sions of Order XVI., r. 11. (a). [BUTT, J.—Can you say that you have brought an action against them within the twelve months required by Lord Campbell's Act?] I must say that or fail. [BUTT, J.—Then do you say that an action against the ship is an action against the parties owning the ship?] According to the form of the writ it is addressed to the "owners and parties interested in the ship or vessel A. B." It is to be noticed that in this particular case the ship was never arrested and the owners undertook to put in an appearance. [BUTT, J.—You want to turn an action in rem into an action in personam. I do not think that ever has been done.] In an action of possession the court has directed that the managing owner should appear as defendant. [BUTT, J.—Can you refer me to any case in which the court has engrafted parties on to an action in rem?] I know of no authority which says it shall not be done, and in a recent case, The Hollandia (not reported), Sir James Hannen joined the pilot. It may be that prior to the Judicature Act this could not be done, but I submit that your Lordship now has the power under Order XVI., r. 11., the important words of which are, "in order to enable the court effectually and completely to adjudicate upon and settle all the questions involved in the cause of matter." [BUTT, J.—I can add a pilot under this order upon the ground that you cannot do effective justice without it. Dr. Phillimore, as amicus curiæ, referred to the case of The Hope (1 W. Rob. 154), where Dr. Lushington had expressed an opinion that it was not competent for the court to engraft upon a proceeding in rem a personal action against the master.] In two cases subsequent to the Judicature Act owners have been added personally to an action in rem:

The Native Pearl, 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 515; 37 L. T. Rep. N. S. 542;

The Annandale, 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 489; 2 P. Div. 179; 37 L. T. Rep. N. S. 364.

According to the note at p. 23 of Coote's Admiralty Practice, 2nd edit., the same thing could have been done prior to the Judicature Act. (b) [BUTT, J.—That I doubt. Your difficulty here seems to me that, having got an action which is useless, you are asking me to turn it from an action in rem into an action in personam. I do not think that is contemplated by the rule. What you are seeking to do is to deprive the defendants of the benefit of the provision in Lord Campbell's Act which says the action shall be brought within twelve months.]

J. P. Aspinall for the defendants contra.—The Native Pearl (ubi sup.) is hardly a binding authority in this case, because the action there was an action in rem under the Admiralty Court Act not to enforce a maritime lien, but merely a right against owners commencing from the date of action. In the present case the action is an action in rem irrespective of statute. Moreover, that action was a default proceeding, and hence the addition of the defendant was not argued. Even assuming the present application was acceded to, the plaintiffs would be out of time because by the provisions of Order XVI. r. 11, the proceedings as against the party added are to be deemed to have begun only on the service of the writ or notice.

Bucknill in reply.—This is not the proper time to take this last objection, though it may well be a question hereafter. [BUTT, J.—That is very true, but you must remember that before my attention was called to those words I was against you, and although I am anxious to prevent a great injustice being done by reason of this lapse of time, I can now see no reason for straining my first impression and acceding to your application.] Inasmuch as the ship was never arrested, the parties have really appeared personally. [BUTT, J.—No, they have not. They only appear to protect their interest in the res. They are not personally defendants.]

BUTT, J.—I have very grave doubts indeed whether this is a matter over which I have power to act in the way I am now asked. However, I should have been strongly disposed to have gone counter to the inclination in my own mind had I thought that it would prevent the objection as to time being urged and availing the defendants in their contention. But it seems to me that it would avail, and I therefore must act upon what was my impression at the outset and refuse to make the order.

Aspinall asked for costs.

BUTT, J.—Had I made the order it must have been upon payment of costs by the defendants, as the necessity for doing so was caused by their mistake. They must, therefore, pay the costs.

Motion refused.

(a) Order XVI., r. 11, is as follows: "No cause or matter shall be defeated by reason of the mis-joinder or non-joinder of parties, and the court may in every cause or matter deal with the matter in controversy so far as regards the rights and interests of the parties actually before it. The court or a judge may at any stage of the proceedings, either upon or without the application of either party, and on such terms as may appear to the court or a judge to be just, order that the names of any parties improperly joined, whether as plaintiffs or as defendants, be struck out, and that the names of any parties, whether plaintiffs or defendants, who ought to have been joined, or whose presence before the court may be necessary in order to enable the court effectually and completely to adjudicate upon and settle all the questions involved in the cause or matter, be added. No person shall be added as a plaintiff suing without a next friend or as the next friend of a plaintiff, under any disability, without his own consent in writing thereto. Every party whose name is so added as defendant shall be served with a writ of summons or notice in manner hereinafter mentioned, or in such manner as may be prescribed by any special order, and the proceedings as against such party shall be deemed to have begun only on the service of such writ or notice."—ED.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Feb. 25, 26, and March 17, 1884.

(Before the LORD CHANCELLOR (Selborne), LORDS BLACKBURN and WATSON.)

BIRRELL v. DRYER. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM THE SECOND DIVISION OF THE COURT OF SESSION IN SCOTLAND.

Marine insurance — Time policy — Warranty — Ambiguity—Maxim, Fortius contra proferentem —Judicial notice.

Whether the underwriters or the owners are to be considered as the proferentes in regard to a condition in a policy of insurance, depends upon the character and substance of the particular condition.

The respondents, shipowners, claimed against the appellants, the underwriters of a time policy of insurance, as for a total loss, and the appellants resisted the claim on the ground of a breach of a warranty in the policy. The warranty was "No St. Lawrence" between certain dates, and it was admitted that the vessel had navigated the gulf of St. Lawrence within the prohibited time, but the owners contended that the warranty applied only to the river St. Lawrence. It was proved that the navigation of the gulf was dangerous at that season, but less so than that of the river.

Held (reversing the judgment of the court below), that, in the absence of any evidence to that effect, the words of the warranty disclosed no ambiguity or uncertainty sufficient to prevent the application of the ordinary rules of construction as to negative words, and that both the gulf and the river were prohibited.

A court should take judicial notice of the geographical positions of, and general names applied to a district as shown on the Admiralty chart.

THIS was an appeal from a judgment of the majority of the Second Division of the Court of Session in Scotland, consisting of the Lord Justice Clerk (Lord Moncrieff), Lords Young and Rutherfurd Clark (Lord Craighill dissenting). which had reversed a judgment of the Lord Ordinary (McLaren). The case is reported in 10 Court Sess. Cas. 4th series, 585; and 20 Sc. L. Rep. 385.

The action was brought by the respondents, who were shipowners, against the appellants, who were underwriters of a policy of insurance, under circumstances which appear in the head-note above and in the judgments of their Lordships, where also the arguments are sufficiently referred to.

The Solicitor-General (Sir F. Herschell, Q.C.), Cohen, Q.C., and Hollams appeared for the appellants.

The Lord Advocate (Balfour, Q.C.) and Barnes for the respondents.

At the conclusion of the arguments their Lordships took time to consider their judgment.

March 17.—Their Lordships gave judgment as follows:—

The LORD CHANCELLOR (Selborne).—My Lords: The question on this appeal is whether the words "warranted no St. Lawrence between the 1st Oct. and the 1st April" in a time policy on the respondents' ship L. de V. Chipman effected with underwriters of Glasgow on the 8th June, 1878, for the twelve months from 29th May 1878 to 28th May 1879, include the Gulf of St. Lawrence or are confined to the river of that name? Many witnesses were examined on both sides to show in what sense they understood these words, and thought that others ought to understand them, but none of those witnesses proved that they bore either the one sense or the other, according to any local or general usage; nor were they able to refer to any instances in which the question had practically arisen, and had been practically determined. Conflicting opinions of individuals, as to the proper interpretation of words in a written contract, would be entitled to no weight, even if it were clear that they were admissible. Your Lordships have, therefore, to consider whether the ordinary rules and principals of construction do, or do not, enable you to ascertain the subject to which these words apply, having regard to those extrinsic facts which are either within your judicial cognisance, or sufficiently established by the evidence. The facts of which I think your Lordships are entitled to take judicial notice, independently of evidence, are these: The great river which discharges the waters of the North American lakes, and the gulf into which it flows, both bear the name of St. Lawrence. There is a Cape St. Lawrence at the main southern entrance into the gulf. The river below Quebec expands into a broad estuary, passing, on each side of the island of Anticosti, into the gulf. The river and the gulf are thus naturally and immediately connected with each other, the access to and the outlet from the river being through the gulf, which is a large water-space, landlocked between the west coast of Newfoundland and the southern, eastern, and northern shores of Canada, New Brunswick, and Nova Scotia, having within it the considerable islands of Anticosti, Prince Edward's Island, and Cape Breton, and connected with the Atlantic Ocean by several channels, of which all but one are narrow. If the words "St. Lawrence" were preceded by the definite article, a noun substantive in the singular number must be understood, which, I think, could only be the "river"; and it would not, in my opinion, be consistent either with the popular or with the geographical use of the word "estuary," which means the tidal part of a river, to regard the whole waters of the gulf as forming part of the estuary, properly so called, of the river St. Lawrence. Here, however, the words are not "the St. Lawrence," they are negative, "no St. Lawrence."

The other material facts, established by the evidence, are these. The navigation of the river St. Lawrence is open, and generally safe, from about the beginning of April till October, after which it becomes dangerous, chiefly from its liability to be impeded by frost, which often sets in suddenly and rapidly. After the middle of November vessels cannot remain there, except at the risk of being frozen in for the winter; and from the beginning of December till about April the navigation is, in ordinary seasons, entirely closed. At the end of March or the beginning of April the ice breaks up and descends into the gulf. The navigation of the gulf is never absolutely closed, but the harbours and narrow waters round its shores, on the south side as well as elsewhere, are often blocked up, or much impeded, in the winter by ice. Ships with grain and other cargo continue to sail from the Bay of

(a) Reported by C. E. MALDEN, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Chaleur, from Miramichi, and from Prince Edward's Island, for some time after the river is closed, and sealing vessels visit the gulf during the winter. "As a general rule," according to the book called "the St. Lawrence Pilot," quoted by one of the appellants' witnesses, "the navigation is not considered safe, "even in the southern part of the gulf, after the first week in December or before the 15th of April." "From about January," according to the evidence of one of the respondents' witnesses, "the gulf is practically closed," by which I understand closed to vessels of any considerable burthen engaged in the ordinary trades of those ports. During this winter season the gulf is dangerous, (though most of the witnesses consider its dangers to be less than those of the river), chiefly from fogs and from snowstorms, which are very dense and frequent. These dangers are enhanced to ships engaged in the usual trade of that region by the nature of their cargoes—timber, and more especially grain; and though the same kind of weather is also met with in the same season outside, upon the banks of Newfoundland, the danger in the gulf is greater because there is less sea-room there. Besides this the Anticosti lights are all put out in the middle of December, and, as the winter advances, the Belle Isle light, and all others of any consequence in the gulf, except some small local lights and that of St. Paul's, twelve or thirteen miles from Cape North, are also extinguished. As to the risks of this navigation from an insurer's point of view, there is a general consent among the witnesses on both sides. [His Lordship here quoted the evidence of several witnesses to the effect that the navigation both of the gulf and river St. Lawrence was especially dangerous during the winter months, and that they were much shunned by underwriters during that period.] No evidence was given to show that any such insurance as that now in question could have been effected on similar terms (10 guineas per cent. premium) by a policy so expressed as unequivocally to leave the gulf open to the vessel insured during the prohibited months; and it is significant that two of the respondents' witnesses, who had been in the habit of insuring by policies in the form now in question, which they say they interpret as prohibiting the river navigation only, have themselves, since the meaning of the warranty was brought into controversy by the present action, been obliged to have their policies made out in an altered form, expressly excluding the gulf. Reading this contract of insurance in the light of the relevant facts, it appears to me that there are two subjects, distinguishable from but closely connected with each other, to both of which the descriptive words "St. Lawrence" may apply, and that there is nothing to confine them to the one rather than to the other of those subjects. The office of the negative form of expression "no St. Lawrence" is not to define, but is to prohibit or exclude. It occurs in a contract for the purposes and objects of which it is reasonable and probable that both the gulf and the river should have been meant to be excluded. The reasons for such exclusion during the prohibited months are applicable to both, though in different degrees at different times during that period. I agree, under these circumstances, with the opinion and conclusion of the Lord Ordinary. I do not think that the evidence discloses any ambiguity or uncertainty sufficient to prevent the application to this case of the ordinary rules and principles of construction; and, according to those rules and principles, the whole St. Lawrence navigation, both of gulf and river, is, in my judgment, within the fair and natural meaning of these negative words, and is therefore prohibited during the months in question. There does not appear to me to be any necessity for resorting to presumptions in favour of or against either party, whether founded on the rule Fortius contra proferentem, or on the onus of proving an exception from the general affirmative terms of this contract. I therefore move your Lordships to reverse the interlocutor appealed from, and to restore that of the Lord Ordinary with costs.

Lord BLACKBURN.—My Lords: I also think that the judgment of the Lord Ordinary was right. The contract is in a time policy for a year, in which is indorsed as part of the contract "warranted no St. Lawrence between the 1st Oct. and the 1st April." No one can, I think, doubt that the document would, like every policy of marine insurance, be very difficult to construe if it were now for the first time brought before a court, but there is no dispute as to the meaning and effect of the contract. The question, as the Lord Ordinary, I think very accurately, says, is not one of degree but of identification. If the ship was during the prohibited time within the district described by the words "St. Lawrence," as here used, there is a defence. It is now admitted that she was within the Gulf of St. Lawrence, and was not within the river of St. Lawrence, and one question is whether "no St. Lawrence" means neither in the gulf nor the river, or means only not in the river. In Uhde v. Walter (3 Camp. 16), where the ship was insured from London to "any port in the Baltic," and was lost when proceeding to Revel, in the Gulf of Finland, Lord Ellenborough, C.J. said: "I think it is clearly competent to the plaintiff to prove that the 'Baltic' is nomen generale, comprehending in common understanding the gulfs and inlets which communicate with the sea, laid down as 'the Baltic' in geographical charts. If the Gulf of Finland is to be considered as the Baltic the ship was sailing on the voyage insured at the time of the capture, and there can be no objection to admit evidence as to the understood limits of any particular sea." And, independent of the high authority of Lord Ellenborough, I think that in applying a local description to the particular spot, some evidence must be admissible. But the evidence received here does not go further than to show that several persons, having no better means of judging than the court, have formed an opinion one way, and several others have formed the opposite opinion, and it leaves the case as it was before.

Reliance was placed by some of the judges below on the maxim Fortius contra proferentem. I do not think that the description of the district excluded can be considered as the words of one party more than of the other. The shipowner, knowing where he is likely to employ his ship, and that he does not intend to use her in some district, generally puts on the ship a description of that district in order to induce the underwriters to agree to a lower premium. I am by no means prepared to say that in some cases, where the description of the excepted district is special, it may not be right to say that these are the words of the assured. But where the description is, like this, general, I think that the assured has a right to suppose that the underwriters understand that description as they ought to understand it. It is alike for the interest of the assured and the underwriters that the description should be definite, and that is alluded to in the warranty "no British America between the 1st Oct. and the 1st April." No one could imagine that there was a material difference in the risk between a voyage from the most northern port in the United States and one from the most southern port of British North America, or between a voyage commenced on the last day which is not prohibited and one commenced on the first day which is prohibited; but a fixed limit is agreed on to prevent disputes. I think that the court should take judicial notice of the geographical position and the general names applied to such districts as this—in short, of all that we see in the Admiralty chart of this part of the sea. I do not know whether the first discoverers of America called the Gulf that of St. Lawrence, and then gave the same name to the river, or vice versâ, nor do I think it material. The name has for many years been applied to both. I think that, applying the name as we find it used in charts and by geographers to a well-defined district, it includes both the river and the gulf.

Lord WATSON,—My Lords: The appellants in their pleadings allege as a matter of fact that, by the general custom of merchants, the words "warranted no St. Lawrence" in a policy of marine insurance include both the gulf and the river of that name. The respondents, on the other hand, aver that, according to mercantile custom, these words refer exclusively to the river St. Lawrence, and also that, assuming the truth of the appellant's allegations, the L. de V. Chipman was not navigated within the limits of the gulf. In the court below the parties were allowed to lead proof of their respective averments; but in the arguments addressed to the House, it was admitted on both sides that the appellants and respondents have equally failed to prove the statements which they made on record. It must, therefore, be taken as an established fact that there was s breach of warranty through the vessel being navigated within the limits of the Gulf of St. Lawrence during the voyage in the course of which she was lost, if it be held that the warranty applies to the gulf. In that case it follows that the respondents cannot recover under the policy either the average loss accruing during the deviation, or for the total loss which subsequently occurred. In the absence of evidence sufficient to show that a technical meaning has been attached to the words "no St. Lawrence," or, it is accurate to say, in consequence of its being established by the evidence that the words have no technical meaning, it becomes necessary for the court to construe them; and, in construing them, I apprehend that it is perfectly legitimate to take into account such extrinsic facts as the parties themselves either had, or must be held to have had, in view when they entered into the contract of insurance. The evidence of both parties was properly directed to the statements of fact upon which they relied in their record, to which the proof allowed was necessarily limited, and the result is that upon various matters, which it might have been of importance to investigate, we have no information. But there are certain facts established by the respondents' as well as the appellants' evidence, which appear to me to be very useful in considering what significance must be attached to the expression "no St. Lawrence." These facts are (1) that there is a gulf, well defined by the peculiar contour of its shores, into which a great navigable river debouches, and that both gulf and river bear the same name, St. Lawrence; (2) that, although there are ports within the gulf to which there is a separate shipping trade, yet, for many trading purposes, the gulf and the river are parts of the same navigation; and (3) that during several months of the year the navigation is exceptionally dangerous.

Two at least of the three learned judges who formed the majority of the Second Division have held that "no St. Lawrence" must be applied to the river only, on the ground that the expression is ambiguous, and that the ambiguity must be solved adversely to the appellants, because "the underwriters are the proferentes with regard to a policy of insurance." That the underwriters may be rightly held to be the proferentes with regard to many conditions in a policy I do not doubt; whether they ought to be so held depends, in each case, upon the character and substance of the condition. In the present case there are many considerations which lead to the inference that the clause in question is not one constructed and inserted by the appellants alone, and for their own protection merely. It was, in point of fact, inserted in the contract by the agent of the respondents; and it is in form a warranty by them that their vessel will not be navigated in certain waters—a matter which it was entirely within their power to regulate. These considerations point rather to the respondents themselves being the proferentes; but I think the substance of the warranty must be looked to, and that in substance its authorship is attributable to both parties alike. The main object of the clause is to define the limits within which the vessel is to be kept while she is navigated under the policy, and that appears to me to be as much the concern of the shipowner as of the underwriters. To define the limits within which the vessel is to be navigated for the purpose of a time policy is, in principle, precisely the same thing as to describe the voyage for which a vessel is insured under an ordinary policy. In both cases it is a definition of the subject-matter of the insurance, a term of the contract, the settlement of which must, in my judgment, be regarded, in a case like the present, as the deliberate act of both parties. Although the rule of construction contra proferentem may not apply, I think that it was rightly argued for the respondents that, seeing the clause in question occurs in the shape of an exception from a leading term of the policy which gives the vessel leave to navigate in any waters, it can only receive effect in so far as it is plain and unambiguous. But I am not satisfied that there is any ambiguity, such as will avail the respondents, to be found in the clause when it is read as a whole. The ambiguity, according to the argument of the respondents, consists in this—that the words may denote either the river, or both gulf and river, and according to the view taken by Lord Young, consists in their being applicable either to the river, or to the gulf, or to both. It is not matter of dispute that the name "St. Lawrence" is applicable to the gulf and also to the river and that, as suggested by Lord Young, it is equally correct to designate the gulf and river as the gulf and river of St. Lawrence; and if one could conceive a case of the words "St. Lawrence" standing by themselves in a policy, without any qualifying context, they certainly would be ambiguous, if not unintelligible. But in the present case any ambiguity which might otherwise have arisen is expelled by the word "no." It is a universal negative, and, in my opinion, excludes all navigable waters, salt or fresh, bearing the name of "St. Lawrence," which can reasonably be held to have been within the contemplation of the parties to the policy. If the river had been the only navigable water in North America known as "St. Lawrence," and there had been elsewhere a gulf of that name, I might have hesitated to hold that the latter was within their contemplation; but the gulf and river of St. Lawrence are so intimately connected, and the perils attendant upon their winter navigation so much akin, that I have come to the conclusion that the warranty must be held to exclude both. Being of the same opinion with the Lord Ordinary and Lord Craighill, I agree with your Lordships that the interlocutor of the Second Division ought to be reversed, and that of the Lord Ordinary restored.

COURT OF APPEAL.

April 22, 23, and 28, 1884.

(Before Brett, M.R., Bowen and Fry, L.JJ.)

The Vera Cruz. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM THE PROBATE, DIVORCE, AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION (ADMIRALTY).

Collision—Lord Campbell's Act (9 & 10 Vict. c. 93) Action in rem—Foreign ship—Jurisdiction—Admiralty Court Act (24 Vict. c. 10), s. 7—Limitation of liability—Appeal—Practice.

The Admiralty Division of the High Court of Justice has no jurisdiction to entertain an action in rem under Lord Campbell's Act, and hence the personal representatives of a deceased person killed by the negligence of those on board a foreign ship, in a collision between that ship and a British ship on waters within Her Majesty's dominions cannot sustain an action in rem against the owners of the foreign ship to recover damages for the loss of the deceased; but, semble (per Brett, M.R.), that, if in action for limitation of liability some of the claimants are the persons mentioned in Lord Campbell's Act, the Admiralty Division may entertain the claim.

Although, in consequence of the Court of Appeal being equally divided in opinion, the decision of the court below stands, yet the Court of Appeal is not bound thereby on a subsequent occasion, though, semble (per Brett M.R.), it is otherwise in the case of the House of Lords,

This was an action in rem brought under Lord Campbell's Act by Mary Seward, the widow and administratrix of William Seward deceased, late master of the British schooner Agnes, against the owner of the Spanish steamship Vera Cruz, to recover compensation for the pecuniary loss sustained by the plaintiff in consequence of William Seward's death, which was occasioned by a collision between the Agnes and the Vera Cruz, on waters within Her Majesty's dominions.

The collision took place in the Crosby Channel, at the entrance to the Mersey, between the Crosby and Formby lightships, on the 12th Aug. 1882.

An action in rem had previously been brought against the Vera Cruz by the owners of the Agnes, to recover damages for the loss of the Agnes. In that action the court had found both ships to blame.

The defendant in the present action appeared under protest (a), and the following petition on protest against the jurisdiction of the court was filed on his behalf:

1. The plaintiff is a British subject and is resident at or near Ulverstone in the county of Lancaster.

2. The defendant is a subject of His Majesty the King of Spain and is resident within that kingdom.

3. The defendant is the sole owner of the steamship or vessel Vera Cruz, which is a Spanish vessel belonging to the port of Bilboa, in Spain, and which is not registered in the United Kingdom of Great Britain.

4. On or about the 12th Aug. 1882, the Vera Cruz was in the Crosby Channel between the Crosby and Formby lightships, on a voyage from Liverpool to ports in Spain and elsewhere, and whilst in the prosecution of the said voyage, and when at the place aforesaid, the Vera Cruz came into collision with the British vessel, the schooner Agnes, and by reason of the said collision the Agnes was sunk and her master and some of her crew and passengers were drowned.

5. The Vera Cruz was in the port of Liverpool in the month of July 1883.

6. On or about the 13th July 1883, the Vera Cruz was arrested in a suit in rem instituted in the Admiralty Division of this honourable court by the owners of the schooner Agnes to recover damages sustained by the owners of the Agnes by reason of the aforesaid collision. The present action in rem was commenced by the plaintiff on the 23rd Nov. 1882, and the indorsement on the said writ is in the words and figures following: "The plain-

(a) It would appear from this case that the Admiralty Court procedure of appearance under protest is not abolished by the Rules of the Supreme Court 1883. By these rules it is enacted that "The orders and rules mentioned in Appendix O. hereto are hereby annulled, and the following orders and rules shall stand in lieu thereof." In Appendix O. are contained the rules, orders, and regulations for the High Court of Admiralty 1859 and 1871, by which it was directed (inter alia) that "If the proctor intends to object to the jurisdiction of the court, the appearance may be entered under protest." The result of this would at first sight appear to be that this mode of procedure was abolished were it not for Order LXXII., r. 2, which states that, "Where no other provision is made by the Acts or these Rules, the present procedure and practice remain in force;" and on reference to the rules it will be found that no provision for appearance under protest is made. However, by Order XII., r. 30, a defendant is entitled to enter a "conditional" appearance, and then move to set aside the service of the writ upon him, a procedure similar in principle to appearance under protest. On this subject see the cases of The Pieve Superiore (vol. 2, p. 319; L. Rep. 5 P. C. 482; The Vivar (vol. 3, p. 308; L. Rep. 2 P. Div. 29), The City of Mecca (vol. 4, p. 412; L. Rep. 6 P. Div. 106), and The Leon XIII. (vol. 5, p. 73 L. Rep. 8 P. Div. 121).

tiff as administratrix, with the will annexed of her late husband William Seward, deceased, late master of the vessel Agnes, claims £1000 against the owners of the ship or vessel Vera Cruz and her freight for damages for the loss of the said William Seward's life, occasioned by a collision which took place at the mouth of the Mersey in the month of Aug. 1882, and the sum of £3 3s. for costs. If the amount claimed is paid to the plaintiff or her solicitor or agents within four days from the service hereof, further proceedings will be stayed."

7. Bail was given in the said first-mentioned action and the Vera Cruz was thereupon released and sailed from England on or about the 17th July, 1883.

8. This honourable court has no jurisdiction to entertain the said cause of damages for loss of life, and by reason thereof the service of the said writ on the Vera Cruz is in the circumstances stated in this petition irregular and void.

The defendants therefore pray this honourable court to pronounce against the jurisdiction of this honourable court and to dismiss this suit with damages and costs.

The allegations in the protest, with the exception of paragraph 8, were admitted by the plaintiffs.

On the petition coming on for hearing, Butt, J., being bound by the decision in The Franconia (3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 435; 36 L. T. Rep. N. S. 640; 2 P. Div. 163), dismissed it without expressing any opinion on the subject. In The Franconia (ubi sup.), in consequence of the Court of Appeal being equally divided, the decision of Sir R. Phillimore, that the Admiralty Division had jurisdiction to entertain an action in rem under Lord Campbell's Act, stood.

The defendant was now appealing from Butt, J.'s decision. The following Acts of Parliament were referred to in the course of the argument:

The preamble and sect. 2 of Lord Campbell's Act:

Whereas no action at law is now maintainable against a person who by his wrongful act, neglect, or default may have caused the death of another person, and it is oftentimes right and expedient that the wrongdoer in such case should be answerable in damages for the injury so caused by him: Be it therefore enacted by the Queen's Most Excellent Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, and Commons, in this present Parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, that whensoever the death of a person shall be caused by wrongful act, neglect, or default, and the act, neglect, or default is such as would (if death had not ensued) have entitled the party injured to maintain an action, and recover damages in respect thereof, then and in every such case the person who would have been liable if death had not ensued shall be liable to an action for damages, notwithstanding the death of the person injured, and although the death shall have been caused under such circumstances as amount in law to felony.

2. And be it enacted that every such action shall be for the benefit of the wife, husband, parent, and child of the person whose death shall have been so caused, and shall be brought by and in the name of the executor or administrator of the person deceased; and in every such action the jury may give such damages as they think proportioned to the injury resulting from such death to the parties respectively for whom and for whose benefit such action shall be brought; and the amount so recovered, after deducting the costs not recovered from the defendant, shall be divided amongst the beforementioned parties in such shares as the jury by their verdict shall find and direct.

Sect. 7 of the Admiralty Court Act 1861:

The High Court of Admiralty shall have jurisdiction over any claim for damage done by any ship.

Dr. Phillimore and Bucknill for the appellant, the owner of the Vera Cruz.—It is submitted that the decision of Sir Robert Phillimore in The Franconia (3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 435; 36 L. T. Rep. N. S. 640; 2 P. Div. 163) is wrong, and should be reversed. The fact that, owing to an equal division of opinion among the judges of this court, that decision stood, does not now preclude this court from reversing it. The words "damage done" in the Admiralty Court Act 1861, s. 7, do not cover a claim under Lord Campbell's Act. Notwithstanding the decisions in

The Sylph, 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 37; 17 L. T. Rep. N. S. 519; L. Rep. 2 Ad. & Ecc. 24;
The Explorer, 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 507; 23 L. T. Rep. N. S. 405; L. Rep. 3 Ad. & Ecc. 289;
The Beta, 20 L. T. Rep. N. S. 988; 2 P. C. N. S. 447;
The Guldfaxe, 3 Mar. Law. Cas. O. S. 201; 19 L. T. Rep. N. S. 748; L. Rep. 2 Ad. & Ecc. 325; it is to be noticed that none of them are binding on this court, and moreover the Queen's Bench has decided otherwise:

Smith v. Brown, 1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 56; 24 L. T Rep. N. S. 808; L. Rep. 6 Q. B. 729;
James v. London and South-Western Railway Company, 1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 428; 27 L. T. Rep. N. S. 382; L. Rep. 7 Ex. 187, 287;
Simpson v. Blues, 1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 326; 26 L. T. Rep. N. S. 697; L. Rep. 7 C. P. 290.

It is true that, by reason of the Merchant Shipping Acts allowing limitation of liability in cases of loss of life, claims under Lord Campbell's Act may be entertained by the Chancery and Admiralty Divisions, but that would only be so in cases where the owners of the wrongdoing ship had admitted their liability:

The London and South-Western Railway Company v. James, L. Rep. 8 Ch. App. 241; 1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 526; 38 L. T. Rep. N. S. 48:
Glaholm v. Barker, L. Rep. 1 Ch. App. Cas. 223 14 L. T. Rep. N. S. 880; 2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 298, 380.

An English statute ought not, in the absence of express words, to be construed so as to impose liabilities upon foreigners for acts committed outside the territorial jurisdiction of England. The mode of assessing damages under Lord Campbell's Act is opposed to the contention that the Legislature intended that claims under that Act might be enforced by a proceeding in rem.

French for the respondent. — The words "damage done" cover personal injury and loss of life. If so, there has been damage done to the widow of the deceased, inasmuch as she, by her husband's death, has suffered pecuniary loss:

The Beta (ubi sup.);
The Ruckers, 4 C. Rob. 73.

Foreign shipowners can limit their liability for loss of life, and claims under Lord Campbell's Act are entertained in the registry of the Admiralty Division for the purpose of determining what amount the several claimants in respect of damage to ship, life, and effects are respectively to get. If the court has no jurisdiction to entertain these claims, it will be impossible to apply limitation of liability. Again, assume the case of a ship the shares in which belong to what is known as a single ship company; assume she has occasioned loss of life by improper navigation; and assume that subsequently the company goes into liquidation and is wound-up. In order that the Chancery Division may rateably distribute the proceeds of the sale of the ship, it will be necessary that claims under Lord Campbell's Act arising from the "damage done" by the ship should be entertained. If, then, the Admiralty and Chancery Divisions have this indirect jurisdiction, why should the Admiralty Court Act 1861 be so construed as to exclude the direct jurisdiction? The advantages of construing the Act so as to bring the present claim within it are obvious. The proceeding in rem gives an easy and effective remedy. A proceeding in personam, where the wrongdoing ship belongs to a foreigner, is in many cases practically useless. It is, moreover, submitted that this court is bound by its decision in The Franconia (ubi sup.). The effect of that decision was to confirm the decision of Sir Robert Phillimore. In the House of Lords, were a decision of this court to stand by reason of an equal division amongst their Lordships, the House of Lords would be bound by that decision on subsequent occasions. If so, the effect of an equal division among the judges of this court has the same result.

Dr. Phillimore in reply.—There may be reasons why an equal division in the House of Lords should bind it on subsequent occasions, on the ground that it is the final and ultimate tribunal of all. In the present case the effect of the decision in The Franconia (ubi sup.) was not to confirm Sir Robert Phillimore's decision, but merely to leave it standing, as if there had been no appeal:

Bright v. Hutton, 3 H. of L. Cas. 341;
Ridsdale v. Clifton, 2 P. Div. 276; 34 L. T. Rep. N. S. 515;
Thompson v. Ward, L. Rep. 6 C. P. 327;
Beamish v. Beamish, 9 H. of L. Cas. 274.

Cur. adv. vult.

April 28.—Brett, M. R.—In this case an action has been brought in the Admiralty Division against the owners of the Spanish steamship Vera Cruz to recover damages under what is called Lord Campbell's Act; that is, to recover damages on behalf of the relatives of the master of a British ship, who had been killed in a collision between his ship and the Vera Cruz. The collision happened, I think, within the realm of England; it happened within the three-mile limit. So far, therefore, it is within the municipal jurisdiction of England. But the owner of the Vera Cruz is a foreigner resident abroad, and the manner in which he was brought before the Admiralty Court was by seizing his ship while she was in England; that is to say, by the process in rem, by means of the seizure of the ship. He himself was not in England, so far as I understand, after the accident, and he never was served personally with a writ, and there was nobody on his behalf who could be served personally, and he never even had notice of this suit. Upon that a protest is entered against the jurisdiction of the court, and Butt, J., without expressing any opinion of his own, felt himself bound by previous decisions of the Court of Admiralty, and overruled the protest, whereupon there is an appeal to this court. Now, here the first point taken was whether this court was bound by a previous decision in the case of The Franconia (ubi sup.), where, upon an appeal on a similar point, this court was equally divided, the result being that the judgment of the Court of Admiralty, in favour of the jurisdiction, stood. It was now argued that in this Court, there having been a case before in which the result of the judgment of this court was that the jurisdiction in rem must be in these cases allowed, this court was therefore bound by that decision. That raises the question whether in any court below the House of Lords the court is bound by a decision, either of its own, or of any other court, where that decision is given by an equal division of the judge who heard the case. As far as my experience goes, when there were three great courts in Westminster Hall, each of them, by way of comity, considered itself bound by a former decision of either of the three courts, being all courts of co-ordinate jurisdiction. But there is no law, either at common law or by statute, which says that a court is bound by the decision of another court. It was traditional comity among the judges in order to enforce uniform decision. Hence, if a court of co-ordinate jurisdiction had come to a determination, the other courts followed it. But that was only comity among the judges. So in the same way there is no law, either at common law or by statute, by which a court is bound by a former judgment of its own. But when a court is equally divided the comity does not exist. Which of the two sides is the one which the court is bound to obey as the predominating authority? Suppose there are four judges, and they are equally divided in opinion, all of those four judges are of equal authority. There is nothing under those circumstances, as it seems to me, upon which comity can be founded. I am perfectly certain myself that, if the reports be examined, it will be found that it was invariable where either a court of co-ordinate jurisdiction or the same court had given a former decision only by equal division of its members, then the court which came afterwards had to elect and choose which of the two equal divisions they agreed with, and that it did not consider itself bound by the former decision. With regard to the House of Lords, it probably is, and I believe is, different, but that is because it is the last and ultimate court. I am not certain that it is conclusive there, but I am inclined to think that it is. The reason for that is that, where a decision has been given by the highest tribunal of all, people must take that to be the law, and it is not to be questioned afterwards, otherwise there would be vacillation in the law. Therefore, I am clear in my own mind that we are not bound by the decision that was formerly given by this court, of which I myself was one of the four judges. I was therefore glad that two of my brother judges here were not members of that court, so that their minds might be brought, unbiassed by any former opinion, to the important question which is raised in this case. I may say for myself that, had I been now persuaded, I would, without a moment's hesitation, have altered my previous view.

Now, the case depends upon this: unless jurisdiction is given by the 7th section of the Admiralty Court Act 1861, there is no jurisdiction. It is important to remember that this is not a case in which the shipowner has been personally served in England so that an action in the Queen's Bench Division might be entertained against him, and that an action has been brought in the Admiralty Division. It would then be an action over which the High Court would have jurisdiction, and the judge of the Admiralty Court, being a judge of the High Court, if other things were in conformity and other conditions were fulfilled, might try the action. It would only then be a question of removing the action from the Admiralty Division to the Queen's Bench

Division. That would not be a question of jurisdiction. But here, unless the claim is within the 7th section of the Admiralty Court Act 1861, there is no jurisdiction. The answer to this question depends, it seems to me, upon this proposition: Does that section apply to the grievance for which a remedy is given in Lord Campbell's Act? The answer to that question depends upon the construction of both those Acts of Parliament. I will first of all take the Admiralty Court Act, the words of which are "The High Court of Admiralty shall have jurisdiction over any claim for damage done by any ship." That Act of Parliament was passed in 1861. In 1860 the case of The Bilbao (Lush. 149; 1 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 5; 3 L. T. Rep. N. S. 338) came before Dr. Lushington. There damage had been done by a foreign ship to a barge either in the Thames or the Medway, and the question was whether the then existing Admiralty statutes gave the Admiralty Court jurisdiction in such a case. Dr. Lushington there pointed out that the then existing Admiralty Act did not give him jurisdiction, because it only gave jurisdiction in the case of damage done to a ship, and not damage done by a ship. In 1861 the present Act of Parliament is passed, in which the words are "any claim for damage done by any ship." In 1862 the case of The Malvina (Lush. 493; 1 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 218; 6 L. T. Rep. N. S. 369), in which there had been damage done by a ship, came before Dr. Lushington. That learned judge there said that it seemed to him that the 7th section of the Admiralty Court Act of 1861 was passed for the purpose of meeting this case, the other statute applying only to damage done to a ship. Now what is the meaning of this 7th section, taking into account the former statute. The words are, "shall have jurisdiction over any claim for damage done by any ship." Is the effect of that to give a jurisdiction in respect of any claim in the nature of an action on the case? It seems to me that the claim is for damage where the ship is the acting instrument of the damage. If you read the section in that way it comes to this: "Shall have jurisdiction over any cause of action, which cause of action is damage done physically by a ship." If that be so, the claim is for damages arising out of a cause of action, which cause of action is a physical injury done to something by the ship. I am not prepared to say that it is confined to damage done to property. I am not prepared to say that, if by mismanagement of a ship her bowsprit or some other part o her were to strike a man on his person and injure him, that would not be damage done by a ship within the meaning of this section. It clearly does not apply to damage done to a man in a ship, but to damage done by a ship, where, as I say, the ship itself is the physical instrument by which the injury is done, and where the cause of action is the physical injury. As I said before, I do not confine the section to property, but to a case where the ship is the instrument by which the damage or injury is caused. If that be the true meaning of the section, what is the cause of action which is given by Lord Campbell's Act? Is it such a cause of action? It seems to me it is not. Lord Campbell's Act was passed to meet cases where a person received what is called a personal injury, that is, injury not to his estate, but to himself as a person, in order to obviate the hardships arising from the doctrine of law that the cause of action died with the person. That was the law prior to Lord Campbell's Act, and Lord Campbell's Act has not altered that maxim or its application. A personal cause of action dies just as much now as it did before. If it be slander, the action dies. If it be personal injury such as breaking a man's arm or leg, or otherwise injuring him, it dies with him. The executor cannot bring an action as executor for the injury to the estate of the deceased. The man has been killed, and there is no right of action. His executor cannot bring an action for the benefit either of his estate or for the benefit of his devisees. What Lord Campbell's Act does is to give a right of action to an executor or administrator, not as representing the deceased, but as representing other people who before had no right of action. But to give such a right of action there must be something more than the killing of the man, and the executor or administrator is a mere instrument to maintain the action on behalf of other people who have sustained pecuniary damage by the killing of the deceased. The executor acts for these people, and not for the deceased. Now what is it gives this cause of action? The death of the deceased caused by the negligence of the defendant is part of the cause of action; but by itself it is not the cause of action. It is necessary that there should be, owing to the death of the deceased, an injury done to those persons on whose behalf the action is brought, which injury has been held to be on the construction of the Act a pecuniary injury. Therefore the cause of action is not the death of the deceased caused by the negligence of the defendant, but, although that is a necessary part of the cause of action, the real cause of action under Lord Campbell's Act is the pecuniary loss to the persons defined by the Act. The cause of action therefore is not a cause of action for anything done by the ship; that is to say, the thing done by the ship is not the cause of action, and something else is. The thing done by the ship is only an ingredient in the cause of action. If so, the Admiralty Court Act does not apply to this case, and therefore does not give jurisdiction to the Admiralty Court to try directly such an action. I wish to be particular in what I am saying now—to try directly such an action.

But I am not prepared to say that in no case can the Admiralty Court inquire into the amount of damage caused by the death of the deceased through the negligent management of a ship. The Court of Chancery had, and has, jurisdiction to limit the amount of liability of a shipowner to a certain sum per ton of his ship, and if there are several claimants upon the ship to distribute the regulated amount amongst them. But in that case the jurisdiction is given when the liability as to negligence is admitted. That jurisdiction has also passed to the Admiralty Court. In such a suit to distribute the regulated amount per ton amongst several claimants, if any of the claimants is the family of the deceased person, as mentioned in Lord Campbell's Act, it being necessary to distribute amongst all claimants, it may be, and I am inclined to think it is, that the Admiralty Court or the Court of Chancery, in order to fulfil that which is within their jurisdiction, must entertain claims which, but for that are not within their direct jurisdiction. If a person had a claim against a shipowner at common law—even under Lord Campbell's Act—which claim might be maintained in any of the other divisions, when it comes indirectly before the Court of Admiralty as a necessary part of its jurisdiction, then the Court of Admiralty must, in order to fulfil that which is within its jurisdiction, entertain a claim which could not be directly but which is thus indirectly brought within its jurisdiction. I cannot lay my hand upon the case at the moment, but I remember having to argue this point before Dr. Lushington. It was not with regard to Lord Campbell's Act, but with regard to a bill of lading or charter-party under circumstances where the Admiralty Court had no direct jurisdiction, and the question came indirectly before the court in a case in which it had jurisdiction. I succeeded there in persuading Dr. Lushington of the truth of the proposition which I am now endeavouring to enunciate, viz., that though the court has not direct jurisdiction, yet, if a matter is brought before it indirectly as a necessary part of its jurisdiction, it must, in order to fulfil the jurisdiction which it has, entertain that which otherwise it would not have the jurisdiction to entertain. In that way a claim under Lord Campbell's Act for personal injury done by a ship would, in my opinion, come before the Admiralty Court in a suit where that suit was brought for the purpose of limiting the liability of the shipowner according to the tonnage of his ship, and where it was necessary for the Admiralty Court, in order to apportion the regulated amount amongst the claimants, to know the particular claim of the parties who were claiming under Lord Campbell's Act. For these reasons I maintain my former opinion, in which Lord Bramwell concurred with me, that the Admiralty Court has not, when a claim under Lord Campbell's Act is brought directly before it, any jurisdiction under the Admiralty Court Act 1861, and if it has no jurisdiction under that Act then it has no jurisdiction at all. I am of opinion, therefore, that the decision of Butt, J., which, as I have before said, is no decision of his must be overruled and this appeal allowed.

Bowen, L.J.—I also think, for the reason given by the Master of the Rolls, that this is a case which is still open to our consideration, notwithstanding the decision in The Franconia (ubi sup.). Now passing to the main point, I feel satisfied that the Act of 1861 did not give the necessary jurisdiction to the Admiralty Court to enable it to entertain this claim for personal injuries under Lord Campbell's Act, and I therefore agree with the views expressed by Lord Bramwell and the Master of the Rolls in The Franconia (ubi sup.). Shortly the question is, whether this is a claim for "damage done by a ship." Looking to the history of the legislation on this point, it shows that it is not, and apart from that consideration the obvious meaning of the section is such as to lead me to the same conclusion. The Act gives a right to compensation for "damage done by any ship." That then, and that only, is the cause of action. Now, what does "damage done by any ship" mean? It means damage done by a ship as the noxious instrument, or more correctly speaking, by those in charge of her. But the plaintiff is in this dilemma, that the claim here must be either for the killing of the deceased, or the injury done thereby to his family. But the killing of the deceased per se gives the plaintiff no right of action at all, either at law or under Lord Campbell's Act. If then, to escape this horn of the dilemma, the respondent says her claim is for the injury done to the interests of the dead man's family, the claim is not for something done by the ship, but it arises partly from the death which the ship causes, and partly from a combination of circumstances pecuniary and otherwise with which the ship has nothing to do. The injury done to the family cannot therefore be said to be done by the ship.

Fry, L.J.—I concur with the views expressed by the Master of the Rolls and Bowen, L.J. I think that, notwithstanding the case of The Franconia, the question raised in this case is still open to us. Bearing in mind the observations of Lord Truro in Bright v. Hutton (ubi sup.), and of Lord Cairns in Ridsdale v. Clifton (ubi sup.), there can be no doubt but that we are at liberty to consider this case, but that we are not bound by The Franconia, which only bound the persons who were parties to that action. Now on the point as to jurisdiction, the words in the Admiralty Court Act 1861 are "damages done by any ship." Do those words include injury to the person? I have come to the conclusion that they do, and I concur with James and Baggallay, L.JJ. as to the meaning of the word damages. Secondly, assuming injury to the person is within the meaning of the section, is it sufficiently wide to embrace an action under Lord Campbell's Act? I think not. Take for instance damage done to a barge in the Thames by the bowsprit of a ship, and a person killed by the same thing. In the first case, the injury which is the cause of action is directly caused by the ship. In the second the cause of action is pecuniary injury to the relatives of the deceased, which injury results from the damage done to the deceased by the ship. And it must be admitted even by the plaintiff that this is not an action for "damage done" by the ship, but for pecuniary loss arising out of such damage. In this view I am confirmed by observing the convenience of such a construction, which not only avoids the difficulty as to a trial by jury, but further the conflict between the common law and Admiralty Court rule as to negligence.

ON APPEAL FROM THE PROBATE, DIVORCE, AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION.

Collision—Compulsory pilotage—Passing through the limits of a pilotage district—Exemption—Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 63), s. 41.

Where a steamship puts into a port within a pilotage district for the purpose of coaling whilst bound on a voyage between two places outside such district, although she is only passing through such district, she is not exempt from compulsory pilotage under the provisions of sect. 41 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1862, as that section provides that the exemptions shall not extend to ships loading and discharging therein, and such loading and discharging is not confined to cargo but extends to coaling.

This was an appeal from the judgment of Sir James Hannen in a damage action in rem against the steamship Winston for damages arising out of a collision between that vessel and the steamship Warwick Castle in Dartmouth Harbour, by which he had found that the Winston was exempted from blame on account of her being compulsorily in charge of a pilot.

The facts of the case are fully set out in the report of the case in the court below (49 L. T. Rep. N. S. 403; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 143).

The question at issue which had been decided against the plaintiffs in the court below, and from which the plaintiffs now appealed, was whether a vessel which in passing through a district where pilotage is compulsory, stops within that district for the purpose of coaling only, and not for taking in cargo, is by the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Act 1862, s. 41, compelled to take a pilot; that is, whether the words "loading and discharging" in that section are, or are not, to be construed as relating strictly to cargo.

The section of the Act is as follows:

41. The masters and owners of ships passing through the limits of any pilotage district in the United Kingdom on their voyage between two places, both situate out of such districts, shall be exempted from any obligation to employ a pilot within such district: Provided that the exemption contained in this section shall not apply to ships loading or discharging at any place situate within such district, or at any place situate above such district on the same river or its tributaries.

Cohen, Q.C., Bruce, Q.C., and J. P. Aspinall for the appellants.—The 41st section of the Merchant Shipping Act 1862 would certainly not apply if the vessel had put in for the purpose of getting a new sail or a new anchor, and it ought not to apply to a loading of coals. The following cases were also cited:

Clyde Navigation Commissioners v. Barclay, L. Rep. 1 App. Cas. 790; 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 390; 56 L. T. Rep. N. S. 379;

The General Steam Navigation Company v. British and Colonial Steam Navigation Company, L. Rep. 3 Ex. 330; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 168, 237; 19 L. T. Rep. N. S. 357; 20 Ib. 581; 37 L. J. 194, Ex.; 38 Ib. 97;

The Lion, L. Rep. 2 P. C. 525; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 133, 266; 18 L. T. Rep. N. S. 803; 37 L. J. 39, Adm.

W. G. F. Phillimore and Raikes, for the respondents, were not called upon.

Brett, M.R.—The sole question here is, what is the meaning of 25 & 26 Vict. c. 63, s. 41, as applied to this case. Now, it certainly applies to a place within a pilotage district, which was not the original port of loading or the original port of discharging the ship. It deals with the case of some intermediate part of the voyage. What is the difficulty here? It has been thought extremely hard that, because a ship passed through a portion of the district without any intention of stopping there at all (because the words of the original Act of Parliament speak of being bound to make a signal for and to take a pilot whilst within the district), a pilot should go on board, not for the purpose of amusing himself, but for the purpose of getting pilotage fees, and therefore to remedy this the present Act superseded the 379th section of the Act of 1854, where it was made a part of the exemption that if the ship was passing through she was exempt, but if she anchored she would not be exempt. Now I have no doubt that some ingenious person immediately argued thus upon some given case: that if a ship dropped her anchor for the purpose of turning her round, not for the purpose of doing anything in the place, but merely because the wind was adverse or too light, and she got under a headland, that nevertheless she was bound to have a pilot; and some ingenious person arguing thus thought it was intended to impose the liability by way of proviso on the exemption, so that, although the ship is in the district in an intermediate part of her voyage, and in that sense is passing through, that nevertheless if she does something, although she is passing through in one sense, she must take a pilot. Then it was found that these words, "whilst at anchor," would not do, and so they were obliged to look for something else, and they have looked for something else which is substantial. It would not do to say "using a port," that might be misunderstood, because they have said that where a ship (though in one sense she is passing through) goes into a port for a definite purpose, such as loading or discharging, then she must have a pilot.

If they had meant to say loading or discharging mercantile cargo, nothing would have been so easy as for them to have said so. If it only applies to cargo on board a ship for freight purposes, it would not apply to a yacht or to a mere passenger ship. Why should it not? It merely means that this is the test of her not being merely passing through; it is not a mere momentary stoppage, it is not a mere stoppage which they cannot help by stress of weather, it is one in which she must obviously and necessarily bring herself to an anchor. It is going in for a definite purpose to load or unload. There is nothing in the language of the section which confines it to loading or discharging mercantile cargo. Why should there be, the reason of the thing being to the contrary, the words not being put in to limit, the reason of the thing not being limitation? Therefore it seems to me you must give a plain meaning to the words. If a ship is loading or discharging, whichever it may be, and goes into the district, she is bound to have a pilot on board. That is the meaning of the statute. A case has been suggested where the ship has been brought up and substantially brought up for a long period in the port, and yet did not take a compulsory pilot. It is unnecessary to give my opinion upon this, and I shall reserve my opinion till such a case comes before me.

Fry, L.J.—I am authorised by Lord Justice Bowen to say that he concurs with the opinion of the Master of the Rolls. It seems to me that the natural construction of the word "loading" applies to the present case, and that it was exactly this kind of loading which was in the contemplation of the Legislature in making this 41st section of the Act of 1862, and I have therefore no hesitation in saying that I am of opinion that in this case pilotage was compulsory.

Collision—Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, Art. XIII. 1880—Moderate speed—Dense fog—Bristol Channel—Salvage—Merchant Shipping Act 1873 (36 & 37 Vict. c. 85), s. 16.

Moderate speed for a sailing ship, within the meaning of Art. XIII. of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions 1880 in a dense fog in the Bristol Channel, is the slowest speed that she can go so as to be under command, and, if she carries more sail than is necessary for this purpose, she will be guilty of a breach of the article.

Moderate speed, within the meaning of art. 13 of the Regulations, varies according to the density of the fog; the thicker the fog, the slower ought to be the speed.

Per Butt, J.: Where two ships having been in collision, one of them renders assistance to the other by towing her, being bound by sect. 16 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1873 to stand by and render assistance, quære, whether she is entitled to salvage remuneration, even though she is not to blame for the collision.

This was a consolidated damage action in rem, instituted by the owners of the steamship Peter Graham against the owners of the schooner Beta, to recover damages arising out of a collision between the two vessels on the 26th Aug. 1883 in the Bristol Channel.

The defendants counter-claimed.

The facts alleged on behalf of the plaintiffs were as follows: Shortly before midnight on the 26th Aug. 1883 the steamship Peter Graham, of 516 tons register, was in the Bristol Channel, about fifteen miles N. by E. of the Longships, on a voyage from Swansea to Valencia with a cargo of patent fuel. The wind was very light from the W.S.W., there was a thick fog, and the tide was ebb. The Peter Graham had been turned round on a N.E. by E. course to stem the tide, and was proceeding at dead slow, making about two knots an hour. Her regulation lights were duly exhibited and burning brightly, and her steam-whistle was being duly sounded and a good look-out kept on board of her. Under these circumstances those on board the Peter Graham saw the boom of the schooner Beta about two points on the starboard bow and about 100 yards off, and, although the engines of the Peter Graham were reversed full speed and her helm put hard-a-port, the two vessels came into collision, the jibboom of the Beta striking the starboard bow of the Peter Graham. Both vessels sustained considerable injury. The Peter Graham stood by the Beta till daylight, and at 5.30 a.m. on the 27th took her in tow, and towed her to the Mumbles Roads off Swansea, where she cast anchor in a place of safety about 6 p.m. on the same day. The plaintiffs charged the defendants with breach of articles 12, 13, and 22 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea 1830, and claimed judgment for the damages occasioned by the collision, together with such an amount of salvage as to the court should seem just.

The facts alleged on behalf of the defendants were as follows: Shortly before 11.50 p.m. on the 26th Aug. 1883 the schooner Beta, of 97 tons, was in the Bristol Channel, about twenty miles W.N.W. from Trevose Lighthouse, on a voyage from Cardiff to Devonport, with cargo of coals. The Beta, under all plain sail, was making about two knots, and heading about N.W. by W., close-hauled on the port tack. The wind was light from the W.S.W., the weather foggy, and the tide flood of about the force of one knot. The Beta had her regulation side lights exhibited and burning brightly, and her foghorn was being sounded in accordance with the regulations, and a good look-out was being kept on board of her. Under these circumstances those on the Beta saw the masthead light of the Peter Graham about three points on the port bow, and distant about 400 yards, and although the steamship was hailed to starboard, and the Beta was brought up into the wind, the Peter Graham came on, and struck with her stem and starboard side the Beta on her bowsprit and cutwater, doing her great damage. The defendants charged the plaintiffs with breach of articles 12, 13, 17, and 18 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea 1880.

On behalf of the plaintiffs evidence was called to prove that the foghorn of the Beta was not heard by those on board the steamer. According to the undisputed evidence of a surveyor, called on behalf of the plaintiffs, the topgallant forecastle plate on the starboard bow of the Peter Graham was smashed in about seven feet, and one plate further aft bulged and bent, second plate down smashed in, and also two shear stroke plates smashed in about thirteen feet from the stem, &c.

On the 5th Dec. 1883 the action came on for hearing before Butt, J. assisted by Trinity Masters.

C. Hall, Q.C. (with him Bucknill) for the plaintiffs.

Myburgh, Q.C. (with him Aspinall) for the defendants.

At the conclusion of the arguments, the learned Judge found the schooner alone to blame. In his judgment having found that the Beta's foghorn was blown by bellows, he proceeded as follows:—Whether it was blown quite as often as it ought to have been, and whether it was sounded within two minutes of the time of the collision, I confess to having some doubt. So much for the foghorn. But now each vessel says the other was going too fast. I am dealing with the question of negligence on the part of the Beta, and I propose first to consider the question, was the Beta going too fast? Now, I state at once, because I think it is the fair way on these occasions, that there is a difference of opinion between my assessors as to the speed of the Beta. One of the two gentlemen thinks that she was going under an undue press of sail and was making more headway through the water than she ought to have been doing on this night with the weather as it was. She was under all plain sail, including two square topsails, and it is thought by one of my assessors that that, coupled with the fact of the very severe blow she delivered to the steamer and the damage she did, shows that she had more way on her than she admits and more way than she ought to have had under the circumstances. Under these circumstances it falls to my lot to decide the question. I do not deny that I have had hesitation about it, but I lean to the conclusion that she was going too fast, and so I decide. I am mainly governed in so doing by this. We have before us a survey of the steamer, and we get from it the nature and the violence of the blow that was delivered. The report says on the starboard bow the topgallant forecastle plate smashed in about seven feet from the stem, one plate further off bulged and bent, the second plate down smashed and also the two shear stroke plates smashed in about thirteen feet from the stem, three frames broken and two twisted and bent, one forecastle deck beam broken and six forecastle deck planks, and two broad deck planks broken, lining and bunk fittings, &c. Then there is other damage mentioned, and there was evidence of the bowsprit of the Beta having gone through the deck of the steamer. This leads me to the conclusion that the Beta was going faster, and not inconsiderably faster, than she says, and that being so, I think she was carrying too great a press of sail having regard to the weather. I think that was negligence on her part, and that she is liable for it. [The learned Judge then dealt with the speed of the Peter Graham, and found it to have been as slow as was consistent with good steerage-way.] Now comes the only remaining point. The foghorn of the Beta was not heard, according to the evidence, by those on board the Peter Graham, and here arises a point which I have often considered, and about which I have always felt a difficulty. Ought we to find negligence against the steamer because she did not hear the foghorn before the collision? In order so to find we must be satisfied that there was not a longer interval between the blasts than two minutes—a matter upon which I have already expressed some doubt. What occurs to me is this: Here were persons on the alert on board the Peter Graham. The question of hearing is not like that of eyesight. People's eyes may be closed or turned away from the direction in which an object comes into view, and they may fail to see it, but their ears are not stopped, and even if they are attending to something else, a foghorn in thick weather is a thing that at once arouses their attention. It seems to me very difficult to say that merely because these people, who were on the look-out and on the alert, did not hear the schooner's foghorn, they are to blame, having regard to the fact that the foghorn, if sounded, was certainly to leeward of the steamer, and that the sound would rather be carried away from the steamer by the wind than towards her. Considering too the careful way in which this steamer was being navigated and the whole circumstances of this case, I do not think that the fact of her not hearing the schooner's foghorn is evidence of negligence for which she ought to be held to blame. In the result I must pronounce that the only blame in this case attaches to the Beta. Now comes the question, is the steamer entitled to salvage? I know it has been held in some cases that where a collision is brought about by the wrongful act of one of two ships the innocent ship is entitled to salvage. No doubt the steamer took the Beta in tow. What I have to consider is, must I administering the law I have to consider is, must I administering the law imply a contract to pay for salvage services? I will not do anything of the sort, and I do not mean to give any salvage in this case. If I am wrong I must be set right elsewhere, but I do not forget that there is an Act of Parliament which renders it a positive duty upon one of two ships which has been in collision to stand by and render such assistance as may be practicable to the other ship, and that is equally her duty whether the other ship is to blame or not. I refer to the 16th section of the Merchant Shipping Act 1873. I believe in acting as the steamer did after this collision she acted most properly, and I do not believe that it ever occurred either to the captain or crew of the Beta or to the captain or crew of the Peter Graham that when they towed this little schooner they were doing it on the terms of being paid salvage. In my view of the Act of Parliament, if the steamer had not chosen to tow the schooner she would have had to stay by her a very long time, because she would not have dared to have left her. Therefore I do not think that this is a case in which any salvage ought to be awarded. I do not know why I was not addressed on this point. I have not had the advantage of any observations on either side upon it, or of having my attention called to the authorities, but I suppose the real truth of the matter is that there is a sort of feeling which I should expect on the part of the owners or legal advisers of the steamer that this is not a case in which they would care to claim salvage, even although technically they might be entitled to it.

From this decision the owners of the Beta now appealed, and contended that the steamer was alone to blame for the collision.

Art. 13 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea 1880, upon which the decision turned is as follows:

> Every ship, whether a sailing ship or a steamship, shall in a fog, mist, or falling snow, go at a moderate speed.

Myburgh, Q.C. and J. P. Aspinall, on behalf of the owners of the Beta, in support of the appeal.—It was the duty of the Beta, under art. 13 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions, to go at a moderate rate of speed. This she did. Though it is true that she was carrying all plain sail it is to be remembered that the wind was light, and that it is necessary for a sailing vessel to have some little way on so as to be well under command. Under these circumstances her speed could not be called immoderate:

> The Elysia 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 540; 46 L. T. Rep. N. S. 840.

The fact that there is strong affirmative evidence that the foghorn was blown on the schooner, and the fact that no foghorn was heard by those on the steamer, is very suggestive of a want of due diligence on the part of those on the steamer.

Hall, Q.C. and Bucknill, for the respondents, were not called upon.

Brett, M.R.—It seems to me that the greater part of this case depends upon what is the law with regard to these two ships. It is undoubted to my mind that by the true construction of art. 13, the steamer was bound to go as slowly as she could in such a dense fog as this was, because it is to be taken that the fog was absolutely dense, so that it was impossible to see anything until it was close upon one. Under these circumstances it seems to me that the steamer was bound to go dead slow; that is, as slow as she possibly could in order to keep herself under command. She ought to have done that, and she did it. She therefore has obeyed the rule.

We now come to the sailing vessel. The rule says she is to go at a moderate speed. What is the meaning of that? Moderate speed, to my mind, must depend upon the density of the fog, because that which would be moderate speed in a light fog would not be moderate in an absolutely dense and thick fog in which one could not see at all. That which would be moderate speed in a fog through which daylight was coming would not be moderate in a fog which was absolutely thick and dark. If we take this fog to be a dense fog, this sailing vessel comes under the same conditions as the steamer, namely, that she must not go through the water faster than is necessary for her being kept under command. This schooner had all plain sail set. Under certain circumstances it might be necessary to have all plain sail set to keep her under command. The question is whether it was necessary in this case. I have put that question to the gentlemen who advise us, and they tell us that this vessel might have been under command to perform the necessary operations with less sail. I do not ask them anything else. What is the necessary inference to draw from their answer? The inference I draw is, that this schooner was going through the water faster than was necessary to keep her under command. If so, she was going at more than a moderate speed, and at a greater speed than was necessary under the circumstances. If so she was wrong. It therefore seems to me that, not being able to overrule the learned judge upon any other point, we cannot overrule him on this, and the appeal must accordingly be dismissed.

Bowen, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. Art. 13 says that "every ship, whether a sailing ship or steamship, shall in a fog, mist, or falling snow, go at a moderate speed." What does the term moderate mean? It is a term of relation, and it must be used in relation to something. Now in this case the collision occurred in the Bristol Channel in a dense fog. Under these circumstances the sailing ship ought not to go at a greater rate of speed than is necessary to enable her to be under command. That being the law, the gentlemen who assist us say that, having regard to the wind, the sails carried by the schooner, and the character of the blow, they are of opinion that the Beta was carrying more sail than was necessary to keep her under command. The result is, that the schooner has infringed the rule, and must therefore be held to blame for this collision.

Fry, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. There are two questions which arise in this case. The first is with regard to the speed of the schooner. On this point the conclusion of the learned judge below appears to be well founded, having regard to the fact that this collision occurred in a dense fog in the Bristol Channel. It was also said that the persons on board the steamer must be taken to have heard the foghorn of the schooner. The learned judge below has, however, found otherwise, and I think it is impossible for us to disturb that finding. The conclusion, therefore, is that the schooner is alone to blame.

The John McIntyre. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM BUTT, J.

Collision—Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea 1880, arts. 13, 18—Dense fog—Steamships—Steam whistle.

Where those on a steamship in a dense fog hear the whistle or foghorn of another vessel more than once on either bow and in the vicinity from such a direction as to indicate that the other vessel is nearing them, it is their duty, under art. 18 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, to at once stop and reverse her engines, so as to bring their vessel to a standstill in the water.

This was an appeal by the defendants in a damage action in rem from a judgment of Butt, J., by which he, on the 19th Dec. 1883, had found the steamships John McIntyre and Monica both to blame for a collision in the North Sea on the 14th Sept. 1883.

The facts alleged on behalf of the plaintiffs were as follows:—

Shortly after 3.30 a.m. on the 14th Sept. 1883 the steamship Monica, of 853 tons net, was in the North Sea, off Seaham, on a voyage from Newcastle to Hamburg. The wind was light from the east and there was a dense fog. The Monica was heading about S.E. by E., and was making about three knots an hour. Her regulation lights were duly exhibited and a good look-out was being kept on board her, and her whistle was sounded regularly. In these circumstances the whistle of a steamer was heard on the starboard bow and replied to. After three or four blasts had been heard and replied to the helm was put to starboard. Immediately afterwards the masthead and red lights of the John McIntyre were seen broad on the starboard bow, and although the helm was hard-a-starboarded and the engines reversed full speed astern, the stem and port bow of the John McIntyre struck the starboard side of the Monica about midships.

The facts alleged on behalf of the defendants were as follows:—

About 3.40 a.m. on the 14th Sept. 1883 the steamship John McIntyre, of 659 tons registered, was in the North Sea, off the coast of Durham, on a voyage from London to the Tyne. The wind was light from the N.N.E., and there was a thick fog. The John McIntyre was heading about N.N.W., and making about two knots an hour. Her regulation lights were duly exhibited, a good look-out was being kept on board of her, and her whistle was sounded from time to time. Under these circumstances the whistle of the Monica was heard about four points on the port bow, and then heard twice again, when it appeared to those on the John McIntyre that the Monica was approaching on the port bow so as to involve risk of collision, and although the engines of the John McIntyre were reversed, and immediately afterwards reversed full speed astern, the starboard side of the Monica struck the stem and bows of the John McIntyre.

Dec. 19, 1883.—The action came on for trial before Butt, J., assisted by Trinity Masters.

Myburgh, Q.C. (with him Phillimore) for the plaintiffs, the owners of the Monica.

Webster, Q.C. (with him Steavenson) for the defendants.

After hearing the evidence and the arguments on both sides the learned Judge found both ships to blame for breach of article 18 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea. With regard to the navigation of the John McIntyre his Lordship dealt as follows:—Now as to the evidence of the John McIntyre, I cannot accept her captain's evidence us to speed. I utterly disbelieve, and the Elder Brethren agree with me, that she was still in the water, or anything like still in the water, at the moment that the blow was delivered. We think that, when she delivered the blow and sank the Monica, she herself was going at a considerable rate of speed. I think the nature of the blow shows it to be so. One has only to hear what admittedly happened to the Monica, only to look at the photograph of the John McIntyre, and the evidence of the surveyor who surveyed her, to be quite satisfied that she was going very much faster than the defendants allege. Now her captain says: "We heard her (that is the Monica's) whistle five minutes before the collision. I gave an order to stop and reverse one minute before the collision. We kept our engines going ahead for four minutes after we heard her whistle, and before we gave any order to stop our engines." It must have been apparent long before the lapse of those four minutes, they having heard the whistle several times, that there was danger. The engines of that vessel ought to have been stopped long before they were, and if necessary also reversed. In conclusion I have no hesitation in pronouncing both these vessels to blame.

From this decision the defendants appealed, and on June 19, 1884, the appeal came on for hearing. It was admitted that the Monica was to blame.

Article 18 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea 1880 is as follows:

> Every steamship, when approaching another ship so as to involve risk of collision, shall slacken her speed or stop and reverse if necessary.

The Solicitor-General (Sir F. Herschell, Q.C.) and Webster, Q.C. (with them Steavenson) for the appellants.—The learned judge below was wrong in finding the John McIntyre to blame for not stopping and reversing sooner. With the first whistle four points on the port bow it did not become necessary to stop and reverse until the third whistle had been heard. To hold otherwise would be to lay it down that a steamer in a dense fog the moment she hears a whistle is to at once stop and reverse, a manœuvre which might in many cases bring about the collision instead of avoiding it.

Myburgh, Q.C. and Dr. Phillimore, for the respondents, were not called upon.

Brett, M.R.—The question in this case is as to the application of article 12 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea 1880 to the John McIntyre. The case of the other ship is hopeless, her navigation being most improper and reckless. We have to apply article 18 to the John McIntyre, a vessel navigating in a dense fog. The John McIntyre was a steamer approaching another vessel in a dense fog. If, then, the circumstances were such that the officer in charge of the John McIntyre ought to have come to the conclusion that, in order to avoid danger or risk of collision, he was bound to stop and reverse his engines sooner than he did, why then he broke the rule. The next question is, were the circumstances such that he ought to have concluded that if he did not stop and reverse his engines there would be risk of collision? because, if he ought to have concluded that, then according to the rule it was necessary that he should not merely slacken his speed, but also stop and reverse his engines. The circumstances of this case seem to me to be, that these vessels were approaching in a thick fog, and that under the circumstances it was the duty of the Monica to keep out of the way of the John McIntyre. Nevertheless, it was palpable to the officer in charge of the John McIntyre that she was approaching another vessel in a fog. It was the whistle of the other vessel which told him not exactly where she was, but about where she was, and that she was in a position in which he could not consider her to be an absolutely safe vessel with regard to him; i.e., he could not consider that he had passed her or that she had passed him either ahead or astern, while he was not at once bound the moment he heard a whistle, wherever it might be, to stop and reverse his engines; but having heard the first whistle, which was about four points on his port bow, he hears another and another whistle, and I cannot help thinking that the evidence shows that it was something like three or four whistles that he heard. The sound of these whistles obviously did not, because they could not, appear to him to be going further astern of him or broader on his beam. What is the inference to be drawn from that? Why, that each of those whistles as they came ought to have told him that the vessel was coming nearer to his bow. He could not see the other ship. What is the conclusion to which he ought to have come? Ought he to have come to this conclusion—that, taking the fog and taking it that he himself was not going dead slow through the water (for I think the learned judge found, and found rightly, that he could not have been going at what is called dead slow), taking into account the pace at which he himself was going, which I think will be shown was faster than he puts it at, ought he not then to have concluded that unless he stopped and reversed his engines there would be, not collision, but risk of collision? If a steamer in a thick fog—so thick that she can hardly see before her—hears another vessel in her neighbourhood on either bow, not being able to see her, and she herself not going at her slowest pace, the question is, whether under those circumstances the officer in charge of the steamer ought not to conclude that it is necessary, in order to avoid risk of collision, that he should stop and reverse. I do not hesitate to lay down the rule, not strictly as a matter of law, but as a matter of conduct, that the moment such circumstances as these happen it is necessary, under the article, to stop and reverse. I am not saying that every time those on board a steamer hear a whistle or a foghorn on their bow they are at once to stop and reverse, but if they hear a whistle or foghorn on either bow getting nearer to their bow, or being in anything like near neighbourhood on either bow, I do not hesitate to lay down the rule that, if the fog is so dense that they can see nothing, then the necessity has arisen for them to stop and reverse. We do not say that she must have stern way on her, but we say she must stop and reverse her engines, so as, if necessary, to bring herself to a dead standstill in the water.

How are we to conclude anything as to the rate at which the John McIntyre was going? I will assume that the Monica was crossing the John McIntyre at a very considerable speed, and that she was under a starboard helm. But then it is clearly proved, in my opinion, that the John McIntyre was made by something or other to enter into the side of the Monica, a distance of from 7 feet to 12 feet. The next thing one has to do is to look at the injury done to the John McIntyre. Now, we have the evidence of the surveyor that she was injured on one bow from the stem downwards some 11 feet, and on the other bow some 7 feet. We have asked the gentlemen who assist us, having regard to the evidence of the surveyor, of the photograph produced in court, and the angle of the blow, what is their opinion as to the speed of the John McIntyre, and they tell us that they think she was going at a considerable rate of speed at the moment of collision. I have already said that, in my judgment, the circumstances were such as made it her duty to stop and reverse, and that it was necessary for her to stop and reverse in order to avoid risk of collision if she was going at any considerable speed. If she was going at considerable speed at the moment of collision, it is obvious that she was going at considerable speed before the moment of collision. If she was doing that, it seems to me that we must decide that she ought to have stopped and reversed before she heard the last whistle, which was almost immediately before the collision. However difficult it may be for persons in command of steamers to do what the law directs, in my opinion we must hold strictly that in a dense fog the moment another vessel is found on the bow or in near vicinity on either bow, and she herself is going at any speed, it has then become necessary, under the 18th rule, not merely to slacken speed, but instantly to stop and reverse. That is a rule of conduct which seems to me to be the result of the statutory regulations, and that has been broken by the officer in command of the John McIntyre. Therefore the judgment of the learned judge was correct, and this appeal must be dismissed.

Bowen, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. I think, as I have said before, that where two ships are approaching so as to involve risk of collision they are bound to slacken speed, and if that is not sufficient they are bound to stop and reverse if it is necessary to avoid risk of collision. Although it may not be possible to say as an absolute matter of law that a vessel in a fog ought to stop the moment she hears the whistle of another vessel in her neighbourhood, yet, as the Master of the Rolls has already pointed out, it seems to me that in this case the officer in charge of the John McIntyre could not have concluded that it was safe to have gone on, and therefore it was necessary to stop and reverse. This the John McIntyre did not do until a later period and she must therefore be held to blame. With regard to the other points urged before us, I entirely concur with the Master of the Rolls, and therefore think the appeal must fail.

Fry, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. In this case two questions have been raised. With regard to the speed of the John McIntyre, the learned judge below has found as a fact that she was going at a greater rate of speed than the witnesses on her behalf have stated. In the first place I, not having seen the witnesses, should in the absence of strong reasons, be unwilling to come to an adverse conclusion. Moreover, those gentlemen who assist us are of the same opinion as the learned judge below. Therefore I think that it must be taken that that finding was correct and cannot be impeached. Now, assuming that speed to be greater than was allowed by the appellants, was it not necessary for the John McIntyre to have stopped and reversed her engines at an earlier time than she did? I think it was, and that under the circumstances it was the duty of the John McIntyre to have earlier taken steps to come to as near a standstill as possible. That being so, I think the John McIntyre must be held to blame.

Appeal dismissed.

Vallance v. Falle. (a)

Merchant Shipping Acts—Seaman's remedy against master — Refusal of certificate — Discharge — Penalty—17 & 18 Vict. c. 104, ss. 27 and 524.

By the Merchant Shipping Act 1852, s. 172, upon the discharge of any seaman the master shall sign and give him a certificate, and if any master fails to sign and give to any such seaman such certificate of discharge he shall for each such offence incur a penalty of 10*l., and by sect.* 524 the whole or any part of the penalty may be applied in compensating any person for any wrong or damage which he may have sustained by the act or default in respect of which such penalty is imposed.

In an action for damages caused by the refusal of the defendant, a master, to give the plaintiff, a seaman, discharged from his ship engaged in the coasting trade, a certificate, the County Court judge nonsuited the plaintiff.

Held, that the remedy by penalty was exclusive under the provisions of the Act, and that the County Court judge was right.

THIS was an action tried in the County Court of Dorset, in which the plaintiff, a seaman, sought to recover damages against the defendant, the master of a ship called the Brighton, trading between Weymouth and the Channel Islands, for improperly withholding and detaining from the plaintiff a certificate of discharge to which the plaintiff was entitled on the termination of his service on board the said ship, whereby the plaintiff was unable to obtain employment in other ships.

The County Court judge nonsuited the plaintiff on the ground that his only remedy was by summons before a court of summary jurisdiction under the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104).

By sect. 17 of that Act:

In the case of all British foreign-going ships, in whatever part of Her Majesty's dominions the same are registered, all seamen discharged in the United Kingdom shall be discharged and receive their wages in the presence of a shipping master duly appointed under this Act, except in cases where some competent court otherwise directs, and any master or owner of any such ship who discharges any seaman belonging thereto or except as aforesaid pays within the United Kingdom in any other manner shall incur a penalty not exceeding 10*l.*, and in the case of home-trade ships seamen may, if the owner or master so desires, be discharged and receive their wages in like manner.

By sect. 171:

Every master shall, not less than twenty-four hours before paying off or discharging any seaman, deliver to him, or, if he is to be discharged before a shipping master, to such shipping master, a full and true account in a form sanctioned by the Board of Trade of his wages and of all deductions to be made therefrom on any account whatever, and in default shall for each offence incur a penalty not exceeding 5*l.*; and no deduction from the wages of any seaman (except in respect of any matter happening after such delivery) shall be allowed unless it is included in the account so delivered, and the master shall during the voyage enter the various matters in respect of which such deductions are made, with the amounts of the respective deductions as they occur, in a book to be kept for that purpose, and shall, if required, produce such book at the time of the payment of wages, and also upon the hearing before any competent authority of any complaint or question relating to such payment.

By sect. 172:

Upon the discharge of any seaman, or upon payment of his wages, the master shall sign and give him a certificate of his discharge in a form sanctioned by the Board of Trade, specifying the period of his service and the time and place of his discharge; and if any master fails to sign and give any such seaman such certificate of discharge he shall for each such offence incur a penalty not exceeding 10*l.*; and the master shall also upon the discharge of every certificated mate, whose certificate of competency or service has been delivered to and retained by him, return such certificate, and shall in default incur a penalty not exceeding 20*l.*

By sect. 173:

Every shipping master shall hear and decide any question whatever between a master or owner and any of his crew which both parties agree in writing to submit to him, and every award so made by him shall be binding on both parties, and shall in any legal proceeding which may be taken in the matter before any court of justice be deemed to be conclusive as to the rights of the parties, and no such submission or award shall require a stamp, and any document purporting to be such submission or award shall be primâ facie evidence thereof.

By sect. 174:

In any proceeding relating to the wages, claims, or discharge of any seaman carried on before any shipping master, under the provisions of this Act, such shipping master may call upon the owner or his agent, or upon the master, or any mate, or other member of the crew to produce any log book, papers, or other documents in their respective possession or power, relating to any matter in question in such proceeding, and may call before him and examine any of such persons being then at or near the place or any such matter, and every owner, master, mate, or other member of the crew who, when called upon by the shipping master, does not produce any such paper or document as aforesaid if in his possession or power, or does not appear and give evidence, shall, unless he shows some reasonable excuse for such default, for such offence incur a penalty not exceeding 5*l.*

By sect. 175:

The following rules shall be observed with respect to the settlement of wages (that is to say)—

(1.) Upon the completion before a shipping master of any discharge and settlement, the master or owner and each seaman shall respectively, in the presence of the shipping master, sign in a form sanctioned by the Board of Trade a mutual release of all claims in respect of the past voyage or engagement, and the shipping master shall also sign and attest it, and shall retain and transmit it as herein directed.

(2.) Such release so signed and attested shall operate as a mutual discharge and settlement of all demands between the parties thereto in respect of the past voyage or engagement.

(3.) A copy of such release, certified under the hand of such shipping master to be a true copy, shall be given by him to any party thereto requiring the same, and any such copy shall be receivable in evidence upon any future question touching such claims as aforesaid, and shall have all the effect of the original of which it purports to be a copy.

(4.) In cases in which discharge and settlement before a shipping master are hereby required, no payment, receipt, settlement, or discharge otherwise made shall operate or be admitted as evidence of the release or satisfaction of any claim.

(5.) Upon any payment being made by a master before a shipping master, the shipping master shall, if required, sign and give to such master a statement of the whole amount so paid, and such statement shall, as between the master and his employer, be received as evidence that he has made the payments therein mentioned.

By sect. 176:

Upon every discharge effected before a shipping master the master shall make and sign in a form sanctioned by the Board of Trade a report of the conduct, character, and qualifications of the persons discharged, or may state in a column to be left for that purpose in the said form that he declines to give any opinion upon such particulars or upon any of them, and the shipping master shall transmit the same to the Registrar-General of Seamen, or to such other persons as the Board of Trade directs, to be recorded, and shall, if desired so to do by any seaman, give to him or indorse on his certificate of discharge a copy of so much of such report as concerns him, and every person who makes, assists in making, or procures to be made, any false certificate or report of the service, qualifications, conduct, or character of any seaman, knowing the same to be false, or who forges, assists in forging, or procures to be forged, or fraudulently alters, assists in fraudulently altering, or procures to be fraudulently altered, any such certificate or report, or who fraudulently makes use of any such certificate or report which is forged or altered, or does not belong to him, shall for each such offence be deemed guilty of a misdemeanour.

By sect. 524:

Any court, justice, or magistrate imposing any penalty under this Act for which no specific application is herein provided, may, if it or he thinks fit, direct the whole or any part thereof to be applied in compensating any person for any wrong or damage which he may have sustained by the act or default in respect of which such penalty is imposed, or to be applied in or towards payment of the expenses of the proceedings.

Francis Turner argued for the plaintiff.—By the Merchant Shipping Act 1873 (36 & 37 Vict. c. 85), s. 31, any officer of the Board of Trade may take the legal proceedings under the Merchant Shipping Act, and if that were done here the plaintiff could get no compensation. In many cases it has been held that an action will lie for breach of a statutory duty notwithstanding a provision for a penalty.

Tindal Atkinson for the defendant.—It depends upon the construction of each statute whether the penalty imposed is the only remedy for a breach of statutory duty. Here it could not have been contemplated to make an action lie for this omission. Compensation is provided by sect. 524.

The following cases were cited and discussed:

Beckford v. Hood, 7 Term Reps. 620;
Hurrell v. Ellis, 15 L. J. 18, C. P.;
Stevens v. Jeacocke, 11 Q. B. 731;
Rogers v. McNamara, 23 L. J. 1, C. P.;
Couch v. Steel, 3 E. & B. 402; 23 L. J. 121, Q. B.;
Wright v. London General Omnibus Company, 36 L. T. Rep. N. S. 590; 2 Q. B. 271;
Atkinson v. Newcastle Waterworks Company, 36 L. T. Rep. N. S. 761; 2 Ex. Div. 441.

STEPHEN, J.—I am of opinion that the judgment of the County Court judge must be affirmed. The case has been well argued on both sides, and I believe every authority has been cited. I do not intend to follow the distinctions which have been drawn between the various decisions; but the general rule to be deduced from them seems to be that every particular enactment providing a summary remedy of this kind must be considered with respect to its own provisions and object in order to discover whether the Legislature intended to confer a general right, which might be the subject of an action, with a collateral remedy by summons at petty sessions, or whether the duty imposed was sanctioned only by the particular penalty, and therefore enforceable by no other than the summary remedy. We must therefore consider the provisions of this statute. The 170th section deals with foreign-going ships, and it appears to give a certificate in such cases more value than in coasting ships of the class in this case. The form authorised by the Board of Trade for foreign-going ships includes an entry as to character; but no effect of that kind is given by the form of certificate for coasters under sect. 172, nor does any special value appear to attach to such certificate. This 172nd section makes it the duty of the master, upon the discharge of any seaman, to sign and give him a certificate of his discharge in a form sanctioned by the Board of Trade, specifying the period of his service, and the time and place of his discharge, and the section goes on to provide that if any master fails to sign and give to any such seaman such certificate of discharge he shall for each such offence incur a penalty of 10*l.* There is a provision later on in the Act (sect. 524) that any court, justice, or magistrate, imposing a penalty for which no specific application is given, may direct the whole or any part thereof to be applied in compensating any person for any wrong or damage which he may have sustained by the act or default in respect of which such penalty is imposed. It appears therefore that this is an offence, created by the statute, for which a specific remedy is provided for any damage which may be the consequence of it. As to the cases cited, I have already said that I think every statutory remedy of this kind must depend upon itself, and can have but little authority with regard to others; it will be sufficient, therefore, if I allude only to one or two of those upon which counsel for the plaintiff relied. For instance, in Beckford v. Hood the question decided was whether a small and inadequate penalty given to an informer precluded an aggrieved author from obtaining damages in an action for breach of copyright. Lord Kenyon there said: "I cannot think the Legislature would act so inconsistently as to confer a right, and leave the party whose property was invaded without redress" (p. 627). That consideration can have no weight in the case before us, because sect. 524 gives to the seaman aggrieved a right to apply to the court of summary jurisdiction for as much of the 10*l.* penalty as may be considered adequate to the circumstances, and I cannot think that any damage he could suffer would be likely to exceed that amount. On the other hand, in Atkinson v. Newcastle Waterworks Company it was obvious that the defendants could never have been intended, by an obligation to supply water for fire engines, to be made insurers for the whole of a large town, when a specific penalty was imposed for failure to fulfil the obligation. That case is far stronger than this, and, to my mind, is no more an authority than the other; but the conclusion there arrived at seems to me more appropriate to this case than that of the copyright, and I think, having regard to the nature of the certificate, the injury likely to result from its omission, and all the provisions in relation thereto, that the remedy, and only remedy, for the wrong of which the plaintiff complains, is by summons before petty sessions. The County Court judge therefore was right in nonsuiting the plaintiff in this action.

MATHEW, J.—I am of the same opinion, and I must say I feel no doubt about it. With regard to a statutory remedy of this description, it was observed by Willes, J. in Wolverhampton New Waterworks Company v. Hawkesford (28 L. J. C. P., at p. 246): "There are three classes of cases in which a liability may be established by statute. There is that class where there is a liability existing at common law, and which is only re-enacted by the statute with a special form of remedy; there, unless the statute contains words necessarily excluding the common law remedy, the plaintiff has his election of proceeding either under the statute or at common law. Then there is a second class which consists of those cases in which a statute has created a liability, but has given no special remedy for it; there the party may adopt an action of debt or other remedy at common law to enforce it. The third class is where the statute creates a liability not existing at common law, and gives also a particular remedy for enforcing it. Now it appears to me that the present case falls within such third class;" and I would interpose in this quotation to express the same view with respect to the seaman's certificate here; "and as with respect to that class it has been always held that the party must adopt the form of remedy given by the statute, so I think the company are bound here to follow the form given by this statute which creates the right." This certificate is not one of character, and the 10*l.* penalty is ample compensation for any wrong done to a seaman by withholding it. Upon the true construction of the provisions of this Act, I think the proceeding for a penalty is the exclusive remedy for any damage of which the plaintiff can complain in this action, and therefore the action was misconceived.

REG. v. THE JUDGE OF THE CITY OF LONDON COURT. (a)

County Courts—Admiralty jurisdiction of—"Carriage of goods in any ship"—Passenger's luggage on board—Action by passenger against shipowner for loss of—Jurisdiction of County Court to try action—County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Acts 1868 and 1869—31 & 32 Vict. c. 71, s. 3, sub-sect. 8—32 & 33 Vict. c. 51, s. 2.

The personal luggage of a passenger on board ship, which is carried with him as a privilege incidental to the contract to convey the passenger himself, is not "goods" within sect. 2 of the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Amendment Act 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 51), by which County Courts, having Admiralty jurisdiction, are empowered to try claims "arising out of any agreement made in relation to the carriage of goods in any ship;" and there is therefore no jurisdiction in a County Court under that Act to try any action by a passenger against a shipowner for the loss of such luggage.

THIS was a rule, calling upon the learned judge of the City of London Court and the defendant in an action brought by the plaintiff in that court, to show cause why the judge should not proceed to hear and determine the said action. The facts of the case were as follows:—

The plaintiff was a passenger on board a ship belonging to the defendant on a voyage from Hamburg to London, and his personal luggage, which on his embarkation on board had been stowed away in the ship's hold, had been lost in the course of the voyage. He sued the defendant, the shipowner, in the City of London Court, to recover its value in damages, his action being brought under the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Amendment Act 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 51), s. 2. The learned judge of the court was of opinion that under that Act he had no jurisdiction to try the action, inasmuch as, in his opinion, the term "goods" in that Act applied not to a passenger's personal luggage, but only to "goods" carried on board a ship as merchandise or for profit; and he accordingly declined to hear the action, which he dismissed with costs, whereupon the rule above mentioned was obtained on behalf of the plaintiff.

The County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c, 71), by sect. 2, enables Her Majesty, on the representation of the Lord Chancellor, by an Order in Council, to appoint certain County Courts to have Admiralty jurisdiction as therein specified and enacted, with a proviso that no judge of a County Court, except the judge of the London Court, shall have jurisdiction in the city of London.

Sect. 3:

Any County Court having Admiralty jurisdiction shall have jurisdiction, and all powers and authorities relating thereto, to try and determine, subject and according to the provisions of this Act, the following causes (in this Act referred to as Admiralty causes):

(3) As to any claim for damage to cargo or damage by collision—Any cause in which the amount claimed does not exceed 300*l.*

By 32 & 33 Vict. c. 51 (the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Amendment Act 1869), s. 2:

Any County Court appointed, or to be appointed, to have Admiralty jurisdiction, shall have jurisdiction and all powers and authorities relating thereto to try and determine the following causes:

(1) As to any claim arising out of any agreement made in relation to the use or hire of any ship, or in relation to the carriage of goods in any ship, and also as to any claim in tort in respect of goods carried in any ship, provided the amount claimed does not exceed 300*l.*

G. Barnes, for the defendant, the shipowner, now showed cause against the rule.—The ruling of the learned judge of the City of London Court, that the term "goods" in the amended County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act of 1869 applied only to "goods" carried as "merchandise or for profit," and in no way related or could be extended to such articles as the ordinary luggage of a passenger on board the ship, was right. The authorities in the way of text-books clearly support that view; for instance, in Marshall on Marine Insurance, 4th ed., part 1, chap. 7, p. 257, it is said that "a policy on goods means only such goods merely as are merchantable, i.e., cargo put on board for the purposes of commerce;" and to the same effect is Lowndes on Marine Insurance, par. 91, p. 48. Even assuming a contract to carry a passenger and his luggage, that would not be a contract to carry his luggage as "goods." There is no precise authority upon this Act; but the above text-books and the following cases throw a light upon the meaning of the term "goods" in such a case as this, where an Admiralty jurisdiction is conferred:

Brown v. Stapylton, 4 Bing. 119; 5 L. J. 121, C. P.; and the judgment of Best, C. J.;
Hill v. Patten, 8 East. 373, per Lord Ellenborough, C.J.;
1 Park on Insurance, 7th ed., p. 26 (citing Ross v. Thwaites);
Cohen v. The South-Eastern Railway Company (in the Court of Appeal), 35 L. T. Rep. N. S. 213; 2 Ex. Div. 253; 46 L. J. 417, Q. B. and Ex.;
Cahill v. London and North-Western Railway Company, 4 L. T. Rep. N. S. 246; 10 C. B. N. S. 154; 30 L. J. 289, C.P.

It is clear that "goods" in the section means something very different from ordinary "luggage," which is not the subject of general average or salvage.

E. Pollock, for the plaintiff, contrà, in support of the rule.—A reference to the prior Act of 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 71) will throw some light on the meaning of the word "goods" in the subsequent Act of 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 51). By the former Act of 1868, s. 3, Admiralty jurisdiction is given to the County Courts in claims for damages to "cargo," but in the subsequent amending Act of 1868 the term "goods" is used in contradistinc-

(a Reported by HENRY LEIGH, Esqr., Barrister-at-Law.

tion to to the word "cargo," and it is submitted that the Legislature, by so changing the word and substituting "goods" for "cargo," clearly meant something different; and, so far from the word "goods" in the later Act meaning the same thing as "cargo" in the earlier Act, as the learned County Court judge held was the case, I contend, on the other hand, that the very reverse is the true and proper construction of sect. 2 of the Act of 1869, and that "luggage," such as that in the present case, was meant by the Legislature to be included in the term "goods." He cited

Cohen v The South-Eastern Railway Company (ubi sup.);
The Alina (Brown v. The Alina), 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 257; 42 L. T. Rep. N. S. 517; 5 Ex. Div. 227.

"Goods," under the Railways and Canal Traffic Act 1854, includes passengers' luggage, and, unless there is manifest absurdity in so doing, the court will so hold in the present case, and make the rule absolute.

Day, J.—I am of opinion that the decision of the learned judge of the City of London Court is quite right. The cases which have been cited by Mr Pollock, though very ingeniously put before us by him, do not, I think, help us much in coming to a decision in this case, in which, I think, the Act of Parliament (32 & 33 Vict. c. 51, s. 2, sub-sect. 1) on which the question turns must be construed by itself. For myself, I have little doubt as to the way in which we ought to construe it. The first part of sub-sect. 1, by which jurisdiction is given to the County Court "as to any claim arising out of any agreement made in relation to the use or hire of any ship," refers clearly, as it seems to me, to claims arising out of or under charter-parties. Then comes the next paragraph of the sub-section, "or in relation to the carriage of any goods in any ship," which refers, I think, as clearly to questions and claims on bills of lading. But it is urged by the plaintiff's counsel, and we are asked by him to say, that the words "in relation to the carriage of any goods in any ship" relate to a claim like the present respecting the claim of the plaintiff for the loss of his personal luggage, and that the agreement to carry a passenger and his luggage is, so far as the luggage is concerned, a contract to carry "goods." That, in my opinion, is not so. The contract or agreement here was not made for or with reference to the carriage of "goods" or luggage, but for the carriage of the plaintiff himself as a passenger, and it is only incidental to that contract that the passenger's luggage (his ordinary personal luggage) is carried with him. Such luggage is not and cannot be deemed to be "goods" in the sense or within the meaning of that word in the above sub-section. The ruling of the County Court judge being quite right, this rule must be discharged.

Smith, J.—I am entirely of the same opinion, and cannot at all agree with the view taken of the section in question by Mr. Pollock. The two statutes that have been referred to deal, so far as concerns the present case, with three matters. The first of them, the Act of 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 71), by sect. 2, sub-sect. 3, relates to claims made for damage to "cargo." In the subsequent Act of 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 51), by sect. 2, sub-sect. 1, two claims are dealt with, namely, first a "claim arising out of any agreement made in relation to the use or hire of any ship," which, as my brother Day has already said, relates to questions upon charter-parties; and secondly, to a claim "in relation to the carriage of goods in any ship," which I also agree with my brother Day in thinking relates to bills of lading. Now, Mr. Pollock has argued that the "claim in relation to the carriage of goods" mentioned in the section must mean or include the plaintiff's luggage, and that the agreement to carry the passenger is an agreement to carry his luggage, which is included in the term "goods." Now, no doubt in the sense that a contract to carry a passenger gives that passenger the incidental right or privilege to carry or take his personal luggage with him, the contract is a contract to carry the luggage, but in no sense is it a contract to carry "goods" within the meaning of the sub-section by which a passenger's luggage was never intended or contemplated. The Act was dealing with "merchandise" in the ordinary and well-known sense of the term.

The Pontida (a)

Bottomry—Cargo owners—Necessity — Master—Agent.

The authority of a master to raise money on bottomry on ship, freight, and cargo is limited as against the cargo owners to such an amount as is necessary to enable the ship to complete her voyage with safety, and even where the money is advanced and the bond given to a person who is not the ship's agent or in any way connected with the ship, he cannot recover as against the cargo owner anything in respect of items other than those which are absolutely necessary.

Upon a reference to the registrar and merchants, in an action on a bottomry bond, the registrar and merchants have a discretionary power to reduce the amounts claimed and expended for any specific item which they shall deem unnecessary or exorbitant, and also the amounts charged for commissions and premium, whether the bond be given to the ship's agent or to a person unconnected with the ship. (b)

This was an action in rem brought by the Comptoir d'Escompte de Paris to enforce payment upon a bottomry bond, they being the holders thereof, against the Italian barque Pontida, her cargo and freight:

The facts as set out in the statement of claim were (so far as they are material) as follows:

(a) Reported by J. P. Aspinall and F. W. Baikes, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

(b) This decision has since been affirmed, on appeal, see post.—Ed.

1. On the 2nd April 1883 the Italian barque Pontida was at Ponta del Garda, in the island of San Michael, in distress, laden with a cargo of wheat shipped under bills of lading, making the same deliverable to shipper's order, and bound on a voyage from Philadelphia to Queenstown, Plymouth, and Falmouth, for orders for a port of discharge, and her master Marco Antonio Faradine being without funds or credit, was compelled to borrow on bottomry of the said ship, her cargo and freight, from Bensande and Co., of Ponta del Garda aforesaid, the sum of 91,375·71 francs for the necessary disbursements and expenses of the said ship and cargo, to enable her to proceed on her voyage.

2. On the 2nd April 1883 a bottomry bond for the said sum of 91,375·76 francs was duly executed between the said master and the said Bensande and Co.

3. By the said bottomry bond, after reciting that the said master and Mr Henrique Bensande, in the capacity of managing partner of the firm of Bensande and Co. personally before the consular agent for the kingdom of Italy, at Ponta del Garda aforesaid, for the purpose of executing the said bond, that the said master was the legal representative of the owners of the Pontida, and duly authorised on their behalf, and likewise the legal representative of the owners of cargo on board, to whom he had communicated the necessity in which he was placed of executing the said bond, not having done so to the consignees through ignorance of who they were, and that in consequence of average suffered by the Italian barque Pontida during her said voyage the said vessel was forced to put into the said port . . . that thereby a necessity had arisen for contracting a loan in the sum of 91,375·76 francs to meet the expenses incurred so as to be able to continue in safety the said voyage which bond had been legally authorised by the said Royal Consular Agency of Italy in the said place, and which in presence thereof had been on the 14th Dec. then last adjudicated to the said firm . . . that the said Henrique Bensande declared to the said consular agent his wish to advance on bottomry . . . the aforesaid sum . . . at a premium of 20 per cent. if discharged in the United Kingdom . . . that the said M. A. Faradine declared that he had already received from the said firm the said sum. . . . And that it was covenanted between the contracting parties that the Pontida should be hypothecated together with her freight and the whole of her cargo of wheat.

4. The said bottomry bond was subsequently indorsed to the plaintiffs, who are the legal owners thereof.

5. The Pontida proceeded on her voyage on the 28th April 1883, and safely arrived with her said cargo on board at Avonmouth, Bristol, her port of discharge within the meaning of the said bond.

The 6th paragraph recited that the bond had been executed according to all the formalities required by Italian law; that the said sum of 91,375·76 francs, together with bottomry premium at 20 per cent., amountd to 109,655·91 francs, and was then still due to the plaintiffs and unpaid.

On the 19th June 1883 judgment in the action was pronounced for the validity of the bond against the Pontida and her freight, and subsequently the owners of cargo admitted the validity of the bond as regards the cargo, subject to a reference to the registrar and merchants. The amount claimed at the agreed rate of exchange was 4386*l.* 0*s.* 8*d.*

The usual order for reference to the registrar and merchants was made.

On the 12th July 1883 the question came on for hearing at the reference before the registrar and merchants, and from the evidence then given and the documents put in the following additional facts were proved:

From the log of the Pontida it appeared that whilst on a voyage from Philadelphia she had met with very severe and tempestuous weather and made a great deal of water, and that all hands had forcibly called on the master to put into the nearest port, and that in consequence she had put into the island of San Michael. Upon her arrival a survey was held by the direction of the Italian consul and by surveyors appointed by him, and it was found that the cargo was in a good condition, but the surveyors advised that the vessel should be lightened up to the copper line in order that they might be better able to examine the true state of the cargo and caulking; they also found that the putting into port was indispensable through the vessel having sprung a leak.

The mate, who was a co-owner of the vessel, then authorised the captain to have the repairs executed which the surveyors had reported to be necessary.

The captain having no funds at his disposal, it became necessary for him to raise the money for such repairs by giving a bottomry bond. He thereupon wrote to the shippers in New York informing them of the circumstances, and an advertisement was inserted in the local paper giving notice that the captain would receive tenders for the money required on bottomry (about 600*l.*). Two tenders were received, and that of Messrs. Bensande and Co. being the more advantageous for the interests of those concerned, was accepted by the master with the sanction of the consul.

A second survey was then held by the same surveyors, the vessel having been lightened as recommended by them, and they found that the oakum had been washed out of the seams and much metal had been ripped away; a diver was also sent down to examine the ship's bottom, and he found that a quantity of metal had been ripped off all along the bottom of the vessel, in consequence of which the surveyors advised that the whole of the cargo should be discharged to enable them to see the bottom of the vessel, and order what should be done. The remainder of the cargo was then discharged, and the surveyors examined the vessel and gave an estimate of the repairs which they considered necessary. The repairs and other expenses being greater than at first contemplated, it became necessary to increase the sum required on the bottomry bond; which was accordingly done. On the completion of the repairs the surveyors examined the vessel, and finding that the necessary repairs had been properly done, pronounced her to be in a fit condition to reload her cargo and prosecute her voyage. The vessel was then reloaded and proceeded on her voyage. Before leaving San Michael, the captain wrote again to the shippers in New York, informing them that the whole of the repairs would amount to 2500*l.*

The surveyors estimate for repairs was as follows:

	Reis.
To caulking from metal line up, and deck, &c.	1,600,000
To port holes covering boards	100,000
Rigging backstays to foretopsail	540,000
Two yards, &c., topsails	190,000
To relining the hold, &c.	150,000
To new bolts and nails to knees and caulking, &c.	2,177,000
To metal, bolts, felt, nails	5,490,000
To repairing rudder	50,000
To scraping and painting	200,000
	10,497,000

Equal to £2099 8*s.*

The amounts claimed in respect of the work done, as recommended by the surveyors were as follows:

	Reis.
Ship chandler's account for rope, nails, &c. ...	80,780
Ditto	452,100
Labour in dry dock—recaulking and remetalling, &c.	5,994,800
Metal, felt, and nails	3,911,280
Blacksmith's account for bolts, tools, &c, ...	509,135
	10,948,095

Equal to £2185 3*s*.

It was proved at the reference that the weight of metal required had been carefully ascertained, and the quantity used had been duly weighed and no more used than required.

The other items claimed (so far as material) were 5 per cent. commission, being the ship's agent's charge upon disbursements, and amounting to 814,520 reis; 2½ per cent commission on 46,809,280 reis, being the value of the cargo discharged, as per manifest less the damaged cargo; and the bottomry premium of 20 per cent. on the total amount advanced.

The commissions were claimed as being the usual and ordinary commissions charged at San Michael under the like circumstances and it was shown that the master had sought to have them reduced but without success.

The premium claimed was that named in the tender and was the lowest offered.

On the 21st July 1883 the assistant registrar made his report and found the sum of 3685*l*. 3*s*. 4*d*. to be due to the plaintiffs upon the bottomry bond, the sum disallowed being 700*l*. 17*s*. 4*d*. Reductions had been made in three items, namely: (1) the amount of the bill for new metal, felt, and nails; (2) the commissions of 5 per cent. and 2½ per cent. by the ship's agent at San Michael; (3) the bottomry premium.

The amounts disallowed appeared in the schedule to the report, as follows:

	Claimed. Reis.	Allowed. Reis.
Metal and felt, &c.	3,911,280	3,000,000
Commission at 5 per cent. ...	814,520	500,000
2½ per cent. on 46,809,280 value of cargo as per manifest deducting value of damaged wheat sold	1,170,230	500,000
	5,896,030	4,000,000
Equal, at agreed exchange of 200 reis per franc, to	29,480·15	20,000
Bottomry premium at 20 per cent.	18,275·15	10,236·58
France ...	47,755·30	30,236·58

The total amount claimed without premium was 91,375fr. 76c. The total amount allowed was 81,375fr. 66c. The premium was therefore reduced to 12½ per cent.

The reasons upon which the assistant registrar had acted in giving his decision not appearing in his report, an application was made for them, and they were obtained. They were as follows:

(1) Bill for metal.—Taking the cost of copper metal in England at 3*l*. per cwt. and allowing an ample amount for cost of conveyance to San Michael, it was considered that the price of 7*l*. per cwt. was exorbitant. I am also advised that more metal was used than was probably necessary to repair the vessel. On these grounds 911,280 reis was disallowed, rather less than one quarter of the amount charged.

(2) The commission of 5 per cent. on the amount expended, and 2½ per cent. in addition on the value of the cargo charged by the ship's agent at San Michael was considered excessive. The amount allowed 500,000 reis on the ship, and the like amount on the cargo, in all about 200*l*., was considered an ample quantum meruit for his services.

(3) The premium of 20 per cent. was considered exorbitant for a voyage of less than three weeks, with a ship that had just been thoroughly repaired and remetalled. In these circumstances 12½ per cent. which was allowed was considered to be a high rate of premium.

And he further added that, before making the reduction for the latter item, one of the merchants who had assisted him in the reference had ascertained by inquiring that the amount of the loan might have been insured for so short a voyage for a small percentage.

On the 19th Nov. 1883 the plaintiffs filed a petition in objection to the assistant registrar's report on the grounds (1) that they were entitled by Italian law to the full amount of principal and premium, and (2) that if the question were governed by English law they were also entitled to the principal and premium, and that nothing had been proved by the defendants upon the reference to justify the reduction. To this the defendants filed an answer, and to the answer the plaintiffs filed a conclusion.

April 1 and 8.—The case came on for hearing upon the petition, in objection to the report of the assistant registrar.

Phillimore and Aspinall for the plaintiffs.—The reductions which the registrar has made in the amounts claimed by the plaintiffs are not warranted either by the facts which were proved at the reference, or the reasons which the registrar has himself given for so reducing them, or upon the authorities which exist on these points. First of all, taking those cases which are against the plaintiff, they are divisible into two classes, namely, those which affect the cost of repairs, and those which affect the commissions and premium. As to the first, there are no cases which lay down the principle that, when the sum advanced on bottomry has been advanced by a person other than the ship's agent, he is bound to see to the application of it, or that the amount expended in repairs can be reduced on the ground of being unnecessary or exorbitant except in the case of fraud. As to the second point, the two strongest cases are in both of which the advance was made by a person not the ship's agent. In the former the bottomry premium having been reduced from 20 to 12½ per cent. was restored by the court, but the reduction in the commissions was affirmed. In the latter the commissions claimed upon the goods landed, and on the advances, were disallowed. In neither case, however, was there a foreign consul acting on behalf of the ship of his nation. In the former case the learned judge held "that the court has not authority to reduce the premium on a bottomry bond, unless specifically affected with fraud or collusion, which must be shown in a clear and distinct manner" (p. 386). But both of these cases, so far as they effect commission, are inconsistent with The Prince of Saxe Coburg (3 Moo. P. C. 1; 3 Hagg. 387), which lays down that, if the foreign merchant after due inquiry shall have reasonable ground for concluding that the repairs are necessary and that the money cannot be raised on personal credit, then his security on ship and cargo shall not be impeached, because it might happen notwithstanding such inquiry that such repairs were not necessary or the money might have been obtained on personal credit. It must follow that, if commissions are payable at all, it cannot be the duty of the lender to inquire into the amount of those commissions or the mode of their application; it is not for him to judge whether the full amount was necessary; and this applies with double force in a case where it appears that the commissions charged are usual at the place where the bond is given. Passing to the cases in favour of the plaintiffs' claims, it has been distinctly laid down that there is no obligation on the part of the lender (not being the ship's agent) to see to the application of the money, or to calculate the expediency of the repairs, if he is sufficiently well assured that the money has been fairly borrowed and that there is nothing in the transaction that is fraudulent:

The Cognac, 2 Hagg. 377;
The Glenmanna, Lush. 115,

The Jane, 1 Dods. 464, 465;
The Vibilia, 1 W. Rob. 1, 10;
The Orelia, 3 Hagg. 75, 84;
The Royal Stewart, 2 Spinks, 260.

As to the reduction of premium, in the case of The Cognac (ubi sup.) the premium of 20 per cent. was reduced by the registrar to 12½, but restored by the court. And in another case a reduction from 14 to 10 per cent. was also restored:

The Zodiac, 1 Hagg, 320.

Except in the case of a loan by a ship's agent the owner of cargo should be held estopped from disputing his liability to pay particular items when once a necessity for the loan has been shown; he, by putting his cargo on board the ship impliedly authorises the master to act as the agent on an emergency arising; in other words, he holds the master out as his agent in case of necessity, and once given that necessity, the acts of the master in supplying the needs of ship and cargo ought not to be open to question by the principal as against a third person. The whole transaction was formally carried out before the Italian consular agent, and competent surveyors were duly appointed by him, who examined the vessels and made reports both before and after the repairs had been executed, and certified that the quantity of the metal paid for had been used for the necessary repairs. Under such circumstances the item for metalling ought not to be impeached but should be allowed:

Bigham, Q.C. and Barnes for the defendants.—The amount which the defendants are compelled to pay upon the bond is limited to what are considered as necessaries in the strict sense of the term; and further, the cost of such necessaries must not be exorbitant, but reasonable under the circumstances, and it has always been the practice of the registrar and merchants to go into figures under these heads:

Cur. adv. vult.

April 29.—BUTT, J.—This is an action brought by the plaintiffs the Comptoir d'Escompte de Paris, as holders of a bottomry bond given at San Michael, on the Italian ship Pontida, her freight, and the cargo of wheat laden on board. The shipowners admitted their liability, but an appearance was entered on behalf of the owners of the cargo, who dispute the amount, although they do not contest the validity of the bond. The matter having been referred to the registrar and merchants, the plaintiffs' claim of 4386*l.* 0*s.* 8*d.* was by them reduced to 3685*l.* 3*s.* 4*d.* with interest. The reductions of which the plaintiffs complain relate to charges for metal, commissions, and bottomry premiums. With reference to the item for metalling the ship, the plaintiffs contend: (1) That it being admitted that some metal was necessary, and the lender on bottomry not being the ship's agent but a banker who came forward in answer to advertisements, it was not competent for the registrar to go into the question of the reasonableness of the quality or price of the metal; (2) That the bond having been entered into with the sanction and approval of the Italian consul at San Michael, is by Italian law binding on all parties. As to this latter contention it is sufficient to say that there is no evidence of the Italian law being such as is alleged.

With respect to the quantity of metal used and the price charged, the question in this as in all such cases must be, was the expenditure necessary for the completion of the voyage? The master is, and can only be, agent of the owners of cargo so as to bind them, ex necessitate; and it is no more within his competency to fix them with liability for an excessive quantity or an excessive price of material, than for material none of which was necessary for the voyage. The question of excess must always be a question for the registrar and merchants. The same considerations apply to the commissions and maritime premiums, both of which appear to me exorbitant. It is scarcely necessary to cite an authority for what I consider the settled law and practice of this court to refer questions of excessive charges, whether for repairs, commissions, or premiums to the registrar and merchants, but the observations of Dr. Lushington in The Lord Cochrane (2 W. Rob. 320, 336), and of Lord Stowell in The Gratitudine (3 C. Rob. 240), may be referred to. It was further contended, more especially I think with reference to the commissions, that the ship might have been detained at San Michael had payment been refused; but, as pointed out by Lord Stowell in the case of The Augusta (1 Dods. 288), that alone will not suffice. With regard to the facts it does not appear to me that the registrar and merchants were precluded by the evidence adduced from exercising their discretion in the matter, or that they have erred in its exercise. I must therefore, overrule the objections and confirm the registrar's report, with costs.

GOWAN v. SPROTT. (a)

Co-ownership action—Order for an account—District registrar—Report—Order III., r. 8—Order XV., r. 1—Order LVI., r. 11.

Where an action is instituted in an Admiralty District Registry by part owners of a ship against the managing owner thereof for an account, and the writ claims an account under Order III., r. 8, and an order for the filing of the accounts is made under Order XV., r. 1, and the account is proceeded with pursuant to order, and the district registrar reports thereon, such report is to be treated as the usual report in an Admiralty Court action, and if the defendant seeks to take objection thereto, he must do so according to the provisions of Order LVI., r. 11, otherwise the plaintiff will be entitled to judgment thereon.

Where a district registrar has made an order in an action in the Admiralty Division for an account between the part owners of a ship that the accounts be filed, and that they be proceeded with, it is too late to take objection to his making such order after he has reported, there having been no appeal against such order.

The court will not extend the time for objecting to the registrar's report in a co-ownership action without special grounds being shown by the party seeking to object.

THIS was a motion by the plaintiffs to confirm a report made by the Liverpool Admiralty District Registrar in an action in personam, in which the plaintiffs, as part owners of the vessel Edderside, of which the defendant was the managing owner, claimed to have an account taken of the earnings and disbursements of the last completed voyage of the said vessel.

The action was instituted on the 19th Jan. 1884 in the Liverpool Admiralty District Registry, and on the 8th Feb. the plaintiffs, having taken out a summons under Order XV., r. 1, for an account, the Liverpool District Registrar made the following order:

Upon the application of the plaintiffs, and on hearing the solicitors on both sides, it is ordered that the defendant, as the managing owner of the ship or vessel Edderside, do, within fourteen days from the date hereof, file an account of the earnings and disbursements of the last completed voyage of the said ship or vessel from Liverpool to Australia, Hongkong, Manilla, and home to Liverpool.

In pursuance of this order the defendant on the 22nd Feb, filed an account, and on the 14th March the district registrar made a further order in the terms following:

Upon hearing the solicitors on both sides, and considering the account filed by the defendant on the 22nd day of February last, and the examination of the defendant taken viva voce this day, it is ordered that the defendant do file a further and better account showing the items at credit of the owners of the ship or vessel Edderside at the commencement of the voyage, an interest statement and an amended statement of freight on her homeward voyage, and that such account be filed within one week from the date hereof, and be proceeded with on the 22nd instant, at eleven o'clock.

On the 20th March the defendant obtained an order extending the time to file the further account until the 24th March, and the 27th March was appointed to proceed with the taking of the accounts. The defendant did not file his further account within the extended time, and on the 27th March his solicitor attended before the district registrar and contended that the registrar had no authority to make the order of the 20th March, and that his jurisdiction ended when the first account was filed.

The matter was then adjourned to the judge in chambers for directions, whereupon Butt, J. on the 1st April deferred making any order until the order of the 20th March had been drawn up and served on the defendant; but, before any further application was made, the defendant on the 24th April filed a further or amended account.

The registrar thereupon proceeded to take the account, and found that there was a balance due from the defendant to the plaintiffs. The following is an extract from the registrar's report, which was given on the 7th May 1884:

We consider it to be our duty to report to your Lordships that the defendant did not in our opinion keep proper books of account as ship's husband, and that had he done so he could have more readily made up and rendered a proper statement of accounts to his co-owners at the termination of the voyage. We also must advert to the fact that several of the accounts for the outward voyage were not paid for until a long period after they were due instead of being paid at the time, and the usual discount obtained, and it is partly because we are unable to point out the specific loss sustained by the owners in consequence of this that we consider that the defendant should be charged with interest at 5 per cent. on the money in his hands and credited with interest on his payments from the date on which they were made.

June 10.—The plaintiffs now moved for judgment.

J. P. Aspinall, for the plaintiffs, after stating the facts, was stopped.

Bucknill, for the defendants, contra.—This is an action under Order III., r. 8, and Order XV., r. 1. [BUTT, J.—Do those orders apply to the Admiralty Division?] It is submitted that they do. According to Order XV., r. 1 (a), "an order for the proper accounts, with all necessary inquiries and directions now usual in the Chancery Division in similar cases" is to be forthwith made. According to the registrar's first order, by which he is bound, it is ordered that the defendant do file an account of the earnings and disbursements of the Edderside. No mention is made of an account being taken, and in the absence of any such order it is submitted that the registrar had no jurisdiction to take the account, and therefore this report is valueless. It has been decided in the

(a) Reported by J. P. ASPINALL and F. W. RAIKES, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

(a) Order XV., r. 1, is as follows: "Where a writ of summons has been indorsed for an account under Order III., r. 8, or where the indorsement on a writ of summons involves taking an account, if the defendant either fails to appear, or does not after appearance, by affidavit or otherwise, satisfy the court or a judge that there is some preliminary question to be tried, an order for the proper accounts, with all necessary inquiries and directions now usual in the Chancery Division in similar cases, shall forthwith be made." In the case of York v. Stowers (W. N. 1884, p. 174), which came before Field, J. in chambers shortly after the Rules of the Supreme Court 1883 came into operation, objection was raised to an account being taken in the Queen's Bench Division under this rule, and application was made that the action should be transferred to the Chancery Division. Field, J., however, decided that the rule was meant to apply to the Queen's Bench Division. The result of the present case is, that the rule is applicable to the Probate, Divorce, and Admiralty Division, thus making it applicable to all three branches of the High Court.—ED.

Chancery Division that a district registrar has power to make an order for an account under Order XV., r. 1, and if the order so directs, but not otherwise, he can then proceed to take the account:

Re Bowen, 20 Ch. Div. 538; 47 L. T. Rep. N. S. 114.

That case is directly in point. It is true that by the second order it is directed that a further account be filed and be proceeded with. But, inasmuch as the registrar in the commencement took upon himself jurisdiction without a proper order, he cannot remedy that defect by this subsequent order. Moreover, the words "be proceeded with" are not sufficient to constitute an order to take the accounts.

BUTT, J.—The case referred to is in the Chancery Division, where it is possible to conceive many instances in which the mere filing of an account is all that is requisite. There are many cases in which the mere delivery of documents into the custody of the chief clerk is alone necessary. But, according to the practice of this court, where accounts are ordered to be filed, it means that the registrar is to go on and take an account. There has been no appeal against this order, and in the absence of such it is to be assumed to be right.

Bucknill.—As your Lordship is against me on the point of law, I would submit that the case should be adjourned in order that objection may be taken to the amount allowed to the plaintiffs. [BUTT, J.—Has not the time expired within which you should have taken such objection?] It is submitted not, because this is a reference under Order XV. and not under Order LVI., by which the time for objecting is limited to six days. It is to be remembered that this is not the ordinary form of Admiralty reference to which the provisions of Order LVI. are applicable, but that it is an action for an account under Order III., r. 8, and Order XV., r. 1. According to Order XV., r. 1, it is an order "with all necessary inquiries and directions now usual in the Chancery Division in similar cases;" and therefore the Chancery practice applies, and not the Admiralty.

J. P. Aspinall.—The action was instituted under the Admiralty Court Act, but we availed ourselves of the provisions of Order XV.

BUTT, J.—It is an action for an account under the Admiralty Court Act, and as the six days within which objection should have been taken have expired, I cannot accede to this application.

Bucknill.—Assuming the time has expired, the court has jurisdiction to extend it, and on the merits of the case this should be done.

BUTT, J.—The defendant has throughout persisted in taking a highly technical objection, in consequence of which he has not taken objection to this report within the proper time. He has, therefore, brought about the difficulty in which he is now placed, and, in the absence of special grounds, I see no reason for extending the time.

The report was accordingly confirmed, with costs.

THE MAMMOTH. (a)

Practice—Collision—Costs—Printed evidence for use of counsel in court—R. S. C., Order LXVI., r. 7, and Appendix N.—Counsel.

In consequence of the negligent navigation of the M. the steamship P. M. came into collision with the M. and with the D. In a damage action, instituted by the owners of the P. M. against the M., the plaintiffs were successful. In a damage action, instituted by the owners of the D. against the M. to recover damages arising out of the collision between the D. and the P. M., the plaintiffs were successful.

In this latter action by agreement between the parties the evidence of the first action, which had been printed in the form of a record for the purposes of appeal, was admitted, and was supplied to the plaintiffs by the owners of the P. M., the defendants refusing to provide them with it.

The registrar, on taxation, allowed the plaintiffs, the owners of the D., the amount paid by them to the owners of the P. M. for the printed evidence, and 3d. per folio for this printed evidence provided for the use of counsel in court in accordance with the terms of Appendix N. of the Rules of the Supreme Court 1883. On objection to the registrar's taxation the Court refused to disallow the 3d. per folio.

In a collision action where the trial promised to be protracted, and the damage done exceeded 2000*l., the Court refused to interfere with the registrar's discretion in allowing the costs of three counsel.*

THIS was a summons by the defendants in a damage action calling on the plaintiffs to show cause why the registrar should not review his taxation of the plaintiffs' costs by disallowing certain items therein allowed.

The action was instituted by the owners of the vessel Dunscore against the East and West India Dock Company, the owners of the derrick Mammoth, to recover damages arising out of a collision between the steamship Persian Monarch and the Dunscore on the 5th Jan. 1883, in the river Thames, alleged to have been brought about by the wrongful manœuvres of the Mammoth.

Immediately prior to this collision the Persian Monarch and the Mammoth had been in collision, in respect of which the owners of the Persian Monarch had instituted an action against the owners of the Mammoth, and in Feb. 1883 the Mammoth was found solely to blame for the collision. Thereupon the present action was instituted, and it was agreed that the evidence taken in the previous action should be admitted in this action. Accordingly, application was made by the plaintiffs to the defendants for the record in the previous action, which record had been printed for the purposes of appeal in such action. This the defendants refused to supply, whereupon the owners of the Dunscore obtained it from the owners of the Persian Monarch, the plaintiffs in the previous action.

The owners of the Dunscore having proved successful in their action against the Mammoth, proceeded to tax their costs, and among other items allowed by the registrar were the charge for the prints of the records together with 3*d.* per folio on the copies supplied to counsel and the fee of a third counsel. The 3*d.* per folio was allowed under the provisions of Appendix N. of the Rules of the Supreme Court, which provides that

> The solicitor for a party entitled to take printed copies shall be allowed, for such number of copies as he shall necessarily or properly take, the amount he shall pay therefor. In addition to the allowances for printing and taking printed copies, there shall be allowed for such printed copies as may be necessary or proper for the following, but for no other purposes (videlicet): Of any pleading, special case, petition of right, or evidence for the use of counsel in court, and in country agent causes when proper to be sent as a close copy for the use of the country solicitor, at per folio ..... 3*d.*

To these items the defendants now took objection on the grounds: (1) that there is no rule or scale under the Judicature Act which empowers a taxing officer to allow for prints of a document at 3*d.* or any other rate per folio which had been printed for and used in another action; (2) that no work or labour was bestowed by the plaintiffs' solicitors on the record to entitle them to such an allowance; (3) that the whole expense of printing such record has already fallen on the defendants in the action brought by the owners of the Persian Monarch, and they have also actually paid for prints of such record furnished by the plaintiffs' solicitors to counsel in that action; (4) that under the existing rules only a party to the action in which a document has been printed is entitled to take prints or to charge for prints for the use of counsel; (5) that the employment of a third counsel was wholly unnecessary, and, under the circumstances of the case, unwarranted, and ought not to be allowed on the ground that the evidence of ten of the witnesses was admitted on their evidence taken long before the hearing, and only four witnesses were actually examined at the trial.

With regard to these items, the registrar's notes were as follows:

> It appears to me that the defendants' solicitors ought themselves to have supplied the copies, and that on their refusal the plaintiffs' solicitors were clearly entitled to obtain them from the plaintiffs' solicitors in the other action, and to recover the amount paid for them from the defendants. I think, on further consideration, that they are also entitled to the scale allowance of 3*d.* a folio on the copies supplied to counsel, the whole record having ultimately been admitted by the defendants, besides having been previously admitted for the purpose of cross-examination. It is true that no labour was bestowed by the plaintiffs' solicitors on the record in question, but that is an objection which would apply to the scale allowance in any case where the solicitor claiming is not the solicitor who has printed the record. It is also true that the defendants have already incurred a similar charge for the same printing in the former action, but if they have to pay the charge again it results from their having raised again the same issues which were decided in that action. I have felt some doubt as to the allowance of a third counsel, but, considering that the case promised to be a hard-fought one, that the trial of the action by the Persian Monarch had occupied the court four days, that the defendants had appealed, that the issues in that action were in effect to be tried again in this, and that the defendants agreed to pay a sum of 2700*l.* in settlement of the claim in this action, a sum much exceeding the amount recovered in the action by the Persian Monarch, it appears to me that the plaintiffs were justified in retaining three counsel, as was also done by the defendants.

The summons came on before the judg in chambers, but was adjourned into court.

Bucknill in support of the application on behalf of the defendants.—On reference to Appendix N. it will be seen that the person entitled to the 3*d.* per folio is "the solicitor for a party entitled to take printed copies." That is, the solicitor in the action in which the matter is printed. Here it is the solicitor in an action other than that in which the evidence is printed who is seeking to charge the defendants with this 3*d.* per folio. The idea in allowing the 3*d.* per folio was to remunerate the solicitor over and above the price actually paid for the printing, and was by way of compensation for his work and labour in correcting proof, and generally in drawing up the record. In this case the record having been printed in the previous action, the solicitor to the present plaintiffs has been at no trouble, and therefore is entitled to no compensation. There was nothing in the circumstances of the case to warrant the allowance of three counsel. There were only four witnesses examined at the trial, and the issues raised were of no unusual character.

Kennedy, for the plaintiffs, contra.—There is nothing in the Rules of the Supreme Court expressly limiting the allowance of 3*d.* per folio to the solicitor at whose instigation the evidence is actually printed. It is the profit allowed to a solicitor in respect of printed evidence for use of counsel, and should be allowed irrespective of the question whether or not the evidence has been printed by the order of the solicitor claiming the allowance. The circumstances are sufficiently special to justify the registrar in allowing three counsel. The case lasted some time, and the amount at stake was large.

BUTT, J.—I can see no reason to interfere with this taxation of costs. The first items which I have to deal with are those charges for the prints of the record over and above the sum actually paid for them to the solicitors of the plaintiffs in the action between the Persian Monarch and the Mammoth. Have any sufficient reasons been shown why I should disallow these charges? It is admitted by the defendants that, if these records had been printed by a party to the action, the plaintiffs would have been entitled to charge at the fixed rate of 3*d.* per folio under Order LXVI., r. 7, But then it is argued that this rule does not apply when the record is printed by parties other than those to the action in which the record is printed. However, I think that when parties enter into an agreement not to call evidence in the ordinary way, but to admit prints of evidence prepared for appeal in another action, that then this is similar to an agreement that the parties should be in the same position as if it had been necessary to have the same evidence printed under an order. I therefore do not think that the objection to these items is made out. With regard to the costs of a third counsel, I am quite aware of the new rules relating to that subject, but it has not been argued that I am absolutely bound by them. I am of opinion that where damage has been done to the amount of 2000. it is not unreasonable to have three counsel. I therefore think, on the whole, that nothing has been shown me to cause me to overrule the taxing master's discretion in this matter, and I therefore direct these objections to be dismissed with costs.

A charter-party wholly executed by both parties thereto abroad, is duly stamped so as to be admissible in evidence if it has been stamped within two months after it has been first received in the United Kingdom as provided by sect. 15 of the stamp Act 1870, and it is not necessary that such a charter-party should be stamped under sect. 68 of the same Act.

Semble, that such a charter-party must be stamped with an impressed stamp, and not with an adhesive stamp.

THIS was an application for a new trial by the plaintiffs in an action instituted in the County Court to recover demurrage amounting to 57*l.* 10*s.* in respect of four voyages of the steamship Belfort belonging to the plaintiffs.

The charter-party under which the defendants' goods had been carried was dated Nov. 30, 1883, and had been entered into and signed by or on behalf of all the parties at La Rochelle in France. On the 13th March 1884 the original charter-party was received unstamped in England by the plaintiffs' agents for the purposes of the action, and was sent by them to the Inland Revenue Office on or about March 17, in order that it might be stamped. On the 2nd April the charter-party was returned from the Inland Revenue Office unstamped with a memorandum in the following words:

> If this charter-party was executed and intended to be dated as at Cardiff it cannot now be stamped under any circumstances. But if signed and intended to be dated as at La Rochelle, an adhesive stamp of 6*d.* must be affixed and cancelled within ten days after its receipt in the United Kingdom, and before being signed by any party within the United Kingdom. But the impressed stamp is not applicable in such a case.

On the 2nd April the plaintiffs' agents in England placed a 6*d.* adhesive stamp on the charter-party and cancelled such stamp. During the hearing of the plaintiffs' case it was proposed to put in the charter-party, but objection was taken by the defendants to the admission of that document on the ground that it had not been stamped in compliance with the provisions of sects. 67 and 68 of the Stamp Act 1870. On this question the County Court judge decided that the charter-party should have been stamped under the provisions of sect. 68, and gave judgment for the defendants.

On the 8th April the plaintiffs wrote, inclosing the charter-party, to the Inland Revenue Commissioners for their opinion as to whether or not the document could be stamped. The charter-party was subsequently returned with an adjudication stamp affixed thereto, and dated April 10, the commissioners being of opinion that the case came within sect. 15 of the Stamp Act 1870 and not within sect. 68 as decided by the County Court judge. (a)

Thereupon application was made to the said County Court judge for a new trial, but such application was refused. An application was then made to the Admiralty Division of the High Court, under sect. 27 of the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868, for leave to appeal, and such application was granted. (b)

Barnes, on behalf of the plaintiffs, in support of the appeal.—This charter-party, which is executed by both parties on Nov. 30, 1883 out of the United Kingdom, is not received in the United Kingdom until March 13. Within two months of that date it has been stamped, and if the provisions of sect. 15 of the Stamp Act 1870 apply there has been a compliance with those provisions. That section enacts that, in the absence of express provision to the contrary, any unstamped instrument executed at any place out of the United Kingdom may be stamped within two months after its receipt in the United Kingdom. No express provision to the contrary exists. It is true that sects. 66, 67, and 68 expressly deal with charter-parties, but only under circumstances different from the present case. In this case the charter-party was executed wholly abroad. Sect. 68 could not have been meant to apply to such a charter-party as the present, because it fixes the utmost limit of time within which it must be stamped as one month, and yet there must be many places out of the United Kingdom whence it would be impossible for a charter-party to reach the United Kingdom within the prescribed month. Sect. 67 cannot apply to the present case, because it deals with charter-parties partly executed abroad, and then sent over to England to be finally executed. Sect. 66 is clearly meant to apply to charter-parties made in this country. There is therefore no "express provision to the contrary," and hence sect. 15 is applicable.

Dr. Phillimore and Bucknill, for the defendants, contra.—Sect. 68, which deals exclusively with charter-parties, contains express provision contrary to the enactment contained in sect. 15. According to sect. 68 a charter-party can only be stamped within one month after its execution,

(a) Reported by J. P. ASPINALL, and F. W. RAIKES, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

(a) On reference to the charter-party we find that the adjudication stamp placed thereon by the inland Revenue Commissioners consisted of a sixpenny impressed stamp, with the words "adjudged duly stamped" printed underneath. Having regard to the fact that sect. 23 provides that, "Except where express provision is made to the contrary, all duties are to be denoted by impressed stamps only," and that no express provision is made to the contrary by sect. 15, under which the court has held that the present charter falls, it is to be presumed that such a charter-party as the present must be stamped with an impressed stamp, and not with an adhesive stamp.—ED.

(b) Sect. 27 of the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act (31 & 32 Vict. c. 71) 1868 provides as follows: "No appeal shall be allowed unless the instrument of appeal is lodged in the registry of the High Court of Admiralty within ten days from the date of the decree or order appealed from, but the judge of the High Court of Admiralty may, on sufficient cause being shown to his satisfaction for such omission, allow an appeal to be prosecuted, notwithstanding that the instrument of appeal has not been lodged within that time." In the case of The Humber (ante, p. 181) Sir James Hannen and Butt, J., sitting as a divisional court, decided that this section is not altered or curtailed by sect. 6 of the County Courts Act 1875, which merely provides an alternative mode of appeal.—ED.

and in this case that month has elapsed. [Sir JAMES HANNEN.—If it is physically impossible that in consequence of the locality where the charter is entered into it should be stamped within the month, what then?] Parties who contemplate entering into charter-parties should have adhesive stamps with them to meet such a contingency.

Sir JAMES HANNEN.—I am of opinion that this document was properly stamped when it was produced on the second occasion before the County Court judge. Sect. 15 of the Stamp Act is general and provides that "(1.) Except where express provision to the contrary is made by this or any other Act, any unstamped or insufficiently stamped instrument may be stamped after the execution thereof, on payment of the unpaid duty and a penalty of ten pounds, and also by way of further penalty where the unpaid duty exceeds ten pounds of interest on such duty, at the rate of five pounds per centum per annum, from the day upon which the instrument was first executed up to the time when such interest is equal in amount to the unpaid duty. And the payment of any penalty or penalties is to be denoted on the instrument by a particular stamp. (2.) Provided as follows: (a) Any unstamped or insufficiently stamped instrument, which has been first executed at any place out of the United Kingdom, may be stamped at any time within two months after it has been first received within the United Kingdom on payment of the unpaid duty only. (b) The commissioners may, if they think fit, at any time within twelve months after the first execution of any instrument, remit the penalty or penalties, or any part thereof."

Now this was a document first executed out of the United Kingdom, and it has been stamped with an impressed stamp within two months after it had been received in the United Kingdom. It lies therefore upon the party who is impeaching the legality of the stamping to show that there is "express provision to the contrary." The express provision to the contrary relied upon is to be found in the sections specially relating to charter-parties. Sect. 66 is: "The duty upon an instrument chargeable with duty as a charter-party may be denoted by an adhesive stamp, which is to be cancelled by the person by whom the instrument is last executed, or by whose execution it is completed as a binding contract." I am of opinion that that section does not refer to charter-parties executed abroad. It is there dealing with charter-parties executed in this country. When we come to sect. 67, I find that the marginal note, which is "as to charter-parties executed abroad," is strongly confirmatory of the contention that sect. 66 does not apply to charter-parties made abroad. This 67th section enacts that, "Where any document chargeable with duty as a charter-party, and not being duly stamped, is first executed out of the United Kingdom, any party thereto may, within ten days after it has first been received within the United Kingdom, and before it has been executed by any person in the United Kingdom, affix thereto an adhesive stamp denoting the duty chargeable thereon, and at the same time cancel such adhesive stamp, and the instrument with an adhesive stamp thereon so affixed and cancelled shall be deemed duly stamped." That contemplates the case of a charter-party first being executed abroad and then being executed in the United Kingdom. That section therefore does not apply to this particular case, because the charter-party here has been executed by both parties out of the United Kingdom. Sect. 68 enacts that, "An executed instrument chargeable with duty as a charter-party and not being duly stamped, may be stamped with an impressed stamp upon the following terms: that is to say, (1.) Within seven days after the first execution thereof, on payment of the duty and a penalty of four shillings and sixpence; (2.) After seven days, but within one month after the first execution thereof, on payment of the duty and a penalty of ten pounds, and shall not in any other case be stamped with impressed stamp." I am of opinion that that section does not relate to a document wholly executed out of this country. It seems to me that it was never intended that in the case of charter-parties executed abroad the parties should have adhesive stamps with them. It appears to me, therefore, that Dr. Phillimore has failed to show that there is any express provision to the contrary, and if so the case comes within sect. 15, and the stamping has been done within the time prescribed by that section. I will only add that in my view the course taken has been most productive of waste of time in rendering it necessary that the whole case should be tried a second time. The proper course would have been to have ordered an adjournment in order that this point might be settled. The result, therefore, is that this appeal must be allowed and a new trial ordered.

BUTT, J.—I am of the same opinion. I think that this document was properly stamped under sect. 15. and that the case comes within the provisions of the sub-sections of that section. It is provided under sub-sect. 1, that with regard to instruments executed abroad they may be stamped within two months after they have been received within the United Kingdom, and by sub-sect. 2 power is given to the commissioners to remit the penalty if they think fit. Now, unless this case is taken out of sect. 15 by some express provision to the contrary, it seems clear that the commissioners have power to do that which they have done. For the express provision to the contrary we are referred to sects. 67 and 68. I do not, however, think that those sections apply to this case, in which the instrument is wholly executed out of the United Kingdom. For instance, sect. 67 applies to a charter-party first executed out of the United Kingdom, because it speaks of something being done within ten days after it has been received in the United Kingdom. Therefore I think that there is nothing to take this case out of the operation of sect. 14 and that this appeal should be allowed.

The Court ordered each party to bear their own costs in the court below, the defendants to pay the costs of the appeal.

Salvage—Practice—Tender—Costs.

Where in a salvage action defendants with their statement of defence tender and pay into court a sum of money in satisfaction of the plaintiffs' claim, and plead such payment into court, and the sum paid in is held to be sufficient, the court will order the defendants to pay the plaintiffs' costs up to the date of the delivery of the statement of defence, unless the circumstances of the case render it just and expedient to order otherwise. (b) In a salvage action it is not necessary that a tender should be accompanied with an offer to pay the plaintiffs' costs up to the date of tender.

THIS was a motion by the defendants in a salvage action, subsequent to judgment therein, to vary the decree by striking out so much as gave to the plaintiffs the costs incurred by them up to the time of tender, and by condemning the plaintiffs in the entire costs of the action.

The action was instituted by the crew and owners of the steamship Xantho against the steamship William Symington, to recover salvage for services rendered to the William Symington, off the coast of Spain, on May 23, 1884.

The plaintiffs claimed 800*l*. The defendants in their defence alleged a tender and payment into court of 200*l*. which was refused by the plaintiffs in their reply. The defence was dated July 12, and the money was paid into court on July 14.

The action came on for trial on the 24th July, before Butt, J., who upheld the tender of 200*l*. with costs. On counsel for the plaintiffs applying for costs up to the time of tender, Butt, J. said: "I have always had a doubt about the practice of this court. I know the rule in the common law courts was, that if a man declined to accept a tender he went on at his own risk, and he paid the whole costs if he failed. I do not know whether that is the rule here. They will follow the usual course in the registry. I will not decide the matter now. If there is an appeal from the registrar we will have the matter decided."

Upon this the following decree was drawn up in the registry:

The judge having heard counsel on both sides pronounced the tender of 200*l*. heretofore made in this action to be sufficient, dismissed the defendants and their bail from this action and all further observance of justice therein on payment of the costs incurred by the plaintiffs up to the time of the said tender being made, and condemned the plaintiffs in the costs incurred subsequently to the said tender.

The plaintiffs thereupon lodged their costs in the registry for taxation, but on the defendants alleging that they proposed raising the question as to whether the plaintiffs were entitled to any costs the registrar postponed taxation.

(a) Reported by J. P. ASPINALL and F. W. RAIKES, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

(b) The learned Judge in his judgment directs the defendants to pay the plaintiffs' costs up to the date of delivery of the statement of defence. We assume that he took this date as being identical with the date of tender. Were the tender made prior to statement of claim, it is presumed that the plaintiff would only get his costs up to the date of the tender.—ED.

The motion now came on before the judge in court.

J. P. Aspinall, for the defendants, in support of the motion.—While the practice of late years in the Admiralty Court has been under similar circumstances to give the plaintiffs the costs incurred up to the tender, it is nevertheless opposed to the practice at common law. [BUTT, J.—We must remember to distinguish between what is called tender in the Admiralty Court and what is known as tender in the common law courts. In the Admiralty Court what is called tender is simply payment into court; whereas, at common law it is an offer of so much in satisfaction of the plaintiff's claim before action brought.] The practice at common law has been to give the defendant the entire costs of the action where the payment into court has been found sufficient. [BUTT, J.—That I think is so, but the practice in the Admiralty Court has been different, and the question is, whether it is a right practice.] It is only since 1869 that the present practice of the Admiralty Court has been unvaried. [BUTT, J.—At the common law I remember there used to be two pleas, viz., tender and payment into court. We must therefore distinguish between the two, inasmuch as in the Admiralty Court payment into court is called a tender.] The question of payment into court has recently been considered by the Court of Appeal, who have decided that the alternative plea of money paid into court as sufficient to satisfy the plaintiff's claim, when held to be sufficient, goes to the whole cause of action, and that judgment should be entered for the defendant, and that the defendant should get all the costs of the action:

Wheeler v. The United Telephone Company, 50 L. T. Rep. N. S. 749; 13 Q. B. Div. 597.

The desirability of having one uniform practice in all the courts should be considered, and, inasmuch as costs are in the discretion of the judge, there is no reason why the old practice of the Admiralty Court should not be set aside. [BUTT, J.—That being so, it is a question of which is the more reasonable.] It would seem the more reasonable course because in a salvage action what generally happens is that either the plaintiffs hastily institute their action without giving the defendants time to make a tender before action brought, or else a tender is made, and refused as insufficient, and then action commenced. In either case the action of the plaintiff is productive of unnecessary litigation if the tender is upheld, and hence the defendants should be made to pay all the costs.

Myburgh, Q.C., for the plaintiffs, contra.—In the absence of strong reasons, the old practice should be followed. [BUTT, J.—I have always had great doubts on this point, and I have been inclined to think that the prevailing practice is a bad one.] Having regard to the eminent judges who laid down the practice, it is to be assumed that it is a reasonable one. [BUTT, J.—But there is no want of analogy between payment into court at common law and tender in the Admiralty Court, and yet the practice at common law has also been settled by equally eminent judges.] The peculiar circumstances of salvage make the practice a just and reasonable one. The tender is not made until after the plaintiffs have instituted their action, a thing which all salvors are entitled to do.

[BUTT, J.—But if you refuse a tender after action brought, you would refuse the same tender prior to action brought, and therefore you are really the creator of unnecessary litigation.] It is not the universal practice at common law to give the defendant all the costs of the action when the tender is upheld:

Buckton v. Higgs, 45 L. T. Rep. N. S. 755; 4 Ex Div. 174;
Greaves v. Fleming, 4 Q. B. Div. 226;
Gretton v. Mees, 38 L. T. Rep. N. S. 506; 7 Ch. Div. 839.

The practice in the Admiralty Court has been to tender a sum of money with costs:

The Hickman, L. Rep. 3 A. & E. 15; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 298; 21 L. T. Rep. N. S. 472;
The Thracian, L. Rep. 3 A. & E. 504; 1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 207; 25 L. T. Rep. N. S. 889.

[BUTT. J.—I do not understand the meaning of a tender with costs. A tender is an offered payment of a sum of money in satisfaction of the plaintiff's claim, and if accepted the person accepting gets his costs as a matter of course.] The Court of Appeal in the case of The Hector (5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 101; 48 L. T. Rep. N. S. 890; 8 P. Div. 218) upheld the old practice of the Admiralty Court as to costs where both ships are held to blame for a collision, although it is opposed to the common law practice, and in many cases works considerable injustice to successful appellants.

Cur. adv. vult.

Nov. 4.—BUTT, J.—This is a suit for salvage services rendered by the plaintiffs to the steamship William Symington on the 24th May last. The action was instituted on the 18th June. The defendants, in their statement of defence, which was delivered on the 12th July, denied that the services rendered by the plaintiffs were salvage services, and as an alternative defence they paid into court the sum of 200*l.*, which sum the plaintiffs, by their reply, alleged to be insufficient. The cause was heard on the 24th July, when the court pronounced the sum paid in to be sufficient. A question as to payment of costs has arisen. There is no doubt as to the liability of the plaintiffs to pay the defendants' costs subsequently to the delivery of the statement of defence; but the plaintiffs claim to be entitled by the practice of the court to be paid their costs up to that date. No doubt the general practice of the Court of Admiralty was to give the plaintiffs their costs up to the time of payment into court, or of tender, as such payment into court was called. On the other hand, the invariable practice of the courts of common law was to give the defendants the whole costs of the cause where the only issue was the sufficiency of the amount paid into court, and where he succeeded on that issue.

Since the passing of the Judicature Acts these costs, instead of necessarily following the event, are by Order LV., r. 1, in the discretion of the court or judge. I think it desirable that the practice of this division, with respect to costs, should, in the generality of actions, be made to conform, as nearly as may be, to that of the Queen's Bench Division; and had there been no considerations specially applicable to salvage suits, I should have been disposed to have condemned the plaintiffs in the whole costs. But there are circumstances which render it peculiarly difficult, if not impossible, for plaintiffs in salvage actions to form an estimate of the amount to which they are entitled for the services they have rendered. In the first place, the amount of their remuneration depends to some extent on the value of the salved property, and of this salvors are seldom aware until after proceedings in the suit have gone some length. Again, from motives of public policy, and from the nature of the services rendered, their title to remuneration is not a mere quantum meruit. Having regard to the weight my predecessors have attached to these considerations, and to the decision of the court in the case of Buckton v. Higgs (ubi sup.), where, as in this case the defendant had pleaded payment into court as an alternative defence, I shall exercise the discretion vested in me by ordering the defendants to pay the plaintiffs' costs up to the time of delivery of the statement of defence. This, however, is a rule from which I should not hesitate to depart in any case in which I thought salvors had acted unreasonably in refusing an offer made before suit. I wish to add that much confusion has arisen both in the Court of Admiralty and in this division from a notion that no payment into court is sufficient unless it be accompanied by an offer to pay the plaintiffs' costs up to that time. In my opinion such an offer is not only unnecessary, but erroneous, and is one which should not be made.

COURT OF APPEAL.

STOCK v. INGLIS. (a)

Marine insurance—Insurable interest—No specific appropriation of goods to contract—Property not passed to the assured—"Free on board."

Where goods are shipped f.o.b., even though mixed with other goods of the same sort and not specifically appropriated to the buyer, if it appear that it was the intention of the parties, in the ordinary course of business, that the goods should be at the risk of the buyer, the buyer has an insurable interest in them.

D. and Co., sugar merchants of London, agreed in writing to sell to the plaintiff, a merchant at Bristol, 200 tons of sugar of a certain quality as regards saccharine matter, at the price of 21*s.* 9*d. per cwt. f.o.b. Hamburg. The sugar was to be shipped from Hamburg to Bristol, and payment was to be made by cash in London in exchange for bills of lading. D. and Co.'s agents at Hamburg, in performance of this contract and also of another Bristol contract for another* 200 tons of sugar, shipped thence per the steamship City of Dublin 400 *tons of sugar, and consigned the same to Bristol. business was, as the plaintiff knew, not to apportion particular bags of sugar to particular buyers at the time of shipment, but to apportion the various bags and the bills of lading representing them between their various buyers at a particular port, after the sugar had been shipped and after D. and Co. had received the bills of lading. This was done in order that D. and Co. might with comparative accuracy make up to each buyer the amount of saccharine matter contracted for by him. The City of Dublin was lost on the voyage from Hamburg to Bristol, before any appropriation of sugar had been made by D. and Co., but D. and Co. afterwards appropriated 200 tons to the plaintiff and sent him an invoice and the plaintiff thereupon paid for the sugar so appropriated to him. The plaintiff had a floating policy on goods, and on hearing of the loss declared thereunder in respect of these 200 tons of sugar in the City of Dublin.

Held, in an action on such policy, that the plaintiff had an insurable interest in such sugar, because, although the property had not passed to him, the words f.o.b. in the contract made between the parties, having regard to their knowledge of the course of business, showed it to be their intention that the 200 tons bought by the plaintiff should be at his risk, and that he should be liable to pay for it whether it arrived or not.

Judgment of Field, J. (47 L. T. Rep. N. S. 416) reversed.

THIS was an appeal from a judgment of Field, J., on further consideration (reported 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 596; 47 L. T. Rep. N. S. 416).

The plaintiff was a Bristol merchant and sought to recover from the defendant, an underwriter at Lloyd's, under a "floating" marine policy on goods in respect of a loss of 3900 bags of sugar shipped on board the City of Dublin from Hamburg to Bristol.

The facts, which are very fully set out in the judgment of Field, J., were as follows:—

The sugars which were lost had been shipped at Hamburg for Messrs. Drake and Co., London merchants, by their forwarding agents there, in intended performance of two written contracts for sale entered into by Drake and Co. with two Bristol buyers in Jan. 1881. At the time of the loss, on the 4th Feb., the position of things with regard to these contracts was as follows: By the earliest of these two contracts (the 7th Jan.) Drakes agreed to sell to a Bristol firm (W. Beloe and Co.) 200 tons of sugar, price 21*s.* 9*d.* per cwt. net, f.o.b. Hamburg, for 88 degrees net saccharine contents. Sugar to analyse between 85 and 92 net, 6*d.* per cwt. to be paid or allowed for each degree above or below 88, but anything above 92 not to be paid for, and should the average analysis of whole contract exceed 90 such excess not to be paid for. For January delivery at Hamburg. Payment by cash in London in exchange for bill of lading. By the second contract of the 12th Jan. Drakes agreed to sell to the plaintiff a similar quantity at a like price upon identical terms. After the loss it became for the first time known to Drake and Co. and to the plaintiff that Beloe and Co. had entered into the contract of the 7th Jan. with Drakes, for the purpose of enabling them to execute a contract previously made by them on the same day with the plaintiff for 200 tons at an advanced price. At the time of shipment and loss, therefore, all that Drakes knew was that they had engaged to sell 400 tons destined for Bristol, i.e., 200 to Beloe, and 200 to the plaintiff, and although plaintiff knew that he had 400 tons coming from Hamburg, i.e., 200 to be shipped by Drakes, and 200 to be shipped by someone under Beloe, he did not know that Drakes were the shippers of the latter 200, nor did Drakes know that Beloe was under any contract to deliver, or plaintiff under any contract to take, 200 tons contracted for by Beloe. The ultimate destination of the whole 400 tons was thus Bristol, deliverable by Drake and Co., f.o.b. at Hamburg during the month of January. The ordinary course of business, and which course was known to the plaintiff, was for Drakes' forwarding agents at Hamburg to ship by that boat of the Hamburg and Bristol line of steamers next due to sail after the time fixed for delivery, and the City of Dublin was the one in turn for departure at the end of the last half of January. The plaintiff, on the 31st Jan., in writing to Drakes, expressed his hope that the 200 tons of the 12th were on the steamer then due to leave Hamburg, and in reply he received a letter from Drakes, that this sugar was not only at Hamburg, but that there would probably be extra expense chargeable to him owing to delay in steamer's arrival out, and consequent delay in departure. About the same time Drake and Co. also advised Harmann and Thielnehmer, their Hamburg forwarding agents, that they had sold 400 tons for Bristol, and gave them the necessary directions as to which bags were to be shipped for that port, begging them to engage room by the City of Dublin, and send the bills of lading to London as soon as possible. The whole of the sugar which Drake and Co. had appropriated to satisfy the two contracts together had not arrived, however, at Hamburg at the time of the departure of the steamer, and in consequence Hermann and Thielnehmer were not able to ship by the City of Dublin more than 3900 bags, and they advised Drake and Co. of this short shipment, proposing to send the 100 short shipped by the next steamer due to sail on the 15th Feb. They did, however, ship 3900 bags, and took several bills of lading by which they were made deliverable to "order, Bristol," but no appropriation was made by them of any specific bags; that is to say, as to which of the bags were to be Beloe's, and which of them the plaintiff's, but the whole 3900 were shipped in one undistinguishable mass, and all were consigned simply "order Bristol." This was in accordance with the usual course of business of Drake and Co., which was not to fulfil contracts of this kind by appropriating the sugar to each buyer at the time of shipment, but to ship enough to satisfy all the contracts they might have for sugar, which were deliverable at any particular port, and after the shipment to apportion the sugar shipped between the buyers at that port according to each contract. The apportionment was made so that no part of the sugar to be supplied under any contract should exceed 92 degrees net saccharine matter, and that the average should not be more than 90, for all net above, though paid for by Drake and Co. in Germany, would, under the terms of the contract, go for nothing in England, and so be a loss to them. It was therefore the usual course of business for Drake and Co. not to make the apportionment until they had got the bills of lading, when by comparing them with the certificates of the analyses of the sugar made in Germany, and which were duly forwarded to them in London, and had references to the marks and number of the bags in which the sugar was packed, they could ascertain the net saccharine contents of each lot of bags, and could allot the bags to their different buyers at the port for which they were shipped, so as to correspond in respect of the specific quantity of net sugar with the degree contracted for. Messrs. Drake and Co.'s transactions of this character were very extensive, as well with the plaintiff as others, and the general course of business between them and their buyers had been for the buyer to bear the cost of the insurance against sea risks from the time of delivery, and the Court of Appeal drew the inference that, as a matter of fact, both the plaintiff and Beloe and Co. knew that it was the course of business of Drake and Co. to apportion and appropriate the sugar to the contracts with their different buyers in the way above described after and not at the time of shipment. The City of Dublin, with the 3900 bags on board, left Hamburg on the 2nd Feb. 1881, and was lost with her cargo on the morning of the 4th. On the 4th Feb. Drake and Co., who had then got the bills of lading, apportioned the 3900 bags between Beloe and the plaintiff, and they made out invoices to each accordingly, that to Beloe and Co. showing an average percentage on the whole of 89·5875, and that to the plaintiff of 89·35, both averages therefore being kept under 90. News of the loss arrived before these invoices were posted, and the plaintiff anticipating that he might have the 200 tons on board coming to him under his contract, although without any specific advice of the shipment, declared on the City of Dublin under the policy sued on for any loss in respect of those 200 tons. In the letter to the plaintiff of the 4th Feb., in which Drake and Co. inclosed the invoice to the plaintiff for the 1900 bags, they proposed that the contract should be cancelled as to the 100 short shipment, and to this the plaintiff assented, but this was done after both parties knew of the loss. The plaintiff and Beloe and Co. subsequently respectively paid the contract price, and obtained the bills of lading for the sugars specified in their respective invoices, and Beloe and Co. afterwards sent an invoice of the 200 tons of sugar sold by them to the plaintiff, who thereupon paid the price of these and received the bills of lading in respect thereof. The plaintiff then declared under the floating policy in respect of this last-mentioned sugar. In consequence of the loss of the ship and cargo, the plaintiff, who had made two sub-contracts with the Bristol Sugar Refining Company for the sale to them of the sugar he had contracted to buy of Drake and Co. and Beloe and Co. at an advanced price, failed to realise the profit he had contracted for. Upon these facts the plaintiff's right to recover was denied by the defendant on the ground that no property in the sugar had passed to him before the loss; and, secondly, that at the time of the loss he had no insurable interest in the sugar itself, and that even if he had an insurable interest in "profits," he was not entitled to declare the loss in respect of that interest upon a policy on "goods."

Field, J., before whom the action was tried, was of opinion, on further consideration, that the plaintiff had neither property nor insurable interest in the sugar, and that, as he was not entitled to recover for a loss of profit under a policy like this on goods, the defendant was entitled to judgment, and he gave judgment for the defendant accordingly.

The plaintiff appealed.

Charles Russell, Q.C. and Reid, Q.C. (Danckwerts with them) for the plaintiff.—The plaintiff had an insurable interest in the sugar, because as soon as it was shipped f.o.b. at Hamburg it was at his risk, even though no property in it had passed to him prior to the apportionment. The plaintiff here contracted to pay for the sugar, whether it arrived or not, and he expressly took all the risks of the voyage. They cited the following cases:

Cohen, Q.C. and Barnes for the defendant.—The plaintiff had no property, nor any insurable interest in the sugar. The price was not ascertainable until the sugar had been appropriated, and therefore at the time of the loss there was no liability to pay the price; the case therefore of Anderson v. Morice (ubi sup.) is an authority in favour of the defendant. Brett, M.R.—I think that no one can deny that this is a case of extreme difficulty and of great nicety. In my opinion it is the duty of a court to lean in favour of an insurable interest if possible, because when an underwriter who has received his premium takes the objection that the assured had no insurable interest, he takes an objection which is technical, and which has no real merit in most instances, and for that reason I have always felt it my duty to lean in favour of an insurable interest if possible. Of course we must not assume facts which do not exist, and we must not stretch the law beyond its proper limits; but we must, I think, approach the consideration of the question with a mind to find in favour of an insurable interest, if the law and the facts will allow it.

In this case it seems to me to have been proved that there was in Bristol a course of business—I do not think it amounted to a custom of trade—in this sugar trade, and that this course of business consisted in this: Where sugar was shipped at Hamburg for Bristol by a particular shipper in sufficient quantities to fulfil all the orders that he had from Bristol, and where the price of the sugar depended upon the amount of saccharine matter in the sugar, it was impossible to be very exact in allocating to each contract the exact amount of saccharine matter to which it was entitled. In consequence of this difficulty the course of business was for the shipper to take bills of lading of small quantities of the sugar, so that, when he saw the analyses of the quantities of the sugar, he could, by distributing the bills of lading according to those analyses, allocate to each contract out of the sugar shipped the exact amount of saccharine matter to which that contract was entitled. Now it seems to me that, whether as a fact that allocation could or could not have been done before shipment, it never was done before shipment, but was always done in England. That is the inference which I draw from the evidence. Then the plaintiff is a dealer in this sugar business; he is a buyer certainly, but he has made many contracts of this kind with persons who sold this kind of sugar. That being the course of business by the seller, the sugar to which the buyer would be entitled depended upon the distribution of the bills of lading according to the analyses, and the exact price which the buyer would have to pay depended also upon that distribution. I cannot then believe that a buyer who had dealt in this sugar trade did not know of this course of business, and I draw the inference that he did know of it. If so, then the course of business was known to the plaintiff and Messrs. Drake and Co. at the time the contract of sale was made, and I think to Beloe also and to all persons trading in sugar between Hamburg and Bristol. Now the contract is made in writing for the purchase and sale of a quantity of sugar on the terms "free on board" by persons who knew the course of business which I have described, and the question is, what is the true construction of that contract having regard to the knowledge of the parties with respect to the course of business in such cases? Now it is not denied that, if the goods shipped are specific goods, the words "free on board" mean more than that the goods are to be delivered on board the vessel at the shipper's expense. If the goods are specific goods the words "free on board" mean that the goods are to be delivered on board at the expense of the shipper on account of the buyer, and in such a case the goods would be at the risk of the buyer from the time when they were shipped, whether they were lost or not on the voyage.

If that is the meaning of the words "free on board" in a contract for the purchase and sale of specific goods, even though payment is not to be made on delivery of the goods on board, but at some other time, and even though the purchaser cannot obtain delivery until he has paid cash or accepted bills against the bills of lading, then the question arises whether there can be a contract made on the terms "free on board," which can be fulfilled without the delivery on board of any specific goods at the time of shipment. That question may be tested thus: Can you make such a contract with regard to part of a bulk cargo? Is there any mercantile or legal reason why a person should not agree to sell another person so much out of a bulk cargo, or ex such and such a ship, upon the terms that if lost the loss shall fall on the purchaser and not upon the seller? I see no reason against this, and if such a contract can be made, then it is made when you put the words "free on board" in a contract to buy and sell a certain quantity of a bulk cargo ex such and such a ship. In such a contract some meaning must be given to the words "free on board," and what meaning can be given to them with regard to the unseparated part of the cargo except the meaning which would be given to them if the contract was dealing with specific goods? What is there contrary to business or law in those words "free on board" meaning in such a contract "I sell you twenty tons out of fifty, I paying the cost of shipment, and you bearing the risk of whether they are lost or not?" I think it is not a bit more inconsistent with business and law, that parties should make such a contract with regard to part of a cargo, than that they should do so with regard to a whole cargo, or with regard to specific parts of a cargo, and therefore the only remaining question is whether this is such a contract. Now, taking the surrounding circumstances into consideration, the circumstances of the course of business known to both buyer and seller, I think that both these contracts of Messrs. Drake and Co. with Beloe and with the plaintiff were that the buyer should pay for the sugar that might be allocated to him, and that he should be bound to accept such sugar, and further that the seller should not run the risk of arrival, but that the buyer should be bound to pay the price against the allocation of bills of lading whether the sugar arrived or not. Therefore, if that is so, when Beloe sold to the plaintiff he sold in truth that contract, and the plaintiff became liable to Beloe to pay for the sugar whether it arrived or not, and he was already liable to Drake and Co. upon the same terms, and therefore upon the non-arrival of the sugar he would suffer a money loss. It is not only that he would not only make a profit, but he would suffer a money loss, and therefore the question that was raised about Anderson v. Morice (ubi sup.) does not arise. Directly one arrives at the true meaning of the contract the case falls within known principles of insurance law, and I cannot doubt that here the plaintiff had an insurable interest. Therefore I think our judgment ought to be in favour of the plaintiff.

Baggallay, L.J.—I am of the same opinion, and I shall express my reasons for agreeing with the Master of the Rolls very concisely. I am of opinion that the appellant is entitled to succeed, upon the ground that at the time of the loss the goods were at his risk. The argument in support of that view has been based on two reasons: one, the fact that the goods were to be "free on board;" the other, the course of business in this particular trade. It has not been denied that where the goods are specific goods the words "free on board" place them at the risk of the buyer from the time of shipment; but it has been suggested that it is different when the goods are not specific, but are, as in the present case, a certain proportion of goods out of a larger bulk. What authority is there for this suggested difference? No authority has been cited to show that there is a difference; what reason, then, in law is there for such a difference? I think it very difficult to suggest any, and if called on to express an opinion I should assent to the argument of Mr Reid. But I prefer to rest my decision upon the general course of business in regard to transactions of this kind. I think it is impossible to come to any other conclusion than that the distribution of the bills of lading, with reference to the analyses of the different sugars which were the subjects of the different contracts, was the ordinary course of business in transactions of this character, and that both parties knew it to be so. Consequently, the goods were at the risk of the purchaser at the time of the loss, and he had an insurable interest for which he is entitled to claim.

LINDLEY, L.J.—In this case the action is brought upon a policy of insurance effected upon goods, and the only question for us to consider is whether the plaintiff had an insurable interest in those goods at the time when the policy was effected. Now, the plaintiff's interest in those goods arises out of a contract, and the first question is, what is the meaning of that contract? The contract is for 200 tons of sugar, free on board at Hamburg, the price to be paid in London against bills of lading, and the sugar to answer a certain description as regards saccharine matter. First, let us examine that contract by itself without reference to any particular course of trade. No particular sugar is specified, and it seems to me that such a contract might be performed in two different ways. Two hundred tons of sugar, answering the description, might be shipped free on board at Hamburg, and appropriated to the contract at the time of shipment and then the property would pass to the buyer at the time of shipment, and the goods would then be at his risk. That is one way, and perhaps the ordinary way of performing such a contract. But there is another way of performing the contract, and here it is that a difficulty arises. Messrs. Drake and Co., the sellers of the sugar, conducted their business in a particular way, and the plaintiff, who was a merchant at Bristol, and had had dealings of this sort with Messrs. Drake and Co., knew of their course of business. That course of business was not to appropriate a certain quantity of sugar to a particular buyer at the time of shipment, but to ship enough sugar to satisfy all the contracts for sugar deliverable at a particular port, and then after shipment to apportion out of that bulk the quantities deliverable to the buyers at that port. It is plain that this was the course of business, and that the plaintiffs knew of it to this extent at all events, that having had dealings with Messrs. Drake and Co. for some years he had been in the habit of insuring the sugar he bought from them directly it was shipped. What is left obscure is whether the plaintiff knew exactly how the appropriation was effected. If we once come to the conclusion that the plaintiff was fully aware of Messrs Drake and Co.'s course of business, then all difficulty vanishes. My difficulty is one of fact, but on the whole I come to the conclusion that the plaintiff knew that Messrs. Drake and Co.'s course of business was not to appropriate quantities of sugar to a particular buyer at the time of shipment, but to ship enough sugar to fulfil their Bristol contracts, and then to appropriate particular bags to particular buyers after shipment. Now, what is the meaning of this contract, having regard to these circumstances? It must mean that out of the quantity of sugar shipped to satisfy the Bristol contracts, the quantity shipped to answer each contract shall be at the risk of the buyer. There is nothing so far as I can see, in point of law, to exclude the existence of such a contract as that. But it is said that you cannot have a contract by which the goods are to be at the risk of the buyer, unless they were appropriated to him at the time of shipment. I think that is too wide a proposition. I see no reason why a person should not agree to buy and pay for a certain portion of a bulk cargo on the terms that such portion should be at his risk during the voyage, even though no portion be appropriated to him until the ship is unloaded. I agree with Field, J. that there was no appropriation of goods in this case so as to pass the property to the plaintiff, but I think it is plain that the intention was that the 200 tons of the cargo should be at the plaintiff's risk. Then the whole difficulty vanishes, because, if that be so, the plaintiff clearly had an insurable interest. I therefore think that the judgment of Field, J., which proceeded on the ground that the plaintiff had no property in the goods, cannot be supported, and that this appeal must be allowed.

Judgment of Field, J. (48 L. T. Rep. N. S. 705) reversed.

THIS was an appeal by the plaintiff from the judgment of Field, J. upon further consideration, in favour of the defendants (reported 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 76; 48 L. T. Rep. N. S. 705).

The action was brought by the plaintiff, as owner of the steamship Zoe, to recover the sum of 174*l.* 8*s.* 9*d.* in respect of freight for the carriage of goods from London to Poti in Russia.

The defendants were bankers at Manchester, to whom the shipper had delivered the bill of lading for the goods indorsed in blank as security for advances made by them to enable the shipper to pay for the goods which he had caused to be manufactured in this country.

The facts fully appear in the report of the proceedings before Field, J., and are also stated in the judgments hereinafter set forth.

Cur. adv. vult.

April, 9, 1884.—The following judgments were delivered:

BRETT, M.R.—In this case the material facts seem to be, that the goods in respect of which freight is demanded in the action were shipped on board the plaintiff's ship Zoe, by one Nercessiantz, to be carried to Poti, in Russia; that Nercessiantz applied to the defendants (who were bankers in Manchester) for, and obtained from them, a loan or advance, and, as a security for the advance, indorsed to the defendants the bill of lading of the goods; that circumstances arose under which the goods were landed and warehoused in Poti, with a stoppage for freight; but the goods were sold under Russian law for duties and charges, and were sold for an amount which left nothing applicable to answer the claim for freight. Thereupon the plaintiff demanded the freight from the defendants. The case was tried before Field, J. without a jury; and he held, as a matter of law, that he was entitled to inquire whether, and he found as a fact, that the intention of Nercessiantz and the defendants was that the transaction was to be only a pledge; that is, that the intention was not to pass and take respectively the whole legal property, subject to an equity as to redeeming it, or as to a balance, if any, after a sale, but to pass and take respectively only a pledge. The learned judge then held, as the result of that intention, that the legal property in the goods did not pass to the defendants, that the Bills of Lading Act did not apply, that there was no contract between the plaintiff and the defendants, and that the plaintiff could not maintain his action for freight against the defendants. Against this judgment the plaintiff appeals. The ultimate question of course is whether under the circumstances the property in the goods passed by the indorsement of the bill of lading to such an extent as to bring the case within the Bills of Lading Act (18 & 19 Vict. c. 111). That depends very nearly, if not quite, upon the question stated by Field, J. "The question in the present case," he says, "resolves itself into, whether the security was intended to operate, or by implication of law arising upon the undisputed facts did operate, in the same way as an assignment by bill of sale, or as a mere pledge?" I should rather put the question thus: Does or does not the indorsement of a bill of lading as a security for an advance, as distinguished from an indorsement of it upon a sale of it or the goods named in it for a price, by necessary implication operate in the same way as an assignment of goods by bill of sale, that is, so as to pass the whole legal property in the goods to the assignee, leaving to the assignor an equity in the proceeds beyond the advance secured and expenses; or may evidence be given of other accompanying facts, from which it may be inferred that the intention of the parties was, and therefore the legal result is, that there was only a pledge of the bill of lading, or of the goods named in it? That question put more tersely is: Does the indorsement of a bill of lading as a security for an advance, by a necessary implication which cannot be disproved, pass the legal property in the goods named in the bill of lading to the indorsee with an equity to the indorser, the borrower, to redeem the bill of lading by payment, or to receive the balance, if any, on a sale?

First, let us consider the consequences of the opposite views; let the transaction be treated as a pawn or pledge of the bill of lading, or of the goods. If of the bill of lading, then there is no common law power in the pledgee to use the bill of lading at all; there is no power to sell it before the time when according to the contract of pledge the article pledged is forfeited, and until a late statute an unauthorised sale of it before that time would have passed no right to the vendee; if of the goods, there is no valid pledge unless the delivery of the bill of lading is treated as a delivery of the possession of the goods to the pledgee. But a delivery of a bill of lading is not a delivery of the possession of the goods to the pledgee, though, when speaking of its effect to pass property, it has often been said to have the same effect as a delivery of possession of the goods; it gives to the indorsee a right to possession on arrival of the ship on payment on freight. It is because it does not give to the indorsee the possession, but that the possession is in the captain of the ship, that the original vendor may under given circumstances stop in transitu the goods in which he has no longer any property, and that the captain has a lien on the goods for his freight, charges, &c. And if the indorsement of the bill of lading is only a pledge of the goods, yet where the pledgee is not otherwise a factor, the mere pledge, before the time of forfeiture given by the contract of pledge, would not by any Factors Act, or any other statute until a recent one, or by common law, have enabled the holder of the bill of lading to sell the goods, or (if he assumed to sell them) to pass any right by such sale. It follows that any merchant, banker, or other asked to advance on the security of a bill of lading must have inquired not only whether it was indorsed for value, but as to what were the terms on which the value was given and the indorsement made. And as to insurance, if the legal property does not pass, inasmuch as certainly in equity the whole interest does not pass, the indorsee for value of the bill of lading cannot insure in his own name for more than his real interest. Whereas, if the indorsement for value was treated as a mortgage, the terms of the equity relating to it were settled between the parties by a contemporaneous writing, and for the breach of those terms there was always between the parties a remedy in equity, and the free dealing with the bill of lading in the general mercantile business of the country was not hampered. He who held the bill of lading with an interest in it could realise his interest by a legal sale, could protect all interests under it by an easy insurance. The purchaser of the bill of lading could buy with safety, and therefore could give a better price. The one view tended, as pointed out by Buller, J., in Lickbarrow v. Mason (ubi sup.), to inconvenience, the other to facility in mercantile business. He points this out, as it seems to me, as a reason upon which the custom of merchants, on which his judgment was founded, came to be in existence. If the general understanding of merchants had not been, in accordance with the verdict of the jury in Lickbarrow v. Mason, accepted in its largest sense, there would, one would think, have been cases in the books raising the question; but no such thing is known in any book. The only mode of accounting for this is to say that merchants have treated the indorsement of a bill of lading for value as equivalent to a bill of sale. It has been suggested that a decision in favour of the plaintiff in this case will not hamper trade, because it will make, by reason of the Bills of Lading Act, a merchant who takes a bill of lading only as security for an advance, so as to be in reality only partly interested in the bill of lading, liable for unknown claims under it by the shipowner who granted it. As to the liability to pay freight, it can only be important in such an isolated instance as the present, because the security for the advance can rarely be available until the lien for freight is satisfied. The amount of the advance is always calculated according to the value of the goods less freight, and so in respect of any other claim subject to a shipowner's lien. If the bill of lading, by reference to a charter-party, incorporates other and unusual liabilities, the merchant asked to advance will examine the charter-party, and only advance to a more limited amount. A loaded bill of lading is of little value. A decision in favour of the defendant would retain in the suggested case of a mere pledge the difficulty which the Bills of Lading Act was passed to obviate, namely, that the pledgee will have rights in the property but no rights in the contract. If he desires by the contract to protect the goods and his interest in the goods, which is the first interest invaded by a breach of the contract of carriage, he must revert to the old inconvenience of being obliged to use the pledgor's name. Mercantile convenience seems to me to lean strongly in favour of a decision for the plaintiff in this case.

The case, however, must after all depend upon authority; it must depend upon the sense in which it is now considered that the finding of the custom of merchants by the jury in Lickbarrow v. Mason (ubi sup.) has been adopted by the courts so as to be taken to be the law merchant without further proof. In order to determine this, it may be well to examine some of the cases which were decided before and which were cited in the case of Lickbarrow v. Mason, as well as that case and the cases after it. The question is, does the bona fide indorsement of a bill of lading as security for an advance, as distinguished from an indorsement upon a sale for a price, pass the whole legal property in the goods named in the bill of lading to the indorsee, leaving only equities to the indorser? The third case put by Holt, C.J. in Evans v. Martlett (1 Ld. Raym. 271), cited in Lickbarrow v. Mason, is "a bill of lading to A., and the invoice only (that is the invoice alone) shows that they are upon account of B.; A. ought always to bring the action, for the property is in him, and B. has only an equity." This does not state in terms whether the bill of lading is originally made to A., or is indorsed to A. The terms are large enough to include an indorsement to A. for value, and then B.'s interest is stated to be only one in equity. The action mentioned is obviously an action of trover. In Hibbert v. Carter (ubi sup.) the plaintiffs were merchants in London, agents and general consignees of one Robert Kerr, who was the owner of goods, and shipped them from Jamaica. The plaintiffs having received advice that the goods were shipped, insured them, but before they had effected the insurance Kerr had indorsed the bill of lading to one Dellprat, in Jamaica, for an arrear due on a mortgage. Buller, J. was of opinion that Kerr had no insurable interest, because the indorsement of the bill of lading had passed the whole property to Dellprat, yet Kerr had not sold the goods. The court was of the same opinion as to the legal property, but held that nevertheless Kerr might have an insurable interest. In what respect? Obviously in respect of his equitable interests, his right to redeem, and to a surplus, if any, on a sale. In Wright v. Campbell (4 Burr. 2046) the action was in trover by the assignees in bankruptcy of one Richard Scott. Lewis Fontaine shipped the goods and took bills of lading and indorsed one copy to Richard Swanwick in Liverpool, in order that Swanwick might sell the goods for him as factor. Swanwick indorsed this copy to Scott to secure him on his becoming bail for Swanwick, and also as security for a debt due from Swanwick to Scott. Scott demanded the goods on the arrival of the ship, but was refused. The goods were delivered to and sold by the defendants. The action was in trover by the assignees of Scott. There was no sale for a price by Swanwick to Scott. Swanwick being a factor could not pledge to Scott, but as factor he had a right to pass the property to Scott. The decision is that, if the transaction was bona fide, the indorsement to Scott for value passed the property to Scott. It did so although the value given was not the price for a sale, and Lord Mansfield is reported by Buller, J. to have approved of the case in Lord Raymond, Evans v. Martlett, upon an interpretation of it in its widest sense. It was after these views, thus expressed, that arose the case of Lickbarrow v. Mason (ubi sup.), upon the interpretation of the decision in which the present question depends. In that case the facts were, that Turing and Son sold goods to Freeman on credit, and shipped them to Freeman and sent him bills of lading. Freeman indorsed the bills of lading to the plaintiffs as security for an advance, and became insolvent before the arrival of the goods.

Turing stopped the goods in transitu by indorsing a copy bill of lading to the defendants to enable them to do so on his behalf. The defendants sold the goods for Turing. Action of trover by the plaintiffs against the defendants. The defendants demurred to the evidence, or, in other words, asserted that there was no evidence on which it could legally be held that the plaintiffs were entitled to succeed. It was argued for the plaintiffs that, as between the consignor and the consignee, the bill of lading is a mere authority by the consignor to the captain to deliver the goods to the consignee, and to the consignee to receive them, and that the consignee cannot transfer a greater right than he has, that is, a right to receive the goods if the authority given to the captain is not countermanded. It was argued for the defendants that the bonâ fide indorsement for a valuable consideration, of a bill of lading to a third person is an absolute transfer of the whole property. It was not suggested on either side that there was a question of intention to be determined by a jury on an inference of fact. It is clear that everyone assumed that the bill of lading was indorsed in order to secure to the plaintiffs the amount of their advance, leaving the surplus if any, for Turing. No one suggested that there was, independently of the indorsement of the bill of lading, a contract of sale of the goods for a price as between Turing and the plaintiffs. Under these circumstances Buller, J. says, "I make the question even more general than it was made at the bar, namely, whether a bill of lading is by law a transfer of the property:" (Smith's Leading Cases, 6th edit. vol. i, p. 710.) He does not say, "whether a bill of lading given under the circumstances of this case is a transfer of the property," but "whether a bill of lading is by law a transfer of the property." It is obvious that he was speaking of a bill of lading indorsed for value. He cites Wright v. Campbell (1 Sm. L. C. 6th Ed,), and then says, that "Lord Mansfield in that case said, that since the case in Lord Raymond it had always been held that the delivery of a bill of lading transferred the property at law." "If so," says Buller, J., "every exception to that rule arises from equitable considerations which have been adopted by courts of law." "Thus," he says, "stand the authorities on the point of legal property; and from hence it appears that for upwards of 100 years past it has been the universal doctrine of Westminster Hall that by a bill of lading, and by the assignment of it, the legal property does pass. And, as I conceive, there is no judgment, not even a dictum, if properly understood, which impeaches this long string of cases." It has been observed that these statements of the law are not literally correct, because they do not exclude an indorsement to a mere agent. But Buller, J. had already in the same judgment, referring to a case before Lord King, disposed of an indorsement to "a pure factor having no demand of his own." I agree, he had said, that he would have no property, because in such a case the factor is only a servant or agent; "he is merely a servant or agent." But then, he said, "it remains to be proved that a man who is in advance, or under acceptances on account of goods, is simply and merely a servant or agent; for which no authority has been or can be produced. It is with regard to the case of "a man who is in advance on account of goods" that his whole judgment is dealing. The whole case of Lickbarrow v. Mason deals with such a person. It is to me impossible to suppose, it seems to me perverse to assume, that the question finally left to the jury was not a question put and understood to be put with regard to such a man. The dispute was between such a man and the plaintiffs. It was with regard to that dispute that the jury found "that by the custom of merchants, bills of lading for the delivery of goods to the order of the shipper or his assigns, are after the shipment, and before the voyage is performed, negotiable and transferable by the shipper's indorsement, or transmitting of the same to any other person; and that by such indorsement and delivery, or transmission, the property in such goods is transferred to such other person." If the contention made now on behalf of the defendants is true, that answer ought not to have been accepted. It made the custom too large. It ought to have contained the limitation "if so intended." If the present contention be true, a question was not asked which ought to have been asked, namely, did the parties intend the transaction to be a pledge on a mortgage? I cannot bring my mind to believe that everybody concerned in that long discussion omitted to consider the proper limitations of the general principle which everybody was trying to discover, and which Buller, J. expressed. It was then in a case where the bill of lading was indorsed to secure an advance that, after long and exhaustive discussion and two trials, the House of Lords held, without anyone even referring to the idea that in any such case an inquiry must be made as to what was the intention of the parties, that by the general custom of merchants the bonâ fide indorsement of a bill of lading for an advance passes the legal property in the goods to the indorsee, leaving the ultimate account between the parties to be settled as an equity. Such a decision I cannot depart from. I can be no party to explaining it away. I accept it as I firmly believe it was intended. To do otherwise restores the judgment of Lord Loughborough. The judgment in Lickbarrow v. Mason governs the present case. According to it the whole legal property in the goods represented by the bill of lading passed by the indorsement of the bill of lading to the defendants. If so it cannot be doubted that, by virtue of the Bills of Lading Act, the liability under the contract contained in the bill of lading passed also to and against the defendants, and that the plaintiff was and is entitled to recover the freight in dispute. I cannot agree with the judgment of Field, J., and in my opinion it should be reversed.

BAGGALLAY, L.J.—The plaintiff in this action is the owner of the ship Zoe, on which certain cases of machinery were shipped and carried to Poti, a Russian port in the Black Sea. The defendants are bankers at Manchester; and, whilst the ship was at sea, they made an advance to the shipper of the goods, who delivered over to them the bill of lading duly indorsed as a security for the loan. No memorandum of charge or other formal document indicative of the intention of the parties was executed, but it was represented by the shipper to the defendants that he was about to proceed to Poti to superintend the delivery of the machinery, that the amount advanced would be repaid before he left England and that he would call again and make definite arrangements for that purpose. He failed, however, to carry out the representations so made by him. The ship arrived at Poti in due course, and the goods not having been cleared within the time limited for that purpose, were sold in accordance with Russian law, but did not realise more than was required to satisfy the demands of the Russian Custom House. The plaintiff thereupon, treating the property in the goods as having passed to the defendants by virtue of the delivery to them of the indorsed bill of lading, and relying upon the provisions of the Bills of Lading Act, demanded from the defendants payment of the freight and incidental charges, and, upon the refusal of the defendants to make such payments, commenced the present action. The action was tried before Field, J. without a jury, and that learned judge held that no sufficient property in the goods passed to the defendants by the delivery to them of the indorsed bill of lading, to render them liable to the plaintiff, and he gave judgment for the defendants. From that judgment the present appeal has been brought.

The first question for consideration is, what was the effect of the delivery to the defendants of the indorsed bill of lading? With all respect for the contrary opinion expressed by Field, J., and which is, I believe, concurred in by my colleague, Bowen, L.J., I am of opinion that, for reasons which I will very concisely state, the legal property in the goods passed to the defendants by the delivery to them of the indorsed bill of lading. I do not propose to examine or discuss the numerous authorities which have been cited in the course of the arguments upon this appeal. The more important of them have been amply examined by the Master of the Rolls in the judgment which he has just delivered, and had previously been fully examined by him in the case of Glyn v. East and West India Dock Company (ubi sup.). I shall content myself with referring to that portion of his judgment in the case just mentioned which had reference to the effect of the delivery of an indorsed bill of lading. In that judgment the Master of the Rolls distinguished between the legal effect of the transaction in transferring the legal property in the goods, and the equitable rights that might be reversed to the borrower by express agreement between the parties, or might be implied in his favour from the general circumstances of the case; and after referring to a suggestion that had been made in argument that the indorsement of the bill of lading, when accompanied by such a letter of charge as had been given in that case, might not have the same fullness of effect in passing the property as if there were no letter of charge, he proceeded as follows: "I am of opinion that an indorsement of a bill of lading for an advance does, by the mercantile law of England, pass absolutely the legal property in the goods to the indorsee, and a consequent right in law of immediate actual possession against the whole world, except some one who may have an independent superior legal right of temporary possession. The right of the borrower of an advance on an indorsement of a bill of lading is, in my opinion, an equity which exists only between him and the lender. I think the indorsement of a bill of lading for an advance has by the law merchant the same effect as a bill of sale has by the common law to pass the legal property in goods, and in either case an equity may be reserved which is still an equity though recognised by the common law courts." This is, in my opinion, a clear and correct exposition of the true effect of the delivery of an indorsed bill of lading as a security for a loan; the legal property in the goods named in the bill of lading passes to the lender, but subject to the equitable rights of the borrower, the nature and extent of which must be gathered from the circumstances of the transaction. It may be, and probably is the case, that certain equitable rights and liabilities were created between the borrower and lender in the present case by the representations made by the former at the time of the loan, and other circumstances of the transactions, but the existence of such equitable rights and liabilities cannot, in my opinion, affect the legal effect of the delivery of the indorsed bill of lading. If it be the true effect of the delivery of the indorsed bill of lading to the defendants that the legal property in the goods passed to them, it can hardly be disputed that they became liable under the provisions of the Bills of Lading Act to pay the amount of freight claimed from them in the present action.

BOWEN, L.J.—I regret very much to find myself at variance with the other members of the court. In this case there are two questions; The first, whether any and what property in the cargo passed to the defendants upon the indorsement and delivery of the bill of lading; the second whether the passing of any such property as passed was a passing of "the" property within the meaning of the Bills of Lading Act (18 & 19 Vict. c. 111), so as to render the defendants liable to freight at the cost of the shipowner. What property, if any, in a cargo afloat passes upon delivery of an indorsed bill of lading, appears to me to be a question of fact in each case that depends, so far as the right between themselves of the immediate parties are concerned, on the express or implied agreement between them. The owner of merchandise may do whatever he pleases with his goods; he may sell them, or mortgage them, or pledge them. It is a pure question of bargain whether he delivers them upon terms which part with the entire beneficial interest in them, or which part with the entire legal interest reserving an equitable right to himself, or which part with a special property only in them, reserving to himself the general and absolute property at law. The freedom of disposition, which owners of property possess when their property is on shore, belongs to them equally when it is afloat. They can if they please, sell the bill of lading, or transfer it upon terms which amount either to a mortgage or to a pledge. For a bill of lading is a symbol of the goods themselves. The cargo being at sea, no actual delivery of it is possible before the ship arrives. During this period of flotation and transit the bill of lading becomes and remains the token or symbol of the goods, and the delivery and indorsement of the bill of lading is equivalent, so far as the passing of the property is concerned, to a symbolical delivery of the goods. Upon principle and reason, therefore, apart from authority, one would suppose that it is to the agreement between the original parties that we ought to look if we wish to discover the effect as between themselves of a delivery of the indorsed bill of lading, just as it is to the agreement between them that we should look to determine the legal consequences that follow on the corporate delivery of the goods. We should expect, in some cases, to find that the entire property had passed; in others, that there had been some different arrangement. Nobody denies that in many instances the transfer of the indorsed bill of lading passes the complete property, nor, indeed, that it is primâ facie evidence of its passing. But this does not prove that when the bargain is different the same effect follows, any more than because the property in a watch often passes on delivery, it follows that a watch cannot be pledged or mortgaged,

It has been argued before us that there is an implication of law derived from the custom of merchants, that by indorsement and transfer of a bill of lading for an advance the absolute property in the cargo vests in the indorsee. In support of this contention reference has been made to the language of the present Master of the Rolls in the case of Glyn, Mills, and Co. v. East and West India Dock Company (ubi sup.). The language of Lord Bramwell in the same case is, on the other hand, in favour of a different view. Lord Blackburn, in the House of Lords, abstained from expressing an opinion as to which was the true nature of the transaction in that particular instance; but even if the transaction in Glyn, Mills, and Co.'s case had been held to amount to a mortgage, it would not follow that a different transaction did not amount to a pledge only, and the decision would not, as it seems to me, have militated against the principles I have above explained. It was further contended by the appellant that the well-known judgment of Buller, J., in the House of Lords, in the case of Lickbarrow v. Mason (ubi sup.), lays it down as law that by the indorsement and delivery of a bill of lading the complete property of goods at sea passes, and that on the second trial of the case a Guildhall jury found that there was a custom of merchants to that effect. Both judgment and verdict must, as it seems to me, be read with reference to the facts of the case itself. Freeman, the consignee of the cargo, had sent to the plaintiffs two bills of lading, together with the invoice of the goods, in order that the goods might be taken possession of and sold by them on Freeman's account, and the plaintiffs had accepted and paid bills of exchange to the value of 520*l.* drawn upon them by Freeman against the goods. "The truth of the case," says Buller, J., "was that Freeman transferred the legal property of the goods to the plaintiffs, who were to sell them to pay themselves the 520*l.* advanced in bills out of the produce, and to be accountable to Freeman for the remainder, if any." It was with reference to this transaction—a transaction of which the very essence was that the property in the goods was intended to pass, if the indorsement of the bill of lading can properly be given this effect—that Buller, J. discusses the question whether the property of goods at sea passes by the indorsement of the bill of lading. What is the proposition of law that he lays down as clear? "That every authority which can be adduced from the earliest period of time down to the present hour, agree that at law the property does pass as absolutely and as effectually as if the goods had been actually delivered into the hands of the consignee." In other words, property passes by an indorsed bill of lading when it would pass by the delivery of the goods themselves. And it was with reference to the same transaction that the special verdict was found as to the custom. The question of the effect of an agreement between the parties when no property, or only a qualified property, was intended to pass with the bill of lading did not arise, nor was it submitted to the jury. Can it be inferred from a verdict so found that the jury intended to establish a custom by which, on delivery and on indorsement of a bill of lading as between the immediate parties, and apart from the rights of third persons, the property in one man's goods passes to another against the will of both, unless there be some written agreement to control the effect of the indorsement? If the borrower in the present instance had verbally agreed with the bank that the absolute property in the goods was not to pass, but a qualified property only, can it be said that any custom of merchants overrides such oral agreement? And if such is not the law, it necessarily would seem to follow that such a restrictive agreement can be implied from the nature of the transaction itself, as well as from express words. Read in their widest sense, the words of the special verdict in Lickbarrow v. Mason admittedly overstate the law, for the delivery to a servant or agent of a bill of lading with the intention that he shall receive the cargo and hold it for his principal obviously passes no property. Some qualification must be read into the terms of the special verdict, and the proper qualification seems to me to be what I have said. It is not easy to see upon what principle there can be any marginal virtue in the symbolical delivery (through the indorsed bill of lading) of goods afloat, beyond what there would be in the delivery of goods ashore, when the question arises between the immediate parties to the agreement.

Shortly after the special verdict on the second trial of Lickbarrow v. Mason its meaning was discussed in the Exchequer Chamber in the case of Haille v. Smith (1 B. & P. 561). Eyre, C.J., in delivering the judgment of the court, intimates that the indorsement of a bill of lading does not itself change the property as a bargain and sale would, but is evidence only of a change, and, as between the original parties, derives its sole virtue and efficacy from the agreement between the parties. This is substantially the same law as that expressed by Buller, J. in Hibbert v. Carter (ubi sup.), and it is not immaterial, as Field, J. has pointed out, to notice that Hibbert v. Carter is a case cited with approval by Buller, J. himself in his subsequent judgment in Lickbarrow v. Mason. The mere fact that in many cases before and after Lickbarrow v. Mason the transfer of a bill of lading is spoken of as passing the property, that in others it is spoken of as creating a pledge, as in Meyerstein v. Barber (ubi sup.), and that in others it is spoken of as a mortgage, affords to my mind, therefore, no difficulty. A man may sell, or he may mortgage, or he may pledge a bill of lading by indorsing and delivering it. The question in each case, when the original parties only are concerned, is what was the bargain on the subject? In the present instance accordingly we have to draw the inference as to the effect of the indorsement and delivery from the narrative of the particular transaction. The cargo shipped in England was to be delivered at Poti in the Black Sea. The owner borrowed an advance from the defendants, and as security deposited the bill of lading, saying that he was shortly going out to Poti to superintend the receipt and delivery of the cargo, and that the amount advanced would be repaid before he left England, and that he would call again and make arrangements about it. What have we here except the simplest form of pledge, the deposit of goods as security for a debt, by which the right to the property vests in the pledgee so far as is necessary to secure the debt, the general property remaining in the pledgor? Delivery of possession is no doubt an essential element in any pledge, but it is very old law that constructive or symbolical delivery of possession is sufficient when actual possession cannot be given. "Goods at sea," says Story on Bailments, "may be passed in pledge by a transfer of the muniments of title, as by a transfer of a bill of lading, or by a written assignment thereof. So goods in a warehouse may be pledged by symbolical delivery of the key, and a bill of lading is only a key of the floating warehouse where the goods are lying." The counsel for the appellant argued that if a pledge only was intended, no indorsement of the bill of lading was needed. This surely is a misapprehension. The pledgee of goods is entitled to sell them upon default, and without the indorsement of the bill of lading the common law powers of the pledgee would be incomplete. It seems to me that the language of Lord Bramwell in Glyn, Mills, and Co's case, cited at length by Field, J. in the court below, applies mutatis mutandis to this case. I feel great diffidence in dissenting from the view of so considerable an authority on the mercantile law as that of the present Master of the Rolls and Baggallay, L.J.; but, except for their contrary opinion, I should have myself thought that there had been in the present case, as between the original parties, a pledge and nothing more.

It remains to be considered whether the pledge of an indorsed bill of lading is such a passing of "the property" as is contemplated by the Bills of Lading Act (18 & 19 Vict. c. 111). I may pause for a moment to observe that it was clearly the opinion of those who framed that statute that the property in goods need not pass by the indorsement of the bill of lading, and that the framing of the preamble and section of that Act shows that the language of the special verdict in Lickbarrow v. Mason is not to be read without some qualification. But passing from this, I think the wording of the Act shows that the provision which we have to construe does not apply to the case of a pledge. [See Fox v. Mott (30 L. J. 259, Ex.), per Martin, B., as explained in The Freedom (ubi sup.).] "A" property passes no doubt by a pledge, but not "the" property, which still remains in the pledgor. Was it intended that a banker who only acquired such a limited and special legal interest in a bill of lading as was necessary to secure his advance should be sued for freight? The present is the first case, as far as I know, in which it has ever been suggested that he could. And I cannot help thinking that the many bills of lading pledged daily in the city of London for advances are not taken by bankers under any such idea. I believe that the true view of the law as to this matter also is that expressed by Lord Bramwell in the case of Glyn, Mills and Co., viz., that a mere pledgee cannot be sued for freight under the Act. He has not got "the" property; he has "a" property only. For these reasons, I agree with the judgment of Field, J., whose careful and elaborate reasonings leave nothing really to be added, and to which I should have added nothing had it not been that I am unfortunately dissentient from the opinion of the Master of the Rolls and Baggallay, L.J. In my opinion, this appeal should be dismissed with costs (a).

The Dunelm. (b)

ON APPEAL FROM BUTT, J.

Collision — Lights — Steam trawler — Look-out — Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea 1863, art. 9—Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea 1880, art. 10.

A steam trawler with her nets down and attached thereto is "stationary" within the meaning of art. 9 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea 1863, although she has way on her through the water, provided such way is not more than is necessary to keep her under command, and in such circumstances she is bound only to carry the white light required by that article; but, if she exceeds that speed, she is bound by art. 3 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea to carry the lights of a steamship under way.

A steam trawler, whilst fishing, was only carrying a white light when she ought to have been carrying the lights of a steamship under way. A steamship having a bad look-out, but with an officer on deck and in charge, was approaching the trawler, but did not see her until within a distance of from a quarter to half a mile, and then did not alter her course until too late to avoid a collision.

Held, that, as the officer in charge might have acted sooner if he had seen a side light, and that, as it was not proved that the absence of the side lights could not by any possibility have contributed to the collision, the steam trawler was to blame for a breach of the regulations.

The judgment of the court below having been confirmed, but for reasons other than those given by the judge below, and the Court of Appeal differing from those reasons, ordered each party to pay his own costs.

This was an appeal from a judgment of Butt, J. in a damage action in rem to recover compensation for damage sustained by the paddle-wheel steam trawler Achievement, of thirty-six tons net, in a collision between that vessel and the screw steamship Dunelm, of 826 tons gross, at about 11.30 p.m. on March 25, 1884, in the North Sea, about seven miles east of Seaham Harbour. The defendants counter-claimed.

(a) The following American decisions, although not directly in point, contain some valuable remarks as to the effect of an indorsement of a bill of lading: De Wolf v. Gardner, 12 Cush. 19; Emery's Son v. Irving National Bank, 25 Ohio St. 360; Hathaway v. Haines, 124 Mas. 311.—Ed.

(b) Reported by J. P. Aspinall and F. W. Raikes, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

At the time of collision the wind was easterly, a light breeze, the weather fine and clear, and the tide about half flood of the force of two knots.

The Achievement, which was on a fishing voyage, had her trawling gear on the ground, and according to her evidence was dragging it with the tide over the ground at about four and a half knots an hour. She was exhibiting a white light in a globular lamp at her masthead, and was heading about south.

The Dunelm, which was on a voyage from Rochester to Sunderland, was heading N.W. by N. ½ N., and making about eight knots, when those on board her observed the white light of the Achievement about half a point on the starboard bow, and from about a quarter to half a mile distant. The white light was watched, and after a short time was made out to be crossing the bows of the Dunelm from starboard to port, and the helm of the Dunelm was put hard-a-port, but although the engines were immediately afterwards stopped and reversed, the vessels came into collision, the port side of the Achievement striking the stem of the Dunelm.

According to the evidence of two of the crew of the Dunelm, called on behalf of the plaintiffs, there was no look-out on board the Dunelm. It however appeared that the officer in charge of the Dunelm was on the bridge. During the course of the hearing it was admitted that the Dunelm was to blame.

The Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea and the Order in Council upon which the argument turned are as follows:

Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea 1863, art. 9:

Fishing vessels and open boats when at anchor, or attached to their nets and stationery, shall exhibit a bright white light.

Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea 1880, art. 10, deals with the lights to be carried by open fishing boats, and other open boats, and by fishing vessels, and is divided into paragraphs a, b, c, d, e, f, and g.

(d) A trawler at work shall carry on one of her masts two lights in a vertical line over the other, not less than three feet apart, the upper light red, and the lower green, and shall also either carry the side lights required for other vessels, or if the side lights cannot be carried, have ready at hand the coloured lights as provided in article 7, or a lantern with a red and green glass as described in paragraph (a) of this article.

Order in Council dated March 24, 1880:

Whereas by the Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act 1862 . . . Now, therefore, Her Majesty by virtue of the powers vested in her by the said recited Act, and by and with the advice of her Privy Council, is pleased to direct that the operation of the said recited article, numbered 10 of the new regulations (the regulations of 1880) contained in the first schedule of the said Order in Council of the 14th day of August 1879, shall be suspended until the 1st day of September 1881, and that in lieu thereof and in substitution therefor, the said recited article numbered 9 of the regulations appended to the said Order in Council of the 9th day of January 1863 shall continue and remain in force until the 1st day of September 1881.

By a succession of Orders in Council art. 9 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea 1863 had been continued in force, and was in force at the time of the collision.

July 2.—The action came on for hearing before Butt, J., assisted by Trinity Masters.

Dr. Phillimore (with him Bucknill) for the plaintiffs, the owners of the Achievement.—The one white light carried by the trawler was in accordance with the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea. By Order in Council, the lights prescribed by art. 10 of the regulations of 1880 were suspended, and in their place was substituted the one white light required by art. 9 of the regulations of 1863. Even assuming the trawler not to have been stationary in fact, she was stationary within the meaning of the word as used in the article, and she has therefore complied with the regulations:

The Edith, L. Rep. Ir. 10 Eq. 345;
The Robert and Ann v. The Lloyds, Holt's Rule of the Road, p. 57;
The Englishman, 3 Asp. Mar Law Cas. 506; 37 L. T. Rep. N. S. 412; 3 P. Div. 18.

Assuming there to have been a breach of the regulations by the Achievement, and assuming it to have been her duty to carry side lights, it cannot be said that this breach could by any possibility have contributed to the collision. It has been proved that not only was there a bad look-out on the Dunelm, but that there was no look-out. If so, the question of lights on the trawler becomes immaterial, and their absence or presence could in no way conduce to the collision:

The Fanny M. Carvill, 2 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 478, 566; 32 L. T. Rep. N. S. 129, 646; L. Rep. 4 A & E. 417;
The Englishman (ubi sup.).

Hall, Q.C. and W. R. Kennedy for the defendants.—The Order in Council of the 24th March 1880 suspends art. 10 of the regulations of 1880, but only substitutes art. 9 of the regulations of 1863 in cases covered by the terms of that article. Thus art. 9 provides that fishing vessels when attached to their nets and stationary shall carry the one bright light. But the Achievement was not stationary. She admittedly was making some two and a half knots through the water, and should therefore have exhibited side lights. She, therefore, has infringed the regulations, and in such a way that may possibly have conduced to the collision. For, assuming there to have been a bad look-out on the steamer, yet there was an officer on the bridge, and had the side lights been exhibited, it is impossible to say that he might not have seen them.

Butt, J.—This is a case in which a point of some nicety has arisen on the interpretation of one or more of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea. I have come to the conclusion, acting on the advice of the Elder Brethren of the Trinity House, that both these vessels must be held to blame. That the steamer is to blame there can be no doubt, and indeed Mr Hall has conceded it to be so. I would therefore only advert to the fact that, though the steam trawler had a good white light exhibited, which ought to have been visible at two or three miles, it was never seen by those on board the steamer until, according to their own statement, they were within a distance of from a quarter to half a mile, and that even then they do nothing, although they are in doubt as to the meaning of the white light, whereas I think they ought certainly to have stopped and reversed their engines. Had they done so they never would have sunk this vessel, the Achievement. That settles the matter as to the steamer.

Now with regard to the steam trawler, the question as to the application of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea arises. She was carrying a good globular light at the masthead, according to the evidence some 30 feet above the deck. She was heading about south, with her trawl down, and was making, by her own admission, about two and a half knots through the water, and about four and a half over the ground. I am advised by the Trinity Masters that trawlers prefer to go at even a greater rate of speed over the ground, and that as a fact they must have some good headway on them. However, taking the speed to have been two and a half knots through the water, what follows? In the year 1880 the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, which with some exceptions are now in force, were promulgated, and had art. 10 of those regulations not been suspended by Order in Council, there would have been no difficulty in determining this case, had it ever arisen, which I very much doubt if that article had remained in force. Now art. 10, sub-sect. (d) of the Regulations provided that "A trawler at work shall carry on one of her masts two lights in a vertical line one over the other not less than three feet apart, the upper light red and the lower green, and shall also either carry the side lights required for other vessels, or if the side lights cannot be carried, have ready at hand the coloured lights, as provided in art. 7, or a lantern with a red and green glass, as described in paragraph (a) of this article." By a series of Orders in Council that article has been suspended, and remains so suspended up to the present time. The first of these Orders in Council, dated the 24th March 1880, I will advert to immediately. It is agreed by the counsel on both sides that there are subsequent Orders in Council in the same terms as the first, and therefore I will confine myself to dealing with the first. By it the operation of art. 10 of the present Regulations for Preventing Collisions was suspended, and in lieu thereof, and in substitution therefor, the 9th article of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea 1863 was to continue and remain in force for a certain period. Now, then, what is the effect of that Order in Council? Dr. Phillimore, on behalf of the plaintiffs, the owners of the steam trawler, has contended that it substituted for the lights provided by sub-section (d) of art. 10 of the new regulations the one bright light mentioned in art. 9 of the old regulations, which bright light was undoubtedly carrried by the Achievement. Certainly, that is an argument which is deserving of very serious consideration, and to which I have given all the weight I think I ought to give, though I have not allowed that argument to prevail with me. The conclusion to which I have come is, that the Order in Council does not substitute the one bright light mentioned in art. 9 of the old regulations for the lights prescribed by sub-sect. (d), art. 10, of the new regulations. The view I take of the matter is this: I think the proper view of the Order in Council is, that art. 9 of the old regulations is, by the Order in Council, substituted for art. 10 of the new regulations in so far, and in so far only, as art. 9 applies to any particular case, and that where art. 9 cannot be applied, art. 10 is suspended, and nothing is substituted for it. If that is the right view of the matter, then I think that in this case art. 3 of the new regulations comes into operation. Is this trawler to blame for not carrying side lights? I think it is impossible to say that she was stationary. She was not stationary as a matter of fact, and in my opinion not stationary within the meaning of the word as used in the regulations. She had four and a half knots on her over the ground, and, what is more important, two and a half knots through the water. The Elder Brethren, whose opinion I have taken on this point, think she cannot be considered as stationary. But further, when one looks at the second paragraph of art. 9 of the old regulations, it appears to me to apply, and to have been intended to apply, only to vessels which are practically stationary. The light required is the light prescribed for vessels at anchor, and I think the article is only applicable to vessels at anchor, or, at the utmost, to vessels drifting without way through the water. If that be the right construction, what follows? It follows that the Achievement was not carrying the proper lights. Whether that conduced to the collision is a matter which I have not to determine. The question is, might not the absence of the side lights have contributed to the collision? Now, what are the facts? I have already said that there was a bad look-out on board the steamer. There was, however, an officer on the bridge, but he also was keeping a bad look-out, because he did not see the Achievement's light until a distance of from a quarter to half a mile. If the trawler had been carrying the side lights, which I have held she ought to have carried, that officer would, in all probability, having regard to the relative position of these two vessels, have seen the red light as soon as he saw the white light. Seeing a red light in such a position, ordinarily an officer would at once give the order to port, which, in this case, is not done till later. He does not then do that, but waits until he can make out the meaning of the single white light. It is therefore probable that, had he seen a red light, he would have ported earlier and in sufficient time to have avoided a collision. In conclusion, it appears to me that, having regard to all the circumstances of this case, not only is it possible, but probable, that this collision might have been avoided if a red light had been visible, and I therefore hold both these vessels to blame.

From this judgment the plaintiffs appealed.

Dr. Phillimore (with him Bucknill), for the plaintiffs, in support of the appeal.—Under the circumstances of this case the Achievement was bound by the provisions of art. 9 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea 1863. She acted in accordance with that article by exhibiting a white light, and therefore should not be held to blame for this collision. If, however, art. 9 does not cover the case of a trawler, then she is bound by the common law only to exhibit such a light as shall warn other vessels in sufficient time of her presence. If so, the white light carried would answer that purpose. It is, however, submitted that art. 9 does cover trawlers, because it is unreasonable to suppose that the Legislature, when specifically enacting with regard to fishing vessels, should have so enacted as to exclude trawling, one of the principal modes of fishing, from the operation of the article. It is submitted that art. 9 is to be construed by reference to art. 10 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea 1880:

Attorney-General v. Lamplough, 38 L. T. Rep. N. S. 87; L. Rep. 3 Ex. Div. 227.

Art. 10 (in terms deals with "a trawler at work," when therefore art. 9 was substituted for art. 10, it is to be assumed that art. 9 was meant to cover the case of a trawler at work. According to art. 9 fishing vessels when "attached to their nets and stationary" are to carry a bright light. Inasmuch as a trawler cannot work without some way on her, the word "stationary" should be construed to mean stationary so far as is consistent with carrying on the work of trawling. It is a matter of common knowledge that trawlers, when fishing, go with the tide. It is therefore necessary that trawlers should have way over the ground. It is also obvious that trawlers, incumbered with their nets, must be under some command, and in order to be so it is necessary that they should have some way through the water, in order to give themselves steerage way and otherwise to enable them to manœuvre. Having regard to the fact that this must have been within the knowledge of those who framed this article, it is to be presumed that in using the word "stationary" they could not have meant a total absence of motion, the effect of which would be to prevent trawl fishing altogether. According to Dr. Lushington and the Irish Court of Appeal the word is to be defined as meaning such way through the water as will give the trawler steerage way:

The Robert and Ann v. The Lloyds, Holt's Rule of the Road, p. 57 (a);
The Edith, L. Rep. Ir. 10 Eq. 345.

If so, it is submitted that two knots does not exceed this limit. It is also submitted that the fishing vessels referred to in art. 9 belong to three distinct categories, viz., vessels at anchor, vessels attached to their nets, and vessels stationary. If so, the Achievement being undoubtedly attached to her nets, it becomes unnecessary to consider whether she was also stationary, and there has therefore been a proper compliance with the article. Even assuming there to have been a breach of the regulations, it could not possibly have conduced to the collision, seeing that it has been proved that there was a bad look-out on board the steamer.

Hall, Q.C. and W. R. Kennedy, for the respondents, contra.—Having regard to the fact that art. 9 prescribes a white light for vessels attached to their nets and stationary, and that vessels at anchor are directed to carry a white light, it is to be assumed that vessels when "stationary" are meant to be in much the same position as vessels at anchor. A vessel when attached to her nets and stationary would both be incumbered with her nets, and also out of command, hence she is to carry that light which will indicate to other vessels that she is to be looked upon as equivalent to a vessel at anchor, and incapable of manœuvring to keep out of their way. It is therefore submitted that stationary means, if not absence of motion over the ground, nothing more than motion with the tide. To give it any wider definition, is to do violence to its meaning. Even assuming it to cover some slight way through the water, the two knots in the present case are excessive. The argument that art. 9 covers three distinct conditions of fishing vessels is negatived by the language of the article, the first conjunction being "or," and the second "and," which shows that the words "attached to their nets and stationary" are to be read together. With regard to the breach of the regulations not possibly conducing to the collision, it is submitted that it is not sufficient to prove merely that there was a bad look-out.

Brett, M.R.—In this case there was a collision between the steamer Dunelm and the steam trawler Achievement, and it is exceedingly clear, and is not otherwise contested, that the steamer was in the wrong. The only question is, whether the Achievement was also to blame. At the time of the collision this steam trawler was in the act of fishing with her trawl net, and had her trawl net down, and being in that position she had a globular white light on her mast, and she had not any red or green side lights. The first question is, whether, being in that state as to her lights, she committed a breach of any rule that was imperative upon her. Another question is, under what rule, if any, would she be? This collision

(a) This was a case tried by Dr. Lushington in which it was necessary for the court to consider the meaning of the word "stationary" as used in art. 9 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea 1863, although ultimately the decision was based on other grounds. The observations of the learned judge on this subject are contained in his address to the Elder Brethren and are as follows: These are the pressing words, 'attached to their nets and stationary shall exhibit a bright white light.' The argument of Her Majesty's Advocate upon this is somewhat to this effect: 'This is not a case where you ought to have carried a white light at all, but it is a case in which you ought to have carried coloured lights; and if it is a case in which you ought to have carried coloured lights, you did not do it, and are therefore to blame.' But I should wish to bring to your very particular consideration the meaning of these words, 'attached to their nets and stationary.' Do you consider, in ordinary circumstances, a fishing vessel, having the trawl attached to it, generally speaking is in a state of locomotion or stationary? And if you should be of opinion that when a vessel is simply dredging, or scarcely in motion, or only that degree of motion which is indispensably necessary to fishing, are you of opinion that the circumstances of this case are different? I should observe to you that the circumstances of this case require consideration, and they were very properly brought to your attention by Her Majesty's Advocate, for he said, and truly said, that in the petition it was stated that the smack was dragging her trawl gear and going through the water at the rate of about one knot per hour, under mainsail, foresail and jib, and that she had at that time the tide running in the direction mentioned. A very important question is, first, whether you are of opinion that she was stationary within the meaning of this section; and secondly, if you should be of opinion that the objection raised by Her Majesty's Advocate is well founded, then whether it was the occasion of the collision or not." It is to be noticed that one of the two questions left by Dr. Lushington to the Trinity Masters is whether in their opinion the smack was stationary within the meaning of this section. The result of this would appear to be that he left to the Trinity Masters what was really a question of law for the court. It would be for the court to interpret the meaning of "stationary," and then to ask the Trinity Masters, as the Court of Appeal in the above case have done, was the trawler exceeding or not the speed sanctioned by the court's definition of stationary.—Ed took place after the Order in Council promulgating the regulations of 1880, in which regulations when originally published, there was an art. 10 which dealt with trawlers. But by a subsequent Order in Council this art. 10 was suspended, and art. 9 of the regulations of 1863 was substituted in lieu of art. 10. Hence Dr. Phillimore argued that we ought to construe art. 9 by what was in art. 10. That is contrary, to my mind to the proper rules of construction. We have to construe art. 9 as if we had to construe it the day after it was enacted. What I mean is this, that we are to take out of the regulations art. 10, and read into it, as if it were there, the old art. 9. Therefore, the code of regulations under which this vessel was at the time of the collision, was the Order in Council promulgating the regulations of 1880, as if that Order in Council had been published with all the articles in it except art. 10, art. 9 being in its place. That being so, was this steam trawler within art. 9? I mean, is she the sort of vessel that could be within art. 9? There is also the question whether, under the circumstances, she ought to have acted under art. 9 or under art. 3, which latter article would be applicable to her as a steamer under way. Prior to the Order in Council substituting art. 9 for art. 10 fishing of different kinds was well known. There was fishing with drift nets, fishing without nets at all, and fishing with trawls. The vessels with drift nets, trawl nets, &c., were all vessels attached to their nets. Now we must assume that those who had to legislate on this matter, knew the way in which the fishing trade was carried on. They knew, therefore, that these vessels fished with their nets attached to them, and so when they use the words "attached to their nets" it seems to me obvious that they meant to include vessels attached to trawling nets just as much as to any other nets. They make no distinction between the nets. Therefore I think it perfectly clear that trawlers, which at the date of the Order in Council were principally sailing vessels, were meant to come within the rule.

But it is not under all circumstances that a fishing vessel is allowed to carry the light prescribed by that rule. A fishing vessel can only carry the white light when at anchor or attached to her nets and stationary. If she is not under those particular circumstances, she is an ordinary seagoing vessel, and, if under way, she must carry the red and green side lights; and, if at anchor, the prescribed white light. With regard to a steamer, which was the case here, there is nothing in art. 9 to exclude her if she is a fishing vessel and is attached to her nets and stationary. If she was within that category, then she must show the white light required by that article. Therefore the matter is reduced to this: Was this steam trawler, at the time when the collision took place, a vessel within the limits of art. 9, so that it was her duty to show a white light, or was she outside that article? If she was not within the article, it follows, as a matter of course, that she was a steamer under way, and ought to have carried the red and green and masthead lights. Therefore, in this particular case, the question is, whether the trawler was a steamer under way, or whether she was a fishing vessel attached to her nets and stationary. That leads me to the construction of art. 9. It certainly is a difficult one to construe. My view of an Act of Parliament —and these regulations are equivalent to an Act of Parliament—which is applicable to a large trade or business is, that it is to be construed, if possible, not according to the strictest and nicest rules of interpretation, but that it is to be construed in a reasonable way with regard to the trade or business with which the Act is dealing. It seems to me impossible to suppose, and it would be wrong to assert, that those who have to legislate with regard to a large trade or business, should be supposed to have so legislated as to prevent that trade or business from being carried on, unless one is forced to come to such a conclusion by the language used; and then that could only be by the most extraordinary inadvertence of those who legislate. With regard to this article, it is first of all enacted as to fishing vessels at anchor—that is, when they are not fishing—that they are to carry a white light. Then there is an enactment as to fishing vessels "attached to their nets and stationary," so that "stationary" is not equivalent to being at anchor. For a vessel to be "at anchor," it is not necessary that there should be an anchor down. For instance, a vessel made fast to moorings has no anchor down, and yet nobody would say that she was not at anchor. So again with fishing boats which are brought up by dropping overboard an exceedingly heavy piece of stone. They are "at anchor," though not attached to an anchor. Therefore the difference between being at anchor and attached to their nets and stationary means that they are not exactly in the same state. To my mind the words "attached to their nets and stationary" are meant to be applicable at a time when the vessels are fishing; because, as every one knows, vessels when fishing are attached to their nets. They are not then under way; that is, they do not enjoy the same liberty of movement as they would when under way. They are then much more like a vessel at anchor than like a vessel under way. They have not the same command over themselves. Should it become necessary for them to go forward they could not easily do so on account of the weight of their nets, especially so in the case of trawlers. Assuming them to be steamers, if they backed, they would back into their own nets, and their screw or paddles would become hopelessly entangled in them. Therefore they are in an extremely helpless state. So if a sailing vessel wore round to avoid some obstruction she would be into her own nets. If she tacked considerably she would also do damage. Therefore these vessels when attached to their nets are much more like vessels at anchor than they are like vessels under way, and it was for that reason, no doubt, that provisions were enacted with regard to them whilst they were fishing, which would distinguish them from vessels under way. Again, with regard to vessels approaching them, if they, while thus crippled, were to carry the same lights that a vessel does when she is under way and in full command of herself, they would mislead other vessels, which would suppose that the fishing vessel was under way and would act accordingly. If another vessel wanted to go astern of a fishing vessel she would have a right to steer on the assumption that the fishing vessel was going forward. But the fishing vessel would be practically stationary, and hence the other vessel would go a great deal too close to her and would probably cut her nets. There are positions in which a fishing vessel, if she is within the rule for vessels under way, would be bound to give way to other vessels, although in her crippled state she could not do what the rule stated ought to be done. That to my mind shows that this article was meant to apply to fishing vessels when fishing. What then is the meaning of the word "stationary?" It has been argued that it must mean mathematically stationary. It seems to me that that cannot be so in a tideway unless the vessel is anchored. A vessel must go with the tide unless she is so managed that with her head turned to tide she exactly counteracts the tide—a thing almost impossible to do for five consecutive minutes. Therefore that cannot be the meaning. Then it was suggested that it means that the vessel must not have any way through the water. But it is told us by our assessors that the mode of fishing in the case of drift nets and trawlers is for the vessels to go with the tide and not against it. If that be true, and the vessel has no way through the water, she cannot steer at all. There may be no harm in a vessel not having command of herself in a perfectly calm sea, but assume there is some sea on, and vessels do fish in what is not exactly a calm sea, she would, under those circumstances, be in manifest danger. How is a vessel then to fish? She cannot be aimlessly wandering about from one side to the other, into her nets and then out of them, and all the time with no command over herself. It makes the thing impracticable. If it was meant that she was to have no way through the water, the Legislature might just as well have said at once that she must not fish at all. What, then, is the use of the white light if by the hypothesis the vessel cannot fish at all? Therefore it seems to me clear that the word "stationary" cannot mean mathematically stationary, that is, going by the land and not by the tide; neither can it mean that the vessel is to have no way on her through the water. I agree that it is a strong word, and the Legislature must have meant to hold the case very strongly indeed. If a vessel is more in the condition of being a vessel under way than at anchor, then she would mislead other vessels if she showed a light which is intended to show that she is a vessel at anchor. The result, therefore, is, that we must so construe this word "stationary" as to mean that the vessel is not in fact stationary, though at the same time I think that we are bound to give the fullest effect to so strong a word as "stationary." It must mean that the vessel is to have some way through the water. How far can one go so as to make trawling practicable in allowing the vessel to have way through the water, and yet at the same time give the fullest possible effect to the word "stationary?" Upon the best consideration that we can give to it, I think what we must say is this, that she must not be going faster than is necessary to keep herself under command while attached to her nets. It will follow from that, that it will not be sufficient for fishermen to say, "We were only going so fast as to enable us to fish with the best advantage and effect," because it may be that a fishing vessel may desire to go faster than I have fixed as the limit, for the purpose of coming to the fish faster and so catching more fish in a given time. Trawl fishing is usually slow because the net is on the ground, and if the vessel goes too fast the net would get torn. But suppose the weather to be such that a vessel cannot fish without going faster than is necessary to keep her under command. It is very possible that there may be weather which is so strong that if vessels fish they must go faster than is necessary to keep them under way. That would be more so in the case of a sailing vessel than in the case of a steamer; but if it is so, they must, according to what I have laid down, neither fish at all, or if they do, they must in the case of a sailing vessel show the red and green lights, and in the case of a steamer show the red, green, and masthead lights. Whether in any particular case a vessel is going faster than is necessary to keep herself under command is a matter of evidence and almost invariably a question for the assessors, although it is perfectly clear that if a trawler was going nine knots through the water we would not want the assessors to tell us that that was excessive.

The evidence in this case I take to be, that the trawler with her trawl on the ground was going at two knots an hour through the water, which with the two-knot tide would give her four knots over the ground. The test, to my mind, is not the speed over the ground, but through the water, and in this case the trawler's speed through the water was two knots. We have therefore asked our assessors this question: "Was the Achievement, assuming she was going two knots an hour through the water, going faster than was necessary to enable her to keep herself under command whilst attached to her nets?" They say that she was. She therefore was not within art. 9, and was within art. 3. Instead, therefore, of having only a white light, she ought under the circumstances to have carried the red, green, and masthead lights. Hence she is to blame, unless another proposition which was put forward can be maintained, which was, that although she had infringed the regulations, yet, under the circumstances, it was not possible that the infringement could have conduced to the accident. It is sufficient for me to say that in this case it is impossible to accept such an argument, because the officer in command of the steamer, only seeing the trawler's white light, would be induced to act differently from what he would have done had the trawler carried the lights which would have shown that she was a steamer under way, and if the absence of those lights might have induced the officer to act differently, then the infringement of the regulations cannot be excused. This is not like the case to which the proposition was referred when it was enunciated, namely, that where one vessel was on the starboard side of the other, and that other vessel has got a green light but not a red light, it is useless to charge her with a breach of the rules for not exhibiting a red light, because, if she had had twenty lights on the port side, no one on the approaching vessel could have seen them, and therefore its absence could make no difference. But this is not anything like that case. The strict interpretation that we have had to put upon this rule will make it very difficult for trawlers, at any given moment, to know what they are to do, because, if they are within art. 9, they do wrong to carry the red and green lights, and if they are outside art. 9, then they do wrong in carrying the white light only. Therefore persons in charge of trawlers will have to do what sailors often have to do, they will have to solve a most difficult problem, and be always asking themselves: "Am I going faster than I ought with only a white light? If so, I must put up my red and green lights. If I am not, I must put up the single white light and immediately take down the side lights." That is the difficulty, but it is one which we cannot help. We have tried to define as fairly as possible the meaning of this Act of Parliament. A larger definition, to my mind, would have been on the whole more desirable, but I do not see any way to construe the word "stationary" in any larger sense than we have done. Therefore I think that, while not agreeing with the reasons of the judgment of the court below, we must come to the same conclusion and dismiss this appeal. How the costs of this appeal are to be borne will have to be considered. The question arises, whether the case comes within the rule that, where both parties are to blame, each party pays his own costs; or whether, the appeal being dismissed, the appellants should pay the costs.

Bowen, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. I agree entirely with the reasons given by the Master of the Rolls for his exposition of the regulations, and I only add a few words because this is, to my mind, a most important matter. In the first place, I should wish most emphatically to call the attention of the Board of Trade to the necessity of dealing in some efficient way with trawl fishing. For myself, I have neither the necessary experience nor the desire to formulate an opinion as to whether or not the white bright light should be legalised for trawlers under all circumstances. If it is that a conflict of opinion rages upon the subject, I do not wish to express any opinion other than this, that some clear and definite line ought to be taken with regard to trawlers, because at the moment the existing legislation is nothing better than a trap for trawlers. I agree with the Master of the Rolls in saying that we should have been glad to have laid down some express guidance for trawlers if we could have done so without doing violence to the meaning of the word "stationary," so that those in charge of trawlers might know what lights to carry, without having to exercise a difficult judgment at each particular moment as to the exact pace at which they are moving through the water. I therefore trust that the Board of Trade will not leave trawlers any longer in their present position. (a)

As regards the construction we are putting upon art. 9, it seems to me to come to this: Steam and sailing trawlers, within art. 9, are only intended to carry a white light if they come within the rather difficult definition of either being at anchor or attached to their nets and stationary. What is the meaning of "attached to their nets and stationary?" The nets must be supposed to be out, or else the vessels would not be attached to their nets. The words "and stationary" must therefore mean something additional. I agree with the Master of the Rolls, when he says that we must construe the article from a business point of view, just as one would construe an Act of Parliament with reference to a matter of science, art, or law. It is the subject-matter which gives the colour to the words used in an Act of Parliament. The first thing to be observed of this article is that the fishing vessels which are dealt with are fishing vessels at anchor; that is to say, vessels which are attached to the land, and do not move with the water. Then there is the other class of vessels which are dealt with, which are vessels moving with the water. They are vessels which rest upon the water as distinct from resting on the land. I do not think the word "stationary" is exactly antithetical to "under way," but thin it means substantially keeping the same spot or station, and only moving about so much as is consistent with fishing. This leads me directly to the test given by the Master of the Rolls. The vessel must have a certain motion with the tide if she is going with the tide, and moreover she must have a certain motion through the water for the purpose of keeping herself under command, and for the necessary purpose of managing her nets. But that is all. If she is doing more than that she is locomotive, and not stationary. No doubt it is a difficult question of fact to say whether a vessel is really stationary according to this popular and seafaring term, but I think it cannot be doubted that a vessel travelling two knots through the water is not stationary. In conclusion, I cannot help thinking that the exposition of the law by the Master of the Rolls is the same exposition, though couched in different language, as that of the Court of Appeal of Ireland in the case of The Edith (ubi sup.), and that it is not at all inconsistent with what has been laid down by Dr. Lushington in the case of The Robert and Ann v. The Lloyds (ubi sup.).

Fry, L.J.—I concur in the judgments pronounced by my learned brethren. The question turns upon the meaning to be given to a few words in art. 9 of the old Regulations for Preventing Collisions. The words are "fishing vessels and other boats, when at anchor, or attached to their nets and stationary, shall exhibit a bright white light." What is the meaning of the word "stationary?" Dr. Phillimore asks us to read "and," which precedes the word "stationary," as "or," so as to hold that the article applied either to fishing boats at anchor, or attached to their nets or stationary. But it is obvious that such a construction would do violence to the language of the article, and would be inconsistent with its intention. It appears to me that two conditions must be satisfied by the meaning to be given to the word "stationary." In the first place, it must describe a common condition of fishing vessels. We cannot suppose that Her Majesty in Council was legislating with regard to an extraordinary and uncommon condition of fishing vessels, and requiring an extraordinary condition of lights. In the next place it must express some condition, some state of fishing vessels incidental to them when their nets are down, and therefore we must find some condition, some common state of fishing vessels when they are attached to their nets and stationery. That appears to me to be the principle upon which the word should be construed, and one which our construction satisfies. No doubt the most rigorous meaning of the word "stationary" is a negation of any motion of the vessel with regard to the ground; but there is a condition, a common and well-known condition of fishing vessels, in which they are attached to their nets, and making some way over the ground. With regard to the other parts of the case I entirely agree with my learned brethren, and I do not consider that it is necessary for me to add any more.

(a) We find on reference to the recent Regulations of 1884, issued subsequently to this decision, that no special provision is made for trawlers of over twenty tons when engaged in fishing. The result is, that they are bound by art 10 (a) to carry the ordinary lights of a vessel under way. Art. 10 (a) directs that "All fishing vessels and fishing boats of twenty tons net registered tonnage, or upwards, when under way and when not required by the following regulations in this article to carry and show the lights therein named, shall carry and show the same lights as other vessels under way." Inasmuch as a trawler is and must be under way when engaged in fishing, and as none of the subsequent regulations in art. 10 provide for trawlers, the result is that trawlers will be bound to exhibit the lights of a vessel under way. Hence all the duties of a vessel under way will be thrown upon trawlers under circumstances which will render it almost impossible for them to efficiently discharge those duties. The disastrous results of casting this heavy burden upon trawlers when incumbered by their nets cannot be more forcibly described than in the above language of Brett, M.R. The only possible advantage of this new state of things over the old is, that the duties of persons in command of trawlers, however difficult it may be to perform them, is clear and obvious, whereas under art. 9 of the Regulations of 1863, as above interpreted by the Court of Appeal, it would be in all cases necessary for them to exercise a difficult judgment at each particular moment as to the exact speed at which their vessel was moving through the water, before they could know what lights they were bound to exhibit.—Ed.

Brett, M.R.—As to the costs of this appeal, we think that, the reasons for the judgment below being in our view incorrect, we ought, under the circumstances, to order each party to bear their own costs. (a)

Appeal dismissed.

(a) The rule as to costs where both vessels are held to blame was somewhat recently settled in the case of The Hector (vol. 5, p. 101; 8 P. Div. 218), where the Court of Appeal, following the old practice of the Privy Council, decided that where both ships are held to blame for a collision each party bears his own costs, both in the court below and in the Court of Appeal. This rule applies even where the defendant's ship is held exempt from liability on the ground of compulsory pilotage and the defendant has not counter-claimed. For instance, in The Rigsborg Minde (vol. 5, p. 123; 8 P. Div. 132), on appeal from a judgment of Sir Robert Phillimore finding the defendants' vessel alone to blame, the Court of Appeal held both vessels to blame, but found that the defendants were under no liability, as the wrongful manœuvre of their ship was caused by the fault of the pilot who was in charge of their ship by compulsion of law. Yet notwithstanding the fact that the defendants had not counter-claimed and were therefore entirely successful appellants, and notwithstanding that the decision of both ships being to blame was due to the fault of a person who was not their servant, they were made to bear their own costs in both courts. This result of the rule would hardly appear to be equitable, and we cannot help agreeing with Cotton, L.J. in his doubts as to whether the rule is settled on reason or sound principles. According to that learned judge, "whoever appeals ought to get the costs of a successful appeal, and to pay the costs of an unsuccessful one." Costs are now in the discretion of the judge, and it would seem more consonant with justice to disregard a rule, even though it be old, if its application works injustice. The only exception to this otherwise general rule is where the appeal is brought by either party from a decision holding both ships to blame, and that decision is confirmed on appeal: (cf. The Hector, ubi sup.) In such a case the appellant having wrongly occasioned the costs of the appeal would generally be made to bear all the costs.

ON APPEAL FROM BUTT, J.

Salvage—Damage to salving ship—Demurrage—Evidence—Separate award for injuries sustained—Registrar and merchants.

In a salvage action evidence of the specific injuries sustained by the salving ship and the cost of repairs thereof, and of demurrage during repairs, was tendered in the Court of Admiralty, and rejected.

Held, in the Court of Appeal (Baggallay and Lindley,, L.JJ.,), that the judge is bound to receive such evidence, and to include the loss shown in his award, except in cases where such evidence is immaterial by reason of the property saved being too small in value to satisfy such loss, or by reason of the services being so trifling as to render it unjust that the loss sustained by the salvors should be borne by the owners of the salved property, or where from other circumstances it is obvious that the court cannot give an amount sufficient to cover the loss; but, per Brett, M.R., that the admission of such evidence is entirely in the discretion of the judge, subject to his award being reviewed by the Court of Appeal in the event of its being shown that the rejection of the evidence improperly affected the amount of the award. (b)

This was an appeal by the plaintiffs in a salvage action from a judgment of Butt, J. delivered on the 1st May 1883, by which he awarded 4500*l.*, to the owners of the Missouri, the salving vessel, 500*l.* to the master, and 1500*l.* to the crew, making in all a total of 6500*l.*

The facts of the salvage service were as follows:—

The steamship City of Chester, belonging to the Inman line, and of 2713 tons nett, while on a voyage from New York, with 111 passengers on board, was sighted in the Atlantic Ocean, flying signals of distress, on the 10th March 1883, by those on board the steamship Missouri. The Missouri was a steamship of 5146 tons gross, bound from Boston to Liverpool, with a general cargo and five passengers. On the Missouri coming up with the City of Chester it appeared that her crank shaft had broken down four days occasioned by his appeal. In the present case, however, the Court of Appeal has disregarded the exception and enforced the general rule, apparently on the ground that the appeal, although dismissed, was brought from a decision which, though right in fact, was wrong in law. —Ed.

(a) Reported by J. P. Aspinall and F. W. Raikes, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

(b) In an American salvage case, The Colon (18 Blatchf. C. Ct. 277), we find that evidence was given of the specific injuries and losses suffered respectively by the owners of the salving ship and by the owners of the cargo laden on board the salving ship, and that the court made specific awards in respect of such losses in addition to a sum awarded as salvage proper.—Ed.

previously, and that she was in need of assistance. The Missouri thereupon took the City of Chester in tow, and on the 12th March towed her into Halifax harbour, a distance of 229 miles. During the towage there was a heavy sea running, and the Missouri's bitts were carried away, her crank shaft was injured, and she was considerably strained. At the time the City of Chester was taken in tow, she was in the track of steamers, and had signalled to several for assistance, one of which, the Suevia, had towed her for twenty-four miles, on the 6th and 7th March, and had then left her on the ground that her coals were running short.

On the 14th March the Missouri left Halifax, and arrived at Liverpool on the 27th.

The value of the Missouri was 83,000*l.*; of her cargo and freight, 104,047*l.*; of the City of Chester, 9,000*l.*; and of her cargo and freight, 89,535*l.*

The plaintiffs in their statement of claim claimed such an amount of salvage as to the court should seem just, and if necessary a reference to the registrar, assisted by merchants, to determine the amount of damage sustained by the Missouri while rendering the service, it having been therein previously alleged that the Missouri had sustained damage, and that in consequence thereof she had to be repaired at Liverpool.

The allegations in the statement of claim with reference to the damage sustained by the Missouri were as follows:—

> She had a list of several degrees during the voyage. Her hull and engines were considerably strained and her hawsers damaged. She also sustained damage when the starboard bitts were torn away, and to her jigger mast. The Missouri arrived in Liverpool on the 27th March 1884. She was then docked and surveyed, and it was found as the fact was that the straining to her hull and engines during the towage had been so great that it was necessary to put her into graving dock, to take out her after crank shaft, and to give her a thorough overhaul and repair. The repairs are now in progress, and according to the best estimation that can be made will cost from 2000*l.* to 2500*l.*, and will detain the vessel, whose ordinary demurrage rate is 128*l.* 13*s.* per day, thirty days, and the total cost for damage and demurrage will be from 5900*l.* to 6400*l.*
> A number of passengers were engaged to proceed by the Missouri on her next voyage to Boston, but in consequence of the detention of the Missouri it became necessary to engage passages for them in other vessels at an expense to the owners of the Missouri of 107*l.* 5*s.* 3*d.*

The action came on for hearing before Butt, J., assisted by Trinity Masters, on the 30th April 1883.

During the course of the plaintiffs' case evidence was given of the fact that the Missouri had been generally strained, that her crank shaft had been injured and that her engines had been loosened. Evidence was then tendered by them of the specific particulars of the injuries sustained by the Missouri, and of the fact that the cost of the repairs rendered necessary by the salvage services amounted to between 2000*l.* and 2500*l.*, and that in consequence of such repairs the Missouri was detained thirty days, which, taking the demurrage rate to be 128*l.* 13*s.* a day, occasioned a loss of about 3900*l.*, making a total actual loss of over 6000*l.*

The learned judge refused to receive this evidence, or to direct a reference to the registrar and merchants to ascertain the amount of loss sustained both by reason of the injuries done to the Missouri and by reason of her detention for repairs. The reasons for his decision appear in the judgment of Baggallay, L.J. In the conclusion, the learned judge awarded the sum of 6500*l.*, of which he apportioned 4500*l.* to the owners of the Missouri and the remainder to her master and crew, without making any specific apportionment in respect of the injuries sustained by the salving ship.

From this decision the plaintiffs now appealed.

Russell, Q.C. and Dr. Phillimore for the appellants, the plaintiffs.—The award of the court below should be varied for two reasons: because the sum awarded is inadequate, and because the learned judge improperly refused to admit evidence to prove the damage sustained by the salvors' ship while rendering the services and the consequential loss by demurrage. Salvage should be a full and adequate reward for services voluntarily rendered and successfully performed. How can that be given unless the court will allow itself to be informed what the services actually cost the salvors? If a sum is given insufficient to recoup the salvors for the expenses sustained by them in rendering the services, as is the case here, there is no salvage reward at all. The salvors should be put in the same position as they were before the services, and should receive a reward in addition. If the present award is allowed to stand, the salvors are actually out of pocket. A reward necessarily means something over and above the outlay expended. To hold otherwise would cause shipowners to instruct their captains not to salve. This question has already been decided in favour of the appellants' contention by the Privy Council, and by Sir James Hannen in the Admiralty Division:

> The De Bay, 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 156; 49 L. T. Rep. N. S. 414; L. Rep. 8 App. Cas. 559;
> The Sunniside, 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 140; 49 L. T. Rep. N. S. 401; 8 P. Div. 137.

It has been the practice of the Admiralty Court since 1829 to refer the assessment of the actual damage sustained by the salvors to the registrar, and to add the amount so found to the award:

> The Oscar, 2 Hagg, 257;
> The Salacia, 2 Hagg. 262;
> The Jane, 2 Hagg. 344;
> The Saratoga, Lush. 318;
> The Albert, 33 L. J. 191, Ad.;
> The Mudhopper, No. 4, 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 103; 40 L. T. Rep. N. S. 462;
> The Silesia, 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 338; 43 L. T. Rep. N. S. 319; 5 P. Div. 177;
> The Crown, Pritchard's Admiralty Digest, p. 842;
> The Demetrius, Ib. p. 847;
> The Bentinck, Ib. 858;
> The Leda, Ib. 863;
> The Gladiator, Ib. p. 827.

The present Rules of the Supreme Court do require particulars of damage to be set out in the statement of claim. Evidence of them therefore must be admissible.

Webster, Q.C. and Myburgh, Q.C. (with them Bucknill) for the respondents).—Salvage operations are undertaken for better or for worse. To compensate salvors for the risk of being unsuccessfu and perhaps sustaining damage to their own ship, the court gives very large awards where the salvage is successful. In view of these large awards, the salvor takes the chance of injuring his own property. Cases certainly exist where small current expenses such as the cost of broken hawsers, coal, &c., have been referred to the registrar and merchants. But they are direct injuries arising from the services during the towage. [Brett, M.R.—What do you say if an injury to the shaft is discovered during the towage?) Evidence might be given of the injury, but not of the cost of repairs. The case of The Martha (3 Hagg. 434) is opposed to the contention that the damages sustained should be first paid for, and then a reward added to that. The salved are not insurers, and there is no case which lays down this principle of indemnity contended for. As to the authority of The De Bar (ubi sup.) it is not binding upon this court, and it is submitted that the principle of that decision is incorrect. The following authorities support the respondents' contention:

The Enchantress, Lush. 93.
The Ellora, Lush. 550;
The Star of India, 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 261; 35 L. T. Rep. N. S. 407; 1 P. Div. 466.

Cur. adv. vult.

July 30.—Brett, M.R.—At the hearing of this case before Butt, J. the salvors, after giving general evidence that the Missouri was strained and her crank shaft injured, claimed, as of right, to give in evidence, either before the judge or the registrar and merchants, before the decree, the specific particulars of the injuries to the ship and machinery, and the specific particulars of the items of the cost of repairing such injuries, and of the estimated time necessary for repairing the same and of the consequent loss to the owners in the nature of demurrage. Butt, J. declined to admit evidence of such particulars either before himself or before the registrar and merchants as required. He further declined, though required to do so, to award any specific sum in respect of the injuries to the salvors' ship, or to her machinery, but awarded generally to the owners of the Missouri, as distinct from the more direct salvors, the sum of 4500*l*. The owners of the Missouri appealed, insisting upon their right, ex debito justitiæ, to give, either before the court or the registrar and merchants before the decree, the evidence which they proffered at the trial; they insisted that there had been a mis-trial on the ground of improper rejection of evidence; they insisted that the judge is bound, on being so required, in every salvage case to admit such evidence, or at all events that he was bound to receive such evidence in the present case. Upon an appeal brought on such grounds the question is not whether the judge ought or ought not in estimating salvage award to take into account and therefore to receive, evidence of the fact that in and by rendering the salvage service the property of the salvors has been injured, but whether in such a case as the present the judge is bound before making his decree to hear evidence, either personally or through the registrar and merchants, of all the specific particulars of such injury, and of all the specific particulars of the loss to the salvors occasioned thereby. It was argued that the judge is bound to receive such evidence in every case, and therefore, of course, in this, or if not in every case, he was in the present case, because the value of the property saved was amply sufficient to allow an amount of reward which would cover the losses suffered by the salvors in rendering the salvage service. In such case it was said the judge is bound to grant an amount of reward which would cover such losses, and therefore bound to ascertain exactly what those losses are. Or it was said he was bound to ascertain such losses in order to consider judicially whether he would or would not grant an amount of reward sufficient to recover them. As to all these contentions the answer depends upon a preliminary question, namely, whether in every case, or in the particular case suggested, the judge is bound to award a sum sufficient to indemnify the salvor. For if he is not, and if from other circumstances in the case he is rightly of opinion that he ought not, the proposition that he must hear the evidence, which upon the hypothesis has become clearly immaterial, is absurd. And an absurd proposition is not a principle of law. Now as to the first, that is to say, the absolute proposition, it is clearly not true. Suppose the loss to the salvors by reason of injury to their property, the result of using it in the salvage service, is equal to or greater than the value of the property saved, the award obviously cannot cover such loss, otherwise the supposed salvage would be a saving of nothing. Then the particulars of such loss are immaterial. Suppose it is at the commencement of, or becomes apparent in the course of the hearing, that the loss of the salvors is greater than half the value of the property saved, it is immediately obvious that the amount to be awarded cannot cover the loss of the salvors, because even in the case of derelicts the Court of Admiralty has hardly ever, under any circumstances, and in no known case of non-derelict has ever awarded, as for salvage reward, more than half of the value of the property saved. In such case again, therefore, the suggested evidence is obviously immaterial. It is immaterial even for the purpose of obliging the judge to consider whether he will or will not grant an amount of reward sufficient to cover the loss, because by the hypothesis circumstances have made it clear that he cannot.

Then let us consider the more limited proposition. Suppose the danger to the thing saved to have been small, though sufficient to raise a salvage claim, is it true to say that in such a case, if by accident, without fault or negligence, the property of the salvor is greatly injured, the whole consequence of such accident is, according to the large equity of Admiralty law, to fall upon him whose property is saved? Is the mere fact that the property saved is sufficient in value to allow the claim for injury to the salvor to be met, conclusive to oblige the judge, without regard to the other circumstances of the case, to allow the claim? To say that it is would be contrary to the whole principle of salvage reward, and the whole long-continued course of its administration. The danger of an injury to his property so large as to make it wrong on the equities of the case to place the whole consequences of such injury on the owner of the property saved, is one of the risks, and by no means the only risk, which is run by all salvors. The judge is bound to consider, not only the circumstances of loss having been incurred by the salvor, but, in conjunction with it, all the other circumstances which enter into the problem of what in the particular case is a reasonable, and between the parties an equitable, amount of salvage reward. There is no jurisdiction known which is so much at large as the jurisdiction given to award salvage. There is no jurisdiction known in which so many circumstances, including many beyond the circumstances of the particular case, are to be considered for the purpose of deciding the amount of salvage reward. All these circumstances have been repeatedly enunciated by Lord Stowell, Dr. Lushington, and others. It is useless to repeat them. It follows that there is no jurisdiction known the administration of which is more within the discretion of the judge who has to administer it. The moment the judge is of opinion, and is not unjustified in being of opinion, that he cannot give, as a part of the amount to be awarded, the specific loss incurred by the salvor, it becomes impossible to say that he is bound at whatever expense to the suitors, or at waste of his own time, to listen to evidence of the particulars of such loss. It follows that in no case can it be predicated that the judge is bound, from the mere fact that it is proffered to him, to admit and entertain and consider such evidence. It may be that in some particular case it can be shown that for want of the knowledge to be obtained from such evidence the judge has not justly determined the amount of salvage which he has awarded. But in such a case an appeal succeeds, not on the ground of the rejection of the evidence, but on the ground of the inadequacy of the amount awarded. The Court of Appeal cannot come to the conclusion that the evidence has been improperly rejected until, from the other circumstances of the case, it has concluded that the only reasonable exercise of discretion was to allow the exact amount of the salvor's loss, or that the discretion cannot, even on the appeal, be fairly exercised without the knowledge of the exact amount. It cannot come to this conclusion until it is clearly of opinion that the amount awarded is in the particular case unreasonably too small, or that it cannot tell whether it was or was not unreasonably small. In truth, a clear conclusion that the amount awarded is unreasonably too small or too large, or that there was not means of determining whether it was unreasonably too large or too small, is the only ground on which an appeal in the case of a salvage award can be successful. The contention, therefore, of the salvors in this case, that the judge was bound ex debito justitiæ to receive at the time and in the manner proffered the evidence proffered to him on the mere ground that it was proffered, fails. In no case has it ever been held that the judge is bound to receive such evidence. It must have been offered and rejected many times. It does not appear to have been received in more than a few cases in the books. The absence of any decision to show that it must be received is fatal to the appellants' contention. I have inquired from the most experienced officers of the Court of Admiralty, and find that no one of them has ever known or heard of any case in which, in a salvage action, such an inquiry was ever referred to the registrar and merchants before the decree, or otherwise than as a means of working out a decree which has already adjudged that a part of the salvage reward shall be the actual cost of the repairs and their consequences. The cases of The Sunniside (ubi sup.) and The De Bay (ubi sup.) are not in point. In both cases the evidence was received. In The Sunniside (ubi sup.) counsel for a salvor asked questions as to the loss of profits occasioned to the trawler by engaging in the services, and also as to the costs of repairing damages occasioned to the vessel by rendering the services in question. This was objected to as inadmissible, but it was admitted. In his judgment Sir James Hannen says: "I was asked to reject that evidence, but this I did not consider myself at liberty to do, because it appears to me it was admissible as an element to be considered in awarding the remuneration to be paid to a vessel which had rendered salvage services. I remain of the opinion which I expressed yesterday, after considering it further, that it is not to be taken in ordinary cases as a fixed figure always to be allowed as in the nature of damages, and then to be added to the amount awarded for the actual salvage service. As a rule it appears to me that the amount for loss of trade, and so on, cannot be taken as an actual figure in calculating what the salvage reward is to be. The same remarks apply, though not with the same force, to the question of damage done, but there is a reason in this case why a distinction should be drawn, and I propose to do it for the purpose of this case only." In The De Bay (ubi sup.) it was contended that some of the items ought not to be taken into consideration at all, as for instance, the loss on charter, and it was further contended that in no case ought the items of loss or damage to the salving vessel to be allowed "as moneys numbered," but that they should only be generally taken into account when estimating the amount to be awarded for salvage remuneration." Their Lordships, it is stated at page 563 of 8 App. Cas., "are of opinion that it is always justifiable and sometimes important, when it can be done, to ascertain what damages and losses the salving vessel has sustained in rendering the salvage services;" and later they add: "If there is a sufficient fund, and the losses sustained by the salvor are ascertained, it would be unreasonable to reject the assistance to be derived from that knowledge when fixing the amount of salvage reward, and their Lordships are unable to appreciate the argument that that which is known may be taken into account generally, but not specifically." This is only a decision that the judge may receive the evidence and may award specific sums. It is no decision that he must do either. That the judge might in this case, and that a judge may in any case, receive such evidence is a proposition which is incontestable. Whether, having received such evidence, the judge has rightly acted upon it is a matter of appeal. But that is an appeal as to the amount awarded. That he may act upon it by directing, as a part of his award, that the specific ascertained amount of the loss be paid to or be realised by the salvor is undoubted, if the other circumstances do not render it unjust that such amounts should be paid or realised. Such a specific direction has been given in many cases. It may, however, not be unworthy of observation that in all such cases the value of the property of the salvors has been small. But it follows from the considerations brought forward in this judgment that the judge is never bound to decree in terms, as a part of his award, that such specific ascertained amount shall be paid or realised. The judge is always entitled to award a general sum. It follows that he is not bound to receive evidence of a specific ascertained amount.

It remains to be considered whether, in the present case, we are of opinion that the judge could not make a reasonably just award without hearing and considering the proferred evidence. I cannot so adjudge. But after consulting the learned judge of the Admiralty Court, and considering the large value of the property saved and the undoubted fact that a large injury was suffered by the appellants, I have, with the assent and concurrence of the learned judge of the Admiralty Court, undertaken to reconsider his decree. In the result, we have come to the conclusion to vary his decree as follows: We decree to the owners of the Missouri 1000*l.* and the cost of the repairs rendered necessary by the straining and other injuries to the Missouri caused by the salvage services, and the real cost, if any, to the owners of the Missouri of any crew kept and paid by them for the service of the ship while she was under repair. Such costs must be ascertained by the registrar and merchants. We leave it to the appellants either to accept that decree or to keep the one which they already have. If they accept our proposed decree they take it subject to this risk, that the costs of this appeal will follow the result of the inquiry before the registrar and merchants. If, however, they should prefer to allow Butt, J.'s award to stand, they may keep it, each side paying their own costs of the appeal.

Baggallay, L.J.—This is a salvage action, and the question involved in the appeal is by what rules, if any, a judge should be guided in such an action in receiving or rejecting evidence, tendered on behalf of the salvors, as to the amount of cost incurred by them in repairing injuries occasioned to their ship by rendering the salvage services, and of the loss arising from the detention of their ship whilst such repairs were being executed. On the part of the appellants, who are the plaintiffs in the action, it has been contended that they were entitled ex debito justitiæ either to have such evidence received and dealt with by the judge himself, or to have the matter referred to the registrar and merchants; whilst it has been urged, on behalf of the respondents, that it was at the absolute discretion of the judge to receive or reject such evidence, and that the exercise of such discretion could not, consistently with the recognised practice in salvage cases, be reviewed. In my opinion, each side in so contending put their case too high. As a second point, it was urged on behalf of the appellants, that, under the circumstances of the present case, certain evidence which was tendered and rejected by the learned judge ought to have been admitted. In order that I may make my views clear, as to the alternative contention of the appellants, I must refer, and I shall do so very concisely, to the circumstances under which this appeal has been brought. [The learned Judge then stated the facts as already set out, and continued:] It is not in dispute that at the time when the Missouri took the City of Chester in tow, and throughout the towage to Halifax, the weather was bad, that the towage was very heavy, and that after the salvage service it was found that the Missouri was strained, and her crank shaft fractured. In reference to the fracture, the learned judge, in the course of his judgment, after stating that it might be a very nice question whether the crank shaft was thoroughly sound before the towage services were rendered, expressed himself as follows: "Upon the whole, I think there is very strong reason to believe that the vessel strained considerably during the towage services and because she had the other very heavy vessel in tow in a heavy sea way;" and again, "I do not think one can shut one's eyes to the fact that there was a very heavy strain brought upon the vessel, and if it is not proved to demonstration that the injuries were done in consequence of the strain, there is very strong reason to believe that they well might have been." It will be noted that the amount of the loss alleged by the plaintiffs to have been sustained by the owners of the Missouri considerably exceeds the amount awarded to them, and that, according to the view taken and acted upon by Butt, J., the Missouri may have rendered the salvage services, not only without any remuneration to her owners, but at a very heavy loss to them; it may be that her owners may have formed an exaggerated estimate of the amount of loss which they have sustained, but they have been deprived of the opportunity of showing that the loss sustained by them is as great as they allege. Now, one cannot help feeling that such a result, in this and other cases, would have a strong tendency to discourage the rendering of salvage services, especially under circumstances similar to those which we are now considering; when from the very first it was evident that the towing of the City of Chester to Halifax must be one of a heavy character and involving considerable risk to the salving ship. These views were thoroughly present to the mind of Butt, J., who, in the course of his judgment, alluded to the increasing indisposition to render assistance to vessels in distress, and to the necessity of making liberal awards when such services were rendered—an observation supported in its application to the present case by the fact that another steamer, the Suevia, had towed the City of Chester for twenty-four hours on the 6th and 7th March, and had then abandoned her on the alleged ground that her own coals were running short.

I pass on to consider the reasons assigned by the learned judge for the rejection of the tendered evidence. The question was not dealt with in the course of his judgment, beyond a statement that he was not going to award any amount for the repairs of the crank shaft or for the repairs of the ship; but in the course of the trial, when the rejected evidence as to the detention of the ship for the purpose of her being repaired was tendered, he expressed himself as follows: "I do not think it has anything to do with the question save as evidence of the risk run. If you have so much damage done that it costs you 20,000*l.*, I could not have increased my award. It is all evidence of the risk you have run; you run that risk for better or worse. If you do it without injury at all, you earn so much more; if not you earn so much less." The counsel for the plaintiffs thereupon submitted that it was the duty of the court to see, if possible, that the salvors were not out of pocket; to which the learned judge replied: "I do not agree with that at all, I differ entirely with you there. I think that it may very well be that a vessel rendering salvage services would get such an injury that the owners would be out of pocket." And when, upon the rejection of the tendered evidence, the counsel for the plaintiffs pressed for a reference to the registrar and merchants, the judge observed: "Salvage remuneration is the sort of compensation, or sort of price to pay, for the services rendered, and one of the elements in arriving at that is the risk run by the salvors and their property. Now, in order to appreciate the risk to property, it is very often material to see what did happen, and if you show a collision between two vessels, or if you show straining and damage to the crank shaft of the salving vessel, all that is evidence of the risk, and all that may very properly be taken into account in the award; but what I hold is this, that, taking the risk upon yourself, and having a greater or less amount awarded you in consequence of that risk, you are not entitled, if the risk had gone against you, to say: Now then we claim not only our award, but we claim the whole price of repairing the injury done and the demurrage during the delay for such repairs. I do not think you are entitled to that, and if you are not I do not see how any of this is material, beyond the fact that your crank shaft was broken and the body of your engine was loosened, and matters of that sort." I have thought it right to set out at some length the grounds, as stated by himself, upon which Butt, J. declined to entertain the question of the amount of damage sustained by the Missouri, either by the reception of evidence adduced before himself, or by a reference to the registrar and merchants. I readily assent to the proposition enunciated by him, that, in determining the amount of salvage to be awarded in any particular case, one of the matters to be taken into consideration is the amount of risk run by the salving ship in rendering the salvage service, and that in estimating the amount of risk so run, evidence of any injury actually sustained by the salving ship is admissible; but I am unable to adopt the view, apparently held by him, that the amount of salvage award should in no respect depend upon the amount of loss occasioned to the owners of the salving ship by reason of the injury sustained by their ship in rendering the service. Butt, J. put a strong case, but it illustrated his views upon the subject, when he said, "If you have so much damage done that it will cost you 20,000*l*. I cannot increase the award;" and it was evidently present to his mind that the principle upon which he was acting in the present case would, as I have already pointed out, probably leave the owners of the Missouri not only unrewarded for their salvage services, but heavy losers through having rendered them. If I rightly appreciate the language used by the learned judge, he considered himself bound, by rules recognised by his predecessors in the Court of Admiralty, to reject the tendered evidence; but he nevertheless at the time when he rejected it expressed himself to the effect that the question involved was of great importance, and one which in his time had never been satisfactorily argued, and that though objections had been from time to time taken and rulings made, it had always been without argument. Though the admission of the rejected evidence or a reference to the registrar and merchants was strongly pressed by the counsel for the plaintiffs, and as strongly opposed on behalf of the defendants, it does not appear that there was any argument upon the question before Butt, J. It has, however, been very ably discussed before us.

In the course of the arguments, numerous cases were cited by the counsel for the plaintiffs, in which the Court of Admiralty has decreed payment to the owners of salving ships for the losses sustained by them in consequence of injuries to their ships whilst rendering the salvage services. In some of such cases the court itself received evidence as to the amount of such losses, and in others it referred it to the registrar and merchants to ascertain and report to the court. Amongst others, our attention was directed to The Oscar (ubi sup.), The Salacia (ubi sup.), and The Jane (ubi sup.), all decided by Sir Christopher Robinson, The Saratoga (ubi sup.), and The Mudhopper (ubi sup.). I deem it unnecessary to refer to these cases in detail, as since the decision of Butt, J. on the 1st May 1883, in the case now under consideration, two other judgments have been delivered: the one by Sir James Hannen on the 21st of the same month, in the case of The Sunniside (ubi sup.); and the other by the same learned judge in the Privy Council on the 30th June following, in the case of The De Bay (ubi sup.), in which similar questions arose to those with which we now have to deal, The material facts in the case of The Sunniside (ubi sup.) were as follows: On the 7th Nov. 1882 the steamer Sunniside broke down, when she was about twelve miles east of Scarborough, bound for Shields. Salvage services were rendered by several vessels, and amongst others by a steam trawler named the Monarch. In the action, which was a salvage action, evidence was tendered by the counsel for the Monarch as to the cost of repairing damages occasioned to her whilst rendering the salvage services, and of the loss of profits whilst so engaged, and this evidence was received by Sir James Hannen, though urged by the counsel for the Sunniside to reject it; and in the result Sir James Hannen awarded to the Monarch 200*l*. in respect of salvage pure and proper, and 100*l*. beyond that sum for loss of profits and repairs. As before mentioned, this award was made on the 21st May 1883, three weeks after the judgment of Butt, J. in the present case. In the course of his judgment Sir James Hannen, after describing the extent to which he considered that the several vessels had rendered services, and stating that in his opinion the Monarch was the vessel which performed the real salvage service, expressed himself as follows: "A question arose at the hearing yesterday as to the admissibility and effect of evidence of what a salving vessel might have earned if she had not been occupied in rendering the salvage service. I was asked to reject that evidence, but this I did not consider myself at liberty to do, because it appears to me that it is admissible as an element to be considered in awarding the remuneration to be paid to a vessel which has rendered salvage services. I remain of the opinion which I expressed yesterday, after considering it further, that it is not to be taken in ordinary cases as a fixed figure always to be allowed as in the nature of damages, and then to be added to the amount awarded for the actual salvage service. I think the loss of earnings and the actual services must be considered under ordinary circumstances together. It is to be remembered that the reason why so high a rate of remuneration is given for salvage service is because of the sacrifices which the salving vessel makes, but to give as it were damages for the sacrifices made, and also a high rate of salvage remuneration, would be to give that remuneration twice over. As a rule, therefore, it appears to me that the amount for loss of trade, and so on, cannot be taken as an actual figure in calculating what the salvage reward is to be. The same remarks apply, though not with the same force, to the question of damage done. But there is a reason in this case why a distinction should be drawn, and I propose to do it for the purposes of this case only;" and he then proceeded to state why, in the case before him, he thought it right to assess the amount of salvage pure and simple apart from the amount which he awarded for cost of repairs and loss of profits. The decision in the case of The Sunniside (ubi sup.) appears to me to affirm the following propositions: 1. In a salvage action evidence is admissible of the cost of repairing damage done to the salving vessel in consequence of rendering salvage service, and of the loss of earnings occasioned by any injury in such service. 2. Such cost and loss are elements for consideration in estimating the amount of the salvage reward. 3. Under ordinary circumstances the amounts of such costs and loss ought not to be taken as "fixed figures" or "moneys numbered" to be allowed in the nature of damage, added to the amount of the reward for actual salvage service, but should be taken into consideration in arriving at the amount to be so awarded. 4. Under special circumstances, of which the case of The Sunniside was itself an illustration, the amounts, when ascertained, of cost incurred for repairs, and of loss of earnings, may properly be taken as "fixed figures," and added to the award for actual salvage service. With respect to the first of these propositions it is to be observed that it goes no further than to affirm that the evidence therein mentioned is admissible, but it must be borne in mind that the only question raised was whether it was admissible. I pass on to consider the case of The De Bay (ubi sup.), the material facts of which were as follows: In the month of Sept. 1881 the Mary Louisa, a steamship of 1287 registered tonnage, in ballast, and bound from Marseilles to a port in Sicily, fell in with the De Bay, a screw steamer of 1805 tons register, bound to Rangoon, with a general cargo: the De Bay was making signals of distress, having lost her propeller; the Mary Louisa towed the De Bay to Malta; the services, which lasted about sixty-two hours, were rendered under circumstances of great difficulty and some danger, and it was alleged by the owners of the Mary Louisa that their ship sustained considerable damage consequent on the services so rendered. A suit for salvage was brought by the Mary Louisa against the De Bay in the Vice-Admiralty Court of Malta, the value of the De Bay, her cargo and freight, being agreed at 67,000*l.*, and the judge awarded the sum of 3535*l.* for loss and damages, and 5000*l.* for salvage services, making together 8535*l.* From that judgment the owners of the De Bay appealed to the Privy Council, and in support of their appeal contended that, in no case, ought the items of loss or damage to the salving vessel to be allowed as "moneys numbered," but that they only should be taken into account generally when estimating the amount to be awarded for salvage remuneration. They also contended that some of the items of loss or damage ought not to have been taken into consideration at all. The judgment delivered by Sir James Hannen contained passages in the following terms: "Their Lordships are of opinion that it is always justifiable, and sometimes important when it can be done, to ascertain what damages and losses the salving vessel has sustained in rendering the salvage services. It is frequently difficult and expensive, sometimes impossible, to ascertain with exactness the amount of such loss, and in such cases the amount of salvage must be assessed in a general manner upon so liberal a scale as to cover the losses and afford an adequate reward for the services rendered. In the assessment of salvage regard must always be had to the question whether the property saved is of sufficient value to supply a fund for the due reward of the salvors, without depriving the owner of that benefit which it is the object of the salvage service to secure him. If, as in the present case, the fund is ample, it is but just that the losses voluntarily incurred by the salvors should be transferred to the owner of the property saved, for whose advantage the sacrifice has been made, and in addition to this the salvor should receive a compensation for his exertion and for the risk he runs of not receiving any compensation in the event of his services proving ineffectual: for if no more than a restitutio in integrum were awarded there would be no inducement to shipowners to allow their vessels to engage in salvage services." And again, "their Lordships are therefore of opinion that the learned judge below has not adopted an erroneous principle in first estimating the amount of loss sustained by the Mary Louisa, and then adding to it an amount for salvage services." Their Lordships, however, having examined into the evidence, did not accept all the items of loss which had been taken into consideration by the judge of the Vice-Admiralty Court, and they further considered, for the reasons expressed in the judgment, that he had awarded too large a sum for salvage remuneration, and they accordingly held that an aggregate of 6000*l.* was sufficient. The case of The De Bay has, in my opinion, established the following proposition: that the cost of repairing injuries occasioned by rendering salvage service, and the loss of earnings arising from the detention of the ship whilst such repairs are being executed, ought to be ascertained with precision when possible. In some cases which will readily suggest themselves, the actual cost of repairs and loss of earnings may be immaterial, as for instance if they clearly exceed the recognised limits of salvage award. In such a case it would be a waste of time and money to enter into such evidence. In other cases it may be extremely difficult, if not impossible, to ascertain with exactness the amount of such cost and loss, and in such cases estimates must be adopted in making the general award. During the arguments in the Privy Council, in the case of The De Bay, it was urged, as it has been urged before us, that by allowing the cost of repairs and loss of earnings, and then a further sum for salvage, the salvors would receive payment of their losses twice over; but, as was pointed out in the judgment delivered by Sir James Hannen, such a result could only be brought about by the court, after giving the amount of the alleged losses specially, taking them again into consideration when awarding the remuneration, an error into which it could not be presumed that any judge would fall.

The cases of The Martha (3 Hagg. 434), The Enchantress (Lush. 93), The Ellora (Lush. 550), and The Star of India (1 P. Div. 466; 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 261), were cited on behalf of the respondents, but they do not appear to me to displace the authority of the older cases cited on behalf of the appellants, and which were referred to, approved, and acted upon in the cases of The Sunniside and The De Bay. I fully recognise the very large discretion which is vested in the judge when dealing with salvage cases; but it is, in my opinion, a discretion, the exercise of which may be reviewed, and however unwilling a Court of Appeal may be to interfere with a decision at which the judge in the exercise of his discretion has arrived, it is its plain duty to do so when in its opinion the discretion has been exercised in a manner which has failed to do complete justice between the litigant parties. The alterations which are occasionally made in the amount of salvage awards illustrate the general principle to which I am adverting, and a rejection of evidence which ought to have been received would appear to be a stronger case for its application. Under these circumstances I cannot assent to the argument of Mr. Webster that the principles enunciated in the judgment in the case of The De Bay are unsound; on the contrary, it appears to me not only that they are sound, having regard to past authority, but that they are consistent both with justice and policy, when we bear in mind the purposes for which the jurisdiction of our courts is exercised in salvage cases. For these reasons, and bearing in mind that the property salved in the present case was of sufficient value to supply a fund for the due reward of the salvors, I think that the learned judge by whom this action was tried ought either to have received the evidence which was rejected before making his award for the salvage service proper, or to have referred it to the registrar and merchants to estimate the additional allowance for costs of repairs and loss arising from detention.

Lindley, L.J.—This is an appeal by the owners of the steamship Missouri against a decision of Butt, J. awarding a sum of 6500*l.* for salvage services rendered by the Missouri to the steamship City of Chester. The value of the salved property was 179,000*l.*, and there were 111 passengers on board the City of Chester. The value of the salving property was 189,000*l.*, and the court apportioned the 6500*l.* awarded as follows: 4500*l.* to the owners of the Missouri, and 2000*l.* to the master and crew. The sum of 4500*l.* awarded to the owners of the salving ship is a very large sum, but, large as it is, her owners complain that it is not enough to cover the loss they have actually sustained by reason of the services their ship rendered to the City of Chester. They allege that the Missouri broke her crank shaft, and suffered further injury, and that the cost of repairs alone amounted to between 2000*l.* and 2500*l.* They further allege that it took thirty days to make good these repairs, and, taking the demurrage rate of the Missouri to be 128*l.* 13*s.* a day, they estimate their loss occasioned by her detention for repairs at 3900*l.*, making their whole actual loss from 5900*l.* to 6400*l.* By the statement of claim the plaintiffs demanded, if necessary, a reference to the registrar and merchants to ascertain the amount of damage suffered by the Missouri in rendering the salvage service. At the trial the plaintiffs tendered evidence in support of their above-mentioned claims, but the learned judge refused to receive it, and he refused to direct a reference to the registrar and merchants to ascertain the amount of loss actually sustained by reason of the injuries done to the Missouri, and of her detention for repair. The view taken by the learned judge is expressed at p. 45 of the record.

The substantial question raised by the appeal is whether the learned judge ought to have received evidence of the above-mentioned losses, and whether he ought, considering the nature of the salvage services and the great value of the property saved, to have awarded to the owners of the salving ship such a sum as would at least cover their losses out of pocket. I think he ought, and my reasons for so thinking are as follows: Salvage is the compensation made to those by whose assistance a ship or its cargo has been saved from impending peril or recovered from actual loss. The claim to compensation for salvage services is enforceable by action in the Court of Admiralty. The persons in whose favour the claim will be recognised, and the circumstances under which compensation to them will be awarded, have been the subject of judicial decision, and the leading principles applicable to these matters may be taken as settled. If the claimants come within the recognised class of salvors, and the circumstances under which compensation is habitually awarded are proved, their claim is allowed. In such cases the claim is made and allowed, not as a matter of favour which can be granted or refused at the arbitrary discretion of the court, but as a matter of right. The Merchant Shipping Act 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104), s. 458, clearly recognises this right. (a) It is true the Act in sect. 458 is confined to salvage in the United Kingdom, but by the law of this country the nature of the right does not depend upon whether the salvage services were rendered on the high seas or on British territorial waters. The lien which salvors have is only consistent with the existence of a right to be remunerated for their services, and this lien exists wherever the services may have been rendered. But although the salvors have a right to compensation for salvage services, the amount to which they are entitled is not fixed more definitely than by saying it ought to be reasonable. What is reasonable in any case must depend upon all the circumstances of that case, and different minds will naturally sometimes differ in their views of what is reasonable. But here again some circumstances are always material for consideration, and these have been ascertained by experience, and the court has for its guidance a long course of judicial decision to assist it in coming to a proper conclusion in each particular case. The first matter for consideration is the nature of the service rendered, the danger from which the one ship has been saved and the danger to which the other ship has been exposed. Under this head have to be considered the skill and courage of the salvors, and the risk of life and death as well to the saved as to their rescuers. A salvage service which hardly exceeds ordinary towage is naturally remunerated on a very different scale from an heroic rescue from imminent destruction. The next matter for consideration is the value of the property saved. The primary object of saving a ship and her cargo from loss is to preserve them for their owners, and this object would be defeated if the remuneration awarded to the salvors were so large as to deprive the owners of the saved ship and cargo of all benefit from their preservation. This consideration at once limits the amount of the salvors' remuneration; for however meritorious their services, salvors are never awarded such a sum as to make those services useless to those who have to pay for them. The value of the ship and cargo saved, is therefore always one element, and a very important element, in considering the amount to be awarded to salvors. There is not, however, any definite rule either as to the proportion of value to be given to the salvors or as to the proportion to be left for the owners of the property saved: see The Salacia (ubi sup.). And it is obvious that whilst a small percentage on a very large value might be proper in one case, the same percentage might be a very inadequate remuneration in another case. The risk of getting little by reason of the comparatively small value of the property saved is one of those risks which salvors always run. Another circumstance which has to be taken into consideration is the risk salvors always run of getting nothing at all by reason of the failure of their efforts to save. However strenuous those efforts, however heroic, still, if unsuccessful, they go unrewarded. They have not in the result benefited the owners of the ship or cargo, and there is nothing preserved out of which remuneration can be paid. Another circumstance to be considered is the importance of so remunerating salvors as to make it worth their while to succour ships in distress. This consideration renders it necessary to be liberal not only to captains and crews who perform the salvage services, but also to the owners of vessels engaged in those services where such vessels have been injured or exposed to danger. The salving vessel is often herself exposed to imminent peril. The risk of loss or damage to her is often very great, and the damage actually done to her, and the loss actually sustained by her owner from delay in her voyage and otherwise may be, and often is, very considerable. Hence one element in determining the amount to be awarded for salvage services is the value of the salving ship and cargo which have been exposed to risk, and the nature and extent of the risk are other elements for consideration. Where the salving vessel is, as in the present case, a large and valuable steamer, exposed to great risk, the claims of her owner deserve very favourable attention: see per Dr. Lushington in The Spirit of the Age (Swa. 286). Unless, where the salving vessel is a valuable steamer, the remuneration awarded to her owner is sufficient to cover this risk, owners of such vessels will naturally discourage their employment in salvage services; a result which would be very disastrous, and which the court should do what it can to prevent. In order to avoid such a consequence as this it is necessary that the amount of compensation awarded to the owner of the salving ship shall, wherever practicable, be sufficiently large to cover the risk of damage and loss which he ran where fortunately none has been sustained. And where damage and loss have been in fact sustained, and its amount can be ascertained, it is necessary that the sum awarded shall, when possible, be large enough to cover such an amount. This amount, however, ought not to be the measure of the remuneration, for the damage actually sustained may be very small, and there may have been serious risk of sustaining much greater damage. Besides which there is always the risk of earning nothing by reason of the loss of the succoured vessel. The amount of loss actually sustained by the owner of the salving ship can therefore seldom, if ever, be the maximum limit of the remuneration to be awarded to him. Neither can such loss be always the minimum limit. It never can be so where the value of the ship and cargo saved is too small to admit of payment in full of the loss in question. And even where the value is sufficient, the salvage service may be so trifling as to render it unreasonable to throw the loss sustained by the salvors on the owners of the property saved. But where the salvage services have been dangerous to the salvors, and have occasioned them serious pecuniary loss, and have been highly valuable to the owners of the property saved, and where the value of the ship and cargo saved is ample not only to defray the loss sustained by the salvors in addition to a proper sum for the services of the master and crew of the salving ship, but also to leave a substantial surplus for the owner of the property saved, in such a case the sum to be awarded to the owner of the salving ship ought to be enough to cover her actual loss and whatever additional risk he ran. Of course care must be taken not to fall into the error of remunerating him twice over for the same risk. He must not be remunerated for the risk he ran of suffering the loss, the amount of which is ascertained and taken into consideration as the loss sustained. Another very important reason for ascertaining the amount of pecuniary loss sustained by the owner of the salving vessel is to enable the court to make a proper apportionment of the total sum awarded for salvage services, for it is obvious that no part of that sum which is given to cover the risk run by the shipowner or damage to the ship ought to go to the master or crew.

(a) Sect. 458 is as follows: "In the following cases (that is to say), whenever any ship or boat is stranded or otherwise in distress on the shore of any sea or tidal water situate within the limits of the United Kingdom and services are rendered by any person, (1) In assisting such ship or boat, (2) In saving the lives of the persons belonging to such ship or boat, (3) In saving the cargo or apparel of such ship or boat or any portion thereof; and whenever any wreck is saved by any person other than a receiver within the United Kingdom: There shall be payable by the owners of such ship or boat, cargo, apparel, or wreck, to the person by whom such services or any of them are rendered, or by whom such wreck is saved, a reasonable amount of salvage, together with all expenses properly incurred by him in the performance of such services or the saving of such wreck, the amount of such salvage and expenses (which expenses are hereinafter included under the term salvage) to be determined in case of dispute in manner hereinafter mentioned."—Ed.

Having thus examined the principles applicable to this subject, it is necessary to turn to the authorities and see how they stand. In The Oscar (ubi sup.) the value of the salved ship and cargo was 2400*l.*; the sum of 220*l.* was awarded for salvage and apportioned between five sailing smacks; but in addition to this sum Sir Christopher Robinson directed a reference to the registrar and merchants to ascertain the amount of loss and damage actually sustained by the different salvors. Again, in The Salacia (ubi sup.) the same learned judge awarded 1500*l.* for salvage services, and in addition 600*l.* to the owners of the salving ship for injuries sustained by her, and a further sum of 1000*l.* to them for the loss of a sealing voyage. This last sum was assessed by the registrar and merchants to whom the assessment of this loss was referred. The learned judge remarked upon the report of the registrar and merchants that, "it relieves the court from the task of forming conjectural estimates of such consequences as are attributed to the engagement of the vessel in this salvage service." In all judicial investigations it is desirable to substitute accuracy for conjecture when the expense of so doing is not too great. In The Jane (ubi sup.) the same learned judge awarded 1200*l.* in all. Of this sum 500*l.* was awarded to the master and crew of the salving ship, and 700*l.* was given to her owners for demurrage, repairs, risks, and expenses. The value of the ship and cargo salved was 7000*l.* The owners of the salving ship claimed 350*l.* for demurrage, repairs, and expenses, and there being no dispute as to these figures, no reference to ascertain them was necessary, and they were accordingly adopted by the court. In The Saratoga (ubi sup.) the value of the ship and cargo salved was 52,002*l.* The salving vessel was a steamer and was crushed against the landing stage at Liverpool and was damaged. Dr. Lushington estimated the damage at 150*l.*, the loss of employment when under repair at 250*l.*, making together 400*l.*, and he awarded 600*l.* in all. There seems to have been no discussion in this case as to the admissibility or non-admissibility of evidence as to the cost of repairing the damage sustained or as to the loss of employment, but it is plain from the judgment that Dr. Lushington fixed the salvage awarded at an amount sufficient to cover these losses as well as ordinary salvage services. In The Albert (ubi sup.) Dr. Lushington, in awarding 400*l.* to a cutter which was damaged in saving a ship and cargo worth 1672*l.*, expressly said the 400*l.* included the damage to the cutter. This remark again shows that the salvage awarded ought at all events to cover the amount of damage sustained by the salving ship when the property salved is of sufficient value to enable this to be done. This case is reported with two others, The Otto Herman and The Ella Constance, and in the head-note it is stated, "in all cases the value of the salving vessel is regarded, and to whatever remuneration is given, must be added a sum to meet any damage she sustains." But I cannot find anything in the judgment in those cases which warrants so wide a proposition. It is evidently inaccurate where the damage done to the salving ship is very great compared with the value of the ship and cargo salved. In The Mudhopper (ubi sup.) Sir Robert Phillimore expressly decided after argument that the owner of the salving ship was entitled to be compensated for the damage to the ship and for her detention during repair, in addition to what was awarded for salvage services. In this case the principle being decided, the figures were agreed. In The Sunniside (ubi sup.) evidence was tendered of what the salving vessel, the Monarch, might have earned if she had not been occupied in rendering the salvage service, and also of the cost of repairing the damage done to her. This evidence was objected to on the ground that no fixed sum could be awarded for these matters in addition to the sum given as a salvage reward which covered these items. Sir James Hannen admitted the evidence as an element to be considered in awarding the remuneration to be paid to a vessel which has rendered salvage services, and he awarded the Monarch 200*l.* for salvage services pure and proper, and 100*l.* beyond that for loss of profit and repairs. The last and most important case in which this question has been discussed was the case of The De Bay (ubi sup), decided by the Privy Council. In that case the judge of the Vice-Admiralty Court of Malta had awarded a salving ship 5000*l.* for salvage services and 3500*l.* for demurrage and damages, i.e. 8500*l.* in all. An appeal was brought on the ground that this sum was excessive, and the Privy Council reduced the amount to 6000*l.* The court thought that some of the items of loss were not satisfactorily proved, but the court nevertheless would not disturb the judgment on these items, but the Judicial Committee, allowing them to stand, reduced the 5000*l.* on the ground that the court below having allowed all damages and losses in full had been too liberal in adding so large a sum as 5000*l.* to them. In this case the Privy Council expressly decided that the court below had done right in admitting evidence of the loss sustained by the salving vessel and in ascertaining the amount of such loss, and in fixing the sum awarded high enough to cover such loss and a proper remuneration for the salvage services. It is true that the decisions of the Privy Council are theoretically not binding on this court, but in cases of mercantile or Admiralty law where the same principles are professedly followed in the colonies and in this country, it is, to say the least, highly undesirable that there should be any conflict between the decisions of the Judicial Committee and those of the High Court or Courts of Appeal in this country. Even if therefore I doubted the correctness of the decision in the case of The De Bay (ubi sup.), I should be disposed to follow it rather than depart from it, and so introduce a diversity of practice where there ought to be no difference in principle. But in fact the cases already referred to seem to me fully to warrant the decision in the case of The De Bay, and I do not regard it as introducing any new practice or principle. It must, however, always be borne in mind that the court was there dealing with a case in which the value of the property saved was very large compared with the whole sum awarded to the salvors, and that there was no circumstance to prevent the court from awarding enough to cover the whole loss sustained by them. The conclusion to be drawn from these authorities is, that where the property saved is ample in the sense already explained, and where there is no circumstance which the court can see at once would prevent it from giving an amount of salvage sufficient to cover the loss sustained by the salvors, evidence has been received, and ought to be received, to show the amount of loss actually sustained by the owner of the salving ship by reason of the salvage services, with a view to fix his remuneration at a sum that will cover such loss, and remunerate him for such further risk as he ought to be compensated for. This view is corroborated by the form of statement of claim given in Appendix C, s. 3, No. 6, to the Rules of the Supreme Court 1883. In that form will be found amongst the particulars of a salvor's claim, "Damage done to the salving ship, so much." These forms were settled by persons of great experience; and although of course they are only illustrative and not conclusive on any question of principle, the form in question indicates that, where a salving ship has been injured, the cost of repairing her ought to be stated. If it ought to be stated, evidence in support of the statement ought not to be rejected except in cases where it is useless to admit it. If it be said that the amount of salvage to be awarded is discretionary with the judge, the answer is that his discretion is a judicial discretion and not an arbitrary discretion, and that a judge who excludes evidence on a matter which he ought to consider does not place himself in the position in which he ought to be before his discretion can be exercised. I do not, however, wish to be understood as going further than the court did in the case of The De Bay (ubi sup.). When the judge has ascertained the amount of loss sustained by the salvors, it still remains for him to decide what amount of salvage is reasonable, regard being had to all the circumstances of the case—the amount of loss sustained by the salvors being only one of them. But unless, owing to the comparatively small value of the property saved, the trifling nature of the salvage services, or some other circumstances, the judge can foresee that it will be useless to inquire into the loss sustained by the salvors, he ought, in my opinion, to receive evidence of such loss.

In the present case the value of the salved property was ample not only to defray any amount of remuneration which could be reasonably awarded to the salvors, but also to leave a very large surplus to the owners of the property saved. The salvage service was important, and there was no circumstance to justify the court in coming to the conclusion that the evidence, if taken, would not affect the amount of salvage to be awarded. The learned judge who tried the action awarded to the owners of the salving ship 4500*l.*, which is a large sum; but, as already stated, he refused to allow evidence to be given either before himself or the registrar of the loss sustained by those owners by reason of the damage done to their vessel, and by reason of the delay in her voyage. The learned judge, however, had not the assistance of the decision of the Privy Council in the case of The De Bay (ubi sup.), for that case was not decided till June 1883, two months after the present case was heard by him. Had that decision been reported, the learned judge would no doubt have followed it. For the reasons above stated I am of opinion that the learned judge ought, under the circumstances, either to have admitted the evidence which he rejected, and then to have decided what would be a proper sum to award the salvors, or to have fixed the remuneration for mere salvage, and to have referred the amount of loss to the registrar and merchants, and have added that amount to the former sum. Had he adopted either of these courses, and ascertained as a fact that the salvors' losses out of pocket amounted to between 5000*l.* and 6000*l.* which is what they allege, I cannot think that he would have considered 4500*l.* sufficient for their remuneration. Whether the judge of the Admiralty Division of the High Court in this or any other salvage action will himself ascertain the amount of loss, or refer it to the registrar and merchants, is entirely a matter for his discretion. But I cannot think it discretionary with him to admit or reject evidence of such loss where, as in this case, there is nothing to justify the rejection of the evidence as useless, and where there can be no difference of opinion as to the ample value of the property saved to admit of the application of the course followed in the case of The De Bay (ubi sup.). The appeal ought not, in my opinion, to be dismissed, but the order of the court below ought to be varied so far as it relates to the sum of 4500*l.* awarded to the appellants. Unless, therefore, the appellants prefer to take the sum of 4500*l.* awarded them, they are entitled to an inquiry in the terms stated by the Master of the Rolls, in order to ascertain the amount of loss sustained by them, and to add the amount when ascertained to the sum awarded for the use of the ship and the risk of her earning nothing, and this sum we fix at 1000*l.*

ON APPEAL FROM BUTT, J.

Collision—Risk of collision—Crossing steamships—Course—Province of Trinity Masters—Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea 1880, arts. 18, 22.

The object of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea is not merely to prevent actual collision, but also risk of collision, and therefore the regulations should be applied, not only when there is actual risk of collision, but also where the circumstances are such that it is probable that risk of collision may be involved. (b)

The duty of a vessel to "keep her course" under art. 22 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea is complied with if she keeps

(a) Reported by J. P. Aspinall and F. W. Raikes, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

(b) On reference to the American decisions we find it was decided in The Dexter (23 Wall, 69) that the regulations are obligatory from the time when necessity for precaution begins. In another American case, The Milwaukee (1 Brown Adm. 313), it was laid down that risk of collision begins the moment the two vessels have approached so near that a collision might be brought about by any departure from the rules of navigation.—Ed.

her heading, whilst checking her speed, because art. 22 covers direction only, and not speed.

Under art. 18 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, a steamship approaching another vessel so as to involve risk of collision, is always bound to slacken her speed, but her duty to stop and reverse her engines is governed by the words "if necessary."

Per Brett, M.R.: The duty to execute the manœuvres prescribed by the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea does not arise from the mere fact of risk of collision, but only if such fact ought under the circumstances to be within the knowledge of those in command of the ship.

Per Brett, M.R.: The functions of the nautical assessors being to assist the judge by their advice, and not to control his decision, where the judge differs from his assessors on questions of nautical skill he is not bound by their opinion. (a)

The steamships A. and B. were on courses crossing one another at right angles, the A. having the B. on her starboard side. When they had approached one another within a distance of from a quarter to half a mile, those on the B., seeing that those on the A. were taking no steps to keep out of their way, whistled and eased the engines. When within 300 yards of one another, those on the B., seeing that those on the A. were still taking no steps to keep out of their way, stopped and reversed their engines full speed astern, but the vessels came into collision. It was admitted that the A. was to blame, but contended that the B. was also to blame for not stopping and reversing sooner.

Held, that it was the duty of the B., under art. 18 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, to stop and reverse her engines, if necessary, to avoid risk of collision; that she had failed to do so in due time; and that she therefore was also to blame for the collision.

This was an appeal by the plaintiffs in a damage action from a judgment of Butt, J., by which he had found the steamship Abeona alone to blame for a collision between that vessel and the steamship Beryl.

The collision occurred in the North Sea, at about 11.30 p.m. on the 10th Sept. 1883. The steamships were on courses crossing one another at about right angles, the Abeona having the Beryl on her starboard side. As they approached, those on the Beryl, seeing that the Abeona was taking no steps to keep out of the way, slackened her speed and blew their whistle at a distance of from a quarter to half a mile off. The Beryl continued at this slackened speed until within a distance of 300 yards, when the Abeona still taking no steps to keep out of the way, the engines of the Beryl were stopped and reversed full speed astern; but, notwithstanding this manœuvre, the vessels came into collision, the Beryl with her stem and port bow striking the starboard bow of the Abeona.

The further facts of the case appear in the report of the proceedings in the court below: (5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 193; 49 L. T. Rep. N. S. 748; 9 P. Div. 4.)

The appellants admitted that the Abeona was to blame, but contended that the Beryl was also to blame.

Hall, Q.C. and Dr. Phillimore, for the owners of the Abeona, in support of the appeal.—The Beryl has infringed the 18th article of the regulations in not stopping and reversing her engines until at a distance of 300 yards from the Abeona. The article directs that a steamship, if approaching another ship so as to involve risk of collision, shall stop and reverse her engines if necessary. Here, however, the Beryl kept on after risk of collision had been involved, and after it had become necessary, within the meaning of the article, to stop and reverse. She therefore has infringed the article and should be held to blame:

(a) The functions of the nautical assessors have since been discussed by the Court of Appeal, in the cases of The Glengarry (decided Nov. 26, 1884) and The Viatka (decided Nov. 27, 1884). In The Glengarry it was argued on appeal that the opinion of the nautical assessors in the Admiralty Court, who have seen the witnesses, is not to be reversed by the assessors in the Court of Appeal. To this argument the Court of Appeal refused to accede. The remarks of Brett, M.R. were as follows: "The judge of the Admiralty Court, assisted by assessors, has come to a certain conclusion, and this is brought by way of appeal before us, who are also assisted by nautical assessors. Now I do not say that there is an appeal from the nautical assessors in the Admiralty Court to the nautical assessors in this court. But I do say that the appeal when it comes on is a rehearing, and that we must give our own opinion on the evidence, and ask the assistance of our own assessors upon any question of nautical skill that may arise." In The Viatka it was argued that in cases where damage has been done by a ship breaking adrift from her moorings the opinion of the assessors as to the propriety of the moorings is binding on the court. In support of this contention reliance was placed upon the cases of The Volcano (2 W. Rob. 337); The William Lindsay (L. Rep. 5 P. C. 338; 2 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 118), and The Peerless (Lush. 30). The remarks of Brett, M.R. on this point are as follows: "This case was tried in the Admiralty Court, and the Trinity Masters, upon certain questions which were asked them by the judge, came to a conclusion adverse to the defendants so far as Trinity Masters have authority to come to such a conclusion. They in this case gave adverse answers to the nautical questions put to them by Butt, J. The learned judge differed from his nautical assessors as to the answers given him on these nautical questions. Dr. Phillimore, to my surprise, has argued that the judge of the Admiralty Court was bound in law to accept the answers of his Trinity Masters upon these questions of nautical skill. The constitution of the Admiralty Court has long since been settled, and it is this: The judge is the sole judge both of law and of fact. He is the court, and he only, and the gentlemen who assist him are no part of the court. The assessors, from the very meaning of the word, are there merely to assist him. The responsibility of finding both law and fact rests solely upon the judge. If that is so, it is at once absurd to argue that he, being the person solely responsible for the finding of the facts, is bound as a matter of law to follow anyone else's opinion in relation to the facts. It would come to this, that the judge would be bound to find upon his own responsibility that a fact was so and so when he himself had a firm conviction that it was not so. The judge of the Admiralty Court ought, and always does pay the greatest possible deference to the opinion given him by the assessors upon questions of nautical skill. Unless he is forced by the most extreme conviction of his own to the conclusion that he cannot agree with them, he always follows them; but to say that, if he has that firm conviction, he is yet bound to follow them, is absurd." In the case of The Aid (4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 432) Sir Robert Phillimore laid down the law in the same way. It is to be noticed that the effect of deciding that the opinion of the nautical assessors is under any circumstances binding on the court, is nothing less than giving them the functions of a jury.—Ed.

keep her course, yet art. 18 was also applicable, it always being the duty of a steamship to stop and reverse, if necessary, to avoid risk of collision. Moreover, art. 22 is concerned with heading only, and has nothing to do with speed. If, therefore, the Beryl had stopped and reversed earlier, while keeping the same heading, she would have obeyed the directions contained in both articles. An officer in command of a vessel has no right to blindly act upon the assumption that another will manœuvre in accordance with the regulations, where the circumstances are such that there is considerable probability that the other vessel will neglect to do what is her duty.

Myburgh, Q.C. (with him Kennedy) for the respondents.—It is conceded that the Beryl slackened her speed at a distance of from a quarter to half a mile. That is in itself evidence of careful navigation, and was a compliance with the direction in art. 18 to slacken her speed. In consequence of the continuing neglect of the Abeona to keep out of the way, the slackening on the part of the Beryl was insufficient, and it became necessary to stop and reverse. In order that the officer in command of the Beryl might properly appreciate the state of the case and come to a right conclusion as to the proper manœuvre, it was necessary that some reasonably short time should elapse between the order to slacken and the order to stop and reverse. It is submitted that, with the Beryl making eight knots an hour, the time that she would take to run the space between the distance of from a quarter to half a mile, and the 300 yards at which she admittedly stopped and reversed, is necessarily very short, and that therefore, under the circumstances, there has been a compliance with the rule. The officer in charge of the Beryl had a right to assume that the Abeona would have done her duty, and probably do it by going under his stern. For him to have stopped and reversed before it became absolutely necessary, might have been the very means of counteracting this manœuvre, and might have brought about risk of collision. The circumstances were such that it could not have been present to the mind of the officer in charge of the Beryl that there would be risk of collision until the vessels were in close proximity, and even then, had the Abeona done her duty, it is probable that no collision would have occurred.

Brett, M.R.—I am very sorry in this case to have to come to the conclusion to which I feel bound to come. A great many things have been said during the arguments which I think have startled me that they should have been brought forward at this time. I refer to the observations made with regard to the construction of the regulations, which I, for my part, thought had been settled almost from the time the rules were drawn up. I take it that the basis of all these rules is that they are instructions to those in charge of ships as to what they ought to do, and the Legislature has not thought it enough to say, "We will give you rules which shall prevent a collision;" they have gone further and said that, for the safety of navigation, "We will give you rules which shall prevent risk of collision." It is, therefore, not enough for an officer in command of a ship to do only that which will prevent a collision. The Legislature lays down rules which shall regulate his conduct, not merely for the purpose of preventing a collision, but for the purpose of preventing even risk of collision. Therefore, the basis and foundation of all these rules are instructions to those in command of ships by which risk of collision is to be avoided. When one speaks of rules which are to regulate the conduct of men, the rules can only apply to those circumstances which must or ought to be known to the parties at the time. It is impossible to regulate the conduct of people as to unknown circumstances. When one is instructing people, it must be to instruct them as to what they ought to do under circumstances which are or ought to be before them. When one says that a man must slacken speed or stop and reverse in order to prevent risk of collision, it would be insensible to suppose that it would depend upon the mere fact of whether there was risk of collision, if the circumstances were such that he could not know there was risk of collision. It would be wicked folly to attempt to regulate a man's conduct with regard to circumstances which could not be known to him. I put some instances during the argument to show that this must be so. A vessel approaching another vessel ought to slacken her speed, if by going on there would be risk of collision. But suppose the night to be absolutely dark and the other vessel to be showing no lights, it would be absolutely wicked, under circumstances like these, where the officer could have no means of knowing that there was risk of collision, to hold his owners liable for a breach of the rule. If, however, the circumstances were such that he ought to have seen the other ship, then it is no excuse to say that in fact he did not see her. Take another case. If two vessels are approaching on courses which will cause them to meet on a high headland, so that until they are absolutely close they cannot see one another, how is one to regulate their conduct under these circumstances? It is absurd to suppose that it is possible to regulate their conduct with regard to what they cannot see and cannot know. Therefore the consideration must always be in these cases, were the circumstances such as ought to have brought it to the mind of the persons in charge that the rule was applicable? It is not whether the rule was in fact applicable, but were the circumstances such that it ought to have been present to the mind of the officer in charge that the rule was applicable. That being so, we have, in this case, to apply that consideration to two separate rules, and to apply it under separate circumstances. The first rule is this: "If two ships under steam" —not two steamships therefore, but "two ships under steam," that is, with their steam up—"are crossing so as to involve risk of collision, the ship which has the other on her own starboard side shall keep out of the way of the other." If the circumstances of the two ships under steam are such that those in charge of them ought to see that risk of collision is involved, then the ship which has the other on her starboard side is bound to do something to keep out of the way of the other. The object of these regulations being to avoid risk of collision, a canon for their interpretation is that they are all applicable at a time when the risk of collision is to be avoided, not that they are applicable when the risk of collision is already fixed and determined. Therefore, they are all applicable some time before the risk of collision is finally fixed and determined. Hence we have always said that the right moment of time to be considered is the moment before the risk of collision is constituted. The words of the rule are not "If two ships under steam are crossing with a risk of collision," but "are crossing so as to involve risk of collision," that is, the moment before there was risk of collision. Here the duty of the Abeona was to follow whatever manœuvre she chose to select which would keep her out of the way of the other so as to avoid risk of collision. But then there is a reciprocal rule which applies to the conduct of the other ship, which is this: "Where, by the above rules, one of two ships is to keep out of the way, the other shall keep her course." It was suggested that "keeping her course" meant keeping her course at the same pace at which she was going before she was called upon to obey this rule. It is the first time I ever heard it suggested "keeping her course" means that she is to keep on at the same speed as before. It has nothing to do with the question of speed, but is concerned with the direction in which a vessel is going. Therefore, she was bound to keep her course. Now we come to another rule, the 18th, which does not in any way modify, clash with, or require to be construed at the same time as, the other rules. It is a wholly independent rule. It will apply, though certain of the other rules apply. In the case of two steamers approaching each other it applies to both of them. We have had a great deal of discussion about this rule, and it is very necessary to consider it carefully. It, in my opinion, like all the others, applies more particularly to the moment before the risk of collision is constituted and exists. It is applicable at a time when the action of both steamers is such as to involve risk of collision. At that moment of time, if what they are doing involves risk of collision, they ought both to slacken their speed. It applies to each of them. But it may be that the condition of things just before the moment when the risk of collision is to be constituted is such that the slackening will not suffice to avoid the risk of collision, and it requires another manœuvre, viz., stopping and reversing. If then it is necessary to stop and reverse, they must do so, either one or the other or both. But this, again, is an instruction as to the conduct of men, and it cannot be that they are to stop and reverse merely because it is proved afterwards that there was risk of collision; it must be if the circumstances are such that an officer of ordinary skill and care would be bound to come to the conclusion that it was necessary to stop and reverse.

That being the construction of the rules, we have to apply them to the present case. The application of these rules in the Court of Admiralty is made by a mixed tribunal. The judge has to try the case and the judgment is his and his alone. The assessors who assist the judge take no part in the judgment whatever. They are not responsible for it and have nothing to do with it. They are there for the purpose of assisting the judge by answering any questions as to nautical skill. They have nothing to do with the credibility of witnesses, unless that credibility depends upon a special knowledge of nautical affairs. They have nothing to do with the question whether the evidence proves that vessels were at one distance or another at any given time. That is not their function. All that is to be decided upon the responsibility of the judge, and upon the evidence before him, and upon his view of the evidence. But nautical questions may arise in the course of the case, and the judge is then entitled to ask the opinion of the assessors for his own guidance. They are, therefore, there to assist the judge in solving any question of nautical skill upon which he wants instruction. Therefore, before such a tribunal, the final question which has to be decided is a mixture of what is the law and what is the construction of these rules, which is a question solely for the judge. The judge is bound to give great weight to the opinion of his assessors; but at the same time, if he does not think their view right, he is not bound to follow it, but follows his own view. I think that on several occasions the opinion of Dr. Lushington differed with that of his assessors even as to questions of nautical skill, and unless the Court of Appeal thought his decision wrong, it stood. Still it would be impertinent in a judge not to consider as almost binding upon him the opinion of the nautical gentlemen who, having ten times his own skill, are called in to assist him. It must, however, be remembered that they are there to assist the judge and not to control. Now, applying these observations to the present case, it cannot be doubted that these vessels were approaching each other in a manner which made three of these regulations applicable. The 16th article was applicable. The Abeona was bound to get out of the way of the Beryl. The moment that rule applied to the Abeona the 22nd article applied to the Beryl, namely, to keep her course. If both these vessels had done what they ought to have done, risk of collision would never have been constituted. But they went on until the 18th rule became applicable. The Abeona seems to have done everything that was wrong. She was a great screw collier, on the north-east coast, performing her voyage with the carelessness which is not uncommon amongst colliers. She was going at full speed, not looking to the right or left, and very likely with her helm lashed, and all her people asleep. Therefore, the whole question is, it being admitted that the Abeona was to blame, whether the Beryl broke any of the rules. What she did was this, she kept her course, and, seeing the Abeona was not doing her duty, she whistled. This first whistle is immaterial, as it is not contended that she was bound to do anything more at that time. But, seeing the Abeona was still keeping on, she whistled again, and slackened her speed. At that moment, were the circumstances such as ought to have caused the officer in charge of the Beryl to perceive that the two vessels were so approaching as to involve risk of collision? They were at a distance of from a quarter to half a mile. At that time the officer in charge of the Beryl slackened his speed. Whether he was justified in only doing that seems to me to involve a question of nautical skill, and, assuming the vessels to have been half a mile apart, we have asked our assessors the following question: "At the time of the second whistle could the Abeona, without difficulty, have passed under the stern of the Beryl, or could she then otherwise, without difficulty, have avoided her?" They answer the question in the affirmative. Therefore, I think that at that time the officer in command of the Beryl was not put into such circumstances as ought to have made him come to the conclusion that it was necessary to stop and reverse. He had a right to assume that the Abeona would not go on obstinately neglecting her duty. According to his evidence, 300 yards is the greatest distance we can give him from the Abeona before he acted again.

Now, the question is raised whether at any appreciable time before he did again act—assuming it to be 300 yards—the circumstances were such that he ought to have come to the conclusion that it had become necessary, in order to avoid risk of collision, to stop and reverse. In order to solve that question, which involves a matter of nautical skill, we have asked the gentlemen who assist us this question: "Was the officer of the Beryl justified, as a sailor, in supposing, until he was within 300 yards of the Abeona, that the Abeona would keep out of his way, and could do so without difficulty." They answer that question in the negative. Accordingly, the next inference of fact which I should draw, assuming that answer to be correct, is that he was not justified in waiting until the vessels were 300 yards apart before he stopped and reversed. He had come within the rule, the circumstances being such that he ought to have earlier come to the conclusion that it was necessary to stop and reverse. But, in order to avoid any difficulty, as to the form of the question, we have asked another question which seems to me absolutely to clench the matter: At 300 yards could the Abeona, by any manœuvre, have avoided risk of collision, unless the Beryl had, at the same time, stopped and reversed? They answer, No. It cannot be that, if what an officer is to do is to act so as to avoid risk of collision, he is to delay acting until the time when, unless he stops and reverses, it is impossible for the other vessel, by any manœuvre, to avoid risk of collision. Upon these answers, and—if it is worth while to say so—I confess I cannot myself see how they could answer otherwise, as I cannot conceive that these two vessels could approach on the courses on which they were to within 300 yards of each other without risk of collision. I absolutely and entirely agree with these findings of nautical fact, and, adding to those nautical facts the facts which are established by the evidence, I am sorry to say that I have been obliged to come to the conclusion that it had become earlier necessary, within the meaning of the rule, for the officer of the Beryl to stop and reverse in order to avoid, not only collision, but risk of collision. If that be so, the result is that the Beryl is to blame as well as the other vessel, and the usual consequences must follow. I should have been glad if Butt, J. had, in his judgment, stated what the question was which he definitely and in terms left to his Trinity Masters. Had we known what it was that was left to them it would have greatly assisted us. Therefore, with great reluctance, the conduct of the Abeona having been as bad as it could be, and the officer of the Beryl having been put into a difficult position by the wrongful act of the Abeona, all that can be said is that he did not do that which the Act of Parliament declares and enacts he must do, and for this pardonable, excusable, and slight fault, I feel bound to decree that his owners must pay for that breach of the Act of Parliament. We, therefore, find both vessels to blame. There will be no costs here or in the court below.

Bowen, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. I think that the judgment in this case is determined by and follows from the answers given us by our nautical assessors. The matter is governed by certain articles of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea. The articles are Nos. 16, 17, 18, and 22. Arts. 16, 17, and 22 are in the same tenor, and differ from 18. They are regulations which prescribe the course which a ship is to keep or abandon, according to circumstances. Art. 18 has to do with speed alone. The arts 16, 17, and 22 prescribe the course that each of two ships meeting so as to involve risk of collision is to take. By art. 16, "If two ships under steam are crossing so as to involve risk of collision, the ship which has the other on her own starboard side shall keep out of the way of the other." By art. 17, "If two ships, one of which is a sailing vessel, and the other a steamship, are proceeding in such directions as to involve risk of collision, the steamship shall keep out of the way of the sailing ship." As the Master of the Rolls has pointed out, these articles are intended, not merely to prevent collision, but to prevent risk of collision. In my view, art. 16 may be expanded into, "if two ships under steam are crossing in such a way that if their respective courses are continued, there will be risk of collision, &c." Art. 17 may also be expanded in the same way. What, therefore, is to be avoided is risk of collision. Art. 22 is correlative to these two other articles, and enacts that, "Where, by the above rules, one of two ships is to keep out of the way, the other shall keep her course."

It has been suggested during the argument that keeping her course means not only keeping the same heading, but also maintaining the same speed. That argument seems to me to be untenable. In my view, the article is opposed to an alteration of heading, and has nothing to do with speed. It is art. 18 which has to do with speed. In my opinion that article means that a steamship when approaching another vessel so as to involve risk of collision must, at all events, slacken her speed; but it may be necessary that she should do more, viz, stop and reverse. That, I think, is the construction to be put upon the terms "if necessary." The meaning to be put upon these words, however, does not arise in this case, on account of the answers given by the gentlemen who assist us. They have told us that in their judgment the officer in command of the Beryl was not justified in supposing, down to the point of 300 yards distance from the Abeona, that the Abeona would keep out of his way, and could do so without difficulty. Although I think it follows from that answer that the Beryl was also to blame for this collision, they have further said that at 300 yards the Abeona by no manœuvre could have avoided risk of collision, unless the Beryl had at the same time stopped and reversed. That is an answer on an issue of fact which disposes of the case. The learned judge below has not in his judgment indicated the exact questions that he put to his assessors. But, bringing to this matter the best attention that I am capable of, I am unable to see any reasons why the answers given us by the gentlemen who assist us are wrong. I think, therefore, that the judgment of the court below must be reversed.

Fry, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The precise question which we have to determine is this: whether it became necessary for the Beryl to stop and reverse at an earlier time than she did. According to the evidence, it seems to have been proved that she stopped and reversed at a distance of 300 yards from the Abeona. Ought she to have stopped and reversed at an earlier time than that? I observe that the rule says that the steamship is to slacken her speed or stop and reverse if necessary. Now, these two vessels were approaching so as to involve risk of collision. It was, therefore, the duty of the Beryl to slacken her speed. That she did. The risk of collision however continued, and the direction in art. 18 is a continuing direction, and therefore it was the duty of the officer in command of the Beryl to decide every moment whether it had become necessary to stop and reverse. Now, the Beryl slackened her speed at a distance between a quarter and half a mile off, and she continued at that speed until within 300 yards. From the answers given us by our assessors it appears to me to be plain that the Beryl continued at her slackened speed for a longer time than she ought to have done. It appears to me that, under the circumstances, the view taken by our assessors is well founded. It has been argued that the necessity to stop and reverse is a necessity which is to be determined by the event and not by the judgment of a seaman. It is not now necessary to decide that question, because, if it is to be judged by the event, the collision followed, and therefore it was necessary; if by the judgment of a sailor, then we have the opinion of our assessors that a sailor ought, under the circumstances, to have earlier seen the necessity of stopping and reversing. Whichever interpretation of these words is correct, it follows that in this case the Beryl was in fault, and must therefore be held to blame for the collision.

ON APPEAL FROM BUTT, J.

Limitation of liability — Collision — Defect in machinery—"Improper navigation"—Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 63), s, 54.

Where a ship is held liable for a collision caused by a defect in her machinery, and such defect is due, not to her master and crew, but to the negligence or default of other persons employed by the shipowner to repair the machinery on shore before the commencement of the voyage, and for the purposes of the voyage, the collision is occasioned by "improper navigation" within the meaning of sect. 54, sub-sect. 4, of the Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act 1862, so as to entitle the owners to limit their liability under the provisions of that Act.

Per Brett, M.R.: All damage wrongfully done by one ship to another whilst the ship which does the damage is being navigated, and where the wrongful act of the ship which does the damage is due to the negligence of any person for whose negligence the owner is liable, is comprised within sect. 54 of the Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act 1862, unless such negligence occurs with the privity of the owner.

Decision of Butt, J. (5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 194; 49 L. T. Rep. N.S. 715) confirmed.

This was an appeal by the defendants from a decision of Butt, J., in an action for limitation of liability under the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act 1862, s. 54, sub-s. 4.

The action was brought by the owners of the steamship Warkworth to limit their liability in respect of a collision between the Warkworth and the vessel British Enterprise, caused by a defect in the steam steering gear of the Warkworth. At the damage action arising out of this collision. Sir James Hannen had found the Warkworth solely to blame, on the ground that the defect in the steering gear was due to the negligence of persons other than the master and crew, for whom the owner was responsible.

Under these circumstances the defendants to the limitation of liability action pleaded that the collision had not been caused by the "improper navigation" of the Warkworth, and therefore denied the right of the plaintiffs to limit their liability. At the trial Butt, J. had held that the collision was caused by the "improper navigation" of the Warkworth, and had allowed her owners to limit their liability accordingly.

The further facts of the case are fully set out in the report of the proceedings in the court below (5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 194; 49 L. T. Rep. N. S. 715; 9 P. Div. 20).

Webster, Q.C. and Dr. Phillimore, for the defendants, in support of the appeal.

Finlay, Q.C. and Barnes, for the respondents, were not called upon.

The arguments were substantially the same as those urged in the court below.

The following authorities were cited in support of the appeal:

Hayn v. Culliford, 4 Asp. Mar. Cas. 128; 40 L. T. Rep. N. S. 536; 4 C. P. Div. 182; 48 L. J. 372, Q. B.;
Chapman v. Royal Netherlands Steam Navigation Company, 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 107; 40 L. T. Rep. N. S. 433; L. Rep. 4 P. Div. 157.
Good v. London Steamship Owners' Protection Association, L. Rep. 6 C. P. 563.

Brett, M.R.—In this case the defendants' ship, at the time of the collision, was being navigated, she was making way through the water for the purpose of going from one place to another, and by reason of a defect in her steering gear she failed to avoid another vessel which was at anchor, and by her own motion in the water struck that other vessel and damaged her. The first question which arises, under these circumstances, is, was her owner liable for that collision? He could not be liable unless the act in question was the result of the negligence of some person for whose conduct he was liable. Supposing he had bought his ship from a firm of shipbuilders, and, by reason of a latent defect in her, this accident had happened, there would have been no negligence on the part of anyone for whom he was responsible; there would have been no liability, and he would have had no need to invoke the protection of this Act of Parliament. This Act is only necessary where there has been some accident caused by the negligence of persons for whom the owner is responsible. Therefore, it must be taken that this collision was the result of the negligence of someone for whose care and skill the owner was responsible. To say that this Act does not apply to negligence on shore is true, if the negligence has no result in what happens when the ship is being navigated. One must assume that the negligence if done on shore is carried on to the water and is effected on the ship when she is being navigated. The negligence in this case was the wrongful placing of a screw into a certain part of the steering gear. Therefore there was an act of negligence, and it was the act of a person for whose care and skill Sir James Hannen has held the owner responsible. Behind that finding we cannot go. If that had been all, and this defect had not been the causa causans of the collision, it would have been wholly immaterial; but Sir James Hannen has found it to have been the causa causans of the accident. It was not the causa proxima, which was the inability of the master to steer his ship so as to avoid this collision, and that inability was caused by the negligence of a servant of the owner.

The question, then, is whether in such circumstances the defendant is entitled to limit his liability under the Act. Though the negligence occurred before the vessel started, its effect was continuous and operative whilst the ship was on her voyage. Now, the Act says that the owner of any ship, whether British or foreign, is to be entitled to limit his liability where any loss or damage is, by reason of the improper navigation of his ship, caused to any other ship or boat, &c. I think you must read it in this way, "by reason of the improper navigation caused by anyone for whom he is responsible." Is this accident caused by the improper navigation of the ship? Surely running into another ship at anchor is not proper navigation? But then it is urged that the words "improper navigation" mean the negligence of the master or crew. There is nothing in the section so to limit it. In my view the word, improper means wrongful. If a ship is being properly navigated she does not run into other vessels. Therefore I come to this, that the proposition I am going to read is certainly included in this statute. It is that all damage wrongfully done by a ship to another ship whilst the ship which does the damage is being navigated, and where the wrongful act of the ship which does damage is due to the negligence of any person for whom the owner is liable, is comprised within the Act. Here the negligence of the person for whose act the owner was liable was the causa causans, and, though not the causa proxima, yet in my view the accident was caused by improper or wrongful navigation. I therefore think that the decision of Butt, J. was correct, and that this appeal must be dismissed.

Bowen, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. Mr Webster and Dr. Phillimore have contended that "improper navigation" in the 54th section of the Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act 1862, is confined to acts or omissions on the part of those on board the ship who are engaged in actually navigating her. It seems to me to be plain that the Legislature, in using the word improper, meant improper navigation by the owner of the ship. In my view the owner does improperly navigate the ship in the eye of the law, and in this I am fortified by the form of words used in the old declarations, if, owing to the negligence of some one for whom he is responsible, damage is caused by his ship. It seems to me that in such a case the ship is improperly navigated within the meaning of the section, whether the damage be caused by the negligence of the master and crew or of same other person for whom the owner is responsible. I do not think it possible to limit the meaning of the words to unskilful navigation by those on board the ship, but I think it means wrongful navigation as where an owner uses his ship under conditions where it ought not to be used. For these reasons I am of opinion that the judgment of the learned judge below ought to be affirmed.

Fry, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. Dr. Phillimore has referred us to the dictionary for the meaning of the word navigation. One of the definitions given there is that navigation is the science or art of conducting a ship from place to place through the water. If that be a true definition of the word navigation, it seems to me that it involves the supplying of proper materials to enable the ship to be properly conducted from place to place and also of skilful mariners capable of so conducting the ship. Skilful mariners, if the ship be not supplied with proper materials necessary for her locomotion, cannot, in the absence of such materials, efficiently and properly conduct her from place to place; so also, all necessary and proper materials are useless without skilful mariners. In my opinion, therefore, proper navigation includes two things—the supply of all necessary parts of a ship, and of mariners with skill and knowledge of their duties. If either of these are wanting, and a collision ensues, which is occasioned by the absence of both or either of these two, then we have a case of improper navigation. The words "improper navigation" may include other cases, but they certainly include the present. In conclusion I may add that I think the following remarks of Butt, J. were well founded, and carry out my observations on this subject. They are as follows: "Primâ facie I do not see why the amount of relief should be limited to a case in which damage has occurred through the negligence of the master and crew, and why the Act should not apply to the negligence of persons other than the master and crew, who are employed by the shipowner to attend to the ship in preparation for the voyage, as, for example, a marine engineer employed, while the ship is in port, to overhaul the machinery." For these considerations, I therefore think this appeal must fail.

ON APPEAL FROM BUTT, J.

Collision—Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea 1880, arts. 13 and 18—Moderate speed—Dense fog—Steamship—Sailing ship.

Where those in charge of a steamship in a dense fog hear a whistle and then others following it and getting nearer, even though the whistles get broader on their ship's bow, it is their duty on hearing the first whistle to reduce their speed, and as the vessels get nearer to bring their ship to as complete a standstill as is possible without putting her out of command, and when the other vessel has come close to, even though not in sight, to stop and reverse their engines.

Art. 13 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, which provides that every ship shall go at a "moderate speed" in a fog, requires the speed to become more moderate as the two vessels get closer together.

Semble, that it is the duty of those in charge of a sailing ship, when in a dense fog they hear a succession of whistles approaching closer and closer, to reduce her speed by taking off sail so as to bring her to as near a standstill as possible while retaining command over her.

This was an appeal by the defendants in a damage action from a decision of Butt, J., finding the steamships Edith and Dordogne both to blame for a collision off Ushant. The plaintiffs admitted that the Edith was to blame.

The collision occurred about 5.30 a.m. on Aug. 26, 1883. At the time of the collision the wind was light from the north-east, and there was a dense fog. The steamship Edith was of 448 tons register, and was bound on a voyage from Swansea to Clarente in France. The Dordogne was a screw steamship of 463 tons register, and was bound on a voyage from Bordeaux to Cardiff. The facts alleged on behalf of the plaintiff were as follows: — While the Edith was proceeding at half speed, her whistle being constantly sounded, and heading about S. by W., half W., the whistle of the Dordogne was heard on the port bow of the Edith. The engines of the Edith was thereupon put to dead slow and her helm was ported. The Dordogne was, however, heard to be rapidly approaching, and the helm of the Edith was put hard-a-port, but the Dordogne was immediately sighted at about a ship's length off and bearing about four or five points on the port bow, approaching at a high rate of speed. An order was given to set the Edith's engines full speed ahead, but before the order could be executed the Dordogne with her stem struck the Edith on the port side. The plaintiffs charged the defendants (inter alia) with navigating at too great a rate of speed and with failing to ease and stop and reverse their engines.

The facts alleged on behalf of the defendants were as follows:—About 5.30 a.m. on the 26th Aug. 1883 the Dordogne was about ten miles S. W. by S. off Ushant. There was a light air from the N. E. and a dense fog. The Dordogne with her engines at dead slow was heading N. half E., and was making about one knot or one and a half knots an hour. Her regulation lights were duly exhibited and burning, the whistle was being duly sounded, and a good look-out was being kept on board her. In these circumstances those on board the Dordogne heard the whistle of the Edith on the starboard bow. The engines of the Dordogne were stopped and her own whistle was blown; the engines of the Dordogne were then moved on slowly. The whistle of the Edith was again heard broader on the starboard bow, the engines were again stopped, and the whistle was again blown. The whistle of the Edith was heard a third time. It was answered by the whistle of the Dordogne and the engines were stopped. The Edith was almost directly afterwards seen and the engines were reversed full speed and the helm put hard-a-port, but the Edith coming on at a considerable speed and at a considerable angle to the course of the Dordogne, struck with her port side, near the engine-room, the starboard bow of the Dordogne, doing much damage to herself and the Dordogne.

The defendants' evidence was that at the time the Edith was seen their engines were stopped, and had been stopped some two or three minutes.

At the trial Butt, J. found that the Edith was "to blame for not having at least stopped her engines not perhaps when she heard the whistle the first, or second, or third, or fourth time, but at some time or other before the vessels got so close that they sighted each other, and the collision became inevitable." With regard to the Dordogne he found that she was going faster than alleged at the moment of collision, and that her engines were going ahead when the Edith came into sight.

Arts. 13 and 18 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea are as follows:

13. Every ship, whether a sailing ship or a steamship, shall in a fog, mist, or falling snow go at a moderate speed.

18. Every steamship when approaching another ship so as to involve risk of collision, shall slacken her speed or stop and reverse if necessary.

Cohen, Q.C. and Dr. Phillimore for the defendants in support of the appeal.—According to the evidence the engines of the Dordogne were stopped at the time the Edith came into sight. If so she had brought herself practically to a standstill in the water:

The Kirby Hall, 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 90; 48 L. T. Rep. N. S. 797; L. Rep. 8 P. Div. 71;

It has never been laid down that a vessel on hearing a whistle, or even a succession of whistles, is to take all way off, which would have the effect of throwing herself out of command and so increase the dangers of navigation:

The John McIntyre, 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 278; L. Rep. 8 P. Div. 135; 51 L. T. Rep. N. S. 185.

According to the decision in The Beryl (51 L. T. Rep. N. S. 554; ante, p. 321; 9 P. D. 137) art. 18 is only obligatory when the circumstances are such as would lead an officer of reasonable care and skill to the conclusion that there was risk of collision. Here, although the whistles were coming closer, yet they were getting broader on the bow, and would therefore indicate a position of safety.

Hall, Q.C. and Baden-Powell, for the respondents, were not called upon.

Brett, M.R.—It seems to me that in these cases of vessels, whether steamers or sailing vessels, which find themselves in a fog, we must hold them very strictly to the regulations. As I ventured to say in The Beryl (ubi sup.), these regulations are made not only for the purpose of preventing collisions, but of preventing danger of collision, and we must take care to hold vessels in thick fogs strictly to the regulations so as to avoid danger of collision. I still am of opinion that we cannot condemn or relieve these ships by the proof of what were the actual facts. We must judge them by what an officer of care and skill ought to have judged the facts to be. That the Edith was solely to blame is obvious, and we need not trouble ourselves about her. The question is as to the Dordogne, whether she was also to blame. That question must be solved by what ought to have appeared to be the circumstances of risk of collision to an officer of reasonable care and skill in command of the Dordogne. Now the circumstances, in fact, were that there was so dense a fog that you could not see another ship until within a ship's length off, until, when you did see her, a collision was almost inevitable. Whilst the Dordogne was in this fog she was at sea, in a place where it would not be extremely probable that she would meet another vessel. This is not like the case of a vessel going up or down a river, or up or down a somewhat narrow arm of the sea like a channel. In such a case, whether an officer hears a whistle or not, he ought to contemplate the probability of meeting with other vessels, because he is in a narrow channel where vessels that are meeting would almost inevitably be in the same line as himself. Take, for instance, the Thames: before an officer hears a whistle I think he ought to have brought his vessel, in such a fog as this, as nearly as possible to a standstill, so as only just to have command over her. But in the open sea, where it is not very probable that he will meet another vessel, I think that that would be a moderate speed, which, if he was in a river and likely to meet a vessel the next minute, ought not to be his speed. But even when at sea, before he hears a whistle, he ought to reduce his way to a moderate speed, though what his speed is to be must of course differ under different circumstances.

Now when at sea an officer hears a whistle he is brought to the conclusion that there is a vessel in the neighbourhood. A good deal must of course depend upon the indication which is given by the other vessel of her presence. I cannot doubt myself but that the sound of a whistle must give some indication of where the vessel is. It is impossible to my mind to say that a whistle sounded at a mile and a half off would sound the same as a whistle sounded one hundred yards off. Personally I cannot believe that. Therefore, if a ship at sea in such a fog hears a whistle which would indicate that another vessel is a mile or a mile and a half off, she ought at once to reduce her speed to a more moderate speed, though moderate speed under these circumstances would be very different to moderate speed when the vessels came closer together. This case is not to be determined by what was done at the time the first whistle was heard. Here we have three, and perhaps more, successive whistles, all coming closer. What must be the conclusion to be derived from those whistles? We know that in fact these vessels were coming closer and closer to each other. We, however, have to judge of what ought to have been the conclusion or suspicion of the officer in charge of the Dordogne. What would that succession of whistles tell him? For myself I should have had no doubt, when you have a succession of whistles, each one coming closer, that each whistle would show him that the other vessel was coming nearer. It is said that the whistles showed him that she was coming in a particular direction, that is, that she was getting broader on his bow. I do not think it signifies whether the whistles get broader on the bow or not, if they show that the vessel is coming closer. If it is coming nearer and nearer in a dense fog (and every one knows that in dense fogs you cannot tell where exactly a vessel is from the sound of her whistle), and you cannot tell the direction in which it is coming, are not those such circumstances as should lead a prudent officer to suppose that if he went on as he was there would be danger? The moment the whistles show him that a vessel is really coming substantially nearer and nearer to him, he not being able to tell the direction in which she is coming, the truth of which observation is in this case shown by the ultimate fact, I have not myself any doubt that he ought to obey not only the 13th article, but also the 18th article if his vessel is a steamer. If it is only the 13th article which he ought to obey, as the other vessel comes nearer and nearer, "moderate speed" becomes more moderate and more moderate. That which is moderate speed, when the vessels are two or three miles apart, is not moderate speed when the vessels are within half a mile of each other. As the vessels get nearer and nearer he must bring his ship to as complete a standstill as is possible without putting himself out of command (a). If his vessel is a steamer she must go at least dead slow. If the other is really coming anything like near to him he ought to obey art. 18 and stop and reverse. To a sailing ship art. 18 does not apply, because she cannot stop and reverse, but she ought, if she is under full sail, to take sail off till she brings herself as nearly to a standstill as will give her command of herself.

Now what ought the officer of the Dordogne to have concluded? Upon that I have asked the following question of the gentlemen who assist us: "Considering the way in which these vessels were approaching each other, would each successive whistle tell the officer in charge of the Dordogne that the other ship was approaching nearer and nearer to him?" They agree with the view I should have come to and say "yes." If so, he ought to have brought his ship to a standstill at an early period, and when the other vessel was coming near to him he ought to have stopped and reversed. Certainly at the time the last whistle was sounded he ought immediately to have stopped and reversed, whereas, I think, the order was only given when he saw the other vessel. He therefore broke art. 18. The learned judge of the Admiralty Court relied upon another circumstance to show that the Dordogne was going at a very considerable pace at the time of the collision. I think it only right to state that upon this point I have asked our assessors the question: "Does the severity of the injuries suffered by the Edith lead to any conclusion as to the speed of the Dordogne at the moment of collision?" I do not know what the advice of the Trinity Masters to the judge of the Admiralty Court was, but I am bound to say that the gentlemen assisting us do not think it would lead to any conclusion as to the speed of the Dordogne at the moment of collision. I therefore do not rely upon the severity of the blow at all. But I rely upon the facts I have stated and the rule I have stated. I am therefore of opinion that in this case the Dordogne broke art. 13 by not going at a moderate speed sooner than she did; and I am further of opinion, which is quite sufficient to decide this case, that she broke art. 18 by not reversing sooner than she did. The decision of the learned judge of the Admiralty Court must therefore be supported and this appeal dismissed.

Cotton, L.J.—We have not to consider what was the conduct of the Dordogne when the first whistle was heard. It is clear that there was a succession of whistles, that the vessels were coming nearer and nearer, and were, in fact, getting very near one another. Now it was the duty of the Dordogne to stop and reverse her engines if there was risk of collision. But it is said that, inasmuch as these whistles were getting broader and broader on the bow, the officer on the Dordogne might reasonably conclude that there was no danger. However, in my opinion, that will not excuse the Dordogne for disobedience to art. 18. In a fog in which a man can see nothing he cannot form any safe opinion as to the direction of another vessel, and he should in such circumstances follow the course stated by the Master of the Rolls.

Lindley, L.J.—I take the same view and think that the Dordogne ought to have obeyed art. 18 sooner.

Bottomry bond—Authority of master—Owners of cargo—Necessity—Registrar and merchants.

The authority of a master to raise money on bottomry is limited as against the owners of cargo to such an amount as is necessary to enable the ship to complete her voyage with safety, and even where the money is advanced by a person who is not the ship's agent, and has no interest in the repairs effected on the ship, and honestly believes from inquiries made that the money is necessary, he cannot recover as against the cargo owner anything in respect of items other than those which are in fact necessary. (a) Reported by J. P. Aspinall and F. W. Raikes, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

(b) We find on reference to the American case of The Barque Edward Albro (10 Benedict, 668), decided in the Southern District Court of New York by Choate, J. in 1879, that the court there disallowed certain items in a bottomry bond which were not necessary for the prosecution of the voyage. It is, however, to be noticed that in that case the bond was on ship and freight only, and that the point as to the lender having made "reasonable inquiries" does not appear to have been taken. According to Choate, J.: "The test of what may be secured in a bottomry bond is not whether the expense is one for which the creditor will have a maritime lien without any express agreement, but whether it was properly and necessarily incurred by the master in pursuance of his authority as agent of the owner for the prosecution of the voyage." One item charged in the bottomry bond and allowed was the funeral expenses of a former master, who had died at the port in which the bond had been entered into. His remarks on this item are as follows: "The funeral expenses of the master should, I think, be allowed. Where a master of a ship dies in a foreign port without means to defray his funeral expenses, and the agent of the ship pays these expenses, humanity and the interests of commerce, and the relations of the parties to the vessel, justify one in treating the expense as a necessity of the ship." The analogous question as to the liability of shipowners for medical attendance to their crew in foreign ports is discussed in the American cases of The Brig George (1 Sumn. 151) and Winthrop v. Carlton (12 Mass. 4). According to sect. 228 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104), where the master or any seaman receives any hurt or injury in the service of the ship, the expenses of medical attendance and subsistence in case of illness, and of burial in case of death, are to be defrayed by the shipowner without deduction from wages. The French code contains a similar provision: (cf. Code de Commerce, arts. 262, 263, and 264.)—Ed.

ahead, but she put her helm hard-a-port. She also set on her engines at the rate of thirty-five revolutions, and I think they were so kept for not less than four minutes. Having regard to this and other facts in the case, I think that there was an unjustifiable amount of headway put on her. I think that the navigation of the Earl of Dumfries was not careful, and I think that, although the Boskenna Bay was at the outset being carefully navigated, there was an error in giving her too much headway. The result therefore is that both vessels must be held to blame"—Ed.

power to reduced the items claimed under a bottomry bond, should they deem them unnecessary or exorbitant, and the court will not interfere with this discretion unless it be shown that the registrar and merchants have exercised it on an erroneous principle.

The Prince of Saxe-Coburg (3 Moo. P. C. 1) explained.

This was an appeal from a decision of Butt, J. in a bottomry action instituted by the Comptoir d'Escomte de Paris, as holders of a bottomry bond given at St. Michael on the Italian ship Pontida, her cargo and freight.

The ship Pontida, being at the island of St. Michael, laden with a cargo of wheat, and her master being without funds or credit, a bottomry bond was executed between the master and Messrs. Bensande and Co., bankers, who tendered in answer to advertisements. These bankers were not the ship's agents.

The bond was entered into on the 2nd April 1883, before the Italian consul, with the formalities required by Italian law, the sum borrowed on the bond being 91,375·76 francs, which, together with a bottomry premium of 20 per cent., amounted in all to 109,650·91 francs.

On the 19th June 1883 judgment was pronounced for the validity of the bond against the Pontida and her freight, and subsequently the owners of cargo admitted the validity of the bond as regards the cargo, subject to a reference to the registrar and merchants. The amount claimed by the bondholders at the agreed rate of exchange was 4386*l.* 0*s.* 8*d.*

The claim came before the registrar and merchants on the 12th July 1883, and included repairs effected under the recommendation of the surveyors at St. Michael, 5 per cent. commission in respect of the ship's agent's charges upon disbursements, 2½ per cent. commission on the value of the cargo discharged, and the bottomry premium of 20 per cent. on the total amount advanced.

On the 21st July 1883 the registrar made his report, and found that the sum of 3685*l.* 3*s.* 4*d.* was due to the plaintiffs upon the bottomry bond, reduction having been made in the amount of a bill for new metal, felt, and nails; in the commissions of 5 per cent. and 2½ per cent. by the ship's agent; and in the bottomry premium of 20 cent.

On the 19th Nov. 1883 the plaintiffs filed a petition in objection to the registrar's report. The case came on for hearing upon the petition on the 1st April before Butt, J., and on the 29th April the learned judge upheld the report, with costs.

From this decision the plaintiffs now appealed. The further facts of the case, and the full arguments, appear in the report of the case below (51 L. T. Rep. N. S. 268; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 284; 9 P. Div. 102).

July 25.—Dr. Phillimore and J. P. Aspinall for the appellants.—It having been proved that the lender made reasonable inquiries as to the necessity of the repairs, and that the lender was not the ship's agent, the registrar has no power to reduce the bondholder's claim. It is to be remembered that there is no imputation of fraud, and that the bond was entered into before the Italian consul with all due formalities. [Brett, M.R.—Has the duty of the lender to make inquiries anything to do with it? Is it not entirely a question of the authority of the master to bind the owners of ship and cargo?] The fact that the lender has made inquiries seems to have influenced the courts in previous decisions. [Brett, M.R.—What authority has the master to incur expenses which are not necessary?] By reason of the initial necessity of something being requisite to enable the ship to carry the cargo to its port of destination, the master is held out as the agent of the ship and the cargo owners for carrying out that purpose. If he, being so held out, incurs more expense than is afterwards decided to be necessary, it seems unreasonable that an innocent person who bonâ fide lends money on the faith of the agency, should be made to suffer in consequence of the wrongful acts of the agent, and that the agent's principals should escape all liability. The following authorities support the appellants' contention:

The Prince of Saxe-Coburg, 3 Moo. P. C. 1; 3 Hagg. 387;
The Jane, 1 Dod. 464, 465;

Barnes (with him Bigham, Q.C.), for the respondents, was not called upon.

Brett, M.R.—In this case the plaintiff brought a suit in the Admiralty Court against the owners of the Pontida and her cargo on a bottomry bond by which the captain at a foreign port made the ship, freight, and cargo liable to bottomry. The defence put forward by the owners of cargo is, that the circumstances with regard to three items, viz., charges for metal and felt supplied to the Pontida, agent's commission, and the premium on the bond, did not give the captain authority to bind the owners to a bottomry bond beyond a certain amount, and that that amount has been exceeded. Now, when a suit is brought in the Admiralty Court upon a bottomry bond, the first question is whether the Court of Admiralty will decree in favour of the bond at all? It will not decree in favour of the bond, against either the shipowner or the owner of cargo, merely from the fact that the bond is in existence. The preliminary inquiry is whether the bottomry bond, as a whole, was entered into under circumstances which gave the captain authority to bind the owners at all. The matter is one of the most extreme importance for the protection of the owners of ships and the owners of cargoes. That which is done is done as a matter of fact, entirely without their authority, and without their having the means of exercising any control whatever. These things are done in a foreign port. A long series of decisions in the Admiralty Court has shown the necessity of looking strictly into these bonds, and it has been stated over and over again that, if there were any laxity whatever exercised in the Admiralty Court as to this power of captains to bind the owner of the ship, or the owner of the cargo, by ordering large repairs in these foreign ports, the shipowner and the owner of cargo would be practically helpless to an indefinite extent. A ship is taken into some small foreign port, which has little or no trade of its own, and if the ship came in and they could do what they liked with it, it would be like the ships that were wrecked on the coasts of England and Scotland in olden days. It would be a subject of thankfulness in every church in the place. It has been seen and known that there is little or no protection for the shipowner, or for the owner of cargo. People, one cannot say properly, but, as one knows, not unnaturally, are very likely (I am not saying this of every foreign port) to combine together to get as much out of the ship as they can in what they would say is all in the fair way of trade. They say, "Let us charge the highest prices we can; let us refit this ship from top to bottom, and the more business we do upon the ship, and the better prices we get, the more profit we will make." And therefore the court has found that, if it rested merely upon the survey of a surveyor in one of these small ports, and upon the evidence of the shipwright who has to do the work, and upon the allowances of the consul who has lived so long with the people of the place that he has got to take their view instead of considering the interests of strangers—if the court rested upon such evidence as that it would rest upon a rotten reed, and the owners of ship and cargo, who are not present, would have no protection against being practically robbed. Therefore, with regard to this preliminary question of whether the court will decree in favour of the bond at all, the court always insists upon looking strictly into the matter, and does not uphold the validity of the bond unless it is shown that the bond was entered into in good faith. Hence, when a person comes into court and says, "I have advanced money on a bottomry bond," the first question which is asked in the Admiralty Court is, "Have you done that in good faith?" Upon such a question as that the question of whether he has made any inquiry at all is very material, because, if the things supplied are proved to be absolutely necessary, there is very little more to be said; but upon the assumption that the amount of the bottomry bond is large, the very first question which presents itself as to the good faith of the lender is this: "How came you to lend such a large sum on bottomry on this ship without making any inquiry at all? That is evidence (if you have made none) of want of good faith, and if I find that the bottomry bond" —the Court of Admiralty always says—"is an extravagant bond in fact, and if I find that you, the lender on bottomry, have made no inquiries at all, I shall decree against you, as judge of fact, that you have not entered into this bottomry bond in good faith, and I will not declare for the bottomry bond at all. I set it aside absolutely and altogether." There is then no need for a reference to the registrar and merchants, for the bottomry bond is gone.

Then what is the law which authorises the captain to enter into a bottomry bond at all? I confess that, amongst the many novel arguments which I hear in this court, I have been astonished to hear of this, to me, new doctrine, that, assuming the things to be in fact unnecessary, the mere fact that the lender on bottomry has made reasonable inquiries as to whether they are necessary or not, the bond is to be upheld for its whole amount, although in fact nothing in it was necessary at all. Let us illustrate the case in this way: Suppose that all the things done to the ship, such as carpentering, &c., are as a matter of fact necessary in order that the ship may prosecute her voyage, and suppose that the price of the materials supplied and repairs effected to have been reasonable, and suppose there was an agent of the shipowner in the port whose duty it was to pay for these things on behalf of the owners; that is, to pay the prices without any bottomry commission at all. But suppose that notwithstanding that the captain has entered into a bottomry bond. That is not an imaginary case. It is in the books and has occurred: (Gunn v. Roberts, 2 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 250; 30 L. T. Rep. N. S. 424; L. Rep. 9 C. P. 331.) In that case it was declared by the court that the bottomry bond could not be enforced; the declaration was against the bottomry bond, and it was held to be wholly void. Why? Because, although the things were necessary as a matter of carpentering to carry the ship to the end of her voyage, yet they were not necessary in the whole sense of the word, because there was an agent of the shipowner in the port who would have advanced the money on other terms than bottomry, and whose duty it was to do so. Therefore, although the bottomry lender had lent his money, he could not recover any of it as upon a bottomry bond. Now supposing, in this case of Gunn v. Roberts (ubi sup.), it had been asserted by the lender, "This is quite true, but I did not know there was an agent of the ship in the port. How should I know there was an agent? I went about amongst my friends and asked them, 'Do you know whether there is an agent?' and they said, "No, there is no agent that I know of.'" Supposing he had then gone to the captain and the captain had said, "No, there is not an agent." How came it that in the case referred to no allusion is made to this theory of "reasonable inquiries?" No such doctrine was even broached, and the bottomry bond was declared against upon the ground that there was no authority in the captain to enter into it under the circumstances. Now, let us take this case. Supposing a ship is in one of these foreign ports, and she requires a certain amount of sheathing or coppering, and other repairs, to take her to the end of the voyage, but the captain thinks it will be for the benefit of his owners that she should be repaired not only sufficiently to carry her to the end of the voyage, but also to re-class her, and make her as good as she was before; that is, about five times more repairs and more coppering and sheathing than would be necessary to take her to the end of the voyage. Supposing the surveyors in terms say that those are the things which are required to take her to England, or to the end of her voyage. The man lends his money on the bottomry bond on the faith of that. According to the argument here, if he does not suspect the honesty of the people, it would be said, "There are reasonable inquiries; he has reasonable grounds; there are the surveys; there is the consul's acquiescence in the surveys." There is not a case in the books in which, under such circumstances, where it has been shown that the repairs done were not merely the repairs necessary for the completion of the voyage, but were repairs necessary to re-class the ship, the bottomry bond has been allowed to the full extent. In a case in which unnecessary repairs were done two questions would arise: First, whether the court would declare for the bond at all. On that point the court would inquire whether the lender on bottomry had made the advance bonâ fide. If he knew that the repairs which were done were unnecessary, and that there was an attempt to impose upon the owners (in which case the question of reasonable inquiries comes in so as to enable us to see whether he has entered into the bottomry bond bonâ fide or whether he has been a party in an attempt to impose upon the owners), although part of his money had been spent in necessary repairs, the whole bond is declared against. But supposing he has not, and has bonâ fide made the advances, then the bond would be declared for; but then it would go to the registrar and merchants to say how much of these repairs were necessary to take this ship to the end of her voyage. The bond being declared for as an honest bond, you have then to consider how much was authorised by the position of the captain, that is, how much was necessary. Therefore, when a bottomry bond is declared for as an honest bond, the lenders have to go into this, that it is a good bond for each and every item of it which is necessary, and it is a bad bond for each and every item that was beyond necessity. It is therefore for the registrar and merchants, after the bond has been declared to be a valid bond as a whole, to inquire as to each item in it, whether the captain had authority to go to the extent of the particular item. That depends upon whether the item was necessary or not, or how much of it was necessary. Each item that was necessary is allowed, and each item that was wholly unnecessary is struck out. Each item that goes beyond necessity is cut down. That is the duty of the registrar and merchants after the bond is declared for. There is, I venture to say, no trace in the books of anything ever having been referred to the registrar and merchants with regard to a bottomry bond except the questions I have now stated, which are referred to them not to enable the Admiralty Court to decree whether the bottomry bond is good or not as a whole, but after the court has declared it is good, in order to see how much of it can be allowed. If the "reasonable inquiries" were to go to the whole amount of the bond, it would be a matter to be inquired into by the court in order to see whether it would decree for the validity of the bond or not. If the reasonable inquiry would do as to any particular item it might be that, after having decreed for the bond, the question whether reasonable inquires were made as to one particular item, if it would be a matter of inquiry at all, might be for the registrar and merchants as to that point: that I will not say. It is enough for me to say that the question of reasonable inquiries has never been a test at all of what amount was to be allowed, but only whether the bond was to be allowed, or declared against.

With great deference, the language of the Privy Council in the case which has been cited, and which has raised some difficulty, it is not to my mind so accurate as the learned Lords would have used if they had been dissecting the case. In my opinion that language was meant to apply to that part of the case which I have endeavoured to explain and to enunciate, namely, whether the bond was a bonâ fide bond and was to be allowed at all, or not, because, as I say, even assuming that part of the expenses is for that which is absolutely necessary, yet, if the bond is an extravagant bond, and has been entered into by the lender either with gross carelessness as to the necessities of the ship, or if he has been a party to an attempt to impose upon the shipowner, there is a want of good faith which will at once put an end to the bond, and there would be nothing to go to the registrar and merchants at all. The whole principle is founded upon the fundamental doctrine that by the law of England the master of a ship, when away from his owners, and in a foreign port, has no authority to bind the shipowners to anything except in case of necessity. With regard to the cargo owner the case is still stronger, if possible, because the master is never the agent of the cargo owner. When he takes the cargo on board he does not take them on board as agent for the cargo owner. I should have thought the whole thing so simple that no one could have even argued upon it. The master takes the goods on board as agent of the shipowner, and not as agent of the cargo owner. Nothing can make him agent of the cargo owner from beginning to end, except a necessity arising during the voyage. Therefore to say that without that necessity existing he has authority to bind the cargo owner whose agent he is not because the person who lends him money has made reasonable inquiries whether the thing were necessary or not, is to cut away the whole ground upon which he can bind the cargo owner at all. To say that, although he was not the agent of the cargo owner, although necessity has not put him into the position of being agent, yet without being his agent at all he can bind him through the result of reasonable inquiries, seems to me to be a contradiction of what has always been held in this country. Therefore I myself come to the conclusion that no such doctrine as urged by Dr. Phillimore has ever been known or countenanced by the law of England, either in the Admiralty Court or elsewhere.

Having regard to a doubt which exists in the mind of my learned brother Fry, in which doubt I do not myself participate, I also think that this appeal must fail, on the ground that there is no evidence of any reasonable inquiries having been made. However, I do not base my decision upon that ground, but upon the greater ground that the master had no authority with regard to these items to bind the owners of cargo beyond what is clearly necessary. The necessity with regard to the items in dispute has been disproved at the reference. As to the decision of the registrar and merchants as to what was necessary or not, the court has never thought of interfering with that decision. The court has always said that with regard to the items found by the registrar and merchants it would only interfere with that finding upon a question of principle, and not upon a question of detail, because this the court is wholly unable to do. The registrar and merchants have found, with regard to these items that they were not necessary, and therefore I can see no reason to interfere. The question whether the commissions—that is, the mercantile commissions—which are alleged to have been paid, were necessary or not, or whether the amcunt was that which was reasonably necessary, is for the registrar and merchants just as much as the other items. And also, with regard to the bottomry commission, that is a thing the propriety of which is known to the registrar and merchants, and the court has no means of rectifying them as to each and every one of those items. They are the ordinary points of submission to the registrar and merchants which they are wholly competent to deal with, and, as I have said, the court will never overrule them except upon a point of principle. The question brought before us has been one of principle, and that is the question which has been so strenuously argued, and that question again I say is this: Assuming that there was no necessity to the extent to which these expenses have been incurred, nevertheless has the captain authority to bind the cargo owner to their full extent, because the merchant who lent the money made "reasonable inquiries?" I say no such law is known in England as will give the captain authority upon the faith of such facts.

Bowen, L.J.—I am of the same opinion, and I agree entirely both with the law as propounded by the Master of the Rolls and with the reasoning by which he has come to that conclusion. Shortly expressed the law is this: The master, as it seems to me, is only the agent to bind the cargo owner in the hour of necessity. He derives all his authority from the necessity, and his authority must be measured by that. That is the great principle which seems to me to have run through the commercial law of this country, and to that I find really no exception. But, if this appeal were allowed, that principle would be destroyed, because the measure of the authority of the master to bind the cargo owner would not be the necessity of the hour, but what the person lending thinks about the necessity. That is a totally new principle, I believe, not only one not hitherto recognised by the common law, but one which would be most dangerous to business. It is essential that we should keep to the lines, I think, of the common law with regard to the authority of the master, or else the shipowners of this great country would be at the mercy of many a small island and many a small court. The authorities of the common law (I will not go back to them) all bear in that direction.

We have been pressed with two or three passages from the judgments in the Privy Council and of Dr. Lushington, in which it is suggested that possibly the lender of money to the captain of a ship may be entitled to recover against the principal of the master, if there is an apparent necessity without the real necessity, providing he has made what is called reasonable inquiry. I fail myself to see how, upon principle, what the lender of the money may reasonably think can possibly extend the master's authority, which is, as I said before, derived from the necessity of the case. But then there is the language in the judgment in the case of The Prince of Saxe-Coburg (ubi sup.). It appears to me that the language there used, when read by the light of the explanation which the Master of the Rolls has given, really ceases to be effective for the purpose of the appellants' argument. Whether it is so or not, that language, great as is the authority of the lips from which it came, is inconsistent with the doctrine which I consider is applicable to this case, and I cannot follow it. It seems to me to be language which is contrary to the common law. I wish also to say that, even if the law were as has been propounded by Dr. Phillimore and Mr. Aspinall, viz., that reasonable inquiries would warrant the lender in lending money which was really not wanted for the purpose of the ship continuing her voyage, yet in this case there seems to me to be no evidence of any such inquiry as would justify any honest man in dealing with the credit of others. There seems to me to be an absence of all reasonable inquiry on the part of the lender.

Fry, L.J.—I concur in the conclusion to which my brethren have come in this case, although I have not been able to do so with such freedom from doubt as they have. The doubt in my mind is, whether a tradesman supplying goods to the ship was not a tradesman supplying goods on behalf of the ship, but an independent merchant making a loan. My doubt is due to the two authorities, The Prince of Saxe-Coburg and The Royal Stuart both of them judgments of great authority. The rule, as Dr. Lushington lays it down, does seem to me to be more elastic than the rule laid down by the Master of the Rolls and Bowen, L.J., and but for the observations he made in those cases I should be free to agree with the law as now laid down by my learned brothers. The passages to which I refer have created a doubt in my mind as to whether, when the lender is a person who has nothing to do with the supplies made to the ship, and bonâ fide makes advances for the purposes of the ship after due inquiry, and believing as the result of his inquiries that the money is to be expended in necessaries, whether in such a case as that the bottomry bond is not good for the whole amount.

In the present case it is, however, not necessary to decide that point, because, in my judgment, the appellants have not shown that reasonable inquiries were made, nor that the advance was made upon the faith of reasonable inquiries. In the first place, it appears to me that the lender ought to have satisfied himself that the repairs bound to be done were not more than were necessary for the completion of the voyage. I have been unable to find in the documents or in the evidence anything that shows the least inquiry on the part of the lender. In the next place it appears to me that the lender being as he is described, a merchant in that port, was primarily bound to make some inquiries as to the prices charged for the repairs to the ship. The result I arrive at is this; having regard to the report, if he had made reasonable inquiry he would have found that the copper sheathing was charged at an exorbitant price. Therefore I say, if the doubt which I venture to express is a doubt, it is quite plain that the appellants have not brought themselves within that doubt, and therefore I entirely concur with the decision of the Master of the Rolls and the Lord Justice.

ON APPEAL FROM THE PROBATE, DIVORCE, AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION.

Practice—Appeal—Cross-appeal—R. S. C., Order LVIII., r. 6.

Where an appellant withdraws his appeal after the respondent has given notice of motion by way of cross-appeal under Order LVIII., r. 6, should the respondent determine to continue with his cross-appeal, his cross-notice will be treated as a substantive notice of appeal, in which case the original appellant may give a cross-notice of appeal that he intends to bring forward the subject-matter of his original appeal.

This was an application to the Court of Appeal by the defendants in an action to recover master's wages and disbursements.

The action was heard by Butt, J., who, on Aug. 12, 1884, gave judgment in favour of the plaintiff, but not for the full amount of his claim.

The plaintiff, being dissatisfied with part of the judgment, gave notice of appeal on Aug. 30 that the judgment of Butt, J. might be varied.

On Nov. 18 the defendants served a notice by way of cross-appeal under Order LVIII., r. 6. (b)

Shortly afterwards the plaintiff determined to withdraw his appeal, and on Nov. 27 notice was given to the defendants' solicitors that the plaintiff abandoned and withdrew his appeal.

Under these circumstances the defendants (the respondents) served the plaintiffs with the following notice of motion:

Take notice that the Court of Appeal, sitting at the Royal Courts of Justice, will be moved on Monday the 12th day of January 1885, at 10.30 a.m., by counsel, on behalf of the defendants, that the notice of contention given by the defendants pursuant to rule 6 of Order LVIII. of the Rules of the Supreme Court 1883, on the 18th day of November 1884, may take the place in the list of appeals of the appeal of the plaintiff, notice of which was given on the 30th day of August 1884, and which stood No. 97 in the printed list of appeals for the last Michaelmas sittings, such last-mentioned appeal having been abandoned by the plaintiff; and that the costs of and occasioned by this application may be costs in the said appeal.

J. G. Alexander, for the defendants, in support of the motion, stated that the question was whether the defendants' cross-notice of appeal was to fall on the plaintiff's appeal being withdrawn, or whether it was to stand as a substantive appeal.

W. R. Kennedy, for the plaintiff, contra.

Cur. adv. vult.

Brett, M.R.—I have consulted with the other members of the Court of Appeal in regard to the question raised in this case, in order that the practice may be settled. We are of opinion that in this and similar cases the cross-notice, which the respondent gave under Order LVIII., r. 6, should be treated as a cross-appeal, but that, in the event of the original notice of appeal by the appellants being withdrawn, the respondents should have the right to elect whether they should continue or withdraw their cross-appeal. If the respondents determine to continue with their cross-appeal, then the original appellant should have the right of giving a cross-notice to the effect that he intends to bring forward the subject-matter of the first appeal. The order is, that the respondents are to treat their notice as an appeal, and they are to become the appellants. In the present case the respondents may have three days to determine whether under the circumstances they will adhere to their application, and if so the costs in this motion shall be costs in the appeal.

Cotton and Lindley, L.JJ. concurred.

(a) Reported by J. P. Aspinall, and F. W. Raikes Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

(b) Order LVIII., r. 6, is as follows:—It shall not, under any circumstances, be necessary for a respondent to give notice of motion by way of cross appeal, but if a respondent intends upon the hearing of the appeal to contend that the decision of the court below should be varied, he shall, within the time specified in the next rule, or such time as may be prescribed by special order, give notice of such intention to any parties who may be affected by such contention. The omission to give such notice shall not diminish the powers conferred by the Act upon the Court of Appeal, but may, in the discretion of the court, be ground for an adjournment of the appeal, or for a special order as to costs.—Ed.

Collision—Salvage—Commission on bail—Liability of wrong-doer—Practice.

In a damage action, the plaintiffs are not entitled to recover as part of their damages a sum paid by them as commission on bail given in an action brought against their ship by salvors whose services were necessitated by the collision.

The vessels A. and B. came into collision, in consequence of which salvage services were rendered to the B. by the C. The salvors instituted an action against the B., in which the owners of the B. tendered, but the salvors recovered more than was tendered them. The A. was condemned in the damage action brought by the B., and on reference to the registrar and merchants to ascertain the amount of the A.'s liability, the registrar allowed the costs incurred by the owners of the B. in defending the salvage suit, but struck out the commission on the bail given by the owners of the B. for the release of their vessel in the salvage action. On objection to the registrar's report:

Held, that, as commission on bail is not recoverable as defendants' costs in a salvage action, such item could not be recovered from the owners of the A.

Quære, whether the owners of the B. were entitled to the costs incurred by them in the salvage action.

The Legatus (Swa. 168) doubted.

This was a special case stated by the parties to a damage action for the opinion of the court as to the liability of the defendants, under the circumstances hereinafter stated, in respect of commission on ba given for the release of the plaintiffs' ship.

(a) Reported by J. P Aspinall and F. W. Raikes, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

In consequence of a collision between the two vessels the County of Aberdeen and the British Commerce, salvage services were rendered by the steamship Paris to the County of Aberdeen. In respect of these services the owners, master, and crew of the Paris instituted a salvage action against the County of Aberdeen, in which action the County of Aberdeen was arrested, but released on her owners giving bail in 2000*l.*, for which they had to pay a commission of 1 per cent., amounting to 20*l.* A tender of 1000*l.* was overruled by the court, which awarded 2000*l.* In the damage action subsequently instituted by the owners of the County of Aberdeen against the British Commerce, the British Commerce was held alone to blame. On the reference to the registrar and merchants to ascertain the amount of the liability of the British Commerce, amongst other items claimed was the 20*l.* paid by the owners of the County of Aberdeen as commission on bail in the salvage action. This item the registrar refused to allow, to which objection was taken by the plaintiffs, and the question now came before the court by way of motion.

Bucknill, for the owners of the County of Aberdeen, in support of the motion.—In consequence of the wrongful act of the defendants this expense had to be incurred by the plaintiffs. If the ship had not been bailed out the plaintiffs would have had a claim for marshal's possession fees against the defendants, which would have greatly exceeded the 20*l.* paid as commission on bail. [BUTT, J.—Surely it only needs a statement of the facts to at once show that you must fail on this application. Your course is clear. You should tender. If the tender is adequate, then you get your costs; if inadequate, then you must bear the consequences.] The principle for which I am contending was acted upon by Dr. Lushington in The Legatus (1 Swa. 168), where he, under similar circumstances, allowed the plaintiffs in the damage action to recover from the defendants the costs incurred by them in the salvage action. That is the practice of the court, and it covers the present case. [BUTT, J.—I doubt whether that is correct, but you are now asking me to extend that practice to commission on bail, which the registrar tells me is never allowed. If I am bound by the practice laid down in The Legatus (ubi sup.), I am just as much bound by the practice as to commission on bail.]

J. P. Aspinall, for the defendants contra, was not called upon.

BUTT, J.—I cannot alter this report. In the first place, I am told that the 20*l.* would not by the practice of the court be allowed as between the immediate parties to a salvage action. Therefore, if I am bound by the practice of the court I am right in disallowing this commission on bail as against the defendants in the damage action, who were not parties to the salvage action. At the same time, although it is not necessary to decide it, I have my doubts as to the principle laid down in The Legatus (ubi sup.). I myself should want a great deal of persuasion to induce me to think that under circumstances like the present the defendants in the salvage action are entitled to be paid the costs of defending that action by the defendants in the damage action. It is enough for me now to say that I shall not extend that principle by applying it to commission for bail.

Application dismissed.

THE CLYDACH. (a)

Collision—"Narrow channel"—Falmouth Harbour—Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, 1880, art. 21.

Art. 21 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea 1880, providing that "in narrow channels every steamship shall, when it is safe and practicable, keep to that side of the fairway or mid-channel which lies on the starboard side of such ship," applies to a steamship entering and passing up Falmouth Harbour, and if a steamer going into that harbour keeps to the side of the channel which lies on her port hand, she violates the regulations.

THIS was a damage action in rem instituted by the owners of the British steamship Cheerful, against the owners of the French steamship Clydach to recover compensation for damages sustained by reason of a collision between the two vessels on Sept. 8, 1884, in Falmouth Harbour.

The defendants counter-claimed.

The facts alleged on behalf of the plaintiffs were as follows:—Shortly before 4.30 a.m. on Sept. 8, 1884, the steamship Cheerful, of 642 tons register, and laden with a general cargo, was approaching Falmouth Harbour, at the speed of about nine knots, on a voyage from Liverpool to London, viâ Falmouth, the weather being fine and clear, the tide about flood, and the wind a light breeze from the westward. Her regulation lights were duly exhibited and burning brightly, and a good look-out was being kept on board. In these circumstances, when the Cheerful was heading about N.N.E. and approaching the harbour at a short distance from Pendennis Point, making for the pier, the green and masthead lights of a steamship, which proved to be the Clydach, were observed by those on the Cheerful distant about a mile and bearing about a point on their starboard bow. About this time the engines of the Cheerful were reduced to half speed. When about off Pendennis Point the engines of the Cheerful were put to slow and her helm starboarded a little to keep along the land and make the pier. The two vessels were in a position to pass each other in safety starboard side to starboard side, but when the masthead and green lights of the Clydach were about three points on the starboard bow of the Cheerful, and were distant about 150 yards, her red light came into view and her green was shut in, rendering a collision imminent. The engines of the Cheerful were immediately reversed full speed, her whistle was blown, and the Clydach was loudly hailed to starboard her helm and reverse her engines; but she came on, and with her stem struck the Cheerful a violent blow on the starboard quarter, cutting her down below the water's edge and sinking her.

(a) Reported by J. P. ASPINALL and F. W. RAIKES, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

The facts alleged on behalf of the defendants were as follows:—Shortly before 4.15 a.m. the French screw steamship Clydach of 620 tons register, laden with a cargo of iron ore, was leaving Falmouth Harbour by the channel nearest to Pendennis Point, and was keeping to that side of the fairway which lay on her starboard hand. The Clydach was heading about S. by W., and was making about three knots an hour. The regulation lights were duly exhibited and burning brightly, and a good look-out was being kept on board her. Under these circumstances the mast-head, then the red and then the green lights of the Cheerful were seen at almost the same moment about a mile and a half distant, bearing right ahead of the Clydach. The helm of the Clydach was ported and her whistle blown. The green light of the Cheerful was shut in, and the two vessels were then in a position to pass clear, port side to port side. The helm of the Clydach was then steadied. The vessels continued to approach each other, and would have passed port side to port side, when the Cheerful suddenly opened her green light and shut in her red, as if under a starboard helm, and caused imminent danger of collision. The engines of the Clydach were at once stopped and put full speed astern, but the Cheerful approached, and, with her starboard side abreast of the mainmast, struck the stem of the Clydach, causing much damage. The defendants charged the plaintiffs with breach of arts. 18 and 21 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea.

Art. 21 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea 1880 is as follows:

> In narrow channels every steamship shall, when it is safe and practicable, keep to that side of the fairway or mid-channel which lies on the starboard side of such ship.

The entrance to Falmouth Harbour is divided by Black Rock into two channels, the Western and the Eastern. Pendennis Point is at the western entrance to the harbour. It was admitted by the plaintiffs that the Cheerful was entering the harbour on the western side of the West Channel.

During the plaintiffs' case evidence was tendered to prove that it was the practice for vessels entering Falmouth Harbour to enter on the western side of the West Channel. In support of the evidence it was contended that it should be admitted, because it showed that it was not "safe and practicable" for the Cheerful to enter the harbour on the eastern side, inasmuch as by so doing she would embarrass other vessels, who, knowing the practice, would not expect to meet a vessel entering on the eastern side; and that, moreover, the existence of such a practice would tend to prove negligence on the part of those on the Clydach, who, knowing the practice, should therefore have been prepared to manœuvre for a ship entering on the western side.

As against the evidence being admissible it was contended that a practice contrary to the provisions contained in the Regulations is inadmissible; and that, moreover, the Clydach being a French ship, those on board of her would know nothing of the practice.

Butt, J., admitted the evidence.

The plaintiffs also called evidence to prove that a considerable number of vessels anchored in the eastern portion of the harbour.

It was agreed that the place of collision was about three cables' lengths north of a line between Black Rock and Pendennis Point.

Dr. Phillimore (with him T. T. Bucknill) for the plaintiffs.—The 21st article of the Regulations ceased to apply after the Cheerful had passed the Black Rock, which is at the entrance to the harbour. The collision took place in the harbour, where the "narrow channel" rule is not applicable. Even assuming it to be applicable, it was necessary for the Cheerful, bound as she was for the pier, to cross over to the western side of the harbour. Moreover, the circumstances of the case were such as to render it unsafe and impracticable for the Cheerful to have entered on the eastern side. [BUTT, J.—It would require very strong circumstances to excuse a departure from the Regulations.] It has been proved that a large number of vessels anchor on the eastern side of the harbour, and that there was a practice to enter on the western side, and therefore it was not "safe and practicable" to enter on the eastern side.

Myburgh, Q.C. (with him Stubbs), for the defendants, were not called upon.

BUTT, J.—This appears to all of us to be a very clear case. It is a case of two steamships approaching one another from opposite directions, the Cheerful going in and the Clydach coming out of Falmouth Harbour. At the outset one of these vessels, the Cheerful, was to seaward of the other, and the other was inside the narrow channel between Pendennis Point and the Black Rock. The Cheerful, in direct violation of the international rules contained in art. 21 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, was entering and passing through that channel on the wrong side; that is to say, she insisted on keeping on that side which lay on her port hand, instead of keeping on that side which lay on her starboard hand. Her own captain says that he saw the lights of the Clydach coming out of the harbour somewhat more than a point on his starboard bow, and about a mile distant. What was his duty under those circumstances? His imperative duty was to keep to the starboard side of the channel. There is only one way in which he could excuse his departure from following that course, i.e., by showing that under the circumstances it was not safe and practicable for him to obey the rule. Is there any reason appearing from the evidence which tends to such a conclusion? The only suggested reason offered as making it unsafe and impracticable to obey the rule was the presence of the lights of the Clydach on his starboard bow. Where were those lights when he first saw them? They were so nearly ahead and at such a distance that there could not have been the slightest risk in his crossing to the starboard side of the channel. Of course it is said that the lights visible were white and green, and, as the green was on the starboard bow of the Clydach, it was not then a position of danger. But with that I do not agree. The Clydach was coming out of the harbour, and, as she comes out, she would be extremely likely to show her green light to a vessel coming in; but that does not in itself show any probability or any disposition on her part to keep on that side of the channel which lay on her port hand, or to pass an incoming vessel starboard side to starboard side.

Therefore, no reason has been shown why the master of the Cheerful should not have obeyed the directions contained in art. 21 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea. The master of the Cheerful is therefore to blame at the very outset. We moreover believe the story told by the master of the Clydach, that he ported his helm to obey the rule, when he was at a considerable distance from the Cheerful. We think that the wrongful starboarding of the Cheerful was the immediate cause of the collision: but I think the whole of the difficulty was caused by the master of the Cheerful wilfully disregarding the directions contained in art. 21. Under these circumstances I have no hesitation in saying that the Cheerful is alone to blame for the collision.

THE REGALIA. (a)

Action of restraint—Part owners—Bond for safe return—Practice.

Where minority owners have instituted an action of restraint claiming security for the safe return of the ship to a named port within the jurisdiction, and a bond is given by the defendants for that purpose, such bond remains in force until the ship returns to that port, and the plaintiffs are not entitled to institute another action for further security upon the ship's return to another port within the jurisdiction, and if such second action is instituted it will be dismissed with costs.

THIS was a motion by the defendants in an action of restraint "to dismiss the action and to condemn the plaintiffs in all costs and damages through the arrest of the steamship Regalia and also in the costs of this application."

The plaintiff, John Robson, was the owner of two sixty-fourth shares in the steamship Regalia. In Oct. 1884 the managing owners, the registered owners of sixty-two sixty-fourth shares, having chartered the Regalia were about to send her on a voyage from the Tyne to Aarhus. On Oct. 13 the plaintiff commenced an action (1884, R. No. 2002, Fo. 365) in the Admiralty Division of the High Court, against the owners of the Regalia, and indorsed his writ as follows:

The plaintiff as owner of two sixty-fourth shares in the vessel Regalia, of the port of Newcastle-upon-Tyne, claims the sum of 500*l.* in respect of his said shares for the safe return of the vessel to the port of Newcastle.

The plaintiff caused the Regalia, then lying in the Tyne, to be arrested. In order to obtain her release the defendants' solicitors, on Oct., 14, undertook to put in bail, and in pursuance of such undertaking a bail bond was executed by two sureties for the sum of 500*l.*, the bond being conditioned that if the defendants should not pay what was "adjudged against them in the said action with costs, execution may issue forth against us (the sureties), our heirs, executors, and administrators, our goods and chattels for a sum not exceeding 500*l.*" (b) No further proceedings were taken in such action.

The Regalia having been released proceeded on her intended voyage, and on Nov. 11 arrived at the port of West Hartlepool, from whence her managing owners proposed despatching her on another foreign voyage. On Nov. 14 the plaintiff commenced the present action of restraint (1884, R. No. 2241, Fo. 427) in the Admiralty Division against the owners of the Regalia, in which action the indorsement on the writ was exactly similar to the indorsement in the first action. On Nov. 14 the plaintiff caused the Regalia to be arrested in the second action. In order to obtain her release the defendants' solicitors undertook to put in bail to the action and in pursuance of such undertaking a bail bond was executed by two sureties for the sum of 500*l.*

The defendants now moved the court to dismiss the present action.

J. P. Aspinall, for the defendants, in support of the motion.—The second action is unnecessary. The bond given in the first action holds good until the vessel returns to the port named, i.e. to Newcastle.

Bucknill, for the plaintiff, contra.—In the case of The Margaret (2 Hagg. 275) it was decided that, while the vessel was within the jurisdiction, the minority owners were premature in instituting a second action. It is, however, to be noticed that in that case Sir Christopher Robinson says as follows: "In the case before me the vessel is safe for the present; if she should prepare to go to sea the part owners may resort to the same remedy as before." [BUTT, J.—But if the vessel is lost prior to her return, the sureties are liable for 500*l.* under the first bond.] The present circumstances are those referred to in The Margaret (ubi sup.) and entitle the plaintiff to commence a second action.

BUTT, J.—I am of opinion that this second action is unnecessary and should be dismissed with costs, including the costs of this application.

THE ROBINSONS and THE SATELLITE. (a)

Co-ownership action—Sale of ship—Register—Guernsey—Admiralty Court Act 1861 (24 Vict. c. 10), s. 8.

The Admiralty Division has no jurisdiction over an action in rem, instituted under sect. 8 of the Admiralty Court Act 1861, claiming an account of the earnings and sale of a ship when the ship is registered at the port of Guernsey, and not at any port in England or Wales.

THIS was a motion by the defendant in an action in rem, instituted under sect. 8 of the Admiralty Court Act 1861, for the release of the vessels the Robinsons and the Satellite, and for an order dismissing the action with costs against the plaintiff.

The action was instituted on the 13th Nov. 1884, and the indorsement on the writ was as follows:

The plaintiff, as owner of thirty-two sixty-fourth shares of the brig Robinsons, and thirty-two sixty-fourth shares of the brig Satellite, claims to have a sale of the said vessels, and that the accounts outstanding and relating to the earnings and management of the said vessels be referred to the registrar.

The following affidavit was filed on the 27th Nov. 1884 on behalf of the defendant:

I, George Allix, of Cæsarea House, Bridge-road, Southampton, in the county of Hants, shipowner and master mariner, make oath and say:

1. I am the above-named defendant, and owner of thirty-two sixty-fourths of the brig Robinsons, and thirty-two sixty-fourths of the brig Satellite.

2. This action is brought by the above-named plaintiff, the owner of the other thirty-two sixty-fourths of the said vessels, against me, the said defendant, for leave to sell the said vessels Robinsons and Satellite.

3. The said brigs or vessels Robinsons and Satellite are registered at and belong to the port of Guernsey, and not in any port of England or Wales.

4. An action was commenced by me in the Royal Courts of Jersey previous to the issuing of the writ in this action, against the plaintiff, for the purpose of having the accounts taken and adjusted between us in respect of the earnings of the said two vessels. Such action is now pending, and will shortly be heard.

In reply to this affidavit an affidavit was filed on behalf of the plaintiff, which alleged that the plaintiff was resident in Southampton, but did not traverse the allegation that the brigs were registered at the port of Guernsey, and not in any port of England or Wales.

Sect. 8 of the Admiralty Court Act 1861 is as follows:

The High Court of Admiralty shall have jurisdiction to decide all questions arising between the co-owners, or any of them, touching the ownership, possession, employment, and earnings of any ship registered at any port in England or Wales, or any share thereof, and may settle all accounts outstanding and unsettled between the parties in relation thereto, and may direct the said ship or any share thereof to be sold, and may make such order in the premises as to it shall seem fit.

J. P. Aspinall in support of the motion.—The court has no jurisdiction to entertain this action. Sect. 8 of the Admiralty Court Act 1861 only gives jurisdiction in the case of ships registered at any port in England or Wales. The Robinsons and the Satellite are registered at Guernsey, and not in any port in England or Wales. The action should therefore be dismissed with costs.

Bucknill, for the plaintiffs, contra.—The parties live within the jurisdiction, and the contract was made in this country.

BUTT, J.—It seems that there is no part of this action which comes outside sect. 8 of the Admiralty Court Act 1861. If so, the court has no jurisdiction. I shall accordingly make the order in the terms of the motion.

THE MARION. (a)

Co-ownership—Sale of ship—Admiralty Court Act 1861 (24 Vict. c. 10), s. 8.

The High Court of Justice (Admiralty Division) will not, in a co-ownership action, order the sale of a ship on the application of either minority or majority owners, unless the applicants prove strong necessity for so doing.

THESE were applicants by way of motion and cross-motion for the sale of the steamship Marion under sect. 8 of 24 Vict. c. 10.

The plaintiff W. C. Lang, the owner of twenty-two sixty-fourth shares, had instituted an action of restraint against the majority owners C. B. Forwood and one Nash. Forwood was the managing owner, and owned thirty-eight sixty-fourth shares. Nash owned the remaining four sixty-fourth shares.

By order of the Liverpool District Registrar, the value of the shares in the Marion had been appraised.

From affidavits filed on both sides it appeared that the parties were unable to agree as to the employment or management of the vessel, that there was no probability of their coming to terms, and that the only means of putting an end to the difficulty was the sale of the ship.

Bucknill, for W. C. Lang, the plaintiff, in support of the motion.—It being impossible that the ship can be managed between her present owners, the court is asked to order a sale of the ship. [BUTT, J.—A part owner must make out an extremely strong case before he will induce the court to order the sale of the whole ship.] Sir Robert Phillimore did so on the application of minority owners in the case of The Nelly Schneider (4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 54; 3 P. Div. 152; 39 L. T. Rep. N. S. 360). Sir Robert Phillimore's reason for so doing is, that it would be greatly to the interests of the parties that their connection should be severed. [BUTT, J.—It is a strong thing for the court to say that it is for a man's interest to sell his ship when he himself says it is not.] The ship has been appraised by the marshal, and my clients are ready to buy Mr. Forwood's shares at the marshal's valuation. We are willing that your Lordship should so order.

Myburgh, Q.C., for the majority owners, in support of the cross-motion.—We as majority owners ask for a sale of the ship. We will undertake to buy Mr. Lang's shares at the marshal's valuation.

BUTT, J.—I think a very strong case should be made out before the court will order the sale of a ship on the application of part owners. It is asking the court to sell the ship whether the co-owners like it or not. If a man is unable to agree with his co-owners, his remedy is to sell his own particular shares. I will therefore not order a sale of the ship except by consent. I will not do it for either party without consent. I shall therefore dismiss both motions.

THE CITY OF LUCKNOW. (a)

Practice—Collision—Counsel's fee — Witnesses—Registrar.

In an action for damage by collision, where the damage to one vessel amounted to 20,000l., and to the other vessel to 2000l., three counsel were instructed on behalf of the plaintiffs, and the fees marked on their briefs were respectively seventy-five guineas, fifty guineas, and thirty guineas, and the registrar, on taxation, reduced these fees to sixty guineas, forty guineas, and twenty-seven guineas; the Court, on appeal from the taxation, allowed the original fees, holding that they were proper fees in a case of that magnitude. (b)

Semble, the cost of detaining witnesses on shore may be allowed, although such witnesses are not called at the trial. This is a matter in the discretion of the registrar.

THIS was a motion by the plaintiffs, in a damage action, arising out of a collision between the steamships Simla and City of Lucknow, "to review the assistant registrar's taxation of the plaintiffs' costs, so far as relates to the reduction of the fees paid to counsel on the hearing of the action and the disallowance of the amounts paid in respect of the detention of the witnesses Egsberg, Coyle, and Scott."

The items in dispute were:

Fee to Mr. R. E. Webster, Q.C. and clerk with brief and papers	82	10	0
Fee to Dr. Phillimore and clerk with brief and papers	55	0	0
Fee to Mr. A. E. Nelson and clerk with brief and papers	32	10	0
Three seamen, Egsberg, Coyle, and Scott, A.Bs. on board Simla, for detention on shore	35	0	0

These items were at first allowed by the registrar, whereupon the defendants filed the following objections:

As to item 1 (viz., fee to plaintiffs' leading counsel) it is submitted that the employment of a third counsel was unnecessary, having regard to the nature of the action, and that in any case the fee ought not to be allowed as against the defendants, inasmuch as the learned counsel did not appear in court in support of the plaintiffs' case or take any part at the trial of the action.

If, notwithstanding the above objection the court should consider the learned counsel to be entitled to a fee, then it is submitted that the amount allowed is excessive, except as including a special fee, it being the invariable practice of the learned counsel to charge a special fee of fifty guineas for undertaking a case in the Admiralty Division of the High Court of Justice, and which special fee it is not the practice to allow on taxation of party and party costs.

As regards items 2 and 3 (viz., fees to plaintiffs' second and third counsel), in case of any fee being allowed to the leading counsel under the above circumstances it is submitted that the fee of 55*l.* allowed to second counsel and clerk with brief and papers and of 32l. 10*s.* allowed to third counsel and clerk with brief and paper should be reduced to the usual amount of two-thirds of the fee of the immediately senior counsel. It should be remembered that the trial did not last six hours.

As to items 4 to 12 (viz., allowances for nine witnesses), it is submitted that the allowance of so large a number of witnesses for attending the trial, eighteen in all, out of whom nine only were called to give evidence, is out of all proportion to the questions of fact at issue in the action, and that all or some of the expenses of witnesses named in the above items (none of whom gave evidence on the trial) should be disallowed.

Thereupon the registrar reviewed his taxation and reduced the items as shown in his notes:

Notes of objection to taxation:

1. This was in my opinion a proper case for three counsel. The amount at stake was unusually large. The plaintiffs' ship Simla of 2172 tons, laden with a general cargo, having been totally lost, the plaintiffs claimed 20,000*l.*, the defendants 2000*l.* The papers also were very lengthy, the plaintiffs' brief and proofs extending to 340 folios, and the other documents laid before counsel to more than 300 folios more. That one of the three counsel for the plaintiffs did not appear at the trial seems rather to justify the employment of a third counsel in a case where so much was at stake. The defendants also had three counsel.

2. On the other hand I think that I ought to make some reduction in the amount of the plaintiffs' counsel's fees, which were: to the leading counsel seventy-five guineas; to the second counsel fifty guineas; to the third counsel thirty guineas. I am informed that the defendants' counsel's fees were: to the leading counsel (the Solicitor-General in addition to a special fee of fifty guineas which it was admitted could not have been recovered as between party and party on taxation) fifty guineas; to the second counsel forty guineas; to the third counsel twenty-seven guineas.

I cannot say that these items were inadequate for a case which though, the amount at issue was very large, did not involve any questions of peculiar difficulty, and for which, although the trial lasted barely more than one day, refreshers were paid on each side and have been allowed on taxation to the plaintiffs at the usual amounts. I have, therefore, on reconsideration, reduced the fees as follows: To the plaintiffs' leading counsel (who seems to have had no special fee) from seventy-five to sixty guineas; to the second counsel from fifty to forty guineas; to the third counsel from thirty to twenty-seven guineas, with refreshers of ten and five guineas respectively to the second and third counsel, who alone appeared on the second day of the trial.

3. Of the eighteen witnesses previously allowed I have, on revision, disallowed three. In explanation of the allowance of so many as fifteen witnesses, of whom fourteen belonged to the Simla, I should observe that the ship's crew numbered fifty, that the collision took place about 7.45 p.m., and that the fourteen witnesses allowed were selected from a much larger number of persons on board the Simla who had witnessed the collision, also that no less than five distinct charges of negligence were made by the defendants against those in charge of the Simla, viz., of want of look-out, of improper navigation, of not exhibiting a proper side light, of having improperly burnt a blue light, and of having improperly deserted their ship after the collision, and that different witnesses were detained in order to speak to different points.

Thereupon the plaintiffs on appeal filed the following objections to the registrar's taxation:

It is submitted that the fees paid to counsel herein having regard to the large sum involved, the voluminous documents and the number of witnesses engaged in the action and the several charges made against the plaintiffs by the defendants in their counter-claim, were fair and proper and ought to be allowed.

The three witnesses were on deck from the time the City of Lucknow was first seen until the collision, and they were material and necessary witnesses for the plaintiffs, and by counsel's advice on evidence were certified as such and were detained accordingly.

Dr Phillimore, for the plaintiffs, in support of the motion.—The findings of the assistant registrar speak to the importance of the case. Acting on counsel's advice the plaintiffs had eighteen witnesses in attendance at the trial. Only nine of these were called, in consequence of an intimation from your Lordship that more were unnecessary. It seems to be the practice in the registry only to allow such witnesses

(a) Reported by J. P. ASPINALL and BUTLER ASPINALL, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

(b) See the remarks of Butt, J. on this subject in The Mammoth, ante, p. 289.—ED.

as are actually called. [BUTT, J.—My interposing does not show that it was improper on the part of the plaintiffs to have eighteen witnesses. I interpose when the evidence sufficiently satisfies me as to the points in dispute. Though nine witnesses may have proved sufficient, the plaintiffs could not tell so until the hearing?] The registrar has allowed three counsel, but reduced their fees. [BUTT, J.—For what reason? I can only say that my experience of common law cases was that in a case of this magnitude counsel got very much larger fees.]

Bucknill, for the defendants, contra, read the registrar's reasons and submitted that they were right.

BUTT, J.—If any mercantile firm of high standing had been called in to deal with an amount in which 20,000*l.* is claimed, their commission would have amounted to more than the three counsel's fees put together. I think these fees were reasonable and should be allowed. With regard to the witnesses, I am not so clear. There must be a discretion vested in the registrar, and unless there is some strong reason to suppose that he has acted wrongly, I do not think that I ought to interfere. I therefore do not propose to interfere with the discretion of the registrar on this point. The costs of this application are to be costs in the cause.

THE ROBERT DICKINSON. (a)

Action of restraint—Bond—Value of shares—Practice—Rules of the High Court of Admiralty 1859.

In an action of restraint the proper form of bond is a bond for safe return, and not a bond to answer judgment in the action.

The bond will be conditioned to the appraised or agreed value of the plaintiff's shares, and not to double the value of such shares.

THIS was an action of restraint instituted by minority owners on the 4th Nov. 1884, against the steamship Robert Dickinson.

The claim indorsed on the writ was as follows:

The plaintiffs' claim is as owners of twenty-two sixty-fourths of the vessel Robert Dickinson, being dissatisfied with the management and employment of the said vessel by their co-owners, that they shall give them a bond in 15,000*l.* for the value of the shares in the said vessel, and for the safe return of the said vessel.

The sum of 15,000*l.* exceeded the estimated value of the plaintiffs' shares. The ship was arrested on the 12th Nov.

On the 24th Nov. a summons was taken out by the defendants for the release of the vessel upon a bond or bail to answer the action being given by the defendants in the sum of 6500*l.* On this summons coming on for hearing the registrar ordered that "upon defendants giving bail in the sum of 6500*l.* to answer judgment herein, the vessel Robert Dickinson might be released."

On the 1st Dec. the defendants tendered the plaintiffs a bond in the sum of 6500*l.* The form was as follows:

Whereas an action of restraint is now pending in the Probate, Divorce, and Admiralty Division (Admiralty) of the High Court of Justice between Robert Dixon and others v. The remaining owners of the steamship Robert Dickinson. Now therefore we (names of sureties) hereby jointly and severally submit ourselves to the jurisdiction of the said court, and consent that, if the defendants in this action shall not pay what may be adjudged against them in the said action with costs, execution may issue forth against us, our heirs, executors, and administrators, for a sum not exceeding 6500*l.*

The plaintiffs refused to accept this form of bond, and on the 2nd Dec. they entered a caveat against the release of the ship.

Thereupon the defendants took out a summons before Butt, J. asking that the caveat should be overruled, that the ship should be released on the defendants filing the bail bond already executed, and that the plaintiffs should be condemned in all damages and costs occasioned to the defendants by the entry of the said caveat release, and the consequent improper detention under arrest of the Robert Dickinson, and in the costs of the application. On this summons coming on for hearing, the judge dismissed the application, and held that the form of the bond ought to be for the safe return of the ship.

The defendants by special leave of the court now moved the judge in court to set aside the above order, and to order that the bail bond already filed by the defendants was good in form.

A summons taken out by the plaintiffs, that the court should settle the form of bond, was ordered to be taken in court at the same time.

The form of bond proposed by the plaintiffs was as follows:

Whereas an action of restraint is now pending in the Probate, Divorce, and Admiralty Division (Admiralty) of the High Court of Justice between Dixon and others v. The remaining owners of the steamship Robert Dickinson, and whereas the Honourable Mr. Justice Butt has ordered that bail be given for the safe return of the steamship or vessel Robert Dickinson to the port of Newcastle, and that the plaintiffs should not bear any portion of the expenses of the ship prior to the safe return as aforesaid, now therefore we (names of sureties) hereby jointly and severally submit ourselves to the jurisdiction of the said court, and consent that, if the said defendants, or we, the said (names of sureties) shall not in the event of the said steamship or vessel Robert Dickinson not safely returning to the port of Newcastle, or in the event of the said steamship or vessel incurring liabilities prior to the safe return as aforesaid, pay to the plaintiffs or to their solicitors the sum of l., the appraisement value of the plaintiffs' shares in the said steamship or vessel, and any sum or sums they may become liable to pay in respect of any such liabilities as aforesaid and the costs of this action, execution may issue forth against us, our heirs, executors, and administrators, lands, goods, and chattels for a sum not exceeding l.

Dr. Phillimore (with him Bucknill), for the defendants, in support of the motion.—Prior to 1859 there was a special form of bond peculiar to actions of restraint:

The Apollo, 1 Hagg. 306;
The Margaret, 2 Hagg. 275.

Since 1859, in which year the Admiralty Court Rules came into force, the practice has been to give a bond to answer a judgment in the form tendered by the defendants. The practice is so stated in Pritchard's Admiralty Digest, 2nd edit. p. 651. Moreover, the form of bond provided by the Admiralty Court Rules of 1859 is the form of bond tendered by the defendants. According to Rule 186, "The forms annexed to these rules, orders, and regulations shall be followed as nearly as the circumstances of each case will allow." The circumstances of the present case do allow of the form of bond as tendered giving the plaintiffs all security that they are entitled to. Moreover, the present form of bond has been in existence since 1859, and it should not, in the absence of strong reasons, be departed from. This practice, as formulated by the Admiralty Court Rules 1859, is preserved by Order LXXII. of the Rules of the Supreme Court 1883, and in Appendix A, part 2, No. 13, the form of bond given is similar in form to that tendered by the defendants:

Reg v. Justices of Pirehill North, 51 L. T. Rep. N. S. 534; 14 Q. B. Div. 13.

G. Bruce, Q.C. and Raikes, for the plaintiffs, contra, were not called upon.

BUTT, J.—I still adhere to the opinion which I pronounced in chambers. I think it perfectly clear that the form of bond tendered is not applicable to the circumstances of this case. There were certain Admiralty Court Rules made in 1859. Under Rule 186 the forms affixed thereto are to be followed so far as circumstances will permit. This is an action of restraint, and there is no prayer in the writ that the court will award any sum of money to the plaintiffs. The bond tendered is drawn in the following form. [The learned Judge then read the bond tendered by the defendants.] I think that form of bond is not applicable to actions of restraint, and ought never to have been employed. Rule 186 says that the forms are to be followed where the circumstances will permit, and, so far from thinking that the present circumstances are met by this bond, I consider its form to be nonsensical and to have no meaning. This motion must be dismissed with costs.

The plaintiffs' summons then came on for hearing.

G. Bruce, Q.C. and Raikes, for the plaintiffs, in support of the summons.—The form of bond proposed by the plaintiffs is drawn to protect the plaintiffs in case the vessel incurs liabilities on the voyage. It is submitted that the bond should be conditioned to double the value of the plaintiffs' shares. This originally seems to have been the practice:

Clarke's Praxis, tit. 12;
Abbott on Shipping, 11th edit., Appendix cccxciv.

Dr. Phillimore and Bucknill, for the defendants, were not called upon.

BUTT, J.—The plaintiffs' counsel have been unable to give me any good authority for extending the bond to cover the event of the vessel incurring liabilities prior to her safe return, or for conditioning it in double the value of the plaintiffs' shares. All that the minority owners are entitled to is a bond for the safe return of the ship to a named port, conditioned at the agreed or appraised value of the plaintiffs' shares. If the parties cannot agree on the value of the shares they must be appraised in the usual way. Each party must pay their own costs of this summons. (a)

(a) In consequence of this decision the following bond was filed: "Whereas an action of restraint for bail has been commenced in the High Court of Justice on behalf of Robert Dickson and others against the remaining owners of the steamship Robert Dickinson and against (names of interveners) intervening. Now therefore we (names of sureties) hereby jointly and severally submit ourselves to the jurisdiction of the said court, and consent that if they, the said remaining owners of the steamship Robert Dickinson, the defendants, or we the said (names of sureties) shall not in the event of the said steamship Robert Dickinson not safely returning from her present voyage to any loading port in England or Wales, whereof notice shall have been given to the plaintiffs when the vessel is at her port of discharge, pay to the plaintiffs or to their solicitors, Messrs. Pattison, Wigg, and Co., the sum of 6500*l*., being the agreed value of the plaintiffs' shares in the said vessel, execution may issue forth against us, our heirs, executors, administrators, lands, goods, and chattels, for the sum of 6500*l*."—ED.

In a damage action the log kept by the engineer is admissible as evidence against his owners.

THIS was a damage action in rem, arising out of a collision between the steamships the Boskenna Bay and the Earl of Dumfries.

During the defendants' case, counsel for the plaintiffs while cross-examining the second engineer of the defendants' ship, proposed to put in evidence the log kept by the first engineer of the defendants' ship for the purpose of contradicting the evidence of the witness. Counsel for the defendants objected to the admission of such evidence.

Dr. Phillimore (with him Bucknill), for the plaintiffs, in support of the admission of the evidence.—The declarations of an agent are admissible evidence against his principal:

The Actæon, 1 Spinks Ecc. & Ad. 176.

The engineer is the agent of the defendants for the purpose of making entries in his log. A protest is admissible evidence. [BUTT, J.—I am not so sure of that, although I know that by the practice of this court it is very often put in.] The log kept by the mate of the defendants' ship is admissible evidence against them. By parity of reasoning the engineer's log is also admissible.

Hall, Q.C. log is not evidence in favour of the owners of the vessel. It, however, is not clear whether by the law of England it is admissible as evidence against them. Yet, as I have so strong an opinion in favour of admitting this and similar documents, I shall, in the absence of any authority against it, allow this log to be put in evidence. Upon the same principle by which the mate's log is admissible I think it may be said that the engineer's log is also admissible. Therefore, though not without doubt, I think this log may be put in.

The log was accordingly put in and read by plaintiff's counsel.

THE PALOMARES. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM THE CITY OF LONDON COURT.

Collision—Practice—Contempt of court—Warrant of arrest—Execution—Bailiff—City of London Court—County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 71), ss. 23, 35.

A warrant of arrest issued in an action in rem, instituted for collision in the City of London Court, and directed to the high bailiff of the said court and others the bailiffs thereof, is not duly executed if executed by a clerk in the bailiff's office, who is not a bailiff, and hence the master of the vessel so arrested is not guilty of contempt of court in removing her.

Semble, if the warrant had been addressed to the clerk as an officer of the court it might, under the provisions of the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868, s. 23, have been duly served by him.

THIS was an appeal from a decision of Mr. Commissioner Kerr, the judge of the City of London Court, refusing to commit the master of the steamship Palomares for alleged contempt of court.

A collision having occurred in the river Thames, on the 5th Nov. 1884, between the steamship Racoon (owned by the Mayor, Commonalty, and Citizens of the City of London) and the steamship Palomares, the owners of the Racoon instituted an action in rem, on the 8th Nov., in the City of London Court, against the steamship Palomares, to recover compensation for damages suffered by reason of the collision.

The following affidavit to lead the warrant of arrest was sworn on the 8th Nov. by Mr. Wm. Thomas Kirby, clerk to the City Solicitor:

1. I am informed and believe that on the 5th day of November instant the steamship Racoon, belonging to the plaintiffs, was run into and damaged by the steamship or vessel Palomares, in the river Thames, through the fault and mismanagement of those on board the last-named steamer.

2. No compensation in respect of such damage has been made to the plaintiffs, as I am informed and believe, and the aid and process of this court are necessary in that behalf.

3. The Palomares is now in the river Thames, within the jurisdiction of this court. She has discharged her cargo, and, as I am informed and believe, she is expected to sail immediately, and out of such jurisdiction, unless restrained by a warrant of this court, leaving the plaintiffs' claim unsatisfied.

Upon the margin of this affidavit the registrar of the court made the following order: "Let a warrant issue to arrest the steamship Palomares."

The warrant was accordingly issued, and was directed "To the high bailiff of the said court, and others the bailiffs thereof."

On the same day the warrant was executed by Edward Henry Watson, who was a clerk in the bailiff's office, and not a bailiff.

Mr. Watson executed the warrant by exhibiting it to those on board the Palomares, nailing a copy to the mast and putting a man in possession of the vessel.

On the same day the master of the Palomares, in disregard of the arrest, proceeded on his voyage to Newcastle with the man in possession on board.

On the 10th Nov. application was made by the plaintiffs to the judge of the City of London Court, upon an affidavit setting out the above facts, for a rule nisi calling upon the master of the Palomares to show cause why he should not be committed for contempt of court.

The rule was granted.

On the 24th Nov. cause was shown to the above rule, when documentary and viva voce evidence was given as to the circumstances under which the vessel had been removed from the jurisdiction. The learned commissioner reserved judgment till the 8th Dec., when he dismissed the rule with costs, holding that the warrant had not been legally executed, and that therefore, the master of the Palomares was guilty of no contempt in taking her to Newcastle.

The learned Commissioner, in his judgment, after dealing with the facts of the case, found that, assuming the warrant to have been duly executed, the master of the Palomares was guilty of contempt of court.

The learned Commissioner then proceeded as follows:—"Was the warrant duly executed? That the warrant was duly issued is clear; and that it was exhibited to those on board, and that a true copy of it was nailed to the mast is not to be doubted. But is this due execution? I think not. Those courts whose jurisdiction and procedure are derived from the civil law have an inherent power of delegating to anyone they see fit to appoint the execution of their decrees. But this has never been the case with our common law courts. In the case of our superior courts the sheriff is interposed between the Crown, in whose name the court acts, and the suitor; and he is responsible to the latter for any excess or deficiency in or misuse of any process of execution entrusted to him. When the County Courts were established in 1846 the same principle was applied. A high bailiff was appointed for each court by whom alone its process can be executed, and he was specially empowered like the sheriff to appoint bailiffs to assist him in the execution of the process which comes to his hands, and like the sheriff he is directly and personally responsible to the suitors. In the statute under which this court, which was constituted on the model of the County Court, issues its process the same principle is adopted. By sect. 17 of the London (City) Small Debts Extension Act 1852, it is enacted that there shall be one or more bailiff or bailiffs of the court, and that such bailiff or bailiffs shall be appointed by the mayor, aldermen, and commons, and that one of the bailiffs, if there shall be more than one, shall be called the chief bailiff of the court, a designation which by a subsequent statute is converted into high bailiff. The 18th section next enacts that the bailiffs "shall by themselves serve all the summonses and orders, and execute all the warrants, precepts, and writs issued out of the court under the provisions of this Act," and that every such bailiff shall be responsible for all the acts and defaults of himself in like manner as the sheriff of any county in England is responsible for the acts and defaults of himself and his officers. These words "by themselves" are to be found in the clause of the County Court statute from which our clauses are copied; but in the County Court statute the words are "by themselves or by the bailiffs appointed to assist them." The omission of these latter words in our statute shows that the Legislature intended, and seems to me to require, that a bailiff of this court shall execute process himself and shall not delegate it to anyone else. And the subsequent words of our statute, making the bailiff responsible for the acts and defaults of himself, as is the sheriff for those of himself and his officers, seems to me to confirm this view, especially as in the County Court statute the words are that the high bailiff shall be responsible for the acts and defaults of himself and of the bailiffs appointed to assist him. It may be suggested that the Admiralty process of arresting a ship is not issued under this Act, viz., The London (City) Small Debts Extension Act 1852. But there is, I think, nothing in that. The jurisdiction in maritime cases is assigned to the court as it is constituted by law, and with all its incidents, with its registrar to record its proceedings and its bailiffs to execute its process. That process, framed under statute, is issued to the high bailiff and is to be executed by him or one of the bailiffs responsible under the statute to the suitor for his acts and defaults. Admiralty process can, on the statute I am now speaking of, be executed, I consider, by no one else. Nothing was said at the hearing to satisfy me or even to suggest that there was any power in a bailiff to delegate his authority to execute Admiralty process. Nevertheless, I have considered it my duty to examine the statutes for myself so as to satisfy my own mind on the subject. The high bailiff of the County Court is expressly authorised to appoint bailiffs to execute process by writing under his hand, and by the County Courts Act 1865, s. 4, the judge and officers of this court have the same powers and authorities, except the power of appointing officers. These words, "except the power of appointing officers," obviously deprive the high bailiff of this court of the power of appointing bailiffs, which in their absence he would have possessed. I have looked at the other County Court Acts, and at the Admiralty Acts which incorporate them, and I can find nothing to justify any bailiff of this court in delegating his authority. And I am consequently of opinion that no legal arrest was effected of the Palomares, her tackle, apparel, or furniture; that the ship consequently was not under arrest when she sailed out of the jurisdiction of the court; and, not being under arrest, that no contempt was committed by the captain of the vessel in so doing. The rule of court of the 15th Nov. will therefore be discharged with costs."

From this decision the plaintiffs appealed.

In support of the appeal the following affidavits were filed by the plaintiffs:

I, Sir John Braddick Monckton, of Guildhall, in the City of London, Knight, Town Clerk, make oath, and say as follows:

1. As the Town Clerk of the City of London I am, by virtue of my office, clerk of the several committees of the Corporation of London,

2. I have referred to the minutes of the Law and City Courts Committee of the Corporation of London, and from these I find, and I know of my own knowledge, that Edward Harry Watson was, on the 2nd day of May 1881, duly appointed by the said committee, in whose hand such appointments lie, on behalf of the plaintiffs to be clerk in the office of the High Bailiff of the City of London Court, and that the said Edward Harry Watson thereupon and thereby became, and has since, and up to the present time continued to be an officer of the said City of London Court.

I, Edward Harry Watson, of the City of London Court, held at Guildhall-buildings, in the City of London, clerk in the office of the High Bailiff of the said City of London Court, make oath and say as follows:

1. I have seen and perused an affidavit in this action, sworn by Sir John Braddick Monckton, and dated the 16th day of January 1885, and I am the Edward Harry Watson therein referred to, and the statements in the said affidavit, so far as they refer to me the said Edward Harry Watson, are in all respects true.

2. On the 8th day of November 1884 a warrant for the arrest of the steamship Palomares, duly issued under the seal of the City of London Court, was delivered to me for service and execution, and I proceeded on board the said steamship Palomares, and duly served and executed the said warrant of arrest on the said 8th day of November 1884.

The following Acts of Parliament were referred to, and are material to the judgment:

The London (City) Small Debts Extension Act 1852 (15 Vict. c. lxxvii.), s. 17:

That there shall be one or more bailiff or bailiffs of the court, and such bailiff or bailiffs shall be appointed by the mayor, aldermen, and commons . . . and one of the bailiffs of the court, if there shall be more than one, shall be called the chief bailiff of the court.

Sect. 18:

That the said bailiffs shall attend every sitting of the court for such time as shall be required by the judge, unless when their absence shall be allowed for reasonable cause by the judge, and shall by themselves serve all the summonses and orders, and execute all the warrants, precepts, and writs issued out of the court under the provisions of this Act . . . . and every such bailiff shall be responsible for all the acts and defaults of himself in like manner as the sheriff of any county in England is responsible for the acts and defaults of himself and his officers.

The County Courts Equitable Jurisdiction Act 1865 (28 & 29 Vict. c. 99), s. 4:

The judge and officers of the court held under the provisions of the London (City) Small Debts Extension Act 1852, hereinafter called the "City Court," shall respectively have and exercise the like jurisdiction, powers, and authorities in all respects, except the power of appointing officers, as are for the time being possessed and exercised by the judge and officers respectively of a Metropolitan County Court, and the chief clerk and the chief bailiff of the City Court shall henceforth be respectively styled the registrar and high bailiff thereof, the word "registrar" being interpreted to include the assistant clerks, and the words "high bailiff" the bailiffs of the City Court.

J. P. Aspinall, on behalf of the plaintiffs, in support of the appeal.—It is submitted that Watson was an officer of the court, and therefore competent to execute the warrant. The County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868 conferred Admiralty Jurisdiction on County Courts. Sect. 23 regulates the mode in which process is to be executed in Admiralty actions. By that section it is provided that for the execution of any decree or order of a County Court the court may order, and the registrar on such order may seal and issue, and "any officer of any County Court may execute process according to general orders." Inasmuch as Watson was appointed by the corporation, and having regard to the provisions of sect. 23 of the London (City) Small Debts Extension Act 1852, that it shall be lawful for the mayor, aldermen, and commons, to order that the judge, clerk, bailiffs, and officers of the court, or any of them, shall be paid by salaries instead of fees," it is submitted that Watson was an officer of the court, otherwise no meaning can be given to the words "officers" as used in sect. 23 of the London (City) Small Debts Extension Act 1852. This contention is supported by the fact that the preceding sect. 11 provides that, in case assistant clerks shall be necessary for carrying on the business of the court, such assistant clerks shall be provided. Sect. 23 then deals with all the officials of the court, naming them as "judge, clerk, bailiffs, and officers of the court," in which latter category it is submitted that Watson is included. Therefore, assuming him to be an officer, it is submitted that there is nothing in the general orders to preclude him executing the warrant. Although in the general orders both of 1869 and 1875 there are special provisions applicable to Admiralty procedure, there is no provision that the warrant of arrest shall be executed by any specified officer. The object of so enacting was to enable the warrant of arrest to be executed by any officer of the court. Otherwise were the execution limited to the bailiffs, it is very possible to conceive that the bailiffs, owing to their various duties, would be incapable of promptly executing the warrant. The desirability of immediate execution of warrants of arrest was doubtless present to the mind of the Legislature, and hence it is submitted that it was expressly meant that such warrants might be executed by any officer of the court. The very fact that there are special orders applicable to Admiralty procedure is of itself proof that it was intended that the Admiralty procedure should differ from the ordinary County Court procedure. It is understood that the marshal of the Admiralty Court does delegate his authority to persons in his office to execute warrants of arrest. Reasoning by analogy, it is submitted that the same power exists in the bailiff of the City of London Court.

Lush-Wilson for the respondent, contra.—By sect. 35 of the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868 it is provided (inter alia), that "General orders shall be from time to time made under this Act for the purposes in this Act directed, and for regulating . . . . the forms of processes and proceedings therein or issuing therefrom." It is submitted that the effect of this section is to give to the forms themselves a statutory force. The form of warrant in use in the County Courts is directed to the "high bailiff of the said court and others the bailiffs thereof," hence the form by its terms is a definition of the words "any officer," as used in sect. 23 of the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868, and shows that the only persons competent to execute the warrant "according to general orders," within sect. 23 of the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868, are the bailiffs. By Order XXXVIII. of the County Court Orders and Rules 1875 it is directed that the general rules of procedure shall apply to Admiralty proceedings, unless expressly ousted by the orders applicable to Admiralty proceedings. Inasmuch as the orders applicable to Admiralty proceedings are silent as to what persons shall execute warrants of arrest, the general orders are to be followed. If so, the execution of this warrant was restricted to the high bailiff or bailiffs, and there has not been a compliance with the orders. It is also submitted that a clerk in the bailiff's office is not an "officer" within the meaning of the word as used in sect. 23 of the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868. Sect. 10 of the London (City) Small Debts Extension Act 1852 speaks of the "several clerks and other officers and servants." This shows that clerks are not included in the term "officers." The fact that sects. 18 and 21 of the London (City) Small Debts Extension Act 1852 provide that the bailiff shall be responsible for his acts and defaults, and require him to give security, show that the Legislature intended that the execution of process should be restricted to bailiffs alone. A close examination of the statutes relating to the City of London Court shows that the Legislature has been very jealous of having the process executed by a responsible officer.

Aspinall in reply.—The desirability of not restricting the execution of warrants of arrest to the marshal in the High Court is evidenced by the words of Order IX., r. II, of the rules of the Supreme Court 1883. The words are, "In Admiralty actions in rem the warrant of arrest shall be served by the marshal or his substitutes." Sect. 86 of the London (City) Small Debts Extension Act 1852 allows "every bailiff or officer" to execute "any process of execution." Arrest of a vessel being analogous to taking goods in execution, and Watson being an officer of the court for some purposes, it is submitted that he was competent to execute the warrant. The words in sect. 23 of the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868, "according to general orders," define the mode of execution and not the persons by whom the process is to be executed The mode of execution in this case was "according to general orders," and therefore there was a valid arrest.

Sir JAMES HANNEN.—I am of opinion that this appeal must be dismissed. By the London (City) Small Debts Extension Act 1852, s. 18, the duty of executing all the warrants, precepts, &c., was entrusted to certain officers called bailiffs, and this Act restricted those officers from deputing their duties in this respect to anyone else. It is not now necessary to enlarge upon the reasons for this enactment. There are express words requiring that the bailiffs "shall by themselves serve all the summonses and orders, and execute all the warrants." If the matter had stood there there would probably have been no argument. It would, under those circumstances, be clear that it was competent for no one else but the bailiffs to execute the warrant. Mr. Aspinall, however, has called our attention to the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868, s. 23, to which he says the learned commissioner did not direct his attention. My own opinion is that the clerk Mr. Watson has been shown by the existing state of things to be an officer of the County Court, because the 11th section of the London (City) Small Debts Extension Act 1852, requires that when a clerk is paid by salary the power of appointment is to be in the corporation. In this case that has taken place. Watson has been appointed by the corporation, and they pay his salary, and that, in my opinion, does constitute him an officer of the court.

Sect. 23 of the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1861 provides that, "For the execution of any decree or order of a County Court in an Admiralty cause the court may order, and the registrar on such order may seal and issue, and any officer of any County Court may execute process according to general orders." I am disposed to think that there would be a power under the general orders to restrict the execution of process to particular individuals or class of individuals that might be indicated, but I do not think that the words "any officer of the County Court may execute process" are in fact annulled by the subsequent words "according to general orders," I think that the class of persons is constituted by that section of the Act who, unless something to the contrary is shown, would have the power to execute the orders of the court. On the other hand, it appears to be quite clear that it does not mean that any officer of the court may of his own motion execute the order. He must derive his authority from the court. In this particular case no authority has been conferred by the court upon the clerks in the bailiff's office to execute warrants. In fact the warrant according to its form is directed specifically "to the high bailiff of the said court, and others the bailiffs thereof." Without entering into the other questions which have been touched upon, I think it is sufficient for the present decision to say that the court might direct its orders to any clerk, including Mr. Watson, but, unless the court does so direct its orders, then it is not competent for the high bailiff to delegate his authority to any clerk to execute the orders. (a)

For these reasons I think that the decision of the learned commissioner was right, and therefore this appeal must be dismissed with costs.

BUTT, J.—I am of the same opinion, although I am not quite certain that I agree with my Lord in every reason. It appears to me that the London (City) Small Debts Extension Act 1852, s. 18, having prescribed that the bailiffs shall by themselves serve summons and execute warrants, the only answer suggested in argument to the observations of the learned judge on that section has been founded upon sect. 23 of the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868, The view I take of the wording of that section is this, that, though I quite agree with my Lord that the clerks for some purposes are officers of the court, yet I do not think they are officers of the court within the meaning of the words as used in sect. 23 of the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868. It seems to me to point to officers whose ordinary duty it is to serve summonses and execute warrants used in the proceedings. Though I am very far, in making these observations, from saying that I disagree with my Lord when he says, or intimates an opinion, that in any case it might be open to the judge by order to direct any officer of the court to execute the summons, and agreeing substantially with all my Lord has said, I think, the decision of the learned judge below was right, and this appeal must be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed with costs.

(a) These remarks of the learned President are in accordance with the decision of the Court of Exchequer in Bell v. Hoyle (L. Rep. 10 Ex. 220). In that case it was decided by Bramwell, Cleasby, and Amphlett, B.B., that where the judgment debtor under County Court process is the high bailiff of the court, the court is justified in appointing a special bailiff to levy execution and in directing the warrant to him, although the Acts 9 & 10 Vict. c. 95, and 30 & 31 Vict. c. 142 contain no provisions on the subject. The ground of this decision is the inherent power of every court, as part of its constitution, to appoint an officer to execute its process. This power was recognised so far back as the reign of Edward III. Thus in 1 Rolle's Abr. tit. "Court," p. 526 (F.) we find as follows: "Quel chose sera incident al court, si le roy grant un court per letters pattents al un corporation de un vil a tener pleas, &c., en cest case coment que la ne soit ascun clause en le pattent a faire un bailie, ou sargeant, d'executer les proces del court, a returner juries, &c., uncore ceo est incident a lour grant a ceo faire, car autrement ils ne poient tener un court." And in Comyn's Dig. tit. "Courts" (p. 8) it is said: "If the King grant conusance of pleas, the grantee shall have power to make process by petit cape, process upon voucher, or other process as incident, though no mention of it in the grant." According to Amphlett, B., "The moment it is found that there was a valid order made by the judge, it appears to me that he had an inherent power to appoint any other person whom he might think fit to enforce it." So in the present case, had the warrant been directed to Watson, he would have been competent, although not a bailiff, to validly execute the warrant of arrest. The principle upon which the present decision is grounded seems to have been acted upon in several earlier cases. Thus in Rhodes v. Hull (26 L. J. 265, Ex.) it was held that an arrest under a ca. sa. by a bailiff to whom the warrant is not addressed, even though he be engaged by the bailiff to whom it is addressed to assist in the arrest, is irregular, and the defendant will be discharged out of custody. So again in Housin v. Barrow (2 T. Rep. 122) Lord Kenyon decided that where the sheriff having directed a warrant to A. and all his other officers to arrest B., A. afterwards inserted the name of C., the arrest by C. was void. It is to be noticed that the present decision is only concerned with the execution of the warrant of arrest, and is not applicable to the service of summonses. By Order XXXIII., r. 6, of the County Court Rules, the registrar is required, upon the præcipe being filed, to issue a summons for service "by the solicitor, or if so required, by the bailiff of the court." In the Admiralty Court, Order X., r. 11, requires the warrant of arrest to be served by the "marshall or his substitutes," and Butt, J. has recently decided that a writ of summons in any Admiralty action in rem may be served by a solicitor's clerk and not necessarily by the marshal: (cf. The Solis, post.)—ED.

THE GETTYSBURG. (a)

Collision—Sale of ship and cargo—Freight—Practice.

Where in an action in rem for collision against ship and freight, in which the defendants' ship was held solely to blame, and, being still under arrest with the cargo on board was ordered to be sold, the Court on motion directed the marshal to discharge the cargo, to retain the same in his custody as security for payment of the landing and other charges and freight, if any, due from the owners or consignees of the cargo in respect of the same, and that in default of any application for the delivery of the cargo within fourteen days, the marshal should be authorised tn sell such part of the cargo as might be necessary to pay the said charges and freight, if any, due.

THIS was a motion by the plaintiffs in a damage action in rem instituted by the owners of the steamship Arch Druid against the steamship Gettysburg and her freight to recover compensation for damages occasioned by a collision between the two vessels.

The collision occurred on the 27th Oct. 1884 in Dungeness Roads. At the time of the collision the Gettysburg was bound from New York to Dunkirk with a cargo of petroleum in barrels. After the collision the Gettysburg was towed by salvors to Thames Haven.

The action was instituted on the 29th Oct.

On the 30th Oct. the Gettysburg was arrested in the sum of 2000*l.*, the cargo being at the same time arrested for freight. The owners of the Gettysburg entered an appearance, but did not give bail. The owners of the cargo made no application for its delivery.

The action was heard on the 28th Jan. 1885, when Butt, J. found the Gettysburg alone to blame for the collision, and ordered her to be sold.

The plaintiffs now moved the court as followes:

We, Thomas Cooper and Co., solicitors for the plaintiffs in this cause, give notice that we shall by counsel on the 3rd day of February 1885 move the judge in court to direct that the marshal do discharge the cargo of the above ship, retaining the same in his custody as security for payment of the landing and other charges and freight, if any, due from the consignees or owners of the said cargo in respect of the same, and that in default of any application for the delivery of the said cargo within fourteen days that the marshal be authorised to sell such part of the said cargo as may be necessary to pay the said charges and freight, if any, due, and that the said ship when discharged be removed from Thames Haven to London for the purposes of sale.

In support of the above motion an affidavit was filed by the plaintiffs in which, in addition to the above facts, it was alleged that the ship and cargo were subject to a claim for salvage in respect of services rendered after the collision, that Thames Haven was a most suitable place to discharge the cargo, and that the deponent believed that the owners of the cargo were lying by until the cargo had been discharged by the plaintiffs, and would then come forward and claim it.

Kennedy, for the plaintiffs, in support of the motion.—The owners of cargo are not prejudiced by the motion. The action being instituted in Oct. 1884, there has been ample time for them to intervene and protect their rights. The defendants have no interest in the present motion. We are asking for freight only in the event of its being due.

J. P. Aspinall, for the defendants, contra.—The court has no power to sell the cargo to realise freight. [BUTT, J.—I do not see how you are interested in this motion.] The cargo is in the custody of the shipowners. [BUTT, J.—It is in the custody of the court.] The court has no greater power to deal with the cargo than the shipowner. The shipowner could not sell it for payment of freight, and hence the court has no power to do so. It is not a perishable cargo, and there is therefore no reason why it should be sold. The proper course for the plaintiffs to have pursued would have been to issue a monition directing the cargo owner to bring in the freight.

Stokes, on behalf of the salvors, asked that if the cargo were sold his clients' lien might be preserved.

BUTT, J.—I am of opinion that the power of the court to deal with this cargo is not derived from the shipowner, and I think I have power to order its sale. I shall make an order in the terms of the motion, directing that the salvors' lien be preserved.

THE DIONE. (a)

Collision—Limitation of liability—Loss of life—Registered tonnage—Practice—Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 63), s. 54.

The tonnage in respect of which shipowners are entitled to limit their liability under sect. 54 of the Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act 1862 is the tonnage appearing on the ship's register which was in force at the time of collision.

In an action of limitation of liability, where the plaintiffs have paid into court, or are willing to pay in, 8*l. per ton in respect of damage to ship, goods and merchandise, but seek in respect of the life claims to pay into court, or give bail for an amount less than their total liability under the Merchant Shipping Act, the court, before fixing such amount, will require the plaintiffs to state on affidavit the names of the persons killed and injured, their condition in life, the number of those who are legally entitled to claim, the number of claims that have been settled, and the amounts paid in settlement.*

THIS was an action for limitation of liability instituted by the owners of the British steamship Dione in respect of a collision between her and the steamship Camden in the river Thames on the 3rd Aug. 1884.

In consequence of the collision the Dione sank, and considerable damage was done to the cargo laden on board her, and also to the Camden, and twenty-three lives were lost.

(a) Reported by J. P. ASPINALL and BUTLER ASPINALL, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

Actions were thereupon instituted against the Dione by the owners of the Camden and by the owners of the cargo laden on board the Dione.

The owners of the Dione admitted that she was solely to blame for the collision, but alleged that the same occurred without their actual fault or privity.

In an affidavit filed on behalf of the plaintiffs, it was alleged that the gross tonnage of the Dione, without deduction on account of engine room, was, according to the register in force at the date of collision, 698·39 tons; that deponent was advised and believed that the plaintiffs' liability in respect of loss of life and personal injuries could not possibly exceed the sum of 300*l.*, and that all persons entitled to claim against the Dione were resident in the United Kingdom.

To this affidavit the Dione's register, made in 1879, was annexed as an exhibit.

It was stated that twelve of the twenty-three lives lost were those of passengers, and that all the claims in respect of loss of life and personal injury, with the exception of two, had been settled.

The plaintiffs claimed (inter alia) that their liability in respect of damage to ship, goods, and merchandise should be limited to an amount not exceeding 8*l.* per each ton of the gross tonnage of the Dione, without deduction on account of engine room; and that on payment into court being made or bail being given for such sum as the court should deem right in respect of loss of life or personal injury caused by the collision, that all persons claiming in respect of loss of life or personal injury might be restrained from bringing actions against the plaintiffs.

The defendants, the owners of the Camden, denied that the tonnage on which the plaintiffs were entitled to limit their liability was 698·39 tons.

Subsequently to the collision the Dione was raised and re-registered. According to the register made in 1879 which was in force at the time of the collision, the gross tonnage of the Dione, without deduction on account of engine room, less space exclusively occupied by seamen and apprentices, amounted to 698·39 tons.

According to the register put in by the defendants, which was dated the 6th Nov. 1884, it appeared that the gross tonnage of the Dione, without deduction on account of engine room less space occupied exclusively by seamen and apprentices, amounted to 806·71 tons.

Raikes, for the plaintiffs, after stating the facts was stopped.

Baden-Powell for the owners of the Camden.—According to the register made after the Dione was raised it appears that the tonnage on which her owners are entitled to limit their liability is 806·71 tons, and not 698·39 tons. The register showing 698·39 tons was made as long back as 1879, and it is submitted that, having regard to the very serious discrepancy between the two registers, the court will not limit the plaintiff's liability according to the earlier register. The copy of the subsequent register now produced by the defendants is admissable evidence by virtue of sect. 107 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, which enacts that copies of registers are admissible evidence, and are primâ facie evidence of their contents. There is no indorsement on this subsequent register to show that the Dione has undergone any structural alterations. Hence there is a conflict between the two registers, and therefore the plaintiffs are not entitled on the evidence before the court to have their liability limited in accordance with the earlier register.

Raikes for the plaintiffs, contra.—By sect. 54 of the Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act 1862, the tonnage on which shipowners are entitled to limit their liability is "to be the registered tonnage in the case of sailing ships, and in the case of steamships the gross tonnage without deduction on account of engine room." The tonnage there referred to is the tonnage appearing on the register which was in force at the time of the collision:

The John McIntyre, 5 P. Div. 200.

This contention is supported by sect. 26 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, wherein it is enacted that the tonnage when ascertained and registered in accordance with the provisions of the Act shall ever after be deemed to be the tonnage. It is secondly submitted that the court should order the plaintiffs to pay a sum of money into court in respect of loss of life and personal injury less than their total liability under the statute. It is alleged in the affidavit that these claims cannot exceed 300*l.*, and therefore the court should order only that sum to be paid in.

BUTT, J.—I am of opinion that the copy of the register tendered in evidence by Mr. Baden-Powell is admissible. I however think that the registered tonnage contemplated by the Act of Parliament is the tonnage appearing on the official register which was in force at the time of collision. If so, the question raised by this subsequent register does not arise. Being satisfied that the registered tonnage is that set out in the plaintiffs' affidavit, I shall limit their liability accordingly. With respect to the application that the plaintiffs should be ordered to pay into court only 300*l.* in respect of loss of life and personal injury, I am not yet sufficiently informed of the circumstances of those claims to feel justified in so ordering. I shall require the plaintiffs to state on affidavit the names of those who perished and were injured, their condition in life, the number of those who are legally entitled to claim, and the number of claims that have been settled, and the amounts paid in settlement. When this has been done the registrar will be in a position to fix a reasonable sum.

THE FAIRPORT. (a)

Master's wages—Damages for wrongful dismissal—Misconduct—Mortgagor—Mortgagee.

The taking away by a master of a ship to sea, after she has been taken possession of by the mortgagees, against their wishes, is such misconduct, even when done by the orders of the mortgagor, his original employer, as will disentitle him to recover in an action in rem as against the mortgagees any compensation for dismissal by the mortgagees, upon their recovering possession of the vessel, before the term of his engagement has expired.

THIS was an appeal by way of motion from the registrar's report made in an action in rem, instituted by the late master of the steamship Fairport, against the vessel, to recover wages and disbursements.

The notice of motion was as follows:

Take notice that this Honourable Court will be moved on Tuesday, the 25th day of November, by counsel, on behalf of Mr. William Edward Bagshaw, the intervener in this action, on appeal from the report of the registrar, dated the 4th day of November, against the award, 87*l*. 10*s*., for damages under the agreement of the 12th May 1884, and the registrar's recommendation as to costs of action, and application will also be made that the costs of the action and of this application may be paid by the plaintiff.

In this action W. E. Bagshaw, the first mortgagee of the ship, had intervened.

The claim of the plaintiff was, prior to judgment, referred by an order of the court to the registrar to report upon.

By an agreement in writing, dated the 12th May 1884, it was agreed between James Jeffryes Wallace, the then sole owner of the Fairport, and the plaintiff, F. G. H. Little, that the plaintiff should be appointed to the command of the Fairport, "for the period of twelve months, at a salary of 25*l*. per month."

The ship was mortgaged to W. E. Bagshaw, who also held acceptances as collateral security for advances made to Wallace.

In consequence of J. J. Wallace failing to meet the acceptances which W. E. Bagshaw, the first mortgagee of the Fairport, held as a collateral security for repayment of money advanced by him to Wallace, Bagshaw instructed Messrs. Kay and Co., shipbrokers, on the 30th May 1884 to take possession of the Fairport under the mortgage.

In consequence of these instructions a carekeeper was sent on board the ship and formally took possession on the 6th June. On going on board he delivered the following letter to the plaintiff:

1, St. Michael House, Cornhill, E.C., 30th May, 1884.
To the Officer in charge of the s.s. Fairport.—My agents, Messrs. George Kay and Co. will take charge of your boat on arrival, and will receive the freight and pay the crew and port expenses, &c.
W. E. BAGSHAW,
Mortgagee of the s.s. Fairport.

The plaintiff at the reference proved that he had taken this letter to Wallace, who tore it up, and told him (the plaintiff) to mind his own business.

On the 10th June the plaintiff, by the directions of Wallace, took the vessel to sea, with the mortgagee's man in possession on board. After proceeding to one or two different ports, the Fairport reached Newport about the 23rd June, where she was arrested by a warrant at the suit of the mortgagee, who thereupon dismissed the plaintiff from his command.

The plaintiff claimed at the reference 483*l*. 4*s*. 8*d*., of which the registrar allowed 158*l*. 10*s*. 2*d*.

The claim in respect of wages was for "Wages for twelve months, under agreement, dated the 19th May 1884, 300*l*." Of this the registrar had allowed 87*l*. 10*s*.

The registrar's report, so far as is material, is as follows:

Whereas an appearance has been entered in this action for William Edward Bagshaw, the first mortgagee of the steamship Fairport as an intervener, and the claim of the plaintiff has by an order of court been referred to the registrar to report upon. . . . Under these circumstances I have held that the plaintiff is not entitled to recover against the ship thus improperly taken out of the hands of the mortgagee any expenses incurred by him in respect of the vessel after she left the river Thames. . . . The last point to notice is the question of wages. The plaintiff was engaged, as before stated, as master of the ship for a period of twelve months from the 12th May 1884, at a salary of 25*l*. per month, the plaintiff to find his own table charts and nautical instruments. He served in her to the end of June, when, as a consequence of her arrest by the mortgagee, the plaintiff was dismissed. The question has been argued by counsel whether the plaintiff can in this action, which is one for wages and disbursements, recover anything in the shape of compensation for wrongful dismissal. I have come to the conclusion that he can do so. In the case of The Great Eastern (17 L. T. Rep. N. S. 228; L. Rep. 1 A. & E. 384; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 58) Dr. Lushington decided to that effect in favour of seamen, and, by sect. 191 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, every master of a ship has the same rights, liens and remedies for the recovery of his wages which a seaman possesses. Then, as to the amount. It was not contended that he is entitled to the whole twelve months' wages. He will naturally look for, and obtain other employment, and, upon consideration of all the circumstances of the case, we consider he will be amply compensated by an allowance of wages for three months and a half at the agreed rate, which will be allowing him wages for nearly two months after his dismissal. I think he is entitled to his costs.

Bucknill, on behalf of the mortgagee, in support of the motion.—The plaintiff is not entitled to recover damages from the mortgagee for wrongful dismissal. The taking away of the Fairport to sea, in opposition to the wishes of the mortgagee, is such misconduct as should forfeit his right to wages. The registrar by his report has disallowed the plaintiff "any expenses incurred by him in respect of the vessel after she left the river," because the ship was "improperly taken out of the hands of the mortgagee." The registrar has therefore found that he was guilty of misconduct, and yet has given him not only wages earned up to the date of dismissal, but also damages for dismissal, although the master's misconduct has occasioned the mortgagee considerable expense.

Barnes, for the plaintiff, contra.—The plaintiff has a lien on the ship for damages for wrongful dismissal:

The Great Eastern (ubi sup.)

The registrar has found no misconduct on the part of the plaintiff. [BUTT, J.—Surely the fact that he disallowed him the expenses incurred in respect of the vessel after she was taken away and also speaks of the vessel being improperly taken away, is a finding of misconduct?] The registrar's reason for disallowing those items was because the mortgagee was not legally liable for them. The plaintiff acted only in obedience to the orders of Wallace, his original employer, and the registrar has not found that there was any collusion between them.

Bucknill in reply.

BUTT, J.—In this case the order of the registrar, as it stands, will have the effect of taking out of the pocket of the mortgagee a sum of money claimed as compensation for dismissal by the master, who, in disobedience to the mortgagee, takes the ship off, with the mortgagee's man in possession. For the purposes of to-day I am only dealing with the damages. I am not going now to deal with the wages earned up to the date of dismissal. I am going to deal exclusively with the question of compensation for the wages which were not earned. In dealing with that, I do not intend to let the plaintiff have damages from the mortgagee. I care not what his rights are against the mortgagor. The fact that the mortgagee took possession of this vessel on the 6th June, as he had a right to do, and that the plaintiff then went off with the vessel, and so prevented the mortgagee from getting possession of his ship till a subsequent period, disentitles him to any claim against the mortgagee for damages. It is said that he has a right to these damages by virtue of a maritime lien on the ship. I cannot agree to that. He is entitled to wages for the time during which he properly served the legal owner on board ship, but not to compensation for dismissal.

Bucknill. — The effect of your Lordship's decision is that a claim amounting to 483*l.* is now reduced to about 60*l.* Under these circumstances the plaintiff should be ordered to pay all the costs.

BUTT, J.—This is a claim for compensation sounding in damages. I therefore do not think I ought to interfere with the registrar's suggestion. The plaintiff is to have the costs of the action and reference, but not of this motion.

EDWARDS, ROBERTSON, AND CO. AND OTHERS v. THE FALMOUTH HARBOUR COMMISSIONERS AND R. SHERRIS.

THE RHOSINA. (a)

Damage—Harbour master—Falmouth Harbour Commissioners—Berthing—Anchor—Jurisdiction—Harbours, Docks, and Piers Clauses Act (10 & 11 Vict. c. 27) 1847—Pier and Harbour Orders Confirmation Act 1870.

Where vessels were required by Act of Parliament to be berthed in a harbour under the directions and control of the harbour master, and damage was occasioned to a vessel by the alleged negligence of the harbour master, who, having fixed the place where the vessel was to be beached, gave an order, on the vessel nearing the spot selected, to let go the anchor, on which the vessel immediately settled and was damaged, the court, in an action by the owners of the vessel against the harbour commissioners (whose servant the harbour master was), held that such order was, under the circumstances, a negligent order; that the harbour master in so ordering was acting in the capacity of, and within the scope of, his authority as harbour master, and that therefore the harbour commissioners were liable.

Where a vessel is, in obedience to bye-laws, being beached under the directions of a harbour master, and for that purpose is properly passing through a place which is outside the jurisdiction and limits of the authority of the harbour commissioners, whose servant the harbour master is, and whilst so passing damage is occasioned to the vessel by the negligence of the harbour master in giving an improper order, the harbour commissioners are liable for the damage.

THIS was a damage action instituted in personam by the owners of the steamship Rhosina, against the Falmouth Harbour Commissioners and Richard Sherris, the harbour master of Falmouth Harbour, to recover compensation for damage occasioned to the Rhosina by the alleged negligence of the harbour master.

The Falmouth Harbour Commissioners are commissioners incorporated under the Falmouth Harbour Order 1870, confirmed by the Piers and Harbour Orders Confirmation Act 1870 (No. 2), and the Acts incorporated therewith. By the said order and Acts, the Harbours, Docks, and Piers Clauses Act 1847 and the General Pier and Harbour Act 1861 Amendment Act are incorporated therewith.

The plaintiffs by their statement of claim alleged (inter alia) that on the 29th Dec. 1883, the Rhosina arrived at Falmouth, and anchored in the outer harbour. On the 1st Jan. 1884 the Rhosina entered the inner harbour, under the orders, directions, and control of the defendant Sherris as harbour master (he being on board), for the purpose of being berthed on the hard in the inner harbour in order to ship a new propeller. The Rhosina was charged with rates for using and entering Falmouth Harbour. The Rhosina proceeded up the inner harbour, under the orders, directions, and control of the defendant Sherris as harbour master, and, on arriving near the hard, he negligently and wrongfully and improperly ordered and caused the crew of the Rhosina to let go the starboard anchor. In obedience to such orders the anchor was let go, and the vessel grounded on the said anchor, and was thereby greatly damaged.

The defendants, the harbour commissioners, by their statement of defence alleged (inter alia) that the Rhosina was not under the orders, directions, or control of the defendant Sherris, either as harbour master or at all. The defendant Sherris went on board the Rhosina, but, as the plaintiffs by their agents and servants had notice not to undertake any responsibility with regard to the ship, and the Rhosina did not proceed up the inner harbour under the orders, directions, or control of the defendant Sherris either as harbour master or at all. The order to let go the anchor was not negligent or improper. The damage to the Rhosina was solely caused by the negligent and improper conduct of the plaintiffs' agents and servants on board the Rhosina, in and about the management of the Rhosina, and in and about letting go the anchor in a negligent and improper manner, and in paying or letting out too much chain, and in not checking or taking proper and timely measures to check the chain, or by the faulty and defective tackle, gear, and machinery of the plaintiffs' ship. Even if the damage was caused or contributed to by any act, control, or direction of the defendant Sherris, the defendant Sherris was not, in going on board the Rhosina, or in doing such act or exercising such control, or giving such order or direction, acting within the scope and limit of his employment and duty as harbour master in the service of the said defendants or by or with their authority. The place of the alleged happening of the alleged matters of complaint was outside the jurisdiction and limit of the authority of the said defendants.

The defendant Sherris by his statement of defence denied that the damage complained of was in any way caused or contributed to by any negligence on his part, and alleged that the accident happened outside the limits of the jurisdiction of the harbour commissioners.

The plaintiffs joined issue on these statements of defence, and further alleged that the plea as to the accident happening outside the jurisdiction showed no answer to their claim.

At the hearing the admitted facts were that on the 31st Dec. 1883 the Rhosina was lying at anchor in the outer Falmouth Harbour. It having been arranged that the Rhosina should be beached to have a new propeller put in, the place where she was to be beached was pointed out by Sherris to the master of the Rhosina and a Mr. Morgan, the superintendent engineer of the owners of the Rhosina. On the 1st Jan. 1884 Sherris went on board the Rhosina, there being a Trinity House pilot on board to navigate her to the inner harbour. Whilst being towed from the outer harbour to the place where she was to be beached, Sherris from time to time gave orders. The place from whence the Rhosina was being taken, and the place where it was intended to beach her, were both within the limits of the jurisdiction of the Harbour Commissioners as defined by the Falmouth Harbour Order 1870. In order to reach the place where the vessel was to be beached it was necessary to traverse a certain area of water, which was not within the jurisdiction of the harbour commissioners, but within that of the Falmouth Dock Company. On approaching the spot selected for beaching the Rhosina, Sherris gave orders to let go the starboard anchor. The anchor was accordingly let go, and 15 fathoms of chain being paid out, the anchor got under the ship's bottom and penetrated three of her plates.

The evidence on behalf of the plaintiffs was that the harbour master was superintending the beaching of the Rhosina as harbour master; that the 15 fathoms of chain were paid out in obedience to the orders of the harbour master; that at the time the order was given the vessel was smelling the ground; that the damage was solely caused by the negligence of the harbour master; and that the accident happened in waters under the authority of the defendants.

The evidence on behalf of the defendants was that Sherris went on board as a friend of the master merely to assist; that he had orders from the commissioners not to go on board vessels, but to give orders from his own tug; that at a conversation with the master on the previous day he had said that he would undertake no responsibility; that his object in ordering the anchor to be let go was to dredge and so stop the way of the ship; that the crew ought never to have paid out 15 fathoms; and that the accident happened in waters owned by the Falmouth Dock Company, and not in waters over which the Falmouth Harbour Commissioners had authority.

The following Acts of Parliament were referred to in the course of the arguments, and are material to the decision.

The Harbours, Docks, and Piers Clauses Act 1847 (10 & 11 Vict. c. 27):

Sect. 52. The harbour master may give directions for all or any of the following purposes (that is to say), for regulating the time at which and the manner in which any vessel shall enter into or go out of, or lie in or at the harbour, dock, or pier, and within the prescribed limits, if any, and its position, mooring or unmooring, placing and removing whilst therein.

Sect. 53. The master of every vessel within the harbour or dock, or at or near the pier, or within the prescribed limits, if any, shall regulate such vessel according to the directions of the harbour master made in conformity with this and the special Act, and any master of a vessel who after notice of any such direction by the harbour master served upon him, shall not forthwith regulate such vessel according to such direction, shall be liable to a penalty not exceeding 20*l*.

Bye-laws made in pursuance of the Falmouth Harbour Order 1870, confirmed by the Pier and Harbour Orders Confirmation Act 1870 (No. 2):

3. Every vessel which enters the harbour, shall, so long as such vessel continues therein, be under the direction and control of the harbour master, and every pilot bringing a ship or vessel into the harbour, is to berth her under the directions of the harbour master, in such a position as will allow a clear passage for vessels entering or leaving the harbour. The master or other person in charge of the ship or vessel (if without a pilot) will be held responsible for the observance of this regulation. . . .

4. Every vessel shall be moored or berthed at such part of the harbour, and shall from time to time be removed from place to place to such situation or situations within the harbour, as the harbour master shall direct; and the owner or master who refuses or neglects to obey the directions of the harbour master with regard to the mooring, berthing, or subsequent removal of such vessel or craft, shall for every offence be liable to a penalty not exceeding 5*l*., and a further sum of 20*s*., after notice in writing, for every hour during which such directions are neglected.

23. All vessels, boats, and craft of every description, shall be moored and placed in such positions as the harbour master may direct; and no moorings shall be laid down without his sanction and approval in writing, and he may give directions for the removal of any vessel, boat, or craft, and for the taking up and removal of any anchors or moorings, and any person failing to obey his direction as to the mooring and placing of vessels, boats, or craft, or for the removal of any anchors or moorings, shall be liable to a penalty not exceeding 5*l*., and a further sum of 20*s*. for every day during which such directions are neglected.

By sect. 8 of the Falmouth Harbour Order 1870, confirmed by the Pier and Harbour Orders Confirmation Act 1870 (No. 2), it is provided:

The limits within which the commissioners shall have authority (which, except for the purpose of the rates to be levied under this order, shall be deemed to be the limits to which this order extends) shall include so much of the harbour of Falmouth as lies within the limits of the municipal borough of Falmouth, and is not within the limits defined by the 39th section of the Falmouth Docks Act 1859, or by the 65th section of the Falmouth Docks Act 1864 as the limits of the jurisdiction of the Falmouth Docks Company.

Sect. 39 of the Falmouth Docks Act 1859 (22 Vict. c. 16):

The limits within which the powers of the superintendent and dock master for the regulation of the docks shall be exercised, shall be the docks, tidal harbours, entrance channel, works and property of the company, and a distance of one hundred yards in each direction therefrom respectively.

Sect. 65 of the Falmouth Docks Act 1864 (27 & 28 Vict. c. 127):

The limits within which the powers of the company's harbour master, dock master, or pier master, for the regulations of the company's harbour, dock, and pier, shall be exercised are the harbour, dock entrance, channel works, and property of the company, and a distance of one hundred yards in every direction from the same respectively.

Webster, Q.C., Dr. Phillimore, and Barnes for the plaintiffs.—Assuming the accident to have happened outside the limits of the jurisdiction of the harbour commissioners, yet, if the harbour master was acting as harbour master and was negligent, the defendants are liable. By reason of the Acts of Parliament ships are beached under the control and directions of the harbour master, and the master and crew are bound to obey his orders. If in carrying out that operation damage is occasioned by the negligence of the harbour master, the commissioners ought not to escape liability because the vessel happens to be physically outside their jurisdiction. The damage is a consequence of the harbour master's orders. Having regard to the duties of the harbour master as laid down by ss. 52 and 53 of the Harbours, Docks, and Piers Clauses Act 1847, and the bye-laws applicable to Falmouth Harbour, it is submitted that the operation of beaching comes within the scope of the harbour master's functions. If so, each particular manœuvre incidental to beaching is within his functions, and hence the manœuvre of letting go the anchor was within the scope of the harbour master's duties. Assuming the harbour master to have been a mere volunteer, he nevertheless would be liable under the circumstances of the present case.

Bucknill, on behalf of Capt. Sherris, the harbour master.—The accident was in no way caused or contributed to by the harbour master, but was wholly caused by the negligence of the crew of the Rhosina. His position was that of a volunteer, and the court should therefore require proof of more than ordinary negligence before holding him liable.

Cohen, Q.C. (with him W. R. Kennedy), for the Falmouth Harbour Commissioners.—The harbour commissioners are not necessarily liable because damage is occasioned by the orders of their servant. It is a question of fact as to what is the nature of the obligation incurred by the commissioners by reason of the harbour master's order:

Mills v. Holton, 2 H. & N. 14.

The order to let go the anchor was an order incidental to the navigation of the vessel from one place in the harbour to another. With that the harbour master has nothing to do, inasmuch as he has no authority to navigate vessels. It is submitted that the accident happened within the area of the dock company, and therefore outside the limits of the jurisdiction of the harbour commissioners. If so, they are not liable.

Dr. Phillimore, in reply, cited

Wilson v. Brett, 11 M. & W. 113; 12 L. J. 264, Exch.

Sir JAMES HANNEN.—As this case has taken some time, I have had an opportunity of discussing some of the points with the Elder Brethren, so that it is not now necessary to delay my decision by any further discussion with them. The first question of fact which I shall deal with is as to the place of the accident, although I do not attach the importance to it that has been attached to it during the progress of the case. So far as I have to deal with it as a matter of fact, I must say that I have come to the conclusion that the place named by the master of the Rhosina is not the correct place. I am of opinion that the accident happened further to the eastward. It appears to me that Mr. McKenzie's evidence on behalf of the defendants is quite convincing. He is a person whose occupation made him familiar with the harbour, and he says the Rhosina was brought to a standstill just in a line with himself and the shore, so that he is able to speak positively as to the place. I, however, am of opinion that, so far as jurisdiction is concerned, this question of place is quite immaterial if the harbour master was acting as harbour master. Suppose there had been no question as to his being on board the Rhosina. Suppose he had been—in obedience to the rules laid down by the commissioners—on his own steamer, and had said to the master of the Rhosina, "I require you to bring your ship to anchor at this spot," and suppose the place had happened to be just over the line where the dock company had jurisdiction, and suppose there had been a rock there on which the vessel had gone, it seems to me impossible to argue that the harbour commissioners would be entitled to say, "We are not responsible, because the orders of the harbour master brought the ship physically outside our jurisdiction." The damage would be a consequence of the orders of the harbour master acting as harbour master, and therefore the commissioners would be liable.

The question, therefore, really is whether Capt. Sherris was originally on board the Rhosina in his capacity of harbour master, or whether he afterwards assumed the duties of harbour master. Now, with regard to his first going on board this vessel there is unfortunately a conflict of evidence. The fact that he had already fixed the place where the vessel was to go, tends to show that he had, before he went on board the Rhosina, done that which properly belonged to his office of harbour master. I think he would have been strictly within his rights if he had left the matter there, and said, "I require you to beach the vessel in such and such a place; you must navigate the vessel up to that spot, and carry out all the necessary manœuvres for beaching her." I am inclined to think that that was the position in which the harbour master originally was. I think that, on the whole, he is to be believed when he states that the way in which he came on board the Rhosina was not that he came in the ordinary course of his business as harbour master, but that his coming arose out of a difficulty as to whether a mud pilot or a Trinity House pilot was to be engaged. I think, on the whole, the evidence shows that he did say that, if he was well enough, he would come down in the morning and give assistance. There is a conflict of evidence as to whether or not he further said that he would take no responsibility upon himself. But in the view I take of the case it is not necessary for me to decide whether he said so or not; for, even supposing he said so, if he did in fact, when on board the vessel, assume the duties of harbour master he would be liable. It appears that he used these expressions not only to the master but also to Mr. Morgan. When he got on board, a state of things arose that might be expected from a divided command. There was the pilot, but the harbour master appears to have given directions which were acted upon.

I entirely assent to the argument addressed to me by the defendants' counsel, that it is no part of the duty of the harbour master to navigate the vessel, but it is, in my judgment, peculiarly part of the duty of the harbour master to say what berth and what moorings a vessel shall take, and what place in the harbour shall be occupied. That duty, in my judgment, applies equally to the beaching of a vessel as to the fastening her to buoys in the harbour; because it is obvious that the place where a vessel is to be beached must not be allowed to interfere with the navigation of the harbour. Now, the harbour master being on board, he appears to have gone forward and to have given a direction, the object of which was to fix the spot where the vessel was to be beached. In doing that, it appears to me that he was acting as harbour master. In my view of his duties, he would have the right of control over the place where vessels were to be anchored. Where a vessel's anchor shall be dropped for the purpose of beaching her is, in my judgment, within the duties of the harbour master. In my judgment although he had not originally, yet he then assumed the functions of harbour master in giving the order for the starboard anchor to be let go. For that act, if a negligent one, he and the harbour commissioners are liable. With regard to the propriety of the act, that is a question for the Trinity Brethren. In what I am about to say I am acting on their advice, which is that, in their judgment, what was done was grossly negligent. Even if, therefore, the harbour master is to be regarded as a volunteer, he would be personally liable. Cases have established the principle that, if a man has peculiar knowledge, his gross negligence is not excused by his being a volunteer. Now, the harbour master's functions extend all over the harbour, and he is a person who should, from his functions and special training, be fully capable, if he used his knowledge and skill properly, of giving directions for the beaching of a vessel. The case of a surgeon failing to use his surgical knowledge is a well-known example of this principle of law. Suppose a coachman gets another coachman to drive—the other coachman being in such circumstances merely a volunteer—and this second coachman drives at an excessive rate of speed and upsets the coach, he would not be excused from liability by saying he was a volunteer.

With regard to Capt. Sherris's act, what he says he intended to do was to let the anchor drop so that its crown should just touch the ground, and thus check the vessel's way, and so assist the action of the tug in getting the vessel's stem round to starboard. But I am advised that the effect of dropping the anchor, combined with the action of the tug, would be that the tug would draw the bows of the vessel in a direction to go over the anchor. That is precisely what happened, so that the reason which Capt. Sherris gives for the manœuvre condemns him I am further advised that the act of dropping the anchor at a time when it was known that the vessel was smelling the ground, and having regard to the position in which she was, was a manœuvre attended with danger. I am advised that it was such a manœuvre that no person having reasonable skill would have recourse to. The dropping an anchor for the purpose of dredging, and so checking the way of a vessel, is a delicate operation, and should be resorted to with the greatest care and safeguards, as having someone ready to stop the chain at the critical moment. Nothing of the kind was done. Capt. Sherris took no steps of the kind, but says he assumed that there would be somebody ready to stop it. I am advised that it was a manœuvre which, under the circumstances, cannot be justified, and that the harbour master ought, as a reasonable man, to have foreseen that he incurred risk of the vessel grounding on the anchor. For these reasons I am of opinion that the defendants are each and all of them liable.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

March 21 and 24, 1884.

(Before the LORD CHANCELLOR (Selborne), Lords WATSON, BRAMWELL, and FITZGERALD.)

GRANT AND CO. v. COVERDALE, TODD, AND CO. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF APPEAL IN ENGLAND.

Charter-party — Exception in charter-party — Commencement of lay days—Loading prevented by frost.

Where it is agreed by charter-party that a ship shall proceed to a certain dock and there load in the customary manner, an exception that the charterer is not to be liable for demurrage if the loading is prevented by frost is confined to such frost as prevents the actual loading on board of the goods which are in the dock ready to be loaded, and does not cover frost which prevents the shipper getting his goods to the dock.

By the terms of a charter-party a ship was to proceed to the port of loading, and there load a cargo of iron in the customary manner from the agents of the charterers.

The charter-party contained the following clauses: "Cargo to be supplied as fast as steamer can receive. Time to commence from the vessel being ready to load, and ten days on demurrage at 40l. per day . . . except in case of . . . frost . . . or any other unavoidable accident preventing the loading." The ship arrived at the port of loading and went into dock, but after the loading had commenced a canal, through which part of the cargo had to pass in lighters in order to reach the dock, was made impassable by a severe frost, and the loading was delayed.

Held (affirming the judgment of the court below), that this delay was not within the exception in the charter-party which referred only to delays in "loading," which would not have been interfered with by the frost if the cargo had been brought to the dock otherwise than by the canal.

THIS was an appeal from a judgment of the Court of Appeal (Brett, M.R., Lindley and Fry, L.JJ.), reported in 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 74; 48 L. T. Rep. N.S. 701; and 11 Q. B. Div. 543, reversing a decision of Pollock, B., reported in 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 528; 46 L.T. Rep. N.S. 632; and 8 Q.B. Div. 600.

The action was brought by the owners of the steamship Mennythorpe, the present respondents, against the charterers, the present appellants, for demurrage and damages for the detention of the ship, under circumstances which appear in the head-note.

The material portions of the charter-party were as follows:

Cargo to be supplied as fast as steamer can receive at all hatchways for loading, and to be discharged as fast as customary with steamers. Time to commence from the vessel being ready to load and unload and ten days on demurrage, over and above the said lay days, at 40*l.* per day (except in case of hands striking work, or frosts, or floods, or any other unavoidable accidents preventing the loading and unloading; in which case owners to have the option of employing the steamer in some short voyage trade until receipt of written notice from charterers that they are ready to resume employment without delay to the ship).

The case was tried before Pollock, B. without a jury at the Glamorgan Summer Assizes in 1881, when all matters of fact were referred to a special referee to report.

The material facts found by him are set out fully in the report of the case before Pollock, B., who decided in favour of the defendants, but his decision was reversed by the Court of Appeal, as above mentioned, on the ground that the case was governed by the decision in Kay v. Field (47 L. T. Rep. N. S. 423; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 588; 10 Q. B. Div. 241).

From this judgment the present appeal was brought.

Webster, Q.C. and Moulton (Bowen Rowlands, Q.C. with them) appeared for the appellants, and contended that the loading was in fact prevented by frost within the meaning of the exception in the charter-party, for the forwarding of the iron from the wharf by the canal to the dock was all part of the loading and cannot be separated from it. They referred to

The Solicitor-General (Sir F. Herschell, Q.C.) and Brynmor Jones, who appeared for the respondents, were not called upon to address their Lordships.

At the conclusion of the argument for the appellants, their Lordships gave judgment as follows:—

The LORD CHANCELLOR (Selborne).—My Lords: I believe that none of your Lordships have any doubt that the order appealed from in this case ought to be affirmed. The whole question of course depends upon the terms of the charter-party, and the material terms are these: On the part of the shipowner it is agreed that the ship "shall (after discharging her cargo at Middlesborough) with all convenient speed sail and proceed to Cardiff East Bute Dock, or so near thereunto as she may safely get, and there load always afloat in the customary manner from the agents of the freighter, a full and complete cargo of about 1800 tons of iron." That is the shipowner's contract. The charterer contracts on his part: "Cargo to be supplied as fast as steamer can receive at all hatchways for loading" (I omit what relates to unloading and discharge), "time to commence from the vessel being ready to load and ten days on demurrage over and above the said lay days at 40*l.* per day (except in case of hands striking work, or frosts or floods, or any other unavoidable accidents preventing the loading)." Now the exception has reference to the loading and nothing else. It is important to observe with respect to any argument founded on the particular accidents enumerated, frosts, floods, or hands striking work, to which large general words are superadded, that those are in a printed form, and are meant therefore to suit each particular case as far as they can, but they are not introduced in contemplation of any particular case, this or any other. But the mention of "Cardiff East Bute Dock" is a part of the special terms of this particular contract, not of the printed form; it is manifest, therefore, that those words must be applied reddendo singula singulis according to the circumstances which may in point of fact be applicable to the particular case in the special contract. You cannot found upon anyone of them an argument of this sort, that it must of necessity have been introduced with reference to the particular place, and the particular circumstances of that place. With that observation I proceed to notice that it is not denied, and cannot be denied, that unless those words of exception according to their proper construction take this case which has happened out of the demurrage clause, the mere fact of frost or any other thing having impeded the performance of that which the charterer and not the shipowner was bound to perform will not in any degree absolve him from the consequences of keeping the ship too long. That was decided, under circumstances very similar in many respects, in the case of Kearon v. Pearson (ubi sup.), and decided expressly on the ground, as was pointed out I think by all the learned judges, certainly by Bramwell, B., by Wilde, B., and by Pollock, C.B., that there was no contract as to the particular place from which the cargo was to come, no contract as to the particular manner in which it was to be supplied, or how it was to be brought to the place of loading, and that therefore it could not be supposed that the parties were contracting about any such thing.

Now it really appears to me that when you observe that this exception in the contract is limited to "accidents preventing the loading," the only question is, what is the meaning of "loading," and whether this particular frost did, according to the facts, prevent the loading. There are two things to be done; the operation of loading is the particular operation in which both parties have to concur. Taken literally it is spoken of in the early part of this charter-party as the thing which the shipowner is to do. The ship is to "proceed to Cardiff East Bute Dock," "and there load the cargo." No doubt for the purpose of loading the charterer must also do his part; he must have the cargo there to be loaded, and tender it to be put on board the ship in the usual and proper manner. Therefore the business of both parties meets and concurs in that operation of loading. When the charterer has tendered the cargo, and when the operation has proceeded to the point at which the shipowner is to take charge of it, everything after that is the shipowner's business, and everything before the commencement of the operation of loading, those things which are so essential to the operation of loading that they are conditions sine quibus non of that operation, everything before that is the charterer's part only. It would therefore appear to me to be most unreasonable to suppose, unless the words make it perfectly clear that the shipowner has contracted that his ship may be detained for an unlimited time on account of impediments, whatever their nature may be, to those things with which he has nothing whatever to do, which precede altogether the whole operation, which are no part whatever of it, and are perfectly distinct from it, but belong to that which is exclusively the charterer's business. He has to contract for the cargo, he has to buy the cargo, he has to convey the cargo to the place of loading and have it ready there to be put on board, and it is only when he has done those things that the duty and the obligation of the shipowner in respect of the loading arises. These words in the exception are as large as any words can be. They mention "strikes, frosts, floods, and all other unavoidable accidents preventing the loading." If, therefore, you are to carry back the loading to anything necessary to be done by the charterer in order to have the cargo ready to be loaded, no human being can tell where you are to stop. The bankruptcy, for instance, of the person with whom he has contracted for the supply of the iron, or disputes about the fulfillment of the contract, the refusal at a critical point of time to supply the iron, the neglect of the persons who ought to put it on board lighters to come down the canal for any distance, or to be brought by sea, or to put it on the railway, or bring it in any other way in which it is to be brought. All those things are of course practical impediments to the charterer having the cargo ready to be shipped at the proper place and time, but is it reasonable that the shipowner should be held to be answerable for all those things, and is that within the natural meaning of the word "loading?" Are those things any part of the operation of loading? Nothing I suppose is better established in law with regard to mercantile cases of this kind than the maxim Causa proxima, non remota, spectatur, and it appears to me that the fact that this particular wharf was very near the Cardiff East Bute Dock can make no difference whatever in principle if it was not the place of loading. If the cargo had to be brought from this wharf on the Glamorganshire Canal, however near it was, if it had to be brought over a passage which in point of fact was impeded, and over which it was not brought to the place of loading, to say that the wharf on the Glamorganshire Canal was upon a fair construction of the words within the place of loading, appears to me to be no more tenable than if the same thing had been said of a place a mile higher up the canal where, according to the actual contract, the persons were to supply the iron, and the owner of the iron might have been found. That really is quite enough to dispose of the whole argument.

The case of Hudson v. Ede (ubi sup.) was referred to. I understand that case as proceeding upon the same principles, but as containing an admission in point of fact of this distinction, that where there is, in a proved state of facts, an inevitable necessity that something should be done in order that there should be a loading at the place agreed upon, as for instance that the goods should be brought across part of a river from the only place from which they can be brought, even though that place is a considerable distance off, yet it being practically according to known mercantile usage the only place from which they can be brought to be loaded, the parties must be held to have contracted that the goods should be loaded from that place in the usual manner unless there was an unavoidable impediment. And of course, if the facts had been so about this particular wharf on the Glamorganshire Canal, if that had been the only possible place from which goods could be brought to be loaded at the East Bute Dock, that authority might have applied. But not only was that not the case, but in point of fact some parts of this very cargo not only could be, but actually were, brought up by carts to the East Bute Dock and put on board the ship, and I infer from the finding of the referee that the whole might have been done by carting, though I agree that it would have been at an expense which was preposterous and unreasonable if you are to look at the interest of the charterer. But, if the charterer has engaged that he will do a certain thing, he must of course pay the damage which arises from his not doing it, whatever the cause of his not doing it may be, whether it be his not being willing to incur an unreasonable expense or whether it be any other cause. Under these circumstances I think that your Lordships can have no hesitation in affirming the judgment appealed from, and I move your Lordships to do so with costs.

Lord WATSON.—My Lords: I am of the same opinion. This vessel had reached her destination at the East Bute Dock, and thereupon it became the duty of the charterer to load the vessel; that is to say, to bring the cargo either to the wharf or by means of lighters to the vessel's side and to put it on board her. The exception which he pleads is an exception in his favour, upon the obligation thus incumbent upon him, and it is for him to show that it extends to the case which he now maintains. I am of opinion that it cannot be so extended. I think that in this case "loading" means loading in the East Bute Dock, and I am not prepared to assent to a construction of this charter-party which would imply that the word "loading" had as many different meanings as there happened to be different merchants or manufacturers of iron rails in Cardiff who happened to select a different locality in order to store their rails for the purposes of shipment.

Lord BRAMWELL.—My Lords: I am entirely of the same opinion. Whether, if these parties had met and talked over the possibility of frost preventing the passage of the iron from Crawshay's Wharf to this ship, or down the Glamorganshire Canal to Crawshay's Wharf, or any other conceivable difficulty arising from frost, whether in that case the shipowner would have agreed to bear the risk of it, the charterer bearing none of the risk of it, is more than I can say. It is utterly impossible to speculate upon such a thing as that. All that we can do is to deal with the particular words that they have used, as to which it is very likely that neither of them had in their minds any definite meaning. But the words to my mind are tolerably plain; they relate entirely to something which prevents the loading, that is to say, the actual putting on board of the cargo, and I think, when you couple that with the expression in the earlier part of the charter-party, that the vessel is to "proceed to the East Bute Dock or so near thereunto as she may safely get, and there load," the exemption or exception really does relate to the very act of loading. Then that being so, in the present case frost did not prevent the loading; what it did was to prevent the particular cargo which the charterer had provided from being brought to the place where the loading would not have been prevented.

Lord FITZGERALD.—My Lords: I also concur. One of the terms of the contract itself was performed: the ship arrived in due course at Cardiff East Bute Dock, the place of loading according to the contract, where she was, in the language of the contract, "to load in the customary manner from the agents of the freighter a full and complete cargo of about 1800 tons." "Cargo to be supplied as fast as steamer can receive at all hatchways for loading." "Time to commence from the vessel being ready to load." "Demurrage over and above the lay days at 40*l.* per day, except" (inter alia) "in case of frosts preventing the loading." There is another provision which is not undeserving of attention: "Steamer not to require to load before 9th Jan." It seems to me that the exception applies only where the accident prevents the loading at the place of loading, and not where it prevents or retards the transit or conveyance of the cargo to the place of loading. The shipper was bound to have a full cargo at the place of loading, and he took on himself all the risks consequent upon delay in transit. If he had had it there it could have been loaded within the lay days, and no case of demurrage would have arisen.

Order appealed from affirmed, and appeal dismissed with costs.

COURT OF APPEAL.

Jan. 13 and 28, 1885.

THE NEWBATTLE. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM BUTT, J.

Collision — Practice — Foreign Government — Counter-claim—Cross action—Security to answer counter-claim — Admiralty Court Act 1861 (20 Vict. c. 10), s. 34.

The Court of Admiralty has power under sect. 34 of the Admiralty Court Act 1861, to stay proceedings instituted by a foreign Government in rem for collision until the Government has given security for the amount of the defendants' counter-claim.

The words "cross action" in sect. 34 of the Admiralty Court Act 1861 cover a counter-claim.

THIS was an appeal from a decision of Butt, J., given in a motion by the plaintiffs in a damage action in rem, to set aside an order of the registrar staying all proceedings in the action until the plaintiffs had put in bail to answer the defendants' counter-claim.

The action arose out of a collision between the steamship Louise Marie, owned by the Belgian Government, and the steamship Newbattle. The action was instituted by the Belgian Government. The defendants counter-claimed and sought to stay the plaintiff's proceedings until bail had been given to answer their counter-claim.

At the hearing of the motion before Butt, J. the plaintiffs' counsel offered to prove on affidavit that the plaintiffs were the Belgian Government. This, however, the defendants did not require, it being assumed that the statement was correct.

At the hearing of the appeal it was alleged, on affidavit, that the Louisa Marie was the property of the King of the Belgians, and was used for the same purposes as his vessel the Parlement Belge: (cf. 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 235; 42 L. T. Rep. N. S. 273.)

J. P. Aspinall, for the plaintiffs, in support of the motion.—There is no power under the Judicature Act to stay the plaintiff's action until security has been given to answer the counter-claim. The only power to do so is given by sect. 34 of the Admiralty Court Act 1861. (b) That section relates to cross actions only and not to counter-claims. In the case of The Alexander (5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 89; 48 L. T. Rep. N. S. 797) the court seems to have intimated that the word "cross action" in that section would not cover a counter-claim. [BUTT, J.—I am sure I never laid down any such doctrine. I have always been of opinion that since the Judicature Act that section applies as much to counter-claims as to cross actions. Dr. Phillimore, as amicus curiæ.—It was so decided by the Court of Appeal in a case in which I was counsel.] Secondly, the section only gives power to stay proceedings where the ship cannot be arrested. It is submitted that this must mean "cannot be physically arrested." In the present case there is nothing to prevent the Louise Marie being arrested, except the fact that she belongs to the Belgian Government, which fact does not prevent her arrest, but merely gives her a privilege extended to her by this court by the comity of nations. If the court chose it could order her arrest, and hence it cannot be said that she cannot be arrested. [BUTT, J.—Are there any cases in which the Court of Chancery has ordered security to be given for costs by a foreign Government suing as plaintiffs?] There are several cases in which the Court of Chancery has stayed proceedings instituted by a foreign Government until the Government has named somebody to answer a cross bill of discovery on the part of the defendants; but I have been unable to find any case where there has been a stay of proceedings until security for costs has been given by a foreign Government. [Barnes for defendant.—In The Republic of Costa Rica v. Erlanger (35 L. T. Rep. N. S. 19; 3 Ch. Div. 62), an order was made by the Court of Chancery against a foreign Government for security for costs. BUTT, J.—Then, Mr. Aspinall, if an order can be made for security for costs, why, by analogy, should not an order be made for security for damages?] Because the effect of such an order is to compel the foreign Government to submit to the jurisdiction in respect of a claim against them, it having been distinctly laid down in The Parlement Belge (4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 235; 42 L. T. Rep. N. S. 273; 5 P. Div. 197), and many other cases, that a foreign Government cannot be forced to submit to the jurisdiction. [BUTT, J.—The Belgian Government have already submitted to the jurisdiction by claiming, and I am now asked to prevent their prosecuting their claim until they have given security for the damage which their vessel has done.] That can only be done under sect. 34, which never was intended to cover such a case as this, but only cases where the defendants' vessel was at the bottom of the sea or continuously out of the jurisdiction.

(a) Reported by J. P. ASPINALL and BUTLER ASPINALL, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

(b) Sect. 34 is as follows: "The High Court of Admiralty may, on the application of the defendant in any cause of damage, and on his instituting a cross cause for the damage sustained by him in respect of the same collision, direct that the principal and the cross cause be heard at the same time and on the same evidence; and if in the principal cause the ship of the defendant has been arrested or security given by him to answer judgment, and in the cross cause the ship of the plaintiff cannot be arrested and security has not been given to answer judgment therein, the court may, if it think fit, suspend the proceedings in the principal cause until security has been given to answer judgment in the cross cause."—ED.

Barnes, for the defendants, was not called upon.

BUTT, J.—In this case I am of opinion that there is no reason for interfering with the registrar's order. It is said that the plaintiffs are a foreign Government. This does not appear on the affidavit, but it has been assumed during the argument, and I now assume it to be so. Under these circumstances, the question is whether the plaintiffs, as a foreign Government, having voluntarily begun an action in this court, and arrested the defendants' ship, are entitled to go on with the action without giving security to answer the defendants' cross action or counter-claim. The Legislature has thought fit to provide that when for some reason the plaintiffs' ship cannot be arrested by the counter-claimant, security shall be given by the plaintiffs so that the defendants may secure payment of any sum they may recover. On the assumption which I have already mentioned, the plaintiffs' ship cannot be arrested, so that the case falls within sect. 34 of the Admiralty Court Act 1861. Mr. Aspinall has argued that though this case is within the words of the section, it is not within its intention. I think that it is within both the wording and the intention. It has also been contended that, assuming this to be so, the court, in its discretion, should not order the Belgian Government to give security. However, an authority from the Chancery Division has been cited that the practice has been to order foreign Governments to give security for costs. If so, by parity of reasoning, I do not see why a foreign Government should not be ordered to give security for damages. I must, therefore, dismiss this motion with costs.

From this decision the plaintiffs appealed.

Dr. Phillimore (with him J. P. Aspinall) in support of the appeal.—In the case of The Seringapatam (3 W. Rob. 41 n.), decided in 1848, in which the plaintiffs' vessel being lost in collision, the defendants were seeking to restrain their proceedings until they had given security to answer the defendants' cross-action. Dr. Lushington reluctantly decided that he had no such power. The remarks of that learned judge no doubt gave rise to the statute under consideration. In that case it was physically impossible that the ship could be arrested, owing to her being at the bottom of the sea, and to that state of circumstances only has the statute been applied. In the present case the Louise Marie is privileged from arrest by the comity of nations: (The Parlement Belge, ubi sup.) This case is not within the mischief contemplated by the statute, as there can be no reasonable doubt that the King of the Belgians will pay whatever is adjudged against him.

Barnes, for the respondents, cited

BRETT, M.R.—It seems to me that this case is clearly within the words of the Act of Parliament. What is there to take it out of the section? It is said that this order ought not to have been made on a sovereign prince. There are some orders which ought not to be made on a sovereign prince, but there are some which ought. In the case of The Parlement Belge (ubi sup.), the defendant, who was a sovereign, appeared under protest, and the question there raised was whether the Admiralty Court could seize a sovereign's ship carrying the insignia of sovereignty. It, however, has always been held that if a sovereign comes into an English court as plaintiff, and avails himself of its procedure, the court may make all proper orders against him. How far that will go I do not know. In this case, the plaintiff having instituted his action in the English Admiralty Court, an order that he shall be restrained from proceeding until he gives security to answer the defendants' counter-claim is not in my opinion an order which touches his dignity. The court may very well do that within the comity of nations. The plaintiff has submitted himself to the jurisdiction of the court by instituting his action, and therefore the court says, "We will not exercise our jurisdiction in your favour unless you give security." What may be the result as to execution or seizing the ship afterwards is quite another thing. We, however, do not anticipate that if the judgment goes against the King of the Belgians he will not pay.

Cotton, L.J.—I think that this order was right. There was a counter-claim, and that, as it seems to me, is the same as a cross action. The section gives the court power to stay the proceedings in the principal action until the plaintiff in that action has given security to answer the defendants' cross action. It is very true that the court could not seize the ship. But all the order does is to stay the plaintiffs' proceedings until he has given security to answer the defendants' counter-claim. If a sovereign comes in and institutes a suit in an English court he submits himself to all proper orders being made upon him. It is true that the court cannot make an order to seize a sovereign's ship; but where the plaintiff has the security of the defendants' vessel it is only right that the court should put the defendants in the same position and give them an equivalent security. I am of opinion that the section applies as much to a foreign sovereign as to any other suitor. This appeal must therefore be dismissed.

Lindley, J.—I also think that the order made by Butt, J. is a proper order. The principal cause was instituted by a foreign sovereign. Thereupon the defendant counter-claims, and I have no doubt whatever that a counter-claim is a cross action within the meaning of the statute. The case is brought within the language of the section, whatever may have been the intention of the Legislature, and it also seems to me to be within the mischief. In these circumstances the judge is asked to stay the plaintiff's proceedings until he gives security for the amount of the defendants' counter-claim. This he has done. He says, "I shall stop your action unless you give security." He clearly had the power to do it, and I think he was quite right to do so. This appeal must therefore be dismissed with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

The Mersey Docks and Harbour Board v. The Overseers of Llaneilian. (a)

Poor rate—Lighthouse—Tower of lighthouse used as telegraph station—Rateability—"Beneficial occupation"—The Mersey Docks Acts.

The appellants appealed against a poor rate made by the respondents in accordance with a supplemental valuation of rateable hereditaments in the parish of Llaneilian, wherein the appellants were assessed in respect of a lighthouse, telegraph station, houses, buildings, and land at Point Lynas, at the gross estimated value of 305*l.*, and rateable value of 244*l.*

The appellants were incorporated as a body of public trustees by the Mersey Docks and Harbour Act 1857, and the property, powers, rights, and privileges of the Liverpool Dock Trustees, including the right to levy certain harbour and light dues on vessels entering the port of Liverpool, were vested in the appellants. The tolls were so fixed that, with the other receipts of the appellants applicable to conservancy purposes, they should not be higher than necessary for conservancy expenditure, and therefore no profits were receivable by the appellants from the occupation of any of the property.

The lighthouse consisted of a tower and a dwelling-house adjoining. In the tower there was the light-room, which contained the flash-light with clock-work for regulating the flashes, and also a room used for working a telegraph wire which was one of the connections of the wire from Birkenhead to Holyhead, maintained by Her Majesty's Postmaster-General for the exclusive use of the appellants under an agreement. The dwelling-house adjoining the tower and the other premises were occupied by the light-keepers as servants of the appellants.

The tower of the lighthouse had no occupation value, except as a lighthouse and as a telegraph station.

The appellants contended that it was not rateable on the ground that it was not and could not be the subject of any beneficial occupation; and they contended that the premises other than the tower ought to be assessed upon their value to be let from year to year, supposing they were not used for the light or telegraph, but were disconnected therefrom, and applied to any other purposes for which they might be available.

The respondents contended that the whole of the premises ought to be assessed upon their existing value to the existing occupiers.

Held, that the tower was incapable of profitable occupation either as a lighthouse or as a telegraph station, in consequence of the restrictions as to profits contained in the Mersey Dock Acts, and was therefore not rateable; but that the adjoining premises must be assessed at a valuation which took into consideration the existence of the tower and its use as a lighthouse and telegraph station, and not at their value supposing them to be disconnected from and independent of the tower.

Judgment of Lord Coleridge, C.J. and Mathew, J. (5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 284; 51 L. T. Rep. N. S. 62) varied.

This was an appeal from a judgment of Lord Coleridge, C.J. and Mathew, J. (reported 51 L. T. Rep. N. S. 62; ante, p. 248) on a special case.

Bigham, Q.C. and Carver for the Board.—We do not argue the point that was taken in the court below upon the 430th section of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104), conceding that it does not apply to the present case. The appellants are expressly restricted by statute from making any profit out of their property used for conservancy purposes, and here the tower, both as a lighthouse and as a telegraph station, is so used. In neither capacity therefore is the tower rateable. There is no such distinction between the two uses of the tower as the Divisional Court has drawn. The adjoining premises must be considered without reference to the tower. [Cotton, L.J.—Supposing a collection of artisans' houses to be built in the immediate neighbourhood of some great factory, are not the values of those houses enhanced by the existence of the factory?] It does not follow that they will be. They cited

M'Intyre, Q.C. (Marshall with him) for the overseers.—A tenant might rent the whole of the dock estate, and the lighthouse would increase the value of that estate. The lighthouse therefore is rateable. It does not follow that property is not rateable because you cannot get a hypothetical tenant for it. They referred to

R v. Coke, 5 B. & C. 797.

Brett, M.R.—I cannot say that the facts are very clearly stated in the case, or that the questions asked are put in very clear terms, but it seems to me that there are two kinds of buildings upon Point Lynas, first, a tower, which is occupied by the appellants, and, secondly, certain houses close to the tower, which are also occupied by the appellants. As to the tower, it is used as a lighthouse, and for the purpose of working a telegraph wire from it, and, as far as I can see, I should say that the truth is, that it is neither used for nor useful for any other purpose. The houses, however, close to it, are used and occupied as dwelling-houses by the servants of the appellants, who are there for the purpose of working the light and the telegraph. These houses are dwelling-houses, and, with the tower, are all the property of the dock board. The use of the tower is certainly regulated by Acts of Parliament, which deals with its use both as a lighthouse and a telegraph station. Those Acts of Parliament have treated it as what is called conservancy apparatus—that is, apparatus for the safety of shipping coming into the port of Liverpool. That conservancy apparatus causes to the dock board large expenditure, and in respect of that expenditure the dock board is certainly entitled to the receipts from its other sources of income, but it seems to me plain that, upon the proper construction of the Acts of Parliament, the receipts may never legally exceed the expenditure. When, therefore, you come to consider the case of a hypothetical tenant who may be supposed to rent this tower, you must suppose him to rent it subject to the Acts of Parliament, because if he did not do so he would have no power to levy tolls at all. But if he takes it subject to the Acts of Parliament, he must also take it subject to the burden imposed thereby, which, in this case, is that he never can charge more than will be sufficient to pay the expenses. Therefore, if this is so, there never can be any profitable occupation of the tower, it has been struck with sterility by statute, and can have no beneficial value. Therefore, as far as regards the tower, both as a lighthouse and as a telegraph station, it being in both capacities subject to the Acts of Parliament, I think that in neither capacity is it rateable, for in neither capacity is it, or can it be, the subject of any beneficial occupation; and, apart from the purposes for which it is used, the case finds that it is not useful for any other purpose.

As to the dwelling-houses, it is clear, to my mind, that they are capable of beneficial occupation, for there is nothing in the Acts of Parliament to prevent the dock board letting them at any time, and a hypothetical tenant would certainly be willing to pay some rent for them. But then the question arises what is the true measure of rateable value in respect of these houses? The suggestion that in order to get at that value the revenues of the dock board are to be taken into account is contrary to every decided case. They must be treated as buildings capable of being let as dwelling-houses, but in a particular position with regard to something else. The neighbourhood must be taken into account—that is plain. A house has a greater letting value as a dwelling-house if it is in the neighbourhood of Grosvenor-square than if it is in the neighbourhood of St. Gile's; and similarly buildings which are capable of being let as workmen's cottages will certainly have a greater letting value if they are in the neighbourhood of some large factory than if they are not. In such a case, then, the existence of the factory might properly be taken into account, because it affects the letting value of the cottages. Coming, then, to the facts of this case, there is here a lighthouse and a telegraph station in existence, and to be used for those purposes in connection with the port of Liverpool. It is obvious that, as long as that state of things lasts, workmen will be wanted to work the light and the telegraph station. Where will these workmen live? It is obvious that they can most conveniently live in the adjoining houses. The hypothetical tenant, therefore, might fairly take into consideration the fact that the dock board would probably want these houses for its work people, and therefore the existence of the tower, used by the dock board as a lighthouse, and a telegraph station is a circumstance which the tenant might properly take into consideration, and in respect of which he might be willing to give a higher rent for these houses as dwelling-houses. To that extent, then, and to that extent only, as it seems to me, we may take into account the existence of the tower. This, I think, is the case put in the third question, and therefore the rateable value will be fixed at 76*l*. Some question arose as to which of the questions did put this case, but I think it is clearly the third, for, if not, there is no difference between the third and fourth questions; for the fourth question contemplates the striking of the tower out of the calculation entirely, and estimating the value of these cottages as if the tower did not exist. Therefore, it seems to me that the true answer in this case is that the tower is not to be rated, because it has no occupation value, but that the houses are to be rated at 76*l*.

Cotton, J.L.—In this case there are substantially two questions. The first two questions upon the case are in reality one, because they both relate to the tower in its two different capacities, the one as a lighthouse, the other as a telegraph station. In my opinion the telegraph station and lighthouse are upon the same footing. They are both used for conservancy purposes, and the case finds that the tower has no value except as a lighthouse or telegraph station. But being thus used for conservancy purposes, the tower would only be capable of beneficial occupation by reason of the light dues and the use of the telegraph; but these receipts are so restricted by Acts of Parliament that they cannot be fixed so as to produce a beneficial or profitable result to the board. Any hypothetical tenant, therefore, who took these premises must take them subject to these parliamentary fetters, and the result of course would be that he could not possibly obtain any beneficial or profitable result. In my opinion, therefore, the tower cannot be rated in respect of the lighthouse and telegraph, and it is found that it has no other occupation value; therefore our answer must be in favour of the appellants.

On the second point, as to the dwelling-house, the difficulty in my mind is to understand what are the alternatives presented, but I think that the fourth alternative means that the lighthouse is to be left out of sight in the calculation altogether, but that, according to the third alternative, if the existence of the tower is to be taken into account, 76*l.* is to be the rateable value. I think the third alternative is the right one. The tower is not to be rated in respect of its use as a lighthouse or telegraph station, but as a fact it is so used, and the fact of its being so used necessitates that there shall be servants there, and the necessity of servants being there to work the tower may be taken into account in considering the value of such houses as those servants would probably occupy. Any person taking these houses would be influenced as to the amount of rent by the fact of the adjoining tower being used for such a purpose, and there would be a greater probability of the houses being occupied at a beneficial rent from the fact that this tower existed and was so used. I think therefore that the tower cannot be disregarded altogether, but must be taken into consideration to this extent, though the board is not to be rated in respect of it. The third alternative seems to put this view, and therefore the rateable value is the amount there fixed, namely 76*l.*

Lindley, L.J.—I am of the same opinion, for the same reasons. Mathew, J. seems to have seen his way to distinguish between the case of the tower used as a lighthouse, and the case of the tower used as a telegraph station. I cannot find any ground for any such distinction in the case.

HIGH COURT OF JUSTICE.

QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION.

Nov 27 and 28, 1884.

(Before Lord Coleridge, C.J., Mathew and Smith, JJ.)

Smith v. Dart and Son. (a)

Charter-party—Cancellation clause—Construction—Excepted perils—Ship to arrive at port of loading free of pratique on or before a certain day—Charterer's option to cancel.

The cancellation clause in a charter-party being for the benefit of the charterers, and the arrival of the ship on a date therein named being a condition precedent to the duty of the shipowner to load, the excepted perils mentioned in the charter-party have no application to such a clause, and hence, where the ship is prevented by these perils from arriving at the port of loading by the date mentioned, the charterers have the right to cancel.

In an action for breach of charter-party, an expression of opinion by the judge that a certain port is a "safe loading place" is not a misdirection if he leaves the question to the jury.

A shipowner agreed by charter-party that his vessel should "proceed to three safe loading places between C. and M., both inclusive, commencing with the easternmost place as ordered after arrival in Spain . . . . and there load from the charterer or his agent 7000 cases of oranges . . . . and being so loaded should therewith proceed, &c. . . . . (the act of God, the Queen's enemies, restraints of princes and rulers, pirates, civil commotion, riots, strikes, fire, frosts, floods, and all and every other dangers and accidents of the seas, rivers, and steam navigation of what nature or kind soever during the said voyage always mutually excepted . . . . Should the steamer not be arrived at first loading port free of pratique, and ready to load on or before the 15th Dec. next, the charterer has the option of cancelling or confirming this charter-party."

The vessel arrived at the first loading port ordered on the 13th Dec., but was not free of pratique there on or before the 15th Dec., communication with the shore being impossible in the then state of the sea and weather, whereupon on the 16th Dec. the charterers' agents gave notice to the master that they cancelled the charter-party, and refused to load the vessel.

Held, in an action by the shipowner for breach of the charter-party, that the excepted perils clause could not be read into the clause providing for the arrival of the vessel at the port free of pratique on or before a certain day, and that the charterers were therefore entitled under the said clause to cancel the charter-party.

This was an action brought by John William Smith, as owner of the steamship Spark, against Joseph H. Dart and Son, fruit merchants in the city of London, to recover damages which the plaintiff alleged had been incurred by him in consequence of a breach by the defendants of a charter-party made on the 14th Nov. 1881 between the plaintiff and the defendants.

(a) Reported by J. Smith Esq., Barrister-at-law.

The charter-party in question was, so far as material, in the following terms:

Nov. 14, 1881.

It is this day mutually agreed between Mr. John W. Smith, owner of the good steamship called the Spark, s.s., classed 100 A 1, of the measurement of 863 nett / 1342 gross tons or thereabouts, and Messrs. Jos. H. Dart and Son, of London, merchants, that the said steamer, being tight, staunch, and strong, and every way fitted for the voyage, shall with all convenient speed proceed to three safe loading-places between Castellon and Malaga, both inclusive, commencing with easternmost place, as ordered, after arrival in Spain (steamer having liberty of taking outward cargo last voyage from any port to any port for owner's benefit), or so near thereto as she may safely get, and there load from the charterer or his agents 7000 cases of oranges and or other lawful merchandise, no oranges or other cargo to be stowed in combings of the hatches not exceeding what she can reasonably stow and carry over and above her cabin tackle, apparel, provisions, and furniture, and being so loaded, shall therewith proceed to London and Hull, or so near thereto as she may safely get, and deliver the same agreeably to bills of lading, and so end the voyage, said bills of lading to be signed at any rate of freight, but at not less than chartered rate, without prejudice to this charter-party (the act of God, the Queen's enemies, restraints of princes and rulers, pirates, civil commotion, riots, strikes, fire, frosts, floods, and all and every other dangers and accidents of the seas, rivers, and steam navigation of what nature and kind soever during the said voyage always mutually excepted). And the charterer does hereby promise and agree to load the said steamer with the said cargo at the port or ports of loading, and to receive the same at the port or ports of delivery as herein stated, and also pay freight as follows: Two shillings and sixpence, 2*s.* 6*d.* Hull, 2*s.* 6*d.* London, in full of all port charges, dues, and pilotages, &c., other goods if shipped to pay in full and fair proportion thereto. Payment whereof to become due and be made as follows: Cash for steamer's ordinary disbursements at port or ports of loading, not exceeding 100*l.* in all, to be advanced on account of freight subject to cost of insurance only, and remainder on right and true delivery of the cargo in cash. Seven weather working days (Sunday and holidays excepted) to be allowed the charterer (if not sooner despatched) for loading, and to be discharged as fast as steamer can deliver, in a safe berth as ordered by charterer. Lay-days not to commence before the 1st Dec. next should the steamer be ready to load previously, time occupied shifting ports not to count as lay-days. Should the steamer not be arrived at first loading port free of pratique and ready to load on or before the 15th Dec. next, charterer has the option of cancelling or confirming this charter-party. Ten days on demurrage at 35*l.* per day to be paid for each and every day the steamer is detained over and above the said lay days, the cargo to be taken from alongside at merchant's risk and expense, and to be properly stowed by a regular stevedore appointed by charterer or his agents at the expense and risk of the steamer, he being wholly under the direction of the master, the charge not to exceed what other steamers pay. Steamer shall not be ballasted with sand or mud, or anything prejudicial to the cargo. It is also agreed that, for security and payment of freight, dead freight, and demurrage, the said owner or master shall have an absolute lien and charge on the said cargo.

And there were also other provisions as to the employment of charterers' agents for the ship's business, the ventilation of the steamer during the homeward voyage, the giving notice of any delay occurring in the course of it, the charterers' right to tranship in consequence thereof, the announcement of the ship's arrival at her outward port of discharge, liberty to load ore or lead or other dead weight for owner's benefit at any port or ports, but no other fruit but charterers' was to be shipped, and the penalty for the non-performance of the agreement was to be the estimated amount of freight.

Pursuant to the charter-party the Spark proceeded to Carthagena in Spain, and there, on the 11th Dec., Messrs. Dart and Co., of Valencia, ordered her to Burriana to load, at which port she arrived on the 13th Dec, but was not free of pratique there on or before the 15th Dec., communication with the shore being impossible in the then state of the sea and weather.

On the 15th Dec. the Spark was compelled, by stress of weather, to quit her anchorage off Burriana, and put in at Valencia, and there, on the 16th Dec., Messrs. Dart and Co., of Valencia, made the following indorsement on the charter-party:

The within-named steamer, not being free of pratique on the 15th Dec., at first loading place, Burriana, we, agents for the charterers, hereby cancel the charter-party; and wholly refused to load the Spark under the charter-party.

The Spark then took on board, but not under the charter-party, 4972 cases of oranges supplied by the agents of the charterers, and delivered them under bills of lading for freight, and the plaintiff now sued the defendants for 253*l.* 10*s.* damages, being the dead freight lost to him in consequence of the defendants' refusal to load the vessel under the charter-party.

The plaintiff alleged that Burriana was not a safe loading place within the meaning of the charter-party, and that the above-mentioned circumstances were a breach of the charter-party.

The defendants denied that Burriana was not a safe loading place within the meaning of the charter-party, and pleaded that, as the vessel had not arrived at her first loading port free of pratique on or before the 15th Dec., they were entitled to cancel the charter-party and refuse to load the vessel.

At the hearing of the case, Hawkins, J., after leaving to the jury the question whether Burriana was a safe loading place, at their request stated that, in his opinion, it was a safe loading place. The jury found that Burriana was a safe loading place, and that it was solely due to the severity of the weather that the vessel had not pratique on Dec. 15, and the learned judge entered judgment for the defendants in accordance therewith.

Hall, Q.C. (with him Witt) now moved on behalf of the plaintiff that judgment should be entered in the action for the plaintiff, or in the alternative for a new trial on the ground that the learned judge misdirected the jury. First, the learned judge misdirected the jury in telling them, when they came back into court for further directions, that in his opinion the port of Burriana was, on the evidence given, a safe loading place within the meaning of the charter-party. [Lord COLERIDGE, C.J.,—The question having been originally left to the jury in a manner to which no exception is taken, the court would scarcely be disposed to lay much stress on this point.] Secondly, the vessel arrived at Burriana on the 13th Dec., and but for the perils of the sea would have been free of pratique there on the 15th Dec. The clause excepting the dangers of the seas and navigation must be read into the clause providing for the arrival of the vessel at her first loading place free of pratique and ready to load on or before the 15th Dec., and as the vessel was prevented from fulfilling that clause solely by the dangers excepted, the charterers' option to cancel never arose, and, in pretending to cancel the charter-party and refusing to load the vessel, they committed a breach of the agreement, for which the plaintiff is entitled to compensation. Barker v. M'Andrew (12 L. T. Rep. N. S. 459; 18 C. B. N. S. 759; 2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 205) was an action against a shipowner for not having his ship ready to load pursuant to the guarantee contained in a charter-party. There the shipowner agreed that the ship, being tight, staunch, and every way fitted for the voyage, should, with all convenient speed sail and proceed to the usual loading place, "guaranteed for cargo in all this month," or so near thereunto as she might safely get, and there load, &c., and an action being brought, alleging as a breach of the charter-party that the vessel was not ready to receive the agreed cargo until long after the time stipulated, the defendant pleaded that the vessel was hindered and prevented by the dangers of seas, rivers, and navigation, and it was held that the plea was a good answer to the action, and that the expression in the charter-party "guaranteed for cargo in all this month," which was admitted to mean "ready to receive cargo within the month," did not take the case out of the exception. Again, in Harrison v. Garthorne (16 L. T. Rep. N. S. 508; 1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 304) it was agreed by charter-party that a vessel, being tight, staunch, and strong, and every way fitted for the voyage, should with all convenient speed sail and proceed to Alexandria, to arrive within a margin of three weeks from the 15th Nov. 1870, and it was held on demurrer, the ship not having arrived within the three weeks, and an action having been brought for breach of the charter-party, that the clause excepting the dangers of the seas was a sufficient answer to the action, and that no breach of the charter-party had been committed. The same considerations apply in the present case, and the non-arrival of the vessel on or before the 15th Dec. being clearly caused by the dangers of the seas, the charterers' option to cancel did not arise, and judgment ought to be entered for the plaintiff.

Nelson (with him Finlay, Q.C.) for the defendants.—In Barker v. M'Andrew (ubi sup.) the guarantee that the vessel should be ready within a month was not, as in the present case, a condition precedent to her right to be loaded. In Crookewit v. Fletcher (1 H. & N. 893; 26 L. J. 153, Ex.) there was a charter-party in which it was stipulated that a vessel was to sail from Amsterdam on or before the 15th March next, and it was held, notwithstanding that the charter-party contained the usual clause excepting the dangers of the seas, that the writing in the margin of the words, "wind and weather permitting, with cargo or in ballast, for ship's benefit," after the words "March next," avoided the charter-party, and that the stipulation that the vessel should sail on or before March next was a condition precedent to her being loaded. There, as in this case, the action was by the shipowner against the charterer for default in loading, and the court, after a full examination of the numerous cases on the point, gave judgment in favour of the defendants. Here also the clause is perfectly unqualified, and the arrival of the ship free of pratique on or before the 15th Dec. was a condition precedent to her being loaded. As the plaintiff failed to fulfil this condition the defendants' option to cancel the charter-party arose, and the port in question having been declared to be a safe loading place within the meaning of the charter-party, judgment was rightly entered for the defendants.

Hall, Q.C. in reply.

Nov. 28.—The following judgments were delivered by the Court:—

Lord COLERIDGE, C.J.—In this case two points were raised for the consideration of the court. In the first place, it was said that the learned judge who tried the case misdirected the jury, the complaint being based not upon any alleged mistake of the learned judge in point of law, but upon the propriety of the mode in which he left to the jury the question as to whether Burriana was a safe loading place or not within the language of the charter-party. Now the charter-party provided that the plaintiff's vessel should proceed to three safe loading places between Castellon and Malaga, both inclusive, commencing with the easternmost place as ordered after arrival in Spain, and there load from the charterers or their agents certain cases of oranges, and there was also a provision later on in the agreement that, "should the steamer not be arrived at first loading port free of pratique, and ready to load on or before the 15th Dec. next, charterer has the option of cancelling or confirming this charter-party." This being the language of the charter-party, the facts of the case were, that the plaintiff's vessel having proceeded to Carthagena, and arrived there on the 11th Dec., the charterers or their agents ordered her to the port of Burriana as her first loading place. The vessel arrived at Burriana on the 13th Dec., but communication with the shore being impossible by reason of the roughness of the sea and the bad state of the weather, she was not free of pratique there on or before the 15th Dec. as required by the clause of the charter-party which I have just read. Under these circumstances the defendants claimed to be entitled by the terms of this clause to cancel the charter-party, and did so cancel it and refused to load the vessel. The plaintiff, however, contended that the defendants were not entitled to cancel the charter-party under the clause, and commenced this action against them to recover damages for the breach of the charter-party which, as he alleged, they committed by refusing to load the vessel there, and one of his contentions in the action was that Burriana was not a safe loading place within the meaning of the charter-party. It is quite plain that this must be a question for a jury, but it is said that the learned judge exceeded his province in directing the jury upon this point. After a careful examination of the summing-up of the learned judge I cannot see that there is any force in this objection, especially when the evidence given in the case is duly taken into consideration. The evidence was, that the port in question was exposed to many points of the compass, and that in consequence landing thereat was frequently impossible, but it was further shown that it was a port from which, as a matter of fact, large quantities of fruit were shipped, and therefore it was in every respect an open question for the jury as to whether this port—admittedly a port of great resort—was within the meaning of the charter-party a safe loading place. This question my learned brother submitted in due course to the jury, and I do not see how he could have done so in any better manner than he actually did, since to my mind none could fail to understand from his summing-up that it was purely a question of degree for the decision of the jury. It is not, however, strongly urged that up to this point any misdirection had taken place, but the jury having retired, after a time returned and asked for further directions, and my learned brother again stated the evidence that, although this port was an open port, yet, nevertheless a large trade was there carried on, and that, as a matter of fact, a ship had only, on the setting in of bad weather, to bank up her fires and go out to sea, and then come back when the weather had moderated, to avert all danger, and that in his opinion the port was a safe port. It seems to me that the course he took was perfectly right, and I see nothing to complain of in anything that my learned brother did. I think that the finding that it was a safe port was, especially having regard to the way in which business was conducted in this place, correct and the finding which ought to have been arrived at, and, as far as this point is concerned, I think that the verdict ought to stand.

But a second point was taken on the part of the plaintiff. By the charter-party it was, as I have said, agreed that should the steamer not be arrived at the first loading port free of pratique and ready to load on or before a day fixed, the charterer was to have the option of cancelling or confirming the charter-party. The fact was, that the vessel arrived two days before the day so fixed, but communication with the shore being impossible on account of the state of the sea and the weather, she was not, on the day fixed, free of pratique there, and in consequence of this the charterer exercised the option of cancelling the charter-party, which he understood the clause in question gave him. It is with this that the plaintiff's second contention has to do. There is, he points out, in the earlier part of the charter-party the usual clause excepting, amongst other things, all dangers and accidents of the seas, rivers, and steam navigation of what nature and kind soever during the said voyage, and he contends that, inasmuch as the vessel was off the port before the day fixed, and was only prevented from being free of pratique there on the day fixed by reason of the dangers of the seas excepted in the clause I have mentioned, the charterers' option to cancel did not arise by reason of the operation of that clause. The question, therefore, for the decision of the court is, whether the stipulation that the vessel should be at the port in question, free of pratique and ready to load, is an independent stipulation overriding the whole of the charter-party, or whether it is subject to the operation of the clause excepting the dangers of the seas. I have come with regret to the conclusion that it is an independent stipulation, and that it overrides the whole of the charter-party, and that, as the steamer did not arrive in time to be at the port free of pratique on the day fixed, the charterer had the option of cancelling the charter-party, and on these grounds I am of opinion that this motion must be dismissed.

MATHEW, J.—I am of the same opinion. With reference to the first point raised by the plaintiff, I do not think that the question was fairly open to the observations made by counsel thereupon. It is admitted that the learned judge, in his summing-up, pointed out to the jury what the question was which they had to decide. They had heard the evidence as to what was the real amount of danger to which the ship was exposed at the place of loading, and the direction of the learned judge in point of law was perfectly correct, viz., that it was for them to say whether the vessel would have been exposed in taking in a cargo there to an unreasonable amount of danger. But the learned counsel for the plaintiff argued that the learned judge dictated to the jury what their finding should be. In my opinion, at the very utmost it can only be said that he told them what his own opinion was. I hope the time has not yet come when a judge is to be prevented from giving his own opinion on any question that a jury may have to decide, so long as at the same time he directs them properly what the law upon that question is.

I now pass to the second point raised on behalf of the plaintiff. With reference to that I must say that at first I was inclined to agree with the learned counsel for the plaintiff that the clause in the charter-party containing the well-known exceptions of, amongst other things, the dangers of the seas was applicable to and governed the later clause, providing that the vessel was to be at the first loading port free of pratique on or before the 15th Dec. On further consideration, it appears to me that, if this restriction is to be put on the clause in question, the effect would practically be to wipe it out of the charter-party altogether. At any rate, the clause would read, "Should the steamer not be arrived at first loading port free of pratique, and ready to load on or before the 15th Dec., then unless she is prevented from doing so by the perils of the seas, the charterers are to have the option of cancelling the charter-party." The clause in question, however, is a clause which imposes on the shipowner no obligation, the enforcement of which could be made the subject of an action, and is therefore distinguishable from another class of clauses, by which a shipowner undertakes to do something which if he fails to do he will be liable to an action for breaking his contract. It is a clause, too, in a contract for the shipment of fruit, and it was clearly therefore important to the charterer that there should be as little delay as possible, and it must be remembered that contracts with reference to produce of this description frequently contain such stipulations as this, that the charterer is to be free of all responsibility under the charter-party unless the vessel arrives within a certain time. Shipowners enter into their contracts on the presumption that all will go well, and must abide by the result if they neglect to leave a sufficient margin in their calculation. In this particular case it is clear that the shipowner ran his calculations too fine, and the consequence was, that the vessel had to put back to Valencia, and was therefore not at the port of loading free of pratique and ready to load on the day stipulated. The charterer, then, in my opinion, had the option of cancelling the charter-party, and rightly exercised it. I think, therefore, for these reasons, that this motion must be dismissed with costs.

SMITH, J.—I am of the same opinion, and quite agree with my Lord and my learned brother, and for my part I have no sympathy with the plaintiff, although of course the case must be decided without sympathy with either the plaintiff or the defendant. As to the first point I am unable to see that there is any objection to be made to the summing-up of the learned judge who tried the case. When the jury returned to ask for further directions he again told them what the law on the subject was, in a manner to which no exception is taken, but he also told them what his own opinion on the point was. If such an objection as this is to be considered a good ground for obtaining a new trial, judges will be absolutely debarred from saying anything to a jury to assist them. No one says that the learned judge laid down to them any principle that was not good law. All he did was to say to them, "If you ask me what my opinion is, I should say that it is a safe port." To my mind it is quite impossible to say that a new trial ought to be granted on such a ground as this.

Now we come to the other point, which is, in my opinion, a point of considerable importance. The question is, whether the exception of the perils and dangers of the seas applies only to the contract of voyage or to the whole of the charter-party. I am of opinion that it applies only to the contract of voyage. It is conceded that no action would have lain against the shipowner for failing to arrive at the port in due time by reason of the operation of what I may call the "perils" clause. That clause therefore is put into the charter-party in favour of the shipowner, because otherwise, if that clause had not been inserted, the shipowner would have been bound to have his vessel at the port of loading in due time, and, if she had gone to the bottom on the way, or in any other manner failed to reach the specified place at the specified time, he would have been liable to an action for damages for breach of his contract. That clause therefore is a clause inserted in favour of the shipowner. The "option" clause, on the contrary, is a clause inserted in favour of the charterer. His position is, that he insists in his contract on having the ship there by the 15th Dec. free of pratique. What is the meaning of this? It means that he has goods of a perishable nature at risk, and that he insists on having the ship ready to load them by a certain day. The shipowner agrees, and enters into a contract that it shall be so. He does not indeed contract to be there in any event so as to be liable for damages if he fails to be there, but he does contract that if he is not there the charterer is to have the option of cancelling the charter-party. I do not think that it is possible for us to limit this stipulation, for I think that the "perils" clause applies only to the contract of voyage and not to the whole charter-party. I agree, therefore, with my Lord and my learned brother that there ought not to be a new trial in this case, and that this motion ought to be dismissed.

THE NASMYTH. (a)

Salvage—Agreement—Crew—Costs.

Where the master of a salving ship agreed to render salvage services for a reasonable named sum, the Court refused, in a salvage action instituted by some of the crew, to depart from the terms of the agreement upon the ground that the crew were not actual parties to it, holding that such a course would be prejudicial to the interests of commerce.

In a salvage action the mere offer by the defendants to pay a sum named in an agreement made prior to the rendering of the services without payment into court is a bad plea.

Where seamen instituted a salvage action in the High Court, and sought to dispute an agreement made by their master for 200*l., which the court upheld, apportioning* 40*l. to the crew, the plaintiffs were condemned in the costs of the action.*

THIS was a salvage action instituted by certain of the officers and crew of the steamship Wordsworth against the steamship Nasmyth, for services rendered to the Nasmyth, her cargo and crew.

The Nasmyth, a steamship of 1303 tons nett, was on the 16th Sept. 1884, in lat. 46° 17′ N. and long. 30° 3′ W., bound on a voyage from New York to Liverpool, when her screw shaft broke. She was then put under sail, and proceeded on her course for twelve days, until the 28th Sept. when she fell in with the steamship Wordsworth off Cape Clear. In answer to a signal from the Nasmyth, "Can you tow me?" the Wordsworth, a steamship of 1303 tons register, bound on a voyage from Newcastle, in New Brunswick, to Sharpness Point, bore down upon the Nasmyth. At this time the wind was a strong breeze from S.W. and the weather moderate. The Wordsworth, after having been made fast, began to tow at about 9 a.m., and at about 5 p.m. on the same day reached Queenstown harbour, where the Nasmyth was anchored, and the Wordsworth resumed her voyage. It was alleged on behalf of the plaintiffs that the said services entailed considerable extra labour, and that the two ships rolled heavily during the towage.

The defendants by their statement of defence pleaded that, on the Wordsworth falling in with the Nasmyth, and prior to the commencement of the services, the following agreement was entered into between the masters of the two vessels:

Stamp 6d.

S.S. Nasmyth.
Sept. 27, 1884.

I hereby agree to pay to the owners of the s.s. Wordsworth the sum of two hundred pounds on his anchoring us safe in Queenstown, for assistance rendered. Agreed by both masters. Providing that the towage is completed without any hitch, otherwise to be settled by arbitration.

(Signed) F. W. RENDLE, Master s.s. Nasmyth.
(Signed) A. C. COOKE, Master s.s. Wordsworth.

Paragraph 8 of the statement of defence was as follows:

(a) Reported by J. P. ASPINALL and BUTLER ASPINALL, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

The defendants were always ready and willing to pay, and before action tendered to the owners of the Wordsworth, on behalf of all concerned, the said agreed sum of 200*l*.

The defendants had not paid the 200*l*. into court.

The value of the Nasmyth was 23,000*l*., of her cargo 28,875*l*., and of her freight 790*l*. The value of the Wordsworth was 30,000*l*., of her cargo 4000*l*., and of her freight 1600*l*.

Deane, for the plaintiffs, submitted that his clients were not bound by the agreement, and that, having regard to the value of the property salved, and the extra labour entailed by the services, they were entitled to a substantial reward.

Sir Walter Phillimore, for the defendants, contra.—The court should uphold the agreement. The services merely consisted in towing the Nasmyth for about eight hours in fine weather. The plaintiffs in this action will be amply rewarded by their share of the agreed sum of 200*l*. The defendants were always ready to pay the 200*l*., and hence this action was unnecessary. Even assuming it to be necessary it should not have been instituted in the High Court, and the plaintiffs should be condemned in costs:

The Agamemnon, 48 L. T. Rep. N. S. 880; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 92.

BUTT, J.—The plea raised in paragraph 8 of the statement of defence is, to my mind, a bad plea. It is only an offer without a payment of money into court. The agreement appears to me to be a fair agreement made in a bonâ fide way, and one by which the master of the Wordsworth had power to bind his owners and crew. I think it would be extremely prejudicial to the maritime interests of this country if, after an agreement of this kind had been entered into, any one of the seamen might be at liberty to come into this court and upset it on the ground that he was not a party to it. I shall uphold the agreement for 200*l*., which, in my opinion, is reasonable in amount, and apportion 140*l*. to the owners, 20*l*. to the master, and 40*l*. to the crew according to their ratings, and I condemn the plaintiffs in the costs of the action. Even if it were necessary to bring the action at all, which I very much doubt, it ought to have been brought in the County Court and not here.

THE RIPON. (a)

Collision—Lights—Rules for the navigation of the river Humber—Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea—Compulsory pilotage—Merchant Shipping Act 1873 (36 & 37 Vict. c. 85), s. 17.

The rules for the navigation of the river Humber are regulations "contained in or made under the Merchant Shipping Acts 1854 to 1873," within the meaning of sect. 17 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1873; and hence their infringement will be visited with the result prescribed by that Act.

Where a two-masted vessel, in pursuance of art. 2 of the Rules for the Navigation of the River Humber, carries a second riding light astern in the position therein prescribed, and continues to carry such light after she gets under way and is crossing the river for the purpose of warning vessels going up or coming down of her position, the carrying of such a light at such a height above the deck is a breach of the regulations, and cannot be deemed to be the showing of a stern light within the meaning of art. 11, or warranted by the "special circumstances of the case," within art. 24.

The exhibition of an improper light, or the failure to carry the regulation lights, is not excused by the fact that it was done in obedience to the orders of a compulsory pilot, it being the duty of the master to see that the lights required by the regulations are carried.

THIS was an action in rem instituted by the owners of the steamship Essex against the steamship Ripon to recover compensation for damages occasioned by a collision between the two vessels on the 16th Nov. 1884, in the river Humber.

The defendants counter-claimed.

It was alleged on behalf of the plaintiffs that the Essex, a steamship of 943 tons register, laden with a general cargo, left the Humber Dock entrance at Hull shortly before 5.50 a.m. on the 16th Nov. 1884, bound on a voyage from Hull to Copenhagen. After leaving the dock entrance the head of the Essex was put down river, her regulation lights were duly exhibited, and her speed through the water was about three to three and a half knots an hour. In these circumstances, as the Eseex was proceeding down river well to the southward of mid-channel, two white lights were observed about half-a-mile distant, and about two points on the port bow which were taken to be those of a vessel at anchor. Immediately afterwards the green and masthead lights of a tug with towing lights came into view at about the same distance and bearing about a point on the port bow. The Essex, finding the tug did not port her helm, but kept her course across the river, eased her engines and hard-a-starboarded her helm so as to pass under the stern of the tug and any craft that she might have in tow, although no lights of any such tow were visible to indicate the fact. After the Essex had altered two to three points to port, her engines were stopped, her whistle was blown, and the tug was hailed whether she had anything in tow, and if so to tow ahead. The Essex was then hailed to go full speed astern, but in fact her engines had been put full speed astern, and at the same moment it was observed by those on board the Essex that the tug had a vessel in tow, which proved to be the Ripon, which was the vessel showing the two white lights. At the same time the Ripon's green light also came in view and the vessels collided, the Essex striking with her stem the starboard side of the Ripon.

The plaintiffs (inter alia) charged the defendants with improperly exhibiting two white lights.

It was alleged on behalf of the defendants that the Ripon, a steamship of 1567 tons and 300 feet long, bound on a voyage from Alexandria to Hull, was on the 16th Nov. 1884 in the Humber in charge of a Trinity pilot by compulsion of law. At about 4.15 a.m. the Ripon, which had anchored on the previous evening in Hull Roads, got under way in charge of the pilot, and in tow of the steam-tug Pioneer and dropped up the river head on to the flood tide until she was off the Victoria Dock piers, and waited in readiness to enter the Victoria Dock, but at 5.15 a.m. the Ripon was hailed by the dock officials that she was to proceed up the river to the Albert Dock. The Ripon and the Pioneer had their respective masthead and regulation side lights duly exhibited, and the Pioneer also carried her proper towing light. The Ripon also had a bright light exhibited aft from the main peak at a height of forty feet from the deck, which she carried as an after-riding light, and which by the pilot's orders was kept hoisted. On receiving orders to go to the Albert Dock it was necessary for the Ripon to bring her head up the river, and for that purpose the helm of the Ripon was put hard-a-port, and with the aid of the tug she was turned round till she was athwart the river heading to the southward. When the Ripon was in this position, lying with her engines stopped, those on board the Ripon observed at a distance of about half-a-mile and about a beam on her starboard side the masthead and red light of the Essex coming down the river. The helm of the Ripon was kept hard-a-port, and the Pioneer continued to tow her head round as before, and when the Essex was about two cables' length distant the whistle of the Pioneer was sounded, and the Essex was hailed, but the Essex continued to come on, and when at a short distance from the Ripon opened her green light and then with her stem struck the Ripon on her starboard side.

The Regulations for the Navigation of the River Humber 1882 were made by Order in Council under the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act 1862, sect. 32 of which is as follows:

In the case of any harbour, river, or other inland navigation for which such rules are not, and cannot be, made by or under the authority of any local Act, it shall be lawful for Her Majesty in Council, upon application from the harbour trust or body corporate, if any, owning or exercising jurisdiction upon the waters of such harbour, river, or inland navigation, or if there is no such harbour trust or body corporate, upon application from persons interested in the navigation of such waters, to make rules concerning lights or signals to be carried, and concerning the steps for avoiding collision to be taken by vessel navigating such waters; and such rules when so made shall, so far as regards vessels navigating such waters, have the same effect as if they were regulations contained in table (C.) in the schedule to this Act, notwithstanding anything in this Act or in the schedule thereto contained.

Rules for the Navigation of the River Humber:

1. All vessels, as well sailing vessels as steamers (except dumb craft), while navigating or anchored or moored in the river Humber or in any part of the river Trent at or below Gainsborough, shall observe and obey the "Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea" set out in the first schedule annexed to an Order in Council made in pursuance of the Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act 1862 and dated the 14th day of August 1879, and as varied and amended by an Order in Council made as aforesaid, and dated the 26th day of August 1881, with the exceptions and additions made in the following rules.

2. All vessels as aforesaid when at anchor in the river Humber or in any part of the river Ouse at or below Goole, or in any part of the river Trent at or below Gainsborough, shall, between sunset and sunrise, instead of the light prescribed by article 8 of the said regulations, exhibit from the forestay or otherwise near the bow of the vessel, where it can best be seen, a white light in a globular lantern of eight inches in diameter, and so constructed as to show a clear uniform and unbroken light, visible all round the horizon at a distance of at least one mile; and, in addition thereto, all vessels having two or more masts shall exhibit another white light at double the height of the bow light at the main or mizen peak, or the boom topping lift, or other positions near the stern where it can best be seen.

Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea:

Art. 11. A ship which is being overtaken by another shall show from her stern to such last-mentioned ship a white light or a flare-up light.

Art. 24. Nothing in these rules shall exonerate any ship, or the owner or the master or crew thereof, from the consequences of any neglect to carry lights or signals, or of any neglect to keep a proper look-out, or of the neglect of any precaution which may be required by the ordinary practice of seamen or by the special circumstances of the case.

At the hearing it was admitted by the plaintiffs' counsel that the Essex was to blame in not having a good look-out.

Hall, Q.C. (with him Bucknill) for the plaintiffs.—It being admitted that the Ripon was carrying, in addition to her masthead and side lights, her after-riding light, it is clear that she has infringed art. 2 of the Regulations, which provides that a steamship when under way shall only carry the masthead and side lights. The Humber Rules being "made under the Merchant Shipping Acts 1854 to 1873," viz., under the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act 1862, s. 32, disobedience to them is to be visited with the consequences that result from an infringement of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, as provided by sect. 17 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1873:

The Lady Downshire, 39 L. T. Rep. N. S. 236; 4 P. Div. 26; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 25.

Therefore, unless it is shown by the defendants that the infringement could not possibly have contributed to the collision, the Ripon should be pronounced to blame:

The Fanny M. Carvill, 32 L. T. Rep. N. S. 646; L. Rep. 4 A. & E. 417; 2 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 478.

As a matter of fact, it is submitted that the exhibition of the after-riding light did conduce to the collision, inasmuch as it led those on board the Essex to assume that the Ripon was a vessel at anchor, exhibiting the two white lights required by art. 2 of the Humber Rules.

Sir Walter Phillimore (with him W. R. Kennedy), for the defendants, contra.—It is submitted that the exhibition of the after-riding light was a precaution required by the provisions of art. 24 of the Regulations. The Ripon was some 300 feet long, and was lying athwart the river, which are "special circumstances" requiring the exhibition of an after-light. Art. 11 requires a stern light to be shown to an overtaking vessel, and it is submitted that this riding-light should be looked upon as a stern light to warn other vessels that the Ripon was lying athwart the river. If, under art. 24, the "ordinary practice of seamen or the special circumstances of the case" required the exhibition of a light aft, it is immaterial where that light was carried, and for what purpose it had previously been used. Pilotage being compulsory in the Humber (The Rigborgs Minde, 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 123; 49 L. T. Rep. N. S.

232; 8 P. Div. 132), and this light having been left where it was by the orders of the pilot, the defendants are exempt from liability:

The Argo, Swa. 462.

Hall, Q.C. in reply.—The exhibition of this after light at a height of about forty feet cannot be said to be required by the "special circumstances of the case," nor can it possibly be looked upon as the stern light contemplated by art. 11 of the Regulations:

The Pacific, 51 L. T. Rep. N. S. 127; 9 P. Div. 124; 53 L. J. 67, P. D. & A.; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 263.

The exhibition of a light prohibited by the Regulations is not within the province of the pilot, and, even should he order it to be exhibited, it is the duty of the master to see that the regulations as to lights are obeyed.

BUTT, J.—In this case it is now admitted that the Essex was in fault. I think there can be no doubt that, taking the evidence of the witnesses called on behalf of the Essex, and taking also the admitted fact that the Ripon had, as well as the riding light at her peak and a masthead light at the foremast head, a green light burning, a better look-out on the Essex would have earlier discovered the real state of things, and so the collision might have been avoided. It is therefore impossible to justify the conduct of those in charge of the Essex for not having stopped their engines before they did. It is stated by the master of the Essex, and one or two witnesses, that the tug's lights were seen. The tug had two white lights at her masthead, which, under ordinary circumstances, indicates that the tug has something in tow. It is true that the master says that tugs not unfrequently do move about in the dock without taking the towing lights down, although they may have nothing to tow. He says he thought the tug was towing a barge without a light astern, and in that state of things he passed down within a short distance. Common prudence ought to have induced him to stop his engines before he did. It does him no injustice if I say that he did not stop his engines until his vessel had altered two and a half points under a starboard helm. The Essex is therefore to blame.

Then the question arises, am I also bound to find the Ripon to blame? I have come to the conclusion that I am. I do it with regret, not only from the view I take of the case, but also from that taken by the gentlemen who assist me, who, so far as they are concerned, would have no hesitation in finding the Essex alone to blame. I, however, feel constrained to hold that the Ripon was to blame for breach of the rules. There is a statutory rule which I have no hesitation in holding is one that comes within the purview of sect. 17 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1873, and it is this: "The lights mentioned in the following articles, and no other, shall be carried in all weathers from sunset to sunrise." It is clear that the Ripon whilst under way was not exhibiting the lights required by the rule, but was carrying a white globe light at her peak. If that rule had stood alone, she ought never to have carried that light whilst under way. The question is whether, in keeping the light there, she did infringe the rule. It is said she did not, because she was turning in the river, and it was no more than a prudent thing, within the requirements of art. 24, to keep the light where it was. It was a thing, if I understand the defendants' contention, required by the "ordinary practice of seamen, or by the special circumstances of the case." I am by no means prepared to say that the special circumstances of the case would not warrant the Ripon showing a light at her stern; but what light? I do not think art. 24 would warrant her in keeping up a riding light in the place prescribed for vessels at anchor. The utmost I think that art. 24 would do would be to allow such a light to be shown over the stern in the position in which vessels being overtaken by another vessel may exhibit a light. I refer to the position of the light contemplated by art. 11 of the Regulations. I think the practice of seamen, or the special circumstances of the case, might have justified the Ripon in showing a light astern, but not in carrying the light where she did at a height of forty feet from the deck. She therefore has infringed the statutory rule.

Can it be said that that infringement could not by possibility have contributed to the collision? It seems to me impossible to say that it could not have contributed. It is said by the plaintiffs that they were misled by the lights, thinking they indicated a vessel at anchor, and that therefore their attention was given to other matters and not directed to the Ripon. In these circumstances it is impossible to say that the breach of the rule might not have conduced to the collision. I myself go a step further, and have no hesitation in finding as a fact that those on the Essex did mistake the two lights for the lights of a vessel at anchor. I, however, do not think that the lights were so misleading as to justify me in finding the Ripon to blame apart from the statute. Therefore, the Essex being guilty of improper navigation, and the Ripon having committed a breach of the rules, the only remaining question is, whether the Ripon is exempt from liability by the fact that she was being navigated by a pilot in waters where pilotage is compulsory. It was the pilot who directed the riding light to be left where it was, but even so I hold that I cannot excuse the owners of this ship on that ground. Once assume the light to be carried where it was, that was an infringement of the statutory rule, and I think that the officers in charge of the ship ought not to allow a pilot to have lights improperly carried in contravention of the rules. Suppose the pilot from some freak reversed the side lights, and put the red light where the green ought to be and the green light in the place of the red, could the officers excuse themselves for allowing that? A master must consider for himself whether the law in respect to lights is being infringed, and if it is he must take steps to stop such infringement. I think that is a matter which, being the subject of a statutory rule, the master is bound to look to himself. Not having done so, his owners are liable, and therefore I pronounce both these vessels to blame.

THE SOLIS. (a)

Practice—Action in rem—Writ of summons—Service—Default action—Rules of the Supreme Court, Order IX., rr. 11, 12; Order XIII., rr. 12, 13; Order XLVII., r. 14.

In an action in rem, service of the writ of summons by a solicitor or his clerk, and not by the marshal, is a valid service.

THIS was a default action in rem, brought by James Gibb Ross, the assignee of a bottomry bond, to enforce payment of the bond against the Spanish ship Solis, her cargo and freight.

The action was instituted on the 17th Nov. 1884, and the writ of summons was served on the Solis by the plaintiff's solicitors' clerk on the same day. No appearance was entered by or on behalf of the defendants. A statement of claim was filed.

March 3.—The plaintiff now sought to obtain judgment by default, and, in accordance with the provisions of Order XIII., r. 12, had filed the following affidavit of service of the writ of summons:

I, John Bruce, clerk with Messrs. Hill, Dickinson, Lightbound, and Dickinson, of 10, Water-street, in the city of Liverpool, the solicitors in this action for the above-named plaintiff, make oath and say:

1. That I did, on the 17th day of Nov., in the year of our Lord 1884, serve the writ in this action by affixing the same for a short time on the mainmast of the steamship or vessel Solis, the vessel proceeded against, which was at the time of service lying in the Langton Dock, Liverpool, and, on taking off the same, by leaving a true copy thereof affixed in its place. The original of the said writ is hereto annexed and marked with the letter A.

2. The said writ appeared to me to have been regularly issued out of and under the seal of the Admiralty Division of Her Majesty's High Court of Justice, Liverpool District Registry, at the suit of the above-named plaintiff against the above-named defandants, and dated the 17th day of Nov. 1884 and marked 1884 (Letter R) No. 3030, to which said writ and copy a memorandum was subscribed and due indorsements were made thereon, pursuant to the statute in that case made and provided.

3. And I further say that I did afterwards, on Monday, the 17th day of Nov. 1884, indorse on the said writ the day of the week and month of such service, according to the statute in that case made and provided.

Upon the plaintiff applying for judgment, BUTT, J. remarked that, according to the affidavit of service, the writ of summons had been served by the solicitor's clerk and not by the marshal, whereas he required to be satisfied that in actions in rem it was not necessary for the writ to be served by the marshal before he would give judgment for the plaintiff. The case was accordingly adjourned, in order that the plaintiff's counsel might investigate the practice on this point.

March 11.—Bucknill for the plaintiff.—Service of the writ by the solicitor's clerk is in accordance with the existing practice of the court. The present practice is regulated by the Rules of the Supreme Court 1883. Order LXVII., r. 14, requires that the service of an instrument by the marshal is to be verified by his certificate, whereas service by a solicitor or his clerk is to be verified by affidavit. Inasmuch as Order XIII., r. 12, which is applicable to default actions in rem, speaks of the "filing by the plaintiff of a proper affidavit of service," the inference is that those who framed the rules contemplated the writ of summons being served by a person other than the marshal. The fact that Order IX., r. 11, specifically requires the warrant of arrest to be served by the marshal, whereas Order IX., r. 12 is silent as to what person is to serve the writ of summons, is another argument in favour of the plaintiff's contention that it was never intended that the writ should be served by the marshal. Again, the form of indorsement on a writ of summons in rem, given in appendix A. form 11, is "this writ was served by X. Y.," and no mention is made of the marshal. The old practice can have no bearing on the question, owing to the fact that actions in rem are now commenced by writ of summons, which was not the practice in this court prior to the Judicature Act, such actions being then commenced by the warrant, which acted both as writ and warrant. Reference was made to the Admiralty Court Rules 1859 and Clerke's Praxis, tits. 1, 2, 3.

BUTT, J.—I am much obliged for the assistance given me by Mr. Bucknill in enabling me to determine the question raised in this case. The registrar and the marshal have also furnished me with some valuable information as to what the practice has been, and from this it is quite clear that before the separation of the warrant and the citation it was the practice for the marshal to effect service of both. They were then, as I understand, one instrument. The present difficulty arises from the abrogation of the old practice without any express provision in the new rules as to how the writs of summons, which are substituted for the citations, are to be served. The practice since this abrogation has been to allow the solicitor or his clerk to effect the service of the writ of summons, on some person other than the marshal. What occurs to me is that it is very doubtful whether a man has the right to go on board a ship and nail a writ of summons upon the mast, or whether that is not a trespass. Possibly that question may some day arise in more striking and more momentous form than it does now. I shall not anticipate that difficulty to-day.

There is, however, one thing which raises a strong inference in favour of the present practice, and that is the language of the new Rules of Court. Thus it is quite clear, because it is the subject of a special rule, that, where an instrument is served by the marshal, the verification of its service is not required by affidavit, but by the marshal's certificate. I refer to Order LXVII., r. 14, which provides that "The service of any instrument by the marshal shall be verified by his certificate. The service of any instrument by a solicitor, his clerk, or agent, shall be verified by an affidavit." That rule draws a broad distinction between a marshal's certificate and the solicitor's affidavit. Then rule 12 of Order XIII. provides that "In all actions not by the rules of this order otherwise specially provided for, in case the party served with the writ, or in Admiralty actions in rem the defendant"—the words are varied, because in Admiralty actions the defendant is not served—"does not appear within the time limited for appearance, upon the filing by the plaintiff of a proper affidavit of service, and if the writ is not specially indorsed under Order III., r. 6, of a statement of claim, the action may proceed as if such party had appeared, subject, as to actions where an account is claimed, to the provisions of Order XV." Therefore, that rule distinctly contemplates the service of the writ of summons being verified by affidavit. If the marshal were required to serve the writ, then, in my view, no affidavit would be necessary, because his certificate would, by Order LXVII., r. 14, be enough. Therefore, when Order XIII., r. 12, requires an affidavit of service, it would appear that that rule contemplates service by a solicitor or his clerk; and therefore, although I have very serious doubts on this point, which have not been altogether removed, I shall not interfere with the existing practice, and I treat this as a proper affidavit, and I make a decree as prayed by the plaintiffs.

THE PALERMO. (a)

Limitation of liability—Foreign ship—Crew space—Merchant Shipping Act 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104), s. 21, sub-sect. 4—Merchant Shipping Act 1867 (30 & 31 Vict. c. 124), s. 9.

The owners of a foreign ship, in limiting their liability, are entitled to the deductions in respect of crew space allowed by the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, s. 21, sub-sect. 4, if the provisions of that Act have been complied with, although there has been no compliance with the requirements of the Merchant Shipping Act 1867, s. 9.

THIS was an action for limitation of liability by the owners of the German steamship Palermo in respect of damages occasioned by a collision with the steamship Rivoli on the 25th Aug. 1883.

In consequence of the collision, the Rivoli sank and five of her crew were drowned. In a damage action instituted against the Palermo, the Court pronounced both vessels to blame for the collision. The plaintiffs, by their statement of claim, alleged as follows:

4. The plaintiffs admit that the said collision was partly caused by the improper navigation of the Palermo.

5. The claims of all the personal representatives of those of the crew of the Rivoli who were drowned against the plaintiffs have been satisfied.

6. The collision occurred without the actual fault or privity of the plaintiffs.

7. The plaintiffs believe that the claims against them in respect of the loss of the Rivoli, and of the goods, merchandise, and personal effects on board her at the time of the collision will exceed the aggregate amount of 8*l.* per ton on the gross tonnage of the Palermo, as calculated for the purpose of limitation of liability.

8. The gross tonnage of the Palermo, after due allowance in respect of closed-in spaces on the upper deck solely appropriated to the berthing of the crew was 1048·06 tons. (b)

(a) Reported by J. P. ASPINALL and BUTLER ASPINALL, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

(b) The sole question in this case was whether the owners of the foreign ship, in calculating the tonnage of their ship for the purposes of limiting their liability, were entitled to deduct crew space, and no question seems to have been raised as to the quantum of the deduction; but it will be noticed that, upon the figures given, the gross capacity of the ship—viz., 1071·94 tons, less crew space, viz., 27·93 tons—equals 1044·01 tons, and not 1048·06 tons as claimed.—ED.

9. The sum of 8*l.* per ton on the gross tonnage of the Palermo, after deducting crew space as aforesaid, is 8384*l.* 9*s.* 8*d.*, and the plaintiffs are willing and hereby offer to give bail or to pay into court, as shall be ordered, the said sum of 8384*l.* 9*s.* 8*d.*, together with interest thereon at the rate of 4 per cent. per annum from the date of collision until payment.

The defendants, by their statement of defence denied paragraphs 8 and 9 of the statement of claim; and in paragraph 2 alleged as follows:

2. The defendants allege that the tonnage of the Palermo, on which the amount of her statutory liability is to be calculated, exceeds 1048·06 tons, and deny that the plaintiffs are entitled to the allowance in the 8th paragraph mentioned.

The register of the Palermo was as follows:

	Cubic metres.		British tons.
(a.) Space below measurement deck	2877·6	=	1015·70
(b.) Space above measurement deck:
One house	115·2	=	40·67
One forecastle	44·1	=	15·57
Gross capacity of the ship	3036·9	=	1071·94
Less:
1. Space for crew	67·9	=	27·93
2. Engine, boiler, & bunkers	575·4	=	203·12
Nett capacity	2393·6	=	840·89

In an affidavit filed by the plaintiffs and verifying the above register, it was alleged that the space for the crew consists, and did consist, at the time of the collision, of permanently closed-in spaces on the upper deck solely appropriated to the berthing of the crew.

The following Acts of Parliament were referred to and are material to the decision:—

The Merchant Shipping Act 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104):

Sect. 21. The tonnage of every ship to be registered, with the exceptions mentioned in the next section, shall, previously to her being registered, be ascertained by the following rule, hereinafter called rule 1; and the tonnage of every ship to which such rule can be applied, whether she is about to be registered or not, shall be ascertained by the same rule.

Sub-sects. 1, 2, and 3 give the measurements to be taken and calculations made for ascertaining the tonnage beneath the tonnage deck, and sub-sect. 3 concludes as follows:

And the quotient being the tonnage under the tonnage deck shall be deemed to be the register tonnage of the ship, subject to the additions and deductions hereinafter mentioned.

Poop and any other closed-in space.

(4.) If there be a break, a poop, or any other permanent closed-in space on the upper deck available for cargo or stores, or for the berthing or accommodation of passengers or crew, the tonnage of such space shall be ascertained as follows:

Then follow the measurements to be taken and calculations made to ascertain the tonnage of any such space or spaces, and the sub-section concludes as follows:

And the quotient shall be deemed to be the tonnage of such space, and shall be added to the tonnage under the tonnage deck, ascertained as aforesaid, subject to the following provisoes: first, that nothing shall be added for a closed-in space solely appropriated to the berthing of the crew, unless such space exceeds one-twentieth of the remaining tonnage of the ship, and in case of such excess the excess only shall be added.

The Merchant Shipping Act 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 63):

Sect. 2. This Act may be cited as "The Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act 1862" and shall be construed with and as part of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 hereinafter termed the principal Act.

Sect. 54, after specifying the liability of British and foreign shipowners, proceeds as follows:

In the case of any foreign ship which has been or can be measured according to British law, the tonnage as ascertained by such measurement shall, for the purposes of this section, be deemed to be tonnage of such ship.

Sect. 60. Whenever it is made to appear to Her Majesty that the rules concerning the measurement of tonnage of merchant ships for the time being in force under the principal Act (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104) have been adopted by the Government of any foreign country, and are in force in that country, it shall be lawful for Her Majesty, by Order in Council, to direct that the ships of such foreign country shall be deemed to be of the tonnage denoted in their certificates of registry or other national papers; and thereupon it shall no longer be necessary for such ships to be re-measured in any port or place in Her Majesty's dominions, but such ships shall be deemed to be of the tonnage denoted in their certificates of registry and other papers, in the same manner, to the same extent, and for the purposes in, to, and for which the tonnage denoted in the certificates of registry of British ships is deemed to be the tonnage of such ships.

The Merchant Shipping Act 1867 (30 & 31 Vict. c. 124):

Sect. 1. This Act may be cited as "The Merchant Shipping Act 1867," and shall be construed with and as part of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, hereinafter termed the principal Act.

Sect. 9. The following rules shall be observed with regard to accommodation on board British ships. That is to say:

(1.) Every place in any ship occupied by seamen or apprentices and appropriated to their use shall have for every such seaman or apprentice a space of not less than seventy-two cubic feet, and of not less than twelve feet measured on the deck or floor of such place.

(4.) Every such place shall, whenever the ship is registered or re-registered, be inspected by one of the surveyors appointed by the Board of Trade under part 4 of the principal Act, who shall, if satisfied that the same is in all respects such as is required by this Act, give to the collector of customs a certificate to that effect, and thereupon such space shall be deducted from the register tonnage.

(5.) No such deduction from tonnage as aforesaid shall be authorised unless there is permanently cut in a beam or cut in or painted on or over the doorway or hatchway of every such place the number of men which it is constructed to accommodate with the words "certified to accommodate seamen."

Stubbs, for the plaintiffs, after stating the facts, was stopped by the Court.

Bucknill, for the defendants, contra.—It is submitted that the plaintiffs are not entitled to any deduction on account of crew space. In The Franconia (4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 1; 39 L. T. Rep. N. S. 57; 3 P. Div. 164) it was decided that foreign shipowners were not entitled to such deduction unless the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Act of 1867 had been complied with. According to sect. 9, sub-sect. 5, no deduction in respect of crew space is to be allowed "unless there is permanently cut in a beam or cut in or painted on or over the doorway or hatchway of every such place the number of men which it is constructed to accommodate, with the words, 'certified to accommodate seamen.'" That has not been done, and therefore the plaintiffs are not entitled to the deduction claimed. The three Acts of 1854, 1862, and 1867 are to be read together, and in The Franconia (ubi sup.) it was held that a foreign ship which is claiming the benefit of these deductions must comply with the provisions applicable to British ships. The Act of 1867 was intended to be a restriction on the Act of 1854, and such seems to have been the opinion of Brett, L.J. in The Franconia (ubi sup.). If so, it is necessary that the provisions of this later Act should be complied with before parties can limit their liability under the later or the earlier Act.

Stubbs for the plaintiffs.—The plaintiffs are claiming the deductions allowed by the Act of 1854, and not those allowed by the Act of 1867. There having been a compliance with the provisions of the Act of 1854, the plaintiffs are entitled to the deductions allowed by that Act. It is submitted that the Court of Appeal did not decide in The Franconia that foreign shipowners were entitled to no deductions in respect of crew space, unless the Act of 1867 had been complied with. The Act of 1867 was not intended to restrict the earlier Act, but rather to enlarge it. In The Franconia James, L.J., at p. 176 (3 P. Div.), speaks of the Act of 1867 as giving "a further allowance for the space occupied by the sailors' berths." We are not claiming that further allowance, but only the allowance allowed by the Act of 1854, with the provisions of which we have complied.

Cur. adv. vult.

Dec. 10.—BUTT, J.—This is an action for limitation of liability which was argued before me yesterday. The question raised is, whether the plaintiffs, who are the owners of a German vessel, are entitled in limiting their liability to deduct from the ship's registered tonnage certain spaces which were inclosed for the use of the crew. It was contended on behalf of the plaintiffs that they were entitled to deduction in respect of such spaces under the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854. It was contended by the other side that in the case of The Franconia (ubi sup.) the Court of Appeal had in effect decided that the owners of a foreign ship were not entitled to these deductions unless there had been a compliance with the provisions of a later Act of Parliament, the Merchant Shipping Act of 1867. I have carefully considered the case of The Franconia (ubi sup.), and I do not understand it to so decide. As I understand it, the Court of Appeal decided this—not that the Franconia, which was a German ship, was not entitled to deduct from her registered tonnage the spaces allotted to the crew which were inclosed and above the upper deck, those being the deductions contemplated by the Act of 1854, but that she was not entitled to further deductions under the later Act of 1867 unless she had complied in all respects with the requirements of that Act. Mr. Bucknill has contended, on behalf of the defendants, that the later Act is to be read as one with the Merchant Shipping Act of 1854, and that therefore a decision on the later Act was a decision on the earlier Act. I am by no means of that opinion. I think that the owners of this German ship are perfectly entitled to make the deductions under the Act of 1854, and so I hold. I therefore pronounce for the limitation of liability as prayed by the plaintiffs.

CAYZER, IRVINE, AND CO. v. THE CARRON COMPANY: THE MARGARET. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF APPEAL IN ENGLAND.

Collision—Contributory negligence—Thames Conservancy Rule No. 23—Merchant Shipping Act 1873 (36 & 37 Vict. c. 85), s. 17.

Where a ship has infringed a rule of navigation which is not within sect. 17 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1873 she will not be held to blame for a subsequent collision, unless it be shown that her disobedience was one of the proximate causes of such collision.

Rule 23 of the Thames Conservancy Rules provides that "steam-vessels navigating against the tide shall, before rounding" certain points, "ease their engines and wait until any other vessels rounding the point with the tide have passed clear." A collision occurred off Blackwall Point, between a vessel proceeding down the river against the tide and one coming up the river with the tide. It was alleged that the former had not complied with the above rule.

Held (reversing the judgment of the court below), that, assuming that she had disobeyed the rule. she could not be held to blame for the collision, it appearing to have been caused solely by the reckless navigation of the other vessel, and such rule not being one of the regulations for preventing collisions within the meaning of sect. 17 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1873.

The above rule is not confined to the seaward side of a line drawn from Blackwall Point to Bow Creek.

THIS was an appeal from a judgment of the Court of Appeal (Brett, M.R., Baggallay and Lindley, L.JJ.), reported in 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 204, 50 L. T. Rep. N. S. 447, and 9 P. Div. 47, who had varied a judgment of the judge of the Admiralty Division (Butt, J.) reported in 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 137, 49 L. T. Rep. N. S. 332, and 8 P. Div. 126.

The action was brought by the appellants, as owners of the steamship Clan Sinclair, against the respondents, as owners of the steamship Margaret, in respect of a collision which occurred off Blackwall Point, in the river Thames, under circumstances which are fully set out in the reports in the Courts below.

Butt, J. held that the collision had been caused by the reckless navigation of the Margaret, and pronounced her solely to blame, but on appeal the Court of Appeal held the Clan Sinclair partly to blame, in not having complied with rule 23 of the Thames Conservancy Rules (set out above), by easing her engines and waiting, and varied the decree accordingly.

The owners of the Clan Sinclair appealed.

C. Russell, Q.C., Myburgh, Q.C., and Hollams appeared for the appellants;

Webster, Q.C., C. Hall, Q.C., and Dr. Phillimore, for the respondents.

The arguments appear sufficiently from the judgments of their Lordships.

At the conclusion of the arguments their Lordships gave judgment as follows:—

Lord BLACKBURN.—My Lords: In this case it appears to me that the principal point to which we have to direct our attention is the question of fact which is involved, for I think that it is more a question of fact than a question of law. The first thing to be considered is, what is the meaning of rule 23 of the rules and bye-laws for the regulation of the navigation of the river Thames? That rule is: "Steam-vessels navigating against the tide, shall, before rounding the following points" (including Blackwall Point) "ease their engines, and wait until any other vessels rounding the point with the tide have passed clear." I may first of all mention a point not raised below, on which the House did not require that any answer should be given by the respondents' counsel; it was this: The rules for the navigation of the Thames down to rule 16 apply, some of them to all the navigation of the river, and some only to navigation of particular parts of the river. After rule 16 there comes this heading: "Bye-laws and rules regulating the navigation of the river between Yantlet Creek and a line drawn from Blackwall Point to Bow Creek." Now, the effect of that heading no doubt is to say that the rules which immediately follow it, including rule 23, primâ facie are only to apply to vessels when they are lower down than the line drawn from Blackwell Point to Bow Creek. A glance at the chart will show that this line would exclude the greater part of what, in my view of the words, is to be taken as being Blackwall Point, which the vessels are to round. The Clan Sinclair, although rounding Blackwall Point, never was in fact to the seaward side of the line from Blackwall Point to Bow Creek, and therefore it was contended that rule 23 did not apply; but I think that it is impossible to put that construction upon rule 23, which in express terms says that "steam-vessels navigating against the tide shall, before rounding Blackwell Point, ease their engines and wait;" and it is impossible, I think, to construe that as meaning that Blackwell Point is to be excluded from that rule. It is a clumsy mode of expressing the intention of the framers of the rule, and they should have provided against it; but they must have intended that the heading confining these rules to below a line drawn from Blackwall Point to Bow Creek shall not apply to rule 23. That necessarily follows, because it is regarding the rounding of Blackwall Point. Now, as to what is the "rounding of Blackwall Point," we have, I believe, all the information that can be given to us by the production of the Ordnance Survey and the Admiralty chart. Upon looking at them we find that, after you have come down the river and have passed the Isle of Dogs, you come where the course of the Thames is north with a little west in it, in a line nearly straight, which may be called a reach. Then the course of the Thames curves round, and at a point below a line drawn to Bow Creek—somewhat below the point—the course of the Thames is south with a little east in it, in what may also be called a reach; so that these two parts of the river are very nearly parallel, and any vessel that comes from one reach of the river into the other must necessarily go round the intervening land. That intervening land is called "Blackwall Point," and I cannot doubt that it is the Blackwell Point to which the rule refers.

Now what is meant by that rule is a question upon which I would not willingly unnecessarily pronounce a decisive opinion, because, before doing so, one should have more definite ideas than I possess as to what were the objects which made those who framed the rule give that direction. I think it is quite plain that they were of opinion, and I have no doubt quite rightly, that the vessels taking a sweep round those points would be in some danger if they both kept up their full speed there, and, for reasons which are no doubt quite sufficient, they thought that the right course for preventing that danger was to direct that when a vessel was going against the tide, and was aware that another vessel was coming round the point, it should not go on at full speed so that both should turn at once, but that it should "ease and wait," whatever that easing and waiting meant. But the first question as to which there appears to be some difference of language, if not of opinion, between the judge of the Admiralty Court and the Master of the Rolls, is as to what is the meaning of "before rounding" and "ease their engines and wait until any other vessels rounding the point with the tide have passed clear." Now, I cannot bring myself to think that Butt, J. is right in the opinion which he seems to have expressed that the meaning of the rule was that the vessels which were in the straight, or nearly straight, reach before they began to turn at all, were to wait there until all vessels that might be seen across the land coming in the opposite direction had passed. The effect of that, I think, would be very inconvenient, and would be to hamper the navigation very much, because all the vessels going down the river would remain gathered together in one spot until all that were coming up had passed by; and it is not the meaning which I should have attributed to the words. I think the fair meaning would be pretty nearly what is expressed by Brett, M.R., that you begin to round when there is so much curving and rounding of the river that the vessels going down the river begin to turn round the land, they then begin to round, and when they have come so far down that the curving of the river ceases, and they begin to go straight, they then cease to round. How much the rounding is to be before the rule applies is a question which I would rather not decide until it becomes necessary to do so, but, in my view of the rule here, it would certainly be somewhere before you come as far down as the spot where the Zephyr was lying, and I should be inclined to think that it was not necessary to begin so early as the point opposite the mouth of the dock out of which the Clan Sinclair came. Now, taking that to be the case, it would follow that, when you are applying the rule to this case of the Clan Sinclair coming down there, there was a part of its course during which the rule would apply to it, and when it should consequently have eased and waited. What the easing and waiting means is a matter of some difficulty. The fact that the vessel is to ease and wait when it is aware that another steamer is coming round with the tide implies that those who have the charge of the vessel are to keep a better look-out than would generally be cast upon them by law, because they are to look out and see whether any other steamers are coming up with the tide on the other side, although those steamers are then so far away that you only see them across the land, and that consequently it would not be necessary to notice them or to report them except for this rule. That is only material as getting rid of the question whether the blame, if blame there was, was entirely that of the pilot. I pass by that, only observing that that is the effect of it. Now, when we have got that we have to see whether there was blame on the part of the Clan Sinclair, identifying for this purpose and for the reason I have already indicated the Clan Sinclair with its pilot, and not identifying it with the pilot any more. Upon that it does seem that there was a time, I will not say how long before, when the pilot of the Clan Sinclair, if the look-out had reported it to him, would have been made aware that there was another vessel coming up with the tide, which, if they both went on their course, would meet when rounding. That being so, there was a time earlier than the time at which he knew it when he ought to have eased and waited, whatever that may mean. I think myself that the question how much he would ease and wait is a question of degree. I think that there can be no doubt that the rule cannot be construed in such a way as to require those who have the management of the ship to stop and cast anchor. It cannot mean that they are to ease their engines and cease to work them so far as to lose all control over the ship. That would be an absurd conclusion, and it would be productive of very great danger. They must keep some way on in order to have some control over the ship.

There does seem to be a difference between Butt, J. and Brett, M.R. as to what degree of control they should keep. I think that Butt, J. and his nautical assessors, acting upon the idea that there might be some way beyond what was necessary to keep mere steerage way, to keep the control, came to the conclusion that you might give a reasonable latitude to the rule, and that you were not to say that it was transgressed unless it was exceeded considerably. Brett, M.R. seems to have laid it down as his view that it was necessary, in order that the rule should be observed at all, to construe it very strictly, and that therefore the speed necessary to keep control was not to be exceeded at all. I do not know which of the two is the right view. I myself should be rather more inclined to agree with Butt, J. than with Brett, M.R., but I do not think it necessary to decide that point. But either way there would be a question of degree. It may be that the speed here may have been greater than it ought to have been; but then comes the question. If the rule was transgressed in that way, was that transgression of the rule the cause of the accident? Now, upon that I think there is no difference between the rules of law and the rules of Admiralty to this extent, that where anyone transgresses a navigation rule, whether it is a statutory rule, or whether it is a rule that is imposed by common sense, what may be called the common law, and thereby an accident happens of which that transgression is the cause he is to blame, and those who are injured by the accident, if they themselves are not parties causing the accident, may recover, both in law and in Admiralty. If the accident is a purely inevitable accident, not occasioned by the fault of either party, then the common law and Admiralty equally say that the loss shall lie where it falls—each party shall bear his own loss. Where the cause of the accident is the fault of one party, and one party only, Admiralty and common law both agree in saying that that one party who is to blame shall bear the whole damage of the other. When the cause of the accident is the fault of both, each party being guilty of blame which causes the accident, there is a difference between the rule of Admiralty and the rule of common law. The rule of common law says, as each occasioned the accident, neither shall recover at all, and it shall be just like an inevitable accident, the loss shall lie where it falls. Admiralty says, on the contrary, that if both contributed to the loss it shall be brought into hotchpot and divided between the two. Until the case of Hay v. Le Neve (2 Shaw Sc. App. 395), which has been referred to in the argument, there was a question in the Admiralty Court whether you were not to apportion it according to the degree in which they were to blame; but now it is, I think, quite settled, and there is no dispute about it, that the rule of the Admiralty is, that if there is blame causing the accident on both sides, they are to divide the loss equally, just as the rule of law is that if there is blame causing the accident on both sides, however small that blame may be on one side, the loss lies where it falls. Now, upon that there must always be a question whether or not, if there is neglect of any rule, that neglect is the cause of the accident. Upon that the case of The Khedive (5 App. Cas. 876; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 360; 43 L. T. Rep. N. S. 610) has been referred to. In that case the rule was a rule by statute, and it was enacted positively that if the rule was not obeyed the breach of it should in itself be deemed to be blame. When the statute imposing the rule is short of that, it is necessary to see that the actual transgression has been in fact the cause of the accident to some extent, it does not matter how much, and that is matter of proof. I do not think that the judges of the Court of Appeal for a moment meant to say that the transgression of this rule was in itself sufficient unless it was an occasion of the accident; but I do think that, their attention not having been called to it, they forgot that, though there was a transgression of a rule, it was not necessarily the cause of the accident which afterwards happened. If they had had their attention called to that, they would surely have mentioned something about it in their judgments. It seems to me to be the most important and difficult point in the case. They would surely have given some ground for saying that they thought the transgression of the Clan Sinclair, which, in their view, was slight, was the cause of the accident, but they did not say a syllable about it. It seems to have been hastily assumed that, if there was blame attributable to the Clan Sinclair, it must have been the cause of the accident. Not one word is said about it. There was no attempt to say that any authorities show that the rules of the Court of Admiralty and the rules of a court of law as to what amounts to being a fault occasioning the accident differ in the slightest degree. The nature of the thing of course requires that in applying those rules you should look to what the nature of the accident is and to what the neglect is. If it is two ships, they are to be governed by the same rules of law and evidence as if it were two carts in the street; but when you come to apply that you must remember that a ship is a thing which cannot be stopped in an instant like a cart, and cannot be moved from one side to the other like a cart, and when you have to look out for miles instead of for yards, the application of the rules becomes very different. Upon that the only case which I am aware of which seems to point to there being any difference between the rules of law and of Admiralty is the case of The Fenham (L. Rep. 3 P. C. 212; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 484; 23 L. T. Rep. N. S. 329), where there are expressions used by Lord Romilly, M.R. which seem to point to his having thought that the burden should lie upon those who infringed a rule to show that the infringement was not the cause of the collision. Now, I am not at all sure that, with proper qualifications and restrictions, that would not be a fair enough rule when applied to such a thing as a collision at night where there was an absence of lights. But when you come to apply it to such a case as this, and say that it is shown that the Clan Sinclair and the Clan Sinclair's people are blameable for this loss (and it is only for this purpose that I am identifying the Clan Sinclair with the pilot) because the Clan Sinclair ought to have eased sooner and waited sooner, I do not think it at all follows, as a reasonable rule of evidence, to say that that occasioned the accident unless the Clan Sinclair can show that it did not. [His Lordship then went through the evidence at some length, coming to the conclusion that the Margaret was to blame, and continued:]

Then it is said that the collision was owing to the Clan Sinclair being where she was. Undoubtedly in one sense that is so. If the Clan Sinclair had been some hundred yards higher up the river, the fact which made it a matter of rashness for the Margaret to run where it did would not have existed. But that is not a sufficient ground for saying that the fact of the Clan Sinclair being there was the cause of the accident. The Clan Sinclair would not have been there at the time when she was there if it had not been that that vessel did not ease and wait so soon, perhaps, as it ought to have done; but that was not the cause of the accident, which was caused by the Margaret, knowing where the Clan Sinclair was, attempting to pass between it and the Zephyr where there was not sufficient room. Then Mr. Webster endeavoured to argue this, and he laid down a very sound, general rule: he said that, where there are regulations to be observed in the management of vessels at sea, the one vessel has always a right to suppose that the other vessel will do its duty, and do all that ought to be done. That is very true, and where it applies I think it is a very sound rule to go by. But in this case the Margaret had not the slightest ground for believing that the Clan Sinclair would stop, or rather had stopped, four or five hundred yards higher up the river; the Margaret saw perfectly well where the Clan Sinclair was, and had a right to suppose that it would ease and stop as soon as it saw a vessel coming with the tide; and in fact the Clan Sinclair, the moment it saw the Margaret, did ease and stop, even to the extent of backing, so that there seems to be some ground for saying that that vessel's head did go a little to the north. But that was not sufficient to occasion the Margaret to run between the Clan Sinclair and the Zephyr as it did, when the space was too narrow for the vessel to go through. As far as I can perceive, it would have been perfectly safe and perfectly unobjectionable for the Margaret to have run up keeping nearer the south shore, and keeping the Clan Sinclair on its starboard side, That being so, it does not seem to me, in point of fact, to have been made out at all that the neglect of duty in not obeying rule 23 (assuming as I do without deciding it that the conclusion to which the Court of Appeal came, that there had been a neglect of duty, was right) was a part of the fault which occasioned the accident; and that being so, it is a case in which the Margaret, and the Margaret alone, being to blame, the Margaret, and the Margaret alone, must pay the damage. The consequence is that, taking that view, I move your Lordships to reverse the decision of the Court of Appeal, and to restore the decision of the Court of Admiralty.

Lord WATSON.—My Lords: I concur in the judgment which has been moved by my noble and learned friend. I think that it is matter of regret that these sailing rules for the direction of persons navigating the river Thames should be expressed in language so ambiguous. I refer, of course, only to rule 23, which is before the House in the present case, and to the heading of the section in which the rule occurs. I agree with Lord Blackburn that one part of rule 23 is express, namely, that part which applies to both sides of Blackwall Point, both to vessels coming down the river against the tide and vessels going up the river against the tide. I do not think that, when the terms of a rule are sufficiently explicit, they can be controlled or overborne by a mere heading such as we have to deal with here. No doubt the heading is a part of the rules, and as part of the rules a part also of the statutory enactment; still, though it may be called in aid when the enactments are ambiguous, I do not think that it can in any case be intended to override the plain terms of a rule like this. The more ambiguous portions of the rule are those which refer to "rounding the points," in this case rounding the Blackwall Point. These have given rise to a good deal of discussion, and I can only say that, in my opinion, it is unfortunate that mariners have for their guide doubtful words, to which learned authorities have attached widely different meanings. I do not think that any of the definitions which have been given are very satisfactory. They come very much to this that "rounding the point" is "rounding the point," but what "the point" is, and at what particular part of the river the "rounding" is to commence, and where it is to end, these definitions leave almost as much in the dark as the rule itself. The other expression occurring in rule 23 which gives rise to some difficulty, is the expression "ease and wait." That obviously does not mean that the vessel shall stop; it means that she shall proceed at a slower pace than ordinary, with, however, a particular object, that of remaining, I think, upon one side of the apex of the point until the vessel approaching with the tide either shall have reached the point or shall have passed her; it is immaterial to decide which for the purposes of this case. Now, in the courts below different views were taken as to the import of the rule, and what constitutes strict compliance with it. In both courts it was held by the men of skill who advised the judges that the Clan Sinclair might have gone slower than she did without losing the control of the vessel; that is to say, keeping her steerage way; but, while the judge of the Admiralty Court was of opinion that her excess of speed over the quantum necessary to keep her going was not such as to constitute any departure from the rule, the learned judges of the Court of Appeal took a different view, and held that it was. Had I to decide the question at this moment, my inclination would be to concur with Butt, J.; but I do not think it necessary for the purposes of the case to decide that point, and for this reason: this rule has no statutory sanction attached to it; it has no provision analogous to that in the Merchant Shipping Act of 1873, which declares a mere departure from the statutory rules to constitute fault—fault from which the offending vessel can only excuse herself by showing that "the circumstances of the case made departure from the regulation necessary." But in the case of a rule like this mere disobedience is not enough; it must be shown that it constituted fault in this sense, that it was actively contributing to the collision. To express it otherwise, it must be shown to have been one of the proximate causes of the collision.

Some observations which appear to me to have an important bearing upon the facts of the present case were made by Lord Selborne, L.C. in Spaight v. Tedcastle (6 App. Cas. 217; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 406; 44 L. T. Rep. N. S. 589). His Lordship there said: "When the direct and immediate cause of damage is clearly proved to be the fault of the defendant, contributory negligence by the plaintiff cannot be established merely by showing that if those in charge of the ship had in some earlier stage of navigation taken a course, or exercised a control over the course taken by the tug, which they did not actually take or exercise, a different situation would have resulted, in which the same danger might not have occurred." I read these words to explain the pith of the sentence which follows, and is in these terms: "Such an omission ought not to be regarded as contributory negligence if it might, in the circumstances which actually happened, have been unattended with danger but for the defendant's fault, and if it had no proper connection as a cause with the damage which followed as its effect." Now, I assume in favour of the respondents that the Clan Sinclair violated rule No. 23. In my opinion that rule must be regarded as prescribing to shipmasters and others navigating the Thames certain reasonable precautions to be taken by all who have occasion to be in that part of the river near Blackwall Point, and I think that a vessel which is proved to have disregarded these precautions must accept the onus of showing that the neglect of them did not contribute to any collision or damage which may have occurred at the time or subsequently. But then I am of opinion that the Clan Sinclair has discharged herself of that onus. I think it is made out by the evidence that nothing was either done or left undone by those who were navigating her which can reasonably be regarded as one of the causes of the collision. The result was to bring the vessel a good deal further down the Thames than she ought to have been; and if that conduct on the part of the Clan Sinclair had been such as to place the Margaret at this disadvantage, to throw her into difficulties, and make it doubtful what course she ought to pursue, then I could hardly have excused the Clan Sinclair from contribution to the collision in the present case. But the fact was not so. The new and wrong position into which I assume the Clan Sinclair had been brought by her neglect of the rule was perfectly apparent to those on board the Margaret, apparent for a considerable time and a considerable distance, for a time and distance of such an appreciable extent that they could, with ordinary care, have avoided the collision which ensued; and the ground of my judgment is shortly this, that, assuming there was a breach of the rule and culpable neglect at the time, yet the consequences of that neglect could have been avoided by ordinary care on the part of the Margaret. Instead of exhibiting ordinary care and prudence, those in charge of that vessel adopted a reckless course of navigation, which is described so well in the opinions of some of the judges in the court below, that I need say nothing further about it. On these grounds I concur in the judgment proposed.

Lord FITZGERALD.—My Lords: I also concur, and I assume for the purposes of the case that upon the true interpretation of rule 23 the Clan Sinclair had begun to round Blackwall Point at the time when her captain saw the masts of the Margaret over the headland. The words of the rule are "before rounding," and I assume that she had begun to round at that time, and then what she was to do was "to ease her engines." I do not mean to say that the obligation to ease depended at all upon her seeing the other vessel. As a rule of sound navigation three things are imposed upon a vessel navigating against the tide. First, when she comes to either of these headlands she must ease. No interpretation has been given to the word "ease" either in argument or in evidence, but it is known to anyone who goes on steam-vessels that a usual precaution of a steam-vessel, in order to keep her completely handy and under command, is to ease her. She is then bound, when approaching any of these headlands, to ease in the first instance. I assume that there are some of those headlands where you cannot see across, and where you may be met by a vessel passing the point immediately. But when a vessel navigating against the tide is aware that a vessel is rounding the point with the tide, coming in the opposite direction, she is to wait until that vessel has passed her. I assume that to be the true construction of the rule, and that the obligation upon the Clan Sinclair was to ease, and that when the pilot or the captain became aware that the Margaret was coming in the opposite direction with the tide he ought to have waited in that eased condition and completely under command; and if it was for me to form an opinion as to whether there had been a substantial compliance by the Clan Sinclair with the requirements of this rule, I confess that I should be inclined to adopt the view of the judge of the Admiralty Court, and not to adopt the too rigid rule laid down by the Court of Appeal. But that is not necessary upon the present occasion; for upon the main question, assuming rule 23 to apply exactly, and that there was not a sufficient compliance with it by the Clan Sinclair in this respect, that her speed might have been less than it actually was, yet that leaves untouched the main question in the cause, which is one of fact, Did the breach of the rule by the Clan Sinclair contribute to the collision? It is said that if she had rigidly complied with the rule, if her speed had been more reduced, she would not have been abreast of the Zephyr, and that if she had not been abreast of the Zephyr the calamity would not have arisen. In one respect that may be quite correct, but it is no answer to the inquiry upon which we are at present She was seen by the Margaret a considerable time beforehand under steam. It was seen by the Margaret that she was alongside and abreast of the Zephyr, The Margaret was then a sufficient distance off, and was completely under control. She had two courses open to her free from danger—one to pass to the north of the Zephyr, and the second to pass to the south of the Clan Sinclair. She did not do either, but for some reason (and possibly, if I were at liberty to speculate, it was the reason which is found in these collision cases too often to be the cause of the calamity, namely, taking the short cut in place of adopting a more safe course) she adopted another, and a dangerous and reckless course, namely, that of passing between the Clan Sinclair and the Zephyr, and under such circumstances as to make it extremely probable that she would come into collision with one or the other. She came into collision with the Clan Sinclair. The latter had immediately before, and when it became apparent that there was danger, used all the precautions in her power to avoid it, but her efforts were ineffectual. I conceive it to be clear, upon a true view of the case, that the Clan Sinclair did not cause the calamity either wholly or in part, and that therefore the decision of the Court of Admiralty was correct.

SEWELL v. BURDICK. (a)

Bill of lading—Indorsement by way of security—Transfer of property—Bills of Lading Act 18 & 19 Vict. c. 111)—Liability for freight.

A shipper of goods, who has indorsed a bill of lading in blank and delivered it to the indorsee simply by way of security for money advanced, does not thereby pass the property in the goods to the indorsee, so as to transfer to him all liabilities in respect of them within the meaning of sect. 1 of the Bills of Lading Act (18 & 19 Vict. c. 111). Consequently the indorsee cannot be made liable in an action by the shipowner for freight.

Judgment of the Court of Appeal reversed.

Lickbarrow v. Mason (1 Sm. L. C. 753, 8*th ed.*) discussed and explained.

THIS was an appeal from a judgment of the Court of Appeal (Brett, M.R. and Baggallay, L.J., Bowen, L.J. dissenting), reported in 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas, 298, 51 L. T. Rep. N. S. 453, and 13 Q. B. Div. 159, reversing a judgment of Field, J. (reported in 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 79, 48 L. T. Rep. N. S. 705, and 10 Q. B. Div. 363) upon further consideration.

The action was brought by the respondent, Mr. James Burdick, on behalf of himself and others, the owners of the steamship Zoe, against the appellants, Messrs. Sewell and Nephew, bankers at Manchester, the indorsees for value of a bill of lading, to recover the sum of 174*l.* 8*s.* 9*d.*, with interest, for freight, primage, and disbursements on sixty cases of spinning machinery shipped in the plaintiffs' steamship Zoe in 1880 by one Nercessiantz, and caried from London to Poti, a port in the Black Sea. The action was tried before Field, J. and a special jury in April 1882. In the course of the trial the jury were, by consent of both parties, discharged, and the learned judge adjourned the case for further consideration. The case was argued on further consideration in Nov. 1882, and in Feb. 1883 the learned judge delivered judgment in favour of the defendants, the now appellants. It appeared that in the bill of lading Henry Head and Co., as agents, were named as the shippers, and the goods were made deliverable at Poti "unto Mr. D. S. Nercessiantz, Kutais, or to his or their assigns, freight, primage, and disbursements of the said goods to be paid at destination, as per margin, or in default of such payment the owners or agents to have an absolute lien on the goods, discharging them in their name aud holding them till all costs, freight, primage, interest, and insurance should be paid in full, and to have liberty to sell the goods by auction and retain the freight and primage and all charges." The Zoe reached Poti with the goods in the month of September, and, as no one appeared to clear the goods, they were on the 14th Oct. 1880 landed and warehoused at the Russian Custom-house, with the usual stop for freight. On the 26th Oct. Nercessiantz, who had previously had business transactions with the defendants, applied to them for a temporary loan of 300*l.* to enable him to complete the payment in this country for the goods, and as security for the advance he deposited with the defendants the bill of lading of the goods. By the Russian law goods landed and not cleared within twelve months are liable to be sold for duty and charges, and, as Nercessiantz did not appear to claim the goods in question, they were sold by the Russian Custom officials, but the proceeds were insufficient to do more than to satisfy their claim. The present action for the freight of the goods was then brought by the plaintiff against the defendants as the owners of the goods of which they held the bill of lading. Field, J. found as a fact that Nercessiantz, in depositing the bill of lading, and the defendants in making the advance, did not intend anything more than a pledge, and did not intend that the property in the goods should pass so as to make the defendants liable for the freight as the real owners of the goods, but that it was intended to leave the general property with Nercessiantz, contemplating that he would deliver the goods to the parties for whom he had bought them, and that the possession of the bill of lading would enable the defendants to stop their advance out of the proceeds, by making them a necessary party to the delivery, or, at the lowest, to put it in their power to compel the borrower to redeem the pledge, and thus obtain the only document by which he could obtain delivery of the goods and perform his contract; but his judgment was reversed, as above mentioned.

The defendants then appealed to the House of Lords.

Nov. 4, 6, 7.—The Solicitor-General (Sir F. Herschell, Q.C.) and Danckwertz, for the appellants, contended that the transaction was only a contract of pledge, which leaves the property in the pledgor. The judgment of the court below was founded on Lickbarrow v. Mason (2 T. R. 63; 1 H. Bl. 357; 2 H. Bl. 211; 5 T. R. 683; 6 East, 20, n.), which only relates to stoppage in transitu, and not to this point:

Gibson v. Carruthers, 8 M. & W. 321.

The real question is what was the contract between the parties. Lickbarrow v. Mason only decided that where there has been an indorsement for value the right of stoppage in transitu is gone. The same point was raised in Newson v. Thornton (6 East, 17), and the judges did not take the extreme view of the effect of Lickbarrow v. Mason which the Court of Appeal took in this case. The property remains in the pledgor:

Turner v. Liverpool Docks, 6 Ex. 543;
Jenkyns v. Brown, 14 Q. B. 496;

At the conclusion of the arguments their Lordships took time to consider their judgment.

Dec. 5.—Their Lordships gave judgment as follows:

The LORD CHANCELLOR (Selborne).—My Lords: This appeal raises the question whether, under the Bills of Lading Act of 1855 (18 & 19 Vict. c. 111), every holder of a bill of lading, indorsed in blank, who has taken it by way of security for an advance of money (and has not afterwards parted with it), is liable, by reason of such indorsement only, to an action for freight by the shipowner, although he may not have obtained delivery of the goods, or derived any other benefit from his security. The difference between the learned judges in the court below mainly, if not altogether, turned upon the question whether, according to the authorities, from Lickbarrow v. Mason (1 Sm. L. C. 753, 8th ed.) downwards, the effect of an indorsement and deposit of a bill of lading, while the goods are in transitu, by way of security for a loan, is to pass the whole legal title to the goods, or only to pledge them, passing at law a "special property," and leaving the "general property" in the shipper. That question was much debated in Glyn, Mills, and Co. v. East and West India Docks Company (6 Q. B. Div. 475; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 345; 43 L. T. Rep. N. S. 584), where Brett, L.J. expressed the same opinion on which he acted in the present case, Bramwell, L.J. taking the opposite view. Lord Blackburn, in his opinion on that case when it reached this House (7 App. Cas. 591; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 580; 47 L. T. Rep. N. S. 309), adverted to the point, but thought it unnecessary to express any opinion upon it. In the present case the true question is whether "the property" in the goods "passed to the indorsee upon or by reason of the indorsement" within the meaning of those words as used in the Bills of Lading Act of 1855. It was considered by Brett, M.R. and Baggallay, L.J., that, if the object of the indorsement and deposit was (as they thought) to pass the whole legal title to the goods to the appellants as indorsees, leaving an equitable interest only in the shipper, it was a necessary consequence that "the property passed" to them within the meaning of the statute, and that the respondent, the shipowner, was entitled to recover under the statute in this action. They clearly used the words "legal" and "equitable" in that technical sense which they have acquired in English law. I am not myself satisfied that this consequence is necessary; but I admit that there are difficulties in the way of the contrary view, as there are also difficulties (arising from the strong and unqualified language used by judges of great authority, from the time when Lickbarrow v. Mason was decided downwards) in the way of the opinion that an indorsement and deposit of a bill of lading, in a case like the present, operates by way of pledge, and not as an assignment of the whole legal title to the goods.

The facts here are simply an indorsement in blank, and deposit of the bills of lading, so indorsed, by way of security for money advanced. There are no special circumstances, except that the indorsee never did obtain, and that it was never possible for him (in fact) to obtain, delivery of the goods. I should not feel greatly embarrassed, if there were no other authority, by the mere terms in which the custom of merchants was found in Lickbarrow v. Mason (5 T. R. 683), viz., that "bills of lading are, after the shipment and before the voyage performed, negotiable and transferable by the shipper's indorsement and delivery . . . and that, by such indorsement and delivery, the property in such goods is transferred." This, it may be said, is the language of the Bills of Lading Act. But I do not understand it as necessarily meaning more than that "the property" which it might be the intent of the transaction to transfer, whether special or general, passes by such an indorsement, according to the custom of merchants. The finding must be reasonably understood. It cannot, for instance, mean that the property will be transferred when there is no consideration. But, although the custom as found seems to me to be consistent with the view taken by Field, J. and Bowen L.J. in the present case, I have more difficulty in saying that the language of Buller, J., in the earlier stages of Lickbarrow v. Mason (2 T. R. 63) is so. And in some later cases other great judges have not only followed, but have even gone beyond that language. The Court of Queen's Bench, in Re Westzinthus (5 B. & Ad. 817), held that a right of stoppage in transitu might be exercised against the interest remaining in the shipper, subject to the security created by the indorsement and deposit of the bill of lading; but they did so on the ground, not that the shipper retained any legal title or interest, but that he had an equity of redemption, of which the form in which the question then arose enabled the court to take notice. And, although it is true that in Harris v. Birch (9 M. & W. 592) the Court of Exchequer, then composed of Parke, Alderson, Gurney, and Rolfe, BB., decided a question of stamp duty upon the ground that an indorsement and deposit of a bill of lading by way of security operated as a pledge, and Coleridge, J. in Jenkyns v. Brown (14 Q. B. 496) considered it to pass a special property only to the indorsee, leaving the general property in the shipper, and in Meyerstein v. Barber (L. Rep. 2 C. P. 38, 661; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 449; 15 L. T. Rep. N. S. 355; 16 L. T. Rep. N. S. 569) all the judges of the Common Pleas and in the Exchequer Chamber concurred in that view, yet, on the other hand, when Meyerstein v. Barber (L. Rep. 4 H. of L. 317; 22 L. T. Rep. N. S. 808) came to the House of Lords, where the judgments of those courts were affirmed, Lord Hatherley, L.C. and Lord Westbury used strong language of an opposite kind. Lord Hatherley, L.C. said: "If anything could be supposed to be settled in mercantile law, I apprehend it would be this, that, when goods are at sea, the parting with the bill of lading is parting with the ownership of the goods;" and afterwards: "I apprehend that it would shake the course of proceeding between merchants, as sanctioned by decided cases, if we were to hold that the assignment of the bill of lading (the goods being at the time at sea) does not pass the whole and complete ownership of the goods, so that any person taking a subsequent bill of lading, be it the second or be it the third, must be content to submit to the loss which would arise from that state of facts." These words are hardly, if at all, qualified by the context, "so that," &c.; although, in a later sentence, as to which see the remarks of Lord Blackburn in Glyn, Mills, and Co., v. East and West India Dock Company (ubi sup), the proposition is less absolute: "When the vessel is at sea, and the cargo has not yet arrived, the parting with the bill of lading is parting with that which is the symbol of property, and which, for the purpose of conveying a right and interest in the property, is the property itself.' Lord Westbury's language is similar, perhaps stronger. "No doubt," he said, "the transfer of it (the bill of lading) for value passes the absolute property in the goods." He quoted some words of Erle, C.J., to which I shall afterwards refer, as having the same sense; he spoke of the first holder for value of the bill of lading as having "the legal ownership of the goods," "the legal right in the property," "both the right of property and the right of possession, passing by a symbol, the bill of lading, which is at once both the symbol of the property and the evidence of the right of possession." To reconcile these expressions with those used in the same case by the judges of the Common Pleas and in the Exchequer Chamber is scarcely possible, and yet no dissent from the views of those learned judges was expressed in this House; on the contrary, their reasoning, and especially that of Willes, J., was referred to with apparent approval, particularly by Lord Hatherley, L.C. and Lord Chelmsford. In such a conflict, not of decisions, but of judicial phraseology, if not of doctrine, it becomes important to remember that it is often dangerous to infer, even from very strong words when used diverso intuitu, conclusions on other subjects which, if they had been present to the minds of the speakers, might perhaps have led to their being more guarded or qualified. None of the cases to which I have referred arose upon the statute with which your Lordships have now to deal; they related, some to the right of stoppage in transitu, some to competing claims between holders for value of different parts of the same set of bills of lading. It may well be that, as against all such claims, and against parties setting up interests adverse to the title of the indorsee for value, such words as "the legal ownership," "the legal right," "the right of property in the goods," might be used, and the property which passed to the indorsee might be described as "absolute," in a sense substantially true, even though such property might, as between the indorsee receiving and the shipper depositing the bill of lading by way of security, be special only and not general; and though the most apt term for a scientific definition of the transaction, as between the borrower and the lender, may be, not assignment or transfer, but pledge.

In such a state of authority it is important to see how the matter stands in principle. In principle, the custom of merchants, as found in Lickbarrow v. Mason, seems to be as much applicable and available to pass a special property at law by the indorsement, when that is the intent of the transaction, as to pass the general property, when the transaction is, e.g., one of sale. In principle, also, there seems to be nothing in the nature of a contract to give security by the delivery of a bill of lading indorsed in blank, which requires more, in order to give it full effect, than a pledge, accompanied by a power to obtain delivery of the goods when they arrive, and, if necessary, to realise them for the purpose of the security. Whether the indorsee, when he takes delivery to himself, may not be entitled to assume, and may not be held to assume towards the shipowner, the position of full proprietor is a different question. But, so long at all events as the goods are in transitu, there seems to be no reason why the shipper's title should be displaced, any further than the nature and intent of the transaction require. This is not inconsistent with what was said by Erle, C.J., in Meyerstein v. Barber (ubi sup.), that "the indorsement and delivery of the bill of lading, while the ship is at sea, operate exactly the same as the delivery of the goods themselves to the assignee after the ship's arrival would do." That learned judge cannot have meant that possession of the symbol is, for every purpose, the same thing as actual possession of the goods; what he did mean was, that the indorsement and delivery of the bill of lading, by way of pledge, which he considered to be the effect of the transaction in that case, was equivalent, and not more than equivalent, to a delivery by way of pledge of the goods themselves. Lord Hardwicke, in Snee v. Prescot (1 Atk. 245), thought that there was a difference between an indorsement of a bill of lading in blank and a personal indorsement, and for some purposes I think there is much reason for that opinion. If, from a personal indorsement, the inference might properly be drawn that a title by assignment, as distinguished from pledge, was meant to pass to the indorsee, it would not, in my opinion, follow that the same inference ought to be drawn from an indorsement in blank. Part of the custom of merchants, found in Lickbarrow v. Mason, was, that "indorsements of bills of lading in blank may be filled up by the person to whom they are delivered or transmitted, with words ordering the delivery of the goods to be made to such person; and, according to the practice of merchants, the same, when filled up, have the same operation as if it had been done by the shipper." Whether it is or is not usual in practice to fill up the blank with any name before taking delivery, it is certainly not to be implied from the custom, as thus found, that the operation of the indorsement, while it remains in blank, is necessarily to all intents and purposes exactly the same as if it were filled up with the holder's name. So long as it remains in blank it may pass from hand to hand by mere delivery, or it may be redelivered to the shipper without any new transfer or indorsement, which would not be the case if there were a personal indorsement. It would be strange if the Bills of Lading Act has made a person whose name has never been upon the bill of lading, and who, as between himself and the shipowner, has never acted upon it, liable to an action by the shipowner upon a contract to which he was not a party. I am not, however, sure, that, for the decision of the present appeal, it is really necessary to rely, either upon any difference between a personal indorsement and one in blank, or upon the distinction between such a form of security as in English law might be held to pass the whole legal title, and a simple pledge. The statute with which your Lordships have now to deal is introduced by a preamble, the material part of which is, that "by the custom of merchants, a bill of lading of goods being transferrable by indorsement, the property of the goods may thereby pass to the indorsee, but nevertheless all rights in respect of the contract contained in the bill of lading continue in the original shipper or owner, and it is expedient that such rights should pass with the property." The 1st section enacts, that "every consignee of goods named in a bill of lading, and every indorsee of a bill of lading to whom the property in the goods therein mentioned shall pass upon or by reason of such consignment or indorsement shall have transferred to and vested in him all rights of suit, and be subject to the same liabilities in respect of such goods as if the contract contained in the bill of lading had been made with himself." The 2nd section provides that "nothing herein contained shall prejudice or affect any right of stoppage in transitu, or any right to claim freight against the original shipper or owner, or any liability of the consignee or indorsee by reason or in consequence of his being such consignee or indorsee, or of his receipt of the goods by reason or in consequence of such consignment or indorsement." There is nothing else material in the Act. This statute contemplates the passing of "the property in the goods," by the indorsement of the bill of lading, as a thing which may, or may not happen, according to the nature and intent of the contract or dealing, for the purpose of which that indorsement is made; and it seems to provide for those cases only in which the property so passes as to make it just and convenient that all rights of suit under the contract contained in the bill of lading should be "transferred to" the indorsee, and should not any longer "continue in the original shipper or owner." One test of the application of the statute may, perhaps, be whether, according to the true intent and operation of the contract between the shipper and the indorsee, the shipper still retains any such proprietary right in the goods as to make it just and reasonable that he should also retain rights of suit—the word is "suit," not "action"—against the shipowner under the contract contained in the bill of lading. If he does, the statute can hardly be intended to take from him those rights and transfer them to the indorsee. If they are not transferred to the indorsee, neither is the indorsee subjected to the shipper's liabilities. It is very difficult to conceive that when the goods are still in transitu, when the substance of the contract is not sale and purchase, but borrowing and lending, and when the indorsement and deposit of the bill of lading is only by way of security for a loan, it can be the intention of either party thereby, without more, to divest the shipper of all proprietary right to the goods, and to take from him and transfer to the indorsee all rights of suit under the contract with the shipowner. That some proprietary right—his original right, subject only to the creditor's security—remains in him is indisputable. If that proposition needed illustration from authority, it would be found in the cases of Re Westzinthus (ubi sup.), Spalding v. Ruding (6 Beav. 376), and Kemp v. Falk (7 App. Cas. 573; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 1; 47 L. T. Rep. N. S. 454). Can it be that he is by the statute deprived of all remedies, legal and equitable, under the bill of lading as long as it remains in the hands of the secured creditor? The creditor in the ordinary course of things will do nothing until the time for payment or delivery of the goods arrives.

Can it, then, be material whether the proprietary right thus remaining in the shipper while the goods are in transitu is legal or equitable? The statute relates to a subject of general mercantile law in which not Englishmen only, but foreigners also, may be, and often are, concerned. Foreign as well as British indorsements of bills of lading by way of security for advances which may be made abroad, perhaps in countries not governed by English laws, are liable to be affected by it whenever recourse must be had to British courts. It seems to me to be inconceivable that the construction of the words "the property in the goods" in such a statute can have been intended to depend upon any such technical distinction as that made in English law, but by no means in the laws of all other countries in which the customs of merchants prevail, between legal and equitable titles. It is to be observed, further, that the statute contemplates beneficium cum onere, and not onus sine beneficio. It may be reasonable if the indorsee has the benefit, as he would if he were a purchaser out and out, or if under his title as indorsee of the bill of lading he obtained delivery of the goods to himself, that he should take it with its corresponding burden quoad the shipowner. But it would be the reverse of reasonable to impose on him such a burden when he has neither entered into any contract of which it might be the natural result, nor, having taken a mere security, has obtained any benefit from it. This observation is fortified by the fact that the statute does not appear to distinguish between indorsements subsequent and those anterior to its enactment. On the other hand, it seems impossible to suppose the Legislature to have passed this statute without some reference to the custom proved in Lickbarrow v. Mason, and to the law, whatever may be the true view of it, established on the same subject by later authorities in the English courts. And if, as I think, it ought to be understood with some reference to that custom and to those authorities, I cannot persuade myself that its operation is altogether restricted to cases of out-an-out sale, or that an indorsee of a bill of lading, by way of security, who converts his symbolical into real possession by obtaining delivery of the goods ought never to derive any benefit from it. The authorities decided upon the statute appear to me to be most easily reconciled with its apparent objects and with each other by a view which, if hardly consistent with expressions to be found in some other cases, nevertheless seems to me to have a real and substantial foundation in reason and good sense—viz., that the indorsee by way of security, though not having "the property" passed to him absolutely and for all purposes by the mere indorsement and delivery of the bill of lading while the goods are at sea, has a title, by means of which he is enabled to take the position of full proprietor upon himself, with its corresponding burdens, if he thinks fit, and that he actually does so, as between himself and the shipowner, if and when he claims and takes delivery of the goods by virtue of that title. The authorities decided upon by the statute are Fox v. Nott, Smurthwaite v. Wilkins, The Figlia Maggiore, and The Freedom. Another case, Short v. Simpson, was also cited during the argument at your Lordships' bar. In Fox v. Nott (6 H. & N. 63, A.D. 1861) the only question determined was that the shipowner retained his remedy by action against the shipper after the indorsement of the bill of lading, a case provided for by the 2nd section; but some of the learned judges expressed opinions bearing upon the general construction of the statute. Pollock, C.B. said: "The indorsee of the bill of lading may be sued under this statute, because by taking the goods he also takes the liability to the freight." Martin, B. said: "The statute means an actual vesting of the property, as by bargain and sale;" and Wilde, B. said: "I agree with my brother Martin that the Act applies only to an absolute transfer of the goods, and was never intended to deprive a person who made advances on the security of the bill of lading of the benefit of the original contract of the shipper to pay the freight." In Smurthwaite v. Wilkins (11 C. B. N. 842, A.D. 1862) the indorsee for value of a bill of lading, who had indorsed it over to a third party, was held not to be liable to the shipowner. Erle, C.J. said: "The contention on the part of the plaintiff is that, the property in the goods passing to the defendants by the assignment of the bill of lading under the Act, they are liable for the freight, although they never received the goods. . . . The contention is, that the consignee or assignee shall always remain liable, like the consignor, although he has parted with all interest and property in the goods by assigning the bill of lading to a third party before the arrival of the goods. The consequences which this would lead to are so monstrous, so manifestly unjust, that I should pause before I consented to adopt this construction of the Act of Parliament. The person who received the goods was always considered liable for the freight; but that was not by virtue of an original liability as a contracting party, but on a contract implied from his acceptance of the goods. Looking at the whole statute, it seems to me that the obvious meaning is that the assignee who receives the cargo shall have all the rights and liabilities of a contracting party; but that, if he passes on the bill of lading by indorsement to another, he passes on all the rights and liabilities which the bill of lading carries with it." Vaughan Williams, J. agreed. "Looking," he said, "at the preamble and at the general scope and intention of the statute, I can entertain no doubt that the view presented by my Lord is the true one;" and he explained the effect of "the general scope" of the Act to be "that, where the right of property leaves the party, the rights and liabilities under the contract leave him also." A case like the present, of a security on an indorsed bill of lading, not acted upon, and which, in fact, never could be acted upon by taking delivery of the goods, but at the same time not transferred to any other person, differs in specie from that of a man who has transferred the bill of lading by indorsing it over to another. But I cannot see that it would be more reasonable to make the holder of such a security, which he has never realised, and never can realise, liable under the statute, than if he had parted with the bill of lading to somebody else. The cases of The Figlia Maggiore (18 L. T. Rep. N. S. 532; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 97; L. Rep. 2 A. & E. 106) and The Freedom (22 L. T. Rep. N. S. 175) were determined in the Court of Admiralty under another statute, which, as Dr. Lushington, and his successor, in my opinion, rightly held, gave that court jurisdiction when, and only when, there was, independently of that statute, a right of action or suit; and, in those particular cases, it appears to have been held that there was no such right of action or suit unless it was given by the Bills of Lading Act. In both of them the plaintiffs, indorsees by way of security of bills of lading, had claimed and obtained delivery of the goods, and then had brought actions against the shipowners for damages which they had sustained through breaches of the contracts contained in the bills of lading; and they were held entitled to recover. This was right, if an indorsee, under such circumstances, may rightly be held entitled to the benefit of the statute, as having elected to complete his potential and inchoate title by taking possession of the goods, and as placing himself towards the shipowner in the position of proprietor. May it not be said that "the property in the goods" then, if not before, "passes" to him "by reason of the indorsement?" The principle of the liability which, under some circumstances, was held, even before the statute, to attach to the indorsee taking delivery, was regarded by Erle, C.J., in Smurthwaite v. Wilson, as elucidating the policy and objects of the statute itself; and both he and Pollock, C.B., in Fox v. Nott, spoke of "taking the goods," and "receiving the cargo," as the test of its application. The authorities on that subject (Jesson v. Solly, 4 Taunt. 52; Stindt v. Roberts, 17 L. J. 166, Q.B.; Wegener v. Smith, 15 C. B. 285; Chappell v. Comfort, 10 C. B. N. S. 802) seem, from this point of view, to deserve consideration. The decision of the Court of Admiralty in the case of The Freedom was affirmed by Her Majesty in Council, upon the advice of the Judicial Committee (24 L. T. Rep. N. S. 452: 1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 28;

L. Rep. 3 P. C. 594); and, although it was on a point as to which the Admiralty had only a statutory jurisdiction, concurrent with the courts of common law, and though in all Admiralty cases the appeal now lies to this House, still this, as the decision of a court of final appeal, ought not, in any later case, to be lightly departed from. The case of Short v. Simpson (13 L. T. Rep. N. S. 674; L. Rep. 1 C. P. 248) did not really require anything to be decided as to the effect of the statute, and nothing was, in fact, so decided. It was there held that, quocunque modo, whether under the statute or independently of the statute, the shipper, to whom a bill of lading which he had indorsed and delivered to his creditor by way of security was re-indorsed and re-delivered upon payment of the loan, was remitted to his original rights.

Upon the whole, I cannot dissemble that this case appears to me to be attended with some considerable difficulties. But those difficulties are mainly technical, arising out of a comparison of the language of the statute with various and not always consistent forms of expression, found in authorities not decided with a view to any such consequences as those which the statute would produce. They deal with questions between unpaid vendors of goods comprised in bills of lading and bonâ fide indorsees of the same bills of lading for value, or between competing and adverse claimants to priority as bonâ fide holders for value of the bills of lading themselves. The statute, on the other hand, deals with questions between shippers and indorsees of bills of lading claiming under them, and between indorsees and shipowners. The preponderance of principle and reason appears to me to be against the proposition that, as between those parties, it can have been intended by, or can be the effect of, the statute to make the creditor of the shipper liable, in effect, as his surety to the shipowner, with whom he was never brought in contact, by reason only of the deposit with him, by way of security, of a bill of lading indorsed in blank; his right, under that deposit, being, whether at law or in equity, special and not general, and the shipper retaining, whether at law or in equity, the real and substantial property in the goods, subject to the security. It had not, until the present case, been directly or indirectly determined, by any authority, that such is the effect of the statute. My conclusion is, that the appellants ought to be exonerated, by your Lordships' judgment, from the respondents' action, and that the order of the Court of Appeal ought to be reversed, with costs.

Lord BLACKBURN.—My Lords: The judgment of Field, J. was reversed by the order now under appeal. The case was tried before him without a jury, and I think it is necessary to see what he had to determine. There was no question between vendor and vendee nor of stoppage in transitu raised, for there was neither a vendor nor a stoppage. The law and decisions as to stoppage in transitu might be relevant in construing the statute 18 & 19 Vict. c. 3, but did not otherwise affect the rights of the parties. It was not suggested that the defendants were, at the time the goods were shipped, in any way interested in the goods, nor that they were, either as undisclosed principals or otherwise, parties to the contract in the bill of lading until it was delivered to them after the ship had sailed and the goods were in the hands of the shipowners to be carried under the bill of lading, and were not yet delivered, with an indorsement in blank by Nercessiantz the consignee named in the bill of lading. I do not think that, either at the trial or on the argument, it was at all disputed that at common law the remedy of the shipowner under a bill of lading was by enforcing his lien upon the goods, or by bringing an action on the contract against anyone who, at the time when the goods were shipped, was a party to the bill of lading, either as being on the face of it a contracting party or as being an undisclosed principal of such a party. In either of these cases he might be sued as having been from the beginning a party to the contract. Some attempts had been made to say that the contract in a bill of lading might, under some circumstances at least, be transferred to an assignee in a manner analogous to that in which the contract in a bill of exchange was transferred by the indorsement of the bill of exchange; but I think, since the decision in Thompson v. Dominy (14 M. & W. 403) in 1845, it has been undisputed law that under no circumstances could anyone, not a party to the contract from the beginning, sue on it in his own name. Any action on the contract at common law must be brought in the name of an original contractor, and no action could be brought on the contract against one who was not liable to be sued as an original contractor. But ten years later the Bills of Lading Act (18 & 19 Vict. c. 111) was passed. The preamble states this as one of the objects which the Legislature had in view: "Whereas, by the custom of merchants, a bill of lading being transferable by indorsement, the property in the goods may thereby pass to the indorsee" (which I think for a long time before 18 & 19 Vict.—A.D. 1855—was undisputed), "but nevertheless all rights in respect of the contract contained in the bill of lading continue in the original shipper or owner" (this, it is to my mind clear, refers to Thompson v. Dominy), "and it is expedient that such rights should pass with the property." The mode in which the Legislature carry out the object thus expressed in the preamble is by sect. 1: "Every consignee of goods named in a bill of lading, and every indorsee of a bill of lading, to whom the property in the goods therein mentioned shall pass upon or by reason of such consignment or indorsement, shall have transferred to and vested in him all rights of suit, and be subject to the same liabilities in respect of such goods as if the contract contained in the bill of lading had been made with himself."

The case made on the statement of claim was that "the property" had passed upon or by reason of the indorsement to the defendants, not that they were before that a party to the contract in the bill of lading, but that by virtue of the Act 18 & 19 Vic. c. 111, when the property passed they became subject to the same liabilities as if the contract contained in the bill of lading had been made with themselves. It is not disputed that the delivery of the bill of lading to the defendants with the indorsement of the consignee on it in blank was an indorsement, nor that whatever interest then passed to them still remained in them. What was in issue was, whether upon or by reason of that indorsement "the property" passed. The first and most important question to be decided in this case is, what is the true construction of 18 & 19 Vict. c. 111? Does the "property" in the goods there mean any legal property in the goods, so as to be satisfied by proof that a legal property passed accompanied by a right of possession, so as to entitle the transferee to maintain trover, though it was intended by the parties, and was as between them, to be by way of security only, the transferor retaining a right of redemption either by way of a common law retention of the general property, though the pledgee had a right to the possession and a property as pledgee, a right exceeding a lien, or the whole property at law having passed by way of mortgage, the transferor retaining an equity of redemption, which in 1855 was an equitable right, enforceable only in a court of equity? I think that all the judges below were of opinion that, if the right reserved was the general right to the property at law, what was transferred being only a pledge (conveying, no doubt, a right of property and an immediate right to the possession, so that the transferee would be entitled to bring an action at law against anyone who wrongfully interfered with his right), though a property, and a property against the indorser, passed "upon and by reason of the indorsement," yet the property did not pass. And I agree with them. I do not at all proceed on the ground that this being an indorsement in blank, followed by a delivery of the bill of lading so indorsed, had any different effect from what would have been the effect if it had been an indorsement to the appellants by name. The case of The Freedom (ubi sup.) was cited, and I think there are expressions used in the judgment delivered in that case by Sir Joseph Napier which indicate that the Judicial Committee were not of that opinion. It is said: "The plaintiffs were consignees for sale, but as part of the transaction a bill of exchange was drawn by the consignors for nearly the full value of the goods; the bills of lading were indorsed by them and forwarded to the plaintiffs, by whom the draft of the consignors was accepted and paid in due course." If that was the transaction (and whether it was so or not, the Judicial Committee proceeded on the assumption that such was the transaction), the plaintiffs in The Freedom were in exactly the position of Church in the case of Newsom v. Thornton (6 East, 17), the case to which I shall have to refer afterwards. Church had the bill of lading indorsed to him as a factor or consignee for sale, and had therefore a right to hold the goods as against the indorser as a security for all his advances; and he had authority at common law to sell the goods, and before the arrival of the ship to transfer the bill of lading in furtherance of a sale, but he had no authority to pledge either the goods or the bill of lading. It is true that, by the Factors Acts, the plaintiffs in The Freedom would have had a power, which Church had not, to pledge the bill of lading, but, as they did not exercise that power, it could make no difference. The judgment then proceeds: "The legal title to the property in the goods specified in the bills of lading was thus transferred to and vested in the plaintiffs. The right of suing upon the contract in the bills of lading was transferred to them by force of the statute 18 & 19 Vict. c. 111." The judgment then proceeds to show, I think correctly, that the dictum of Martin, B. (reported in Fox v. Nott, ubi sup.) was not necessary for the decision in that case, and goes on: "Their Lordships are satisfied that it was intended by this Act that the right of suing upon the contract under the bill of lading should follow the property in the goods therein specified; that is to say, the legal title to the goods as against the indorser." It certainly seems to me that their Lordships thought that "the property" passed within the meaning of the 18 & 19 Vict. c. 111, if any legal right to hold as against the indorser passed. The statute which their Lordships had to construe was 24 Vict. c. 10, s. 6, which is in these terms: "The High Court of Admiralty shall have jurisdiction over any claim by the owner" (i.e., of the goods) "or consignee or assignee of any bill of lading of any goods carried into any port in England or Wales in any ship for damage done to the goods, or any part thereof, by the negligence or misconduct of, or for any breach of duty or breach of contract on the part of, the owner, master, or crew of the ship, unless it is shown to the satisfaction of the court that at the time of the institution of the cause any owner or part owner of the ship is domiciled in England or Wales." It is not necessary to put a construction on the 24 Vict. c. 10, s. 6. I think that there are very good reasons for contending that a person who has possession of an indorsed bill of lading without any right at all to hold it against the indorser without being owner of any interest in the goods, is not an "assignee" within the meaning of this enactment, and consequently that what I understand to be the actual decision of Dr. Lushington in The St. Cloud (Brow. & Lush. 4), that such a person could not sue under the Admiralty Act, may have been right enough. It is not necessary to decide that. But I agree with what was said in The Nepoter (L. Rep. 2 A. & E. 375; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 355; 22 L. T. Rep. N. S. 177), that it is contrary to all rules of construction to interpolate any reference to the Bills of Lading Act into the Admiralty Act. I think, therefore, that the actual point decided in The Freedom might be quite right, for the plaintiff in that action had a property, and a very substantial property, in the goods as against the indorsers, and everyone else perhaps, and was in every sense an assignee of the bill of lading. The opinion expressed on the construction of 18 & 19 Vict. c. 111, that in that Act the property meant a legal title as against the indorser, was perhaps unnecessary, and I think not sound. The words used in the statute are not such as primâ facie to express such an intention. No one, in ordinary language, would say that, when goods are pawned, or money is raised by mortgage on an estate, the property, either in the goods or land, passes to the pledgee or mortgagee, and I cannot think that the object of the enactment was to enact that no security for a loan should be taken on the transfer of bills of lading unless the lender incurred all the liabilities of his borrower on the contract. That would greatly, and I think unnecessarily, hamper the business of advancing money on such securities which the Legislature has, by the Factors Acts, shown it thinks ought rather to be encouraged. It is not uncommon to reduce into writing the agreement between the banker and his customers as to the terms on which the bills of lading deposited by them as securities are to be held. Such was the case in Glyn v. East and West India Dock Company (ubi sup.), as to which I shall have more to say hereafter. When there is such a writing, it is, in the absence of fraud, conclusive between the parties as to what they intended. And I do not in the least question that such a writing may be so expressed as to show that between the parties the transfer was a mortgage, though of goods, in the manner with which everyone is familiar with regard to lands. The equity of redemption in such a case was an equitable estate only, and in 1855 enforceable in equity, not at law. Where there is neither a symbolical delivery by a transfer of a bill of lading, nor an actual delivery of the goods themselves, there may be (though there seldom is) a substantial difference in the rights of the lender according as the transaction is of the one kind or the other. In Howes v. Ball (7 B. & C. 481) Ball sold and delivered a coach to John Howes (since deceased) under an agreement in writing, in which there was this clause: "And further I, John Howes, do agree that Thomas Ball do have and hold a claim upon the coach until the debt be duly paid." John Howes died without having paid the debt. Ball, after his death, seized the coach, for which seizure the action was brought by the executor. Had that agreement amounted to a mortgage by John Howes to Ball, I take it there could have been no doubt that the mortgagee would have had as much right against the executor of John Howes as he would have had against John Howes himself. But it was held that it did not amount to a mortgage, but only to an agreement that Ball should have a right of hypothec, and, there having been no delivery by Howes to Ball, the decision was that, though so long as John Howes lived and held the property in the coach Ball might have justified a seizure as against him, he could not justify a seizure as against his representatives. In Flory v. Denny (7 Ex. 581), where the agreement was "as an additional security for a loan to assign all the debtor's right and interest in a chattel," it was held to be a mortgage, and to operate so as to transfer the property, without any delivery, as a bargain and sale out and out of the goods would, though an agreement to create a pledge would, according to Howes v. Ball, have conveyed no property of any kind in the goods without a delivery.

But where the goods are at sea, and there is a transfer of the bill of lading, there is a delivery of possession, symbolical, it is true, but all that can be given. The question whether there was a mortgage or only a common law pledge, or hypothec, it being accompanied by delivery, might affect the question what was the court in which those rights were to be enforced, but does not affect the substance of the rights. The borrower, if ready and willing to pay the money, might in the one case be able to bring an action at law against the lender who refused to allow him to redeem, and in the other have to sue in equity, but as it would equally be a pledge his rights would be the same in substance. I am therefore strongly inclined to hold that, even if this was a mortgage, there would not have been a transfer of "the" property within the meaning of the 18 & 19 Vict. c. 111. This is contrary to the opinions not only of Brett, M.R. and Baggallay, L.J., but of Field, J. also. Bowen, L.J., who agreed with Field, J. in thinking that this was not a mortgage but only a pledge, did not express any opinion as to what would have been the law if it had been a mortgage. I believe all the noble and learned Lords who heard the argument are agreed with him in thinking that in this case it was only a pledge. I do not, therefore, intend to express a final decision that an assignee of a bill of lading by way of mortgage is not as such liable to be sued under the 18 & 19 Vict. c. 111; but only to guard against its being supposed that, even if Brett, M.R. and Baggallay, L.J. were right in holding this a mortgage, I, as at present advised, should agree in their conclusion that the defendant could be sued. I now proceed to consider the question on which the Court of Appeal were divided in opinion, but the majority made the order now appealed against. The question is stated by Brett, M.R. to be: "Does the indorsement of a bill of lading as a security for an advance by a necessary implication which cannot be disproved pass the legal property in the goods named in the bill of lading to the indorsee with an equity in the indorser, the borrower, to redeem the bill of lading by payment or to receive the balance, if any, on a sale?" Field, J. had held, and Bowen, L.J. agreed with him, that it might so operate, if so intended by the parties at the time, but did not so operate if it was intended to be no more than a pledge as distinguished from a mortgage. I do not understand that any one of the judges below disputed that if it was a question of intention depending on the evidence, the finding of Field, J. was right; but the majority in the Court of Appeal proceeded on the principles laid down by Brett, L.J. in Glyn v. East and West India Dock Company (ubi sup.). In that case the terms on which the bill of lading was delivered to Glyn and Co. were reduced to writing, and the question, therefore, whether it was intended to deliver it by way of pledge only, or by way of a mortgage, depended on the construction of that writing. Whether Brett, L.J. thought that on the construction of the written instrument it was intended to be a mortgage, I do not know; I do not think he proceeded on that ground. He said it was a mortgage, and that the effect of the statute 18 & 19 Vict. c. 111 was to transfer the right to sue and the liability to be sued to Glyn and Co. Bramwell, L.J. was of an opposite opinion on both points. He thought that Glyn and Co. had a special property and a right of possession, and no more. In the House of Lords I said: "I do not think it necessary to express any opinion on a question much discussed by Brett, L.J. I mean whether the property which the bankers were to have was the whole legal property in the goods, Cottam and Co.'s interest being equitable only; or whether the bankers were only to have a special property as pawnees, Cottam and Co. having the legal general property. Either way the bankers had a legal property, and at law the right to the possession, subject to the shipowner's lien, and were entitled to maintain an action against anyone who, without justification or legal excuse, deprived them of that right." All the noble and learned Lords agreed in this. I think, therefore, the decision of this House is a strong authority in support of the position which I have before advanced, that the rights of a mortgagee having taken a bill of lading, and the rights of a pawnee having taken a bill of lading, are in substance the same. I did not think it necessary to point out that the question which the House in Glyn v. The East and West India Dock Company had to decide, and did decide, would have been just the same if the 18 & 19 Vict. c. 111 had never been passed, or had been repealed, and consequently that it was unnecessary to express any opinion on the construction of that Act; but it obviously was so.

Before proceeding further, I wish to point out what, in my opinion, is a great misapprehension as to the effect of the decision of this House in Lickbarrow v. Mason (ubi sup.), and as to the weight to be given to the opinion of Buller, J. delivered in this House, and reported in a note to 6 East, 20. I have already said that in this case there is no sale, no vendor, and no vendee, and no stoppage in transitu; so that this misapprehension, as I think it is, is not so material as it might be in some other cases. A demurrer on evidence, as is pointed out by Eyre, C.J. in delivering the unanimous opinion of the judges in Gibson v. Hunter (2 H. Bl. 205), not Gibson v. Minet, as is by mistake said in the note in 6 East, though not familiar in practice, was a proceeding known to the law. He explains it, and states his very confident expectations (which have been justified by the result) that no demurrer on evidence would again be brought before the House. It may be well to point out the dates. The demurrer on evidence in Lickbarrow v. Mason was in 1787. The only case of a demurrer on evidence in what were then recent times was Cocksedge v. Fanshawe (1 Doug. 118), on which judgment had been given in this House in 1783. Neither in the King's Bench nor in the Exchequer Chamber was any question raised in Lickbarrow v. Mason as to the mode in which the questions discussed were raised. In 1790 the writ of error from the decision of the Exchequer Chamber was brought before the House of Lords. The law peers at that time were Lord Thurlow, Lord Loughborough, and Lord Kenyon. When it was argued does not appear, but it was argued, and the same question as had been asked of the judges in Cocksedge v. Fanshawe was asked of the judges. Six judges (including all the survivors of those who had joined in Lord Loughborough's judgment in the Exchequer Chamber) answered in favour of the respondent. The three judges who had given judgment in the King's Bench answered in favour of the appellant. This House delayed giving its opinion till 1793. In the meantime, in 1791, there was a demurrer to evidence in Gibson v. Hunter (2 H. Bl. 205), which was brought before this House. The case in this House is reported in 2 H. Bl. 187. On the 7th Feb. 1793 this House gave judgment, awarding a venire de novo. One week afterwards, on the 14th Feb. 1793, this House delivered judgment in the long-pending case of Lickbarrow v. Mason, awarding in that case also a venire de novo. Lord Loughborough was himself at that time Lord Chancellor. I should have thought, if anything was clear, it was that this House did not decide anything, except that on that demurrer to the evidence no judgment could be given. Certainly the last conclusion that I should draw is that stated by Field, J., that the House in which Lord Loughborough was chancellor decided, "presumably" on the opinion delivered by Buller, J., against the judgment of Lord Loughborough, which six judges to three had thought right. Neither can I at all agree in the opinion expressed by Field, J., that the opinion of Buller, J. has always been taken as the law, and been adopted and followed as the law up to the present day. It never was published till 1805, in a note to Newson v Thornton (6 East, 17). I have for many years been of opinion, and still remain of opinion, that much of what Buller, J. expresses in that opinion as to stoppage in transitu was peculiar to himself, and was never adopted by any other judge, and is not law at the present day. But it is not necessary to pursue this subject further, as I agree with Bowen, L.J. that neither the statement of the custom of merchants in the special verdict in Lickbarrow v. Mason, nor the opinion of Buller, J., justifies the inference that the indorsement of a bill of lading for a valuable consideration must pass the entire legal property, whatever was the intention of the parties. In Lickbarrow v. Mason Turing was an unpaid vendor to Freeman. He had indorsed the bill of lading to Freeman, and had not, therefore, any right, except that of stopping the goods whilst in transitu, if Freeman became insolvent without having paid for the goods, and that right he had, though the indorsed bill of lading had been sent on to the vendee, so long as that bill of lading remained in the vendee's hands. But before any such stoppage Freeman, for valuable consideration, indorsed the bill of lading to Lickbarrow, who, whether as mortgagee or pledgee, had a legal property accompanied by a right of possession. The point which I understand to have been decided in Lickbarrow v. Mason was that, on the transfer of the bill of lading to Lickbarrow, the goods ceased to be in transitu, the shipowner from that time no longer holding them as a middleman to carry the goods from the unpaid vendor, Turing, to Freeman, his vendee, but holding them as agent for Lickbarrow. It was held first in Re Westzinthus (ubi sup.) and then in Spalding v. Ruding (ubi sup.) that where the transitus was thus put an end to by what was in reality only a pledge, the stoppage might be made available in equity so far as the rights of the pledgee did not extend. I thought, and still think, that the reason why the stoppage could not be made available at law was because the shipowner no longer held the goods as a middleman, as the transferee of the bill of lading for valuable consideration and bonâ fide, so as to give him a security, whether by way of mortgage or by way of pledge, had a legal property in the goods which he could enforce as against the shipowner.

Such being my view of the law, whether it was right or wrong, I expressed myself accordingly in Kemp v. Falk (7 App. Cas. 573; 47 L. T. Rep. N. S. 454), so as to show that I thought so; but there was nothing in that case to call for a decision on the point now before this House. In Newsom v. Thornton (ubi sup.) Lord Ellenborough says: "I should be very sorry if anything fell from the court which weakened the authority of Lickbarrow v. Mason as to the right of a vendee to pass the property of goods in transitu by indorsement of a bill of lading to bonâ fide holders for a valuable consideration and without notice. For as to Wright v. Campbell (4 Burr 2047), though that was the case of an indorsement of a factor, it was an outright assignment of the property for value. Scott, the indorsee, was to sell the goods and indemnify himself out of the produce the amount of the debt for which he had made himself answerable. The factor at least purported to make a sale of the goods transferred by the bill of lading, and not a pledge alone. This was a direct pledge of the bill of lading, and not intended by the parties as a sale. A bill of lading, indeed, shall pass the property upon a bonâ fide indorsement and delivery where it is intended so to operate, in the same manner as a direct delivery of the goods themselves would do if so intended, but it cannot operate further." Lawrence, J. says, speaking of Lickbarrow v. Mason, "All that that case seems to have decided is, that where the property in goods has passed to a vendee, subject only to be divested by the vendor's right to stop them when in transitu, such right must be exercised, if at all, before the vendee has parted with the property to another for a valuable consideration and bonâ fide, and by indorsement of a bill of lading given him a right to recover them." And Le Blanc, J. says that what they then determine "will not break in at all on the doctrine of Lickbarrow v. Mason that the indorsement of a bill of lading upon the sale of goods will pass the property to a bonâ fide indorsee, the property being intended to pass by such indorsement." In Glyn v. East and West India Docks (ubi sup.) Brett, L.J., says (speaking of an opinion of Willes, J.) "To say that an indorsement of a bill of lading for an advance is only a pledge, seems to me to be inconsistent with what has always been considered to be the result of Lickbarrow v. Mason, namely, that such an indorsement passes the legal property," by which I understand him to mean the whole legal property. But neither in that case nor in the case now at bar does he refer to any authority to that effect. Expressions used by judges have been cited which, I think, only show that they did not carefully consider their language, where no question of the kind before us was under discussion. And, as far as I know, there is no decision subsequent to Lickbarrow v. Mason which proceeds on such a ground, whilst Newsom v. Thornton proceeds expressly on the ground that the indorsement of a bill of lading, when intended to be a pledge only, is not valid if made by one who has no authority to make a pledge. I do not know that I am justified in saying that it is a decision that, if it was made by one who had authority to make a pledge, it would be good as such, though I think that appears to have been Lord Ellenborough's opinion, and I do not think any authority was cited on the argument at the bar to show that such is not the law. No case was cited at the bar, nor am I aware of any in which it has been held that a transfer of the bill of lading for value necessarily, whatever might be the intention, passed the whole legal property. Brett, M.R., says: "If the general understanding of merchants had not been in accordance with the verdict of the jury in Lickbarrow v. Mason accepted in its largest sense, there would, one would think, have been cases in the books raising the question." With submission to him I think no weight can be given to this absence of authority until it is shown that there have been cases in which it became material to consider whether an indorsement intended to be and operating as a pledge at law had a less effect than an indorsement operating against the intention as a mortgage. I have already given my reasons for thinking that in substance the right would be the same. Without, therefore, deciding the question whether a mortgage would render the mortgagee liable under the 18 & 19 Vict. c. 111, I decide that mainly for the reasons given by Bowen, L.J., this transfer did not operate as a mortgage. I therefore am clearly of opinion that the order made by the Court of Appeal should be reversed with costs, and the judgment of Field, J. restored.

Lord BRAMWELL.—My Lords: I concur. This action would not have been maintainable at common law. Is it maintainable under the 18 & 19 Vict. c. 111? That depends upon whether the applicants are indorsees of the bill of lading "to whom the property in the goods therein mentioned has passed upon or by reason of such indorsement." It is found, as a fact, and rightly found, as is admitted, that all that was intended in the transaction was a pledge. This would give the appellants a property, but, as put by Bowen, L.J., not "the" property. As I understand Brett, M.R., if this could be, then the appellants are right; but he thinks it could not be, that Lickbarrow v. Mason, or rather Buller, J.'s judgment shows that, when a bill of lading is indorsed to give any title to the transferee, the entire property is passed, and that in such a case as this nothing but an equitable right to redeem remains in the transferor. It is for those who assert this to prove it. I cannot prove the negative that it is not so, and logically and reasonably I might content myself with saying that it is not proved to me—that I see no reason and no authority in support of it. But I go further. I think that authority and reason are against it. I will not discuss or examine the cases. They do not, in my opinion, justify the contention. I will not examine them in detail. That has been done by the Lord Chancellor. I understand his conclusion to be that the expressions of the learned judges which have been relied upon should be read and interpreted secundum subjectam materiam. I agree. In no case has the present matter been under consideration. As to the reason and principle which should govern, I ask why should the transfer of the bill of lading have a greater effect, contrary to the parties' intention, than the handing over of the chattels themselves would have? They could be pledged if on shore, but, being at sea, no actual delivery, which is necessary to a common law pledge, can take place. There can, however, be a symbolical delivery by transferring the bill of lading. Why should the effect be different? Then consider the inconvenience of holding that the pledgor has only an equitable right; that he may repay the loan at the day appointed, but thereby acquire no legal title to the possession of the goods; that the pledgee may sell and pass the entire property to one not having notice of the equitable title. Consider what difficulties would be put on those who lend on such securities if this action was maintainable. The banker who lent money on a bill of lading for goods which arrived in specie, but damaged by perils of the seas so as to be worthless, might lose the money lent and the freight. Another consequence would be, that the transferee of the bill of lading, though only interested to the amount of the loan on it, would be the person to bring actions on the contract to carry. It is true that, unless he can do so in all cases, he can in none, even where his interest is to the extent of the full value of the goods. Either this was not thought of by the Legislature, or, if it was, they thought that no case could be included unless all were, and that it was better to include none than all. It is to be observed that the statute in its preamble says that by indorsement the property "may" pass. It is to be remembered also, as pointed out by my Lord Chancellor, that this law bears upon foreigners out of the kingdom. I am the more surprised at this contention on the part of Brett, M.R., as he has always so ably and powerfully contended that mercantile laws, contracts, and usages should be as free as possible from technicality.

I am of opinion that the appeal should be allowed. I cannot truly say that I have any doubt on the matter. I take this opportunity of saying that I think there is some inaccuracy of expression in the statute. It recites that, "by the custom of merchants, a bill of lading, being transferable by indorsement, the property in the goods may thereby pass to the indorsee." Now, the truth is, that the property does not pass by the indorsement but by the contract in pursuance of which the indorsement is made. If a cargo afloat is sold, the property would pass to the vendee, even though the bill of lading was not indorsed. I do not say that the vendor might not retain a lien, nor that the non-indorsement and non-handing over of the bill of lading would not have certain other consequences. My concern is to show that the property passes by the contract. So if the contract was one of pledge, the property would be bound by the contract, at least, as to all who had notice of it, though the bill of lading was not handed over. There is, I think, another inaccuracy in the statute, which indeed is universal. It speaks of the contract contained in the bill of lading. To my mind there is no contract in it. It is a receipt for the goods, stating the terms on which they were delivered to and received by the ship, and therefore excellent evidence of those terms, but it is not a contract. That has been made before the bill of lading was given. Take, for instance, goods shipped under a charter-party, and a bill of lading differing from the charter-party, as between shipowner and shipper at least the charter-party is binding: (Gledstanes v. Allen, 12 C.B. 202.) These distinctions are of a verbal character and not perhaps of much consequence; but I am strongly of opinion that precision of expression is very desirable, and had it existed in such cases as the present there would not have been the contradictory opinions which have been given.

Lord FITZGERALD.—My Lords: Field, J. in the court below came to the conclusion that the transaction under investigation was intended by the parties to operate as a pledge only. There can be no doubt that the inference thus drawn by the learned judge was correct in fact. It seems to follow that the pledgees acquired a special property in the goods with a right to take actual possession should it be necessary to do so, for their protection or for the realisation of their security. They acquired no more, and subject thereto the general property remained in the pledgor. I am of opinion that the delivery of the indorsed bill of lading to the defendants as a security for their advance did not by necessary implication transfer the property in the goods to the defendants. They were not, therefore, "indorsees of a bill of lading to whom the property in the goods passed by reason of the indorsement," so as to make them, without more, "subject to the same liabilities in respect of such goods as if the contract contained in the bill of lading had been made with them." The judgments which have been just delivered are so very full, and so able and satisfactory, that it would be mere affectation on my part to attempt to do more than express my concurrence.

Order appealed from reversed. Order of Field, J. restored. Respondent to pay the costs in the court below and in this House.

SEWARD v. OWNER OF THE VERA CRUZ.

ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF APPEAL IN ENGLAND.

Collision — Admiralty Division — Jurisdiction — Action in rem—Admiralty Court Act 1861, s. 7 —Lord Campbell's Act.

The Admiralty Division has no jurisdiction to entertain proceedings in rem for damages occasioned by loss of life, the words "damage done by any ship" in sect. 7 of the Admiralty Court Act 1861 not covering an injury resulting in loss of life, and not extending the provisions of Lord Campbell's Act so to include an action in rem. Judgment of the Court of Appeal affirmed.

The Franconia (2 P. Div. 163; 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 435; 36 L. T. Rep. N. S. 640) overruled.

THIS was an appeal from a judgment of the Court of Appeal (Brett, M.R., Bowen and Fry, L.JJ.), reported in 9 P. Div. 96, and 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 270, reversing a judgment of Butt, J.

The action was brought in rem against the owner of the Vera Cruz, a Spanish vessel, and her freight and cargo, by the appellant, as administratrix of William Seward her husband, to recover damages under Lord Campbell's Act (9 & 10 Vict. c. 93) for the loss of her husband and son, who were drowned in consequence of a collision between the Vera Cruz and the British vessel Agnes, in the Mersey, in August 1882. The Vera Cruz was arrested at Liverpool in July 1883. The defendant appeared under protest, and contended that the Admiralty Division had no jurisdiction to entertain the action, but Butt, J. held himself bound by the decision of the Court of Appeal in The Franconia (2 P. Div. 163; 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 435; 36 L. T. Rep. N.S. 640), and decided in favour of the jurisdiction (see 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 254; 51 L. T. Rep. N. S. 24). This decision was reversed by the Court of Appeal, as above mentioned, that court holding that they were not bound by the decision in The Franconia (ubi sup.), as the court was equally divided in that case.

The plaintiff now appealed to the House of Lords. G. Bruce, Q.C. and French appeared for the appellant, and contended that the Admiralty Division had jurisdiction to entertain an action under Lord Campbell's Act for damages for the death of a person who was killed by a collision with a foreign ship, and to arrest such ship as security. The jurisdiction depends on recent statutes, but the older authorities as to the jurisdiction of the Admiralty Court may be looked at. Originally that court exercised jurisdiction, independent of any Act of Parliament, over all torts committed on the high seas. See

The Volant, 1 Wm. Rob. 383;
The Hercules, 2 Dod. 353;
The Ruckers, 4 C. Rob. 73;

and the American case De Lovio v. Boit (2 Gallison, 398), which was decided by Story, J. upon the English authorities, and sums them up. There is no prohibition except in the cases of torts committed in the body of a county. If the court has this jurisdiction, it can, by virtue of recent statutes, exercise it either in rem or in personam. The Admiralty Court Act of 1840 (3 & 4 Vict. c. 65), s. 6, makes no distinction between damage done by and damage received by a ship. The Bilbao (1 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 5; 3 L. T. Rep. N. S. 338; Lush. 149) was decided on the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104, s. 527), and that case was followed by the Admiralty Court Act 1861 (24 Vict. c. 10), on which the present question turns. We contend that the words of sect. 7, giving jurisdiction "over any claim for damage done by any ship" are wide enough to include this case, and by sect. 35 this jurisdiction may be exercised by proceedings in rem or in personam. Lord Campbell's Act was passed before this, in 1846, and it did not create a fresh cause of action, but only removed a difficulty in procedure caused by the death:

Read v. Great Eastern Railway Company, L. Rep. 3 Q. B. 555; 18 L. T. Rep. N. S. 82.

[Lord BLACKBURN referred to Pym v. Great Northern Railway Company, 4 B. & S. 396.] The words of the Admiralty Act are wide enough to include all damage, direct or consequential, and this jurisdiction is practically convenient, and in the case of a foreign ship it is difficult to see what other remedy there is. Sect. 2 of Lord Campbell's Act, providing for a jury, creates no difficulty, for since the Judicature Acts there may be a jury in the Admiralty Division, and a proceeding in rem is inter partes. As to the origin of the Admiralty jurisdiction in rem, see

The Merchant Shipping Act 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104), by sect. 514, which gives jurisdiction to the Court of Chancery over the liability of shipowners in respect of loss of life, shows that the Legislature intended the Admiralty Court to deal with cases under Lord Campbell's Act. The words "damage done by any ship" should receive a wide construction:

Smith v. Brown (L. Rep. 6 Q. B. 729; 1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 56; 24 L. T. Rep. N. S. 808) is in favour of the respondent, but it is in conflict with The Beta (ubi sup.). Since the decision in The Franconia ubi sup.) in 1877 this jurisdiction has been frequently exercised, and found practically convenient. The objections taken in the court below as to its practical working apply equally to the procedure under the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, sect. 514, and the balance of justice and of convenience is in favour of our contention.

Dr. Phillimore and Bucknill, who appeared for the respondent, were not called upon to address the House.

At the conclusion of the arguments for the appellant their Lordships gave judgment as follows:

The LORD CHANCELLOR (Selborne).—My Lords: Both Mr. Gainsford Bruce and Mr. French have argued this case with so much ability that your Lordships have received all that assistance which it would be possible for counsel to give in order to appreciate the question to be now decided, and therefore, as the result has been to satisfy your Lordships that the judgment appealed from is right notwithstanding the very considerable conflict of opinion and authority which there was upon the point before, it does not seem to your Lordships necessary to call upon the learned counsel on the other side. This is an action in rem essentially. By the rules of court there are certain provisions made for actions in rem in the Probate, Divorce, and Admiralty Division as distinct from the ordinary class of actions. Although it might have been possible to bring an ordinary action, in all respects of the same kind as could be brought in the Queen's Bench Division, in the Probate, Divorce, and Admiralty Division, and though I should be far from entertaining any doubt as to the jurisdiction of that division to deal with such an action in this, as in any other case (but not more in this than in any other case) if no objection were taken, and no transfer asked for or made, yet this is not an action of that kind. This is an action brought in a form appropriate to actions in rem in the Admiralty Division, of the same kind as might have been brought in the Court of Admiralty before the Judicature Acts were passed, and this question must be determined exactly in the same manner as if the action had been so brought, and as if the Judicature Acts had never been enacted. Now, the question whether such an action lies or not depends altogether upon the construction and effect of the 7th and 35th sections of the Admiralty Court Act of 1861. I do not myself think that there are any other sections in that Act which are material to the question to be determined. What it noticeable is, that most of the sections are expressed in definite terms, leaving no opening for any doubt or question as to the particular cases in which a new jurisdiction is to be given, or an old jurisdiction extended to the Admiralty Court. But this 7th section is expressed in perfectly general words: "The High Court of Admiralty shall have jurisdiction over any claim for damage done by any ship;" and the question which your Lordships have to determine is what is meant by these words "claim for damage done by any ship," whether they can, according to sound principles of construction, be held to include such causes of action as arise under Lord Campbell's Act when death has occurred by reason of the "wrongful act, neglect, or default" of some other person. That 7th section must be construed with the 35th, on which no doubt this action is founded: "The jurisdiction conferred by this Act on the High Court of Admiralty may be exercised either by proceedings in rem, or by proceedings in personam." That section undoubtedly, according to the natural meaning of the words, shows that while an option to proceed in rem or in personam is given as to the jurisdiction conferred by the Act, yet from the very nature of such an option every case provided for by the Act is regarded as a proper case for a proceeding in rem, and accordingly the appellant, considering that the 7th section brought cases under Lord Campbell's Act within the purview of the Admiralty jurisdiction, justly upon that hypothesis held it to mean such actions as were capable of being brought by a proceeding like the present in rem: and if the action cannot be so brought, then I apprehend it will follow ex converso that the 7th section does not extend to this description of claim.

Now one thing is quite clear, and that is that whether this particular kind of action can be brought within those words does not depend upon any expressed intention of the Legislature to bring it within the clause, for there is not the slightest reference whatever in that clause to any particular case or class of cases. If it necessarily or properly comes within the words "any claim for damage done by any ship," according to the reasonable construction of those words in connection with the clause which authorises proceedings in rem to enforce such claim, then no doubt the words, being general, would include it; but express or special inclusion is certainly not indicated. Upon that point I cannot but observe that the argument founded on the 13th section in the Act seems to me not to assist the appellant, because, when the Legislature did intend, under certain special conditions, to deal with cases of which this might be one, it has done so, and that in so many words, and a reference to the jurisdiction given to the Court of Chancery in England by the ninth part of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 makes the intention definite and clear. But there is nothing of that kind in this section, and unless the proposition can be made out that this kind of action necessarily, or at all events legitimately, falls within the words "claim for damage done by any ship," there is not the smallest indication of any intention of the Legislature to include it. It must be remembered that Lord Campbell's Act is the source of the right, if the right exists, and we must look to that Act to see whether a claim made under that Act can naturally or properly be described as a "claim for damage done by any ship." The first observation which occurs is this—there is not a word about ships in Lord Campbell's Act. It is an Act which deals with a category of cases, which may include injuries done by persons responsible for the navigation of ships to persons suffering by faults in that navigation, but it only includes them as part of a much larger and more general category of cases, and without any express reference to or mention of any particular case which may fall under that category. Therefore no one can say that Lord Campbell's Act relates expressly to claims for damage done by ships; and this section in the Act of 1861 relates to that and to nothing else. Maritime damage by ships is the subject of that legislation; general injuries resulting in loss of life by wrongful acts and so forth, are the subject of the other. It is not very likely that when the legislation goes on such different lines it should be intended indirectly to affect by the one legislation, and in a peculiar manner, a particular case which may or may not arise under the other legislation. But that is not all. Inasmuch as there can be no right of action whatever unless it comes within the terms of Lord Campbell's Act, let us see whether those are terms which can be brought reasonably and naturally and consistently within the interpretation sought to be imposed on the 7th section of the Act of 1861, which statute turns the action into an action in rem at the option of the plaintiff. Now, what are the words? "Whensoever the death of a person shall be caused by a wrongful act, neglect, or default"—all words plainly applicable only to a person doing an act, or guilty of a neglect or default, and not to an inanimate instrument or thing like a ship—"and the act, neglect, or default is such as would (if death had not ensued) have entitled the party injured to maintain an action and recover damages in respect thereof"—"to maintain an action and recover damages" plainly points to a common law action—"then and in every such case the person who would have been liable if death had not ensued shall be liable to an action for damages, notwithstanding the death of the person injured." Well, it is to my mind, as plainly as possible, a personal action given for a personal injury inflicted by a person who would have been liable to an action for damages, manifestly in the common law courts if the death had not ensued. Lord Campbell's Act gives a new cause of action clearly, and does not merely remove the operation of the maxim, Actio personalis moritur cum personâ, because the action is given in substance, not to the person representing in point of estate the deceased man, who would naturally represent him as to all his own rights of action which could survive, but to his wife and children, no doubt suing in point of form in the name of his executor. And not only so, but the action is not an action which he could have brought if he had survived the accident, for that would have been an action for such injury as he had sustained during his lifetime; but death is essentially the cause of the action, an action which he never could have brought under circumstances which if he had been living would have given him, for an injury short of death which he might have sustained, a right of action, which might have been barred either by contributory negligence, or by his own fault, or by his own release, or in various other ways. Every word of that legislation being, as it appears to me, legislation for the general case, and not for particular injury by ships, points to a common law action, points to a personal liability, and a personal right to recover, and is absolutely at variance with the notion of a proceeding in rem. But the matter does not stop there, because the peculiarity of the legislation is this, that the action being given for the benefit of the wife, or husband, parent and children of the dead person, "the jury" (it is assumed that there would be a jury) "may give such damages as they may think proportioned to the injury resulting from such death to the parties respectively for whom and for whose benefit such action shall be brought; and the amount so recovered, after deducting the costs not recovered from the defendant, shall be divided amongst the before-mentioned parties in such shares as the jury by their verdict shall find and direct:" and there are some other provisions, one as to the time within which the action is to be brought, another as to what the plaintiff is to do: "In every such action the plaintiff on the record shall be required, together with the declaration to deliver to the defendant or his attorney, a full particular," and so on. It is impossible not to see, and the proposition is too clear to admit of dispute, that if the 7th section of the Act of 1861 has the effect of transferring that action to the Court of Admiralty to be brought under the Admiralty rules and system, tried without a jury, and enforced in rem and not in personam, without making any person individually a defendant as liable to an action for damages, without making any person a defendant on the record and declaring against him, to whom or to whose attorney full particulars can be delivered, and so on, the Act of 1861 has materially varied the effect of the Act which gives the right of action.

Now, if anything be certain it is this, that where there are general words in a later Act capable of reasonable and sensible application without extending them to subjects specially dealt with by earlier legislation, you are not to hold that earlier and special legislation indirectly repealed, altered, or derogated from merely by force of such general words, without any indication of a particular intention to do so. For that principle I may refer to Hawkins v. Gathercole (6 De G. M. & G. 1). That case arose under the Judgment Act (1 & 2 Vict. c. 110), s. 13, which provided that a judgment should be binding (inter alia) on all the interest of the debtor in "lands, tenements, rectories, advowsons, tithes," and so forth, and that for the amount of the judgment these different descriptions of property to which he might be entitled should be charged in the same manner as if "the person against whom the judgment should have been entered up had power to charge the hereditaments, and had by writing under his hand agreed to charge them with the amount of the debt." The question arose as to an ecclesiastical benefice. By the restraining Act of Elizabeth a clergyman had no power to charge his benefice, but Lord Cranworth thought when the case came before him in the first instance that those words in sect. 13 relieved him from the want of power indirectly in that particular case, and in favour of the creditor did away with the effect of the restraining Act of Queen Elizabeth, putting him in the situation of a man who could charge and who had charged. But that decision was reversed. It was held that all those general words about tithes and rectories and so on were capable of a reasonable application to subjects not affected by any particular legislation; and that the statue of Elizabeth not being referred to in any way, the Act being in diversâ materiâ, and not containing the slightest indication of any such intention, was not unnecessarily to be repealed or altered by such general words. I need not read more from the case than the words of Turner, L.J. (at p. 31): "Can," he says, "the statute of Elizabeth be held to be practically repealed" (and of course alteration in any important particulars is pro tanto the same) "by such general words as are contained in the 13th section of this statute? I venture to think that it cannot, grounding that opinion upon the authorities to which I have generally referred, and adding to them the 11th case in Jenkins' Fifth Century, in which it is thus said: 'A special statute does not derogate from a special statute without express words of abrogation.'" To me it seems to be not only easy, but right, to construe the words in the Act of 1861 in a sense in which they are quite inapplicable to this particular cause of action, and leave all the provisions of Lord Campbell's Act in full force and effect, not modified or interfered with; because in truth "damage done by any ship" was a form of expression naturally applicable to that description of damage—maritime damage—as to which, in cases falling within the jurisdiction of the Admiralty Court, the ship was treated as, so to say, in delicto, and was liable to a proceeding in rem, such as the 35th section contemplated.

I think that I have said all that is really necessary. The argument from the Merchant Shipping Act, as it appears to me, manifestly fails. There, where the Legislature did intend for certain purposes, for the purpose of giving effect to the limited liability, and administering a fund brought into court to answer that liability, that this description of claim against the owners of the ship should be brought into account as well as other claims, it made provisions giving a jurisdiction to the Court of Chancery, which, as it was exercisable by the Court of Chancery and not otherwise, has since been transferred to the Court of Admiralty; it made provision giving a jurisdiction in those cases to the Court of Chancery, in order to effect the express and manifest intention of the Legislature for that particular and limited purpose, and it would involve so much and only so much modification of the provisions of Lord Campbell's Act as might be necessary to give effect to the intention so declared. But there is nothing of that kind here. What you have bearing upon that subject is in the enactment which applies only to the case of competing claims, and the case where the rule of limited liability is to be applied, and a fund is brought into court to answer it. That is not the case here. The judgment appealed from appears to me to be entirely right, and I move your Lordships to dismiss the appeal with costs.

Lord BLACKBURN.—My Lords: I am entirely of the same opinion. Before Lord Campbell's Act, where a person had been injured from any of the causes mentioned in the 1st section of that Act, and had died, the maxim Actio personalis moritur cum personâ applied; he could not sue, for he was dead, and it did not survive to anybody whomsoever to sue for the damages occasioned by the accident which had caused injury to him resulting in death. That Lord Campbell, or rather the Legislature at the instance of Lord Campbell, thought fit to alter; and I think that when that Act is looked at it is plain enough that, if a person dies under the circumstances mentioned when he might have maintained an action if it had been for an injury to himself which he had survived, a totally new action is given against the person who would have been responsible to the deceased if the deceased had lived, an action which, as it is pointed out in Pym v. Great Northern Railway Company (2 B. & S. 759; 4 B. & S. 396), is new in its species, new in its quality, new in its principle, in every way new, and one which can only be brought if there is any person answering the description of the widow, parent, or child, who under such circumstances suffers pecuniary loss by the death. That is a personal action, if personal action there ever can be. It is quite plain (it does not require much more than to state it) that if a man who has the custody and management of a ship manages it in such a way that by his negligence, or from any other cause which is mentioned in sect. 1, a person is killed, that man is liable under Lord Campbell's Act; and also if that man is a servant acting for a superior (the shipowner is generally speaking the person), if he is the servant of the shipowner who is the principal, the shipowner is answerable under this cause of action. That being so, the Legislature by the Merchant Shipping Act of 1854, when they were renewing former enactments which limited the liability of a shipowner according to the value of his ship, thought fit to say, if the owner of the ship is as such made liable under Lord Campbell's Act (for that is what they meant), it shall be included in those claims which are to be divided rateably according to the value of the ship to which the liability of the shipowner is limited: and a jurisdiction was given by the 514th section to the Court of Chancery to enforce the limitation of the liability, and for that purpose it had various collateral powers.

Now, that was the state of things in 1854 and down to 1861, and I think there cannot be the least doubt that at that time the remedy which the widow, parent, or child would have, the action being brought in form by the administrator with all the provisions which have been already read, providing that the matter should be properly done, would be a personal action, and a personal action only; and whether the liability of the person who was sued was because he was the owner of the ship, in which case he would have a limit to his liability under the Act of 1854, or because he was the owner of a stage coach, it would be a personal liability, and a personal liability only. Now the Legislature undoubtedly had full power to enact that the Court of Admiralty should have what jurisdiction they choose to give it. The question really, when it is looked at, depends upon the construction of the 7th section of the Admiralty Court Jurisdiction Act (for I do not think that any of the others really go to it or throw any light upon it), the words there used being that the Court of Admiralty shall have jurisdiction over any claim for damage done by any ship. That being so, what do these words mean? If the question now raised had been that which the Court of Queen's Bench, of which I was then a member, treated as raised in Smith v. Brown (L. Rep. 6 Q. B. 729; 1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 56; 24 L. T. Rep. N. S. 808)—that really was a case under Lord Campbell's Act and under Lord Campbell's Act only, but it was treated as general—if the question now raised had been whether personal damage to a man who lived was within that 7th section of the enactment, I should have had, as I then had, some doubt about the matter, and it would have carried me so far that, if that had been the question now raised, I certainly should have wished to hear the case argued out to the end before giving an opinion upon it one way or the other. But the question raised here being exclusively whether the liability of a shipowner as a person, under Lord Campbell's Act, to make good damages for the negligence of his servant who happens to be master of the ship, comes within the words "damage done by any ship," I decidedly say that I do not think it does. The Legislature, in using such general words as those, cannot have had in contemplation all the numerous and important subjects which, had they been considering Lord Campbell's Act, they would have had. For instance, no one seems to have thought of the case of a Swedish ship or a French ship on the high seas drowning an Englishman, and afterwards coming into England. There would have been a very serious international question raised in that case whether the English Legislature had enacted (as it beyond doubt had full power to enact) that when the ship came into England there should be power to enforce against the Frenchman or the Norwegian reparation for the loss of life which his own law did not give, though the accident which caused it happened on the high seas. In this particular instance the Spaniard's ship is in the Mersey, and is in English waters when the occurrence takes place, but the point upon the construction of the Act of 1861 would have been just the same if the collision by which the accident had occurred had been in the Bay of Biscay; there would have been no difference that I can perceive in the matter, and that is obviously a very serious question indeed which should be carefully considered in inquiring whether the Legislature when passing that Act intended it to have any such meaning. That is no reason for saying that, if the words of the statute plainly and obviously have that meaning and show that that was intended, foolish and rash and improvident as we may think it to have been, we must not give them that effect. But when the question comes to be whether there are words in any way pointing to liability under Lord Campbell's Act, or to the defendant's liability under Lord Campbell's Act, that seems to me to be a very strong argument indeed for saying that the words are not to be so construed, and consequently that the Court of Admiralty had not in 1862 any such jurisdiction as is now claimed.

Lord WATSON.—My Lords: Notwithstanding the very full and able argument which has been addressed to the House by the counsel for the appellant, I entertain no doubt that a right of action such as is given by Lord Campbell's Act in a case like the present is not a "claim for damage done by a ship" within the meaning of the 7th section of the Admiralty Court Act 1861. Upon that ground, and upon that ground only,

I am of opinion with your Lordships that the appeal ought to be dismissed.

The Heinrich Bjorn. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM SIR JAMES HANNEN.

Necessaries—Foreign ship—Maritime lien—Action in rem—Bottomry bond—3 & 4 Vict. c. 65, s. 6.

A contract entered into with the managing owner of a ship for a loan of money to be laid out in necessaries places the lender in the same position as a material man supplying the goods.

3 & 4 Vict. c. 65, s. 6, does not create a maritime lien in respect of necessaries supplied to a foreign ship, and hence material men cannot enforce their claim by proceedings in rem against the ship when in the hands of subsequent purchasers for value. (b)

A written agreement, made between the managing owner of a ship and another party, by which it is agreed that, in consideration of an advance for necessaries supplied to and for the use of the vessel, the managing owner undertakes to return the amount advanced "on the return of the said barque from her present voyage," and authorises the lender to cover the amount advanced by insurance on the barque, but which is silent as to maritime interest, is not a contract of bottomry, there being no words in the contract purporting to pledge the ship as security for the loan, and it not appearing that the parties ever had any intention of creating a bottomry bond (Brett, M.R. dubitante).

The Ella A. Clarke (8 L. T. Rep. N. S. 119; 1 Mar. Law. Cas. O. S. 325; Br. & Lush. 32) reversed.

This was an appeal by the defendants in a necessaries action from the decision of Sir James Hannen, by which he decided that the plaintiffs were entitled to recover so much of their claim as had been in fact expended in necessaries (5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 145; 49 L. T. Rep. N. S. 405; 8 P. Div. 151).

The plaintiffs were Messrs. C. and C. J. Northcote, shipbrokers, carrying on business at Liverpool.

The Heinrich Bjorn was a Norwegian vessel, and in March 1882 was lying in the port of Liverpool. Gunder Abrahamsen, the then managing owner, was in England, and was indebted to the plaintiffs on a general account unconnected with the ship, and required a further advance. Gunder Abrahamsen owned five sixth shares in the Heinrich Bjorn. The freight of the ship being

(b) According to this decision, the only effect of the statute is to enable the material man to enforce his claim in the Admiralty Court by arrest of the ship; but his claim against the res commences only from the date of the arrest, and all persons having claims on the res prior in date to the arrest, whether they be purchasers, mortgagees, or persons having maritime liens, take precedence of his claim. Prior to 1840, which was the date of the statute under consideration, it had been decided in many prohibitions that the Admiralty Court had no jurisdiction over claims for necessaries; but it is to be noticed that in every such case the necessaries were supplied on land and not on the high seas. According to the judgment of the court the law relating to necessaries was, prior to the 3 & 4 Vict. c. 65, as follows: "Ever since the 13 Rich. 2, c. 5, the judges of the Admiralty Court were restrained from 'meddling of anything done within the realm,' and were confined to things done upon the high sea." According to Bridgman's case (Hobart's Rep. 11), the contract of the master upon the high seas is a contract effecting the hypothecation of the ship; thus we find the following passage on p. 12: "But I was of opinion clearly that the Admiral Law is reasonable, that if a ship be at sea and take leake, or otherwise want victual or other necessaries, whereby either herself be in danger or the voyage defeated, that in such case of necessity the master may impawn for money or other things to relieve such extremities by employing the money so." Hence, in the case of necessaries supplied upon the seas, it is to be presumed that the Admiralty had jurisdiction, and that a maritime lien existed in respect of such supplies. The following authorities support this proposition: Palmer v. Pope (Hobart's Rep. 79, 212); Justin v. Ballam (2 Ld. Raymond, 805); Bridgman's case (Hobart's Rep. 11); Coke's Inst. part 4, c. 22, p. 134. The absence of more numerous and more direct authorities is no doubt due to the fact that such supplies partake so much of the character of salvage, and salvage reward being so much greater than the actual value of the supplies, that persons making supplies have preferred to bring their claim as salvage rather than as a claim for necessaries. In the American case of De Lovio v. Boit (2 Gall. 398), Story, J., in a learned and luminous judgment, after reviewing all the authorities on the question, decided that the Admiralty had jurisdiction over all maritime contracts, wheresoever the same may be made or executed, and hence he concluded that a policy of insurance was within the jurisdiction. According to this learned judge, the words "things done upon the sea," as used in the 13 Rich. 2, c. 5, are to be interpreted as meaning all things touching the sea—that is, maritime affairs in general. Therefore, prior to 1840, necessaries supplied upon the sea gave the same remedies as collisions or salvage upon the sea, and when we find the Legislature extending the jurisdiction to cover salvage, collision, and necessaries supplied within the body of a county, the argument that if a maritime lien be given in the case of salvage and collision it is also given in the case of necessaries is of great force. It is, however, noticeable that in the judgment of the court no reference is made to this contention. The learned judges seem to have assumed that prior to 1840, no jurisdiction existed in respect of necessaries wherever supplied, and that, therefore, the statute 3 & 4 Vict. c. 65 was to be construed without any regard to the previous history of necessaries. The grave inconveniences attaching to this decision are in themselves an agreement against its correctness, and, should the question be taken before a higher tribunal, it is to be hoped that, in the interests of expediency, as well as in the interests of commerce, the House of Lords will see its way to arriving at a different conclusion. If there be no maritime lien, not only may injustice be done through tradesmen losing their money, but commerce will also be affected owing to the difficulty which masters of foreign vessels will find in getting supplies unless they at once pay for them. Some of the incidents of maritime liens are, no doubt, objectionable; but experience shows that tradesmen need every protection when dealing with certain classes of foreign vessels.—Ed in the hands of other persons, the plaintiffs refused to make the advance, but agreed to supply Gunder Abrahamsen with money for necessaries for the ship, provided they could get security for such advance. To this Abrahamsen agreed, and an agreement was drawn up on the 23rd March, by which it was agreed that, in consideration of the plaintiffs advancing an amount of about 600*l.* "for necessaries supplied to and for the use of the barque Heinrich Bjorn," Abrahamsen undertook to return the amount advanced, with interest and all charges, on the return of the vessel from her then voyage.

This agreement is set out in full in the judgment of the court.

The sum required for the disbursement of the ship for its outward voyage was estimated at 350*l.* Instead of paying 350*l.* of the debt due from Abrahamsen to the plaintiffs, and the plaintiffs advancing that sum to Abrahamsen for the purchase of necessaries, it was agreed that this amount should be settled in account between them as though this had been done by the plaintiffs handing Abrahamsen a cheque for 350*l.* as for necessaries, which he immediately returned to the plaintiffs in discharge of so much of the debt due from him to them.

The Heinrich Bjorn was subsequently sold to the defendants in this action, who had knowledge of the plaintiffs' claims.

May 6, 8, 19, June 13 and 26.—Myburgh, Q.C. and Pike for the appellants, the defendants.—On the facts the defendants are entitled to judgment. It is also submitted that in law the plaintiffs have no cause of action against the res in the hands of the defendants. Notwithstanding the decision of Dr. Lushington in The Ella A. Clark (8 L. T. Rep. N. S. 119; Br. & Lush. 32; 1 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 325), that 3 & 4 Vict. c. 65, s. 6, gave a maritime lien in respect of necessaries supplied to a foreign ship, it is submitted that there are good and sufficient reasons why this court should overrule that decision. Prior to 1840 the Admiralty Court had been prohibited from exercising jurisdiction over necessaries. The 3 & 4 Vict. c. 65, s. 6, was passed to give the Admiralty Court the same jurisdiction over necessaries as the common law courts possessed, the only difference being that the plaintiff in the Admiralty Court was allowed to enforce his remedy by seizure of the ship. There are no express words in the Act creating a maritime lien, and in their absence it is submitted that the Legislature never contemplated the creation of so important a right in favour of the material man. Though Dr. Lushington decided in The Ella A. Clark (ubi sup.) that the 3 & 4 Vict. c. 65, s. 6, did create a maritime lien, it is yet to be noticed that on the several occasions when this question came before him, he entertained very different opinions:

The Alexander, 1 W. Rob. 288; 1 N. of Cas. 188;
The Ocean, 2 W. Rob. 368;
The West Friesland, Swa. 454;
The Gustaf, 6 L. T. Rep. N. S. 660; Lush. 506; 1 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 230;
The Ella A. Clark (ubi sup.);
The Pacific, 10 L. T. Rep. N. S. 541; Br. & Lush. 243; 2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 21.

It is true that there are passages in judgments of the Privy Council approving of Dr. Lushington's decision in The Ella A. Clark (ubi sup.), but these at the best are dicta, which this court should not follow:

The Two Ellens, 26 L. T. Rep. N. S. 1; L. Rep. 4 P. C. 161; 1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 208;
The Rio Tinto, 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 224; 9 App. Cas. 356; 50 L. T. Rep. N. S. 461.

The reasoning of Dr. Lushington's decision in The Ella A. Clark (ubi sup.) is founded on the fallacious assumption that where a proceeding in rem is given a maritime lien is created. This assumption was subsequently rejected by Dr. Lushington himself and other learned judges:

The Pacific (ubi sup.);
The Gustaf, (ubi sup.);
The Two Ellens (ubi sup.).

It has been held that no maritime lien is created by sect. 5 of the Admiralty Court Act 1861, which gave the Admiralty Court jurisdiction over necessaries supplied to a British ship, and it is submitted that this and the earlier Act giving jurisdiction over necessaries supplied to a foreign ship are in pari materiâ and should be construed alike. Secondly, assuming the court to be of opinion that 3 & 4 Vict. c. 65, s. 6, did create a maritime lien, it is submitted that, inasmuch as the goods were supplied to the managing owner in this country, they were not "necessaries" within the proper meaning of the word, and therefore no maritime lien attached to the ship. The word "necessaries" implies necessity, which does not exist if the owner is present when the goods are supplied. It being the duty of the master to take the ship back to the owner, he must "necessarily" buy materials for that purpose. If an owner is devoid of funds he can always sell the ship, whereas a master cannot:

The Sophie, 1 W. Rob. 369;

The mere fact of the agreement between Abrahamsen and Messrs. Northcote speaking of the advance being made "for necessaries supplied to and for the use of my barque Heinrich Bjorn" is not by itself sufficient, if the plaintiff fails to prove that the money was in fact expended in necessaries:

Guion v. Trask, 8 W. R. 266; 29 L. J. 337, Ch.;
Greens v. Briggs, 6 Hare, 395;
The Helena Sophia, 3 W. Rob. 265.

Hall, Q.C. and Dr. Raikes for the respondents, the plaintiffs.—In the absence of strong reasons, the court should not overrule the decision of Dr. Lushington in The Ella A. Clark (ubi sup.), that 3 & 4 Vict. c. 65, s. 6, created a maritime lien, a decision which has been acted upon for over twenty years, and also approved of by the Privy Council on several occasions. That no maritime lien is given by the Admiralty Court Act 1861, s. 5, supports the respondents' contention, that Act applying only to necessaries supplied to a British ship, in which case the material man has other remedies than those given by a maritime lien. Where a proceeding in rem is given, it is to be presumed, in the absence of reasons to the contrary, that the Legislature meant to create a maritime lien:

The Bold Buccleugh, 7 Moo. P. C. 267;
The Alexander, 1 W. Rob. 288; 1 N. of Cas. 188.

Although the Admiralty Court was prohibited from exercising jurisdiction over claims for necessaries, it is to be noticed that in the cases in which prohibition was granted the necessaries were supplied on land and not on the high seas. There is, therefore, no decision which decides that prior to 1840 the Admiralty Court had not jurisdiction over necessaries supplied on the high seas, and that no maritime lien existed under such circumstances. It may, therefore, have been the intention of the Legislature to create a maritime lien in respect of necessaries supplied on land, just as it created a maritime lien in the case of damage or salvage "within the body of a county." There is no English authority drawing a distinction between goods supplied to a master and goods supplied to an owner, whereas there are several American cases in which it has been decided that, provided the owner is devoid of personal credit, a necessaries action will lie:

St. Yago de Cuba, 9 Wheaton, 409;
Thomas v. Osborn, 19 How. 22;
The James Guy, 1 Ben. 112;
The Nestor, 1 Sumn. 73, 81;
The Grapeshot, 9 Wall. 140;
The Kalorama, 10 Wall. 204.

It seems unreasonable that the master, who is only the agent, should be able to create a maritime lien, and that the owner, the master's principal, should not be able to do so:

The Riga, L. Rep. 3 A. & E. 516; 1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 246; 26 L. T. Rep. N. S. 202;
Steinbank v. Shepard, 22 L. J. 341, Ex.;
Ladbroke v. Cricket, 2 T. Rep. 649.

Even if no maritime lien attached, yet, as the defendants were purchasers with notice of the plaintiffs' claim, the plaintiffs have a charge upon the ship which entitles them to proceed in rem. It is also submitted that the agreement amounts to a bottomry bond, and should be treated as such.

Myburgh, Q.C. in reply.

Dec. 20.—The Court having doubts as to whether or not the agreement entered into between the plaintiffs and Abrahamsen constituted a bottomry bond, counsel were heard on this point.

Myburgh, Q.C. for the defendants.—The agreement does not purport to be a bottomry bond, and it was never so intended. The agreement by its terms excludes all maritime risk. The lender has an alternative security. In the event of the return of the ship from her voyage he is to look to the borrower for repayment; if she is lost on the voyage he has a charge upon the policies of insurance. No maritime interest is provided for. In the absence of the above necessary incidents of a bottomry bond, the agreement cannot be treated as a bottomry bond:

The Atlas, 2 Hagg. 48;
The Emancipation, 1 W. Rob. 124;
Steinbank v. Shepard, 22 L. J. 341, Ex.

Hall, Q.C. for the plaintiff.—The agreement entered into between the plaintiffs and Abrahamsen contains all the essentials of a bottomry bond. The agreement to repay the sum lent is conditional "on the return of the said barque Heinrich Bjorn from her present voyage." It is not necessary that a maritime premium should be expressly stated:

The Empusa, 41 L. T. Rep. N. S. 383; 5 P. Div. 6; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 185;
The Mary Ann, L. Rep. 1 A. & E. 14.

The reserving of personal liability does not invalidate the bond:

The Nelson, 1 Hagg. 177;
The Zodiac, 1 Hagg. 320.

The form of a bottomry bond is immaterial provided its purport is clear:

The Kennersley Castle, 3 Hagg. 7;

An owner can bottomry as well as a master. Prior to the legislation relating to mortgaging ships it was a very usual way for an owner to raise money. This is shown by reference to 19 Geo. 2, c. 37, s. 5, which prohibited the owner from so doing under certain circumstances:

Cur. adv. vult.

Feb. 14, 1885.—The judgment of the court was delivered by

Fry, L.J.—On the 23rd March 1832 Gunder Abrahamsen was the owner of five sixth shares in the Norwegian ship Heinrich Bjorn, and was the managing owner of the ship, which was then lying in Liverpool under the care of Messrs. Brodersen, Vaughan, and Co., shipbrokers there. Shortly before this date, viz., on the 10th March, a charter-party of this ship from Liverpool to Tabaxo and back to Liverpool had been negotiated by the plaintiffs, Messrs. Northcote, who were shipbrokers of London, and who had for years acted for Abrahamsen. On the 23rd March 1882 Abrahamsen, having come from Norway to London, entered into a transaction with the plaintiffs in a memorandum of agreement signed by Abrahamsen, which was as follows: "In consideration of C. and C. J. Northcote advancing me, Gunder Abrahamsen, by cash or acceptance, an amount of about 600*l*., say six hundred pounds British sterling, for necessaries supplied to and for the use of my barque Heinrich Bjorn of Kragerœ, Norway, I hereby undertake to return them the whole amount so advanced me, with interest and all charges, on the return of the said barque Heinrich Bjorn from her present voyage as concluded for me by C. and C. J. Northcote, as per charter-party dated the 10th March 1882. I hereby declare that I, Gunder Abrahamsen, am sole managing owner of the said Heinrich Bjorn, and that the only part owner with me in her is the present master, J. Boe, who owns one-sixth, say one-sixth, share. C. and C. J. Northcote are also authorised by me to cover the said amount advanced me by insurance on ship, &c., out and home, at my cost. This insurance to be effected either here or in Norway." It appears from the evidence tendered by the plaintiffs in this case that Abrahamsen, shortly after the transaction in question, went into liquidation, and that the five-sixths of the vessel belonging to his estate were, prior to the commencement of this action, sold to Nativig, Aaldborg, and others, who are therefore amongst the defendants in the present proceedings.

The question in this action is, whether the present owners can be effected with liability under the contract of the 23rd March 1882, and as they were not parties to that transaction they can only be so affected if the contract in question created a charge upon the ship which they purchased. The case was commenced and continued down to the hearing as a cause for necessaries, without any suggestion that the contract in question was a contract of bottomry, and apparently on the hypothesis that a contract for the supply of necessaries created a maritime lien. The same view seems to have been acted upon by both parties at the trial, and we do not find that the learned judge's attention was drawn to the inquiry whether that view of the nature of a contract for necessaries was correct, nor to the question whether the contract could be considered as, or was in fact, a contract of bottomry. On the contrary, the questions raised at the trial, and the questions on which therefore evidence was given, appear to us to have been, first, whether the contract produced was a bonâ fide contract, or whether, as the defendants alleged, it was a scheme for charging on the ship the private debts of the part owner; and, secondly, whether the plaintiffs' claim for necessaries was or was not too large. When, however, the case came before us on appeal, the point was raised whether a contract for necessaries does, by the law of England, create a maritime lien, and this question was accordingly argued before us at length; and at a later stage the further question whether the contract sued on was not in truth a bottomry contract was raised, and argued before us by one counsel on each side. We will approach these questions in the opposite order to that in which they were argued. Both sides have more or less relied on the parol evidence given in this case as to the true result of the contract. We entertain grave doubts whether the evidence can be relied upon for that purpose. We think that it was perfectly admissible on the issue before the learned President, viz., whether the contract was a fraud or not; but we think that it is not admissible to qualify or show the real relation of the parties to a written agreement. Taking the contract, then, as expressed in the written document signed by Abrahamsen, it must be inquired whether it charges the ship, and whether the lender assumes the maritime risk. It appears to us that the contract creates no charge upon the ship. On the contrary, the security taken is of an alternative kind; in the event of the return of the ship from her present voyage, the lender is to look to the borrower personally, and to enforce the liability created by the words "I hereby undertake." In the event of the ship being lost on her voyage, the lender is to look to the equitable charge on the policies which is created by the authority given to the lenders to insure the ship at the cost of the borrower. For the same reason it appears to us that the lender does not take the maritime risk. On the contrary, he takes a contract which gives him an alternative security, excluding all risk at all. This is not, as it appears to us, one of those cases in which the parties, having previously intended to create a bottomry contract, have erred in some particular, in which case the court may reject the erroneous particular. On the contrary, the notion of bottomry was absent from the minds of all the parties. The evidence is not addressed to it. It is not mentioned in the written document, in the pleadings or in the judgment of the learned President, or in the arguments before us, till some observations on it fell from the learned junior counsel for the respondents. We therefore feel bound to conclude that the contract in question was not a contract of bottomry.

The question therefore arises, does a contract entered into with a managing part owner for the loan of money to be laid out in necessaries for a ship create a maritime lien? It is, we think, clear that such a loan places the lender in the same position as the person who has actually supplied the necessaries to a ship. Before the passing of the statute 3 & 4 Vict. c. 65, no such lien was recognised by the law of England. This point was fully discussed in a passage in Abbott on Shipping, which has often been referred to, and the conclusion arrived at by the learned writer is beyond doubt a correct statement both of the civil law and of the old law of England on the point. "Every man," says the learned Chief Justice (Abbott on Shipping, 5th edit. pp. 108, 109), "who had repaired or fitted out a ship, or lent money to be employed in those services, had by the law of Rome, and still possesses in those nations which have adopted the civil law as the basis of their jurisprudence, a privilege or right of payment in preference to other creditors, upon the value of the ship itself, without any instrument of hypothecation or any express contract or agreement subjecting the ship to such a claim. This privilege exists in France not only while the ship remains in the possession of the owner, but even after a sale to a third person for some period of time. It appears," he adds, "that the law of England has not adopted this rule of the civil law with regard to repairs and necessaries furnished here in England. A shipwright, indeed, who has taken a ship into his own possession to repair it, may not be bound to part with the possession until he is paid for the repairs, any more than a tailor, smith, or other artificer, in regard to the object of his particular trade, unless there be a special agreement to give credit for a certain period, or such an usage in the trade as is equivalent to a special agreement. But a shipwright who has once parted with the possession of the ship, or has worked upon it without taking possession, and a tradesman who has provided ropes, sails, provisions, or other necessaries for a ship, are not by the law of England preferred to other creditors, nor have any particular claim or lien upon the ship itself for the recovery of their demands." In the case of The Neptune (3 Knapp P. C. C. 94), decided by the Privy Council in 1835, not only was the law as laid down by Lord Tenterden accepted as governing the case of material men suing in rem, but as carrying with it the further conclusion that material men have no lien on the proceeds of a ship sold under a decree of the court for the payment of seamen's wages." "This decision," says Dr. Lushington, in The Pacific (Br. & Lush, 245), "took away the last vestige of Admiralty jurisdiction in the case of necessaries; and from that date till the recent statutes the material man had no locus standi whatever in the Admiralty Court." The next inquiry, therefore, is whether the Legislature of the present reign has created a lien on the ship in favour of material men which did not previously exist. By the 3 & 4 Vict. c. 65. s. 6, passed in the year 1840, it was enacted "that the High Court of Admiralty shall have jurisdiction to decide all claims and demands whatsoever in the nature of salvage for services rendered to, or damage received by any ship or seagoing vessel, or in the nature of towage, or for necessaries supplied to any foreign ship or seagoing vessel, and to enforce the payment thereof, whether such ship or vessel may have been within the body of a county or upon the high seas at the time when the services were rendered or damage received or necessaries furnished in respect of which such claim is made." This clause gives the Admiralty jurisdiction in respect of four kinds of claim: (1) For salvage services rendered to any ship; (2) for damage received by any ship; (3) for towage services rendered to any foreign ship (a); (4) for necessaries supplied to any foreign ship; and in order to understand the operation of the clause it seems necessary to inquire how the law stood with reference to these claims before the statute was passed. Shortly, that law was as follows: that ever since the 13 Rich. 2, c. 5, the judges of the Admiralty Court were restrained from "meddling of anything done within the realm," and were confined to things done upon the high sea; so that whilst in respect of salvage services rendered and damage done by collision on the high seas it recognised a maritime lien in favour of the person rendering the services or sustaining the damage, it had no jurisdiction whatever where the services were rendered or damage done within the body of a county; that as regards towage, which was only then coming into use, the court had no jurisdiction whatever (per Dr. Lushington, The Wataga, Swabey, 167); that as regards necessaries supplied to a foreign ship the court had no jurisdiction at all; and that in no case had the English law recognised the supply of necessaries or the doing of repairs as constituting a maritime lien. Such being the position of the law with regard to these several claims, the clause just read gives the Court of Admiralty jurisdiction with regard to all of them, whether the ship in question was within the body of a county or upon the high seas; but the clause is silent as to the nature of the jurisdiction, and words simply giving jurisdiction do not seem appropriate or adequate to the creation of so important a right as that conferred by a maritime lien, a right towards which the law of England was less friendly than the law of Rome and of the countries which have adopted the civil law. It has been suggested that the way in which necessaries are associated with salvage and damage implies an intention to give in respect of necessaries the same lien as existed in respect of salvage; but the argument is not satisfactory, especially when it is observed (1) that necessaries are more closely associated with towage, which give no lien, than with salvage or damage: (2) that the 4th section of the same Act gave the court jurisdiction to decide all questions of salvage, damage, wages, or bottomry; and that this was so far from creating a lien in favour of a master's wages, though the word wages is closely associated with claims protected by maritime liens, that the Legislature subsequently interpose to give a master this lien. Indeed, it is difficult to suppose that, if the Legislature had intended to create a maritime lien, it would not have done so in express words. When, as on two occasions during this reign it has been the case, the Legislature has been minded to create a maritime lien in favour of a master's wages, it has done so by express words. Thus, by the statute 7 & 8 Vict. c. 112, s. 16, it was enacted that all the rights, liens, privileges, and remedies (save such remedies as are against a master himself) which by that Act, or by any law, statute, custom, or usage, belonged to any seaman not being a master mariner, in respect to the recovery of his wages, should, in the case of the bankruptcy or insolvency of the owner of the ship, also belong and be extended to master mariners in respect to the recovery of wages due to them from the owner of any ship belonging to any of Her Majesty's subjects. And almost precisely similar words, omitting those relating to the bankruptcy or insolvency of the owner, are found in the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, s. 191. But how and in what manner was the new jurisdiction thus given to the Admiralty Court by the statute of 1840 to be exercised? The answer is, that it must be exercised in the manner familiar to the Court of Admiralty and to all courts regulated by the civil law, either by an arrest of the person of the defendant if within the realm, or by the arrest of all personal property of the defendant within the realm whether the ship in question or any other chattel, or by proceedings against the real property of the defendant within the realm: (The Charkieh, L. Rep. 4 Ad. & Eccl. 59, 91; The Alexander, 1 W. Rob. 294.) But if the material man may thus arrest the property to enforce his claim, how does his claim differ from a maritime lien? The answer is, that a maritime lien arises the moment the event occurs which creates it; the proceeding in rem, which perfects the inchoate right, relates back to the period when it first attached. "The maritime lien travels with the thing into whosesoever possession it may come" (The Bold Buccleugh, ubi sup.), and the arrest can extend only to the ship subject to the lien. But, on the contrary, the arrest of a vessel under the statute is only one of several possible alternative proceedings ad fundandam jurisdictionem. It creates no right in the ship or against the ship at any time before the arrest; it has no relation back to any earlier period; it is available only against the property of the person who owes the debt for necessaries, and the arrest need not be of the ship in question, but may be of any property of the defendant within the realm. The two proceedings therefore, though approaching one another in form, are different in substance. In the one case the arrest is to give effect to a pre-existent lien; in the other the arrest is only one of several alternative modes of procedure, because, to use the language of Dr. Lushington in The Volant (ubi sup.), "it offers the greatest security for obtaining substantial justice in furnishing a security for prompt and immediate payment."

We shall now inquire how far the authorities are consonant with the conclusion that the statute 3 & 4 Vict. c. 65, s. 6, gave no maritime lien to the material man. For if on examining them it should appear that any clear course of decision or practice had arisen in favour of such a lien, we should be very unwilling to disturb it. The first contested case which came before the courts on the statute of 1840 was the case of The Alexander (ubi sup.), in Nov. 1841, where the question mooted was whether the Act gave a remedy in favour of persons who had supplied necessaries before the Act came into operation. In the course of his discussion of that question Dr. Lushington said: "The statute does not create a lien upon the vessel at all; the debt has no foundation upon the statute. The effect of the statute is expressly declared in the 6th section in these terms: 'That the Court of Admiralty shall have jurisdiction to decide all claims and demands whatever for necessaries supplied to any foreign ship or seagoing vessel, and to enforce the payment thereof.' The statute, therefore, simply confers upon the court a jurisdiction to be employed in every lawful mode which the court has the power to exercise for enforcing the payment; it might be by arresting the person of the owner if he were resident here, or by arresting the property in case a necessity occurred." The same case came before the court in March 1882, when Dr. Lushington observed "that when the recent statute conferred upon this court a jurisdiction in these matters, or rather perhaps revived an ancient jurisdiction long prohibited, it never was nor could be intended to alter the law, but merely to give a new remedy which was rendered necessary in the peculiar case of foreign ships." It is perhaps scarcely to be doubted that the jurisdiction given by the statute was a new one and not an old one revived, for the jurisdiction formerly asserted was of course prohibited on the ground that it did not exist. In 1845 the case of The Ocean (2 W. Rob. 368) came before the same learned judge, and the point decided was, that articles supplied for the equipment of a vessel building in a foreign dockyard were not necessaries within the statute in question. But in the course of the judgment the learned judge made these observations: "Before the statute was passed all claims for salvage and all questions of damage, as well as demands for towage services where the transaction took place within the body of a county, were cognizable in the courts of common law alone. If this court had proceeded to adjudicate in the matter it would have been subjected to a prohibition. For the convenience of parties who might so render services or receive damage it was deemed expedient to restore the ancient jurisdiction of the Court of Admiralty;" i.e., if we rightly read the learned judge in cases arising within the body of a county. In The Flecha (1 Sp. Eccl. & Adm. 438, July 1854) Dr. Lushington said that not the least important amongst the reasons for the passing of the section of the statute in question "was that the law of this country might in that respect be assimilated to the general law of the maritime states of Europe," which is the first statement that we have been able to find from the lips of this learned judge which at all tends towards the conclusion that the material men would acquire a lien under the statute. In 1859 Dr. Lushington, however, further departed from his view that the statute created no maritime lien in favour of the material men. In The West Friesland (Swa. 454), which was a cause of necessaries brought by the material men against the subsequent purchasers of the ship, Dr. Lushington said that the purchaser of a ship takes subject to liens, and pronounced for the plaintiffs. This case went to the Privy Council, and there the court observing that important questions of law had been raised in the argument expressed no opinion upon them, but reversed the decision of the Admiralty Court on the facts of the case, holding that the material men failed to raise a case on those facts. This case, therefore, comes to nothing as an authority on the point in question; and whatever may have been the exact nature of Dr. Lushington's decision in that case, he seems to have soon reverted to his early view, for in the year 1862, in the case of The Gustaf (Lush. 508), Dr. Lushington in his judgment said: "Claims for necessaries moreover do not possess ab origine a lien; but carry only a statutory remedy against the res, which is essentially different." In the year 1861 was passed the statute 24 Vict. c. 10, of which the 5th section, omitting an immaterial proviso, is as follows: "The High Court of Admiralty shall have jurisdiction over any claim for necessaries supplied to any ship elsewhere than in the port to which the ship belongs, unless it is shown to the satisfaction of the court that at the time of the institution of the cause any owner or part owner of the ship is domiciled in England or Wales." By sect. 35 of the same Act it was declared that "the jurisdiction conferred by this Act on the High Court of Admiralty may be exercised either by proceedings in rem or by proceedings in personam." It is evident that the 5th section of this Act is closely connected with the enactment which has been under discussion hitherto, and the view which it will be seen was adoped by Dr. Lushington that these two statutes were in pari materiâ appears to us to be well founded. In the year 1863 the case of The Ella A. Clark (ubi sup.) came before Dr. Lushington on a question arising on the statute 3 & 4 Vict. c. 65, where the learned judge held that a claim for necessaries supplied to a foreign ship might be enforced by proceedings in rem under the statute notwithstanding a subsequent and bonâ fide transfer to a British owner. "When the Legislature thought fit," said the learned judge, "to put masters' wages on the same footing as seamen's wages they did, as relates to this court, constitute masters' wages a maritime lien, and looking through the several recent statutes I am led to the general conclusion that when the Legislature has appointed the proceeding in rem they intended to give the same remedy as heretofore was in use in this court in the administration of justice in the cases of maritime lien, though no express words may be used to that effect." This language of the learned judge is perhaps not absolutely free from ambiguity, because it refers to remedy only and not to rights; but the decision rests upon the proposition that wherever the Legislature had by recent legislation given a proceeding in rem there it had created a maritime lien. It is remarkable that the distinction between the language of the Legislature when it gave a maritime lien to the master for his wages and when it gave a proceeding in respect of necessaries did not attract the notice of the learned judge. In the following year 1864 arose the case of The Pacific (ubi sup.). There the plaintiff sued the vessel, which was a British ship, for necessaries supplied, and the defendants, who were mortgagees, intervened. The case therefore arose under the statute of 1861, but Dr. Lushington reviewed the whole law on the subject, in a judgment of which the following are material portions: "The decision of the Privy Council in the case of The Neptune (3 Knapp. 94), given in the year 1835, took away the last vestige of Admiralty jurisdiction in the case of necessaries, and from that date till the recent statutes the material man had no locus standi whatever in the Admiralty Court. His only remedy was in the common law courts; and there, unlike the mortgagee, he could proceed only against the shipowner, not against the ship. This state of things was altered by 3 & 4 Vict. c. 65, s. 6, which gave the court jurisdiction over claims for necessaries supplied to a foreign ship; but that statute not applying to British ships, the 24 Vict. c. 10, s. 5, gave jurisdiction over claims for necessaries supplied to any ship subject to two provisoes, viz., that the supply should have been made elsewhere than in the port to which the ship belongs, and that at the date of the institution of the suit the shipowner should not be domiciled in this country. These enactments may seem diverse, but the reason for them is plain and uniform. Against the foreign vessels a real action is given to the material man in all cases, because the owner is assumed to be beyond the jurisdiction; and it is also denied against a British vessel in case the necessaries have been supplied in the home port, because the presumption is that the supply was made upon the personal credit of the owner, who would there be known and trusted. In short, the remedy against the ship is given only where a personal action against the owner would be fruitless; and not even then where the supply is to be assumed to have been made on his personal credit. The material man, therefore, by the mere fact of his supplying necessaries, in no case obtains the ship as a security until he institutes his suit in this court; and in the case of a British ship like the present he may never obtain it at all if by reason of the owner having a domicil in this country the suit cannot be instituted. This, I think, shows that the material man has not a maritime lien, for a maritime lien accrues from the instant of the circumstances creating it, and not from the date of the intervention of the court." In The Troubadour (1 A. & E. 302; 16 L. T. Rep. N. S. 156; 2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 475) a case of necessaries against a British ship, which occurred in 1866, Dr. Lushington followed his decision in The Pacific and reasserted that until institution of suit a necessaries man has no claim upon the vessel. In 1871, in The Two Ellens (ubi sup.), Sir Robert Phillimore had to determine whether, as the law then and now stands, the material man has a maritime lien upon a British ship under the statute of 1861; and after reviewing several of the decisions of Dr. Lushington, he expressed his inability to acquiesce in the reasoning on which the judgment in The Pacific (ubi sup.) was founded, or to reconcile that reasoning with the judgment in The Ella A. Clarke (ubi sup.). "The two statutes ought," he said, "I should have ventured to think, to be construed as being in pari materiâ." He further said that he should have thought that in the case of material men there was an inchoate lien before the institution of the suit, but nevertheless he determined to follow Dr. Lushington in the case of The Pacific, and held that there was no such lien. This case was naturally carried to the Privy Council, when the decision of the court below to the effect that no maritime lien was created by the statute of 1861 against a British ship, was upheld. In the course of the judgment, which was delivered by Mellish, L.J., he, after referring to the statute of 1840, said: "In the construction of this section, it has been held in several cases in the Court of Admiralty that there is a maritime lien in the case of supplies and necessaries furnished to a foreign ship; and their Lordships do not mean to intimate any doubts as to the validity of those decisions, but they are of opinion that those decisions may be supported upon the ground that, though it is perfectly true that the only words used in the section are 'that the High Court of Admiralty shall have jurisdiction'—which words seem hardly sufficient in themselves to create a maritime lien—yet, looking at the subject-matter to which that section relates, it appears designed to enlarge the jurisdiction which the Court of Admiralty already had in matters forming the subject of a maritime lien. These are strong grounds for holding that, as respects salvage, and as respects collision, which already gave a maritime lien when they occurred on the high seas, it was intended that they should also, when they occurred in the body of a county, equally give a maritime lien;" and that being so as to salvage and collision, it might be well said that 'necessaries' immediately following it was intended that the same rule should apply in the case of necessaries." If this were really a decision on the point in question, it would no doubt be of the last importance; but to us it appears that the court merely suggested a distinction between the two statutes which rendered, in their opinion, a decision on the later enactment not conclusive on the earlier one. In the case of The Pieve Superiore (L. Rep. 5 P. C. 482; 2 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 319; 30 L. T. Rep. N. S. 887), in 1874, the Privy Council again accepted the view that sect. 6 of the Act of 1861 did not confer any maritime lien, for the reasons given in the case of The Two Ellens (ubi sup.).

(a) The learned judge here seems to assume that the jurisdiction conferred by the statute is limited to towage services rendered to foreign ships. However, on reference to the words of the section it would seem that the jurisdiction is in respect of claims for towage to any ship, either British or foreign, whether she be within the body of a county or upon the high seas. This appears to be an extension of the ancient jurisdiction exercised by the Admiralty Court over claims for towage services rendered on the high seas: (cf. Williams and Bruce's Admiralty Practice, 152).—Ed.

The result of this long catena of authorities is hardly satisfactory. It shows that for several years Dr. Lushington repelled the notion that the statute of 1840 created any maritime lien in favour of a material man; it shows that in one or more cases he admitted the opposite view, but that at a yet later date he reverted to the earlier conclusion, and that in the one case, that of The Ella A. Clarke, in which he formally decided in favour of the lien, he did so on a principle of construction, namely, that when the Legislature gave a proceeding in rem then it created a maritime lien; and that this principle was rejected by the learned judge himself in the next case of The Pacific, and by the Privy Council in the case of The Two Ellens. It appears to us that upon the whole the current of authorities is against the existence of the lien. But the most important result, in our opinion, is the negative one that there has been no settled or uniform current of authority or of practice in the Admiralty Court in favour of the lien, and that the question is therefore properly open for decision on principle. In our opinion, the two statutes of 1840 and 1861 ought (notwithstanding the observation of Mellish, L.J. in The Two Ellens) to be construed as in pari materiâ, and we think that the decision of the Privy Council in that case lends confirmation to the conclusion at which we arrive, namely, that whilst the statute of 1840 has enabled the material man to enforce his claim in the Admiralty Court, and as one means of relief has given him a right to arrest the ship, it has given him no maritime lien, and consequently no right against the ship till action brought. It does not appear to us probable that the Legislature, whilst giving a remedy against both foreign and British ships, should have created a lien in the one case which it did not create in the other. To hold that the remedies are alike in the two cases is, we think, more consistent with international comity than an opposite decision would be. Mr. Hall suggested that, if there was no maritime lien, nevertheless the defendants in the present case were purchasers with notice of the plaintiffs' claim. But whilst notice of an equitable lien affects a purchaser of the legal estate, notice of a mere personal claim against the vendor has no such effect, and it appears to us that there is no pretence for contending that the supply of necessaries creates any equitable lien against the ship. This argument, which indeed Mr. Hall did not press upon us, is untenable. Our conclusion is, that the appeal must be allowed and the plaintiffs' action dismissed with costs here and in the court below. I have the authority of the Master of the Rolls for saying that, though he concurs in the earlier part of the judgment with difficulty, he approves without qualification of the latter part of it, viz., that portion relating to the question of maritime lien.

THE STEAMSHIP THANEMORE LIMITED v.

THOMPSON AND OTHERS. (a)

Practice—Service out of the jurisdiction—Action against underwriters — Co-defendants served within the jurisdiction—Order XI., r. 1 (g)

The plaintiff brought his action in England on a policy of marine insurance against several underwriters. He served his writ of summons on two of the underwriters who were within the jurisdiction, and applied for leave under Order XI., r. 1 (g), to serve his writ on the other defendants, who were residing out of the jurisdiction in Scotland, as being necessary parties to the action.

Held, that the plaintiff ought to be allowed to serve his writ out of the jurisdiction; and that Order XI., r. 1 (g), was framed to meet such a case.

THIS was an application for leave to serve a writ out of the jurisdiction, which had been referred by Smith, J. at Chambers to the Divisional Court.

The plaintiffs brought their action in the High Court of Justice on a policy of marine insurance against forty-four underwriters who had subscribed the policy in question.

Only two of the above underwriters resided in England within the jurisdiction; the remainder resided or carried on business in Glasgow.

The plaintiffs served a writ of summons upon the two defendants who were in England, and applied for leave to serve the other defendants, who were out of the jurisdiction, with the writ, on the ground that they were necessary and proper parties to the action already commenced in the High Court.

An affidavit in support of the application showed that the steamship Thanemore was registered in the port of Barrow, and traded between that port and the United States. The repairs of the said steamer, which formed the subject-matter of the action, were effected in Liverpool, and the evidence of the shipwrights there was necessary to support the claim, and the ship was in Liverpool on an average once in every month; the defendants within the jurisdiction had been properly and duly served; the action was set down to be tried in Liverpool, in or near which town all the material witnesses resided; and the cost of trying the action there would be much less than in Scotland, where every witness would have to be sent from England; and if leave to serve the defendants out of the jurisdiction were not granted, a separate action in Scotland would have to be brought against them.

By Order XI., r. 1:

Service out of the jurisdiction of a writ of summons or notice of a writ of summons may be allowed by the court or a judge whenever—

(g) Any person out of the jurisdiction is a necessary or proper party to an action properly brought against some other person duly served within the jurisdiction.

G. Barnes for the plaintiff.—I apply ex parte for leave to serve the defendants out of the jurisdiction with a writ of summons in this action. Those within the jurisdiction have been duly served with a writ of summons, and the action is one that is properly brought in the High Court. All parties may be joined as defendants by the plaintiff against whom he has the right to relief whether jointly, severally, or in the alternative. Therefore, all these defendants can now be properly joined as parties. Where partners were sued, one of whom was out of the jurisdiction, upon proof of proper service on the other partner within the jurisdiction, leave to serve the writ upon the defendant abroad has been granted:

Lightowler v. Lightowler W. N. 1884, p. 8.

On these grounds I ask for leave to serve the writ on the defendant abroad.

MANISTY, J.—I think leave ought to be granted. The parties are here sued jointly, and are severally liable. The majority happen to be in Scotland, but the minority in England have been duly served, and the action is one that ought properly to be tried in this country.

LOPES, J.—I am of the same opinion. The defendants out of the jurisdiction are proper parties to be joined in this action with the defendants in England. I think that Order XI., r. 1, sub-sect. (g), was intended to meet this very case. Leave granted.

THE CHARLES JACKSON. (a)

Co-ownership action—Reference—Registrar's report—Stay of execution—Costs—Practice.

A managing owner, who had not delivered accounts for nine years, instituted a co-ownership action for settlement of accounts, and for payment of the balance found due to him, and claimed certain items in respect of materials supplied to the ship for which he had not paid, and for which the defendants were being sued in the Queen's Bench Division. The registrar in his report allowed the plaintiff these items. Upon application to confirm the report, and for judgment, the court decreed payment of the amount found due by the registrar, but stayed execution until the defendants were protected against the claims in the Queen's Bench Division, and refused the plaintiff the costs of the action upon the ground of delay in rendering his accounts.

Quære: Is a managing owner entitled to recover against his co-owners in respect of sums of money due to third parties on account of the ship, but which he has not paid?

THIS was an action instituted by Peter Lawson, as managing owner of ten-sixteenths of the vessel Charles Jackson, against John Curwen and others, as owners of three-sixteenth shares, for settlements of the accounts of the said vessel, and for payment of the sums found due to him.

The action was instituted on the 12th July 1883.

On the 1st Aug. 1884 Butt, J. ordered that the matters in dispute should be referred to the registrar to report thereon.

On the 23rd Jan. 1885 the ship was sold by the plaintiff in pursuance of an order of court. This order was made with the consent of the parties. The proceeds of the sale realised 760*l.*, which was paid into a bank to abide the event of the action.

The reference was heard on the 15th Dec. 1884, when the registrar found that there was due to the plaintiff the sum of 257*l.* 14*s.* 6*d.*, and recommended that "each party ought to pay his own costs of the reference, and a moiety of the reference fees."

In an affidavit sworn on the 31st Jan. 1885 on behalf of the defendants, it was alleged as follows:

5. In the accounts of the plaintiff filed in the above action the plaintiff claimed, as managing owner of the said vessel Charles Jackson, to have paid moneys, and to have made disbursements on my and the other defendants' behalf in respect of the said ship, and amongst such moneys so alleged to be paid and disbursements made are included large sums of money as paid by the plaintiff to Messrs. Ritson and Co., of Maryport, in the county of Cumberland, ship chandlers and shipwrights, Messrs. Michael Hutchinson and Co., of Liverpool, ship chandlers, Messrs. Hayton and Simpson, also of Liverpool, shipbrokers, and Messrs. Caleb Smith and Co., also of Liverpool, shipbuilders and engineers.

6. The said Messrs. Ritson and Co., Hutchinson and Co., Hayton and Simpson, and Caleb Smith and Co. have recently commenced four different actions against me and other owners of the said vessel to recover certain sums of money which they allege to be due from them to me and the other owners in respect of the said vessel Charles Jackson, and which sums of money I verily believe were included in and formed part of the accounts filed in this action by the above-named plaintiff, and claimed by him as being payments made by him on behalf of myself and the other defendants.

7. I caused an appearance to be entered to the said four actions so brought against me as aforesaid by Messrs. Ritson, Hutchinson and Co., Hayton and Simpson, and Caleb Smith and Co., and I am informed and believe a summons was issued by the plaintiffs in the said four actions pursuant to the Rules of the Supreme Court 1883, under Order XIV., rule 1, to sign judgment against me, notwithstanding appearance, but on the hearing of such summons I am informed and believe I was allowed to defend such four actions, and which leave was affirmed upon an appeal.

8. I have caused to be served on the plaintiff a third-party notice pursuant to the Rules of the Supreme Court 1883, Order XVI., r. 48, claiming to be indemnified by the plaintiff against all liability in respect of the said four actions brought against me and the other defendants on the ground that such liability (if any) was improperly incurred by the plaintiff on his own responsibility, and not in any way on my behalf or with my authority or consent, and I have caused to be delivered my statements of defence in the said four actions.

It appeared that no accounts had been delivered for nine years prior to the action, and that the defendants were defending the action upon the ground that they had never been able to see or investigate the plaintiff's accounts.

The plaintiff was now moving that:

1. The report of the registrar, dated 15th Dec. 1884 in this action be confirmed.

2. That judgment be entered for the plaintiff in accordance with such report, with costs of the action and of this application and judgment.

3. That the costs of the plaintiff as between solicitor and client of the proceedings for and in relation to, and for the sale and completion of the sale of the said ship Charles Jackson be paid out of the proceeds of such sale, or in the alternative that the defendants pay such costs as were incurred by reason of their opposition to such sale and the application for leave to sell.

Bankes for the plaintiff.—I ask that judgment be entered in accordance with the registrar's report, and that the plaintiff be allowed the costs of the action. He is also entitled to be paid the expenses incurred by him in selling the vessel.

Raikes, for the defendants, contra.—The court should not let execution go in this action without protecting the defendants against the claims that are being made against them in the Queen's Bench Division. Although the plaintiff has not paid these items they are allowed in the Registrar's report. Should the plaintiffs in the Queen's Bench Division get judgment, the defendants will have to pay these items twice over. The plaintiff is not entitled to the costs of this action, inasmuch as he has failed to deliver accounts for nine years. He by his own conduct has necessitated the present action.

BUTT, J.—This is an action of partnership account. It appears that no accounts have been delivered for nine years by the managing owner, the plaintiff in this action, whose primâ facie duty it was to deliver them at some earlier date. Under these circumstances, I cannot give the plaintiff the costs of this action. But as to the costs incurred by the plaintiff in selling the ship, I do not forget that that sale was carried out by consent, and that the order of court for the sale was by consent. I therefore think the plaintiff is entitled to deduct all those costs from the proceeds of the sale. Those are not costs of litigation. I therefore order that the defendants pay their share of the plaintiff's costs of the sale of the vessel, or rather that the plaintiff may deduct the cost from the proceeds.

As to a stay of execution, I understand that the defendants have suffered judgment against them by certain claimants, and that the plaintiff in this action has been allowed the amounts of those judgments in the registrar's report, I think that until the defendants are satisfied that those common law actions are stopped and that they are not in jeopardy from them, they ought not to part with their money to the plaintiff. I think they are entitled to be protected. It may be that if the plaintiff gets execution in the action before me the plaintiffs in the common law actions will also get execution against the defendants, the result of which will be that the defendants will have to pay twice over. That is not just. I therefore will not allow execution to go in this action against the defendants until they are protected in the other actions. I moreover am not so clear that the plaintiff is entitled to judgment for amounts which he has not paid. I am not at all prepared to say that I should allow a managing owner, under ordinary circumstances, to have a judgment in respect of claims which he has not paid. As I propose to deal with this matter the question is immaterial, but I am by no means satisfied that the plaintiff is entitled to judgment in respect of the sums claimed in the Queen's Bench action.

Dr. Raikes.—Will your Lordship allow it in this way, execution stayed with liberty to apply?

BUTT, J.—Yes; I see no objection to that. The more proper way would be to confirm the report and not make a decree.

Dr. Raikes.—Stay of execution will protect my clients.

BUTT, J.—I shall make the ordinary decree for payment, but execution not to go until the court is satisfied that the defendants are secured against the claims in the Queen's Bench Division, with liberty to either party to apply. I also order that the plaintiff is entitled to deduct his share of the expense of selling the ship from the proceeds of the sale.

WHITE v. DITCHFIELD; THE MEREDITH. (a)

Co-ownership action—Managing owner—Time charter—Liability of co-owner.

Where a ship, having been chartered out and home under a time charter, is being brought home under a voyage charter in consequence of the time charter having been broken, the purchaser of shares purchasing during such homeward voyage is not liable for losses incidental to the voyage out under the time charter.

Semble, that a managing owner may be entitled to some reasonable sum as a commission on profits, although he owns shares in the ship and no express agreement as to his remuneration has been entered into.

THIS was an action in personam, instituted by John White, late managing owner of the steamship Meredith, against S. J. Ditchfield, the owner of one sixty-fourth share, to recover 33*l.* 9*s.* 4*d.*, the defendant's alleged share of the losses sustained by the ship during the years 1873 to 1877.

On the 25th June 1884 the plaintiff's claim was, by an order of court, referred to the registrar to report thereon.

The Registrar's report was as follows:

Whereas by an order of court, dated 25th June 1884, all matters in dispute in this action were referred to the registrar, assisted by merchant, to report thereon. Now I do hereby report that I have, with the assistance of Mr. Sidney Young, of London, merchant, carefully examined the claim filed by the plaintiff, together with all accounts and vouchers and the papers and proceedings produced and brought in, and having on July 24th last and the 5th Dec. inst. heard the evidence of John White, the plaintiff, and also what was urged by counsel for the plaintiff, and by the solicitor for the defendant, I find that there is due to the plaintiff the sum of 6*l.* 12*s.* 8*d.*, with interest thereon at 4 per cent. per annum, as stated in the schedule hereto annexed. I am also of opinion that the plaintiff should pay the costs of the reference. This is a claim by the late managing owner of the ss. Meredith for a balance of only 33*l.* 9*s.* 4*d.*, the proportion alleged to be due from the defendant as owner of one sixty-fourth share of losses sustained by the ship during rather more than three years, from November 1873 to January 1877. The claim, though of small amount, was complicated and troublesome to investigate. (1) The balance of 17*l.* 13*s.*, claimed as due for the first of the three periods comprised in the accounts (Nov. 1873 to Feb. 1874) has been wholly disallowed, on the ground that the defendant, who had acquired his share while the ship was on her homeward voyage from the Black Sea, was not liable for a share of a loss previously sustained on the ship's outward voyage under another charter-party. (2) The balance of 26*l.* 8*s.* 10*d.*, claimed for the second period (March 1874 to April 1875), was admitted to be due. (3) The balance of 10*l.* 12*s.* 6*d.* credited to the defendant for the third period (April 1875 to January 1877) has been increased by the disallowance to the plaintiff of two sums of 6*l.* 9*s.* 8*d.* and 2*l.* 14*s.* The former of these sums was claimed as the defendant's share of a loss of 501*l.* 0*s.* 9*d.* sustained by the ship whilst employed by the plaintiff as one of his own line of steamers on a voyage to Hayti and Jamaica and back without a charter and without the defendant's authority. The second sum of 2*l.* 14*s.* has been credited to the defendant as his share of a reduction made in the commission charged by the plaintiff for the management of the ship. For this he had claimed in all 341*l.* 14*s.* 8*d.*, being at the rate of 2½ per cent. on the gross freight earned during his management, in lieu of which 190*l.* has been allowed, or about 100*l.* a year during the same period. By these disallowances the plaintiff's claim has been reduced from

(a) Reported by J. P. ASPINALL and BUTLER ASPINALL, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

33*l.* 9*s.* 4*d.* to 6*l.* 12*s.* 8*d.*, and considering also that the plaintiff ceased to be managing owner in the latter part of 1878, but did not bring the present action until very nearly six years later, in March 1884, I am of opinion that he ought to pay the costs of the reference.

The following petition in objection to the registrar's report was filed by the plaintiff:

Whereas by an order of court, dated the 25th day of June 1884, all matters in dispute in the action of White v. Ditchfield were referred to the registrar and merchant. And whereas the said registrar by his report, dated the 31st day of December, found that only the sum of 6*l.* 12*s.* 8*d.* was due to the plaintiff, and that the plaintiff should pay the costs of the reference. Your petitioner submits that the decision of the registrar was wrong in law in holding that the defendant was not liable in respect of an existing contract, entered into in regard to the s.s. Meredith prior to the date when defendant purchased his shares in the said vessel, and on a subsequent voyage, during which loss was sustained by the employment of the said ship, and further that the registrar improperly exercised his discretion in disallowing the plaintiff his commission for management of the said ship and making the plaintiff pay the costs of the reference, and your petitioner will therefore ever pray, &c.

In answer to this petition the defendant filed an answer in support of the report.

According to the evidence given at the reference it appeared that the defendant had become the registered owner of one sixty-fourth share in Jan. 1874; that on the 7th Oct. 1873 the Meredith was chartered under what was alleged to be a time charter, from Middlesborough to Taganrog; that on the ship arriving at Kertch the charterer broke the charter; that the ship was then brought home under a voyage charter; and that it was during this homeward voyage that the defendant purchased his share.

The plaintiff now appealed from the registrar's report.

Bigham, Q.C. (with him Atherley-Jones) for the plaintiff.—The registrar was wrong in law in holding that the defendant was not liable in respect of the losses incurred under the time charter. It is true that at the time the defendant bought his share the ship was being brought home under another charter, but it is submitted that the recharter was an incident of the voyage out under the time charter. The defendant would clearly be liable for losses incurred on the voyage home, even though they were incurred previous to his buying the share. [BUTT, J.—I am by no means sure of that.] So it is submitted, and if so, the voyage home being merely an incident in the time charter, the defendant is liable for all losses incurred from the departure of the Meredith from England. The defendant is bound to stand in the shoes of the vendor from whom he bought. The purchaser of shares in a ship is entitled to the profits accruing to the shares. If so he must also bear the liabilities. Underwriters in case of total abandonment, and mortgagees on taking possession, are entitled to the freight accruing due. In the same way they must take possession subject to all just burdens on the ship. [BUTT, J.—I am not clear that underwriters take the burdens in cases of abandonment.] It is also submitted that the registrar was wrong in reducing the item of commission. It was argued on behalf of the defendant at the reference that a co-owner like the plaintiff was not entitled to commission on the profits. It may be that the registrar has acted upon that fallacious principle in reducing the plaintiff's claim.

Bucknill, for the defendant, was not called upon.

BUTT, J.—I am very clearly of opinion that there is no liability on the part of Mr. Ditchfield to contribute towards any portion of the loss arising on the voyage that was to have been performed under the time charter. The time charter was at an end before the defendant purchased his share, and therefore he cannot be liable in respect of any loss arising out of it. I am not quite satisfied, although I do not decide the point, that he is necessarily liable for any portion of the loss incurred on the homeward voyage prior to the purchase of his share. The plaintiff, however, is not appealing in respect of that matter. That settles the first question.

On the second point, the only result of my interfering with the registrar's report would be to add a few pounds to the amount allowed the plaintiff. It is a small matter in figures, though perhaps important in principle. I do not agree at all with the contention which was taken before the registrar on behalf of the defendant, that in cases where the managing owner is a co-owner and has an interest in the adventure, that therefore he is not entitled to any commission on the profits. I think it is almost the universal practice for a managing owner under those circumstances to have some remuneration. The amount I think is usually fixed, but I am not aware that there is any hard and fast practice as to the amount where it has not been previously settled. Knowing that Mr. Smith, the assistant registrar, has had considerable practice in these matters, and that he was assisted by Mr. Young, who has the widest and most extensive experience, I cannot, in the absence of any evidence that the registrar was wrong, interfere with his allowance. This appeal must be dismissed with costs.

ANDERSON, TRITTON, AND CO. v. OCEAN STEAMSHIP COMPANY. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF APPEAL IN ENGLAND.

General average contribution—Liability of owners of cargo—Salvage.

Where a master enters into a towage contract, rendering the shipowners liable to pay a sum of money named in the contract whether the services prove beneficial or not, and the ship and cargo are thereby saved, the remuneration agreed upon may be the subject of a general average contribution. The fact that a shipowner has become liable to pay, and has paid, a sum of money for services rendered to the ship and cargo, and that such payment was reasonable, does not show conclusively that the whole of such sum is chargeable to general average. Before the owners of cargo can become liable for a general average contribution it must be left to the jury to find what sum should properly be charged to general average under the circumstances.

Judgment of the Court of Appeal reversed.

THIS was an appeal from a judgment of the Court of Appeal (Brett, M.R., Baggallay and Bowen, L.JJ.), reported in 50 L. T. Rep. N. S. 171; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 202, and 13 Q. B. Div. 651, reversing a decision of the Divisional Court (Grove, Lopes, and Mathew, JJ.), directing judgment to be entered for the defendants, the present appellants.

The action was brought by the respondents, as owners of the steamship Achilles, to recover a sum of 162*l.* 11*s.* 7*d.*, alleged to be due from the appellants, as owners of a portion of the cargo, as a general average contribution. The Achilles ran aground on a shifting sand-bank in the Hankow river in China, and her master, believing the ship and cargo to be in danger, signalled to another steamship, the Shanghai, for assistance. With the help of the Shanghai the Achilles got off the bank uninjured. An arrangement existed between the owners of steam-vessels trading to the Hankow river to the effect that, if any vessel was in danger and signalled for assistance, she should pay the assisting vessel a sum of 10,000 taels (2500*l.*), whether the services rendered were beneficial or not, and that no services should be rendered for more than twenty-four hours. The master of the Achilles was aware of this arrangement when he signalled to the Shanghai. The arrangement was embodied in an agreement drawn up and signed after the Achilles had got off the bank, and a sum of 2691*l.* 19*s.* 6*d.* was paid by the respondents to the owners of the Shanghai for the services and expenses. It was in respect of this sum that the general average contribution was claimed.

The action was tried before Cave, J. and a jury, and he gave judgment for the plaintiffs, but the Divisional Court directed judgment to be entered for the defendants. Their decision was reversed as above mentioned by the Court of Appeal, and the defendants, the cargo owners, appealed to the House of Lords.

The Solicitor-General (Sir F. Herschell, Q.C.), Cohen, Q.C., and Barnes appeared for the appellants, and contended that there was no agreement binding on the shipowners to pay any definite sum. The ship was, no doubt, in danger, and the salvors were entitled to quantum meruit for their services, but the circumstances show that there was not at that time any binding agreement to pay 10,000 taels. These were not, properly speaking, "salvage services," for they were only to continue for twenty-four hours whatever the condition of the Achilles might have been at the end of that time, and the money was to be paid whatever the result, an arrangement which cannot bind the cargo owners. The jury have not found any contract, and if the Shanghai had brought an action in the Admiralty Court for salvage services this agreement could not have been set up in answer to her claim. In any case the agreement can only bind the shipowners, not the cargo. There cannot be a general average contribution unless there is a salvage agreement enforceable in the Admiralty Court, and this agreement could not be enforced, being unreasonable. It is against public policy, and, even if good against the ship, it cannot stand against the cargo. They cited

H. Matthews, Q.C., G. Bruce, Q.C., and H.D. Greene, who appeared for the respondents, were requested to confine their arguments to the points: (1) Whether the agreement was against public policy; (2) Whether it was binding on the cargo-owners; (3) Whether it was reasonable. They argued that it was binding on the shipowners, and, therefore, if they were compelled to make the payment, it was a case of general average. The test is, was it judicious to make the sacrifice at the time? The agreement in fact bound the owners:

Arthur v. Barton, 6 M. & W. 138;
Beldon v. Campbell, 6 Ex. 886.

There was a reasonable necessity here, and it appears from the evidence that the sum paid was not, in fact, unreasonable. Whether any particular expenditure does or does not give rise to a general average contribution, depends upon whether it was, in fact, judicious:

Birkley v. Presgrave, 1 East, 220;
Kemp v. Halliday, 6 B. & S. 723; L. Rep. 1 Q. B. 520; 2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 370; 14 L. T. Rep. N. S. 762;
Moran v. Jones, 7 E. & B. 523.

[Lord BLACKBURN.—The point is, was the case properly left to the jury, and have they found the payment reasonable as against the appellants here?] In finding it reasonable as to the ship they have found it reasonable as against all parties. The Shanghai was herself in danger, and as to what is a reasonable amount in such a case see The Waverley (ubi sup.):

The Minnehaha, 15 Moo. P. C. 133;
The Medina (ubi sup.).

If the agreement was reasonable it was a sacrifice for the general good, and the cargo-owners are bound. No doubt, if the services had not been effectual, there would not have been a general average loss, but the Achilles and her cargo were in fact benefited, and as she could not have got off the bank at less expense, nor have set aside the agreement as inequitable, it must fall within the rule as to general average. It was, in fact, a salvage agreement:

The Undaunted, Lush. 90; 2 L. T. Rep. N. S. 520;
The Melpomene, 1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 515; L. Rep. 4 A. & E. 129; 29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 405;
The E. U., 1 Spinks Ecc. & Ad. 63.

The ship was in peril requiring assistance, and the agreement to pay the 10,000 taels was reasonable, and a payment for the general good stands on the same footing as a material sacrifice. If the services had failed the whole burden would have fallen on the ship. This was not a case of duress such as The Helen and George (Swab. 368). The salvors were themselves in danger, and are entitled to substantial remuneration:

The Phantom, 2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 442; L. Rep. 1 A. & E. 58; 15 L. T. Rep. N. S. 596.

The question of "public policy" is covered by the finding of the jury that the agreement was reasonable.

Cohen, Q.C. in reply.—The agreement is inequitable on the face of it, and would have been invalid as against the shipowners if they had not subsequently ratified it. It is inconsistent with the principles of salvage law, as administered in the Admiralty Court. See

At the conclusion of the arguments their Lordships took time to consider their judgments.

Dec. 5, 1884.—Their Lordships gave judgment as follows:—

Lord BLACKBURN.—My Lords: The first paragraph of the statement of claim is as follows: "In consideration that the plaintiffs, at the request of the defendants, had taken on board a ship of the plaintiffs, called the Achilles, certain goods of the defendants, to be carried on board the said ship from Hankow to London, the defendants promised that they would contribute and pay their just share and proportion, in respect of the said goods, of any general average loss that might arise or happen to the ship during the said voyage." The statement then proceeds to aver that the ship with the goods on board took the ground, and that the ship and crew were in danger of perishing, and that "her master and crew, being unable to rescue the said ship or the said cargo from the said danger, help and assistance were obtained, and were necessary and proper for that purpose, for which the plaintiffs were obliged to pay, and did pay, 2691*l.* 19*s.* 6*d.*, and the ship and cargo were by means of the said help and assistance preserved." If there was a general average loss to which the defendants were to contribute it is not now in controversy that the defendants' proportion of 2691*l.* 19*s.* 6*d.* would be 162*l.* 11*s.* 7*d.*, and for that sum the action was brought. There can, however, I think, be no doubt that the plaintiffs are not tied down to recover that exact amount or nothing. If it was proved that there was a claim for general average, but that the amount for which the claim was made out was less than 2961*l.* 19*s.* 6*d.*, the plaintiffs might still recover the proper percentage of that amount actually made out. The defendants by their statement of defence put the plaintiffs on proof of everything, and contended, and I rather think still contend, that the plaintiffs are not entitled to recover anything. But they seem to have had doubts upon that subject, and therefore bring 75*l.* into court. What the effect of this mode of pleading might be on the costs I do not stop to inquire. It certainly shows, to my mind, that, besides the issue whether there was a general average at all, there was a serious issue as to what the amount was to which the cargo had to contribute as a general average. I may as well clear away a matter of prejudice. If anyone is insured in the ordinary form his insurers would have to indemnify him for general average. It is, therefore, usual enough for a merchant who is insured to hand over the defence to his insurers; if they can make out that the merchant is not liable at all, there is no claim on the insurers; if they can make out that the amount payable is less than is demanded, the claim on the insurers is less. I think it very likely that in this case insurers are defending the action in the name of the defendants, though I do not know that it is so, but that makes no difference in the law, and should make none as to the findings of fact. No more contribution is exigible from the owner of a parcel of goods that are insured than from the owner of a parcel that is not insured.

On the trial evidence was produced on the part of the plaintiffs only, the defendants calling none. At the close of the case it was submitted that there was no case, and various objections were taken. One of these I may now notice: There was evidence—I do not now say more—that not only the ship, but also the cargo, were exposed to a peril from which the master and crew were unable to rescue them; that the assistance of the Shanghai was requested and was granted; and there was evidence that by the assistance of the Shanghai the ship and cargo were saved from that peril. Mr. Cohen's objection, if I understood him rightly, was that, assuming all to be true which this could prove, it would show a claim for salvage for which the owners of the Shanghai might have brought a suit in the Court of Admiralty against the ship and cargo, and that in that court the amount of the fair reward would have been decided by the Admiralty, taking everything into consideration; the peril to the Shanghai, which does not seem to have been great, being one element, and the sum which the owners of the Shanghai in all cases demanded being another, but not a conclusive one. But I think this was not a tenable point. The owners of the Achilles paid the amount demanded by the Shanghai as a disbursement; after they had been paid the owners of the Shanghai could not have brought any suit. And I think it would be a very unjust rule of law that the cargo owners should go free from a payment which they might have been forced to make to the owners of the Shanghai because the owners of the Achilles did not put the Shanghai to a suit in the Court of Admiralty, but, rightly or wrongly, paid as a disbursement the whole amount demanded. I do not think that the owners of the Achilles could, by paying the claim of the Shanghai, entitle themselves to recover more from the goods owners than the Shanghai could have recovered in a salvage suit against the goods owners, but I do not see why they might not recover whatever it was fair and just should be paid as a contribution. General average, as is explained in Abbott on Shipping, part 3, chap. 8, p. 342 (5th edit.), is founded on the Rhodian law, which, however, in terms did not extend further than to cases of jettison; but its principle applies, and it has been applied, to other cases of voluntary sacrifice for the benefit of all, that is, if properly made. Those things which are actually saved in the sense explained in Abbot on Shipping, part 3, chap. 8, sect. 13, p. 355 (5th edit.), must contribute. In Kemp v. Halliday (6 B. & S. 746)

I said: "In order to give rise to a charge as regards general average, it is essential that there should be a voluntary sacrifice to preserve more subjects than one exposed to a common jeopardy, but an extraordinary expenditure incurred for that purpose is as much a sacrifice as if instead of money being expended money's worth were thrown away. It is immaterial whether the shipowner sacrifices a cable or an anchor to get the ship off a shoal, or pays the worth of it to hire those extra services which get her off. It is quite true that so long as the expenditure by the shipowner is merely such as he would incur in the fulfilment of his ordinary duty as shipowner, it cannot be general average," And I may observe that in the specimen of an adjustment given in Abbott on Shipping (part 3, chap. 8, sect. 16. p. 359, 5th edit.), and sanctioned by Lord Tenterden's high authority, one of the items allowed is "expense of bringing the ship off the sands, 50*l*." That item must have been a disbursement to pay for services hired. I think that the promise stated in the first paragraph of the statement of claim is one that would be implied by law in every contract for the carriage of goods. The shipowners have, I think, a lien till the contributions are paid or secured. The goods owner may raise the question whether any, and if any what, contribution is due, by offering to pay what, if anything, he admits to be due, demanding the goods, and if refused bringing trover, and so raising the question whether he has been ready and willing to pay enough. But I see no reason why the same question should not be raised in this form of action. Questions of this sort are generally more conveniently settled by average adjusters as arbitrators, or by stating a case on any question of law on which the opinions of average adjusters differ; but the action having been brought must be disposed of.

I have come to the conclusion that, on the evidence given at the trial it was not a simple issue whether the whole sum actually paid by the shipowners to the owners of the Shanghai was chargeable to general average, and, if that was not made out, that nothing was to be recovered. I do not think that it would follow merely from the shipowner having become liable to pay and having paid that sum, that the whole of it was chargeable to general average. I think it might well be that on this evidence the proper conclusion was that something differing from that sum might be chargeable, and I think that, till it is ascertained whether any sum was chargeable, and what that sum was, the case is not ripe for decision. And I do not think that the answers by the jury to the questions asked by the learned judge at the trial suffice to enable this House to solve that question. I have therefore come to the conclusion that neither the judgment given by Cave, J. in favour of the plaintiffs for the whole amount, nor the order of the Divisional Court entering judgment for the defendants, nor the order now appealed against restoring the judgment below, can be supported, and that the only course that can be adopted by this House is to order a new trial. The principles on which I come to this conclusion have not often been discussed in a court of law; they probably often come before average adjusters, and are of great importance. The contract of the shipowner is to carry on the goods to their destination. In Beldon v. Campbell (6 Ex. 886) it is said by Parke, B., with, I think, perfect accuracy, "there is no doubt of the power of the master by law, but some as to what extent it goes, to bind the owner. The master is appointed for the purpose of conducting the navigation of the ship to a favourable termination, and he has as incident to that employment a right to bind his owner for all that is necessary, that is upon the legal maxim, Quando aliquid mandatur, mandatur et omne per quod pervenitur ad illud." And I think that if the question here raised had been whether the owners of the Achilles were bound by a contract made by their masters to pay the owners of the Shanghai the sum in question, the first questions asked by Cave, J. would have been perfectly right. I do not, however, think that on the evidence any question of the authority of the master to bind his owners really was raised. The two sets of shipowners had a common agent, Drysdale, Ringer, and Co., and I should rather conclude that Drysdale, Ringer, and Co. were the persons who, on behalf of the owners of the Shanghai agreed to send out the Shanghai to help the Achilles as soon as the master of the Achilles signalled that he wanted help, and that the amount of remuneration to be paid by the owners of the Achilles to the owners of the Shanghai was not discussed or settled between the captains at all, but was settled in the first instance by Drysdale, Ringer, and Co, and afterwards the two sets of shipowners ratified and agreed on what they settled. I think, therefore, that it was quite clear that there was a contract binding on the owners of the Achilles to pay the sum of 2691*l.* 19*s.* 6*d.* to the owners of the Shanghai; whether it was made by themselves or by their master for them is, as far as regards the binding of the owners of the Achilles, unimportant. But neither the owners of the ship nor their master have authority to bind the goods, or the owners of the goods, by any contract. The master has, I think, authority to make for his owners all disbursements which are proper for the general purposes of the voyage, and when once those disbursements are paid for, either by the master ou of funds belonging to the owner which the master has, or by funds which the owners themselves apply to discharge a contract which they either could not dispute because the master had bound them to make it, or did not choose to dispute, I think that the disbursement, in so far as it is a disbursement for the salvation of the whole adventure from a common imminent peril, may properly be charged to general average. But I think there is neither reason nor authority for saying that the whole amount which the owners of the ship choose to pay is, as a matter of law, to be charged to general average. And though I quite agree that there is some evidence here that the Achilles and her cargo were both in danger, and were both saved by the services of the Shanghai, and though I also agree that it is not a question of law whether the amount of the sum charged as a disbursement was exorbitant or not, still I cannot find that any question as to the amount was submitted to the jury.

It seems to me that if such a question had been submitted to a jury there is much in the evidence that might make it very doubtful whether the jury would think this sum properly chargeable against the owners of the goods if uninsured. If they thought the charge was against the underwriters, there is a common enough impression, not confined to jurymen, that the underwriter's trade is such as to make it right to be liberal in deciding any doubtful question against them. I do not think this ought to influence, but it might do so. I cannot, however, find that the opinion of the jury was taken at all as to the amount. On a new trial that question may be raised, and it may be a subject of great difficulty to say what evidence bears on it, and what the proper directions to the jury should be. I think it better not to prejudice the question further than by saying that the fact that the owners of the Achilles had by contract, made either by their master or by themselves, became bound to pay this sum, and had paid it, is not, I think conclusive that the whole of it was chargeable to general average, though part of it may be. If your Lordships agree in this opinion, I think that the order of this House should be for a new trial, and that all the costs of the trial, and in the Divisional Court, and in the Court of Appeal, are thrown away; and that as neither party can be said to have succeeded in this House, each party should bear his own costs in this House. I therefore move accordingly.

The LORD CHANCELLOR (Selborne) and Lord WATSON concurred.

Order appealed from reversed, except so far as it rescinds the order of the Queen's Bench Division that judgment be entered for the defendants. Cause remitted with directions for a new trial.

UZIELLI AND CO. v. THE BOSTON MARINE INSURANCE COMPANY. (a)

Marine insurance—Reinsurance—Notice of abandonment to reinsurers—Sue and labour clause—"Factors, servants, or assigns."

The plaintiffs had (as agents for a French insurance company) effected with the defendants a policy of marine insurance upon a large number of steamers, as per list attached to the policy; the policy being a reinsurance applying to policies issued by the French company, subject to the same terms, clauses, and conditions as those policies, but to cover total loss only. The policy contained the ordinary suing and labouring clause in favour of the assured, their "factors, servants, and assigns." One of the vessels named in the list attached to the policy, and therein insured for 1000*l.*, went ashore. The policy issued by the French company upon this vessel was itself a policy of reinsurance effected by some of the original underwriters of the vessel. The owner of the vessel served notice of abandonment upon the original underwriters, but not upon the French company or upon the defendants; the original underwriters refused to accept the notice, and took steps to get her off, and eventually brought her into dry dock at Leith at considerable cost and expense. At Leith the original underwriters agreed with the owner to pay him 88 per cent. of her value, and take her; but, apart from this agreement, the vessel was a constructive total loss. The French company paid to the original underwriters who had reinsured with them their proportion of the 88 per cent., together with their proportion of the expenses, making together 112 per cent. of the sum so insured. The French company now sought to recover from the defendants the amount so paid by them to the original underwriters:

Held (varying the judgment of Mathew, J.), that the notice of abandonment to the original underwriters was sufficient, and that, as between the reinsurers and reinsured, no such notice was necessary; that the plaintiffs were not entitled to recover on the policy itself more than 1000*l.*; and that they could not recover any more under the suing and labouring clause, as the original underwriters were not their factors, servants, or assigns.

THIS was an appeal from a judgment of Mathew, J., sitting without a jury.

It appeared that in the month of February 1881 the owners of a vessel called the Rose Middleton, effected with certain underwriters at Lloyd's a policy of insurance upon that vessel for a sum of 1500*l.*, and also insured her in certain insurance clubs. In the same month the Lloyd's underwriters reinsured that risk for 1500*l.* with the plaintiffs, who were acting as agents and insurance brokers for a company called the Compagnie l'Armement of Paris. This policy contained a sue and labour clause.

In the course of 1881 the plaintiffs, acting on behalf of the French company, effected with the defendants a policy for 345,073*l.* upon 443 vessels, as per list attached to the policy. Upon the list appeared the Rose Middleton, therein insured for 1000*l.* The policy appeared on the face of it to be a policy of reinsurance applying to policies issued by the French company, "subject to the same terms, clauses, and conditions as the original policies, and to pay as may be paid thereon, but to cover the risk of total loss only." There was also the ordinary sue and labour clause in favour of the assured, "their factors, servants, and assigns."

In the month of October 1881 the Rose Middleton went ashore, and her owners, having elected to treat her as a total loss, gave notice of abandonment to the original underwriters and clubs; but no notice of abandonment was given to the plaintiffs or to the French company, or to the defendants. The underwriters and clubs refused to accept the notice and succeeded in getting the vessel into port at Leith at considerable expense, and there agreed with her owners to pay them 88 per cent. of her value; but, apart from this agreement, it appeared that the vessel was a constructive total loss. The vessel was then sold by the underwriters.

Thereupon the plaintiffs, on behalf of the French company, became liable to pay, and paid to the underwriters, their proportion of the 88 per cent. and their proportion of the salvage expenses, less the proceeds of the sale, the total of the amount working out at 112 per cent. of the 1500*l.* insured, namely 1680*l.*

The plaintiffs brought an action against the defendants to recover that amount.

Mathew, J. at the trial gave judgment for the plaintiffs for 1120*l.*, being 112 per cent. upon the 1000*l.* for which the vessel in question was insured with the defendants.

The defendants appealed.

Finlay, Q.C. and Edge for the appellants.—The judgment ought to have been for the defendants. The policy effected by the plaintiffs with the defendants was to "cover the risk of total loss only" and there has been no total loss; the owner and underwriters did not treat her as a total loss, but came to terms about her on another footing. But even if there was a total loss, the defendants have had no notice of abandonment; such notice is necessary in the case of reinsurers:

Phillips on Insurance, s. 1506;
Arnould on Marine Insurance, 5th ed. p. 104.

But if this is not so, the plaintiffs can only recover the 88 per cent. of the amount insured, for that is all they have paid in respect of the loss; they claim the excess under the sue and labour clause, but that only applies to the assured, their "factors, servants, and assigns," in this case the original underwriters were none of these things. They cited

Lohre v. Aitcheson, 41 L. T. Rep. N. S. 323; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 168; 4 App. Cas. 755;

Cohen, Q.C. and Barnes, for the respondents, were asked to argue the last point only.—The original underwriters who sued and laboured did so as the servants of the plaintiffs. The policy contains the words "to pay as may be paid thereon," and these words impose the same liability upon the defendants as that which the plaintiffs bore. They cited

Cur. adv. vult.

Nov. 10.—Brett, M.R.—In this case the action is brought by the plaintiffs, who are the assured under the policy, against the defendants, who are the insurers, and the action is to recover for a total loss. The case was tried by Mathew, J. and he gave judgment for an amount which is 112 per cent. of the sum insured by the policy, and thereupon the defendants appealed to this court. Now, this policy upon which this action is brought is a policy of reinsurance effected by persons who are themselves reinsurers under another policy, and accepted by the defendants to the amount of 1000*l.* Now, the judgment has given the plaintiffs more than 1000*l.*, and the defendants have argued four objections to that judgment before us. First, they said that the policy was an insurance against total loss only, that there was in fact no total loss, and therefore judgment should have been given for them; secondly, they said that no notice of abandonment had been given to them by the plaintiffs; thirdly, that the judgment was too large, because they are not liable under the circumstances to pay more than 88 per cent. of the 1000*l.*; and fourthly, that the plaintiffs cannot under the circumstances recover anything under the sue and labour clause. As to the first point, I think it is obvious that there was a constructive total loss of the vessel; the argument advanced on that point seemed to me to answer itself. As to the point upon the notice of abandonment, it is admitted that the plaintiffs gave no such notice to the defendants, but the policy is entered into between subsequent insurers, who under it became in their turn assured, and inasmuch as due notice was given by the owner to the first insurers, it seems to me that, according to the rules of insurance law, that is amply sufficient. Then comes the third question as to what is the subject-matter of this policy, and on this point we must again remember that it is a reinsurance policy entered into by reinsurers. It is still, I think, a policy upon the ship; but then comes the question of what is the plaintiffs' interest in the ship. It is true that they have no interest as owners, but it is clear that they have an insurable interest, and it is equally clear that that interest is the loss which they might suffer under their policy of insurance. Now supposing they had insured this ship to its full value, their loss might then be more than the full value, by reason of their having to pay something under the sue and labour clause, and therefore the interest they would have at risk would be the amount which they might have to pay under their policy. If, therefore, they had insured themselves in this policy to the full amount and more of the sum for which they were themselves insurers, then I should not have said that they were over-insured, their interest at risk being what I have stated. What they have insured then is the interest which they have at risk, but to what extent? Only to the extent of 1000*l.*; they stand their own insurers as to any excess. If that be the nature of this policy, then the plaintiffs cannot recover more than 100 per cent. of the amount for which they insured. The plaintiffs, therefore, are entitled to recover 1000*l.* under this policy, and they cannot recover more unless the sue and labour clause is applicable. That brings me to consider and construe the sue and labour clause in such a case as this, in a policy of reinsurance upon a policy of reinsurance. By the terms of the clause it shall be lawful under the policy for the assured, "their factors, servants, and assigns, to sue labour," &c. It was the difficult question raised as to the meaning of this clause in this policy that made us hesitate about giving judgment at once. Speaking for myself, I should be anxious to give it the largest possible interpretation, so that where there has in fact been a suing and labouring which has been advantageous to every insurer, the assured might be held entitled to recover under this clause. But here the actual suing and labouring was not done by the plaintiffs themselves, but by the underwriters of Lloyd's Association, who were not employed by them, and who were not their "factors, servants, or assigns." If the word "agents" had been used, I should have hesitated still more in coming to this conclusion; but the words used are those of the common form, and are not, I think, wholly sufficient to cover this particular loss in a reinsurance policy upon a reinsurance policy. The judgment must therefore be varied to this extent, that the plaintiffs must have judgment for 1000*l*. This point was scarcely glanced at in the argument before the learned judge, and substantially the respondents have succeeded on the appeal. We therefore dismiss the appeal with costs.

Cotton, L.J.—I agree.—There have been two principal contentions put forward on the part of the appellants: first, that they are not liable at all; secondly, that if they are liable, they are only liable to the extent of the 88 per cent. paid to the original insurers, I will add nothing to what has been said about the total loss, in my opinion it is clear that there was a total loss. Then it was said that notice of abandonment ought to have been given to the defendants, but in my opinion there was no need to do so; notice of abandonment was given to the original insurers, but they did not accept it; they could not give such notice to any other persons without accepting the abandonment. The defendants, therefore, are liable for something, and in order to see for what we must look at the contract. Now the policy is a policy of reinsurance applying to policies issued by the French company, "subject to the same terms, clauses, and conditions as the original policies, and to pay as may be paid thereon, but to cover the risk of total loss only." The conditions show that this was an insurance upon a ship effected by persons whose interest in the ship was not as owners; but, as having this interest, that they were liable upon the policies issued by them to a certain extent upon the ships mentioned in the list. Therefore I agree with the Master of the Rolls, that the liability of the defendants is for 1000*l*. The words "to pay as may be paid thereon" have been relied on to limit that liability to the 88 per cent. paid to the original insurer, but in my opinion they have not that effect, they only provide that the defendants are to repay the plaintiffs whatever they may have had to pay under their policies, subject only to a total loss occurring. Total loss has occurred, and they are liable to pay to the extent of 100 per cent.—that is 1000*l*.—for everything which the plaintiffs properly paid under their policy. I will not go again through the argument raised upon the sue and labour clause. In my opinion that clause is not so framed as to make the acts of the underwriters at Lloyd's the acts of the French company, and no additional burden can be made out of that clause beyond the 1000*l*.

Lindley, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. Several questions have been discussed. The first point that there was, in fact, no total loss fails; when one looks at the figures it becomes too clear for argument. Upon the second point, that there was no notice of abandonment to the defendants, it seems settled law that no notice is necessary in such cases. There is an American decision in a case of Hastie v. De Peyster (3 Caines, N. Y. 190), in which Kent, C.J. and Livingstone, J. so decided in carefully reasoned judgments, and since then it has been accepted as law, though the point is not very familiar in this country. The plaintiffs, therefore, are entitled to recover something, the question is how much? They sue to recover 112 per cent., being the 88 per cent. they paid as for a total loss, and the remainder which they paid under the sue and labour clause in the policy. In this policy there are three clauses to be considered: the first is that by which the policy is expressed to be upon a ship to the extent of 1000*l*.; the second is a special clause as to this being a policy of reinsurance; and the third is the sue and labour clause. It seems to me that but for the second clause the case would stand thus, that the plaintiffs would only be entitled to recover 88 per cent., that is in respect of the total loss; they do not bring themselves within the sue and labour clause for the reasons given by the Master of the Rolls, and I do not think they would have done so even if the word "agents" had been used; but the special clause to which I have alluded gives them a right to recover all their risk incurred, and everything which they have paid under the French policy up to 100 per cent.

Judgment varied.

Marine insurance—Insurance against absolute total loss—Constructive total loss becoming absolute total loss—Mortgagees—Insurable interest.

When mortgagees of a ship by agreement with their mortgagors effect an insurance on the ship at the mortgagors' expense and hold the policy as part of their security, they have an insurable interest entitling them to sue on the policy, even if their mortgage has been paid off, where they have been compelled to pay to the mortgagors the value of the ship by reason of some default on their part, and the mortgagors have ceded to them their rights under the policy upon receipt of such payment.

A policy against absolute total loss only covers any such loss of the thing insured as is sufficiently complete to entitle the owners to recover without notice of abandonment, and hence where a ship is driven ashore, and by the continuous action of the perils of the seas becomes a total loss, the assured are entitled to recover, even though the ship were at the time of being driven ashore a constructive total loss only.

The mortgagees of a ship agreed with the mortgagors to effect an insurance on the ship at the mortgagors' expense, the policy to be held by them as part of their security. After the ship had sailed, the mortgagees effected an insurance against absolute total loss only. On the voyage the ship was driven ashore in a gale, and, having become a constructive total loss, notice of abandonment was given by the mortgagees to the underwriters. The mortgagors immediately gave notice that they would look to the mortgagees as if they were their underwriters for a full insurance, and recovered from them the full value of the ship. The ship remained for two months exposed to the perils of the sea, when she became a complete wreck, and was then sold without prejudice to the rights of the parties. After the sale, but before this action, the mortgage was paid off. The mortgagors ceded to the mortgagees their rights under the policy when they were paid the full value of the ship.

Held, in an action by the mortgagees against the underwriters claiming for an absolute total loss, that the mortgagees, though their mortgage had been paid off, had still an insurable interest in the ship; and, secondly, that, as the ship when sold had become an absolute total loss from perils which were continuous, the plaintiffs were entitled to recover.

This was an action upon a policy of insurance on a ship for 1000*l.*, the insurance being against the risk of absolute total loss only.

The case was tried before Mathew, J., without a jury, when the learned judge reserved judgment.

The facts and arguments are fully stated in the judgment.

Cur. adv. vult.

Jan. 24.—Mathew, J.—In this case the plaintiffs sought to recover for a total loss upon a policy of marine insurance alleged to have been entered into with them upon a vessel called the Ardenlea. The policy was in a peculiar form, namely, against absolute total loss only, and the question raised as to the meaning of the policy was one which, so far as I know, had not before been made the subject of discussion in a court of law. Now, the circumstances which gave rise to the action were shortly these:—Messrs. Levy, the plaintiffs, towards the end of the year 1881, had agreed with the firm of Carrara and Co. to advance the sum of 2000*l.* upon a mortgage of the vessel in question, and the advance was to be secured by two bills of the mortgagors, payable at six months and twelve months, for 1000*l.* each, and it was further agreed that the plaintiffs should effect an insurance upon the ship with their own underwriters, but at the expense of the mortgagors. It was intended in the ordinary course that the policy should be held by the mortgagees as part of their security. Now, the Ardenlea was an old ship. She had had some repairs done to her shortly before at Greenock, and had been purchased by the Messrs. Carrara for 2500*l.* It was intended that she should go in ballast from Greenock to Cardiff; that at Cardiff she should take on board a cargo of coals, and proceed to Gibraltar; and that when she reached Gibraltar she should be dismantled, and used from that time forward as a hulk. It is hardly necessary to say that an insurance on such a vessel is not very readily effected; and the only quotation that the plaintiffs obtained from their underwriters was one of 8*l.* 8*s.* per cent. for that voyage. Now, owing to an unfortunate mistake of their brokers, the plaintiffs were under the impression that they were entitled to look upon the ship as covered with the underwriters for an insurance for the voyage at that rate; they were mistaken, and, labouring under the mistake, they informed Messrs. Carrara that the ship was covered, and Messrs. Carrara sent the vessel to sea under the impression that that representation was correct. As a matter of fact the insurance had not been effected by their brokers, and all that the plaintiffs were able to do was to effect an insurance against absolute total loss upon the ship upon the voyage from Greenock to Cardiff at the rate of 40*s.* per cent. What occurred to the vessel was this: She sailed from Greenock about the 19th Nov., and shortly after she got to sea she encountered a serious gale; she came into collision with a steamer, and was ultimately, as is detailed by the protest, driven ashore, and no doubt most seriously damaged. The position in which the plaintiffs found themselves was one of considerable difficulty. Messrs. Carrara at once gave them notice that they intended to look to them as if they were their underwriters upon the ship, because they said the ship had been sent to sea upon a representation made to them by the plaintiffs that she was fully protected by insurance, and the plaintiffs had some difficulty in determining how they would act under the circumstances. But, when the plaintiffs found that Messrs. Carrara insisted upon the view that they had taken, they placed themselves in communication with the underwriters, and did what appears to me to have been the best in the interests of all parties with reference to the insurance. I may say that Messrs. Carrara ultimately established the position they took in the first instance, and succeeded in recovering, by a judgment of the Court of Appeal, from the present plaintiffs the full value of the ship. Notice of abandonment was given to the defendants, and the defendants took steps to ascertain what was the condition of the ship, and in the result the plaintiffs and the defendants came to the conclusion, as I am satisfied, that the ship, as she lay immediately after the stranding, was a constructive total loss. The ship remained from November to January exposed to the perils insured against, and in January, after the original injury to the ship had been seriously aggravated and increased by the perils to which she was exposed, by the consent of the plaintiffs and defendants, but without prejudice to their respective rights, she was sold, as the only thing possible to be done with her under the circumstances. It is only necessary to say further that the plaintiffs, who held the bills of Messrs. Carrara for the amount of their advance, were paid the amount of their bills as they became due. At the time the vessel was sold they were still mortgagees. At the time when the action was brought they had indemnified Messrs. Carrara for the loss of the ship, but their mortgage had been paid off in the way that I have described.

It was contended for the defence that the plaintiff could not recover on two grounds—first, from the absence of an insurable interest; and, secondly, that there was no absolute total loss within the meaning of the policy. Upon the first point, it was said that the insurance must be taken to have been effected to protect the mortgagees, or the mortgagors, or both. If for the mortgagees, it was urged that their mortgage had been paid off, and therefore their interest was extinguished. If for the mortgagors, it was urged that the insurance was not in fact what the mortgagors had authorised, and that therefore the underwriters were not liable. If for both, the result, it was said, must be the same, for what protected neither interest could not protect both. Now, I think it clear that the insurance was intended to cover, and did cover, the interest of both the mortgagees and the mortgagors. The policy in terms covered the ship, and it was not necessary that the nature of the interest which was intended to be covered should be stated. There is no ground, it seems to me, for the contention that the mortgagors did not sanction an insurance as between them and the defendants. They insisted, as they were entitled to do, that the plaintiffs were, under the circumstances, liable to indemnify them for the loss of their ship, and they agreed to cede to the plaintiffs their claim to the proceeds of the insurance, in order to enable them to acquit themselves of their loss. In other words, they were willing that the plaintiffs, as their underwriters, should succeed to all their rights under the policy against the defendants, but they never intended to exonerate the underwriters from their liability, as is clear from the correspondence, and particularly from their letter to the plaintiffs of the 7th Dec. 1881. It is true that the plaintiffs refused in the first instance to admit that they were bound to indemnify the mortgagors; but, having been compelled to pay them the value of the ship, they accepted their proposal for the transfer to them of the mortgagors' interest and policy, and I see no ground, either in law or in equity, on which the defendants can complain of what has been done. The objection, therefore, that there was no insurable interest appears to me to fail the defendants.

The other ground of defence was that there was no absolute total loss within the meaning of the policy. It was said that, as the vessel survived her first disaster, the defendants were not liable. Several witnesses, who were experts in the business of underwriters were called by the defendants to prove that the words "absolute total loss" had a customary meaning, namely, the total annihilation of the subject of the insurance; but the witnesses, in my judgment, failed to show that the words had any other than their ordinary meaning. The witnesses appeared to me to be stating their opinion as to the meaning of the insurance, and their view of the intention with which the particular form of words had been adopted by underwriters, and not the result of their experience as to any conventional meaning of the word "absolute." The policy must, therefore, be construed without the help of any proof of usage to explain its meaning. It seems to me that in the policy in question the phrase "absolute total loss" is meant to be contrasted with "constructive total loss," and that the underwriters intended to be exempt from losses which were not actually but only technically total. It is clear, with reference to a risk of this description, the underwriters would be prudent to insist upon absolute proof of loss, and to protect themselves from the speculative questions to which a notice of abandonment might give rise—first, as to the extent and cost of repairs; and, secondly, as to the value of the ship when repaired. Accordingly, it seems to me that the underwriters meant to restrict their liability to a destruction of the ship so complete as would entitle the owners to recover whether a notice of abandonment had been given or not. In this case the vessel was stranded in the month of November, and upon the evidence before me I am satisfied that she was then a constructive total loss, but that a notice of abandonment would be necessary, or at any rate would be prudent, if the plaintiffs intended to recover under a policy for a total loss, that policy being in the ordinary form. Here the vessel remained exposed to the perils insured against down to the 17th Jan. following, when she was sold, as she lay with her gear and tackle. She was stripped by the purchaser, and it did not appear that to the purchaser the bill was of any value whatever. It seems to me that when she was sold she had become a complete wreck, and to repair her would be practically to rebuild her. Her timbers, no doubt, held together, but she was no longer a ship. She was in the condition to entitle the owner to claim for a total loss without abandonment: (Cambridge v. Anderton, 2 B. & C. 691). The only mode of turning what was left of her to account was to sell her as she lay. It was not practicable to restore her to her former character as a sea-going ship. This seems to me to be the legitimate inference from the documentary evidence before me, and no witnesses were called by the defendants to rebut this inference. It was contended by the defendants that, as the ship was in the first instance a constructive total loss only, the liability of the underwriters had ended, and that subsequent loss by perils insured against was not covered by the policy. But if this were so, and the vessel had been knocked to pieces the day after she stranded, or if she foundered in the attempt to get her off, the plaintiffs would have had no claim under the policy. This could not have been intended, and was, in view of the matter, repudiated even by the witnesses who were called by the defendants. It was further suggested that, if the original loss grew into an absolute loss, that result was due to the neglect and default of the plaintiffs, and that, therefore, the defendants were not liable. The only neglect charged upon the plaintiffs was their failure to have the vessel removed to a place of safety. But, even if it were clear this could have been done, it could only have been accomplished at an expense which no prudent owner would have incurred, for, when she was got to a place of safety, the cost of repairs, added to the cost of getting her off, would have exceeded probably by a large amount her value when repaired. The plaintiffs were not bound to throw away their money. They were not called upon to do anything that a prudent owner would not have done, and the removal of the vessel from where she lay was not what any prudent owner would have attempted. I think that the vessel became a wreck from perils which were continuous, or, at any rate, recurrent in their operation from the time she stranded, and the effects of which could not be averted by any means which the plaintiffs could reasonably have adopted. The principle of insurance law applicable to the case appears to me to be illustrated by the decisions of Mullett v. Shedden (13 East, 304) and Stringer v. The English and Scottish Marine Insurance Company (L. Rep. 4 Q.B. 676; on appeal, 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 440; 22 L. T. Rep. N.S. 802; L. Rep. 5 Q. B. 599). The loss, in my judgment, ultimately became an absolute total loss within the meaning of the policy, and I therefore think that the plaintiffs are entitled to recover. My judgment is for the amount of the policy, with interest from the date of the sale.

SCARAMANGA AND OTHERS v. MARTIN MARQUAND AND CO. (a)

Charter-party—Negligent navigation by shipowner's servants—Cargo in part salved—Salvage expenses—Payment of salvage expenses by underwriters—Right of owner of cargo to recover amount of expenses against shipowner.

The plaintiffs under a charter-party shipped a large quantity of rye on board one of the defendants' ships, to be carried from the port of T. to the port of A. Owing to the negligent navigation of the defendants' servants the ship was cast ashore, and a large quantity of the rye was lost; but a considerable quantity was saved by the Salvage Association, who were employed by the underwriters of the cargo with the assent of the defendants. The average statement was prepared, and the sum assessed was agreed to by the plaintiffs, and the Salvage Association were paid by the underwriters the expenses claimed by them. The plaintiffs brought their action to recover the amount of the salvage expenses so paid by the underwriters. The plaintiffs recovered a verdict for an amount to be settled out of court. The question of law involved in the case was reserved for further consideration. The defendants contended that they were not liable because the plaintiffs themselves had not paid the expenses, and the payment under the circumstances was voluntary.

Held, on further consideration, that the plaintiffs were entitled to recover the amount of the salvage expenses, as, without their being incurred, the remainder of the cargo could not have been sent to its destination, which was for the benefit of the defendants, and that the payment under the circumstances was not voluntary.

THIS was an action tried before Huddleston, B. in which the plaintiffs sought to recover two sums, first, for the non-delivery of a large quantity of rye shipped on board the steamship Earl of Dumfries, belonging to the defendants, and chartered by the plaintiffs; and, secondly, for the proportion of charges and expenses claimed by the Salvage Association in respect of the cargo as adjusted by the average statements. Owing to the course adopted during the argument it is unnecessary to refer at any greater detail to the first point.

The material facts appear sufficiently in the judgment of the learned judge.

C. Russell, Q.C. and Barnes, for the plaintiffs, moved for judgment.

The Solicitor-General (Sir F. Herschell, Q.C.), Finlay, Q.C. and Bucknill, for the defendants. —The second point in dispute between the plaintiffs and defendants is the claim of the former for "proportion of charges and expenses claimed from the plaintiffs in respect of the cargo as per average statement." There are two answers to that claim: A person who sues in respect of a breach of contract for money paid must prove that he has paid or is under an obligation to pay it. The plaintiffs have not paid the money nor were they under any obligation to pay it. This money was paid by the underwriters of the cargo, by whom the salvage expenses were incurred, and not by the plaintiffs. In fact, the underwriters are trying to recover from the shipowners the moneys paid by them for the salvage of the cargo. If the plaintiffs had salved the cargo themselves they might have recovered, but there is no privity of contract between the defendants and the underwriters. Again, the correspondence between the parties shows that this money was paid by the underwriters in respect of matters for which the plaintiffs have admitted their liability to pay. It is a voluntary payment and cannot be recovered.

G. Barnes in reply.—The underwriters having paid this amount to the Salvage Association under their policy of insurance, could clearly be subrogated to the rights of the plaintiffs, who have a claim against the shipowners for the negligence of their master:

North of England Iron Steamship Insurance Association v. Armstrong and others, 21 L. T. Rep. N. S. 822; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 330; L. Rep. 5 Q.B. 244.

The residue of this cargo could not have been sent to its destination except at the expenditure of the amount claimed. The plaintiffs are damnified to that amount. The defendants were bound to forward the cargo. The Salvage Association are called in, and save the rest of the cargo. The plaintiffs admit that this action is brought on behalf of the underwriters, but that does not prevent them from recovering. As to the other point, the average adjustment was made at the instance of the defendants, and the money has been paid. This was not a voluntary payment, and it left untouched the ultimate liability of the defendants for the negligence of their captain.

Cur. adv. vult.

April 1.—HUDDLESTON, B.—This action was brought by the plaintiffs upon a charter-party and bill of lading against the defendants, who were owners of the ship, for default in delivery of a large quantity of rye which had been shipped at Taganrog for Altona by the Earl of Dumfries. The Earl of Dumfries was wrecked on the voyage off the coast of Portugal, and the jury, after a long inquiry, found that that was occasioned by the negligence of the defendants' master. The questions raised on further consideration were with reference to the damages. They divided themselves into two heads, the one the actual loss of a portion of the rye, the other as to the expenses incurred in saving the remainder. I have to decide upon the principle; the amount under each head is to be settled by agreement out of court. With reference to the loss of the rye actually incurred, the defendants alleged that the plaintiffs were not entitled to recover at all, or, in any event, not beyond nominal damages, because they had sold the rye to one Lichtenstein, who again had sold it to Schutt and Co., of Berlin, who were assignees of the bill of lading and of the policy of insurance, and that therefore the property had passed out of the plaintiffs and was vested in the vendees. The plaintiffs contended that they were trustees for others, and, as the contract of sale from them to Lichtenstein and Schütt was at a fixed price "sound delivered," the risk of sound delivery was still the plaintiffs', and gave them an interest and right to sue. It will not become necessary to decide these points, as letters were produced from the vendee and the sub-vendee authorising the plaintiffs to join them as plaintiffs, and I should do so if necessary.

The other question as to the salvage expenses arose in this way: The underwriters had as was usual in such cases, employed the Salvage Association with the assent of the defendants, the correspondence showing that the defendants gave instructions, and were continually in communication with the Salvage Association, who sent out a steamship, the Queensferry, and rescued a large portion of the cargo, and, though the expenses were very heavy, there was a large margin of rye saved beyond what those expenses would amount to. Kroeplin was Schütt's agent at Hamburgh, and the defendants delivered through Slowman, their agent, to Kroeplin the whole of the rye saved from the Earl of Dumfries. Before doing so they required and received from Kroeplin through Slowman a deposit of 50,000 marks to answer general average and charges under an agreement undertaking to pay not only freight but general average. The average statement was prepared by an average stater at Hamburgh; the Salvage Association were paid their claim by the underwriters of the cargo, and the defendants deducted from the 50,000 marks the balance between the payment so made to the Salvage Association and the amount adjusted, and returned the residue to the plaintiffs through Slowman. The defendants contended that, as it had not been paid by the plaintiffs, the plaintiffs could not recover. It is clear that the remainder of the rye could not have been sent to its destination without these expenses which were incurred in consequence of the defendants' master's negligence, and were for the benefit of the defendants. If the rye had been completely lost they would have been obliged to have paid the full amount of the loss to the plaintiffs; and if the plaintiffs had paid this money they could have recovered it from the underwriters, and the underwriters upon payment would be subrogated into the rights of the insured as against the defendants (Dickinson v. Jardine, L. Rep. 3 C. P. 639), and as the underwriters could recover from the defendants through the plaintiffs for the value of the goods lost, so they can for the amount of the salvage expenses paid. The Salvage Association, having a lien upon the salvage could have compelled Schütt to pay them those expenses before delivery of the rye. Schütt on payment could have recovered that amount from Lichtenstein, and Lichtenstein from the plaintiffs, and the plaintiffs could have recovered it from the underwriters, who could have sued the defendants in the plaintiff's name, and, to avert this circuity of payments, the sum was paid in the first instance by the underwriters of the cargo and the Salvage Association with the assent of all the parties.

It was further contended that inasmuch as the amount had been paid under an agreement, that it was a voluntary payment, and could not be recovered back. It is quite clear that that agreement was an arrangement merely to adjust the general average and not the question of ultimate liability, and was subject to the defendants' liability for the negligence of their captain. If the question of such liability had not been raised (as it would seem from the correspondence at that time not to have been) the money would have been paid under a mistake of fact and so would be recoverable. I am therefore of opinion that the plaintiffs are entitled to recover both for the rye actually lost and for the salvage expenses, and I give judgment for the plaintiffs with costs for the amounts to be settled out of court.

The Leptir. (a)

Wages action—Owners of cargo—Freight—Abandonment—Salvage.

Where a salving ship takes a crew off a vessel in distress and puts men on board of her, refusing to allow her own crew to return, and the two vessels are in company navigated into port, there is no such abandonment of the ship as to put an end to the contract of carriage, and consequently there will be freight due upon the consignees requiring delivery of the cargo, such freight being pro ratâ, assuming the port not to be the port to which the cargo ought to have been taken under the contract of carriage.

This was a wages action instituted in rem on the 2nd July 1884 by two able seamen and a steward against the Austrian brig Leptir and her freight.

A warrant of arrest was issued, and the vessel was arrested at Cardiff, her cargo being also arrested for freight. The owners of the Leptir did not appear.

At the time when the plaintiffs were earning the wages claimed, the ship was chartered from Hayti to Queenstown or Falmouth for orders for a port in the United Kingdom, or on the Continent between Bordeaux and Hamburg. During the performance of this charter-party, the Leptir met with severe weather, and was brought into Cardiff by salvors, who subsequently instituted a salvage action on the 27th May.

After the vessel's arrival at Cardiff, the owners of cargo at once applied for delivery of the cargo to them at Cardiff, without payment of freight, but the shipowners and the salvors both refused to accede to this request. The owners of cargo thereupon took out a summons, in the action instituted by the salvors, for the release of the cargo, and an order was made for such release upon bail being given in respect of the salvage services. The cargo, however, was not in fact released from arrest at the time when the present wages action was instituted, viz., on July 2, 1884.

On the 18th July the owners of the cargo entered an appearance in the wages action, and issued a summons for the release of their cargo.

At the hearing of this summons, the judge ordered the cargo to be released, and ordered the solicitors for the owners of the cargo to give an undertaking either to bring into court the freight if any due, or to give bail for the amount thereof.

There was no appearance on behalf of the owners of ship, and the plaintiffs having in due course filed their statement of claim, the action as against the ship came on by default, when judgment was given for the plaintiffs, but their claim could not be satisfied out of the ship, the proceeds of which had been consumed in paying the claims of the salvors. The plaintiffs therefore sought to recover their wages against the freight in the hands of the cargo owners, and for this purpose served them with the statement of claim, with a notice that they delivered the claim for the purpose of raising the question whether freight was or was not due.

The plaintiffs by their statement of claim, after stating that they had served on board the Leptir and earned wages, alleged as follows: "On the 3rd July the said ship was in Cardiff, and there was then and still is due and owing in respect of the time when the plaintiffs were serving as aforesaid, or part thereof, freight for the carriage of cargo in the said ship," and they claimed in addition to their wages ten days double pay, wages until the date of final settlement, and the expenses of their proceeding to their respective homes.

The owners of cargo delivered a defence alleging that,

2. In or about the month of May 1884 the Leptir, laden with a cargo of logwood, and bound from Hayti to Queenstown or Falmouth for orders, was towed into Cardiff by the Russian barque Pehr Brahe, which had picked up the Leptir at sea a derelict.

3. There was not at the commencement of this action, nor is there now, any freight due from the now pleading defendants as owners of the said cargo in respect of the same.

5. The now pleading defendants say alternatively that the abandonment of the Leptir by the plaintiff, and the rest of the crew was wrong and unjustifiable, and that on that ground no wages became due and payable to the plaintiffs in respect of the said voyage.

At the hearing of the action the following evidence was given by one of the plaintiffs in support of the claim:

The brig Leptir having left Hayti with a cargo of logwood on the 11th April 1884, bound to Queenstown for orders, began to make a considerable quantity of water on and after April 30. In consequence of the pumps being choked thirty tons of cargo were thrown overboard, and the forehold was bailed out with buckets. On the 8th May the Russian barque Pehr Brahe being sighted, signals were hoisted, and a consultation was held as to what should be done, but nothing was said to the crew as to leaving the Leptir. On coming up with the Pehr Brahe the Leptir's master was taken on board the Russian barque in the Leptir's boat. The master of the Leptir then ordered the boat to return and fetch the crew, but not to bring any clothes or baggage. The crew of the Leptir were then taken on board the Pehr Brahe. On the next morning the mate of the Leptir asked the master of the Russian barque to be allowed to return to the Leptir, the crew all being ready and willing to do so. The master of the Pehr Brahe refused permission, but shortly afterwards sent four of his own men and their clothes on board the Leptir. In consequence of this the master and mate of the Leptir quarrelled with the master of the Pehr Brahe. The two vessels proceeded for England, keeping in company with one another and in sight until the night prior to the vessels arriving at Cardiff, when the Leptir was lost sight of in consequence of heavy weather. During the voyage the crew of the Leptir assisted in working the Pehr Brahe in the place of those who had gone on board the Leptir, and were paid by the master of the Pehr Brahe for so doing. On the 24th May the vessels arrived at Cardiff, when the master and crew of the Leptir immediately proceeded to their vessel, which they found flying the Russian national flag. The Russians refused to allow them to board the Leptir. The master, however, succeeded in getting on board, but was forcibly ejected by the Russians. Later on the same day the Leptir's crew were allowed, through the intervention of the Austrian consul, to go on board her. The Leptir was arrested in a salvage action on the 27th May, her cargo being then on board of her. The Russians then left her.

In cross-examination the witness admitted that when he left the Leptir she was in considerable peril, and that some of the crew brought their effects on board the Russian barque.

J. P. Aspinall, on behalf of the plaintiffs, submitted that there was no such abandonment of the ship as put an end to the contract of carriage, and that the shipowners were entitled to freight under the contract, as the goods had been delivered at a port within the words of the contract; or in any event to pro ratâ freight, and that the owners of cargo were not entitled to their goods without payment of freight for the carriage thereof. [He was then stopped by the Court.]

Bucknill for the defendants, the owners of cargo. —No freight is due from the cargo owners to the shipowner, because there was an abandonment by the master and crew of the Leptir. On the evidence it is submitted that when the crew left the Leptir they had the intention of abandoning her. The witness called on behalf of the plaintiffs has admitted that some of the Leptir's crew had their effects ready to take off the ship, and that some of them did in fact take them on board the Russian barque. [BUTT, J.—If the evidence were that the crew packed up everything they possessed, it might perhaps show that they had the intention of abandoning their vessel, assuming they had fallen in with no other ship, but not if another ship came up, as was the fact.] Assuming there to have been an abandonment, on the authority of The Cito (45 L. T. Rep. N. S. 663; 4 Asp. Mar. Cas. 468; 7 P. Div. 5), no freight is due. [BUTT, J.—I do not intend to carry The Cito a step further than it has gone. Moreover, the abandonment must be justifiable to be within the case of The Cito; and can it be said that the Russian barque being there ready and willing to assist, an abandonment under such circumstances could be justifiable?] But if the seamen improperly abandoned the ship, they have forfeited their wages. [BUTT, J.—Is that so if they abandon with the consent of the master?] In this case the evidence shows that they intended to abandon whether he consented or not.

BUTT, J.—I am very clearly of opinion in this case that on the facts there was no abandonment of this ship within the proper meaning of the word, and therefore the case of The Cito (ubi sup.) does not apply. But, as I said before, I should be strongly inclined to say that, even if there had been an abandonment without any intention on the part of the crew to return and save the vessel, yet, having regard to the fact that the Russian barque was willing to assist, such an abandonment would have been so improper that the cargo-owners would have been entitled to recover damages against the shipowner for the wrongful act of his crew, which assumes therefore that the contract of affreightment was not thereby put an end to. That being so, it follows that some freight is due. I leave out of consideration what the amount is, and I pronounce for the claims, referring the amount to the registrar to ascertain what is due to the plaintiffs. The freight, which is pro ratâ, is, I suppose, a heavy freight. I pronounce for the plaintiffs' claim with costs.

THE OWNERS, MASTER, AND CREW OF THE STEAMSHIP GLENAVON v. THE OWNERS OF THE CARGO ON THE STEAMSHIP GLENFRUIN.

THE GLENFRUIN. (a)

Salvage—Cargo owners—Contract of carriage—Warranty of seaworthiness—Bill of lading—Excepted perils.

The warranty of seaworthiness implied in a bill of lading is an absolute warranty that the ship shall be in fact fit for the voyage, and not merely that the shipowner shall take all reasonable care to make her so fit; and hence a latent defect in the screw-shaft existing prior to the commencement of the voyage, and resulting in the breaking of the shaft, is a breach of the shipowner's warranty of seaworthiness, although the shipowner may have taken all reasonable precaution in the selection of the shaft.

The excepted perils in a bill of lading have no application to the case of a ship sailing in an unseaworthy condition; and hence they are no defence to an action brought for loss or damage to the charterer's goods occasioned by such unseaworthiness.

Where a screw-steamship carrying cargo under a bill of lading containing the exception "accidents of the seas and of navigation," becomes disabled through her main shaft breaking in consequence of a latent defect in existence prior to the sailing of the vessel, and another vessel belonging to the same owners renders salvage services, such owners are precluded from recovering salvage against the cargo by reason of the services becoming necessary through the breach of their warranty of seaworthiness. In these circumstances the right of the crew of the salving ship to recover for the services is not affected by such unseaworthiness; but the owners of the cargo, having to pay such salvage, are entitled to recover by way of counterclaim, from such of the plaintiffs as are owners of the salved ship, the full amount which they, the owners of cargo, have to pay to the crew for salvage; and the same rule applies to the case of an owner of a salving ship who is not also the owner of the salved ship.

THIS was a salvage action instituted in personam by the owners, master, and crew of the steamship Glenavon, against the owners of the cargo laden on board the steamship Glenfruin, for salvage services rendered thereto.

The Glenavon was an iron screw-steamship of 2985 tons gross register, with engines working up to 2650 horse-power, and was manned by a crew of sixty-six hands. At the time the salvage services were rendered she was on a voyage from Japan and China to New York laden with a cargo of tea.

The Glenfruin was at the time the services were rendered on a voyage from Hankow to London, laden with a cargo of tea. The value of the Glenfruin and her freight was 70,000*l.*, and of her cargo 158,000*l.* Sixty-two sixty-fourth shares in the Glenavon and sixty-two sixty-fourth shares in the Glenfruin were owned by the same nineteen persons. The remaining two sixty-fourth shares in the Glenavon were held by a Mr. William Houston, and the remaining two sixty-fourth shares in the Glenfruin by another gentleman.

The facts alleged on behalf of the plaintiffs were as follows:—On the 18th June 1884 the Glenfruin had broken her main shaft, and on the 26th June, at about noon, she being then in the Indian Ocean about 2°22′ N. lat. and 68°39′ E. long., she was observed by those on board the Glenavon flying signals for assistance. On the Glenavon coming up with the Glenfruin it was discovered that the breakdown of the Glenfruin's machinery was due to a fracture in the screw-shaft. After the breakdown, efforts had been made to repair the shaft, and an engineer from the Glenavon went on board the Glenfruin to render assistance. On the morning of the 27th June the Glenavon began to tow the Glenfruin, and continued so doing until the 2nd July, when the repairs to the shaft of the Glenfruin were completed and her engines set ahead. It being uncertain whether the repairs would hold, it was agreed that the Glenavon should stay by the Glenfruin until she had passed Cape Guardafui. On the 4th July Guardafui was passed, and at noon on the 5th, as the Glenfruin's engines continued to work well, and Aden was only 350 miles distant, the Glenavon parted company and proceeded on her voyage. The Glenfruin eventually reached London in safety. The towage extended over about 900 miles, and the weather was fine during the rendering of the services.

The defendants by their statement of defence alleged as follows:

4. The cargo laden on board the Glenfruin at the time mentioned in the statement of claim was so laden by or for the several owners thereof, the defendants, on the terms of certain contracts by bills of lading then entered into between the plaintiffs, the owners of the steamship Glenavon and the defendants (or the shippers of the respective goods who endorsed the bills of lading to the defendants and thereby passed the property in the goods respectively to the defendants), whereby the plaintiffs contracted to carry the said cargo to London, and there deliver it to the defendants on payment of freight, and the act of the said plaintiffs in towing and assisting the Glenfruin, as alleged, was done only in fulfilment of their said contracts, as aforesaid, to carry her cargo to London, or for the purpose of enabling their own vessel to earn the freight on the said cargo, or for the purpose of avoiding their liability for the non-delivery of the said cargo to the defendants at London aforesaid, or for the sake of bringing their own vessel (which had put to sea in an unseaworthy condition) safe into port, and was in any case an act done for the sole behalf and advantage of the said plaintiffs, and was not, so far as the said plaintiffs are concerned, a salvage service.

5. The cargo of the Glenfruin was also laden on board her under the said contracts on the terms that the said vessel should be seaworthy for the voyage, and the defendants say that the said vessel, the Glenfruin, was not seaworthy for the said voyage, and was not reasonably fit to carry the said cargo to its destination at the time when she sailed on the said voyage, in this, that the screw-shaft of the said vessel was defective, unsound, and in improper condition and improperly fitted, and in consequence thereof, and for no other cause, the shaft broke down, and the upper part of the bearing in the immediate proximity of the shaft broke away, and the Glenfruin became in need of and received the assistance of the Glenavon, as in the statement of claim set out, and the said plaintiffs are not entitled to make any claim upon the defendants in respect of the said assistance.

6. Under the circumstances aforesaid the plaintiffs, the owners of the steamship Glenavon, or such of them as were and are owners of the Glenfruin, are not entitled to any salvage remuneration. The defendants also submit that any remuneration which the master and crew of the Glenavon are entitled to against them is of small amount, and that the defendants are entitled to recover the same from the plaintiffs, the owners of the Glenavon, or some of them, by way of counter-claim, as hereinafter stated.

By way of counter-claim against the plaintiffs, the owners of the steamship Glenavon, or such of them as were also the owners of the Glenfruin:

1. The defendants have suffered damage by breaches of contract by bills of lading of the said cargo shipped thereunder on board the Glenfruin at Hankow by the defendants and signed by or for and on behalf of the said plaintiffs, or some of them; or alternatively, the said goods were supplied under the said bills of lading by various shippers at Hankow on board the Glenfruin, and which were signed as aforesaid and indorsed to the defendants to whom the property in the said goods thereby passed.

2. The plaintiffs (the shipowners) made default in delivery of the said goods respectively and only delivered the same subject to certain claims which they were bound to pay and discharge, and which they had not and have not paid or discharged, and which they have left the defendants liable to pay.

3. The said vessel Glenfruin was not seaworthy for the voyage on which the said goods were shipped, and not reasonably fit to carry the said goods to their destination at the time when she sailed on the said voyage in the respects mentioned in the fifth paragraph of the defence, and in consequence thereof the said shafting broke down and the bearing broke away, and the said vessel became in need of and received the assistance in the statement of claim mentioned.

Particulars of damage:

1. Whatever sum may be awarded to the master and crew of the Glenavon for salvage.

2. If the defendants are held liable to the owners of the Glenavon, or any of them, for any sum for salvage or other sums, the defendants claim such sum or sums from the plaintiffs, the owners of the Glenavon, or such of them as were also owners of the Glenfruin.

The defendants counter-claim:

Judgment for whatever sum or sums they are entitled to recover from the plaintiffs, the owners of the Glenavon, or any of them, and such further and other relief as the case may require.

The plaintiffs, by their reply, alleged as follows:

1. They join issue on so much of the statement of defence as does not consist of allegations contained in the statement of claim.

2. The plaintiffs, the owners of the Glenavon, say alternatively, that if they contracted as alleged in the fourth paragraph of the defence (which they deny), their act in towing and assisting the Glenfruin as alleged was not done in fulfilment of the said contract, or for the purpose of avoiding their liability for the non-delivery of the said cargo to the defendants at London. The plaintiffs also deny that the Glenfruin had put to sea in an unseaworthy condition.

3. The plaintiffs, the owners of the Glenavon, also say alternatively as aforesaid, that the Glenfruin was seaworthy for the said voyage and reasonably fit to carry the said cargo to its destination at the time when she sailed on the said voyage. The plaintiffs deny that the screw-shaft of the said vessel was defective, unsound, or in an improper condition or improperly fitted, and they deny that in consequence thereof the Glenfruin broke down as alleged.

4. Alternatively, the plaintiffs, the owners of the Glenavon, say that if they contracted to carry the said goods on board the Glenfruin, which they deny, they did so on the terms of certain bills of lading which excepted loss or damage from machinery and all and every the dangers and accidents of the seas and of navigation, of whatever nature or kind, and the plaintiffs say that the breaking of the shaft of the Glenfruin was an excepted peril within the meaning of the said bills of lading.

5. In the alternative, the Glenfruin, as a fact, broke down during the said voyage owing to the existence of a latent defect in her lower shaft, against the existence of which it was impossible to provide, and could not have been discovered by the exercise of any ordinary care, skill, prudence, and foresight, and of the existence of which the said plaintiffs were ignorant.

At the hearing of the action evidence was given on behalf of the plaintiffs as to the nature of the salvage services. It was also proved that the screw-shaft had been bought from a first-class firm, that the flaw was due to a latent defect which it would have been impossible to discover, and that the owners of the Glenfruin had used all reasonable diligence in the selection of the shaft.

Russell, Q.C., Cohen, Q.C., and Bucknill for the plaintiffs.—It is submitted that the implied warranty of seaworthiness is not an absolute warranty that the ship shall be in fact fit for the voyage, but only that the shipowner shall take all reasonable care to make her so fit. If the court is precluded by authority from so holding, the plaintiffs nevertheless contend that the warranty is modified by the terms of the bill of lading. By the contract contained in the bill of lading loss or damage caused by "the accidents of the seas and of navigation" is excepted. In the present case the liability of the defendants to pay salvage remuneration is due not only to the vessel's unseaworthiness, but to the unseaworthiness plus the state of the weather, which together made it necessary to take assistance, and so rendered the defendants liable to pay salvage. The loss of the defendants is therefore due to an accident of navigation:

Nugent v. Smith, 1 C. P. Div. 444; 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 198; 34 L. T. Rep. N. S. 827; Steel v. The State Line Steamship Company, 37 L. T. Rep. N. S. 333; 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 516; 3 App. Cas. 72.

In The Miranda (27 L. T. Rep. N. S. 389; L. Rep. 3 A. & E. 561; 1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 440), which was a case of salvage where the two ships belonged to the same owner and the assistance was rendered necessary owing to the salved ship having broken her screw-shaft, Sir Robert Phillimore awarded salvage as against the cargo. Where the shipowner has used all reasonable care and skill in the selection of the shaft, the fact of its breaking owing to a latent defect is an accident touching the motive power of the ship, and therefore an "accident of navigation" excusing the shipowner from all loss thereby caused:

Phillips v. Clark, 2 C. B. N. S. 156;
Lloyd v. General Iron Screw Collier Company, 10 L. T. Rep. N. S. 586; 2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 32; 3 H. & C. 284; Grill v. General Iron Screw Collier Company, 18 L. T. Rep. N. S. 485; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 77; L. Rep. 3 C. P. 476.

It may be contended by the defendants, on the authority of Steel v. State Line Steamship Company (ubi sup.), that the plaintiffs cannot avail themselves of the excepted perils, because they have no application to a ship sailing in an unseaworthy state. The decision of the House of Lords was, however, confined to the particular excepted perils in the bill of lading then under consideration. Moreover, in the present case the "accident of navigation" happened after the commencement of the voyage, whereas in Steel v. The State Line Steamship Company (ubi sup.) the cause of the damage was the negligence of the crew prior to the sailing of the ship.

Webster, Q.C., Tyser, and Barnes for the defendants.—The owners of the Glenfruin are liable to the owners of cargo for any loss occasioned by providing an unseaworthy ship, and they therefore are liable in respect of any salvage remuneration which may be due in respect of the services rendered to the cargo. The Miranda (ubi sup.) is not in point, inasmuch as Sir Robert Phillimore refrained from dealing with the question of unseaworthiness on the ground that no evidence had been given as to the vessel's condition when she sailed. Even assuming that case to be in point, it has since been overruled by subsequent decisions. The implied warranty of seaworthiness is an absolute warranty that the ship shall in fact be fit for the voyage:

Lyons v. Mells, 5 East, 428;
Kopitoff v. Wilson, 34 L. T. Rep. N. S. 677; 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 163; 1 Q. B. Div. 377;
Steel v. State Line Steamship Company (ubi sup).

The excepted perils in the bill of lading have no application to an unseaworthy ship, the unseaworthiness of which was the efficient cause of the loss:

Steel v. State Line Steamship Company (ubi sup)
Tattersall v. The National Steamship Company Limited, 50 L. T. Rep. N. S. 299; 12 Q. B. Div. 297; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 206.

According to the decision of the House of Lords all the exceptions in a bill of lading must be taken to refer to a period subsequent to the sailing of the ship.

Cur. adv. vult.

March 31.—BUTT, J.—The plaintiffs are the owners, master, and crew of the steamship Glenavon, of 2385 tons gross register, manned by a crew of sixty-six hands. The defendants are the owners of the cargo laden on board the steamship Glenfruin, a vessel of about the same size as the Glenavon. At the time of the salvage services the Glenfruin was bound from Hankow to London with tea. The Glenfruin and her freight were of the value of 70,000*l.*, and her cargo of the value of 158,000*l.*, making 228.000*l.* in all. On the 18th June 1884 the main shaft of the Glenfruin broke in the Indian Ocean. Her machinery was thereby for the time rendered useless, and she was particularly unmanageable under sail. On the 26th June the Glenavon, also laden with tea, and bound on a voyage from Japan and China to New York, fell in with the Glenfruin. There were twenty-one owners of shares in the two ships, nineteen of whom held amongst them sixty-two sixty-four shares of each vessel; the remaining two sixty-four shares in each ship were held by a person who was not a part owner in the other. It was agreed that, for the purposes of this suit, the values of the Glenavon, her freight and cargo, should be taken to be equal to those of the Glenfruin, her freight and cargo. At the request of the master of the Glenfruin, the Glenavon took hold of her and towed her on her voyage a distance of about 900 miles. By the the shaft of the Glenfruin had been repaired so that she could use her engines, though not at full speed. As it was uncertain whether the repairs to the shaft would hold good, the Glenavon kept in company of the Glenfruin till the 5th July, when the Glenfruin's engines continuing to work well, the Glenavon left her and proceeded for New York. The weather was fine during the salvage services. The Glenfruin reached her port of destination in safety. The bills of lading of the Glenfruin contained the following amongst other exceptions: "The act of God, the Queen's enemies, pirates, robbers by land or sea; restraint of princes, rulers, or people, loss or damage from machinery, boilers, or steam, or from explosion, heat, or fire on board, in hulk, or craft, or on shore; jettison, barratry, misfeasance, error in judgment; any act or neglect or default whatsoever of pilots, master, or crew, in the management or navigation, of the ship; risks of craft, or hulk, or transhipment, and all and every the dangers and accidents of the seas, rivers, and canal, and of navigation, of whatsoever nature or kind, are excepted."

The principal questions raised and discussed in the case were: (1) Was the breakdown of the Glenfruin's shaft caused by unseaworthiness? (2) Does the implied warranty of seaworthiness in the bill of lading amount to a contract by the shipowners that the ship (including her machinery) shall be in fact reasonably fit for the voyage, or only that due care shall be taken to make her so fit? (3) Was the warranty qualified, or were the shipowners otherwise exempted from liability for the breaking of the shaft by the exceptions in the bill of lading? With reference to the first of these questions, it appears from the evidence that very few, if any, of these large shafts are turned out, even by the best makers, without some flaws in the welding. If one of such flaws is of a serious nature, it is apt to extend from the strain put upon it by the working of the engines, and in course of time so to weaken the shaft as to make it unfit for the purposes for which it is designed. This is almost always, if not always, the cause of the breaking of the shafts of large steamers. The shaft in question had been made by one of the best firms, and after its completion it was impossible for that firm, or for the owners of the ship to discover the flaw until it was laid bare by the breaking of the shaft. That flaw was a very serious one. It had no doubt gradually increased during the four years the shaft was in use, and the defect culminated in the breakdown on a voyage on which the ship had met with no more than ordinary weather. I find as a fact that, when the Glenfruin started from Hankow, the shaft was not reasonably fit for the voyage; in other words, that the ship was unseaworthy. On the second question—viz., that relating to the nature and extent of the warranty of seaworthiness—I am, I think, concluded by authority. I have always understood the result of the cases from Lyon v. Mills (5 East, 428) to Kopitoff v. Wilson (ubi sup.) to be, that under his implied warranty of seaworthiness the shipowner contracts, not merely that he will do his best to make the ship reasonably fit, but that she shall really be reasonably fit for the voyage. Had those cases left any doubt in my mind it would have been set at rest by the observations of some of the Peers in the opinions they delivered in the case of Steel v. The State Line Steamship Company (ubi sup.).

Thirdly, I am of opinion that the exceptions in the bill of lading have not the effect either of limiting the implied warranty or of otherwise exempting the shipowner from liability to the owners of cargo for damage or loss occasioned by the breaking of the shaft. It appears to me that the reasonable construction of the exceptions relied on by the plaintiffs—viz., "all and every the dangers and accidents of the seas, rivers, and canal, and of navigation of whatever nature or kind"—must be "dangers and accidents" happening to a seaworthy vessel, and that the exception has no application to the case of a ship which was unseaworthy at the time of sailing, and the unseaworthiness of which was the efficient cause of the loss or damage. In the case of Steel v. The State Line Steamship Company (ubi sup.). to which I have already referred, the decision of the House of Lords was that the exceptions contained in the bill of lading then under consideration were exceptions of matters subsequent to the sailing of the ship with the goods on board. I can see no reason for taking a different view of the exceptions in the bill of lading in the present case. The result is, that the part owners of the Glenavon, who were also part owners of the Glenfruin, would be liable to the owners of cargo on board the Glenfruin for any loss occasioned by the breakdown of the machinery. In other words, such part owners (plaintiffs in the present suit) would be liable to reimburse the defendants any amount of salvage that I might award. To avoid what is termed "circuity of action," I must decline to make any award in favour of those plaintiffs. There is, however, one of the plaintiffs (Mr. William Houston, the owner of two sixty-fourth shares of the Glenavon) who is not a part owner of the Glenfruin, and who would therefore be entitled to his proportion of the salvage that would have been awarded to the plaintiffs had none of them been part owners of the Glenfruin. Again, I do not understand it to have been contended, either in the pleading or in the argument, that the master and crew of the Glenavon are not entitled to salvage remuneration. Having regard to all the circumstances of the case, and bearing in mind that the two ships for practical purposes must be taken to have belonged to the same owners, and that the cargo only of the Glenfruin, and not ship, freight, and cargo, are proceeded against in this action, I award 40*l.* to the plaintiff William Houston, 50*l.* to the master, and 250*l.* to the officers and crew of the Glenavon, according to their respective ratings. There will also be judgment for the defendants on their counterclaim against the owners of the Glenfruin for the amount of salvage I have awarded.

JAMES BURNESS AND SONS v. THE PERSIAN GULF STEAMSHIP COMPANY LIMITED.

THE BUSHIRE. (a)

Collision—Both ships to blame—Breach of contract—Damages — Charter party — Bill of lading—Damage to cargo.

The Admiralty Court rule that in cases of collision the damages are to be equally divided where both ships are to blame, does not apply to actions for breach of contract of carriage brought by owners of cargo against the carrying ship to recover damages for loss of, or injury to, their goods, and hence the plaintiffs in such actions are entitled to recover their full damages from the owners of the carrying ship.

THIS was an action in personam, instituted by charterers for breach of charter-party and bill of lading against the Persian Gulf Steamship Company Limited, the owners of the steamship Bushire.

The plaintiffs claimed 1000*l.* damages for non-delivery of cargo shipped under the said bill of lading on board the Bushire at Cardiff for delivery at Aden.

The plaintiffs by their statement of claim alleged as follows:

5. Whilst the said goods were being carried by the defendants for the plaintiffs under the said charter-party and bill of lading, the defendants, by their servants, so negligently and unskilfully navigated the said steamship Bushire that, on or about the 28th Sept. 1884, she came into collision with the steamship Bernina and sank, whereby the said goods were totally lost to the plaintiffs.

6. Alternatively while the said goods were being carried for the plaintiffs by the defendants under the said charter-party and bill of lading, the Bushire came into collision with the Bernina on or about the 28th Sept. 1884 and sank, whereby the said goods were totally lost to the plaintiffs.

The defendants by their defence alleged as follows:

2. The defendants deny that the plaintiffs are entitled to the sum of 1000*l.*, and say, on the contrary, that they are only entitled to the sum of 500*l.*, which the defendants now tender and pay into court, and offer to pay the plaintiffs' costs up to the date of this tender, and say that the said sum is sufficient to satisfy the plaintiffs' claim.

3. In answer to paragraphs 5 and 6 of the statement of claim, the defendants admit that the vessel, the Bushire, did collide on or about the 28th Sept. 1884 with the steamship Bernina, but they only admit that they were partly to blame for the said collision, and say as a fact that the steamship Bernina was also partly to blame for the said collision, and say that they are only liable to pay the sum of 500*l.*, being half the damages sustained by the plaintiffs in consequence of the loss of the said goods.

March 24.—The action came on for hearing before Butt, J.

Barnes, for the plaintiffs, after stating the facts, was stopped by the Court.

Newson for the defendants.—In accordance with the practice of this court, that where both ships are held to blame the damages are equally divided, the owners of the Bushire are only liable for half the plaintiffs' damages. [BUTT, J.—Surely that practice is not applicable to an action like the present, for breach of contract.] In the case of the Chartered Mercantile Bank of India v. Netherlands India Steam Navigation Company (48 L. T. Rep. N. S. 546; 10 Q. B. Div. 521; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 65) Brett, L.J. uses language indicating that the practice is not confined to actions of tort, and hence is applicable to the present case. [BUTT, J.—Is there any case of breach of contract to which the rule has been applied?] I have been unable to find any case; but the defendants rely upon the remark of Brett, L.J., that "if these ships had belonged to different owners, the loss of the cargo on board one of them being the result of negligence on the part of both . . . . the owners of each of the two ships would have been bound to pay in the result half of the loss which was claimed."

BUTT, J.—It seems to me that this, being an action for breach of contract, and not a case of tort, is not governed by the Admiralty Court practice of the division of damages where both vessels are to blame. I must therefore pronounce for the full amount of the plaintiffs' claim. If there is any dispute as to the amount, it must be referred to the registrar.

THE VICTOR COVACEVICH. (a)

Collision—Practice—Inspection by Trinity Masters—Admiralty Court Act 1861 (24 Vict. c. 10), s. 18.

In a collision action the court will not order the vessels to be examined by the Trinity Masters prior to the hearing of the action except under very unusual circumstances, and especially not where the party applying has had the opportunity by his witnesses of inspecting the vessel himself.

THIS was a motion by the plaintiffs in a collision action in rem for an order that the defendants' barque, the Victor Covacevich, might be examined prior to the hearing of the action by the Trinity Masters to be appointed for the trial, and that her lights might be exhibited in the screens, and the foresail and mainsail set during such examination.

The collision occurred between the plaintiffs' steamship Hermon and the barque Victor Covacevich in the English Channel, off Hastings, at about 4 a.m. on the 15th Jan. 1885. One of the plaintiffs' charges against the Victor Covacevich was that she was not carrying her lights in accordance with the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea.

In support of the motion, affidavits were filed in which it was alleged that the Victor Covacevich had been inspected by the plaintiffs' surveyors, who reported that the screens for the lights of the Victor Covacevich were not in accordance with the requirements of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, that it was therefore impossible for those on board the Hermon to have seen the Victor Covacevich's lights, and further that having regard to the bearings of the two vessels the foresail of the Victor Covacevich was set in such a way as to obscure her lights to those on board the Hermon.

The Victor Covacevich was a foreign ship.

Sect. 18 of the Admiralty Court Act 1861 (24 Vict. c. 10), is as follows:

> Any party in a cause in the High Court of Admiralty shall be at liberty to apply to the said court for an order for the inspection by the Trinity Masters or others appointed for the trial of the said cause, or by the party himself or his witnesses, of any ship or other personal or real property, the inspection of which may be material to the issue of the cause, and the court may make such order in respect of the costs arising thereout as to it shall seem just.

J. P. Aspinall, for the plaintiffs, in support of the motion.—The court has power under sect. 18 of the Admiralty Court Act 1861 to grant the motion. [BUTT, J.—Is there any precedent for this application?] There have been several cases in which the Trinity Masters have inspected the ship. [BUTT, J.—Those were cases in which the inspection took place after the action had come on for hearing. So far as I am concerned, I will never order an inspection at this stage of the proceedings except under very unusual circumstances.] The Victor Covacevich is a foreign ship, and it is possible that she may be removed out of the jurisdiction. Should it at the hearing appear necessary to inspect her, great injustice would be done to the plaintiffs if she had in the interim been removed out of the jurisdiction.

Dr. Raikes, for the defendants, was not called upon.

BUTT, J.—This appears to me to be an endeavour to substitute for the ordinary practice an irregular practice, which is to be resorted to only under very unusual circumstances. In the present case the plaintiffs will have abundant evidence to prove the question raised as to lights when the case comes on for hearing. I am of opinion that the time has not yet arrived for this application. Moreover, I think there would be the gravest inconvenience in adopting a course which would tend to encourage the substitution of the reports of experts for the evidence in the case. I should be very indisposed to grant such an application under any circumstances; but it appears to me to be clear that in this case the plaintiffs have had ample opportunity of inspecting these lights and their position, and the mode in which they are screened. It is not suggested that they cannot obtain evidence of these facts, and, that being so, I have no hesitation in refusing this application. It must be dismissed with costs.

THE EUROPEAN. (a)

Collision—Steam steering gear—Liability of shipowner—Negligence—River Thames—Dangerous machine.

Where a ship comes into collision in a crowded river with another vessel by reason of her patent steam steering gear going wrong and getting out of control, and it is shown that such steering gear has on a previous occasion gone wrong in a similar way, and that after being carefully examined by a competent engineer, who has not been able to discover any defect, it has been replaced in the ship without alteration, such user in a crowded river, the hand gear on the ship being available, is evidence of negligence, rendering the shipowner liable for the damage occasioned by the collision.

(a) Reported by J. P. ASPINALL and BUTLER ASPINALL, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

(a) Reported by J. P. ASPINALL and BUTLER ASPINALL, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

The rule that a man is bound to maintain his property in such a condition that it is not dangerous to the public, applies to fixed and immovable property only, and not to movable chattels, and hence does not apply to a ship and the parts thereof, so as to make the shipowner, in the absence of negligence, liable for a collision caused by a defect in the construction in the ship's steam steering gear.

The user of a ship steered by steam steering gear in a crowded river is not the user of a dangerous machine in such a way as to render the shipowner, in the absence of negligence, liable for damages resulting from a collision occasioned by a failure of the steering apparatus.

Tarry v. Ashton (34 L. T. Rep. N. S. 97; 1 Q. B. Div. 314) explained.

THIS was a collision action in rem, instituted by the owners of the sailing vessel Nio against the screw steamship European, to recover compensation for damage occasioned by a collision between the two vessels in the river Thames.

The facts alleged on behalf of the plaintiffs were as follows:—

Shortly before 2 p.m. on the 24th Aug. 1884, the Nio, a brig of 171 tons register, was lying at Huntley's Wharf on the south side of the river Thames in Greenwich Reach, properly moored and made fast with her starboard side against the wharf and her head down the river. The weather was fine and the tide high-water slack. In these circumstances the screw steamship European was observed to be proceeding down the river about mid-channel, distant about two cables' lengths, and on the Nio's port quarter. Suddenly the European was seen to be heading for the Nio's port side, as if under a port helm, and very shortly afterwards the European with her stem struck the Nio on the port side about amidships.

The defendants by their statement of defence, after stating that the European, a steamship of 1736 tons, bound from London to New York, was, on the 21st Aug. 1884, being steered down the river by means of her steam steering gear, alleged as follows:

3. The vessel left the Millwall Dock the same afternoon; and in leaving the dock and proceeding down the river her steam steering gear had worked perfectly true in accordance with the various changes ordered, but in the circumstances aforesaid as the man at the wheel was attempting to steady the helm, in obedience to an order in that behalf received by him, the steam steering gear suddenly failed, and the wheel flew hard aport, and the vessel's head began to pay off to starboard. Orders were at once given to starboard and hard astarboard, but the wheel could not be got over, and the vessel could not be given a starboard helm.

4. Immediately it was found that the European could not be got to steer and that the steam steering gear had failed, her engines were stopped and reversed full speed and her anchor let go, and steam shut off the steam steering gear, and the hand gear got to work, but before her headway could be stopped, she with her stem came in contact with the port side of the Nio.

5. The defendants deny that the European was negligently or improperly navigated, or that there was any negligence on the part of the defendants, or anyone for whom they were or are liable, or by any improper or defective equipment of the European.

6. The said failing of the steam steering gear to act happened without any negligence or default on the part of the defendants, or of anybody for whom they are responsible, and the said collision was not occasioned by any neglect, default, or mismanagement on the part of those on board the European, or the defendants, or anyone for whom they are responsible, and the said collision was the result of inevitable accident.

At the hearing of the action it was proved that the steam steering apparatus was a patent of Messrs. Higginson, of Liverpool, of which five hundred had been supplied to different ships; that on the vessel's inward voyage from America the apparatus had failed in a similar way to the present case when she was coming up the Thames; that in consequence of such failure the apparatus was examined by the foreman of Messrs. Higginson, who was unable to discover the cause of its failure, and pronounced it to be in perfect order; that it had been placed on board the European in 1884, that it had never failed except on the two occasions mentioned, and that the steam could be shut off and the helm worked by hand alone. Two expert witnesses on behalf of the plaintiffs stated that, under certain circumstances, when the full pressure of steam was put on for the purpose of putting the wheel hard over, it was possible that the sudden pressure of steam would in that particular patent so affect the parts of the machine that the wheel might get out of control.

Finlay, Q.C. (with him Bucknill) for the plaintiffs.—It is submitted that on the evidence the defendants have been guilty of negligence, making them liable for the damage to the plaintiff's vessel. It is admitted by the defendants that on the vessel's inward voyage, about a fortnight previous to the present accident, the steam steering gear failed in precisely the same way as on the present occasion. It is also admitted that the defendants were unable to ascertain the cause of this failure, and nevertheless started down a crowded river like the Thames without any guarantee that the steering apparatus might not fail to work, as it had done before. It clearly would be negligence if the apparatus had failed to act properly on a dozen previous occasions, and the court should not absolve the defendants from liability because there has been a failure of the machinery on only one previous occasion. Shipowners have no right to entrust the control of a large ship in a crowded river to machinery about the efficiency of which there is any doubt, and if damage is caused by that machinery failing to act properly, they are guilty of negligence, rendering them liable to the owners of the property damaged. It is also submitted that on the principle laid down in Tarry v. Ashton (34 L. T. Rep. N. S. 97; 1 Q. B. Div. 314) the defendants are liable, even assuming them to have been guilty of no negligence. A shipowner owes a duty to the public, to so maintain his ship as not to be a source of danger to others. The user of a ship steered by steam steering gear in a crowded river like the Thames is the user of a "dangerous machine" within the meaning of Powell v. Fall (43 L. T. Rep. N. S. 562; 5 Q. B. Div. 597), and, therefore her owners are liable for damage occasioned by its use, although they may not have been guilty of negligence.

Sir Walter Phillimore (with him Gorell Barnes) for the defendants.—If this collision was due to any negligence, it was the negligence of the patentees of the machine, for whom the shipowners are not liable:

Quarman v. Burnett, 6 M. & W. 499; 4 Jur. 969;
The Virgo, 35 L. T. Rep. N. S. 519; 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 285;
Hughes v. Percival, 49 L. T. Rep. N. S. 189; 8 App. Cas. 443;
The Warkworth, 51 L. T. Rep. N. S. 558; 9 P. Div. 146; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 326.

The defendants were guilty of no negligence:

The William Lindsay, 29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 355; L. Rep. 5 P. C. 338; 2 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 118.

After the failure on the first occasion the machine was taken to pieces by a competent engineer and was pronounced by him to be without defect. Under those circumstances the defendants did all that a reasonably prudent man could to insure the proper working of the steering apparatus. The cases of Tarry v. Ashton (ubi sup.) and Powell v. Fall (ubi sup.) have no application to the present circumstances. The principle acted upon in Tarry v. Ashton (ubi sup.) was expressly limited by Parke, B. in Quarman v. Burnett (ubi sup.) to immovable property, and it therefore has no application to a ship. A ship, even though steered by steam steering gear, cannot be called a "dangerous machine" in the sense that a locomotive driven along the highway is so called, and therefore the case does not fall within Powell v. Fall (ubi sup.).

Bucknill in reply.

Cur. adv. vult.

March 24.—BUTT, J.—The plaintiffs, the owners of the brig Nio, seek to recover damages for an injury done to their vessel by the steamship European, owned by the defendants. On the afternoon of the 24th Aug. 1884 the Nio was lying properly moored at Huntley's Wharf on the south side of Greenwich Reach, in the river Thames, when the European, a large steamer bound from Millwall Dock to New York, ran into her, doing considerable damage. The European, which was in charge of a duly licensed pilot, was being steered by steam steering apparatus, of which Messrs. Higginson, of Liverpool, are patentees. All went well, and the vessel properly answered her helm until she arrived at the place in question, when suddenly some derangement of the steam steering gear occurred, the ship's helm went hard over to port, the helmsman being unable to control or move it. The ship's engines were at once stopped and reversed, and her anchor was let go, but she ran into the Nio before her way could be stopped. The evidence clearly establishes that all that could be done to avoid the collision was done after the machinery went wrong.

The plaintiffs contended that the defendants are liable, even assuming that neither they nor their own servants were guilty of negligence. In support of this proposition the plaintiffs rely on a class of cases of which Tarry v. Ashton (ubi sup.) is an example. I think, however, they are not entitled to succeed on this contention. Those are cases where the defendants were persons in possession of real property, and with reference to them the rule of law seems to be that they must take care that their property is so used or managed that other persons are not injured, and that, whether their property be managed by their own immediate servants or by contractors with them or their servants, the same rule does not apply to the use or management of movable chattels. This distinction is clearly pointed out by Parke, B. in delivering the judgment of the Court of Exchequer in the case of Quarman v. Burnett (ubi sup.). The case of Powell v. Fall (ubi sup.) was also relied on by the plaintiffs' counsel in support of the contention stated above. That was the case of damage to a hayrick by fire from a locomotive steam-engine being driven along the high road. There is, in my opinion, no analogy between that case and the present. Moreover, in that case, it seems to have been admitted throughout that the defendants, the owners of the engine in question, were liable for the injury complained of, although occasioned by no negligence of theirs or their servants, unless the Locomotive Acts protected them. I have, therefore, no hesitation in holding that the defendants in the present case are not liable, unless the damage was caused by the negligence of themselves or their servants. Was it occasioned by such negligence?

I have already found that there was no negligence after the derangement of the machinery occurred; but it was proved that on the way up the Thames on the inward voyage of the European, immediately preceding the voyage in question, a precisely similar difficulty had arisen below Gravesend, and that in consequence the use of the steam steering gear had been discontinued, and the vessel had been steered by hand up to the docks. Shortly afterwards the machinery was taken to pieces and readjusted by a competent fitter, who, however, failed to discover the cause of this derangement, and there was, therefore, no assurance that the vice, whatever it may have been, had been cured during the overhaul. I do not forget that there is evidence in the case that some five hundred of Messrs. Higginson's steam "quartermasters," as they are called, have been supplied to different ships, and that they have generally worked well, and without developing the defect now under consideration. What that defect may be is a question on which, on the evidence, neither the Elder Brethren of the Trinity House nor myself have arrived at a definite conclusion, although the evidence of Mr. Gray and Mr. Flannery would seem to point to a radical error of construction.

I cannot, however, help thinking, having regard to what had happened to the machinery only a few days before, that to trust the control of a ship of 1736 tons net register to the self-same apparatus in the crowded and intricate navigation of the Thames was an act imprudent in itself, and likely to cause damage to the property of other people. It was the less justifiable because there would appear to have been no objection to the use of the hand steering gear alone. I feel constrained to hold that this constituted negligence on the part of the defendants, and to pronounce for the damages proceeded for.

THE FOSCOLINO. (a)

Limitation of liability—Loss of life—Damage to ship, goods, and merchandise.

In an action for limitation of liability, where it appeared that all the claims in respect of loss of life had been settled, the Court ordered that upon payment in of 8*l. per ton, all persons having any claim, either in respect of loss of life or damage to ship, goods, or merchandise, should be restrained from bringing any action in respect of the collision.*

IN this case the owners of the s.s. Foscolino sought to limit their liability in respect of loss of and damage to ship and cargo, and in respect of loss of life and personal injury arising out of a collision with the s.s. Venetia on June 14, 1884.

In their statement of claim the plaintiffs alleged that the Venetia was sunk and three of her crew were drowned in the collision; they admitted liability for the collision; they alleged that claims had been made in respect of ship and cargo, and that they had compromised and paid the claims made in respect of the whole loss of life occasioned by the collision. They alleged that the sum of 8*l.* per ton on the gross registered tonnage of the Foscolino was 8607*l.*; that they were willing to pay the same into court or give security for the same; that they were willing and offered to give security, if the court should so order, to cover claims for possible further loss of life or personal injury occasioned by the collision.

The plaintiffs claimed a declaration that they were not answerable in damages in respect of loss of life or personal injury, either alone or together, with loss or damage to ship, goods, &c., to an aggregate amount exceeding 15*l.* per gross registered ton, or for loss of, or damage to, ship, goods, &c., to an aggregate amount exceeding 8*l.* per gross registered ton; that the amount for which they were liable in respect of loss of life or personal injury, either alone or together, with loss or damage to ship, goods, &c., was 16,138*l.*, and no more; that the amount for which they were liable for loss of, or damage to, ship, goods, &c., was 8607*l.* and no more; that upon paying into court or giving security for 8607*l.*, together with interest, and upon giving security (if so ordered) for such further sum as to the court should seem fit, for possible claims for loss of life or personal injury, all further proceedings and actions should be stayed, and that all persons interested in the Venetia or her cargo, or having any claim in respect of loss of life or personal injury, should be restrained from bringing any action in respect of the collision, and that proper directions should be given for ascertaining all persons having just claims in respect of loss of life or personal injury, or loss of, or damage to, ship, goods, &c., and that the said sum might be rateably distributed among the persons making out their claims, and that proper directions might be given for excluding any claimants who should not bring in their claims within a certain fixed time.

The owners of ship and cargo entered an appearance and admitted the plaintiffs' right to limitation of liability as regards themselves. The plaintiffs at the hearing produced an affidavit showing the names of all persons killed, their condition in life, the number and position and age of the persons asserting and entitled to assert life claims, and showing that all these claims had been settled by payment of sums of money and the amount of such payments.

The plaintiffs thereupon applied for judgment as claimed, without giving any security for the life claims, and upon payment into court of the 8607*l.*, the amount of their limited liability in respect of ship, goods, &c., and the court made such order accordingly. In drawing up the judgment the registrar omitted all mention of the life claims and confined the judgment so as to limit the plaintiffs' liability only in respect of ship, goods, &c.

On the 31st March 1885 Aspinall, on behalf of the plaintiffs, applied to the court to direct that the judgment might be drawn up so as to protect the plaintiffs against all possible future life claims without giving further security than that already given in respect of ship and cargo. It was argued that some one of the claimants already settled with might make a further claim, and if the plaintiffs were not protected against such claims they might have to contest actions brought by paupers from whom they could get no costs, whereas if such actions were restrained in this action all claims would be barred unless brought within the time limited by the advertisements. It was also pointed out that, unless the plaintiffs got their limitation in respect of life claims, there could be no advertisements.

Bucknill for owners of cargo.

BUTT, J. thereupon directed that the judgment should be drawn up in the form asked for, and the judgment was accordingly drawn up as follows:

The Judge, having heard counsel on all sides, pronounced that the owners of the steamship Foscolino are entitled to limited liability according to the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 and the Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act 1862; and that in respect of loss of life or personal injury, or of loss or damage to ship, goods, merchandise, or other things caused by reason of the improper navigation of the said steamship on the occasion of the collision between the said steamship and the steamship Venetia on the 14th June 1884, the owners of the said steamship Foscolino are answerable in damages to an amount not exceeding 16,138*l.*, such sum being at the rate of 15*l.* for each ton of the registered tonnage of the said vessel, without deduction on account of engine room; and that in respect of damage to ship, goods, merchandise, or other things alone the owners of the said steamship Foscolino are answerable in damages to an amount not exceeding 8606*l.* 17*s.* 8*d.* of the said sum of 16,138*l.*, being at the rate of 8*l.* for each ton of the registered tonnage of the said vessel, without deduction on account of engine room. The judge ordered that upon payment into court of the said sum of 8606*l.* 17*s.* 8*d.*, together with interest thereon at the rate of 4 per cent. per annum from the date of the said collision until such payment into court, and also upon payment of the costs incurred on behalf of the plaintiffs in the consolidated action 1884, L. No. 1523, fo. 254 and 1884.

(a) Reported by J. P. ASPINALL and BUTLER ASPINALL, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

F. No. 1104, fo. 279, all proceedings in the third consolidated action be stayed. The judge further ordered that three advertisements should be inserted, at an interval of not less than a week between each advertisement, in each of the following newspapers, viz., the Times, the Shipping and Mercantile Gazette, and the Daily Telegraph, intimating to all persons having any claim in respect of loss or damage caused as aforesaid that if they do not come in and enter their claims on or before the 1st July next they will be excluded from claiming to share in the amount for which the owners of the steamship Foscolino are answerable as aforesaid, the last of such advertisements to be inserted on or before the 16th June next ensuing. And he referred all claims brought in or hereafter to be brought in in this action to the registrar, assisted by merchants to ascertain the amount thereof. The judge also condemned the plaintiffs in the costs of the action.

THE SERAGLIO. (a)

Salvage—Practice—Arrest by telegram—Contempt of court—Affidavit of value—R. S. C. Order IX., r. 12.

It having been the practice of the Admiralty Court and of the Admiralty Division to give directions by telegraph to the officers of customs to arrest a ship immediately on the issue of the warrant, and before the warrant itself can have reached the officer, such arrest is valid, and if the owner or master remove her out of the jurisdiction after the officer of customs has taken possession of her, he is guilty of contempt of court, notwithstanding the provisions of Order IX., r. 12, as to the mode in which service of the warrant is to be effected.

THIS was a motion by the defendants in a salvage action for the release of the salved vessel Seraglio, her cargo, and freight, "without filing an affidavit as to the values of the property arrested, the solicitors for the defendants undertaking to file such affidavit within three days." The plaintiffs, who were the owners, master, and crew of the steamship Gazelle, after the institution of the action, obtained a warrant of arrest. The Seraglio being at Plymouth, notice of the issue of the warrant was telegraphed by the marshal to the Custom House officer at that port. On receipt of the telegram the Custom House officer went on board the Seraglio and arrested her. The master of the Seraglio, however, in obedience to his owner's orders, took the vessel with the Custom House officer on board and proceeded to Cardiff, where the warrant of arrest was duly served upon her.

The following affidavit of William Henry Raeburn, resident in Glasgow, one of the defendants, was filed in support of the motion:—

1. My said firm are the owners of the steamship Seraglio.

2. This is an action for alleged salvage services rendered by the plaintiffs on the 24th inst. to the steamship Seraglio, whereby the latter was towed into Plymouth. My firm never received from the plaintiffs or any person on their behalf any application for payment for the said alleged services, but on the 27th inst. the vessel, which was then in Plymouth, was arrested at the plaintiffs' suit about half past seven in the evening. The said vessel was then about to proceed to Cardiff for the purpose of loading cargo and sailing from the latter port on Saturday next for Bombay under charter.

3. About ten o'clock on Monday night I received a telegram from my agents at Plymouth, Messrs. Weekes, Phillips, and Co., informing me that the vessel had been arrested by telegram at the suit of the plaintiffs, and as I believed that the arrest was not legal, and I had had no demand from the plaintiffs for any sum claimed by them, I telegraphed to Weekes, Phillips, and Co. that the vessel was to proceed to Cardiff for the purpose of loading.

4. I declare that all blame attaching to taking the vessel from Plymouth is solely chargeable to myself this deponent. The master would not have removed the vessel without receiving the orders he did from me.

5. I declare that in ordering the master to proceed to Cardiff I did not intend any disrespect to this honourable court. It being late at night I was unable to consult my solicitors, as I should have done had I received the telegram in the daytime, and I say that I was not aware that a vessel could be arrested by telegram or without any claim being made by the plaintiffs on my firm for their alleged salvage services. It was important that the said vessel should arrive at Cardiff as soon as possible, and she was taken there direct.

6. If in what I have done I have committed any disrespect to this honourable court, I beg to tender my apology for the same, but in acting as aforesaid I honestly believed that the arrest of the Seraglio was, in the circumstances, improper, and I am advised that it could only have been legally effected by production and service of the warrant itself on board.

Order IX., r. 12, is as follows:

In Admiralty actions in rem, service of a writ of summons or warrant against ship, freight, or cargo on board, is to be effected by nailing or affixing the original writ or warrant for a short time on the mainmast or on the single mast of the vessel, and on taking off the process, leaving a true copy of it nailed or fixed in its place.

Bucknill, for the defendants, in support of the motion.—Having regard to the fact that the defendant is resident in Glasgow, and that the affidavit of value will be filed within three days, it is submitted that the court should accede to the motion. There was no contempt in taking the vessel to sea, inasmuch as she had never been legally arrested, and was therefore not within the jurisdiction of the court. Order IX., r. 12, requires the original warrant to be affixed to the mast for a short time, and on its being taken off, a copy being left in its place. In the present case there had only been notice by telegram of the issue of the warrant, which was not sufficient.

J. P. Aspinall, for the plaintiffs, contra.—It is submitted that the defendant is not entitled to the motion. He is seeking a favour. He is not entitled to the release of the ship until he has filed an affidavit of value. Having been guilty of contempt, the court should not grant him the favour he seeks. According to the practice of this Division a vessel may be arrested by telegram, just as in the Chancery Division notice of an injunction may be given by telegram:

Ex parte Langley, 41 L. T. Rep. N. S. 388; 13 Ch. Div. 110.

Sir JAMES HANNEN.—The defendant, who is the owner of the Seraglio, is asking a favour of the court, which gives me an opportunity of marking my sense of his conduct by refusing it. I have only to deal with this matter as a contempt of court. There is no doubt about the proper way of serving a warrant of arrest, but equally also no doubt as to the manner in which notice of its issue may be communicated. In the present, notice of the issue has been given in precisely the same manner in which notice of the granting of an injunction is given in the Chancery Division, viz., by telegram. In the Chancery Division, though no doubt a formal injunction is obtained, the means of communication having in these days become more rapid, the telegraph is employed to give notice of its being granted. Everyone knows that in matters of business he cannot with safety disregard a notice given by telegram; and so it must also be understood that a litigant cannot disregard a notice sent to him by telegram by an officer of the court. This is so even if there were any reason to doubt the authenticity of the telegram; in those circumstances inquiry should be made. In the present case nothing can be more flagrant than the conduct of the owner of the Seraglio, who appears to have taken this course in order to test the law. I think I am taking the most lenient view I can of the matter by accepting his apology, but I shall not so again in any other case. The motion must be dismissed and the defendant condemned in the costs.

INGLIS v. STOCK. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF APPEAL IN ENGLAND.

Marine insurance—Insurable interest in goods—Sale "free on board."

D. and Co. agreed in writing to sell to B. 200 tons of sugar of a certain quality at an agreed price, "f.o.b." at H., payment by "cash in London in exchange for bills of lading." B. resold to the respondent at an increased price, but on the same terms. D. and Co. also sold 200 tons of sugar to the respondent upon the same terms. D. and Co.'s agent shipped 390 tons of sugar in one ship to satisfy these two contracts. The usual course of business was not to appropriate specific bags of sugar to particular contracts till after the shipment, and after D. and Co. had received the bills of lading. The ship and cargo were totally lost by perils of the sea before any appropriation was made, but D. and Co., after hearing of the loss, appropriated 200 tons to B.'s contract, and 190 tons to the respondents, and he paid the contract price and obtained the bills of lading. He had a floating policy of insurance on goods, and declared under it in respect of the sugar so lost.

Held, in an action on the policy (affirming the judgment of the court below), that the respondent had an insurable interest in the sugar, and was entitled to recover.

Held (per Lord Blackburn), that an undivided interest in a parcel of goods may be described generally as an interest in goods in the same manner as if it were an interest in every portion of the goods.

THIS was an appeal from the judgment of the Court of Appeal (Brett, M.R. Baggallay and Lindley, L.JJ.) reported in 51 L. T. Rep. N. S. 449; 12 Q. B. Div. 564; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 294, reversing a judgment of Field, J. reported in 47 L. T. Rep. N. S. 416; 9 Q. B. Div. 708; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 596, upon further consideration.

The action was brought by the respondent against the appellant, who was an underwriter, on a policy of insurance on goods, under circumstances which appear in the head note and in the judgment of the Lord Chancellor, and also in the reports in the courts below.

The Solicitor-General (Sir F. Herschell, Q.C.), Cohen, Q.C., and Barnes appeared for the appellant, and contended that the question was whether the property had passed to the respondent before the loss, so that the goods might attach to the floating policies. In order to carry out the contracts to advantage, it was necessary for Drake and Co. so to distribute the sugar as to equalise the saccharine averages; they shipped one amount of sugar and did not appropriate it so as to pass the property to the respondent till a later date. The risk had not attached to the policies at the date of the loss, and nothing that happened later could make it attach. See Anderson v. Morice (1 App. Cas. 713; 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 290; 35 L. T. Rep. N. S. 566; [Ex. Ch.] L. Rep. 10 C. P. 609; 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 290; 33 L. T. Rep. N. S. 355). Drake and Co. kept the right of specifically appropriating, and of deciding on whom the short delivery should fall, in their own hands. The price to be paid varied according to the apportionment, and till the property had passed the price is not due, and the respondent could not be made liable for it. Drake and Co. did not determine which bags were to be Beloe's and which the respondent's till the bills of lading arrived after the loss, and then the purchasers might have rejected them. The judgment of the court below rests on a finding as to the course of business which was not supported by the evidence. A loss before the appropriation no more affected the purchasers than a loss before the shipment. If Drake and Co. had become bankrupt before the apportionment the sugar would have passed to their assignees. The respondent had no interest in it at the time of the loss, as no property would pass till specific goods were separated from the bulk. The contract of insurance necessarily implies that there shall be specific goods covered at the time of the loss. There was no implied authority to appropriate after the loss. They also referred to

(a) Reported by C. E. MALDEN, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The LORD CHANCELLOR (Selborne).—My Lords: The question in this case is, whether the plaintiff had at the time of the loss of the steamer City of Dublin in the river Elbe, on the 4th Feb. 1881, an insurable interest in 3900 bags of sugar, part of that vessel's cargo. The Court of Appeal, reversing a judgment of Field, J., decided in the plaintiff's favour. By two contracts, dated respectively the 7th and 12th Jan. 1881, which were, except as to dates and parties, identical in their terms, Messrs. Drake and Co., merchants of London, agreed to sell to one Beloe and to the plaintiff respectively, 200 tons each of German beetroot sugar, to be shipped from Hamburgh. The material terms of the contract between Drake and Beloe are these:—"London, Jan. 7th, 1881, Messrs. W. Beloe and Co. We have this day sold to you for your account 200 tons German beet sugar of the crops 1880-1881, at 21*s.* 9*d.* per cwt. of 50¾ kilos. net f.o.b. Hamburgh for 88 degrees net saccharine contents." I need not read all the details. "The sugar shall analyse between 85/92 net both inclusive; sixpence per cwt. to be paid or allowed for each degree above or below eighty-eight, fractions in proportion; but anything above ninety-two not to be paid for. The analysis is to be effected by a public German chemist." Then, omitting some immaterial points, it goes on: "for January delivery at Hamburgh payment by cash in London in exchange for bills of lading; less two months' interest at 5 per cent. per annum. Any dispute arising out of this contract to be settled by arbitration of two London brokers in the usual way." By another contract dated the 7th Jan., the plaintiffs bought from Beloe the sugar which Beloe had contracted to buy from Drake and Co., upon substantially the same terms, except that the price to be paid for it to Beloe was to be 21*s.* 10½*d.* per cwt., subject to like variations between the same limits; and that the average analysis of the whole contract was "not to exceed ninety." The price therefore in each case was to be variable, according to the percentage of saccharine matter in the sugar; the goods were in each case to be delivered at Hamburgh free on board, and consequently were, after shipment, to be at the purchaser's risk; and the bills of lading were to be retained by the vendors till the purchase moneys were paid. The plaintiff and Beloe at Bristol, and the agents of Drake and Co. at Hamburgh, engaged space for these sugars in a general ship, the City of Dublin, one of a line of steamers trading between Bristol and Hamburgh. The shipping agents at Bristol being informed by the plaintiff of his two purchases from Beloe and Drake and Co., and learning from Beloe that Drake and Co. were his vendors, advised their correspondents at Hamburgh that 400 tons of sugar would be coming for that ship's cargo from Drake and Co. I do not think it material, but it is proper to know that the plaintiff did not know from whom Beloe had bought, and Drake and Co. did not know that Beloe had sold to the plaintiff till after the loss. The quantity actually put on board the City of Dublin at Hamburgh was only 3900 bags or 390 tons. As to this, I think it enough to say that if the plaintiff would have had an insurable interest in 4000 bags, under the circumstances of the case he had, in my opinion, such an interest though the quantity was short by ten tons. No other sugar belonging to Drake and Co. was put on board this ship. The 3900 bags were, therefore, specially separated, from the bulk of the vendors' own sugar; and they were shipped under Drake and Co.'s contracts with Beloe and the plaintiffs, with a view to, and in fulfilment of, the agreement of Drake and Co., as vendors, to put the purchased sugars "free on board." The present controversy arises out of the manner in which this was done. Each bag was distinguished by a mark denoting its percentage, according to certified analysis, of saccharine matter; and ten bills of lading, for parcels bearing marks corresponding to those on the bags, were made out in an impersonal form and sent, according to the contracts, to Drake and Co., to be retained by them till the time of payment should arrive. The aggregate consignment, except as to the deficiency of 100 bags, was proper and suitable to fulfil the two contracts, without exceeding, as to either of them, the average of 90 per cent. of saccharine matter; and, according to the evidence of Mr. Hales, a partner in the firm of Drake and Co., it was made up and "ordered forward" as being "so divisible." But no particular bags were then set apart or marked as applicable to the one contract more than the other; it was thought sufficient by Drake and Co., or their agents, to leave this to be done when the bills of lading came forward. There would be no practical difficulty in doing it in a proper and reasonable way, even if the plaintiff had not produced Beloe's contract, inasmuch as neither purchaser could claim, and Drake and Co. were not to be paid for any excess beyond 90 per cent. of the average analysis of the whole contract, though it was conceivably possible that it might have been done perversely and unreasonably. The decision was, in fact, made by Drake and Co., who forwarded invoices of the parcels attributed to each purchaser on the evening of the 4th Feb., after they had received notice of the loss. In the division so made the deficiency of ten tons was ascribed to the plaintiff's contract, being the later in date. No question was raised by the plaintiff or by Beloe; and the purchase moneys were paid by the plaintiff according to the contracts and invoices. But by this, which was done after the loss, the underwriters were, of course, not bound. It is contended, on the part of the appellant, that under these circumstances, and for want of a proper division before the loss, the shipment had not the effect of divesting the prior title of Drake and Co., the vendors, or of passing any interest in these sugars to the plaintiff. This argument appears to me to confound two very different things—the appropriation necessary as between vendor and purchaser, and the division, as between purchaser and purchaser, of specific goods actually appropriated to the aggregate of the two contracts. I do not think it follows that there could be no appropriation by the vendor of which the purchasers might take the benefit, merely because the parcels of goods appropriated were mixed in the act of appropriation so as to require some subsequent division or apportionment. Whether this may have happened by previous agreement or course of dealing between all the parties, in which case there could be no serious doubt, or by accident, error, or want of proper care on the vendor's part, appears to me to make no difference in principle. The purchasers might possibly be entitled to reject, but the vendors could not, in my opinion, without their consent, retract the appropriation. In the present case I see no reason to doubt that the difficulty arising from the confusion of parcels—material only to the settlement of the amount payable by the plaintiff to his two vendors—if not solved by consent or by arbitration, for which each contract provided, would have been soluble by principles of law applied to the facts and the terms of the contracts. The necessity for doing this, and the fact that it had not been done at the time of the loss, do not in my opinion sufficiently distinguish this case from Brown v. Hare (3 H. and N. 484; 4 Ib. 822), and earlier authorities to the same effect. The goods were, by the act of the vendors, separated from all other goods belonging to them; they were shipped "free on board" in what was for that purpose the purchaser's ship, under two contracts so to deliver them, in both which contracts, subject to the payments to be made by him to Drake and Co. and Beloe, the plaintiff was then, though Drake and Co. did not know it, solely interested. I cannot infer from any part of the evidence that in so shipping them indiscriminately the vendors intended to break, instead of fulfilling, their contracts, and to take upon themselves, contrary to those contracts, the subsequent risk of loss, and the liability to freight. Yet this, as it seems to me, would be the necessary result of the appellant's argument. I think that the order appealed from is right, and I move your Lordships to affirm it, and to dismiss the appeal with costs.

Lord BLACKBURN.—My Lords: I also agree that there is no occasion to hear the counsel for the respondent. The respondent had insured himself by floating policies to the extent of 5000*l*. One of the policies is set out as a sample policy. It is a policy for 4000*l*., part of 5000*l*., and is marked in the margin No. 4247. By it the respondent caused himself to be insured in respect of goods conveyed in a steamer "from the continent of Europe between Havre and Hamburgh, both ports included, $\frac{\text{and}}{\text{or}}$ Rouen, $\frac{\text{and}}{\text{or}}$ Nantes, to Bristol upon any kind of goods and merchandise, beginning the adventure upon the said goods and merchandises from the loading thereof aboard the said ship at as above, upon the said ship, &c., including all risks of craft, and so shall continue, and endure during her abode there upon the said ship, &c., and, further, until the said ship, with all her ordnance, tackle, apparel, &c., and goods and merchandises whatsoever, shall be arrived at as above upon the said ship, &c, until she hath moored at anchor twenty-four hours in good safety and upon the goods and merchandises until the same be there discharged and safely landed." Then I pass over a sentence which is immaterial for the present purpose. "The said ship, &c., goods and merchandises, &c., for so much as concerns the assured by agreement between the assured and assurers in this policy are and shall be valued at 4000*l*., part of 5000*l*., on sugar to be hereafter valued and declared. To follow policy for 4000*l*., No. $\frac{3}{4246}$ dated the 6th Dec. 1880." The meaning of "to be hereafter valued and declared," is that if the insured has several adventures out, all within the description in the policy, he may select at his pleasure which is to be protected by the policy; and, on his giving notice of such a selection to the insurers, the policy is as if it had named that adventure from the beginning. Of course, if adventures have been previously named, these come first, and, whether these prior subjects of insurance are lost or not, the policy is equally pro tanto functus officio. And I believe the practice is, if there is nothing to show that the first adventure which came in safe was selected not to be under the policy, it is taken to be so, though there is no declaration. The meaning of "To follow policy for 4000*l*., No. $\frac{3}{46}$" is, that, there being consecutive policies, any loss declared is to be borne first by the earlier policies, and that it is not until after the policy No. $\frac{3}{4246}$ is exhausted, either by losses or declared adventures which have come in safe, that the underwriters on the policy which follows are to bear the balance of the loss, if any.

There is not, as far as I remember, any other difference between a policy in the present form, with a declaration that it is on sugar valued at 3800*l*., and sailed in the City of Dublin steamer, which sailed from Hamburgh to Bristol on the 3rd Feb. 1881, and an ordinary policy for the same sugar, valued at the same sum, on the same steamer, on the same voyage. The appellant is an underwriter for 150*l*. on each of these consecutive floating policies.

There is no dispute, at least now, that the City of Dublin is such a steamer, and the voyage such a voyage as was within the terms of the policies, nor that the values and declarations were properly given, nor that there was enough left unexhausted on the policies to enable the underwriters to pay a total loss. But it was said that the situation of the plaintiff with regard to the sugars was not such as to give him an insurable interest. And I have no doubt that, in order to recover against an underwriter, the assured must show that he suffers loss in respect of the thing insured. In case of an insurance on goods, if he shows that he had at the time of the loss the whole legal property in the goods which were lost, he undoubtedly does show it. But I do not agree that this is the only way in which he can show an insurable interest in goods, or that any relation to goods such that if the goods perish on the voyage the person will lose the whole, and if they arrive safe will have all or part of the goods will not give an interest which may be aptly described as "goods." In the present case there has been a good deal of extraneous matter brought into the discussion. I think if it had been remembered that the three contracts—viz., that of the 7th Jan. between Drake and Beloe, that of the same date between Beloe and the respondent, and the contract of the 12th Jan. between Drake and the respondent—were all in writing, and it had been seen that they are so expressed that, in my opinion, there is no doubt as to their construction, the objection would have been much more clearly raised, not, I think, for its benefit. Drake and Co., of London, who were large importers of beet sugar manufactured in Germany, made a contract with Beloe, of Bristol, who bought to sell again. There are, I gather, trading lines of steamers running from Hamburgh to Liverpool, Leith, and Bristol, and, it may be, other places; but to London, if a steamer is wanted from Hamburgh, it must be chartered, but of course it may be chartered. By the contract Drake and Co. bound themselves to Beloe to supply 200 tons of German beet sugar of the crop of 1880-81. It was not only to be German beet sugar, but it was to analyse between 85 and 92, "but anything above 92 not to be paid for." No portion of the sugar now in dispute was either below 85 or above 92, so that this term does not come into operation. The sugar was to be "net free on board at Hamburgh," and it was for January delivery at Hamburgh. The price was to depend upon the "average analysis of the whole contract. Should the average analysis of the whole contract exceed 90, such excess is not to be paid for." The Solicitor-General raised an argument on this clause which I shall notice by-and-by. The price was to be paid in London in exchange for bill of lading. Now, under this contract the first thing to be done was by Beloe, the buyer. He must let Drake, the seller, know in good time on what ship the goods were to be shipped free on board, for, till he knew that, Drake could not put the goods on board. As soon as he had secured room in the steamer he selected, and let Drake and Co. know in good time on what steamer they were to ship them, Drake and Co.'s part of the contract begins; they are bound to have there at Hamburgh, and to ship free on board that ship, 200 tons of sugar answering in all respects to the description in the contract. Provided that sugar of the proper quantity and description was put on board that ship, it was no concern of Beloe's where or how Drake and Co. got it. So soon as they had done that they had fulfilled their part of the contract so far. But the price was to be paid in London in exchange for bill of lading; and no doubt from that it is to be implied that Drake and Co. were to take a bill or bills of lading for the sugar they put on board, and were in due time to be ready and willing to give the bills of lading in London in exchange for the price. If Drake and Co. did this Beloe was bound to pay the price. Now, Beloe had on the same day, but whether before or after he had made the contract with Drake and Co. does not appear, made a contract with the respondent to supply him with 200 tons of sugar at $1\frac{1}{2}d.$ a cwt. higher price than that at which Drake had agreed to supply Beloe. As the respondent knew where he wanted the sugar, this was to be shipped "free on board A 1 steamer to Bristol." The description of the sugar was the same as that in the contract between Drake and Beloe, except that it was said "average analysis not to exceed 90." The Solicitor-General said that if the average analysis exceeded 90 Beloe was bound to take it from Drake, but not to pay the excess in price; but the respondent was not bound to take this more valuable lot at all, but would be in his right if he rejected it. What would have been the case if that point had been raised by the facts we need not inquire, though I have a strong suspicion that a jury would not much favour it. But, looking at the documents, it appears that not only were the averages under 90, but that by no possible shuffling of the 3900 bags actually put on board the City of Dublin could 2000 bags have been selected the average of which would exceed 90. The respondent did not know, and had no reason to inquire, where Beloe was to get the sugar with which he was to supply him. He saw Edward Stock, the agent for the Bristol line of steamers, and, according to the evidence, his directions were to secure room for the 200 tons in the steamer which would leave at the end of the month; and on the 11th Jan. E. Stock and Son, the Bristol agents for the steamers, wrote to Nisstle and Günther the following letter:—"There are 200 tons of sugar sold for shipment the second half of this month, but we have not yet ascertained the names of the shippers. There are also further parcels in treaty," and so forth. This, it must be noticed, was before the contract between Drake and the respondent on the 12th Jan., and how there can be any doubt raised that the respondent did his best as far as regards securing room on that steamer to take on board the sugar which Beloe was to ship or cause to be shipped, I am unable to conceive. He had to advise Beloe of this, and it is sworn that he did so, and I see no possible reason for doubting that he did. The position of things, then, as between Beloe and the respondent was this: The respondent had done his part, and unless Beloe by himself, or Drake, or anyone else, put the proper quantity of sugar of the proper description on board the steamer, the respondent had a right of action against Beloe. If Beloe did put the proper quantity on board he was entitled to recover the price in exchange for bills of lading, and it was no answer that the goods had perished at sea before the bill of lading was offered. He did send an invoice specifying the marks and numbers of 2000 bags undoubtedly put on board, which he alleged had been shipped on the respondent's account. If these were proper bills of lading for the sugar shipped, it is difficult to imagine a clearer case of the loss of sugar. It is said that the bills of lading which he offered to give in exchange for the cash, were not the bills of lading of goods shipped for the respondent in the City of Dublin, and, therefore, the respondent was not bound to pay in exchange for such bills of lading; instead of being liable to pay Beloe the price he had an action against him for breach of contract in not shipping as he ought to have done. This requires us to notice some more of the evidence.

When the respondent had made his contract with Drake on the 12th Jan., he at once proceeded to Edward Stock and Sons, who, on that very day advised Nisstle and Co. that the 200 tons were coming; so that he had done his part in securing room for that 200 tons, and if Drake and Co. have not shipped them he has a cause of action against them. They did not ship the whole 200 tons, but only 190 tons, 10 tons or 100 bags meant to be shipped having been delayed. For that Drake and Co. sent an invoice and received payment; and, as I said about Beloe, if Drake and Co. have offered the respondent bills of lading for goods which were not shipped for him, he has a cause of action against them, and was not bound to pay. But if Drake and Co. have fulfilled their contract, and the bills of lading are those referring to the 1900 bags, then the subsequent loss by perils of the sea is no answer. The respondent must pay the price, and has lost it, and that is as clear a loss as can well be. When Drake and Co., or rather their agents at Hamburgh, were shipping the sugar and held the mate's notes, it was no doubt their business to see that a proper bill of lading for each separate shipment was signed; and if at any time before the bills of lading left Hamburgh they had been allocated to each shipment, no objection, not even an idle one, could have been raised. But instead of doing so the whole of the bills were sent in a lump to London that they might be allocated there. This was perfectly bonâ fide. Drake and Co. had no interest in favouring one more than the other, and were to be paid exactly the same price per bag, whether they allocated it to the one or to the other. And if they had done this before the loss, I do not see what damage either Beloe or the respondent could have sustained by the allocation being made in London instead of in Hamburgh. Now, I have been quite unable to see, even if the respondent had sustained some damage, that it could have been damage going to the whole root of the matter, so as to form a defence against an action by either Drake and Co., or Beloe, for not paying for the goods in exchange for the bills of lading; that is, supposing the respondent, because prices had greatly fallen, or from any other motive, had wished to get off. And if it were so, I think the case would fall entirely within what Lord Hatherley in Anderson v. Morice (3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 290; 35 L. T. Rep. N. S. 566; 1 App. Cas. 713) says is the principle of Sparkes v. Marshall (2 Bing. N. S. 671). The insurers have no right to call upon the insured to exercise a possible option to be released from his contract. But the loss having happened before the actual allocation, the respondent's loss, when it happened, was a loss not of 200 tons, but of 200 tons parcel of 390 tons; so that the loss, though exactly the same, is said not to be the same in description, because it is a loss of an undivided portion of the goods instead of being a loss of the goods themselves, I am quite unable myself to perceive why that should make the slightest difference. In the merits certainly it does not. I am quite unable to perceive why an undivided interest in a parcel of goods on board a ship may not be described as an interest in goods just as much as if it were an interest in every portion of the goods. No authority was cited in order to show that it was not so, and I can see no reason for it. Then, that being so, of course it follows that there is no defence at all, and this is my opinion.

This, however, is not the ground on which the Court of Appeal decided. They thought that there was shown to be a custom, or course of dealing, which rendered Drake and Co.'s conduct a literal fulfilment of the contract. I am not satisfied that, on the evidence, such a custom or course of trade was shown. I do not say that it is not, but I should at least wish to hear the respondent's counsel before deciding on that ground. On the other, as I have already intimated, I have no doubt at all.

COURT OF APPEAL.

Tuesday, May 12, 1885.

(Before BRETT, M.R., BAGGALLAY and BOWEN, L.JJ.)

THE FRIEDEBERG. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM BUTT, J.

Collision—Reference—Costs.

The rule of the Admiralty Court, in damage actions, that where more than a third of the plaintiff's claim at the reference is disallowed he is condemned in the costs of the reference, is not a hard and fast rule fettering the judge's discretion, and the judge is entitled, and ought to exercise his discretion as to costs according to the circumstances of each particular case.

THIS was an appeal by the defendants in a collision action in rem, from a decision of Butt, J., condemning the defendants in the costs of the action, and directing each party to bear their own costs of the reference, including a moiety of the reference fees.

The collision occurred in the Bristol Channel, between the barques Nourmahal and Friedeberg, on the 18th July 1882.

The action was heard on the 23rd April 1884 by Sir James Hannen, who pronounced the defendant's vessel, the Friedeberg, alone to blame, and referred the amount of the plaintiffs' damages to the registrar, but reserved the question of costs until the amount of the damages had been ascertained.

The plaintiffs, at the reference, brought in a claim amounting to 1262*l.* 13*s.* 8*d.*, of which the registrar allowed 166*l.* 18*s.* 9*d.*

The report of the Registrar, so far as is material, was as follows:

I beg further to report that the claim as made by the plaintiffs has been disallowed to a great extent under the following circumstances: On the morning of the 18th July 1882 the two ships Nourmahal and Friedeberg were at anchor in Penarth Roads. The Nourmahal, a wooden barque of 846 tons register, was in ballast, bound for Cardiff. The Friedeberg, an iron barque of 795 tons, was laden with coals, and bound to Valparaiso. Between nine and ten a.m. of that day the Friedeberg having, with the assistance of a steam tug, got up her anchor, proceeded, and in attempting to cross the bows of the Nourmahal, drove down on her, and having hooked the Nourmahal's cable with her anchor, the port side of the Friedeberg came into collision with the starboard bow of the Nourmahal. In order to clear the cable the Nourmahal had to heave in her anchor, and whilst so doing the two vessels were lashed together for a time, and were held by the Friedeberg's tug, though, perhaps, drifting a little with the tide, until the Friedeberg let go her starboard anchor which held the ships, the tug then leaving them. Some time afterwards, when the two vessels in this condition had swung with the tide, the Friedeberg's master engaged another tug, the Porthill, to tow the Nourmahal clear of the Friedeberg and to a safe anchorage.

The Nourmahal's hawser was then given to the tug, which proceeded to tow her ahead. From this point there is great conflict as to what subsequently occurred. The plaintiff states that the tug towed the Nourmahal a very short distance ahead, and then called upon her to drop her anchor; that the master refused to do so on the ground that it was too near, and would be giving the Friedeberg a foul berth; and that he called and signalled to the tug to let his ship drop astern so as to regain her original anchorage, passing the Friedeberg's port side; that instead of obeying these directions the tug proceeded to turn to starboard under a port helm, with the Nourmahal in her wake, until the latter took the ground about a quarter of a mile from the Friedeberg on her starboard beam. On the other hand, the statement is that the tug towed the Nourmahal to a safe and good anchorage, at least half a mile distant; that on getting there the master of the Nourmahal refused to anchor there, and insisted on his ship being turned and taken to a spot indicated by him; that the master of the tug warned him that if the attempt was made the ship must go aground; but on his insisting he made the attempt, and the ship did take the ground.

It does not seem necessary that I should decide which of these two statements is most consistent with the real truth, though we are decidedly of opinion that the Nourmahal had been towed to a considerable greater distance than her master represents before the tug proceeded to turn her. I am advised by the assessors that when the tug had towed the Nourmahal free of the Friedeberg she was not in a position of danger or of difficulty; that it required only ordinary skill and experience to place her in as good anchorage ground as she was at the time of the collision. I am of opinion therefore, that, whether her getting aground is to be attributed to the fault of those on board the tug or of those on board the Nourmahal, the Friedeberg is not responsible for the consequences.

It then became necessary to consider what portion of the total damage sustained by the Nourmahal is due to the grounding. With respect to this, the master of the Nourmahal admitted that for forty minutes the ship was driving and being pulled over the bank. The chief officer also stated that the ship struck the ground heavily, and heeled over on her side, which caused her to strain very much, and she dragged and bumped very heavily for about half a mile. There is no suggestion that she made any water in the interval between the collision and the grounding, though she did make water directly after grounding. Notwithstanding these statements the owner and the two surveyors employed by him, when the ship got into dock, made light of the damage from the grounding, stating that it was confined to the forefoot, and that from 30*l.* to 40*l.* would suffice to repair it, and they attributed the necessity for all the other repairs to the damage occasioned by the collision before the grounding. With this view I am unable to agree, and I have the entire concurrence of the gentlemen who assist me, in concluding from all the facts and evidence that the damage from the actual collision was comparatively slight, and the more serious injury to the ship was the result of the grounding, which rendered it necessary to strip, remetal, and recaulk the ship. After careful consideration the amount allowed in the schedule is in our opinion ample for the repairs and expenses occasioned by the collision, and includes the expense of placing her in dry dock for the purpose of ascertaining if the contact of the vessels had scraped off or injured any copper below what was visible whilst she was afloat.

The Registrar made no recommendation as to costs. The plaintiffs thereupon served notice of motion upon the defendants calling upon them to show cause why they should not be condemned in the costs of the action and the reference.

Dec. 18, 1884.—Phillimore for the plaintiffs.

Bucknill for the defendants.

Butt, J.—This is a case in which the question of costs is in the discretion of the court. That discretion, as in all cases of discretion, must be exercised with reference to some rule or reason, and not capriciously. The case is one in which the whole injury arose (not in legal sense, but speaking generally) from the wrongful acts of the defendants' servants on board the Friedeberg. She came wrongfully into collision with the Nourmahal, and it was in the course of being towed free from that collision that the latter sustained the injury which she got, some of it by the collision and some of it in being towed to a safe place. It is very true that it is found that the Nourmahal sustained the bulk of the injury in the course of the towage after she had been taken to a place of safety, and therefore, legally, it was not a consequence of the collision. But I think it quite clear that there was a very fair question whether it was not legally a consequence of the collision, and that being so, I do not think any fault ought to be found with the owners of the Nourmahal for bringing their action in this court, because, had they brought it in the County Court, they would at once have debarred themselves from that second portion of their claim. Therefore, I think it is a case in which the plaintiffs ought to have their costs of the action. With regard to the costs of the reference, I cannot see if it was reasonable for the plaintiffs to bring their claim in a superior court, how it can be said that they could not reasonably have put it forward before the registrar. They did put it forward, and failed on the larger part of it, and I think their failure must disentitle them to costs. They have taken the chance of the award and failed. The next question is, ought they to pay the costs of the reference? Having regard to all the circumstances of the case, I think not. I think the proper order to make is that the plaintiffs have the costs of the action, and each party to pay his own costs of the reference.

From this decision the defendants now appealed.

Hall, Q.C. (with him Bucknill) for the appellants.—Having regard to the fact that the registrar has found that the plaintiffs are only entitled to recover the sum of 166*l.* 18*s.* 9*d.*, it is submitted that the action ought never to have been brought in the High Court, and that the plaintiffs should be condemned in the costs. It is also submitted that inasmuch as the plaintiffs at the reference brought in a claim amounting to 1262*l.* 13*s.* 8*d.*, of which only 166*l.* 18*s.* 9*d.* has been allowed, they should, in accordance with the practice of the Admiralty Court, be condemned in the costs of the reference. The rule upon which that court acts is that where the registrar disallows more than one-third of the plaintiff's claim, the plaintiffs are condemned in the costs. Dr. Lushington, in the case of The Empress Eugenie (Lush. 138), condemned the plaintiff in costs where he had failed to substantiate his claim upon a question of law only. According to that learned judge, "I think I should be making a dangerous precedent if I were upon such grounds to relax the ordinary and salutary rule of the court." It is true that in The Gleaner (38 L. T. Rep. N. S. 582; 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 582), and a few other cases the court has departed from the rule, but in the absence of strong reasons the court should follow the practice and condemn the plaintiff in the costs of the reference. In the present case the findings of the registrar clearly show that the plaintiffs must have had ample opportunity of knowing that the defendants were not liable for the larger portion of the claim.

Beaufort (with him Sir Walter Phillimore), for the respondents, was not called upon.

Brett, M.R.—The Court of Admiralty has always had a discretion as to costs, and even if it had not originally it has been given it by the Judicature Act. When a court has such a discretion it is intended that the court shall exercise it in each individual case. If, therefore, a hard-and-fast rule is laid down, the judge's discretion is fettered. With all deference to that eminent judge, Dr. Lushington, when he laid it down as a general rule that if on a reference the plaintiff did not recover a certain proportion of his claim he was to be deprived of or to pay the costs, he did what was wrong. In laying down such a rule he was fettering his own discretion, and that of his successors, which he had no legal power to do. As to the rule which has been alluded to, I doubt if it is a good rule, and in many cases it must work injustice. But inasmuch as the judge of the Admiralty Court is bound to exercise his discretion in each particular case it is wrong to say that there is any rule by which he can be bound. In the present case the learned judge has exercised his discretion, and has given his reasons for the conclusion to which he came, viz., that the plaintiff was entitled to the costs of the action, and ought not to pay the costs of the reference. There is really no ground for interfering with the decision of the learned judge, and, moreover, we also think there is another objection, viz., that there is no appeal from the decision below. On all these grounds we think this appeal must be dismissed.

Bill of exchange—Drawing against particular shipments of goods—Marginal advice of draft—Specific appropriation of shipments—Stoppage in transitu.

J., P., and Co., merchants at Pernambuco, having in the course of their business received orders from customers to purchase goods on their account in New York, instructed S. J. and Co., their agents at Liverpool, to purchase the goods and have them shipped to J., P., and Co. S. J. and Co. then instructed R. B. B., the agent at New York of J. P. and Co. and S. J. and Co., to purchase the goods. R. B. B. purchased the goods and shipped them to J., P., and Co., sending with them the invoices and bills of lading. To provide himself with funds to purchase the goods R. B. B. drew bills of exchange on S. J. and Co. in which were the words "and charged to account as advised." Attached to each bill was a counterfoil headed "Advice of draft." This was addressed to S. J. and Co., mentioned the number, date, and amount of the bill, and concluded with these words (mutatis mutandis), "Against shipments per steamship Glensannox, No. 6, N. Y. to Brazil vid Baltimore. Please protect the drafts as advised above, and oblige drawer, R. B. B. New York, May 9, 1879." These bills were sold for value in New York, and R. B. B. advised S. J. and Co. of the bills, and at the same time forwarded a statement of account. On presentation of the bills for acceptance S. J. and Co. detached the counterfoils and kept possession of them.

On the 10th June 1879 (while the plaintiffs, P., S., and Co. were the holders of these bills, drawn, according to this course of business, in respect of a shipment to J., P., and Co., to whom the bills of lading were at the same time sent) S. J. and Co. suspended payment. The same day the failure was known in New York, and R. B. B., under some pressure from P., S., and Co., telegraphed to J., P., and Co., "Having pledged documents and shipments Glensannox, hold proceeds subject order P., S., and Co." The ship Glensannox arrived at Pernambuco on the 11th June, and the goods were delivered to the customers (of J., P., and Co.) who had ordered them, the purchase money being received by J., P., and Co. The Court found that the bills of lading had been delivered to the customers before the telegram was received. The bills of exchange were dishonoured by S. J. and Co. when presented for acceptance. J., P., and Co. claimed to retain the purchase moneys against moneys alleged to be due to them by S. J. and Co.

Held (affirming the decision of Bacon, V C., 51 L. T. Rep. N. S. 16; 26 Ch. Div. 755), that the goods were not specifically appropriated to meet the bills of exchange, and therefore that P., S., and Co. were not entitled to have the purchase moneys applied in payment of the bills.

Frith v. Forbes (7 L. T. Rep. N. S. 261; 4 De G. F. & J. 409) distinguished.

Held also, on appeal, that even if the telegram had reached J., P., and Co. before the transitus was at an end, it would not operate to stop them in transitu.

AT the date of the agreement hereinafter mentioned, Phelps, Stokes, and Co., the plaintiffs, were bankers at New York; Thomas Comber the defendant, was a member of the firm of Johnston, Pater and Co., of Pernambuco, merchants, and of the firm of Johnston, Comber, and Co., of Bahia; Samuel Johnston and Co. were merchants at Liverpool, and the bankers and agents of the Pernambuco and Bahia firms; and Carruthers Charles Johnston was the sole representative of the Liverpool firm, and also the larger partner in the Pernambuco and Bahia firms.

By an agreement made the 11th Dec. 1877, between C. C. Johnston, of Liverpool, of the one part, and R. B. Borland of the other; after reciting that C. C. Johnston was desirous of appointing the said R. B. Borland as agent to represent the partnership firms of Samuel Johnston and Co. of Liverpool, Johnston, Pater, and Co. of Pernambuco, and Johnston, Comber, and Co. of Bahia, on commission in the United States of America for the term of five years from the 1st Jan. 1878, upon the terms and conditions thereinafter contained, it was agreed between the parties thereto as follows:

That the said R. B. Borland shall, for and during the period of five years from the said first day of Jan. 1878, enter into the service of the said C. C. Johnston, and well and faithfully act for him as agent on commission, as may from time to time be required by him, the said C. C. Johnston, in the United States of America, and shall and will, during the said term, diligently attend the business concerns of the said C. C. Johnston and the said firms of Samuel Johnston and Co., Liverpool,

(a) Reported by FRANK EVANS, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Johnston, Pater, and Co., Pernambuco, and Johnston, Comber, and Co., Bahia. That all business transactions by the said R. B. Borland on behalf of the said firms shall be charged by commission only, in conformity with the rates which have been heretofore charged by the said R. B. Borland since the 1st Jan. 1873, under a written agreement and power bearing date 28th Dec. 1872. Provided, however, that in cases of mutual agreement, the scale of commissions may be modified by the parties to this agreement as circumstances warrant.

That the said R. B. Borland shall not enter into any speculative business whatever, but confine himself entirely to that of commissions only, and in case of any other commissions being offered to him by other firms, he shall first submit the same for the approval of the said C. C. Johnston, in writing, before proceeding with the transaction thereof.

That the said R. B. Borland shall be at liberty to make advances on shipments of produce consigned to the said C. C. Johnston, to the extent of not exceeding three-fourths of the net value thereof, and he is hereby authorised and empowered to draw on the said Samuel Johnston and Co. for the amount of all such advances, and also for the amount of any orders given by the said firms of Samuel Johnston and Co., Johnston, Pater, and Co., and Johnston, Comber, and Co.

That the said R. B. Borland shall use his best endeavours and utmost exertions in obtaining consignments of and orders for produce in connection with the said firms.

From the date of the agreement, until May 1879, R. B. Borland was the general agent in New York of the three firms.

The ordinary course of dealing between the firms and Borland was as follows: The Pernambuco and Bahia firms, having received instructions from persons in Brazil for the purchase of North American goods, instructed the Liverpool firm to purchase the goods and have them shipped to the Pernambuco and Bahia firms. The Liverpool firm then instructed Borland, as their agent at New York, to purchase the goods, and he purchased them and shipped them to the Pernambuco and Bahia firms, at the same time sending them the invoices and bills of lading of the shipments. To provide himself with money to pay for the goods Borland drew bills of exchange on the Liverpool firm and sold the bills in New York in the ordinary way on the market. The bills of exchange were not drawn for the precise amount of the shipments, but for round sums, which were brought into the account current between the Liverpool firm and Borland. Every bill of exchange drawn by Borland had annexed to it a counterfoil with a perforated line between the bill and the counterfoil, the bill and counterfoil being together in the following form:

Advice of Draft.

Amount 1500*l.* 0/0.

Against Shipts. per s.s. Glensannox No. 6, N.Y. to Brazil via Balt.

Please protect the drafts as advised above, and oblige drawer. R. B. Borland, New York. May 9th, 1879.

Exchange for 1500*l.* 0/0

New York, May 9th, 1879.

Sixty days after sight of this first of exchange (second and third of same tenor and date being unpaid) pay to my order the sum of 1500*l.* sterling, value received, and charge the same to account as advised.

(Signed) R. B. Borland.

To Messrs. Samuel Johnston and Co., Liverpool.

No. 401. Payable in London.

Borland advised the bills drawn by him to the Liverpool firm, and with his advice forwarded a statement of the account current between them.

On presentation of the bills of exchange for acceptance, Samuel Johnston and Co. accepted the bills, and detached the counterfoils, and retained them in their own possession.

In May 1879 the Pernambuco firm ordered the Liverpool firm to send certain goods to them for some of their customers in Brazil; the Liverpool firm sent the order to R. B. Borland, who bought the goods in New York.

R. B. Borland sent the goods, with the invoices and the bills of lading, by the steamship Glensannox to the Pernambuco firm, to the order of the customers who had ordered the goods from that firm, and to pay for the goods drew three bills of exchange upon the firm of Samuel Johnston and Co. One numbered 401 was dated the 9th May 1879, and was drawn for a sum of 1500*l.* payable on the 23rd July 1879, and the other two numbered respectively 402 and 404, were dated the 16th May 1879, and drawn for sums of 1500*l.* and 2000*l.* respectively payable on the 30th July 1879.

Each of the bills of exchange had the usual counterfoil attached, and was in the form above, mutatis mutandis.

R. B. Borland sent the bills of exchange, and copies of the bills of lading, to Samuel Johnston and Co., and in the meantime sold the bills to Phelps, Stokes, and Co., in New York.

On the 10th June 1879, whilst Phelps, Stokes, and Co. were the holders of the bills, Samuel Johnston and Co. stopped payment, and on the same day, immediately on ascertaining this fact, the plaintiffs and R. B. Borland telegraphed to Pernambuco, informing Johnston, Pater, and Co. (who had been previously instructed as to the purchase and shipment of the goods, and as to the three bills being drawn against and charged on the said goods) that they must hold the said shipments by the Glensannox, and the proceeds of the sale thereof, as security to the plaintiffs as the holders of the bills. The telegram was as follows:

Having pledged documents and shipment Glensannox hold proceeds subject order Phelps, Stokes, and Co. and Bank British North America.

The Glensannox arrived at Pernambuco on the 11th June, and the defendant, or his firm of Johnston, Pater, and Co., obtained possession of the goods, transferred them to the Brazilian purchasers, and received the proceeds, which they claimed to retain against a debt, or balance of account, due to them from the Liverpool firm.

There was some conflict in the evidence whether the goods had arrived at Pernambuco before the telegram was received.

The bills of exchange, on presentation for payment, were dishonoured by the Liverpool firm, and the plaintiffs in the present action claimed to have the amount of the three bills in their hands paid out of the proceeds of the goods, on the ground that they had been specifically appropriated to meet the bills; but Bacon, V.C. held there was no such appropriation, and dismissed the action: (51 L. T. Rep. N. S. 16; 26 Ch. Div. 755.)

The plaintiffs appealed.

R. T. Reid, Q.C. and Northmore Lawrence for the appellants.—The bills of exchange, with the "advices of draft" annexed, gave the plaintiffs a lien or charge on the goods against which the bills were drawn, and the goods or the proceeds were specifically appropriated to meet the bills:

Frith v. Forbes, 7 L. T. Rep. N. S. 261; 4 De G. F. & J. 409;

Ireland v. Livingston, 27 L. T. Rep. N. S. 79; L. Rep. 5 E. & I. App. 395.

Even if there was no specific appropriation, the telegram to Pernambuco operated as a stoppage in transitu of the goods by Borland acting for the benefit of the plaintiffs:

Marten, Q.C. and F. Thompson, for the defendants, were not called upon.

Cotton, L.J.—This is an appeal from a judgment of Bacon, V.C., and the object of the appellants is to make out that they have a lien on certain goods. The facts of the case are rather complicated. There was a firm at Pernambuco and another at Liverpool, and Mr. Borland was, I will assume, appointed agent in New York on behalf of those two firms. There was another firm at Bahia, but I leave that out because it is immaterial. The parties to the Liverpool firm and the Pernambuco firm were, I think, practically the same people, but it is unnecessary to consider that now. The course of business was this: The Pernambuco firm, having received instructions from natives to buy goods for them, sent to the Liverpool firm, and the Liverpool firm directed Mr. Borland to buy in North America whatever was required by the Pernambuco firm. Then Mr. Borland shipped the goods, not to the Liverpool firm from which he received the instructions as to buying them, but to the Pernambuco firm. In order to provide himself with money to pay for the goods, Mr. Borland drew bills on the Liverpool firm, and discounted or sold them in the market. The appellants are persons who bought certain bills which had been drawn by Borland on the Liverpool house in order to provide for cargo which he was sending to the Pernambuco house for the benefit of the native buyers.

Now, the first question which was argued, and which we have to decide, is whether the purchasers of those bills had, either by independent agreement, or by the agreement which it is alleged appears on the face of the bills, a lien or charge on the cargo sent to Pernambuco for the amount of the bills. It is unnecessary to go through the evidence on the question as to whether there was any express charge besides that which it is alleged appears upon the bills, because, in my opinion, the evidence does not show that there was anything like an agreement outside what appears on the bills to give to the purchasers of the bills a charge on the cargo, to pay for which the bills were undoubtedly drawn. But then we come to the bills of exchange, and they are in a somewhat extraordinary form, because annexed to each bill, as it would be presented in Liverpool, there was a counterfoil or margin of paper to be detached in Liverpool, with a perforated line showing where it was to be torn off. [His Lordship read one of the counterfoils, as set out above, and continued:] It is said that that of itself, reasonably interpreted, and as it would be reasonably understood by any banker or other person dealing with these bills, creates a charge upon the goods to buy which this bill had been drawn and negotiated. I cannot accede to that view. What is it? It is not a direction to be shown to or sent to the persons who are to receive the cargo; it is simply a direction to be sent to the persons who have ordered the cargo to be sent, and into whose hands the cargo would never come, they not even having the bills of lading, and it is to be detached by them. I do not say it would have created a charge even if sent to the persons to whom the cargo was sent. I am by no means satisfied that merely saying that the bill is drawn against a certain cargo, even when that notice is sent to the person to whom the cargo is consigned, will give a lien or charge on the cargo. But here the direction is sent to entirely different persons; and I should say, not being a mercantile man, that if that direction is sent, not to the person who is to have the command of the goods, or to whom the goods are consigned, but to someone who is a correspondent or agent of that person, and on whom the bills are drawn for the purpose of providing for that cargo, it is a mere indication to him that the bills of exchange are really bills drawn under the arrangement that he should accept bills for the purpose of enabling cargoes to be purchased and shipped to their correspondent in Pernambuco. It is to satisfy the person to whom the bills are sent that they are bills legitimately drawn under the arrangements existing between the parties, and also to tell him how he is to keep the accounts with reference to that and other shipments. To my mind it in no way conveys anything like the idea that there is an intention to create a charge or lien on the cargo.

But it is said that there is the authority of two eminent judges in Frith v. Forbes against that view. When Frith v. Forbes is relied upon, as it often is, almost every judge before whom the case comes says that it must have been decided on the special circumstances of the case. James, L.J., when it came before him in Robey and Co.'s Perseverance Ironworks v. Ollier, said: "I am of opinion, therefore, that the plaintiffs have no such lien as they claim, and that their bill was rightly dismissed. The decision in Frith v. Forbes turned upon special circumstances, and can hardly be treated as governing any other case." James, L.J., therefore, clearly did not understand the case of Frith v. Forbes, as laying down the principle that a mere statement communicated to the consignees of goods that the bill is drawn against those goods, will of itself give a charge. Mellish, L.J. said: "I am of the same opinion. The indorsement of a bill gives only a right to the bill, and I do not think that any mercantile man would suppose, because he saw in the bill the words 'which place to account cargo per A.,' that he was to have a lien on that cargo." James, L.J. also said: "I am not prepared to say that, merely because a bill of exchange purports to be drawn against a particular cargo, it carries a lien on that cargo into the hands of every holder of the bill." Upon what special ground Frith v. Forbes was decided it is hardly necessary for us now to consider; but it is obvious that, although the question as to whether the plaintiffs in that case had a lien or charge created in favour of themselves, was of importance, yet the real question was whether Forbes and Co., who were the defendants, could insist upon their general lien as against the claim of the plaintiffs (assuming the plaintiffs had a claim), Forbes and Co. having received the goods under special instructions with reference to the bills, intending that they should accept the bills and provide for payment. Forbes and Co. refused to accept the bills, and yet wanted to keep the goods for themselves, and that really was the principal matter of contest. Without entering further into Frith v. Forbes, it is sufficient, in my opinion, to say that here the direction was not given to the person to whom the goods were consigned, but to another person, who never would have the goods in his possession or under his control. I should also mention that in the case referred to, of Ex parte Devers; Re Suse (51 L. T. N. S. 437; 13 Q. B. Div. 766), one at least of the present Lords Justices said that Frith v. Forbes was decided under special circumstances, and Lindley, L. J. expressed himself as not considering that it laid down the general principle which was there contended for. But I think we ought not to consider Frith v. Forbes as an authority governing the present case, and I am of opinion, especially having regard to the distinction which I have mentioned, that there was no charge on the cargo created in favour of the billholders, either by express agreement, or by that which appears on the face of those bills, or rather on the face of the documents temporarily annexed to the bills, but to be severed from them when the bills were accepted in Liverpool.

Now we come to the other part of the case. The failure of the Liverpool firm was known in New York on the 10th June, and then there was an interview between Mr. Borland and the plaintiffs, who had purchased the bills. It is unnecessary to consider what took place between them, because I decide the case entirely without reference to that. On the same day a telegram was sent to the Pernambuco firm, and for the purpose of my judgment I will assume, though I do not decide, that that telegram reached the Pernambuco firm at the time when the transitus of goods was not at an end, that is to say, while the goods were still in transitu.

Now, let us consider what stoppage in transitu is. It is a right given to an unpaid vendor, at any time while the goods are still in transitu, that is to say, while they are in the hands of the shipowner as carrier. It is a retaking by the unpaid vendor on the cancellation of the contract as some people say, or, as I should rather say, a resumption of possession, for the purpose of insisting on his lien for the price, at any time while the goods are in the hands of the carrier, and have not reached the hands of the purchaser or consignee, and are not in his possession. What is the consequence of the vendor resuming possession? The vendor cannot exercise the right to the prejudice of purchasers for value, but if he takes possession before the purchase money has been paid, he may say: "I cannot prejudice you, but I can hold the goods till you pay me the money." If there has been a mortgage, he can seize the goods subject to the rights of the mortgagee to have the money paid. The consequence of his taking possession of the goods to enforce his vendor's lien is, that he has a right, before he hands over the goods, to receive from the purchasers any money which may be still unpaid by them. Now is this telegram in any way a stoppage in transitu? In my opinion it is not. [His Lordship read the telegram above set out, and continued:] Now, in my opinion, on the mere construction of that document, it is not a declaration that the vendor intends to retake possession. It assumes that the goods will be handed over to the purchasers, and that they will be paid for, because it is not "hold the goods," but "hold proceeds" subject to the order of Phelps, Stokes, and Co. Now I omit all reference to the question how far this telegram would have been effectual to stop the goods in transitu if it had been sent to the consignees, and not to the carrier; but I in no way express any opinion in favour of the view that it would have been effectual if it had been sent to the consignees. It is not, in my opinion, anything which expresses an intention to retake possession; it is simply an attempted direction as to the way in which the proceeds of this cargo are to be dealt with, and in my opinion there was no right to give any such direction. The case of the Pernambuco firm was, that they had already money in the hands of their agents at Liverpool, who, they say, were largely indebted to them; that the bills were drawn as against that. And what they have done is to carry the proceeds of this cargo to their own credit in the account between themselves and the Liverpool firm. Whether that is right or not we need not now decide. All we have to decide is, that the plaintiffs, the holders of these bills of exchange, have not, either in consequence of the lien claimed on the goods, or in consequence of what is said to be, but is not, a stoppage in transitu, any right to have the proceeds of these goods applied in payment of the bills. In my opinion, the appeal fails.

Lindley, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The first question is, What rights, if any, did the plaintiffs acquire, as the discounters of these bills, to have the goods against which they were drawn applied specifically in taking up the bills. Now, as mere discounters of bills of exchange not accompanied by a bill of lading, they would have no such right at all; but it is said that, in consequence of what took place between Mr. Borland and the plaintiffs, and having regard to that memorandum attached to the bills of exchange, the discounters of the bill acquired that right. The bill of exchange had attached to it a memorandum which is, I fancy, rather unusual, but it is an important document. [His Lordship stated the effect of the counterfoil, and continued:] That memorandum was annexed to each of the bills of exchange when the plaintiffs discounted them, and it appears that in the course of business between the parties the bills of exchange, with that memorandum attached, would be presented for acceptance to the Liverpool firm, Samuel Johnston and Co.; that Samuel Johnston and Co. would then tear off that memorandum and keep it. It is a direction, advice, or order to them; and they tear it off and keep it in order that they may have the memorandum and act upon it. The discounters of the bill, the plaintiffs, are then left with the bills of exchange, but they do not get the bills of lading. The bills of lading were never attached to the bills of exchange at all, and the plaintiffs never get the ordinary security on the goods which discounters of bills of exchange with bills of lading annexed would get. The bills of lading were sent to Pernambuco and so were the goods; neither the bills of lading nor the goods were sent to Liverpool. Can it be established that, under these circumstances, the plaintiffs have any lien on the goods at all by virtue of this memorandum? In other words it comes to this, whether a transaction under such circumstances as these can for any purpose be regarded as practically equivalent to getting the bill of lading. It is clear that that question only has to be asked to answer itself, and from such a transaction that result is wholly unknown so far as I am aware. Quite apart from Frith v. Forbes, there is no case which warrants the idea that in a transaction of this kind the discounter of the bill of exchange gets a lien on the goods against which it was drawn. Frith v. Forbes is clearly distinguishable on the ground to which Cotton, L.J. has alluded; and it appears to me that, so far as authorities and decisions go, they are rather against than in favour of the contention that by this memorandum, and what took place when the bill of exchange was discounted, the discounter got any claim on the goods. I quite concur in the view taken by Bacon, V.C. that the discounters made inquiries whether these were honest commercial bills drawn against goods in the ordinary way, and that they trusted to the solvency and respectability of the drawees. That appears to be the real truth of the transaction so far.

It is then said that, apart from that, the plaintiffs have a lien, if not on the goods, at all events on the proceeds of the sale of the goods, by what took place on the 10th June 1879. At that time the ship was about to arrive at Pernambuco—she did arrive on the 11th June. The bills of lading had gone forward to Pernambuco; the Liverpool firm had not got them, and did not intend to have them, still less had the discounters of the bills. But, under more or less pressure and certain threats, Borland seems to have sent a telegram to Pernambuco. I am like the Vice-Chancellor, I do not treat those threats as amounting to duress. But Borland was under constraint to send the telegram on which so much stress has been laid. That telegram began with a statement which was inaccurate in point of fact, because he never had pledged the goods. What effect, if any, had that telegram on the rights of the parties? I confess it appears to me to have had none whatever. Mr. Borland had no right at that time to dictate to the Pernambuco firm how they were to deal with the proceeds of the sale of those goods. It is said that he was in a position to stop the goods in transitu. I will assume that he was, and that he was agent for the vendors, or in such a position that he might have stopped the goods in transitu. He certainly did nothing of the kind, and never intended to do anything of the kind, and the probability is, that if he had thought of it, he would have seen it was hopeless for him to try to stop the goods in transitu at all. In point of fact, as I understand from the evidence, the goods had arrived in Pernambuco, and the bills of lading had been handed to the native buyers before this telegram reached the hands of the Pernambuco firm, I think that is made out when one comes to study the time, though it runs very fine. [His Lordship discussed the evidence on this point, and continued:] It so happens that the telegram came too late to stop the goods, and what is quite as important to my mind, is that there was no intention on the part of Borland to stop them. He wanted to impound, for the present plaintiffs, the proceeds of the sale of the goods, and he had no right to do that. This is a most unfortunate occurrence so far as the plaintiffs are concerned, but it does not appear to me to be consistent with the principles on which this court and the other courts in this country always act in matters of this kind to hold that they are entitled to succeed in this action. The plaintiffs are in the unfortunate position of being unsecured and not secured creditors.

Fry, L.J.—I entirely concur in what has been said by my brother Lord Justices. On the first point, it appears to me that, whether you look at the parol evidence or at the advice or draft attached to the bill of exchange, no specific lien or appropriation is made out. I adopt the language of James, L.J. in Robey and Co.'s Perseverance Ironworks v. Ollier, where he said: "I am not prepared to say that merely because a bill of exchange purports to be drawn against a particular cargo it carries a lien on that cargo into the hands of every holder of the bill." It appears to me that in the present case all that took place was some assertion of what was perfectly true, that these bills were drawn against an actual transaction, and that they were not accommodation bills. If the argument which has been addressed to us were to succeed it would appear to me to follow that every bill of exchange which represented a real transaction, at the bottom of which, to use a common expression I believe, there were goods, would be a bill giving a lien upon the goods which formed the subject of that transaction. That appears to me to be neither law nor mercantile usage.

With regard to the "advice of draft," it appears to me that there was no intention whatever of creating by that instrument any charge in favour of the bill of exchange. The nature of the instrument really contradicts any such contention. The document was to be presented to the drawee of the bill; it was to induce him to accept the bill, and on acceptance it was to be retained by him. This "advice of draft," therefore, would neither travel into all the hands which might hold the bill of exchange, nor would it travel into the hands of those to whom the bill of lading would come. It would go, therefore, neither with the bill of exchange nor with the bill of lading, and if it went with neither it seems to me that it was very ill calculated to create a charge on the produce of the one in favour of the holder of the other. With regard to the second question I come to the same conclusion as my learned brethren. Assuming even, which I do not for the present moment doubt, that Mr. Borland may have had the right of stoppage in transitu; assuming, which I certainly am not yet convinced of, that he might have stopped in transitu by a notice addressed neither to the shipowners nor to the captain, but to the consignee—I say, assuming both those propositions in favour of the appellants, that it remains to be considered whether Mr. Borland did exercise such a right of stoppage as he might have had. In my judgment he neither exercised it nor intended to do so. The telegram which he sent suggests that he had already created a pledge upon the property by some previous transaction, and purports to give effect to that pledge by a direction as to the mode in which the proceeds of the cargo should be dealt with. In my opinion, he had no right to give any such direction with regard to the cargo, and therefore, whatever Mr. Borland's rights to stop in transitu might have been, in my judgment, if he had the right, he did not exercise it. The appeal, therefore, must be dismissed with costs.

Appeal dismissed with costs.

Bill of exchange—Drawing against particular shipments of goods—Letter of advice—Specific appropriation—Equitable assignment.

The purchasers of bills of exchange, on the face of which there is a direction to the drawees to charge the amounts thereof against particular shipments of goods, who do not receive therewith the bills of lading, do not obtain thereby any lien or charge on the shipments. The statement in the bills only amounts to a representation that the bills are regular and actually drawn against shipments, and not accommodation bills. And even when, in addition to such a direction in the bills of exchange, the letter of advice by the consignors to the consignees incloses the bills of lading, and states that against the consignments the consignor's value on them for a particular sum in favour of the bill holder (naming him), there is no specific appropriation of the shipments or the proceeds of sale to meet the bills.

If the court in Frith v. Forbes (7 L. T. Rep. N. S. 261; 4 De G. F. & J. 409) did not rely on the special circumstances of that case as showing in fact that a specific appropriation had been agreed on, but intended to lay down as a principle of law that such a letter of advice of itself constituted a specific appropriation in favour of the consignor, the decision in Frith v. Forbes is now overruled.

The plaintiffs B., S., and Co., purchased at the New York Market, in the ordinary way, from A. B. and Co., provision merchants at New York, bills of exchange, drawn by A. B. and Co. on the defendant K. (a provision merchant in London), an example of which was: "Exchange for 2,500l. Sixty days after sight of this first of exchange (second and third unpaid) pay to the order of B. S., and Co., in London, 2500l., sterling, value received, and charge the same to account of cheese per 'Britannic' and lard per 'Greece' as advised." On the same day B., S., and Co. wrote K.: "We inclose bill of lading for 1558 boxes [of cheese] per Britannic,' and against these, and lard per 'Greece,' we value on you at sixty days' sight for 2500l., favour B., S., and Co." The proved course of dealing between A. B. and Co. and K. was, that A. B. and Co. were in the habit of drawing on K. in anticipation of sales, the bills frequently referring to specific shipments; that K. was not under any agreement to accept bills; that any bills accepted by K. were on the general credit of the drawers; that, as between K. and A. B. and Co. there was no specific appropriation of the shipments to meet the bills; that the proceeds of sale of the shipments were carried to the credit of A. B. and Co. in their general account with K.; and that the amount of bills accepted by K. were carried to the debit of A. B. and Co. in the same account.

A. B. and Co. having suspended payment, K. refused to accept the bills. On the arrival of the "Britannic" and "Greece" in England, K. took possession of and sold the shipments of cheese and lard, and claimed to retain a portion of the proceeds of sale in payment of the balance due to him on his general account with A. B. and Co.

Held, affirming the decision of Chitty, J. that the shipments were not specifically appropriated to meet the bills, and, therefore, that B., S., and Co. were not entitled to have any of the proceeds of sale applied in payment thereof.

Archibald Baxter and Co., who were provision merchants at New York, on the 5th and 6th Aug. 1875, consigned to Thomas Kough, one of the defendants, a provision merchant in London, carrying on business as "Jones Brothers," a quantity of lard per the ship Greece, and a quantity of cheese per the ship Britannic. Baxter and Co. were in the habit of consigning goods to Kough, and drawing bills of exchange upon his firm. There was no evidence that there was a separate account of the consignments, or that the money arising from sales had been treated as belonging to the consigning firm.

On the 5th Aug 1875 Baxter and Co. drew a bill of exchange in the following form:

Archibald Baxter & Co.

New York, 5th Aug. 1875.

Exchange for £2500.

Sixty days after sight of this first of exchange (second and third unpaid), pay to the order of Messrs. Brown, Shipley and Co., in London, two thousand five hundred pounds sterling, value received, and charge the same to account of cheese per Britannic, and lard per Greece as advised.

Messrs. Jones Brothers, London.

(Signed) Archibald Baxter and Co.

No. 3512.

On the same day Archibald Baxter and Co. wrote and sent to Kough a letter, of which the material part was as follows:

Inclosed please find invoice and bill of lading for fifty tierces lard on account of Mr. Chidley. . . . We are shipping you further about 3000 boxes choice cheese. . . . We inclose bill of lading for 1558 boxes per Britannic, and against these and lard per Greece we value on you at sixty day's sight for 2500*l.* favour Brown, Shipley, and Co.

On the 6th Aug. 1875 Archibald Baxter and Co. drew a bill of exchange in the following form:

Archibald Baxter & Co.

New York, 6th Aug. 1875.

Exchange £1000.

Sixty days after sight of this first of exchange (second and third unpaid) pay to the order of Messrs. Brown, Shipley, and Co., in London, one thousand pounds sterling, value received, and charge the same to account of cheese per Britannic.

Messrs. Jones Brothers, London.

(Signed) Archibald Baxter and Co.

No. 3515.

On the 6th Aug. 1875 Archibald Baxter and Co. sent Kough the following letter:

Confirming our respects of yesterday we have now to hand you invoice for 3298 boxes and B. L. for 1740 boxes cheese per Britannic, on account of which we value on you at sixty days for 1000*l.* favour Brown, Shipley, and Co.

We expect by to-morrow's German mail to draw to a point.

The plaintiffs purchased the bills of exchange from Archibald Baxter and Co., and afterwards, on the 7th Aug. 1875, Archibald Baxter and Co. stopped payment.

On the 24th Dec. 1875 Archibald Baxter and Co. were adjudicated bankrupts in New York, and the defendant Tappan was appointed trustee in the bankruptcy.

Before the goods arrived, or the bills of exchange were presented for acceptance, Kough had notice that Archibald Baxter and Co. had stopped payment, and when the bills were presented for acceptance on the 17th and 18th Aug. 1875, he refused to accept them. On the 19th and 20th Oct. 1875, he refused to pay them when they were presented for payment.

The consignments, on their arrival in England, were taken possession of by Kough, and sold, and he claimed, out of the proceeds received by him, to retain certain sums alleged to be due to him on his general account with Archibald Baxter and Co. The rest of the money he paid into court in a suit of Dennistoun v. Kough.

The plaintiffs in the present action claimed a declaration that they were entitled, in priority to all other persons, to a valid charge on the consignments, and the proceeds of sale thereof, for the amount of the two bills of exchange, and were entitled to have such proceeds applied in or towards satisfaction of the bills.

Chitty, J., before whom the case was heard, found that there was no special agreement when the plaintiff purchased the bills, but that the bills were purchased on the market in the ordinary way. The evidence on this point is stated in the judgment of Chitty, J.

The course of dealing between Archibald Baxter and Co. and the defendant Kough is fully stated in the judgments of Chitty, J. and the Court of Appeal. Shortly stated, it was that although the New York firm were in the habit of drawing on Jones Brothers in anticipation of sales, and the bills so drawn frequently referred to certain consignments, Jones Brothers were not under any engagement to accept the bills; that when Kough did accept bills, he did so on the general credit of the drawers, and that there was, as between these two firms, no specific appropriation of consignments to meet bills, the net proceeds of the sales of all consignments being carried to the credit of the general account of Archibald Baxter and Co., with Jones Brothers, and the amount of all bills drawn by Archibald Baxter and Co. and accepted by Jones Brothers, being debited against Archibald Baxter and Co. in the same account.

There was conflicting evidence of certain mercantile men with regard to the meaning and effect of such bills of exchange as those set out above, but the only passage material to this report is one which occurred in the affidavit of Mr. G. E. Bowring, of No. 7, East India-avenue, in the city of London, merchant, which was in these words:

I say that mercantile men, when purchasing bills of exchange, on the face of which there is a direction to the persons on whom such bills are drawn to charge the amounts thereof against particular shipments of goods or merchandise, do not, according to my experience of the custom of merchants, understand therefrom that they obtain any lien or charge upon those particular shipments, but only that the bills are regular, and are actually drawn against shipments, and are not accommodation bills; and that it is the custom of merchants, when buying bills of exchange, if they desire to have a lien or charge on the goods shipped, against which such bills are drawn, to require to have delivered to them the bills of lading and other shipping documents relating to those goods.

Chitty, J.—This case has occupied a considerable time, chiefly by reason of the supposed state of the authorities, but it appears to me to be a simple case. The plaintiffs are holders of certain bills of exchange, drawn by Baxter and Co., of New York upon their agents in Liverpool, Jones & Co.; the plaintiffs claim to have an equitable charge upon the proceeds of certain cargoes which were consigned about the same time that the bills were drawn by Baxter and Co. to Jones and Co. The property in the goods consigned at the time of these transactions was undoubtedly in Baxter and Co., and it was competent for them to create a valid charge or lien on the goods. The plaintiffs claim to be equitable assigns. The other parties to the action, are the defendant Tappan—who is the trustee in the bankruptcy of Baxter and Co., the consignors, and the owners of the cargo, subject to the questions which will have to be decided in this action—and the defendant Kough, who represents the house of Jones and Co. at Liverpool, the consignees of the cargoes and drawees of the bill. After the bill had been bought by the plaintiffs in New York, Baxter and Co. became bankrupt, and notice of their bankruptcy reached the defendant Kough in this country before the bills were presented or the goods were received by him, and he declined to accept the bills of exchange which were afterwards presented to him in due course. The plaintiffs, as they claim an equitable charge, must found their case upon agreement. An agreement to pay out of the fund is a good equitable charge. It matters not whether it be to pay an existing debt, or a sum of money advanced at the time, or whether it be a bill of exchange; but it must be shown, on the part of those who assert an equitable charge, that they have obtained it by agreement. The agreement may be shown by producing a written document which is clear, or the agreement may be fairly derived from the course of dealing; and where there is a contest as to an oral agreement, the court must decide whether there is such an oral agreement or not. The point which the plaintiffs have to make out in this case is, that there is an agreement amounting to an equitable charge or an equitable assignment of part of the fund. Such an agreement may be shown by the general terms which the parties came to with reference to the supposed course of dealing, and may be derived also from the course of dealing itself, relating to transactions that have been entered into, or transactions which it is proposed should be entered into, or it may be shown, by the special terms agreed upon at the time when the transaction takes place. There never was any special agreement at the time when the bills were bought by the plaintiffs. So far the case stands clear of all difficulty. The plaintiffs bought the bills on the market in the ordinary way, and therefore they are thrown back upon some terms which are alleged by them to have been arranged on a previous occasion, and to have been intended to govern the course of dealing in regard to the purchase of the bills throughout the transactions which might thereafter ensue. Have the plaintiffs shown any such agreement as that? The evidence on the part of the plaintiffs is complained in paragraph 3 of the affidavit of Mr. Johnson, a member of the plaintiffs' firm. He says: "Prior to purchasing the said bills of exchange I made inquiries of Archibald Baxter, a member of the firm of Archibald Baxter and Co., by whom the said bills were drawn, and he personally assured me that all bills that would be drawn by him upon his correspondents in England, including Jones Bros. of London, were regular, and against shipments specified in the advices of his said firm to his correspondents, including Messrs. Jones Bros., upon whom said bills were drawn." That statement simply amounts to this, that when the plaintiffs purchased the drafts they were assured that the bills were good mercantile bills—not accommodation bills, but bills actually drawn against shipments specified in advices—in other words, that they were regular bills drawn in the ordinary course in a proper mercantile transaction. There is not one word there which shows that the parties buying the bills were to have a charge on the proceeds, and it appears from the rest of the evidence that such a thing had not entered into the minds of the parties at all. [His Lordship discussed some other evidence on this head, and continued:]

The plaintiffs have failed to prove an agreement relating to the particular transaction, or any agreement derived from the course of dealing as between the drawers and sellers of the bills and the purchasers of the bills. The course of dealing between the consignors and consignees was this: The consignees, Jones Brothers, were under no obligation to accept the bills. The goods which they were receiving were more or less of a perishable nature, and, before they accepted any particular bill, they considered what the cargo was, and only accepted the bill when they thought that the cargo would form a sufficient security. But they did not rely on the particular cargo which was coming forward, because the course of business was that the proceeds of the sales of the various cargoes, of which they were in course of receipt, were carried to a general account, and when they accepted the bills they had the security of the general account, that is to say, the proceeds of the various cargoes then either undisposed of or in the course of being disposed of, out of which they could have repaid themselves the amount of acceptances. The course of dealing between the consignors and consignees, if it be looked to with a view to assist the plaintiffs, so far from being favourable to them, is adverse to them.

I propose now to say a few words on the particular documents, on which great reliance was placed in the opening of the case. I assume that it is now settled law that a mere reference, on the face of the bill, to a cargo, showing that the bill is drawn (to use a term in mercantile language) as against the cargo, does not create any charge or lien in favour of the bill holder as against the cargo or the proceeds of the cargo. In Robey and Co.'s Perseverance Iron Works v. Ollier (27 L. T. Rep. N. S. 362; L. Rep. 7 Ch. App. 695) Mellish, L.J. says: "The indorsement of a bill gives only a right to the bill, and I do not think that any mercantile man would suppose, because he saw in the bill the words 'which place to account cargo per A.,' that he was to have a lien on that cargo." And in Ex parte Arbuthnot; Re Entwistle (3 Ch. Div. 477), the bill on the face of it referred to the cargo, the words being, "and place the same to account cotton shipments, as advised, with or without further advice," but it was there held that there was no specific appropriation. In the case before me the bills of exchange do contain such an intimation. In the first bill, the one for 2500*l.*, the words are, "and charge the same to account of cheese per Britannic and lard per Greece," with the words "as advised." On the same day a letter of advice was sent by the drawer of the bill to the consignee of the cargo, that is to say, by Baxter and Co. to Jones Brothers, containing these words, "we enclose bill of lading 1558 boxes per Britannic, and against these and lard per Greece we value on you at sixty days for 2500*l.*" The second bill of exchange refers to a cargo in the same way as the first, with this exception, that it does not contain the words "as advised," and the letter of advice is in similar terms to the letter which I have already read. The plaintiffs undoubtedly started this case on a footing very different from that which they have been able to maintain after the evidence that has been gone into. It is stated in the 9th paragraph of the statement of claim that there was a distinct communication to the plaintiffs of the letters of advice before they bought the bills, that the plaintiffs "purchased the said bills on the faith of the letters, and in the belief that by the said bills and letters the said consignments and the proceeds of sale thereof were specifically appropriated to meet the said bills," but when the evidence is examined, it is admitted that there is not one tittle of evidence to support that statement beyond such evidence as is found on the face of the bills themselves. Counsel for the plaintiffs attempted to give great force to the words, "as advised" in the first bill, knowing that when they did that, to a certain extent they were weakening their case upon the second bill. It appears to me that the words "as advised" having regard to the circumstances of this case, make no difference whatever. If there had been a contest between the parties as to whether the letters of advice had been communicated or not, the insertion of those words upon the face of the bill might have been material; but I am asked to take the words "as advised," and to draw the inference from them that there was a specific agreement with reference to creating a charge on the cargo, in the face of the facts which are proved. I have all the facts before me as to what did take place, and upon those facts I say unhesitatingly that there is no ground for the suggestion that there was any specific agreement entered into at the time. The words "as advised" were put in without any reason, and without any intention on the part of the person who inserted them on the face of the bill to refer to any particular agreement. That the words "as advised" were thrown in without any special ground is, to my mind, clear, and it is acknowledged that there is no distinction between the case arising on the bill of the 5th Aug. and the case arising on the bill of the 6th Aug., and on the face of the latter bill there are no such words. There are words thrown in which, to my mind, have no special meaning, and I decline to infer from the words "as advised," that there was an agreement, when I am satisfied in point of fact that there was none. The letters of advice were sent by the consignors to the consignees, but, if there was no agreement binding the consignors, and creating as against them an equitable obligation to allow the proceeds of the goods to be applied in payment of the bills, the letters of advice amount only to instructions by the principal to the agent, which, of course (unless embodied in an agreement between the principal and the purchaser of the bill), would be revocable at will. And in the case before me such instructions would, of course, be revoked by the bankruptcy which intervened shortly after the letters of advice were sent, because, by the intervention of the bankruptcy, the property in the goods was changed, and Baxter and Co. were no longer owners of the goods, but the trustee in bankruptcy became the owner in their place. From what I have stated it appears to me that this case is really free from any substantial difficulty, but I bear this in mind, that I am not deciding whether Jones and Co. have, by reason of some general lien, a right to have the goods applied to discharge their general debt. With that I am not concerned. The only parties who are contesting the matter before me are the plaintiffs, who claim the charge, and the defendant (Tappan), the trustee in bankruptcy of Baxter and Co., and Mr. Kough, representing his firm of Jones and Co., who are combined in opposing the claim of the plaintiffs. After what I have stated, I consider it unnecessary to go through the cases at any length, and I do not propose to do so. Frith v. Forbes (7 L. T. Rep. N. S. 261; 4 De G. F. & J. 409) is relied upon by the plaintiffs, and that is a case which appears to have been misunderstood. I say that, because James, L.J. (from whom irrelevant statements seldom fell) says it is a case which must not be misunderstood, and he has given at least one explanation of it in Ex parte Arbuthnot; Re Entwistle. He there said: "The case of Frith v. Forbes must not be misunderstood. The court there held, that in a transaction between principal and agent a direction given by the principal to the agent as to the application of the proceeds of the sale of particular goods was binding on the agent, and that he could not set up against it his own general lien." Baggallay, L.J., referring to what had fallen from James, L.J. on a former occasion, adopted, in fact, what James, L.J. had said. Possibly he put it a little stronger than it would appear that James, L.J. himself did, but no doubt he was satisfied as to what James, L.J. meant, having heard what had fallen from him during the course of the argument before them. Baggallay, L.J. said, quoting James, L.J., with approval, "In Robey and Co.'s Perseverance Ironworks v. Ollier, Frith v. Forbes was commented upon, and James, L.J. then said that the decision in that case depended upon special circumstances and could not be treated as governing any other case." I will make one other observation on Frith v. Forbes, which is this, that Begbie and Co. were not parties contesting the matter in the Court of Appeal. (a) There is ground for saying, having regard to a passage in the judgment of Knight Bruce, L.J. (4 De G. & J. 418), that there were some facts which were adverse to Begbie and Co. which do not appear upon the face of the report, and which may have constituted sufficient ground why Begbie and Co. should not argue the case. The passage which I refer to is that which shows that there were letters from the assignees in bankruptcy of Begbie and Co., which letters the Lord Justice considered had a material bearing upon the case. Frith v. Forbes was a decision between the holders of the bills and the defendant Forbes, who had taken cargoes without having accepted the bills, and the circumstances no doubt were very special. It is not for me to say that the particular case was wrongly decided. I am quite satisfied to say that it is a decision which cannot be treated as an authority binding me in any way in this case. I think it is unnecessary to go through the other decisions, because I have stated the principle upon which I proceed.

It appears to me that for the reasons I have given the plaintiffs case fails, as against the defendants, and therefore that the action must be dismissed.

The plaintiffs appealed.

Their arguments sufficiently appear from the judgment.

Romer, Q.C. and Stallard for Kough.—Frith v. Forbes does not govern this case, which must be considered apart from authority. [Cotton, L.J.—We all agree that, but for Frith v. Forbes, we should not have to call on you.] We ask the court to hold that this case, so far as it lays down a principle, is not good law. It has certainly not been followed in any reported case. Probably there were other facts before the court which do not appear in the report.

Robinson, Q.C. and Yate Lee for Tappan.

Carson replied.

Cotton, L.J.—This is an appeal from a judgment of Chitty, J. deciding that the plaintiffs, who purchased in New York bills drawn on Jones and Co., have no specific charge or lien on the proceeds of goods remitted to that firm in England. Now these bills are in a form not at all unusual. Though they are bills of exchange, yet they contain a reference to the proceeds of certain cargoes or remittances of goods against which the bills were to be charged. In the bills there are these words, "Sixty days after sight of this first of exchange (second and third unpaid) pay to the order of Messrs. Brown, Shipley and Co., in London," those are the plaintiffs, a certain sum of "pounds sterling value received, and charge the same to account of cheese per Britannic." In the second bill there are also the words "and lard per Greece." Then there are in one bill, but not in the other, the words, "as advised." The appellants do not rely upon that as in itself giving them a charge, but they look to the advice, as expressed in one case on the face of the bill of exchange, but not expressed in the other. And, as I understand their argument, they say that the advice—that is, the letter which went to the English firm, Messrs. Jones and Co., before they received these goods—did specifically appropriate, in favour of the drawers of the bills and consignees of the goods, the proceeds of those goods to pay the bills which Baxter and Co. had drawn, and which they expected to be accepted by the English firm. Now, one must here get rid of one point. Jones and Co. never, in fact, accepted the bills, and in that state of circumstances, unless there is something exceptional in the case, those who received consignments with such letters as these, are bound to accept the bills of exchange. In other words, having regard to the terms of the letters, they have the goods sent to them with an implied intention, if not an expressed one, that they are to receive them only in case they will undertake the obligation imposed upon them by accepting the bills, and that if they do not, then the goods shall be returned either to the consignor or to anyone who may have got from the consignor a good charge upon or an assignment of the goods. We have not to decide that question, but, in the absence of special circumstances, I should think that would not be disputed. But what the appellants require is something very much more. They say that, even though there was no acceptance, the proceeds of these goods would be specifically appropriated for the benefit of Baxter and Co., and that they are assigns of the right of Baxter and Co. I am dealing now with the first question, whether there was any right in Baxter and Co. to say that there was that specific appropriation. The material words of the letter referring to this are these: "We inclose bill of lading for 1558 boxes per Britannic, and against these and lard per Greece, we value on you at sixty days sight for 2500*l*., favour Brown, Shipley and Co." Now, we have really no evidence as to what the effect is, between consignors and consignee, of such advices as these. If the acceptances are not given, then, primâ facie, the right of the consignor is to say: "Hold the goods to my order; do not deal with them as goods which you have a right to take," but there is no evidence of what further right there is.

Now, in my opinion, if we deal with this case independently of mercantile usage, it comes to this. Here is a firm in America drawing on a firm in England, and they say: "We have drawn on you; we have sent you a remittance of goods which will be sufficient to indemnify you against any liability which you will undertake by means of your acceptances—that is to say, we are sending goods, the proceeds of which will come into the general account between us, as for that bill of exchange, when you have accepted it, and when you pay it." That is really an inducement to the consignee, on the drawing of the bill of exchange, to put himself under the obligations which he will undertake by giving the acceptance. But that is not sufficient for the appellants, They must show that the proceeds of these goods were specifically appropriated, after an acceptance given, or before acceptance given, so as, in favour of the consignors, to make the goods specifically appropriated, and appropriated only to payment of these bills. It is remarkable that, although in this case evidence has been given as to what would be the proper result of the words contained in the bills of exchange, no word is said in the evidence as to what, in favour of the consignor, would be the effect of the terms contained in these letters as regards the consignors having drawn against these consignments.

In my opinion it would be quite wrong to attribute to these letters and to this advice any such result as is claimed on behalf of the appellants. It is said that, in deciding that there is no such appropriation in favour of the consignors, we should be deciding against Frith v. Forbes. Frith v. Forbes is a case which has been mentioned constantly, but never, I think, followed in any case. Possibly there has never been a case so much like Frith v. Forbes as the present case, but we cannot disregard what James, L.J. said in Robey and Co.'s Perseverance Ironworks v. Ollier, and Frith v. Forbes was decided on special circumstances, and could hardly be treated as governing any other case. It is a common practice between merchants abroad and merchants in England to remit goods with a letter stating that they are remitted, that certain bills have been drawn against them, and that the bills of exchange do also refer on their face to the consignments in the same way. James, L.J. must therefore, have considered that there was something special in the circumstances in Frith v. Forbes showing that there was an appropriation there in favour of the consignor, and showing that there was a transfer of that appropriation for the benefit of the bill holders, which we cannot gather distinctly from the report of that case. But here we have evidence on behalf of both the consignors and the consignee, showing that the result of the dealings between them, in transactions similar to this, was that the goods and the proceeds, where acceptances had been given, were not considered as appropriated, but that they were carried to the credit of the general account. That disposes of any appropriation, because, if there is to be an appropriation, the goods and the proceeds must be carried to an account showing that they are obtained simply for the purpose of paying these acceptances, and that until the acceptances are paid the consignee has no right to them. That evidence might possibly have been met by showing that, on looking at the accounts, these proceeds appeared to be so dealt with as to make it impossible for Jones and Co. to deny that there was an appropriation. For instance, if it had been shown that there was a separate account of these shipments, or that the money when received had been treated, even though carried into the general account, as money which still remained the money of the consignors, then the evidence would have been met. But there is no such evidence at all as far as we can see. If it had appeared on the accounts (which have not been put in evidence) that on the moneys received from the proceeds of goods interest had been credited to the American firm, it would have been impossible then to say that there had been a specific appropriation. If interest had been credited, the money must have been received and employed by Jones and Co. for their general purposes. Interest is paid for the use of money, and if the money was appropriated for the specific purpose of answering these bills, it is difficult to see how any interest could be credited on these proceeds to the consignors: but we must take it on the evidence that in the dealings between the parties similar to this there was no appropriation at all.

Now, undoubtedly we cannot find in the report of Frith v Forbes what it was on which the judges decided that there was an appropriation in favour of the consignors. It may be that there were letters which tended to support the judges in that conclusion, or it may be that, Begbie and Co. not disputing it, there were circumstances pointing to that conclusion because, although as pointed out by Mr. Carson, it is evident that both below and in the Court of Appeal Begbie and Co. were represented, yet they seem to have taken, neither in the court above nor in the court below, any strong part in the argument. If the Lords Justices did, in Frith v. Forbes, lay down that a letter such as this, without anything more, constituted an appropriation in favour of the consignor, so that the goods must be kept as a specifically appropriated fund in his favour, I should say that they drew a conclusion which was not justified, and the sooner one says that, in my opinion, the better. It may be that there was other evidence, but in my opinion it is not the correct conclusion from letters of advice such as this, that there was an appropriation in favour of the consignor, and that the proceeds of the goods should be kept as a specific fund appropriated for the payment of bills. That, in my opinion, would be a wrong conclusion, and, as far as we can see (that was pressed upon us by Mr. Carson), that was all that the judges had to go upon in Frith v. Forbes. Of course, there may be dealings between consignors and consignees in transactions like these which do show that, whatever the terms of the letters were, there was that contract between them. They might, by appropriating the goods, and by passing accounts which show that appropriation, prove that those were really the terms on which they carried on business, and on which they contracted, and then there would be no difficulty as regards appropriation. But here, in my opinion, there was no appropriation simply on the letters. We have evidence here that this was not acted upon as an appropriation, and that really will dispose of the whole case of the payment here.

I may mention a case, which has not yet been referred to, of Inman v. Clare (Johns. 769), before Lord Hatherley, in which, there being a question of appropriation, that was decided by reference to a custom which existed in Liverpool. Merchants in Liverpool received the goods, and there was (which it is hardly necessary for me to inquire into here, after the opinion I have given on the first part of the case) a clear transfer by letter to the holder of the bills of the right which the drawers and consignors had. But, as regards the other part of the case, it has not been contended that, if these bills stood alone, they would give a good charge.

It was contended that the bills of themselves, by the terms of the letter, would be a transfer of the right of the drawer to the persons in whose favour these bills were drawn. In my opinion, it would be wrongly construing the terms of this document to say that, if there were any such appropriation, the bills transferred the benefit of that appropriation from the drawer of the bills to the billholder. How it can be contended that that was the effect in the case of the second bill, I can hardly conceive, because the words there are "charge the same to account of cheese per Britannic," the words of the other bill being "and charge the same to account of cheese per Britannic, and lard per Greece, as advised." That, construing it fairly, simply comes to this: "When your acceptances (which must be given if you take the goods) are paid, then, as a matter of account, treat the bills as exhausting any credit you may have obtained by our having remitted to you these particular goods."

In my opinion, the appellants fail on the essential part of their case, namely, in showing that there is any appropriation, in favour of the drawers of the bills, of the cargo, or of the proceeds of the cargo.

Lindley, L.J.—The plaintiffs here are purchasers of certain bills of exchange drawn by Archibald Baxter and Co. upon Jones Bros., Jones Bros. being represented by the defendant Kough. [His Lordship read the first bill and continued:] Now the first question to which I will address myself is this, Did those bill of exchange, taken by themselves, give the plaintiffs any specific charge upon the goods—the cheese and the lard—therein referred to? I look at the case quite apart from any question of appropriation between the consignors and the consignees, or anything which transfers the right to the appropriation. I cannot find anything, either in Frith v. Forbes, or in the general law, or in the evidence which is adduced in this case, which goes that length. Looking at the bills of exchange per se, apart from anything else, there is no language in them which amounts to anything of the sort. We must bear in mind that the controversy in this case has arisen when the bills of exchange have not been accepted, and that we are asked to say, according to the argument, that the bills of exchange in themselves give Brown, Shipley, and Co. an equitable right to the goods which were assigned to the acceptor, and which the acceptor was to deal with when he had accepted the bills. I cannot find in the documents any language whatever which gives the plaintiff any interest in the proceeds of the goods which were consigned by the drawer. I think it has been felt throughout, that the case cannot be put upon the bills of exchange simply as a declaration and as documents of charge. Then the appellants' case is put very ingeniously in another way. It is said that, however that may be, there was an appropriation, by the drawers of the bills, the consignors, Baxter and Co., of this cheese and lard to this particular bill; that is to say, that Archibald Baxter and Co., the drawers, and consignors, were entitled, as against Jones Bros., to have the bills taken up by these particular goods. That is, as I understand, the meaning of it. Now, that is a question of inference of fact. Was there anything of the sort? There is the advice note which runs in this way: "We inclose bill of lading for 1558 boxes per Britannic, and against these and lard per Greece, we value on you at sixty days sight for 2500*l*., favour Brown, Shipley, and Co." Now there is the uncontradicted evidence of Mr. Kough showing that in point of fact these parties did not deal upon the footing of there being any specific appropriation such as is contended for; and in the face of that, I cannot draw the conclusion from the document and that evidence that there was any such specific appropriation. It is not at present disputed that these goods were consigned to Jones Bros. as against these bills, or that the bills were drawn as against these goods, or that as Jones Bros. did not choose to accept the bills, they ought to return the goods; of course that is plain enough, but any specific appropriation, such as is contended for, seems to me to be negatived by the evidence in the case. Now, supposing there was no specific appropriation as between the consignor and the consignees, of course, there could be no transfer of the right to specific appropriation, and the case, therefore, fails on that ground. That is how it appears to me the matter would stand apart from authority, and looking only at the documents and the facts.

But then it is said that we cannot decide this case in the manner without overruling Frith v. Forbes. Now, I confess I do not see any material distinction between this case and Frith v. Forbes, unless it be in Mr. Kough's affidavit, which negatives any specific appropriation between drawer and acceptor. In Frith v. Forbes it is to be observed that there was no controversy between the consignors and the consignees. Begbie and Co. appear to have been represented by counsel before the Court of Appeal, and it seems to have been rather assumed, if not in the court below in the Court of Appeal, that there was that appropriation. Turner, L.J. came to the conclusion that there was an appropriation between the consignors, and the consignees and acceptors, and he put it in this way: "Now, in the letters written by Begbie and Co. to Forbes and Co. with reference to each of these bills, it is in terms expressed that the bills were drawn against the consignment, terms which, as I understand their import, could not be construed otherwise than as meaning that the bills were to be paid out of the proceeds of the consignment." These remarks are open to this observation. I do not know whether the Lord Justice meant to say that in point of law there was a specific appropriation, that that was his inference of fact—that, having regard to the correspondence and the evidence in that case, and having regard to the line of conduct which Begbie and Co. took, he came to the conclusion, as a matter of fact, that these expressions bore that meaning. If that was all he meant, of course there is nothing in it. Whether he was right or wrong, we are not bound to draw the same inference of fact. It is only an application of legal principle that we are bound to follow. Of course I see the difficulty there is in ascertaining exactly what he meant to say. He may have meant to say that these two documents, the letter of advice and the acceptance, amounted in point of law to a specific appropriation. If he did, I confess it seems to me to be rather startling, and not consistent with what I understand the law to be as decided in other cases, and the law upon which business is conducted in this country. I do not think he can have meant that. I think he must have meant, under the circumstances of the case present to his mind, to have come to the conclusion that there was that appropriation, which, be it observed, Begbie and Co. never denied at all. Then he also came to the conclusion that, if there was that appropriation as between the consignor and the consignee, the benefit of it was transferred to the holders of the bill. There is a difficulty about that, a difficulty which I need not face here, because, to my mind, this case breaks down in this anticipatory step. As Kough's evidence shows, there was no appropriation—in fact there was no right to appropriate or transfer. But there is a difficulty in the second step in Frith v. Forbes, which it is impossible not to see; and, I confess, it is difficult to reconcile that with the other cases, and in particular with what Lord Hatherley distinctly said in Inman v. Clare, that if the drawer of the bill had the right of specific appropriation of the goods he did not pass that by negotiating the bill. It is put here by Mr. Rigby that there was a special bargain. That is dealt with in this particular case by cutting away the subject matter of the bargain. If the consignors had no right to the appropriation, of course they could not in that case bargain to give it to the plaintiffs. I have made these remarks on Frith v. Forbes, because it does appear to me to be extremely difficult to reconcile it with the principle of our decision. I do not see how to distinguish it except by the passage in Mr. Kough's affidavit, which shows that there was no specific appropriation as there was in Frith v. Forbes.

Under these circumstances, I think the view taken by Chitty, J. is right, and that the appeal ought to be dismissed.

Fry, L.J.—The question we have to consider arises upon a bill of exchange. There are two bills of exchange, but I will confine my observations to one, the bill of exchange of the 15th Aug. and the letter of the same date, written by Baxter and Co. to Mr. Kough. Two arguments have been addressed to us in this case, and they require to be taken separately. The first is, that the direction in the bill of exchange to "charge the same," that is, the 2500*l*., "to account of cheese per Britannic and lard per Greece, as advised," constitutes a lien, or specific appropriation or charge, in favour of Messrs. Brown, Shipley, and Co., to whose order the bill was drawn. That is the point of view to which the evidence has been addressed, and it is a point of view which, as I understand, Mr. Rigby adopted in his argument. There is a second argument based on the bill, taken together with the letter of advice, an argument which I understand Mr. Rigby to have by no means abandoned, but, on the contrary, to have pressed upon us, though Mr. Carson, in the course of his very able argument to-day, has preferred to press more strongly the second argument upon us. To my mind, it is not correct to hold that these words of direction in the bill of exchange constituted any lien or any charge. Upon that point there is evidence before us of mercantile men with regard to the meaning and effect of such words in a bill of exchange, and, although the evidence is not harmonious, the view which I conceive to be the true one is expressed by several witnesses, one of whom is Mr. Bowring, and I will read from his affidavit a passage which, according to my view, expresses the true conclusion of the effect of such an instrument. [His Lordship read the paragraph above set out, and continued:] I may observe that what passed between the firms in America, on the drawing of the bills of which these are part of the series, appears to me to confirm that conclusion. I think what Brown, Shipley, and Co. were anxious for was to be satisfied that the bills of exchange which they were about to purchase were real mercantile bills, and not accommodation bills. The same point drew some observations from Mellish, L.J. in Robey and Co.'s Perseverance Iron Works v. Ollier, which has been so often referred to in the course of this discussion. He said: "The indorsement of a bill gives only a right to the bill, and I do not think that any mercantile man would suppose, because he saw in the bill the words 'which place to account cargo per A.,' that he was to have a lien on that cargo. A mercantile man who is intended to have a lien on a cargo expects to have the bill of lading annexed; if there is no bill of lading annexed, he only expects to get the security of the bill itself." That is my view of the true effect of that direction in the bill, and I think that, whether I look at the preceding cases, or at the evidence in this case, that conclusion is supported. Now, the second argument, which is the one Mr. Carson especially pressed upon us, arises upon that direction, coupled with the letter of advice of the same date; and the way in which Mr. Carson has put it before us is this: He has said that the letter of advice creates a lien in favour of the maker of the bill, and that by the direction on the face of the bill that lien is transferred to the person to whose order the bill is drawn. Now, the first inquiry therefore is this: Does the letter of advice in this case create any specific appropriation in favour of the maker of the bill? I have already read the words of the advice: "We enclose bills of lading," describing what they are for, "and against these and lard, per Greece, we value on you at sixty days' sight for" so much. In other words, it merely amounts to having said: "We send a certain bill of lading, and value on you at sight" for a certain amount. In my judgment, the statement that they are sending the bill of lading, and that they value at that amount, is merely a statement of the motive which they suggest to the drawee why he should accept the bills; and no doubt he cannot refuse to accept the bills and at the same time take the bills of lading. Therefore, as between the drawer and the drawee, it imposes a condition on the acceptance of the goods. The consignee cannot accept the goods without accepting the bills. But I think that it goes no further, and I do not think that such language, in mercantile law, has the effect of creating any specific appropriation.

Now, it is not a little worthy of observation that, in the present case, so little do the appellants appear to have thought of this part of their present contention, that there is no evidence of mercantile men addressed to this part of the case, although it is one upon which the evidence of mercantile men would have been relevant as giving the meaning of the direction in the bill of exchange. But, further, in the present case there is distinct evidence to show that there was, in fact, no specific appropriation of these goods; and, although there was this mode of drawing the bill of exchange, and the method of advising that they had been drawn had been in force between the parties to this transaction for some considerable time previously, no specific appropriation had been made of the cargoes against the proceeds of goods. The Lords Justices who have preceded me have dealt with that part of the case so fully that it is not necessary for me to do more than to say that I have arrived on that evidence at the same conclusion. I think, therefore, whether we look at the course of dealing, or the language of the letter of advice, that was not adequate to create a specific appropriation in favour of the maker of the bill. But, even supposing that it had been, I am bound to say that I feel great difficulty in the second step of the argument, which is this, that the direction in the bill of exchange assigned or transferred the specific appropriation from the maker of the bills to the persons to whose order they were drawn. I am unable to think that mere words of direction have any such operation. Those words of direction appear to me to be merely what they purport to be, a direction as to the account against which the bills are to be drawn; and I do not think they are intended to transfer any lien, supposing that it existed. That is the view which I take of the effect of the direction in the bill of exchange, nor can I help observing that there would, to my mind, be very considerable difficulty in holding that an instrument at the same moment operated as a bill of exchange and as an equitable assignment. I agree that it is not necessary to express any concluded opinion on the point, and I therefore abstain from so doing; but it would require some argument to convince me that the same instrument could have that operation. Very difficult questions would arise. A bill of exchange is a negotiable instrument, taken in the ordinary course of business, and free from the equities between the original parties to the transaction. An equitable assignment is not a negotiable instrument, and need not at all be free from the equities between the parties. If the same instrument creates the one and the other, does the equitable assignment travel to the hand of every holder of the bill of exchange, or if not, where does it stop? If it travels into the hands of all the holders of the bill, is it like a bill of exchange free from equities, or is it like an ordinary equitable assignment? Those are questions which, it appears to me, are worthy of consideration, and would have to be considered before the court could say that this instrument operated in both ways.

The main stress of the argument, no doubt, has been, and very justly so, the case of Frith v. Forbes, and Mr. Carson has pressed upon us very forcibly the importance of not departing from legal authorities. I feel the full weight of that observation. At the same time it must be borne in mind that cases are authorities for principles of law and not for conclusions of fact, and, as has been already pointed out by Lindley, L.J. it may well be that the true conclusion of that case is that the Lords Justices, upon the facts before them, there came to a particular conclusion of fact with regard to the existence of the equitable assignment and the transfer of it to the bill holders. If they had intended to lay down any general principles, that case would not have been dealt with as it has been by the courts subsequently. The observation of James, L.J., that that case probably governed no other, is a very opposite observation, if in Frith v. Forbes the decision was a decision on an issue of fact, and it was not an observation likely to have fallen from the Lord Justice if Frith v. Forbes laid down a principle of law. I think, therefore, we are not constrained on that case to come to any particular conclusion on the facts of this case, and that Chitty, J. was right in the conclusion to which he came. The appeal therefore will be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed with costs.

The Stanmore. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM THE PRESIDENT (SIR JAMES HANNEN) OF THE PROBATE, DIVORCE, AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION.

Collision — Approaching steamships — Lights — "Risk of collision"—Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, art. 18.

Art. 18 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, directing that, when two steamships are approaching so as to involve risk of collision, they shall slacken their speed, or stop and reverse, if necessary, is applicable not only where the officer in command sees or ought to see there is actual risk of collision, but also where he sees the other vessel doing something which may involve risk of collision.

The steamships C. and S. were approaching one another at night, starboard to starboard, and when at a distance of a quarter of a mile the green and masthead lights of the S. were seen by those on the C. to close in and come more into line. The Nautical Assessors advised the court that such alteration in the bearing of the lights was an indication to the officer in charge of the C. that the S. had in all probability ported, and that porting on the part of the S. would, in the circumstances, involve risk of collision.

Held (affirming the court below), that the probability that the S. had ported rendered it incumbent on the C., on seeing the alteration of the lights, to have at once reversed her engines in compliance with Art. 18 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions, and that in default of so doing she must be held to blame for the collision.

This was an appeal by the plaintiffs, the owners of the steamship Cornwall, in a collision action in rem, from a decision of Sir James Hannen, holding both ships to blame.

(a) Reported by J. P. Aspinall and Butler Aspinall, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

The collision occurred about 12.30 a.m. on the 9th Sept. 1884, in the North Sea, off Whitby, between the steamship Cornwall, of 419 tons register, and the steamship Stanmore, of 1269 tons net.

The facts alleged by the plaintiffs were as follows:—The Cornwall, which was on a voyage from London to Sunderland, was, shortly before 12.30 a.m., making about eight knots an hour on a N.N.W. course. In these circumstances the whistle of a steamship, which proved to be the Stanmore, was several times heard ahead. The engines of the Cornwall were stopped a few minutes afterwards, and the Stanmore's green and masthead lights were seen about a point and a half on the starboard bow, and distant about half a mile. The vessels, as they neared each other, would have passed in safety starboard to starboard; but when about three points on the starboard bow the red light of the Stanmore came into view, and her green was shut in, causing danger of collision. The engines of the Cornwall were at once ordered to be reversed full speed, but before the order could be completely carried out the green light of the Stanmore came again into view, and a collision became imminent. As the only possible chance of escape the engines of the Cornwall were at once set on full speed ahead, and her helm was put hard-a-starboard; but the Stanmore, with her stem, almost directly struck the Cornwall on the starboard bow, in consequence of which she sank.

The facts alleged by the defendants were as follows:—The Stanmore, which was on a voyage from Newcastle to New Orleans, was making about eight and a half knots on a S.S.E. course. In these circumstances the masthead and red lights of a steamer, which proved to be the Cornwall, were seen about three-quarters of a mile distant bearing about three-quarters of a point on the starboard bow. The engines of the Stanmore were immediately put to half speed, and her helm put hard-a-port, so as to bring the vessels red to red. The Cornwall, however, instead of keeping her course, starboarded and shut in her red and opened her green light, and caused risk of collision. Although the engines of the Cornwall were immediately stopped and reversed, the vessels came into collision. The defendants charged the plaintiffs (inter alia) with neglecting to stop and reverse their engines before the collision or in due time.

According to the evidence of the master of the Cornwall, who was in charge at the time of collision, he saw the Stanmore's green and masthead lights about a point and a half on his starboard bow, distant about half a mile. When the Stanmore got about three points on his starboard bow he saw her masthead and green lights coming more in a line. This told him the Stanmore was porting, and when the red light came into view on the starboard bow, and distant about a quarter of a mile, he ordered his engines full speed astern.

Dec. 13, 1884.—The case came on for hearing before Sir James Hannen, assisted by Trinity Masters.

The learned President (Sir James Hannen), after finding that the vessels were approaching starboard to starboard, and that the Stanmore was to blame for having ported to a green light, dealt with the case of the Cornwall as follows:—

Then there remains the further question whether the Cornwall is to blame. That depends upon whether or not she reversed her engines in time. Her case is that, observing a change in the position of the Stanmore's lights, her speed was reduced to easy. The change which it is alleged was seen on board the Stanmore was that her lights were brought more nearly in line, and that is the only thing which the master of the Cornwall refers to. He says he comes to the conclusion that the Stanmore was porting her helm. It was observed by the Trinity Brethren at the time that the mere fact of the green light and the white light being brought more nearly in a line did not conclusively establish that the Stanmore was turning under a port helm, because the bringing the lights into a line would depend upon where the side light was, side lights being differently placed in different ships. It is the first time that this point has been presented to my consideration as involving any element of uncertainty, but I should think that it must depend upon the distance of the lights and upon the state of the atmosphere whether a judgment can be formed as to whether the light is in one place or another when they are being brought into line, and there must be some position when an opinion can be formed whether the vessel is turning one way or the other. Be that as it may, I have put this specific question to the Elder Brethren: If the master of the Cornwall was of opinion that the Stanmore was under a port helm, and was so approaching him, was he justified in abstaining from reversing until the red light came into view, which is what he says he did? For though he came to the conclusion that the Stanmore was under a port helm, and that there was danger, yet he did not do anything until the Stanmore had come round so much as to show her red light. The answer which has been given to me by the Trinity Brethren, and in which I entirely concur, is, that he was not justified in waiting so long. It is true that the placing of the side lights might affect his conjecture as to the meaning of the lights coming into a line. This point was not taken by the man himself nor by counsel, but putting it at its highest, it would only show that there was an element of uncertainty as to what the movements of the ship were, and it might be that she was under a port helm, as she, in fact, turned out to be. Then, if it might indicate that the vessel was under a port helm, it was not justifiable on the part of the master of the Cornwall to wait until the course of the Stanmore had been so much altered that her red light was brought into view, before he took the necessary precautions required by the law of reversing his engines in order to prevent a collision. He says himself he believed the Stanmore was under a port helm, and he knew that it was dangerous. I am therefore of opinion that he failed in his duty in not having reversed sooner, and that upon that ground the Cornwall is also to blame.

From this decision the plaintiffs now appealed.

Sir Walter Phillimore and Bucknill for the appellants.—The duty of the Cornwall to stop and reverse her engines is regulated by art. 18 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions. According to that article steamers are bound to ease or stop and reverse their engines when approaching one another so as to involve risk of collision. In order that the officer in charge may judge whether the ships are so approaching, it is necessary that some small space of time should elapse in which he may form a judgment:

The Emmy Hease, 50 L. T. Rep. N. S. 322; 9 P. Div. 81; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 216.

He is not bound to instantly stop and reverse his engines. In the present case those on board the Cornwall stop and reverse as soon as they see the Stanmore's red light, which shows them as a fact that she has ported. The fact of the green and masthead lights coming into a line is an indication that the vessel has probably ported, but nothing more. The officer in command of a ship at night ought not to act upon the probable and possible manœuvre of an approaching vessel.

Hall, Q.C. and Barnes, for the respondents, were not called upon,

Brett, M.R.—In this case it appears that the two vessels were meeting going as nearly as possible on opposite courses, and it was night time. They were meeting so that they would pass starboard side to starboard side if they had both kept on their courses; if so, there would have been no danger of collision. Their duty therefore was to keep on, or else both to starboard. However, in fact, one of them ports. To my mind it is not sufficient to say that she ported, because suppose, as I tried to point out in the case of The Beryl (51 L. T. Rep. N. S. 554; 9 P. Div. 137; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 321), she had been carrying no lights, and had ported, and had thereby in fact brought about danger of collision, there would be no culpability on the part of the officer in command of the other ship in not manœuvring for this porting, because without lights he could not have known the other vessel had ported. These regulations are made in order to teach sailors how to act when circumstances arise which they know have arisen. It is not enough that the circumstances have in fact arisen, if the officer does not and cannot know. Now the Stanmore did in fact port when a little more than a quarter of a mile distant, and when on the Cornwall's starboard bow. The gentlemen who assist us gave it as their opinion that that produced risk of collision, and even without their valuable assistance I cannot conceive that anyone accustomed to ships could doubt it would be so.

Now comes the question whether the risk of collision was indicated to the officer in charge of the Cornwall, so that he ought to have acted to avoid it. The evidence is, that he saw the white and green lights coming more into a line. It was suggested, when that evidence was given in the Admiralty Court, that it would show him the Stanmore had ported, upon which the Trinity Masters informed the learned President that it depended upon the position of the side lights. What that means I do not quite understand. Assuming what they said was perfectly correct, then arises this question: Although the alteration in the lights does not show as a positive fact that the Stanmore had ported, does it show that she has in all probability ported? Now, something must have happened to account for the alteration in the position of the lights. We have therefore asked the gentlemen who assist us these two questions: Would the fact of the green and white lights coming more into a line indicate to the captain of the Cornwall, as a sailor, that in all probability the Stanmore had ported? They answer Yes. We then put this question: If the Stanmore ported at a little more than a quarter of a mile, being in the position in which she was on the starboard bow of the Cornwall did that produce risk of collision? They answer Yes. Therefore it is to be taken that the alteration in the position of the lights would not indicate as a certain fact that the Stanmore had ported, yet things showed that in all probability she had ported. In these circumstances what is the officer's position? Then you come to a point of reasoning which sailors must learn, and it is this: if in all probability a ship has done something which, if she has done it, produces risk of collision, ought not the officer in charge of the other ship to think there is risk of collision? In order to insure safety and to avoid risk of collision, which is the great object of the Regulations, I think that when an officer sees something which ought to indicate to him that another ship has done something involving risk of collision, he ought to act to avoid that risk. This is carrying the rule further than it has been carried before. If he ought to have acted, it is plain that his duty under the circumstances was not only to stop but also to reverse his engines. I therefore think that the officer in command of the Cornwall did not fulfil the duty imposed upon by the Regulations, and that the Cornwall must be held also to blame.

Baggallay, L.J.—I have only one further observation to make, and it is this, that that which we are informed by our assessors would be the effect produced upon the mind of a sailor who knew his duty was the effect actually produced upon the master of the Cornwall. For on looking at the evidence I find this: "Q. What did you see then? A. I saw her masthead and green lights come more in a line with each other. Q. That told you she was doing what? A. Porting."

Bowen, L.J.—In my opinion also the finding of the assessors brings this case within the express words of the regulation. The ships were approaching at night starboard to starboard. When the ships came close the captain of the Cornwall saw the green and masthead lights coming in a line. He did not see that the Stanmore had ported, but he saw the manœuvre which, in the opinion of our assessors and of the Trinity Masters below, would lead a reasonable sailor to infer that there was a strong probability that she was porting. If she had ported it is admitted that it involved danger. If this manœuvre which he saw reasonably led him to think that she had ported, the hypothesis as to risk of collision had begun. Stopping his engines was not sufficient, and therefore reversing was not necessary.

Judgment affirmed.

Re The London Marine Insurance Association; J. W. Smith's case (21 L. T. Rep. N. S. 97; L. Rep. 4 Ch. 611) distinguished.

This was a special case stated for the opinion of the court by agreement between the parties in an action brought by the Barrow-in-Furness Mutual Ship Insurance Company Limited against Thomas Ashburner, to recover the sum of 342*l.* 5*s.* 3*d.* for calls, contributions, and interest thereon due from the defendant as a member of the company under the circumstances therein stated, which, so far as material were as follows:

The Barrow-in-Furness Mutual Ship Insurance Company was completely registered and incorporated under the provisions of the statutes 7 & 8 Vict. c. 110 and 10 & 11 Vict. c. 78, in the year 1858, and the defendant was duly admitted a member thereof in June 1868, and subject to the facts hereinafter stated insured, and continued to keep insured, several vessels in the said company, and paid the entrance fees and calls thereon. He was elected treasurer of the company on the 27th Nov. 1878, and continued to act as such until the 29th June 1881.

Up to the year 1879 a policy was issued by the company to the defendant on all ships proposed by him to the company for insurance and accepted, but after that date no policies (with the exception hereinafter stated) were issued by the company mentioned, or any company succeeding it before the commencement of the action. The last policies issued to the defendant (with the exception above-mentioned) were issued on two accepted proposals of the 31st March and the 11th Oct. 1879 respectively. The practice of the other members of the company, and the practice of the defendant after the expiration of the policies mentioned, was that after the expiration of the first time policy no new policy was issued, but instead thereof stamped receipts were given for calls.

(a) Reported by J. Smith Esq., Barrister-at-law

On the 29th Dec. 1880, at a special general meeting of the company, summoned for that purpose in accordance with rule 91 (a) of the rules and regulations, the following resolutions were reduced to writing, and twice read and put to the vote, and were on both occasions carried unanimously:

Resolved that the business, credits, assets, and effects of the company be transferred to a company to be called the Barrow-in-Furness Mutual Ship Insurance Company Limited on the terms of the said intended company paying and discharging all the debts, liabilities, and obligations of the company entered into, and subsisting, and capable of taking effect as at the 25th March last.

Resolving that the Barrow-in-Furness Mutual Ship Insurance Company be and the same is hereby absolutely dissolved.

The defendant was present at the meeting, and took an active part in the discussion of the proposals and voted in favour of the said resolutions. The proposed articles of association, in the form in which they were subsequently registered, were read over at this meeting, and explained to the meeting by the solicitor for the company, and were approved of.

The said resolutions were unanimously confirmed at a subsequent special general meeting held for that purpose on the 25th Feb. 1881. The defendant was not present at this meeting, but he had on the 10th Jan. 1881 given the secretary of the said company a proxy to vote for him at the said meeting.

On the 11th April 1881 the memorandum and articles of association subsequently registered were signed by seven persons who were directors of the old company, and at a meeting of the company held on the 19th April 1881 it was intimated to the members present by the secretary that the company had been registered as a limited company. This was found to be a mistake, but until the mistake was discovered the company acted as if it had been so duly registered.

On the 22nd June 1881 a consent to take the name of a subsisting company was signed by two directors of the old company.

On the 29th June 1881, at what purported to be a meeting of the new company, directors were elected, and the secretary of the old company was elected secretary of the new company. The defendant ceased to be treasurer at this date.

The new company was duly registered on the 3rd Feb. 1882 under the name of the Barrow-in-Furness Mutual Ship Insurance Company Limited, with a memorandum and articles of association.

After the passing of the foregoing resolutions, and until the registration of the new company, business was carried on as before, sometimes in the name of the new company, and sometimes in the name of the old company, but the business of the old company was purported to be carried on by the new company.

The defendant after the passing of the said resolutions, and before the registration of the new company, continued to keep his vessels on the books of the company, as insured, and paid calls upon the said vessels, and intended to remain insured as before, but no policy of insurance was given to the defendant.

On the 6th April 1881 the defendant wrote to the secretary of the company, in reply to an application for calls made up to the 25th March 1881, complaining that six sixty-fourths of a certain ship had not been withdrawn according to notice, giving a list of the share of his vessels insured in the company, and asking for a corrected account. The alterations were made as requested, and some time after the defendant examined the register of insurances.

(a) The 91st and 92nd of the rules and regulations of the company, as contained in the deed of settlement were:

91. That absolute dissolution of the company shall be made only in case a resolution for that purpose is reduced into writing, and twice read and put to the vote, and carried each time by a majority of at least two-thirds in number of the members present, personally or by proxy, at a special general meeting expressly summoned for the purpose, and entitled among them to at least two-thirds of the whole number of votes for the time being held by all the members of the company; and if such resolution shall also be confirmed by a like majority at a subsequent special general meeting, to be held at any time after the expiration of fourteen days, and before the expiration of two calendar months next after the general meeting at which such first resolution is passed, then the company shall be dissolved (except only for the purposes mentioned in the next rule) from the date of such second general meeting.

92. That in case of dissolution the directors shall, with all convenient speed call in, sell, dispose of, and convert into money, all such parts of the estate and effects of the company as shall not then already consist of money; and a general account, estimate, and valuation shall be made by the directors of the said estate, and of all assets and liabilities of the company, which account and valuation are to be submitted to a special general meeting of the company, and, when approved by such meeting, shall be binding upon the members; and upon settling such final account, all the surplus estate and moneys (if any) of the company (after payment of all just demands upon the company or all the debts or liabilities of the company, after exhausting and applying all the assets of the company, are to be divided and appropriated to and among, and be paid to or by the members (as the case may be) in proportion to the respective amounts of their insurances in the company at the time of such dissolution. But no member who omits to put in his claim, and (if required) establish his title to the share in such surplus, falling due to him, within two years after the special general meeting, held for winding up the company's affairs, shall be entitled to any share or interest therein, but the same is to be applied and divided as part of the surplus capital of the company, for the benefit of and among the then ascertained parties among whom the rest of the capital is to be distributable; but such omission to claim shall not exempt any such member from any liability to contribute to the discharge of the liabilities remaining against the company. But notwithstanding any such resolution for the dissolution of the company, the said deed of settlement, and all the privileges, rights, and liabilities of the members shall continue in full force until the affairs of the company have been wound up, and the debts and credits, assets, and property of the company have been paid, got in, realised, and divided as aforesaid, and for these purposes, and until such time as aforesaid, the company shall be deemed to be still subsisting.

On the 11th Sept. 1881 the defendant proposed a vessel for insurance, and paid an entrance fee for the same. No policy was then issued for this vessel, but on July 14, 1882, the directors of the new company, after a letter from the defendant of July 11, 1882, demanding the return of the entrance fee, executed a time policy from Sept. 11, 1881, to Sept. 11, 1882, but claimed to retain the same for a lien on it for calls unpaid by the defendant. With the exception of this policy, no policy was issued by the new company to the defendant or to any member before the commencement of the action. No call was ever made on the vessel for which this policy was issued.

After the registration of the new company the defendant continued the same course of business as before, as shown by letters of the 1st and 11th April 1882, giving notice of withdrawal of shares in certain ships.

The defendant having failed to comply with the requests of the company's secretary for the payment of amounts alleged to be due from the defendant to the company, the writ in the action was issued on July 29, 1882, the claim of the plaintiff company being for three calls with interest, made respectively on Sept. 21, 1881, Jan. 25, 1882, and March 25, 1882, amounting in all to 342*l.* 5*s.* 3*d.* These calls were made to meet actual losses which had happened to vessels whose owners had paid the usual entrance fee, and who had made proposals which were duly accepted, but no policy had been issued for any of these vessels.

All the losses which had happened before the 29th Dec. 1880, and all the working expenses up to that date, were, with the exception of a liability of 375*l.*, included in a call made on June 29, 1881, which was paid by the defendant on Jan. 9, 1882.

Between the 29th Dec. 1880 and the 25th Feb. 1881 two vessels were lost, involving a liability of 1330*l.* 10*s.* The defendant's share of this liability, if any, would be one-seventh of that amount. The call of Jan. 25, 1882, was made to cover this liability.

There were no losses between Feb. 25 and June 29, 1881.

The Court of Chancery of the County Palatine of Lancaster, upon the application of the defendant, by orders made on April 30, June 18, and Aug. 13, 1883, ordered the defendant's name to be removed from the register of members of the plaintiff company.

It was agreed by the parties that the question of amending the statement of claim by adding the name of the old company as plaintiffs, and all questions of amendment, should be for the court.

The question for the opinion of the court was whether the plaintiffs were entitled to recover the sum of 342*l.* 5*s.* 3*d.*, or any and what part thereof.

Collins, Q.C. (with him R. G. Digby) for the plaintiff company.—The circumstance that there were no policies is not material, the action not being on the policy:

Read v. Anderson, 51 L. T. Rep. N. S. 55; 13 Q.B. Div. 777;

Rosewarne v. Billing, 9 L. T. Rep. N. S. 441; 33 L. J. 55, C. P.

In Rosewarne v. Billing it was held that, if a broker be employed to make wagering contracts, such as are illegal under the 8 & 9 Vict. c. 109, s. 18, and at the request of his principal pays the amount due under such contracts, he can recover the amount so paid from his principal, and the illegal nature of the contract with reference to which the money is paid is no defence to an action founded on such a claim, and in Read v. Anderson the same view was taken, the contract sued upon not being a wagering contract, although the action related to betting and wagering. So here, although the action deals with insurance matters, yet, as it is not an action to recover a loss under a policy, the fact that there were no policies is immaterial, and the plaintiffs are entitled to recover the amount paid for the defendant to those members who have suffered losses. The new company also, having all the rights of the old company transferred to them, stands in the same position as the old company, of which the defendant was clearly a member:

The Hull Flax and Cotton Mill Company v. Wellesley 2 L. T. Rep. N. S. 728; 6 H. & N. 38.

[He was stopped by the Court.]

Box (with him C. Russell, Q.C. and Sim).—This action can only be founded on an agreement for the insurance of ships, and it was long ago decided in Re London Marine Insurance Association; J. W. Smith's case (21 L. T. Rep. N. S. 97; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 280; L. Rep. 4 Ch. 611), by Selwyn and Giffard, L.JJ. (affirming James, V.C.), that under 35 Geo. 3, c. 63, no agreement for insurance of ships could be valid unless duly stamped according to that Act, and that there was therefore in that case, which was a case of an association formed on the principle of mutual insurance, no evidence of a binding mutual contract for insurance having been entered into. The law is the same at the present time under 30 & 31 Vict. c. 23, ss. 7 and 9. The defendant is not estopped from denying that he was a member of the company, since in Smith's case (ubi sup.) there was payment of entrance fees and calls, and yet the applicant was not held to be estopped from denying his membership. Further, the Court of Chancery of the County Palatine of Lancaster has removed the defendant's name from the list of members of the plaintiff company.

R. G. Digby in reply.—Smith's case (ubi sup.) was distinguished in Re The Teignmouth and General Mutual Shipping Assurance Association; Martin's claim (26 L. T. Rep. N. S. 684; 1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 325; L. Rep. 14 Eq. 148), where it appeared that it was the practice of the association to issue unstamped policies, but the widow of a member was, notwithstanding that the policy was not stamped, held entitled to recover the balance due thereon on the ground that there was a sufficient admission of liability in the books of the association to establish the relation of debtor and creditor.

Cur. adv. vult.

Dec. 20.—Day, J.—In this case I am of opinion that the plaintiffs are entitled to the judgment of the court. The case is one which in itself presents a very considerable difficulty, and it presents additional difficulty by reason of the very ingenious use which has been made by the learned counsel for the defendant of the case of The London Marine Insurance Association; J. W. Smith's case (21 L. T. Rep. N. S. 97; 3 Mar.

Law Cas. O. S. 280; L. Rep. 4 Ch. 611), decided in 1872 by the Court of Appeal. Now, this case is without doubt a case of authority, and a case which is binding in authority upon us, and if I were of opinion that it was really applicable to this case it would be my duty to find in accordance with the decision therein. But, after very careful consideration of that case, I have come to the conclusion that nothing was decided in it which really assists us in coming to a determination in this case. As far as I can understand it, all that is decided there is that, upon the evidence available, and under the circumstances proved to have existed there, Smith was not liable to be put upon the list of contributories of the mutual insurance club that was being wound-up under the control of the Court of Chancery. Here, in my judgment, it is not necessary to determine whether the defendant was or was not a member of this company—certainly not whether he was a member of this company so as to be liable to be put upon the list of contributories, and to be dealt with as a member for all purposes. What we have to determine is simply whether, upon the facts stated in the case, the defendant Ashburner is liable to make good to the plaintiff company the sums of money which they claim specifically in this action, and I am of opinion that he is so liable, and for these reasons: It seems that, at one time, no doubt the defendant was a member of what I may term the old company. He was an assurer on a duly stamped policy, and he was a member. To what extent he was a member to my mind it is unnecessary to inquire, but to some extent undoubtedly he was a member. On the 29th Dec. 1880 and on the 25th Feb. 1881 resolutions were passed for winding-up or putting an end to the old company, and transferring the business to what is termed the new company. A resolution was passed with the assent and to some extent by the exertions of Ashburner, a resolution to which he was undoubtedly a party—that the business credit, assets, and effects of the company be transferred to a company, which I will call "the new company"—meaning thereby the present plaintiffs—"on the terms of the said intended company paying and discharging all the debts, liabilities, and obligations of the company entered into and subsisting and capable of taking effect as at 25th March last." It seems to me to be perfectly clear that, whether the defendant Ashburner be a member of the old company or a member of the new company, as he led and induced the new company to take upon themselves the liabilities of the old company, any moneys paid by them under this resolution would be moneys paid at his request. It seems to me clear and beyond argument that, as to any liabilities such as are referred to in this resolution, the discharge of those liabilities must be contributed to by the defendant. The liabilities were undertaken at his instance, the moneys have been paid at his request, and it does not lie in his mouth to say that he was not at that time a member of the old company. He induced the new company to pay these moneys for his benefit and advantage upon the representation that he would discharge as though he were a legal member of the old company all liabilities which might be thus undertaken by the new company. Whether he was legally or not legally a member of the old company, therefore, I do not care to inquire.

But there are other portions of this claim arising otherwise than in respect to liabilities subsisting and capable of taking effect on the 25th of March last. There are liabilities which have been subsequently acquired, and no doubt they cannot be dealt with upon the footing of the resolution of the 29th Dec., but must be dealt with upon other and independent grounds. What, then, do I find took place after this new company commenced business? I find that, although the defendant Ashburner never had, with the new company, any policy upon which he could have sued, or on which he could have enforced any legal right, still he continued to insure his ships with the new company in the irregular manner in which the new company carried on its business, dispensing with stamped policies of insurance, and carrying on what they termed a mutual insurance by a system of accounts. The defendant undoubtedly had several ships thus continuously insured. In fact he seems to have been more or less active in reference to these transactions. I find evidence that several ships belonging to him were—I do not like to use the word "insured"—but I will say, dealt with in this irregular way. I find that on the 6th April 1881 he writes to the secretary of the company asking for a corrected account of his insurances, and he sets out a number of ships in which he appears to be interested, and specifies the amounts which are insured upon them. He makes proposals to the company again in Sept. 1881, and pays an entrance fee. No policy was ever issued to him. I find that on the 1st April he writes to the company withdrawing some shares upon some ships, clearly implying that other shares in the same ships remained insured with the company. He does the same by another letter of the 11th April, but after a while, when premiums have accumulated against him and he is applied to for payment, he declines to pay the moneys which are demanded of him in respect to those insurances, and it is said he is not liable to do so because there were no stamped policies of insurance. There is no doubt whatever that he could not enforce in a court of law any claim whatever in payment of those policies; but the question we have to determine, as he is not suing on the policies, is not, whether he could have established a claim upon the policies, but whether he has or has not put himself in such a position towards the company that he is liable to pay the sums of money that the company claim of him. Now the company during this time have been making payments to other persons who have been similarly dealt with, and to my mind they have been making those payments at the request of the defendant, because the defendant has been keeping his ships insured in this irregular manner with them, upon the understanding existing between himself and all those persons with whom he was acting that they would pay him all losses which accrued due to him whether they were legally bound to pay him or not—still that they would pay him. He has been keeping his ships insured in this way on the understanding that the company, which is a limited company, represented by its officers, would pay, and they have paid the persons who have been thus irregularly insured, and have incurred liabilities to pay them—not indeed liabilities which would be strictly enforceable in a court of law, but such as were to be discharged at the request of all the members from time to time. It seems to me, therefore, that so far as moneys have been paid by the plaintiffs in pursuance of these persistent and continuous implied requests by the defendant, the defendant is bound to repay those moneys as moneys paid at his request by the plaintiffs. For these reasons the plaintiff company is, in my opinion, entitled to our judgment.

MATHEW, J.—I concur in the judgment which my learned brother has just delivered. The able argument addressed to us by Mr. Box, who appeared for the defendant, led me to doubt whether our judgment ought not to be for the defendant, and certainly with a great part of that argument I entirely agree; but, after consideration, it appears to me that the learned counsel has failed to answer the view of the case taken by my Brother Day in the course of the argument, and which has been the basis of his judgment just delivered. As, therefore, my doubts are not sufficient to lead me to differ from the opinion of my learned brother, I think that judgment must be for the plaintiff company, with costs.

HOUGH AND CO. v. HEAD. (a)

Marine insurance—Time policy—Chartered freight —"Loss of hire which may arise from accidents occurring between certain dates" — Accident within the prescribed dates, and loss of hire afterwards—Underwriter not liable.

The plaintiffs chartered their vessel for six months from the date when the vessel was put at the charterer's disposal, namely, the 21st March 1881, with the option to the charterers of continuing the charter for a full period of six months.

By clause 6 of the charter-party it was provided "that in the event of loss of time by deficiency of men, collision, breakdown of engines, and the vessel becomes incapable of steaming or proceeding for more than forty-eight working hours, payment of hire to cease until such time as she is again in an efficient state to resume her voyage. . . . The acts of God, the Queen's enemies, fire, and all and every other dangers and accidents of machinery, or of the seas, rivers, and navigation of whatever nature and kind always mutually excepted."

The plaintiffs insured against loss of chartered freight by two policies, one of which for 1200*l. was underwritten by the defendant as an underwriter for* 150*l.*

The insurance effected was "At and from and for and during the space of six calendar months from the 15*th April to the* 14*th Oct.* 1881, both days inclusive, for 1200*l., on chartered freight, to pay only loss of hire not exceeding* 2000*l. which may arise in clause* 6 of charter-party for accidents occurring between the 15*th April and the* 15*th Oct., but free of claim arising from deficiency of men."*

During the currency of the policy, viz., on the 27*th June* 1881, the vessel, while going through the Straits of Magellan, struck something which injured her bottom, but did not prevent her from proceeding on her voyage, and she arrived at Liverpool on the 18*th Nov. She was put into dock on the* 28*th Nov., and on the* 30*th Nov. the charterers gave notice to the plaintiffs that the hire would cease as per charter-party until the vessel was in a fit state to resume employment. The repairs were completed on the* 30*th Dec.* 1881.

Held, that the underwriter was not liable for loss of freight, because, although the accident which necessitated the repairs and caused the loss of hire happened within the six months prescribed in the policy, there was no loss of freight within that particular time.

SPECIAL CASE.

2. The plaintiffs are owners of s.s. Presnitz, and on the 12th March 1881, by a charter-party of that date, chartered their said vessel to Messrs. Laws, Surtees, and Co. for six months, commencing from date when the vessel was put at charterers' disposal, with the option to charterers of continuing the charter for a further period of three or six months, the charter being of the sole use of the vessel to the charterers for the period of the said hire.

2. The freight for the hire of the vessel was to be 12*s.* 6*d.* per gross register ton per month, payable in London monthly in advance in cash, and in proportion for any part of a month.

3. A copy of the charter-party is annexed hereto marked "A," and is to be taken as forming part of this case. Clause 6 of the charter-party was as follows:

That in the event of loss of time by deficiency of men, collision, break-down of engines, and the vessel becomes incapable af steaming or proceeding for more than forty-eight working hours, payment of hire to cease until such time as she is again in an efficient state to resume her voyage. Should any difference arise between the parties to this contract, either in principal or detail, the same shall be referred for arbitration at London to two persons, one to be chosen by each contracting party, with power for them to call in a third, and a decision of a majority shall be final and binding. (The acts of God, the Queen's enemies, fire, and all and every other dangers of accidents of machinery, or of the seas, rivers, and navigation, of whatever nature and kind always mutually excepted.) That in the event of the steamer being lost, the money advanced upon the current month shall be returned in proportion to the number of days which she may not have completed of that month.

4. The vessel was placed at charterers' disposal on, and the six months' charter commenced from, the 21st March 1881.

5. The plaintiffs, on the 4th April, 1881, caused themselves to be insured against loss of chartered freight to the extent or sum of 2000*l.*, by two policies of insurance, one for 800*l.* (which is not in question in this action) and the other for 1200*l.*, the latter being effected at Lloyd's and underwritten by the defendant as an underwriter for 150*l.* portion of such 1200*l.*

6. A copy of the policy is annexed hereto marked "B," and is to be taken as forming part of this case. It will be seen that the insurance effected was:

At and from and for and during the space of six calendar months from the 15th April to the 14th Oct. 1881, both days inclusive.

And for 1200*l.* on chartered freight.

To pay only loss of hire, not exceeding 2000*l.*, which may arise in clause 6 of charter-party for accidents occurring between 15th April and 10th Oct., but free of claim arising from deficiency of men.

7. During the currency of the six months, from the 15th April to the 14th Oct., covered by the policy, viz., on or about the 27th June 1881, and while the vessel was going through the Straits of Magellan on a voyage to the west coast of South America, something happened which is thus described in the "Protest" extended by the master of the vessel on arrival at his port (Talcahuano), on the west coast aforesaid, which was all that was known of the occurrence to those on board the vessel at the time of the happening:

The twenty-seventh day of June last, when the steamer was proceeding through the Straits of Magellan, on which date, at about quarter-past three in the afternoon, weather clear, and going full speed, heading south-south-east along the land, vessel suddenly struck something with her bottom amidships, which, however, must have been very soft, for the ship did not lose her headway. The engines were immediately stopped, and soundings having been taken all round, the depth of water was found to range from seven fathoms forward to eleven fathoms aft. Ship having been sounded, and finding that she was making no water, proceeded on voyage.

8. The six months' charter expired on the 21st Sept. 1881, the vessel being then on a voyage, and the charterers exercised their option of continuing the charter for a further period of three months at the time and in the manner provided by clause 11 of the charter-party; the charter under the said charter-party thus being extended to and terminating on the 21st Dec. 1881.

9. The vessel arrived at Liverpool on the 18th Nov., and, after discharging her cargo there, was put into dry dock for inspection on the 28th Nov., when her keel was found to be broken, and other damages to her bottom to have been suffered, necessitating considerable repairs. This damage had, although unknown until she was docked as aforesaid, been, in fact caused by the said accident in June 1881.

10. On the 30th Nov. 1881 the charterers gave a notice to the plaintiffs, the notice being, so far as material, in the following terms:

This steamer having broken her keel, and become incapable of steaming for some time, we give you notice that the hire will cease, as per charty-party, until the vessel is in a fit state to resume employment. We understand the accident took place in the Straits of Magellan during her outward voyage.

11. The repairs were not completed, nor could the vessel be got into an efficient state to go upon a voyage, until the 30th Dec. 1881. The charter, as has been stated, terminated on the 21st Dec. 1881.

12. The claim under the policy was adjusted by London average adjusters as being 56*l.* 11*s.* 1*d.* per cent. of the said 1200*l.*, the proportion of the defendant in respect of the 150*l.* underwritten by him being 84*l.* 16*s.* 7*d.* This claim, however, is in respect of the whole time occupied by the repairs. The amount will have to be reduced to 61*l.* 13*s.* 10d, in the event of it being decided that the defendant is liable for loss of hire up to the 21st Dec. (inclusive) only.

13. The contention of the plaintiffs is that the defendant is liable, under the terms of the policy, for loss of hire during the charter, under clause 6 of charter-party, in respect of the accident which occurred in June, although the cessation of payment of the hire did not occur until after the 14th Oct.

14. The defendant contends that he is not so liable, because there has been no loss of hire under the charter-party, and that the charterers are liable under the charter-party for the freight during the repairs, and that, even if there has been any loss of time it did not occur before the 14th Oct. 1881, and was not covered by the policy.

The questions for the decision of the court are:

(a) Whether charterers were entitled, under clause 6 of the charter-party, to refuse to pay the hire from the 30th Nov. 1881.

(b) If so, whether the defendant is liable under the policy in respect of the loss of hire consequent on such refusal to pay by the charterers.

(c) If so, is he liable for the sum of 84*l.* 16*s.* 7*d.*, or only for 61*l.* 13*s.* 10*d.*?

If the court shall answer question a and question b in the affirmative, judgment shall be entered for the plaintiffs for such sum as the court, under question c, shall determine, with costs.

If the court shall answer questions a and b, or either of them, in the negative, judgment is to be entered for the defendant, with costs.

Pollard for the plaintiff.—By the terms of the charter-party payment of hire was to cease in the event of loss of time by collision, and I ask the court to draw an inference that the vessel struck some floating wreckage, and that would be an accident caused by collision. Alternatively, I contend that the damage, and consequent loss of hire, was caused by "a danger of the sea," which was "mutually excepted," and I lay stress on the word "mutually," because it is unusual in a clause of this kind. It must mean that if the damage and delay was caused by a danger of the sea, no freight would be payable by the charterers, and there would consequently be a loss of hire for which the underwriters would be liable. The underwriter has contracted to pay for loss of hire for accidents within certain dates, not for loss of hire within certain dates. If I show that there was a loss of hire caused by an accident which happened within the prescribed dates that is sufficient. In Furneaux v. Bradley (1 Park. Ins. 365) the ship was damaged within the time of the policy, but the condition of the ship could not be ascertained until after the expiration of the policy, the question was whether there was a total loss by the accident, and it was held a partial loss only. He also referred to Phillips on Insurance, 3rd ed. p. 684.

Barnes for the defendant,—I do not dispute the law referred to, but the distinction is that those are policies on ships. The whole of the freight which was at risk within the time specified in the policy was paid, and the underwriters were not liable for anything else. The plaintiff had insured something at risk during these periods, and nothing outside. [MANISTY, J.—The clause in the charter-party provides that loss of hire is to cease if the vessel becomes incapable of steaming or proceeding for more than forty-eight working hours, and that must mean from the time of the accident.] Yes; that must be the true construction of the charter-party, and, as a matter of fact, the vessel was not incapable of proceeding, and was on her voyage for some months afterwards. He cited

Havelock v. Geddes, 10 East, 555;
Ripley v. Scaife, 5 B. & C. 167.

GROVE, J. (having stated the facts).—It was argued by Mr. Pollard on behalf of the plaintiffs, from what I will call the main point of the case, that although no damage was done, and no freight was prevented being earned during the particular period of the six months from the 15th April to the 14th Oct., yet as the damage which was subsequently discovered was due to an accident between those two dates, and was also within the period of the charter-party, which did not expire until the 21st Dec. 1881, that the underwriters were liable. It was also argued that the damage was caused by a collision, and therefore came within clause 6 of the charter-party referred to as the clause for damage, within which alone the underwriters would be responsible on their policy. Thirdly, it was argued that as this was a danger of the sea, and of navigation, and as such danger was mutually excepted in the charter-party, the parties contemplated no payment of freight during the time arising from such accident; that there was a loss of freight to the shipowner, and that therefore the plaintiffs, who were the shipowners, had a right to recover upon this policy of insurance.

I am of opinion, as I have said, that the defendants are entitled to judgment, and I may say I entertain that opinion upon all the three points, but more especially upon the first point, which goes to the root of the whole matter.

I am of opinion that this, being a time policy, was a policy intended to meet the injury by loss of freight during the prescribed period—namely, from the 15th April to the 14th Oct. 1881. Mr. Pollard's argument is that as the words are to pay loss of hire which may arise from accidents occurring between the 15th April and the 14th Oct., and as this accident occurred during that time, it does not matter whether the damage occurred during that time, provided it occurred within the duration of the charter-party. His argument is that, if it were otherwise, the language would have been, "to pay a loss of hire not exceeding, &c., which may arise between the 15th April and the 15th Oct." Mr. Pollard contends, further, that there would be no reason, if such were the intention of the policy, to use the words "For accidents occurring." It appears to me there is a sufficient reason. The underwriter does not intend to be liable, as I construe this clause, for anything else but for accidental damage occurring; therefore, there is a sufficient reason for inserting the words "for accidents occurring during this period." If it were to be said, as contended by Mr. Pollard, that the defendants are liable for subsequent damage caused by an accident within the prescribed period, although no freight was lost during that time. In that case the underwriters would incur an unknown liability for the whole period of the charter-party, and there is nothing to show why the period of the accident should be limited between the 15th April and the 14th Oct. What is a time policy of this sort generally directed to? It is a limitation of period by which the insurers know that their liability is limited by the two termini of the period, and if they are to incur contingent liability for a matter, the fundamental cause of which occurred during that period, and the effects of which are not perceptible or injurious, or do not occasion any risk or any loss against which the parties may be supposed to insure during that period, it becomes a vague indefinite matter, and one would not construe a policy in such a sense unless the words were so inevitably clear that one could not come to any other conclusion. Now, with regard to a time policy and the nature of the risk, Mr. Arnould says, at page 350, "the two extremes of the time are the termini of the risk, and the adventure begins and ends with the term wherever the ship may then happen to be, and whether or not the object of the voyage be accomplished or not. The risk once begun under a time policy necessarily ceases when the time in the policy comes to an end. Upon the instant that the policy attaches the insurer's right to the full premium is complete and the right of the insured for full indemnification in case of loss, therefore there is no suspension of the risk. Whether the ship be at sea or in port it continues to run until the expiration of the period insured.' Mr. Arnould there is rather contemplating a policy on the ship or possibly on the cargo, but is there any reason why this should not apply to a policy on freight? The object of the underwriter is to limit himself to a certain time, and the object of the party effecting the insurance is to narrow as much as possible the premium they have to pay, so as to enable them to insure what they possibly might think the most dangerous time without paying a higher premium for an insurance during the whole voyage, or the whole period of the charter-party. Probably here the assured thought that the dangerous time in the Straits of Magellan, or that the period during which the ship would be passing through the Straits of Magellan would be between April and October, and this, as we all know, is a dangerous passage, a narrow channel which is liable to storms, and consequently to accidents to ships, and they have limited their policy to that period, and thereby pay a much less premium than if they effected a policy for the whole period of their charter-party upon the ship. Then is not that a reasonable construction of the clause? What is the policy? They are "to pay loss of hire not exceeding 2000*l.*, which may arise for accidents," that is an inaccurate expression, I suppose it means, "from accidents occurring between the 15th April and 15th Oct." The limit of time applies, to my mind, as much to the words "loss of time," as to the words "for or from accidents," and the reason for inserting the words, "for accdents," is that it is a policy to meet accidents, and not to meet other matters, which could not be called other accidents; therefore, there is a full reason for inserting the word "accidents." I am of opinion, therefore, and it appears to me to be the only reasonable construction I can give to the matter, that this policy was a policy upon risk of freight during a period beginning the 15th April and ending the 14th Oct. As there was no freight lost during that period—the freight was paid the whole of the time—the policy did not attach, and, therefore, the underwriters are not liable.

I am also in favour of the defendant on the other two grounds. According to the ordinary meaning of language, which we must apply to these matters, this could not be said to be a collision, this was, as far as one can form an opinion, the running upon a bank, either of sand or ground, something which is said to be soft, not a hard rock, but which it turned out injured the keel of the vessel. If you call that a collision, stranding is a collision, everything in which a vessel meets with an impediment, or strikes a rock or the ground is a collision. In the ordinary acceptation of language would you call that a collision? No case has been cited by Mr. Pollard which goes anything like as far as that. He has referred to a case where it was held that a vessel coming in and striking against a pier or a dock was a collision. That is a very different case to this. Collision appears to me to contemplate the case of a vessel striking another ship or boat, or floating buoy, or other navigable matter, something navigated, and coming into contact with it. It, so to speak, imports as it were two things. It may be that one is active and the other is passive, but still in one sense they each strike the other. That does not apply to striking on the ground at the bottom. I am, therefore, of opinion on that point the plaintiff fails, though it is unnecessary to decide that, if I am right on the first and main point.

I also think there is no exemption of freight in this case within the exception in the general words of clause 6 of the policy, "accidents" of seas and navigation always excepted. I am, therefore, of opinion that the defendant is entitled to my judgment.

MANISTY, J.—I am of the same opinion as to the result.

The charter is really for six calendar months, commencing on the day the vessel was put at the disposal of the charterers at Cardiff, that was the 21st March 1881, so that the charter is absolute for six months commencing 21st March and, of course, ending 21st Sept. 1881. Then there is an option given to the charterers to extend the period either for three or six months. Now, that the charter was known to the underwriter is obvious, because reference is made to it in the policy of insurance, and bearing in mind, therefore, that the terms of the charter are six months, ending 21st Sept., with the option of extending it, really and truly is the same as if another charter had been entered into, so far as freight is concerned. What then is the risk which the underwriter undertook and what was the subject-matter of the policy. The subject-matter is chartered freight and the term of the risk is six months from 15th April to 14th Oct., not the six months relating to the charter-party, but it is a time policy for six months upon chartered freight during the period. Those being the termini in the policy and the extent of the risk, let us see what the risk was. It was to pay only loss of hire not exceeding 2000*l*., which may arise in clause No. 6 of the charter-party. If it stopped there, I suppose there would be no doubt that that would confine it to the loss of hire mentioned and arising in clause 6, but then it goes on, "for accidents occurring between 15th April and 15th Oct." But then the words which follow that are, to my mind, very significant, and show exactly why this was introduced about accidents —for accidents occurring between those times, "but free of claim arising from deficiency of men." Now, if you turn to the charter-party, you see exactly what is meant. I, the underwriter, will be answerable for loss of hire that is caused by accident, but I will not be liable for loss owing to deficiency of men. The charter-party, clause 6, is: "That in the event of loss of time by deficency of men, collision, break-down of engines, and the vessel becomes incapable of steaming or proceeding for more than forty-eight working hours, payment of hire to cease until such time as she is again in an efficient state to resume her voyage. Should any difference arise between the parties to this contract, either in principle or detail, the same shall be referred for arbitration at London to two persons, one to be chosen by each contracting party, with power for them to call in a third, and a decision of a majority shall be final and binding (The acts of God, the Queen's enemies, fire, and all and every other danger and accidents of machinery, or of the seas, rivers, and navigation of whatever nature and kind always mutually excepted). That in the event of the steamer being lost the money advanced upon the current month shall be returned in proportion to the number of days which she may not have completed of that month." So that when the underwriter said: "I will not be subject to a claim arising from deficency of men," he meant this, I will only be liable for accidents such as collision, break-down of engines, or loss of the steamer. It seems to me that that entirely explains how it came to pass that they inserted the words "to pay loss of hire for accidents occurring." If that is so, clause 6, with the exception of what Mr. Pollard very much relies upon, namely, the general words about the acts of God, and so on, is clear and distinct, and I consider that it is pretty well settled law that, if there is an express covenant or an express stipulation as to when the hire is to cease, the hire of the ship or anything else, you do not imply that it is to cease, in any other event. An express agreement that it shall cease in certain events excludes the implication that it is to cease in other events. That is a general principle applicable to all deeds and policies, and charters, and everything else. Then if that be so, the case, as it seems to me, lies in a very narrow compass. I entirely agree that this was not collision, it was not the break-down of engines, it was not the loss of the ship. These are the cases which are specified in clause 6, and it was not one of them. But then, Mr. Pollard says, there is this other clause in the charter-party, namely, dangers and accidents of the seas are mutually excepted. Then the agreement is, that that being so, any danger of the sea which caused any delay would entitle the charterer to say, "I am exempted from payment of freight during the time of that delay." That is entirely and absolutely inconsistent with this express clause, that the delay must be for forty-eight working hours. That again would be a strong argument to show that those general words were never meant to be applicable to the cause which arose. But it seems to me that those observations go a long way to show that the defendant is not in the wrong. If the specified cases in the 6th clause would apply in any other sense, namely in the sense of its being a collision, then do they apply to this case? It is in the case of a collision which renders the vessel incapable of steaming or proceeding until she is again in an efficient state to resume her voyage. That was not this case. It never did prevent her steaming or proceeding for a single hour. She did proceed, and for several months proceeded, from June down to the 28th Nov.

I quite agree with my brother Grove, that the risk of the policy only continues during the period from the 15th April to the 15th Oct., and during that period there was no loss. I do not think it ever entered the minds of either party that if at some subsequent time there should be a loss owing to an accident which occurred during the time of the existence of the policy, and that time only brought into existence by an extension of the period for which the charter was made, it is the same as if there had been a new charter, as in this case the six months had run out and the charter had not been extended, and then a new charter had been entered into, so that there was no chartered freight for three months more. The argument must go to the length of saying that although the charter ran its course and expired, and there was no loss, yet there was during the existence of another charter, and during another period when there was chartered freight, the discovery of an accident which occurred during the currency of the policy. It seems to me that would be a most extraordinary construction to put upon this policy of insurance. For these and other reasons which I will not go into it seems to me that the defendants are entitled to our judgment.

Lopes, J.—I am clearly of opinion that the defendants are entitled to judgment in this case.

It is an action brought by shipowners against underwriters on a policy of insurance, and it is most material to see what the risk is in respect of which the insurance was given. The two clauses in the policy that are material for the purposes of ascertaining what the risk was appear to me to be these:—First, that the insurance effected was at and from and for and during the space of six calendar months, from the 15th April to 14th Oct. 1881, both days inclusive, and was on 1200*l.* chartered freight, to pay only loss of hire not exceeding 2000*l.*, which may arise in clause 6 of charter-party, for accidents occurring between 15th April and 15th Oct., but free of claim arising from deficiency of men. Those are the two clauses from which it is to be inferred what the risk insured against was. Now, it appears to me that the risk which the underwriters undertook was this, the loss of chartered freight between the 15th April and 15th Oct. The thing at risk in that policy was the chartered freight between those days. Therefore, in order to entitle the plaintiffs to recover in this action, if that is the true construction of the policy, there must have been a loss of chartered freight arising between the 15th April and the 15th Oct. in respect of an accident occurring between those two dates. Two things are necessary therefore; there must be a loss of the chartered freight between those two dates in respect of an accident occurring between those two dates. Now, it is true that the accident occurred between those dates; but it is also true that there was no loss of any chartered freight between those two dates, and that being as I consider the true construction of this charter-party, on that ground alone the plaintiffs would not be entitled to recover, because every penny of the chartered freight which was earned between those two dates had been paid.

Then, with regard to the other point, putting aside the question of time—the 15th April and 15th Oct.—has there been any cesser of the payment of the chartered freight such as is contemplated by the charter-party and covered by the policy? It appears to me that it is perfectly clear that there has not. I do not desire to go through the reasons which have been already so fully given by my brothers, but clearly nothing has happened which was provided for in the earlier part of clause 6 of the charter-party.

Then it is said the general words which appear further on in the clause applied. Now, it is perfectly clear law that those words would not create a cesser of payment of freight by themselves, and unless you can connect those general words with the earlier part of clause 6 they would be absolutely ineffectual for that purpose. It appears to me that the general words constitute an independent clause applicable to other purposes, and cannot be connected in any way with the earlier part of clause 6. Therefore, on that ground also, I think the defendants would be entitled to succeed.

ADMIRALTY BUSINESS.

(Before Sir James Hannen and Butt, J.)

THE PRINCESS. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM THE GREAT YARMOUTH COUNTY COURT.

Collision—Consequential damage—Rotten wood—Board of Trade.

Where a ship is damaged by collision and on opening her up to effect the repairs rendered necessary by the collision, certain parts of her not injured by the collision are found to be rotten and to require renewing, the cost of such renewal cannot be charged to the collision damage, although such parts but for such opening up would have lasted for some years.

This was an appeal by the defendant from a decision of the judge of the County Court of Norfolk (Admiralty Jurisdiction) in a collision action in rem instituted by the owners of the dandy trawler Speedwell against the fishing smack Princess.

The action was instituted on the 7th Jan. 1885. Prior to the institution of the action, the defendant admitted his liability, and tendered to the plaintiff the sum of 70*l.*, in satisfaction of his claim. The plaintiff refused to accept the tender, which was paid into court on the 10th Jan. 1885. On the action coming on for trial on the 13th Feb. 1885, the judge of the County Court, after hearing counsel and solicitor for the plaintiff and defendant respectively, made an order that it should be referred to the registrar to assess the amount of the damages, with a direction that, if any point of law was raised at the reference, the registrar should reserve it for the decision of the County Court judge. In accordance with this order, the registrar, after hearing evidence, found the following facts :—

1. That the damage caused to the Speedwell by the collision between her and the Princess on the 28th Sept. 1884 was surveyed soon after she returned into Yarmouth Harbour by Mr. Edmund Fleming, the surveyor agreed upon by both parties, and that in accordance with his survey, dated the 6th day of Oct. 1884, the Speedwell was docked, and the repairs specified in the survey were carried out by Messrs. Fellows and Son.

2. That while such repairs were being carried out, certain defects and deterioration in the timber heads, not visible externally, were discovered, and Mr. Paxton, the local surveyor to the Board of Trade, in the course of his official duties, when visiting Messrs. Fellow's shipbuilding yard, inspected the Speedwell, and called the attention of the plaintiff, and also of Mr. J. H. Fellows and his foreman, to the timber heads, intimating to them that the parts which were defective or deteriorated must be replaced by new work before she could go to sea again, and if such repairs as he required had not been carried out, it was within the knowledge of the plaintiff and of Mr. J. H. Fellows that the Board of Trade would have had power to detain the Speedwell under sect. 6 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1876.

3. That Messrs. Fellows and Sons accordingly, with the knowledge and approval of the plaintiff, carried out such additional repairs as were necessary to satisfy the requirements of the Board of Trade surveyor, and to put the Speedwell into a fit and proper state to go to sea again, and in accordance with the usual course of business in such cases, but without any instructions from the plaintiff and without his knowledge, they entered the several items of the repairs in their day-book and ledger under two separate accounts, one being headed "damage account," which amounted to a total of 37*l.* 16*s.* 2*d.*, and included only the repair of the damage actually caused by the collision, and the other being headed "owner's account," which amounted to a total of 35*l.* 15*s.* 8*d.*, and included the repairs rendered necessary by the deterioration of the timber heads; but, after the work was completed, Messrs. Fellows and Son, by the express desire of the plaintiff, furnished him with one bill for the entire work, amounting to 73*l.* 11*s.* 10*d.*

4. That the defects and deterioration in the timber heads were not in any way caused by the collision, but resulted either from bad workmanship when the Speedwell was repaired in 1878 or from ordinary wear and tear since that date.

5. It was, however, contended on behalf of the plaintiff that the additional repairs were rendered necessary in consequence of the collision, although the defects were not caused thereby, inasmuch as it was established in evidence that the Speedwell was in good condition, capable of doing the work of a first-class fishing boat, and might reasonably have been expected, notwithstanding these defects, if the collision had not occurred, to have pursued her ordinary employment for four or five years longer without needing any substantial repairs; but, in consequence of her port side being open to repair the damage actually caused by the collision, the other latent defects were disclosed and brought to the official notice of the Board of Trade surveyor, and the plaintiff was consequently forced to incur the expense of additional repairs which he would not otherwise have been subjected to.

6. The point therefore which I reserve for the decision of the judge is, whether, under the above circumstances, the plaintiff is entitled to recover the whole cost of the repairs done to the Speedwell or only the cost of repairing the damage actually caused by the collision.

On the question of law raised in the registrar's report coming before the learned County Court judge, his Honour decided in favour of the plaintiff, saying, "that the principle on which he had to decide the case was clearly established. The principle he had acted on in cases of collision on the highway had been that the wrongdoer, if he ran into a neighbour's carriage and did damage, and in its repair it was made substantially new, it was not his fault but the fault of the wrongdoer. He had held that the plaintiff was entitled to all the costs incurred in making the carriage what it was at the time of collision. He should act in the same manner with regard to collisions at sea. The principle was clearly stated in the cases which had been referred to. What were the facts in the case? This vessel was prosecuting her business on the fishing station. She was, as was found by the report, and, as was established in evidence, in good condition, and capable of doing the business of a first-class fishing boat, and could have pursued her ordinary business for four or five years but for the collision. In his judgment she had a right to be put in that condition again; and if in doing so something arose not anticipated at the time of collision, so much the worse for the defendant. The plaintiff was entitled to have the vessel put in a condition to render her fit for the purposes required. When the vessel was stripped after the collision, it turned out that some of her timber heads were in such a condition that she could not go to sea until they had been repaired. She was at sea when she was struck, and could have continued to carry on her business four or five years without repairs. Why should not the plaintiff pay for making her fit to go to sea again? The defendant must put the vessel into the condition she was when she was collided with, and, cost what it might, the defendant would have to do it."

From this decision the defendant now appealed.

Bucknill, for the defendant in support of the appeal, was stopped.

Sir Walter Phillimore for the respondent.—The decision of the learned County Court judge is right and should be affirmed. The same principle was acted upon by Dr. Lushington in the case of The Egyptian (8 L. T. Rep. N. S. 776; 2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 56). Had it not been for the collision, the necessity to replace the timber heads would not have arisen for some four or five years. Primâ facie, a wrongdoer is liable for all the consequences of his wrongful act. Even if only a part of the damage is attributable to the wrongdoer, and that part cannot be distinguished from the rest, the wrongdoer is responsible for the whole.

THE PRESIDENT (Sir James Hannen).—We think the decision of the learned County Court judge cannot be supported. The point here raised was very forcibly commented on by Dr. Lushington in the case of The Alfred (3 W. Rob. 232, 239), when he says that if shipowners attempt to include repairs not rendered necessary by the collision in the amount of their damages, they would be guilty of fraud. In the present case the damage occasioned by the collision can be easily discriminated. All that the report shows as to the rotten timber heads is that, in consequence of the collision, the Board of Trade inspector was given the opportunity of seeing that it was his duty to require the owner of the Speedwell to do further repairs than those rendered necessary by the collision. To charge such repairs upon the defendant would be like the case of a man who, having been knocked down by a cab, is told by the doctor that he is suffering from a disease which rendered an operation necessary, and claims from the cabowners, not only compensation for the accident, but also the doctor's fee for the operation. We are clearly of opinion that we cannot affirm this decision. As the defendant has paid 70*l.* into court, which is more than the amount of the repairs for which he is liable, we must find for the defendant.

SVENDSEN v. WALLACE. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF APPEAL IN ENGLAND.

General average—Perils of the seas—Putting into port to repair—Expenses of reloading cargo—Particular average.

Where a vessel laden with cargo is compelled to put into port to repair an injury caused by perils of the seas, the expense of reloading the cargo, necessarily unloaded for the purpose of repairing the injury, and the expenses incurred for port charges, pilotage, and other charges subsequent to reloading, are not chargeable to general average.

A ship sprang a dangerous leak while on a voyage, and it become necessary, for the safety of ship and cargo, to put into a port of refuge to repair; and when in port it was found necessary to unship the cargo in order to repair the ship.

Held (affirming the judgment of the court below), that the expenses of reloading the cargo after the repairs had been completed were not general average expenses.

THIS was an appeal from a judgment of the Court of Appeal (Brett, M.R. and Bowen, L.J., Baggallay, L.J. dissenting), reported in 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 232; 50 L. T. Rep. N. S. 799; 13 Q.B. Div. 69, reversing a judgment of Lopes, J., reported in 48 L. T. Rep. N. S. 795; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 87; 11 Q. B. Div. 616.

The action was brought by the appellants as owners of the ship Olaf Trygvason against the respondents, the cargo owners, to recover a general average contribution. The defendants disputed their liability in respect of charges for reshipping the cargo, and for outward pilotage and port dues at St. Louis in Mauritius, where the ship had been obliged to take refuge for repairs, in consequence of having sprung a leak on a voyage from Rangoon to Liverpool.

The facts are very fully set out in the judgment of Lord Blackburn, and at p. 87 of these Reports.

C. Russell, Q.C., Cohen, Q.C., and Warr appeared for the appellants, and contended that the question depended upon whether the decision in Atwood v. Sellar (4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 153; 41 L. T. Rep. N. S. 83; 4 Q.B. Div. 342; on appeal. 42 L. T. Rep. N. S. 644; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 283; 5 Q. B. Div. 286) governs this case. The Court of Appeal distinguished it, but we say that it applies, and that the going into a port of refuge, landing, warehousing, and reloading the cargo, are all one continuous transaction, which gives rise to general average. The expenses may be said to be incurred when the steps which necessarily lead to them have been taken:

The Copenhagen, 1 C. Rob. 289.

The deviation to a port of refuge in consequence of a leak is as much an "extraordinary sacrifice" as cutting away a mast, and there is no other distinction or difference in principle between this case and Atwood v. Sellar (ubi sup.). See which all favour our contention.

Webster, Q.C., Myburgh, Q.C., and Barnes, for the respondents, argued that much depended on whether the case was to be decided on general principles, or on the practice of average adjusters. The respondents rely on principle and custom. On principle the first cause must govern all the allocation of expenses, according as it is a general average sacrifice or sea damage causing a particular average loss; or the expenses must be incurred to prevent the existence of a common danger. Atwood v. Sellar (ubi sup.) does not extend to this case, or, if it does, it is to that extent wrong. The ship is repaired for the benefit of the owner, and it may earn freight; it is not necessarily for the benefit of the cargo owner that the goods should go on in the same bottom. As to the duty of the shipowner to repair, see and the judgment of Cockburn, C.J. in Atwood v. Sellar (ubi sup.), citing Worms v. Storey (11 Ex. 427) and De Cuadra v. Swann (16 C. B. N. S. 772), but he goes beyond any previous authority. The master is bound to repair the ship if necessary, acting as agent of the owner to enable him to earn his freight. The dividing line between general and particular average is when the goods are in safety. The argument for the appellants loses sight of the shipowner's obligation to the cargo owner. Da Costa v. Newnham (ubi sup.) is no doubt in favour of the appellants, but it cannot now be considered law. The expenses incurred after the cargo is in safety are not the subject of general average. They are not the consequence of putting into the port of refuge.

Moss v. Smith, 9 C. B. 94;

(a) Reported by C. E. MALDEN, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The expenses of landing and storing the goods are not properly general average charges, and should be disallowed on strict principle, but they have been allowed by custom: (see Benecke on Marine Insurance p. 191.) We rely on Power v. Whitmore (ubi sup.) so far as it modifies Plummer v. Wildman (ubi sup.). When the goods are once in port the principle of the decision in Atwood v. Sellar (ubi sup.) ceases to apply. See

Hall v. Janson, 4 E. & B. 500;
Job v. Langton (ubi sup.);
Walthew v. Mavrojani, 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 382; 22 L. T. Rep. N. S. 310; L. Rep. 5 Ex. 116; Harrison v. Bank of Australasia, 25 L. T. Rep. N. S. 944; 1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 198; L. Rep. 7 Ex. 39, on the principles of general average. Simply putting into a port of refuge does not give rise to a general average, unless it is to avoid a common danger, and then it ceases when the danger ceases. The dividing line is to be drawn there. A particular average loss making it the duty of the master to go into port cannot give rise to a general average contribution. See Cohen, Q.C. was heard in reply.

At the conclusion of the arguments their Lordships took time to consider their judgment.

May 12.—Their Lordships gave judgment as follows:—

Lord BLACKBURN.—My Lords: The question intended to be brought before this House is raised in a somewhat unusual way. The appellants, plaintiffs below, are the owners of a vessel, the Olaf Trygvason. The nationality of the vessel is immaterial. She took on board at Rangoon a cargo of rice. A bill of lading for the whole cargo was signed, of which the material part is as follows: "Shipped in good order and well conditioned by the Bombay Burmah Trading Corporation Limited in and upon the good ship called the Olaf Trygvason, now riding at anchor in the Rangoon river, and bound for Scilly, Falmouth, Plymouth, or Cowes for orders. 13,583 bags cargo rice to be delivered in the like good order and well conditioned, at the port of discharge (the act of God, the Queen's enemies, fire, and all and every other dangers and accident of the seas, rivers, and navigation of whatsoever nature and kind excepted) unto order or to its assigns. Freight for the said goods payable as per charter-party." The ship was ordered to Liverpool. The respondents, defendants below, are merchants in London who purchased the cargo of rice and became assignees of the bill of lading. On the arrival of the ship at Liverpool the respondents, as holders of the bill of lading and consignees of the whole cargo, were entitled to have the cargo delivered to them on discharging the lien of the shipowners. But the captain had a lien on it, not only for the freight, as to which there was no dispute, but also for the payment of such disbursements as formed a charge on the cargo, as to the amount of which there was and is a dispute, and also for any amount which the cargo had to contribute to general average, as to the amount of which also there was and is a dispute. This often occurs, and it gives rise to a difficulty which is well expressed in the preamble to the average bond signed in this case: "Whereas the said ship lately arrived in the port of Liverpool, on a voyage from Rangoon, and it is alleged that during such voyage she met with bad weather, and sustained damage and loss, and that sacrifices were made and expenditure incurred which may form a charge on the cargo or some part thereof, or be the subject of a general average contribution, but the same cannot be immediately ascertained, and in the meantime it is desirable that the cargo should be delivered." The mode in which this difficulty is commonly dealt with has at least for more than eighty years (see Myer v. Vander Deyl, in 1803, Abbott on Shipping, 5th ed. p. 362) been that the captain agrees to give up his lien on payment of the freight payable on delivery, and the various consignees of the cargo agree, in consideration thereof (and, if required, give security), to pay to the owners of the ship the proper proportion of any particular or other charges which may be chargeable on their respective consignments, or of any general average to which the owners of such consignment as such may be liable. As in the present case there was only one owner of the whole cargo, and no dispute as to either the quantity of the cargo or the amount of the freight, this left only two things to be determined, the amount of the special charges on the cargo which were payable by the respondents, and the amount of the general average charges of which the respondents have to pay the proportion payable in respect of the cargo and of the freight paid in advance at Rangoon, which in effect was a part payment of the price of so much of the cargo, the proportion payable in respect of the ship and of the freight not yet paid being payable by those interested in them. The facts as to what took place on the voyage, what were the disbursements actually made, and under what circumstances they were made, cannot be proved by legal evidence without much delay and expense, but at least, when there is no suspicion of fraud or falsehood, the ship's papers enable an average adjuster of competent skill to approximate to them sufficiently to decide the case as an arbitrator, if the parties choose to give him authority so to act, or, if they do not so authorise him, to apply the principles generally acted on by average adjusters, so as to produce a practical result on which the parties can, and generally, if the average adjuster is of repute, do act, as having the moral weight of an award, though either party may, if they please, question his findings, either of fact or of law, for it is not an award. In the present case two firms of repute, Lowndes and Ryley, of Liverpool, and W. Richards and Son, of London, were employed to prepare adjustments. Each, as is usual, prefixed to the statement extracts from the ship's papers, showing the state of facts on which they acted. These are almost identical, and I think, looking at the two adjustments, they are agreed up to a certain point, and, if it is open to me to form my opinion from the ship's papers, I should say that so far no reasonable person could differ from them.

The vessel sailed from Rangoon on the 30th March 1880. She took the ground at low tide, but got off at high tide, and proceeded on her voyage after this accidental stranding. Till the 19th May she continued on her voyage, and on that day she deviated from the course of the voyage and ran for Mauritius. During these seven weeks she encountered strong winds and heavy seas, which caused the ship to strain, and labour, and make water. There was nothing, however, beyond ordinary perils of the seas, except that some spars and canvas were sacrificed in order to erect a windmill to assist in working the pumps. The cost of replacing those, less the usual allowance of one-third new for old about 10*l.* is allowed in general average by both adjusters. But it is clear that the vessel did not run for Mauritius on account of the windmill, and, except as evidence confirmatory of the extent to which she was leaking by the 19th May, this is not material. Had the deviation not been justified by a sufficient cause it would have rendered the shipowners liable (see Davis v. Garrett, 6 Bing. 716); and therefore it is important to see what was the state of the vessel on the 19th May. Not only was she leaking at the rate of nine inches an hour, but when she came to anchor on the 22nd in the harbour of St. Louis she was found in the harbour to be making 10½in. of water per hour, so that, though there is no extraordinary weather noticed, the leak had in that day and a half increased greatly, and it was necessary to hire a considerable number of shore labourers who were employed to pump her. The surveyors, who saw her on the 22nd whilst afloat in the harbour, found her still making 10½in. an hour, and recommended the cargo to be discharged until the leak stopped, or the vessel became sufficiently lightened to be placed in dry dock. On the 4th June the whole cargo with the exception of about 100 tons having been discharged, the surveyors again examined her, and found the vessel still making 7in. of water per hour. They recommended the vessel to be put in dry dock for further examination of her bottom, which was done. It seems impossible to come to any other conclusion than that the vessel, though perhaps she might have reached her destination with such a leak, would have been in great danger, and consequently that it was quite justifiable to run into St. Louis; nor can it, I think, be disputed that everything which was done after the vessel came into harbour until the vessel was removed into the dry dock was reasonably done with a view to the common safety of ship, cargo, and freight, which, while such a leak existed, were not in safety even in the harbour. Both adjusters must have agreed on this, for I find that each of them allows as general average all the extra expenses up to that date, including port dues and pilotage inwards, the hire of the labourers who pumped, the expenses of the survey, and the expense of landing the portion of the cargo unshipped between the 22nd May and the 4th June, as well as the cost of replacing the spars, &c., sacrificed to make a windmill, amounting, in the whole, in round numbers to nearly 300*l.* to general average. And if that had been all there would have been no difference between them, and probably no dispute between the parties. But a difference, which anyone who has read the case of Atwood v. Sellar (41 L. T. Rep. N. S. 83; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 153; 4 Q. B. Div. 342; on appeal, 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 283; 42 L. T. Rep. N. S. 644; 5 Q. B. Div. 286), and was aware that the members of the firm of W. Richards and Sons are leading members of the association mentioned in the fifth paragraph of the special case there stated, and that Mr. Lowndes was the eminent average adjuster mentioned in the sixth paragraph, must have anticipated, arose. Messrs. Lowndes and Ryley charged to general average the expenses of warehousing and insuring the cargo when on shore, amounting in round numbers to 190*l.*, and the expenses of reshipping the cargo, amounting in round numbers to 446*l.*, and the outward dock dues, amounting in round numbers to 20*l.*, and the outward pilotage, about 5*l.*, to general average. They charge about 30*l.* as special average to cargo, and nothing to freight. Messrs. W. Richards and Sons charged the expenses of the cargo on land, amounting in round numbers, as already stated, to 190*l.*, to cargo, as well as the smaller item of 30*l.*, as to which there is no controversy; and the other items which Messrs. Lowndes charge to general average, amounting in round numbers to near 500*l.*, to freight. Both agree in charging the expenses of taking the ship into dry dock, and the much more heavy expenses of repairing the vessel, amounting altogether to 1866*l.*, to ship and owners, so that there is no dispute as to those items. There is some difference apparently as to the value put upon the ship as a contributory subject into which it is not necessary to inquire. The result is, Lowndes and Co., apportioning the general average as they made it out amongst the subjects contributory as they valued them, made Messrs. Wallace, as owners of the cargo and the prepaid freight, liable to pay as contribution to general average 740*l.*, and in respect of particular average 30*l.*, in all, 770*l.* I omit shillings and pence. Messrs. Richards and Sons made them liable to pay as contribution to general average 467*l.*, as particular average on the cargo 215*l.* (including the 30*l.*), in all 681*l.* I again omit shillings and pence. Messrs. Wallace paid that sum, and for the difference between it and 770*l.* this action was brought.

There were two issues joined, one on a plea that there was a custom so general as to have the effect of being incorporated in all contracts by which the rule of practice of adjusters contended for by the respondents was established, which was denied. The other was a general plea of payment before action of 681*l.* 13*s.* 1*d.*, to which the plaintiffs replied that they had received it, but that it was not enough to satisfy their claim. Both issues came on to be tried before Lopes, J. and a special jury. The judge ruled that there was no evidence fit to be left to the jury in support of the custom. On this there has been no appeal to this House. The jury were discharged on the issue as to the sufficiency of the payment, and that was reserved for further consideration. No evidence was called on this issue, and nothing was said as to how the facts were to be ascertained if it became material to ascertain any of them not expressly admitted. I do not think it was supposed, by either side, certainly, from the terms of his judgment, not by Lopes, J., that anything could depend on the special circumstances; it was not until in reading the judgment of Bowen, L.J. I came upon this opinion, "The question whether extraordinary expenditure after the entry into a port of refuge is rightly chargeable to general average necessarily depends on the circumstances of each case," and on further consideration agreed in it, that I became aware of the importance of having some means of ascertaining what the circumstances were. Without some such power no judgment except a venire de novo could be given, unless it could be laid down as a general proposition of law, either that no expenses of warehousing the cargo and afterwards reshipping it in a port of refuge can ever be general average expenses, or that they must always be so. I am not prepared to assent to either proposition. Any State may, by its Legislature, enact that within its territories the law shall be either way. Judging merely from the language of their codes (which, however, is often apt to mislead, unless construed with reference to their law and usage), I should say that some foreign nations have enacted in opposite ways. There is, however, no English enactment on the subject. I have no doubt that both parties would, if it had occurred to anyone that it was necessary or even desirable so to do, have readily agreed to give the court power to look at the ship's papers, and, if it thought fit, draw inferences from them as an average adjuster would do. I propose to deal with this case as if such a power was given. In Simonds v. White (2 B. & C. 811) Abbott, C.J. says: "The principle of general average, namely, that all whose property has been saved by the sacrifice of the property of another shall contribute to make good his loss, is of very ancient date, and of universal reception among commercial nations. The obligation to contribute, therefore, depends not so much upon the terms of any particular instrument as upon a general rule of maritime law. The obligation may be limited, qualified, or even excluded by the special terms of a contract as between the parties to the contract, but there is nothing of that kind in any contract between the parties to this cause. There are, however, many variations in the laws and usages of different nations as to the losses which are considered to fall within this principle." The point decided in that case was that the loss was to be adjusted according to the law of the place of the destination, in that case Russia, and that the Russian adjuster was to adjust it according to the Russian law, which, of course, was to be gathered from the Russian edicts and the decisions of the Russian judicature; and that, though the ship and the parties were English, the goods owners could not recover back so much of the money as would not have been charged to them on an adjustment of average made according to the law of England. As in the present case the place of delivery was English, this is an authority, if one was required, to show that the law and usage of foreign nations, where they differ from our own, are irrelevant. But it will be observed that Abbott, C.J. expressly says that a contract might alter the whole, and in Wilson v. Bank of Victoria (16 L. T. Rep. N. S. 9; 2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 449; L. Rep. 2 Q. B. 203) it was intimated that a custom tacitly making it part of the contract that any particular principle should be applied might alter the whole. I think that unless it was proved that there was such a custom as to be tacitly incorporated, it could have no such effect. And I have no doubt that the issue which has not been brought here by appeal was rightly decided. I think, however, there is much force in the concluding observations of Manisty, J. in Atwood v. Sellar (ubi sup.). I agree with him at least thus far, that a general practice, long continued amongst English adjusters, affords strong ground for thinking that the practice is one which is not in general inconvenient, and that it throws a considerable onus on those who impugn it to show that the particular circumstances are not such as to render an adherence to the practice in that case against principle. Before proceeding further, I think it desirable to consider what is the question raised on the issue reserved for further consideration. The plaintiffs claimed the sum which Messrs. Lowndes and Ryley made payable, viz., 770*l*. The defendants had paid the sum which Messrs. W. Richards and Sons made payable by them. The issue was whether all that was really due had been paid. It is to be observed, first, that the points on which Messrs. W. Richards and Sons differ from Messrs. Lowndes and Ryley are not all in favour of the defendants. If the 190*l*. which represent the warehousing rent, and fire insurance are properly charged to cargo, the defendants have to pay the whole of it. If it is properly charged to general average, they have only to pay their proportion of it, or somewhat less than one half. That, if it stood alone, would make nearly 100*l*. more payable by the defendants. But if the 450*l*., which is the cost of reshipping, is properly charged to freight, the defendants are not liable to pay any portion of it. If it is properly charged to general average, they would have to pay about half of it. So that that item makes a difference of about 230*l*. If, in addition, the 20*l*. for the cost of going out of port is properly charged to freight, that makes a further difference of about 10*l*. It is not, therefore, necessary to decide anything more than whether these two items are, under the circumstances of the case, properly chargeable to general average or not. If they are not so chargeable, the order appealed against is right, for the defendants have paid enough, and more than enough, whether the 190*l*. is properly chargeable to cargo or not, and it is unnecessary to consider that question except in so far as it may throw light on the principles which are to guide the decision of the first and most important one. I do not think it necessary to inquire what would be the proper course if the seeking the port of refuge had been solely for the purpose of doing repairs, the cargo not being in any danger. Such a case may perhaps sometimes, though rarely, occur. Nor do I think it necessary to inquire what would be the proper course if the ship and cargo were both safe in the harbour of refuge. and the unloading of the cargo was entirely for the purpose of facilitating the repairs. Such a case seems more likely to happen than that first supposed. I think, on examining the two adjustments, and exercising the power which I have assumed to be given, there can be no doubt that the cargo on board the ship, leaking to the extent which she did, was not safe even in harbour until the ship was so far lightened that she could be taken into dry dock. Should the expense of reloading her, after the repairs were made, be charged to freight, the goods having been taken out under such circumstances? I think it should. I am afraid I have not understood the reasoning on which Cockburn, C.J. in his judgment in Atwood v. Sellar (ubi sup.) comes to a contrary conclusion. If I have, I must express dissent from it. The ordinary contract between shipowner and merchant is, that the goods shall be carried to their destination, and shall there be delivered, unless prevented by the excepted perils. And this generally should be done in the original ship, Whenever the ship is disabled it must, in order literally to fulfil this contract, be necessary to repair the ship so far as to make her fit to carry on the cargo, and if any part of the cargo has been taken out to reship it. Rosetto v. Gurney (11 C. B. 188) was a case between the owners of corn insured from Odessa to Liverpool and their underwriters. The plaintiffs claimed for a total loss, and the underwriters paid money into court. The cargo was at Cork in a very damaged state, but by great skill, and at considerable cost, was prevented from turning into manure, and was sold at Cork, a considerable part of it being still corn. The verdict was entered for a total loss. A rule for a new trial was obtained on various grounds, one, on which it was made absolute, was that the judge had not properly directed the jury as to the effect of the extra cost of conveyance in a new bottom from Cork, the port of distress where the wheat was sold, to Liverpool, the port of destination. The Court say as to this: "If the voyage is completed in the original ship it is completed upon the original contract, and no additional freight is incurred. If the master tranships because the original ship is irreparably damaged, without considering whether he is bound to tranship, or merely at liberty to do so, it is clear that he tranships to earn his full freight; and so the delivery takes place upon the original contract."

There never was in the present case any question as to the Olaf Trygvason being irreparably damaged; but she was so far damaged that it was certain that there would be some delay (it turned out to be about six weeks) before the Olaf Trygvason was in a fit state to carry the goods on to Liverpool. And if there had been a good ship at St. Louis willing to carry the goods to their destination for less than the agreed freight from Rangoon, it might have been for the benefit of all that the goods should be shipped on that vessel at once, carried on, and delivered to the consignee without delay. Such was the course pursued in Shipton v. Thornton (9 A. & E. 314), where the original shipment was from Singapore to London in the James Scott. She put into Batavia in distress, and there the goods were transhipped into the Mountaineer and the Sesostris, carried to London, and there delivered to the owner of the James Scott at a cost less than the amount of freight which he would have earned had the goods been caried on in the James Scott. He delivered them to the consignee, who produced the original bill of lading by the James Scott. The consignee refused to pay freight at the rate in the bill of lading of the James Scott from Singapore to London, though he paid that from Batavia agreed on in the bills of lading of the Mountaineer and the Sesostris. The decision was, that whether or not the captain was bound to tranship he was at liberty to do so, and having done so had earned his full freight. The expense which he had incurred to earn it being certainly not general average, but I think a particular average paid by the shipowner to earn his freight. My conclusion is that if, instead of transhipping, the captain waits till the original ship is repaired, and then reships on that original ship, the cost of so doing should not be general average, but particular average to earn the full freight. Cockburn, C.J. seems to think that in all cases where the ship is disabled, whether she can be repaired or not, the original contract is dissolved, and a new one formed by law. This seems to me in direct conflict with the two decisions I have just cited; and even if it were so, I think it is somewhat in the nature of a petitio principii to say that one of the terms of the new contract should be that the cost of transhipment or reshipment, as the case may be, should be general average. The judgment, however, of the Court of Appeal, delivered by Thesiger, L.J., does not proceed on this ground. I have some difficulty, after reading the statement as to the grounds on which the Court of Appeal proceeded, given by Baggalay, L.J. in his judgment in the present case, in saying on what ground it does proceed. The special case in Atwood v. Sellar (ubi sup.) was express that the ship was injured by a voluntary sacrifice, and was thereby compelled to put in to Charleston to repair the said damage. It is not expressly said either way whether the cargo was in any danger. Baggallay, L.J., who was a party to that judgment, says that it was decided on the ground that putting into the port of refuge was necessary for the safety of both ship and cargo, and that he at least thought that it was immaterial what was the cause of that necessity. Yet I think there is much reason for doubting if Thesiger, L.J. quite agreed in this. He says: "The principle which underlies the whole law of general average contribution is that the loss, immediate and consequential, caused by the sacrifice for the benefit of cargo, ship, and freight, should be borne by all. This principle is in the abstract conceded by counsel for the defendants, and its application to the present case is admitted to the extent of allowing the expenses of unloading the goods, for the purpose of doing the necessary repairs to enable it to proceed on the voyage, to be the subject of general average contribution, but they attempt to distinguish such expenses from those of warehousing and reloading the cargo, and of outward port and pilotage charges, by the suggestion that the common danger to the whole adventure is at an end when the goods are unloaded, and that general average ceases at the point of time when the common danger ceases." This is, I think, a fair statement of the argument of the respondents' counsel in the present case. Afterwards, he says, the going into port, the unloading, warehousing, and reloading, are at all events parts of one act or operation contemplated, resolved upon, and carried through for the common safety and benefit, and properly to be regarded as continuous." This was much relied on by the counsel for the respondents. If I thought it was the state of the case before the House, I should consider whether in such a case it might not fairly be argued that the whole of these operations were to be considered as parts of the expense of repairing the damage, and therefore, in a case where the cause of the damage was such that the expense of repairing it ought to be borne by all, as was the case in Atwood v. Sellar, to be borne by all; but that in a case where the cause of the damage was such that the expense of repairing it ought to be borne by the ship only, which is the present case, to be borne by the ship only. But having come to the conclusion that such is not the state of the case before the House, I do not enter into this inquiry. Having come to the conclusion that, under the circumstances of this case, the expenses of reloading, &c., should not be placed to general average, and that being enough, if your Lordships agree with me, to show that the respondents have paid more than enough, it is not necessary to consider whether the smaller sum of 20*l.* ought also to have been charged to ship or freight, and not to general average. I agree with Bowen, L.J. in what he says, that is a more difficult question than the other. And as the amount is not sufficient to turn the scale, it is not necessary to decide it. I should think it seldom involved any sum so great as to be of practical importance, and I prefer leaving it undecided. I shall therefore move that the order appealed against be affirmed, and the appeal dismissed, the appellants to pay the costs.

Lords WATSON and FITZGERALD concurred.

Order appealed from affirmed, and appeal dismissed with costs.

THE YOURRI; THE SPEARMAN. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM THE SUPREME CONSULAR COURT OF CONSTANTINOPLE.

Collision — River Danube — Fog — Negligence — Titre 2, cap. 2, art. 34 of Danube Commission Rules.

Under art. 34, cap. 2, titre 2, of the Danube Regulations, directing that, where two steamships meet going in opposite directions, "ils sont tenus de se diriger de telle sorte qu'ils viennent tous deux sur tribord. A cet effet, le bâtiment qui remonte le fleuve doit appuyer vers la rive gauche, et celui qui descend vers la rive droite," vessels going down the river are bound to keep to the right bank, and if a vessel in a mist after sunset keep to the left bank and come into collision with another vessel, the breach of the rule is negligence.

THIS was an appeal by the master of the Russian steamship Yourri from the decision of the Supreme Consular Court of Constantinople sitting in Vice-Admiralty, holding the steamships Yourri and Spearman both to blame for a collision in the river Danube.

The collision occurred on the 9th Dec. 1882.

On the 20th Dec. 1882 the master of the Yourri instituted a damage action against the Spearman and her freight.

On the 30th Jan. 1883 the master of the Spearman instituted a cross action against the Yourri.

(a) Reported by J. P. ASPINALL and BUTLER ASPINALL, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

The case on behalf of the appellants was as follows:—

The Yourri, a Russian steamship of 92 lasts, was, at the time of the collision, on a voyage from Lisbon to Odessa with a general cargo and passengers, and in charge of a pilot licensed by the European Commission of the Danube. Shortly before 6 p.m. on Dec. 9, 1882, the Yourri, with her regulation lights duly exhibited, was being navigated down the river a little to the starboard side of midstream, and was proceeding at a slow rate of speed. The weather, which had been a little misty, was then fine but dark. In such circumstances a vessel, which proved to be the Spearman, was observed ahead. The helm of the Yourri was at once put hard-a-port and her engines stopped, but the Spearman, coming on at great speed apparently under a starboard helm, struck the port bow of the Yourri and did her so much damage that she shortly afterwards sank.

The case on behalf of the respondents was as follows:—

The Spearman, a steamship of 651 tons net, was, on the 20th Dec. 1882, bound to Galatz from Sulina. At about 4.45 p.m. the Spearman, being on the starboard side of the river, was preparing to anchor for the night when the Yourri was seen right ahead. At this time it was still daylight, and, though the weather was hazy, both banks of the river were visible. On the Yourri being reported the helm of the Spearman was put hard-a-port and her engines reversed full speed astern. Notwithstanding the endeavours of the Spearman to avoid collision, the port bow of the Yourri struck the Spearman, causing her considerable damage. The current swung the Yourri round the bow of the Spearman, and, the ships parting, the Yourri sank close to the left bank of the river.

On the 14th Feb. 1884 the Supreme Consular Court of Constantinople delivered judgment finding both vessels to blame, the Yourri for being navigated on the wrong side of the river in contravention of art. 34, cap. 2, of the Danube Rules, and the Spearman for being navigated after sunset without lights in violation of the Danube Regulations, which violation contributed to the collision.

The regulations applicable to the navigation in question are the Danube Regulations, of which art 34, c. 2, is as follows:

Lorsque deux bâtiments à vapeur ou deux bâtiments à voiles navignant par un vent favorable se rencontrent faisant route en sens contraire, ils sont tenus de se diriger de telle sorte qu'ils viennent tous deux sur tribord, ainsi qu'il est d'usage à la mer. A cet effet, le bâtiment qui remonte le fleuve doit appuyer vers la rive gauche, et celui qui descend vers la rive droite. Il en est de même, lorsque la rencontre a lieu entre un bâtiment à vapeur et un bâtiment à voiles navignant par un vent favorable.

The master of the Yourri was appealing from the above decision, and submitted that it should be varied by the Spearman being held alone to blame for the following among other reasons:

1. Because it appears by the evidence that the Yourri was being navigated in a careful and proper manner, and in obedience to all the rules in force for the navigation of the Danube.

2. Because it appears by the evidence that the helm of the Yourri was ported as soon as the Spearman was or could be seen by those on board the Yourri to be meeting the Yourri, and this was in compliance with the regulations in force.

3. Because, assuming that both vessels were about in midstream, the Yourri did all that could be required of her by porting as and when she did.

4. Because the learned judge was wrong in finding that the Yourri was navigating on the left or port side of the river.

5. Because, if she had been so navigating, that of itself would be no breach of the regulations.

6. Because it appears by the evidence that the collision and the damage consequent thereon are imputable solely to the negligence of those on board the Spearman.

The respondents submitted that the decision ought to be affirmed for the following among other reasons:

1. That the Yourri was, at the time of the collision, coming down the left or wrong side of the Danube, and that she neglected to comply with article 34 of the Regulations for the Navigation of the River Danube, and also article 21 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea.

2. That, having regard to the terms of the said article 34 and the breach of it by the Yourri, she is responsible for the collision.

3. That the Yourri was being navigated at an improper speed, and that her steam whistle was not being sounded, and that she neglected to comply with article 34 of the Regulations for the Navigation of the River Danube and article 13 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea.

4. That those on board the Yourri neglected to slacken her speed or stop and reverse her engines in due time.

5. That a sufficient look-out was not kept on board the Yourri.

6. That the judgment was right in holding the Yourri in the wrong, and that she caused the collision.

Sir Walter Phillimore and Stubbs for the appellants.—On the evidence it is submitted that the Yourri was being carefully navigated on the starboard side of the river. Even assuming the Yourri not to have been keeping to the right bank there has been no breach of the rule. The rule provides that when two ships "se recontrent, faisant route en sens contraire," they must direct their course "qu'ils viennent tous deux sur tribord." In order to carry out this provision they are directed to "appuyer" towards the right and left banks respectively. The rule therefore is confined to cases where two ships are meeting, and hence it is submitted that the words "doit appuyer" mean "should bear towards" and not "keep to." If they mean "keep to" the right or left bank, as the case may be, the vessels would never meet at all.

Webster, Q.C. (with him Barnes) for the respondents, was not called upon.

Their Lordships' judgment was delivered by Lord BLACKBURN.—Their Lordships do not think it necessary to call upon the respondents' counsel. The first important question is, what upon the evidence is the correct view of the facts. There is a good deal that is not in dispute at all. The Yourri was going down the river Danube and the Spearman was coming up. When the Yourri had got near the spot where the collision took place there was, according to all the evidence, a certain degree of mist, which, on the balance of the evidence, seems to have been sufficiently great to prevent seeing across the river. That being the case, there would be an obvious object and reason for the vessel that was coming down the river to steer so near to one shore or the other that it could see that shore and guide itself in going down the river. If she were to keep in the middle of the river when the mist was such that she could not see either shore, she would not know where she was going, and she must come nearer to either one side or the other to guide herself. Having that obvious desire, the question would be, did the Yourri go to the left side to guide herself, or did she go to the right? Now, as to that question, the whole of the evidence shows that she went to the left, and, in addition to that, after the collision took place she was found on the left side. What effect the collision might have had in moving the vessel from the spot where the collision took place to one side or the other would not matter here. It might have had some effect in pushing the vessel farther from or nearer to the shore, but it is quite clear that there is not upon this evidence any ground for saying that the court below was wrong in the conclusion that the vessel could not have been pushed to the spot where her hulk was found lying unless she was upon the left-hand side of the river instead of the right-hand when the collision happened.

That fact being established then comes the question that is put as a matter of law: Was it a right decision of the Consular Court to hold that it was negligent in the vessel coming down the river, especially when there was a fog and approaching night, to go to the left-hand side instead of going to the right? That of course very much depends upon what is the construction of the rule which has been referred to. That rule seems decidedly to say that, in the river, the vessel that is going down shall keep to the right bank. This ship, the Yourri, did not keep to the right bank when the fog came on, and it was necessary to keep to one bank or the other to guide her. She might and ought to have gone to the right side, and then she would have known that no vessels coming up the river could meet her, unless they were neglecting their duty by going to the wrong side. She would then have been safe. As it was, she went for no reason apparently on the left-hand side when she ought not to have done so, and their Lordships think it would be very dangerous indeed in the case of a river navigation to put any other construction on the rules than to say that it is a neglect of duty for the vessel that is to keep to the one side or the other, according as the rules may be, not to do so. It is very necessary that all vessels should know that going down the Danube they should keep to the right bank, and in coming up keep to the left bank, and that it is a neglect of duty and negligence to come across to the other side. That being so, that this neglect of duty, if it was one, was the cause of the accident, or contributed to it, is a matter that can hardly admit of dispute at all. Had the Yourri not improperly gone to the left-hand side, the Spearman would never have met her. The Spearman was held to blame for not having lights, and the court below thought that the absence of lights partly contributed to the accident, and that decision has not been appealed against. The result is, that the judgment of the Supreme Consular Court must be affirmed, and this appeal dismissed with costs, and their Lordships will humbly advise Her Majesty to that effect.

Appeal dismissed.

COURT OF APPEAL.

Tuesday, June 16th, 1885.

(Before Brett, M.R., Bagallay and Bowen L.JJ., with Nautical Assessors)

The Rhosina. (a)

Damage—Harbour master—Falmouth Harbour Commissioners—Harbours, Docks, and Piers Clauses Act 1847 (10 & 11 Vict. c. 27), ss. 52, 53.

It being with the scope of the authority of the harbour master of Falmouth Harbour, upon the proper construction of the Acts relating thereto, to regulate the place and manner of beaching a vessel therein for repairs, an order given by him to those in charge of a vessel to let go their anchor in such a way that the vessel sits upon it in beaching and is thereby injured, is negligence, for which the Harbour Commissioners, as his employers, are liable.

Where a vessel is, in obedience to bye-laws, being beached in a harbour under the directions of the harbour master, and in order to reach the place of beaching selected by the harbour master she is properly passing through waters outside the limits of the authority of the Harbour Commissioners (whose servant the harbour master is), and while outside such limits damage is occasioned to her by the negligence of the harbour master in giving an improper order, the Harbour Commissioners are liable for the damage thereby occasioned.

This was an appeal by the Falmouth Harbour Commissioners from a decision of Sir James Hannen in an action instituted by the owners of the steamship Rhosina against the Falmouth Harbour Commissioners and Richard Sherris, the harbour master.

The plaintiffs claimed compensation for damage occasioned to the Rhosina by the alleged negligence of the harbour master. Sir James Hannen gave judgment in favour of the plaintiffs (52 L. T. Rep. N. S. 140; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 350; 10 P. Div. 24).

On the 29th Dec. 1883 the Rhosina had put into Falmouth and anchored in the outer harbour. In order to ship a new propeller, it became necessary that the Rhosina should be beached on the hard in the inner harbour at a place selected by the harbour master. On the 1st Jan., before the Rhosina left the outer harbour, the harbour master went on board. The Rhosina then entered the inner harbour, there being a Trinity House pilot on board. On nearing the spot selected by the harbour master, he gave orders to let go the starboard anchor, on which the Rhosina grounded, and was thereby damaged. At the time when the harbour master gave such order, the Rhosina was smelling the ground and a tug was towing on her starboard bow. The place from whence the Rhosina was being taken and the place where it was intended to beach her were both within the limits of the authority of the harbour commissioners as defined by the Falmouth Harbour Order 1870. In order to reach the place where the Rhosina was to be beached it was necessary to pass through an area of water which was not within the jurisdiction of the harbour commissions, but within that of the Falmouth Dock Company.

On behalf of the defendants it was pleaded that Capt. Sherris went on board the Rhosina as a friend of the master to assist in beaching her, and not in his official capacity of harbour master; that the negligence occasioning the damage was that of the crew, and that the accident happened in waters within the jurisdiction of the Falmouth Dock Company, and not in waters over which the Falmouth Harbour Commissioners had authority.

Sir James Hannen held that the manœuvre of beaching the Rhosina was within the duties of the harbour master; that the order to let go the anchor was in the circumstances negligent; that in so ordering Sherris had assumed the functions of harbour master; that, although the place where the Rhosina grounded was not within the limits of the authority of the harbour commissioners, such fact was no defence to the action; and that the defendants were each and all of them liable.

From this decision the Falmouth Harbour Commissioners appealed.

The harbour master did not appeal.

The following Acts of Parliament are material to the decision:—

The Harbours, Docks, and Piers Clauses Act 1847 (10 & 11 Vict. c. 27):

Sect. 52. The harbour master may give directions for all or any of the following purposes (that is to say), for regulating the time at which and the manner in which any vessel shall enter into or go out of, or lie in or at the harbour, dock, or pier, and within the prescribed limits, if any, and its position, mooring or unmooring, placing and removing whilst therein.

Sect. 53. The master of every vessel within the harbour or dock, or at or near the pier, or within the prescribed limits, if any, shall regulate such vessel according to the directions of the harbour master made in conformity with this and the special Act, and any master of a vessel who after notice of any such direction by the harbour master served upon him, shall not forthwith regulate such vessel according to such direction, shall be liable to a penalty not exceeding 20*l.*

Bye-laws made in pursuance of the Falmouth Harbour Order 1870, confirmed by the Pier and Harbour Orders Confirmation Act 1870 (No. 2):

4. Every vessel shall be moored or berthed at such part of the harbour, and shall from time to time be removed from place to place to such situation or situations within the harbour, as the harbour master shall direct; and the owner or master who refuses or neglects to obey the directions of the harbour master with regard to the mooring, berthing, or subsequent removal of such vessel or craft, shall for every offence be liable to a penalty not exceeding 5*l.*, and a further sum of 20*s.* after notice in writing, for every hour during which such directions are neglected.

Cohen, Q.C. and W. R. Kennedy, for the Falmouth Harbour Commissioners, in support of the appeal.

Webster, Q.C., Sir Walter Phillimore, and Barnes, for the plaintiffs, were not called upon.

The argument was substantially the same as that in the court below.

Brett, M.R.—The first question is, what was the harbour master doing, and was that within his authority as harbour master? He wanted the ship to be stranded in a particular part of the harbour and in a particular way, viz., stern first.

(a) Reported by J. P. Aspinall and Butler Aspinall, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

When the vessel came close to the place he found there were obstacles to her being put on stern first, unless she could be manœuvred in a particular way. He was of opinion that the ship would, in the circumstances, go on head first, and in order to get her on stern first he said, "Let go your anchor till it touches the ground, and let the tug tow on the starboard bow; the anchor will check her, and she will take the ground in the way I wish." Supposing that is what he wanted to do, he was attempting to regulate the manner in which the vessel should lie in the harbour, and to regulate the placing of her in a particular spot. It seems to me that, if he was doing this, he was doing something which was within his power under sect. 52 of the Harbours, Docks, and Piers Clauses Act 1847. But it has been suggested that it was not he who ought to have been giving orders in this particular place, but the dock master, because the order was given within the ambit of the property of the dock company. To my mind the dock master had no authority to give any orders at all with regard to this ship, because she was not going to do any of the things within the property of the dock company, which the dock master had a right to regulate. It is true that the vessel was passing through the water over and above the property of the dock company, but the dock company has no property in the water. The ship was going to the place where she was to be stranded, and that was, as is admitted, a place over which the harbour commissioners have control.

Then it is said that the harbour commissioners are not liable because the order with regard to the beaching of the vessel was given within the ambit of the property of the dock company. Looking at sect. 8 of the Falmouth Harbour Order 1870 and at sect. 39 of the Falmouth Dock Act 1859, it seems to me that the order was given in a place which was not within the ambit and authority of the harbour commissioners. But if the harbour master gives an order regulating the manner in which a vessel shall lie in the harbour, does it make it less the act of the harbour master as harbour master because the order is given in water above property where he has no jurisdiction? It seems to me impossible to say that. If this was an order given as harbour master, then it was an order which he had authority to give, because it related to the manner in which the vessel was to be put on the hard in that part of the harbour over which he had jurisdiction. It was next contended that Capt. Sherris acted as a friend of the master of the Rhosina, and not as harbour master at all. The learned President has, however, come to the conclusion that, though it might be that the harbour master originally went on board the Rhosina as a friend to help the captain to navigate his vessel into the harbour, yet when they came near to the place where the vessel was to be put on the hard, the harbour master assumed the authority of harbour master, and gave an order as harbour master. That is a question of fact on which I absolutely agree with the learned judge. The harbour master says that he gave no orders as to the navigation of the ship, but merely recommendations. But when he came near the scene of the accident, he then took the command into his own hands, and gave an order to the chief mate. He distinguishes between doing nothing, making recommendations and giving orders. It is said that he was not bound to give orders, but I think it would be very dangerous to say that a harbour master would have a right to be absent if there was difficulty in stranding the ship. Supposing that, instead of beaching the vessel in the spot he had selected, her master had begun to beach her fifty yards off, can anyone say that he would not be bound to resume his office of harbour master and order her to be placed elsewhere? To my mind, if anything was going wrong, it would not only be within his authority, but it would be his duty, to exercise his authority as harbour master. As to the way in which the harbour master exercised his authority, I have asked the gentlemen who assist us these two questions: The first is: "Was the manœuvre described, viz., whilst the ship was smelling the ground to let go the starboard anchor in order to check the ship while the tug on the starboard bow was towing her to starboard, an unskilful manœuvre?" The answer is, "Most certainly." The tug was pulling her clean over the anchor in shallow water and the harbour master's only excuse is, that he thought there would be water enough if the anchor went under the finer part of the ship. The Nautical Assessors have advised us that it was unskilful, and that in itself decides the case. The answer to the other question, however, makes it quite clear. It is this: "Ought the harbour master to have given precautionary orders that he desired to have the chain stopped at eight fathoms or directly it touched the ground before he ordered the anchor to be let go?" If he had given such orders, it would have been next to impossible that they could have been obeyed; but it was impossible to expect the chain to be stopped unless he gave orders of the most precautionary kind, and therefore he ought to have so ordered. That advice was given to the learned president, and the same advice is given to us now. Therefore, both as regards the law and the facts, this judgment is right and must be affirmed.

Baggallay, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. On the occasion in question the Rhosina was on a voyage from Cardiff to New Orleans in ballast, and, having damaged her screw propeller, she went into Falmouth to have it repaired. She remained in the outer harbour for two or three days, when it was deemed expedient to remove her into the inner harbour. On the morning that she was to be removed, it appears that the harbour master went on board to accompany the vessel round from the outer to the inner harbour. He gave no orders until she approached the bank in the inner harbour. After two or three suggestions he then gave the order which our assessors say was improper. Was that order given in such a way as to render the harbour commissioners responsible? That depends upon whether he was acting within the scope of his authority as harbour master. By sect. 52 of the Harbours, Docks, and Piers Clauses Act 1847 authority is given to the harbour master to regulate the time at which and the manner in which the vessel shall enter into, go out from, or lie in the harbour, and the position it shall take up therein. When passing over from the dock company's property to the inner harbour, the harbour master gave an order which clearly was within the meaning of the Act of Parliament

That is further borne out by the bye-laws of the commissioners, regulating the mooring and berthing of vessels. By these bye-laws not only is the harbour master to give directions, but a penalty is imposed on the captain of a vessel who refuses to obey his orders. This appears to be an order directly given within the provisions of the general Act and the bye-laws. The harbour master being bound to give proper directions, and having failed to do so, the commissioners are clearly liable.

HIGH COURT OF JUSTICE.

QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION.

Friday, June, 19, 1885.

(Before POLLOCK, B.)

CLARKE v. THE MILLWALL DOCK COMPANY.

Landlord and tenant—Distress for rent—Privileged goods—Ship while building to be paid for by instalments—Constructive delivery—Property in ship.

A shipbuilder contracted to build a ship for the plaintiffs, which was to be paid for by nine different instalments at various stages of its construction; at the payment of each instalment the property in the ship as completed up to that time was to vest in the plaintiff.

During the building of the ship the shipbuilder became in arrear in respect of his rent, and the defendants, his landlords, distrained upon the ship for the amount of rent so due.

The plaintiff paid under protest the amount claimed and brought this action to recover the amount.

The plaintiff contended that the arrangement between the shipbuilder and himself rendered the ship free from liability to distress.

Held, under the circumstances of the case, that the ship was liable to distress, and that the case did not come within any of the exceptions which exempt goods on the premises of a tenant from liability to distress for rent due to the landlord.

THIS was an action tried before Pollock, B. without a jury, to recover a sum of money by the plaintiff under protest under the following circumstances:—

The plaintiff, who was the executor of one France, alleged in his statement of claim that in the months of September and October 1883, the defendants wrongfully detained from the plaintiff a certain ship called the Swillington, the property of the plaintiff, as the executor of France, and compelled the plaintiff to pay the sum of 1721*l.* 12*s.* 1*d.* before the defendants would realise the said ship to the plaintiff.

The defendants in their defence denied the detention of the ship, but said that at the time of the alleged detention it was not the property of the plaintiff, but of one Gilbert; and that they did not compel the plaintiff to pay the said sum, nor did he pay it under protest.

They further stated that before the alleged detention the said Gilbert held certain premises and dry docks as tenant thereof to the defendants under a demise at a certain monthly rent thereby reserved, and 1630*l.* 9*s.* 11*d.* of the said rent was then due from the said Gilbert to the defendants, and the defendants, while the said Gilbert was such tenant, and while the arrears of rent remained so due, entered on the said premises and dry dock and seized the said ship as a distress for the arrears of rent, and lawfully detained the ship under the distress for a reasonable time and until they were paid the sum of 1721*l.* 12*s.* 1*d.*, the amount of the arrears and lawful expenses of and in relation to the distress, when the defendants delivered the ship to the plaintiff and Gilbert, which was the alleged detention.

It appeared from the facts of the case that one Gilbert entered into a contract in Oct. 1882 with one France, whom the plaintiff represented, to build a steamship named the Swillington in the dock leased by the defendants to Gilbert. The price was to be 8000*l.*, which was to be paid in nine instalments, each instalment becoming due on the completion of a certain amount of work done to the ship, agreed on by the parties. During the building of the ship Gilbert drew upon France for more than the amount due for the work actually done and completed.

It also appeared from the books of France that he bought material necessary for the building of the ship which he shipped to Gilbert, and which was used for that purpose.

France died on the 27th Aug. 1883.

Gilbert in the meantime had become in arrears with his rent due to the defendant company which he was unable to pay, and on the 11th Sept. 1883 the defendants distrained for the sum of 1630*l.* 9*s.* 11*d.*, for rent due.

On the 2nd Oct. 1883 the plaintiff paid the defendants the sum of 1721*l.* 12*s.* 1*d.* under protest, and the ship was released. The plaintiff sought to recover the whole of this sum in the action on the ground that the steamship had been illegally distrained upon as the property in it had passed to him from Gilbert.

Finlay, Q.C. (R. A. M'Call with him).—The plaintiff is entitled to recover the amount claimed by him in the action; the distress was wrongful; the ship was not rightfully seized by the defendants, for the property in it had passed to the plaintiff. The defendants, of course, say that the property in the ship was still in Gilbert when the seizure took place; they let their dock for the purposes of public trade, and must be taken to know that the ships in it from time to time are not the property of the lessee, and which cannot be seized to satisfy arrears of rent due from him; and things brought to a place where a public trade is carried on are privileged from distress:

Simpson v. Hartopp, Willes, 512; 1 Sm. L. C. 450; Muspratt v. Gregory, 1 M. & W. 633, 655 (per Parke, B.)

Parke, B., in the latter case (p. 655), after citing from Gilbert on Distress, that valuable things in the way of trade shall not be liable to a distress, says that "the principle upon which the exemption is founded appears with great distinctness from these authorities to be the protection of trade . . . . and that the principle of the rule is the public good and the freedom of commerce." The effect of the agreement between France and Gilbert, with reference to the building of this steamer, was to pass the property in the vessel, so far as it was built up from time to time, in France, when the latter paid the stipulated instalments. Consequently, at the time of the distress, the steamer, so far as she was built, was France's and not Gilbert's property, and on the principle of exemption laid down by Parke, B. was not liable to be seized for the arrears of rent.

Cohen, Q.C. (W. Graham with him).—Judgment ought to be for the defendants. This ship was not privileged from distraint. Besides, France knew of the pecuniary liability of Gilbert to the defendants, as appears from his letters; and, indeed, he had paid money to them on his behalf; in one letter he recognised their right to detain the ship till the rent was paid, for he writes, "and you may depend upon it they (the defendants) will not part with the boat (the Swillington) till paid." Lord Abinger in Muspratt v. Gregory (p. 662), points out that every one of the cases excepted from the law of distress is a case in which the trade is one that consists in dealing with other men's goods; here the steamship was Gilbert's, and until delivery over to the plaintiff remained his. There is no case where goods are privileged which are not brought upon the tenant's premises for the purpose of being worked up or managed in the way of his trade or employment:

Parsons v. Gingell, 4 C. B. 545;
Smith's Landlord and Tenant, 218;
Woodfall's Landlord and Tenant, 410.

The goods of lodgers and certain chattels used by agricultural tenants required special legislative enactments to exempt them from distress. The steamship was Gilbert's property, and so was liable to be seized:

Swire v. Leach, 18 C. B. N. S. 479;
Miles v. Furber, 27 L. T. Rep. N. S. 756; L. Rep. 8 Q. B. 77.

The exceptions to the liability to distress are not general but special:

Lyons v. Elliott, 33 L. T. Rep. N. S. 806; 1 Q. B. Div. 210.

The claim of the plaintiff is not recoverable in an action of this kind:

Glynn v. Thomas, 11 Exch. 870.

Finlay, Q.C. in reply.—The letters of the deceased France do not prejudice him, for they do not amount to a waiver of his right to insist that this ship was not distrainable for Gilbert's arrears of rent. As to the case of Parsons v. Gingell (ubi sup.). I say in the first place it is irrelevant; next, that it has been overruled by Miles v. Furber (ubi sup.). Bayley, J., in his judgment in Adams v. Crane (3 Tyrwh. 326), remarks that the privilege of goods from distress "has been from time to time increased in extent, according to the new modes of dealing established between parties by the change of times and circumstances, one of which modern modes of dealing is the case of a factor." The question here, no doubt, arises for the first time. It is submitted that it is not necessary that the goods should be actually delivered to the occupier of the premises for the purposes of his trade, but a constructive delivery would be sufficient. Every time that France paid an instalment to Gilbert there was a constructive delivery of so much of the ship as was completed for the purpose of being finished by Gilbert in his capacity of shipbuilder and therefore the ship was altogether free from liability to be distrained.

POLLOCK, B.—This case is one of very great general interest, and no doubt raises a question of importance both as regards law and as regards commerce. The action is brought by the plaintiff, Mr. Clarke, who is executor of one William France, who had a contract whereby a man named Gilbert, a shipbuilder, was to build for him a certain ship called the Swillington. That ship was to be built upon a contract, the material parts of which are set out in the papers before me. I may state it shortly by saying it is a contract of the nature of that which was discussed in the case of Woods v. Russell (5 B. & Ald. 942), and several other cases, whereby the builder is not to complete the whole ship and then to be paid for the whole ship before any property in any part of the ship passes, but it is a contract whereby the portions of the ship were to pass to the person for whom it was being built as payments were made from time to time. Now I need not, for the purposes of this case, enter into any discussion as to the effect of such a contract as that, which was well considered in several cases where the question arose as between the builder of the ship and the vendees or assignees as to at what moment of time the particular property passed. That is a very interesting head of law which need not be examined in this case. But the defendants here claim to have detained the ship because they were the landlords of Gilbert who built the ship; and I have no doubt, upon the facts before me, that such a tenancy existed as entitled them to distrain as against Gilbert in respect of all property for which a distress could be taken.

Therefore the only question which results from these facts now before me is this, whether or no this vessel, as between Gilbert and France, was an article which could be distrained upon by the defendants, the landlords, as against their tenant, Gilbert. I do not think it is necessary, as has been done by learned judges before now, to go back to the root of the rule of law which gave to a landlord the right of distress. I think it is sufficient to say that from time to time, from very natural feelings of equity, the judges have made exceptions to the general rule that all goods found upon the premises of a tenant are subject to distress. I may only refer to that class of goods within which it is said by the plaintiff the ship in question comes, namely, goods which are upon the premises of the tenant for purposes of the carrying on of his trade. It is observable that the decisions on that class of case have commenced, and as far as I know have been continued throughout in all the cases that have existed, as based upon, as far as the relative position of the parties is concerned, "the principle of things sent or delivered to a person exercising a trade to be carried on, wrought or managed in the way of his trade or business, as a horse in a smith's shop, materials sent to a weaver, or cloth to a tailor to be made up. These are privileged for the sake of trade and commerce." I have cited that from the judgment of Willes, C.J. in Simpson v. Hartopp (Willes 512), the well-known case; and in the notes to Smith's Leading Cases a number of cases will be found, all of which come within the category of cases in which the goods have been sent by some person to be made up. Now I am far from saying that the law should be laid down upon so narrow a principle that we should look for exactly the same circumstances in a new case as the circumstances upon which the old cases have been decided. I am sure I should be the last to adopt such a principle as that; but I think it always extremely important to remember this, in cases of this kind where a rule of law has been established by long usage, that the rule of law cannot be always extended to all the cases in which it could be upheld as founded upon the reasonableness on which the rule was originally based. That seems to me to be a very important point to be borne in mind. That, no doubt, was what was in the mind of Lord Abinger, who I am sure was a man who never clung to anything like a narrow view of law, when he said in the case of Muspratt v. Gregory (1 M. & W., p. 661), that he was "afraid of trusting to his own judgment with regard to the public good as a principle upon which we are to make rules or to engraft exceptions. I do not know whether the time may not come when the public good may require that all goods should be exempted from distress." The obvious remark to be made on that is, that the time has come in certain of the cases, for instance, in the good of lodgers, in which a proper course has been taken, and the Legislature has interfered. So again the Legislature will interfere in this and other cases if that time has come. But I cannot agree with what was said by Mr. Finlay in his reply, that this is a case in which, as was said in Miles v. Furber (ubi sup.) by the court, to allow a distress would affect the very principle of business. That, I think, is a very good ratio decidendi. The case of a pawnbroker, the case of a carriage sent to a coachmaker for sale, and the case, possibly, of a ship sent to a dock for repair, are cases in which a man could not carry on his business if the landlord could always come in and take the goods of a third person so sent to his premises.

Now just let us look for a moment at what are the real facts in the present case. Gilbert is building a ship. It is open to him to make any contract he likes. He may make the usual old contract that the ship should be built, and when built, he should be paid for it. He may make the contract that it should be paid for in, I think, nine different instalments. Each time the vesting of the property out of Gilbert, the builder, into France, the person for whom the ship is being built is a mere matter of private and independent contract between the parties; and, although such a course of business is known, it cannot be said that it could be predicated beforehand with any certainty what would be the precise contract, or whether there would be any such contract at all between the parties. Therefore it cannot be said that the business of a shipbuilder could not be carried on with safety if his landlord could come in and take goods from his premises. Therefore it seems to me that I should be legislating rather than laying down the law if I were to say that the law exempted articles within the circumstances existing in the present case. There was one other point taken by Mr. Finlay, and he took it, partly independently, very properly as arising out of his main point, and it was this: that the very contract between the landlord and the tenant here showed that the ships would be built on these premises, and also that the ships would come in for repairs, and therefore that ships would not be distrainable. Now, as far as the matter rests with ships coming in for repair, I have not to deal with that question, nor do I see any difficulty or inconsistency in saying that those might not be distrainable. But with regard to ships that were being built there, then I think the question is this: Can I infer from the conduct of the parties that there was anything on the part of the landlord whereby he intended not to exercise the power of distress which he would have by the law of the land? It is common knowledge that the landlord may, either by express words or by his conduct, from which an inference may be drawn, consent that the goods of a third person brought on the premises shall be exempt from distress. Those cases are collected, as other cases of the kind are, in Smith's Leading Cases. They are referred to in page 464 of the 8th edition. But those are cases in which the question has not been whether, from the character of the tenancy, there has been anything unusual. The facts have been that the parties have brought the goods on to the premises with the knowledge of the landlord, and the landlord, either by express language or by conduct, has clearly shown that he does not intend to exercise his right with regard to those particular goods. In those cases, of course, it would not be consistent with equity or reason that he, having so expressed his opinion, should afterwards withdraw it and attempt to exercise his common law right. In the present case I find nothing of that kind. No doubt there is something which furthers the argument of Mr. Finlay when the general principle is considered, but I find nothing which would enable me to say that this case should be decided on its own particular facts, and I must be very careful in dealing with a well-known and well-established right, such as the right of distraint, not to create any new exception merely by reason of what may seem to be fit and proper between these particular parties, the landlord and the tenant, when I am considering the rights of other parties arising out of the matter in hand. It seems to me, therefore, on these grounds that the plaintiff has failed in establishing his claim. One other point I must allude to shortly, and that is this: It is admitted now with regard to 70*l.*, which was an amount arising out of the rent due from the use of tools and plant, and also with regard to something like 200*l.*, which was rent not then due, that there was a claim for rent above that amount actually due, and therefore that this holding of the ship in question was wrongful. If this action had been an action between landlord and tenant the solution of the question would have depended on different grounds which I need not allude to now. I think it is sufficient to say that, as I understand the law, no action of this kind can be maintained against a person who, up to a certain point, or to a certain amount, has properly held this ship as a lien for his claim unless a tender was made for the amount actually due. Therefore there must be judgment for the defendants with costs, and the defendants, as Mr. Cohen properly says, will be prepared to hand over any amount found due to the plaintiff upon account taken.

(Before Denman, J.)

The Great Indian Peninsula Railway Company v. Turnbull. (a)

Charter-party—Advance freight—Repayment of—"Steamer lost or not lost"—Loss by negligent navigation.

Goods were shipped under a charter-party containing the following stipulation:—"Four-fifths of the freight (calculated on the quantity shipped) to be advanced and paid in cash in one month from the steamer's sailing from her last port in Great Britain (steamer lost or not lost)," The steamer sailed on the 12th July; was lost through the negligence of her master on the 19th July; the loss was known on the 21st July; on the 26th July the charterer paid four-fifths of the freight to the shipowner. In an action by the charterer against the shipowner to recover damages for breach of contract:

Held, that notwithstanding the clause "steamer lost or not lost," the charterer was entitled to take into account and recover the advance freight so paid and the premiums of insurance, in addition to the prime cost of the goods.

Further consideration.

The action was brought by the Great Indian Peninsula Railway Company against Charles Turnbull to recover 2290*l.* 1*s.* 3*d.*, being the amount of damage suffered, as it was alleged, by the plaintiff company by reason of the breach of contract of the defendant.

The plaintiffs, in their statement of claim, alleged that they had suffered damage by reason of the defendant's breach of a charter-party of his steamship Leverrier, dated the 26th June 1884, and made between the plaintiffs and the defendant, and also by reason of the breach of two bills of lading of goods shipped by the plaintiffs on board the said vessel, in pursuance of the said charter-party, the defendant, having, as it was alleged, made default in delivery of the said goods, namely, 2006 tons of coal; and the plaintiffs further alleged that whilst the said goods were being carried by the defendant for the plaintiffs under the said charter-party and bills of lading, the defendant by his servants so negligently and unskilfully navigated and managed the said vessel that on or before the 19th July 1884 she stranded near Cape Spartel, whereby the said 2006 tons of coal were wholly lost to the plaintiffs, and the plaintiffs sustained other losses, expenses, and charges; that four-fifths of the freight, amounting to 1324*l.* 19*s.* 2*d.*, was paid in advance by the plaintiffs to the defendant, pursuant to the said charter-party and bills of lading; and that the prime cost of the coal, together with the four-fifths of freight advanced, bills of lading, insurance, policy, and agent's commission, amounted to 2290*l.* 1*s.* 3*d.*, which sum the plaintiffs claimed to recover from the defendant.

The defendant denied the breaches of the charter-party and bill of lading, and the negligent and unskilful navigation and management of the vessel, and said that the said goods were lost solely by the dangers and accidents of the seas excepted by the said charter-party and bill of lading; and the defendant also contended that, if the facts as alleged were true, the plaintiffs were not entitled to recover the said sum from the defendant.

By the charter-party aforesaid it was agreed between the defendant, the owner of the Leverrier, and the plaintiffs, through their agents, that the said ship should with all convenient speed proceed to Birkenhead, and there load in the usual and customary manner a cargo of coal, and, being so loaded, should proceed therewith to Bombay, or so near thereunto as she might safely get, and deliver the said cargo in the usual and customary manner, the act of God, the Queen's enemies, restraint of princes and rulers, fire, and all and every other the dangers and accidents of the seas, rivers, and navigation, of what nature and kind soever always mutually excepted, and, amongst other stipulations contained in the said charter-party it was agreed that freight was to become due upon the due delivery of cargo, and was to be paid upon the weight then ascertained at the rate of 16*s.* 6*d.* per ton on the quantity delivered to the consignees in Bombay, less first cost and insurance of coal delivered short of the quantity stated in the bill of lading, and the charter-party then proceeded:—

But four-fifths of the freight, calculated on the quantity shipped, to be advanced and paid in cash in one month from the vessel's sailing from the last port in Great Britain (steamer lost or not lost) and the remainder found to be due to be paid in cash in Bombay.

Bills of lading were afterwards signed by the authority of the master in accordance with the terms of the charter-party, the clause as to freight being:

Freight is to become due upon the due delivery of the cargo, and is to be paid upon the weight ascertained on delivery of the cargo in Bombay, at the rate of 16*s.* 6*d.* per ton of 20 cwts. on the quantity delivered to the consignees in Bombay, but four-fifths of the freight (calculated on the quantity shipped) to be advanced and paid in cash in one month from the steamer's sailing from her last port in Great Britain (steamer lost or not lost) and the remainder found to be due to be paid in cash in Bombay, less first cost and insurance of coal undelivered of the quantity herein stated to have been shipped.

The Leverrier loaded a cargo of coal under the charter-party at Birkenhead, and sailed thence for Bombay on the 12th July; on the 19th July she stranded on Cape Spartel, on the coast of Morocco, the loss being known in England on the 21st July; on the 28th July the plaintiffs paid to the defendant four-fifths of the freight calculated on the quantity of coal shipped.

The action came on for hearing before Denman, J. and a special jury, when a verdict was found and judgment entered for the plaintiffs, subject to the further consideration of the question of law as to the measure of damages.

Barnes (with him C. Russell, Q.C.) for the plaintiffs.—The items in dispute are the premiums of insurance and the four-fifths of the freight paid in accordance with the terms of the charter-party within one month of the steamer's sailing, which the defendant contends the plaintiffs are not entitled to recover, notwithstanding that the ship was lost by the negligence of his servants. It is contended on the part of the plaintiffs that the words "steamer lost or not lost" must mean "lost or not lost by any of the perils and accidents of the seas, rivers and navigation" excepted in the first part of the charter-party, and cannot be extended to mean "lost or not lost by any means including negligent navigation." The plaintiffs have actually paid the four-fifths of the freight stipulated in the charter-party, and this advance freight so paid is part of the value of the cargo which has been lost by the negligence of the defendant's servants. The true measure of damages is the value of the cargo at the port of destination. The goods would have been worth more there by reason of four-fifths of the freight having been paid, and the plaintiffs are, therefore, entitled to recover this sum back from the defendant,

Sir Farrer Herschell Q.C. (with him Bucknill) for the defendant.—The defendant is not liable to be called upon to repay the amount paid by the plaintiffs for advance freight and insurance. As to the insurance, there is most clearly no principle on which the underwriters of cargo—who are, of course, the real plaintiffs in the case—can sue for the payment for the second time of premiums which they have already received once. The main point, however, is as to the four-fifths of the freight paid in advance. Now, this is an action by charterers against shipowners for the breach of a contract, and the clear words of the contract sued upon are to the effect that four-fifths of the freight are to be paid by the charterer to the shipowner whether the steamer is "lost or not lost." The words "steamer lost or not lost" must be held to have some meaning, and it was clearly the intention of the parties that they should have some meaning; but if, the steamer having been lost, it is to be held that the charterer is entitled to recover the advanced freight back from the shipowner, no meaning whatever is given to these words, and they might just as well have been omitted from the charter-party. It is submitted that this amount, although spoken of as freight to be advanced, is really money paid as consideration for receiving the goods on board and entering into an undertaking to carry them (Kirchner v. Venus, 12 Moo. P. C. 361), and never acquired the legal character of freight.

Barnes in reply.—The measure of damage is the loss we have sustained by not having our goods delivered to us at Bombay, and the value of a cargo at its point of destination, obviously includes the premium paid for its insurance on the voyage thither. This is clearly laid down in Arnould on Insurance, vol. 1, 4th edit. p. 304; 5th edit. p. 322, where it is said that: "With regard to goods, the long-established rule in this country is that their value for the purposes of insurance, when not fixed by the policy, is the amount of the prime cost, together with the charges of shipping them on board, stamp duty, and broker's commission for effecting the policy; the whole covered with the premium and insurance on the premium: (Usher v. Noble, 12 East, 646; Tuite v. The Royal Exchange Company, 1 Park on Insurance, 8th edit. 224, 225.)" The words "steamer lost or not lost," mean "lost or not lost by the act of God, the Queen's enemies, restraint of princes, and the dangers and accidents of the seas, rivers, and navigation," and cannot be extended to cover a loss which has been found to be caused by their own negligence. According to the contention of the defendant, the clause would have applied if he had deliberately blown up the ship, and the construction, is, therefore, wholly unreasonable. The true and only test is the value of the cargo at Bombay, which is clearly enhanced by the payment of four-fifths of the freight, and the plaintiffs are, therefore, entitled to recover.

Denman, J.—I am of opinion that the plaintiffs are entitled to recover the whole of the amount claimed by them. I think that in this case we must look at the contract between the parties as contained in the charter-party and bills of lading, in which we find a stipulation in the following terms:—"Four-fifths of the freight (calculated on the quantity shipped) to be advanced and paid in cash in one month from the steamer's sailing from her last port in Great Britain (steamer lost or not lost)." These being the words of the bargain, it is contended on behalf of the defendant that the money paid in pursuance of this clause is paid, not as freight, but as consideration for taking the goods on board. Now, what is there to support this contention? I am unable to see anything, and, in my opinion, there is nothing to show that the real bargain was other than what it is expressed to be in the charter-party, namely, that the money should be paid as freight. Then, this advance freight having been paid by the plaintiffs to the defendant, the steamer was actually lost through the negligence of the defendant or his servants, and the question arises, What was the loss thereby entailed on the plaintiffs? I think that the freight, in so far as it had been paid by the plaintiffs, was clearly a part of their loss, and that they ought to recover it from the defendant. As to the insurance, I was at first impressed by the argument of the learned counsel for the defendant, that the underwriters having already received the premiums once could not rightly sue for them again; but, on consideration, it appears to me that the contrary contention is correct, that what we ought to consider in this matter is the commercial value of the goods at the port of arrival, and if the ship had arrived, the price which would have been obtained for it at Bombay would have included all the reasonable expenses of taking it thither from a mercantile point of view, including, of course, insurance. There is, in my opinion, no force in the argument that the money paid is paid in consideration of the cargo being taken on board, and not freight in its strictest sense. The shipowner merely stipulates that when the cargo is well started on its voyage he shall be paid a certain amount of freight so that he may not be out of pocket as to all the expenses of carrying the cargo until the conclusion of the voyage, but, on the contrary, have money in hand for the payment of his disbursements. I think it is equally clear that the premium of insurance is one of the things which ought properly to be taken into consideration in ascertaining that value. The case of Kirchner v. Venus (12 Moo. P. C. 361) was cited in the course of the argument on the first point, but I do not think that that case affects the case before us, turning as it does on the peculiar terms of the contract between the parties there. Here I think we must look at the substance of the bargain between the parties, and at that alone. For these reasons I am of opinion that judgment must be entered for the plaintiffs for the full amount claimed.

Conspiracy—Restraint of Trade—Combination of shipowners—Circulars—Interim injunction.

The defendant shipowners had combined together, and their agents in China had issued circulars there to the effect that exporters in China who confined their shipments of goods to vessels owned by the combined lines should be allowed a rebate payable half-yearly, on the freight charged. Any shipment at any port in China by an outside steamer to exclude the shipper of such shipment from participating in the return during the whole six-monthly period within which it had been made.

The plaintiffs, on the ground that such combination was a conspiracy entered into with the object of ruining them (the plaintiffs), and of driving away competition, applied for an interim injunction to restrain the defendants from continuing to issue these circulars, and from otherwise acting in restraint of trade.

Held, that, as the plaintiffs had not shown that the refusal of this application would result in irreparable injury to them, and as they might recover ample compensation in damages if they succeeded at the trial, and the cause of action being doubtful, this was not a case in which the court would grant an interim injunction.

Held, that such combination, if proved according to the plaintiffs' contention, would be a conspiracy within the principle laid down in Rex. v. Eccles, (1 Leach C. C. 274).

This was an application for an interim injunction which had been referred by Day, J. at chambers to the Divisional Court, that the defendants might be restrained, until the trial of the action, from publishing certain circulars, and from acting in any way so as to prevent shippers of goods from shipping goods in China by the plaintiffs' vessels, and from acting so as to prevent the said vessels loading in China at proper freights and upon fair and proper terms, and that the defendants might be ordered to withdraw any of the said circulars already circulated.

The plaintiff company was incorporated in 1883 for the purpose of acquiring shares in certain steamships known as the Sikh, Afghan, Pathan, and Ghazee, which trade between Chinese and Australian ports and London. The defendants McGregor, Gow, and Co., T. Skinner and Co., D. J. Jenkins and Co., the Peninsular and Oriental Steam Navigation Company, the Ocean Steamship Company, and William Thomson and Co., were firms competing with the plaintiffs, and owned numerous vessels trading in the same seas.

The defendants in 1879, in combination with other shipowners, formed a ring or "conference" (as it is known in the shipping trade), and offered to allow to such shippers of cargo as were willing to confine their shipments of goods exclusively to "conference steamers" a rebate of 5 per cent. upon the freights charged. The plaintiffs alleged that by reason of such combination and conspiracy they (the plaintiffs) were prevented from obtaining cargoes for their vessels, and that shippers had been and were thereby coerced and induced to forbear from shipping cargoes by steamers belonging to the plaintiffs. Further, that the defendants, with intent to injure the plaintiffs, had agreed to refuse and had refused to accept cargoes from shippers at Chinese ports without an undertaking by the shippers not to ship any cargoes by "non-conference steamers."

The plaintiffs' claim was for damages for conspiracy, and an injunction. The circulars in respect of which the plaintiffs were now seeking an interim injunction were addressed to shippers at the Chinese ports, and signed by the defendants' agents in China, and ran as follows:

Shanghai, May 10, 1884.

Dear Sirs,—To those exporters who confine their shipments of tea and general cargo from China to Europe (not including the Mediterranean and Black Sea ports) to the Peninsular and Oriental Steam Navigation Company, Ocean Steamship Company, McGregor, Gow, and Co., Glen, Castle, Shire, and Ben lines, and to the steamships Oopack and Ningchow, we shall be happy to allow a rebate of 5 per cent on the freight charged. Exporters claiming the returns will be required to sign a declaration that they have not made nor been interested in any shipments of tea or general cargo to Europe (excepting the ports above named) by other than the said lines. Shipments by the steamships Albany, Pathan, and Ghazee, on their present voyages from Hankow, will not prejudice claims for returns. Each line to be responsible for its own returns only, which will be payable half yearly, commencing Oct. 30 next. Shipments by an outside steamer at any of the ports in China or at Hong Kong will exclude the firm making such shipments from participation in the return during the whole six-monthly period within which they have been made, even though other branches may have given entire support to the above lines. The foregoing agreement on our part to be in force from present date till April 30, 1886. We are, &c.

Shanghai, May 11, 1885.

Dear Sirs,—Referring to our circular dated May 10, 1884, we beg to remind you that shipments for London by the steamships Pathan, Afghan, and Aberdeen, or by other non-conference steamers at any of the ports in China or at Hong Kong, will exclude the firm making such shipments from participation in the return during the whole six-monthly period in which they have been made, even although the firm elsewhere may have given exclusive support to the conference lines. We are, &c.

Sir Henry James, Q.C., Sir Farrer Herschell Q.C., Crump, Q.C., and J. Gorell Barnes for the plaintiffs.—This is a case in which the plaintiffs are entitled to an interim injunction to restrain the action of the defendants. The facts are not in dispute, and such a combination as has been effected clearly amounts to an illegal conspiracy on the part of the defendants to oust all opposition to the conference lines, and to drive away competition. Such action is in the restraint of trade and against public interest, and therefore against the policy of the law and illegal. It might, in fact, be described as a case of "boycotting," of the worst sort. This is not the case of an individual contracting for exclusive dealing, but a combination of tradesmen to prevent trading with others, and an attempt to create a monopoly. By the rules laid down by the conference the penalty of losing the whole six-monthly rebate is to be incurred by the shipper of a cargo, even of the smallest value, if shipped by a non-conference steamer, and that whether any of the defendants' ships are at the time of the shipment in the port or not. The result of such forfeiture of the whole six-monthly rebate is that the penalty incurred is greatly in excess of the benefit which would have accrued to the defendants if the freight had been earned by them. An action for conspiracy can be founded if a combination is shown to exist either for the purpose of arriving at an unlawful end, or at a lawful end by unlawful means; as soon as there is a combination to arrive at an unlawful end every step taken with a view to arriving at such end becomes itself unlawful:

Reg v. Parnell, 14 Cox C. C. 508.

The combination here consists of certain carriers who have powerful means at their disposal of carrying on trade, in respect of which there is competition. That competition they are anxious to drive away, for they can afford to make the rebate when they have obtained the exclusive control of the market, unhampered by opposition. Such a combination for the purpose of creating a monopoly is clearly illegal. It is unlawful by molestation to endeavour to deter or influence any person in the employment of his industry, talent, or capital in any lawful manner:

Reg v. Druitt, 10 Cox, C. C. 592.

The court will interfere where there is a combination to prevent an individual from carrying on his trade, or to render it more difficult for him to carry on his trade:

Gregory v. The Duke of Brunswick, 6 M. & G. 205.

In many cases an agreement to do a certain thing has been considered as the subject of an indictment for a conspiracy, though the same act if done separately by each individual without any agreement among themselves would not have been illegal:

Reg v. Mawbey, 6 Term Rep. 619, 636.

A combination of this sort is illegal as tending directly to impede and interfere with the free course of trade (Hilton v. Eckersley, 6 E. & B. 47), and therefore the court ought to grant the injunction prayed for.

Horace Davey, Q.C., Finlay, Q.C., and Pollard, for the defendants.—This is not a case in which the court will grant an interim injunction. The alleged cause of action is a complete novelty. There is no precedent in which an injunction has been granted to restrain a conspiracy, which is an offence indictable at common law, nor is there any evidence of malice, which is of the essence of an action of this description. It is for the plaintiffs to show that there was a malicious intention on the part of the defendants of damaging the plaintiffs in their trade. The combination complained of was created in 1879, but the plaintiff company only came into existence in 1883, and the terms of the circulars applied, not to the plaintiffs' vessels only, but to all non-conference steamers. Counsel for the plaintiffs have confounded the result of the combination with its object. The intention of the defendants was, not to injure the plaintiffs's trade, but to increase their own; the result might prove injurious to the plaintiffs, but nevertheless the object of the defendants was to benefit themselves and perfectly legal:

Wickens v. Evans, 3 Y. & J. 318.

This case does not come within the principle laid down by Lord Mansfield, C J. in Rex v. Eccles (1 Leach C. C. 274), where the alleged conspiracy seems to have been directed against an individual; and, moreover, that case is overruled by Reg. v. Rowlands (17 Q. B. 671; 5 Cox C. C. 437), where Erle, J. laid down what seems to be a true and accurate statement of the law at the present time: "The law is clear that workmen have a right to combine for their own protection, and to obtain such wages as they choose to agree to demand. But I consider the law to be clear so far only as while the purpose of the combination is to obtain a benefit for the parties who combine—a benefit which by law they can claim. I make that remark because a combination for the purpose of injuring another is a combination of a different nature directed personally against the person to be injured; and the law, allowing them to combine for the purpose of obtaining a lawful benefit to themselves, gives no sanction to combinations which have for their immediate purpose the hurt of another." An interim injunction ought not to be granted in a case where all the facts are not fully before the court, where the cause of action, if any, is extremely doubtful and entirely novel, and where the damages are not even alleged to be irreparable. If at the trial a good cause of action is found to exist, damages will be recovered by the plaintiffs, and it will then be in the power of the court also to grant an injunction. It has always been the practice in the Chancery Courts to refuse to grant injunctions to restrain criminal offences even if injurious to property:

Clark v. Freeman, 11 Beav. 112;
Prudential Assurance Company v. Knott, 31 L. T. Rep.N. S. 866; L. Rep. 10 Ch. 142; Fisher v. Apollinaris Company, 32 L. T. Rep. N.S. 628; L. Rep. 10 Ch. 297.

Since the Judicature Act there have been cases in which, after trial and where the legal right has been established, the Court of Chancery has granted an injunction to restrain the publication of a libel injurious to trade, and where the injury was clearly irreparable; but there are no cases in which this has been done upon an interlocutory application:

Thomas v. Williams, 43 L. T. Rep. N. S. 91; 14 Ch. Div. 864.

This court has power to issue an injunction to restrain a defendant from publishing of the plaintiff, to the injury of his trade, matter which a jury have found to be libellous (Saxby v. Easterbrook, 3 C. P. Div. 339), but not before a good cause of action has been established. Moreover, before granting an injunction, the court must consider the balance of convenience and inconvenience, which in the present instance is vastly in favour of the defendants. In fact, to grant this injunction would be going far beyond anything ever yet done by the courts upon an interlocutory proceeding. The forfeiture of the six-monthly rebate, consequent upon an infraction of the rules of the conference, is not in the nature of a penalty, as has been contended by the other side. If the defendants secure the whole of the trade, they can afford to make a partial return to the shippers, otherwise not. That is a perfectly legitimate mode of securing to themselves the freights. They lose the right to the return unless they conform to the rules of the conference. The particular reason why the contract is made in that form is that there is a brisk season and a dull season in the Chinese shipping trade, and the defendants' vessels run all the year round for goods and passengers, whereas the plaintiffs are primarily an Australian line, and run to China only during the tea season when trade is brisk. They also cited

Rex v. Turner, 13 East, 228;
Gregory v. Duke of Brunswick, 6 M. & G. 205; 3 C. B. Rep. 481;
Reg. v. Druitt, 10 Cox C. C. 592.

Sir Henry James, Q.C. in reply.—If the combination is illegal and in restraint of trade, that is sufficient evidence of malice. Lord Mansfield, C.J. lays down that the offence of conspiracy does not consist in doing the acts by which the mischief is effected, but in conspiring with a view to effect the intended mischief by any means. The illegal combination is the gist of the offence:

Rex v. Eccles, 1 Leach C. C. 274.

Cur. adv. vult.

Lord Coleridge, C.J., after mentioning that Fry, L.J. concurred in the judgment he was about to deliver, stated the facts of the case as alleged by the plaintiffs, and continued substantially as follows:—The plaintiffs contend that this is a conspiracy to exclude their ships from the China market, and that it is against public policy, inasmuch as it is an undue interference with trade. Assuming that the plaintiffs could establish what they allege to be their case, and that there was a conspiracy against them on the part of the defendants—for such it would be, and it is certainly conceivable that such a conspiracy as this might be proved in point of fact—I entertain no doubt that, if the combination could be made out to be not a mere honest endeavour to support the defendants' trade, but really a device to ruin the plaintiffs trade, an indictment for conspiracy and therefore an action would lie, and it would come within the principle laid down by Lord Mansfield in Rex v. Eccles (1 Leach C. C. 274). That case is as good law now as when Lord Mansfield decided it, though one illustration which he gave in it is no doubt open to argument, and has been unfavourably commented upon. Still it is good law in principle. This case seems also to be within the principle of conspiracy given by Tindal, C.J. in O'Connell v. The Queen (11 Cl. & F. 155.) If the law has been correctly laid down by Lord Fitzgerald in Reg. v. Parnell (14 Cox C. C. 508), and I do not mean to express any doubt whatever upon the point, an indictment would lie in a case of a conspiracy to "boycott" a person, and therefore an action may lie here. I find it difficult to distinguish the facts in this case, if true, from the general outline of the facts in the case before Lord Fitzgerald. It is to be observed also that if the plaintiffs succeed in this action the damages may be exemplary, and such as may severely tax the resources of the conference owners.

But then, admitting for the purposes of this application the truth of all the facts as alleged by the plaintiffs, there arises the question as to whether the present case is one for an interlocutory or interim injunction. Fry, L.J., whose experience in this class of cases is far greater than my own, agrees with me that this is not a case for issuing an interlocutory injunction, because, although the cause of action is conceivably within the limits of legal idea, yet it is, in point of fact, a very difficult case for the plaintiffs to establish. The defendants, while admitting the issue of the circular, by their affidavits put a totally different complexion on the case, and advance one which is at least plausible and one which they may induce a jury to believe. They say that the forfeiture of the rebate by shippers who do not deal exclusively with the conference steamers is not an exaggerated penalty; it is not more than they have a perfect right to do, and give out that they will do, in the fair protection of their trade. It will be for a jury to decide which of the two contentions has been made out in fact; it is a matter entirely for proof by evidence and by examination of witnesses. Therefore, the matter being very doubtful, it would be a strong thing for this court to anticipate the decision of so doubtful a matter by issuing an interim injunction. Again, the fact that if the plaintiffs are right in their contention, full compensation is capable of being made to them in damages, is almost in itself a sufficient reason for not granting the injunction. If they succeed I have no doubt they will and ought to get very substantial damages. I understand that that is of itself a reason for not issuing an injunction prior to the trial of the action.

Further, it does not appear to me that the plaintiffs will suffer anything in the nature of irreparable injury. They may suffer; it may be that they will have a difficulty in carrying on their China trade, but such damage differs from injury called irreparable, for which compensation in damages would be no redresss. It is in cases of irreparable injury that an interim injunction issues. But the injury here is obviously not of that character. There are also other circumstances in this case which appear to me to disentitle the plaintiffs to the interim injunction for which they ask; for instance, the state of things complained of existed since 1879, whereas the plaintiff company was not incorporated till 1883. To use an analogy derived from another branch of the law, the plaintiffs came to the nuisance. Again, the plaintiffs are primarily an Australian company, and there has also been delay in making this application. The plaintiffs have not put forward any grounds upon which the courts have granted an injunction before the trial of the action. It is admitted, also, that this is a novel application, and the absence of anything like authority makes us consider this case far too doubtful to justify us in issuing the interim injunction asked for.

Application dismissed with costs.

THE STORMCOCK. (a)

Collision—Tug and tow—Joint tortfeasors—Measure of damages.

The schooner J. M. S. having come into collision with a tug and her tow, a damage action in rem was instituted by the owners of the schooner against the tug to recover all the damages occasioned by the collision. Subsequently to the collision the plaintiffs received from the owners of the tow a sum of money, described in an agreement entered into between these parties "as an advance on account of the damages to be recovered from the owners of the tug." By the agreement it was agreed that the owners of the tow should give the plaintiffs all information and assistance necessary to bring the action to a successful issue; that if the schooner and the tug should both be held to blame, the plaintiffs should repay any sum by which the money already paid exceeded the moiety of damages recoverable against the tug; and that, as a basis of the arrangement, it was understood that the schooner should be found blameless for the collision.

The Court, having found the tug alone to blame, held that the above payment was not such a payment by the tow in satisfaction of the damages occasioned by the collision as amounted to a settlement in discharge of the action, and was consequently no bar to the action, and that, notwithstanding the advance paid by the tow, the plaintiffs were entitled to recover from the defendants all the damages occasioned by the collision.

It is not the duty of those in charge of a tow which is being towed with a long scope of hawser by night at sea to direct the movements of the tug—the circumstances being different to towing by day in a river.

THIS was a collision action in rem instituted by the owners of the schooner J. M. Stevens against the steamtug Stormcock in respect of a double collision between herself and the Stormcock and between herself and the ship Earl of Beaconsfield, which was in tow of the Stormcock.

The collision occurred in the Firth of Clyde on the 6th March 1884.

The facts alleged on behalf of the plaintiffs were as follows:—The J. M. Stevens, a schooner of 141 tons net, was on March 6, 1884, at about 4 a.m., in the Firth of Clyde, on a voyage from Ardrossan to Dublin, laden with a cargo of coal. There was a light breeze from about S.W. by S. The weather was fine, and the J. M. Stevens was proceeding under all sail close-hauled on the port tack, heading about W. by N. Her side lights were duly exhibited and burning brightly, and a good look-out was being kept. In these circumstances the masthead and towing lights of a steam-tug, which proved to be the Stormcock towing the dismasted iron ship Earl of Beaconsfield, was seen from four to five points on the port bow of the J. M. Stevens, and from two to three miles distant. The J. M. Stevens was kept on her course. Shortly afterwards the green light of the Stormcock came into sight, and the tug and her tow approached the J. M. Stevens on her port bow until they caused danger of collision. The Stormcock was loudly hailed to keep clear, but she came on at a considerable speed and with her stem struck the bowsprit and port bow of the J. M. Stevens and carried away the bowsprit, and almost immediately afterwards the Earl of Beaconsfield with her stem struck the J. M. Stevens on the port quarter. The J. M. Stevens shortly afterwards sank.

The facts alleged on behalf of the defendants were as follows:—The Stormcock, a steam-tug of 134 tons net, was on March 6, 1884, towing the ship Earl of Beaconsfield, from Waterford towards Glasgow. Shortly before 4.45 a.m., the Stormcock and her tow were in the Firth of Clyde, between Pladda and Holy Islands, proceeding at about the rate of eight knots an hour, and steering N.N.E. The tug had her regulation lights duly exhibited, and a good look-out was being kept on board of her. The Earl of Beaconsfield had her regulation lights burning brightly, and she was towing astern of the Stormcock, with a scope of about 120 fathoms of hawser. In these circumstances the red light of the J. M. Stevens came suddenly into view about 250 yards off, and about three points on the starboard bow of the Stormcock, whereupon the helm of the Stormcock was put hard-a-port, her engines were stopped, and the Earl of Beaconsfield was loudly hailed to port her helm. The engines of the Stormcock were then reversed full speed astern, and her helm steadied and starboarded, and she was brought into a position to have passed clear under the stern of the J. M. Stevens. If the Earl of Beaconsfield had duly ported her helm upon being hailed, both vessels would have gone clear, but the Earl of Beaconsfield improperly neglected to port her helm, and forging ahead caused danger of collision with the Stormcock, and the Stormcock was in consequence compelled to set on her engines full speed ahead, thereby throwing herself across the bows of the J. M. Stevens, carrying away the jibboom and bowsprit of that vessel.

The defendants, in their defence, further alleged as follows:

5. The defendants admit their liability for the collision between the Stormcock and the J. M. Stevens, but they say that the sinking and loss of the J. M. Stevens and everything on board of her was not occasioned thereby, but was caused solely by the collision between the Earl of Beaconsfield and the J. M. Stevens, and that such last-mentioned collision was wholly caused, or was contributed to by the negligence of the Earl of Beaconsfield and those on board of her.

7. Alternatively the defendants say that if the loss of the J. M. Stevens and everything on board of her was caused or contributed to by the negligence of those on board the Stormcock (which is not admitted), the owners of the Earl of Beaconsfield have paid to the plaintiffs, or have agreed to pay to the plaintiffs, certain sums of money in respect of the damages sustained by the plaintiffs in the said collision and claimed by them in this action, and that the plaintiffs have accepted the same in full satisfaction and discharge of the trespasses complained of and the damages claimed in this action.

8. The defendants further say that by the agreement under which the owners of the Earl of Beaconsfield have paid or have agreed to pay to the plaintiffs the said sum of money as agreed, it was, after the said collision and before this action was brought, agreed between the plaintiffs and the owners of the Earl of Beaconsfield, that the plaintiffs should instruct Messrs. Thomas Cooper and Co., who were and now are acting as solicitors to the owners of the Earl of Beaconsfield and their underwriters in respect of the matters arising out of the said collision, to bring an action in the plaintiffs' names against the Stormcock, and that the plaintiffs should give them all information and assistance which they might require to bring the said action to a successful issue, and that the plaintiffs should not be liable for any costs whatever, and that any amount recovered from the Stormcock beyond the sum of money paid or to be paid under the said agreement to the plaintiffs should be paid over to the plaintiffs, and that if the J. M. Stevens and the Stormcock should both be found to blame for the collision the plaintiffs should repay any sum by which the sum of money paid to them under the said agreement exceeds the moiety of their damages recoverable against the Stormcock. The defendants say that in pursuance of the said agreement this action was brought by the said Messrs. Thomas Cooper and Co. in the names of the plaintiffs, but on behalf of the owners of the Earl of Beaconsfield, and to enable the said owners of the Earl of Beaconsfield to recover from the defendants the sum so paid or to be paid to the plaintiffs.

The plaintiffs, by their reply, joined issue and alleged alternatively as to paragraph 8 of the statement of claim that it was bad in law and showed no answer to the action.

The agreement referred to in the statement of defence was contained in a receipt and a memorandum, which were as follows:

Received of Messrs. Thomas Cooper and Co. the sum of six hundred and fifty pounds as an advance on account of the damages to be recovered from the owner of the tug Stormcock by the owners of the schooner J. M. Stevens, and of her cargo and freight, and her master and crew's effects, in respect of the loss of the said schooner, her cargo and freight, and master and crew's effects, by collision with the Stormcock. It is agreed that the said parties will instruct Messrs. Thomas Cooper and Co. to bring an action in their name against the Stormcock and her owners, and will give them all information and assistance which they may require to bring the action to a successful issue, but they are not to be liable for any costs whatever. Any amount recovered from the Stormcock beyond the sum of 650*l.* to be paid over to the owners of the J. M. Stevens. If both the J. M. Stevens and Stormcock are found to blame for the collision, the owners of the J. M. Stevens, her cargo and freight and master and crew, are to repay any sum by which the above 650*l.* exceeds the moiety of their damages recoverable against the Stormcock.

If the action against the Stormcock fails for any cause but default on the part of the J. M. Stevens, the owner of the Earl of Beaconsfield to pay any further sum to which the damage sustained by the loss of the J. M. Stevens, her cargo, freight, and master and crew's effects, may amount assessed in the usual way in such cases in the Court of Session or by the sheriff, with interest from the collision at 4 per cent. per annum. If the action against the Stormcock succeeds, the owners of the J. M. Stevens to pay a sum not exceeding ten pounds in full for all extra costs between solicitor and client. It is understood as a basis of the arrangement that the J. M. Stevens will prove that she had her lights burning and kept her course before the collision until it was inevitable. The Scotch costs to be paid by the Earl of Beaconsfield, R. and S. Neill (Scotch solicitors acting on behalf of the owners of the J. M. Stevens) to be allowed usual agency on the action here if successful. In case the Stormcock or her owners be freed from liability and should take any proceedings against the J. M. Stevens or her owners for damages, the owners of the Earl of Beaconsfield indemnify the J. M. Stevens and her owners against all damages and costs under such action, provided the J. M. Stevens had her lights up and kept her course.

The witnesses called on behalf of the plaintiffs alleged that the Stormcock with her stem and starboard bow struck the J. M. Stevens on her port bow close to the stem, carrying away the forecastle head; that the Earl of Beaconsfield then struck the J. M. Stevens on the port quarter within 20 feet of her stern; and that the J. M. Stevens sank head foremost owing to the blow given by the Stormcock.

The witnesses called on behalf of the defendants alleged that the Stormcock struck the J. M. Stevens a slanting blow with her starboard bow on her jibboom and bowsprit, and that the Earl of Beaconsfield struck the J. M. Stevens on the port quarter stem on. The mate of the Stormcock stated that after the collision he went in a boat to the J. M. Stevens and found a large hole in her port quarter.

Sir W. Phillimore (with him Bucknill) for the plaintiffs.—On the evidence it is submitted that the sinking of the J. M. Stevens was solely due to the collision with the Stormcock. In order that the defendants should escape liability they must prove either that the death-blow was not directly given by the Stormcock, or indirectly caused by the negligence of those in charge of the Stormcock. The agreement between the owners of the Earl of Beaconsfield and the owners of the J. M. Stevens is no bar to this action, it being conditional upon the J. M. Stevens being found blameless for the collision. Moreover, the 650*l.* is stated to be an advance, and is therefore not a payment in accord and satisfaction of the plaintiffs' claim.

Cohen, Q.C. and Aspinall for the defendants.—It is admitted that, if the Stormcock sank the J. M. Stevens, the owners of the Stormcock are liable for the damages suffered by the plaintiffs in excess of the 650*l.* already paid by the owners of the Earl of Beaconsfield, but for no more. Had the Earl of Beaconsfield been keeping a proper look-out, she would have ported before the collision, and not have caused the Stormcock to go across the bows of the J. M. Stevens. Even assuming the Stormcock to be in fault, the Earl of Beaconsfield is also in fault, and was actually the cause of the sinking of the J. M. Stevens. If so, the tug and tow are joint tort-feasors. The plaintiffs are seeking in this action to recover all the damages occasioned by the collision, irrespective of the fact that they have been paid 650*l.* This action is therefore brought for the benefit of the Earl of Beaconsfield, a joint tort-feasor with the Stormcock, between whom there can be no contribution:

Merryweather v. Nixon, 8 T. R. 186;
Addison on Torts, p. 85.

Although the 650*l.* is stated to be an advance, it is believed that the damages sustained by the plaintiffs do not exceed that sum. If so, it is a payment in full satisfaction of the plaintiffs claim, who therefore can have no right of action against the Stormcock. The tug is the servant of the tow, and inasmuch as the plaintiffs have received satisfaction from the tow, they cannot recover against the servant:

Brinsmead v. Harrison, L. Rep. 7 C. P. 547; 27 L. T. Rep. N. S. 99;
Wright v. The London General Omnibus Company, 2 Q. B. Div. 271; 36 L. T. Rep. N. S. 590;
Thurman v. Wild, 11 Ad & Ell. 453;
Priestly v. Ferney, 3 H. of L. 957.

Sir W. Phillimore in reply.

Sir JAMES HANNEN.—In this case the steam-tug Stormcock had in tow a large vessel, the Earl of Beaconsfield, when the Stormcock and the Earl of Beaconsfield both came into collision with the schooner J. M. Stevens. The Stormcock was towing the Earl of Beaconsfield with a scope of 120 to 150 fathoms of hawser. It has scarcely been argued that the J. M. Stevens was to blame, although the witnesses of the Stormcock did feebly put forward a suggestion that the reason why they did not see the J. M. Stevens was that she had no lights. It has, however, been shown that the J. M. Stevens had lights, and I think no blame can be imputed to her. I think, however, that there was a bad look-out on the Stormcock, and I think that the collision between the tug and the J. M. Stevens arose from that bad look-out. I am advised that the blow which the Stormcock delivered to the J. M. Stevens was in all probability sufficient to have caused the schooner to sink, even if she had not come into collision with the Earl of Beaconsfield. The evidence points to this, not merely that the bowsprit of the J. M. Stevens was torn away by the tug, but that her whole forecastle was torn away. Such a blow would be calculated to be a blow sufficient to sink the vessel. Be that as it may, we are all clearly of opinion that the subsequent collision between the Earl of Beaconsfield and the J. M. Stevens was brought about solely by the negligence of those on board the Stormcock. The collision occurred at night at sea, and I am advised by the Trinity Brethren that that creates a wholly different state of affairs to ordinary towing by day in a river where those on the tow are able to direct the movements of the tug. That is very different from the present circumstances. A tug which is towing at night with 120 fathoms of hawser is not capable of being directed by those on the tow with that speed and rapidity which is possible in a river. It is the view of my assessors that it is not to be expected under the circumstances that the tow could control the movements of the tug so as to prevent a collision of this kind. The tow would have a right to suppose that the tug which was so far in advance would take the necessary precautions to avoid collision with an approaching vessel. Therefore there was no negligence on the part of those on board the Earl of Beaconsfield in not giving directions to the tug to take a different course to that which she adopted. I should observe that the allegations of negligence on the part of the Earl of Beaconsfield, put forward by the Stormcock, have fluctuated very much on the pleadings and evidence. It was suggested at first, in the statement before the Receiver of Wreck, that the collision arose from the Earl of Beaconsfield not having ported in time. There is, however, no evidence which satisfies me that she did not port when called upon to do so. I have already dealt with the other suggestion, that if those on the tug were in fault in not seeing the J. M. Stevens, those on the tow were equally in fault. I therefore come to the conclusion that the Stormcock was to blame.

That conclusion gives rise to the consideration of the defence put forward by the owners of the Stormcock. As to the liability of the tow, it seems to have been admitted by both the learned counsel that the tow was responsible for the negligence of the tug. I confess I have been somewhat astonished to find to what extent that principle has been carried by my learned predecessors. But for these decisions, apparently based, according to Dr. Lushington, on considerations of expediency, that there should not be a divided command, I myself should have been inclined to think that the decisions of the American courts establish a rule more in conformity with my own ideas of justice; that is, that the particular circumstances should be looked at in each case to see whether the tug or the tow, or both, are liable. But I accept the decisions of Dr. Lushington treating the tug as the agent or servant of the tow. However, although that has been held, it has also been held that the tug and tow are not so identified with one another that the tow cannot recover against the tug that which the tow has been obliged to pay as compensation for the negligence committed by the tug. Taking the view that I do of the facts of this case, it would follow that the Earl of Beaconsfield would have been entitled to recover as against the tug for the damage which was done. In addition to the above facts which I have found, an agreement was entered into between the owners of the Earl of Beaconsfield and the owners of the J. M. Stevens, the effect of which was that the solicitors for the Earl of Beaconsfield had the control of the proceedings in the action brought by the J. M. Stevens against the Stormcock for the purpose of establishing that which has now been established, viz., that the Stormcock was to blame for the collision. In so doing there was nothing remarkable. The owners of the Earl of Beaconsfield had a direct interest in the action, and therefore said to the owners of the J. M. Stevens, "To you it does not matter whether we are to blame or the tug, because you will recover either against us or the tug; therefore let us have the control of the proceedings." In that I see nothing objectionable. The question is whether something more was not done. It is said that the owners of the Earl of Beaconsfield have discharged the liability of the Stormcock, and that, therefore, no right of action remains on the part of the J. M. Stevens against anybody. When, however, the documents constituting the agreement come to be examined, I am of opinion that they do not amount to that. The agreement runs thus: [The learned President then read the agreement.] It was contended that the words "650*l.* as an advance" show that this was to be considered as an absolute payment; but on consideration I am of opinion that it was only a provisional payment, as though the parties had said, "We must have some security." That might have been done by depositing a sum of money in a bank, but I find a passage in the agreement which seems to me to clearly establish that this was not a payment out and out. It is this: "It is understood as a basis of the arrangement that the J. M. Stevens will prove that she had her lights burning and kept her course." Here is a distinct statement that this is a payment on the assumption that the J. M. Stevens will be able to prove that she was not to blame. If it had been established that the J. M. Stevens was to blame, this money would have been recoverable back. That being so, I come to the conclusion that this was not a satisfaction of the claim of the J. M. Stevens, and that therefore it does not stand in the way of the J. M. Stevens recovering in this action. This arrangement could undoubtedly have been carried out by some other means; because, if the money had been paid by the owners of the Earl of Beaconsfield under compulsion of law to the owners of the J. M. Stevens, they would upon the facts have been entitled to recover those damages over against the Stormcock, inasmuch as the necessity for paying the money had been occasioned by the Stormcock's negligence. For these reasons I am of opinion that the Stormcock is alone to blame, and that the defence has not been made out.

THE CARDIFF STEAMSHIP COMPANY v. JOHN BARWICK AND OTHERS.

THE RAISBY. (a)

Salvage—Ship and cargo—Liability of owners—Average bond—Costs—Higher scale—R. S. C. Order LXV., rr. 9, 10.

Where salvage services are rendered to ship, freight, and cargo, the shipowners are not personally liable for the services to the cargo.

Where salvage services are rendered to ship, freight, and cargo, there is no duty on the owners of the salved ship before delivering the cargo to take a bond from the consignees thereof securing payment by the consignees to the salvors of salvage due in respect of the cargo.

Salvage services were rendered by the steamship G. to the steamship R. and her cargo under the following written agreement signed by both the masters: "At my request, the captain of the steamship G. will tow my ship, the steamship R., to St. Nazaire, that being the nearest port for repairs. The matter of compensation to be left to arbitrators at home, to be appointed by the respective owners." The R. was towed to St. Nazaire, and thence proceeded to Dunkirk, where her cargo was delivered to French consignees. A salvage action in rem was commenced in England against ship, freight, and cargo, but the plaintiffs not being able to procure the appearance of the cargo owners, salvage was awarded in respect of ship and freight only. In a salvage action in personam against the owners of the R. to recover salvage for the services rendered to the cargo:

Held, that the defendants were not liable under the agreement, and that there was no liability on shipowners to pay salvage for services to cargo.

Costs on the higher scale will only be allowed under exceptional circumstances, and there were no such circumstances in this case.

THIS was a salvage action in personam instituted by the owners, master, and crew of the British steamship Gironde against the owners of the steamship Raisby to recover salvage for services rendered to the cargo laden on board the Raisby, or, in the alternative, for damages for breach of duty.

The particulars of the services were as follows:—The steamship Gironde, of 461 tons net, was on Sept. 3, 1883, about twelve miles north of the Chaussée de Sein Light, bound on a voyage from Cardiff to Bordeaux. In these circumstances the steamship Raisby was sighted flying a signal of distress. The Gironde bore down upon the Raisby, when the following written agreement was entered into between the two masters: "At my request the captain of the steamship Gironde, of Cardiff, will tow my ship, the steamship Raisby, of London, to St. Nazaire, that being the nearest port for repairs. The matter of compensation to be left to arbitrators at home to be appointed by the respective owners. Signed in duplicate by both masters." The Raisby was a steamship of 1502 tons net, bound on a voyage from Bombay to Dunkirk, and laden with a cargo of about 3650 tons of grain and seed. The position of the Raisby was perilous. Her holds were flooded, there was water in the engine-room, which had put out the fires, some of her sails had been carried away, and there was a current setting her in shore. At 2.30 p.m. the Gironde began to tow, and after considerable difficulty and danger the Raisby was safely brought to an anchorage off St. Nazaire at 7.30 a.m. on Sept. 5.

The statement of claim, so far as is material, was as follows:

5. The Raisby was partially repaired at St. Nazaire, and with her cargo on board was subsequently towed to Dunkirk, her port of discharge, and her cargo was then duly delivered by the defendants to the consignees thereof, from whom, and each of whom, the defendants took and received a bond or agreement, whereby the said consignees undertook to pay to the defendants the proportion due in respect of the said cargo of any sum or sums paid by or recovered against the defendants for and in respect of the said services, and generally for and in respect of general average and salvage.

6. In the alternative, the plaintiffs allege that the said cargo was taken to Dunkirk and delivered as aforesaid, and that it was the duty of the defendants to the plaintiffs, before and at the time of delivering the said cargo to the consignees thereof, to obtain and take from the said consignees, and each of them, a bond or agreement securing the payment by the said consignees and each of them, of any sum or sums due from them, and each of them and paid or recovered in respect of the said services, and generally for and in respect of general average and salvage upon the said cargo; and the plaintiffs allege that the defendants failed to perform the said duty, and to obtain and take the said bond or agreement, and thereby have prevented the plaintiffs from recovering against the said cargo the salvage due to them in respect of the said cargo.

11. The said agreement to tow the Raisby was an agreement to render salvage services for reward to the said ship and her cargo, and was entered into by the master of the Raisby as agent for the defendants.

The defence, so far as is material, was as follows:

4. As to paragraph five of the statement of claim, the defendants say that, before delivery of the cargo at Dunkirk, the consignees thereof agreed to pay to the defendants such amount as might be adjudged by the laws in force in France (of which country the consignees of the said cargo were subjects and in which country they were residing) to be payable by the said owners in respect of any general average contribution due by them as such owners.

5. The defendants deny that there was any duty from them to the plaintiffs to obtain and take from the consignees of the said cargo a bond or agreement securing the payment by them of any sum or sums of money in respect of general average and salvage upon the said cargo as alleged. The defendants also deny that they have, by the alleged breach of duty or otherwise, prevented the plaintiffs from recovering against the said cargo such salvage (if any) as is due to the plaintiffs in respect of the said cargo.

9. The defendants deny that the master of the Raisby was their agent to render them liable in this action, and they deny that there is anything due from them to the plaintiffs in respect of the said services.

(a) Reported by J. P. ASPINALL and BUTLER ASPINALL, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

At the hearing it appeared that on the 4th Oct. 1883 the plaintiffs commenced an action in rem in England against ship, freight, and cargo, but in consequence of the plaintiffs being unable to procure the arrest of the cargo or the appearance of the cargo owners, the proceedings against the cargo were abandoned. In that action the plaintiffs recovered 4000*l.* as salvage in respect of the services rendered to the ship and freight. On Dec. 28, 1883, the plaintiffs commenced an action in the Tribunal de Commerce at Dunkirk for salvage to cargo against the consignees of the cargo, in which it was decided that no action would lie, because the proceedings had not been taken against the owners of ship and cargo conjointly, and because the master was not a party to the proceedings. The plaintiffs put in the defendants' log, and called evidence in support of their statement of claim.

The defendants called M. Dumont, a French advocate, who stated that the plaintiffs might have arrested the ship, freight, and cargo at Dunkirk or St. Nazaire, and retained the cargo until bail was given, or a court of competent jurisdiction had adjudicated upon the claim. A. M. Allibert proved that he, as representing the Raisby, drew up an average bond at Dunkirk in the usual French form providing that the adjustment should be in conformity with the law and jurisprudence of the Tribunal de Commerce at Dunkirk.

Sir Walter Phillimore and J. P. Aspinall for the plaintiffs.—The defendants are liable under the agreement. Apart from the agreement there is a primary liability on the shipowner to pay salvage for services to the cargo. The effect of the decision in Anderson v. The Ocean Steamship Company (52 L. T. Rep. N. S. 441; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 401; 10 App. Cas. 107) is that a master may contract when ship and cargo are in peril so as to bind the cargo and the shipowner, but he so contracts as agent for the shipowner, and quâ third parties, the shipowner is primarily liable. No injustice is done to the shipowner by so deciding, since he has a remedy over against the cargo for any salvage he may have to pay in respect of the cargo. In Akerblom v. Price (7 Q. B. Div. 129; 44 L. T. Rep. N. S. 837; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 441) salvage in respect of cargo was primarily paid by the shipowner, who in that action sought to recover over against the cargo owner. The authority of the master as agent for the shipowner is sufficiently wide to enable him to enter into an agreement, express or implied, rendering the shipowner liable for salvage in respect of the whole adventure:

The Medina, 2 P. Div. 5; 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 305; 35 L. T. Rep. N. S. 779;
The Alfred, 50 L. T. Rep. N. S. 511; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 214;
The Vandyck, 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 17; 47 L. T. Rep. N. S. 694.

The words of the agreement are sufficient to impose this liability on the shipowner, and in construing the agreement it is to be remembered that the services to the cargo were beneficial to the shipowner, and it is to be presumed that this was present to the mind of the master on entering into the agreement. It is further contended that the defendants are liable in tort, because, owing to breach of duty on their part, we have been unable to proceed in rem against the cargo. The shipowner having possession of the cargo, he had no right to part with it without securing to the plaintiffs the means of recovering salvage in respect of it:

Crooks v. Allan, 5 Q. B. Div. 38; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 216; 41 L. T. Rep. N. S. 800.

Webster, Q.C. and Myburgh, Q.C. (with them Bucknill) for the defendants.—The master has no authority to bind the owner for salvage to cargo. The fact that there is no trace of any such authority or of such primary liability on the shipowner in the books, is in itself strong evidence of the correctness of the defendants' contention. Salvors have both a possessory and a maritime lien in respect of the res salved. Their remedy is, therefore, against the res or its owner. In Anderson v. The Ocean Steamship Company and Akerblom v. Price the question was not whether the shipowner was bound to pay salvage in respect of cargo, but whether, having done so, he could recover it in general average against the cargo owner. The decisions of Dr. Lushington in The Mary Pleasants (1 Swa. 224) and in The Pyrenee (Br. & L. 189) distinctly lay it down that ship and cargo must each pay its own share of salvage, and that neither can be made liable for the salvage due from the other. Assuming the master to have the necessary authority to bind the shipowner, he has not done so by this agreement. There is no mention in it of cargo. The only agreement is, that the compensation is to be left to arbitrators. There is no authority for saying that a shipowner is bound to take an average bond to protect salvors. Average bonds are taken for the protection of the shipowner, to secure proper payments as between himself and the cargo owners. The case of Crooks v. Allan is not in point. In that case the shipowner was held liable to cargo owners for omitting to take the necessary steps to secure payment of general average. There the cargo owner's only remedy lay in the shipowner procuring an adjustment of general average. In the present case the salvors have a possessory and a maritime lien, two most effective remedies. Moreover, it has been proved that the defendants did in fact take an average bond in the French form, and have, according to the decision in Simonds v. White (2 B. & C. 805), done all that is required of them.

Sir W. Phillimore in reply.—The cases of The Mary Pleasants and The Pyrenee only decide that the ship itself is not liable for salvage to the cargo. The plaintiffs are, however, not seeking to recover in rem against the Raisby, but personally against her owners. In the case of a canal boat carrying goods in inland waters, if she were to break down, and her owners or master were to employ persons to rescue the cargo, and provide another boat to carry it on, it is clear that the owners of the boat would have to pay all the cost of the rescue and of the forwarding, and equally clear that the master of the canal boat would have authority to enter into the necessary contract, it being one of the incidents of his employment. In the present case, the engagement of a vessel to render salvage services to ship and cargo is one of the ordinary incidents of the employment of the master of a seagoing vessel.

Cur. adv. vult.

May 19.—Sir James Hannen.—The facts of this case are as follows: The defendants' steamship Raisby, on a voyage from Bombay to Dunkirk, when about twelve miles from the Chaussée de Sein Light being disabled, gave signals for assistance. The plaintiffs' steamship Gironde went to her assistance, and the following document was signed by the two captains: "At my request the captain of the steamship Gironde, of Cardiff, will tow my ship the steamship Raisby, of London, to St. Nazaire, that being the nearest port for repairs; the matter of compensation to be left to arbitrators at home to be appointed by the respective owners." The Gironde thereupon towed the Raisby to St. Nazaire, where she was sufficiently repaired to proceed to Dunkirk, her port of destination. The cargo was delivered to the several French consignees at Dunkirk. After some ineffectual attempts to arrange a reference the plaintiffs commenced an action in this division for salvage against the ship, freight, and cargo, but being unable to procure the appearance of the owners of the cargo in those proceedings they were abandoned so far as it related to the cargo and its owners, and the action was continued against the ship and freight and its owners alone. In that action a sum of 4000*l.* was recovered for salvage of ship and freight on an estimated value of 35,000*l.* While this action was proceeding the plaintiffs commenced an action in the French Tribunal de Commerce, at Dunkirk, for salvage of the cargo, in which they failed, and they now proceed in this action against the owners of the Raisby personally to recover from them remuneration for the salvage of the cargo. The question is whether this action can be maintained. It is clear that no primary liability rests upon the ship or its owners to pay for the salvage of the cargo. It is laid down in Abbot on Shipping, tit. "Salvage" 6: "With respect to the parties liable to pay salvage and the interest in respect of which it is payable, the rule is that the property actually benefited is alone chargeable with the salvage recovered." In The Pyrenee it was explicitly decided that the ship is not liable for the salvage of cargo, and The Mary Pleasants (1 Swa. 224) is to the same effect. But it is contended for the plaintiffs that in this case the defendants are liable by virtue of the alleged agreement entered into between the two captains. The so-called agreement, however, does not purport to extend the liability of the shipowners, or indeed to fix any liability on anyone except in so far as such liability may be created by the acknowledgment it contains that the captain of the Raisby had requested the captain of the Gironde to tow his ship to St. Nazaire. This part of the document in no way alters the position of the parties from what it would have been if the captain of the Raisby had simply accepted the services of the Gironde, in which case it has not been contended that a claim could have been maintained against the ship or its owners for salvage of the cargo, The only agreement contained in the document is that "the matter of compensation" (without reference to the persons or property to bear it) "is to be left to arbitrators at home." This, however, was valueless as an agreement. It could not have been pleaded as any answer to an action for salvage brought in the ordinary way in the Admiralty Division, and if effect could have been given to it at all it would only have been by bringing an action upon it for not submitting to arbitration. And this action is not of that nature. It appears to me, therefore, that the plaintiffs altogether fail to show any liability on the part of the defendants to pay for the salvage of the cargo, and I should not have thought it necessary to say more, but that it has been argued that there are cases which, though they do not expressly decide that the shipowner is liable in the first instance for the salvage of the cargo, yet they imply such a liability. The most important of these cases is the recent one in the House of Lords of Anderson v. Ocean Steamship Company (ubi sup.). There Lord Blackburn, delivering the judgment of the House, held that where the owners of a salved vessel had entered into a binding agreement with the salvors, and had paid a particular sum for salvage of ship and cargo, they might recover such portion of it as a jury might think reasonable from the owners of cargo as general average. Their Lordships did not decide that, apart from agreement, the owners of the ship would have been liable to pay for the salvage of the cargo. The principle upon which the decision proceeded is explained in the passage cited at p. 114 of 10 App. Cas. from Kemp v. Halliday. That principle is, that money actually and necessarily expended for the preservation of ship and cargo is as much a voluntary sacrifice for the common benefit as the sacrifice of a mast or anchor would have been. Here the defendants have not paid anything in respect of the salvage of cargo, nor have they entered into any agreement to pay it. The liability both as to the parties responsible and the amount is left at large to be determined in due course of law, and that is, as it appears to me, that the plaintiffs must seek their remedy for salvage of cargo, as distinct from ship, from those who have had the benefit of that salvage.

Another ground of complaint is thus alleged in the statement of claim: that it was the duty of the defendants to the plaintiffs, before delivering the cargo, to obtain from the consignees of the cargo a bond or agreement securing the payment to the consignees of any sum due from them, and paid or recovered in respect of the plaintiffs' services, and that the defendants have failed to perform this duty, and thereby have prevented the plaintiffs from recovering against the cargo the salvage due in respect of it. But there was no duty towards the plaintiffs to obtain such a bond. If indeed the defendants were liable in this action, and could have obtained such a bond as the plaintiffs allege it was the defendants' duty to take, it was imprudent of them, in their own interest, not to do so, but the plaintiffs have no right of action against the defendants because they did not do something for their own security. But, as a matter of fact, the defendants did take an average agreement in the French form, which stipulates that the adjustment shall be "in conformity with the law and with the jurisprudence of the Tribunal of Commerce at Dunkirk," and it has not been shown that they could have obtained any other. The allegation in the statement of claim that the plaintiffs have been prevented by the defendants from recovering against the cargo the salvage due in respect of it is wholly unsupported. It has been proved by M. Dumont, a French advocate, that the plaintiffs might have asserted their lien on the cargo by arresting it either at St. Nazaire or at Dunkirk, and the plaintiffs were expressly warned by the defendants' agent that if they did not arrest the cargo they would lose their lien, and that the responsibility would rest with them. Instead of doing this the plaintiffs instituted a suit for salvage before the Tribunal of Commerce against the owners of the cargo, in which they failed. I of course abstain from criticising the judgment of the French court, but M. Dumont was of opinion that it would have been reversed on appeal. I observe, however, that one of the grounds of the decision was that "the cargo had been delivered to the claimers thereof without the captain of the Gironde having taken any steps to make valid or protect the rights which he now claims to have over the cargo;" from which it would seem that, if the plaintiffs have lost their remedy against the cargo owners in France, it is by their own default. For these reasons I am of opinion that the plaintiffs have failed to establish their claim, and that the action must be dismissed with costs.

Myburgh, Q.C., for the defendants, asked for costs on the higher scale. According to Order LXV., r. 9, costs on the higher scale may be allowed "on special grounds arising out of the nature and importance or the difficulty or urgency of the case."

THE PRESIDENT.—I see no special grounds in this case for allowing costs on the higher scale. I have before pointed out it was only in exceptional cases that costs on the higher scale ought to be allowed. Provision has been made by rule 10, Order LXV., for the taxing officer to allow such costs on the higher scale in respect of particular matters as he may think fit. I see no reason for allowing all the costs to be taxed on the higher scale, and therefore I must refuse the application.

THE CHUSAN. (a)

Collision—Trawlers' lights—Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea 1884, art. 10.

Art. 10 (a) of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea 1884, requiring all fishing vessels of twenty tons net and upwards, "when under way," to carry the ordinary lights of a vessel under way, unless required by other regulations to carry the lights therein prescribed, is applicable to trawlers whilst engaged in trawling and in motion.

Where a steamship having come into collision with a trawler, which, in violation of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, was carrying a white masthead light in addition to side lights, and it appeared that those on board the steamship had not seen the white light, the Court refused to hold the trawler to blame for the breach of the regulations, on the ground that it could not possibly have contributed to the collision.

THIS was a damage action in rem, instituted by the owner of the fishing smack I. C. U. against the steamship Chusan to recover damages occasioned by a collision with the Chusan.

The collision occurred in the English Channel on Dec. 24, 1884. The whole of the crew of the I. C. U. were drowned.

The plaintiffs, by their statement of claim, alleged as follows:—On Dec. 24, 1884, the cutter-rigged smack I. C. U., of fifty tons register, was in the English Channel on a fishing voyage, manned by a crew of four hands all told. About 2.15 a.m. the I. C. U. was between the Start Point and Portland Bill, Berry Head, bearing about N.W., distant about twenty miles. The weather was squally, the wind E.N.E., the tide ebb, and the I. C. U. was proceeding on the starboard tack at an unknown rate of speed. Her regulation lights were duly exhibited and a good look-out was being kept. In these circumstances those on board her sighted the Chusan. The I. C. U. kept her course and burnt flares over her quarter, but the Chusan ran into her, and with her stem struck the port bow of the I. C. U., cutting her down and sinking her, and the whole of the crew of the I. C. U. were drowned.

The defendants, by their defence, denied that the Chusan had come into collision with the I. C. U., but admitted that she had been in collision with a vessel name unknown, and alleged that, if such vessel was the I. C. U., the collision was solely caused by the negligent navigation of the I. C. U.

The statement of facts pleaded by the defendants was as follows:—On Dec. 24, 1884, shortly before 2.30 a.m., the Chusan, a steamship of 2651 tons, bound from India to London, was in the English Channel off Lyme Bay. The Chusan was steering E. by S., and proceeding at the rate of about ten knots. Her regulation lights were duly exhibited and a good look-out was being kept. At such time several bright lights of vessels were seen ahead and on the port bow. The course of the Chusan was altered under a port helm in order to pass clear to the southward of such lights. The Chusan proceeded under her port helm for a short time, when the red light of a vessel was seen about two points on the starboard bow, at a distance of about a quarter of a mile. The helm of the Chusan was immediately put hard-a-port and her engines were stopped. The vessel then showed a white light over her port quarter, but the stem of the Chusan almost immediately struck her on her port side, and she sank in a short time, all hands being lost.

The defendants charged the smack with not keeping her course, and with not having her side lights properly burning and exhibited in accordance with the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea.

At the hearing the witnesses called on behalf of the plaintiff were the plaintiff himself, a surveyor, the master of a fishing smack belonging to the same fleet as the I. C. U., and the look-out on board the Chusan.

The plaintiff and the surveyor proved that the I. C. U. carried proper lights, that the I. C. U. had not been seen since the 24th Dec., and that the plaintiff had received from the Receiver of Wreck a stern board belonging to her boat, bearing the name I. C. U., and that no other smack belonging to the fleet had been lost at that time. The master of the smack Pioneer proved that he had sailed on the voyage in question in company with the I. C. U., that during the night of the 23rd Dec. the I. C. U. had been fishing with her trawl down, that he saw the Chusan go in the direction of the I. C. U., that he then lost sight of the I. C. U., and never saw her again, that about five minutes before the collision the I. C. U. was exhibiting a white light at her masthead, that she was then evidently hauling up her trawl, and that he saw no other lights on her except the bright light. The look-out from the Chusan proved that he reported a red light on the starboard bow distant about two ship's lengths, that the Chusan came into collision with the vessel exhibiting the red light, and that he believed it to be a fishing smack.

At the close of the plaintiffs' evidence it was submitted by counsel for the defendants that there was no case made out, first, because there was no proof of the identity of the I. C. U. with the vessel with which the Chusan had come into collision; and secondly, because there was no evidence of negligence on the part of the Chusan.

BUTT, J. held that there was evidence of identity and of negligence.

The defendants did not call any witnesses.

Bucknill (with him Nelson) for the plaintiffs.—It being proved that the Chusan ran down a smack on the morning of the 24th Dec., and sank her, all hands being drowned, and that the I. C. U. was in the immediate neighbourhood, and was sunk with all hands, the conclusion is that she was sunk by the Chusan. The evidence being that the look-out on the Chusan, going ten knots, reported a red light on the starboard bow, distant a quarter of a mile at the outside, it was the duty of the Chusan to have immediately reversed her engines. All she did was to port her helm and stop her engines. She is therefore to blame for a breach of art. 18 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea.

Hall, Q.C. (with him Sir Walter Phillimore and Baden-Powell) for the defendants.—The onus is on the plaintiffs to prove conclusively that the Chusan came into collision with the smack. The evidence on this point is merely problematical. There is also an absence of affirmative evidence fixing the Chusan with negligence. Assuming there to have been negligence on the part of the Chusan, the smack is also to blame for infringing the regulations by carrying an improper light.

BUTT, J.—I am now prepared to give my opinion upon all but the question as to whether the smack is to blame for not exhibiting proper lights, or what is the same thing, for exhibiting improper lights. In my view of this case there is no doubt upon the evidence that the Chusan sank the smack I. C. U. All hands on the I. C. U. having perished, it is, of course, extremely difficult to establish a case of negligence against the steamer, but a plaintiff is bound to establish his case, and the question therefore arises whether, in the state of the evidence, I can find negligence against the steamer. Now, it is difficult to say what lights this smack, the I. C. U., carried at different times in the course of the night, and until I have heard an argument upon the point I am not prepared to decide what lights a smack with her trawl down ought to carry. But the plaintiffs have called one of the crew of the steamer, and he has said that, being the look-out man on the starboard bow of the Chusan, he saw, and saw for the first time, at a distance of two ship's lengths, a red light on board the smack the Chusan ran down. The plaintiffs having, under the peculiar circumstances of the case, been forced to call a witness from the other ship, I do not hold that they are bound to take everything that this witness says as true, and I am not inclined so to take it. I notice that in the preliminary act and in the pleadings it is stated that the red light of the smack run down by the Chusan was seen by those on board the Chusan at a quarter of a mile distant. If the defendants had wanted to discount this statement, although it is not always allowed to parties to depart from their preliminary act, they should have called evidence. The whole of their officers and crew were, I presume, available, but they have chosen to let the matter stand upon the plaintiffs' evidence, and upon their pleadings. In that state of things, acting under the advice of the Elder Brethren, I have no hesitation in saying that the steamer saw, as she has pleaded, the smack's red light at about a quarter of a mile distant. If she had no time to clear the smack under a port helm, it was her manifest duty, under the rules, not only to stop, but to reverse her engines. She takes a half measure, she stops, but she does not reverse—that is the story told on her pleadings. I think that was wrong, and therefore I hold her to blame—the question whether the smack is also to blame depends upon the question of lights. That is a matter which I will not decide until I have heard further argument of counsel upon it.

June 15.—The question as to whether the smack was carrying the lights required by the regulations now came on for argument.

Sir Walter Phillimore (with him Hall, Q.C, and Baden-Powell) for the defendants.—The master of the Pioneer has said that the smack was exhibiting a masthead light five minutes before the collision, and that he never saw her exhibiting any other lights. The look-out on the Chusan, although keeping a vigilant look-out, only sees the red light when distant two ship's lengths. If the masthead light was being carried five minutes before the collision, the presumption is that it was being carried immediately before the collision. A trawler, whether engaged in fishing or not, has no right to be exhibiting a white light. This collision having happened in Dec. 1884, art. 10 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea 1884 is applicable. By art. 10 (a): "All fishing vessels and fishing boats of twenty tons net registered tonnage or upwards when under way, and when not required by the following regulations in this article to carry and show the lights therein named, shall carry and show the same lights as other vessels under way." As none of the subsequent regulations provide for trawlers, the result is that they are bound to show the same lights as a vessel under way. If so, the I. C. U. was wrong in exhibiting a white light:

The Dunelm, 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 304; 51 L. T. Rep. N. S. 214; 7 P. Div. 164.

The fact also that the red light was never seen by the master of the Pioneer, and only seen by the look-out on the Chusan at a short distance, proves that the red light was only put up at the last minute, and not in proper time. Vessels are entitled to have the assistance of side lights for a distance of two miles, and the I. C. U. has therefore infringed the regulations in this respect.

Bucknill (with him Nelson) for the plaintiffs.—It is submitted that art. 10 (a) of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea is not applicable to trawlers. If so, trawlers are entitled to exhibit the white masthead light required by the old regulations. No mention is made of trawlers in this regulation, and it is therefore to be assumed that they were not meant to be touched by this article. It speaks of "all fishing vessels . . . . when under way." The words, "when under way," negative the idea of the article applying to trawlers with their trawls down engaged in fishing. The evidence of the master of the Pioneer that he only saw a masthead light is not conclusive of there being no red light exhibited. He had no reason to give particular notice to what lights the I. C. U. was showing. The onus is upon the defendants to substantiate the charge that the smack was carrying improper lights, and this they have failed to do. Assuming the smack to have been improperly exhibiting a white light, it is a breach of the regulations which could not possibly have contributed to the collision, because it was never seen by those on the Chusan.

BUTT, J.—In this case I have already decided that there was negligence on the part of the Chusan, and the question now remaining is, whether there was contributory negligence on the part of the smack. The first matter which it is material to consider is, what lights these smacks, when trawling, are bound to carry under the regulations. This is by no means the first case in which we have had considerable difficulty in deciding what lights these vessels are bound to carry. I confess it is a matter of some astonishment to me that, after so much discussion in this court, in the Court of Appeal, and in the public press on this question, with reference to the case of The Dunelm (ubi sup.), the new regulations should have been published without some more specific and distinct provision as to what lights trawlers should carry. However, I can only deal with such materials as the Legislature has provided, and, after carefully listening to the arguments of counsel, I have come to the conclusion that under the Regulations of 1844 these vessels, when trawling—i.e., when moving through the water with their trawls down—are bound to carry the side lights that ordinary sailing vessels carry. I think that not only the I. C. U., but all these fishing smacks on this occasion with white lights were infringing the statutory regulations, and though I do not say that it is free from doubt I so hold. What is to be the result of this infringement on the part of the I. C. U.? Although she may have infringed the regulations at an earlier period, it is plain that she was carrying her coloured lights at the time of the collision, and we have the very best evidence of that because the red light was seen by those on board the Chusan. The defendants not only plead that they saw it, but the look-out man from the Chusan says he saw the red light of the I. C. U. before the collision. But it is suggested that it was exhibited only at a distance of two or three ship's lengths; that is, when the smack was close to the steamer. Now I think that the presence of the light before the collision affords a presumption on which the court may act, that it had been there at an earlier time, unless that presumption is rebutted by some satisfactory evidence to the contrary. It was competent for the owners of the Chusan to have called the officers and crew who were on deck to have said that the light was not there until they got within a certain distance. The defendants have not called either officers or men. The plaintiffs, in the difficulty in which they were placed owing to the crew of the smack being drowned, were forced to call the look-out man on the Chusan, who says he saw the red light on the starboard bow, but only at the distance of two ship's lengths. Is that evidence on which I ought to act? I do not think it is. I should have thought that the crew of the smack being drowned, the owners of the Chusan would have been desirous of offering all the evidence in their power in explanation of this most unhappy occurrence. They have elected to do otherwise.

Now, with regard to the witness from the Chusan, in the first place he is contradicted by the preliminary act and the defence, in which it was stated that the red light was seen a quarter of a mile off. Whatever may have been the case with reference to the red light, it is proved to my satisfaction that the smack's white light was exhibited some time before the collision, and yet the look-out man on the Chusan never saw it. If he did not see the white light when he ought to have seen it, it is too much to ask me to accept his story as to the red light. I am satisfied, so far as that man is concerned, that he was not keeping a good look-out, and, as his is the only evidence with which I have been favoured, I am not prepared to decide upon it that the red light was only put up at the last moment. Against the considerations to which I have given expression there is the evidence of the master of the Pioneer, who says that within five minutes of the collision he saw the white light of the I. C. U. and saw no side lights. Having regard to that evidence, I am asked to say the red light was not there. The steamer was going about ten knots. She would, therefore, be certainly no further than a mile from the smack when the smack passed the Pioneer, which is the time to which the master of the Brilliant refers. If the red light was not visible then, the I. C. U. was in default, because it ought to have been visible when the Chusan was two miles distant. The contention, therefore, is that the red light was exhibited too late. But in answer to that it is to be remembered that the master of the Pioneer had no reason to give special notice to the I. C. U. or to the lights she was carrying. All he seems to recollect is that he saw the white light. It would be excessively dangerous to trust to such evidence. It is not at all impossible that the I. C. U. may have placed her coloured lights in position as soon as she got her trawl up, and it is very possible she may have left the white light up, in which case the evidence of the master of the Pioneer would be reconciled with the fact that the red light was visible before the steamer saw it. It may be said that it would be an infringement of the regulations to have the white light up if the side lights are exhibited. It is true that it would be, but in this case it could not possibly have contributed to the collision, because those on board the steamer never saw the white light. On the whole, I do not think there is evidence to rebut the presumption that the red light was up at an earlier time than the look-out man on the Chusan saw it. That being so, I do not think the charge of negligence against the smack is made out, and I pronounce the Chusan alone to blame.

THE WHICKHAM. (a)

Practice—Interrogatories—Deposit—Security for costs—Co-ownership action—Order XXXI., r. 26.

Where in a co-ownership action, brought by a managing owner against his co-owners for an account to recover a balance, the plaintiff sought to interrogate the defendants, who were numerous, and to be dispensed from making the usual deposit, the defendants contending that a deposit ought to be made in respect of each defendant interrogated, the Court ordered a deposit of 5*l., and* 10*s. for each additional folio over five and no more.*

THIS was a motion by the plaintiff in a co-ownership action for an order that security for the costs of delivering interrogatories by the plaintiff to the defendants might be dispensed with.

The action was brought by the plaintiff as late managing owner of the steamship Whickham to recover from the defendants, his co-owners, the sum of 5500*l.* for moneys due for disbursements made and liabilities contracted on behalf of such co-owners, and upon an account stated.

The plaintiff was owner of five sixty-fourths shares in the Whickham, and proposed delivering interrogatories to the defendants, thirty-four in number, as to the terms of management under which he had been appointed managing owner.

In support of the motion an affidavit was filed, of which the following is material:

3. Particulars have been delivered by the defendants who are defending this action, from which it appears that there are thirty-four co-owners defending this action.

4. All the said defendants are represented by one firm of solicitors.

6. The plaintiff is advised to deliver interrogatories to each of the defendants defending this action. Such interrogatories have been settled by counsel, and are twenty-nine folios long. There is only one set of interrogatories for all such defendants.

7. The amount of deposit to be made under Order XXXI., r. 26, in respect of one such set of interrogatories administered to one person would be 17*l.*, and when administered to thirty-four persons it would be 608*l.*

8. Plaintiff is advised by counsel that discovery by interrogatories from each of the defending defendants is essential to his case. Owing to the defendants withholding payment of the whole of the plaintiff's claim, the plaintiff is somewhat embarrassed momentarily, and he is wholly unable to deposit such an amount as 608*l.*

In an affidavit filed on behalf of the defendants, it was alleged that the expense of obtaining answers to the interrogatories would be considerable, owing to the defendants being resident in different parts of the country, and owing to several of them living at a distance from the residence or office of a commissioner. It was also alleged that some of the defendants were old ladies, who would probably require the personal attendance of their own solicitor.

J. P. Aspinall, for the plaintiff, in support of the motion.—Having regard to the particular circumstances of this case, the plaintiff is asking to be allowed to deliver interrogatories without making the usual deposit of 5*l.* referred to in Order XXXI., r. 26. The defendants contend that, as interrogatories are being delivered to thirty-four defendants, a deposit of 5*l.* is to be made in respect of each defendant. The result of this contention would be that the plaintiff would have to deposit between 600*l.* and 700*l.* in order to interrogate the defendants. The rule speaks only of 5*l.*, and of 10*s.* for every additional folio over five. The interrogatories, though administered to thirty-four different defendants, are all the same, and the defendants are all represented by the same solicitor.

Bucknill for the defendants.—The words of the rule point to a deposit of 5*l.* in respect of each set of interrogatories. [BUTT, J.—What power have I to order more than a deposit of 5*l.* and so much per folio. The rule speaks of that and no more. The deposit is after all only a test of bona fides.] In the present case the defendants are resident in different parts of the country, and separate expenses will be incurred in respect of each defendant. The defendants rely upon the following decisions:

Aste v. Stumore, 49 L. T. Rep. N. S. 742; 13 Q. B. Div. 326; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 175;
Jubb v. Bibbs, W. N. Dec. 8, 1883, p. 208;
Smith v. Reed, W. N. Dec. 1, 1883, p. 196.

BUTT, J.—My view is that the right order is to order the plaintiff to pay into court 5*l.*, and 10*s.* for every folio in excess of five. In so ordering I do not wish to be thought to disagree with anything Field, J. has said; but, in the exercise of my discretion, I think that is the proper order.

The following order was accordingly drawn up:

"The judge, having heard counsel on both sides, directed that the plaintiff do pay into court, as security for the costs of the interrogatries to be delivered by him, the sum of 5*l.*, together with 10*s.* for every additional folio exceeding five of such interrogatories, and that the costs of this motion be costs in the action." THE RAINBOW. (b)

Wages action—Master—Managing owner—Lien for wages—Merchant Shipping Act 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104), s. 187—Merchant Seamen Act 1880 (43 & 44 Vict. c. 16), s. 4.

A master who, after receiving a portion of his wages from the managing owners, elects to allow

(a) Reported by J. P. ASPINALL and BUTLER ASPINALL, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

(a) The defendants gave notice of appeal against this order, and, as the construction of the rule was considered doubtful and the decisions were conflicting, the plaintiff, by agreement with the defendants, paid 150*l.* into court as security, whereupon the defendants abandoned their appeal.

(a) Reported by J. P. ASPINALL and BUTLER ASPINALL, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

the balance to remain in their hands at interest, by so doing loses his lien, and cannot recover the balance in rem, but if he has had no opportunity of receiving his wages, or has been refused payment of them on demand, the mere fact of his allowing them to remain in the managing owners' hands after they become due will not deprive him of his remedy.

Where shipowners, in answer to a claim for wages, plead an agreement between the managing owners and the plaintiff that the plaintiff shall, instead of receiving his wages, allow it to remain in the hands of the managing owners, and has thereby foregone his right against the ship, the onus is upon the defendants to clearly prove that there was an express arrangement to that effect, before the court will deprive the plaintiff of his right.

Under the provisions of sect. 187 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, and sect. 4 of the Merchant Seamen Act 1880, as to the nonpayment of wages the right to recover ten days' double pay and wages to the time of final settlement is not enforceable where there is a bonâ fide question as to liability.

THIS was an action in rem against the barque Rainbow, instituted by her late master, Thomas Laughorne, to recover wages and disbursements.

By the statement of claim it was alleged that the plaintiff served as master during four voyages until April 12, 1885, when he was wrongfully dismissed. He claimed 264*l.* 5*s.* 7*d.*, ten days' double pay, wages to date of final settlement or judgment, and interest on the amount recovered to writ.

The particulars of the plaintiff's claim were as follows:

Balance of settled accounts of first voyage, Feb. 4, 1881, to July 5, 1882	100	0	0
Interest thereon to date of writ	14	2	9
Balance of settled accounts of second voyage	170	13	5
Interest thereon to date of writ	10	16	9
Wages and disbursements on fourth voyage ending April 12, 1885	34	7	8
	330	0	7
Less cash received on fourth voyage	65	15	0
	£264	5	7

At the time of the plaintiff's engagement the ship was owned by Messrs. Fry and Co., and by Messrs. ROSS and Co., in which firm Alexander Cassels was a partner. Messrs. Fry's shares were mortgaged to Mr. Cassels. On the completion of the third voyage the ship was taken possession of by Messrs. Ross and Co., and Mr. Cassels the mortgagee, who appeared and defended the action.

The defence, so far as is material, was as follows:

3. The defendants deny that they dismissed the plaintiff. The plaintiff on or about April 12th, 1885, himself terminated his employment by issuing his writ in this action. Alternatively the defendants say that they were justified in dismissing the plaintiff without notice, or payment in lieu of notice, by the plaintiff's said acts, and that if they dismissed him the alleged dismissal (which the defendants do not admit) was not wrongful as alleged.

5. The defendants, in respect of the first and second voyages mentioned in the particulars, say that the accounts of the said voyages respectively were duly settled on the conclusion of each voyage, and the Rainbow and the owners of the Rainbow were discharged from any claim of the plaintiff in respect thereof, and that nothing remains due to the plaintiff in respect thereof, either for principal or interest. The sums of 100*l.* and 170*l.* 13*s.* 5*d.* which the plaintiff now claims are respectively sums which the plaintiff, instead of receiving the same in cash upon the settlement of the voyage accounts, on the conclusion of the said respective voyages, from Messrs. F. G. Fry and Co., the then managing owners of the Rainbow, who had in their hands the funds wherewith to pay the same to the plaintiff, and debited the owners of the Rainbow with such payment, preferred and elected by private arrangement with the said Messrs. F. G. Fry and Co., to lend to them personally on their account, by leaving or placing the same in their hands at interest, the transaction in each case being wholly one between the plaintiff and the said Messrs. F. G. Fry and Co., who acted therein for themselves only and not for or on account of the ship or with the knowledge or authority of their co-owners. The said F. G. Fry and Co. had no authority to borrow or retain any portion of the said moneys for the purposes of the Rainbow, and they were not in fact borrowed, retained, or used for any such purposes. The said voyage accounts were settled between the said F. G. Fry and Co. and the co-owners upon the basis and the faith of the said moneys having been duly paid and all claims of the plaintiff duly discharged. The defendants submit that under the said circumstances the plaintiff is not entitled to maintain this action in respect of any part of the said moneys.

As to the wages due at the end of the second voyage, the plaintiff stated that before he left for the third voyage he had sent in his account to Messrs. Fry and Co., the managing owners; that these accounts had been returned to him, with a request that he would look over them and see whether he agreed with the corrections; that before he had actually settled or agreed to these accounts, but when the balance due to him had been ascertained within a small amount, he had asked one of the managing owners, who was then at Newport waiting for the ship to sail, to pay him the balance due in respect of the first and second voyages; that the managing owner had gone away without complying with that request; and that he, the master, had had no further opportunity of asking for or recovering his wages before he left England on the third voyage. In Jan. 1884, during the third voyage, the plaintiff wrote to Messrs. Fry, inclosing them the account which they had sent him relating to the second voyage, and stating that he found it correct, and requesting that they would send a credit note to his sister, and allow her to draw upon them for any small sums she might require.

Upon the plaintiff's return to England at the end of the third voyage, he found that the defendants had become managing owners, who thereupon settled up and paid his account for the third voyage. The plaintiff thereupon applied to Messrs. Fry for payment of the balance due in respect of the first and second voyages, and in a letter written to Messrs. Fry whilst he was in command of the ship at Glasgow, being then bound for Cardiff, he requested Messrs. Fry to pay him the balance for the second voyage on his arrival at Cardiff, and stating that, as he was required to give them one month's notice for the 100*l.*, he thereby did so, and requested payment of the 100*l.* one month after date.

The defendants called Messrs. Fry and their manager, who having proved a request by the master for Messrs. Fry to retain the 100*l.* at interest (which was admitted by the master), and that the master might have had the 100*l.* at the end of the first voyage, and the 170*l.* 13*s.* 5d. at the end of the second voyage if he had insisted upon it, further alleged that at the end of the second voyage nothing passed between the master and themselves with respect to the balance then due to the master, or that the accounts were returned to him as alleged, and that he had stated to Mr. Fry that he wished the balance to be dealt with as before. Mr. Fry's books showed that the master had been credited in his private account with the balance due to him on the second voyage under the date of the day before the ship left Cardiff on the third voyage, and that the owners of the ship had been debited with the amount of these wages, and that the account against the owners including these wages had been balanced at the end of the next succeeding June. Mr. Fry, however, stated that the master had not in fact been credited with these wages until after he, Mr. Fry, had received the master's letter of June 1884, and he admitted that no definite arrangement had been come to with respect to what was to be done with the balance due on the second voyage, beyond the master requesting him to deal with it as he had done before. According to Messrs. Fry's books, the balance of 170*l.* 13*s.* 5*d.* had been dealt with as the 100*l.* One question between the parties was whether the balance of 170*l.* 13*s.* 5*d.* had been definitely agreed prior to the ship leaving Newport on the third voyage. The plaintiff's evidence with respect to what passed between him and Mr. Fry at Newport as to the balance of wages due on the second voyage was very clear, whilst the evidence of Mr. Fry was doubtful.

The plaintiff was about to proceed on a fifth voyage, but failing to receive the balance due on the first and second voyages, he threatened to proceed against the ship, and was thereupon removed from command, and Messrs. Fry and Co. having become bankrupt, he instituted the present action.

J. P. Aspinall for the plaintiff.—Having regard to the evidence of the plaintiff that he elected to allow the 100*l.* to remain in the hands of Messrs. Fry, I cannot contend that the plaintiff can recover that sum in this action. With regard to the fourth voyage, the amount due to the plaintiff was 34*l.* 7*s* 8*d.*, but he admits having received 65*l.* 15*s.* The substantial question, therefore, is with regard to the balance of 170*l.* 13*s.* 5*d.* due on the second voyage. This question turns upon the credibility of the evidence, and it is submitted that the court should require very strong proof of the alleged arrangement between the plaintiff and Messrs. Fry before deciding against the plaintiff on this item. The fact that the plaintiff was paid in full in respect of the third voyage by the new managing owners is no proof that he thereby waived his right in rem in respect of the previous voyage. He was content to get his money from whom he could, and it is not enough for the defendants to say that his dealings with Messrs. Fry were such as to point to an understanding that the 170*l.* 13*s.* 5*d.* should be dealt with as the 100*l.* on the previous voyage. They must go further, and prove an express arrangement in order to oust the plaintiff from his remedy against the ship.

Sir Walter Phillimore (with him W. R. Kennedy) for the defendants.—The election of the plaintiff to allow the 100*l.* to remain in Messrs. Fry's hands is an answer to his claim for that amount. It is submitted that, notwithstanding the conflict of evidence, the court should come to the conclusion that the same arrangement was made with regard to the 170*l.* 13*s.* 5*d.*, which also remained in Messrs. Fry's hands. The fact that the plaintiff received payment of the money due on the third voyage from new managing owners would show that he looked to Messrs. Fry for the balance on the previous voyages. The fact that Messrs. Fry treated the 170*l.* 13*s.* 5*d.* as they treated the 100*l.* is strong evidence that they did so with the plaintiff's authority. The letter written from East London asking Messrs. Fry to send a credit note to his sister, and to honour her drafts, shows he looked to Messrs. Fry and not to the ship.

J. P. Aspinall in reply.

BUTT, J.—This is a claim against the owners of the barque Rainbow for the wages and disbursements of the plaintiff, who was for several voyages master of the vessel. The voyages have been called the first, second, third, and fourth voyages, and the only question which it is necessary to decide has arisen in respect of the second voyage. At the end of the first voyage, after some payments in cash to the plaintiff by Messrs. Fry, who were the managing owners, there was a balance remaining due of 100*l.* That sum was left in Messrs. Fry's hands, the master not choosing to receive it in cash. The balance of the second voyage also remained in Messrs. Fry's hands, who some considerable time afterwards failed. The question is, who is to suffer by their failure, the master or the principals, the owners of the Rainbow. With regard to the balance of 100*l.* due on the first voyage, that remained in the hands of Messrs. Fry, with the express assent of the plaintiff, and at his request. A document was given him which would seem to point to that having been the understanding, but it is not necessary to interpret it, because the master has very fairly said in his evidence that he might have had the money if he had chosen on the settlement of accounts, but he preferred to leave it at interest in the hands of Messrs. Fry. That is conclusive against his right to recover it in rem. His lien was gone, and therefore he cannot succeed on that item of his claim.

Now we come to the balance of the second voyage. Here again the money remained in Messrs. Fry's hands, and the question is, who is to suffer by Messrs. Fry's failure. Now first of all, it is to be remembered that Messrs. Fry were the agents of the shipowner, and not the agents of the master. For their default, therefore, primâ facie their principals, and not the servant of those principals, should and ought to suffer. But the defendants have taken upon themselves the burden of showing that, whereas that would be the rule under ordinary circumstances, with regard to this particular voyage there was an express agreement that the money should remain in the hands of Messrs, Fry, as the bankers of the plaintiff; for that is what the contention comes to. The defendants rely not only on the evidence they have given in support of that allegation, but also on what happened on the previous voyage. They say that that is some evidence of the terms on which the money remained in Messrs. Fry's hands. That I do not deny. But the question really is this: Does the evidence satisfy me that there was a distinct arrangement between the plaintiff and Messrs. Fry that this sum should remain, whether at interest or not, in Messrs. Fry's hands? I confess I have some difficulty in arriving at a conclusion on the point. But I do feel that where an owner, who has employed an agent to pay his servant, sets up an express agreement between the servant and the agent that the servant shall forego his rights against his master, it ought to be proved most clearly. In the present case I am by no means satisfied that that arrangement was entered into. The account was not finally closed when this alleged agreement was supposed to have been entered into. This appears not only from the evidence of the plaintiff but also from the correspondence which passed between him and Messrs. Fry. I do not agree that, if he asked for his money in February and could not then get it from Messrs. Fry, he has concluded himself from asking it from the owners by his letter of June from East London. Upon the whole, the conclusion I come to is, that the accounts not being finally settled there is not sufficient evidence of an express arrangement. I must therefore pronounce for the claim of the master on the second voyage.

J. P. Aspinall.—The plaintiff also claims ten days' double pay, wages to date of final settlement, and interest on the amount recovered. By sect. 187 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, where a master or owner refuses to pay "without sufficient cause," he shall pay to the seaman a sum not exceeding ten days' double pay. In The Princess Alice (Lush. 190) it was decided that that section was applicable to a master. By sect. 4 sub-sect. (4) of the Merchant Seamen Act 1880 it is provided that in the event of the wages not being paid, "unless the delay is due to the act or default of the seamen, or to any reasonable dispute as to liability," the seaman's wages shall be payable until the time of final settlement.

BUTT, J.—I think in this case there was "sufficient cause," and "a reasonable dispute as to liability." It never could have been meant that, where there was a bonâ fide question as to liability, shipowners should be visited with the penalties prescribed by those statutes. My judgment, therefore, is for 170*l.* 13*s.* 5*d.*, less 31*l.* 7*s.* 4*d.*, with interest on that sum from the date of writ, and costs.

BURT AND OTHERS v. LIVINGSTONE; THE SOLWAY. (a)

Evidence—Carriage of goods—Breach of contract—Letter written by master.

In an action for damage to cargo caused by the vessel running aground, a letter written by the master to his owners, stating the circumstances under which the vessel went ashore, is admissible as evidence against the defendants.

THIS was an action instituted by goods owners against the owners of the steamship Solway for non-delivery of cargo.

(a) Reported by J. P. ASPINALL and BUTLER ASPINALL, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

The goods were shipped at Archangel, on board the Solway, for carriage to London. During the voyage, the Solway ran aground in the White Sea, and was totally lost with the cargo on board.

The plaintiffs charged the defendants with negligence. The defendants admitted that the goods were not delivered, but said that the goods were lost by excepted perils contained in the bill of lading.

R. T. Reid, Q.C. (with him Barnes), in opening the plaintiff's case, proposed to put in evidence a letter written by the master of the Solway to his owners, stating the circumstances under which the Solway went ashore, and giving his opinion as to the cause of the casualty.

Sir Walter Phillimore (with him Green), for the defendants, objected to the admission of such evidence. Statements made before the Receiver of Wreck, though made pursuant to Act of Parliament, are not admissible as evidence against the shipowners:

Nothard v. Pepper, 17 C. B. N. S. 39; 10 L. T. Rep. N. S. 782; 2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 52;
The Little Lizzie, L. Rep. 3 Ad. & Ec. 56; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 494; 23 L. T. Rep. N. S. 84.

A fortiori, a voluntary letter written by the master cannot be used against his owners. There is no duty on the master to write such a letter, and hence it cannot be said to be the admission of an agent made in the ordinary course of his duty.

Reid, Q.C., contra.—The cases of Nothard v. Pepper (ubi sup.) and The Lizzie (ubi sup.) are not in point because there the admissions were made in obedience to an Act of Parliament, and not by a servant to his employer in the ordinary course of his business. In The Manchester (1 W. Rob. 62) the admission of the master was held to be admissible in plea; if so, a letter describing the facts of the disaster is admissible. It is a master's duty to report to his owners the incidents of a casualty like the present.

Sir Walter Phillimore in reply.

Sir JAMES HANNEN.—I am of opinion that this letter is admissible in evidence. The case of Nothard v. Pepper (ubi sup.) at first somewhat troubled me; but, as Mr. Reid had pointed out, the admission was not made by a servant to his employer, but to a person in authority by virtue of an Act of Parliament. The present case seems to me to fall within a leading principle of the law of evidence. It is clear that a ship's log is admissible in evidence by the other side against the owners. The letter in this case comes within the same rule. It is part of the captain's duty to report to his owners all the circumstances incidental to the navigation of the vessel. There is no difference whether he puts these statements into the log, or sends them by letter. I therefore admit the letter, but with this reservation, that the statements as to what the captain did or saw, or what orders he gave, are only admissible, and not his opinion as to the cause of the casualty.

THE NUMIDA.

THE COLLINGROVE. (a)

Practice—Costs—Damages—Action in rem—Arrest of ship—Commission on bail—Discontinuance of action.

A successful defendant in an action in rem, where the action is decided in his favour or discontinued, cannot recover as costs the commission paid by him for bail to release his ship from arrest, though he may in some instances, where the arrest is made malâ fide or with gross negligence, recover it as damages.

THESE were two summonses raising the same question in two different actions, viz., a damage action, The Numida, and a salvage action, The Collingrove.

The Numida was a collision action in rem, instituted by the owners of the steamship Messina, in which the plaintiffs claimed 20,000*l*. The Numida was arrested and the defendants having put in bail the plaintiffs on the day following discontinued the action. Thereupon the defendants took out a summons for an order that the plaintiffs should pay the costs of procuring bail. This summons was adjourned into court.

The Collingrove was a salvage action instituted by the owners, master, and crew of the steamship Colstrup, in which the plaintiffs claimed 1500*l*. The services were rendered necessary by damage occasioned to the Collingrove in consequence of a collision with the Colstrup, and consisted in towing the Collingrove a short distance into Falmouth. The Collingrove was arrested, and bail given for her release. The Colstrup having been found alone to blame for the collision, the salvage action was discontinued. Thereupon the owners of the Collingrove took out a summons, asking that the salvors should be ordered to pay the costs of procuring bail given for the release of the Collingrove. This summons was adjourned into court, and ordered to be heard with the summons in The Numida before the President and Butt, J.

Hall, Q.C., for the owners of the Colstrup, against the summons.—Commission on bail has never been regarded as costs, and therefore cannot be recovered as such. Assuming it to be recoverable as damages, it is only recoverable as such where the arrest is made malâ fide, or with crassa negligentia:

Baden-Powell, for the owners of the Collingrove in support of the summons.—It is submitted that commission on bail is in the nature of costs. Even if not, the vessel was arrested in an excessive sum, and therefore the commission on bail is recoverable as damages.

J. P. Aspinall, for the owners of the Numida in support of the summons.—Had the vessel remained under arrest, the plaintiff would have had to pay the marshal's possession fees. The giving of bail was therefore beneficial to the plaintiffs. The commission was reasonably and properly incurred; it is therefore costs in the action, which the plaintiffs must pay. The cases cited only refer to damages, and not to costs. The actual cost of filing and stamping the bail bond and other expenses connected with the bond are always allowed as costs, and have been allowed in this very case. Commission on bail is an expense just as necessary as and similar in principle to the above-mentioned expenses. Such commission has been recognised as a necessary expense in those cases where the court has condemned plaintiffs in the costs of procuring excessive bail required by them:

The George Gordon, 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 216; 9 P. Div. 46; 50 L. T. Rep. N.S. 371.

[Sir JAMES HANNEN.—Parties procure the release of their ship in order that she may earn freight. Does not that show the cost of commission on bail, or anything that you pay in respect of bail, is a loss to you, or a substitute for a loss of freight, which you would incur if the ship remained under arrest, and that therefore it is in the nature of damages rather than costs?] If that be so, a successful defendant ought never to be entitled to any costs of filing bail bond, &c.; yet those costs are allowed.

Cur. adv. vult.

Aug. 4.—Sir JAMES HANNEN.—In the case of The Numida, which was argued before Butt, J. and myself on a summons adjourned into court, the question raised was whether, when a ship has been arrested and held to bail, and the proceedings against her have been discontinued before the hearing, the owners are entitled to compensation for the loss occasioned to them by being obliged to pay commission in order to procure bail for their ship. It was contended for the shipowner that this commission must be regarded as costs in the proceedings, in which the giving of bail was an ordinary step. We are, however, of opinion that this contention cannot be supported. It was not suggested that these expenses ever had been treated as costs since the time when the practice of obtaining bail on payment of a commission arose, and we should not be justified in creating a new head of costs. We think, however, that in some circumstances the commission paid for obtaining bail would be recoverable as damages. This commission is the cost which the owner incurs to obtain the release of his ship and to avert the damage he would sustain by the continued detention of his vessel.

It appears to us, therefore, that this commission might be recovered as damages in those cases and in like circumstances in which damages could be recovered for the wrongful arrest of the vessel. It has always been the practice in the Court of Admiralty for the judge to award these damages to the defendant, where upon the trial the facts have shown that he was entitled to them, without putting him to the necessity of bringing a fresh action for them: (The Evangelismos, Swa. 378.) It appears to us that, where the suit is discontinued, the same power nevertheless belongs to the court in fitting cases to award damages to the defendant whose ship has been improperly arrested, upon the facts being brought to the knowledge of the court by affidavit. We do not, however, consider that the bare fact of the proceedings being discontinued entitles the defendant to damages. It is necessary for him to show that the arrest of the ship was malicious, or the result of gross negligence. This had not been shown in this case, and we therefore dismiss the summons with costs. In the case of The Collingrove, where the same point was raised, the result will follow.

COURT OF APPEAL.

Thursday, March 5, 1885.

Before Brett, M.R., Baggallay and Lindley, L.JJ.)

The Beeswing. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM BUTT, J.

Wages and disbursements—Master—Action in rem — Maritime lien — Charter-party — Admiralty Court Act 1861 (24 Vict. c. 10), s. 10.

Where a ship is chartered under a charter providing that the master shall be appointed by the charterers, that the owners are to provide and pay for all provisions and wages of captain and crew, and for the necessary equipment and efficient working of the ship, that the captain is to be dismissed by the owners if he fails to give satisfaction, and that the charterers shall provide and pay for all coals, pilotages, port charges, &c., the master is the servant of the shipowners, and hence he has a right in rem for his wages and such disbursements as are necessary for the navigation of the ship, and which the charterers had not by the provisions of the charter-party undertaken to pay; and semble, per Brett, M.R., if the charterers had refused to make these disbursements, and without them the ship could not be navigated, the master would be entitled to charge them against the shipowners.

Quœre, Has a master under sect. 10 of the Admiralty Court Act 1861 a maritime lien for his wages and disbursements? (b)

Semble, where a master is the servant of the charterers and not of the shipowners, he has no right against the owners in respect of wages and disbursements.

This was an action in rem for wakes and disbursements, instituted by the master of the steamship Beeswing against the owners thereof.

The plaintiff was on the 31st Jan. 1884 appointed by the Anglo-African Steamship Company Limited, who had chartered the vessel under a time charter, master of the steamship Beeswing.

This appointment was subject to the approval of the shipowners, who before the plaintiff's appointment had an interview with him, and, after getting a reference from him, consented to his being appointed.

The agreement under which the plaintiff served was contained in a letter sent by the company to the plaintiff, and was as follows:

> We hereby appoint you master of the steamship Beeswing at a salary of 30*l.* per calendar month, in consideration of your taking the ship across the various bars, excepting Lagos, and we agree to pay you 5*l.* per cent. on the net profits of the voyage on the usual conditions, that is, if you give us entire satisfaction on completion of same. Your appointment as master dates from to-day.

The plaintiff thereupon took command of the vessel, and whilst in command he made disbursements and incurred board expenses, and also incurred liabilities on bills of exchange drawn by him in respect of necessaries supplied to the ship and which were still unpaid and owing.

The plaintiff claimed 688*l.* 3*s.* 5*d.*, being a balance of wages and the disbursements above mentioned.

The particulars of the disbursements consisted of liabilities incurred to various merchants in Africa in respect of various disbursements and payments made by or at the request of the plaintiff in respect of crew's wages, boat hire, provisions, &c.

At Sierra Leone Messrs. Pickering and Berthond made disbursements amounting to 437*l.* 2*s.* 8*d.* in respect of stores and provisions, washing bill, cash advanced to plaintiff for crew's wages, commission on advances, coals, clearing vessel, and pilotage outwards. Of this 437*l.* 2*s.* 8*d.*, 212*l.* 4*s.* 8*d.* was in respect of stores and provisions, washing bill, cash advanced to plaintiff for crew's wages and commission on advances, the remaining 224*l.* 18*s.* being in respect of coals, clearing vessel, and pilotage outwards.

At Lagos Messrs. Banner Brothers made disbursements amounting to 84*l.* 6*s.* 3*d.* in respect of stores and provisions, commission on advances, and pilotage. Of this 84*l.* 6*s.* 3*d.*, 58*l.* 1*s.* 3*d.* was in respect of stores and provisions and commission on advances, the remaining 30*l.* being in respect of pilotage. At Benin and Brass River Messrs. Stuart and Douglas made disbursements amounting to 16*l.* 1*s.* in respect of stores and provisions only. At Brass River Messrs. John Lander and Co. made disbursements amounting to 46*l.* 13*s.* in respect of coals.

The defendants by their defence alleged that by an agreement between the Anglo-African Steamship Company Limited and the managing owners of the Beeswing, of which agreement the plaintiff was well aware and to which he consented, one-half of the plaintiff's wages were to be paid by the company and the remaining half by the defendants. Paragraph 4 of the defence was as follows:

> The disbursements, board expenses, and liabilities mentioned in the statement of claim, were made and incurred by the plaintiff on the account and credit, and for the benefit of the charterers, and as their servant and agent, and not on account of the ship or on the account or credit, or for the benefit of her owners, or as their servant or agent. Such disbursements, board expenses, and liabilities were made and incurred solely in respect of matters which the charterers were bound, under the provisions of their charter-party, to supply, and of such provisions the plaintiff had full notice by having in his possession a copy of the charter-party.

(b) As to the maritime lien of a master, see Merchant Shipping Act 1854, sect. 191.

The material provisions of the charter-party were as follows:

It is this day mutually agreed between . . . she being then tight, staunch, and strong, and in every way fitted for the service, and being maintained by owners with a full complement of officers, seamen, engineers, and firemen . . . That the owners shall provide and pay for all provisions and wages of the captain, officers, engineers, firemen, and crew; shall pay for the insurance of the vessel, and for all oil, tallow, and waste required for the engine-room, and provide and pay for the necessary equipment for the proper and efficient working of the said steamer. That the charterers shall provide and pay for all the coals, fuel, port charges, pilotages, agencies, and all other charges and expenses whatsoever, except those before stated . . . That the captain shall be appointed by the charterers, and to be properly qualified shall follow the instructions of the charterers, who will furnish him from time to time with the necessary sailing directions, and he shall keep a full and correct log, which shall be exhibited to the charterers, or their agents, when required . . . Should the charterers be dissatisfied with the conduct of the captain, or any of his officers or engineers, the owners shall, on being advised of such, fully investigate the matter, and, if necessary, make a change in the appointment. Should the owners be dissatisfied with the captain, the above clause to apply . . . That the owners shall have a lien upon all cargoes and all sub-freights for freight or hire due under this charter, and charterers to have a lien on the ship for all moneys paid in advance and not earned.

At the hearing the plaintiff alleged that, in respect of the 437*l.* 2*s.* 8*d.* due to Messrs. Pickering and Berthond, he drew no bill, but claimed in respect of a personal liability to them. It appeared that in payment of the other advances he drew bills on the charterers in favour of the merchants making the advances. He alleged that he had received no instructions as to the agents who were to be employed at the various ports, but took the ship's business to those persons whom he deemed to be most fitting, being personally acquainted with the agents in the various ports.

It also appeared that the Anglo-African Steamship Company Limited were in liquidation, that the bills drawn by the plaintiff on the company in respect of disbursements had been dishonoured on presentation, that at the time when the bills were drawn and the various disbursements made the plaintiff had no knowledge that the company were in difficulties. The plaintiff denied any knowledge of the alleged agreement by which the owners of the Beeswing were liable for only half his wages. He admitted that he took with him on the voyage a copy of the charter-party.

Aug. 9, 1884.—Dr. Phillimore (with him T. Swift) for the plaintiff.—By virtue of sect. 10 of the Admiralty Court Act 1861 the plaintiff has a remedy in rem in respect of his wages and disbursements. The disbursements are all made in respect of matters necessary for the navigation of the ship, and therefore the shipowners are liable for them. The fact that the bills of exchange are drawn upon the charterers does not prevent the plaintiff recovering against the ship if the disbursements were for the owners' use. It has been held that liabilities incurred by the master may be disbursements, although he has not discharged the liabilities:

The Glentanner, Swa. 415;
The Feronia, L. Rep. 2 A. & E. 65; 17 L. T. Rep. N. S. 619; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 54;
The Limerick, 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 206; 1 P. Div. 411; 34 L. T. Rep. N. S. 708.

Finlay, Q.C. (with him J. G. Alexander) for the defendant.—Having regard to the provisions of the charter-party, it is submitted that the plaintiff was not the owners' master, but the charterers. If so, the owners are not liable to him for wages or disbursements. Assuming him to be the owners' captain, special provision is made in the charter-party requiring the charterers to provide certain things, in respect of which the plaintiff is now suing the shipowners. The plaintiff had no authority to bind the shipowners in respect of things which the charterers expressly agreed should be provided and paid for by them.

The Admiralty Court Act 1861, sect. 10, is as follows:

The High Court of Admiralty shall have jurisdiction over any claim by a seaman of any ship for wages earned by him on board the ship, whether the same be due under a special contract or otherwise, and also over any claim by the master of any ship for wages earned by him on board the ship, and for disbursements made by him on account of the ship. Provided always, that if in any such cause the plaintiff do not recover fifty pounds he shall not be entitled to any costs, charges, or expenses incurred by him therein, unless he shall certify that the cause was a fit one to be tried in the said court.

Butt, J.—This is an action in rem for master's wages and disbursements. The total sum claimed is about 688*l.*, of which 107*l.* are wages. The Beeswing was let by the present defendants, her owners, to the Anglo-African Steamship Company Limited, and she was let by a time charter, the time being at the rate of 559*l.* 10*s.* per month. The company (the charterers) are in liquidation, and it is their failure that has given rise to the present proceedings, for, I presume, had they continued trading and solvent the questions raised would not have been brought before this court. The charter-party contains several clauses, to the more important of which I will now advert. It is provided that the owners shall provide and pay for all provisions and wages of the captain, officers, engineers, firemen and crew, for the insurance of the vessel, and for all oil, tallow, and waste required in the engine-room, and provide and pay for the necessary equipment for the proper and efficient working of the ship. It is also provided that the charterers shall provide and pay for all coal and fuel, port charges, pilotage, agencies, both at Liverpool and Africa, and all other charges and expenses whatsoever, except those before stated; that the charterers shall accept and pay for all coals then left in the bunkers at current market price. And further on is this clause: "That the owners shall have a lien on all cargoes and all sub-freights for freight or hire due under this charter, and charterers to have a lien on the ship for all moneys paid in advance and not earned." The plaintiff took charge of the ship as master, and navigated her out to the West of Africa, where she traded. He there obtained a cargo and then brought her home.

There is no serious dispute as to the wages due to him, or as to the liability of the ship to pay those wages. The question in this case is with reference to the disbursements. It is impossible now to deal with the various details and figures; they will be for the registrar and merchants. There are two categories under which the disbursements appear to range themselves.

First, what I will call "Disbursements on owners' account," for instance, wages, stores, provisions; and disbursements on what I will call "charterers' account," for example, coals, krooboys' wages and provisions, and other matters which, by the charter, the charterers undertook to pay. The ship having come home, and the company being in liquidation, this suit was instituted under the 10th section of the 24 Vict. c. 10, the Admiralty Court Act of 1861. The defendants have appeared, and they contend, in the first place, that the section of the Act to which I have adverted gives no lien for masters wages and disbursements; or, at all events, for master's disbursements. I do not think that is the right way of putting it. The question is, whether the combined effect of sects. 10 and 35 is not to give a remedy in rem, i.e., a remedy against the ship herself for such wages and disbursements. Another contention urged on behalf of the defendants is, that liabilities are not disbursements, or, in other words, that it is wrong to hold the ship liable to debts incurred by the master, but which he has not discharged. Both these questions have long before now been the subject of consideration in this court, and I think counsel on both sides agree that I am precluded from going into the matter. I am bound to hold, in accordance with the decisions, that the defence upon those grounds is not sustainable in this court. Now, a third contention urged on the part of the defendants is this: assuming the other two points to be decided against them, they say that in this case the master is not liable to the different firms from whom he got goods or money for providing what he did provide for the ship. This contention is totally irreconcilable with the broad facts, the admitted facts, because in some instances the master drew bills of exchange upon which he is most clearly liable. Therefore, with reference to those matters it is impossible to say he has not incurred liability. In other instances the master was not quite so clear. How far a master renders himself personally liable by ordering necessaries in a foreign port is a question of some nicety. It must depend to some extent upon the facts of each case, but I shall follow the decisions in the class of cases of which The Limerick (ubi sup.) in the Court of Appeal is the latest, and hold that the plaintiff did incur liability to Messrs. Pickering and Berthond for such of the goods and moneys as he procured of or through them for the owners' use, and that he is consequently entitled to recover them in this action. As to whether the plaintiff incurred any personal liability for coals, I express no opinion. That may be a matter standing upon a different footing, and it is not necessary, in the view I take, for the determination of this suit. I do not know enough of the facts as to the agency of Pickering and Berthond for the charterers to determine that matter, and I express no opinion on it. I do not think the fact, if it be the fact, that Pickering and Berthond were the charterers' agents would preclude the master from recovering in this action disbursements made on account of the owners, and I so hold. Neither do I think that, in those cases where he drew a bill of exchange upon the charterers, that would prevent his recovering disbursements really made for the owners' use. On the other hand, I am of opinion that the plaintiff had no authority to pledge and did not pledge the credit of his owners for coals, wages, and provisions of krooboys and other expenses appertaining to the charterers; and therefore, the owners of the ship not being liable for these sums, they cannot be recovered in an action in rem by the master against the ship. There being no authority for the plaintiff to pledge his owners' credit in respect of those things, I do not think the steps taken by the defendants to enforce their lien for hire under the clause of the charter-party makes any difference. I pronounce that the payment into court is insufficient, and I refer it to the registrar and merchants to inquire into the items, with directions to allow the wages and all proper disbursements, except such as the charterers have undertaken to pay.

From this decision the defendants appealed.

The plaintiff had originally given notice of appeal, which was subsequently withdrawn (cf. The Beeswing, 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 335; 51 L. T. Rep. N. S. 833).

Sir Walter Phillimore (with him Kennedy) for the respondents.

The argument was substantially the same as in the court below, the defendants contending that they were liable for neither wages nor disbursements, as the master was not their master, nor appointed by them.

Brett, M.R.—It is unnecessary to consider whether in this case the statute gives a maritime lien on the ship in respect of the master's wages and disbursements. If it had been necessary, I should certainly have required a great deal of argument to convince me after our recent decision in The Heinrich Bjorn (5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 391; 10 P. Div. 44; 52 L. T. Rep. N. S. 560). The statute gives to the Admiralty Court jurisdiction to try claims for wages and disbursements brought by a master against his owners, and in order to enforce that jurisdiction the court has power to seize the ship of the owners. Now, here the questions are, first, whether the master's wages were due to him from the owners, though this is not the subject-matter of these proceedings; and secondly, whether they were bound to pay him for such disbursements as it was necessary from the circumstances of the case that the captain should make on behalf of the owners, and which his position as captain would give him implied authority to make on their behalf. Nobody could suppose that, if he was not their captain, he could charge his wages against them, because to charge his wages against persons who did not employ him would be absurd. It seems to me equally clear that, merely as captain, he could not enforce his claim to disbursements against the owners, unless it was in respect of disbursements which he, as their captain, had implied authority to make on the owners' behalf. If, therefore, he were the captain of the charterers and not of the owners, I think he could not enter his claim against the owners of the ship in respect of wages or disbursements made by him. But if he was the captain of the owners' it seems to me that he certainly was entitled to sue them for his wages to the Admiralty Court; and if he was their captain, he certainly was entitled by virtue of his position to make disbursements which were necessary for the navigation of the ship. He was at least entitled to make those disbursements against the owners which were not stipulated for in the charter-party, and which it was not known to him were to be paid by the charterers. I doubt very much, however, whether he was entitled to make disbursements on behalf of the owners, which the charterers were bound to make, unless he first went to the charterers or their agents, and found that they absolutely refused to make them. If he had been put in this position, that the charterer's agent at a foreign port had refused to make disbursements which they had undertaken to make, and the ship could not be navigated without those disbursements, I have a strong opinion that in such a case he would be entitled to charge such disbursements against the owners.

Was he, therefore, the captain of the owners? That must depend upon the charter-party. The fact which is against that view is, that he was to be appointed by the charterers. Is this what is called a demise of the ship? To my mind it is certainly not. The command and the possession of the ship were left in the hands of the owners. What the charterers had a right to was a certain space in the ship in which to put their cargo, and they had no control over the crew at all, except that they were to give what are called sailing orders to the captain. Otherwise the vessel was in the possession of the owners, and it must be a strong case indeed where the captain who navigates the ship is not their captain. The captain was to be appointed by the charterers, but the owners were to maintain the crew and the captain, and it follows that they must pay them. There was a stipulation in the charter-party by which, in the event of the charterers being dissatisfied with the conduct of the master, the owners were required to make a full investigation into the matter. Would that stipulation have been necessary if he was the servant of the charterers? It seems to me that this charter-party shows that although the captain was to be nominated by the charterers, he was to be paid by the owners, to be subject to their orders as to navigation, and to be dismissed by them if he was to be dismissed at all. It follows from this that he is the owners' captain. If, then, he is their captain, inasmuch as they were bound to maintain the ship in a manner fitted for service, any necessary disbursements made by him in order to preserve the vessel in that condition—and this, of course, includes the provisions of a proper crew, and the wages of seaman, or repairs to the ship in a foreign port—he, the captain, was bound to pay on behalf of his owners. He is therefore entitled to recover these disbursements from the owners. In my opinion this appeal must be dismissed.

Baggallay, L.J. concurred.

Lindley, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. It seems to me that, though the captain had certain rights as against the charterers, there was no doubt that he was the captain of the owners. It appears to me, therefore, that Butt, J.'s decision was right.

APPEAL FROM THE QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION.

Marine insurance—Concealment—Material fact—Risk in lighters—Agreement as to lighterman's liability.

In marine insurance all facts which a prudent and experienced underwriter would take into consideration in estimating the premium are material, and ought to be disclosed.

The London lightermen have two contracts as to the carriage of goods, the one as common carriers, the other on the terms that they will not be liable for loss unless caused by negligence, and the rate of premiums on goods carried under the latter contract being greater than that under the former.

Held, that the fact of the goods being carried under the latter contract is material, and ought to be disclosed to the underwriters, and its concealment will avoid the policy.

This was an action brought by the plaintiffs, sugar refiners in London, against the defendant, an underwriter at Lloyd's, to recover in respect of the loss of certain sugar which occurred in the Thames while the sugar was being conveyed from the steamer to the plaintiffs' refinery. The sugar was insured in steamer or steamers, "and in boats and lighters while loading and unloading, and until finally delivered at any wharves, docks, landing places, vessels, or refinery at Silvertown, as ordered by the assured." The risks insured included "all risks of transhipment and storage on the route, and of rafts, craft, and lighters in loading and unloading, the transhipment, and particularly of any special lighterage, and while in craft waiting shipment or landing, or delivery to other vessels after arrival, and until delivered at any wharves, docks, landing places, vessels, or elsewhere, as ordered by the assured or their agents, each raft, lighter, or other craft to be considered as separately insured."

The defence, raising the main question upon which the decision of the Court of Appeal turned, was that of concealment of a material fact, namely, the existence of an agreement between the plaintiffs and their lighterman, named Hooper, who did all their lighterage, by which the latter was exempted from liability for any loss in craft except such as might be caused by his own negligence.

At the trial, which took place in London before Manisty, J., it was shown that before April 1882, in cases where underwriters had paid for losses occurring while the goods were in lighters, they had been in the habit of suing the lighterman in the name of the assured, and recovering the amount of the losses so paid. In consequence of this an association of the Thames master lightermen caused a notice to be published in the newspapers stating that they would not take upon themselves the liability of common carriers, but would only be liable for loss of or damage to goods resulting from the negligence or wilful acts of their servants. After this, in policies including risk on lighters, the premium charged was higher where the goods were carried on the terms that the lightermen should only be liable for negligence or misconduct than it was where the lightermen were liable as common carriers.

On the 20th May 1882, shortly before the policies sued on were effected, the plaintiff's brokers had written a letter to the plaintiffs respecting another loss which had taken place shortly before that date. Their letter was as follows:

We have sent the papers relating to craft loss to Messrs. Powell and Jupp, average adjusters, to make up a statement. Of course you have seen the notices in the Times about lightermen's ability, including a letter to-day. Merchants are now insuring the craft risks excluded by lightermen, which seem to comprise all but negligence, at risks varying from 1*s.* to 2*s.* 6*d.* p.c., depending on the distance allowed in the Thames. The rate seems high; but it is not out of proportion to the risks as explained by lightermen. Have you any instructions to give?

The policies now sued on were effected through the brokers who had written the above letter, without any additional premium for craft risk, and without communicating to the underwriters the terms of the arrangement between the plaintiffs and Hooper. The defendant stated at the trial that he had no knowledge of the existence of this arrangement until some time after the policies had been effected; but it was known to his solicitor, who had conducted an action against Hooper in respect of the previous loss referred to in the broker's letter.

The following are the questions which were left to the jury, and their answers:

(1) Was the fact communicated to the underwriters that by the existing arrangement between Hooper and the plaintiffs Hooper was liable only in case of negligence?—Answer: It was not communicated direct to the underwriters, but it was disclosed to the defendant's solicitors on the 5th Aug.

(2) Was the fact of the plaintiffs having that arrangement with Hooper material to the risk; that is to say, was it a fact which a prudent and experienced underwriter would have taken into consideration in estimating the premium?—Answer: Yes.

(3) If it was material, was it concealed?—Answer: No.

(4) When the insurances were effected on the 21st and 25th July, and on the 5th and 23rd Sept., was it the usual usage for merchants to employ lightermen on the terms of the resolution of the Association of Lightermen in April 1882?—Answer: Yes.

(5) Was that usage generally known?—Yes.

(6) Were the underwriters reasonably justified under the circumstances of the case in assuming without inquiry that there would be recourse against lightermen with the liability of a common carrier?—Answer: No, they were not.

On these findings Manisty, J. gave judgment for the plaintiffs.

The Divisional Court (Day and Smith, JJ.) set aside the judgment, and entered judgment for the defendant.

The plaintiffs appealed.

The appeal was argued by Webster, Q.C. and Reid, Q.C. (Hollams with them) for the plaintiffs; and by Russell, Q.C. and Cohen, Q.C. (Barnes with them) for the defendants.

The following decisions were referred to:

BRETT, M.R.—In this case the plaintiffs had effected a policy with the defendant and others upon goods on board ships or in boats, craft, and lighters. The policy was to include all risks incidental to navigation, and all risks of rafts, craft, and lighters in loading, unloading, and transhipping, and in particular of any special lighterage, and while in craft waiting transhipment or landing on delivery to other vessels after arrival, and until delivered at any wharves, docks, landing places or elsewhere as ordered by the assured. The goods arrived in the Thames in a ship, and were put on board a lighter which belonged to a man named Hooper, whose business it was to let lighters. He had a running agreement with the plaintiffs, as to the construction of which there has been some contention, but which was one of two things: either an agreement which, as between the plaintiffs and Hooper, obliged the plaintiffs at the risk of becoming liable for breach of contract to allow him to carry all goods which were carried for them in ships and were to be taken to a wharf; or an agreement whereby, whenever Hooper should lighter goods for the plaintiffs, certain conditions were to be part of the contract. In either case it was part of the contract that Hooper should only be liable to the plaintiffs in the case of negligence; that is, that whatever may be the liability of a lighterman under ordinary circumstances the liability here was so limited that Hooper could only be liable if he were guilty of negligence. The loss is admitted, and the defence is that of concealment of a material fact. Concealments are of two kinds, viz., fraudulent concealment and non-disclosure. Here it is charged against the plaintiffs that from ignorance of what was necessary for them to do under the law, or from carelessness, they did not disclose to the underwriters that which they ought to have disclosed. Manisty, J. left to the jury certain questions which they have answered specifically. It was not a general verdict, and upon their answers he directed verdict and judgment to be entered for the plaintiffs. The Divisional Court entered verdict and judgment for the defendant, and the plaintiffs now appeal. The first finding is of no value. The solicitor is not a standing agent for his client to receive mercantile notices in respect of mercantile business. It may be doubted whether there was a disclosure on Aug. 5th, but whether there was or not is immaterial. The substantial arguments before us were these: first, as to whether the jury were justified in answering the second question in the affirmative; and secondly, if so, whether they were justified in answering the fourth and fifth questions in the affirmative; and, thirdly, if so, whether the answers to those questions materially affect the plaintiffs' case. I have come to the conclusion that the jury were justified in answering the second question as they did, and that the direction on that point was right. It is said that the plaintiffs should have disclosed that they had an arrangement with Hooper which minimised his liability in case of loss. The only effect which it was suggested that could have upon the money position of the underwriters is that, assuming a loss for which they would be liable under the policy to pay the plaintiffs, they would not, by reason of this minimisation of liability have the same valuable recourse over against the lighterman as they otherwise would have in the name of the assured. It is obvious that it could only affect the salvage which the underwriters might have; and if there were nothing else in the case I should have thought that the mere minimisation of the right to salvage would not have been a material fact. But something else has happened, for there is evidence that it had become more or less publicly known that some lightermen, at all events, would not carry goods unless their liability was minimised by arrangement, and therefore it was obvious that two states of things might arise so as to affect the underwriters' right to salvage where there was a loss on board lighters. It is not disputed that upon such a policy as this the underwriters would be liable for loss whether the lighter belonged to the owner of the goods or to another person, or whatever might be the arrangement for lighterage between the lighterman and the person for whom the goods are carried. Therefore it signifies not to whom the lighter belonged, for the underwriters would be equally liable for loss on board the lighters. It was disputed whether, if the lighter belonged to wharfingers, they would have that liability in the absence of a special contract. To my mind they would. If goods are lost in the lighter of a dock company, the company are carriers of goods on the water, and therefore are subject to the full liability unless by arrangement that is restricted. Therefore the underwriters finding that in the one case they would have the advantage of using the name of the assured against the persons who were under full liability, and that in the other case there was that arrangement, came to the conclusion that the two positions were different as to their mercantile interest, and that they ran greater risk of money loss in the one case than in the other. Upon that they came to the conclusion that in the one case they would charge a larger premium, and that where they had full protection they would charge less. Therefore they came to the conclusion that they would have two rates of insurance. They made known that such was their resolution, so as to let people know that if they insured with them they would have to pay different premiums according to the different states of circumstances. There is evidence that this had become known to the plaintiffs, either personally or by their brokers, before they insured. It seems to me that the moment they knew that there were two rates of insurance which would arise in consequence of their taking one position or another with regard to the landing of their goods, it became material to the underwriters to know what was the plaintiffs' intention at the time. Certainly, if the plaintiffs had bound themselves, it became material for the underwriters to know that fact. But if the contract did not bind the plaintiffs to land their goods by Hooper's lighters, yet it seems to me that where there is a difference in the premium known to the plaintiffs, amd where they have the intention at the time when they insure of landing their goods under circumstances which they know would, if disclosed, cause the underwriters to require a larger premium, this is a matter which a prudent and experienced underwriter would take into consideration in estimating the premium, or in considering whether he would take the risk, and is, therefore, a material fact to be made known. Therefore, that question being rightly left to the jury, they were justified in coming to the conclusion to which they came. The authorities show that the materiality is not as to the risk, but whether the fact, if disclosed, would influence the underwriters as to entering upon the insurance or as to the terms upon which they would insure. The case most like this is Harrower v. Hutchinson (22 L. T. Rep. N. S. 684; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 434; L. Rep. 5 Q. B. 584). There the vessel and the goods insured were lost in returning from a port which was not known to the underwriters. An underwriter is bound to know the mercantile geography of the countries to which the voyage is insured; that is, he is bound to have the knowledge which underwriters of ordinary skill have. But if there are any circumstances with regard to a port, which, although it exists, is not so well known that all careful underwriters must be taken to know about it, then the case may be brought under the definition which requires the assured to disclose. As a fundamental rule, an assured has to disclose any circumstance which would affect the determination of a prudent and experienced underwriter, which is known to the assured and is not known, and ought not to be known, to the underwriter. In that case it was proved that the port existed, and that it was a more dangerous port than the other. But by reason of it not having been sufficiently frequented it was not to be assumed against any particular underwriter that he was bound to know, and it was proved that the particular underwriter did not know. Therefore that was a case where the assured knew of a larger danger, and the underwriter did not know, and was not bound to know it, and accordingly the court held that the assured ought to have disclosed the fact that he was sending the ship to that port, and that it was a more dangerous port than the other. The difficulty in that case was whether the underwriter ought not to be taken to know the condition of that port; but it was held that, under the particular circumstances of the case, the port being not so largely frequented as to make it known to the generality of careful underwriters, the particular underwriter was not bound to know. Applying that doctrine here, the assured knew that they had made up their minds at the time of the insurance to land the goods by this particular lighterman. That was not disputed. They knew that they had a particular arrangement with him, and that if he did carry their goods he would be only under a limited liability. To my mind it is clear that the particular underwriter did not know of this arrangement. Therefore there is here a matter which the assured knew and the underwriter did not know. Then comes the question whether the underwriter ought to have known. That question presents greater difficulty. The evidence which justifies the second finding is, that there was a diversity of practice, and that some goods are carried by lightermen with full liability and others with limited liability, caused in some causes by agreement and in others by circumstances. If the fourth finding means that the practice is so general that almost every merchant employs a lighterman with limited liability, it seems to me to destroy and cut away the very ground on which the second finding was based. It leaves only one mode of landing goods. Is it true to say that there is only one mode of landing goods, that is, under limited liability? It seems to me from the evidence on both sides, that it is not true to say that there was a general usage to employ lightermen only under one set of circumstances. The evidence shows nothing which can support and make reasonable the finding of the jury upon the fourth question, and if the fourth falls the fifth also falls. Therefore, so far as my judgment goes, I should say that the case must be decided on the footing that there was no evidence to support the findings on the fourth and fifth questions. Therefore the case rests upon the second finding. But having come to the conclusion that the second finding is right, it seems to me that the facts which support that finding make it impossible that the fourth and fifth can be right. It comes to this, that the fourth and fifth findings are inconsistent with the propriety of the second; so that there is a dilemma that, if findings four and five are right the second is wrong, and if the second is right the others are wrong. I think that the fourth and fifth are wrong, and the second is right. As to the sixth question, it seems to me, first, that it mixes up law and fact; secondly, that it is irrelevant. For these reasons I come to the conclusion that the judgment of the Divisional Court must be affirmed, and that the verdict must be entered for the defendant. I take the third answer to mean "was not disclosed." I do not think the fact was concealed in any other way, for there is no symptom of fraudulent concealment.

Baggallay, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The ground of my conclusion is, that there was evidence to support the second finding, but there was no evidence to support the third and fourth.

Bowen, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The first question is as to what is the legal test to be applied to the evidence. It is established law that a person who deals with underwriters must disclose to them all material facts known to himself and not known to them, or, at all events, which they are not bound to know. In order to make that proposition clear, of course it becomes necessary to understand what one means by a material fact. That definition also has been conclusively established by reason and authority. It is the duty of the assured to communicate to the underwriter all facts in his own knowledge which would affect the mind of the underwriter, either as to taking the contract or as to the premium. The question of materiality depends upon the effect which the communication would have upon the underwriter at the time when the policy is made. Therefore, in answering the question whether a fact is material, one may shortly dispose of it by saying that it depends upon whether or no a prudent underwriter would take that fact into consideration in estimating the premium. The rule has been laid down over and over again, and is stated clearly in the case of Ionides v. Pender (30 L. T. Rep. N. S. 54; 2 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 266; L. Rep. 9 Q. B. 531).

That being the law, what are the facts to which we have to apply it? The importers of this produce, which is to be landed in the Thames, use lighters for the purpose of discharging the cargoes. Down to the year 1882 no importance seems to have been attached by the underwriters to the way in which importers dealt with lightermen. Owing to a previous litigation, in 1882 the lightermen came together and combined for the purpose of insisting upon being discharged from the liability which is known as that of common carriers. Their combination was known to merchants, and was also known to underwriters, who thought the determination of the lightermen to resist the liability of common carriers was of sufficient gravity to affect the underwriting of policies and the premiums to be charged. As long as it remained uncertain down to the time when the ship arrived whether the cargo would be landed by a lighterman who remained subject to common law liability or by one who took the goods upon the terms of being exempted, then, unless the underwriters made it part of the terms of the bargain between them and the assured, and insisted that the goods should be landed one way or the other, there was nothing which the assured in such a case knew and the underwriters did not know, and therefore there could be nothing which the assured was bound to disclose, the non-disclosure of which was material, because the underwriters would be bound to know the ordinary course of trade. But the moment the merchant makes an arrangement which determines the uncertainty in one direction, and either binds himself by agreement (as seems to have been the case here) with a lighterman that the latter shall carry the goods without being liable to the common law liability, or even supposing the merchant does not bind himself by a binding agreement to employ a lighterman, and that the arrangement in this case falls short of that mutual contract which at first sight I was inclined to think it did, it only amounts to this, that a merchant has made an arrangement which for business purposes practically governs the future, and which at the time when he makes the policy he intends to carry out; then a fact exists which is in the knowledge of the assured and not in the knowledge of the underwriters. Is it then material that such a fact should be disclosed? The evidence here was, that from and after May 1882 premiums were affected by the existence or non-existence of such an arrangement, and if one wishes for a conclusive finding upon the question whether this arrangement and intention on the part of the merchant was material, one finds it in the brokers' letter which gave a conclusive indication to their principals that in their minds, as well as in the minds of the underwriters, such an arrangement should be disclosed. It is impossible under such circumstances, having regard to the true definition of materiality, to doubt that the finding of the jury must stand which says that the fact of the arrangement having been made was material to the risk; i.e., was a fact which a prudent underwriter would have taken into consideration in estimating the premium.

With regard to the question whether the mere existence of facts which would lessen the salvage are facts which should be disclosed I offer no opinion. It seems to me that, although an arrangement lessening salvage is not necessarily material, it may be so, and that the real test is whether the underwriter would be affected in estimating premium. The arrangement here between the merchants and the lightermen is not a mere lessening of salvage, for the existence of such an arrangement may affect the danger of the goods being lost. I found my judgment upon this: that at the time when the policy was effected there was an existing arrangement between the assured and the lighterman, which was intended by the assured to be acted upon, and the existence of which would materially affect the underwriters in estimating the premium. If that is a true view of the case, the remaining answers to the questions seem to me to be embarrassing. The fourth may be read in two ways. If it is read in one way it will mean that practically there was only one way of landing goods, and that there was a general usage to employ lightermen upon the terms that they should be discharged from common law liability. It seems to me that this is inconsistent with the answer given to the second question, because, assuming that the prevalent usage is to employ lightermen in only one way, and the underwriters know this, to disclose the arrangement would give them no additional information. If that is the true way in which the fourth finding must be read, it seems to me that there is no evidence to support it. I confess that I am inclined to read the fourth answer as intimating an opinion on the part of the jury that there was a general usage not supplanting other usages, but taking its place amongst them as one quite common, and which should be known to all in business, i.e., that lightermen might be employed upon the terms that their common law liability should remain, but that they might equally probably be employed on the terms that they should not be subject to their common law liability. If that is the true meaning, the answer to the fourth question is irrelevant, because what is material is the existence of the prior agreement, and that is the ground upon which there has been concealment. It is within the rights of the merchant to employ a lighterman upon any terms, provided he has not at the time of the policy elected to take a particular course; but, if there is a fixed agreement at the time of the policy, that should be disclosed. If that should be disclosed, how can it be an answer to say that the underwriters should never assume that there would be recourse against the lighterman, or that there was a general usage when the goods did arrive to deal with them in one way or the other? The complaint is not that that recourse has been taken away in the events which happened, but that the underwriters were not told of the special agreement at the time when the policy was made. Therefore, if read in that way it is not an answer to the second finding of the jury. But if it is to be read as meaning that there was only one prevalent way of landing goods, there is no evidence to support it. The same observations apply to the fifth and sixth findings. For these reasons I am of opinion that the appeal should be dismissed.

The Christiansborg. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM SIR JAMES HANNEN.

Practice—Stay of proceedings—Actions in rem—Bail—Letter of guarantee—Proceedings in Admiralty Division—Lis alibi pendens—Election.

Where a collision action was instituted in Holland in which the defendants' vessel was released upon a letter of guarantee given between the parties, and the plaintiffs subsequently instituted a second action in this country, and re-arrested the vessel, the Court of Admiralty stayed the second action and released the vessel:

The Court of Appeal (Baggallay and Fry, L.JJ., Brett, M.R. dissentiente) affirmed the order, being of opinion that the letter of guarantee being in principle equivalent to bail, the second proceedings in this country were vexatious, and that having the power to stay them they ought, under the circumstances, to exercise that power.

This was an appeal from a decision of Sir James Hannen on a motion by the defendants in a collision action in rem, asking the judge "to direct the steamship Christiansborg and her freight to be immediately released on the ground that bail has been given for the ship in the Royal Court of Holland, at Rotterdam, in a suit instituted there, and to dismiss this action."

The collision occurred in the Baltic, on the 20th May 1885, between the foreign steamships the Christiansborg and the Jessica, the Jessica and her cargo being totally lost.

The owners of the Jessica and her cargo thereupon instituted an action in the Royal Court of Holland at Rotterdam, on the 15th June 1885, against the steamship Christiansborg. She was arrested at Maashuis. Upon the defendants giving a letter of guarantee in the sum of 175,000 gulden, the vessel was released on the 20th June.

On the 9th July an action in rem was instituted in England in the Admiralty Division of the High Court of Justice, by the owners of the cargo laden on board the Jessica, against the Christiansborg, claiming 15,000*l.* damages.

On the 14th July the owners of the Jessica and her freight, and her master and crew (proceeding for their effects) instituted an action in rem in England in the Admiralty Division of the High Court of Justice against the Christiansborg, claiming 15,000*l.* damages. The Christiansborg was arrested in these actions.

The plaintiffs proposed consolidating the actions, and offered to accept bail in the sum of 12,000*l.* The defendants thereupon took out a summons in the cargo action, calling on the plaintiffs to show cause why the Christiansborg should not be released on the ground that bail had been given in the Dutch action, and why the English action should not be dismissed. The summons came on for hearing before Sir James Hannen on the 14th July, when it appearing probable that the Dutch proceedings had been, or would be, discontinued, the summons was adjourned sine die in order to enable the parties to come to terms.

On the 16th July the defendants having reason to believe that the Dutch proceedings were being continued, now (July 17) moved the court as above stated, having, on the 16th July, served a notice of motion to the above effect, in the action brought by the owners, master, and crew of the Jessica.

According to an affidavit sworn by a Mr. Henry Schmidt, of Hamburg, who acted as representative of the Jessica and cargo, it was stated that a Mr. Von Appen, who acted for the same interest to value the Christiansborg, had released the steamer on receipt of a letter of guarantee whereby the private underwriters guaranteed up to the amount of 175,000 gulden for compensation which the Christiansborg might have to pay. Mr. Schmidt stated that he disapproved of this letter, and offered to deliver it up to the underwriters, who, however, held to it.

Paragraphs 5 and 6 of the affidavit were as follows:

5. I say that no bail has been given in Holland. The only security that has been given is the said letter of guarantee, which I am ready to deliver up at once.

7. Since the Christiansborg was released in Holland I have been informed, and believe, that there are great difficulties in the way of prosecuting a suit in Holland on the subject of such a collision as this.

The letter of guarantee was as follows:

The Private Underwriters, Holman's Canal, Copenhagen, June 17, 1885.—We, the undersigned, the private underwriters in Copenhagen, hereby guarantee to the parties interested in the steamer Jessica, of Hamburg, and her cargo, up to the amount of 175,000 gulden, for the compensation which the steamer Christiansborg may eventually have to pay by legal decision in Holland. —(Signed) The Private Underwriters, pp. Ed. Hordt and Son, Carl. Will.

July 17.—The motion came on for hearing before the President, Sir James Hannen.

Myburgh, Q.C. (with him Nelson), for the defendants, in support of the motion.

Sir Walter Phillimore (with him Stubbs), for the plaintiffs, contra.

The plaintiffs offered to abandon the proceedings in Holland, and pay the costs incidental thereto. This offer the defendants refused to accept.

Sir James Hannen.—I am of opinion that this question comes on before me in precisely the same manner as it did on summons in chambers, because the only direction I gave was that it should be adjourned sine die—in the expectation, indeed, that some arrangement had been or would be come to between the parties, which appears not to be the case. I am now called upon to state the principle on which such a question as this should be determined. I am of opinion that where the suit has been brought in one court, as to which it is not shown that it would not do justice, it is primâ facie oppressive to institute another suit in any other court, and the only difference between the case of the one suit being in an English court and the other in a foreign court is, that it is highly probable that the English court will come to the conclusion more easily that full justice would not be done in the other court if the circumstances were brought to its knowledge leading to that conclusion. In this particular case no facts are brought to my knowledge to show that the Dutch court would not do full justice, and as full justice between these two foreigners as the English court. It is simply stated that when the steps which had been taken in Holland came to the knowledge of some one in this country that he objected, although the plaintiffs' agent in Holland was perfectly satisfied. It is true Mr. Schmidt says that there are great difficulties in proceeding with the suit in Holland, but he does not state what they are. That statement is contradicted, and I see no reason to entertain any doubt whatever that the proceedings can be taken with as reasonable certainty of justice being done in Holland as here.

Now let me consider what are the facts, and to what conclusion they should lead me. That there is a lis alibi pendens is perfectly clear. I do not of course think that that in itself precludes the plaintiffs from taking action here, if they show good reason for so doing; but, as I have already intimated, I do not think they have shown any good reason. The Dutch suit is pending. It is true that the plaintiffs have expressed a willingness to abandon that suit, but the Dutch court is seised of this litigation, and without its consent (and I suppose it would be governed by similar considerations to those which I have expressed), and until it has dismissed the suit, and says it cannot entertain it, it is a lis alibi pendens. The plaintiffs in Holland exercised a plain right in holding the vessel to bail there. Security was given which satisfied the agents of the plaintiffs in Holland, and thereupon the vessel was released. Now what is the meaning of that release? It plainly must mean—everybody must understand it to mean—that the vessel was to go on her course and be useful to her owners and earn freight, and not merely that, she was to have liberty to sail about in Dutch waters. But the theory that is set up by the plaintiffs is, that though they have got a security, which I suppose is a security according to Dutch law, and which satisfied their agent there, they are at liberty wherever they find this vessel to arrest her over again, and so defeat the very object of the security which had been obtained in Holland. It appears to me, therefore, that justice requires—and none of the authorities which have been cited prevent me doing what I think justice requires—that the suit which has been instituted here should be stayed, and that the vessel should be released. This order is applicable to both actions.

From this decision the plaintiffs appealed.

July 18.—Sir Walter Phillimore (with him Stubbs), for the plaintiffs, in support of the appeal. —The decision of the learned President is wrong, being in direct opposition to the law as laid down by this court in the cases of

McHenry v. Lewis, 22 Ch. Div. 397; 47 L. T. Rep. N. S. 549;

The Peruvian Guano Company v. Bockwoldt, 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 29; 48 L. T. Rep. N. S. 7; 23 Ch. Div. 225.

According to the law there laid down, where the same plaintiff sues the same defendant in respect of the same cause of action in this country and in a foreign court where the remedy and procedure are different, there is no presumption that the multiplicity of actions is vexatious, and a special case must be made out to induce the court to interfere. The onus therefore is upon the defendants to show that the institution of the action here is vexatious. This they have not done, and the court therefore should not exercise its jurisdiction to restrain the plaintiffs continuing their action in this country. Moreover the court will only interfere where a very strong case is made out, and in The Peruvian Guano Company v. Bockwoldt, where the circumstances were analogous to the present, the court even refused to make the plaintiffs elect. The old practice of the Courts of Chancery was to put the plaintiff to his election, and not to stay the proceedings. The decisions of Sir Robert Phillimore in

The Catterina Chiazzare, 34 L. T. Rep. N. S. 588; 1 P. Div. 368; 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 170;
The Mali Ivo, 20 L. T. Rep. N. S. 681; L. Rep. 2 A. & E. 356; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 241; are conflicting, and if conflicting with the decision of this court in McHenry v. Lewis (ubi sup.) they are of no avail to the defendants. It may be said that in this case, the actions being both in rem, the remedy and procedure are the same in both countries, and therefore, on the authority of McHenry v. Lewis (ubi sup.), the court should interfere. But assuming the procedure to be the same, then no bail bond was given to the Dutch court as our Court of Admiralty requires, and the plaintiffs would have no effective means of enforcing their remedy, assuming the Dutch court to decide the case in their favour. If, therefore, the procedure in the Dutch court is similar to ours, it would be a denial of justice to compel the plaintiffs to proceed in a court where they will have no effective remedy. If, however, the procedure and remedy in Holland are different from ours, then, according to the decision of this court, there is no vexation, and the court should not interfere.
The Peshawur, 48 L.T. Rep. N.S. 795; 8 P. Div. 32; 5 Asp. Mar. Cas. 89.

Myburgh, Q.C. (with him Nelson) for the respondents.—According to the decision of McHenry v. Lewis (ubi sup.), if the court sees that the circumstances of the case are as vexatious as in a case where a plaintiff sues the same defendant in two courts in this country, then it will interfere to prevent the defendant being vexatiously harassed. In such a case it has jurisdiction either to stay the proceedings or to put the plaintiff to his election. It is not shown that the Dutch court would not do full justice between the parties; and, moreover, both actions being Admiralty actions in rem, it is submitted that the remedy and procedure in both courts are substantially the same, and that therefore, on the authority of McHenry v. Lewis, the second action is vexatious and should be stayed. There is no distinction in principle between a letter of guarantee given between the parties and a bail bond given to the court. The giving of bail is the substitution of the bail for the res, and means the release of the ship from all liabilities in respect of the collision. Her subsequent arrest was therefore against good faith, and to meet the ends of justice, which none of the authorities prevent, the second action should be stayed. The decisions of the Admiralty Court on this point are in favour of the defendants' contention, and are capable of being supported consistently with the decision of this court.

Sir Walter Phillimore in reply.

Cur. adv. vult.

July 21.—Brett, M.R.—In this case a suit was instituted in an Admiralty Court in Holland, against a ship in respect of a collision, and in that suit the parties, unless the proceedings in the Admiralty Court in Holland differ from those in the Admiralty Division here, have done that which is absolutely contrary to the practice of the court. Instead of taking a bail bond to the court, they have taken a guarantee as between themselves. The plaintiffs in Holland have now instituted an action in the Admiralty Division here against the same ship for the same collision. A motion was made in the English action to stay the proceedings here upon the ground that there was an action pending in Holland between the same parties for the same cause of action. The plaintiffs in this court offered to elect at once to abandon the proceedings in Holland and to proceed only here. They offered to cancel the bond or guarantee, to give it back, and to pay all the costs of the Dutch proceedings; but Sir James Hannen declined to allow them to elect, and stayed the proceedings here absolutely, so that the plaintiffs could never proceed in this country. The question is, was the learned President right in so doing? Now this was a collision between two foreign ships on the high seas, and the defendants' ship has come into an English port, and has been seized by the Admiralty Division here. There is no doubt, in my mind, that the court here has full jurisdiction to try the case. The question therefore must be, where a plaintiff has brought an action in a court in this country which has jurisdiction, whether the court will prevent him from going on with that suit.

Now what are the rules which have been laid down with regard to this? and laid down, in my opinion, with perfect correctness, and in a manner binding on this court. There is the case of McHenry v. Lewis (22 Ch. Div. 397; 47 L. T. Rep. N. S. 549), decided in 1882. In that case it was argued that the mere fact of proceedings being pending in a foreign court was sufficient of itself to cause a court here, in which an action between the same parties and for the same cause of action was pending, to stay proceedings here. Indeed, it was argued that the court here would not have jurisdiction. The late Master of the Rolls gave a most important judgment, which I should have thought would have settled the law. He said: "That question is, whether or not, when an action is brought by a man in this country against a defendant, and the same plaintiff brings an action in a foreign country against the same defendant for the same cause of action, this court has jurisdiction in a proper case to stay the action in this country on the ground that the defendant is doubly vexed by reason of the action being brought also in the foreign country." Then he deals with the case of Cox v. Mitchell (7 C. B. N. S. 55) in a way which is binding on us, and then he proceeds to say: "If the true view of the judgment is that primâ facie a man is not doubly vexed when the action is brought in the two countries, but that you want a special case to show that he is doubly vexed, then there is no conflict of opinion." That is, in other words, to say that, where the two actions are in two different countries, and that is all which can be alleged, primâ facie there is no vexation at all, and the court ought not to interfere. It ought not even to put a party to his election primâ facie, but leave him to go on and see in which suit he can get execution first. The learned Master of the Rolls then said: "As regards the second point, it appears to me that very different considerations arise where both the actions are brought in this country, and where one of them is brought in a foreign country. In this country, where the two actions are by the same man in courts governed by the same procedure, and where the judgments are followed by the same remedies, it is primâ facie vexatious to bring two actions where one will do." So that even where it is in courts that have precisely the same procedure, precisely the same remedies in the same country, even there it is only primâ facie vexatious; and he adds that "this has been recognised, I believe, for ages by the practice of the old Court of Chancery." Now, what did the old Court of Chancery do, even in the strong case that is there referred to? It put the plaintiff to his election. It did not stay the action without giving him an election, it did not refuse to allow him to elect upon any terms but it put him to his election. That is all the Court of Chancery did. The learned judge says: "But where it is in a foreign country it certainly appears to me that we cannot draw the same inference. Not only is the procedure different, but the remedy is different." I should think the learned judge there meant to say "may be different." Then in another part he shows how it might be different, but it is not worth while to allude to that. We therefore have the late Master of the Rolls drawing a strong distinction between the case of the proceedings being in two countries and in the same country. Where they are in the same country, he only says it is a primâ facie case of vexation; and even where it is a case of vexation, he says the Court of Chancery had never done more than put a man to his election. Then Cotton, L.J. says: "The distinction between proceedings where they are both in the same tribunal and when one is in England and the other is abroad, has already been pointed out by the Master of the Rolls, and that may explain why it is of course when both the actions are in England, and not of course when one is in England and the other abroad." Then he lays down the way in which the jurisdiction is to be exercised: "But here under the circumstances of this case ought we to exercise a jurisdiction, which I assume we have, and to make the order? In the first place, it is a jurisdiction which one ought to exercise with extreme caution. Stopping in the middle of a suit a plaintiff from going on when he has a right of action as against the defendant is a jurisdiction which has to be exercised with very considerable caution." Then he goes on to discuss the particular case: "But I cannot say here that we ought to come to the conclusion, which is the principle on which the jurisdiction is to be exercised, that proceeding with these two suits in the two different tribunals is vexatious. It may be harassing no doubt, because it is very harassing to have an action brought against one in any tribunal at all, but that is not enough. It must be vexatiously harassing the defendant on the part of the plaintiff whose action is sought to be stayed." Then Bowen, L.J. says: "I think that Cox v. Mitchell (ubi sup.) decided nothing more, that it simply lays down the proposition that the mere pendency of an action abroad is not a sufficient reason for staying an action at home, although the causes of action and the parties may be the same." And then further on he says: "The fact that no English action has ever yet been stayed on the ground of concurrent litigation in America is a strong argument to prove that such concurrent American litigation is not of itself a sufficient reason why an English action should be stayed." Now he speaks of America as the strongest case he can find because the laws of America are as nearly as possible the same as the laws of England, and are founded upon the same law. Again he says: "It is clear not merely from reason but from the language of Lord Cottenham and Lord Cranworth referred to by Cotton, L.J., that this court could do it if necessary for the purposes of justice, but some special circumstances ought surely to be brought to the attention of the court beyond the mere fact that an action is pending between the same parties on the same subject-matter in America." That seems to me to lay down the law that there is jurisdiction in the court, but that it ought only to be exercised with the greatest caution. Where both actions are in England in the same tribunal—because in England, if one is in one tribunal and another in another, where the proceedings are not identical, or where the remedies are not equally effective, the law would apply which he has laid down with regard to foreign countries—he says the jurisdiction is to be exercised with extreme caution, and where in England it is in an exactly similar tribunal, primâ facie it is vexatious, and therefore it would lie upon the party bringing the action to show that it was not. But where the cases are in foreign countries, different countries, primâ facie it is not vexatious, and he who says it is is bound to prove clearly to the court that it is, and that the person who is suing here in a court which has ample jurisdiction would have in every respect the same chance in the foreign court which he has here, and that he would have equal facility to enforce his remedy. Then we have the case of The Peruvian Guano Company v. Bockwoldt (23 Ch. Div. 225; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 29; 48 L. T. Rep. N. S. 7), in which the motion was that the plaintiff might be ordered to elect, not that the proceedings should be stayed. Indeed, I can find no case in which the court has stayed the second action without giving the plaintiff the right of election. There again the late Master of the Rolls says: "It is very important in these cases that the court should clearly see that in stopping an action it does not do any injustice." I will not read any more of his remarks, because he has already stated his opinion in the other case. Then Lindley, L.J. says: "As I understand it, it comes to this, that where the plaintiff is suing in this country and also abroad in respect of the same matter, and a motion is made to compel the plaintiff to elect, it is not sufficient for the person so moving to point out that there are two proceedings being taken with reference to the same matter; he must go a step further and show there is vexation in point of fact, that is to say, that there is no necessity for harassing the defendant by double litigation." In other words, he must show that there is no necessity. He proceeds: "If in any case it is established that there is nothing except vexatious litigation, there is ample jurisdiction in this court to make the order asked." Then Bowen, L.J. in stronger language says: "How are we to apply that doctrine to concurrent actions in our own and foreign courts?

It seems to me that we have no right moral or legal to take away from a plaintiff any real chance he may have of an advantage. If there is a fair possibility that he may have an advantage by prosecuting a suit in two countries, why should this court interfere and deprive him of it?"

The cases to which I have referred had dealt with cases in the Admiralty Court, as to which I must say that they are not satisfactory. Take the case of The Peshawur (8 P. Div. 32; 48 L. T. Rep. N. S. 796; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 89), which was an action in personam arising out of a collision in the Indian Ocean. It there appeared that "a cause of damage in rem relating to the same collision had prior to the proceedings in this court been instituted by the owners of the Peshawur against the Glenroy in a Vice-Admiralty court abroad and was there pending." That is all that was shown to the court and Sir Robert Phillimore upon that only says; "There are two questions raised in this case; first, whether I have the power in my discretion to direct a stay of the proceedings in the action brought in this court, by the owners of the Glenroy against the Peninsular and Oriental Steam Navigation Company; and secondly, whether, if I have this power, I ought in the circumstances to exercise it in favour of the defendants in the action here. Now I think I have a discretion as to whether I should stay the proceedings here or allow them to go on, and I shall exercise this discretion in favour of stopping all proceedings in the action in this court until after the suit at Colombo has been heard." He gives no reason. He says: "I shall do it. I have a discretion and I shall do it," and the only facts proved were that there was a suit pending at Colombo. That decision is in the very teeth of the decision in the Court of Appeal. It seems to me, with very great deference to Sir Robert Phillimore, that that case was wrongly decided, and I cannot regard it as an authority. Then there is the case of The Mali Ivo (ubi sup.), in which Sir Robert Phillimore refused to stay the proceedings. In that case the learned judge made statements, which have been relied upon; he says that he has a discretion, which nobody denies. Then he says: "I am aware that it has been decided by the Court of Common Pleas, in the case of a foreigner against whom an action of contract was pending in his own country at the suit of the plaintiff, and who came over to this country and was sued here by the plaintiff for the same demand, that the pendency of the action in the foreign country was not a sufficient ground for staying the proceedings in the action here, and I have considered that part of the case of The Bold Buccleugh (7 Mod. P. C. 223) which refers to this subject:" If we take those words literally, as I am inclined to do, I agree with him. Then he goes on: "I have come to the conclusion that it would be my duty either to suspend proceedings in this court or to put the parties to their election"—If that is to be read together as one thing it gives the parties their election, and if they refuse to exercise it, and to stay proceedings, that, I think, would be right. He continues—"as to which court they would have recourse to, if, indeed, the evidence before me established that there was a lis alibi pendens before a tribunal which could afford the plaintiff a complete remedy, whether the proceedings were technically instituted in rem or in personam." If the meaning of that is to afford as complete a remedy and as easily enforced, as the remedy in this court, and if it means to say that, then it is right, but not otherwise. In The Catterina Chiazzare (ubi sup.) the facts are thus stated by the judge: "A cross action had been entered on the 23rd Dec. in the High Court of Admiralty of Ireland, on behalf of the Catterina Chiazzare, against the Harriet Williams, for the damages occasioned by the collision; and subsequently, some time, I think, in the month of February, the owner of the Harriet Williams, the plaintiff in the principal cause in the High Court of Admiralty of Ireland, gave notice to the owner of the Catterina Chiazzare that no further proceedings would be taken in this suit brought by them against the vessel, and that the plaintiff would be at the costs which at that time had been incurred. Previously to this notice having been given the court in Ireland had already stated that it was not competent to the owner of the Harriet Williams to abandon the action until he had first caused the Catterina Chiazzare to be released in an action he had commenced against her in this court. Now the objection on protest is to the effect that there is a lis alibi pendens between those two vessels in the High Court of Admiralty of Ireland, that an application having been made to the judge in the High Court of Ireland to dismiss the suit on behalf of the original suitor, the owner of the Harriet Williams, the court refused to do so. Therefore the state of things is this, that there was a suit instituted in the High Court of Admiralty of Ireland by the same plaintiff who now institutes a suit in this court, there being also a cross suit in Ireland, and the judge having refused to dismiss the plaintiff on his application from the suit, it is contended that it is competent to me to meet the matter by dismissing the proceedings instituted in this court. I am of opinion that I ought not to allow this suit to be proceeded with at present. I think that it has been clearly made out that there is a cause before the High Court of Admiralty of Ireland between the same parties for the same object, and arising out of the same cause of action as the action before me, and that no doubt, apart from technical considerations, it would be a most inconvenient course of proceeding to allow the same case to be heard at the same time in two different courts. What I have to consider is what other courts have decided as to what constitutes a lis alibi pendens. On this point I may refer to my decision in another court in Walsh v. Bishop of Lincoln (L. Rep. 4 A. & E. 242). I think that the plaintiff here has lost his way. I think that he should have applied to the High Court of Admiralty of Ireland to dismiss the suit as he did, and if that was refused, I think he ought to have appealed from that refusal. At all events, in the present state of things, I shall order the Catterina Chiazzare to be released, and the proceedings in this court to be stayed." Here again the learned judge seems to have exercised his jurisdiction upon the mere ground that there was a case pending in Ireland. If we take Ireland not to be, for the purpose in question, a foreign country, but assume that the court in Ireland will give the same remedy as the court here, that case is to be supported on the ground that primâ facie there was vexation, and that primâ facie case was not met by any offer of the person suing in the second court. That is the way to uphold that case consistently with the other decisions.

Now, when we come to apply this doctrine to the present case, what have we got? The court is asked to stay the proceedings upon the ground that there are proceedings pending in Holland. Admiralty Courts are, to my mind, municipal courts of the country in which they exist, exercising by consent of all nations the maritime law which is the common law of all nations upon the high seas; but the courts are municipal courts, and the Admiralty Court in Holland is therefore a municipal court of a foreign country. That being so, the case is within the authorities, according to which it is not vexatious to have instituted the suits in both courts, one being a foreign court. But, I think that Admiralty Courts are not within the full authority of that proposition, because the way in which they exercise their jurisdiction in all countries, so far as I know, is by seizing the ship and releasing her on bail being given according to the practice of the court. If, therefore, bail be given in one court, and when another suit is instituted in a second court bail is to be given again, I think that that could not be allowed if the party suing in the second court insisted on preserving the bail in both courts. I think it would be vexatious to call upon the owner of a ship in respect of the same cause of action to give bail in the two courts at the same time. Therefore, where the case is an Admiralty action, and bail has been given in the foreign court, the party who objects to the action proceeding in the second court has satisfied to a certain extent the burden of proof which lies upon him, and has shown that it would be vexatious to allow without terms the matter to go on in the second court. But the English court cannot be satisfied without ample and satisfactory evidence that the course of procedure in the foreign Admiralty Court is in all respects the same as in the English court, and it cannot without ample evidence be satisfied that a person suing in the court abroad will have all the same chances of effective success and all the same facilities as he has in the English court. Therefore, it is only in the case of bail being given that it is oppressive to proceed in the English court at the same time that you are proceeding in a foreign court. Were it not for this question of bail, it seems to me that an English court exercising its jurisdiction, according to the rules laid down, would not interfere at all, and would allow both cases to go on in both courts at the same time, but the fact that bail has been given in both cases would prevent it. It seems to me that the court would not be exercising its jurisdiction with caution, but it would be exercising it with extreme rashness, and great injustice might follow, if upon the mere fact of bail having been given in a foreign court it was to prevent a plaintiff saying he would give up the bail and pay the expenses incurred in the other court, and although he so offers, yet to refuse to allow him to go on in the English court which has jurisdiction to try the case. But the present case is stronger, for either the proceedings in Holland are shown to be different from those in the English Admiralty Court, and the plaintiffs will have no possibility of there obtaining judgment with effect; or, on the other hand, the proceedings in Holland are the same as here. Then it is clear that after the release of the ship upon the guarantee between the parties an English Court of Admiralty would not try the case. A court will not proceed to try a case so as to make itself ridiculous; and inasmuch as in an action in rem the mode of enforcing the judgment is by enforcing a bail bond entered into with the court, the court would not proceed to try the case where the ship has gone, where no bail bond has been given to the court, and where there is nothing but a mere guarantee between the parties which is a mere personal contract. The Court of Admiralty could not enforce a guarantee. Supposing the Admiralty Court gave judgment for the plaintiffs, it would be helpless to enforce its judgment, and would be obliged to leave the parties to bring an action in another court. Hence, if the court stops the plaintiff from proceeding here, it deprives him of the right of effective judgment and leaves him to go on in Holland, where the court, if the procedure is the same as here, will not further entertain the litigation, and then the plaintiffs are helpless because they have only obtained a guarantee from the defendants to pay if the Court of Admiralty decides that the defendants' ship was in the wrong. Therefore, if we stop the action here, and the Court of Holland, assuming it to have the same procedure as ours, refuses to try, the guarantee becomes worthless, and the plaintiff will have no remedy in any court. It seems to me to be asking this court to perform an act of absolute injustice. But if the procedure in Holland is different from ours, is it the same thing to have a judgment in Holland which can only be enforced by the guarantee of a third party, which is a matter of contract only? Is that as effective a remedy as a judgment here after bail has been given to the satisfaction of the court. I confess, to my mind, that to refuse to allow the plaintiff to elect and to stay the action, notwithstanding the plaintiffs' offer, is breaking away from the decisions of this court which have laid down a distinct and workable rule, and I fear that this court in so acting would be doing that which may lead to hopeless injustice to the plaintiffs. I there think that this judgment ought to be overruled.

Baggallay, L.J.—I have the misfortune in this case to differ from the Master of the Rolls. I need hardly say I am very reluctant to differ from a judge who has had so great an experience of cases of this kind. I feel the greater anxiety on account of the serious consequences which will result to one side or the other according as this case is decided. With regard to the law, I take it to be established by a series of authorities that where a plaintiff sues the same defendant in respect of the same cause of action in two courts, one in this country and another abroad, that there is a jurisdiction in the court of this country to act in one of three ways: To put the party so suing to his election: or, without allowing him to elect, to stay all proceeding in this country; or to stay all proceedings in the foreign country. As I had occasion to observe in the course of the argument, it is not in fact a stay of proceedings in the foreign court, but it is an injunction upon plaintiff restraining him from prosecuting the proceedings in the foreign country, which, of course cannot be enforced against him if he is a foreigner, and is neither present in this country, nor has any property here. It is an injunction which may become inoperative, but that is how it may be done.

Now I think the principle of election is very clearly expressed in the case of McHenry v. Lewis (ubi sup.). The marginal note I think correctly represents the effect of the decision. It is this: "Where a plaintiff sues a defendant for the same matter in two courts in this country, such a proceeding is prima facie vexatious, and the court will generally, as of course, put the plaintiff to his election and stay one of the suits. And the same principle applies where one of the actions is in the Queen's Court in Scotland or Ireland or any other part of the Queen's dominions." The judgment in that case drew a distinction between two actions being brought in English courts, and the case where one action is brought in a British court, the other in a foreign court. It draws the distinction which I also draw that primâ facie, if the actions are in two courts in the British dominions, it is vexatious to sue the same party in two different actions, but not necessarily so where one of the two actions is in a foreign court; we must examine into the circumstances of the case, and see whether, under the circumstances, it is as vexatious as it would be if the same actions had been commenced in two British courts. That I take to be the effect of the decision in McHenry v. Lewis (ubi sup.), and no doubt it should be seen whether the party should be put to his election; but the circumstances of the case must be such that, instead of putting the plaintiff to his election, the court will stay one or other of the two proceedings. Whether you adopt the principle of putting the party to his election, or of staying the proceedings in one or other of the courts, must depend upon the circumstances of the case. Some suggestions were made in the earlier part of the argument here to the effect that no decision had gone so far as to stay proceedings in a foreign court, or until after the party had been put to his election. I ventured to suggest that there were several cases in which that course had not been followed, thus showing an authority for that which was supposed to have no authority for it. It has been decided that before decree you may stay the proceedings of a foreign court, if the foreign court were Scotch, or Irish, or colonial. I think there is a case where the foreign court did stay proceedings without putting the party to his election. Therefore I take it that there is no question that the court can stay the action in the foreign court if the circumstances warrant it. But there is no doubt that, where the court has been in the habit of staying one or other of the proceedings, it has preferred to stay the proceedings in the English court. The principles to which I have just now referred were well recognised principles in the Chancery Courts prior to the Judicature Act, as it appears from one of the cases referred to by the Master of the Rolls. Since the passing of the Judicature Act those general powers are exercised by any branch of the High Court. The principles enunciated in that case are referred to by Jessel, M.R. in these terms: "When an action is brought by a man in this country against a defendant, and the same plaintiff brings an action in a foreign country against the same defendant for the same cause of action, this court has jurisdiction in a proper case to stay the action in this country on the ground that the defendant is doubly vexed by reason of the action being brought also in the foreign country." In the case of The Mali Ivo (ubi sup.) there had been a collision in foreign waters, and proceedings had been commenced in the Austrian Consular Court of Constantinople, and other proceedings were commenced in the English court. Application was thereupon made to stay the proceedings in the foreign court. After referring to the various authorities which had been quoted in the course of the argument, Sir Robert Phillimore expressed his opinion in these terms: "I have come to the conclusion that it would be my duty either to suspend proceedings in this court, or to put the parties to their election as to which court they would have recourse to, if, indeed, the evidence before me established that there was a lis alibi pendens before a tribunal which could afford the plaintiff a complete remedy, whether the proceedings were technically instituted in rem or in personam. I am also of opinion that the Austrian Consular Court of Constantinople would come within the category of a competent tribunal, inasmuch as by the well-known capitulations, by treaty, sufferance, and usage, the Austrian empire, like other Christian States, has acquired from the Ottoman Porte an exclusive right of jurisdiction to be exercised over its own subjects in suits of this kind within the limits of the Ottoman territory." And having come to the conclusion that the Austrian court was a competent tribunal, he refused the application on the merits of the case, saying, "As a matter of fact I am satisfied that there is no suit pending between the litigants, now before me, on the same subject." And upon that ground he refused the application, but recognised the jurisdiction in holding that it would be his duty either to suspend the proceedings in one court or to put the parties to election. That was an application to suspend the proceedings in the English court. In the case of The Peruvian Guano Company v. Bockwoldt (ubi sup.), in which Jessel, M.R. made a remark to which I have already referred, I have no doubt the Court of Appeal were of opinion that no sufficient case was made out to cause them to make such an order as was prayed. There the application was that the parties might be ordered to elect whether they would proceed with the English or with the French proceedings. That was refused, and I think the grounds of the refusal appear very distinct indeed from the judgment of Lindley, L.J., where he says: "Apart from the fact that the action in France is for six cargoes and the action here is for seven, there are certainly reasons, not frivolous reasons, not harassing reasons, for bringing the action in France. We cannot compel the plaintiff to abandon that action. The fact that the action in France is for six cargoes, and the action here is for seven, prevents us from making the common order to elect between the two actions. If we were to compel the plaintiffs to elect so far as the six cargoes are concerned, we should not attain the result desired; we should not wholly stop one action out of two; both would be going on, namely, one in France for six cargoes and one in England for the seventh." And for that reason the application was refused. But I think that we have got some other cases which may be a guide, and particularly one referred to by Brett, M.R. I mean The Catterina Chiazzare (ubi sup.) That case appears to me, if it was rightly decided, to be upon all-fours with the one which we are now called upon to decide. According to the report, the facts are these: [The learned Lord Justice then read the facts of the case and the judgment.] If that was rightly decided, I really am unable to distinguish between the circumstances of that case and the circumstances now under consideration.

In the present case the vessels which came into collision were foreign vessels, owned by foreign owners, and the collision took place in foreign waters. The vessel which did not go to the bottom went afterwards to a port in Holland, where she was arrested by proceedings in an Admiralty Court of competent jurisdiction. Having been so arrested an agreement was come to between the owners or the representatives of the owners of the two vessels for the release of the defendants' vessel upon a guarantee being given, and the vessel was thereupon released. At present I am unable to see the distinction in principle between being held upon bail in the ordinary form, and being released by virtue of an agreement come to between the two owners or their representatives. The vessel then went to sea a free ship, and she might have entered into a charter-party for another voyage. I am not certain whether she did not do so in the present case. Being a free ship she came into an English port, and she may have done that for the very purpose of carrying out the charter-party into which she had entered. If this were merely a case of double proceedings, it might be quite right to put the parties to an election; but what led to this vessel coming to and being arrested in an English port, but the agreement entered into between the representatives of the owners, and in consideration of which she had originally been released? and she might have entered into a contract for the performance of which she was responsible. If this vessel is detained and not allowed to go to sea she would be unable to carry out her contract, and she would be responsible for all that was done by the action of the parties, who could have kept her in the Dutch port, but who allowed her to go to sea upon a guarantee which must be taken to be sufficient. These are the circumstances of the case to which we have to apply the generally recognised rules. There will be vast inconvenience to either party whichever course is adopted. If she is allowed to go to sea it may be that the plaintiffs, owing to the guarantee not covering all the damage sustained, may suffer. On the other hand, the value of the cargo in respect of which she has been arrested is so very large that if she is kept in an English port and not allowed to go to sea the consequences may be, and probably will be, disastrous for her. The difficulties seem to me to be great on both sides, and where the difficulties are so great, I think the parties who have brought the difficulties about by not allowing the case to proceed in the Dutch court are the parties who ought to suffer and not the others. I am sorry, therefore, to dissent from the view of the Master of the Rolls, but it appears to me, forming the best judgment I can upon the circumstances of the case, that the view of Sir James Hannen was right, and that the vessel should be allowed to go to sea at once.

Fry, L J.—I have also arrived at the conclusion that the judgment of the learned President is right. I come to that opinion, as it seems to me, without in any way impugning the principles laid down by this court in either the cases of McHenry v. Lewis (ubi sup.), or The Peruvian Guano Company v. Bockwoldt (ubi sup.). The ground upon which I conclude the learned President is right is this: that in my judgment the institution of the action in the Admiralty Court in this country was against good faith. I come to that conclusion from the evidence of Mr. Schmidt himself, who is prosecuting the present action on behalf of the plaintiffs. He tells us in effect that the ship was arrested in Holland, that a letter of guarantee was given to Mr. Von Appen, whom he describes as acting on behalf of the owners of the Jessica and which Mr. Von Appen considered satisfactory, and that he (Mr. Von Appen) released the ship. Now, there are two ways in which that transaction may be viewed. It may be viewed as equivalent to the giving of bail, and I rather understood Sir Walter Phillimore in the first instance to present it to us in that aspect. Let us consider it for one moment as if it were a case in which bail had been given to the Dutch Admiralty Court. What is the effect of giving bail? It appears to me that the bail is the equivalent of the res, and that when the bail has been given for the thing it is, if not impossible, highly improbable that another action should be allowed to go on against the res in any other place. I cannot help observing that it appears to me, where the matter in controversy is a ship the business of which carries it from jurisdiction to jurisdiction, very different considerations may apply to the existence of a suit in some other jurisdiction to those which apply to an ordinary action in personam. I think, therefore, that in the case of bail given, the plaintiff in the foreign action, the first action, has obtained that which is equivalent to the arrest of the res.

The same conclusion it appears to me may be arrived at in another way. The result of the giving of the bail is the release of the ship. Now, what is the meaning of releasing a ship under these circumstances? It appears to me that the meaning of it is, that she is released from all rights and claims against her in respect of the collision, which is the cause for which she has been compelled to give the bail. Therefore, without saying it is impossible that a second action should be allowed where such a release has been obtained, I think the existence of such a release is the most cogent circumstance against allowing the prosecution of a second action. That is the view which Sir James Hannen entertains, because he says: "Now what is the meaning of the release? It plainly must mean, everybody would understand it to mean, that the vessel was to go on her course, and be useful to her owners, and earn freight, and not merely that she was to have liberty to sail about in the Dutch waters." If that be, as I think it is, the true meaning of a release obtained by the giving of bail, it seems to me that the subsequent institution of this suit is against good faith. And I cannot help observing the extreme inconveniences which would, in my judgment, follow if the practice were allowed of instituting proceedings in rem in whatever port the ship might happen to arrive. The result would be, or might be, that in the case of a collision a vessel might be arrested afresh in every jurisdiction in which she might appear, and that although bail may have been given in the courts of foreign jurisdiction, so that she would be harrassed from port to port by successive actions of the kind which we have now before us, and the plaintiff might be called upon to elect in all the antecedent litigations. It appears to me that that would result in extreme inconvenience. But it may be contended that the proceeding in the present case is not the giving of bail, but instead of it it is the acceptance of a guarantee given by certain persons and accepted by Mr. Von Appen, who, in consideration of the guarantee so given, released the ship. In that point of view we have before us a private convention, an agreement between the litigant parties, and in consideration of the agreement obtained by the defendants in that litigation the plaintiffs have given a release to the ship as the result of that convention. Now, no doubt one may imagine circumstances of mistake, miscarriage, and many other circumstances which might render such an arrangement inoperative, and it might, under those circumstances, constitute no bar to a future action; but, in the present case, we have no such circumstances. The release, as I say, had been purchased by the giving of that guarantee. It is suggested that that guarantee may be inoperative, but the remarkable circumstance is, that Mr. Schmidt, who is acting on behalf of the owners of the Jessica in this country, and was advised no doubt by his solicitor what case he must make out, does not venture to suggest that the guarantee is inoperative or give any reason why he desires to be free from it or repudiate it. Again, it has been suggested that Mr. Von Appen may not have had the authority which justified him in accepting that guarantee and giving the release. The remarkable circumstance again is, that Mr. Schmidt states that Mr. Von Appen acted for the owners of the Jessica, and he does not venture to suggest that there was any defect in the authority for him either to accept the guarantee or to give the release. I think therefore that we are bound to consider that there was a transaction, an arrangement, an agreement between the litigant parties by which for valuable consideration the owners of the Christiansborg purchased the release of their vessel from the claims of the owners of the Jessica. Consequently they having so obtained a release which was intended to be operative, the institution of this action in an English Admiralty Court is against good faith. For these reasons I agree with my brother Baggallay, L.J., and I think this appeal must be dismissed. (a)

Sir Walter Phillimore.—Would your Lordships, applying the principles acted upon in Wilson v. Church (12 Ch. Div. 454; 41 L. T. Rep. N. S. 296), order the defendants to give bail under protest, in order that this point may be taken to the House of Lords? The plaintiffs are willing to pay the expenses of the defendants giving bail.

(a) Subsequently to this decision the plaintiffs entirely abandoned proceedings in Holland, and instituted fresh actions in this country, which were ultimately settled by the defendant paying the plaintiffs' claims.—Ed.

Brett, M.R.—How can we order that when the court has just decided that the defendants are not called upon to do so?

Sailing Ship "Garston" Company v. Hickie and Co. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION.

Charter-party—Final sailing from last port—Meaning of "port."

The word "port" in a charter-party means the port as commonly understood by shipowners and merchants, not the port as defined by Acts of Parliament or bye-laws for the purposes of revenue or pilotage.

By a charter-party two-thirds of the freight was payable "ten days after the final sailing of the vessel from her last port."

The ship started on her voyage from Cardiff Docks, and proceeded as far as a spot 300 yards beyond the junction of the artificial channel leading from the docks with the river Taff, where she was damaged by a collision which obliged her to put back for repairs.

After ten days the shipowners sued the charterers for the two-thirds freight.

Held (affirming the judgment of Wills, J.), that the spot where the collision occurred was within the port of Cardiff and therefore the ship had not sailed from the port within the meaning of the charter-party.

This was an appeal by the plaintiffs from the judgment of Wills, J., before whom the case was tried without a jury at Liverpool.

The plaintiffs sought to recover the sum of 1687*l.* 6*s.* 5*d.*, for freight alleged to be payable under a charter-party dated the 27th Oct. 1884, by which the plaintiffs' ship Garston was to proceed from Hamburg to Cardiff or Newport, as ordered, and load a cargo of coal, and proceed to Bombay. The freight was to be 18*s.* 6*d.* a ton. The clause in the charter-party relating to payment of freight was as follows:

> The freight to be paid, say two-thirds in cash less 5½ per cent. for interest and insurance, ten days after the final sailing of the vessel from her last port in Great Britain, the charterers holding the policy as collateral security, and the remainder in cash . . . . on the right and true delivery of the cargo.

The ship was ordered to Cardiff and loaded a cargo of 2895 tons of coal in the Bute Docks.

On the 22nd Dec. 1884 she started from the docks for Bombay, and was towed by a steam-tug down the artificial channel leading from the docks, past the pier-head to about 300 yards beyond the junction of the artificial channel with the river Taff. Having proceeded so far, the ship came into collision with a steamer, and was so seriously damaged that she was obliged to put back to Cardiff for repairs.

The writ was issued on the 2nd Jan. 1885, at which date the freight claimed, which was two-thirds of the whole amount, less 5½ per cent. would be payable if, when the collision occurred on the 22nd Dec. 1884, the ship had finally sailed from her last port in Great Britain within the meaning of the charter-party. This depended on whether the place where the collision occurred was within or without the port. The facts relating to what constitutes the port are sufficiently set out in the judgment.

Wills, J. gave judgment for the defendants, and the plaintiffs appealed,

French, Q.C. and Synott, for the plaintiffs in support of the appeal, referred to

Roelandts v. Harrison, 9 Ex. 444;
Price v. Livingstone, 47 L. T. Rep. N. S. 629; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 13; 9 Q. B. Div. 679;
Hudson v. Bilton 6 E. & B. 565.

Moulton, Q.C. and Carver, for the defendants, were not called upon to argue.

Brett, M.R.—I am of opinion that this appeal ought to be dismissed. The question is, whether any freight has become payable to the plaintiffs under this charter-party in the events which have happened. In the first place, it is contended that, because the ship was to sail from Cardiff, therefore, in the clause relating to the payment of freight, the expression "the port" must be construed to mean the town of Cardiff. The words are, "The freight to be paid two-thirds in cash, ten days after the final sailing of the vessel from her last port in Great Britain." It seems to me that we must read the words in their ordinary sense. Now the last port in Great Britain, which the ship was to sail from, was Cardiff. Therefore it must be read thus: "Ten days after the final sailing of the vessel from the port of Cardiff in Great Britain." That is the true meaning of the words. In the case of Roelandts v. Harrison (9 Ex. 444) it was argued that if the vessel had started from the innermost end of the port, with everything ready for her sailing to sea, and with the intention when she started of not stopping again till she reached her final destination abroad, that was a final sailing from the port within the meaning of similar words in a charter-party. But the court there held that the words, "final sailing from the port of loading," could not mean what it was contended they meant, because the final sailing from the port does not take place at the time when the vessel starts from the innermost end of the port, but when she gets to the outer end of the port. Till then she has not sailed from the port, she is sailing in the port. Then in Price v. Livingstone (47 L. T. Rep. N. S. 629; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 13; 3 Q. B. Div. 679) this question arose: Supposing the vessel to have got outside the port, what is the meaning of the word "finally?" If she is going just outside the port only to drop anchor there, and is not starting on her voyage, or if she is going outside the port with the intention of coming into it again, then she has not "finally" sailed from the port, although she has sailed from it. The vessel must be outside the port, and she must also have "finally" sailed from it. In the present case the question does not depend on the word "finally," but the whole question is, whether the vessel had sailed from the port, that is to say, whether she was outside the port within the meaning of the charter-party. Wills, J. has taken exception to the use of the words "popular" and "commercial," where it has been said that the word "port" is to be understood in its "popular" sense or its "commercial" sense. Possibly those are not the best possible words that could be used; but the question is, whether they are not good working definitions in the sense in which they have been used. But they are not the only words which have been used for the purpose. Some judges have said, "In the business sense of the word," or "in the ordinary sense," or "in the common and ordinary sense." All these phrases mean very much the same thing—namely, that it is not to be the fiscal port. The parties are not contracting with regard to that. The fiscal port, the limits of which are fixed by Act of Parliament, is never, in fact, taken into consideration by shipowners or merchants employing ships. We know also as a fact that the limits of many pilotage authorities extend far beyond anything which would be called in the ordinary sense "the port" of a particular place. For instance, a ship coming into the port of Liverpool is bound to take a Liverpool pilot at Port Lynas, which is not, in any ordinary sense, within the port of Liverpool. Therefore the word "port" in a charter-party does not necessarily mean a pilotage port as defined by statute, or, which is the better word, a pilotage district. Therefore, in trying to define the port with regard to which persons who enter into a charter-party are contracting, one should endeavour to find words which will exclude that which one knows the parties did not intend. They intend the port as commonly understood by all persons who are using it as a port, i.e., for sailing to or from it with cargoes. What shippers of goods, charterers of vessels, and shipowners in their ordinary language mean by a "port" is the port in its ordinary business sense, in its popular sense—i.e., the popular sense of such persons. It is also the port in its commercial sense; for with them business means commercial business.

Therefore, with the greatest deference to Wills, J., it seems to me that all these phrases are equally good, and that they all in substance mean the same thing. He seems to have been inclined to substitute the words "the legal port;" but, with deference to him, in my opinion that would not be correct. The legal port may be fixed by a local Act of Parliament, which is not generally well known. It must mean the port which such persons as I have mentioned would be dealing with, for the purpose of ships going to or from it carrying cargoes. Now, such people go to a port because they want either to load or to unload goods, and everyone who understands ships knows that goods cannot conveniently be loaded or unloaded in a place where the ship herself would be in danger. Therefore all people possessed with common sense, instead of taking their boats on to an open beach where they might be knocked to pieces in a storm, go to what they call a port, which is always a sheltered place. It is a place of safety for the ship and cargo whilst the loading or unloading is taking place. There can never be a port, in the ordinary business sense of the word, unless there is some element of safety in it for the ship and cargo. Now what will constitute a port as regards the loading and unloading of goods, and the safety of the ship during the process? What will be more certain to be a port, in the sense of all persons concerned in the use of it, than a natural port—that is, a place in which the conformation of the land with regard to the sea is such that, if a ship comes within certain limits, she is in a place of safety for loading and unloading? Such a place is almost certain to be a port in a business sense. It is not quite accurate to say in a natural sense, as independent from the business sense, though the one is almost certain to measure the other. But, if it is apparent that the land is so shaped that there is protected water within a certain space, it is almost certain that there will be the port which is spoken of by business men under a certain name—a place where there is protected water by reason of the natural lie of the land and water. Of course there may be an artificial port, which has the same effect as a natural port, as for instance, at Plymouth, where breakwaters and walls have been built inclosing a part of the sea, which, if those breakwaters and walls had not been built, would be a dangerous and unprotected part of the sea. This makes that inclosed part of the sea protected water; and it is certain that, if the water within the walls was before they were built not within the port, commercial men will very soon afterwards call that water within those walls the port, and deal with it upon the faith that, when a ship is within the walls, she is within the port, and when she is outside the walls she is at sea.

There are also places of comparative safety, where neither the natural configuration of the land with regard to the sea nor the artificial walls make a perfectly safe port, but only a place of comparative safety. In such cases it is not so easy to ascertain what the parties to a charter-party must have meant by "the port," for it is necessary to find out where, in fact, ships are usually loaded and unloaded. The moment it is ascertained that the loading and unloading of ships takes place at a particular spot, it is safe to infer that the parties understood that spot to be within "the port," because, as a general rule, people do not load or unload goods outside a port. They do so sometimes, but very seldom, and only under exceptional circumstances. If, therefore, the place of loading and unloading is ascertained, it may safely be treated as being within the port. It is clear, however, that the port may extend beyond the place of loading and unloading, just as a dock may. The space in the centre of a large dock is seldom used for loading and unloading. Vessels may, but seldom do, load or unload in the middle of the dock. They generally load and unload at the quay, which is at the edge of the dock. Therefore, although the loading and unloading of goods is not always the exact measure of a port, it is a safe rule to say that the loading and unloading takes place within the port. But it may be necessary to ascertain how far the port extends beyond the place of loading and unloading. If the authorities, known in commercial business language as "the port authorities," exercise authority over ships within a certain space of water, and shipowners and shippers who have ships within that space of water submit to the jurisdiction claimed by these authorities, whether according to Act of Parliament or not, that seems to me the strongest possible evidence that the shipowners, the shippers, and the port authorities have all come to the conclusion that they will accept that space of water in which the authority is so exercised and submitted to as "the port" of the place. All these seem to me to be proper tests as to whether a certain space of water is a port within the popular sense, the business sense, the commercial sense, or the ordinary sense—any but a statutory or fiscal sense.

Applying these rules in the ordinary business sense to the present case, we find that the chart shows the conformation of the land with regard to the sea. Whether Penarth Roads are within the port of Cardiff I decline to decide on this occasion, for it is unnecessary; when the question arises it will have to be decided. The present question is, whether the place where this ship was when she ceased to move is within the port or not. Now, that place is to the northward of the headland of the Penarth Docks, and therefore we have only to consider whether the water inside the headland of the Penarth Docks is within the port of Cardiff. To my mind the chart settles that question. Any evidence of individual shipmasters as to what they might consider to be the port would have very little effect on my mind after I had looked at the chart, and I am sure it would not have any effect on the mind of any ordinary man of business. The chart seems to me to be almost conclusive that the water inside the headland of the Penarth Docks is within the port of Cardiff. But, in addition to this, there is the evidence of the plaintiffs' own witnesses, and, to my mind, the bulk of the plaintiffs' evidence has made out the defendants' case. The evidence of the harbour-master seems to me conclusive. He says the Penarth Docks are within the port. Probably he did not mean that the water within the dock gates is within the port, but meant that the entrance to the docks is within the port—that is, that the port extends at least as far as the headland of the Penarth Docks. Also, as I understand his evidence, and it seems to me to be clear, he puts the north limit of the port at the artificial works of the Bute Docks. His intention appears to be to include the Bute Docks and to exclude the Penarth Docks, but he says that the port is the water between the two. That would give the north and south limits of the port; but the water between those north and south limits includes what are called Penarth Flats and Cardiff Flats, and therefore to say that those places, which are left nearly or quite dry at low water, are not within the port would be, to my mind, an outrage on the common sense of anybody who understands what would be the conclusion of those persons who have to do with such a thing as a port. Moreover, the bye-laws, made by persons who were assumed to have the right to deal with the port, provide that certain pilots shall be dealt with as sea pilots, and certain other pilots shall be dealt with as port pilots, and those port pilots are to be the pilots who may act within the port. Then, in order to determine what is the port, the bye-laws define it as all the water from the shore at the north-east side of the new docks away to the eastward towards the East Cardiff buoy, then turning south down to the Monkstone, then turning to the westward and south-west to the Wolves, then turning south to Lavernock point, which was very far below the Penarth Docks headland. All that is treated as within the port. If it were necessary now to decide what are the exact limits of the port, I should certainly say that this was the strongest evidence that the boundary of the port extends at least as far as that. I observe that, having so defined the port, the bye-laws provide that port pilots may lie for protection under the Sully Island, which is to the westward of Lavernock point, and it may be that that island is also within the port. I will not say at present whether Penarth Docks are within the port; but it seems to me clear (and that is all we have to decide to-day) that the evidence justified Wills, J., who was acting as a judge of fact, in finding as a fact that, within the meaning of all persons who deal with Cardiff as a port, the port of Cardiff covers at least the water to the north of the Penarth headland up to the Bute Docks, and, east and west, the Cardiff Flats and the Penarth Flats. I believe myself (but I do not wish this to be taken as my decision) that the port is much larger. I believe it is at least as large as it is stated to be in the bye-laws to which I have referred. I come, therefore, to the clear conclusion, as the learned judge said he did upon the evidence before him, including the chart, that this vessel was at the time of the collision inside the port of Cardiff in the sense which I have explained; and, if she had not left the port of Cardiff, she had not finally sailed from her last port in Great Britain. For these reasons I am of opinion that the judgment for the defendants is right, and that this appeal ought to be dismissed.

Baggallay, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The question we have to decide is, whether the ship Garston had finally sailed from the port of Cardiff when she reached the spot where the collision took place. Now, as to the meaning of the words "finally sailed" there is very little difference of opinion. The old cases were considered in Price v. Livingstone (47 L. T. Rep. N. S. 629; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 13; 9 Q. B. Div. 679), and the judges who decided that case expressed their opinion as to how the words "finally sailed" ought to be interpreted, and there was no substantial difference between those opinions. I think it was most concisely stated by Lindley, L.J., who said: "Final sailing, I apprehend, means getting clear of the port for the purpose of proceeding on the voyage" (6 Q. B. Div. at p. 682). Accepting that as the true interpretation of the words "finally sailed," we have to consider whether the ship Garston had, when the collision occurred, finally sailed from the port of Cardiff. As the Master of the Rolls has pointed out, it is not necessary for the purposes of this case to decide what are the exact limits of the port of Cardiff. We have only to decide whether the particular point where the collision took place is within or without the port. I agree with the Master of the Rolls that the point in question is within the limits of the port. In Roelandts v. Harrison (9 Ex. 444) it was decided that a vessel which had left the dock gates, and had got to a certain point in what was called the artificial ship canal, had not "finally sailed" from the port, and the principle upon which that case was decided goes this length, that so long as a vessel remains within the artificial canal terminated by the pierhead, she has not "finally sailed" from the port. It was not then necessary to decide more than that. But in Price v. Livingstone (47 L. T. Rep. N. S. 629; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 13; 9 Q. B. Div. 679) the vessel had cleared from Penarth Docks, and had been towed for seven or eight miles out in the Bristol Channel, about three miles from Lavernock Point. There it was held that she had finally sailed from the port of Cardiff.

Between those two decisions a variety of questions may arise as regards the application of the general principles laid down in them. In the present case, following the course taken by the Master of the Rolls, I look at the chart, and it appears to me to give substantially two equivalents of headlands—namely, an inland water, with the Bute Docks and their dependencies, forming the one margin, and the Penarth Docks, forming the other margin. Between those limits there is a circular space of inland water which, it seems to me, must, according to all ordinary principles, be regarded as the port in its commercial or business sense, not for fiscal purposes, but for all ordinary business purposes. The spot where the collision took place is within the limits of the port so fixed. It is also within the limits of the channel by which a vessel must pass from the Bute Docks down the continuation of the river Taff, and joining that river at the neck which forms the second river running into the Bristol Channel at that point. But the matter does not rest there. Evidence has been given as to the pilotage rules and the limits for pilotage purposes, which are indicated by reference to successive buoys and lights—the East Cardiff buoy, the Monkstone, and the Wolves. Those are the limits of the port for pilotage purposes. It is material to observe that certain restrictions are imposed on persons navigating the channel within those limits. Amongst other things, they are forbidden to cast out any cinders or ballast in a certain portion of this district. These are rules which persons navigating vessels within those limits know that they must obey. At a spot close by that where the collision took place—namely, on the Cardiff flats—there is a very large anchorage for vessels of comparatively small size, and there the restriction as to casting out ballast is strictly enforced. This is a rule which any person arriving at or leaving the port of Cardiff in the ordinary course of navigation is bound to observe; and for all commercial purposes it seems to me that spot must be taken to be within the limits of the port. The port may extend much further, and no doubt for fiscal purposes it does extend very much further. Whether for commercial purposes or business purposes it extends beyond the limits I have referred to it is unnecessary now to decide. It is sufficient to say that the spot where the collision took place is within the port as it is understood for commercial purposes.

Bowen, L.J.—The question to be decided is whether the place where this vessel met with her disaster is within the port of Cardiff, having regard to the document in which the expression "last port," which we have to construe, is used. I will not attempt to give a complete definition of the meaning of the word "port" in a popular, in a commercial, or in any other sense; but I think it is clear that we must construe the word in the sense in which shipowners and charterers would naturally use it in such a document as a charter-party, unless anything special can be found in the charter-party to indicate that the word is used in a different sense. Therefore we must see what in the ordinary language of business men, who are concerned with the letting of ships and the exportation and importation of cargoes, is the meaning of the word "port." Charterers of ships are concerned, not only with English ports, but also with foreign ports. It is, therefore, obvious that the word "port," as used by them, cannot be treated as a term which is capable of any very rigid definition. If we were dealing only with English ports, we know that an English port is, in theory, created by the Crown. The creation of a port is a part of the prerogative of the Crown, and a port has privileges which arise either from prescription or from grant; and, in order to ascertain the limits of an English port, one would naturally look for evidence, either in some document emanating from the Crown or in some usage or reputation of the place, and would expect to find that there were fixed boundaries. The same kind of definition could not apply to foreign ports, and it is obvious, therefore, that the word "port" is one which has not a fixed sense. If it appeared from a commercial document that certain acts were to be performed within the limits of a borough, one would know that the word "borough" is a term which has a fixed sense; but the word "port" has never been defined in such a fixed sense. There are, however, several matters which must be borne in mind in construing the term "port" for business purposes. In the first place, the limits imposed by the document (if there be one) which created the port would have to be considered. I do not say that this would be necessarily decisive as to the use of the word by business men, for even if the port was created by charter or grant, men of business do not always observe the strict limits of the port as originally defined by the charter or grant. But, at all events, if there was such a document, it would be right to look at it as one of the matters to be attended to. Still more should one attend to the natural configuration of the coast and the character of the ground. That must be very material, because a port is created for the purpose of the exportation and importation of cargoes and for the vessels which carry the cargoes. Another matter which ought to be considered is the authority which is exercised, and the limits within which that authority is exercised, not for fiscal purposes, but for purposes connected with the loading and unloading, the arrival and departure of ships; the mode in which the business of loading and unloading is done, and the general usage of the place. Taking all these things together, it must be ascertained in each particular case in what sense shipowners and charterers would be likely to employ the term "port." In the present case, to assist us in drawing a correct inference as to what are the limits of the port of Cardiff in a business sense, we have the chart which has already been alluded to, we have the history of the artificial cut, and we have the character of the ground on each side of it, and all these, in my opinion, have a very important bearing on the case. We have also the witness whose evidence has already been commented on. The pilotage bye-laws also seem to me to be important as defining the limits of the port for business purposes. I do not think that the local Acts of Parliament relating to the Bute Docks in any way assist the appellants; for they appear to leave the matter doubtful, and do not really decide either way. On the whole case I have formed a very strong opinion that, at all events, north of the Penarth pier is within the port of Cardiff. I do not wish to go further than is necessary for the decision of the present case; but, unless my view should be changed by further argument, I should certainly be inclined to stretch the limits of the port of Cardiff somewhat further; but I reserve to myself the right to consider that question if it shall arise for decision in the future. For these reasons I agree that the judgment should be for the defendants.

The Bellcairn. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM BUTT, J.

Collision—Damage to cargo—Judgment by consent—Limitation action—Claimants therein—Registrar.

Where owners of ship and owners of the cargo laden on board of her respectively institute actions against another ship for damage by collision, and in the ship action judgment is, by the consent of the parties, given, dismissing the action, but in the cargo action both ships are held to blame, and subsequently the defendants instituted an action for limitation of liability, the judgment in the ship action cannot be set aside by an order of the registrar in the absence of the plaintiffs in the cargo action, so as to enable the plaintiffs in the ship action to claim in the limitation action.

Semble, the judgment in the ship action could only be set aside by the court itself upon the whole of the facts and the parties affected being brought before it; and quœre whether any such order ought to be made.

This was an appeal from a decision of Butt, J. on a motion in an action for limitation of liability.

A collision having occurred between the steamships Bellcairn and Britannia on 31st July 1884, a damage action in rem was instituted by the owners of the Britannia against the Bellcairn, in which action the owners of the Bellcairn counterclaimed. On the 7th Nov. 1884, when this action came on for trial, it was, by consent between the parties, dismissed, the judge making the following order:—"The judge, by agreement of counsel on both sides, dismissed the action, and the claim and counter-claim, but made no order as to costs."

On the 13th Nov. another action in rem was instituted against the Bellcairn by the owners of the cargo on board the Britannia, in which action both ships were held to blame; whereupon the owners of the Bellcairn instituted an action for limitation of liability. On the 7th March 1885 the owners of the Britannia, by the consent of the owners of the Bellcairn, obtained an order from the assistant-registrar setting aside the decree in the original damage action by which that action had been dismissed. The order was as follows:—"Upon consent of both solicitors, it is ordered that the judgment dated the 7th day of November 1884, whereby the plaintiff's action was dismissed, be set aside." On the 25th March an appearance was entered in the limitation action by the owners of the Britannia, who claimed to prove against the fund in court for the damages sustained by them in the collision. On the 31st March 1885 the Court pronounced the owners of the Bellcairn entitled to limited liability, and referred the claims to the Registrar to report upon.

According to the Registrar's report, the claim of the owners of the Britannia was opposed by the owners of the cargo on board the Britannia on the following grounds:—"That the effect of the judgment entered on November 7, 1884, was to extinguish the claim of the owners of the Britannia for damages against the owners of the Bellcairn; that it cannot be revived by the bare consent of the owners of the Bellcairn, who have no interest to maintain that judgment, and who gave such consent behind the backs of the owners of the Britannia's cargo and other claimants, and to their prejudice and to the prejudice of the judgment the cargo owners have obtained, since the fund in court will not suffice to pay the moiety of the damage they have incurred." The registrar then stated that in his opinion the objection was well founded, and excluded the claim of the owners of the Britannia, but found what was due to them in the event of the court holding them entitled to claim. The owners of the cargo laden in the Britannia took out a motion to confirm the report, and the owners of the Britannia took out a cross-motion to vary the report by allowing their claim.

Aug. 11.—Finlay, Q.C. (with him Stubbs) for the owners of cargo on the Britannia.

Sir Walter Phillimore (with him J. P. Aspinall) for the owners of the Britannia.

Butt, J.—The question for decision arises out of a collision between the Bellcairn and the Britannia. In the course of the hearing of the action between the ships counsel agreed to a decree by which the claim and counter-claim were dismissed, and that judgment was formally entered. Then by a proceeding which I do not understand the solicitors to the parties in that action took a consent to the registry, and drew up an order setting aside the previous judgment. That order ought never to have been made by the registrar, and no doubt he would not have made it had his attention been directed to the facts of the case. It is clear that if after the decree of Nov. 7 the owners of the Britannia had instituted a second action against the Bellcairn, the previous decree would have been a legal answer to it. But the owners of the Bellcairn, being sued by the owners of cargo laden in the Britannia, instituted a limitation action, and obtained the usual decree therein. The cargo owners bring in their claim, and then there comes in a competing claim by the owners of the Britannia. After the decree it was not competent for the Britannia to bring a fresh action against the Bellcairn. The sum paid into court in the limitation action represents the ship; it is its statutory value, the 8*l.* per ton being a statutory appraisement of the ship. This being so, it is impossible for the owners of the Britannia to have any valid claim against the money in court, and therefore the contention of the cargo owners is right, and the report of the registrar must be confirmed.

From this decision the owners of the Britannia appealed.

Nov. 4.—Sir Walter Phillimore (with him J. P. Aspinall) for the appellants.—The order setting aside the judgment is a regular order made in the regular way. [Lord Esher, M.R.—Most certainly not. What power has the registrar to set aside the solemn judgment of the court? He is only a servant of the court.] The same thing is constantly done in chambers at common law; even if the registrar's order is irregular, no steps have been taken to set it aside, and therefore, so long as it stands, it cannot be treated as a nullity. There was no reason why a second action should not have been brought by the Britannia. At the date of the consent order, the decree in the limitation action had not been made, and therefore the owners of cargo had then no vested rights in the fund in court.

Bucknill, Q.C. (with him Stubbs) for the owners of cargo on the Britannia.—By sect. 49 of the Judicature Act 1873 no order made by the court by the consent of parties shall be subject to any appeal, except by leave of the court making such order. If leave of the court is required for appealing from such order, what power can the registrar have to set it aside? The facts of the case were not disclosed to the registrar. Had they been he never would have made the order.

Lord Esher, M.R.—It must be clear to everyone that, if the judgment of the court given upon the trial is a valid and standing order, the owners of the Britannia can have no valid claim against the owners of the Bellcairn. The question is, has that order in any way been set aside? Now, I agree absolutely and entirely with Butt, J. that where upon a trial the court gives a judgment, although it is by consent of the parties, it is nevertheless a solemn judgment, and cannot be set aside by a subsequent agreement between the solicitors and on application made to an officer of the court behind the backs of third parties. It seems to me that at least the only authority which could set aside the first judgment would be the court itself and I think that this consent order is an order really obtained behind the back of the court. But I go further, and am strongly inclined to the opinion that the registrar, even if he had known all the facts, had no jurisdiction or authority to alter the judgment of the court, and I doubt extremely whether the court itself, without any evidence of the consent being a fraudulent consent, or such a fraud as to deceive the court, would have any jurisdiction to set aside the judgment it had already given. At all events, in this case and under the circumstances, I am quite clear that the order obtained from the registrar was absolutely void, and that the original order stood. There was no colour or pretence for saying that the judgment of the learned judge was wrong, and therefore I think this appeal must be dismissed.

COTTON, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. There is a claim brought by the owners of the Britannia against the fund in the limitation action. By consent a judgment was given in the damage action which would be an answer to any subsequent action brought by the Britannia. Has that judgment been got rid of? There was an order drawn up by consent of the parties which purported to get rid of it. In my opinion, if the judgment were to be set aside at all it could only be done by an order of the court, made when all the facts were properly before it; and if the court was informed of the pending limitation action, and that the Britannia intended to put in a claim, the judge would not, in my opinion, have made an order setting aside the previous judgment, because it would be obvious that the intention was to prejudice the rights of third parties. Therefore, in my opinion, without entering into the question of the power of the court, this consent order does not affect the previous judgment which barred the claim of the Britannia against the Bellcairn.

LINDLEY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. I cannot conceive for a moment that the court, knowing the facts, would have made this order. The object was not to benefit the Bellcairn but to place the Britannia in competition with the owners of cargo. I therefore think this appeal must be dismissed.

HOUGH AND Co. v. HEAD. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION.

Marine insurance—Time policy—Chartered freight—Loss of hire arising from accidents occurring between certain dates—Accident within prescribed dates, and loss of hire afterwards—Underwriter not liable.

The plaintiffs chartered their vessel for six months from the date when the vessel was put at the charterers' disposal, namely, the 21st March 1881, with the option to the charterers of continuing the charter for a further period of six months.

By clause 6 of the charter-party it was provided "that in the event of loss of time by deficiency of men, collision, break-down of engines, and the vessel becomes incapable of steaming or proceeding for more than forty-eight working hours, payment of hire to cease until such time as she is again in an efficient state to resume her voyage. . . . The acts of God, the Queen's enemies, fire, and all and every other dangers and accidents of machinery, or of the seas, rivers, and navigation, of whatever nature and kind, always mutually excepted."

The plaintiffs insured against loss of chartered freight by two policies, one of which, for 1200*l.*, was underwritten by the defendant as an underwriter for 150*l.*

The insurance effected was: "At and from and for and during the space of six calendar months from the 15th April to the 14th Oct. 1881, both days inclusive, for 1200*l. on chartered freight, to pay only loss of hire not exceeding* 2000*l., which may arise in clause 6 of charter-party for accidents occurring between the 15th April and the 15th Oct., but free of claim arising from deficiency of men."*

During the currency of the policy, viz., on the 27th June 1881, the vessel, while going through the Straits of Magellan, struck something which injured her bottom, but did not prevent her from proceeding on her voyage, and she arrived at Liverpool on the 18th Nov. During the voyage the charterers had exercised their option of continuing the charter for three months. She was put into dock on the 28th Nov., and on the 30th Nov. the charterers gave notice to the plaintiffs that the hire would cease as per charter-party until the vessel was in a fit state to resume employment. The repairs were completed on the 30th Dec. 1881.

Held, that the underwriter was not liable for loss of freight, because, although the accident which necessitated the repairs and caused the loss of hire happened within the six months prescribed in the policy, there was no loss of freight within that particular time.

Judgment of Grove, Manisty, and Lopes, JJ. affirmed.

THIS was an appeal by the plaintiffs, who were shipowners, from the judgment of Grove, Manisty, and Lopes, JJ., who held that the defendant, who was an underwriter, was not liable on a policy of insurance in respect of the loss of chartered freight occurring under circumstances which are shortly stated in the head-note to this report, and more fully in the report of the case in the court below (5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 447; 52 L. T. Rep. N. S. 861), where the special case is set out.

Pollard, for the plaintiffs, in support of the appeal, used similar arguments to those employed before the Divisional Court.

Barnes, for the defendant, was not called upon.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—The contention on behalf of the plaintiffs is contrary to the whole theory and substance of insurance law. Insurance is a contract of indemnity against loss to the assured, not against accident, but against loss caused by the accident. If the policy is a time policy, the insurance must be against a loss occurring within the time covered by the policy. The loss in respect of which the plaintiffs in the present case seek to recover is a loss of freight, and the question is whether it was a loss occurring within the time covered by the policy. It is clear that the plaintiffs were paid freight for the whole of that time. I am of opinion that this is a perfectly plain case, and that the judgment appealed from is right, and ought to be affirmed.

COTTON, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The plaintiffs seek to recover on a time policy insuring chartered freight. By the terms of the policy the insurance is against "loss of hire . . . which may arise in clause 6 of the charter-party for accidents occurring between the 15th April and the 15th October." Here the loss took place after the expiration of the period covered by the policy.

Bowen, L.J.—I am of the same opinion, and I agree that the case is clear. A policy of marine insurance is a contract of indemnity against the losses specified in the policy, and it is obvious that in the case of a time policy the loss insured against must be a loss occurring within the time covered by the policy. Mr. Pollard says that in the case of a time policy on ship, if an accident takes place on the last day of the period covered by the policy, and the loss is found out when the ship gets into dock after the expiration of the time, the underwriters would be liable, and he contends that on the same principle the defendant is liable here. In the case suggested, however, the insurance is against pecuniary loss arising from damage to the ship, and such a loss occurs the moment the ship is damaged, whereas in the present case no loss within the meaning of the policy occurred until the plaintiffs lost the freight which they would otherwise have earned, and this did not take place until after the expiration of the time covered by the policy. It is clear, therefore, that the loss is not one for which the plaintiffs are entitled to recover.

Scaramanga and others v. Martin Marquand and Co. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION.

Charter-party — Negligent navigation by shipowner's servants — Cargo in part salved — Salvage expenses—Payment of salvage expenses by underwriters—Right of owner of cargo to recover amount of expenses against shipowner.

Where, owing to negligent navigation, a ship is cast ashore and her cargo thereby suffers damage and loss, money paid by the underwriters of the cargo to a salvage association, who are employed with the assent of the shipowners, for saving a portion of the cargo, is not a voluntary payment, and is recoverable by the cargo owners from the shipowners, being money paid on behalf of the cargo owners to avert a loss which would have fallen on the shipowners if the portion of the cargo had not been salved and sent on to its destination.

The plaintiffs, under a charter-party, shipped a large quantity of rye on board one of the defendants' ships to be carried from the port of Taganrog to the port of Altona. Owing to the negligent navigation of the defendants' servants, the ship was cast ashore, and a large quantity of the rye was lost, but a considerable quantity was saved by the Salvage Association, who were employed by the underwriters of the cargo with the assent of the defendants. The average statement was prepared, and the sum assessed was agreed to by the plaintiffs, and the Salvage Association were paid by the underwriters the expenses claimed by them.

The plaintiffs brought an action on behalf of the underwriters to recover the amount of the salvage expenses so paid by the underwriters. The plaintiffs recovered a verdict for an amount to be settled out of court.

The question of law involved in the case was reserved for further consideration. The defendants contended that they were not liable, because the plaintiffs themselves had not paid the expenses, and the payment under the circumstances was voluntary.

Held, that the plaintiffs were entitled to recover the amount of the salvage expenses, as, without their being incurred, the remainder of the cargo could not have been sent to its destination, which was for the benefit of the defendants, and that the payment under the circumstances was not voluntary.

Judgment of Huddleston, B. affirmed.

This was an appeal by the defendants from the judgment of Huddleston, B., on further consideration, which is reported 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 401; 52 L. T. Rep. N. S. 764, where the facts are fully stated.

Cohen, Q.C. (Bucknill, Q.C. with him) for the defendants.

Barnes, for the plaintiffs, was not called upon to argue.

Lord Esher, M.R.—Mr. Cohen candidly admits that he finds great difficulty in supporting the appellants' case. I am of opinion that the judgment is right, and ought to be affirmed.

Cotton and Bowen, L.JJ. concurred.

Stewart and Co. v. The Merchants' Marine Insurance Company Limited. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION.

Marine insurance—Partial loss—Memorandum—Warranty against average under 3 per cent.—Time policy on ship—Separate voyages—Mode of calculating average.

A ship was insured by a time policy, and was warranted free from average under 3 per cent., unless general, or the ship be stranded, sunk, or burnt. During the time covered by the policy the ship made several separate and distinct voyages, and particular average losses were incurred, amounting in the aggregate to more than 3 per cent., though the amount of such losses on each separate voyage was less than 3 per cent.

Held, that in the case of a time policy on ship the amount of the particular average loss must be calculated at the end of each separate and distinct voyage, and the losses incurred on the different voyages cannot be added together, and therefore the underwriters were protected from liability by the warranty.

Judgment of Stephen, J. reversed.

(a) Reported by P. B. Hutchins, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

This was an action brought on a policy of marine insurance to recover a sum of 46*l.* 18*s.* 4*d.* for particular average losses, amounting to 4*l.* 13*s.* 10*d.* per cent. on 1000*l.* the extent of the plaintiff's interest. The policy was a time policy on the steamer Wyndcliffe, for twelve calendar months from the 11th Jan. 1882 to the 11th Jan. 1883.

The plaintiffs' claim was disputed on the ground that the defendants were protected from liability by the following memorandum which was contained in the policy:

> The ship and freight shall be and are warranted free from average under three pounds per cent. unless general or the ship be stranded, sunk, or burnt.

The ship went on several separate and distinct voyages during the period covered by the policy, and several separate and distinct particular average losses occurred. The amount of such losses occurring on each separate and distinct voyage was in each case less than 3 per cent., and it was contended on behalf of the defendants that the particular average losses occurring on the different voyages could not be added together for the purpose of estimating their liability.

Stephen, J., before whom the case was tried without a jury, after taking time to consider, overruled this contention, and held that, inasmuch as the aggregate amount of the particular average losses which occurred during the period covered by the policy exceeded 3 per cent., the defendants were not protected by the memorandum, and gave judgment for the plaintiffs for the amount claimed.

From this judgment, the defendants appealed.

Nov. 3 and 4, 1885.—Barnes, for the defendants, in support of the appeal.—There is no authority for the view adopted by the learned judge, that the plaintiffs are entitled to add together the losses occurring on the separate voyages and claim in respect of the whole amount of such losses, as if they made up one particular average loss. Such a construction of the memorandum is opposed to the object for which it was introduced, which was to protect underwriters from claims in respect of trifling losses. There is no decision in this country directly in point, but the American case of Brooks v. The Oriental Insurance Company (7 Pickering 259) supports the contention on behalf of the defendants. The decision of the Court of Exchequer in Blackett v. The Royal Exchange Assurance Company (2 C. & J. 244) and the American case of Donnell v. The Columbian Insurance Company (2 Sumner, 366) are distinguishable, because both those cases were decided on voyage policies.

Hibery for the plaintiffs.—The principle of the two last-mentioned cases (Blackett v. The Royal Exchange Assurance Company and Donnell v. The Columbian Insurance Company) and the grounds of the decisions are applicable to the case of a time policy, as well as to that of a voyage policy, and therefore those cases are authorities in favour of the plaintiffs. The judgment in Brooks v. The Oriental Insurance Company is inconsistent with the above cases, and ought not to be followed. The following cases were also referred to in the course of the argument:

Cur. adv. vult.

Dec. 7.—The judgment of the court was delivered by Lord Esher, M.R., as follows:—The judgment of Stephen, J., from which this appeal is brought, was given on statements in the pleadings. The trial took place without a jury, a circumstance which I regret, considering the nature and importance of the case. The appeal on which we have now to give judgment raises an important question of mercantile law, which has never yet been decided in England. The policy on which the action is brought is a time policy on ship. It is admitted on both sides that there were several separate and distinct voyages, and that there were several separate and distinct average losses. If the average losses were not added together, those occurring on each voyage would be less than 3 per cent.; but if the average losses occurring on all the voyages were all added together they would be more. The policy is carelessly drawn, for the common form in use for policies on goods is applied to the case of a ship, leaving in the policy stipulations which have nothing to do with a ship. The memorandum on which the question to be decided turns is in the following words: "The ship and freight shall be and are warranted free from average under 3 per cent., unless general or the ship be stranded, sunk or burnt." This being a policy on ship, we must strike out the immaterial stipulations, and read it as if those stipulations, which can have no application to a ship were omitted. The question is, whether all the losses occurring during the time covered by the policy are to be added together. As regards policies on goods, which are almost always voyage policies, but which might be made time policies, it has been held in America, by Story, J., in a case to which I will presently refer more fully, that separate average losses, although they are distinct losses, occurring during the continuance of the same policy, are to be added together, and it has been so held in Blackett v. The Royal Exchange Assurance Company (2 C. & J. 244), in the case of a voyage policy on ship. In America, in the case of a time policy on ship, it has been decided the other way, and once, in a voyage policy on ship and goods, the same way. A time policy cannot now be made in England to cover a longer period than one year. The memorandum as to average was introduced in or about the year 1749, and there was then no limit as to the duration of a time policy; but in 1795, for revenue purposes only, and in a revenue statute (35 Geo. 3, c. 63), it was enacted that no time policy should be made for a longer period than one year, and the law is now the same by 30 & 31 Vict. c. 23, s. 8. If stamps were abolished time policies, as was the case formerly in this country, and as is the case now in almost all other countries, might be made for more than one year. Now it seems impossible, in the case of a policy on goods, to suppose that it was intended that small average losses should stand over until the end of the time covered by the policy. Where there are several separate and distinct voyages there would very probably be a new captain and a new crew on each voyage, and it would be practically impossible to inquire as to the losses which had occurred; that is to say, it would be impossible for the insurers to make satisfactory inquiries, for they would have no means of checking the losses on the earlier voyages. There is another matter which ought to be noticed. The memorandum as to average losses would cover general average losses, unless such losses were expressly excepted. But general average ought to be adjusted at the end of each voyage, and therefore in the case of a policy on goods it seems difficult to say that it is necessary to wait until the end of the time covered by the policy before adjusting the losses. Therefore, standing by the decisions, and the reasons which I have given, I should say that in such cases the losses must be added together for each voyage, but not those occurring on two separate voyages.

The question then arises whether the same reasons exist in the case of a policy on ship. Many reasons have been given for the introduction of the memorandum. One reason that has been suggested is the difficulty of ascertaining what losses are caused by sea perils, and what are caused by wear and tear. In the case of goods this is not a good reason, as for instance where the goods are perishable, for there the loss always begins by sea perils. The true reason is, that it was found desirable to prevent disputes as to small matters from arising, and therefore the assured and the assurers agreed to take these small average losses out of the policy. If this is so, the reason is equally applicable to ship and to cargo. Then it is said that, if the other reason to which I have referred is taken to be the correct one, it is easy to find out at the end of the voyage what damage has been done to the ship by sea perils; but to my mind this cannot be ascertained in the case of many injuries to a ship. For instance, where a ship is strained in one storm and a new storm occurs, it may be impossible to ascertain whether she was more strained in the second storm. Therefore that is not a good reason. I am of opinion that both as to ship and goods the memorandum arose in order to avoid trifling disputes. In the old times 3 per cent. was a fair sum to cover small losses, for the size and value of ships were then less than they now are. In the present day 3 per cent. on the value of a ship may (as is the case here) cover a large sum, but still 3 per cent. is left as the limit, and we must construe the memorandum as it would have been construed when it was first introduced, although there might then have been a time policy covering a period of fifty years. The first decision in point of date which it is necessary to consider is Brooks v. The Oriental Insurance Company (7 Pickering, 258), in the year 1828. That was a case of a time policy on ship for twelve months, with a memorandum exempting the assurer from liability for partial losses under 5 per cent. In delivering the judgment of the court, Putnam, J. said (at p. 266): "And we are of opinion as to the second question, that distinct and successive losses are not to be added together in order to make up the 5 per cent.; but that the damage from disasters happening at one time, or in one continued gale or storm, is to be considered by itself. If this were otherwise, the insurers would be called upon to pay for a great many trifling losses which should be borne by the assured as coming within the common wear and tear of the ship." I cannot accede to this reasoning. In one continued storm it may be easy to tell whether the losses are separate and distinct or not, as for instance, where on one day the ship scrapes her keel, and on the second day, during the continuance of the same storm, she loses a mast; these losses would be quite distinct. The other question as to wear and tear I have dealt with already. The next case is Blackett v. The Royal Exchange Assurance Company (2 C. & J. 244), in 1832, where Lord Lyndhurst, C.B. delivered the judgment of the Court of Exchequer, which has never been overruled. That was the case of a voyage policy on ship, containing a memorandum similar to that now before us, and the court held that the losses were to be added together, although they were separate and distinct. With the greatest respect, it appears to me that the court there did not enter into the business aspect of the case. The ground which they gave for their decision was, that the memorandum is an exception in favour of the assured, and there is a rule that, where a stipulation occurs in a contract making an exception in favour of one party, the exception is to be construed strictly, which of itself seems hardly sufficient. However, where the question is as to a voyage policy on ships, that decision would be a binding authority. The next case is Donnell v. The Columbian Insurance Company (2 Sumner, 366), decided in 1836 by Story, J., whose opinion is always entitled to the higest respect. He came to the conclusion, on a voyage policy on ship and goods, containing a memorandum against liability for partial loss on goods, or on the vessel or freight, unless it amounted to 5 per cent. that successive losses on cargo, as well as on ship, must be added together. He applied the rule that an exception must apply to the same subject-matter as that from which it is excepted, and he agreed with the view adopted in Blackett v. The Royal Exchange Assurance Company (2 C. & J. 244), and differed from the reasoning in Brooks v. The Oriental Insurance Company (2 Sumner, 366). There are therefore two decisions showing that, in the case of a voyage policy on ship, successive losses are to be added together, and the last decision also shows that the same rule applies to a voyage policy on goods. I think we must adopt this as a correct statement of the law.

In the present case we have to decide the point with regard to a time policy on ship. We have to consider whether, in construing a policy of marine insurance or a charter-party, we ought to apply the same rules of construction as in construing other instruments. These documents are informal and ungrammatical. They contain numerous distinct contracts, and no grammatical construction can be placed on the whole instrument if read together. The practice has been that, whenever a new point arose in such cases, almost all the judges took the opinion of the jury. It is said that this was as to the existence of the custom, but Lord Mansfield always took the opinion of the jury as to the mode of estimating the amount of the loss. It is said that it would be necessary to call average adjusters to ascertain the practice; but, independently of that, I should ask a jury of merchants how, in their opinion, the loss ought to be dealt with. In the present case, however, we must do without a jury. We cannot construe the policy according to the ordinary rules applicable to the construction of written documents. The proper way to arrive at a conclusion is to apply our knowledge of business to the terms of the policy in order to ascertain the meaning. Taking the fact that this is a time policy, a kind of policy which, but for the fiscal limitation to which I have alluded, might be made to cover a period of more than a year, and which formerly was made to cover longer periods, and taking the fact that such a policy often covers many separate voyages, it is difficult to think that the assured and the assurer could have intended to wait until the end of the period covered by the policy before adjusting the losses in question. The crew and captain might be changed after each voyage. The general average losses must be settled at the end of each voyage. The damage to the ship must be repaired at the end of each voyage. It follows that the end of each voyage is the time at which to consider what is the amount of the losses, and therefore in a time policy each separate and distinct voyage must be considered separately, and the whole must not be treated as one voyage divided into stages. The questions which we have to consider here are discussed in a work of very great authority, Phillips on Insurance. The learned author has not dealt with the exact point which we have now to decide, but he states the general rule thus: "Another question is, whether successive losses can be added together, and a claim made, if the aggregate exceeds the rate of the exception. In regard to the cargo and freight, the practice in adjustments has always been to estimate the rate of the exception upon the aggregate loss of each passage or period during which the risk continues on the same subject;" then, after dealing with the decisions to which I have referred, he continues: "The weight of authority leads to the conclusion that the exception applies to the aggregate of successive losses on the ship in the same manner as on the cargo" (sect. 1780). The use of the words "each passage or period" shows that the author had in his mind the possibility of a time policy on goods, and the rule which he lays down would equally apply to a time policy on ship. We have carefully considered the question raised on this appeal, and the result at which we have arrived, taking the rule of construction to be as I have stated, and not attempting to construe the policy according to the ordinary rules of grammar, is this: that the losses occurring on any one separate and distinct voyage must be added together, but not those occurring on two or more separate and distinct voyages. There may be one case where the whole of a voyage cannot be brought in for the purpose of estimating losses, and that is where the last voyage continues beyond the expiration of the period covered by the policy; there the losses would be added together only up to the end of the time covered by the policy. In the present case, however, the policy contains a stipulation that if the period of twelve months comes to an end during a voyage the ship is to be covered by the policy until the end of that voyage, and therefore no such difficulty could arise. We have all come to the conclusion that all the losses occurring on any one voyage should be added together, but here the losses occurring on any one separate and distinct voyage do not amount to 3 per cent., and therefore the defendants are protected from liability by the memorandum, and the judgment which has been given in favour of the plaintiffs must be reversed. Appeal allowed.

The Temple Bar. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM BUTT, J.

Action in rem—Master's disbursements—Mode of trial—Jury—R. S. C., Order XXXVI., rr. 4, 6, 7.

Actions in rem are excluded from the operation of Order XXXVI., r. 6, giving the parties an absolute right to trial with a jury by virtue of the provisions of Order XXXVI., r. 4, and hence applications for a trial with a jury in such cases are to be made under Order XXXVI., r. 7 (a), which gives the judge a discretion as to the mode of trial. (b)

In an action in rem for master's disbursements, set

(a) Reported by J. P. Aspinall and Butler Aspinall, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

(b) R. S. C., Order XXXVI., r. 4. The court or a judge may, if it shall appear desirable, direct a trial without a jury of any question or issue of fact, or partly of fact and partly of law, arising in any cause or matter which previously to the passing of the principal Act could without any consent of parties have been tried without a jury.

Rule 5. The court or a judge may direct the trial without a jury of any cause, matter, or issue, requiring any prolonged examination of documents or accounts, or any scientific or local investigation, which cannot in their or his opinion conveniently be made with a jury.

Rule 6. In any other cause or matter upon the application of any party thereto for a trial with a jury of the cause or matter or any issue of fact, an order shall be made for a trial with a jury.

Rule 7. (a) In every cause or matter, unless under the provisions of rule 6 of this Order, a trial with a jury is ordered, or under rule 2 of this Order, either party has signified a desire to have a trial with a jury, the mode of trial shall be by judge without a jury; provided that in any such case the court or a judge may at any time order any cause, matter, or issue to be tried by a judge with a jury, or by a judge sitting with assessors, or by an official referee or special referee with or without assessors. (b) The plaintiff in any cause or matter in which he is entitled to a jury, may have the issues tried by a special jury upon giving notice in writing to that effect to the defendant at the time when he gives notice of trial. (c) The defendant in any cause or matter in which he is entitled to a jury, may have the issues tried by a special jury, on giving notice in writing to that effect at any time after the close of the pleadings or settlement of the issues, and before notice of trial, or if notice of trial has been given, then not less than six clear days before the day for which notice of trial has been given. (d) Provided that a judge may at any time make an order for a special jury upon such terms, if any, as to costs and otherwise as may be just.

down for trial at the assizes, where the judge of the Admiralty Division had in his discretion refused to allow a trial by jury, the Court of Appeal declined to interfere with such discretion.

This was an appeal from a decision of Butt, J. in chambers, refusing the plaintiff's application, in an action in rem for disbursements, that the action might be tried by a judge and jury.

The plaintiff was suing in rem as late master of the barque Temple Bar for disbursements, and claimed 466*l*. By the statement of claim, it was alleged that the plaintiff had drawn a bill for 466*l*. on the owner of the barque in favour of the persons making the disbursements, that the bill had been dishonoured, and that proceedings had been instituted against the master for the recovery of the 466*l*. The venue was laid at Liverpool.

By the defence the allegations in the statement of claim were denied. It was also pleaded that the plaintiff had received 146*l*. from, and given a receipt to, the previous owner in discharge of all his claims against the Temple Bar, and that the plaintiff had lost his claim by laches.

Notice of trial by a judge at the ensuing Liverpool Assizes having been given, the plaintiff applied on the 4th Nov. to the Liverpool district registrar for an order that the trial should be by a judge and jury. This application was refused, and on appeal to Butt, J. in chambers he affirmed the decision of the district registrar. The plaintiff now appealed from this decision.

Danckwerts for the plaintiff.—Rule 6 of Order XXXVI. giving an absolute right to trial with a jury is applicable to this case, and hence the decision of Butt, J. was wrong. The facts of this case make it very fitting that it should be tried by a jury. Assuming rule 6 is not applicable, yet according to the decision of the Court of Appeal in Hunt v. Chambers (46 L. T. Rep. N. S. 399; 20 Ch. Div. 365), the onus of proof is on the party opposing the application for a jury. If, therefore, the right to a jury be in the discretion of the judge, he should in this case have exercised his discretion in favour of the plaintiff.

Pyke, for the defendant, was not called on.

Lord Esher, M.R.—The case, as it seems to me, stands thus: This is an Admiralty action in rem, brought in the Admiralty Division, only the venue was laid in Liverpool. If there were no other rules, it seems to me that Order XXXVI., r. 7, would apply; that is to say, it would be tried without a jury, unless application were made to the judge, who, for a sufficient cause, would have ordered it to be tried with a jury. The plaintiff, fearing that his application for a jury might be met with the answer that, having brought an action in rem, he was bound by the Admiralty Court procedure, applied under rule 6, so that he should have no discretion, and that he, the plaintiff, might say, "You are absolutely bound to make an order for a jury." If rules 6 and 7 were the only rules affecting the matter, I am inclined to think that that would be so. But, in order to prevent the application of rule 6 in such cases, rule 4 was put in. This, to my mind, is a case coming under rule 4, as this action, being one in rem for master's disbursements, was one which would, prior to the Judicature Acts, have been tried in the Admiralty Court without a jury. Therefore rule 6 does not apply. Accordingly, the only application that could have been made in this case for a jury was under rule 7, and in that case the judge has a discretion, and the burden of proof would have been on the plaintiff. In this case I doubt if the burden could have been discharged. If the contention of the appellant were true, either party in every collision case in the Admiralty Court might insist upon the judge trying the case, not by himself and assessors, but by himself and jury. I suppose rule 4 was put in to prevent such a state of things. There is an application which the plaintiff can, if he thinks fit, make even now. He may ask the judge at Liverpool to have the case tried by a judge and jury, if there are any grounds for saying that the assistance of the assessors might be disadvantageous. But I suppose that would be as the judge thinks fit, as it would be an application under rule 7. This appeal must therefore be dismissed.

Cotton, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. It is contended, on behalf of the appellant, that under rule 6 there is an absolute right to have a jury. But in what cases does rule 6 apply? The rule is introduced by these words: "In any other cause or matter," which makes us look at the preceding rules to inquire what the other "causes or matters" are. By rule 5 it is clear that certain common law cases are excluded from the operation of rule 6. By rule 4 we find that causes which would have been tried before the Judicature Act without a jury are excluded from rule 6. It is not for us to say whether the court ought, under rule 4, to have exercised its discretion in allowing or disallowing a jury; but the question is, whether the case is excluded from the operation of rule 6 by the words "in any other cause or matter." The case of Hunt v. Chambers (ubi sup.) was decided on the rules of 1875, and has no application to the case. I think, therefore, this appeal must fail.

Lindley, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. In order to decide this case, it is necessary to read all the rules together, and also to bear in mind the state of things prior to the passing of the rules. Prior to the Judicature Act two kinds of actions existed, those with juries and those without juries. We are now concerned with a class of case in which there was no right to a jury; and the question is, whether the rules have given a right. I think not. In this particular case the parties have no absolute right to a jury, but there was power for the court to direct a trial with a jury. The registrar has held that there was no reason for ordering a jury. With that I agree, and therefore think this appeal must be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

HIGH COURT OF JUSTICE.

CHANCERY DIVISION.

Aug. 3 and 5, 1885.

(Before CHITTY, J.)

Re THE GREAT EASTERN STEAMSHIP COMPANY; CLAIM OF WILLIAMS AND OTHERS. (a)

Seamen's wages—Merchant Shipping Act 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104), ss. 149, 150, 157, 167, 181, 182, 187—Merchant Seamen (Payment of Wages and Rating Act) 1880 (43 & 44 Vict. c. 16), s. 4, sub-sects. (1) and (4)—Lien for—Foreign-going ship—Voyage not proceeded upon.

Seamen engaged by the owners or their agent for a voyage upon a foreign-going ship are entitled to a lien for their wages upon the ship, and the proceeds of sale thereof, although the engagement of the seamen has not been in writing, and although the ship does not proceed upon her voyage.

A master who, though appointed by the owners of the vessel, yet under the terms of the charter-party thereby becomes the charterers' captain, is as between the owners and the seamen the agent of the owners, and hence seamen engaged for a voyage are not bound to look into the title of the master who appoints them to ascertain whether he is the captain of the owners or the charterers.

The words "at the end of his engagement" in the Merchant Seamen Act 1880 (43 & 44 Vict. c. 16), s. 4, sub-sect. 1, mean the time at which his actual service terminates, and include the natural efflux of the agreement as well as the discharge of the seamen in breach of the contract. And therefore, to entitle a seaman to wages to the date of final settlement, it is not necessary that the whole term of his engagement should have expired, but it is sufficient that his actual service on board ship should have ended.

The time up to which a seaman is entitled in an action to recover his wages under this Act is to date of certificate of chief clerk in Chancery, or report of registrar in Admiralty.

BY a charter-party dated the 31st Oct. 1844 the steamship Great Eastern was chartered by the Great Eastern Syndicate Limited from the Great Eastern Steamship Company. It was therein mutually agreed that the said vessel should be Maintained by charters providing her with full complement of officers, seamen, engineers, and firemen, adapted to a steamer of her class, shall be placed under the direction of the said charterers or merchants, or his or their assigns, to be by him or them employed for the conveyance of lawful merchandise [for a voyage from Milford Haven to New Orleans and back to the United Kingdom.] Owners engage to have screw engines and boilers (now connected therewith) put in condition to proceed to sea with earliest possible despatch. The said steamer is let for the sole use of the said charterers for twelve calendar months, commencing the day the screw engines and boilers are finished repairing and ready for sea, at which day the vessel is to be at the disposal of the charterers at Milford Haven. . . . The captain, although appointed by the owners, shall during the currency of this charter be considered as the servant of the charterers, and be under his or their orders and directions as regards employment, agency, or other arrangements, and shall use all and every despatch possible in prosecuting the voyage, and the crew are to render all customary assistance with the vessel's boats.

(a) Reported by G. W. KING, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The charterers were also to pay the crew's wages.

The voyage did not take place, and the steamship was commenced to be put in repair in accordance with the terms of the charter-party. Disputes having arisen between the owners and the charterers before the screw engines and boilers were in fact finished repairing, or ready for sea, the charterers never got full possession of the ship under the charter-party.

On the 2nd Dec. 1884 Edwin Billinge was appointed by the Great Eastern Steamship Company to the command of the ship by the following letter:

The Great Eastern Steamship Company Limited, 10, King William-street, London, E.C., 2nd Dec. 1884.—To Captain Edwin Billinge.—Dear Sir,—In appointing you to the command of the steamship Great Eastern, I have to inform you that she is now under a time charter, copy of the charter-party you have herewith, to the provisions of which you will please to strictly adhere. You will observe that the charterers pay all expenses of every kind during the continuance of the charter, including your own and the crew's wages due, provision for which you will require to be made. You are to give no orders or instructions whatever which may involve the ship herself in any pecuniary liability except with the special sanction and approval of the owners. . . . . You will now take charge of the ship, and be guided by the instructions of the charterers with a due regard to the interest of the owners.—Yours truly, for the Great Eastern Steamship Company, WILLIAM BAKER, Chairman.

The Great Eastern Syndicate gave the following certificate:

The Great Eastern Syndicate Limited, 18, New Bridge-street, Blackfriars, Dec. 3, 1884.—This is to certify that Capt. S. Billinge has been appointed commander of the Great Eastern steamship now lying at Milford Haven, and that he has authority from the directors of this Syndicate Limited to engage such officers and sailors, ship's carpenters and joiners, as he has indented for the engagement of same, being subject to the approval of the board.—HENRY CRUSE, Secretary.—By order of the Board.

In anticipation of the voyage Billinge, after his appointment, engaged certain officers and men to serve on board the vessel.

In addition to Williams the present claimant who was so engaged for the voyage as chief engineer, there were also engaged for the contemplated voyage a boatswain, a boatswain's mate, several able seamen, a butcher, baker, three stewards, ship's cook, and quartermaster. These men served on board the vessel for some weeks, and were discharged by Billinge on the 3rd Feb. 1885, without having been paid their wages up to that date.

It appeared from the evidence that the plaintiffs had no knowledge of the position of the parties, or any reason to believe that they had been engaged on behalf of persons other than the owners.

On the 11th Feb. 1885 Williams, on behalf of himself and the other men mentioned above, the present applicants, who were employed on board the ship, commenced an action in rem in the Admiralty Division to enforce their maritime lien for wages against the ship. On the 23rd Feb. 1885 a petition to wind-up the company was presented, and on the 7th March following an order for compulsory winding-up was made. An order for sale of the ship was made on 21st May 1885.

In consequence of the winding-up proceedings, the plaintiffs in the Admiralty action were unable to go on with their action, and on the 18th June 1885 an order was made on their application staying the proceedings in the Admiralty action, and giving them leave to come in and prove their claim in the winding-up, and in this action, which was an action by the holders of the "A," or first series of mortgage debentures, against the trustees for the debenture-holders, and the company to enforce their security.

The claim, which was by Williams on behalf of himself and the other men above mentioned, now came on to be heard.

Aspinall (Myburgh, Q.C. with him) in support of the claim of the seamen.—Seamen hired to fit a ship for sea and go a voyage in her, may sue in the Admiralty for the wages they earn in fitting her out, though she does not proceed upon the voyage, and it makes no difference whether they were hired by the owner or not:

Wells v. Osman, 2 Lord Raym. 1044;
Abbott's Law of Merchant Ships and Seamen, edit. 12, p. 471

The charterers were in possession of the ship by the owners' authority, and if so, any engagement by them of seamen gives the seamen a right in rem for their wages, and also a right to recover the penalties prescribed by the Legislature for the nonpayment of their wages:

Merchant Shipping Act 1854, ss. 149, 150, 157, 167;
Merchant Seamen (Payment of Wages and Rating) Act 1880, s. 4. (a)

Romer, Q.C. and Chadwyck Healey for the mortgage debenture-holders.—We have the first charge upon the assets. The seamen have no lien on the ship; the law as to the payment of seamen's wages is not applicable to these men, who were only employed to rig out the ship and were not seamen within the meaning of the statutes which have been referred to. Moreover there has been no signed agreement, as required by sect. 167 of the Act of 1854.

Aspinall in reply.—By the common law rule, articles were not necessary in order to give a right to wages:

Wells v. Osman (ubi sup.);
Maude & Pollock's Law of Merchant Shipping vol. 1, edit. 4, p. 170.

The signing of articles is a provision required by the Legislature for the protection of seamen, and shipowners are liable to a penalty for failing to comply with these provisions. But the Legislature has never said that the seamen's right to wages is lost if articles are not signed. In effect sect. 167 of the Act of 1854 has been overridden by sect. 4 of the Act of 1880. He referred to sects. 149, 157, 167, 182, and 187 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854.

CHITTY, J.—This is a claim by seamen on board the Great Eastern steamship, and they claim a lien on the ship for wages. Several points have been raised, and the first is whether they were engaged as seamen. There is some suggestion in the affidavits which have been filed in opposition to the claim, to the effect that the claimants were engaged on board the ship simply for the purpose of doing repairs to the rigging, painting, and the like. The claimants, however, swear they were engaged as seamen, but they do not say in terms by whom. However, looking at the evidence as a whole, I am satisfied that they were engaged by Captain Billinge. I have no doubt that they were actually to some extent employed in doing work upon the ship, but after the case of Wells v. Osman (2 Lord Raym. 1044) it is impossible to doubt that seamen engaged for a voyage may be doing work on the ship before the voyage actually commences, and yet would be entitled, apart from the question I have to decide upon the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, to their wages and their lien. That being so, looking to the character of the claimants, and having regard to the facts that are presented before me with reference to what they did, I am satisfied that they were engaged, in point of fact, as seamen. It is unnecessary to go through the affidavits at any length, but I may refer to the affidavit of Joseph

(a) The material sections of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104), and of the Merchant Seamen (Payment of Wages and Rating) Act 1880 are the following:

The Merchant Shipping Act 1854.

Sect. 149. The master of every ship, except ships of less than eighty tons registered tonnage, exclusively employed in trading between different ports on the coasts of the United Kingdom, shall enter into an agreement with every seaman whom he carries to sea from any port in the United Kingdom as one of his crew in the manner hereinafter mentioned, and every such agreement shall be in a form sanctioned by the Board of Trade, and shall be dated at the time of the first signature thereof, and shall be signed by the master before any seaman signs the same, and shall contain the following particulars as terms thereof.

Sect. 150. In the case of all foreign-going ships, in whatever part of Her Majesty's dominions the same are registered, the following rules shall be observed with respect to agreements (that is to say):

(Here follow rules that the agreement is to be signed by each seaman in the presence of a shipping master, to be read over and explained to each seaman, and to be in duplicate.)

Sect. 157. If in any case a master carries any seaman to sea without entering into an agreement with him in the form and manner, and at the place and time hereby in such case required, the master, in the case of a foreign-going ship, and the master or owner in the case of a home-trade ship, shall for each such offence incur a penalty not exceeding five pounds.

Sect. 167. Any seaman who has signed an agreement and is afterwards discharged before the commencement of the voyage, or before one month's wages are earned, without fault on his part justifying such discharge, and without his consent, shall be entitled to receive from the master or owner, in addition to any wages he may have earned, due compensation for the damage thereby caused to him, not exceeding one month's wages, and may, on adducing such evidence, as the court hearing the case deems satisfactory, of his having been so improperly discharged as aforesaid, recover such compensation as if it were wages duly earned.

The Merchant Seamen (Payment of Wages and Rating) Act 1880.

Sect. 4, sub-sect (1). The owner or master of the ship shall pay to each seaman on account, at the time when he lawfully leaves the ship at the end of his engagement, two pounds, or one-fourth of the balance due to him, whichever is least, and shall pay him the remainder of his wages within two clear days (exclusive of Sunday, fast day in Scotland, or bank holiday) after he so leaves the ship.

Sub-sect. (4). In the event of the seaman's wages, or any part thereof, not being paid or settled as in this section mentioned, then, unless the delay is due to the act or default of the seaman, or to any reasonable dispute as to liability, or to any other cause not being the act or default of the owner or master, the seaman's wages shall continue to run and be payable until the time of the final settlement thereof.

Williams, who was the engineer, which sums up the names of those who are now claiming and the capacities in which they were engaged on board. [His Lordship here read the names and continued:] The butcher of course is necessarily employed on board a ship in the fair sense of the term. Although he is there for the purpose of killing the live animals that may be on board, yet he is a seaman, and can be engaged as a seaman. A large ship going on a distant voyage of this kind does require a butcher. Then there is the chief baker and several stewards, the ship being a very large one and a ship that requires several stewards. I am satisfied that they were engaged as seamen, and I am also satisfied upon the evidence that they were engaged by Captain Billinge. Obviously it would not do for any stranger to enter into any engagement with the seamen for a voyage, but Captain Billinge was appointed by the owners under the charter-party, and although when appointed he becomes the charterers' captain, he was, as between the owner on the one hand and the seamen engaged on the other, not the less on that account the agent of the owners. I think it would be an extravagant thing—it would be indeed an injustice in the highest degree—to hold that the seamen engaged for a voyage were bound to look into the title of the captain and ascertain whether he is the captain of the charterers or the owners, and to go into the disputes which have arisen in this case. This case illustrates the point exceedingly well, because there is a dispute between the charterers and the owner in regard to the charter-party itself. It is quite enough to say that in this case Captain Billinge was held forth by the owners of the ship, who put him in command of the ship, as their agent for the purpose of engaging the seamen. That being so, the question arises which has been argued at the bar, whether the Merchant Shipping Act of 1854 does not render it imperative that the engagement of seamen in a foreign-going ship should be in writing. For the owners it was argued that sects. 149, 150, and 157 taken together showed that the Legislature intended that contracts between masters and shipowners on the one hand and seamen on the other for a foreign voyage should be in writing, and if not in writing, void. As was said by Lord Campbell in the case of The Liverpool Borough Bank v. Turner (3 L. T. Rep. N. S. 494; 2 De G. F. & J. 502) no general rule can be laid down with regard to the construction of an Act of Parliament as to whether that Act is merely directory or imperative; in other words, taking the case before me, whether the contract is void although there are no words avoiding it, or whether the statute is merely directory. In the case of The Liverpool Borough Bank v. Turner (ubi sup.) the question turned on the same Merchant Shipping Act as regards mortgages. The Court of Appeal held that, although there was no provision rendering a mortgage void not made in accordance with the directions of the Act, and although there had been in the former Acts of Parliament relating to the same subject-matter clauses avoiding the mortgage, yet, taking the Act as a whole, and looking at the provisions carefully, the result was that the Legislature did intend that that part of the Act should be imperative, and consequently an equitable mortgage was avoided. The effect of that decision has since been superseded by sect. 3 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1862. That section, however, gives me some guidance with reference to the question which I have now to determine. As Mr. Aspinall pointed out, the sections to which I have referred do not in terms enact that there shall be an agreement in writing entered into with regard to foreign-going ships with the seamen on the commencement of the engagement or agreement. But when the sections are looked at carefully, the language of the Legislature is directed to the carrying of the seamen to sea. Now, sect. 149, which is general, and relates to all ships except small coasting vessels, enacts that the master "shall enter into an agreement with every seaman whom he carries to sea from any part of the United Kingdom as one of his crew in the manner hereinafter mentioned;" that is the agreement referred to, which is afterwards required to be in a particular form, and in writing before the master carries the seamen to sea. Sect. 150, on which counsel for the shipowners chiefly relied, relates to foreign-going ships, foreign-going ships being those which are described in the definition section to include ships trading between some place in the United Kingdom and some place beyond certain limits, such as the coast of the United Kingdom, the islands of Guernsey and Jersey, and other places, and the continent of Europe between the river Elbe and Brest inclusive. With regard to the Great Eastern steamship, and for the purposes of this question, she was clearly a foreign-going ship, for she was going to New Orleans. The section enacts that, "In the case of all foreign-going ships, in whatever parts of Her Majesty's dominions the same are registered, the following rules shall be observed with respect to agreements." The section enacting that that is to be an agreement is sect. 149, and that points definitely to the time at which this agreement must be entered into. Sect. 150 is only a subsidiary section covering part of the same ground as sect. 149, and applying only to what is called in the technical language of the Act "foreign-going ships," and it enacts certain rules with reference to the agreements which sect. 149 requires. I do not read those rules through; they are obviously stipulations in favour of the seamen. That of course is not conclusive on the point, because there may be also stipulations in favour of the shipowners, but they are clearly on the face of them for the benefit of the seamen, and the mischief which this part of the Act is intended to remedy was the risk of the men being carried out to sea by some captain who was minded to take them to a long distance to some foreign country when they really had not come to a definite agreement that they would sail upon such a voyage. Sect. 157 contains a penalty which is not imposed on the seamen, but which is imposed on the master and on the owners. That section is as follows: "If in any case a master carries any seaman to sea" (so again, as in sect. 149, that is the reference to carrying the seamen to sea), "without entering into an agreement with him in the form and manner and at the place and time hereby in such case required, the master in the case of a foreign-going ship, and the master or owner in the case of a home trade ship, shall for each such offence incur a penalty not exceeding five pounds." That is the penalty, not imposed upon the seaman, but, according to the provisions of the Act, imposed on the master or owner alone. But it applies simply to the case of carrying the seamen to sea. It seems to me that the result of these enactments is, that the Act of Parliament does require that, before the seamen are carried to sea, there should be, in the case of a foreign-going ship, the agreement with the particulars and ceremonies mentioned in sect. 150; but the Act of Parliament does not require that there should be any articles signed between the master and the seaman until the ship is going to sea, that is to say, until she starts on her voyage. In the case before me the ship was never ready for sea. I have already disposed of the point with regard to the engagement of the seamen, on the authority of Wells v. Osman (ubi sup.). I think there is nothing in the statute which avoids the agreement which was come to, as I hold in point of fact, between the master on the one hand and the seamen on the other; and that it was not necessary for the purpose of the question that I have to decide that the agreement should be in writing.

Then there was another point raised. Having decided this matter in favour of the seamen, the question arises whether they are entitled, under the statute of 43 & 44 Vict. c, 16, s. 4, to payment of their wages until the time of the final settlement thereof. They have, according to the evidence, not been paid. The facts are, that the charterers or the shipowners—as far as the seamen's claim is concerned it is immaterial which—were unable to put the ship into the state which was required for the particular voyage to make her seaworthy, and Captain Billinge discharged the seamen. They accepted the discharge, and left the ship; but they have not been paid their wages, and a considerable sum remains due to each of the claimants. Now sect. 4 of 43 & 44 Vict. c. 16, enacts that "in the case of foreign-going ships the owner or master of the ship shall pay to each seaman on account, at the time when he lawfully leaves the ship at the end of his engagement, two pounds," and so on. Sub-sect. 4 of the same section enacts that, "in the event of the seaman's wages, or any part thereof, not being paid or settled as in this section mentioned" (that means as mentioned in sect. 4), "then, unless the delay is due to the act or default of the seaman, or to any reasonable dispute as to the liability, or to any other cause not being the act or default of the owner or master, the seaman's wages shall continue to run, and be payable until the time of the final settlement thereof." The material words are, "not being paid or settled as in this section mentioned." That apparently throws me back on sub-sect. (1), which relates to the end of the engagement. Upon that, as to the meaning of those words, I have heard an argument. Mr. Aspinall has pointed out, and I think rightly, that the corresponding or correlative section in the Act of 1854 was sect. 187, which contains an enactment relating to the period within which wages are to be paid: "The master or owner of every ship shall pay to every seaman his wages within the respective periods following (that is to say), in the case of a home-trade ship within two days after the termination of the agreement, or at the time when such seaman is discharged, whichever first happens." In the case of all other ships, with certain exceptions, it gives certain time after the seaman's discharge. The language of the section is, "After the termination of the agreement, or at the time when such seaman is discharged." That would seem to point to this, that the words "termination of the agreement" mean the natural termination of the agreement by effluxion of time, or the time when the seamen are discharged, which may be in breach of the contract, or may be at the time that corresponds exactly with the time at which the agreement terminates. But that language is not adhered to in sub-sect. (1) of sect. 4. There the words are, "at the end of his engagement." It appears to me that "the end of his engagement" means that time at which his actual service terminates; that is to say, the language is sufficiently elastic to include the natural effluxion of the agreement, and the discharge of the seaman in breach of the contract. I think these words are used advisedly to include both cases. The words "at the end of his engagement" would, according to my view, include such a case as this, namely, the discharge by the captain of the seamen before the time at which, according to the agreement, and without breach of the agreement, he could discharge them, which is the present case. They were discharged, and they accepted their discharge, and having put that construction upon these words "at the end of his engagement," I have already decided that the words "as in this section mentioned," which occur in sect. 4, sub-sect. (4), mean at the termination of the agreement. If the seamen's wages are not then paid certain consequences are to follow. That being so, I have to see whether the shipowners have any ground of defence against the effect of this section by reason of the subsequent words. It is enacted, sect. 4, sub-sect. 4, "unless the delay is due to the act or default of the seamen"—clearly in the case before me the delay was not due to the acts or defaults of the seamen—"or to any reasonable dispute as to liability." There was no dispute as to liability before the claim was raised in the Admiralty action. The dispute as to the liability argued before me has been a question of law chiefly, though to some extent a question of fact. But with regard to the question of fact I hold that there was no reasonable dispute.

In regard to the question of law, that was not raised in substance until the argument in court. I think that, having regard to the nature of the question of law on the statute, the dispute which has arisen, as shown by the argument in court, is not a "reasonable dispute" within the meaning of this section. It is not necessary for me to say that there could not be a reasonable dispute when there was a question of law only, but I must look at the nature of the question of law, and it appears to me that under the circumstances of this case there was no reasonable dispute as to the liability. The next matter mentioned in sub-sect. (4) is, "or to any other cause not being the act or default of the owner or master." Was there any other cause not being the act or default of the owner or master? For the owners it is said that there was no claim made against them, and they had no opportunity of settling the claim. But the answer appears to me to be this. The condition on which this section depends is "the event of the seamen's wages not being paid or settled," and the duty, therefore, of paying or settling the seamen's wages is one which is cast upon the master or the owner. To my mind it cannot be said that the delay is due to "any other cause not being the act or default of the owner or master. The real cause of all this is, that the master was not provided with funds either by the charterers or by the shipowners. If the master had had money he would undoubtedly have paid them. He may or may not have been personally liable. About that I am not concerned in the present argument. But those who are bound to put him in funds for the wages have not provided the money. Then again was the act or default on the part of the owner or master? There is one other section which was relied on by the owners to which I must refer, and that is sect 167 of the Act of 1854, which seems to me to have little or nothing to do with the point. That section says that seamen who have signed an agreement and are discharged before the voyage are to have compensation. That section does not apply, because here the seamen who are claiming have not signed an agreement. The Acts of 1854 and 1880 are to be read together, and it may or may not be that sect. 167 is superseded by the enactments which are more beneficial to the seamen contained in sect. 4 of the Act of 1880. It is not necessary to decide that, but it is necessary for me to say that sect. 167 does not afford any ground for displacing (even reading the two statutes together) the clear enactment of sect. 4 of the Act of 1880. With regard to the question of the validity of the agreement by reason of there being no signed articles, I may refer to sect. 182: No seaman shall by any agreement forfeit his lien upon the ship, or be deprived of any remedy for the recovery of his wages to which he would otherwise have been entitled; and every stipulation in any agreement inconsistent with any provision of this Act, and every stipulation by which any seaman consents to abandon his right to wages in the case of the loss of the ship, or to abandon any right which he may have or obtain in the nature of salvage, shall be wholly inoperative." Sect. 181 is also material, because it entitles the seaman to wages in a foreign-going ship before the articles are signed. For these reasons I think that the seamen have a valid claim against the ship, and that they are entitled to their wages according to the practice in the Admiralty Division, that is to say, until the time of the certificate.

His Lordship made an order declaring that the applicants were entitled to a lien upon the ship and upon the proceeds of sale thereof for their wages and costs in priority to all other mortgages and charges whatsoever, and that the applicants were at liberty to enforce their lien by sale of the ship in case the sale should not be carried out with due diligence.

REW v. PAYNE, DOUTHWAITE, AND CO. (a)

Carriage of goods—Consignment of goods—Repudiation—Bill of lading—Retention of—Bill of exchange—Non-acceptance of—Conversion of goods—Measure of damages—Delay.

Where goods are consigned to a person in this country, and the consignor transmits the shipping documents and a bill of exchange to a creditor other than the consignee, and such creditor hands the shipping documents to the consignee with an intimation that they are at his disposal on his returning the bill of exchange duly accepted, the consignee must either accept the bill of exchange or return the documents, and if he refuses to accept the bill of exchange, but nevertheless takes possession of the goods, professing to retain the bill of lading as security for freight and other charges, the consignor's creditor is entitled to recover from the consignee as damages the value of the cargo less forfeit and interest on such value.

A shipload of timber having been consigned to the defendants, the consignor sent the bill of lading and other shipping documents, and also a bill of exchange, to the plaintiffs, in pursuance of the usual course of business between him and them, to cover certain advances which they from time to time made to him.

The plaintiffs placed the shipping documents and bill of exchange relating to the cargo of timber in the hands of agents, who acted between the plaintiffs and the defendants. The agents at the request of the plaintiffs forwarded the documents to the defendants, in order to have the bill of exchange accepted by them.

Shortly afterwards the defendants informed the agents that the cargo was thoroughly out of condition, and that they could not take it in its then state. The agents replied that, unless the defendants returned the bill of exchange accepted, they ought to send back the shipping documents. This the defendants declined to do, as they had paid part of the freight, and intended to take possession of the cargo. Later on they stated that they had been compelled to remove the cargo under the rules of the dock company, but that, if the agents would repay them the freight and certain charges, and their profits on a portion of the cargo which they had sold, they would return the documents. The agents replied that the matter must be left in the hands of the plaintiffs, the owners of the cargo. The defendants then returned to the agents the bill of exchange unaccepted, but retained the bill of lading as security against freight and charges. They offered to yield up the bill of lading on the freight and charges being refunded. Thereupon the plaintiffs commenced an action against the defendants, asking that they might be ordered to accept and deliver up the bill of exchange; and that it might be declared that, until such acceptance and delivery, the defendants were not entitled to retain the bill of lading. They also asked for an injunction, a receiver, and damages. Owing to delay, caused by the fault of both parties, the action did not come on for hearing until about four years after its commencement.

Held, that the defendants, having refused to accept the bill of exchange, were bound to have returned the shipping documents, which were only at their disposal on the condition that they should so accept the bill; and that they wrongfully took possession of the cargo, and dealt with it as its owners, although they had repudiated the contract, and refused to accept the bill of exchange, availing themselves of the bill of lading, which they had no right whatever to retain or make use of, to get that possession.

Held, therefore, that the plaintiffs were entitled to damages against the defendants; that the proper measure of damages was the value of the cargo after making a deduction for freight; but that none of the other charges claimed by the defendants could be allowed, except outgoings incurred in connection with the sale of part of the cargo.

Held also, that the defendants must pay damages, in the nature of interest, for keeping the plaintiffs out of possession of their goods; that the ordinary measure of such damages would be 5 per cent. on the value of the cargo from the time the defendants wrongfully took possession thereof; but that, having regard to the delay which had occurred in bringing the action on for hearing, attributable no less to the plaintiffs than the defendants, half damages, computed at the rate of 2½ per cent. only, would be awarded.

THE plaintiffs in this action, Quincey Rew and Philip O. K. B. Oliphant, carried on business as merchants in London in copartnership, under the style or firm of Rew, Kington, and Co.

The defendants, Payne, Douthwaite and Co., were timber merchants, carrying on business at Hull.

The plaintiffs' claim was that the defendants might be ordered to accept a certain bill of exchange and to deliver it to them; and that it might be declared that, until such acceptance and delivery, the defendants were not entitled to retain or use a certain bill of lading, or to obtain delivery of or deal with certain goods to which such bill of lading related.

The plaintiffs also asked for an injunction, a receiver and damages.

The material facts of the case sufficiently appear from the head-note and judgment.

KAY, J.—The facts of this case are as follows: Mr. August Eklof, a certain vendor of timber in Borga, Finland, consigns a shipload of timber to the defendants, Messrs. Payne, Douthwaite, and Co., of Hull. He does not send to them the bill of lading, but he sends the bill of lading to the plaintiffs, Messrs. Rew, Kington, and Co. The position the plaintiffs occupied was, that they were merchants who had acted as bankers for Eklof, and they had advanced money to Eklof, and there was a sum of 5000*l*., as I gather from the evidence, due from Eklof to them. The usual course of business between them and Eklof seems to have been, that Eklof should send to them shipping documents from time to time to cover, or partially cover, the advances which they allowed him to receive. Accordingly, what Eklof does is this: he, in the first place, writes on the 20th Sept. 1881 to the plaintiffs thus: "Confirming my respects of yesterday, I beg to inclose herewith the following shipping documents, viz.: (1) An indorsed bill of lading, Penelope, s.s.; (2) Invoice for Messrs. Payne, Douthwaite, and Co., of Hull, amounting to 1816*l*. 16*s*. 6*d*."—and then mentioning other documents which I need not refer to—"and have now to hand you the following drafts against aforesaid invoice amounts, viz., 1816*l*. 16*s*. 6*d*. to your order upon Payne, Douthwaite, and Co., Hull, payable London"—mentioning other drafts—"with which you will be pleased to do the needful to my credit." Nobody can doubt the meaning of that letter. It was according to the course of dealing between Eklof and Rew and Co. He sent them the shipping documents, the bill of lading, and the invoice, and he sent likewise a bill of exchange, which they were to get the defendants, Payne, Douthwaite, and Co., to accept and place to his credit with them, Rew and Co., that is, against his overdraft. The bill of lading is in the usual form. What happened was this: Rew and Co. placed these documents in the hands of Messrs. M. H. Krook and Co., who seem to have acted as agents in this country between Rew and Co. and Payne, Douthwaite, and Co. Krook and Co. sent these documents to Payne, Douthwaite, and Co. in order to have the bill of exchange accepted. They were sent in a letter dated the 26th Sept. 1881, in which Krook and Co. write to Payne, Douthwaite, and Co. thus: "Referring to our former letter of this date, we now beg to hand you inclosed indorsed bill of lading, policy of insurance, and invoice per Penelope, the latter amounting to 1816*l*. 16*s*. 6*d*. At the request of Messrs. Rew, Kington, and Co., of this city, the holders of the bill of lading, we also beg to inclose August Eklof's draft for the above amount to their order. The documents are therefore at your disposal on your returning to us the said draft duly accepted," Thus Payne, Douthwaite, and Co. got these documents upon these conditions, that the documents were at their disposal if they chose to return the draft accepted. Now, what is the law? If Payne, Douthwaite, and Co. did not choose to accept the bill of exchange, then of course they were bound to return the bill of lading and the other shipping documents which were only at their disposal on the condition that they should accept the bill of exchange. In the case of Shepherd v. Harrison (24 L. T. Rep. N. S. 857; L. Rep. 5 E. & I. App. 116), in the House of Lords, the matter went a little further, because there, in the letter of advice, sending the shipping documents, the condition was not expressed. The House of Lords, however, held it was clear that, when a bill of exchange and shipping documents were sent in this kind of way, they were sent upon a condition that the bill of exchange should be accepted; that the non-expression of that condition was not material; and that the duty of the parties who received the shipping documents was either to accept the bill of exchange or return the shipping documents. Lord Cairns said: "I hold it to be perfectly clear that when a cargo comes in this way, protected by a bill of lading and a bill of exchange, it is the duty of those to whom the bill of lading and the bill of exchange are transmitted, in a letter, either 'to appropriate or reprobate' entirely and completely then and there. If they accept the cargo and the bill of lading, and accept the bill of exchange drawn against the cargo, the object of those who shipped the goods is obtained. They have got the bill of exchange in return for the cargo; they discount or use it as they think proper; and they are virtually paid for the goods. But if, on the other hand, the persons to whom the bill of lading is sent do not refuse in toto the consignment of the goods, but keep the bill of lading, but do not accept the bill of exchange, then the agents for the foreign shippers have neither the goods nor the money to deal with; if they had repudiated the transaction in toto the agents of the shippers might have dealt with some other house, and raised money on the goods. I therefore think that when one merchant in this country sends to another, under circumstances like the present, a bill of lading and a bill of exchange, it is not at all necessary for him to say in words: 'We require you to take notice that our object in inclosing these bills of lading and bills of exchange is, that before you use the bills of lading you shall accept the bills of exchange.'" What they did here was this: I have read the letter of the 26th Sept. 1881. On that day the ship arrived at Hull. The defendants telegraphed to Krook and Co. for the charter on the 27th Sept. 1881. On the same day the charter is sent, and they write thus to Krook and Co., who were, as I have said, acting in the matter as the agents of the plaintiffs: "We are in receipt of your two favours of yesterday's date, the one inclosing bill of lading, policy of insurance, and invoice per Penelope. We also have copy of translation of shipper's protest, but we still do not see this is our matter at all. We bought a certain quantity of goods c. i. f. and in adopting the charter, of course it is for contract quantity, and this is a matter to be fought out between the shipper and the owner, and we must certainly look to the shipper for our redress. The Penelope commenced to discharge yesterday, and we have just been down to look at the cargo, and we are most annoyed to find it thoroughly out of condition, and not at all in accordance with the contract or representation; the boards are very sappy, and many nothing but one mass of black sap from end to end, and the quality of the narrow most inferior; in fact, our "fourths wifsta warfs" are infinitely superior. We therefore request you will come down at once, and we cannot accept the cargo in its present form, and no time must be lost, or the dock company will compel removal." Then they say that they are vexed it has turned out so badly. An answer was telegraphed on the 28th Sept. 1881—"If you send draft accepted to-day will come down to-morrow. Telegraph." The reply from the defendant is: "Steamer discharged to-night; bulk of cargo bad as can be; must have settlement before accepting draft; cargo must be removed at once." They write on the 28th Sept. 1881: "We have your telegram as follows: 'If you send draft accepted to-day, will come down to-morrow; telegraph.' We wired reply." Then they repeat their own telegram. "Many of the narrow widths are almost unmerchantable. Here the goods lie to be seen, and they speak for themselves." Now observe, at this moment the goods were on the wharf; they were not in the possession of the defendants at all. "We must commence to yard cargo to-morrow" (that is, we must remove it from the general wharf to our yard); "we certainly shall decline to receive cargo in its present state, and we think you should have come down at once to arrange a survey." The answer from Krook and Co. is another telegram: "Unless you return bill accepted you must send us back the documents by to-day's post." They reply on the 28th Sept. 1881: "We have your second telegram as follows" (which they quote), 'Unless you return bill accepted you must send us back all the documents by to-day's post.' This we must decline doing"—that is, they will neither accept nor send back the documents—"as we have paid part of the freight, and we request shippers to carry out their part of the contract, when we will do ours. It is no fault of ours this unpleasantness has arisen, and if only shippers would ship what they sell they would have little trouble. Having sold part of the cargo we do not intend to lose our profit, so you had better arrange to settle the matter without further loss of time. We are bound by the new rules of the dock company to commence yarding the cargo to-morrow, and we think you would have saved a lot of time if you had come down to-day." Is not that a clear repudiation? They say that they will not have the cargo; they will not accept the bill of exchange; they will not return the bill of lading; and they mean to take possession of the cargo to-morrow. Without the bill of lading they could not have taken possession of the cargo. The bill of lading was the only document which gave them any power or authority to take possession of the cargo. Their position is this: They say, "You have sent us the bill of lading which we are only to have upon the condition of accepting the bill of exchange; we will not accept the bill of exchange, we repudiate the cargo, we will not have it; but we have paid part of the freight, and we shall take possession of the cargo; we shall keep this bill of exchange, which is not ours, and which we have no right to keep, for the moment in order to enable us to take possession of this cargo, which is also not ours."

Then the correspondence goes on. I do not think it necessary to read all the letters, but there is one which is very material. The defendants write on the 30th Sept. 1881 to Krook and Co.: "The entire cargo is more or less out of condition and inferior, and if you think we shall accept without a guarantee as to survey you are mistaken, especially as we have heard to-day how a Borga shipper served a Grimsby firm once. We have been compelled to commence to remove the cargo, under the new rules of the dock company, and if you will repay us the freight and yarding charges and our profit on the portion we sold to arrive, we will return you the documents." In reply Krook and Co. on the 1st Oct. 1881 say: "We beg to acknowledge receipt of your favour of yesterday, which we will put before Messrs. Rew, Kington, and Co. on Monday, as they are not in town to-day. We have every wish to act fairly towards you by having the goods surveyed and obtain for you any allowance that you are fairly entitled to, but by taking the law into your own hands you prevent us from doing anything in the matter. We must now leave the case in the hands of Messrs. Rew, Kington, and Co., the owners of the cargo, and we feel sure you will find out that our opinion of the way in which you have treated this matter is correct." On the 3rd Oct. 1881 the defendants write saying: "We are in receipt of your favour of the 1st instant and note contents. We return invoice and bill unaccepted per cargo per s.s. Penelope, retaining bill of lading against freight and charges, &c., &c., which we have paid, and we are yarding this cargo for whom it may concern." Then there is some further correspondence, among which is a letter dated the 4th Oct. 1881 from the defendants to the plaintiffs: "In reply to your yesterday's favour we have already returned to Messrs. W. H. Krook and Co. all shipping documents per steamship Penelope, excepting the bill of lading, which we hold as security for freight, advance charges, and our loss sustained on the portion of the cargo sold to arrive and rejected by our buyers on account of bad condition and quality. The steamer arrived before the documents, and we paid freight on demand." There is no evidence when that freight was paid, but it seems to me quite immaterial whether they paid the freight before they got the bill of lading, or after they got it. If they paid it before they got the bill of lading, they paid it entirely at their own risk; if they paid afterwards, it is the same matter. The letter continues thus: "And as the goods are not in accordance with the contract in many ways, we have declined to receive them, and we will at once return you the bill of lading on your refunding us the freight charges and our loss of profit as named above. Perhaps you are not aware there is an overcharge." Then they mention an overcharge in the invoice of 11*l.* 3*s.* 10*d.* Then they say: "We offered at the outset to settle by survey, and the award (if any) to be guaranteed by you and paid us on maturity of bill; but, as this was not listened to, we simply refuse the cargo and ask you to remit us the freight, &c., as per statement inclosed, when we will hand you the bill of lading and hold the cargo to your order." The statement inclosed was as follows: "To freight paid, 615*l.* 2*s.* 1*d.*; yarding expenses, 179*l.*; eight days' interest, 13*s.* 5*d.*; bank commission, 1*l.* 10*s.* 9*d.*; loss of profits on 108 standards sold to arrive if goods had come in accordance with the contract, 90*l.* 18*s.* 10*d.*; making a total of 887*l.* 5*s.* 1*d.*" Then the next letter is the last I shall read. The defendants write again to Krook and Co. on the 5th Oct. 1881: "We are in receipt of your yesterday's favour returning us the invoice and draft per Penelope and insist we shall accept for a cargo of wood that is inferior, which we shall decline to do unless we have Messrs. Rew, Kington, and Co.'s guarantee there shall be a proper survey held at once by proper competent parties or party as may be agreed upon, and the sum awarded (if any) shall be paid by this firm to us on maturity of bill, as we shall decline to place ourselves in the hands of the shipper without such guarantee, for special reasons which we need not specify; and, further, we have no jurisdiction over him in his own country. Failing the above, we shall hold the cargo against freight, advance charges, &c., until we receive the money as regards the average."

That was the defendants' position. They insist upon retaining the bill of lading, which they received merely upon the condition that they should accept the bill of exchange, although they have not accepted the bill of exchange, and although they have repudiated the contract and say that they will not have the cargo, as they did most emphatically by the letter of the 4th Oct.—"We simply refuse the cargo." They say that they have taken possession of this cargo, and they will hold this cargo against all these charges which they insist on making against the plaintiffs. That is the simple position of the affair. The question is, what are the rights of the parties? The pleadings raise two cases: The plaintiffs ask, first of all, that the defendants may be ordered to accept the bill of exchange for the amount of the invoice, less the clerical error of 11*l.* 3*s.* 11*d.* which had arisen; and, further, "that it might be declared that until such acceptance and delivery of the said draft, or such payment of the said sum, the defendants were not entitled to retain or use the said bill of lading, or to obtain delivery of or deal with the said deals, battens, and goods." Then they ask for an injunction and a receiver and damages. The alternative claimed is based on this statement in paragraph 11 of the statement of claim: "The said vessel Penelope arrived at Hull on or about the 26th Sept. 1881, and the defendants, although they had full notice of the plaintiffs' rights, nevertheless wrongfully made use of the said bill of lading to obtain delivery to themselves of the said deals, battens, and wood goods, and they wrongfully and improperly took possession of the said deals, battens, and wood goods, and stacked the same in their yards at Hull, and have dealt therewith as the owners thereof." That is most completely made out by the evidence. It is plain from the letters which I have read that the defendants did wrongfully take possession of the goods, although they had repudiated the contract and refused to accept the bill of exchange, and that they availed themselves of their actual possession of the bill of lading, which they had no right to retain for a moment after they declined to accept the bill of exchange, in order to obtain possession of the goods. They could not obtain possession without the bill of lading, and they availed themselves of the bill of lading to get that possession. Then they informed the plaintiffs that they would retain the cargo until the plaintiffs paid all these charges. It is obvious that they were wrongdoers. They had no right whatever to retain the bill of lading. They had no right to make use of the bill of lading to enable them to obtain possession of the cargo. In one form or another of action—it is not material to determine which—the plaintiffs, who were the owners of this cargo, as between themselves and the defendants, have a right to recover damages against them for this wrongful dealing of theirs. The sort of ownership which the plaintiffs had is defined in the case of Sewell v. Burdick (52 L. T. Rep. N. S. 445; 10 App. Cas. 74). It is quite plain that it was an ownership, which, though special for certain purposes—that is to say, would render them liable probably in an action for the freight—still was an action which, as between them and the defendants, entitled them to take possession of the cargo if the bill of exchange was not excepted. The question is, what is the proper measure of damages? I understand, as the case was opened, it was claimed that the plaintiffs should recover the full value of these goods without making any allowance for any of these things, including freight. That did not seem to me to be right, and that kind of claim gave me some little trouble in looking into the cases. My opinion would be, if that claim were persisted in, that that would be putting the right too high, because it seems to me the case comes very near indeed, if not quite within, the authority of Chinery v. Viall (5 H. & N. 288), to which I have referred. Neither of these parties could ever have obtained possession of these goods without paying the freight, and for the freight of course there was a lien on the goods. Accordingly, to give the plaintiffs the value of the goods, without any allowance at all for the freight, would be giving them a great deal more than in any conceivable circumstances they could otherwise have obtained. That does not seem to be the proper measure of damages. But when the matter was discussed, counsel very properly said that they did not put the plaintiffs' claim so high as that. They did not deny that, in measuring the damages, the freight ought to be allowed, and accordingly it is not necessary for me to consider that matter more particularly. Then the question is, whether any, and if any which, of the other charges should be allowed. [His Lordship went through them, and concluded:] Of all these charges nothing, it seems to me ought to be allowed except the freight, which it is admitted should be allowed, and such actual out-of-pocket outgoings in respect of the sale which was made as upon inquiry may be thought to be proper.

There remain two questions: one is the question whether by way of damages, any allowance in the nature of interest for keeping the plaintiffs out of possession of their goods all this time, should be made. Primâ facie it seems to me that there should be some such allowance, not of course of interest, but that damages should be given to the plaintiffs for the long time they have been kept out of the possession of their own goods. The ordinary measure of such damages would be to take the value of the goods, and to allow damages on the footing of 5 per cent. (this being a mercantile transaction) upon the value from the time when the defendants wrongfully took possession of these goods. But then, of course, in estimating that, I must look to the delay that has taken place, and who is to blame for that delay. [His Lordship examined into this and said:] I cannot help seeing there has been a very considerable delay on both sides. Certainly a delay for which the defendants are to blame as much as the plaintiffs. Accordingly, it is a matter which must be taken into consideration by the court in estimating the damages If there were no delay attributable to the plaintiffs, I should think it right to give them damages computed on the footing of 5 per cent. on the value from the time the goods were improperly taken possession of by the defendants; but seeing there has been this delay on both sides, I shall give damages only at half the amount, computed at the rate of 2½ per cent.; that, as nearly as I can judge, will be what is just between the parties. Then there is the question of the costs of this action. It is said the action mainly asks that the defendants may be ordered to accept the bill of exchange. It is impossible for me to make a man accept a bill of exchange, especially when he has always said, from the first, that he would not accept it. To imply a contract to accept a bill of exchange from the wrongful taking possession of the goods, when the defendants have all along said, come what might, they would not accept the bill of exchange, seems to me to be out of the question entirely. But then I cannot see that that claim has added one farthing to the costs of the action. The evidence and the pleadings must have been entirely the same, whether that claim had been answered or not. That evidence has not been very long evidence, and it is evidence which I should have thought the parties might have put in a month or two without the least difficulty. It is altogether irrelevant to the main and important question in this action—namely, the question whether there was a wrongful taking possession of these goods or not, and the question what damages ought to be paid for the wrongful taking possession. Accordingly, as I think that the defendants have been in the wrong from the very first, it seems to me that I cannot make any order about the costs of this action, but that they must pay such costs. I do not think that the doubt that was raised about the freight makes any difference in that respect, although the question between these parties being very small, I should have thought it might have been determined in a much simpler way without the delay which has taken place. There must be an inquiry what was the value of the goods at the time the defendants took possession of them, and upon that 2½ per cent. must be computed from that time, by way of half measure of damages. According to my judgment, the plaintiffs will then be entitled to recover from the defendants that value to which the 2½ per cent. is added as damages from that time, minus the freight, and minus any proper expenses of the actual sale that took place—I mean out-of-pocket expenses—as to which, unless the parties can agree upon them, there will be an inquiry. I have no doubt, however, that the parties will probably be able to settle that matter between themselves. The out-of-pocket expenses of the actual sale will be paid out of the fund in court. The counter-claim, which was merely formal in order to give effect to the lien, will be dismissed with costs.

THE MERCHANT PRINCE. (a)

Collision—Lights—Flare-up—Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, arts. 2, 11.

The burning of a flare by vessels other than overtaken and fishing vessels is not forbidden by art. 2 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, though blame may be attributed to a vessel exhibiting a flare if such an exhibition is misleading and contributes to collision.

THIS was a collision action in rem instituted by the owners of the Norwegian ship Hans Gude against the steamship Merchant Prince to recover damages occasioned by a collision between the two vessels in the Straits of Gibraltar. The defendants counter-claimed.

The facts alleged by the plaintiffs were as follows: About 11.45 p.m. on the 20th April 1885 the Hans Gude, a full-rigged ship of 909 tons register, bound on a voyage from Marseilles to Saint Ubes in ballast, was in the Straits of Gibraltar. There was a strong breeze from E.S.E. and the weather was dark but clear. The Hans Gude was heading W. by N. and making about eight or nine knots an hour. Her regulation lights were being duly exhibited and were burning brightly, and a good look-out was being kept on board her. In these circumstances the masthead light of a steamer, which proved to be the Merchant Prince, was seen about five miles off and about two points on the starboard bow of the Hans Gude. The Hans Gude was kept on her course. Shortly afterwards the red light of the Merchant Prince came into view, on about the same bearing. Those on board the Hans Gude kept a careful watch on these lights. The Merchant Prince kept on for some time with her red light open on the starboard bow of the Hans Gude, and flare lights were accordingly burnt on the Hans Gude to attract the attention of those on board the Merchant Prince. The Merchant Prince then for a short time opened her green light and shut in her red, but again opening her red and shutting in her green light, she came on apparently at full speed, and although a flare light was again burnt on board the Hans Gude the Merchant Prince came into collision with her, striking with the stem the starboard bow of her Hans Gude, and doing so much damage that she sank, her master and seven of the crew being drowned.

The facts alleged on behalf of the defendants were as follows: At about 11.40 p.m. on the 20th April 1885 the steamship Merchant Prince, of 1111 tons net register, and bound on a voyage from Penarth to Genoa, was off the Straits of Gibraltar, heading S.E. magnetic, and making about 6 knots an hour. Her regulation lights were duly exhibited and burning brightly, and a good look-out was being kept. In these circumstances those on board the Merchant Prince observed a flare-up light, which proved to have been exhibited on board the Hans Gude, about one point on the port bow, and distant between one and two miles. No other light being visible from the Hans Gude, those on board the Merchant Prince concluded that the flare-up was being shown, in accordance with art. 11 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, by a steamer which they were overtaking, and therefore kept on their course. The flare-up light continued to be seen by them at intervals, and at about the same bearing, and, although it was carefully watched, nothing was observed to indicate in any way that it came from any vessel other than a steamer which the Merchant Prince was overtaking. But about midnight a very dim green light, belonging to the Hans Gude, suddenly came into view a little on the Merchant Prince's port bow, and distant about two ship's lengths. The engines of the Merchant Prince were immediately stopped and reversed full speed, and her helm put hard-a-port; but the Hans Gude, coming on at great speed, with her starboard bow struck the stem of the Merchant Prince.

The defendants (inter alia) charged the plaintiffs with a breach of art. 2 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea in improperly showing a flare-up light.

Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea.

Art. 2. The lights mentioned in the following articles, numbered 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, and 11, and no others, shall be carried in all weathers from sunset to sunrise.

Art. 10 (e). Fishing vessels and open boats may at any time use a flare-up in addition to the lights which they are by this article required to carry and show. All flare-up lights exhibited by a vessel when trawling, dredging, or fishing with any kind of drag net, shall be shown at the after part of the vessel, excepting that if the vessel is hanging by the stern to her trawl dredge or drag net, they shall be exhibited from the bow.

Art. 11. A ship which is being overtaken by another shall show from her stern to such last-mentioned ship a white light or a flare-up light.

Sir Walter Phillimore (with him Dr. Stubbs) for the plaintiffs.—The evidence establishes that the Hans Gude kept her course, and exhibited the lights required by the regulations. The steamer is therefore alone to blame. It is permissible to give warning to the approaching vessel, even though she is not an overtaking vessel, by exhibiting a flare. This is not prohibited by art. 2 of the regulations, which speaks of the lights that are to be "carried," and is therefore confined to fixed and permanent lights, and has no application to a temporary light like a flare:

The Anglo-Indian, 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 1; 33 L. T. Rep. N. S. 233; Marsden's Law of Collisions at Sea, 2nd ed., p. 316.

It is to be observed that art. 10 (e) permits fishing vessels and open boats to use a flare at any time. In an emergency where the circumstances require, it never could have been intended that vessels should not avail themselves of flares to warn approaching vessels, and so prevent collision. In the present case, had there been a good look-out on the steamer, the exhibition of the flares could not have been misleading, and should, by their altering position, have shown that the Hans Gude was approaching, and was not being overtaken.

Finlay, Q.C. (with him Barnes and Baden-Powell) for the defendants.—By art. 2 the lights mentioned in arts. 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, and 11, and "no others" are to be carried. A flare burnt on an approaching ship is not mentioned, and therefore the words "no others" prohibit its use. The regulations specifically state the circumstances under which a flare is to be shown, and to permit it to be within a master's discretion whether it shall be exhibited under other circumstances would in many cases conduce to collision. In the present case the steamer was misled, and was justified in thinking that she was overtaking the Hans Gude.

Sir JAMES HANNEN.—The first question I have to determine is one of law, viz., as to the construction of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea. It is contended on the part of the Merchant Prince that the exhibition of a flare light is forbidden by the regulations, except in two cases—one when the vessel is being overtaken, in which case it is shown astern; and the other in the case of fishing vessels. With regard to art. 11, it is to be observed that it says that "a ship which is being overtaken by another shall show from her stern a white light or flare-up light." That does not of itself forbid the use of a flare light in other cases. It is also to be observed that the word which is there used is "show." Now, the rule which is relied on as proving that the flare light is not to be shown unless under the circumstances mentioned, is art. 2, which says: "The lights mentioned in the following articles (3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, and 11), and no others, shall be carried from sunset to sunrise." Now, I am of opinion that it does not mean that no other lights shall be shown on any occasion, but that no other lights shall be carried as fixed lights except those mentioned. The difference in the language of the two rules indicates that it was not intended that the same thing should be meant by the words "carried" and "shown." I may state—though, of course, it does not influence my construction of the rule—that the Trinity Brethren consider that it has always been, so far as their experience goes, the construction which has been acted upon by nautical men, and that it has never been construed in practice that the showing of a flare-up light was forbidden if circumstances made its exhibition judicious. Therefore it always becomes a question depending on the circumstances whether or not the showing of a flare-up light is calculated to mislead. Of course if it is, and in consequence of that misleading an accident happens, the blame must be attributed to the vessel exhibiting the flare. That it must depend on the circumstances is further shown by this, that the rules contemplate the use of the flare light for trawling, dredging, and fishing boats; and though it has not been suggested that the Hans Gude was in such a position that she could be supposed to be a fishing vessel, it shows that there are circumstances in which it becomes necessary for a vessel which sees a flare-up light to consider whether it is an overtaken vessel or whether it is a fishing vessel.

That leads me to the circumstances of the case. The case on behalf of the Hans Gude is that, the wind being E.S.E., she was sailing a W. by N. course, when she sees two points on her starboard bow the white light of a steamer. That steamer, as it turns out, was the Merchant Prince, which was coming on a S.W. course, and she alleges that she saw the flare-up light two points on her point bow. It is alleged on behalf of the Hans Gude that the captain, who is unfortunately drowned, and therefore cannot give evidence, said that the steamer, the white light of which had been seen before the red light, seemed to be running into them, and that thereupon he gave orders that there should be a flare-up light exhibited. It is said by the defendants that, seeing this flare, they took it to be a steamer going in the same direction as themselves, which they were overtaking, and it may be that when they first saw it they were under that impression. Whether they saw the flares as soon as they ought is another question, and I think there is grave reason for doubt whether they did see them when they were first exhibited by the Hans Gude. But while they might for a short time have been under the impression that it was a steamer which they were overtaking, yet, if they had examined the course of the flares, they would have been able to see that it was not a vessel which they were overtaking, but one which was approaching them. The question is, was the steamer justified in persisting, as her case is that she did, in treating the Hans Gude as an overtaken vessel. I am advised that it is not improbable that the Hans Gude was sailing on a W. by N course. Indeed, in the judgment of the Trinity Masters, a W. by N. course is a course which a vessel might be expected to be sailing when proceeding on the voyage on which she was. I therefore see no reason to doubt the statement of those on the Hans Gude, that her course was W. by N. It has been said by the witnesses for the Merchant Prince that, thinking it was a steamer proceeding in the same direction as themselves, they expected to see the flares broaden on their bow. But we know as a fact that the vessel was not a steamer going in that direction, but that it was the Hans Gude steering W. by N. We must consider what would be the effect of that upon the broadening of the flares. If the Hans Gude were proceeding W. by N., then she would not broaden on the port bow of the steamer, but would grow closer and closer. The suggestion that the Hans Gude must have altered her course is not supported by evidence, and is not accepted by me. I come to the conclusion, therefore, that, if there had been better judgment exercised by those on board the steamer, it would have been seen that their first impression was an erroneous one, and that they should have taken some precautions to avoid collision in circumstances which they did not at first appreciate. In the captain's letter he says he saw a flare, but "he could not make it out." The only intelligible meaning that can be put upon these words is that he saw the flares, but did not know what they meant. Not knowing what they meant, he ought to have given them a wide berth or slackened his speed, in either of which cases the collision would not have occurred. All the circumstances tend to show that he thought, there being a flare, he had a right to assume, and continued to assume whatever else he saw, that this was a vessel which he was following.

An argument has been founded on the fact that, not only did the man who was sent by the commanding officer go to see that the green light was burning properly, but that others went also. For my part I can see no inconsistency in that. If they had not done this, it would have been argued ad nauseam that they had only the evidence of one man to rely on; and now that they have many, it is said that they are wrong, and that we are not to believe them. The truth is that those on board the Hans Gude were in doubt as to whether the other vessel would come into collision with them, and it was in the highest degree natural that they should go and see whether the light was burning brightly or not. I believe this collision has entirely arisen from the first impression, which may have been a natural one, having been adopted that the Hans Gude was a vessel which was being overtaken, and then no further thought was given to it, and owing to that assumption the Merchant Prince ran into the Hans Gude. For these reasons I am of opinion that the Merchant Prince is alone to blame.

THE BLENHEIM. (a)

Collision—Damage to cargo—Measure of damages—Loss of market—Freight—Lien.

When a cargo has been shipped, and the voyage is delayed by an accident not within the perils excepted in the contract of affreightment, in consequence of which the cargo has to be discharged, the shipowner has a lien on the cargo for the purpose of enabling him to earn his freight, and the cargo owner is not entitled to insist on delivery of the cargo without payment of freight before the completion of the voyage on which the freight is to be earned, but the shipowner may insist upon reshipping the original cargo if it is capable of being carried on.

The steamship K., having just started on a voyage from C. to B. with a cargo of coals, carried under charter for the plaintiffs, came into collision with the B. at the port of loading. The K. put back and discharged her cargo for the purpose of repairs. The coal was found to be damaged, and its owners (the plaintiffs) were advised that it was unfit for reshipment, and that, for the good of all parties interested, it should be sold at C., and not carried on to B. The owners of the K. refused to part with the cargo or to take any other cargo except upon fresh terms as to freight. The plaintiffs made no inquiry as to these terms, and the coals were reshipped and carried on to B., where, being useless for the purposes of the plaintiff's locomotives, for which it had been originally intended, it was used in the plaintiffs' smithies. The owners of the B. having admitted liability, and the damages being referred to the registrar, he reported that in his opinion the shipowner was not entitled to insist upon reshipment of the damaged cargo, and that the plaintiffs' damages were the loss they would have sustained if the coals had been sold at the port of loading.

Held, on objection to the report, that the cargo, though damaged, was capable of being carried on, and that, therefore, the shipowner having a lien upon it for freight to be earned, was entitled to insist upon carrying it on, or to exact fresh terms as to freight for another cargo, and that the damages were the loss to the plaintiffs at B., and not at C.; but that it was the duty of the cargo owner to have inquired what the fresh terms as to freight were, so as to diminish the loss as far as possible, and that in ascertaining this loss the saving which could have been effected by shipping a fresh cargo on new terms must be taken into consideration by the registrar, and that the report must go back to the registrar to ascertain the damages upon this basis.

Held, also, that the fact that the coal was used in the plaintiffs' smithies at B. did not necessarily show that the difference between the value of locomotive and smithy coals was the measure of the plaintiffs' loss, but the actual reduction in its value occasioned by the collision must be ascertained.

THIS was an objection by the plaintiffs in a damage to cargo action to the Assistant Registrar's report.

The action was brought by the plaintiffs, as owners of a cargo of coals on board the steamship Kairos against the owners of the steamship Blenheim and her freight, to recover damages caused to the cargo by reason of a collision between the Kairos and the Blenheim on 7th July 1882.

The defendants admitted their liability, and the damages were referred to the registrar and merchants to be by them assessed. The plaintiffs claimed 1742*l.* 7*s.* 3*d.*, and were allowed 643*l.* 12*s.*

The following is the registrar's report:

This was a claim by the Great India Peninsula Railway Company, as owners of a cargo of coals shipped in the steamship Kairos, for damage done in a collision between that ship and the steamship Blenheim in Penarth Roads on July 7, 1882. In an action by the owners of the Kairos the Blenheim was found solely to blame, and the claim of the Kairos was heard and reported upon in August, 1883. In a separate action by the owners of the cargo of the Kairos, the owners of the Blenheim admitted liability, but the reference of the cargo claim did not come on for hearing until the 25th July 1884, when it was adjourned for further evidence, and after some fruitless attempts at a settlement, the hearing was concluded on the 2nd inst. The collision happened just after the Kairos had come out of Penarth Docks, bound for Bombay with a cargo of coals, for the use of the Great India Peninsula Railway Company. The vessel was so much injured, being cut down to the water's edge, and a hole being made in her hold No. 3, that she had to be redocked for repairs, and all her cargo was taken out; but, on completion of the repairs, it was reshipped and carried to Bombay, where she arrived on Sept. 9, and her cargo was delivered. The plaintiffs' claim was based on the certificates of the surveyors who inspected the coal at Bombay shortly after it had been landed and stacked. It comprised four items:

	£	s.	d.
1. The loss by short delivery of 77 tons in excess of the usual waste, at Rs. 18, or 30*s.* per ton	115	10	0
2. The damage by salt water to the coal in No. 3 hold, 972·64 tons, at Rs. 2, 3*s.* 4*d.* per ton	162	2	3
3. The damage by excessive breakage to the whole cargo delivered, 2881¼ tons, at Rs. 6, or 10*s.* per ton	1440	15	0
4. Survey fees	24
	£1742	7	0

This estimate of the damage was objected to, and in our opinion justly, as being very excessive. First, the loss on the 77 tons short delivered had been taken at 30*s.* per ton, the supposed market value of the sound coal at Bombay after payment of freight and other charges; but should have been based on the cost price of 10*s.* per ton, no charges being payable on it, and the freight having been already settled by the defendants in the former action. Secondly, as regards the breakage, it was stated in the surveyor's certificates that "the whole of the coal contained an immense amount of very fine coal dust, almost like sand, and a very small proportion of medium and large sized coal, not sufficient to build up the walls of the stack," and the damage so caused by excessive breakage was estimated at Rs. 6, or 10*s.* per ton, the surveyors, it was added, being of opinion that if sold by auction it would show that deficiency on the sound value of similar coals. But first it would appear that the excessive breakage was to some extent at least not attributable to the collision, for in a letter of the 24th July 1882, from Mr. Winston, the plaintiffs' assistant coal inspector, who examined the coal at Cardiff shortly after its discharge, it was stated that sufficient care had not been exercised to prevent breakage, and that therefore there was a large quantity of small coal. Again, we think that the plaintiffs' surveyor used an erroneous test in measuring the plaintiffs' loss by the depreciation of the value of the coal if put up for sale by auction at Bombay. That, no doubt, would have been a proper test if the plaintiffs had been merchants importing the coal for resale, and therefore entitled to claim for loss of profit; but here the coal was for the plaintiffs' own use, and it appeared from the surveyor's 8th answer to the 11th interrogatory, and from the evidence of Mr. Berry, the plaintiffs' accountant, that the broken coal, though "in a great measure unfit and useless for locomotive purposes (for which it was imported), was used by the company in their smithies," for which they import annually about 2000 tons at a cost of only 6*d.* or 1*s.* less per ton than that of their coal for locomotive purposes. But another objection was taken to the claim, which, in our opinion, made it unnecessary to determine the amount of depreciation in the value of the coal at Bombay. From correspondence produced at the reference it appeared that Mr. Thomson, the plaintiffs' inspector at Cardiff, reported that about one-third of the cargo—the coal contained in hold No. 3—had been saturated with salt water, and thereby rendered unfit for reshipment to Bombay, and that the remaining quantity would "have to be hand picked in shipment, as there was a very large percentage of small, and as this would be a very costly process, and the result unsatisfactory," he strongly recommended that, for the good of all parties interested, the whole cargo should be condemned and sold. Such was stated to be the common way of dealing with damaged cargoes of coal at Cardiff, and it was admitted by the plaintiffs that it would have been the best way of dealing with this particular cargo. The reason given by them for not adopting it was that Mr. Stamp, the owner of the Kairos, refused to take any other cargo than the cargo actually discharged, except, as he stated in an affidavit, "upon fresh terms as to freight, &c." Upon this it was argued for the plaintiffs that they were bound to reship the same cargo at the risk of having to pay damages to the shipowner. Mr. Stamp, however, was not produced as a witness at the reference, nor did it appear that any attempt had been made by the plaintiffs to ascertain what was meant by "fresh terms as to freight, &c.," nor had they had any communication with Mr. Stamp, except through Messrs. Pirie and Co., who had chartered the ship from the owner and sub-chartered her to the plaintiffs. No authority was cited for the contention that the plaintiffs were bound to reship a damaged cargo at the port of shipment against the advice of their surveyors; nor was it shown on what reasonable grounds the shipowner could have insisted on reloading a damaged and possibly dangerous cargo rather than take a clean cargo of coals, which might have been shipped with probably less delay. It was further stated that, but for the owner's refusal, the sub-charterers, Messrs. Pirie and Co., were willing to ship a fresh cargo, but it did not appear why they should be bound to obtain the shipowner's approval for the shipment of a clean in place of a damaged cargo, or how either party would have been injured by the substitution. We therefore think that the plaintiffs ought to have sold the cargo at Cardiff in accordance with their inspector's advice, and that they are not entitled to recover the depreciation of the market value of the cargo when delivered at Bombay, but only the loss which they would have sustained if the cargo had been sold at Cardiff. From the evidence given at the reference as to the result of sales of similarly damaged cargoes at Cardiff, we gathered that the discharged cargo might have been sold at a loss not exceeding 4*s.* per ton on the cost price of 10*s.* per ton. Assuming, then, that the loss of weight consequent upon discharging the cargo at Cardiff was about 2 per cent., the average estimated loss of weight on delivery of such cargoes at Bombay, or about 60 tons on the whole cargo of 3019, we have allowed 30*l.*, or 10*s.* per ton in respect of that loss. On the remainder of the cargo, consisting of 2959 tons, which, in our opinion, ought to have been sold at Cardiff, we have allowed 600*l.*, being nearly at the rate of 4*s.* per ton. A sum of 12*l.* 6*s.* has been added to the claim as the cost of surveys at Cardiff. The claim having been so largely reduced, I am of opinion that the plaintiffs ought to pay the costs of the reference.

The plaintiffs objected to this report for the following, among other, reasons:

1. They were unable to compel John Pirie and Co. or Messrs. Gordon and Stamp to abandon the above-mentioned charter-parties and bill of lading, or to carry a new cargo of coal under the said charter parties and bill of lading, and were entirely unable to sell the said coal at Cardiff.

2. The evidence produced before the assistant-registrar and merchants proved that the plaintiffs had actually suffered damage to the amount claimed by them on the said items.

3. That, had the plaintiff sold the coals at Cardiff as suggested in the assistant-registrar's report, they would still have been liable to John Pirie and Co. for the freight under the charter-party between themselves and John Pirie and Co., and the bill of lading, for which no allowance is made.

4. That although the plaintiffs used the said coal in their smithies, yet that such coal was not equal to or as valuable as the coal they would otherwise have bought for that purpose, and that the plaintiffs' claim is made up in accordance with the proper measure of damages.

5. The plaintiffs pray that the said report may be reformed, and that the plaintiffs may be declared entitled to the sum of 1644*l.* 5*s.* 3*d.*, with interest and the costs of the reference, and that the court will make such order in the premises as it shall seem just.

The defendants filed an answer to the above objections.

Barnes for the plaintiffs. — The assistant-registrar has not assessed the plaintiffs' damages on a correct basis. He has wrongly assumed that the shipowner could not have insisted on carrying on the damaged cargo to Bombay. The shipowner had a legal right to carry the cargo on. He insisted on exercising this right, and so prevented the plaintiffs selling the cargo at Cardiff:

Notara v. Henderson, L. Rep. 7 Q. B. 229; 1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 278; 26 L. T. Rep. N. S. 442; Parson's Law of Shipping, edit. of 1869, pp. 217, 231.

They are therefore entitled to recover the depreciation in the value of the coal if put up for sale at Bombay. The coal, being unfit for locomotive purposes, was used up in the plaintiffs' smithies, although it proved of less value than the coal commonly burnt in the smithies.

Kennedy, Q.C. for the defendants,—The damage was caused by perils not excepted in the contract of carriage, and the shipowner is not entitled to unreasonably insist upon carrying the goods forward:

Notara v. Henderson, L. Rep. 5 Q. B. 346; 3 Mar Law Cas. O. S. 419; 22 L. T. Rep. N. S. 577;

If so, it was the duty of the plaintiffs to have sold the cargo at Cardiff, which might have been done at a loss of only 4s. per ton. Assuming the shipowner to have the right to retain the cargo, the plaintiffs had no right to allow it to go on without making some inquiry as to what terms the shipowner was willing to accede to in respect of another cargo. It might have been that the shipowner would have taken another cargo at only a small increase of freight, which would have diminished the loss occasioned by carrying the damaged cargo to Bombay.

Cur. adv. vult.

Aug. 4.—Sir JAMES HANNEN.—This case arises on the plaintiffs' objections to the assistant registrar to report. The facts are so clearly stated in the report that I need not recapitulate them. I regret that I cannot adopt the view of the registrar and merchants, as it is a very reasonable one, but I do not think it can be supported in law. I have no doubt that it would have been better for the cargo, and that it would not have been any disadvantage to the shipowner if a fresh cargo had been shipped at Cardiff instead of reshipping the damaged cargo, but I am of opinion that the shipowner was entitled to insist on the original cargo being reshipped if it was capable of being carried on, as appears to have been the case. The shipowner has a lien on the cargo for the purpose of enabling him to earn his freight, and the cargo owner is not entitled to insist on delivery of the cargo without payment of freight before the completion of the voyage on which the freight is to be earned.

Mr. Stamp was therefore acting within his legal rights in refusing (if he did refuse) to take any other cargo than that which was actually discharged. It does not appear, however, that Mr. Stamp absolutely refused to take a fresh cargo. He only refused to do so except "on fresh terms as to freight, &c." What these fresh terms were is not shown. It is pointed out by the assistant registrar that it did not appear that the plaintiffs inquired what these terms were, and this no doubt created a difficulty in estimating what the fresh terms as to freight would have been. I agree with the assistant registrar and merchants that it was the duty of the plaintiffs to make inquiry as to these terms in order that they might be able to form a judgment whether the benefit to be derived from shipping a fresh cargo would not more than compensate for the increased freight, and so diminish the loss for whomsoever it might concern. In the absence of any such inquiry, it was to be presumed that the shipowner would not have made use of his position to extort unreasonable terms. Any advance in freight which might have occurred after the signing of the charter-party might therefore have been taken into account in estimating what the loss could have been reduced to, if the plaintiffs had endeavoured, as they ought to have done, to diminish it as much as possible. I am of opinion therefore that the assistant registrar's estimate of the damage is not based on a correct principle, and that it is necessary to ascertain or estimate what would have been the increased freight payable in respect of a fresh cargo before comparing the loss which resulted on the damaged cargo at Bombay with the loss which would have arisen on sale of that cargo at Cardiff, and shipping a fresh one. I am also of opinion that the value of the coal to the plaintiffs at Bombay ought not be estimated at the price the plaintiffs' pay for coal for their smithies merely because they used this coal for smithy purposes, but that the true question is to what extent was the heating power of the coal reduced. Although it was in fact used by the plaintiffs in their smithies, it may have been of less value than that which they were accustomed to buy at 1*s.* or 6*d.* per ton less than that which they paid for coal for locomotive purposes.

Collision—Practice—Preliminary Act, art. 9.—"Distance and bearing of the other vessel when first seen"—Amendment.

Where in a collision action the questions in the Preliminary Act are improperly answered the court will always be disposed to view with suspicion the case of the party so answering, even though it appears to have been accidental, and if it proves to have been intentional the court will then scrutinise the case most closely and approach it with the gravest suspicion.

"The L. when first seen was at anchor" is an improper answer to art. 9 of a Preliminary Act inquiring the "distance and bearing of the other vessel when seen," and the court at the hearing ordered the party so answering to amend.

THIS was a collision action in rem instituted by the owners of the steamship Lobelia against the owners of the steamship Godiva to recover damages occasioned by a collision between these vessels on June 22, 1885.

The collision occurred in the river Scheldt at the entrance of Terneuzen Harbour in consequence of the Godiva and the Lobelia attempting to enter it at the same time. Art. 9 of the defendants' Preliminary Act inquiring the "distance and bearing of the other vessel when first seen" was answered as follows: "The Lobelia when first seen was at anchor."

On the case coming on for hearing, Raikes (with him Sir Walter Phillimore), for the plaintiffs, contended that the question was improperly answered and should be amended.

Bucknill, Q.C. (with him J. P. Aspinall), for the defendants, contra.

BUTT, J.—I am of opinion that this question is improperly answered, and I shall accede to the plaintiffs' application and order it to be amended. In all cases where I find the questions improperly answered, I am also disposed to view with suspicion the case of the party so answering, even though it appear to be accidental. But if it proves to have been done intentionally and with malice prepense, then I am inclined to scrutinise their case most closely and to approach it with the gravest suspicion. (a)

The Preliminary Act was accordingly amended as follows: "The Lobelia, when first seen, was distant about two miles, nearly ahead but on the port bow withal." In the result the Lobelia was found alone to blame.

THE CHEERFUL. (b)

Salvage—Ineffectual efforts—Ultimate salvage by others—Right to reward.

Where salvors in answer to a request for assistance render services which through no fault of theirs are ineffectual, and leave the vessel in distress in a worse position than the one in which they found her, they are entitled to no reward, even though the vessel be ultimately saved by other salvors.

THIS was a salvage action instituted by the owners, master, and crew of the steamship City of Hamburg against the steamship Cheerful, her cargo and freight, in respect of services rendered thereto in the English Channel. The defendants counter-claimed for damage occasioned by collision with the City of Hamburg during the performance of the alleged service.

According to the evidence of the plaintiffs the particulars of the services were as follows: About 10 p.m. on the 1st Feb. 1885, the City of Hamburg, of 1220 tons gross, and laden with a general cargo on a voyage from Rotterdam to Belfast, was proceeding down the English Channel, and was about eight miles S.S.W. of Anvil Point. A fresh gale was blowing from about S.W. accompanied by heavy squalls and rain, and a heavy cross sea was running. About this time the masthead and red lights of the Cheerful, a steamer of 1014 tons gross, were sighted distant about three-quarters of a mile. Shortly afterwards she was seen to haul down her masthead light, and to replace it with three red lights. She also commenced burning blue lights and sounded her whistle. The City of Hamburg thereupon proceeded towards the Cheerful, and on coming up with her it was found that she had lost her propeller. The master of the Cheerful asked to be towed to Portland, and after considerable difficulty the City of Hamburg was made fast ahead of the Cheerful. During the time the hawsers were being made fast, the two vessels had drifted three miles nearer the shore, on to which the wind and sea were setting them fast. About 12.15, Anvil Point then bearing about N. by E half E. and about five miles distant, the City of Hamburg commenced towing. About 3 a.m. the Shambles was bearing W.S.W., distant about half a mile, and the wind was about S. blowing a whole gale when the port hawser parted. The engines of the City of Hamburg were at once eased, and about a quarter of an hour later the starboard hawser parted. The engines of the City of Hamburg were at once stopped, and the broken hawsers were hauled on board. Whilst this was being done both vessels drifted towards the Shambles and Portland Race, as the tide was setting them in that direction. The Cheerful then let go her anchor, and was brought up about two and a half miles distant from the Shambles Light, which bore about S.E. by E. half E. About 7.30 a.m. those on board the Cheerful requested the City of Hamburg to bend a line on to a life buoy and steam across the bows of the Cheerful, so that the buoy might be streamed across her bows and be picked up. The City of Hamburg, having got upon the starboard bow of the Cheerful, and having dropped her buoy, commenced to drift towards the Cheerful, when her engines were put full speed ahead, and her helm hard aport. But when just ahead of the Cheerful a terrific squall struck her, and drove her athwart the Cheerful's bows, and her port quarter fouled the stem of the Cheerful, thereby causing damage to both vessels. Efforts were then made to pass a line, but, as the City of Hamburg was in great danger herself and could render no further assistance, she bore away for Portland, and there came to anchor. Her master then caused information to be sent to Weymouth of the position in which the Cheerful was, and in the course of the day she was towed into Portland Roads in (a) These observations of the learned judge show the importance of a rigid compliance with the requirements of preliminary acts. The rule of court regulating the filing of and other matters incidental to preliminary acts is Order XIX., r. 28. By this rule preliminary acts are to be filed within certain specified times "in actions in any division for damage by collision between vessels, unless the court or a judge shall otherwise order." The object of these documents is well put by Dr. Lushington in the case of The Vortigern (Swa 519), where he says: "Preliminary acts were instituted for two reasons: to get a statement from the parties of the circumstances recenti facto, and to prevent the defendant from shaping his case to meet the case put forward by the plaintiff." To prevent either party knowing the contents of his opponent's preliminary act, they have to be filed and sealed up before any pleading is delivered, and are not to be opened until ordered by the court or a judge. In order to prevent any evasion of the objects for which these documents were instituted, the court has always set his face most strongly against allowing amendments in a preliminary act after it has been filed: (The Frankland, 1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 207; L. Rep. 3 Ad. & Ecc. 511.) So careful has the court been to prevent the object of preliminary acts being defeated, that even where the party applying to amend his preliminary act stated upon affidavit prior to the hearing of the action that the mistake was the result of a clerical error, the court refused to allow the amendment; (The Miranda, 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 595; 7 P. Div. 185.) In The Biola (3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 125) an ingenious but unsuccessful attempt was made to evade the object of these documents by delivering prior to the close of the pleadings interrogatories which sought to obtain the information given in the preliminary act. Sir Robert Phillimore, however, without stating any reasons, very properly, as it would seem, ordered these interrogatories to be struck out. But in the subsequent case of The Radnorshire (4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 338; 5 P. Div. 172) the same learned judge allowed similar interrogatories apparently on the ground that they were neither unreasonable, vexatious, nor scandalous. It is to be noticed that in the report of this latter case it does not appear at what stage of the proceedings these interrogatories were administered. We, however, presume that this decision would not apply to cases where similar interrogatories were administered prior to the delivery of any pleading, as were this allowed a defendant would be in the possession of information which would enable him to shape his case to meet that put forward by the plaintiff, and so one of the principal objects of preliminary acts would be defeated.

(a) Reported by J. P. ASPINALL and BUTLER ASPINALL, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

safety. But for the services of the City of Hamburg the Cheerful must have driven ashore near St. Alban's Head. Inside the Shambles where the Cheerful was towed she was in a place of comparative safety. The City of Hamburg in rendering the services consumed ten tons of coal, and sustained considerable damage. She towed the Cheerful about sixteen miles.

On behalf of the defendants it was denied that whilst the hawsers were being made fast in the first instance, the vessels drifted nearer to the shore, or that the wind and sea were setting them in that direction. It was alleged that the Cheerful lost her propeller about 10.30 p.m. on the 1st Feb. about eight miles from Anvil Point. After the City of Hamburg had taken the Cheerful in tow the wind and sea gradually increased. The defendants alleged that the collision at the Shambles was due to the negligent navigation of the plaintiffs, and stated that the City of Hamburg not only did not render any beneficial services, but that the position in which she left the Cheerful was worse than that in which she was when first taken in tow.

The defence, so far as is material, was as follows:

8. The defendants deny that the City of Hamburg was ever until the collision in peril, and also deny the allegations that she rescued the Cheerful from a position of the greatest danger, and towed her to a place of comparative safety. The Cheerful, though deprived of her steam power, and to a considerable degree unmanageable, was in no immediate danger when the City of Hamburg first took her in tow, and the defendants deny that but for the services of the City of Hamburg the Cheerful would have been driven ashore or wrecked.

9. The City of Hamburg did not render any beneficial services to the Cheerful. The place to which the Cheerful was towed, and in which she was left by the City of Hamburg, was a worse position than that in which she was when first taken in tow, and the danger of the position in which she was placed by the City of Hamburg was greatly aggravated by the damage which was done to the Cheerful by the collision with the City of Hamburg through the negligence and want of care and skill on the part of those on board the City of Hamburg.

10. The defendants say that the plaintiffs are not entitled to award or compensation in respect of damage or detention for repairs caused wholly by the fault of those on the City of Hamburg.

11. The defendants submit that in the circumstances herein appearing the plaintiffs are not entitled to any salvage remuneration.

The defendants counter-claimed in respect of the damage occasioned to the Cheerful by the collision with the City of Hamburg.

The facts upon which the learned judge based his decision are found in the judgment.

The plaintiffs did not establish by their evidence that it was in consequence of the information sent by them to Weymouth of the Cheerful's position that she was ultimately saved.

Sir W. Phillimore (with him Bucknill, Q.C.) for the plaintiffs.—The plaintiffs' services did in fact contribute to the ultimate safety of the Cheerful. They were rendered at the express request of the defendants, and should therefore, on the authorities, be rewarded as being in the nature of salvage services;

The Undaunted, Lush. 90; 2 L. T. Rep. N. S. 520;
The Atlas, Lush. 518;
The E. U., 1 Spinks, 63.

In the Melpomene (L. Rep. 4 A. & E. 129; 29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 405; 2 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 122) the court awarded salvage, although the plaintiffs' efforts were unavailing, and the ship was saved by other salvors. The defendants in the present case have failed to establish the plea of negligence.

Myburgh, Q.C. (with him Kennedy, Q.C.) for the defendants.—According to the decision of Dr. Lushington in The India (1 W. Rob. 406), "Salvage reward is for benefit actually conferred in the preservation of property, not for meritorious exertions alone." In the present case no actual benefit was conferred, and the plaintiff's exertions, instead of being meritorious, were so negligent as to entitle the plaintiffs to succeed on their counter-claim. As a matter of fact the original danger to the Cheerful was considerably augumented by the plaintiffs' services.

BUTT, J.—In this case the steamship Cheerful, a vessel of 1014 tons gross register, broke down through the loss of her propeller at a distance which, I think, was stated at from seven to ten miles from Anvil Point. The steamer City of Hamburg, which is a vessel of somewhat larger tonnage, at once came to her assistance. The accident happened sometime about 10 p.m. on the 1st Feb. whilst the Cheerful was on a voyage from London to Liverpool. The weather at the time was not perhaps very bad, but it was bad, and it is alleged on the part of the salvors that if they had not taken the vessel in tow she must have gone on to the coast to the northward, in which case the probability is that every person on board would have been lost, the coast being very dangerous just at that position. The defendants on the other hand by their witnesses say: True the vessel broke down, but there was no immediate danger of our going ashore, and in point of fact, if we had been left by the City of Hamburg altogether, it is not likely we should have gone ashore. The City of Hamburg on coming up is asked to tow the Cheerful into port. She took her in tow for that purpose, and they proceeded together for Portland Roads. But when near the lightship on the Shambles both the hawsers parted, at which time no doubt the position of the vessel was one of considerable danger. The Cheerful let go her anchor. The wind at this time seems to have been tending to the southward more and more, and getting more violent. The anchor was let go at about 3 a.m. in the morning. The City of Hamburg was at that time in an uninjured condition. She stood by, and some time later on, in consequence of a request from those on the Cheerful, she proceeded to steam across her bows from the port side of the Cheerful, on which she lay, to her starboard side, with the view of dropping a life buoy and then sweeping a line across the bows of the Cheerful with the view of again getting the hawser on board. In the course of that manœuvre she got out of command. It is said that she fell into the trough of the sea, and those on board of her assert that she was struck by a very heavy squall, and so came across the bows of the Cheerful, causing damage to both vessels. Somewhere about 9.30 on the same morning a tug called the Queen came to the assistance of the Cheerful, took her in tow, and with some slight assistance rendered by another tug took her into Falmouth harbour, and there left her in a position of safety. Some questions of importance have been raised in this case. It is necessary to consider the amount of danger this vessel was in at different periods of the time in question. There is no doubt that when she broke down off Anvil Point there was some risk. The Elder Brethren do not advise me that there was anything like imminent risk of her then going ashore. There is no doubt that, after the hawsers had parted in the neighbourhood of the Shambles, and after the Cheerful had let go her anchor and been brought up, she was in a position of very considerable danger. That danger was augmented to no considerable extent by the damage sustained in the collision with the City of Hamburg, and the Elder Brethren agree in advising me that the position in which the Cheerful was when the City of Hamburg left her was one of very considerably greater danger than the position she was in when first taken in tow.

That being so, the question arises as to whether the owners, master, and crew of the City of Hamburg are entitled to salvage remuneration. I confess to the greatest possible reluctance in deciding a case of this sort against the salvors, but I feel constrained to abide by what, in my opinion, are the authorities which have been laid down on this subject, and to hold, the language of Dr. Lushington in the case of the The India (ubi sup.), that "unless the salvors by their services conferred actual benefit on the salved property, they are not entitled to salvage remuneration." It follows from what I have said that no actual benefit was conferred on this vessel by the services rendered by the City of Hamburg, because she was left in a position of greater peril than she occupied before. I may say that, in dealing with the question of the relative amount of danger, the Elder Brethren and myself have not left out of our minds the fact that the Cheerful was near Portland harbour, where tugs are to be obtained. Then comes the question of the counterclaim. It is said by those who represent the Cheerful that the manner in which the City of Hamburg was navigated was negligent. I have asked the Elder Brethren their view upon the matter, and although one of them, if not both, are inclined to think that greater care and skill might have been used, and would have avoided the collision, yet, seeing the exigency of the position, and danger in which the Cheerful was placed and the condition of the weather, the manœuvre does not constitute negligence. I therefore pronounce that there was no negligence within the legal meaning on the part of the City of Hamburg, and I must dismiss the counterclaim. The order is, that both claim and counterclaim are dismissed, and I make no order as to costs.

The judgment of Mathew and Day, JJ. (5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 443; 52 L. T. Rep. N. S. 898) affirmed.

THIS was an appeal from a judgment of Mathew and Day, JJ., reported 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 443; 25 L. T. Rep. N. S. 898. A special case was stated for the opinion of the court by agreement between the parties in an action brought by the Barrow-in-Furness Mutual Ship Insurance Company Limited against Thomas Ashburner, to recover the sum of 342*l.* 5*s.* 3*d.* for calls, contributions, and interest thereon due from the defendant as a member of the company under the circumstances therein stated, which, so far as material were as follows:—

The Barrow-in-Furness Mutual Ship Insurance Company was completely registered and incorporated under the provisions of the statutes 7 & 8

(a) Reported by A. A. HOPKINS, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Vict. c. 110 and 10 & 11 Vict. c. 78, in the year 1858, and the defendant was duly admitted a member thereof in June 1863, and subject to the facts hereinafter stated insured, and continued to keep insured, several vessels in the said company, and paid the entrance fees and calls thereon. He was elected treasurer of the company on the 27th Nov. 1878, and continued to act as such until the 29th June 1881.

Up to the year 1879 a policy was issued by the company to the defendant on all ships proposed by him to the company for insurance and accepted, but after that date no policies (with the exception hereinafter stated) were issued by the company mentioned, or any company succeeding it before the commencement of the action. The last policies issued to the defendant (with the exception above-mentioned) were issued on two accepted proposals of the 31st March and the 11th Oct. 1879 respectively. The practice of the other members of the company, and the practice of the defendant after the expiration of the policies mentioned, was that after the expiration of the first time policy no new policy was issued, but instead thereof stamped receipts were given for calls.

On the 29th Dec. 1880, at a special general meeting of the company, summoned for that purpose in accordance with the rules of the company, the following resolutions were reduced to writing, and put to the vote, and carried unanimously:

Resolved that the business, credits, assets, and effects of the company be transferred to a company to be called the Barrow-in-Furness Mutual Ship Insurance Company Limited on the terms of the said intended company paying and discharging all the debts, liabilities, and obligations of the company entered into, and subsisting, and capable of taking effect as at the 25th March last.

Resolving that the Barrow-in-Furness Mutual Ship Insurance Company be and the same is hereby absolutely dissolved.

The defendant was present at the meeting, and took an active part in the discussion of the proposals and voted in favour of the said resolutions. The proposed articles of association, in the form in which they were subsequently registered, were read over at this meeting, and explained to the meeting by the solicitor for the company, and were approved of.

The said resolutions were unanimously confirmed at a subsequent special general meeting held for that purpose on the 25th Feb. 1881. The defendant was not present at that meeting, but he had on the 10th Jan. 1881 given the secretary of the said company a proxy to vote for him at the said meeting.

On the 11th April 1881 the memorandum and articles of association subsequently registered were signed by seven persons who were directors of the old company, and at a meeting of the company held on the 19th April 1881 it was intimated to the members present by the secretary that the company had been registered as a limited company. This was found to be a mistake, but until the mistake was discovered the company acted as if it had been so duly registered.

On the 22nd June 1881 a consent to take the name of a subsisting company was signed by two directors of the old company.

On the 29th June 1881, at what purported to be a meeting of the new company, directors were elected, and the secretary of the old company was elected secretary of the new company. The defendant ceased to be treasurer at this date.

The new company was duly registered on the 3rd Feb. 1882 under the name of the Barrow-in-Furness Mutual Ship Insurance Company Limited, with a memorandum and articles of association.

After the passing of the foregoing resolutions, and until the registration of the new company, business was carried on as before, sometimes in the name of the new company, and sometimes in the name of the old company, but the business of the old company was purported to be carried on by the new company.

The defendant after the passing of the said resolutions, and before the registration of the new company, continued to keep his vessels on the books of the company, as insured, and paid calls upon the said vessels, and intended to remain insured as before, but no policy of insurance was given to the defendant.

On the 6th April 1881 the defendant wrote to the secretary of the company, in reply to an application for calls made up to the 25th March 1881, complaining that six sixty-fourths of a certain ship had not been withdrawn according to notice, giving a list of the share of his vessels insured in the company, and asking for a corrected account. The alterations were made as requested, and some time after the defendant examined the register of insurances.

On the 11th Sept. 1881 the defendant proposed a vessel for insurance, and paid an entrance fee for the same. No policy was then issued for this vessel, but on the 14th July, 1882, the directors of the new company, after a letter from the defendant of the 11th July, 1882, demanding the return of the entrance fee, executed a time policy from the 11th Sept., 1881, to the 11th Sept., 1882, but claimed to retain the same for a lien on it for calls unpaid by the defendant. With the exception of this policy, no policy was issued by the new company to the defendant or to any member before the commencement of the action. No call was ever made on the vessel for which this policy was issued.

After the registration of the new company the defendant continued the same course of business as before, as shown by letters of the 1st and 11th April 1882, giving notice of withdrawal of shares in certain ships.

The defendant having failed to comply with the requests of the company's secretary for the payment of amounts alleged to be due from the defendant to the company, the writ in the action was issued on the 29th July, 1882, the claim of the plaintiff company being for three calls with interest, made respectively on the 21st Sept., 1881, the 25th Jan., 1882, and the 25th March, 1882, amounting in all to 342*l.* 5*s.* 3*d.* These calls were made to meet actual losses which had happened to vessels whose owners had paid the usual entrance fee, and who had made proposals which were duly accepted, but no policy had been issued for any of these vessels.

All the losses which had happened before the 29th Dec. 1880, and all the working expenses up to that date, were, with the exception of a liability of 375*l.*, included in a call made on the 29th June, 1881, which was paid by the defendant on the 9th Jan., 1882.

Between the 29th Dec. 1880 and the 25th Feb.

1881 two vessels were lost, involving a liability of 1330*l.* 10*s.* 0*d.* The defendant's share of this liability, if any, would be one-seventh of that amount. The call of the 25th Jan. 1882 was made to cover this liability.

There were no losses between the 25th Feb. and the 29th June 1881.

The Court of Chancery of the County Palatine of Lancaster, upon the application of the defendant, by orders made on the 30th April, the 18th June, and the 13th Aug. 1883, ordered the defendant's name to be removed from the register of members of the plaintiff company.

It was agreed by the parties that the question of amending the statement of claim by adding the name of the old company as plaintiffs, and all questions of amendment, should be for the court.

The question for the opinion of the court was whether the plaintiffs were entitled to recover the sum of 342*l.* 5*s.* 3*d.* or any and what part thereof.

The Divisional Court gave judgment in favour of the plaintiff company.

The defendant appealed

Bigham, Q.C. and Neville for the defendant.—The defendant is not liable to pay any of the sums demanded. The payments to which the defendant is asked to contribute were made on contracts prohibited by statute. By 30 & 31 Vict. c. 23, s. 7, it is enacted that "No contract or agreement for sea insurance (other than such insurance as is referred to in the 55th section of the Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act 1862) shall be valid unless the same is expressed in a policy; and every policy shall specify the particular risk or adventure, the names of the subscribers or underwriters, and the sum or sums insured; and in case any of the abovementioned particulars shall be omitted in any policy, such policy shall be null and void to all intents and purposes. By sect. 9 of the same Act it is further enacted that "No policy shall be pleaded or given in evidence in any court, or admitted in any court to be good or available in law or in equity, unless duly stamped; and it shall not be lawful for the said commissioners or any officer of Inland Revenue to stamp any policy at any time after it is signed or underwritten by any person on any pretence whatever." And further, by sect. 13 of the same Act, a penalty of 100*l.* is imposed on any person becoming an assurer unless the insurance is in writing and duly stamped. By 30 & 40 Vict. c. 6, s. 2, the 16th section of the Stamp Act 1670 is applied to sea policies, and such policies may be stamped after execution on payment of a penalty of 100*l.* In the present case no policies were issued, and the contracts were therefore expressly malum prohibitum. [Brett, M.R.—Is not the defendant estopped from setting up any such defence?] Not if the contracts are expressly prohibited by statute. [Brett, M.R.—The statute does not prohibit such contracts, but only attaches certain inconveniences to the making of them in such and such a way.] By this means the Revenue is defrauded, because the policies must be stamped; that is provided for in sects. 13 and 14 of 30 & 31 Vict c. 38. Penalties attach to the making of policies and leaving them unstamped, and therefore such contracts as these are distinctly prohibited, and the statute provides a penalty against anyone acting in contravention of its provisions. Such enactments amount to a prohibition upon contracts made otherwise than in accordance with the statute, and therefore no estoppel can arise:

Re London Marine Insurance Association; J. W. Smith's case, 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 280; 21 L. T. Rep. N. S. 97; L. Rep. 4 Ch. 611.

Henn Collins, Q.C. and K. Digby for the plaintiff.—The defendant is estopped from saying that the contracts were invalid. It may be that they are invalid, but the defendant cannot set that up. The statute provides a penalty for making unstamped policies, and that penalty is the only one attaching to the act. The statute does not prohibit the making of such contracts as these so as to make it an offence, and so as to prevent any estoppel being set up against it. If that is the true construction of the statute, the defendant is clearly estopped, inasmuch as his acts have misled the society and every member of it. All societies of this sort are based upon the assumption that all members will contribute their share of the losses incurred. They cited

Edwards v. Aberayron Mutual Ship Insurance Society, 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 154; 34 L. T. Rep. N. S. 457; 1 Q. B. Div. 563;

Bigham, Q.C., in reply, referred to

Bensley v. Bignold, 5 B. & Ald. 335

Brett, M.R.—I must first express my pleasure at the ability and tact displayed by counsel in arguing this case, and I must then express my disgust at the defence, which is a disgraceful, but I am glad to say, wholly unsuccessful, attempt to back out of a liability. The defendant was a most active member of two mutual insurance societies, the business of the old company being turned over to the new company by resolutions passed to effect that change, and, though the process was carried out a little irregularly, I think the result was that the old company existed until the new one was registered. At any rate, the defendant was an active member of both companies upon those terms, which are always the terms of societies such as these—namely, that if his vessels were lost the other members of the society should pay his losses, and if other members lost vessels he should contribute to pay theirs. The contracts of insurance in such cases are really made between the members, and the society is only the machinery for collecting and paying the various amounts. This defendant dealt throughout as if he and the other members had validly insured their ships, and withdrew vessels and added vessels just as and when it suited his convenience. When the policies came to be renewed, the practice of this society was to do so by means of an unstamped receipt, and it is said that the defendant did not know what was the course of business in this respect; that is an unsupported assertion, and I am satisfied that he, of all the members of the society, was well acquainted with the custom. Losses occur and a call is made, and I think it is certain that he knew that the call was made in respect of losses occurring under renewal or unstamped policies. What does he do? He writes a letter showing quite plainly that, though on other grounds he objects to the amount, he considers the call valid and binding on him. Thereupon the losses are assessed and calculated and the amounts apportioned to the various members in proportion to their interests in the society, and these amounts are paid by them. The amounts to be paid by the various members are of course calculated upon the assumption that all will pay, and upon that assumption all the insurances had been entered into; and I think it is plain that the defendant by refusing to contribute his share of the losses had misled the other members, both those who had to pay and those who had to receive, and the society representing the members.

Now such conduct on his part is a clear estoppel upon his now setting up that the calls were invalid on the ground that the contracts were illegal, unless such an estoppel is prevented by something else. If the estoppel set up was against a criminal or prohibited contract, there would of course be no estoppel. It is said that the contracts are prohibited by sects. 13 and 14 of 30 & 31 Vict. c. 23. Those are sections dealing with stamps and requiring stamps to be affixed to certain documents; they assume a contract, and what is aimed at is that, whether these documents are stamped or not, certain advantages shall accrue to the Revenue. It was no offence at common law not to stamp such documents, and therefore the Legislature in requiring a stamp is imposing an obligation upon persons which the common law did not impose upon them; and the Legislature, at the time of imposing the burden, also enacts the penalty for not complying with the terms of the enactment. I am of opinion that the consequence of disobedienee under such circumstances is the consequence enacted, and that that is the only consequence. It is not true to say that a person could be indicted for a breach of this Act of Parliament; the only consequence to him would be that he would be liable to the payment of a penalty. I think that is the construction of those sections, and the latter Act to which we were referred—viz., 39 & 40 Vict. c. 6—is fatal to the idea of a crime in such a case, because that statute authorises the officer of the court to affix a stamp, and, on the payment of a penalty, to make this so-called prohibited thing a valid document. There is nothing in sects. 13 and 14 of 30 & 31 Vict. c. 23 prohibiting such contracts; on the contrary they assume them to be good and valid, and only require a stamp. I think that, whether these policies were valid policies or not, the defendant has estopped himself from saying that the insurances were not valid, Baggallay, L.J.—I am of the same opinion.

Bowen, L.J.—I agree as to the estoppel. I think that the true construction of the Act is, not that the contract is prohibited or illegal, but that penalties are attached to the making of it in any but a certain way.

Appeal dismissed.

Charter-party—"Ready quay berth as ordered by charterer"—Demurrage.

By a charter-party it was agreed that the plaintiffs' vessel, after loading a cargo, should proceed "to London or Tyne Dock to such ready quay berth as ordered by the charterers." Demurrage at an agreed rate per day, and the captain or owners to have an absolute lien on the cargo for all freight, dead freight, and demurrage.

The vessel was ordered by the charterers to a London dock, but upon her arrival there there was no quay berth ready for her reception, and a delay of one day was thereby caused in discharging her cargo.

Held, that, on the true construction of the charter-party, the charterers were bound to name and provide a ready quay berth, and that for a delay caused by their neglecting to do so the plaintiffs were entitled to a lien on the cargo for demurrage, the damages being sufficiently in the nature of demurrage to come within the demurrage clause in the charter-party.

Judgment of Mathew, J. affirmed.

This was an appeal from a judgment of Mathew, J. sitting at Nisi Prius without a jury.

By a charter-party made on June 21, 1882, between the plaintiffs and E. J. Hough and Co., for the charter by Hough and Co. of the plaintiffs' steamship, the Wimbledon, it was agreed that the Wimbledon should proceed to Tripoli, and there load a cargo of esparto fibre, and when so loaded should proceed "to London or Tyne Dock to such ready quay berth as ordered by the charterer," "cargo to be delivered as fast as steamer can deliver per working day, weather permitting, Sundays, Bank Holidays, Good Friday, and Christmas Day, and accidents excepted." "Demurrage to be at the rate of 30*l.* per running day." "In no case, unless in berth before noon, shall the lay days count before the day following that on which the vessel is in berth at ports of loading and discharging, ready to load or deliver, and notice thereof given in writing." "The captain or owners having an absolute lien on the cargo for all freight, dead freight, and demurrage in respect thereof."

In the month of July 1883 a cargo of esparto fibre was shipped on board the Wimbledon at Tripoli, under a bill of lading, by which the cargo was made deliverable to Hough and Co., or their assigns, they paying freight and performing all other conditions as per charter-party.

The charterers ordered the vessel to Millwall Dock, London, and she arrived in that dock on the evening of the 13th Aug. 1883, but no quay berth was there ready for her, and she was never able to get alongside a quay berth until the 16th Aug.

The consequence of there being no quay berth ready for her reception was that a delay was caused in the discharging of the vessel's cargo, in respect of which delay the plaintiffs claimed a lien upon the cargo for two days' demurrage at 30*l.* per day, according to the charter-party. The plaintiffs, therefore, under the Merchant Shipping

(a) Reported by A. A. Hopkins, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Amendment Act 1882, put a stop-order on the goods by landing them and placing them with the Millwall Dock Company, subject to the lien for 60*l.* for two days' demurrage.

The defendants had bought the cargo from the charterers, and claimed the delivery of it to them as owners, by virtue of the delivery orders given to them by the charterers, under and by virtue of the bill of lading; but in consequence of the stop order they were obliged to deposit the sum of 60*l.* with the Millwall Dock Company in order to obtain delivery of the cargo.

The defendants disputed the plaintiffs' right to the lien, and gave notice, under the statute, to the dock company to retain the 60*l.* on their behalf.

The plaintiffs thereupon brought the action to establish their right to the lien, and to recover the 60*l.* so deposited by the defendants.

The action was tried before Mathew, J. without a jury, and that learned judge held that, according to the true construction of the charter-party the plaintiffs had a lien for demurrage if the charterers delayed the vessel beyond the time required for discharging her, either by failing to provide her with a quay berth or by delay in discharging. He gave judgment for the plaintiffs for 30*l.*, as it appeared from the evidence that the failure to provide a quay berth had only caused a delay of one day. The plaintiffs agreed to accept that amount.

The defendants appealed.

Gully, Q.C. and Douglas Walker for the appellants.—The destination of this vessel was a quay berth. Until she reached that destination the lay days would not begin to run, and therefore demurrage could not begin to be reckoned until the vessel was alongside a quay berth in the Millwall Dock, to which dock she was ordered by the charterers. (Murphy v. Coffin, 12 Q. B. Div. 87.) (a) After that time there was no delay, and therefore there is in this case no claim for demurrage proper, and if there is no claim for demurrage proper the plaintiffs have no lien on the cargo. It may be that the plaintiffs have some remedy against the charterers for delaying the vessel, assuming that the true meaning of the clause in the charter-party is that the charterers are bound to provide a ready quay berth; but that is a remedy against them only, and it is not a claim within the demurrage clause of the charter-party, and does not give them a lien on the cargo. [BRETT, M.R.—Demurrage is a term sufficiently elastic to include such a case as this: Sanguinetti v. Pacific Steam Navigation Company, 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 300; 35 L. T. Rep. N. S. 658; 2 Q. B. Div. 238.] In that case the lay days had begun to run.

W. Baugh Allen and J. A. Hamilton for the plaintiffs.—Under this charter-party the charterers were bound to provide a quay berth ready for the vessel upon her arrival at the dock to which she was ordered. That is the very purpose of inserting the word "ready" in the clause. The delay arose in consequence of the charterers' failure to do what they were bound to do to expedite the vessel's discharge. A delay so caused properly gives rise to a claim for demurrage.

Gully, Q.C. in reply.

BRETT, M.R.—The question in this case must be whether, as between shipowner and charterer, a charterer in the position of this defendant would be liable, and, if so, to what extent. The charter-party is a very difficult one to construe, but assistance may be obtained from a consideration of the question. In whose favour is the clause referred to inserted? The clause is express in its terms—namely, that when the vessel is loaded she is to proceed "to such ready quay berth" as ordered by the charterers. The word "ready" there inserted has, as between shipowners and charterers, a definite and express

MURPHY v. COFFIN AND CO.

THIS was an action for demurrage tried in the Glamorganshire County Court. The County Court judge gave judgment for the defendants, subject to a case for the opinion of the Queen's Bench Division.

The material facts were as follows:—By a charter-party, dated June 23, 1880, the plaintiff's steamship Foyle was to load from the charterers' agents at Cardiff, a cargo of coals, and being so loaded, proceed to Dieppe, and deliver the same alongside consignees' or railway wharf, or into lighters or any vessel or wharf where she may safely deliver as ordered; cargo to be loaded, and discharged in forty-eight running hours; demurrage over and above the lying time at 10*s.* an hour. The ship arrived in the dock at Dieppe about 5 p.m. on July 1, and was ordered by the charterers to discharge at the railway wharf. Owing to all the discharging berths being occupied until 7.30 p.m. on July 2, she was not berthed at the railway wharf until then, and was finally discharged about 4.30 p.m. on July 5.

F. J. Church for the plaintiff.

Horne Payne for the defendants.

MATHEW, J.—It is the ordinary and reasonable rule that the lay days under a charter-party do not begin to run until the vessel has arrived at her place of destination. The charter-party here seems to have been framed in the hope of avoiding the questions which have arisen in numerous cases as to the respective rights and liabilities of shipowners, charterers, and consignees, with respect to the discharge of cargo where the place of destination is a dock. By the terms of the charterer, the vessel, having loaded the cargo, is to "therewith proceed to Dieppe, and deliver the same alongside consignees' or railway wharf or into lighters or any vessel or wharf where she may safely deliver as ordered." The place of destination, therefore, is one of these named places which the charterers may order. On the vessel's arrival at Dieppe, she was ordered to discharge at the railway wharf, but, it being occupied by other vessels, there was no berth then vacant for her, and it was not until she obtained one that she was able to discharge. With all respect to the learned judges who decided the case of Davies v. McVeagh (4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 149; 4 Ex. Div. 265; 41 L. T. Rep. N. S. 308), I think it inconsistent with other cases referred to in argument here to-day. It is to be observed that the attention of the court in that case does not seem to have been called to the fact that under the charter-party the High Level Dock was the place of destination. It seems, on the contrary, to have been assumed that the place of destination was the Wellington Dock. In the case of Strahan v. Gabriel, which is not reported, but is mentioned in Nelson v. Dahl (L. Rep. 6 App. Cas. 38; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 392; 44 L. T. Rep. N. S. 381), the facts were the same as in the present case, with the exception that the charterer had no option as to the place of destination. But the fact that in this case an option is given to the charterer does not, in my view, prevent that case from covering this in principle. Here, I am of opinion that the railway wharf was the only place of destination under the charter-party, and that the lay days did not begin to run until the vessel had secured a berth there. The result, therefore, is that the plaintiff must fail, and that our judgment is for the defendants.

DAY, J. concurred.

meaning, and the question is, in whose favour that word is inserted. It seems to me that, if the word "ready" had been omitted, the clause would have been a clause entirely in favour of the charterers, giving them power to order the vessel where they liked, but that when the word "ready" is inserted, the clause is then limited thereby in favour of the shipowner—in this respect, that the vessel is not to be kept waiting the convenience of the charterer; and the meaning of the clause, then, is that the charterer shall have power to order the vessel to such a dock and such a quay berth as shall be most to his benefit, but that he undertakes that a quay berth shall be "ready" for her reception. By this clause, therefore, a charterer does bind himself to name a quay berth ready to receive the vessel so soon as she was ready to proceed there, which in this case would be so soon as she entered the Millwall Docks. If so, then there was in this case a default on the part of the charterer because a quay berth was not thus ready to receive her. What, then, in the nature of things, would be the result of that default to the shipowner? The only result would be that his vessel would be detained, and detained by the default of the charterer. For such a detention the parties to this charter-party have agreed that 30*l.* a day shall be paid to the shipowners. Demurrage is the agreed amount of damage to be paid for the delay of a vessel, caused by a default of the charterer either at the commencement or the end of her voyage. It is true that in this case the damage is not strictly demurrage; but it is in the nature of demurrage, and the demurrage clause in a charter-party is elastic enough, in the ordinary construction of a charter-party, to comprise such a damage as this. Therefore the liability of the defendants is to be measured by the same liability as that of the charterers if they had been defendants, and I think, therefore, that the judgment of Mathew, J. was right, and the appeal must be dismissed.

Baggallay, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. I think the word "ready" is introduced into the charter-party in order to protect the shipowner against the possibility of a dock being named by the charterer and no quay berth being found therein ready to receive the vessel. The clause, therefore, imposes an obligation upon the charterer of finding and naming such quay berth.

Lindley, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. As soon as one is satisfied that the word "ready" is a word inserted for the benefit of the shipowners, it follows that the charterers must provide a quay berth, or pay damages for not doing so. It is now said that those damages are not covered by the demurrage clause; but it was pointed out in Sanguinetti v. Pacific Steam Navigation Company (ubi sup.) that a demurrage clause was elastic enough to meet such a case as this. I think the appeal must be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

HIGH COURT OF JUSTICE.

QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION.

Dec. 1 and 19, 1885.

(Before Cave and Wills, JJ.)

The Berwick Harbour Commissioners (apps.) v. The Churchwardens and Overseers of the Parish of Tweedmouth (resps.). (a)

Poor rate—Rateable value—Docks—Tolls—Harbour due—Tonnage duties—Additional duty on vessels using dock.

The Commissioners of Berwick Harbour were empowered, under 48 Geo. 3, c. ci. and 25 & 26 Vict. c. xxv., to improve the navigation of the harbour, the soil of which was not vested in them, and to construct quays and landing places which were vested in them. In return, they were entitled to receive certain rates and duties of tonnage from all ships using the harbour, and on all goods shipped from or landed on the quays and landing places. By 35 Vict. c. ix., they were empowered to make and maintain a wet dock. The duties on goods substituted by the later Act were practically the same as those given by the Act of 1862, with the exception that there was a new clause to the effect that additional dues of 75 per cent. above the rates specified were to be payable on the completion of the wet dock on goods (except coal, iron, or lime) loaded or discharged in the dock, or exported or imported in vessels of 100 tons or upward. By sect. 66 of the later Act, the commissioners were empowered to levy a harbour duty of 3*s.* 4*d. on every ship entering the harbour. By the* 25*th section of the same Act, for the rates and duties given by the Act of* 1862, were substituted the tonnage dues on ships entering or leaving the harbour, contained in schedule B. This schedule contained two sets of rates, one for vessels under 100 tons, the other for vessels of or above 100 tons; it also contained the following new clause: "Additional dues to be payable on completion of wet dock. For every ship or vessel entering the wet dock, over and above the before-mentioned dues, for every ton, 2*d."*

The commissioners were assessed to a poor rate, for the parish of Tweedmouth, as occupiers of the wet dock, at a gross estimated rental of 1380*l.*, and a rateable value of 1180*l. In this estimate both the harbour due and the tonnage duties of the vessels using the dock were included by the assessment committee. The commissioners appealed to quarter sessions, and the Recorder was of opinion that both the harbour due and the tonnage duties ought to be excluded when ascertaining the rateable value of the dock, and amended the rate, altering the assessment to a gross estimated rental of* 636*l. and a rateable value of* 530*l.*

The assessment committee appealed by way of a special case.

Held, on the argument of the case, that the decision of the Recorder was right, and that as the dock was not the sole meritorious cause of the commissioners' right to the dues, the harbour due and the tonnage duties were not to be taken into account in ascertaining the rateable value of the dock, but only the additional 2*d. per ton levied on vessels actually entering and using the dock.*

Reg. v. The Dock Company at Kingston-upon-Hull (7 Q. B. 2) distinguished.

(a) Reported by W. P. Eversley, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

This was a case stated for the opinion of the court by the Recorder of Berwick-upon-Tweed; of which the following are the material parts:—

1. The appellants were the commissioners incorporated by the Berwick-upon-Tweed Harbour Act 1862, "An Act for the preservation and improvement of the Pier and Harbour of Berwick-upon-Tweed," and the respondents were the assessment committee of the Berwick-upon-Tweed Union and the overseers of the poor of the parish of Tweedmouth, in the said county.

2. The appellants were assessed to a rate, dated the 20th Nov. 1884, and made for the relief of the poor of the said parish, as "occupiers of the dock-buildings and plant, Main-street, Tweedmouth," at a gross estimated rental of 1380*l.* and a rateable value of 1150*l.*, and were appealing against such assessment.

3. The Harbour of Berwick-upon-Tweed is a natural tidal harbour, navigable for about a mile upwards from its mouth; and down to the year 1808 it was managed by the mayor, bailiffs, and burgesses of the borough, who, for that purpose, levied certain dues on all shipping entering the harbour. In that year an Act of Parliament was passed (48 Geo. 3, c. ci.), whereby certain commissioners were appointed for rebuilding and maintaining the pier, and for erecting such other works as might seem proper and expedient for the preservation and improvement of the said harbour. A new scale of rates or duties on goods and ballast imported into or exported out of the harbour was substituted for those formerly levied, certain rates or duties of tonnage were imposed, and a due of 3*s.* 4*d.* for every vessel coming into the harbour, which was in substitution for the dues levied before the passing of the said Act. Under this Act the said pier was rebuilt and quays and wharves constructed, and other improvements carried out from the funds at the disposal of the said commissioners.

4. In 1862 a further Act of Parliament was passed, 25 Vict. c. xxv., reconstructing and incorporating the said commissioners, vesting in the new body all the property of the former commissioners, and substituting new rates or duties on goods and ballast imported into or exported from the harbour, and new rates or duties of tonnage, and retaining the before-mentioned due of 3*s.* 4*d.* on all vessels entering the harbour.

5. In 1872 a further Act of Parliament was passed, 35 Vict. c. ix., giving the said commissioners power to construct a wet dock, and other works incidental thereto, and new schedules of rates, or dues on goods and on tonnage were substituted for the former ones. The rates and dues levied under the Act consisted of: (1.) Shore dues on goods imported into or exported from the harbour. (2.) Additional dues to be payable on completion of the wet dock; that is to say, all goods loaded or discharged in the dock, or exported or imported in vessels of a registered tonnage of 100 tons and upwards to be charged 75 per cent. above the ordinary rates. (3.) Ballast dues. (4.) Tonnage dues on ships on entering or leaving the harbour, and a due of 3*s.* 4*d.* on every vessel. (5.) Additional dues to be payable on completion of the wet dock; that is to say, 2*d.* per ton on every ship or vessel entering the wet dock, over and above the ordinary tonnage dues, and a further sum at the rate of one halfpenny per registered ton per week after the first six weeks, in the case of any ship remaining in the dock longer than six weeks, unless wind-bound or detained by stress of weather. (6.) Rates for the use of staiths, cranes, tramways, sheds, and weighing machinery.

6. All money received by the appellants from rates or duties, or other sources of income under their said Acts, was required to be applied in the manner and order following, and not otherwise, namely: First, in paying interest accruing due on money borrowed, and providing the requisite annual instalments or appropriations for payment off of the principal thereof, and in paying annuities granted under the said Act of 1872. Secondly, in paying the current working and establishment expenses of the appellants, and their expenses of maintaining and keeping in repair their works.

7. The appellants, accordingly, constructed a wet dock upon the south side of the river, upon a portion of the foreshore which was purchased from the Crown by them. The said dock was opened by them in 1876. This dock and other works connected therewith, under description of "dock-buildings and plant," were, together with the pier or wharf called Carr Rock, the subject of the rate appealed against.

9. Previously to the year 1808 Carr Rock was a natural rock projecting into the river at high water, at the end of which the river, by its scouring action, excavated a deep hole in which vessels could lie afloat. At some time between 1808 and 1862 works were done upon the said rock for the purpose of rendering it more convenient for use as a wharf, and such works had since been, and were still, maintained and repaired by the appellants, and shore dues had been, and were still, received by them in respect of goods landed and shipped at the said rock.

10. No portion of the bed of the harbour was vested in the said commissioners, and they had no ownership in nor occupation of it.

11. The following figures were agreed upon between the parties as representing, for the purposes of this appeal, the receipts and outgoings of the said commissioners:

Tweed Dock.

1. Dock dues, i.e., the 2*d.* per ton, payable by every ship or vessel entering the wet dock, schedule B.	173	7	6
2. Shore dues, being the dues on all goods landed in the dock, under schedule A., including 75 per cent. additional payable on completion of the dock	621	11	2
Ditto, on goods exported	35	18	1
3. Crane dues, schedule C.	23	11	8
4. Tonnage dues, schedule B., being the tonnage dues on ships entering or leaving the harbour, irrespective of their entering or not entering the dock, but received from vessels which did enter the dock	986	17	9
5. Harbour duty, schedule B., being a duty of 3*s.* 4*d.* payable by every ship or vessel coming into the harbour, irrespective of the dock, but received in respect of vessels which did enter the dock	17	0	0
Actual Outgoings attributable exclusively to the Dock.
1. Wages of dock attendants and engineer at steam crane, oil for lamps, and other stores	318	3	0
2. Dredging at entrance, average	250	0	0

Note.—No allowance in these figures was made for costs of management, tenants' profits, renewals, or interest on borrowed money.

For renewals, if chargeable, the amount to be taken at	250	0	0
If it was held that the tonnage dues above mentioned ought to have been taken into account in estimating the rateable value of the dock, it was further agreed that there should be further deducted as an annual outgoing against the dock a proportion of the general charges of the harbour, such as clerk and harbour master's salary, lighthouse expenses, steam tug, &c., &c., and allowance for renewals (pier &c.)	350	0	0
Rates included in this sum.

Note.—It was open to the appellants to contend that in addition to the items above specified, deductions or allowances should be made in respect of interest on borrowed money and tenants' capital and profits.

Carr Rock.

Receipts.

1. Amount actually received for "tonnage dues," schedule B., from vessels moored at this berth	347	5	4
2. Ditto, harbour duty, ditto...	15	10	0
3. Amount received from shore dues on goods landed at this berth, schedule A. ...	230	9	4
Ditto, shipped at ditto	73	3	6

Outgoings.

Repairs	15	0	0
Proportion of general harbour expenses, including rates	80	0	0
Renewals	50	0	0

Note.—No allowance made in these figures for tenants' capital or profits.

12. The appellants, in the years 1874, 1875, and 1876, borrowed from the Public Works Loan Commissioners, upon mortgage upon their said property, the sum of 35,000*l.*, of which sum there was at the date of the appeal, owing to the said commissioners the principal sum of 31,590*l.* 4*s.* 7*d.* and the sum of 240*l.* 12*s.* interest thereon, at the rate of 3½ per cent. per annum.

13. The appellants have borrowed the further sum of 25,000*l.*, which loan is secured by bonds issued by them upon the security of the whole of the property, tolls, and dues of the appellants, and of such last-mentioned sum there is still owing by the appellants the sum of 23,280*l.*, the interest and charges upon which for the year 1885 amount to the sum of 1166*l.* 4*s.*

14. On behalf of the appellants, it was contended: first, that, in order to obtain the rateable value of the property rated, the tonnage dues and harbour duty were not to be taken into consideration, because they were not earned in respect of the said dock or Carr Rock, but were payable by all vessels entering the harbour, whether using the said dock or not, and that, therefore, the sums of 986*l.* 17*s.* 9*d.*, 17*l.*, 347*l.* 5*s.* 4*d.*, and 15*l.* 10*s.* should be omitted from the list of receipts; secondly, that the said commissioners were entitled to deduct from the annual receipts interest on the capital necessary to carry on the business and tenants' profits.

15. On behalf of the respondents it was contended that tonnage dues and harbour duty paid to the appellants upon all vessels which actually used the wet dock or the Carr Rock were to be taken into consideration in ascertaining the said rateable value; that the appellants were restricted under the said Acts in the application of their income, and therefore were not entitled to any deduction from the gross value of their said property in respect of tenants' profits, and that payments of the interest upon moneys borrowed by them were in the nature of payment of rent, and not to be deducted from the gross value, and that the appellants were not overrated.

16. The recorder decided, 1st, That in ascertaining the rateable value of the appellants' said property the tonnage dues and harbour duty received by them as aforesaid, were not to be taken into consideration. 2nd. That the appellants were not entitled to reduction in respect of interest on tenants' capital or tenants' profits. 3rd. That the appellants were overrated; and by his order allowed the appeal and altered the said assessment, in accordance with such decisions, to a gross estimated rental of 636*l.* and a rateable value of 530*l.*

If the court should be of opinion that the said order was correct in point of law, it was to be affirmed. If the court should be of opinion that the said order was not correct in point of law, it was to be quashed.

J. L. Walton (R. Cunningham Glen with him) for the assessment committee.—The order of the recorder ought to be quashed, and the original rating of the appellants restored. The charge of 2*d.* per ton on vessels entering the commissioners' dock ought not to be the only basis for rating their premises; the dues levied upon the tonnage of the vessels entering the harbour should also be added, because were it not for this wet dock, where they may easily unload their cargoes, ships would not enter the harbour at all. In 1862 the Carr Rock was turned into a quay, under a private Act of Parliament which vests the property in the new commissioners, and sect. 66 gives them power to take rates and duties on the tonnage, and generally new powers which the old commissioners did not possess. Sect. 25 of that Act substitutes for the rates and duties on goods given by the Act of 1862 the shore dues on goods imported into or exported from the harbour, as set out in schedule A., which contains a new clause to the effect that additional dues are to be payable on the completion of the wet dock, and goods (with certain exceptions) loaded or discharged in the dock, or exported or imported in vessels of a registered tonnage of 100 tons or upwards, are to be charged 75 per cent. above the rates specified. The same section also substituted for the rates and duties under the Act of 1862 the tonnage dues on ships on entering or leaving the harbour, contained in schedule B., which schedule contains a new clause to the effect that additional dues are to be payable on the completion of the wet dock, for every ship or vessel entering the wet dock, over and above the beforementioned dues, for every ton 2*d.* These dues are to be paid on completion of the wet dock, and it has been completed, consequently the tonnage dues and harbour duties on all vessels entering the harbour ought to be taken into account in estimating the rateable value of the dock, because the increase in these dues is to be attributed to the expense incurred by the commissioners in making the wet dock. It was the object of the Legislature to induce the commissioners to make this dock. Next, the whole of the tonnage dues and the duties paid by ships actually entering the wet dock ought to be brought into the account, and not merely the additional 2*d.* per ton:

Reg. v. Kingston-upon-Hull Dock Company, 7 Q. B. 2; 14 L. J. 114, M. C.

The present case cannot be distinguished from the Hull Dock case, and there the tonnage dues on ships using the dock were taken into account in ascertaining the rateable value of the dock. If the vessels use this wet dock their tonnage dues are earned in respect of it, and are therefore properly rateable. The commissioners may get profits from the use of the dock by increasing the tonnage dues and letting the additional 2*d.* per ton go, and so escape rateability of the dock altogether.

Ridley (F. D. Blake with him) for the commissioners.—It was intended by the Legislature in this case that all vessels coming within the mouth of the Berwick Harbour should pay both a harbour duty and a tonnage duty, and when the wet dock was completed and ready for use, the commissioners were empowered to make an additional charge of 2*d.* per ton on every vessel making use of the dock. This additional duty is alone to be taken into account, and not the harbour and tonnage duties, and certainly not the harbour duty of 3*s.* 4*d.* per vessel. The Hull Dock case (ubi sup.) is distinguishable from the present one. There was no harbour or dock at Hull before those made under statutory sanction, and no additional duty was imposed upon vessels making use of the docks, and certain duties were made payable to the company making the docks, for every ship coming into or going out of the harbour, basin, or docks within the port of Hull. But in the present case there has been an additional duty imposed on vessels using this wet dock, and this additional duty has been rightly taken into consideration. The difference between the two cases is shortly this: in the Hull Dock case there were no other dues receivable by the dock owners, except the tonnage dues on ships entering the harbour and port, and if these had been subtracted there would have been nothing left to be taken into consideration; but in the present case that is not so. The Harbour Commissioners for New Shoreham v. The Overseers of Lancing (L. Rep. 5 Q. B. 489) is in point.

Cur. adv. vult.

Dec. 19.—Cave, J.—The only point raised for our consideration upon the argument of this appeal was whether, in assessing the Berwick Harbour Commissioners to the poor rate in respect of their dock buildings and plant, both tonnage dues and harbour duty, received by them under the Harbour Act 1872, are to be taken into account. It appears that in the early part of this century the pier, formerly built to shelter the Berwick harbour from storms, had gone to decay whereby the harbour was much exposed to storms, and the navigation thereby was much impeded by sand banks and other obstructions, and in danger of becoming altogether unfit for the purposes of trade. The Legislature thereupon interposed, and by 48 Geo. 3, c. ci., appointed commissioners with power to improve the navigation of the harbour by deepening it and removing obstructions, and to make and erect jetties, capstans, and other engines, and posts for preserving the navigation and rendering it more safe and commodious, and to make quays and docks for the better accommodation of the shipping and the trade of the port. The commissioners were also empowered (sect. 31) to make regulations for the navigation of the harbour and of all vessels resorting thereto, and for the loading and delivering of goods, and for the quays under their authority, and for the laying of goods thereon. For the purpose of providing funds for the undertaking the commissioners were empowered (sect. 33) to demand and collect (a) certain rates or duties on goods and on ballast imported into or exported from the harbour, and also (b) certain rates or duties of tonnage on ships using the harbour for trading purposes or shelter. By sect. 42 the commissioners were empowered to let these rates and duties, either from year to year or for any term not exceeding seven years. This Act was repealed by the Berwick Harbour Act 1862, and from the recitals contained in the later Act it appears that the commissioners had re-erected the pier and kept it in repair, and had erected a lighthouse and quays, wharves, jetties, and offices, and had provided steam-tugs, buoys, moorings, anchors, and dolphins, and had kept in repair the previously existing quays and wharves, and had removed various sand banks and other obstructions and annoyances to the navigation within the harbour. By sect. 14 the commissioners were empowered to erect all such piers and other works authorised by the repealed Act as had not then been erected, or as the commissioners thereafter might deem it necessary to erect, and to maintain the piers and works already erected or thereafter to be erected. By sect. 49 they were empowered to dig and remove sand, gravel, or clay, in any part of the harbour; and by sect. 50, to dredge any banks, shoals, or channels within the harbour for the better maintaining and improving the navigation thereof, and to remove any other obstructions and impediments. By sect. 66 they were empowered to demand and collect certain rates and duties on goods and on ballast imported into or exported from the harbour, and also certain rates or duties of tonnage, which latter were only one half the amount of those given by the earlier Act, except the harbour duty, which in each case was 3*s.* 4*d.* on every ship coming into the harbour. The soil of the harbour was not vested in the commissioners by either Act. So far the case is comparatively free from difficulty. The commissioners were empowered to improve the navigation of the harbour, the soil of which was not vested in them, and received certain rates and duties of tonnage from all ships using the harbour. They were also empowered to construct quays and landing places, which were vested in them, and received certain rates or duties on all goods shipped from or landed on these quays and landing places. The tonnage rates and duties were granted for, and arose from, the use of the land covered with water which the commissioners did not occupy. The rates and duties on goods were granted for, and arose from, the use of the quays and landing places; and consequently, where the commissioners were the occupiers of the quays and landing places, these rates and duties on goods were in the nature of profits arising from the land so occupied, and were rateable.

We have, however, to deal with the new conditions introduced by the Act of 1872, which, by sect. 4, empowered the commissioners to make and maintain a wet dock, an embankment below high-water mark, a quay or quays, an entrance into the dock, a gangway, and an access to the quay, and all necessary subsidiary works. They were also empowered (sect. 20) to purchase fisheries in the harbour, with a view to the improvement of the navigation of the harbour or the increase of the accommodation available for vessels frequenting the same. By sect. 25 there were substituted for the duties on goods given by the Act of 1862 the shore dues on goods imported into or exported from the harbour set out in schedule A. which are very much the same as those contained in the Act of 1862, except that schedule A. contains this new clause: "Additional dues to be payable on completion of wet dock. Goods (except coal, iron, or lime) loaded or discharged in the dock, or exported or imported in vessels of a registered tonnage of 100 tons or upwards, to be charged 75 per cent. above the rates specified." Sect. 25 also substituted for the rates and duties of tonnage given by the Act of 1862 the "tonnage dues on ships on entering or leaving the harbour," contained in schedule B. In that schedule there are two sets of rates, one for vessels under, the other for vessels of or above, 100 tons. The rates for vessels under 100 tons are practically the same as those imposed by the Act of 1862. Those for vessels of or above 100 tons are 2*d.* a ton higher than the other rates, but still lower than the rates imposed by the Act of 1808. Schedule B. also contains the following new clause: "Additional dues to be payable on completion of wet dock. For every ship or vessel entering the wet dock, over and above the beforementioned dues for every ton 2*d.*"

Under these circumstances, it was contended that the tonnage dues and harbour duty on all vessels entering the harbour should be taken into account in estimating the rateable value of the dock, because the increase in these dues (which, however, only existed in the case of vessels of or above 100 tons) must be attributed to the expense incurred by the commissioners in making the wet dock. To this, however, it seems to be a sufficient answer that the commissioners were by the Act of 1872 empowered to execute other works in addition to the wet docks, and that these dues were authorised to be taken immediately on the passing of the Act, and before the wet docks were completed or even begun, and might, it would seem, be taken although the wet docks never were made at all. I am therefore of opinion that these rates and duty are unconnected with the wet docks, and cannot be said to have been earned by them. Secondly, it was urged that, assuming the tonnage dues and duty on all ships could not be taken into account, yet at least the whole of the tonnage dues and the duty paid by ships actually entering the wet dock should be brought into the account, and not merely the additional 2*d.* per ton. The word "additional" it was said showed that the totality of the dues in the case of a vessel entering the wet dock must be treated as a single and indivisible payment, and the whole of it must be deemed to be earned by the wet dock. For this position the case of Reg. v. Hull Dock Company (7 Q. B. 2) was cited. In that case certain dues were given to the dock company in respect of the charges and expenses they had been at in making the docks, and these dues were of the same amount and were equally payable whether the ships entered the docks the property of the company, or merely entered the harbour which was not the property of the company without going into the docks at all. The docks were the sole meritorious cause of the company's right to the dues, and it was held that the dues were not the less earned by the docks where the ship actually entered the docks because the ship must have paid the same amount if it had not entered the docks at all. In the present case the wet dock is not the sole meritorious cause of the commissioners' right to the dues. On the contrary, the commissioners have executed and maintain works in the harbour by which ships using the harbour are directly benefited; and seeing that all ships entering the harbour pay a certain and uniform rate whether they enter the wet dock or not, while those which enter the wet dock pay an additional rate of 2*d.* a ton from which those who do not enter it are free; and seeing that the former rate was always payable even before the wet dock was made, while the additional rate only came into operation when the wet dock was completed, the inference is, in my judgment, irresistible that the additional 2*d.* a ton alone is earned by the wet dock, and that the dues which all vessels pay alike whether they enter the wet dock or not are earned by the works carried out and maintained by the commissioners in the harbour, and cannot be taken into account in rating the docks, because they are not earned by the wet dock, nor is the wet dock in any way the meritorious cause of them. In my judgment the decision of the recorder was correct, and must be affirmed.

Wills, J.—I am of opinion that the recorder was right in excluding from the receipts to be taken into consideration in assessing the commissioners in respect of the docks those portions of the tonnage dues under schedule B. of the Act of 1872 which are not the "additional dues" at the end of that schedule, and also the harbour duties of 3*s.* 4*d.* per vessel. Since the year 1808 harbour duties have been charged under Acts of the years 1808, 1862, and 1872 respectively upon all ships making use of the harbour; but, as the soil of the harbour did not belong to the commissioners, and any accommodation afforded by them through the pier, quays, and wharves which they owned was paid for by the import and export duties (which in the Act of 1872 are called the shore duties), harbour duties were never treated as increasing the value of the occupation of the premises belonging to the commissioners, and therefore were not carried into the rating. This seems to have been a correct practice according to the second branch of the decision in Reg. v. Kingston-upon-Hull Dock Company (7 Q. B. 2). In 1872 the Act under which dues are now collected was passed. It recited that the commissioners were desirous of undertaking the construction of a wet dock and other works for the improvement of the harbour and the accommodation of vessels resorting thereto, and for facilitating communication with the southern shore of the harbour, on being authorised to do so, and on the maximum rates and duties leviable by them being increased. The Act accordingly empowered them (sect. 4) to make a wet dock, to make an embankment below high-water mark from Berwick Bridge to the landward end of Carr Rock Pier, and certain quays and wharves, and empowered them to take under schedule A.: 1. Shore duties which (with a few very trivial alterations, and with the introduction of a very few articles not included in the former schedule) were identical with the then existing shore duties. 2. Additional dues to be payable on the completion of the wet dock, and which were payable on goods loaded or discharged in the dock, or on goods exported or imported in vessels of a registered tonnage of 100 tons or upwards. And under schedule B.; 1. Tonnage duties on vessels entering or leaving the harbour and not using the wet dock, which for small vessels were the same as the then existing tonnage duties, but which for vessels of or above 100 tons register were materially higher than those leviable under the Act of 1862. 2. A harbour duty of 3*s.* 4*d.* per vessel, which was the old duty, except that an additional sum was now made chargeable upon vessels remaining in the harbour more than six weeks. 3. Certain dues in certain events upon boats, which were the same as the existing dues. 4. Additional tonnage dues at the rate of 2d. per ton, to be payable on completion of the wet dock, in respect of every vessel entering the wet dock. There were then two classes of tonnage dues; 1. Upon vessels which did not enter the docks, which were substantially and with two very trivial exceptions the same as the old harbour duties. 2. Upon vessels which did enter the docks, the latter being 2*d.* per ton higher than the former. By the preamble of the Act the rate upon a vessel which entered the docks, and which was the aggregate of the harbour duty proper, and the 2*d.* per ton payable on entering the wet dock is treated as one rate, and the additional dues are spoken of as effecting an increase of the maximum rates theretofore chargeable, which were harbour dues simply and not as a new and separate charge.

If this form of expression were to be taken as conclusive, it would follow that the whole of the larger rate chargeable upon a vessel entering the dock must be treated as one and indivisible, and it would follow, further, that either the whole of it must be included, or, in calculating the earnings of the dock, the whole of it must be rejected as an element in arriving at their rateable value. But I think this would be a pedantic adherence to mere phraseology, and would ignore the facts and the real substance of the enactment. The commissioners do works of two classes—they construct an embankment ending with the landward end of Carr Rock Pier and certain quays, and also a wet dock. By the first of these they improve the facilities for landing goods, and as a compensation they get, in the case of vessels of or above 100 tons, largely increased landing charges in case such vessels use the quays or the Carr Rock Pier without entering the dock. As to these no question arises. As a compensation for constructing the wet docks they get, besides the increased shore duties on all goods in respect of which the docks are used, the additional tonnage duty of 2*d.* per ton on vessels which enter the dock. The substance of this enactment seems to be, that the commissioners get the old tonnage dues which were chargeable before the dock was constructed, and which still attach the moment the vessel crosses the outer boundary of the harbour, and which are therefore irrespective of the use of the dock, and beyond that get a fresh tonnage charge upon every vessel which uses the dock. The result is to show that the charge which in the preamble is called one is in effect two, namely, the old tonnage dues which were strictly harbour dues, and which have never been taken into account in the rating of the commissioners, and the dues for the use of the dock. I see no reason why the portion of the aggregate duty referable to the mere use of the harbour, and which the provisions of the Act make it easy to separate from the total, should assume a different character because the dock (which may or may not be used, and which is of no benefit to the ship making no use of it) is allowed to earn an additional 2*d.* per ton if used. The duty of 3*s.* 4*d.* upon each ship entering the harbour is wholly unaffected by the construction of the dock, and is not increased in the case of a vessel entering the dock, and I think it retains its old character, and has been properly excluded from the calculation by the recorder.

It is said, however, that such a decision conflicts with the case of Reg. v. The Kingston-upon-Hull Dock Company, cited above. I do not think so. In that case the charge was upon every vessel entering the harbour basin or docks; and it was the same in each of the three cases. The court held that when once a vessel did enter the docks, the rate was earned by the docks, and was therefore to be taken into account in assessing their earnings. It is difficult to see how any other conclusion could be arrived at. It was not possible to dissect the charge and say that a portion was paid as a mere harbour due, inasmuch as the only definite measure of the harbour due afforded by the Act, if subtracted from the total charge would have left nothing as the earnings of the docks. I think, therefore, that as to the dock the learned recorder was right as to both the classes of dues which he excluded. As to the Carr Rock, it seems to me that the facilities which were afforded by the property of the commissioners were paid for by the shore dues. It is not contended that the soil of the bed of the harbour adjoining the Carr Rock where vessels lie alongside it belongs to the commissioners. It is said, however, that it earns the tonnage dues, which are of the character of harbour dues, by having a mooring post to which vessels make fast. I cannot think that this is anything more than a facility for the landing of goods. It would be going a long way to say that it was enough to turn the harbour dues, which would be payable by a vessel whether it made fast to the mooring post or depended upon its own anchor, into the earnings of the pier or landing place; and I think that in respect of the Carr Rock also the decision of the learned recorder was right. The order of the sessions will, therefore, be confirmed with costs.

HALL v. BILLINGHAM AND SONS. (a)

The Chain Cables and Anchors Act 1874 (37 & 38 Vict. c. 51), ss. 3 and 4—Contract for sale of chain cable—Implied warranty that it has been tested—British and foreign ships.

By the 3rd section of the Chain Cables and Anchors Act 1874 (37 & 38 Vict. c. 51) a maker of or dealer in anchors and chain cables shall not sell or contract to sell, nor shall any person purchase or contract to purchase, for the use of any British ship, any chain cable or any anchor exceeding in weight 168 pounds, which has not been previously tested and stamped in accordance with the Chain Cables and Anchors Acts 1864 to 1874, and any person who acts in contravention of this section shall be deemed to be guilty of a misdemeanour; and by the 4th section every contract for the sale of a chain cable shall, in the absence of an express stipulation to the contrary (proof whereof shall be on the seller), be deemed to imply a warranty that the cable has been before delivery tested and stamped in accordance with the Chain Cables and Anchors Acts 1864 to 1874.

Held, that the 4th section applies to all contracts for the sale of chain cables, and is not confined by the words of the 3rd section to contracts for the sale of chain cables for the use of British ships.

THIS was a rule obtained on behalf of the defendants calling upon the plaintiff to show cause why the verdict given and judgment entered for him at the hearing of the action in the Grimsby County Court should not be set aside and judgment entered for the defendants on the ground that the defendants did not give any implied warranty to the plaintiff that a chain cable purchased by him from the defendants had been tested in accordance with the Chain Cables and Anchors Acts 1864 to 1874.

The action was brought by John Parker Hall against the defendants Jesse Billingham and Sons to recover the price paid by him to them for sixty fathoms of chain cable.

On the 11th Jan. 1884 the plaintiff sent to the defendants a written order for "sixty fathoms tested chain $\frac{7}{8}$ short link."

On the 18th Jan. the defendants forwarded to the plaintiff a chain cable, and also an invoice, one of the items of which was:

60 Fms. short link cable tested, 27cwt. 2qrs. 7lbs., at 10*s.* 11*d.*, 15*l.* 0*s.* 10*d.*

With the invoice was inclosed the following certificate:

Cradley Heath Chain and Anchor Testing Works, near Brierley Hill, 18th Jan. 1884.—We do hereby certify having proved by our machine for Mr. J. P. Hall an iron short link chain $\frac{7}{8}$-inch diameter, 60 fathoms long, to the proof strain of 9 tons 2½cwt. Admiralty strain, and delivered the same to order, weighing 27cwt. 2qrs. 7lbs. Proof mark "B. and S.," No. 1884, stamped on the end link.—THOMAS MELLERSHIP, Superintendent.

The Board of Trade surveyor having refused to pass the chain, the plaintiff brought an action against the defendants to recover its price, at the hearing of which it was admitted that the chain cable was not tested and stamped, except as stated in the above-mentioned certificate, whereupon the learned County Court judge found that the contract between the plaintiff and defendants must, by virtue of the 4th section of the Chain Cables and Anchors Act 1874 (37 & 38 Vict. c. 51) be deemed to imply a warranty on the part of the defendants that the cable had been before delivery tested and stamped in accordance with the Chain Cables and Anchors Acts 1864 to 1874, and gave judgment for the plaintiff.

The defendants then obtained a rule calling upon the plaintiff to show cause why the judgment entered for him should not be set aside and judgment entered for the defendants on the ground that the contract was not within the 4th section of the Chain Cables and Anchors Act, 1874, and must not be deemed to imply the above-mentioned warranty, and this was the rule which now came on for argument.

The statute 27 & 28 Vict. c. 27, entitled "An Act for regulating the proving and sale of chain cables and anchors," provides;

2. The Lords of the Committee of Privy Council appointed for the consideration of matters relating to trade and foreign plantations, hereafter in this Act called the Board of Trade, may from time to time grant to any corporation, public body, or company, person, or persons erecting any proving establishment, apparatus, and machinery suitable for the testing of chain cables or anchors, licence to test chain cables and anchors under this Act, and the board may suspend or revoke any licence so granted if the board shall see occasion; and the expression "tester" in this Act applies to every corporation, public body, or company, person, or persons to whom such licence shall be granted, so long as such licence continues in force: provided that such a licence shall not be granted in any case unless and until the proving establishment, apparatus, and machinery erected have been inspected by an inspector appointed as by this Act provided, and have been certified by him as proper and efficient for their purposes.

11. From and after the 1st July 1865 it shall not be lawful for any maker of or dealer in chain cables or anchors to sell or contract to sell for the use of any vessel any chain cable whatever, or any anchor exceeding in weight one hundred and sixty-eight pounds, unless such chain ceble or anchor shall have been previously tested and duly stamped in accordance with the provisions of this Act; and if any person acts in contravention of this provision, he shall for every such offence, upon a summary conviction for the same before a justice of the peace, or in Scotland before any sheriff, justice, or magistrate, be liable to a penalty not exceeding fifty pounds.

The Chain Cable and Anchor Act 1871 (34 & 35 Vict. c. 101) provides:

3. After the commencement of this Act, the Board of Trade shall not grant originally, or by way of renewal to any corporation, public body, company, person, or persons, except the corporations and public bodies mentioned in the first schedule to this Act, or authorised in that behalf as hereinafter mentioned (a), any licence under the principal Act for the testing of chain cables and anchors.

7. After the commencement of this Act, a maker of or dealer in chain cables or anchors shall not sell, consign, or contract to sell or consign, nor shall any person purchase or contract to purchase any chain cable whatever, or any anchor exceeding in weight one hundred and sixty-eight pounds, which has not been previously tested and duly stamped in accordance with the provisions of the principal Act and this Act, unless the same is sold, contracted for, consigned, and purchased as and for old iron.

Every person who acts in contravention of this section shall be liable on summary conviction before two justices of the peace, or in Scotland before any sheriff or sheriff substitute to a penalty not exceeding fifty pounds.

Sect. 9 repealed sect. 11 of the Act of 1864.

(a) Reported by JOSEPH SMITH, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

(a) By Order in Council.

The Chain Cable and Anchor Act 1874 (37 & 38 Vict. c. 51) provides:

3. After the commencement of this Act, a maker of or dealer in anchors and chain cables shall not sell or contract to sell nor shall any person purchase or contract to purchase for the use of any British ship, any chain cable or any anchor exceeding in weight one hundred and sixty-eight pounds which has not been previously tested and stamped in accordance with the Chain Cables and Anchors Acts 1864 to 1874. Any person who acts in contravention of this section shall be deemed to be guilty of a misdemeanour.

4. Every contract for the sale of a chain cable shall, in the absence of an express stipulation to the contrary (proof whereof shall lie on the seller), be deemed to imply a warranty that the cable has been before delivery tested and stamped in accordance with the Chain Cables and Anchors Acts 1864 to 1874. In case of dispute, the proof of such testing and stamping shall be on the seller.

J. H. Etherington-Smith, for the plaintiff, showed cause.—This contract is clearly within the 4th section of the Act of 1874, which says that every contract for the sale of a chain cable shall be deemed to imply a warranty that the cable has been before delivery tested and stamped in accordance with the Chain Cables and Anchors Acts 1864 to 1874. [He was stopped by the Court.]

Johnston Watson for the defendants, in support of the rule.—The 4th section of the Act of 1874 must be read with the 3rd section, and applies to British ships only. The provisions of the Acts of 1864 and 1871 applied to all sales of chain cables, and in those Acts there is no mention of implying a warranty that the cable has been tested. It was then considered that the provisions, although sufficiently stringent for foreign ships, were not so for British ships, and consequently by the Act of 1874 it was provided by the 3rd section that to sell an untested cable or anchor for the use of a British ship should be a misdemeanour, and, by the 4th section, that the contract for the sale of a chain cable should be deemed to imply a warranty that it has been previously tested. The 3rd and 4th sections are intended to be read together, and apply only to sales of anchors and chain cables for the use of British ships. [Smith, J.—The Act of 1871 prohibits the sale of any chain cable whatever without testing, and is still unrepealed. If the sale of an untested cable is prohibited under a penalty, why should not the 4th section of the Act of 1874 apply to all sales of chain cables, and imply a warranty in all cases?] It has been the general practice of makers of and dealers in chain cables and anchors since the Act of 1874 to supply chain cables tested in accordance with the Acts to British ships, and privately tested cables to all other ships, and this is a reasonable construction of the words of the Act. Further, the plaintiff has lost the right of relying upon the breach of warranty. The plaintiff is a dealer in chain cables, and this cable was consigned to him and received by him in 1884. He knew that there were two methods of testing chains, viz., the Board of Trade test and the private test, and the certificate forwarded with the invoice informed him that this cable had been privately tested, which was the only test he stipulated for in giving the order. With that knowledge he retained the chain for sixteen months. This conduct therefore amounts to an acceptance of the goods, which precludes him from suing on a breach of warranty.

Mathew, J.—I am of opinion, in this case, that the judgment of the learned County Court judge is right and must be upheld. By the 4th section of the Chain Cables and Anchors Act 1874 it is provided that every contract for the sale of a chain cable shall, in the absence of an express stipulation to the contrary (proof whereof shall lie on the seller), be deemed to imply a warranty that the cable has been before delivery tested and stamped in accordance with the Chain Cables and Anchors Acts 1864 to 1874. Now, in what way are we to construe this section? The language is perfectly plain, and, as far as I see, there is no inconsistency in it—nothing which is at all repugnant to common sense. Following, therefore, the ordinary rules of construction, it is, I think, the clear meaning of the section that every contract for the sale of any chain cable whatever—and therefore this contract for the sale of the chain cable, the price of which the plaintiff is seeking to recover—must be deemed to imply a warranty that it has been tested before delivery in accordance with the Chain Cables and Anchors Acts. We are asked, however, to say that the section does not apply to every contract for the sale of any chain cable whatever, but only to every contract for the sale of a chain cable for the use of a British ship, on the ground that the previous section is so restricted, and that the two sections ought to be read together. I do not at all see the force of this contention. I think, indeed, that the 3rd section throws considerable light on this. It was, in my opinion, so restricted because it imposes a very serious penalty on those supplying British ships with anchors and cables which have not been previously tested; but I do not see any reason why the fourth section, which does not impose any penalty of the kind, should be so restricted, and I think that the intention of the 4th section was to prevent the sale of any chain cables whatever without their having been previously tested. I think, therefore, that the learned County Court judge was right, and that this rule must be discharged with costs.

Smith, J.—I am entirely of the same opinion.

barge owner is therefore not liable under that section to a penalty for leaving his barge in the docks without any person on board.

This was a case stated by J. Rowland Phillips, Esq., a stipendiary police magistrate, under the statute 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43, as amended by the Summary Jurisdiction Act (42 & 43 Vict. c. 49), for the purpose of obtaining the opinion of the court on a question of law which arose before him as hereafter stated.

Case.

1. At the Police-court, West Ham-lane, Stratford, in the county of Essex, on the 26th March 1885, a complaint was preferred by George Reader, who was acting as agent of the London and St. Katharine Docks Company, hereinafter called the respondents, against George Hedges and Sons, hereinafter called the appellants, charging them under the London and St. Katharine Dock Company Act 1864 (27 & 28 Vict. c. clxxviii), s. 101, for that a certain vessel, to wit, the barge Grace, was on the 12th March 1885 left in the Royal Albert Docks without any person on board, of which vessel the appellants were the owners.

2. The said complaint was on the 30th March 1885 heard by me, when it was proved and I found that at 8 a.m. on the 12th March 1885 the said vessel, to wit, the barge Grace, was left in the Royal Albert Docks without any person on board, and that the appellants were the owners of the said vessel, to wit, the barge Grace, and that it was simply propelled by oars.

3. It was contended on the part of the respondents under the London and St. Katharine Docks Act 1864 (27 & 28 Vict. c. clxxviii.), s. 101, and under the Harbours, Docks, and Pier Clauses Act 1847 (10 & 11 Vict. c. 27), s. 3, which is incorporated in the former Act, that the barge Grace was a vessel within the meaning of the above-mentioned Acts of Parliament, and that the fact of the vessel, to wit, the barge Grace, having been left in the Royal Albert Docks without any person on board rendered the master or owner of the said vessel, to wit, the barge Grace, liable to forfeit a sum not exceeding 5*l.*

4. It was contended on the part of the appellants that the barge Grace was a barge simply propelled by oars, and it was admitted that at the time of the alleged offence there was no person on board the said barge, and it was contended that the said barge Grace was not a vessel within the meaning of the 101st section of the London and St. Katharine Docks Act 1864, and the 3rd section of the Harbours, Docks, and Pier Clauses Act 1847 (10 & 11 Vict. c. 27), and that the appellants as owners of the said barge Grace were therefore not liable to the penalties mentioned in the said 101st section of the London and St. Katharine Docks Act 1864.

5. I being of opinion that the barge Grace was a vessel within the meaning of the above Acts of Parliament as charged in the summons, convicted the appellants in a penalty of 2*l.*, and ordered them to pay 2*l.* 3*s.* 6*d.* costs.

The question for the opinion of the Court is, whether the barge Grace is a vessel within the meaning of both the above-mentioned Acts of Parliament. If so then my conviction was right, but if the barge Grace is not a vessel within the meaning of the said Acts, then my conviction was wrong.

The Harbours, Docks, and Pier Clauses Act 1847 (10 & 11 Vict. c. 27), s. 3, is, so far as material, as follows:

3. The following words and expressions in both this and the special Act, and any Act incorporated therewith, shall have the meanings thereby assigned to them, unless there be something in the subject or context repugnant to such construction, that is to say:

The word "vessel" shall include ship, boat, lighter, and craft of every kind, and whether navigated by steam or otherwise.

The 3rd section of the London and St. Katharine Docks Act 1864 (27 & 28 Vict. c. clxxviii.) incorporates the Harbours, Docks, and Piers Clauses Act 1847 (10 & 11 Vict. c. 27) with that Act, and the 4th section provides that "the several words and expressions to which by the Acts in whole or in part incorporated with this Act meanings are assigned, have in this Act the same respective meanings, unless excluded by the subject or context."

The 100th, 101st, and 102nd sections of the London and St. Katharine Docks Act 1864 (27 & 28 Vict. c. clxxviii.), are as follows:

100. The dock master shall have full power and authority to order all ships and vessels entering the docks, basins, locks, cuts, or entrances of the amalgamated company, or any of them, to be dismantled in such manner as he thinks proper and safe for the vessel so entering, and for the prevention of accident or mischief to other ships and vessels, or to lighters, or craft, or to the docks and works; and during the time of every ship's delivery or when discharged her cargo, to have such quantity of ballast on board or deadweight in her hold as he judges requisite; and no ship or vessel shall be allowed to enter the docks, basins, locks, cuts, or entrances, unless she be so dismantled, nor shall any ship or vessel therein be unladen so far as to render her insecure through the want of weight in her hold, or of such quantity of ballast on board as the dock master thinks expedient; and the dock master shall have full power and authority to give directions for topping, bracing, or striking yards, masts, and taking in running bowsprits, and for having substantial hawsers and tow lines and fasts to the dolphin mooring craft, buoys, mooring-posts, or rings, and also to regulate the equipment, rigging, and lading of all ships and vessels in the docks, basins, locks, cuts, or entrances, as he thinks necessary.

101. In case the dock master judges any act or proceeding in the rigging, lading, or equipment of any ship or vessel injurious to the ship or vessel, or to other ships or vessels lying in or entering or departing from the docks, basins, locks, cuts, or entrances, or to the docks and works, he shall give notice to the master of the ship or vessel, or to some other person on board, and appearing to be in charge of the ship or vessel, to discontinue and alter the same, and in case the master shall not, according to the direction, suspend or alter the act or proceeding immediately after notice so given for that purpose, or if any ship or vessel be left in the docks, basins, locks, cuts, or entrances, without any person on board, the master or owner of the ship or vessel shall, for every such offence, forfeit not exceeding five pounds; and the owner of the ship or vessel shall also be answerable for all the damage or injury sustained by any other ships or vessels or by the amalgamated company through neglect thereof.

102. At any time after the expiration of twenty-four hours after the time when any lighter, barge, or like craft, enters any dock, basin, cut, lock, or entrance of the amalgamated company, the dock master or his assistant may, by notice in writing, require the removal of the same out of the docks and works, and the notice may be served by being delivered to the owner, or left for him at his then usual or last known place of abode or business, or by being forwarded by post, directed to him at his then usual or last known place of abode or business, or at his address as appearing on the craft, or if not appearing thereon, then as appearing by the books of the master, wardens, and commonalty of watermen and lightermen of the River Thames; and if within twelve hours after the delivery or sending of the notice the craft is not removed as thereby required, the owner thereof shall for every such default forfeit not exceeding forty shillings, and a further sum of twenty shillings for every twenty-four hours or less period after the first twenty-four hours during which the delay continues; and at any time after the expiration of twenty-four hours after the delivering or sending of the notice the dock-master or his assistant may remove the craft out of the docks and works and leave the same safely moored, and the owner or master of the craft shall pay to the company the reasonable expense of the removal, and the same may be recovered as damages or a penalty.

Finlay, Q.C. (with him Cranstoun) for the appellants.—A barge simply propelled by oars is not a vessel within the meaning of the 101st section of the London and St. Katharine Docks Act 1864, and the magistrate was wrong in convicting the appellants under this section for leaving their barge in the docks without any person on board. It is true that the Company's Act of 1864 incorporates the Harbour Docks and Piers Clauses Act 1847, and that that Act interprets the word "vessel" as including "ship, boat, lighter, and craft of every kind, and whether navigated by steam or otherwise," but it is contended that the context precludes that meaning from being assigned to the word "vessel" in the 101st section. The 100th section begins by giving the dock master power to dismantle all ships and vessels entering the docks. The word "dismantle" is not applicable to lighters and barges. The object of this "dismantling" is to prevent accidents to "other ships and vessels, or to lighters, or craft, or to the docks and works." Here if the word "vessel" included lighters, the words "or to lighters and craft" would have been necessary, but a distinction is clearly drawn for the purposes of this section between "vessels and lighters." The section then proceeds to make regulations as to ballast, which again do not apply to barges, and the section concludes with giving the dock master authority to give directions for topping, bracing, or striking yards, masts, and taking in running bowsprits, and for having substantial hawsers and towlines, and also to regulate the equipment, rigging, and lading of all ships and vessels in the docks. None of these provisions apply to barges. To this section the 101st section is clearly ancillary, prescribing the course to be taken by the dock master in exercising the authority bestowed by the 100th section. The first provision is that "in case the dock master judges any act or proceeding in the rigging, lading, or equipment of any ship or vessel injurious to the safety of the ship or vessel, or to other ships or vessels" in the docks, he shall give notice to the master or some other person on board, and appearing to be in charge to alter it. Again, the words "rigging, lading, or equipment of a ship or vessel" clearly do not apply to a barge solely propelled by oars. Then follows the provision we are dealing with, that in case the master does not alter the injurious proceeding after notice, and if any ship or vessel be left in the docks without any person on board, that is, to whom notice may be given to alter the proceeding, then the owner shall forfeit a penalty. All these provisions have to do with the dismantling and unlading of vessels, and clearly do not apply to barges. This argument is fortified by the 102nd section, which, ships and vessels having been dealt with in the preceding sections, proceeds to deal with lighters and barges specifically and by name. It provides that after twenty-four hours after the time when any lighter, barge, or like craft enters the docks the dock master may require by notice in writing its removal, and it is to be observed that there is no provision as to serving the notice on the person on board and appearing to be in charge, the statute on the contrary appearing to contemplate it as a probable occurrence that a barge might be left without any person on it, and consequently providing for sending the notice by post to certain addresses mentioned in the section. The section further contemplates that barges may be left without anyone in charge for some time, and gives the dock master power after twelve hours to remove them at the expense of the owner. As this section therefore clearly contemplates barges being left without any person in charge, it is clearly repugnant to it that the word "vessel" in the 101st section, which provides for fining the owner of a vessel left without anyone in charge, should include a barge simply propelled by oars. Further, the Legislature has not usually included barges under the term "ship or vessel:"

The Bilboa, 1 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 5; 3 L. T. Rep. N. S. 338; Lush. 149;
Everard v. Kendall, 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 391; 22 L. T. Rep. N. S. 408; L. Rep. 5 C. P. 428.

In Everard v. Kendall, Keating, J. says: "It is remarkable that whenever a definition is given in any Act of Parliament of 'ship' or 'vessel' barges have invariably been excluded;" and Montague Smith, J. says: "What, then, is the meaning of 'ship?' It is conceded that in the Court of Admiralty the jurisdiction exercised in respect of collisions is confined to cases of vessels not propelled by oars alone. I can see no intention on the part of the Legislature to alter the jurisdiction of the Court of Admiralty as to the definition of 'ship.' In the 24 Vict. c. 10, the preamble of which declares it to be passed for the purpose of extending the jurisdiction of the Court of Admiralty, 'ship' is defined in sect. 2 to mean 'any description of vessel used in navigation not propelled by oars.'"

Clarke, Q.C. (with him Grain), contra.—It was the intention of the Legislature that the 101st section should apply to all vessels, including barges, and there is nothing in that section or in the context repugnant to this construction. The Harbours, Docks, and Piers Clauses Act 1847, which is incorporated by this Act, assigns (ss. 3 and 4) a distinct meaning to the word vessel, making it include ship, boat, lighter, and craft of every kind, and whether navigated by steam or otherwise, and it will require very strong affirmative considerations, which do not exist here, to induce the court to hold that the word "vessel," in the 101st section, has a different meaning from that assigned to it by the interpretation clause. On the contrary, all the arguments of expediency and the proper construction of the sections require that barges should come within the operation of the 101st section. The distinction between the 100th and 101st sections and the 102nd consists only in the two former sections containing provisions applicable to all vessels including barges, whereas the provisions of the 102nd are applicable to lighters and barges only. It is further of the highest importance to the dock company that the 101st section should be held to apply to barges, since that section has always been applied to them, and without the section it will be difficult for the company to control the large number of barges entering the docks. The 101st section provides against the mischief of vessels being left unattended in the docks, and this mischief is greater in the case of barges than of any other vessels, as they are more likely to be cut adrift by the departure of ships or other barges to which they may be moored. The magistrate was right in deciding that a barge is a vessel within the meaning of the 101st section.

Finlay, Q.C., in reply, was not called upon.

Huddleston, B.—The question we have to decide in this case is whether the barge Grace belonging to the appellants, a barge simply propelled by oars, is a "vessel" within the meaning of the 101st section of the London and St. Katharine Docks Act 1864 (27 & 28 Vict. c. lxxviii.), which provides that if any ship or vessel be left in the docks, basins, locks, cuts, or entrances without any person on board, the master or owner of the ship or vessel shall, for every such offence, forfeit not exceeding five pounds. Under this section the appellants have been convicted, but we are of opinion that the magistrate was wrong in so convicting them. The whole question turns on the interpretation we put upon the different sections of the Acts. If it were a mere question of the meaning of the word "vessel" in the Act, we should be bound to say that this barge was a vessel within its meaning, for the 3rd section of the Act incorporates the Harbours, Docks, and Piers Clauses Act 1847 (10 & 11 Vict. c. 27), which, by its 3rd section, provides that "the word 'vessel' shall include ship, boat, lighter, and craft of every kind, and whether navigated by steam or otherwise." If, therefore, it were a mere question as to whether a barge were a vessel under this Act, that would be conclusive; but the 4th section of the Act provides that "the several words and expressions to which by the Acts in whole or in part incorporated with this Act meanings are assigned, have in this Act the same respective meaning unless excluded by the subject or context." Now, when we come to look at the 100th and 101st sections of the Act, we think it is clear that the Legislature never contemplated that a barge should be considered a vessel within the meaning of those sections, and I think that to hold that it was a vessel within their meaning would be repugnant to the context and circumstances contemplated by those sections.

Now, in dealing with the 100th and 101st sections, it is obvious at once that they must be taken together, and that it was the intention of the Legislature to give to the dock master certain powers with reference to ships and vessels, and to order alterations which he might judge to be requisite to be made. Notice of these alterations has to be given to some definite person or persons on board, and then to ensure the carrying out of the dock master's orders, a punishment is provided for disregard of them. Then there is also an ancillary provision, that if a ship or vessel be left in the docks without any person on board, the owner shall be liable to a fine in just the same way as if the notice had been given and disregarded. Now, this is not, as Mr. Clarke has endeavoured to put it, a specific enactment that if a vessel is without any person on board the owner is to be liable to a fine, but it is coupled to the previous part of the section by the word "or," that is to say, if there is no one on board on whom a notice can be served then the owner shall be fined. Now, what do the full powers given to the dock master by these sections deal with? He may order all ships or vessels to be dismantled so as to prevent damage to themselves or to other vessels or the docks. The word "dismantled" has to my mind a very clear significance, and then going on through the section we find these words, "during the time of every ship's delivery," "ballast," "topping, bracing or striking yards and masts," "taking in running bowsprits," "substantial hawsers and tow lines," "equipment, rigging and lading." These things are not applicable to barges. Then by the 101st section, if the dock master thinks any act or proceeding in rigging, lading, or equipment of a ship or vessel injurious to its own safety or the safety of the other ships, notice is to be given to the master, or failing the master to some person on board and appearing to be in charge. If there is no one at all on board then the master is fined. It seems to me that this is not a penalty for having no one on board, but a provision ancillary to the other provisions of the section, that if a notice is sent and there is neither the master nor any person in charge on board to serve it upon, then it shall be an offence to have no person on board. Nor do I think that there is any error on the part of the Legislature in omitting lighters and barges from the earlier sections, because when we look at the 102nd section we find that they had before them the difference between barges and other vessels, and made numerous distinctions between the two cases. Under these circumstances, I think it is clear that it was not the intention of the Legislature that a barge of this description should be brought within the operation of this section, and I think that the magistrate was wrong in convicting the appellants. The case of Everard v. Kendall has been quoted, but I do not think that, turning as it does on the construction of another Act of Parliament, it affects this case. Mr. Clarke has argued that this section has always been acted upon as including barges, and that if we hold that barges are not included within it the company will find a difficulty in dealing with them; but I think that it will be found that the company has ample power to make bye-laws to meet the case, and such a consideration ought not to influence us when upon the whole scope and context it is perfectly clear that it was not the intention of the Legislature that a barge solely propelled by oars should be considered a vessel within the meaning of this 101st section.

Wills, J.—I am of the same opinion. It is impossible to read these three sections together without seeing that they deal with the powers which the dock master is to have with reference to ships and vessels, and with reference to lighters, barges, and like craft, a distinction being made between the two classes, and the provisions relating to ships and vessels applying to ships and vessels, and the other provisions applying to lighters, barges, and the like craft. Where ships and vessels are mentioned, then we find the provisions are applicable to the things which we ordinarily mean when we use those words, namely, large craft with rigging and equipment. Amongst these provisions we find one which says that where it is necessary to discontinue or alter the manner of effecting the dismantling, discharging, lading, or equipment of any vessel, a notice which is clearly to be immediately acted upon is to be given to some person on board, and the intention evidently is that some person must be left on board to receive it, and therefore a penalty is provided if a master leaves his vessel in the docks without some person on board to receive such a notice. With regard, however, to lighters and barges and small craft which have no rigging, and to which there is therefore no necessity to give any notice regulating their dismantling or equipment, we find in the 102nd section a totally different scheme, and if it becomes necessary to remove them, and no one can be found belonging to them to remove them, then notice is to be sent by post or in some other way to the owners, and if they do not appear or send someone within twelve hours, then the dock master may move them at their expense. This interpretation appears to me to be perfectly clear and intelligible, and I think that the language of the sections is perfectly consistent with it. All we have to do is to place the clause of the 101st section, which we are considering—that is, "or if any ship or vessel be left in the docks, &c., without any person on board"—into a parenthesis, and then the whole clause is intelligible. It seems to me that Mr. Finlay has shown that the contrary interpretation is repugnant to the context, which shows that it was not the intention of the Legislature to include barges in the operation of these sections. Mr. Clarke, however, has argued that although barges may not be affected by the parts of the sections dealing with dismantling and equipment, because those things are not applicable to them, yet there is no reason for excluding them from the operating of the other parts which deal with lading and discharging, since barges are particularly liable to be overladen and so sunk, and it is very necessary that the dock master should have authority to prevent this. I do not think that, where a section is dealing so evidently with the lading and discharging of ships, a portion which may possibly apply to both can be taken out and said to apply to barges. Barges too, it is said, may very well come within the clause providing for the prevention of injury to other ships and vessels. I do not think that it is likely that a small barge having no rigging, and out of the way of rigging, was intended to be included in this provision. These are the only two passages where it is suggested that there is any necessity for a wider interpretation of the sections.

I do not, however, think there is any necessity for the construction, because, under the 83rd section of the Harbours, Piers, and Docks Clauses Act 1847, the dock company has, I think, ample powers to make bye-laws to meet the case. Mr. Clarke argues that there is no power under that section to make a bye-law to keep some person on board; but I think that, however that may be, there is ample power to make bye-laws sufficient to prevent the mischief contemplated in these sections. Enactments of this kind are always meant to be construed with reference to the habits of the people engaged, and I do not see that there is any necessity to keep a man on board every lighter at all times. I cannot help thinking that the Legislature would be slow to give such a power directly, because one cannot ignore the common knowledge of mankind, and such a necessity would involve the reconstruction of large numbers of these barges for the purpose of making a cabin for the person on board. On the questions, therefore, submitted to us I think that the sections, if carefully considered, leave no doubt that the appellants' barge is not a vessel within their meaning, and that the conviction is therefore wrong. Conviction quashed.

HUTH AND CO. v. LAMPORT AND ANOTHER.

GIBBS AND SON v. LAMPORT AND ANOTHER. (a)

General average—Security for payment—Form of bond—Deposit.

When there has been a general average loss incurred, and the contributions have not been ascertained, the shipowner is not entitled to make delivery of the cargo conditional upon the consignees signing an average bond in the form known as the Liverpool average bond, and making a deposit of 10 per cent. on the estimated value of their goods in the joint names, as provided by the bond, of the defendants and their average adjuster, or in the names of the defendants alone, or in the name of the average adjuster alone. A bond in such a form is unreasonable.

SPECIAL CASE, the material part of which was as follows:—

The plaintiffs were severally consignees of cargo shipped on board the steamship Thales at Buenos Ayres for Liverpool. The defendants were agents of the owner of the Thales, but for the purposes of the case were to be taken as owners of the ship.

The vessel grounded on her homeward voyage near Bridport, and part of the cargo was jettisoned.

When the vessel arrived at Liverpool the defendants claimed a lien on the residue of the cargo for general average losses and other charges, and refused to deliver the goods to the plaintiffs unless they would sign an average bond in the form known as the Liverpool average bond, and make a deposit of 10 per cent. on the estimated value of their goods, in the joint names, as provided by the bond, of the defendants and their average adjuster, or in the names of the defendants alone, or in the name of the average adjuster alone.

The object of having the deposit in one of these forms was to give the shipowner the power of drawing from time to time for his disbursements.

The plaintiffs, Huth and Co., refused to comply with these conditions, but offered to sign the London form of bond and to pay 10 per cent. on the estimated value of the goods into the joint account either of themselves and the defendants, or of the nominees of both. The defendants would not accept the London form of bond, and thereupon the plaintiffs paid under protest a deposit of 10 per cent., and the goods were delivered to them.

The actions by Huth and Co. was brought to recover the sum paid under protest, as above mentioned, and damages for the detention of the goods, and it was found in the case that if the defendants were not entitled either to the Liverpool form of bond, or to a deposit in any one of the three ways mentioned, one of which they required, or to have 10 per cent. paid before they delivered the goods, then their refusal to deliver them was unjustifiable.

In the action brought by Gibbs and Son the goods were delivered up on an application made in the second action under Order L., r. 8, on payment into court of 10 per cent. on the value to meet the lien which the defendants claimed in order to assert their right to a deposit on the terms above mentioned.

A bond similar to the London bond has been in use for seventy or eighty years, and the deposit, where any has been required, has always been made in the joint names of the shipowner and consignee. When the voyage ends in Liverpool the practice for about fifteen years has been for the shipowner to tender and for the consignee to sign the Liverpool form of bond, and for a deposit to be made in accordance with it, but the signing of the bond is not in all cases insisted on.

The difference between the London and the Liverpool form of bond lies in the provisions as to deposits, and in the special provisions in the Liverpool form for referring all questions of general average, or other charges arising out of the voyage, to the average adjuster of the shipowner, with a clause as to appeal from his decision. Both bonds contain an agreement that the deposit shall be held as a security for the general average and particular charges, but by the Liverpool bond it is further agreed that the parties in whose names the amount stands may pay thereout such sums as they shall from time to time consider ought to be paid to the owners or master on account of money actually disbursed by them or him, or to enable them or him to pay off and discharge claims which form part of the general average and other expenses.

The question for the opinion of the court was, whether the defendants were liable to the plaintiffs to any and what extent.

Cohen, Q.C. (Barnes with him), for the plaintiffs, was stopped.

Finlay, Q.C. (French, Q.C. with him) for the defendants.

The following cases were cited:

Simonds v. White, 1 B. & C. 805;
Crooks v. Allan, 41 L. T. Rep. N. S. 800; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 216; 5 Q. B. Div. 38;
The Norway, Br. & Lush. 377.

MATHEW, J.—I think our judgments must be for the plaintiffs in each case. The case has not been stated with a view of having the question determined whether, according to the custom of merchants and the law of England, a shipowner is entitled in every case where there is a claim for general average to retain the cargo till payment of the amount has been made. It might be necessary to decide that formally if any such right had been asserted in this case by the owner of the ship. Mr. Finlay referred to the matter, but he did not argue it at any length, and he appeared to me to say that when the time came, and when the proper case arose, he would be prepared to assert that the authorities show that such a right as I have referred to exists. The only cases he was able to call our attention to were the cases of Simonds v. White and Crooks v. Allan (ubi sup.). It is sufficient to say that neither of those authorities, in my judgment, justifies him in the argument that any such right exists; but in this case it is perfectly clear that no such right was insisted upon. If it had been a question of lien, and if the shipowner had called upon the consignee to deal with his lien, the question of amount would immediately have presented itself, and a more onerous and difficult position for a shipowner to place himself in cannot be imagined. He would be bound to give up the goods upon having a proper tender made to him. In order to enable a proper tender to be made he would be bound to give the necessary information to the consignee; and then he would run very great risk of asking too much or too little, a risk to the other consignees in the one case, and a risk to the particular consignee in the other. But no such position was taken up by the shipowner. (a) What the shipowner insisted upon was, upon the bond being in the Liverpool form. He was willing to take security, but he insisted that it should be in the form of what has been called the Liverpool bond.

The question presented to us is whether that bond is such a security as a shipowner might reasonably demand. It appears to me perfectly clear to be unreasonable in two particulars; first, in insisting upon making the average adjuster the arbitrator in the first instance, with a complicated arrangement for appeal from his decision; and secondly, in insisting upon payment over of the deposit money, either to the owner of the ship himself, or to the owner and some average adjuster, so that the money is placed for a time entirely out of the reach of the consignee of the goods; and that money, according to the terms of the bond, may be drawn upon by the owner of the ship, where the money is deposited in his name, or by the owner of the ship and the average adjuster whom he could name, in the event of it being deposited in the names of both of them. That form of average bond is, to my mind, unreasonable. The form of the London bond, which we are told has existed for seventy or eighty years, appears to be a reasonable one; and I should be glad if the result of our decision were to induce the shipowners of Liverpool to have recourse to the greater experience and wisdom of their London brethren, and adopt that form of bond. Our judgment must be for the plaintiffs.

SMITH, J.—I am of the same opinion.

Judgment for the plaintiffs.

(a) Mr. Justice Mathew seems to throw some doubt upon the right of the shipowner to exercise a lien upon the cargo for general average, and to retain it until payment of his claim. This expression of opinion is not necessary to the decision, and whatever doubts may have been created by it, they appear to be set at rest in favour of the shipowner by the decision of the Court of Appeal in this case: see post; and L. Rep. 61 Q. B. Div. 735.—ED.

THE HERCULES. (a)

Collision—Default action—Sale of foreign ship—Affidavit verifying cause of action—Marshall's report.

The court will not order the sale of a foreign ship in a default action in rem merely on the affidavit to lead the warrant and the report of the marshal alleging that it is desirable the ship should be sold, but it further requires an affidavit verifying the cause of action and stating that no appearance has been entered on behalf of the ship.

THIS was a motion by the plaintiffs in a collision action in rem instituted against the owners of the foreign ship Hercules. The Hercules had been arrested on the 29th Oct. 1885, but no appearance had been entered by the defendants.

The plaintiffs had filed the usual affidavit to lead the warrant of arrest. The marshal had made a report, stating the Hercules to be a Norwegian ship of 683 tons net; to have been built in 1841; to be in a very bad state of repair; to be not worth more than 200*l.*; and alleging that it was desirable that she should be immediately sold, in order to prevent further expenses being incurred, and that she was every day deteriorating in value.

Dr. Stubbs, for the plaintiff, in support of the motion.—The court should, in the present circumstances, exercise its power of ordering a sale. [BUTT, J.—The only materials before me are the marshal's report and the affidavit to lead the warrant of arrest. Surely you should have an affidavit verifying the cause of action?] There is enough before the court to warrant an order for sale.

BUTT, J.—I will not order the sale of a foreign ship merely on the marshal's report and the affidavit to lead the warrant. That affidavit merely says there has been a collision, and that damage has been occasioned to the plaintiffs. However, in this case, I will accede to the application, subject to the plaintiffs filing in the Registry an affidavit verifying the cause of action, and stating that no appearance has been entered on behalf of the ship.

THE COLONSAY. (a)

Practice—Necessaries action—Intervention of mortgagees—Sale of ship—Marshal's expenses.

Where mortgagees intervened in a necessaries action which was discontinued by the plaintiff before coming to trial, the Court directed that the marshal's fees occasioned by the sale of the ship, which was ordered on the application of the mortgagees, should be borne by the mortgagees, who had received the proceeds of the sale, and for whose benefit it had been made.

THIS was an appeal from the assistant registrar's report by interveners in a necessaries action in rem against the ship Colonsay.

The action was instituted by the plaintiff to recover the value of necessaries supplied by him to the Colonsay, and the vessel was arrested therein. The owners put in an appearance, but did not give bail or deliver pleadings. Subsequently Messrs. Kelly and Co. intervened as mortgagees, and took possession of the ship under their mortgage. The material-man, alleging that he had a prior claim to the mortgagees, refused to release the vessel. The mortgagees then obtained an order for the sale of the ship, and under this order she was sold. The marshal's fees and expenses amounted to 370*l.* 1*s.* 10*d.*

The vessel was bought by the interveners, agent. Two days prior to the trial, the plaintiff having discontinued his action, judgment, with costs, was, by his consent, entered for the mortgagees. The mortgagees' claim exceeded the proceeds of sale, which were paid out to the mortgagees, less the expenses occasioned by the sale, with the exception of the marshal's possession fee, which the assistant registrar was of opinion should be paid by the plaintiff. The mortgagees now appealed against the decision of the assistant registrar charging them with the costs of the sale.

Bucknill, Q.C. for the mortgagees.—It was the plaintiff, who has failed in his action, and who necessitated the sale of the ship. He should have discontinued his action earlier. As he has been unsuccessful in his claim, he should be ordered to pay the costs of the sale. The sale was for the benefit of all parties, and it is, therefore, unreasonable that the interveners, who have succeeded in establishing their right, should be visited with the costs.

Sir Walter Phillimore for the plaintiff.—It was at the instance of the mortgagees that the ship was sold. The continuance of the action by the plaintiff is no reason why the plaintiff should pay the expenses of the sale, as the ship must have been sold in any event. The mortgagees were not forced to apply to have the ship sold. They were people of substance, and could have given bail for the amount of the plaintiff's claim. It cannot be said that the plaintiff improperly continued his action. He required to be satisfied that the mortgagees had a valid title, and, on being so satisfied, he at once discontinued the action.

Bucknill, Q.C. in reply.

BUTT, J.—This is a case in which the plaintiff claimed a sum of money alleged and sworn to be due to him for necessaries supplied to the ship Colonsay. There was no denial of this claim, and it must therefore be taken that he had a perfectly good claim against the shipowners and equally against the ship herself, subject, of course, to any prior lien that might be in existence. The defendants, now appearing, have intervened as mortgagees, and they set up their mortgage, which, if valid, takes priority over the claim for necessaries.

(a) Reported by J. P. ASPINALL and BUTLER ASPINALL, Esqrs. Barristers-at-Law.

Inasmuch as the amount of the mortgagees' claim exceeds the value of the ship, their lien completely ousts the lien for necessaries. The ship was arrested by the plaintiff in the necessaries suit, and afterwards the mortgagees having intervened applied for an order for sale. That application was granted, and the ship was sold. Certain expenses were occasioned by that sale, and the question is, whether those expenses are to be paid by the plaintiff or by the mortgagees.

Now, it is perfectly true that a vessel under arrest may be in such a condition that it is desirable for all parties she should be sold, or, as an alternative, she may be bailed. In this case it was perfectly competent for the mortgagees to have bailed this ship. It is not contended that their pecuniary position was such as to preclude their doing so. The assistant registrar has disallowed the mortgagees the marshal's fees and charges, except the possession fees, on the ground that the ship was sold on their application, and apparently for their benefit. I am now asked to say that they, with the proceeds in their pockets, are not to pay the expenses of the sale. It is very true that the material-man has been defeated by the mortgagees, but I cannot think any blame is to be attributed to him for instituting the suit. I think that the mortgagees, acting as reasonable men, should either have given bail or have paid the expenses of the sale themselves. I must therefore decline to accede to this application, and I uphold the assistant registrar's decision.

THE HARVEST. (a)

Collision—Bye-laws for the Regulation of the Port of Newcastle-upon-Tyne 1884, art. 20.

Where a vessel entering the Tyne from the southward, in order to get upon a course to take her up the river on the north side, across from south to north of mid-channel at from two to three cables lengths outside the south pier she thereby infringes Bye-law 20 for the Regulation of the River Tyne, directing that vessels shall be brought into the port to the north of mid-channel; and she ought, on the proper construction of the bye-law, to have crossed from south to north at some considerable distance outside the pierheads.

THIS was a collision action in rem instituted by the owners, master, and crew of the late steamship Stainsacre against the owners of the steamship Harvest to recover damages occasioned by a collision between the two vessels on the 30th Nov. 1885. The defendants counter-claimed.

The facts alleged on behalf of the plaintiffs were as follows: Shortly before 11 p.m. on the 30th Nov. 1885 the steamship Stainsacre, of 705 tons register, bound on a voyage from Howdon Dock in the Tyne to Copenhagen with a cargo of coals, was proceeding down the Tyne; the weather was fine and clear, but dark, the wind was about W.N.W., and the tide was first quarter ebb. When the Stainsacre had passed the Herd Buoy, and was approaching the south pier, she was well over to the south of mid-channel, and was making about five to six knots. Her regulation lights were duly exhibited and burning brightly, and a good look-out was being kept. In these circumstances the red light of a vessel, which afterwards proved to be the steamship Harvest, was seen about three points on the starboard bow of the Stainsacre, and about one mile distant, but no masthead light was visible. The Stainsacre was kept heading E. ½ S. on the course she had been steering to leave the harbour, until she had cleared the end of the south pier, when her helm was put hard-a-port, but shortly afterwards two short blasts of a steam whistle were heard from the Harvest, which was then, for the first time, discovered to be a steamship by those on board the Stainsacre. Immediately on getting this signal, the helm of the Stainsacre was put hard-a-starboard, and two short blasts of her whistle blown, and immediately afterwards, the red light of the Harvest alone continuing open, the engines of the Stainsacre were put full speed astern and her whistle blown three short blasts. But the Harvest came on fast, and with her stern and starboard bow struck the starboard side of the Stainsacre a little abaft the fore rigging, doing the Stainsacre great damage, in consequence of which she sank in five minutes after the collision.

The plaintiffs charged the defendants (inter alia) with breach of arts. 2 and 3 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, and also with improperly approaching the entrance of the Tyne in such a direction that the Harvest was g brought into the port to the south of mid-channel, and neglecting to comply with Bye-Law 20 for the Regulation of the Port of Newcastle-upon-Tyne.

The facts alleged on behalf of the defendants were as follows: Shortly before 11 p.m. on the 30th Nov. 1885, the steamship Harvest, of 881 tons register, bound on a voyage in ballast from Terneuzen to the Tyne, had arrived off the entrance to the Tyne, and was proceeding to enter the river, having the two leading lights in line on a bearing of W. ¾ N. At such time her regulation masthead and side lights were duly exhibited and burning brightly, and a good look-out was being kept on board of her. In these circumstances those on board the Harvest observed the masthead and port lights of a steamer, which proved to be the Stainsacre, leaving the river very nearly ahead, and a little on the port bow withal, and distant about one mile. The helm of the Harvest was ported a little, and the Stainsacre brought about a point on the port bow of the Harvest, and the vessels were in a position to pass port side to port side. As the Stainsacre approached she appeared to be steering so as to pass in too close proximity to the Harvest, and the helm of the Harvest was ported a little more, when suddenly the Stainsacre shut in her red light and opened her green. The helm of the Harvest was thereupon put hard-a-port and one short blast blown on her steam whistle, and immediately afterwards, as the Stainsacre was seen to be steering across the bows of the Harvest, rendering a collision imminent, the engines of the Harvest were stopped and reversed full speed astern, and three short blasts blown on her steam whistle; but the Stainsacre came on at a high rate of speed, and, before the Harvest could gather stern way, the Stainsacre, with her starbourd side about amidship, struck the stem of the Harvest. It was also alleged by the defendants that just before the collision, and when the vessels were about a quarter of a mile apart, some sudden gusts of wind or other unavoidable circumstance extinguished the masthead light of the Harvest, which had up to that time been burning brightly.

Bye-law 20 for the Regulation of the Port of Newcastle-upon-Tyne is as follows:

Every steam or other vessel (whether towing any other vessel or not, or being towed) shall, unless prevented by stress of weather, be brought into the port to the north of mid-channel, and be taken out of the port to the south of mid-channel.

Sir Walter Phillimore (with him Gorell Barnes) for the plaintiffs.—The defendants are to blame for not complying with the regulations as to lights. The absence of the masthead light misled the plaintiffs, and contributed to the collision. The defendants have also infringed art. 20 of the Tyne rules in coming into the harbour as they did.

F. W. Raikes (with him Stokes) for the defendants.—The extinguishing of the light was due to circumstances beyond the control of the defendants, and occurred when the vessels were so close that it could not have misled the plaintiffs. The Harvest was being brought into the harbour to the north of mid-channel, and was therefore complying with the Tyne rules. Moreover, the bye-laws have no application, as the collision occurred outside the piers.

Sir W. Phillimore in reply.

BUTT, J.—There is no difference of opinion at all between the view which the Elder Brethren have taken of this matter and my own. The collision, which occurred between two steamships, the one leaving and the other entering the Tyne, took place on the night of the 30th Nov., somewhere about 11 p.m. The Tyne Commissioners have by authority issued certain regulations for governing and directing the navigation of their port, and the regulation which is most material to the present case is No. 20. The preceding rule directs vessels to keep on their own starboard side of mid-channel in navigating narrow waters, and to pass port side to port side. Rule 20 is in these words: "Every steam or other vessel (whether towing any other vessel or not, or being towed) shall, unless prevented by stress of weather, be brought into the port to the north of mid-channel, and be taken out of the port to the south of mid-channel." Now, my understanding of that rule is that a vessel about to enter the Tyne, coming from the southward, is not to cross from the south to the north side close up to the pierheads. She is to get on a course that will take her up the river at some considerable distance outside the piers. The reason for such a regulation is obvious. It appears to me, and in this the Elder Brethren agree, that the main cause of this collision—I do not say the approximate or the only cause—was the fact, which I find to be a fact, that the steamer Harvest, instead of keeping out to sea till she had passed the line of the mid-channel course out of the river, crossed the line too near in towards the pierheads, and so brought about a position of danger, which, with the other circumstances under consideration, really caused this collision. The collision seems to have happened some two or two and a half cables lengths outside the pierheads, and not more. The wreck lay in a position described in the notice which has been issued warning captains of ships of its position, and that position is decidedly to the south of mid-channel. But it is said that, though that is or was the position of the wreck, it was not the place of collision, because, the tide being as it was, carried the vessel down, and that that accounts for her lying so far to the south. When we come to examine the evidence we find that all the witnesses on behalf of the Stainsacre say the collision occurred to the south of mid-channel, and all the witnesses called on behalf of the Harvest say that is not the case, and that it occurred to the north of mid-channel.

There being this conflict, I have to decide what is the real truth of the matter. What occurred to me during the hearing of the evidence, and what occurs to me now, is that I cannot accept the story told by the captain of the Harvest as a true story. I cannot accept his evidence as to the speed of his vessel, and especially that part of it in which he says that his vessel actually had stern way on her at the time of the collision. I believe that is wholly contrary to the fact, and therefore I am not predisposed to accept his evidence as to the position in regard to mid-channel, in which he says this collision occurred. In the course of his cross-examination, he was asked by Sir Walter Phillimore to take the position in which he says his vessel was at a certain point on the coast, and lay the course he steered from that point. He did so, and the chart which he has marked shows that he was up within some three, or three and a half at most, cables lengths of the entrance of the harbour at the time his course intersected the line of leading lights; whereas his case is that he had got on the line some mile and a half or two miles outside, and was complying with, and not infringing, rule 20. I am perfectly aware that it is hard to judge a man too severely by evidence of that sort; but, allowing him a good deal of latitude, it appears to us that he must have been, on his own showing, a great deal nearer the mouth of the harbour than he admits when he began to alter his course. That points to the conclusion that he infringed rule 20, and I cannot help thinking that the position of the wreck leads to the same conclusion. We then have the evidence of the pilot Blair, called by the owners of the Harvest, and not by the plaintiffs, who say in terms: "If the Harvest had come in to the north side of the river there never would have been any collision." What is that but equivalent to saying that one cause, at all events, of the collision was the Harvest not coming in to the north side, and that is not obeying rule 20. We think, therefore, it is clear that the Harvest was entering the harbour in defiance of the rule.

The next point is as to the absence of the Harvest's masthead light. That light was, undoubtedly, out before the collision; and, having regard to the evidence as a whole, I have no doubt that it was out sooner than the defendant's witnesses would have us believe. We think it clear that, when the Harvest was something like a mile from the Stainsacre, her masthead light had gone out. That being so, it was gross carelessness on the part of those in charge of that vessel, entering such a river as the Tyne, to have allowed it to remain out until the time of the collision. I have not forgotten that there was some independent evidence called to prove that the masthead light had gone out only shortly before the collision, and also to prove that the Harvest was a considerable distance outside the harbour when she shaped her course up the river. I have given all the attention to that evidence which I think it deserves, and I have come to the conclusion that it is not altogether trustworthy. It occurred to me, early in the course of this case, to ask myself, Supposing this masthead light was out, and the red light of the Harvest alone visible to those on board the Stainsacre, when they came within some such distance as a mile, would it have made any difference? I put the question to the captain of the Stainsacre, and he, in entire conformity with his statement before the Receiver of Wrecks, said: "I took that vessel, seeing a red light only, for a sailing vessel. I ported to go under her stern, and I should have passed well under her stern if she had been a sailing vessel coming, as I had reason to believe she was. Had I known it to be a steamer, I should have at once eased my engines, and there would have been no collision." I think that is consistent with the facts, and I have no doubt it is the real truth of the matter. I think not only was the masthead light out, and negligently allowed to remain out for a considerable time, but I think that it was a circumstance materially contributing to the collision, and that for that also the Harvest is to blame. There is another part of this case which has to be considered, and it is this: I refer to the starboarding of the Stainsacre. That was an extraordinary manœuvre, having regard to the position in which these vessels were. She says she starboarded because she heard the Harvest blow two blasts of her whistle, which meant that she was directing her course to port. It is very difficult to believe that the Stainsacre would ever have starboarded at all unless she had heard these two blasts. There is no other reason why she should have done it. The witnesses from the Harvest have sworn that they only gave one blast, and as a matter of fact, we know that the Harvest was porting. Therefore it seems to me extremely difficult to suppose that they should have made a signal that they were starboarding. It is a conflict out of which I do not see my way clearly. It has occurred to me as possible that, either from some choking in the pipe or some similar defect, what was intended as one blast may have sounded as two. I do not know that that is a theory which ought to be accepted as the true explanation of this case, but I have no doubt that the master and those on board the Stainsacre acted under the impression that two blasts were given. Under all the circumstances of the case I have come to the conclusion that the real cause of the collision was the Harvest crossing the entrance of the port in violation of rule 20, and that the absence of her masthead light was also a cause conducing to the collision. I do not think, under the circumstances, that blame can be imputed to the master of the Stainsacre for starboarding, and we are all very clearly of opinion that, as soon as the danger was apparent, he acted by starboarding, by giving signals, and by stopping and reversing. Under these circumstances I pronounce the Harvest alone to blame.

THE TURGOT. (a)

Wages and disbursements — Master — Charter-party—Costs—Ten days' double pay—Merchant Shipping Act 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104), s. 187.

Where a ship was chartered under a charter providing that the captain should be appointed and dismissed by the charterers, that the shipowners were to provide and pay for all provisions and wages of the captain and crew, and for the necessary equipment for the efficient working of the ship, and that the charterers should pay for all the coals, port charges, and other expenses, except those above stated, and the captain instituted an action in rem against the owners of the ship claiming in respect of disbursements, consisting of provisions and coals, in respect of which latter item he had given a draft on the shipowners, which draft had been dishonoured, the Court held that the master, having notice of the charter-party, was agent for both the owners and the charterers in respect of the liabilities of each, as determined by the charter, and that therefore the owners were liable in respect of the provisions, but not in respect of the coals.

Where, in an action for master's wages, it appears that, at the institution of the suit, accounts are outstanding between the owners and the plaintiff, and that the same have not been taken or settled, and that within two days of the institution of the suit the wages are paid, the owners have not refused to pay "without sufficient cause" within the meaning of sect. 187 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, and therefore the plaintiff is not entitled to recover ten days' double pay.

THIS was an action in rem for wages and disbursements instituted by the master of the steamship Turgot against the owners thereof, in which the vessel was arrested in the sum of 1500*l.*

The plaintiff was appointed master by the charterer, Henry Robertson, with the approval of the shipowners, and commanded the said steamship from the 5th April 1884 to May 25, 1885.

The plaintiff, by his statement of claim, alleged that, whilst master, necessaries were supplied to the Turgot by Messrs. Tramontana, of Palermo, upon his order to enable the vessel to perform her voyage, and that Messrs. Tramontana had recovered judgment against him for the cost of such necesaries, viz., 24*l.* 4*s.* 4*d.*, together with 6*l.* 10*s.* for costs. It was also alleged that necessaries had been supplied to the said ship by E. T. Aguis and Co., of Malta, upon the plaintiff's order to enable the Turgot to perform her voyage, and that the plaintiff had been sued for the cost of such necessaries, viz., 187*l.* 14*s.*, and was liable to pay the same. The plaintiff also claimed wages and ten days' double pay.

The defendants had to put in bail amounting to 1500*l.*

The defence, so far as is material, was as follows:—

(a) Reported by J. P. ASPINALL and BUTLER ASPINALL, Esqrs. Barristers-at-Law.

1. The defendants admit that the plaintiff served as master of the Turgot for the period in the statement of claim mentioned, but they say that during the whole of the said period the said steamship was chartered to one Robertson, and that by the terms of the charter-party or charter-parties (which terms were well known to the plaintiff) the charterers were to provide and pay for all coal and fuel for the steam engines, port charges, and expenses whatsoever, except certain expenses not material to this action, and the master, officers, and crew were to be appointed by and to follow the instructions of the charterers, and the master was, in fact, appointed by the said charterers, and was, as he well knew, in fact, the servant of, and in all matters connected with the said ship during the said period acted as and was the agent of the charterers and not of the defendants.

2. The defendants deny that necessaries were supplied to the Turgot by Messrs. Tramontana or E. T. Aguis and Co., as alleged in the statement of claim, and say that if any goods were supplied on the order of the plaintiff, as alleged (which the defendants deny), the plaintiff was in giving such order or in taking delivery of the said goods, acting, as he well knew, and as was well known to the persons supplying the said goods, as agents for the charterers of the said ship, and not on behalf of or with the authority of the defendants. If the plaintiff has been sued for the said goods, as alleged (which the defendants do not admit), the defendants say that the plaintiff was not liable in respect of the same, and if he has suffered judgment against himself in respect thereof such judgment or judgments were suffered by the laches and want of proper defence on the part of the plaintiff.

3. As to the plaintiff's claim for wages, the defendants say that since action it has been duly satisfied and discharged by payment.

4. As to the plaintiff's claim for disbursements, the defendants deny that the plaintiff ever made any disbursements or incurred any expenses or liabilities for the said ship, or that the same remain due and unpaid to him as alleged. If any disbursements were made, or expenses or liability incurred (which is denied), the same were not made and incurred by the plaintiff as agent for, or on behalf of, or by the authority of the defendants, but as agent for the charterers, as hereinbefore alleged. The defendants further say that if the plaintiff did make any such disbursements, or incur any such expenses or liabilities, the said charterers have satisfied and discharged the claim of the plaintiff in respect thereof by payment or in account.

The plaintiff, by his reply, said as follows:

1. The plaintiff admits that since the commencement of this action the defendants have paid to him the balance of his wages and disbursements actually out of pocket, but the defendants have not paid to him his ten days' double pay to which he was entitled, nor anything for his detention, and have not paid or indemnified him against the claims still being pressed against him, and for which he is liable as master of the Turgot.

2. As to the residue of the defence the plaintiff joins issue.

The particulars of the plaintiff's claim were as follows: Tramontana's claim and taxed costs, amounting to 30*l.* 14*s.* 4*d.*; costs of plaintiff's solicitors in Tramontana's action, not yet delivered; E. T. Aguis and Co.'s claim, amounting to 187*l.* 14*s.*; costs of plaintiff's solicitors in E. T. Aguis and Co.'s action, not yet taxed; ten days' double pay; and legal charges outside the above actions incurred by the plaintiff in consequence of the defendants' conduct. In addition to the above items, the plaintiff originally claimed a sum of 1002*l.* 3*s.* in respect of alleged necessaries supplied by Messrs. Laming and Co., but this item was subsequently withdrawn.

The material provisions of the charter-party were as follows:

It is this day mutually agreed . . . that the owners shall provide and pay for all provisions and wages of the captain, officers, engineers, firemen, and crew, shall pay for the insurance of the vessel (if any), and for all oil, tallow, and waste required for the engine-room, and provide and pay for the necessary equipment for the proper and efficient working of the said steamer. That the charterer shall provide and pay for all the coals and fuel for the steam engines, port charges, and expenses whatsoever, except those before stated. That the charterers shall accept and pay for all coal now in ship's bunkers, and the owners shall, on expiry of the charter-party, pay for all coal then left in the bunkers, both at current market prices. . . . That the captain, officers, and crew shall be appointed by and shall follow the instructions of the charterer, who will furnish him from time to time with sailing directions. That the captain shall use all and every dispatch in prosecuting the voyage, and shall render all customary assistance with the ship's crew and boats, and should the owners be dissatisfied with the conduct of the captain, or any of the officers, or engineers, the charterer shall, on being advised of such, fully investigate the matter, and if necessary make a change in the appointments.

At the trial it appeared that the charterer, Mr. Henry Robinson had appointed the master; that the master had knowledge of the provisions of the charter-party; that Messrs. Tramontana's claim was in respect of provisions, boat hire, and pilotage inwards and outwards; and that E. T. Aguis and Co.'s claim was in respect of coals and provisions supplied at Malta, and of 6*l.* advanced to the captain. With regard to this claim, it appeared that in consequence of a statement made by E. T. Aguis and Co.'s clerk to the master, that they had received instructions from Messrs. Laws, Surtees, and Co., the owners of the Turgot, that the master was to draw upon the owners. The master accordingly drew a draft for 187*l.* 4*s.* upon the owners, and handed it to E. T. Aguis. It, however, appeared that in fact the Messrs. Laws, Surtees, and Co. had given no such instructions, and they had accordingly refused to meet the draft. The plaintiff attempted to prove that the supply of coals at Malta was chargeable to the ship, on the ground that it was necessary to bring the ship home in consequence of the charterer having failed to supply the goods, and it being necessary in the owner's interest that the ship should return. In this they failed, it being shown that the coals were supplied on the charterer's order.

J. P. Aspinall (with him Bigham, Q.C.) for the defendants.—The matters in respect of which the plaintiff is claiming were, by the provisions of the charter-party to be supplied by the charterer. Therefore, on the authority of The Beeswing (53 L. T. Rep. N. S. 554; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 484), the plaintiff should look to the charterer and not to the owners for payment. He clearly had no authority to pledge the owners' credit in respect of coal. It is also submitted that he is not entitled to recover the costs incurred by him in defending the actions brought against him. He clearly ought never to have defended them except with the sanction of the present defendants.

Gorell Barnes for the plaintiff.—The master is entitled to recover such disbursements as by the provisions of the charter-party the owners were bound to provide. With regard to the coals, reliance is placed upon the judgment of the Master of the Rolls in The Beeswing (ubi sup.), where he says that if the charterers' agents abroad refused to make disbursements which they had undertaken to make, and the ship could not be navigated without such disbursements, the master would be entitled to charge such disbursements against the owners. The facts in the present case, therefore, entitle the master to claim in respect of the coals.

Cur. adv. vult.

Jan. 19.—Sir JAMES HANNEN.—This is an action by the captain against the owners of the Turgot for necessaries supplied at Palermo, for which the captain has made himself liable, and in respect of which judgment has been recovered against him. He also claims for necessaries supplied at Malta, and for wages. The defendants deny their liability on the ground that the plaintiff, in incurring these liabilities, acted as agent for the charterer, and not for the owners; and, as to the wages, they say they have been paid. By the terms of the charter-party the owners were to provide and pay for provisions and wages, the charterer to provide and pay for coals and other expenses. The captain was to be appointed by and follow the instructions of the charterer, and if the owners were dissatisfied with the captain the charterer was to investigate the facts, and, if necessary, make a change. He was, in fact, appointed by the charterer, and furnished with a copy of the charter-party. I have been referred to the case of The Beeswing (ubi sup.), in which the facts were very similar to the present, except that there the captain was to be discharged by the charterers. In this case the captain, knowing the terms of the charter-party, was the agent of the owners in providing those necessaries which, by the terms of the charter, were to be paid for by the owners; and was the agent of the charterers in providing those necessaries for which they were to be responsible. At Malta the captain ordered coals to the amount of 150*l.* 10*s.*, provisions amounting to 18*l.* 13*s.* 2*d.*, and obtained an advance of 6*l.* to himself. After the coals and provisions were supplied the captain proposed to pay by drawing on the charterer, but the merchant supplying the goods refused to take this mode of payment, alleging that he had instructions from the owners that the captain might draw a bill on them. Believing this statement, which was, in fact, not correct, the captain drew on the owners for the coals and provisions, and it is in respect of his liability on this bill that he now claims against the owners. I, however, am of opinion that the captain is not entitled to recover in respect of the coals, as, by the terms of the charter-party, he had no authority to pledge the credit of his owners for them.

It was argued by the plaintiff's counsel that, on the authority of The Beeswing (ubi sup.), he had an implied authority to pledge the credit of the owners as agent ex necessitate, in order to enable the ship to sail. The facts do not support his argument. The owners had no interest in the immediate departure of the ship from Malta, as the charterers were bound to pay for the hire of the vessel during its detention, and even if it had not been so the plaintiff ought to have communicated by telegram with the owners before pledging their credit for disbursements, which he knew they were not bound to make. On the other hand I am of opinion that the captain had implied authority on the owners' behalf to make disbursements for provisions which they were bound by the charter-party to supply, and I think he is entitled to enforce his claim against them to that extent. On the same principle I think he was entitled to pledge the owners' credit at Palermo, and he therefore can recover the amount of his claim in respect of the necessaries supplied there. With regard to the costs incurred by the plaintiff in defending the actions brought against him, I think he cannot recover them. He was, undoubtedly, liable in those actions, and he should not have defended except at the request of the defendants in this action. I am further of opinion that the plaintiff is not entitled to recover ten days' double pay, as the small balance of wages due was not delayed without sufficient cause, and as it was only found to be due on a final settlement of involved accounts, and was, in fact, paid within a few days of the action being brought. In the result I find he is entitled to recover the 6*l.* advanced at Malta, and the 18*l.* 13*s.* 4*d.* in respect of provisions supplied there, and also 24*l.* 4*s.* 2*d.* recovered by Messrs. Tramontana in respect of necessaries supplied at Palermo, making in all 48*l.* 17*s.* 6*d.*, which I decree due with costs.

Bigham, Q.C.—It is submitted that, as the plaintiff has recovered less than 50*l.*, the action should not have been instituted in the High Court. Moreover, the court should not forget that the defendants had to put in bail for 1500*l.*, which was most unreasonable, and therefore the plaintiff should be condemned for arresting the ship in such an amount.

Barnes contra.

Sir JAMES HANNEN.—The captain was placed in a very difficult position between the owners and the persons making the disbursements, and I think this case was a proper one to be investigated here. I therefore adhere to my decision as to costs.

THE DORA TULLY. (a)

Disbursements—Master—Managing owner—Ship's stores.

A master on his appointment agreed with the managing owner that he, the master, should find the provisions for the officers and crew at a certain rate per day. The master subsequently agreed with the managing owner, who was also a ship's store dealer, that the managing owner should supply the provisions and should charge them against moneys of the master which he held in his hands. The managing owner, however, debited his co-owners with the costs of the provisions, and fraudulently applied the master's money to his own purposes.

Held, in an action in rem against the owners by the master to recover wages and disbursements, that the master was entitled to credit for such an amount in the settlement of his accounts with the owners, the fraudulent application of his money by the managing owner being a wrong done to the co-owners for which he was not responsible.

THIS was a motion by the defendants in an action in rem for master's wages and disbursements, asking that the registrar's report therein might be varied by directing that the plaintiff should not be entitled to recover against the defendants a sum of 316*l.* 17*s.* 6*d.*, which has been allowed by the registrar.

The action was instituted by Robert Young, late master of the s.s. Dora Tully, in rem against her owners to recover wages and disbursements. His claim, which amounted to 1584*l.* 5*s.* 1½*d.*, was referred to the registrar and merchants, who allowed him 552*l.* 5*s.* 9*d.* At the reference it appeared that, at the time he was appointed master, it was agreed between himself and one C. Tully, the managing owner of the ship, that he, the master, should victual the officers and crew at a stipulated rate per day, and that these provisions were supplied by Tully. It also appeared that at this time Mr. C. Tully held in his hands a sum of 316*l.* 17*s.* 6*d.* belonging to the master, and that it was agreed between them that this sum of money should be applied in paying the master's victualling account. Mr. Tully, who was a ship's store dealer, accordingly supplied provisions to the ship, most of which were supplied from his own stores. He having become involved in pecuniary difficulties, instead of applying the plaintiff's money in payment of these provisions, debited the cost of such provisions to his co-owners, who in fact paid for them, and he applied the plaintiff's money to his own purposes. It further appeared that, notwithstanding the arrangement that the master should supply provisions, the owners had in some instances supplied and paid for them themselves. In respect of such items the plaintiff, in his claim, gave the owners credit, and deducted the same accordingly. Among other items claimed were the victualling bill and the above-mentioned 316*l.* 17*s.* 6*d.*, which was claimed in the following form:

C. Tully and Co., for provisions, 316*l.* 17*s.* 6*d.*

The registrar, being of opinion that the victualling bill included all amounts paid for provisions, struck out the 316*l.* 17*s.* 6*d.*, but subsequently acceded to the plaintiff's application that he (the registrar) should strike out of the credit account (containing the deductions before referred to) as many items as would balance the 316*l.* 17*s.* 6*d.*

The registrar's report with regard to this item of 316*l.* 17*s.* 6*d.* was as follows:

In explanation of the concluding item of the schedule No. 2, I have further to report that it appears by the evidence of the plaintiff that, at the time he was appointed master of this ship, he agreed with Mr. C. Tully, the managing owner that he, the plaintiff, should find provisions for the officers and crew during the voyage at a certain rate per diem. At such time Mr. C. Tully held in his hands a sum of 316*l.* 17*s.* 6*d.* belonging to the plaintiff, or was indebted to him to that amount for money received on his account, and it was further agreed that all provisions supplied to the ship by Mr. Tully, or paid for by him as managing owner, should be charged against such private moneys until the amount should be exhausted. It further appears that, whilst the ship was absent on the voyage in question, Mr. C. Tully became involved in financial difficulties, and, instead of debiting the plaintiff's private moneys with the costs of the provisions supplied to the ship, and which, to a large extent were supplied from his own stores, he paid for them out of moneys belonging to the ship, and debited them accordingly in his accounts with his co-owners. In so doing Mr. Tully violated his agreement with the plaintiff, and acted unjustifiably by his co-owners. In my opinion it was a fraudulent application of his co-owners' money, to which the plaintiff was no party and for which he must not be held responsible and that the plaintiff is only bound to give credit for the amount of any provisions so paid for out of the ship's moneys as exceeds the sum he had left in Mr. Tully's hands for the purpose before stated.

J. P. Aspinall for the defendants.—As regards this 316*l.* 17*s.* 6*d.*, Tully was the agent of the master only and not of his co-owners. If so, the default of Tully is to be visited on the master and not on the co-owners. Although Tully was managing owner, yet, for the purposes of this transaction, he was merely a marine-store dealer employed by the master to provide the provisions. The fact that the master was by his agreement to supply the provisions, shows that, for this purpose, Tully was acting only in his capacity of marine-store dealer, and therefore had no authority to pledge the credit of his co-owners:

The Rainbow, 53 L. T. Rep. N. S. 91; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 479.

A further proof of this is that Tully held this money as security for provisions to be supplied in the future, and therefore this money was in no way held on behalf of the co-owners.

Sir Walter Phillimore (with him Dr. Raikes) for the master, contra.—The registrar is right in treating this money as having been held by Tully in his capacity of managing owner, and therefore as agent for the co-owners. It is true that Tully has been guilty of a fraud against his co-owners, but for this the master should not be held liable.

Aspinall in reply.

Sir JAMES HANNEN.—This was a suit for wages and disbursements, the registrar finding 552*l.* 5*s.* 9*d.* to be still due to the plaintiff. The plaintiff, being captain of the vessel Dora Tully, was by agreement bound to provide provisions for the officers and crew. He was to be paid a stipulated sum for so doing. Tully, the managing owner of the vessel, held, at the time of the captain's appointment, 316*l.* 17*s.* 6*d.* of the captain's money in his hands, and it was agreed between the captain and Tully that he was to deduct from the amount of 316*l.* 17*s.* 6*d.* the price of provisions which should be supplied by Tully to the vessel. The captain was primarily liable. Certain provisions were supplied by Tully himself out of his own stores, he being a provision dealer; as to other provisions, the captain obtained them abroad and drew on Tully for their amount; but Tully, instead of treating the price of these provisions so supplied by him, and the other provisions with respect to which the captain drew on him, as discharged by the money in his hands belonging to the captain, made default in so applying these moneys in his hands, and in his account with his co-owners treated the provisions as having been paid for out of the ship's money.

Now the question arises upon whom the loss is to fall by reason of that misconduct on the part of Tully, and the registrar has found, with the assistance of the merchants, that the loss must fall on the co-owners and not on the plaintiff, and I am of opinion that that view is the correct one. As to the provisions supplied by Tully himself, it appears to be entirely free from the possibility of a doubt. Tully is dealing with his own provisions, and when he supplied them he was of course bound by his agreement with the captain that these goods should be treated as paid for out of the moneys in his hands. Though the facts are somewhat different with regard to the provision for which the captain drew upon Tully, yet it appears to me the result must be the same. The captain, when he drew on Tully, drew upon the assumption, which he had a right to hold, that Tully would pay for those goods, and they were to be treated as agreed for out of the moneys which Tully held of his at the time; and if Tully did not do that which it was his duty towards his co-owner to do, namely, to treat these goods as paid for out of the 316*l.* 17*s.* 6*d.*, it was a wrong done to his co-owners, for which the captain is not responsible, and he has only done what he had a right to do by virtue of his arrangements with the co-owners, and therefore I must hold that the report of the registrar is correct, and the appeal must be dismissed with costs.

THE ST. AUDRIES. (a)

Collision — Cardiff Drain — Crossing ships — Docking signal—Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, arts. 16 and 23.

Where a steamship, in charge of a pilot, bound for Penarth Dock, and carrying the usual docking signal of two bright lights aft, saw, when crossing Cardiff East Flat, the red and masthead lights of a steamship coming down Cardiff Drain, bearing on her starboard bow and distant from three to four cables length; but the pilot in charge took no steps to get out of the way of the other vessel until a collision was inevitable, because he was of opinion that, as he was bound for dock, he was entitled to hold on, the Court held that his vessel was to blame for breach of art. 16 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions, there being no "special circumstances" warranting a departure from the regulations.

THIS was a collision action in rem instituted by the owners of the steamship Saltwick against the owners of the steamship St. Audries to recover damages occasioned by a collision between those two vessels on the 20th May 1885. The defendants counter-claimed.

The facts alleged on behalf of the plaintiffs were as follows: Shortly before 11.35 p.m. on the 20th May 1885 the steamship Saltwick, of 1703 tons gross, laden with a cargo of coals and bound on a voyage from Cardiff to Port Said, was, in charge of a duly licensed pilot, proceeding down the Cardiff Drain. She was keeping on the west side of mid-channel, and was making about two or three knots an hour, with her engines going dead slow. The weather was fine and clear, the tide was about high water, and the wind was blowing a moderate breeze from the S.W. The regulation masthead and side lights were duly exhibited on board the Saltwick and burning brightly, and a good look-out was being kept on board. In these circumstances those on board the Saltwick observed the masthead and green lights of a steamship, which proved to be the St. Audries, about one to two points before the port beam and distant about one to one and a half miles, and shortly afterwards they observed that she also carried two bright lights aft. The Saltwick continued slowly on her course down Cardiff Drain, and, as she approached the St. Audries, it was seen that she was attempting to cross the bows of the Saltwick, thereby causing risk of collision. Thereupon the engines of the Saltwick were reversed full speed astern and three short blasts were blown with her whistle; but the St. Audries still came on, and with her starboard bow struck the stem of the Saltwick, doing her great damage. The plaintiffs (inter alia) charged the defendants with breach of art. 16 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea.

The facts alleged on behalf of the defendants were as follows: Shortly before 11.35 p.m. on the 20th May 1885, the screw steamship St. Audries, of 500 tons net, bound from Newport to Penarth Dock in ballast, was, in charge of a pilot, crossing Cardiff East Flat about the cross-channel. The St. Audries was heading about W., and was making from one to two knots. Her regulation side and masthead lights were duly exhibited and burning brightly, and the usual docking signal of two bright lights was hoisted aft, and a good look-out was being kept. In these circumstances the masthead and red lights of the Saltwick were seen in the Cardiff Drain about five points on the starboard bow, and distant about three to four cables. The Penarth Dock head signal for the St. Audries to enter not being up, the engines of the St. Audries had been stopped, and she was forging slowly ahead, and when the Saltwick was seen to be coming down the Drain, crossing the course of the St. Audries, the engines of the St. Audries were reversed full speed astern, in order to allow the Saltwick to pass ahead, and the whistle was sounded three blasts. But the Saltwick sounded two blasts on her whistle, and came towards the St. Audries as if under a starboard helm, and caused danger of collision. The whistle of the St. Audries was again sounded three blasts, and the Saltwick was loudly hailed, but the Saltwick with her stem struck the St Audries a heavy blow on her starboard bow and did her great damage.

The pilot in charge of the St. Audries, in cross-examination, admitted that he had held on until the last minute, alleging that, as he was bound for the dock, he conceived he was not bound to give way to the traffic coming down Cardiff Drain.

The Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea:

Art. 16. If two ships under steam are crossing so as to involve risk of collision, the ship which has the other on her own starboard side shall keep out of the way of the other.

Art. 23. In obeying and construing these rules, due regard shall be had to all dangers of navigation, and to any special circumstances which may render a departure from the above rules necessary in order to avoid immediate danger.

Myburgh, Q.C. (with him Gorell Barnes) for the plaintiffs.—The St. Audries is to blame for breach of art. 16 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions. The pilot in charge of the St. Audries has admitted that, although he had the Saltwick on his starboard side, he took no steps to keep out of her way until a collision was practically inevitable. It cannot be said that in this case there were any special circumstances rendering a departure from art. 16 necessary.

C. Hall, Q.C (with him Baden Powell) for the defendants.—The St. Audries being bound for dock, it is unreasonable that she should have to give way to all the traffic coming down the Drain, and so lose her chance of docking. She carried the usual docking signal, which made it apparent to those on the Saltwick what her destination was. If therefore the St. Audries did fail to take steps to keep clear of the Saltwick, there were special circumstances warranting her conduct. The Saltwick is to blame for breach of art. 18 in not stopping and reversing sooner. Those on board the Saltwick say the St. Audries was neglecting her duty, and yet held on, and therefore, on the authority of The Beryl (51 L. T. Rep. N. S. 554: 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 321; 9 P. Div. 137) they are to blame.

Myburgh, Q.C. in reply.

Sir JAMES HANNEN.—I am of opinion that both these vessels are to blame. With regard to the St. Audries, it is plain that she was being navigated by her pilot under a false conception of his rights and duties. He thought, because he was going into the dock, he was exempted from art. 16 of the regulations, and that it was not his duty to keep out of the way of the Saltwick, although she was on his starboard hand. It is very evident that he acted upon that assumption, for he says that, even after he had stopped his engines he thought he had enough way on to cross the bows of the Saltwick. It is plain that she had been going at a very considerable speed from the distance she travelled after her engines had been stopped; and I have no doubt but that the pilot was hurrying to get into dock, and, in order to do so, was insisting upon what I have already described as a total misconception of what his rights and duties were.

But, on the other hand, it appears to me that the Saltwick is also to blame. Some observations have been made as to the state of discipline on board this ship when she left port, and it may be that some laxity in this respect did exist, and that, in consequence, the St. Audries was not seen quite so soon as she might have been. But, be that as it may, I am not going to rest my decision upon it. The facts are that she was going down the Drain, as she had a right to do, and, so long as she was entitled to expect that the other would get out of her way, no blame can be imputed to her for continuing on. But there comes a time when a vessel, even though she is primâ facie entitled to hold on, is bound to take steps with regard to contingencies which may arise through the wrongful act of the other vessel. In this particular case, if those on board the Saltwick had seen—and I think that they ought to have seen—that the St. Audries was persisting in her intention of crossing their bows, they ought to have stopped and reversed sooner than they did, and, if so, the collision would have been avoided. There is also the further charge made against the Saltwick that she starboarded. I am sorry to say that I have come to the conclusion that the charge has been made out, notwithstanding the plaintiffs' evidence. Not only is it spoken to by those on board the St. Audries, but there is the evidence of those on the dockhead, also the evidence as to the two blasts, and also the evidence of the witness who says that he rowed past the buoy to the eastward of it, and that the collision took place to the eastward of where he was. For these reasons I have come to the conclusion that the Saltwick did starboard her helm, and I also find that she was out of the gut at the time of the collision. The result is that both vessels are to blame.

COURT OF APPEAL.

Tuesday, Nov 3, 1885.

(Before Lord ESHER, M.R., COTTON and LINDLEY, L.JJ.)

NIELSEN AMD CO. v. WAIT, JAMES, AND CO. (a)

Charty-party—Lay days—Demurrage—"Running days"—Custom to lighten vessel at entrance to port.

By a charter-party it was agreed that the plaintiffs' steamship should proceed to Cronstadt, and there load a full cargo of wheat or other grain, and therewith proceed to London, or to a good and safe port in the Bristol Channel as ordered, "or so near thereto as she may safely get at all times of tide, and always afloat, and deliver the same on being paid freight." "Eight running days, Sundays excepted, to be allowed the merchants, if the ship be not sooner despatched, for loading and discharging the steamer, and ten days on demurrage if required over and above the laying days, at 25l. per day." The steamer occupied six days at Cronstadt in loading a cargo of 4325 quarters of wheat, and was ordered to Gloucester for discharge. She arrived at Sharpness Dock, in the Bristol Channel, on the 13th Nov. Sharpness Dock is within the port of Gloucester, and about seventeen miles from the basin, which is within the city of Gloucester, where grain cargoes are usually discharged if the burthen of the ship will admit, the access to the City Basin being attained by a ship canal. The steamer was ready to commence her discharge on the 13th Nov., but could not get nearer to Gloucester than Sharpness until part of her cargo was discharged. On the 14th and 15th the defendants took delivery of 1585 quarters at Sharpness, and then required the master to take the steamer through the canal to the basin to complete the discharge. The master proceeded under protest, and arrived in the basin on the 17th. On the 18th the discharge was completed, and the vessel returned to Sharpness and arrived there on the 19th.

In an action for demurrage a custom of the port of Gloucester was proved to the following effect—that the customary place for discharging grain cargoes was at the basin within the city, that when vessels with grain cargoes destined for Gloucester were of too heavy a burthen to go up the canal they were lightened at Sharpness; that during the discharge at Sharpness of so much of the cargo as was necessary to enable the vessel to proceed by the canal to the basin the lay days counted, but the time occupied by going up the canal to the basin and by returning to Sharpness was not counted:

Held, that the custom was reasonable, and that it was not inconsistent with the express terms of the charter-party as to "running days," and that therefore the time occupied by the vessel in going from Sharpness to the basin and in returning ought to be excluded from the lay days.

Judgment of Pollock, B. affirmed.

Brown v. Johnson (10 M. & W. 331) discussed.

This was an appeal from a judgment of Pollock, B. sitting at Nisi Prius.

The plaintiffs, as owners of the steamship St. Hilda, claimed against the defendants, as consignees of a grain cargo carried from Cronstadt to the port of Gloucester, a balance for freight and demurrage. In the result, however, the only question which remained between the parties was as to the number of lay days which were to be allowed to the defendants for discharging at the port of Gloucester. As to this the plaintiffs claimed four days demurrage beyond the lay days. The defendants admitted only one day, in respect of which they tendered before action, and paid into court, the amount claimed for that one day.

The steamship St. Hilda, a vessel of 495 tons net register, was by a charter-party made in London on Oct. 7, 1882, chartered by the plaintiffs to Messrs. Scaramanga and Co., a firm of London merchants. The charter-party provided that the steamer should proceed to Cronstadt, or so near thereto as she might safely get, and there load, always afloat, a full cargo of wheat or other grain, and therewith proceed to London, or to a good and safe port on the east coast of Ireland, or in the English or Bristol Channel, or on the continent between Hamburg and Havre inclusive, or to Glasgow, or to a port on the east coast of Ireland, or to Limerick, as ordered on signing bill of lading, or at Elsinore or Falmouth for ports west of Falmouth, "or so near thereto as she may safely get at all times of tide and always afloat, and deliver the same on being paid freight."

The charter-party, after naming the freights payable at the different ports, continued as follows:

The freight to be paid on loading and right delivery of the cargo in cash; eight running days, Sundays excepted, are to be allowed the said merchants, if the ship be not sooner despatched, for loading and discharging the said steamer, and ten days on demurrage if required over and above the said laying days, at 25*l.* sterling per day. If not ordered on signing bill of lading, steamer to proceed to Elsinore, and if no orders there within twelve hours of arrival lay days to count until ordered to port of discharge, or to Falmouth for final orders as above, which are to be given within twelve hours of arrival or lay days to count, but if she calls at Falmouth 10*l.* to be paid for doing so.

In accordance with this charter-party, the St. Hilda proceeded to Cronstadt, and there loaded a cargo of 4325 quarters of wheat in bulk. A bill of lading in respect of this cargo was signed by the master and delivered to Scaramanga and Co., which provided for the delivery of the cargo to them or their assigns "on paying freight for the said goods and all other conditions as per charter-party." There was indorsed on the charter-party, "six running days, Sundays excepted, expended in loading the cargo;" and further, "Capt. Robinson is hereby directed to proceed with steamship St. Hilda and her present cargo to Gloucester, Bristol Channel, for discharge."

The steamer arrived at Sharpness Dock in the Bristol Channel, at 11 o'clock a.m. on the 13th Nov. 1882. Sharpness Dock is within the port of Gloucester, and about seventeen miles from the basin, which is within the city of Gloucester, where grain cargoes are usually discharged if the burthen of the ship will admit, the access from Sharpness Dock to the City Basin being attained by the Berkeley ship canal.

On the 13th Nov. 1882 the steamer was cleared at the Custom-house, and lay at Sharpness ready to commence the discharge and delivery of the cargo to the defendants, who were the holders of the bill of lading, but she could not get nearer to Gloucester than Sharpness unless a considerable portion of her cargo were first discharged at Sharpness. The defendants on the 14th and 15th Nov. discharged and took delivery into lighters of 1585 quarters, and then required the master to take the steamer through the canal to a discharging berth within the basin at Gloucester, and adjoining the defendants' warehouse. On the 16th the captain proceeded under protest for the basin, and arrived on the 17th. On the 18th the residue of the cargo, 2740 quarters, was discharged by the defendants, and on the same day she commenced her return to Sharpness, where she arrived on the afternoon of the 19th Nov.

The plaintiffs claimed to reckon six days for detention at the port of discharge, making two lay day and four on demurrage, and for this they claimed to be allowed not only for the two days occupied in unloading at Sharpness and the one day unloading at Gloucester Basin, but also for the two days occupied in proceeding from Sharpness to the basin, and the one day occupied in returning.

The defendants, on the other hand, contended that the two days occupied in going from Sharpness to the basin and the one day occupied in returning ought to be excluded, and they allowed only for the two days occupied in discharging at Sharpness and the one day at Gloucester Basin, which, with the six days occupied by the loading at Cronstadt, would leave only one day on demurrage, for which they had paid the amount claimed into court.

The case came on for trial at the Summer Assizes 1884, at Gloucester, before Pollock, B. and a special jury, when the above facts were admitted, and no evidence was called on behalf of the plaintiffs. Two witnesses, corn merchants, of long experience at Gloucester, were called on behalf of the defendants to prove the custom of the port of Gloucester with respect to the delivery of grain cargoes out of ships of too large a burthen to come up the canal without some portion of their cargo being discharged at the entrance. The custom as stated by them was as follows: That the customary place for discharging grain cargoes has always been at the basin within the city, and that they had never known a vessel refuse to go there; that when vessels with grain cargoes destined for Gloucester were of too heavy a burthen to come up the canal they were lightened at Sharpness; that during the discharge at Sharpness of so much of the cargo as it was necessary to discharge in order to enable the vessel to proceed by the canal to Gloucester Basin the lay days counted, but that the time occupied by coming up the canal to discharge at Gloucester Basin and by returning to Sharpness was not counted. They cited individual cases in which the question had arisen between a shipowner and the consignee, and in which after some dispute the shipowner had given way and accepted an amount of demurrage based on this custom. This evidence was not disputed by the plaintiff's counsel, and the learned judge found the custom proved. It was agreed that the jury should be discharged, and that the learned judge alone should deal with the case.

Pollock, B. held the custom reasonable, and that it was not inconsistent with the terms of the charter-party, and that therefore the plaintiffs were entitled only to the one day's demurrage, which had been paid into court. He therefore gave a verdict and judgment for the defendants.

The plaintiffs appealed.

John Edge and Meek for the plaintiffs.—The plaintiffs are entitled to count as days on demurrage the days occupied by the vessel in going up the canal from Sharpness to Gloucester Basin, and in returning to Sharpness. Any custom to the contrary is unreasonable: the vessel's discharge is begun at Sharpness, and at that time lay days begin to count. Any custom which breaks the lay days and sends the vessel at the expense of the shipowner to another place of discharge is an unreasonable custom. But, even if the custom is not unreasonable it cannot prevail in this case, because it contradicts the express terms of the charter-party. The charter-party provides for "eight running days, Sundays excepted, to be allowed for loading and discharging." The phrase "running days" means "days running" or consecutive days:

Brown v. Johnson, 10 M. & W. 331.

[Lord Esher, M.R.—How can that be so when the eight running days cover both loading and discharging? They cannot be consecutive.] Of course the voyage must intervene, but the days of loading or discharging in port must be consecutive. Moving the vessel from Sharpness to Gloucester Basin is only moving in port, Sharpness being part of the port of Gloucester. Any time occupied by the merchants in having the vessel moved in port for their own convenience would always count as lay days. [Lord Esher, M.R.—That might be true in the absence of any custom, but here is a custom dealing with that point, and you have to make out that it contradicts the charter-party.] Of course the basis of the argument is that "running days" in the charter-party means consecutive days, and, if that is so, the custom is clearly inconsistent with the charter-party. [Cotton, L.J.—But if for "running" in the charter-party "consecutive" is read the clause becomes insensible, because it is impossible that all the eight days can be consecutive.] The Irish cases, Caffarini v. Walker (Ir. Rep. 9 C. L. 431) and McIntosh v. Sinclair (Ir. Rep. 11 C. L. 456), which were cited by Pollock, B. in his judgment, were inconsistent with his decision.

H. Mathews, Q.C. and A. T. Lawrence, for the defendants, were not called on to argue.

Lord Esher, M.R.—After hearing all that can possibly be said in this case from the counsel for the plaintiffs, I think the point has been threshed out, and we are in a position to give judgment without calling on the counsel for the defendants. The question which arises is whether the shipowner in this case is entitled to charge the charterers or the consignees of the cargo—it matters not which—for two days during which the vessel was proceeding from Sharpness along the canal to the basin of the harbour within the city of Gloucester, and also for one day during which the vessel was returning between those places. By the terms of the charter-party, the vessel was to load in a foreign port, and, being loaded with a grain cargo, was to proceed at the choice of the charterer to a good and safe port on the east coast of England, to London, or to a port in the English Channel, or in the Bristol Channel. Until, therefore, the charterer had exercised his choice, and had ordered the vessel to her destination, it would not be known to what port she was to proceed. The vessel was ordered to Gloucester, which is undoubtedly a Bristol Channel port, being upon a navigable river which flows down to the Bristol Channel. Now, when in a charter-party, as in this one, a large choice of ports is given, to any one of which the vessel may be ordered to proceed, no one can tell the exact circumstances in which the vessel may be placed until it is known to what port she will be ordered; because the general rule governing the delivery of cargoes is that the vessel must proceed to the port to which she is ordered, and must there deliver at that port her cargo, according to the usual course of delivery at that port of such a cargo as she carries. The exact circumstances, therefore, in which the vessel may be placed will vary in various ports. Her owners cannot deliver her cargo at any place in the port as they may think fit, neither can the charterers order her to any place in the port to which they may think fit; her owners in this particular may not gratify their own whim and pleasure, nor are they bound by the whim and pleasure of the charterers, but they are bound and entitled to deliver the cargo at the port in one part of the port—namely, at that place in the port where such cargoes are usually delivered. Now, that being the general rule, I have no doubt that, if it were shown that at a particular port the usual mode of unloading a particular cargo was to unload one-half or any proportion at one place in the port, and to unload the remainder at another place in the port, then the usual place of delivery of that cargo in that port would be at both those places. The shipowner would be bound and entitled to deliver the cargo in that way, unless some other stipulation had been made between him and the charterer as to the mode of unloading the ship.

Now I come to the clause as to lay days, which is a very common clause in charter-parties—a clause as common as charter-parties themselves. Some stipulation has to be made about the time to be occupied in loading and unloading the cargo; that time is fixed either expressly or impliedly—it may be fixed expressly by the parties, or fixed impliedly as a reasonable time by law. If it is fixed by the parties, they do it in this way: they allow a certain number of days during which the vessel is to be at the disposal of the charterers to load and unload her, and during which he is not to be called on to pay for the use of the ship; those days are the lay days. A lay days clause, therefore, is always a stipulation in the charter-party in favour of the charterer. Upon that stipulation a further stipulation is commonly engrafted dealing with demurrage days. Those are days beyond the lay days, during which the charter-party provides that the charterer shall pay a fixed sum for the use of the ship, if he keeps her doing nothing for the purpose of loading or unloading her for a certain number of days after the lay days are over. That stipulation is also in favour of the charterer, because, instead of being involved in any dispute about the amount he has to pay for keeping the vessel idle, the sum to be paid per day during the demurrage days is fixed by the charter-party. If the charterer keeps the vessel idle beyond the demurrage days, the amount to be paid is a question of damages, and he does not know what he will have to pay until the amount has been settled by a tribunal or by agreement. In this case we have to deal with lay days. Lay days are described in charter-parties in various different ways, and may be stipulated for and calculated in various different manners. They may be, and sometimes are, described as days of so many working hours; then the number of days is fixed, and the number of hours per day during which the work is to proceed is also fixed. They may be described as so many "working days." In that case they will depend in some degree upon the port in which the vessel may be at her loading and discharge. "Working days" are not the same in every port in England even, and "working days" in foreign ports differ from working days in English ports. By custom, if not by law, English working days do not include Sundays, and in some foreign ports working days may include Sundays. Again, in some foreign ports, working days may not include saints' days, while such days would be working days in England. If by the custom of any particular port certain days in the year are holidays, so that by the custom no work is done in that port on those days, then the term "working days" in the charter-party does not at that port include those days. In an English port "working days" do not include Sundays and Christmas Days and some other days well known as holidays. "Working days," then, in a charter-party means days on which, at the port according to the custom of the port, work is done in loading and unloading ships, and in no case at an English port do they include Sundays. Merchants and shipowners have thought that there was something unsatisfactory in the use of the term "working days," and that lay days ought to be counted irrespective of the customs of different nations and different ports, and that the charterer must take the risk of whether or not work is done on Sundays and holidays at the various ports in which the chartered vessel may be. They have, therefore, introduced a new term into charter-parties—namely, "running days." That phrase is used to distinguish the days from working days. If "days" are spoken of in a charter-party, they are distinguished from "working days," because, primâ facie, "days" means all day and every day, and includes Sundays and holidays; but it is possible that disputes might arise about the meaning of the term "days" in such a connection, and it is to obviate any such difficulty that this term "running days" has been issued. That is a nautical term, and it can be at once seen what it means. What is the run of a ship? It is a phrase well known. One speaks of the number of days it will take a ship to "run" from the Indies to England, and "running days" are those days on which a ship is running. What are those? Why, all day and every day, day and night. That is as plain as possible the meaning of the term. "Running days" are those days during which, if the vessel were at sea, she would be running on her voyage—that is, every day and all day. In the case of Brown v. Johnson (ubi sup.) Lord Abinger pointed out that, in point of truth, "days" and "running days" mean the same thing; because, if so many days for loading and unloading a vessel are spoken of in a charter-party, they include not only working days, but every day, including Sundays and holidays, and consequently it comes to pass that "days" and "running days" really mean the same thing.

Having come to the conclusion, it now remains to consider in what manner the lay days—not "running days"—are to be calculated. They must begin as soon as the ship is at her berth in the usual place of delivery, and must go on from then consecutively. They must go on consecutively, not because the charter-party in terms says so, but because it is to be taken as a necessary implication that the parties intend that, as soon as the vessel begins to unload, the unloading is to proceed uninterruptedly upon consecutive days, neither party at his option taking a holiday. If the phrase "working days" is used, that consecutiveness is spoilt, for the reason which I have already explained. "Running days" means, as I have said, the same thing as days, and, when the lay days are provided for as "running days," the work must go on from day to day, every day being counted. Now, a charter-party might provide that the lay days should be so many "running days" except Sundays, in which case the meaning would be that every day was to be counted except Sundays, those days being taken out by the express exception contained in the charter-party. Now comes the question, Is the term "running days" in a charter-party contradicted by proof of a custom existing at a particular port that at that port certain intermediate days—such as Sundays, for instance—are to be taken out? It does not seem to me that there is any contradiction. It is only an explanation of how at that port the "running days" are to be calculated; they are not to be, as they ordinarily would be, consecutive, if the custom is to the contrary. I cannot see that such a custom contradicts any express or implied stipulation in the charter-party, and if it does not do so then the custom may be proved. In this case I think it cannot be denied that the custom was proved. The learned judge heard the evidence of two witnesses upon it, was satisfied with that evidence, and found that the custom was proved. That custom was, after all, a custom of a very limited kind, and was this: that when a vessel arrives at the port of Gloucester with a grain cargo (the custom does not apply to all cargoes), and is so heavily laden that she cannot get up the canal from Sharpness to the basin of Gloucester within the city, the shipowner has the right to call upon the charterer to be present at Sharpness to take delivery, not of all the cargo, but of so much thereof as will so lighten the vessel that she shall be able to pass up the canal to Gloucester Basin; the time occupied in unloading thus much of the cargo at Sharpness counting as part of the lay days. The vessel then passes up the canal and delivers the remainder of her cargo in the basin and returns to Sheerness, the time occupied in going and returning not being counted as part of the lay days. I think the custom assumes that Sharpness is within the port of Gloucester, because, if that were not so, by what right would the shipowner include the time occupied in unloading at Sharpness in the lay days? And for all the purposes of this case I treat Sharpness as being within the port of Gloucester. Then, what does the custom come to? It only comes to this: that at the port of Gloucester there are two usual places of discharge for grain cargo—the one at Sharpness, where the ship discharges enough to enable her to pass up the canal; and the other at the basin at Gloucester, where the discharge is completed. If there was no custom, the lay days would of course begin at the beginning of the delivery at Sharpness, and would, if "days" or "running days" were provided for, go on consecutively from day to day. But the custom adds this term: that for the time occupied by the traversing of the canal—which is, be it remembered, a removal of the vessel within the limits of the port—lay days are not to be counted, and that out of the "running days" such an intermediate time is to be deducted. I cannot see that such a custom contradicts anything contained in the charter-party, and, so far from being an unreasonable custom, it seems to me to be a most reasonable one, and one calculated to do accurate justice between shipowner and charterer, having regard to the circumstances of the port. I think, therefore, that the judgment of the learned Baron was right, and that this appeal must be dismissed. I think the judgment of Lord Abinger in Brown v. Johnson (ubi sup.) is an express authority that such a custom as this is admissible, and that, if proved to exist in fact, it modifies the charter-party.

Cotton, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. A custom was found by the learned judge to have been proved to this effect: that when vessels with grain cargoes come to discharge at the port of Gloucester, but are too heavily laden to go up the canal, they discharge at Sharpness so much of their cargo as is necessary to lighten them to enable them to go up the canal; that the days occupied in this discharge are counted among the lay days provided for by the charter-party, but that the lay days are interrupted while the vessel is going up the canal, and begin again when she arrives at the usual place of discharge in the basin of Gloucester. That was the custom found by the learned judge, and, although the evidence of the witnesses who proved the custom has been criticised, I see nothing which would justify us in saying that the learned judge was wrong in finding the custom to be that which he has stated. That seems to me a reasonable custom, and a custom which takes into account the interests both of the shipowner and of the charterer, and provides reasonably for each of those interests. The main point argued was, that this custom is inconsistent with the express terms of this charter-party, and of course that objection, if it could be made out, would be fatal. A custom when proved only modifies that which, in the absence of any custom, would be the consequence of the contract between the parties. It modifies their legal rights under the instrument, there being no express provision in the instrument with reference to the matter; but where the instrument itself deals with the subject-matter of the custom in a way contrary to the custom, then the rights of the parties are determined by the instrument. Now, it is said that this charter-party provides eight running days for loading and unloading the cargo, that running days mean consecutive days, and that therefore the custom which breaks into the consecutive days is inconsistent with the express provisions of the charter-party. I think the fallacy of that argument is this: that "running days" means consecutive days. It may be true that, in the absence of any custom, running days would be consecutive days, but that is not conclusive. What we have to consider is whether the phrase "running days" is an express stipulation that the days shall be consecutive. I think it is not. I think the phrase "eight running days" will not, in the ordinary use of the English language, bear that meaning: "eight days running" might have done so, but I think "eight running days" has a different meaning. It may be that the consequence of using the term "running days" will, in the absence of custom, be that the days will be consecutive; but nothing has been quoted to show us that "running days" must necessarily mean "consecutive" days. I think the language used by Lord Abinger in Brown v. Johnson (ubi sup.) is quite contrary to the appellants' contention. He says: "With respect to the days, I think the word 'days' and 'running days' mean the same thing—namely, consecutive days—unless there be some particular custom." But he cannot mean that it is the same as if "consecutive days" had been expressly stipulated for, because, if "running" was the same as "consecutive," no custom could interfere to make the days not consecutive. I think, therefore, that there is nothing in the express terms of this contract to prevent the custom from being introduced and proved, and, as it was introduced and proved, in my opinion the judgment of the learned judge was quite right. I am of opinion that the days spent in going up the canal and returning are not to be included in counting the lay days allowed for the discharge of the cargo. I am therefore of opinion that the appeal must be dismissed.

Lindley, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. I think, upon the evidence, the custom was proved. The main point argued was that, taking the custom as proved, it was inconsistent with the terms of this charter-party, and cannot affect the question now in dispute between these parties. To reduce the argument of the appellants to the smallest possible compass, it is this: that "running days" in this charter-party means and ought to be read as "consecutive days." Let me say, in the first place, that if the word "consecutive" is substituted for the word "running," the clause becomes wholly insensible, because it would follow that the time spent in loading, unloading, and in calling for orders at Elsinore, is all to be spent upon consecutive days. That is wholly impossible, and therefore the one word cannot, at any rate, be substituted for the other. Then it is urged that "running days" have been held to mean consecutive days. How does the custom bear upon that proposition? The custom is that the time which is necessarily consumed in going up the canal from Sharpness to Gloucester and in returning is not treated as part of the time for unloading. During that time the cargo is certainly not physically being discharged, and the custom of the port says that that time is not to be reckoned as part of the time allowed for the discharge. By the charter-party a fixed number of days are allowed for loading and for discharge. Looked at in that way, it appears to me that the custom is in strict conformity with the terms of the charter-party, and in no way inconsistent with it. I need not say anything more about the authorities. I think it is plain that "running days" means all days and every day, whether they are working days at the particular port or not. I think, therefore, that the judgment of the learned Baron was right, and that this appeal must be dismissed.

GARDNER AND SON v. TRECHMANN. (a)

Charter-party—Bill of lading—Incorporation of charter-party into bill of lading—Freight—Lien.

The plaintiffs were the consignees of certain goods shipped on board a chartered vessel under a bill of lading whereby freight was payable at the rate of 22s. 6d. per ton, and whereby it was provided that extra expenses should be borne by the receivers, and "other conditions as per charter-party." By the charter-party it was provided that freight should be payable at the rate of 31s. 3d. per ton, and that a shipowner should have an absolute lien on the cargo, for freight, dead freight, &c. A further clause provided that the captain was to "sign bills of lading at any rate of freight, but should the total freight as per bills of lading be under the amount estimated to be earned by this charter, the captain to demand payment of any difference in advance." At the port of discharge the defendant, the shipowner, claimed and compelled payment from the plaintiffs, who were not the charterers, of freight at the rate provided for by the charter-party. The plaintiffs sued to recover back the difference between the charter-party and bill of lading freights.

Held, that the conditions as to payment of freight contained in the charter-party were not incorporated in the bill of lading; that no right of lien existed for the freight mentioned in the charter-party; and that upon payment of the freight mentioned in the bill of lading the plaintiffs were entitled to delivery of the goods.

Judgment of Baggallay, L.J. reversed.

THIS was an appeal from a judgment of Baggallay, L.J., at the trial at Liverpool.

The plaintiffs were timber merchants at Bootle, and the defendant was the owner of the British steamship Amanda.

By a bill of lading, dated Aug. 13, 1883, about 750 tons of boxwood were shipped on board the Amanda, at Taganrog, and were made deliverable to the plaintiffs. The bill of lading was signed by the captain of the Amanda, and contained (inter alia) the following clauses:

Freight for the said goods payable on delivery at the rate of twenty-two shillings and sixpence (22*s.* 6*d.*) per ton of 2240lbs. delivered, immediately in cash, without discount, with average accustomed.

All extra expenses in discharging to be borne by the receivers, and other conditions as per charter-party dated the 23rd July 1883.

The charter-party thus referred to in the bill of lading had been made upon the date mentioned between the defendant and Messrs. Berthold Smith and Co., of Taganrog. By the terms of the charter-party the Amanda was to proceed to a safe port in the Sea of Azof, and there load a full and complete cargo, &c., and then proceed to a safe port in the United Kingdom, on being paid freight at the rate of 1*l.* 11*s.* 3d. per ton. The charter-party also contained the following clauses:

The freighters' liability on this charter to cease when the cargo is shipped (provided the same is worth the freight, dead freight, and demurrage on arrival at port of discharge), the owner or his agent having an absolute lien on the cargo for freight, dead freight, demurrage, lighterage at port of discharge, and average.

It is further agreed the captain to sign bills of lading as presented and at any rate of freight, but should the total freight as per bills of lading be under the amount estimated to be earned by this charter, the captain to demand payment of any difference in advance; on the other hand, any difference in excess of chartered freight to be deducted by charterers' agents at port of discharge.

Upon the arrival of the Amanda, at Liverpool, the port of discharge, the defendant claimed payment of freight at the rate mentioned in the charter-party, but the plaintiffs disputed that claim, and contended that the proper rate of freight payable was the rate mentioned in the bill of lading. The defendant detained a portion of the cargo to enforce payment of the freight at the rate mentioned in the charter-party, and in order to obtain delivery the plaintiffs were obliged to pay a sum of about 99*l.* in excess of the freight due under the bill of lading, which sum of 99*l.* the plaintiffs now sought to recover back in this action.

Baggallay, L.J. at the trial gave judgment in favour of the defendant.

The plaintiffs appealed.

Barnes for the plaintiffs.—The plaintiffs are entitled to delivery upon payment of the freight at the rate mentioned in the bill of lading. The clause in the bill of lading, which incorporated the conditions of the charter-party, must be strictly construed, and must not be read so as to override the express conditions of the bill of lading. Baggallay, L.J. relied upon Gray v. Carr (25 L. T. Rep. N. S. 215; 1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 115; L. Rep. 6 Q. B. 522), but that case does not govern this case. The last authority on the point is the case of Gullichsen v. Stewart (50 L. T. Rep. N S. 47; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 200; 13 Q. B. Div. 317), which shows that, where a charter-party and bill of lading differ, the bill of lading must prevail. He also cited Porteus v. Watney, 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 34 39 L. T. Rep. N. S. 195; 3 Q. B. Div. 227, 534.

(a) Reported by A. A. HOPKINS Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

French, for the defendant.—The clause in the bill of lading which incorporates the charter-party does so wholly, except so far as the clause itself creates any exception. The courts have never cut down an agreement of this nature. Gullichsen Stewart (ubi sup.) only decided that the consignees of the cargo were not protected by the charter-party. [Lindley, L J. referred to Fry v. Chartered Mercantile Bank of India (14 L. T. Rep. N. S. 709; 2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 346; L. Rep. 1 C. P. 689). Does not that case show that such a general reference as this to the charter-party incorporates only such of its conditions as are consistent with the bill of lading?] No case has so held at present.

Barnes was not called on to reply.

Brett, M.R.—In this case the plaintiffs have shipped goods to be carried to England, and the shipowner has assumed to hold them in respect of an alleged lien for freight, the freight alleged to be payable to the shipowner being the difference between the freight payable under the bill of lading and that payable according to the charter-party. The shipowner's claim is not only for the whole freight under the bill of lading, but for that and as much more as will make up the amount to the amount of freight mentioned in the charter-party. Now I am of opinion that the charter-party gave the shipowner no lien for this difference of freight; the charter-party itself dealt with this very point. The excess of the amount estimated to be earned by the charter-party over the freight payable under the bills of lading was to be paid immediately before the ship sailed, it was to be demanded by the captain; the shipowner had therefore no right of lien for that excess even against the charterer. But assuming that this right of lien ever did exist in the shipowner, it now exists no longer; it has been ousted by the fact that his captain has signed this bill of lading. There have been many cases as to what is incorporated into a bill of lading by these words of general reference to a charter-party—"other conditions as per charter-party."

I think the cases come to this: that these words bring into the bill of lading all those stipulations and clauses of the charter-party which are applicable to the contract contained in the bill of lading, and none others; further, no stipulation contained in the charter-party can be brought in by these words so as to alter the express stipulations contained in the bill of lading, so that where the bill of lading contains specific stipulations these cannot be altered by these words of general reference to a charter-party which may contain inconsistent conditions. In this bill of lading there is an express and specific stipulation with regard to the payment of freight, viz., that the goods shall be delivered on the payment of a specified amount of freight, which amount has been fixed without reference to any other amount of freight, The effect of the shipowner's contention in this case would be to alter that specific stipulation by these general words of reference to the charter-party in which another amount of freight is mentioned. What these words of general reference to the charter-party do is to bring into the bill of lading all those clauses and conditions of the charter-party which are not specifically dealt with by the bill of lading itself; as for instance, a lien for demurrage, but not a lien for freight payable under the charter-party. These cases are difficult to decide, and I can well understand how the Lord Justice came to a decision in favour of the defendant; but, after hearing full argument, I feel constrained to differ from him.

Cotton, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The question turns upon the construction of two documents, the charter-party and the bill of lading, and we have to consider for what amount of freight the plaintiffs were liable under these two documents. Now the higher rate of freight is given by the charter-party, but in that document express power is given to the captain to sign bills of lading at a lower rate, and he did sign this bill of lading under that power. One of the very purposes of the bill of lading is to settle the amount of freight, and to hold that by these words of reference to the charter-party, "other conditions as per charter-party," a lien is given to the shipowner for the amount of freight stipulated for under the charter-party would, as a mere matter of construction of these two documents, be to alter their plain meaning. These words seem to me to provide in effect that the charter-party shall govern the contract except as to the specific provisions contained in the bill of lading, as to which the bill of lading is of itself a sufficient and effectual contract. This construction saves and takes in most of the clauses of the charter-party, but it does not take in what is here contended for, namely, a lien for the freight mentioned in the charter-party; that would be to alter the very point upon which the bill of lading is itself express. I think, therefore, that the decision of the learned judge cannot be supported, and that this appeal must be allowed.

Lindley, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The whole difficulty has arisen from the captain having neglected to enforce on behalf of the shipowner the clauses of the charter-party as to demanding payment in advance of the difference between the freight due under the bills of lading and the freight estimated to be earned by the charter-party; and the shipowner now seeks to throw upon the owners of the cargo that difference, which they ought to have obtained from the charterers before the vessel sailed at all. The bill of lading is the contract for the conveyance of the goods, and the holder of that document is entitled to have the goods delivered to him upon payment of the specified freight. Here it is contended that he is not entitled to delivery except upon payment of the freight specified in the charter-party, and that that is so by reason of the general words in the bill of lading which incorporate the charter-party. But is the term in the charter-party as to freight consistent with the bill of lading? Certainly I am of opinion that it is not. I cannot see how the two clauses can stand together, and I think it is tolerably plain that only those conditions of the charter-party are incorporated with the bill of lading which are consistent with the contract contained in the bill of lading. I think judgment must be entered for the plaintiffs with costs.

The Ebor. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM THE PROBATE, DIVORCE, AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION (ADMIRALTY).

Collision—Dense fog—Moderate speed—Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, arts. 13, 18.

Where those in charge of a steamship in a dense fog hear a whistle ahead, it becomes their duty to act sooner with their engines than if the whistle is heard on either bow; and in such a case they ought to act on the probability that the whistle belongs to a vessel approaching them, and that therefore risk of collision may be involved.

The Dordogne (51 L. T. Rep. N. S. 650; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 328; 10 P. Div. 6) explained.

This was an appeal by the plaintiffs from a decision of Sir James Hannen in a collision action in rem instituted by the owners of the steamship Telesilla against the owners of the steamship Ebor. The defendants counter-claimed.

The facts alleged on behalf of the plaintiffs were as follows: Shortly before 4.25 a.m. on the 29th Jan. 1885, the Telesilla, a steamship of 795 tons net, manned by a crew of seventeen hands all told, and laden with a cargo of coal, whilst on a voyage from the Tyne to London, was in the North Sea off Cromer. At such time the wind was a light breeze from the S.W., the weather was foggy and thick in patches, the tide was about one hour's ebb, running about one knot, and the Telesilla was steering S. by E. ½ E. magnetic, making about three knots through the water, with her engines going slow. Her proper regulation lights were duly exhibited and burning brightly. A good look-out was being kept on board of her, and her steam whistle was being sounded at frequent intervals. At such time those on board the Telesilla heard the dull and faint whistle of a steamship, apparently about two points on the port bow, and she was kept on her course, and, the whistle of the Telesilla having been sounded in reply, the steamship's whistle was again heard, apparently nearer; whereupon the engines of the Telesilla were stopped and her whistle was again blown; but soon afterwards, and when the speed of the Telesilla was reduced so that she was only just moving through the water, the masthead and green lights of a steamship, which proved to be the Ebor, came in sight about two points on the port bow of the Telesilla, and about two ships' lengths off, and, although the engines of the Telesilla were at once reversed full speed astern, and three blasts blown on her steam whistle and her helm starboarded, the Ebor, which was going at a high rate of speed, with her starboard bow struck the stem of the Telesilla doing her great damage.

The defendants admitted that they had been guilty of negligence contributing to the collision, but alleged that the plaintiffs were also guilty of negligence. The facts alleged on behalf of the defendants were as follows: Shortly before 4.25 a.m. on the 29th Jan. 1885, the Ebor, a steamship of 449 tons, manned by a crew of fifteen hands all told, was off Cromer in the course of a voyage from Calais to the Tyne in ballast. The tide was ebb, and there was a thick fog. The Ebor was heading N.N.W., and going half speed at about the rate of three and a half knots. Her regulation masthead and side lights were duly exhibited, burning brightly, and her fog signal was being duly sounded. At such time several whistles were heard from ahead, and on each bow, and the lights of a steamer were seen on the port bow all clear. In these circumstances the white light, and immediately afterwards the red light, of the Telesilla were seen at a distance of about two hundred yards, about two points on the starboard bow. Her whistle was heard, and in a short time her hull was seen close to the Ebor, approaching at considerable speed. When the light of the Telesilla was seen, the engines of the Ebor were stopped and reversed full speed, and her helm was put hard-a-port; but the Telesilla struck the starboard bow of the Ebor with her stem, and did her considerable damage. The defendants (inter alia) charged the plaintiffs with breach of arts. 13 and 18 or the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, which are as follows:

Art. 13. Every ship, whether a sailing ship or a steamship, shall in a fog, mist, or falling snow go at a moderate speed.

Art. 18. Every steamship when approaching another ship, so as to involve risk of collision, shall slacken her speed, or stop and reverse if necessary.

April 30, 1885.—The case came on for hearing before the President (Sir James Hannen), assisted by Trinity Masters.

Sir Walter Phillimore and J. P. Aspinall for the plaintiffs.

Charles Hall, Q.C. and Baden-Powell for the defendants.

Sir James Hannen.—These cases give rise to great difficulty, and I certainly think that this one particularly illustrates that fact; but, having given the best consideration to the case that I can, having consulted the Trinity Brethren, I come, on the whole, to the conclusion that both these vessels are to blame. Certainly it cannot be laid down, as was indicated by the Master of the Rolls in the case of The Dordogne (51 L. T. Rep. N. S. 650; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 328; 10 P. Div. 6) that there is any rule of law that a vessel, when she hears the whistle of another steamer in a fog, is bound to come to a standstill. It must depend upon the circumstances of the case. Of course there is a good deal of deception about the direction in which the sound is heard, or the direction in which it seems to be heard from; but if a man believes that the sound comes from a place well away on either side, it would give rise to different steps to what it would if he believes that he hears the sound right ahead. In this case the sound of the whistle which was heard on board the Telesilla was heard practically ahead very slightly on the port bow. I have asked those who assist me to put themselves in the position of those on board the Telesilla, and to say what should have been done different to what was done, and the answer that I receive is that, in the circumstances which existed, they ought to have stopped when they heard the first whistle until they had time to discover by the sound of the whistle whether the vessel was approaching, or what it was doing. Instead of doing that they continued at the pace at which they had previously been going, and what is the result? Shortly afterwards—say, a minute—they find themselves in such close proximity to another vessel, that then it becomes, as they allege, practically impossible to avoid a collision. This state of facts which the plaintiffs put forward shows that where the whistle of a steamer is heard practically ahead, that it is not right to wait till another whistle is heard, but immediate steps must be taken to ascertain in what direction the other vessel may be going. As I have hitherto had occasion to say, they must put themselves, as it were, en rapport with each other. They must put themselves in such a position that each may be able to deliberately form a judgment as to what distance the other vessel is off, and in what direction she is going. If the vessels continue going as they are until another whistle is heard, it may be through the negligence of the other vessel that they are brought into such close proximity that it may be impossible to avoid collision. I do not think that when officers in command of ships are dealing with fogs, they should say "We expect everything to be done that ought to be done on the other side." It has been pointed out that precautionary steps are to be taken at a time when the vessels are approaching so as to involve risk of collision. That risk may arise from ignorance or even negligence on the other side.

It is to be further observed, with regard to the Telesilla's case, that it was originally put forward in a very different manner to that in which it has been attempted to be proved. It was represented that there were three points of time, at two of which a change was made in the manœuvring of the Telesilla. It is said in the Preliminary Act that the Ebor's whistle was heard, and, when her whistle indicated that she was approaching, that then the engines of the Telesilla were stopped, and that, when the Ebor again whistled and came into view, the engines of the Telesilla were reversed. In the pleadings it is said that the whistle, having been heard for the first time, was again heard, apparently nearer, whereupon the engines of the Telesilla were stopped, and her whistle was again blown; but soon afterwards, and when the speed of the Telesilla was reduced so that she was just moving through the water, the masthead and green lights of a steamer, which proved to be the Ebor, came in sight about two points on the port bow. That statement of facts emphatically marks a decided interval between the stopping and the reversing; but the evidence which has been given satisfies me that there was practically but one operation of stopping and reversing. The man scarcely had his hand on the lever to accomplish one order before he had to effect the other operation. Everything leads to the conclusion that these two orders, viz., "Stop" and "Reverse full speed," were uttered as rapidly as they could be after each other. This shows the very short space of time which, by not stopping sooner, the Telesilla had left herself to perform any needful manœuvre when it was found that there was danger. There is no doubt that the position of the Telesilla was a difficult one. In justice to her, I should say that the Elder Brethren are of opinion that, in no other respect but in that which I have indicated, was there any want of proper care shown on her part. It is, however, our opinion that, though she may have been only a little in fault, yet she was in fault, and therefore there will be a decree of both these vessels to blame.

From this decision the plaintiffs appealed.

Jan. 18, 1886.—The appeal came on for hearing before the Court of Appeal, assisted by Nautical Assessors.

Sir Walter Phillimore and J. P. Aspinall, for the plaintiffs, in support of the appeal.—The Telesilla has been improperly held to blame because those in charge of her did not act with the engines on hearing the first whistle. It is admitted that she was then going at a moderate speed, and that, when it became known to her that the Ebor was approaching so as to involve risk of collision, her engines were immediately reversed. It has never been laid down that a vessel, on hearing a first whistle, is to at once take all way off her. If she is going at a moderate speed she is entitled to hold on until she hears a second whistle, and then act as circumstances may require. In The Dordogne (51 L. T. Rep. N. S. 650; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 328; 10 P. Div. 6) the Master of the Rolls said that, on hearing the first whistle, the vessel should reduce her speed, and that, when the other vessel came substantially near, then all way should be taken off. It is true that Sir James Hannen has found that the first whistle was heard practically ahead, but all the plaintiff's witnesses describe it as being dull and faint, indicating that it was some considerable distance off. If so, the circumstances were not such as to lead a reasonable and prudent officer to suppose that there was then risk of collision; and, if so, the Telesilla did not infringe art. 18 of the regulations in not acting on hearing the first whistle.

C. Hall, Q.C. (with him Baden-Powell) for the respondents, was not called upon.

Lord Esher, M.R.—I think the judgment of the learned judge was right, and for the reasons he gave. Much has been said about the case of The Dordogne (ubi sup.) and the construction of art. 13 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions. The article is, "Every ship, whether a sailing ship or steamship, shall in a fog, mist, or falling snow go at a moderate speed." In The Dordogne (ubi sup.) the question was raised as to the construction of that article—whether "moderate" was to be an absolute term, or whether it was meant to be a term relative to the circumstances. It was there urged in argument that "moderate" meant an absolute rate of speed without any relation to the circumstances; and what the court endeavoured to state, and held, was, that "moderate" really meant moderate according to circumstances, so that what is moderate under one set of circumstances is not moderate in another. That was the real effect of the judgment, which did not attempt to say that, if two vessels were within a mile of each other in a fog, their speed was to be a certain specified speed. I recollect in The Dordogne (ubi sup.) trying to illustrate my meaning. For instance, if a ship were going up or down a narrow river in a thick fog, so that those in charge could not see ahead, under those circumstances, where the chances are a hundred to one that they would meet another ship exactly opposite to them, whether there was a whistle or no, moderate speed might in that case consist in being absolutely stopped in the water. At all events, it might be her duty to have only just enough way on to keep steerage way. Another case would be where the ship is in the open sea, but in the track of vessels; then, if she is in a thick fog, and knows that in all probability there will be ships meeting her, although it is not the same as if she were in a narrow river, yet she ought to go very slow. Again, if she is in the open sea and not in the track of vessels, then, until she hears a whistle, she has no reason to suppose that any ship is near. But if she hears a whistle the circumstances are different. Here, again, we must consider the direction of the whistle. If she hears a whistle astern of her, there is, of course, then no reason why she should stop. By so doing she would probably be run into by the vessel behind her. If the vessel were on either beam it would be very nearly the same thing. But when you come to a whistle on the bow you come to a different state of things. If a whistle is heard on the bow, it is absurd to say that an experienced officer cannot tell something as to the distance of the vessel sounding the whistle. Suppose you hear a whistle, say, about two miles off, and broad on your bow, there is then no necessity to stop your ship, perhaps hardly any necessity to moderate her speed. But if the ship is really close to you—I do not mean within a ship's length—and on your bow, then you ought to bring your ship to a moderate speed within the meaning of the rule. If you find the vessel is ahead of you, then it becomes necessary to take extreme precautions, because you know that every moment is bringing the ships nearer together, and that there will be danger. When the whistle is ahead of you, you ought, to my mind, to act much sooner than if the whistle is anywhere else. But, supposing it is ahead, then comes the question whether you have a right to wait till there is a second whistle. If the whistle is ahead, I should say you ought hardly to wait at all; but if it is on the bow, and seems to be at a considerable distance, you may wait till there is a second whistle. If the second whistle, under these circumstances, is nearer than the first, your duty is clear—you ought to stop, and keep your vessel in hand.

In the present case, where was the first whistle that was heard? There seems to be a dispute whether there were three whistles or two. One of the witnesses says there were only two whistles—others say there were three whistles. It is also said that there was one whistle, and then an interval between the second and third. But there is one witness who says that he heard three whistles, and that there came one, and then the other two within a second of each other, and that, within a second of these two whistles, the ship was in sight. If so, that was equivalent to two. If there were really an interval between the second and third, the question will depend on the second, and whether the ship acted properly on hearing the second. I, however, take it that the evidence comes to this—that there were in substance two whistles. Now, what ought this ship to have done on hearing the first whistle? It was as nearly as possible ahead of her. It has been described as being "dull." Was that really so? That partly depends upon how far the ship was. If she was within what any reasonable person would call a near distance, then I shall not adopt the epithet "dull." I shall take it to be an ordinary whistle. As far as I can make out, the ships certainly were not more than a mile from each other—I should think within a mile. What, then, was the duty of the officer in charge of the Telesilla? It was to go at a moderate speed. What was a moderate speed? He was going over the ground from three to three and a half knots. That was a moderate speed before he heard any whistle; but was it so after he heard the whistle? It seems to me, then, that moderate speed was to go nearly as slow as he could, consistently with keeping his vessel under command. I do not think he was then obliged to stop his engines; but ought he to have gone on at the pace he was going? He could have gone at some pace between that and stopping his engines. But, instead of doing that, he kept on the same speed till the vessels were close together. Therefore, the question before the learned judge was this: Was the Telesilla going at a moderate speed between the first and second whistle, having regard to the fact that the first whistle was sounded ahead, and that the officer in command could not say in what direction the other vessel was going? What should an officer in a fog do when he cannot tell whether a vessel is coming towards him or not? He certainly ought to act on the possibility that she is coming towards him. That is a rule I do not hesitate to lay down in those circumstances. With a whistle right ahead of you in a fog, so that you cannot see the ship whistling until she is close on you, you ought to act on the possibility—nay, on the probability—that she is coming towards you. If she is coming towards you, to my mind it follows, as a matter of course, that your speed ought to be almost as slow as it can be. If it is not, you have not gone at a moderate speed within the meaning of art. 13, and then, by reason of your breaking that article, the consequence is that you also break art. 18. You may, of course, break art. 18 without breaking art. 13, for that is only applicable to fog, mist, or falling snow. In this case, the learned judge was advised that, with the whistle ahead, and at a distance certainly not more than a mile, the Telesilla ought to have stopped till she had time to discover what the other vessel was doing. The meaning of that is not that the officer in command ought to have actually stopped the engines, but that he ought to have stopped the way of the ship, and make her go slower, until a second whistle should tell him whether the other vessel was coming towards him or going away from him. Had there been a second whistle which showed that the other vessel was going away, he might instantly have gone on; but if the second whistle showed that the vessel was approaching him, he would have to act again, because, although he had brought his engines to slow, yet, on finding that the other vessel was coming closer to him, he ought to stop his engines and probably reverse. Those on the Telesilla ought to have been in such a position that, when the second whistle was heard, they could have stopped and reversed their engines, and sent their ship back almost instantly. Unfortunately they did not do so. It has been said over and over again by this court that vessels in a fog must be held very strictly to the rule, and also that the rules are not made to prevent collisions only, but to prevent risk of collision. The learned judge has taken that view, and, to my mind, he was right in so doing. I wish I could express myself so clearly with regard to my decision that the utmost hypercriticism could not hereafter question what I say now. I will therefore say again that this was a case in which the vessel whistling was as nearly as possible right ahead, and at such a distance that it must have been apparent to those on the Telesilla that, if the vessel was coming towards them, it must very soon produce a position of great danger; that therefore the officer in charge ought to have acted on the probability that the vessel was coming towards him; that therefore he ought to have acted at once and without delay; and that, because he did not act sooner than he did, he broke the rules. I therefore think that the judgment of the President was right, and I would only add that our assessors agree with the opinion of the Trinity Masters below.

Lindley, L.J.—I am of the same opinion, that the conclusion arrived at by the learned judge in this case was right, though I think, as he did, that the decision bears somewhat hardly on the Telesilla. The collision took place in a fog off Cromer, and, up to that time, the Telesilla was going at what there is no reason to suppose was other than a moderate speed. She was going easy, and I understand there was no other method of going slower, except perhaps by stopping the engines from time to time. I will assume that to be so. The Telesilla hears a whistle, which is a little on the port bow, but practically ahead. Now comes the question, What ought she to have done? In point of fact, we know she did nothing until she heard the second whistle, which was much plainer and clearer than the first, and which showed that the other vessel was approaching nearer. Directly after that they see the vessel, and there is a collision. I must say I agree with the learned President when he says: "The state of facts which the plaintiffs put forward show that immediate steps should have been taken, by waiting for a repetition of the whistle, to ascertain the distance of the other vessel and the direction she was taking. As I have had occasion to say, they should, as it were, put themselves en rapport with each other. Instead of that they still continue to go on, at the same speed, until another sound is heard, and then the ships are brought into such close proximity that it is impossible to avoid a collision." It is very difficult to lay down a general rule in these cases. But, looking at the facts of this case, and the speed at which the Telesilla was going, it is obvious that something more might have been done to ascertain the movements of the other vessel. It seems to me that she was in fault, and did break art. 18. I am therefore of opinion that the decision is right, and that this appeal should be dismissed.

Lopes, L.J.—It appears to me that the decision in The Dordogne (ubi sup.) lays down no invariable rule as to what a vessel must do in a fog after she hears a whistle. Each case must depend on its own particular circumstances. The "moderate speed" spoken of in art. 13 must be taken to be a relative term. Thus, there may be circumstances where it would be prudent to stop, and even to reverse. In the present case the whistle was heard almost directly ahead. When it was heard, the Telesilla was going about three and a half knots, and continued on at that speed. The learned President has found that the Telesilla should have gone slower than that, until she discovered or had reason to know what the other vessel was doing, and from what quarter she was coming. The only question that this court has to consider is, whether that is an unreasonable conclusion to arrive at. Unless it is, it ought not to be reversed. I am of opinion that it is a reasonable conclusion, and that therefore this appeal ought to be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

Thorman v. Burt, Boulton, and Co. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM THE QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION.

Carriage of goods—Action for freight—Counter-claim for short delivery—Bill of lading—Signature of master's agent—Liability of owner—Estoppel—Bills of Lading Act 18 & 19 Vict. c. 111), ss. 1, 3.

To an action for freight by a shipowner against the indorsees of the bill of lading, the defendants counter-claimed in respect of short delivery. All the goods that were actually put on board had been delivered to them; but the bill of lading acknowledged the receipt of a larger quantity. All the goods mentioned in the bill of lading had been floated alongside the ships in rafts, and mate's receipts given for them; but some of them were lost before they were shipped. The bill of lading was signed, "By authority of the captain, Wilh. Ganswindt as agent." Ganswindt was the ship's broker at the shipping port.

Held, that, apart from the Bills of Lading Act, a bill of lading is not conclusive against a shipowner, and he is not liable in respect of any goods not actually shipped; and that, in the present case, he was not liable under that Act, as the bill of lading was not signed by or for him.

Grant v. Norway (10 C. B. 665; 16 L. T. Rep. O. S. 504) and Jessel v. Bath (L. Rep. 2 Ex. 267) followed.

By a contract between Schoenberg and Domansky, of Dantzic, and Burt, Boulton, and Haywood, of London, the former sold to the latter 800 to 1000 loads of sleeper blocks deliverable to ships at Dantzic, according to the custom of the port, payment by buyer's acceptance in exchange for shipping documents. The custom of the port of Dantzic in loading timber cargoes is as follows: The shipper counts the number of pieces in each raft, and they are then floated down to the ship, and again counted by the mate or someone on behalf of the ship, and a mate's receipt given for them, which receipt is handed over to the ship when bills of lading are signed. In the present case 7497 pieces were delivered in rafts alongside the s.s. Meredith, belonging to the plaintiff, and a mate's receipt given for that number. This receipt was taken to the office of Ganswindt, the shipping broker, and the bill of lading was made out for the quantity named in the receipt, and was signed by the shipping broker. The bill of lading commenced as follows: "I, Fletcher, master of the steamship called Meredith, which is now loading in Dantzic, to sail for London, where the discharge is to take place, certify that I have received from Messrs. Schoenberg and Domansky in the hold of my said ship, 7497 pieces," &c., and was signed, "By authority of the captain, Wilh. Ganswindt as agent." The number of pieces actually shipped on board and delivered to the defendants, who were the indorsees of the bill of lading, was 216 short of the 7497 pieces, such 216 pieces being lost in some way from the rafts when alongside the ship.

This action was brought for freight and dock dues, but the only question in dispute was, whether there had been a short delivery for which the defendants could counter-claim. The action was tried before Grove, J., who held that the counter-claim was not maintainable.

The defendants now appealed.

Bigham, Q.C. and Armytage for the defendants.—By the Bills of Lading Act, the bill of lading is conclusive evidence that the goods therein represented to be shipped have been shipped, as against the master or other person signing. Here the signature is by the ship's agent and binds the shipowner. [Lord ESHER, M.R.—You will find Jessel v. Bath (L. Rep. 2 Ex. 267) a distinct authority to the contrary.] Even if the person signing has only authority to bind the owner in respect of goods actually shipped, delivery of the goods to the servants of the shipowner alongside the vessel is equivalent to delivery on board:

British Columbia Sawmill Company v. Nettleship, 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 65; L. Rep. 3 C. P. 499; 18 L. T. Rep. N. S. 291.

Howard v. Tucker, 1 B. & Ad. 712.

Cohen, Q.C. (with him (J. Edge) for the plaintiff.—The Bills of Lading Act only makes the person actually signing the bill of lading liable:

Brown v. Powell Duffryn Coal Company, L. Rep. 10 C. P. 562; 2 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 578; 32 L. T. Rep. N. S. 621.

In the present case the bill of lading is not signed by the plaintiff; and the person who actually signed, signed for the master, and not for the shipowner. [He was stopped by the Court.]

Lord ESHER, M.R.—This is an action by a shipowner for freight and dock dues. The defendants are the assignees of the bill of lading, to whom it must be taken that the property in the goods mentioned in the bill of lading has passed; and they have set up a counter-claim against the shipowner for not delivering all the goods specified in the bill of lading. The question is, whether that counter-claim is maintainable. Before the Bills of Lading Act, if any injury was done to the goods, so as to affect the rights of the person to whom, by the indorsement of the bill of lading, the property had passed, he could sue in respect of such injury. If the goods were misdelivered or any other form of conversion had taken place, he could bring an action of trespass; that was by reason of his ownership of the goods. But he could not maintain an action upon the contract contained in the bill of lading. The question here is, not whether the defendants can maintain an action as owners of the goods, but whether they can sue for a breach of the contract contained in the bill of lading. By the Bills of Lading Act, sect. 1: "Every consignee of goods named in a bill of lading, and every indorsee of a bill of lading, to whom the property in the goods therein mentioned shall pass upon or by reason of such consignment or indorsement, shall have transferred to and vested in him all rights of suit and be subject to the same liabilities in respect of such goods as if the contract contained in the bill had been made with himself." The contract contained in the bill of lading refers to all goods put on board the ship. It does not bind the owner of the ship as to more goods than those put on board. If the bill of lading signed by the master contains more goods than those actually put on board, the signature is beyond the master's authority; therefore, as far as this 1st section goes, the contract is only binding as to the goods actually put on board. But then it is said that the 3rd section of the Act gives the defendants a larger remedy. By that section, "Every bill of lading, in the hands of a consignee or indorsee for valuable consideration, representing goods to have been shipped on board a vessel, shall be conclusive evidence of such shipment, as against the master or other person signing the same, notwithstanding that such goods, or some part thereof, may not have been so shipped, unless," &c. Now I agree that the words "the person signing the same" do not necessarily mean the person who actually signs. If, for instance, a clerk in the shipowner's office signs per pro., the owner might be the person signing within the section. Or, if the captain had the gout and was thereby prevented from signing himself, and a servant signed for him, the captain would be the person signing. But in the present case, the signature was not that of a mere clerk or servant but of an agent; and he was the agent of the master, not of the shipowner. Therefore, as the shipowner did not sign the bill of lading in the present case, he incurs no liability under the 3rd section. I have already said that the 1st section does not help the defendants, as under that they can only sue in respect of the goods actually put on board. A number of cases seem to me to have really decided what we are deciding in the present case.

LINDLEY, L.J.—If this counter-claim is based upon the Bills of Lading Act, I am of opinion that it is not maintainable. The bill of lading is signed as follows: "By authority of the captain, Wilh. Ganswindt, as agent." That is clearly not the signature of the shipowner, who is the person against whom this counter-claim is made. Therefore, the argument based upon the 3rd section of the Bills of Lading Act falls to the ground. The 1st section merely gives the indorsee of the bill of lading the right to sue upon the contract contained in it. Then, if we look outside the Act the case of Grant v. Norway (10 C. B. 665; 16 L. T. Rep. O. S. 504) settles the point. The question to be decided was an extremely difficult one before that case; but that case settled it, and, as far as I am aware, has always been acted on. The marginal note is: "The master of a ship signing a bill of lading for goods which have never been shipped is not to be considered as the agent of the owner in that behalf, so as to make the latter responsible to one who has made advances upon the faith of bills of lading so signed." Then Mr. Armytage argues that there is a distinction between that case and this because all the goods mentioned in the bill of lading were floated alongside the ship in the present case, and were therefore in the custody of the ship. But that difference seems to me not to be material with reference to the question that we have to decide here. The decision of Grove J. was right, and this appeal must be dismissed.

LOPES, L.J.—The defendants in this action, who are indorsees for value of the bill of lading, seek to recover, by way of counter-claim, from the plaintiff, who is the shipowner, the difference in value between the goods delivered, which are all that were actually put on board, and the larger quantity of goods mentioned as being shipped in the bill of lading. It is perfectly clear that before the Bills of Lading Act such an action was not maintainable. Nor is it maintainable since that Act, and the case of Jessel v. Bath (L. Rep. 2 Ex. 267) seems to me to be a direct authority to that effect. That decides that the owner or charterer of a vessel is not bound by the signature of his agent to a bill of lading for a greater quantity than was actually shipped. The decision of the learned judge was therefore right, and this appeal will be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

HIGH COURT OF JUSTICE.

CHANCERY DIVISION.

Monday, March 15, 1886.

(Before KAY, J.)

CAIRD v. MOSS. (a)

Estoppel—Judgment—Res judicata—Shipbuilding contract—Action for rectification of—Agreement already executed under judgment of Palatine Court.

A judgment of the court deciding on the construction of an agreement that the plaintiffs are not entitled to priority over the defendants constitutes no bar, by reason of its being res judicata, to a subsequent action by the plaintiffs claiming rectification of the agreement so as to give them that priority.

The plaintiffs, shipbuilders, who had not been fully paid the price of a ship built by them for one B., entered into an agreement with B. and the defendants, who held a charge upon the ship in respect of a loan to B., whereby it was agreed to sell the ship to J. R., the plaintiffs holding the purchase money and distributing it amongst B., the defendants, and themselves, in accordance with the terms of the agreement. The plaintiffs having paid themselves the balance of the purchase money due to them from B. in priority to the claim of the defendants, the defendants instituted an action against the present plaintiffs, claiming that the trusts of the agreement should be carried out. In that action it was held that the present plaintiffs' claim was not entitled to priority over the defendants' claim, and that the plaintiffs were not entitled to pay themselves the balance of the original purchase money. In the present action to rectify the agreement by inserting such words as would provide for payment to the plaintiffs of the balance of the purchase money in priority to any other payment:

Held, that the previous judgment was no bar, in the sense of being res judicata, to the claim in the present action.

THE plaintiffs, Caird and Purdie, were shipbuilders, carrying on business at Barrow-in-Furness.

The defendants, Moss and Co., were shipbrokers, carrying on business in Liverpool and London.

On the 21st July 1880 the plaintiffs entered into a contract with William Batten to build for him a steamship, afterwards called the Espana, for the sum of 14,600*l.*, which was subsequently increased by reason of certain extras to 15,600*l.*

In Aug. 1880 Batten gave a charge upon his interest under the contract to the defendants, who, on the 21st Sept. 1880, gave notice thereof to the plaintiffs.

In Feb. 1881 Batten sold his interest in the vessel to José Reyes. Batten being unable to pay the sum of 6460*l.*, the balance of the purchase money due from him to the plaintiffs, an agreement, dated the 15th March 1881, was entered into between the plaintiffs, Batten, and the defendants. By that agreement, after reciting, among other things, that Batten had paid to the plaintiffs 9140*l.* on account of the 15,600*l.* due in respect of the purchase money for the vessel, leaving a balance of 6460*l.* due to the plaintiffs, it was agreed that the plaintiffs should despatch the vessel to Manilla, to José Reyes; that on payment of 10,276*l.* the balance due from José Reyes to Batten (which payment Batten thereby authorised), the plaintiffs were to give up possession to José Reyes; in default of payment of the 10,276*l.*, the plaintiffs were to be at liberty to sell the vessel. The 4th clause provided for the distribution of the purchase money, and was in the following terms:

4. The said Caird and Purdie shall hold the purchase money for the said vessel, whether received from the said José Reyes or any other purchaser, upon trust first, to recoup themselves all costs, charges, and expenses, of what nature or kind soever, in any way connected with the said vessel on and from the 7th day of March instant, being three days after her trial trip, including in such costs any expenses incurred in pursuance of clause 1, after giving credit for any freight, and including in such costs Mr. Caird's expenses of his present journey to London, and the legal expenses of the preparation of this agreement, and including the sum of 162*l.* 14*s.* 6*d.*, part of the disbursements by H. E. Moss and Co. in respect of the present intended voyage of the steamer, which sum Caird and Purdie are to pay to them in exchange for proper vouchers for that amount; second, to pay to the said H. E. Moss and Co. the sum of 1427*l.* 5*s.* 6*d.* now due to them by the said William Batten; and third, to pay over the balance, if any, to the said William Batten.

The agreement then provided for the collection and distribution by the plaintiffs of the insurance money in the event of the steamer being lost.

The vessel was ultimately sold by the plaintiffs to José Reyes, in July 1881, for 9200*l.*

On the 20th Oct. 1881 the defendants commenced an action against the plaintiffs in the Palatine Court of Lancaster, charging them with wilful default in selling the vessel for a less sum than 10,276*l.*, and claiming that the plaintiffs should make good the loss thereby incurred, and that an account should be taken of the amount received by the plaintiffs in respect of the purchase money, and that the trusts of the agreement of the 15th March 1881 should be carried into execution. Before the trial of the action the charges of wilful default were withdrawn.

By an order in that action, dated the 24th March 1882, the plaintiffs were ordered to deliver the account asked for by the statement of claim, and an account of the costs charges, and expenses mentioned in the 4th clause of the agreement of the 15th March 1881.

The plaintiffs, in rendering such account, included as a payment the sum of 6460*l.*, which was subsequently disallowed by the registrar.

The plaintiffs appealed to the Vice-Chancellor, who upheld the registrar's decision.

The plaintiffs thereupon paid the 1427*l.* 5*s.* 6*d.*, due to the defendants on their security, into court, which was subsequently received by the defendants. The plaintiffs appealed to the Court of Appeal, but the appeal was dismissed with costs on the ground that the 6460*l.* was not a cost, charge, or expense, within the meaning of the 4th clause of the agreement of the 15th March 1881.

The plaintiffs thereupon brought the present action for rectification of the agreement of the 15th March 1881, by inserting in the 4th clause thereof after the word "first" the words "to retain the said principal sum of 6460*l.* and then," or by inserting such other words as would provide for the payment to the plaintiffs of the purchase or insurance moneys of the principal sum of 6460*l.* in priority to any other payment thereout; and that such consequential rectification as might be necessary or expedient might be made; and that it might be declared that under the circumstances the sum of 1427*l.* 5*s.* 6*d.* belonged to the plaintiffs, and that the defendants might be ordered to repay the same to the plaintiffs.

The defendants, by the 9th paragraph of their statement of defence, pleaded that, if every allegation of fact contained in the statement of claim were true, the plaintiffs would not be entitled to any part of the relief claimed by the statement of claim, the trust of the agreement of the 15th March 1881 having been executed, and the amount claimed by the plaintiffs paid under the judgment of the Palatine Court; and the defendants submitted that the point of law should be disposed of before the trial of the action.

The point of law was accordingly argued separately, pursuant to Order XXV., r. 2.

Graham Hastings, Q.C. and S. Hall, for the plaintiffs, referred to Houstoun v. Marquis of Sligo, 52 L. T. Rep. N. S. 96; 29 Ch. Div. 448.

[They were stopped by the Court.]

W. F. Robinson, Q.C. and R. Neville, for the defendants.—The plaintiffs are estopped by the judgment of the Palatine Court from bringing this action for rectification of the agreement. With regard to the claim for the repayment of the 1427*l.* 5*s.* 6*d.* paid by the plaintiffs to the defendants under the judgment of the Palatine Court, the plaintiffs can have no right to recover it. It has been laid down that where a defendant, having a right to resist the claim of a plaintiff, does not do so, but allows the plaintiff to recover money under legal process, he is estopped from recovering it back again:

Marriot v. Hampton, 2 Sim. L. C. 421; 7 T. R. 269.

No reply was called for.

KAY, J.—In this case a preliminary point of law has been raised under these circumstances. It seems that the plaintiffs are shipbuilders, and agreed with one William Batten to build a ship for him upon certain terms. When the ship was finished, he not being able to make the payments which he was bound to make under the agreement, the ship was sent to sea under another contract between the parties, which is set out in the 8th paragraph of the statement of claim. Under that contract the builders were still to have the management of, and practically the dominion over, the ship. They were to be at liberty to sell her, and were to hold the purchase money upon trust, first, to recoup themselves all costs, charges, and expenses, of what nature or kind soever, in any way connected with the vessel; secondly, to pay to Moss and Co., who are defendants in this action, and who were the mortgagees, the sum of 1427*l.* due to them from Batten, Batten having mortgaged whatever interest he had in the ship to them; and thirdly, to pay over the balance to Batten. It appears that an action was brought in the Palatine Court on the 20th Oct. 1881, by the mortgagees, Moss and Co., against the builders, Caird and Purdie, claiming that the trusts of that agreement should be carried into execution. Practically the claim was larger at first, but it was ultimately reduced to that. Of course that involved a question of construction of the agreement, and as a matter of construction this question was raised: "Whether, under that agreement, Caird and Purdie were to be at liberty to pay to themselves the balance of the money owing to them by Batten, before they handed over the 1400*l.* odd to Moss and Co., and of course before they handed over the balance of the purchase money to Batten?" The plaintiffs contended that, according to the construction of the agreement, that was the obvious meaning. There was a great deal to be said for that argument. However, it was decided by the registrar, in taking the accounts, that that was not the true construction of the agreement, and that they were bound to hand over the 1400*l.* to Moss and Co. without paying themselves the balance of what was due to them.

Upon the matter being taken to the Vice-Chancellor of the County Palatine, he decided the same; and then, on appeal to the Court of Appeal, the Court of Appeal decided the same way according to the construction of that agreement. Whether there was a mistake or not in the agreement they did not say, and of course they could not say, because that point was not raised in any way in the pleadings. What they did decide was that that was the true construction of the agreement, and that they were bound to hand the money over. Now, observe, that was an action simply for carrying out the trusts of that agreement. There was no claim in any way, either by way of defence or counter-claim, that the agreement was not, if that was the true meaning of it, in the form in which it should have been, and that it ought to be rectified. That point was not raised either by way of defence, if it could be a defence, or by way of counter-claim in the action. Fourteen days after the Court of Appeal had decided, upon the true construction of the agreement, that the 1400*l.* was payable to Moss and Co. before payment of the balance of the purchase moneys of the ship to Caird and Purdie, this action was begun, stating on the face of the pleadings all these proceedings in the Palatine Court, and asking for the rectification of the agreement by inserting the words "to retain the said principal sum of 6460*l.*," which was the balance due as purchase money of the ship from Batten to Caird and Purdie. The point which has now to be decided is thus raised in the defence (paragraph 9): "The defendants further say that, if every allegation of fact contained in the statement of claim were true, the plaintiffs would not be entitled to any part of the relief claimed by the statement of claim, the trusts of the said agreement of the 15th March 1881 having been executed, and the amount claimed by the plaintiffs paid under a judgment of the Palatine Court, and the defendants submit that this point of law should be disposed of before the trial of the action." What is the point of law? It is stated first of all that the point of law is that this was res judicata in the Palatine Court; but in the Palatine Court, as I have already mentioned, the question whether the agreement was an agreement which ought to be rectified, and could be rectified, was not raised in any shape or way. How can that be res judicata? I will take from the well-known notes to the Duchess of Kingston's case (2 Sm. L. C. 832) a passage from Vinnius, which has been adopted by English courts, first of all in the judgment of Knight-Bruce, V.C., in Barrs v. Jackson (1 Y. & C. C. C. 585; on App. 1 Phil. 582), and then by Lord Westbury, in the case of Hunter v. Stewart (1 De G. F. & J. 168). The extract is in these words: "Vinnius in a note to the 13th title of the 4th Book of the Institutes, upon the words 'per exceptionem rei judicatæ,' says, 'Quæ ita agenti obstat si eadem quæstio inter eosdem revocetur, id est, si omnia sint eadem idem corpus, eadem quantitas, idem jus, eadem causa petendi, eadem conditio personarum.'" Take one of these, idem jus. Did the question of rectification arise before the Vice-Chancellor of the County Palatine? In no kind of way. It was not even touched. Therefore it seems to me quite idle to say that this is a case of res judicata. If I were so to hold, I should be holding, in fact, that a point which never was raised in any way in the Palatine Court, which could not be raised according to the pleadings as they were before the Vice-Chancellor of the Palatine Court, was decided by him in his judgment in that action. It is manifest that so stated, the proposition fails at once. There, is nothing like res judicata.

Upon what ground can I stop this action for rectification of the agreement upon the submission of the defendant? Of course, upon such a submission, I must assume that the action is well founded, and that there is a case for rectification. Upon what ground, unless the judgment of the Palatine Court amounts to a judgment on this point, can I stop this action? It is said that the money, having been paid over under the judgment of the Palatine Court, cannot be recovered. Of course it cannot be recovered on any of the grounds on which it was paid over; that is clear enough. But suppose there be another and a paramount ground, which was not before the court at all, and could not be before the court in that action, why should not it be recovered on that ground in a separate action which that action does not in any way interfere with? The claim is an equity pure and simple. The courts of common law had no power to rectify instruments, as we know, and this peculiar jurisdiction is, I believe, one of those which by the Judicature Act 1873 is reserved to the Chancery Division of the High Court of Justice. Therefore it is a case that might be met by an allegation of laches or anything of that kind. But in this pleading I have nothing of that kind before me. The defence does not say that there is any kind of laches, and really what I have said almost disposes of that. Of course I do not mean to prejudice any defence that can be raised at the trial of this action, but what the plaintiffs in this action, being the defendants in the action in the Palatine Court, did was this: They had a very strong belief that, according to the true construction of the agreement as it stood, they were right. I cannot say that that belief was entirely groundless. It seems to me a matter which might very plausibly be argued. They were so confident of their view upon the agreement as it stood that they chose to carry that case to the Court of Appeal, and not until the Court of Appeal had decided against them did they raise the alternative case of rectification of the agreement. I am very confident that they could not raise that in any way except by a counter-claim, or a separate action. Two cases have been cited in which, under the old practice in the courts of common law, a plea which raised the question that the deed or instrument was in an improper form, and that it ought to be rectified, seems to have been allowed to defeat the action where it was plain that there was a case for rectification, although the court could not in the action then before them decree any rectification. I do not know, I am sure, how often the courts of common law may have taken that course, or whether I rightly apprehend what those two decisions were. But whether that be so or not, it is perfectly familiar to everybody who has practised in the Court of Chancery that the Court of Chancery never has given, and never will give, relief on the ground that a man has a right to rectification, unless that is raised in the nature of a cross-action by the person who claims it. I defy anyone to produce any instance in which relief has been given on the ground that a man has a right to have the instrument rectified, unless there is a proceeding in the nature of an action claiming that rectification. Therefore it seems to me plain that this relief could not have been given in the Palatine Court unless there had been a cross-action, either by way of counter-claim or by a substantial action brought by the defendants, the present plaintiffs, for rectification of the instrument. That was not done. I will not say one way or the other—because I do not think that point is properly before me now—whether the parties were guilty of such laches in not doing that as will defeat them at the trial of this action. That is a point that arises in this action, and does not arise upon this preliminary point of law. The preliminary point of law really is, whether an action of this kind can be brought or not after that judgment; and the question in point of fact is, whether that judgment did amount to an adjudication of the question raised in this action. In my opinion it clearly did not. I therefore decide the point of law in favour of the plaintiffs. There will be a declaration that the judgment of the Palatine Court is no bar to this action.

PANDORF AND CO. v. HAMILTON FRASER AND CO. (a)

Charter-party—Bill of lading—Excepted perils—"All and every dangers and accidents of the seas, rivers, and navigation of whatever nature and kind soever"—Damage by sea-water let in by rats—All reasonable precaution taken to keep down rats.

A cargo of rice shipped under a charter-party and bills of lading, excepting "the act of God and all and every other dangers and accidents of the seas, rivers, and steam navigation of whatever nature and kind soever," was damaged by sea-water entering through a pipe which had been gnawed through by rats. All reasonable precautions had been taken by the shipowner to keep down the rats.

Held, on further consideration, that the damage was "a danger or accident of the seas" within the meaning of the charter-party and bills of lading.

FURTHER CONSIDERATION.

This was an action brought by the plaintiffs, as shippers of a cargo of rice, against the defendants as shipowners to recover 1008*l.* 1*s.* 8*d.* as damages for injury to the rice on a voyage from Akyab to Liverpool.

The rice was shipped under a charter-party, by which the defendant agreed with the plaintiffs that their ship should proceed to Akyab and there load a cargo of rice for Liverpool, the act of God, &c., and all and every other dangers and accidents of the seas, rivers, and steam navigation of whatever nature and kind soever, and errors of navigation during the voyage, excepted, and under bills of ladings which excepted "all and every dangers and accidents of the seas, rivers, and navigation of whatever nature and kind."

The defendants in their statement of defence alleged that the damage for which the plaintiffs were seeking to recover was caused by reason of the perils excepted in the charter-party and bills of lading under which the cargo was shipped, and they also alleged that the damage occurred from inherent vice in the said rice, and from the improper condition in which it was shipped, and they denied an allegation made by the plaintiffs in their statement of claim that the vessel was unseaworthy at the commencement of the voyage.

At the trial before Lopes, J., at Liverpool, it was agreed that the rice was damaged to the amount which the plaintiffs sought to recover during the voyage from Akyab to Liverpool by sea water passing through a hole in a pipe connected with the bath-room in the vessel, which pipe had been eaten through by rats. It was also agreed that all reasonable precautions had been taken to keep down the rats on the voyage to Akyab. The inherent vice in the rice relied upon by the defendants was the shipping the cargo at Akyab with rats in the bags, or bringing the rats on board in the lighters with the rice, and upon this point the learned judge left to the jury the following questions: "Were the rats that caused the damage brought on board by the shippers in the course of shipping the rice? And, did those on board take reasonable precautions to prevent the rats coming on board during the shipping of the cargo?" The jury answered the first question in the negative, and the second in the affirmative, and thereupon the learned judge reserved the case for further consideration.

Cohen, Q.C. and Joseph Walton for the plaintiffs.—The damage to the cargo being caused by rats was not due to the "act of God" or to any of the "dangers and accidents of the seas, rivers, and navigation" excepted by the charter-party and bills of lading, and the shipowners are therefore liable to make it good, their liability not being expressly limited by contract. Damage caused by rats is not the "act of God" (Dale v. Hall, 1 Wils. 281), nor a "danger and accident of the seas, rivers, and navigation:"

Laveroni v. Drury, 8 Ex. 166; 22 L. J. 2, Ex.

In Kay v. Wheeler (16 L. T. Rep. N. S. 66; 2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 466; L. Rep. 2 C. P. 302) goods were shipped under a bill of lading containing the usual exceptions of "the act of God, the Queen's enemies, fire, and all and every other dangers and accidents of the seas, rivers, and navigation, of what kind and nature soever," and the goods having been injured during the voyage by rats, it was held, although the shipowner had taken all possible precaution to prevent it, that the cause of injury did not come within the exception, and that the shipowner was liable. In The Chasca (32 L. T. Rep. N. S. 838; 2 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 600; L. Rep. 4 A. & E. 446), again, it was held that the exceptions in the bill of lading did not operate to protect the shipowners from liability for damage done to the cargo by sea water let into the hold in consequence of the barratrous act of the crew in boring holes in the ship during her voyage for the purpose of scuttling her. That case, it is submitted, is analogous to the present. In Woodley and Co. v. Michell and Co. (48 L. T. Rep. N. S. 599; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 71; 11 Q. B. Div. 47) it was decided that a collision between two vessels brought about by the negligence of either of them without the waves or wind or difficulty of navigation contributing to the accident, is not a peril of the sea within the meaning of the exception in a bill of lading. In Story on Bailments, sect. 512*a*, also, it is said that, "the phrase 'perils of the sea' must be understood to include such losses only to the goods on board as are of an extraordinary nature, or arise from some irresistible force or from inevitable accident, or from some overwhelming power which cannot be guarded against by the ordinary exertions of human skill and prudence." On the authorities cited the damage done to the plaintiff's goods was not due to any of the perils excepted, and the plaintiffs are therefore entitled to succeed. They also cited Bigham, Q.C. and Barnes for the defendants.—The damage being caused by an inroad of sea water without any negligence on the part of the shipowners, is a peril of the sea within the meaning of the exception in the charter-party and bill of lading. Dale v. Hall (ubi sup.) and Laveroni v. Drury (ubi sup.) are distinguishable. It could not be contended that if a swordfish had made a hole in the ship and let in the water which caused the damage, the damage would not have been a peril of the sea within the exception, and negligence on the part of the shipowners having been distinctly negatived, no distinction can be drawn between that case and the present. If there had been negligence on the part of any person, then the accident would have at once been taken out of the exception, but negligence being absent it clearly comes within it. This is the only effect which can be given to the case of Woodley and Co. v. Michell and Co. (ubi sup.) taken in combination with Buller v. Fisher (3 Esp. 67), where it was held that where there is an exception in a charter-party of "perils of the sea" a loss from the ships running foul of one another by misfortune is within the exception, and is a loss by perils of the sea. Cur. adv. vult.

Dec. 21, 1885.—The following written judgment was delivered by LOPES, L.J.—This was an action brought by the plaintiffs, the shippers of certain rice, against the defendants, the shipowners, to recover 1008*l.* 1*s.* 8*d.*, damages for injury to the rice on a voyage from Akyab to Liverpool. It was agreed that the sum of 1008*l.* 1*s.* 8*d.* was the amount recoverable, if the defendants are liable. The defendants in their statement of defence alleged that the damage complained of occurred by reason of perils excepted in the bills of lading. The excepted perils in the bills of lading were "all and every dangers and accidents of the seas, rivers, and navigation, of whatever nature and kind soever." The defendants also alleged that the goods were delivered under a charter-party, and that the damage complained of occurred by reason of perils excepted in such charter-party. The excepted perils in the charter-party were "the act of God and all and every other dangers and accidents of the seas, rivers, and steam navigation, of whatever nature and kind soever, and errors of navigation during the voyage." The defendants also alleged that the damage occurred from inherent vice in the rice, and from the improper condition in which it was shipped. They also denied an allegation made by the plaintiffs in their statement of claim, that the vessel was at the commencement of the voyage unseaworthy. At the trial before me at Liverpool there was no dispute about the cause of damage to the cargo; and in the course of the trial it was agreed that the damage was caused during the voyage by sea water passing through a hole in the pipe connected with the bath-room in the vessel, such pipe having been eaten through by rats. It was also agreed that all reasonable precautions had been taken to keep down the rats on the voyage to Akyab. The inherent vice relied on by the defendants was the shipping the cargo at Akyab with rats in the bags, or bringing the rats on board in the lighters with the rice. To dispose of this point I left to the jury the following questions: "Were the rats that caused the damage brought on board by the shippers in the course of shipping the rice? And, did those on board take reasonable precautions to prevent the rats coming on board during the shipping of the cargo?" The jury answered the first question in the negative, and the second in the affirmative. These answers disposed of the alleged inherent vice in the cargo upon which the defendants relied.

It may be convenient here to deal with the contention of the plaintiffs that the ship was unseaworthy at the commencement of the voyage by reason of a rat or some rats being on board. Mr. Cohen contended that the presence of a rat or some rats constituted a latent defect, and made the ship unseaworthy. It is clear from the findings of the jury, and the admission, that there was no excess of rats. If the presence of a rat or some few rats on board a wheat or rice carrying ship makes her unseaworthy, very few such vessels, if any, would be seaworthy; for, I presume, few, if any, are absolutely free from rats. I think this point is untenable. The immediate cause of damage in this case was the incursion of salt water through the hole in the pipe eaten through by the rats. The effective cause of damage was the rat or rats. Question, is damage so caused a "danger or accident of the seas" within the meaning of the bills of lading and charter-party? The point is novel and important, and has been very ably argued. A carrier by sea is, like a common carrier, apart from express contract absolutely responsible for the goods intrusted to him, and insures them against all contingencies, excepting only the act of God and the enemies of the Queen. It was at first contended that what happened here exonerated the defendants, as amounting to damage resulting from acts of God. This point was subsequently abandoned; nor, indeed, could it be maintained in the face of the decision of Dale v. Hall (1 Wils. 281), which appears to decide that the action of rats is not one of those natural causes which may be acts of God. Moreover, it is not pleaded in this case that the damage resulted from the act of God. "Dangers or accidents of the seas" are practically equivalent to the more popular term "perils of the seas." In a seaworthy ship damage to goods caused by the action of the sea during transit, not attributable to the fault of anybody, is in my opinion a "danger or accident of the seas" intended to come within the exception, and exonerating the shipowner. It is clear the action of the sea itself is one of the causes contemplated. Losses by perils which have no special connection with the sea or the navigation, though they may occur during the voyage, do not fall within this exception. For instance, damage by rats eating the cargo (Kay v. Wheeler, 16 L. T. Rep. N. S. 66; 2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 466; L. Rep. 2 C. P. 302; Laveroni v. Drury (8 Ex. 166; 22 L. J. 2 Ex.); or by cockroaches eating the goods in the ship (The Miletus, Parsons on Shipping, vol. 1 p. 258, n.) (a); or by an accidental fire in the hold (The Hong Kong and Shanghai Banking Corporation v. Barker, 7 Bombay High Court Reports, O. C. J. 186, 203 (b); Parsons on Shipping, vol. 1, 256). The reason is obvious; these are all losses which are in no sense attributable to any action of the sea, but which might occur anywhere. The cause of loss must be such that ordinary exertions of human skill and prudence—such exertions as might be reasonably expected from careful and prudent men—will not avail to guard against it. A stranding due to unskilful navigation is not within the exception. Where water got into a ship through a hole wrongfully bored in her by some of the crew and damaged the cargo, the exception "dangers of the sea" in a bill of lading was held not to protect: (The Chasca, 32 L. T. Rep. N. S. 838; 2 Asp. Mar. L C. 600; L. Rep. 4 A. & E. 446.) The learned judge (Sir R. Phillimore) there held that, in construing exceptions in a bill of lading, the real and not the proximate cause of loss, as in the case of marine insurance, was to be regarded. It was also held that losses occasioned by negligence not being within the exception "perils of the sea" à fortiori barratry would not be. Where a ship was sunk, and the goods lost owing to a collision with another ship, and there was no fault on the part of either ship, the loss was held to be a peril of the sea: (Buller v. Fisher, 3 Esp. 67.) The case, however, which has gone furthest is Woodley and Co. v. Michell and Co. (48 L. T. Rep. N. S. 599; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 71; 11 Q. B. Div. 47). There, there had been a collision, and it was held that, if there had been negligence in navigating either of the ships the owner of the carrying ship was not protected. Brett, L.J. said, "What I think it is necessary in this case to say (and I repeat it without any doubt) is, that, although a collision when brought about without any negligence of either vessel is, or may be, a peril of the sea, a collision brought about by the negligence of either of the vessels, so that without that negligence it would not have happened, is not a peril of the sea within the terms of that exception in a bill of lading."

It seems, therefore, that directly the real or effective cause of the loss is some act of man, the loss cannot be ascribed to "dangers or accidents of the sea." These authorities support the definition which I have given; nor do the plaintiffs seek to impugn it, so far as it goes; but they contend that a further term must be added, e.g., that the effective cause must not only be something beyond human control, but something peculiar to navigation. They say, in fact, the rats here are the effective cause, and rats are not peculiar to navigation. In Story on Bailments, sect. 512*a*, there is the following passage, which seems to be in point; "The phrase 'perils of the sea,' whether understood in its most limited sense, as importing a loss by natural accidents peculiar to that element, or whether understood in its more extended sense, as including inevitable accidents occurring upon that element, must still in either case be understood to include such losses only to the goods on board as are of an extraordinary nature, or arise from such irresistible force, or from inevitable accident, or from some overwhelming power, which cannot be guarded against by the ordinary exertions of human skill and prudence." The point raised here is, that though the loss is proximately and directly from dangers which are peculiarly incidents of the sea, yet another cause has co-operated without which the mischief would not have happened. In Laveroni v. Drury (8 Ex. 166; 22 L. J. 2, Ex.) what has happened in this case evidently occurred to the mind of Pollock, C.B. Rats had eaten the cargo; and it was held that the loss was not by a "peril of the sea." There was no incursion of sea water; nor was there anything to connect the damage peculiarly or at all with the sea or navigation. Pollock, C.B. in his judgment says: "If, indeed, the rats had made a hole in the ship, through which water came in and damaged the cargo, that might very likely be a case of sea damage." This was an obiter dictum, and not necessary for the decision. I think a loss arising from some inevitable accident at sea whereby sea water enters the ship and damages goods, is a "danger or accident of the seas" within the exception. It seems to me that, where the effective cause is beyond human control, and in consequence salt water enters, which damages goods, it is an "accident of the sea" within the meaning of the contract of affreightment, and the true intention of the parties. Here, it is sea damage occurring at sea,

(a) The note is as follows: In The Miletus, U.S.C.C., New York, 1866, Nelson, J., Cockroaches ate the labels pasted on the outside of the mats which inclosed chests of tea. This "embarrassed the assortment and delivery of the boxes to the consignees, and depreciated the market value of the same" Held that the vessel was liable. Nelson, J. said: "We also concur in the opinion that the rule must be regarded as settled in this court, that damages occasioned by vermin on board a ship to the cargo in the course of the voyage is not the result of a peril of the sea, or of one of the dangers or accidents of navigation with the exception in the bill of lading."

(b) In this case goods shipped under a bill of lading exempting the shipowner from liability from loss occasioned by the act of God, the Queen's enemies, fire, and all and every other dangers and accidents of the seas, rivers and navigation of whatsoever nature and kind were lawfully landed on the custom-house premises at Bombay, and there accidentally burned. In an action against the shipowner to recover damages for the non delivery of the goods, Westropp, C.J. said on appeal: "It has been contended for the plaintiffs that the scope of the exception must be controlled by the word 'other' preceding the words 'dangers and accidents of the seas, rivers, and navigation, of whatever nature or kind soever,' but we cannot accede to that argument. Fire, no doubt, may occur at sea as well as on shore, but it never has been regarded as a peril, danger or accident of the sea within the meaning of those terms as known to mercantile usage or the law."

and nobody's fault. I think the defendants have brought themselves within the exception. Suppose this pipe had burst from frost or from some cause which human care and foresight could not have prevented, and goods damaged by entry of salt water, could it be successfully contended that the shipowners were not protected? I think not. I see no distinction between that case and the one now under discussion. There will be judgment for the defendants with costs.

LEDUC AND CO. v. WARD AND OTHERS. (a)

Practice—Non-joinder of defendants—Discretion of court or judge—Carriage of goods—Shipowners—Rules of Supreme Court 1883, Order XVI., r. 11.

Upon an application under Order XVI., r. 11, by the defendant or defendants on the record, that other defendants be added, the court or judge may exercise a discretion, and the order will not be made unless it is shown that the non-joinder complained of will prejudice the parties to the action, or that "the presence before the court of additional parties is necessary in order to enable the court effectually and completely to adjudicate upon and settle all the questions involved in the cause or matter."

THIS was an appeal from the refusal of Field, J. at chambers to make an order, upon the application of the defendants on the record, that three more persons should be added as defendants to the action. The action was brought to recover damages alleged to have been sustained by the plaintiffs in respect of a cargo shipped by them on the defendants' vessel Austria, the owners of which vessel consisted of all the defendants who had been made parties to the action, and also of three other persons whom the plaintiffs had not joined. As appeared by an affidavit made by the solicitor to the defendants, these three persons were, at the time when the cause of action arose, interested in the said vessel equally with the persons whom the plaintiffs had chosen to join as defendants, and it was also stated that it would be cheaper and more convenient if the remaining part-owners were joined as parties to the action. A summons had been taken out for an order that these three persons be added as defendants under Order XVI., r. 11, but Field, J. at chambers had refused to make the order. From such refusal the defendants now appealed.

John Edge, for the defendants, moved by way of appeal from the decision of the judge at chambers.—This action is brought upon a contract made jointly by all the co-owners of the vessel on which the goods in question were shipped, and, before the Judicature Act 1873, a plea in abatement would have lain. It being no longer competent to defendants to plead in abatement, their only remedy for non-joinder of parties by the plaintiff now is to go before the judge at chambers under Order XVI., r. 11, under which this application is made. Order XVI., r. 11, provides that "the court or a judge may, at any stage of the proceedings, either upon or without the application of either party, and upon such terms as may appear to the court or a judge to be just, order that the names of any parties improperly joined, whether as plaintiffs or as defendants, be struck out, and that the names of any parties, whether plaintiffs or defendants, who ought to have been joined, or whose presence before the court may be necessary in order to enable the court effectually and completely to adjudicate upon and settle all the questions involved in the cause or matter, be added." It is submitted that, this being an action upon a joint contract, all the co-owners of the vessel are parties who ought to have been joined, and the order for their joinder ought to be made:

Kendall v. Hamilton, 41 L. T. Rep. N. S. 418; 4 App. Cas. 504.

Lord Cairns, in his judgment in that case, says: "I cannot think that the Judicature Acts have changed what was formerly a joint right of action into a right of bringing several and separate actions; and although the form of objecting by means of a plea in abatement to the non-joinder of a defendant, who ought to be included in the action, is abolished, yet I conceive that the application to have the person so omitted included as a defendant ought to be granted or refused on the same principles on which a plea in abatement would have succeeded or failed." In this case all the co-owners were partners quâ this joint contract, and they are therefore all proper and necessary parties to be joined, and before the Judicature Acts a plea in abatement would therefore have succeeded. If the present defendants are held liable, they will be entitled to contribution from their co-contractors, and in such an event, if the order asked for is refused, they will have to bring another separate action against these persons, and it is obvious that such a course would be expensive and inconvenient. [HAWKINS, J.—Lord Penzance, in his judgment in the same case, says that "since the Judicature Act no such thing as a plea in abatement is possible. The non-joinder of any party under any circumstances has ceased to be an answer, objection, or defence to the action. In such a case the action goes on, and the court or a judge may, on such terms as appear to be just, order that the name or names of any party or parties, either plaintiffs or defendants, who ought to have been joined, or whose presence before the court may be necessary in order to enable the court effectually and completely to adjudicate upon and settle all the questions involved in the action, be added: (Judicature Act 1875, Order XVI., r. 13.) Now, these provisions appear to me to have entirely altered the rights of joint contractors in respect of procedure. They have no longer any absolute right to insist that they should be sued together or not at all." Lord COLERIDGE, C.J.—Yes, and this dictum has the advantage of agreeing with the statute, which the counter-dictum by Lord Cairns does not.] It is submitted that the order ought to be made.

J. Gorell Barnes, for the plaintiffs, showed cause, and submitted that it was clear from the language of rule 11, Order XVI., that the order asked for was entirely a matter of discretion, and that such discretion had been properly exercised by the learned judge at chambers.

John Edge, in reply.

Lord COLERIDGE, C.J.—This is an application by the defendants who have been made parties to the action, to add three more persons as defendants, on the ground that they are co-owners with the applicants in the vessel in respect of which the action is brought. The learned judge at chambers refused to make the order. The ground of the application appears to be that the defendants have an absolute right of having these co-defendants added. It is necessary first of all to ascertain whether the court may exercise any discretion in an application of this nature. If the court has a discretion, it is quite plain that it ought to sustain the decision of my brother Field. If there be a discretion, there is no doubt that the learned judge at chambers has properly exercised such discretion. But, as the question has been raised whether there is or is not such a discretion, it will be necessary for us to decide that point. I say that we clearly have such a discretion. The rule (Order XVI., r. 11) says that "no cause or matter shall be defeated by reason of the misjoinder or non-joinder of parties." Non-joinder is added in the Act of 1883. Order XVI., r. 13, of the Judicature Act of 1875 dealt with misjoinder only; therefore it has now been enacted by the Legislature that non joinder is no longer to be a cause of nonsuit. The rule goes on to say that "the court may in every cause or matter deal with the matter in controversy so far as regards the rights and interests of the parties actually before it. The court or a judge may" [reads the rule]. Now, if any words could have been selected clearly to show that there is a discretion, it seems to me that those used in this rule most adequately express such intention. Not only is the word "may," and not "must," used, but the whole tenour of the section is clearly to that effect. Now, then, the question for us to decide is whether those words give the court a discretion in respect of the amendment of pleadings by reason of the misjoinder or non-joinder of parties. As I understand Mr. Edge to say, we have no such discretion, and in the present state of the law there is a right in a defendant to compel the addition of others. It certainly would seem very inexpedient that such should be the law, because there may be the best reasons why a plaintiff should not wish to add certain persons as defendants; they may be men of straw or persons against whom it would be very difficult for him to prove his case; and yet the contention is, that, notwithstanding any such difficulty, the defendant has a right to compel the addition. That, in face of the enactment, which seems carefully to give a discretion, must be determined by the particular facts of every case. If a case were presented in which the defendants on the record were prejudiced by the non-addition of certain persons as defendants, or if it were shown that the omission placed them in a disadvantageous position, I can well understand that in such a case a judge ought, in the exercise of his judicial discretion, to order the plaintiff to make the addition, because it would "enable the court effectually and completely to adjudicate upon and settle the questions involved in the cause or matter." But no steps have been taken by the defendants here to show any such necessity or expediency; it is put upon the inherent and absolute right of the defendants.

We have been pressed by the authority of the case of Kendall v. Hamilton, which was decided in the House of Lords, and is reported in 4 App. Cas. 504. In the first place I may say that that case decided nothing about defendants. It was a case in which an action was brought and judgment recovered against two persons who had borrowed money from the plaintiffs. The debt was in the nature of a partnership debt due from the two defendants and a third person (the respondent) jointly; but at the time the plaintiffs brought the action they were not aware that the debt had been contracted by the third person jointly with the defendants. The defendants did not plead in abatement, and judgment was recovered against them; but, by reason of the insolvency of the defendants, the judgment remained unsatisfied. The plaintiffs afterwards discovered the interest of the third person, and brought an action against him for the debt, but it was held that the judgment recoverable against the defendants constituted a bar to another action brought by the same plaintiffs against the third person. To that, as far as I can see, Lord Cairns limits his judgment, and he says: "I cannot think that the Judicature Acts have changed what was formerly a joint right of action into a right of bringing several and separate actions. And although the form of objecting, by means of a plea in abatement, to the non-joinder of a defendant who ought to be included in the action is abolished, yet I conceive that the application to have the person so omitted included as a defendant ought to be granted or refused on the same principle on which a plea in abatement would have succeeded or failed." Then I find that, when Lord Penzance comes to deal with the matter, he lays down an opinion strongly against the present contention and greatly in favour of the view I am insisting upon. He says: "The Judicature Act abolished all the old forms of action; it abolished all the old technical forms of procedure, and established a new procedure for the enforcement indiscriminately of both legal and equitable rights, which is independent of all the old rules of law on that subject. Particularly it did away with all objections and defences arising out of the misjoinder or non-joinder of parties, either plaintiff or defendant. Since that Act no such thing as a plea in abatement is possible. The non-joinder of any party under any circumstances has ceased to be an answer, objection, or defence to the action. In such a case the action goes on, and 'the court or a judge may, on such terms as appear to be just, order that the name of any party who ought to have been joined, or whose presence before the court may be necessary in order to enable the court effectually and completely to adjudicate upon and settle all the questions involved in the action, shall be added.'" Now that is the rule upon which Lord Penzance delivered that judgment, and Lord Cairns says nothing in contradiction to it. Lord Blackburn undoubtedly does say: "I cannot agree in what seems to be the opinion of the noble and learned lord on my left (Lord Penzance) that the Judicature Act has taken away the right of the joint contractor to have the other joint contractors joined as defendants, or made it a mere matter of discretion in the court to permit it. With great deference I think that the right remains, though the mode of enforcing it is changed." That is a dictum delivered in the year 1879.

In the case of Julius v. The Bishop of Oxford (42 L. T. Rep. N. S. 546; 5 App. Cas. 214) the House of Lords elaborately went into all the authorities, and decided that "may" did not mean "must." It was there held that the words in a statute "it shall be lawful" of themselves merely made that legal and possible which there would otherwise be no right or authority to do, and that their natural meaning was enabling and permissive only. So the word "may" is a word ordinarily importing discretion, whereas the word "must" imports a duty. The court or a judge may, upon such terms as may appear to be just, order the names of any parties improperly joined to be struck out, or that the names of any parties who ought to have been joined, or whose presence before the court may be necessary in order to enable it effectually and completely to adjudicate upon and settle all the questions involved, be added. It appears that Lord Blackburn considered that a rule couched in such language conferred a right to have parties added as defendants, and that to such right there was no discretion; but I think he was probably speaking with reference to the old plea in abatement, and that he had not the words of the rule before him. At any rate, I do not agree with what he says as to that. I think that a rule which enacts in terms that the non-joinder of parties will not defeat the plaintiff's action, clearly abolishes the effect of the old plea in abatement, and to my mind it is quite plain that what is intended is that the plaintiff has a right to add parties as defendants, but that the defendant has no corresponding right unless he can show that not doing so will prevent the court from effectually doing justice. That such will be the case here is not contended. With great deference to the dictum of Lord Blackburn in the case of Kendall v. Hamilton, which was delivered in the year 1879, I am clearly of opinion that the court or a judge has a discretion in this matter, and this application must therefore be refused.

Hawkins, J.—I am of the same opinion, and I also think that the addition of defendants is to be ordered by the judge in the exercise of his discretion only; and, as Mr. Edge has failed to satisfy me that this a case in which such discretion ought to be exercised in favour of his clients, I think that this application must be refused.

THE ARDANDHU. (a)

Limitation of liability—Collision—Discontinuance of action—Consent order—R. S. C., Order LII., r. 23.

The discontinuance of a collision action between shipowners by the plaintiffs does not preclude them from claiming against and sharing with the cargo owners in the amount paid into court under sect. 54 of the Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act 1862, in a limitation action instituted by the defendants in consequence of a judgment obtained against them by the cargo owners in respect of the same collision where the order for discontinuance is set aside by the judge before the claim in the limitation action is made.

This was a motion by the owners of cargo lately laden on board the steamship Kronprinz on objection to the registrar's report in an action brought by the owners of the steamship Ardandhu to limit their liability. The collision out of which the present action arose occurred on March 1, 1883 between the steamships Ardandhu and Kronprinz. Thereupon actions in rem were respectively instituted against the Ardandhu by the owners of the Kronprinz and by the owners of the cargo laden on board the Kronprinz. The ship action was discontinued on May 2, 1883. The cargo action was tried on Dec. 18, 1884, when both ships were found to blame. On Jan. 29, 1885, the owners of the Ardandhu instituted an action to limit their liability. In that action the registrar made the following report:

Whereas, on the 1st March 1883, a collision occurred off Cape St. Vincent between the steamships Kronprinz and Ardandhu, which collision this court in a certain cause of damage (1883, Fo. 249) pronounced to have been occasioned by the fault or default of the masters and crews of both the said ships, and whereas, on the 24th March 1885 the court did by its decree or order in this action pronounce the owners of the Ardandhu to be entitled to limited liability for damages arising therefrom according to the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Acts in that behalf; and whereas a sum of 9917*l.* 7*s.* 5*d.* was afterwards paid into court by the owners of the Ardandhu, being the amount of their statutory liability aforesaid, inclusive of interest; and whereas all claims filed or to be filed upon such fund were referred to the registrar, assisted by merchants, to report upon, and the time allowed for filing claims has expired. Now, I do hereby report that I have, with the assistance of Messrs. Sidney Young and Neville Lubbock, of London, merchants, carefully examined the claims filed in this action, together with all accounts and vouchers and the papers and proceedings produced and brought in; and having on the 30th and 31st Oct. 1885, and 11th Jan. 1886 heard counsel and solicitor thereon, I find that claims for loss or damage to ships, goods, merchandise, and other things have been proved to the extent shown in the schedule hereto annexed. A question, however, has arisen as to the right, under the circumstances hereafter stated, of the owners of the Kronprinz to prove against the fund in court in respect of the damages they sustained by the loss of their ship. The collision occurred on the 1st March 1883. On the 6th of March in that year an action for damage by that collision (Fo. 120) was brought in this division by the owners of the Kronprinz against the owners of the Ardandhu for whom an appearance was duly entered on the 19th March. On the 2nd May following a consent order was entered in these words: "Upon consent of both solicitors, it is ordered that this action be discontinued without costs, on the ground of inevitable accident." After an interval of two years and upwards, namely, on the 30th June 1885, this order was rescinded by Mr. Justice Butt on the application of the plaintiffs, the defendants not objecting. In the meanwhile, on the 25th June 1883 an action for damage arising from the same collision (Fo. 249) was brought in this division by the owners of the cargo of the Kronprinz against the owners of the Ardandhu, and after various proceedings this action was tried on the 18th Dec. 1884, when the president found both vessels to blame, and pronounced for a moiety of the damages sustained by the plaintiffs. Shortly afterwards on the 20th Jan. 1885, the owners of the Ardandhu commenced this action (1885, Fo. 41) for the purpose of limiting their liability for all damages occasioned by the collision in question; and the usual decree having been made, the various claims were filed, and amongst them a claim on behalf of the owners of the Kronprinz for the loss of their ship. This claim has been contested on the ground that the owners of the Kronprinz have debarred themselves from recovering against the Ardandhu by having discontinued their original action, and by consenting to the terms of the consent order made therein on the 2nd May 1883, as before stated. It is contended that this claim comes within the principle of the decision of this court, confirmed, on appeal, in the recent case of The Bellcairn (53 L. T. Rep. N. S. 186). I am of opinion, however, that there is an essential difference between the two cases. In the case of The Bellcairn, an action by the owners of the Britannia against the owners of the Bellcairn had, after trial in court, been dismissed, and when subsequently the owners of the Britannia claimed to prove for their damages against the fund in court in the action brought by the owners of the Bellcairn to limit their liability, the court held that such claim had been properly disallowed by the registrar at the reference, and that the owners of the Britannia were not entitled to share in that fund. In this case, on the contrary, the original action on behalf of the owners of the Kronprinz was not dismissed, but was simply discontinued before the delivery of any statement of defence, and I am unable to see that the plaintiffs' right to commence another action for the same cause, which would otherwise be unquestionable, can be affected by the introduction into the before-mentioned order of court of the words, "by reason of inevitable accident." These words may have been so introduced as a quasi reason for the defendants consenting to waive costs. It appears to me that the objection raised by the owners of cargo to the participation of the owners to the Kronprinz in the fund in court is not well founded, and I have accordingly allowed the claim of the latter.

The agreement upon which the consent order was made was as follows: "We, Lowless and Co., solicitors for the defendants, hereby consent to this action being discontinued, on the ground of inevitable accident." This agreement was filed in the registry on May 2, 1883.

Sir Walter Phillimore (with him Stubbs) for the owners of the cargo on the Kronprinz.—By Order LII., r. 23 (a), any agreement in writing in Admiralty actions may be filed, and shall "thereupon become an order of court, and have the same effect as if such order had been made by the judge in person." In the present case the agreement was filed in the registry, and therefore had the same effect as the decree dismissing the action in the case of The Bellcairn (10 P. Div. 161; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 503; 53 L. T. Rep. N. S 686). If so, the owners of the Kronprinz are precluded from claiming against the funds in court. The effect of the discontinuance order was to put an end to the action, and it cannot be revived by a subsequent order. It is also to be observed that at the time Butt, J. rescinded the order, the decision in the Bellcairn (ubi sup.) had not been given.

Barnes, for the owners of the Kronprinz, contra.—In the present case the consent order was properly set aside by the order of the judge, and therefore cannot now bar the claim of the shipowners, as it is not now in force. In The Bellcairn (ubi sup.) the matter was res judicata, having been disposed of in open court, and the decree therein was never set aside. This agreement was never meant to be such an agreement as is contemplated by Order LII., r. 23, but was simply meant to be the basis of the consent order which the registrar made. Although it may be true that the agreement was filed, it was done so by inadvertence, and it never was in the contemplation of the parties that it should have the effect referred to in Order LII., r. 23.

Sir Walter Phillimore in reply.

Cur. adv. vult.

Feb. 16.—Sir JAMES HANNEN.—This was a suit for the limitation of the liability of the owners of the vessel Ardandhu. A collision having taken place between her and the steamer Kronprinz, both vessels were pronounced to blame. The owners of the Kronprinz now seek to prove against the fund in court. It was contended on behalf of the owners of the cargo laden on board the Kronprinz that the owners of the ship are not entitled to any share in the fund because they had discontinued the action they had commenced against the Ardandhu. It is, however, clear that the mere discontinuance of an action does not prevent the plaintiff from substantiating his claim in other proceedings, as by proof in bankruptcy, or, as in this case, by proof against the fund in court. But it is contended that in this case the particular terms of the order to discontinue, bar the right of the owners of the Kronprinz to prove. The order is in these terms: "Upon consent of both solicitors it is ordered that this action be discontinued without costs, on the ground of inevitable accident." This order was made on the consent of the defendants, which was as follows: "We, Lowless and Co., solicitors for the defendants, hereby consent to this action being discontinued, on the ground of inevitable accident." This order was subsequently rescinded by Butt, J., on June 30, 1885. It is argued on behalf of the owners of cargo that this case is governed by the decision in The Bellcairn (ubi sup.). I, however, am of opinion that there is a material distinction between the two cases. In The Bellcairn (ubi sup.) there was a decree of the court, which could only be set aside by the court, and not by the consent of the parties. Here there was no decree negativing the plaintiffs' claim, but only a discontinuance of the then existing proceedings. The plaintiffs would have been entitled to discontinue, as a matter of course, on payment of costs. All that they needed the consent of the defendants for was to avoid the payment of costs. This the defendants gave, and added their reason for so doing, viz., that they considered that the collision arose from inevitable accident. Mr. Justice Butt has rescinded this order, and it is not in existence, and cannot affect the case, whatever effect it had while in force.

(a) Any agreement in writing between the solicitors in Admiralty actions, dated and signed by the solicitors of both parties, may, if the Admiralty register think it reasonable and such as the judge would under the circumstances allow, be filed, and shall thereupon become an order of court, and have the same effect as f such order had been made by the judge in person.

But it is further argued that apart from the order to discontinue, there was a pre-existing agreement between the parties, which, being filed, would have the effect of barring the plaintiff's claim. I am of opinion, however, that there was no such agreement as is contemplated by Order LII., r. 23. It was not treated in the registry as such an agreement, but simply as a consent to the order. I am therefore of opinion that there is nothing in the circumstances of the case which precludes the owners of the Kronprinz from establishing their claim against the fund in court. I may further add that the judgment and observations of the Lords Justices in The Bellcairn (ubi sup.) proceeded upon the ground that the matter had passed into res judicata. The result, therefore, is that the motion is dismissed. As the owners of the Kronprinz have raised this objection, and have failed, they must pay the costs.

THE OAKFIELD. (a)

Collision—Compulsory pilotage—Fog—Negligence of master—Liability of owners.

Although the pilot in charge of a ship by compulsion of law is under ordinary circumstances solely responsible for getting the ship under way, yet, if the weather is so bad by reason of fog or other circumstances as to make navigation manifestly perilous and to give rise to a plain prospect of danger, it is the duty of the master to interfere, and he is to blame if he permits his vessel to get under way in such circumstances.

Where a pilot in charge of a vessel by compulsion of law gives at the suggestion of the master an improper order which brings about a collision, such interference by the master does not transfer the responsibility of the pilot to the master so as to deprive the shipowners of the defence of compulsory pilotage to an action to recover the damages occasioned by the collision.

The Lochlibo (3 W. Rob. 310) followed and explained.

THIS was a collision action in rem, instituted by the owners of the ship Duchess of Albany against the owners of the steamship Oakfield, to recover damages occasioned by a collision between the two vessels on the 27th Jan. 1886.

The facts alleged on behalf of the plaintiffs were as follows:—

On the 27th Jan. 1886 the Duchess of Albany, an iron ship of 1746 tons register, manned by a crew of thirty-one hands, was lying ready for sea at anchor in the river Mersey, nearly abreast of the Huskisson Dock and a little to the westward of mid-river. She was in the charge of a duly licensed pilot. The port anchor was down and 30 fathoms of chain out; the weather was foggy, and her chain had been shortened in so as to be ready to proceed to sea as soon as the fog lifted; the bell on board was rung regularly and frequently, and a good look-out was kept. In these circumstances, at about 2.20 p.m. on that day, the wind being about E.S.E. blowing a moderate breeze, the weather hazy and the tide flood, running about three knots an hour, those on board the Duchess of Albany observed the steamship Oakfield, distant about a quarter of a mile and about three or four points on the port bow, heading to the eastward, with her engines apparently stopped. Shortly afterwards it was noticed that she was coming ahead at full speed, under a starboard helm, with the apparent intention of crossing the bows of the Duchess of Albany. Those on board the latter vessel continued to hail her and kept ringing their bell continuously, but she continued to come ahead until with her starboard side she struck the bowsprit and jibboom of the Duchess of Albany, doing her considerable damage. The plaintiffs, in addition to charging the defendants with not navigating the Oakfield so as to keep her out of the way of the Duchess of Albany, with improperly starboarding, and with keeping their engines full speed ahead, made the following charge:

The Oakfield had been at anchor in safety within the river shortly before the collision took place, and those on board her acted imprudently and improperly in leaving her anchorage and in proceeding up the river, having regard to the state of the weather.

The facts alleged on behalf of the defendants were as follows:—

On Jan. 27 the steamship Oakfield, of 1123 tons register, arrived in the river Mersey on a voyage from Tripoli to Birkenhead, in charge of a duly licensed pilot by compulsion of law. The pilot and captain were on the bridge, an A.B. at the wheel, and the chief officer and boatswain on the look-out on the forecastle. The weather was thick and hazy and the tide flood running about two knots an hour. In these circumstances, as the Oakfield was proceeding up the river with the pilot in charge, her engines working slow and her steam-whistle being continuously sounded, those on board of her observed a vessel, which proved to be the Duchess of Albany, about 300 yards distant, a little on the port bow of the Oakfield, heading about N.E. The helm of the Oakfield was starboarded, and almost immediately afterwards put hard-a-starboard, and the engines full speed ahead, to clear the Duchess of Albany. The head of the Oakfield paid off under the starboard helm, but not sufficiently to clear the Duchess of Albany, and when the bridge of the Oakfield was about level with the stem of the Duchess of Albany, the helm was put hard-a-port and the engines stopped to throw the Oakfield's quarter clear, but the two vessels came into collision, the bowsprit of the Duchess of Albany striking the Oakfield about the starboard main rigging.

Paragraphs 5 and 6 of the defence were as follows:

5. There is no negligence or improper conduct or want of care, skill, or seamanship on the part of the master, officers, or crew of the Oakfield.

6. The Oakfield was by compulsion of law in charge of a duly licensed pilot, and the said collision was caused solely by the act or default of the said pilot.

The pilot in charge of the Oakfield was subpœnaed by the defendants to produce his licence, and was identified as the pilot in charge by the master of the Oakfield. The pilot was then called by the plaintiffs and said in examination in chief that immediately on seeing the Duchess of Albany he gave the order hard-a-port and full speed astern; that the captain thereupon said to him, "What are you doing that for? You will be right into her. Let her go and starboard and you will clear her;" that his previous order was not carried out, and that there would have been no collision had his first order been obeyed. In cross-examination he said that he in fact had given the orders starboard and hard-a-starboard in consequence of the suggestion of the captain, he considering that the master had taken charge of the vessel. It also appeared that in consequence of the fog the Oakfield had anchored off the Bar Lightship and in the Crosby Channel, and that on the fog lifting a little the vessel proceeded up the river, the orders to get the vessel under way being given by the pilot.

Hall, Q.C. (with him Carver), for the plaintiffs, contended that, having regard to the nature of the defence, the onus lay upon the defendants to establish their defence.

Sir Walter Phillimore (with him Pickford) for the defendants.—The defendants are not to be called upon to give proof of a negative character excluding the mere possibility of contributory fault on the part of their servants. On the authority of the Clyde Navigation Company v. Barclay (36 L. T. Rep. N. S. 379; 1 App. Cas. 790; 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 390) they are only bound to show that the pilot's fault was sufficient to cause the collision and to rebut any evidence against their servants of contributory negligence. In the circumstances of this case no blame can be attributed to the master and crew. It has been said that the weather was so bad as to make it negligence on the part of the master to have allowed the vessel to get under way. But that is a question entirely for the pilot, and the whole responsibility of determining whether the vessel should be got under way rests with the pilot:

The Lochlibo, 3 W. Rob. 310;
The Peerless, Lush. 30;
The City of Cambridge, 2 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 239; 30 L. T. Rep. N. S. 439; L. Rep. 5 P. C. 451.

Even assuming the master to have suggested an improper manœuvre, the pilot is not relieved from responsibility. This point has already been decided in The Lochlibo (ubi sup.) by Dr. Lushington, where he considered it a "most dangerous doctrine" to hold that suggestions from the master imposed the pilot's responsibility on him.

C. Hall Q.C. (with him Carver) for the plaintiffs.—The fact of a compulsory pilot being on board does not relieve a master from responsibility for not interfering to prevent obvious danger to the vessel:

The Girolamo, 3 Hagg. 169;
The Borussia, Swa. 94.

In this case the master was wrong to allow his vessel to be navigated up the Mersey in a thick fog on a flood tide. On the question of starboarding, it it is submitted that the conduct of the master amounted to an interference with the duties of the pilot, and was more than a mere suggestion. He practically countermanded the pilot's order and really took the ship out of his hands. Had it not been for the interference of the master no collision would have occurred.

Sir JAMES HANNEN.—That this collision occurred from the fault of someone on board the Oakfield is unquestionable. The principal question in the case is, whether the blame is attributable to the pilot or to the master or crew. The first point to consider is, whether there was anything in the state of the weather which made it an act of negligence for that vessel to be under way. I stated in the course of the argument that I was under the impression that in foggy weather it might be blameworthy on the part of a captain to allow his vessel to get under way. I am still disposed to think that there might be such an amount of fog as would make it culpable on the part of a master to allow his vessel to be in motion at all. I think, if there were such a state of obscurity owing to fog as would give rise to a plain prospect of danger, the master could not in those circumstances throw the whole responsibility on the pilot if he ordered the vessel to get under way. But in this case it is said that the circumstances did not give rise to such a plain prospect of danger, for although the weather was admittedly foggy, yet vessels might be seen at a very considerable distance; the evidence is, from 300 yards to half a mile. If vessels could be seen at such a distance as that, then it is a question for the pilot to determine whether it was wise to weigh anchor, and the master would be relieved from responsibility. The pilot knows all the local dangers, and knows as it were by instinct where he may go and where he may not go. It is therefore obvious that the master would leave it to the pilot to judge whether it would be safe to proceed in such a state of weather. I think therefore there was nothing in the state of the weather which made it negligent on the part of the master to allow his vessel to get under way. But I am advised that, as a matter of fact, having regard to the state of the weather and the fact that the tide was flood, it was a very imprudent thing to have that vessel under way. That, however, does not concern the master. It must be entirely a matter for the pilot to judge what would be the effect of the flood tide.

The next question is, whether there was any defect in the Oakfield's look-out. The pilot says he never heard the Duchess of Albany reported at all; but the evidence of the other witnesses from the Oakfield satisfies me that the other vessel was seen and reported. Whether she was reported before or after she was seen from the bridge of the Oakfield, I do not think important on the assumption I take, that it was only a question of seconds which took place first. It may be that those on the bridge did see the vessel a few seconds before the look-out, but I come to the conclusion that there was no want of care in the look-out. The next question is, whether the Oakfield was wrong in attempting to cross the bows of the Duchess of Albany. We are of opinion that she was clearly wrong in that manœuvre. The remaining question is, whether blame is to be attributed to the master or to the pilot. I think, after one has heard the examination and cross-examination of the pilot, it must appear pretty plain how this collision occurred. The evidence of the witnesses from the Oakfield shows that on the Duchess of Albany being reported, it seems clear that there was some doubt in the minds of both captain and pilot as to whether the Duchess of Albany was under way or not. The pilot in his evidence said he first gave the order to port, and he went so far as to say that he thought the helmsman had begun to get the wheel over. In this, however, he has been contradicted, and I doubt whether that order was ever given. Then came the order to starboard, and up to that time it is clear that the pilot had been giving the orders. There is a conflict as to how this order to starboard came to be given, but the pilot admits that the words proceeded from his lips. To excuse himself he says he was merely carrying out the captain's order, and that it was not his order at all. I cannot accept that explanation. I feel convinced that the true solution of the case is, that when the Duchess of Albany was first seen there was a doubt as to whether she was or was not at anchor, that the captain very likely did strongly express an opinion that it would be safe and proper to starboard and go across her bows, that the pilot adopted that view and gave the order which brought about the collision.

There remains only this to consider, whether the interference of the master relieves the pilot from responsibility. I am of opinion that it does not. It has been pointed out by Dr. Lushington in the case of The Lochlibo (3 W. R. 310), that a suggestion made to the pilot by the master does not transfer the responsibility from him to the master. Though it would be the duty of the master to make suggestions to the pilot from time to time, it rests with the pilot to form his own opinion as to the value of the suggestion. It is only when the captain actually gives an order contrary to the pilot that he takes the responsibility for the manœuvre on himself. It is clear that this relation between the master and pilot was understood, for, if the pilot had felt that the matter was taken out of his hands, he would have left it to the master to have given the order. I think that in this case the entire responsibility rests with the pilot, though I believe that it was in consequence of his having unwisely listened to the master that the collision occurred. The defendants are therefore entitled to judgment with costs.

THE BERNINA. (a)

Collision—Loss of life—Action in personam—Both ships to blame—Contributory negligence—Measure of damages—Lord Campbell's Act 1846 (9 & 10 Vict. c. 93)—Judicature Act 1873 (36 & 37 Vict. c. 66), s. 25, sub-sect. 9.

Where passengers are killed in a collision between two ships for which both are to blame, the deceased are so identified with their carrying ship as to be deemed to be guilty of contributory negligence, and hence their personal representatives suing the owners of the non-carrying ship under Lord Campbell's Act can recover nothing.

Thorogood v. Bryan (8 C. B. 115) followed.

The Admiralty Court had no jurisdiction prior to the Judicature Act 1873 to entertain claims for loss of life, and there was consequently no rule in the Admiralty Court as to the division of damages in cases of loss of life, and as sect. 25, sub-sect. 9. of the Judicature Act 1873 has made no alteration in the principles of law as to the division of damages, passengers killed in a collision between two ships can recover nothing where both ships are to blame.

THESE were three actions in personam brought under the provisions of Lord Campbell's Act by the personal representatives of three deceased persons, whose deaths had been occasioned by a collision between the two steamships, the Bernina and the Bushire, on Sept. 28, 1884.

The three deceased persons were respectively the second officer on the Bushire, the first engineer on the Bushire, and a passenger on board the Bushire.

The facts were by agreement between the parties set out in a special case, which was as follows:—

1. The first of these actions is an action in personam brought by Elizabeth Helené Armstrong, as administratrix of the estate and effects of her husband, John Hutchinson Armstrong, deceased, against James Mills and others, the owners of the steamship Bernina, to recover on her own behalf and on the behalf of her children damages alleged to have been sustained by them by reason of the death of the said John Hutchinson Armstrong.

2. The second action is brought in personam by the plaintiff Catherine Owen, as administratrix of the estate and effects of her husband Thomas Timothy Owen, deceased, against the said defendants, to recover on her own behalf damages alleged to have been sustained by her by reason of the death of the said Thomas Timothy Owen.

3. The third action is brought in personam by the plaintiff Habiba Harone Toeg, as administratrix of the estate and effects of her son Moses Aaron Toeg, deceased, against the same defendants, to recover on her own behalf damages alleged to have been sustained by her by reason of the death of the said Moses Aaron Toeg.

4. The owners of the said steamship have appeared, and are defendants in all of the said actions.

5. A collision occurred on the 28th Sept. 1884, between the British screw steamship Bernina, belonging to the defendants, and manned and navigated by their servants the master and crew thereof, and the British screw steamship Bushire, of 1011 tons register, belonging to the Persian Gulf Steamship Company Limited, and manned and navigated by their servants the master and crew thereof. The result of such collision was that the Bushire sank, and fifteen persons on board of her at the time of the said collision were drowned.

6. It is admitted that the said collision was caused by the fault or default of the master and crew of the steamship Bushire, and by the fault or default of the master and crew of the steamship Bernina.

7. At the time of the said collision the said John Hutchinson Armstrong was one of the crew of the said steamship Bushire, and was serving on board the said steamship Bushire as first engineer under duly signed articles, and was by reason of the said collision drowned.

8. The said John Hutchinson Armstrong was at the time of the collision off duty, and had nothing to do with the negligent or careless navigation of the Bushire, which partly caused the said collision as aforesaid.

9. At the time of the said collision the said Thomas Timothy Owen was one of the crew of the said steamship Bushire, and was serving on board the said steamship as second officer under duly signed articles, and was by reason of the said collision drowned.

10. The said Thomas Timothy Owen was at the time of the said collision in charge of the said steamship Bushire, and was directly responsible for the negligent or careless navigation of the Bushire, which partly caused the said collision as aforesaid.

11. At the time of the said collision the said Moses Aaron Toeg was being carried on the said steamship Bushire as a passenger from London to Bushire in the Persian Gulf. He had paid his passage money for the voyage, and was by reason of the said collision drowned.

12. The said Moses Aaron Toeg had nothing to do with the negligent or careless navigation of the Bushire, which partly caused the said collision as aforesaid.

13. All of these actions were commenced within twelve calendar months of the date of the death of the said John Hutchinson Armstrong, the said Thomas Timothy Owen, and Moses Aaron Toeg.

14. The court is to be at liberty to draw inferences of fact.

15. The questions for the opinion of the court are as follows:—1. Are the defendants liable for the damages (if any) sustained by the first-named plaintiff and her said children by reason of the death of her husband, the said John Hutchinson Armstrong, in the said collision? 2. If the defendants are liable, are they liable to pay the whole of such damages (when ascertained) to the plaintiffs, or only a moiety of the same? 3. Are the defendants liable for the damages (if any) sustained by the plaintiff in the second action by reason of the death of Thomas Timothy Owen. 4. If the defendants are liable, are they liable to pay the whole of such damages (when ascertained), or only a moiety of the same? 5. Are the defendants liable for the damages (if any) sustained by the plaintiff in the third action by reason of the death of her son, the said Moses Aaron Toeg, in the collision? 6. If the defendants are liable, are they liable to pay the whole of such damages (when ascertained), or only a moiety of the same?

If the plaintiffs, or either of them are entitled to recover against the defendants, judgment is to be entered up accordingly with costs, and there is to be a reference to the registrar and merchants to assess the damages in accordance with the judgment of the court.

If the defendants are not liable to the plaintiffs, or either of them, then judgment is to be entered accordingly for the defendants, with costs.

The following Acts of Parliament were referred to in the course of the argument:—

The preamble and sect. 2 of Lord Campbell's Act:

Whereas no action at law is now maintainable against a person who, by his wrongful act, neglect or default, may have caused the death of another person, and it is oftentimes right and expedient that the wrongdoer in such case should be answerable in damages for the injury so caused by him: Be it therefore enacted by the Queen's most Excellent Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, and Commons, in this present Parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, that whensoever the death of a person shall be caused by the wrongful act, neglect, or default, and the wrongful act, neglect, or default is such as would (if death had not ensued) have entitled the party injured to maintain an action and recover damages in respect thereof, then and in every such case the person who would have been liable if death had not ensued shall be liable to an action for damages, notwithstanding the death of the person injured, and although the death shall have been caused under such circumstances as amount in law to felony.

2. And be it enacted that every such action shall be for the benefit of the wife, husband, parent, and child of the person whose death shall have been so caused, and shall be brought by and in the name of the executor or administrator of the person deceased; and in every such action the jury may award such damages as they think proportioned to the injury resulting from such death to the parties respectively for whom and for whose benefit such action shall be brought; and the amount so recovered, after deducting the costs not recovered from the defendant, shall be divided amongst the beforementioned parties in such shares as the jury by their verdict shall find and direct.

Sect. 25, sub-sect. 9, of the Judicature Act 1873:

In any cause or proceeding for damages arising out of a collision between two ships, if both ships shall be found to have been in fault, the rules hitherto in force in the Court of Admiralty, so far as they have been at variance with the rules in force in the courts of common law, shall prevail.

Bucknill, Q.C. (with him Nelson) for the plaintiffs.—Even assuming the plaintiffs to be deemed to be guilty of contributory negligence on the authority of Thorogood v. Bryan (8 C. B. 115; 18 L. J. 336, C. P.), yet the plaintiffs are entitled to half damages under the provisions of the Judicature Act 1873, s. 25, sub-sect. 9. By that section the Admiralty Court rule as to the division of damages where both ships are to blame is made applicable to "any cause or proceeding for damages arising out of a collision between two ships." This is a "cause or proceeding for damages arising out of a collision between two ships," and therefore the section applies. By Order XIX., r. 28, Preliminary Acts are to be filed "in actions for damage by collision between vessels," which are words very similar to those used in sect. 25, sub-sect. 9. In the case of Webster v. The Manchester, Sheffield, and Lincolnshire Railway Company (5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 256, n.; L. Rep. W. N. Jan. 5, 1884), which was an action in the Queen's Bench Division under Lord Campbell's Act arising out of a collision between ships, your Lordship sitting in judges' chambers, ordered a Preliminary Act to be filed. It is submitted that if Order XIX., r. 28, applies to actions under Lord Campbell's Act, this section of the Judicature Act is equally applicable. The Merchant Shipping Act 1854 has limited shipowners' liability to 15*l.* per ton for loss of life, and were the plaintiffs to claim in an action limiting the defendants' liability they would be entitled to half their damages. If so, how can it be said that they are not entitled to recover in this action? It is, however, submitted that the plaintiffs are entitled to recover full damages, and are not precluded from recovering damages by reason of the decision of Thorogood v. Bryan (8 C. B. 115; 18 L. J. 336, C. P.). That decision has been questioned in several subsequent decisions, and also by many eminent text writers:

Rigby v. Hewitt, 5 Ex. 240;
Quarman v. Burnett, 6 M. & W. 499;
Smith's Leading Cases, 8th edit. 316;
Addison on Torts, 4th edit. 388.

In the Scotch case of Adams v. The Glasgow and South-Western Railway Company (3 Scotch Sess. Cas. 4th series, p. 215), the principle acted upon in Thorogood v. Bryan (ubi sup.) was condemned. Again, in the case of The Milan (Lush. 388; 5 L. T. Rep. N. S. 590), Dr. Lushington refused to be bound by Thorogood v. Bryan (ubi sup.) as being contrary to Hay v. Le Neve (2 Shaw Sc. App. 505). The American courts have also dissented from this principle:

Shearman and Redfield on Negligence, sect. 46, 3rd edit. 56;
Chapman v. Newhaven Railway Company, 19 N. Y. 341;
Webster v. Hudson River Railway Company, 38 N. Y. 260; Colegrove v. New Haven Railway Company, 20 N. Y. 492.

Sir Walter Phillimore and Barnes, for the defendants, contra.—The present case cannot fall within sect. 25, sub-sect. 9, of the Judicature Act 1873, because prior to the Judicature Act the Admiralty Court never entertained actions under Lord Campbell's Act. If so, there could have been no "rules hitherto in force in the Court of Admiralty" in such a "cause or proceeding." It is to be noticed that the word used is "rules," and not rule or principle, showing that the half-measure of damages was only to be applied to certain well-known cases such as damage to ship or cargo. [BUTT, J. referred to the cases of The Sylph, 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 37; 17 L. T. Rep. N. S. 519; L. Rep. 2 Ad. & Ecc. 24; and The Beta, 20 L. T. Rep. N. S. 988; 2 P. C. 447.] Those were actions in rem over which the court had jurisdiction, whereas the present action is in personam and could not have been instituted in rem:

The Vera Cruz, 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 386; 10 App. Cas. 59; 52 L. T. Rep. N. S. 474.

Were the court to decide in favour of the plaintiff's contention, the decision would hold good in actions tried in the Queen's Bench Division before a judge and jury. If so, the amount of damages awarded by the jury would in all cases similar to the present have to be divided. The creation of such an anomaly is a strong argument in favour of holding that the Legislature never intended the section to apply to actions under Lord Campbell's Act. The decision in Thorogood v. Bryan (ubi sup.) is the law of the land, and has never been expressly overruled. Though it is true that some judges have expressed dissatisfaction with it, yet in many cases it has been expressly aproved of:

Armstrong v. Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Company, L. Rep. 10 Ex. 47; 33 L. T. Rep. N. S. 228; 44 L. J. 89, Ex.;
Waite v. North-Eastern Railway Company, E. B. & E. 719;
Spaight v. Tedcastle, 44 L. T. Rep. N. S. 589; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 406; L. Rep. 6 App. Cas. 217.

Although Thorogood v. Bryan (ubi sup.) has been disapproved of in the New York courts, yet in other States, for example, Massachusetts and Ohio, the principle has been followed:

Smith v. Smith, 2 Pick. 621;
Cleveland Railway Company v. Terry, 8 Ohio St 570;
Puterbaugh v. Reasor, 9 Ohio St. 484.

Bucknill, Q.C., in reply, cited

The Chartered Mercantile Bank of India, London, and China v. Netherlands India Steam Navigation Company, 48 L. T. Rep. N. S. 546; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 65; 10 Q. B. Div. 521.

BUTT, J.—The English decisions which have been referred to make it perfectly clear what the law is. If it had not been so, I should have taken time to consider my judgment. If I had to decide for the first time the question discussed in Thorogood v. Bryan (ubi sup.) I should have hesitated long before I arrived at the conclusion at which the learned judges in that case arrived, especially having regard to the opinions expressed both in text-books and by learned judges in Scotland, and in some States of America which are strongly antagonistic to the doctrine laid down in that case. But, as Lord Blackburn has said in the case of Spaight v. Tedcastle (ubi sup.), the decision in Thorogood v. Bryan (ubi sup.) has never been overruled in this country, and having regard to the practice—I think I may say the universal practice—by which judges decline to overrule the decisions of courts of co-ordinate jurisdiction, I do not consider myself authorised to ignore that case.

Therefore, however reluctantly, I must give effect to it, and I must decide that in each and all of the three cases embraced by the special case the doctrine laid down in Thorogood Bryan (ubi sup.) would bar the plaintiffs of their remedy unless sect. 25, sub-sect. 9, of the Judicature Act 1873 entitles them to half damages. It is said by Mr. Bucknill that that section enables the court to give the plaintiffs at least half of the damages they have sustained by reason of the collision. That section is as follows: "In any cause or proceeding for damages arising out of a collision between two ships, if both ships shall be found to have been in fault, the rules hitherto in force in the Court of Admiralty, so far as they have been at variance with the rules in force in the courts of common law, shall prevail." It is said that this is a case arising out of a collision between two ships, and that therefore the section to which I have referred relates to it. I think, if there were nothing else in the section, that would be a sound argument. But, taking a broad view on the whole of the section, I do not think this case is within it. I do not think the Legislature contemplated such a case as this when this section was enacted. By express words it only applies to cases where the rules in force in the Admiralty Court were at variance with the rules in the courts of common law. Now an action under Lord Campbell's Act is a totally distinct action from any action that was ever entertained by the Admiralty Court. It is different in its very nature, and it is certain the Admiralty Court never did entertain such a suit. Therefore there was no rule in the Admiralty Court as to the measure of damages, or as to the mode in which damages should be assessed in such a case. If there was no rule in the Admiralty Court, there was no rule at variance with the courts of common law. Therefore there being no variance, it appears to me that by the very words of the section it does not apply to this case. Therefore, much as I regret it, I am forced to say, on the authority of Thorogood v. Bryan (ubi sup.) and some subsequent cases, that the plaintiffs are precluded from recovering in this action, and that their case is not rendered better by the Judicature Act of 1873. I therefore give judgment for the defendants with costs.

THE UNDAUNTED. (a)

Towage contract—Breach of—Implied warranty—Efficiency of tug—Notice restricting liability.

In a towage contract there is an implied undertaking on the part of the tugowners to supply an efficient tug with sufficient equipments, including a proper supply of coal; and hence, a term in the contract by which the tugowners are exempted from liability for loss or damage occasioned by the negligence of their servants is no defence to an action for damages occasioned to the owners of the tow in consequence of the towage being discontinued owing to the tug having started with an insufficient supply of coals.

Where in the course of towage the tug, owing to her having started with an insufficient supply of coal, is obliged to cast off to go to the nearest port to ship more coal, and then returns and completes the towage, the tugowners are entitled to be paid the price agreed upon in the towage contract if the owners of the tow do not prove any damage to have been occasioned to them by the temporary discontinuance of the towage.

THIS was an action in personam for towage services rendered by the tug Knight Commander to the American ship Undaunted. The defendants counter-claimed for demurrage occasioned by the towage being temporarily discontinued. The plaintiffs, the owners of the tug, claimed 110*l.* under an agreement by which the Undaunted was to be towed from Havre to Cardiff for the sum of 110*l.*, including the use of hawser.

According to the evidence of the plaintiffs, the facts were as follows:—In April 1884 an agreement was made by correspondence between the plaintiffs and the defendants, by which the plaintiffs were to provide a tug to tow the defendants' ship Undaunted from Havre to Cardiff for 110*l.*, including use of hawser. In one of the plaintiffs' letters forming the contract were these words, "Towage conditions as per inclosed card," by which card the tugowners were exempted from any liability for any damage caused by the negligence of their servants, or by the perils of seas, rivers, or navigation. In another letter of the plaintiffs were these words, "Our quotation covers, as usual, one daylight tide only for docking at Cardiff." The tug Undaunted then proceeded to Havre, which she left with the tow about noon on the 26th April with 90 tons of coal on board, her full complement being 120 tons. During the towage she met with severe weather and encountered a strong head wind. At about 3.30 p.m. on the 28th April, when the vessels were off Trevose Head, the master of the Knight Commander finding that his coal had burnt more quickly than he had reason to expect, cast off for a time and proceeded to Swansea for additional coal, and then returned to the Undaunted and took her in tow again after an absence of about 27 hours. The vessels arrived at Cardiff on the morning of the 30th, when it was found impossible to take the Undaunted into dock owing to the docks being full at the time. The Undaunted was not able to be docked till the 3rd May, and it was alleged by the plaintiffs that, owing to the number of vessels in dock, the Undaunted could not have been docked before even if she had been continuously towed. The Undaunted was towed for 68 hours in all, the average time for the towage being from 56 to 57 hours. The plaintiffs also alleged that when the Knight Commander commenced towing she was fully and properly supplied and equipped, and that the insufficiency of coal was due to its fast consumption and the unusual severity of the weather, which the plaintiffs had no reason to expect.

In cross-examination the master admitted that when he cast off, which was within 53 hours of leaving Havre, he had only 15 tons of coal on board.

The defendants, by their defence, alleged that the weather during the towage was fine and moderate, that the plaintiffs had not performed the towage agreed for, that the plaintiffs had not performed the towage within the agreed time, and that in consequence thereof the Undaunted could not be docked till noon on the 3rd May. The defendants counter-claimed four days' demurrage, occasioned by the Undaunted not arriving at Cardiff in time to dock by the evening tide of the 29th.

F. W. Raikes for the plaintiffs.—The towage contract has been performed, and therefore the plaintiffs are entitled to recover. No misconduct or breach of duty can be imputed to the plaintiffs. Under ordinary circumstances the coal supply would have been sufficient, and its failure was entirely due to circumstances which the plaintiffs were not bound to foresee, viz., immoderate weather and defect in the coal. Even assuming the tug to have started with an insufficient supply of coal, that is due to negligence on the part of the master, for which the plaintiffs, by the terms of the contract, are not responsible:

The United Service, 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 170: 9 P. Div. 3; 49 L. T. Rep. N. S. 701.

In that case the negligence of the master was analogous to the negligence complained of in the present case, inasmuch as it caused the tug to be of insufficient power for the service. [BUTT, J.—How do you meet the decision in Steel v. The State Line Steamship Company (37 L. T. Rep. N. S. 333; L. Rep. 3 App. Cas. 72; 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 516)? The tug, if insufficiently supplied with coal, is deficient in equipment when she commences the towage. I think tugs, when they enter upon the performance of a towage contract, should be abundantly supplied with coal.] However that may be, the towage was completed, and therefore, on the authority of The Lady Flora Hastings (3 Hagg. 118), the plaintiffs are entitled to recover.

Praed (with him Gorell Barnes) for the defendants.—In The Lady Flora Hastings (ubi sup.) the breakdown of the tug was due to accidental circumstances, whereas, in the present case, the insufficiency of coals was due to the negligence of the master. The clause in the contract exempting the plaintiffs from liability is only applicable to loss or damage incurred during the towage, and not to the negligence of the plaintiffs in providing an inefficient tug. The parties contemplated that the towage should be continuous, and in some circumstances its temporary discontinuance might cause serious danger to the tow. It is proved that, in the present case, the defendants were, in consequence of the delay, unable to have their vessel docked as soon as they otherwise would have done. There has, therefore, been a breach of the contract, occasioning loss to the defendants.

F. W. Raikes in reply.

BUTT, J.—This is an action arising out of a towage contract to tow the ship Undaunted from Havre to Cardiff. The tug was not at Havre at the time when the contract was entered into, but in pursuance of the contract she proceeded to Havre, and there took the Undaunted in tow on the 26th April 1884. When off Trevose Head, which is some 70 miles from Cardiff, it was found there were only 15 tons of coal remaining on board the tug. Her master did that which was probably prudent and right under the circumstances. With the approval, so far as I can gather, of the master of the tow, he cast off and went to Swansea to procure a fresh supply of coal. The Undaunted in the meantime was put under canvas, and is said to have beat to the northward, but probably she did not materially alter her position before the tug came back on the following day. Arguments have been directed as to the quantity of coal the tug had on board at the time she left Havre, and on the evidence I come to the conclusion that she was not properly or adequately supplied. It is a matter of very great importance that steam-tug owners should not be released from the obligation which is incumbent upon them to provide adequately and properly equipped tugs, because the consequences of having to cast a vessel off in the middle of the towage may be of the very gravest kind. It may involve not only serious danger to property, but also to life. If a tug were to cast a ship off in a gale of wind and on a lee shore in order to go and procure coal, the consequences would be serious. Therefore I am not disposed to diminish the responsibility of the tugowners in that respect.

With regard to the circumstances of this case, I have no doubt that the weather was worse than the captain of the tug anticipated before he started on the voyage. I am not prepared to say that it was worse than he had reason to expect, but at the same time I have no doubt that the weather was bad, and that when the tug cast off they had been practically making no way at all. It is said that, assuming the coal on board on starting from Havre to have been inadequate, it is not a matter for which the tugowners are responsible, for by the terms of the card, which is said to have been incorporated in the contract, they are not responsible for the negligent acts of the master. I do not think, however, that that can avail the plaintiffs in this case, because there is an implied undertaking on the part of tugowners to supply an efficient tug, including sufficient equipments and a proper supply of coal, and if the tug was—as I find it was—deficient in this respect, it is a matter for which the tugowners are liable, notwithstanding the exceptions in the card.

The question is, did the tug perform the contract? If it were established that any serious damage had resulted to this ship from the tug leaving her I should hold the plaintiffs liable, but I do not think any damage has been proved. The suggested damage is, that the Undaunted did not arrive at Cardiff in time to dock on the evening tide of the 29th April. The defendants plead as a part of the contract that the tug was "to tow the Undaunted from Havre to Cardiff docks, and dock her on or before Tuesday, the 29th April," but this is nothing like the real contract, which was merely to tow the Undaunted to Cardiff docks, the towage beginning on the 26th or 27th. Now, having regard to the evidence of the collector of Penarth dock (called on behalf of the defendants), who says that the average towage voyage from Havre to Cardiff is from fifty-seven to sixty hours, it is clear that, if the towage had commenced on the 27th, these vessels, even if they had gone as fast as they ordinarily do, would not have reached Cardiff by the evening of the 29th. Therefore, assuming the tug to have had a sufficient supply of coals, is it shown that the vessels would have arrived at Cardiff in time to allow the Undaunted to have docked on the evening of the 29th? I do not think anything of the sort is shown. The captain of the tug has said that for some time before they cast off they had only been able to make three knots an hour, and that when they cast off there was such a strong head wind that they were practically making no way at all. That being so, it is clear that, even if the tug had not cast off, and had had a sufficient quantity of coal, the Undaunted could not have got to Cardiff in time for the evening tide. It is in evidence that if she had not arrived by that time she could not have been docked sooner than she was, on the 3rd May, as the docks were full up until then. But even if she had got into dock earlier there is no evidence that she would have been any better off, or that her owner would thereby have derived any benefit. There is no evidence of any contract or charter-party, or that any cargo was waiting for her. On the whole, the conclusion to which I have come is, though I do not think the tug was so well equipped as she should have been at the outset, that, as the defendants have failed to prove any damage, my judgment must be for the plaintiffs. The towage having been resumed, and the defendants having accepted that subsequent towage, the contract was performed, and therefore the price must be paid. I therefore pronounce for the plaintiffs for the sum sued for.

THE BELLCAIRN. (a)

Practice—Institution of legal proceedings—Principal and agent—Managing owner and co-owners—Costs—Limitation of liability.

Where a shipowner applied to the court to set aside an order condemning him in the costs of unsuccessful legal proceedings taken in his behalf by the managing owner, on the ground that the proceedings had been instituted without his knowledge, consent, or ratification, and that the first intimation he had of the proceeding, was a notice received by him about a month previous to the present application condemning him in the costs of such proceedings, the Court refused to grant the application, as it did not appear that the applicant, though he had no knowledge of the institution of, was not aware of the pendency of the proceedings, and because he had not at once applied to the court on becoming aware of the proceedings, instead of delaying to take any steps for over a month.

THIS was a motion in a limitation of liability action to set aside certain orders of court therein made against one George Butt Craig, one of the owners of the British steamship Britannia.

The action had been instituted by the owners of the Bellcairn to limit their liability in respect of a collision between the Bellcairn and the Britannia on the 31st July 1884.

The owners of the Britannia had brought an action in rem against the owners of the Bellcairn to recover damages for the collision. That action was dismissed at the trial by the consent of the parties. Subsequently the owners of cargo on board the Britannia brought an action in rem against the Bellcairn, in which action both ships were held to blame. Thereupon, the owners of the Bellcairn having instituted an action to limit their liability, the owners of the Britannia, on the 25th March 1885, unsuccessfully sought to claim against the fund in that action: (The Bellcairn, 10 P. Div. 161; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 503; 53 L. T. Rep. N. S. 186).

The following affidavit by the applicant was filed in support of the motion:—

1. I am the registered owner of one sixty-fourth share in the late British steamship Britannia, which, on or about the 31st day of July 1884, was sunk in the English Channel by collision with the steamship Bellcairn, and was totally lost.

2. I am informed and believe that an action for damage by the said collision was brought in this division of the High Court of Justice in the name of the owners of the Britannia, against the owners of the Bellcairn, in which the latter also counter-claimed for the damage they had sustained, and that at the trial of the said action, on Nov. 7, 1884, the claim and counter-claim were dismissed by consent of both sides; and that in an action brought subsequently by the owners of the cargo on the Britannia against the Bellcairn, the court pronounced for a moiety of the damages sustained by the plaintiffs, and that the owners of the Bellcairn paid into court the amount of their statutory liability of 8*l*. per ton.

3. In the month of Feb. 1886 it came to my knowledge that the managing owners of the Britannia, Messrs. Ward and Hobzapfel, had taken proceedings to set aside the judgment of Nov. 7, 1884, and had claimed in the name of the owners of the Britannia to prove against the fund in court for the damages sustained in the collision, and that such claim had been successfully resisted by the owners of the cargo on the Britannia, who had obtained a judgment against the owners of the Britannia for their costs thereby incurred amounting to 86*l*. or thereabouts.

4. The said Ward and Hobzapfel have left this country in order, as I am informed and believe, to escape their liabilities, and are now abroad.

5. The said legal proceedings to set aside the said judgment and to claim against the fund in court were taken by the said Messrs. Ward and Hobzapfel entirely without the knowledge, sanction, or ratification, express or implied, of me this deponent, or, as I am informed and believe, of any of the co-owners of the said Britannia, nor have I, or to my knowledge and belief have my co-owners, at any time given to the said Ward and Hobzapfel or either of them any general authority to take such proceedings as they or he might think fit or be advised to recover the loss sustained by the owners of the Britannia, and the first intimation that I had of the said proceedings was in Feb. 1886, when I received a circular from a Mr. Schnitger, acting on behalf of the said Ward and Hobzapfel, informing me of the proceedings and of the liability incurred for costs, and requesting me to consent to pay a proportion of the same.

6. By my instructions my solicitors, Messrs. Dodds and Co., of Stockton-on-Tees, and their agents in London, gave written notice to Messrs. Stokes, Saunders, and Stokes, of 21, Great St. Helens, in the city of London, the solicitors for the said cargo-owners, that the said proceedings were the sole act of the said Messrs. Ward and Hobzapfel, that they were taken without the knowledge or sanction of me and of my co-owners, and were altogether ultra vires, and that I repudiated all liability in respect of the same, but nevertheless I am informed and believe that the said Messrs. Stokes, Saunders, and Stokes have, since the receipt of such notice, issued execution against me for 86*l*. or thereabouts, the whole amount of their said costs.

7. Under these circumstances I am advised and believe that the said Messrs. Ward and Hobzapfel had no authority to bind me to the payment of any part of the costs of the said legal proceedings and that I am entitled to have all proceedings under the said judgment obtained by the said cargo-owners stayed against me.

The terms of the motion were as follows:

Take notice that this honourable court will be moved on Tuesday, the 30th day of March 1886 instant, by counsel on behalf of George Butt Craig, one of the owners of the steamship Britannia, for an order that the name of the said George Butt Craig shall be struck out of the proceedings in this action, on the ground that the said name has been used as, or included amongst, the parties to this action without his authority, knowledge, or consent, and that the judgments or orders of the 11th day of Aug. 1885, and the 4th and 7th days of Nov. 1885 in this action, in so far as they condemn the said George Butt Craig in costs or otherwise affect him, may be set aside, and that the execution issued on the said judgments or orders, so far as they affect the said George Butt Craig, may be also set aside, and that all other proceedings in this action purporting to be by or against the said George Butt Craig may be set aside and dismissed, and that the cost of this application and all other costs occasioned to the said George Butt Craig by reason of his having been improperly joined as a party to these proceedings, be paid either by the owners of the cargo of the Britannia, or by the parties improperly joining him.

J. P. Aspinall in support of the motion.—The managing owner had no authority to claim in this action. If so, the costs incidental to those proceedings were incurred without authority, and my client is not liable to pay them. [BUTT, J.—Why, if he knew of these proceedings in February, did he not at once come to the court instead of waiting until now?] There has been no unreasonable delay. It is submitted that on the affidavit it is clear that the claim was instituted and carried on without my client's knowledge. It also appears that the managing owner had no general authority to take legal proceedings.

(a) Reported by J. P. ASPINALL and BUTLER ASPINALL, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

Finlay, Q.C. (with him Dr Stubbs) for the owners of cargo on the Britannia.—The case of Mudrig v. Newman (1 C. M. & R. 402) is in point, and fixes a litigant with costs, although the solicitor has instituted the proceedings without his authority or knowledge. [BUTT, J.—That was prior to judgment, and therefore no liability had been imposed. I think it would have been different if judgment had been given. You surely do not contend that, where a solicitor uses another man's name without his authority or knowledge to carry on an action, he is to pay the costs if the proceedings are unsuccessful?] The decision certainly seems to go as far as that. It no doubt is a hardship, as Parke, B. says, but there is a remedy against the solicitor. It is also submitted that, apart from authority, the affidavit is not sufficient. It does not show that Mr. Craig had no knowledge of the continuance of the proceedings, or what was the authority given to the managing owner to institute the original proceedings. Had the present proceedings proved successful, Mr. Craig would have reaped the benefit, and he should therefore bear the burden of their want of success.

Sir Walter Phillimore for the owners of the Britannia,

J. P. Aspinall, in reply, cited

Collins v. Johnson, 24 L. J. 231, C. P.

BUTT, J.—Before acceding to such an application as the present, where the applicant alleges that he was innocently and unwittingly made a party to proceedings of which he knew nothing, I ought to be satisfied that he really and truly not only was ignorant that proceedings had been instituted, but also that they were going on. I am not satisfied that that was so in this case. In the first place, before the present proceedings had been taken, an action had been instituted in the applicant's name in respect of the damages occasioned by the collision. I gather from the affidavit that he was aware of these proceedings, and that he authorised them. He, however, has not told us what authority he gave to the managing owner to take those proceedings, and I cannot help thinking that, if that authority had been produced, we should have seen that it extended to the legal proceedings now under discussion. It is also to be noticed that the affidavit abstains from stating that the applicant had no knowledge at all, in any shape or form, of the institution or the continuance of these proceedings. It seems to me to be a very carefully prepared affidavit, but it does not at all satisfy me that this gentleman may not have had some knowledge of what was going on. Then there is another matter, which to my mind is fatal. I refer to the delay in bringing the matter before the court, which is, I think, inexcusable. Taking the allegations most favourable to himself, he had information of these proceedings in February, and yet he lies by till now, and takes no steps to prevent these proceedings going on, whereas I think he ought to have come to the court at once. For these reasons I am of opinion that this application must be dismissed with costs.

THE ZOE. (a)

Limitation of liability—Collision—Loss of cargo—Admiralty stores—Prerogative of Crown—Merchant Shipping Act 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104), ss. 4, 504, 514—Admiralty Suits Act 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 78), s. 3.

Assuming that the Crown is not bound by the Merchant Shipping Acts, it may nevertheless under the provisions of the Admiralty Suits Act 1868, claim against the fund in a limitation of liability action in respect of the loss of Admiralty stores by collision.

Quære: Can the Crown, where a shipowner limits his liability, enforce any claim beyond the amount limited by the Merchant Shipping Acts?

In a limitation of liability action a claim may be brought in upon terms after the time fixed by the decree for bringing in claims has expired, provided the claimant has not been guilty of laches disentitling him to the indulgence.

THIS was a motion by the Crown in a limitation of liability action institution by the owners of the steamship Zoe for leave to come in and claim therein.

The action was instituted in respect of damages arising out of a collision between the Zoe and the Norwegian barque Dannebrog on 10th Feb. 1885, whereby both vessels, together with their cargoes, were lost. Amongst other goods on board the Zoe at the time of the collision were stores belonging to the Admiralty. The Zoe was found solely to blame for the collision. The present action was instituted on the 10th June 1885, and on the 21st July 1885 the plaintiffs obtained the usual decree limiting their liability, and directing all claims to be lodged in court on or before the 21st Oct. 1885. No claim was lodged in respect of the Admiralty stores within the time fixed by the decree. In an affidavit filed on behalf of the Crown, it is alleged that the Crown had been informed by the Admiralty shipping agents that legal proceedings had been dropped, that relying upon such information no steps had been taken to enforce the claim in respect of the Admiralty stores, and that it was only after the 21st Oct. 1885, viz., on the 19th March 1886, that they become aware of the real position of affairs. It appeared that the reference had been held, but that no money had been paid out of court.

In these circumstances notice of motion was given in the following form:

Take notice that this honourable court will be moved on Tuesday, the 6th day of April next, by Her Majesty's Attorney-General of counsel on behalf of the commissioners for executing the office of Lord High Admiral of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, that the said commissioners may be at liberty to come in and enter their claim in respect of loss or damage to goods and stores of the Crown caused by the improper navigation of the steam-vessel Zoe, on the occasion of the collision between that vessel and the barque or vessel Dannebrog, on the 10th Feb. 1885, notwithstanding that the time mentioned in the decree dated the 21st July 1885 has elapsed.

The following Acts of Parliament were referred to, and are material to the decision:—

(a) Reported by J. P. ASPINALL and BUTLER ASPINALL, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

Merchant Shipping Act 1854 (17 & 18 Vict c. 104).

Sect. 514. In cases where any liability has been or is alleged to have been incurred by any owner in respect of loss of life, personal injury, or loss of, or damage to ships, boats, or goods, and several claims are made or apprehended in respect of such liability, then . . . . it shall be lawful in England or Ireland for the High Court of Chancery, and in Scotland for the Court of Session, and in any British possession for any competent court, to entertain proceedings at the suit of any owner for the purpose of determining the amount of such liability subject as aforesaid, and for the distribution of such amount rateably amongst the several claimants, with power for any such court to stop all actions and suits pending in any other court in relation to the same subject-matter, and any proceeding entertained by such Court of Chancery or Court of Session or other competent court may be conducted in such manner and subject to such regulations as to making any persons interested parties to the same, and so to the exclusion of any claimants who do not come in within a certain time, and as to requiring security from the owner, and as to payment of costs, as the court thinks just.

The Admiralty Suits Acts 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 78).

Sect. 3. The Admiralty may institute any action, suit, or proceeding concerning naval or victualling stores, or other Her Majesty's stores, goods, or chattels under the charge or control of the Admiralty, or any stores, goods, or chattels sold or contracted to be delivered to or by the Admiralty for the use or on account of Her Majesty, or the price to be paid for the same, or any loss or injury of or to any such stores, goods, or chattels as aforesaid . . . . in like manner and form (as nearly as may be) as if the question in dispute were one between subject and subject.

The Attorney-General (Sir Charles Russell) and Staveley Hill, Q.C. (with them A. T. Lawrence) in support of the motion.—The Crown, although not bound by the Merchant Shipping Acts, wishes to avail itself of the provisions relating to actions for limitation of liability. The mere fact of its not being bound by an Act of Parliament does not prevent it availing itself of the rights and remedies given by the Act. While it is true that the time for lodging claims has elapsed, it is nevertheless submitted that, in the circumstances of this case, the Crown should be allowed to come in and claim, subject to terms. The fund has not yet been distributed, and, as in bankruptcy and the administration of estates claims can be brought in so long as there is even a portion of the fund left, the present claim should by analogy be allowed. In the case of Angell v. Haddon (1 Madd. 529) a creditor was allowed to prove his debt, though the fund had been apportioned amongst the creditors and transferred to the Accountant-General. Here there have been no laches. The Crown was justified, on the information given it, in acting as it did.

Sir Walter Phillimore (with him Dr. Stubbs) for various claimants, contra—The crown is not bound by the Merchant Shipping Acts. By sect. 514 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 the fund in a limitation action is appropriated to the claimants under the Act. As the Crown is not one of those claimants, and therefore a stranger to that fund, it ought not to be allowed to claim against it to the prejudice of other persons. That section gives the court power to stay all other actions, and, as one of the prerogatives of the Crown is to have process out of any court it pleases, the provisions of that section clearly make it inapplicable to the Crown. [BUTT, J.—It seems to me immaterial whether the Crown is bound or not, if it may avail itself of the rights and remedies given by the statute.] This fund was reserved by Act of Parliament for our claims, and therefore the Crown cannot to our prejudice rank against it. The Crown, not being bound by the Act, has other remedies. [BUTT, J.—I doubt if a shipowner's limit of liability is greater than 8*l.* per ton, even as against the Crown.] If the Crown is not bound, then its right to full damages cannot be curtailed by the Act:

Chitty on Prerogative, 383:

Ex parte Postmaster-General, 10 Ch. Div. 595.

Assuming the Crown to be entitled to claim in a limitation action, there is in this case evidence of such gross laches that, on the authority of Hall v. Falconer (11 Jnr. N. S. 151), the claim should not have been allowed, especially as the fund has been apportioned amongst the various claimants. The Crown was wrong to have relied upon information given by other persons, and ought to have informed itself of the real facts of the case.

Gorell Barnes (with him Hannen) for the owners of the Zoe.—The limit of the liability of the owners of the Zoe, even to the Crown, is fixed by the Merchant Shipping Acts, and hence the Crown has no right except against the fund in court. The Crown is bound by statutes that are for the public good; (Chitty on Prerogative, p. 333.) [BUTT, J.—All statutes presumably are for the public good.] The Acts allowing limitation of liability in their preambles describe their provisions as being for the public good and for the encouragement of commerce. The Crown can always take the benefit of an Act of Parliament, even though it is not named; (Coke's Reports, part vii., p. 32.)

Staveley Hill in reply.—The Admiralty Suits Act 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 78), s. 3, gives the Crown the right to institute an action, suit, or "proceeding" in respect of naval stores, as if the question in dispute were one between subject and subject. That being so, this is a "proceeding" within the meaning of that section, and therefore the Crown has a right to claim against the fund.

BUTT, J.—While I have some doubt whether the Crown is not bound in a limitation action to come in and take pro ratâ with the other claimants against the fund, it is not necessary to decide that point now. For, assuming it is not bound, it appears to me to be quite clear that it may elect to come in and share rateably in the fund if it so pleases. It does not at all follow that because the Crown is not bound by the Act it may not come in and claim its pro ratâ share of the fund, just as it may, though not bound by the Bankruptcy Act, claim a dividend. I should have been quite prepared to say that it might do that even apart from the provisions of the Admiralty Suits Act. It seems to me, however, that that Act of Parliament gives express power to the Crown to take such proceedings as these. That, therefore, settles the first point. Then it is said that the Crown has been guilty of such laches as to forfeit its right to put in a claim. There is no doubt that laches may deprive a claimant of the indulgence of being allowed to come in and claim after the proper time has expired. A case has been cited in which that course was followed, but it was a very different case to the present. I appears to me that, as the fund is still in court, if the claimant were a subject and not the Crown, it would under the circumstances be simply shocking to refuse to allow him to come in; and that being so, I do not mean to refuse this application of the Crown. While, however, I do not think there has been laches disentitling the Crown to come in and claim, I think there has been remissness on the part of the authorities, and therefore I am going to grant this application upon terms. I grant it upon this condition that the Crown pays all the costs occasioned by the claim not having been lodged within the proper time.

THE CREADON. (a)

Limitation of liability—Collision with two ships—Amount of liability—Separate acts of negligence—Merchant Shipping Act 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104), s. 506.

Where a ship comes into collision with two vessels one after the other, there being a short interval between the two collisions, the shipowner will be entitled to limit his liability to 8*l. per ton (there being no loss of life) if the first collision is the substantial and efficacious cause of the second, and there is no separate act of negligence on the part of those in charge of the plaintiffs' ship in respect of the second collision.*

THIS was an action of limitation of liability instituted on behalf of the owners of the steamship Creadon against the owners of the sailing ship Garston and against the owners of the sailing ship Asia in respect of collisions between the Creadon and the Garston and Asia on the 22nd Dec. 1884.

On the 22nd Dec. 1884 the Creadon, whilst on a voyage from Portsmouth to Roath Basin, Cardiff, came into collision first with the Garston and then with the Asia. In damage actions instituted by the owners of the Garston and the Asia against the Creadon, the owners of the Creadon admitted liability, and now sought to limit the amount of their liability in respect of both collisions to 8*l.* per ton on the registered tonnage of the Creadon, alleging that the collisions happened at one and the same time and occasion.

The defendants delivered separate defences denying that the collisions happened at one and the same time and occasion, and alleging that they occurred on distinct occasions and were caused by separate and distant acts of negligence on the part of those in charge of the Creadon.

The evidence on behalf of the plaintiffs was as follows: The collision happened about 10.15 p.m. in Cardiff Drain close to the pierhead, the first collision being with the Garston about a ship's length below the pierhead, the second collision being with the Asia about a ship's length inside the pierhead. The time between the two collisions was from one to two minutes, and the second collision was the inevitable result of the first.

(a) Reported by J. P. ASPINALL and BUTLER ASPINALL, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

The defendants' witnesses alleged that the two collisions took place at a distance of about a quarter of a mile from each other, and the interval between the two was from ten to fifteen minutes. They also alleged that the second collision was the result of a separate act of negligence on the part of the Creadon from that which caused the first collision, viz., attempting to cross the bows of the Asia under a port helm.

The findings on the facts are fully stated in the judgment.

The following Acts of Parliament were cited, and are material to the decision:—

The Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 63).

Sect. 54. The owners of any ship, whether British or foreign, shall not in cases where all or any of the following events occur without their actual fault or privity, that is to say:

(4.) Where any loss or damage is by reason of the improper navigation of such ship as aforesaid caused to any other ship or boat, or to any goods, merchandise, or other thing whatsoever on board any other ship or boat; be answerable in damages. . . . in respect of loss or damage to ships, goods, &c., to an aggregate amount exceeding 8*l.* for each ton of the ship's tonnage.

The Merchant Shipping Act 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104).

Sect. 506. The owner of every seagoing ship or share therein shall be liable in respect of every such loss of life, personal injury, loss of or damage to goods as aforesaid arising on distinct occasions to the same extent as if no other loss, injury, or damage had arisen.

Kennedy, Q.C. and Gorell Barnes for the plaintiffs.—The plaintiffs are entitled to limit their liability as for one collision. Sect. 506 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 speaks of the loss or damage happening on "distinct occasions." In the present case the collisions happened on practically one and the same occasion. [BUTT, J.—That section does not mention ships.] Still, the principle is the same. In the present case one act of negligence caused both collisions, and the second collision was the inevitable result of the first. The court has made the same decree in previous cases:

The Rajah, 1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 403; L. Rep. 3 A. & E. 539; 27 L. T. Rep. N. S. 102;
The Douglas, Shipping Gazette, July 27, 1882.

J. P. Aspinall for the owners of the Garston.—The onus is on the plaintiffs to establish not only that the two collisions did not happen on separate and distinct occasions, but also to show that the Creadon could not by any reasonable precautions have avoided the second collision. This they have failed to do; it being established beyond all doubt that there was a considerable distance and interval of time between the two collisions.

Sir Walter Phillimore (with him Pyke) for the owners of the Asia.—The case of The Rajah (ubi sup.) is distinguishable. In that case the Rajah ran into the ship William Davie and her tug at one and the same time. The collisions were therefore not on "distinct occasions." [BUTT, J.—Yes; that was a somewhat different case. There there were two collisions on one and the same occasion; here you say the collisions occurred on distinct occasions.] Yes, and therefore, while the Legislature may have intended to allow shipowners to limit their liability as for one collision where the two collisions occurred at practically one and the same time, it was never intended to be so where the two collisions happened on totally distinct occasions. Here not only was there a considerable interval of time and space between the two collisions, but it is submitted that on the evidence the plaintiffs were guilty of a separate act of negligence in respect of the second collision.

Kennedy, Q.C. in reply.

BUTT, J.—This is a case in which the owners of the steamship Creadon seek to limit their liability in respect of collisions between their vessel and two sailing ships, the Asia and the Garston, on the 22nd Dec. 1884. The collision occurred between 9 and 10 p.m., in Cardiff Drain. Two damage suits, one by the owners of the Asia, the other by the owners of the Garston, were instituted against the Creadon. In both of those suits the present plaintiffs admitted liability, and they now seek to limit the amount of that liability to 8*l*. per ton pursuant to the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Acts. The question is, were the two collisions the result of one act of negligence, or was the second collision occasioned by a distinct act of negligence on the part of the Creadon? In the former case the plaintiffs would be entitled to the relief asked for; in the latter they would not. This turns upon a question of fact, and there is unfortunately a considerable conflict of evidence as to what the real facts are. The view I have taken of the evidence—and I find that the Elder Brethren have come to the same conclusion—is, that the plaintiffs' witnesses have really and substantially told a true story when they represent the collisions as occurring very nearly at the same spot and within a very short time of each other. The evidence of one of their witnesses called Brown is to my mind well worthy of credit, and he not only says that the two collisions occurred within a very short distance of each other, but also that the second collision was inevitable after the first occurred. On the other hand I do not consider the defendants' evidence to be at all satisfactory. I do not believe that ten or fifteen minutes elapsed between the two collisions, or that they happened at any great distance apart. The story told by the pilot of the Asia that she altered some seven points under her port helm is one which I do not believe. On the whole, therefore, the conclusion to which I have come is that the collisions were so close together that the first was the substantial and efficacious cause of the second, and that there was no separate act of negligence on the part of those in charge of the Creadon in respect of the second collision. The result, therefore, is that the plaintiffs have a decree in the terms prayed for.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Feb. 1, 2, 4, and March 8, 1886.

(Before the LORD CHANCELLOR (Halsbury), and Lords BLACKBURN, WATSON, BRAMWELL and FITZGERALD.)

SEATH AND CO. v. MOORE. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM THE SECOND DIVISION OF THE COURT OF SESSION IN SCOTLAND.

Law of Scotland—Sale of goods—Delivery of ship's engine—Mercantile Law Amendment (Scotland) Act 1856 (19 & 20 Vict. c. 60), sect. 1—Bankruptcy of vendor.

By the law of Scotland the effect of the appropriation and acceptance of a specific chattel by the contracting parties is to perfect the contract of sale, and to give the purchaser a right to demand delivery, but the property in the chattel does not pass to him until he has obtained delivery under the contract; and sect. 1 of the Mercantile Law Amendment (Scotland) Act 1856 (19 & 20 Vict. c. 60) imposes no limitation upon the right of the vendor's creditors to attach goods in his custody until the contract of sale has been so perfected.

C. and Son, a firm of engineers, undertook by different contracts to supply and fit up engines in various ships which were being built by the appellants, who were shipbuilders, and advances were made by the appellants as the work progressed. An agreement was subsequently entered into between the parties by which it was stipulated that on payment being made on account of any contract, "the portions of the subjects thereof, so far as constructed, and all materials laid down" in C. and Son's yard "for the purpose of constructing the same, shall become and be held as the absolute property of" the appellants, "subject only to the lien of C. and Son" for the "payment of the price, or any balance thereof that may remain due." At the date of this agreement C. and Son were insolvent to the knowledge of the appellants, and the only considerable contracts they had on hand were the contracts with the appellants, which it was then known would result in a loss. It was important to the appellants that the contracts should be completed, and they continued to make advances to C. and Son until the most important contract was completed. After that C. and Son became bankrupt.

Held (affirming the judgment of the court below), that there had been no sale of any specific goods to the appellants within the meaning of sect. 1 of the Mercantile Law Amendment (Scotland) Act 1856, nor delivery of possession, and that the appellants were not entitled, as against the trustee in C. and Son's bankruptcy, to take possession of the materials to be used in carrying out their contracts, which were in C. and Son's yard at the date of their bankruptcy.

Simson v. Duncanson (Mor. Dict. 14,204) discussed.

THIS was an appeal from a decision of the Second Division of the Court of Session in Scotland (Lords Young, Craighill, and Rutherfurd-Clark) affirming a judgment of the Lord Ordinary (Lord Adam). The case is reported in 12 Ct. Sess. Cas. 4th series 260, and in 22 Scot. Law Rep. 192.

The facts of the case appear shortly from the head-note above, and in the judgments of their Lordships.

H. Davey, Q.C., C. S. Dickson and Greig (both of the Scotch Bar) appeared for the appellants, and admitted that their case must fail unless it could be brought within sect. 1 of the Mercantile Law Amendment (Scotland) Act 1856, which protects the rights of purchasers who have had goods appropriated to them, but have not taken delivery before the bankruptcy. The object of the Act, as stated in the preamble, was to assimilate Scotch and English law, and the evidence shows the terms on which the two firms dealt with each other, which, it is submitted, brings the case within the section. In addition to the authorities referred to in the judgments, they cited McBain v. Wallace, 6 App. Cas. 588; 45 L. T. Rep. N. S. 261.

C. Russell, Q.C., R. Vary Campbell (of the Scotch Bar) and McClymont, for the respondent, supported the judgment of the court below.

At the conclusion of the arguments their Lordships took time to consider their judgment.

March 8.—Their Lordships gave judgment as follows:—

Lord BLACKBURN.—My Lords: The pursuers Seath and Co. are shipbuilders, carrying on business at Glasgow and Rutherglen on the Clyde. The defender Moore is the trustee of the estate of A. Campbell and Son, who were sequestrated on the 12th May 1883. A. Campbell and Son up to the date of their sequestration carried on also at Rutherglen the business of engineers. Seath and Co. were not themselves engineers, and when either in order to complete a ship of their own, or in order to fulfil a contract which they had entered into with a third party, they required to have machinery made, they were in the habit of employing A. Campbell and Son to supply it. There does not appear, at least in any of the transactions now in question, to have been any privity of contract between A. Campbell and Son and the third parties with whom Seath and Co. had contracts. When it was known to both sides that Seath and Co. wanted the machinery to implement a contract with another, that would be important in considering what agreement should be made between Seath and Co. and A. Campbell and Son. But when the agreements were made they were between Seath and Co. and A. Campbell and Son. In no one of the five contracts now before the House were Seath and Co. to do any work to the machinery in A. Campbell and Son's yard. Their part was to pay money, and so far as concerned fitting the machinery into the ships, to have the ships ready at the required time. Seath and Co. advanced money in respect of the work in progress, and A. Campbell and Son did much work on machinery. On the sequestration the trustee took possession of a large number of articles which (if A. Campbell and Son had continued sui juris, and both parties carried out what they contemplated doing, Seath and Co. making the further payments they were to make, and A. Campbell and Son finishing the further work they were to execute) would have been delivered on the ships, and then ceased to be in any respect the property of A. Campbell and Son. The pursuers Seath and Co. claimed a right to have these articles delivered to them.

I think there is a separate question as to each article, that being what on the proof appears to have been the contract as respects that article, and also how far what was to be done to that article had been carried. As the transactions all took place in Scotland, the effect of the contracts and the acting of the parties (when it is ascertained what they were) on the rights of Seath and Co. and A. Campbell and Son in respect of any particular article must depend on the Scottish law. If a firm of shipbuilders and a firm of engineers had carried on business on the Tyne instead of on the Clyde, and entered into precisely similar arrangements, and done exactly similar things, so that the proof was exactly the same, I think the questions, what was the contract, and how far they had acted with respect to any particular article, would be identical with those in the present case. But what the effect would be on the rights of the two firms as to the property in that article would be a question of English law. The law of England does not differ from the civil law, and those laws founded on it, including the Scottish law, as to what is sufficient to pass the property in a movable chattel. A contract for a valuable consideration, by which it is agreed that the property in a specific ascertained article shall pass from one to another, is effectual according to the law of England to change the property. It may be that the party who has sold the article is entitled to retain possession till the price is paid, if that was by the contract to precede delivery, but still the property is changed. It is essential that the articles should be specific and ascertained in a manner binding on both parties, for unless that be so, it cannot be construed as a contract to pass the property in that article. And in general, if there are things remaining to be done by the seller to the article before it is in the state in which it is to be finally delivered to the purchaser, the contract will not be construed to be one to pass the property till those things are done. But it is competent to parties to agree for valuable consideration that a specific article shall be sold and become the property of the purchaser as soon as it has attained a certain stage, though if it is part of the bargain that more work shall be done on the article after it has reached that stage, it affords a strong primâ facie presumption against its being the intention of the parties that the property shall then pass. I do not examine the various English authorities cited during the argument. It is, I think, a question of the construction of the contract in each case at what stage the property shall pass, and a question of fact in each case whether that stage has been reached. As I understand the civil law, the property is not transferred without delivery, and consequently, unless there was an actual—or perhaps a constructive—delivery, the property remained the property of the seller, and his creditors might seize it. But though this was so, yet when things had gone so far as that, according to the true construction of the contract in each case there was perfecta emptio, there was a jus ad rem transferred to the purchaser, though as between the purchaser and the creditors of the vendor a complete property remained in the vendor; there was a property, though not a complete one, transferred to the purchaser, such that the risk of loss and the chance of gain were both transferred to the purchaser, so that the property remaining in the vendor was as between him and the purchaser not a complete property. The Scottish law, as I understand it, followed the civil law; though there was a perfect sale transferring the risk of loss and the chance of gain, and giving the purchaser an interest in the thing so as to enable him as against the vendor to enforce delivery, yet, unless there was a delivery, actual or perhaps conventional, the creditors of the vendor might seize the thing. An alteration was made in the law in this respect by the Mercantile Law Amendment Act 1856, "Where goods have been sold, but the same have not been delivered to the purchaser, and have been allowed to remain in the custody of the seller, it shall not be competent for any creditors of such seller after the date of such sale to attach such goods as belonging to the seller by any diligence or process of law, including sequestration, to the effect of preventing the purchaser or other in his right from enforcing delivery of the same." I do not think this enactment has the effect of saying that the property shall pass, but when a sale has proceeded so far that the purchaser has a right to enforce the delivery, it renders the distinction between the right of the purchaser and that of one to whom under the law of England the property had passed merely a nominal distinction not affecting the substantial rights. The Lord Ordinary in this case having heard all the proof has come to the conclusion that the pursuers have failed as to all the articles; he therefore assoilzied the defender. As to some, by a minute agreed to by the parties they have been given up, and so far there has been an alteration made in his interlocutor. There is no appeal as to that alteration, and we need not inquire what were the motives which led the parties to agree to that minute. Subject to that alteration the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary is adhered to. And it is against that interlocutor that this appeal is brought. I have come to the conclusion that the interlocutor is right, and that the appeal should be dismissed with costs.

I agree with the Lord Ordinary that no custom of trade is proved which could effect the construction of the five contracts. The first of the contracts, that of the 2nd Sept., was to furnish and to fit up in a vessel to be built by the pursuers an engine and boilers for a lump sum of 1800*l.*, and I am not sure how far the Lord Ordinary when he says that "the contract was not a contract of sale habile to convey a jus ad rem," means to express an opinion that because the contract was to complete and deliver the engine and boilers on board the vessel of the pursuers, and then to fit them up there, which fitting up I think would be aptly described as work and labour, the furnishing of the boilers and engine could not under any circumstances be a sale of them. I should pause before I agreed to that, but I think it quite sufficient to say that primâ facie there was no sale at least till the boilers and engine were so far completed as to be fit for delivery on the vessel, where they were to be fitted up by A. Campbell and Son, and that there is nothing in the contract to indicate any intention that they should be held as sold at any earlier stage, whilst the fact that there was to be one lump price for the whole engine, boilers, and fitting up is strongly against that construction. The second contract, that relating to the Brighton, does contain a stipulation that "the first parties shall pay to the second parties the sum of 6300*l.* for the said engines, boilers, machinery, and appurtenances, and that by four equal instalments, as follows, viz., "the first when cylinders, sole-plates, and condensers are cast; the second when the machinery is tooled and boilers ready for riveting; the third when the engine, boilers, and machinery are all ready alongside for lifting on board; and the fourth when all completed and tried to the satisfaction of the owners and ready for delivery." I do not think it necessary to inquire whether, if the question had arisen as to the rights of the pursuers after the first three instalments had been earned and paid, this would or would not be sufficient to establish that the engines and boilers so far completed were then sold; for as I understand the case the boilers and engines were before the sequestration, as far as completed, completely delivered, and all that the defender seized were some loose articles in the yard of the sequestrated trader, which probably were intended to be part of the boilers and engines but never had become so. The third contract does stipulate for a payment of one-third of the price "when the boiler is on board," but it never reached the state when it could be put on board. The fourth contract contains no stipulation as to an instalment at all. I agree with the Lord Ordinary that if the reasoning as to the first contract is right it applies also to these contracts. The fifth and last contract—that relating to the Bonnie Princess—was rather peculiar. The Liverpool and Welsh Coast Company had agreed to pay Seath and Co. 1500*l.* after "receiving a report by two competent engineers stating that the machinery is working satisfactorily." The agreement between Seath and Co. and A. Campbell and Son was: "First, that the second party," A. Campbell and Son "shall execute the work, and undertake and implement the whole obligations undertaken by and imposed upon the first party," T. B. Seath and Co., "by the said agreement in all respects, excepting only the requisite alterations to the bunkers and others coming within the shipbuilders' department (which the first party shall execute at their own expense), and the first party shall be entitled to enforce implement of the said agreement against the said second party. Second, that the second party shall receive payment of the whole sum stipulated to be paid by the company under said agreement on the conditions therein stated but the first party shall have a lien thereon for any sum which may be due by the second party to them. Third, that the second party shall free and relieve the first party of all claims which may arise or be made against them by the said company in respect of alleged breach of the said agreement, as well as of the original contract, so far as the same has been or may be occasioned by their default." The articles in question never were put on board the steamer, and still less were the conditions on which alone the Liverpool and Llandudno Company were to pay the 1500*l.* fulfilled. It seems impossible to construe this contract as amounting to a sale of any of the articles under this contract. I am much inclined to think that where a contract made in Scotland was such, and had been so far executed, that if a precisely similar contract made and so far executed between two firms on the Tyne would have been construed to amount to a sale passing the property, that contract in Scotland ought to be construed as giving a jus ad rem against that article. Perhaps that may not be always so. But I am of opinion that if the whole of these transactions had been English there would not in respect of any one of the articles have been established a contract such as under the circumstances to pass the property. As for the agreement of the 1st Dec. 1882, I think it is not an agreement for a sale at all, but an attempt to bargain for a pledge or security. A pledge or security without delivery of possession is, I think, not good. And though in England a bill of sale under seal having that effect may be made, this is not a bill of sale.

Lord WATSON.—My Lords: The respondent Alexander Moore is trustee for the creditors of A. Campbell, junior, who carried on business as a manufacturing engineer in Glasgow, under the firm name of A. Campbell and Son, until his estates were sequestrated on the 12th May 1883. For many years prior to his sequestration the bankrupt was largely employed by the appellants, who are shipbuilders at Glasgow and Rutherglen, to make and fit up engines and machinery in vessels constructed by them either under contract or on speculation, and that employment constituted the main part of the bankrupt's trade, his other business consisting chiefly of job-work and repairs. At the date of his sequestration the bankrupt was in course of executing five different contracts with the appellants—the first of these, dated Sept. 1881, for furnishing tandem machinery to the Elms; the second, dated March 1882, for supplying and fitting engines for the Brighton; the third, dated Aug. 1882, for constructing and fitting a new boiler on board the Satanella; the fourth, dated Sept. 1882, for making and fitting two tandem-engines on board a barge belonging to the Trinity Board; and the fifth, for removing her boilers from the steamer Bonnie Princess, and replacing them with two upright boilers, and making certain alterations in the details of her machinery and engines. Of these five vessels, one only, the Elms, was built by the appellants on their own account, whilst the Brighton, the Satanella, and the Trinity barge were built for customers. The Bonnie Princess had been delivered to the purchaser with her hull and engines completed, but she did not attain the guaranteed speed, and was returned to the appellants in order that her machinery, which had been supplied by the bankrupt, should be altered and repaired. The bankrupt on the 1st Dec. 1882 undertook to make these alterations and repairs "to the satisfaction of an engineer to be appointed by the shipowners." In the contract for the Brighton's engines it was expressly stipulated that the price (6300*l.*) was to be payable to the bankrupt by four equal instalments at specified stages, but none of the other four contracts contained a written stipulation to the effect that any part of the price was to be paid before his contract obligations had been fully performed by the bankrupt. It is a fact established by the evidence that the appellants through the whole course of their dealings with the bankrupt were in use to make advances to him from time to time to account of the contract price, even in cases where there was no stipulation as to instalments. These advances were not made in virtue of any legal obligation, and their amount was determined by the appellants with reference to their general knowledge of the progress which the bankrupt had made towards completion of the contract work, or in the preparation of materials for it, and without inspection or express acceptance of any part of the work as conform to contract. In the month of Nov. 1882 the bankrupt became seriously embarrassed for want of ready money. The contracts which he had then on hand related to the first four of the vessels already mentioned, and he was aware, and informed the appellants, that he would be obliged to stop his works and suspend payment unless he received pecuniary assistance from them. The appellants agreed verbally to make him advances from time to time to account of the contract prices (the amount of such advances being left to their discretion) in respect of his granting to them a letter of agreement or obligation, which bears date the 1st Dec. 1882. The only consideration expressed in that writing is, that he had entered into contracts with the appellants "in some cases without certain stipulations being expressed with reference thereto." The first article of the writing provides that the appellants shall at all times have free access to the bankrupt's premises for the purpose of inspection, and that the "whole work and material of any such contract shall be subject to the approval of the said T. B. Seath and Co., or of their representatives." The second article is to the effect that on a payment being made on account of any contract, "the portions of the subject thereof, so far as constructed, and all materials laid down for the purpose of constructing the same, should become and be held as being the absolute property of the said T. B. Seath and Co." subject only to the bankrupt's lien for so much of the price as might be unpaid. By the third article the appellants are empowered, upon the insolvency of the bankrupt, or his failure to proceed with due diligence in the execution of the work, not only to take possession of the completed work, and "all materials laid down or obtained for the construction thereof," but to enter, if they shall think proper, into possession of his premises and use his plant, tools, and machinery for the completion of the work. By the fourth article the bankrupt undertakes the risk of all contract work until completed and delivered, and also undertakes to effect adequate insurances against loss by fire in the name of the appellants. These conditions are declared to be applicable to all contracts or agreements then current, or which might thereafter be made between the parties. The only contract subsequently made was that relating to alterations and repairs in the machinery of the Bonnie Princess. At the date of the sequestration none of the five contracts in question had been completed, and no machinery had been placed on board ship except in the case of the Brighton. The fittings of her engines was nearly completed, but certain parts of the machinery, some of them unfinished, had not been put on board or fitted. The trustee took possession, for behoof of the general body of creditors, of the uncompleted work and materials which he found on the bankrupt's premises, which had either been used or were intended to be used in the execution of these contracts. The appellants on the 30th June 1883 instituted the action in which this appeal is taken, concluding for delivery to them of the whole of such work and materials. The articles claimed, which I shall afterwards have to refer to more particularly, are enumerated in the conclusions of the summons, and also in certain inventories, and they are generally described in the summons as being "connected with the fulfilment" of one or other of the five contracts already referred to. The Lord Ordinary (Adam) rejected the appellants' claim, and by interlocutor dated the 8th April 1884 assoilzied the respondent, with expenses. The appellants reclaimed to the Second Division of the Court, but before judgment the parties lodged a joint minute setting forth that the respondent Moore consented to its being found and declared that, as in a question with him or the bankrupt, the appellants were entitled to possession of the last three items of the first inventory, and also of the articles forming branch 2 of the third, and branch 2 of the fifth inventory. By interlocutor dated the 9th Dec. 1884 their Lordships found and declared in terms of the minute, and to that extent altered the judgment of the Lord Ordinary, but quoad ultra refused the reclaiming note, adhered to the interlocutor reclaimed against, and found the respondent entitled to additional expenses.

The appellants maintained that by the law of Scotland the work executed under each contract, so far as then completed, vested in them, and became their property whenever they made payment of an instalment or an advance to account of the price such as they considered fairly proportionate to its value. That proposition was founded upon the case of Simson v. Duncanson (Mor. Dict. 14,204). The decision in that case does not, in any view of it, go so far as to support the claim preferred by the appellants to the property of articles, finished or unfinished, merely intended for use in the construction of a vessel, but not yet made part of the thing sold. Nor, in my opinion, can it be held as authority for the general proposition that in the circumstances narrated in the report the property of that part of an unfinished ship which has actually been constructed passes to the purchaser without delivery. The report of the case as collected by Morison, and supplemented by Professor Bell (Commentaries 5th edit., vol. i., p. 157), is exceedingly meagre, and there may have been circumstances before the court sufficient to warrant the inference that delivery had been made, which had not been noticed by the reporter. At the time when Simson v. Duncanson was decided, and for many years afterwards, the purchaser of a vessel, or of any other corporeal movable, had, before delivery was made to him and its property vested in him, no right to the thing sold as against creditors of the seller who had used diligence, or against the trustee in his sequestration. Until possession was given to the purchaser the trustee had the option either of enforcing the contract against him, or of taking the thing sold, leaving the purchaser to rank for a dividend upon the amount of loss he sustained by non-fulfilment of the contract. By the law of England the appropriation of a specific chattel by the vendor, and the agreement of the vendee to take that specific chattel and pay the stipulated price, have the effect of vesting the property of the chattel in the vendee. In Scotland the effect of such an appropriation and acceptance by the contracting parties is to perfect the contract of sale, and to give the purchaser a personal right to demand delivery of the specific chattel from the seller. When the contract is thus perfected the risk is transferred to the purchaser, according to the maxim of the civil law, periculum rei venditæ nondum traditæ est emptoris, but the property of the chattel does not pass to him until he has obtained delivery under the contract. In the year 1856 the Mercantile Law Amendment (Scotland) Act was passed for the purpose of remedying the inconvenience arising from certain differences between the laws of England and the sister country. Sect. 1 of that Act provides that, "where goods have been sold, but the same have not been delivered to the purchaser, and have been allowed to remain in the custody of the seller, it shall not be competent for any creditor of such seller, after the date of such sale, to attach such goods as belonging to the seller by any diligence or process of law, including sequestration, to the effect of preventing the purchaser or others in his right from enforcing delivery of the same, and the right of the purchaser to demand delivery of such goods shall from and after the date of such sale be attachable by or transferable to the creditors of the purchaser." These enactments involve no alteration of the principles previously applicable to the contract of sale itself. Their sole effect is to deprive the creditors of the seller or the trustee in his bankruptcy of the right, which they previously had, to defeat the purchaser's right to demand delivery of the goods sold to him. In construing the first section of the Act it has all along been held, and in my opinion rightly held, in the courts of Scotland that it imposes no limitation upon the right of the seller's creditors or trustee until the contract of sale has been perfected in the sense which I have already indicated—in other words, that goods are not "sold" within the meaning of the section unless the contract has been so far completed as to confer a proper jus ad rem upon the purchaser. The appellants maintain that under these provisions of the Mercantile Law Amendment Act they are entitled to demand delivery from the trustees of all the articles enumerated in their summons. In order to establish that right with regard to all or any of the articles in dispute it must be shown that these had before the sequestration been "sold" to them by the bankrupt within the meaning of the Act. The authorities which appear to me to have the most material bearing upon this part of the case are Woods v. Russell (5 B. & Ald. 942); Clarke v. Spence (4 Ad. & El. 448); and Wood v. Bell (5 E. & B. 772; 6 E. & B. 355.) It is true that these are English decisions relating to ships in course of construction, and that in the present case none of the machinery or articles in dispute had been attached to the vessels of which they were severally intended to form part. But I see no reason why the principles applicable to the sale of part of a ship should not equally apply to the sale of part of a marine engine, or other corpus manufactum, in course of construction. And so far as I understand the laws of the two countries, the same circumstances and considerations which in England sustain the inference that a chattel has been "sold" to the effect of passing its property to the vendee, will in Scotland generally be sufficient to sustain the inference that it has been "sold" to the effect of transferring the risk to the purchaser, and giving him a jus ad rem enforceable against creditors of the seller under the Act of 1856. The English decisions to which I have referred, appear to me to establish the principle that where it appears to be the intention, or in other words the agreement, of the parties to a contract for building a ship, that at a particular stage of its construction the vessel, so far as then finished, shall be appropriated to the contract of sale, the property in the vessel, as soon as it has reached that stage of completion will pass to the purchaser, and subsequent additions made to the chattel thus vested in the purchaser will, accessione, become his property. It also appears to me to be the result of these decisions that such an intention or agreement ought (in the absence of any circumstances pointing to a different conclusion) to be inferred from a provision in the contract to the effect that an instalment of the price shall be paid at a particular stage, coupled with the fact that the instalment has been duly paid, and that until the vessel reached that stage the execution of the work was regularly inspected by the purchaser or someone on his behalf. I do not think it is indispensable in order to sustain that inference that there shall be a stipulation for payment of an instalment in the original contract, or that the stipulated instalment shall have been actually paid. The absence of these considerations, which are in themselves of great importance, might, in my opinion, be supplied by other circumstances. At all events, whenever during the currency of a contract which contains no such stipulation, the parties in good faith agree that the purchaser shall pay a sum to account of the price, and that the vessel so far as constructed at the date of that payment shall be appropriated to the contract, I see no reason to doubt that the new covenant so made ought to have the same effect as if it had been a term of the original contract. I am, however, of opinion that by the law of England, in order to pass the property as sold, there must always be facts proved or admitted sufficient to warrant the inference that the purchaser has agreed to accept the corpus so far as completed as in part implement of the contract of sale.

There is another principle which appears to me to be deducible from these authorities, and to be in itself sound, and that is, that materials provided by the builder, and portions of the fabric, whether wholly or partially finished, although intended to be used in the execution of the contract, cannot be regarded as appropriated to the contract or as "sold" unless they have been affixed to or in a reasonable sense made part of the corpus. That appears to me to have been matter of direct decision by the Court of Exchequer Chamber in Wood v. Bell. In Woods v. Russell (5 B. & Ald. 942), the property of a rudder and some cordage which the builder had bought for the ship was held to have passed in property to the purchaser as an accessory of the vessel, but that decision was questioned by Jervis, C.J., delivering the judgment of the court in Wood v. Bell, who stated the real question to be, "what is the ship, not what is meant for the ship," and that only those things can pass with the ship "which have been fitted to the ship, and have once formed part of her, although afterwards removed for convenience." I assent to that rule, which appears to me to be in accordance with the decision of the court of Exchequer in Tripp v. Armitage (4 M. & W. 687). I shall now advert to the character of the articles claimed by the appellants, as these are enumerated in the summons, and more fully described in the inventories, which I have carefully examined. The result of that examination has been to satisfy me that with the exception of one item (a tandem engine said to be almost complete) in the inventory relating to the Elms, two items in that relating to the Satanella, three items in that relating to the Trinity, and of two items in that relating to the Bonnie Princess, all the articles claimed, though meant to be used in the execution of the five contracts current at the date of the sequestration, are mere disjecta membra more or less finished, which have never been attached to or become part of any specific corpus. It appears to me to be impossible to hold that any of these articles were specially appropriated to the several contracts for which they were provided, or, in other words, that they were "sold" in such sense as to give the appellants a jus ad rem, unless your Lordships shall be of opinion that the decisions of the Court of Exchequer in Tripp v. Armitage, and of the Exchequer Chamber in Wood v. Bell, are contrary to law. With regard to the excepted items, the descriptions given of them are not so minute as to enable me to determine whether all that is comprehended in each item, and in some instances whether any part of the item, can be reasonably considered as a corpus, in the same sense as the framework or hull of a ship in course of construction. Before dealing with the question, whether, assuming them to be of a character which admitted of their being appropriated to the purchasers, these excepted items were actually "sold" to the appellants to the effect of giving them a jus ad rem, I think it will be convenient to consider the legal effect of the letter of agreement by the bankrupt dated the 1st Dec. 1882. Although the letter professes to embody certain stipulations which have been omitted in framing his contracts with the appellants, the leading conditions to which the bankrupt thereby submits are, in my opinion entirely collateral to the contract of sale. The plainly expressed purpose of the letter was to vest the appellants with the absolute property, not only in the subject of each contract so far as actually constructed, but in all materials brought to the bankrupt's premises in order to be used in its construction, probably with the view of giving the appellants security for advances made by them to account of price. I need hardly say that by the law of Scotland the property in corporeal movables cannot be passed without delivery of possession, and a stipulation in a contract of sale that the thing sold should become the property of the purchaser without delivery is as invalid against the creditors of the seller as it would be in any other contract. In Anderson M'Call (4 Sess. Cas., 3rd Series 771, Lord Neaves said: "The law of Scotland is clear that no property in movables can be passed without delivery, and that no security can be constituted over movables retenta possessione. A written instrument of possession will not pass the property of movables. . . . The fundamental principle is that the right of property in moveables does not pass by consensual contract." The appellants' counsel hardly disputed that such is the law of Scotland, and that there was no delivery to the appellants of any of the articles claimed by them, but they argued that the letter indicated the intention of the parties that upon an advance being made on account of any contract, the articles constructed and provided for its execution should be "sold" under the contract. I am unable to infer that intention from the tenour of the writing. On the contrary, its terms appear to me clearly to indicate that their intention was to give the appellants a right of property in all materials collected, and all parts of machinery finished or unfinished with a view to the contract, as well as the machinery so far as set up and connected, and that quite irrespective of any obligation on the part of the bankrupt to use such materials in the execution of the contract, or of any obligation on the part of the appellants to accept the property to be thus vested in them, or any portion of it, as in implement of the contract.

It was urged for the respondent at your Lordships' bar as well as in the court below, that in the circumstances disclosed in evidence the letter of the 1st Dec. 1882 was void in law, in respect that it conferred upon the appellants an undue preference over the general creditors of the bankrupt. Had the law of Scotland permitted the document to receive effect according to its terms it might have been necessary to decide that point, but if the views which I have expressed in regard to its import and legal effect meet with your Lordships' approval it becomes unnecessary to dispose of it. It only remains for consideration whether the excepted items already referred to, connected with the Elms, Satanella, Trinity barge, and Bonnie Princess contracts were sold to the appellants within the meaning of the Mercantile Law Amendment (Scotland) Act. I assume that each of these items was in reality a specific corpus capable of being appropriated to the contract, in part implement of which it had been constructed at the time when an instalment or advance to account of the contract price was actually paid. In the case of each of these contracts one or more of such payments had been made before the date of the sequestration, and although they were not originally stipulated, I should nevertheless be of opinion that the appellants had acquired a personal right to insist on delivery if it appeared that either at the time when such payments were made in respect of a particular contract, or at the time when they were appropriated by mutual consent to that contract, the parties intended and agreed that the contract work so far as then completed and existing in forma specifica should be "sold" to the purchaser. But in order to constitute an agreement to that effect it must appear that the purchaser consented to accept the subject in the same condition in which it then was as part of the completed subject, which was to be subsequently delivered to him by the seller under the contract of sale. I have come to the conclusion that the appellant's claim to the excepted items must fail, because I cannot find in the case of any one of them the least trace of an agreement or of an intention on their part to accept it as in implement of the contract of sale. Had they inspected the work and material as the purchasers had done in Clarke v. Spence and Wood v. Bell, there would have been room for the inference that they had accepted as in terms of the contract the work so far as completed and inspected, and that the bankrupt had no longer the right to alter or reconstruct any part of it, thereby necessitating a second inspection. Mr. Seath, one of the partners of the appellant company, was from time to time in the bankrupt's premises, and had a general knowledge of the progress made in the work of each contract and in preparing materials for its execution, but it is not pretended that there was inspection either by him or any other person representing the appellants. There is in fact not a single circumstance, either admitted or established in evidence, sufficient to support the inference that they meant to accept or did accept the work executed as in implement pro tanto of the contract, whilst there are many circumstances which lead to an opposite conclusion. I am accordingly of opinion that the interlocutors appealed from ought to be affirmed and the appeal dismissed with costs.

Lord BRAMWELL.—My Lords: I agree in the conclusions of my noble and learned friends, and in the reasons which have led them to those conclusions. All I wish to say is that our opinions do not in any way impugn the principle of Woods v. Russell except as to the chattels there mentioned—the rudder, and I think some rope; and I may repeat what Mellish, L.J. said, that I should be very sorry if anything we said did so or seemed to do so. Nor do our opinions in any way impugn the reasons given in that case for that decision. I also agree that the same reasoning would apply to any other chattel as to which the parties should agree that the property should pass while the chattel was in an incomplete state.

COURT OF APPEAL.

Wednesday, Feb. 3, 1886.

Before Lord Esher, M.R., Lindley and Lopes, L.JJ.)

Huth and Co. v. Lamport and another.

Gibbs and Son v. Lamport and another. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION.

General average—Security for payment—Form of bond—Deposit.

When there has been a general average loss incurred, and the contributions have not been ascertained, the shipowner is not entitled to make delivery of the cargo conditional upon the consignees signing an average bond in the form known as the Liverpool average bond, and making a deposit of 10 per cent. on the estimated value of their goods in the joint names, as provided by the bond, of the defendants and their average adjuster, or in the names of the defendants alone, or in the name of the average adjuster alone. A bond in such a form is unreasonable.

Semble, the above decision does not interfere with the right of the master to retain the goods until payment of general average or to require security in a reasonable form.

Judgment of Mathew and Smith, JJ. affirmed.

This was an appeal by the defendants from the judgment of Mathew and Smith, JJ., reported 54 L. T. Rep. N. S. 334; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 543; 16 Q. B. Div. 442, where the facts are fully stated.

Finlay, Q.C. and W. R. Kennedy, Q.C. (Box with them) for the defendants.—It is clear the defendants, as shipowners, had a lien on the cargo for the amount of general average contribution payable by the plaintiffs. The terms on which such lien was to be given up were matter of arrangement between the parties, and the defendants were entitled to insist on any security which they might think necessary; the question of reasonableness does not arise. The bond referred to in the special case has long been in use at the port of Liverpool, and its terms are reasonable. They cited Cohen, Q.C. (Warr and Barnes with him), for the plaintiffs, was stopped by the Court.

Lord Esher, M.R.—I am of opinion that the decision of the court below ought to be affirmed. The defendants' ship arrived at Liverpool, after a voyage, during which a general average loss had occurred. It is clear that the plaintiffs, as owners of part of the cargo, were liable to contribute to this general average loss, and it is equally clear that the defendants, as shipowners, had a lien on the cargo to secure payment of the general average contributions, and were entitled to refuse to deliver goods to a consignee of the cargo until they were paid; they were not bound to accept security, but were entitled to demand immediate payment. It follows therefore that each consignee must pay the amount demanded by the shipowner for general average, or must at his own risk tender what he believes to be his proper proportion. The master will not have a right to insist upon payment of an arbitrary sum without furnishing the necessary account or particulars, so as to enable the owner of the goods to ascertain how the amount became due. If the master were to refuse to furnish such particulars, the case would come within the rule laid down by Dr. Lushington in The Norway (Br. & Lush. 377), and the consignee would not be prejudiced by not having made a sufficient tender. But if the master gives all proper information and demands payment the owner of cargo cannot insist upon paying the amount into a bank in the name of persons other than the shipowner, but must either pay the amount demanded, or tender such an amount as he believes to be reasonable. If, however, the shipowner were to let it be known that, whatever might be the amount tendered by the consignees, nothing but a particular security would be accepted, then the question would arise whether the security demanded was reasonable. If a deposit of 10 per cent. on the value of the goods were demanded, this as a general rule would be wholly unreasonable.

We must consider whether in the present case the demand is unreasonable, having regard to the other conditions. The bond requires that the deposit shall be made in the joint names of the defendants and their average adjuster, and the use of the word "their" clearly points to an average adjuster appointed by the defendants. Then the shipowner is to have power to draw upon the deposit from time to time for his disbursements and this would include all disbursements and payments which in the result the shipowner would have to pay for himself. Let us apply this provision to the case of salvage. The ship is in distress, and is succoured by salvors; the master makes a compromise with them for the payment of a large sum, and it may turn out upon the final settlement that a large part of the salvage will fall on the shipowner; yet by the terms of the bond the master is to be at liberty to take the whole amount of the salvage out of the deposit, and the only security which the cargo owner would have for the repayment of what ought to be returned would be the credit of the shipowner. This, in my opinion, is wholly unreasonable. If the shipowner requires the consignee of the goods to enter into a bond in particular terms, the question arises whether the bond is reasonable or unreasonable, and if part of what is insisted upon is unreasonable the whole instrument is unreasonable. That the bond insisted on in the present case is unreasonable is, I think, clear. First, it makes the shipowner's own average adjuster an arbitrator; then there is a particular kind of appeal from the decision of an average adjuster, which prevents the parties from taking the opinion of a legal tribunal; further, the terms of the deposit are unreasonable, inasmuch as the deposit is to be made in the joint names of the representative of the shipowner and the average adjuster. Then the average adjuster of the shipowner is to be the judge, and what purports to be a deposit is to be drawn upon for such disbursements as the average adjuster and the representative of the shipowner, without the consent of the depositor, think ought to be paid to the shipowner. For these different reasons I have come to the conclusion that the bond is one which the Liverpool shipowners have no right to impose upon the owners of cargo. The case does not enable us to compare this form of bond with the form called the London bond, and I therefore give no opinion as to whether the London bond is reasonable or not.

Lindley, L.J.—I cannot differ from the decision of the court below on this special case. The right of the master to refuse delivery of goods unless he is paid the consignee's share of general average is clear up to a certain point. If the amount due is paid or tendered the master cannot refuse delivery. It is unnecessary in the present case to say whether he can refuse if reasonable security is offered. But if no question of payment or tender is raised, and if he himself requires security, he cannot impose unreasonable terms. The question here is, whether the defendants are entitled to insist upon the consignees doing one of two things, namely, making the deposit as described in the case, or in the alternative signing the Liverpool bond. As to the first alternative, it appears that the object of the deposit is to give the master control of the money for the benefit of the shipowner. I cannot think that this is reasonable. As to the second, I agree with the Master of the Rolls that the bond is not one which can be imposed upon a consignee against his will.

Lopes, L.J.—I quite agree with the decision of the other members of the court. I think the terms of the Liverpool bond are unreasonable for the reasons which have been given by the Master of the Rolls.

The Ardandhu. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM SIR JAMES HANNAN.

Collision—Actions by shipowners and cargo owners—Agreement to discontinue—Limitation of liability action—Claimants therein—R. S. C., Order XXVI., r. 1.

Owners of ship and owners of cargo laden on board of her respectively instituted actions in rem against another ship for damage by collision. In the ship action the following agreement was signed by the parties: "We hereby consent to this action being discontinued without costs on the ground of inevitable accident," and the registrar made an order thereon discontinuing the action. In the cargo action both ships were held to blame, and the defendants therein obtained a decree limiting their liability. The plaintiffs in the ship action then obtained an order from the judge rescinding the order of discontinuance, and claimed against the fund in the limitation action.

Held that the agreement and consent order amounted to a mere discontinuance of the action, and not to a release of all rights possessed by the parties thereto against each other, and that therefore the plaintiffs in the ship action were entitled to claim against the fund.

(a) Reported by J. P. Aspinall and Butler Aspinall, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

This was an appeal from a decision of Sir James Hannen on a motion in an action for limitation of liability.

A collision occurred between the steamships Ardandhu and Kronprinz on the 1st March 1883, whereby the Kronprinz and the cargo laden on board of her were utterly lost.

On 6th March 1883 a damage action in rem was instituted by the owners of the Kronprinz against the Ardandhu, but before any pleadings were delivered this action was discontinued by the consent of the parties thereto. The agreement by which this action was discontinued was in writing, dated the 1st May 1883, and was as follows:

> We, Lowless and Co., for the defendants hereby consent to this action being discontinued without costs, on the ground of inevitable accident.

This agreement was left in the Admiralty Registry, and signed by the assistant registrar, who indorsed upon it the word "fiat." This agreement was embodied in a consent order of court, dated the 2nd May 1883, which was as follows:

> Upon consent of both solicitors it is ordered that this action be discontinued without costs on the ground of inevitable accident.

On the 25th June 1883 another action in rem was instituted against the Ardandhu by the owners of cargo laden on board the Kronprinz, in which action both ships were on the 18th Dec. 1884 held to blame for the collision.

On the 29th June 1885 the owners of the Ardandhu instituted an action to limit their liability, and on the 24th March 1885 the Court pronounced the plaintiffs therein entitled to limit their liability, and referred the claims to the registrar to report on.

The owners of the Kronprinz then took out a summons to have the consent order of discontinuance rescinded, and on the 30th June 1885 Butt, J. made the following order: "Upon hearing counsel for the plaintiffs and solicitors for the defendants it is ordered that the order of court of the 2nd May 1883 be rescinded, and that the plaintiffs do pay all the costs occasioned by such order having been made." At the reference in the limitation action the owners of the Kronprinz brought in a claim amounting to 29,679*l.* From the registrar's report it appeared that the owners of the Ardandhu counter-claimed 5148*l.* At the reference the claim of the owners of the Kronprinz was opposed by the other claimants, but was admitted by the registrar. In this he was upheld by Sir James Hannen (54 L. T. Rep. N. S. 468), and from that decision the owners of the cargo laden on board the Kronprinz now appealed.

Sir Walter Phillimore and Dr. Stubbs, for the owners of cargo, in support of the appeal.—The owners of the Kronprinz are precluded from claiming against the fund in court by reason of the agreement come to between themselves and the owners of the Ardandhu. It is submitted that that agreement amounted to more than a mere discontinuance, and was in fact a compromise withdrawing all claims which the parties thereto had against each other. From the registrar's report it appears that the owners of the Ardandhu had a substantial counter-claim against the Kronprinz. That being so, the true meaning of the agreement was to determine the rights of these parties against each other, and therefore they cannot now go back from it so as to injure third parties. The fact that the parties entered into a solemn agreement, that it was filed, and that a consent order was drawn up, shows that something more than a mere discontinuance was meant. It is said that the words "inevitable accident" were inserted to relieve the plaintiffs from payment of costs; but the costs must have been trifling, as no pleadings had been delivered, and it is therefore submitted that, as the plaintiffs were wealthy persons, this could not have been the true reason. Assuming the agreement to have been filed, it then becomes, by reason of Order LII., r. 23, an order of court, and on the authority of The Bellcairn (53 L. T. Rep. N. S. 686; 10 P. Div. 161; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 503) it cannot be set aside so as to affect the rights of third parties.

Gorell Barnes for the respondents, the owners of the Kronprinz.—The owners of cargo are seeking to avail themselves of the mistake of my clients in originally thinking the collision was due to inevitable accident, to get an unfair advantage over them. At the time the agreement was entered into the parties thought the collision was an inevitable accident. It has, however, proved otherwise, and therefore my clients are entitled to claim against the fund in court, unless they have done anything to bar that right. All that they have done is to discontinue the original damage action, but they, by discontinuing that action, have not precluded themselves from claiming in other proceedings. By the provisions of Order XXVI., r. 1, it was necessary, in order to avoid payment of costs, to state that the collision was due to inevitable accident. The agreement cannot be construed as a compromise of all rights, as it certainly would be no defence to an action by the owners of the Ardandhu against the Kronprinz. If there was a mere discontinuance and nothing more, that has been properly set aside by the judge, and there is nothing to preclude us from claiming. The Bellcairn (ubi sup.) is not in point, as there judgment had been given in open court and never properly set aside.

Sir Walter Phillimore in reply.

Cur. adv. vult.

March 18.—Lindley, L.J.—This is an appeal from the decision of the President of the Admiralty Division, and the question raised is, whether a claim can be made against a fund which has been paid into court in a limitation of liability action, and which fund is divisible among those persons who have claims against the ship whose owners brought it in. The difficulty arises in this way. There was a collision between the vessels the Kronprinz and the Ardandhu. An action was brought by the owners of the Kronprinz against the Ardandhu in respect of that collision, and after the writ therein had been issued, and before any pleadings were delivered, the solicitors for the owners of the two ships signed a document, which runs thus: "We, Lowless and Co., solicitors for the defendants, hereby consent to this action being discontinued, without costs, on the ground of inevitable accident." That is signed by the solicitors of the plaintiffs and defendants respectively, and is dated the 2nd March 1883. There is written on the margin, "Fiat, J. G. S.," the letters being the initials of the assistant registrar of the Admiralty Court. It appears that on the next day an order was drawn up in these terms: "Upon consent of both solicitors it is ordered that this action be discontinued, without costs, on the ground of inevitable accident." It then appears that nothing was done for two years in that action. Meanwhile an action was brought by the owners of cargo on the Kronprinz against the Ardandhu on the assumption that the collision was not due to inevitable accident, but to the negligence of those in charge of the Ardandhu, and in that action both ships are found to blame. The defendants then instituted an action to limit their liability, and in March 1885 the usual decree was made, and money was brought into court by the owners of the Ardandhu to answer the claims which might be made against her. Subsequently to this the order of discontinuance in the ship action was rescinded by Butt, J. The order of Butt, J. runs thus: "Between the owners of the Kronprinz and the owners of the Ardandhu. Upon hearing counsel for the plaintiffs, and solicitors for the defendants, it is ordered that the order of court of the 2nd May 1883 be rescinded, and that the plaintiffs do pay all the costs occasioned by such order having been made." The order of discontinuance having been got rid of, a claim was made by the owners of the Kronprinz against the fund in court. That claim of course comes into competition with the claim of the cargo owners, and the question is, whether the owners of the Kronprinz are entitled to claim against the fund. The registrar has admitted them to claim, and his report has been confirmed by the President of the Admiralty Division.

The question turns on the true meaning, I will not say of the order of the 2nd May 1883, but of the agreement upon which the order is based. I think there can be no doubt, after the case of The Bellcairn (ubi sup.), that if this agreement really amounts to a release of all demands between the owners of the Kronprinz and the owners of the Ardandhu, arising out of the collision, then the owners of the Kronprinz are not at liberty to claim against this fund. I take it to be well settled that, when a person pays into court a sum of money to be distributed under the order of the court amongst persons having claims against the fund, he cannot fabricate something in order to enable other persons to compete with the claimants, and whether the new claim be resuscitated or revived, or created for the first time, appears to me to be utterly immaterial. If therefore the true meaning of the agreement is that the owners of the Kronprinz had released the Ardandhu from all demands, it appears to me that neither by rescinding the order or agreement, or by any other method, could their claim be resuscitated or revived. Now, what is the construction to be put upon this agreement? I myself have not been able to come to the conclusion that it does in substance amount to a release of all demands. The language of it is confined to this, that the action be discontinued. But the order of discontinuance has been set aside. It appears to me that the view taken by the President is right. I feel the difficulty created by the use of the words "on the ground of inevitable accident;" but the difficulties on the other side are also considerable, because to hold that this agreement precludes the owners of the Kronprinz from claiming against the fund is to force the meaning of the words to an extent I do not think we are justified in doing. I am therefore of opinion that this appeal should be dismissed.

Lopes, L.J.—Our decision in this case appears to me to depend entirely on the nature of the transaction of May 1883. Was it a discontinuance of the then pending action, or was it an agreement to abandon and relinquish all claims? If it was a discontinuance it is clear that the plaintiffs are not precluded from substantiating their claim in other proceedings, and may prove against the fund in court in the present action. I think it is a discontinuance of the then existing proceedings such as was contemplated by Order XXVI., r. 1. The plaintiffs might have discontinued without the defendants' consent if they had been willing to pay the costs, and they obtained that consent in order to avoid the payment of those costs. The defendants, in giving their consent to relinquish costs, added the words with regard to inevitable accident because they considered that that was the cause of the collision, and that was the ground why they ought not to be called upon to pay costs. I do not think that the plaintiffs, when they entered into that arrangement, intended to relinquish any claims they might have arising from action taken by parties other than themselves. I believe all they intended was, that they themselves would not move in the then pending action. The case of The Bellcairn (ubi sup.) is relied upon, but it is clearly distinguishable. The matter there had become res judicata, and it was on that ground that the shipowners' claim was precluded. I think, therefore, that the decision of the learned President was right, and that this appeal should be dismissed.

Lord Coleridge, C.J.—I am not prepared on the question of construction to differ from the opinions of my learned brothers, but I should like to state why I am not satisfied, and why therefore, without dissenting, I do not formally assent to this judgment. If the question were a question of law only there can be no doubt that the law has been pronounced with perfect correctness by my learned brothers. If this was, as Sir James Hannen states, only a discontinuance there could be no question that the owners of the Kronprinz have a perfect right to take the proceedings they are now taking, because, to use the words of Sir James Hannen, "it is clear that the mere discontinuance of an action does not preclude the plaintiff from substantiating his claim in other proceedings." That is perfectly clear law, and if that was the proper and adequate meaning of the words of this agreement, and of the order, there would be nothing to dispute about. But I confess that I have considerable difficulty in saying that that construction adequately fulfils the tenour of these two documents. A discontinuance formerly—certainly at common law—was effected by the plaintiff simply discontinuing and paying costs. That was an end of the matter. Now, a plaintiff may discontinue his action with payment of costs if the court agrees to it. But even now, under Order XXVI., r. 1, a plaintiff can of his own will discontinue if he chooses to pay the costs. The construction contended for limits the operation both of the agreement and of the order to the nonpayment of costs. But it is to be remembered that the parties to this action are considerable people. The matter at issue between them was a very large one. At the date of the agreement all that had happened was the issue of the writ. Therefore, had the owners of the Kronprinz wished to discontinue their action, all they had to do was to pay the costs and be done with it. The costs could not have been above 30*s.*, and perhaps were less.

That being so, the contention that this was a mere discontinuance does not appear to me to be an adequate account of this solemn agreement. I cannot think it an adequate account of this agreement to say that it was meant to release the plaintiff from the payment of 30*s.*, and still less does it seem to me to be adequate when we remember that in order to escape the payment of this small sum the agreement is indorsed with the fiat of the court, and also made the basis of an order of court. I look at this on the ground of probability. Is it likely that two attorneys would have come to an agreement which is fiatted by the court and fiatted by an order of court to release the plaintiffs from the payment of 30*s.*? That does not appear to me to be an adequate explanation, and the view I would be inclined to take would be, that the words "without costs on the ground of inevitable accident" meant that the parties met together and agreed as between themselves that the two ships should not sue one another, and that the insertion of these words meant "We agree that there was an inevitable accident; you may therefore discontinue this action without costs, but we tell you that we agree between ourselves that the ground on which the action shall not be continued is one that will prevent any action being brought, and as between ourselves we agree we will not sue one another." I admit that it is not so stated, and that the words used are "that this action be discontinued," but I can only say that if the matter were res integra I should take a different view to my learned brothers. Therefore, while I do not dissent, I can only say I do not feel satisfied.

Blackburn, Low, and Co. v. Vigors. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION.

Marine insurance—Principal and agent—Concealment by agent of material fact from principal—Knowledge of agent—Knowledge of principal.

Where an agent, who is employed to effect an insurance for his principal, deliberately omits to communicate to that principal material facts which in the course of his employment have come to his knowledge, and which it is his duty to disclose to his principal, there is a concealment which will have the effect of vitiating an insurance subsequently effected by such innocent principal through another agent who is unaware of any such concealment of material information.

So held by Lindley and Lopes, L.JJ.; Lord Esher, M.R. dissenting.

Judgment of Day, J. reversed.

The plaintiff, Thomas Low, was an insurance broker and underwriter, carrying on business at Glasgow under the firm of "Blackburn, Low, and Co."

The defendant was an underwriter at Lloyd's and was represented there by a Mr. Whalley.

This action was brought to recover the sum of 50*l.*, the defendant's subscription to a policy of reinsurance for 700*l.*, dated the 2nd May 1884, on the hull and machinery of the ship State of Florida, as and from New York to Glasgow, which was subscribed, on the defendant's behalf, at a premium of thirty guineas net per cent., which the underwriters still retained.

The policy was effected through Roxburgh, Currie, and Co., insurance brokers in London.

By his statement of defence the defendant alleged that he was induced to subscribe the policy in question by the wrongful concealment by the plaintiff and his agents of certain facts then known to the plaintiff or his agents and unknown to the defendant, and which were material to the risk.

The concealment relied upon was, that the plaintiff, and those interested in the insurance, and their agents, concealed from the defendant the following facts:

(1.) That the steamship City of Rome, which had arrived in Liverpool immediately before the policy in question was effected, had brought news supposed by the plaintiff, and by his agents, and by the owners of the State of Florida, to relate to the State of Florida, and tending to show that the vessel had been wrecked at sea.

(2.) That the City of Rome had received a signal from another vessel to the effect that such other vessel had on board the shipwrecked crew of a vessel, the first name of which was "State."

(3.) That it was currently reported in Liverpool and Glasgow that the City of Rome had spoken or received signals from a vessel with the shipwrecked crew of the State of Florida on board.

(4.) That the State of Florida being long overdue two steamships had immediately before the date of the orders for insurance arrived in the Clyde from New York, having started long after the State of Florida, and that inquiries had been made of those on board as to the State of Florida, and that those on board could give no information as to the said vessel, and could not explain her non-arrival.

(5.) That the plaintiff, or his agents, had been in communication with the managers of the State of Florida in Glasgow as to her non-arrival, and that such managers had informed the plaintiff, or his agents, that they could not account for her non-arrival unless some misfortune had happened to her.

The facts of the case, and the arguments of counsel, sufficiently appear in the judgments.

The action was tried before Day, J. on the 6th July 1885, and his Lordship gave judgment for the plaintiff.

The defendant appealed.

The appeal was heard on the 1st March 1886.

Cur. adv. vult.

May 22, 1886.—The following written judgments were delivered:—

Lord Esher, M.R.—The facts of this case necessary to be stated for the elucidation of the question which we have to decide, which facts were admitted or proved at the trial before Day, J., trying the case without a jury, are, that the plaintiff, trading as Blackburn, Low, and Co., carried on business at Glasgow as an underwriter and insurance broker, and that he had insured a ship, called the State of Florida, for 1500*l.* from New York to Glasgow. The ship, which was a steamship, left New York on the 11th April, and was due in ordinary course at Glasgow on or about the 24th April. The ship was also underwritten for further amounts by or through Rose, Murison, and Thompson, another firm of insurance brokers and underwriters in Glasgow, who were the usual insurance brokers for the owners of the State of Florida. On the 30th April, the ship being four or five days overdue, the plaintiff instructed his usual insurance brokers, Roxburgh, Currie, and Co., of London, to reinsure the ship for him to the extent of 1000*l.* at or not exceeding ten guineas. These brokers answered on the same day that the insurance could not be done under twenty guineas; to which the plaintiff replied, "Which not disposed to pay;" and so by this answer the authority to Roxburgh, Currie, and Co. to insure for the plaintiff was for the time ended. In the meantime, on the 28th April, information, which was admitted at the trial to be material, had been brought to Liverpool by a ship called the City of Rome. Before this information was known to anyone in Glasgow, Rose, Murison, and Co., instructed their correspondents in London (Rose, Thompson, Young and Co.) to reinsure in London their existing insurances on the State of Florida to the extent of 1500*l*. at fifteen guineas, and some such reinsurances were in consequence effected in London. On the 1st May Mr. Thompson, a member of Rose, Murison, and Thompson, told the plaintiff in Glasgow that his firm had effected some insurances in London, and was thereupon requested by the plaintiff to instruct Rose, Thompson, Young, and Co., of London, to reinsure 1500*l*. for him, the plaintiff. This request was forwarded by Rose, Murison, and Thompson, as from themselves, to Rose Thompson, Young, and Co., at 11.30 on the 1st May in the following terms: "Blackburn Low wish to reduce Florida lines; cover to them 1500*l*. at fifteen guineas nett." The answer was that this could not be done under twenty guineas. At 12.30 Mr. Murison, of Rose, Murison, and Thompson, had notice of the rumours which had reached Liverpool. He afterwards telegraphed, no longer in the name of his own firm, but in the name of the plaintiff's firm, to Rose, Thompson, Young, and Co., to offer twenty guineas. The answer came direct to the plaintiff. Further communications passed between the plaintiff and Rose, Thompson, Young, and Co., the rates continually rising. At 4.33 on the 1st May, Rose Thompson, Young and Co. reinsured to 800*l*. for the plaintiff; but at 4.53, when the limit had risen to thirty-five guineas, the plaintiff closed his negotiations through Rose, Thompson, Young, and Co. by a telegram: "Not inclined to extend limit." At this moment, therefore, the plaintiff had no insurance broker instructed to act for him. On the 2nd May the plaintiff sent new instructions to his usual brokers, Roxburgh, Currie, and Co., to reinsure 700*l*. on his behalf, which they effected on the same day at thirty guineas on the "ship lost or not lost," and this was the insurance sued upon in this action.

It was at the trial admitted, on behalf of the plaintiff, that the request to Rose, Murison, and Thompson to instruct Rose, Thompson, Young, and Co. constituted Rose, Murison, and Thompson the plaintiff's agents to effect insurance for him. This authority lasted until the plaintiff was put into direct communication with Rose, Thompson, Young, and Co., when it, of course, ceased. In like manner Rose, Thompson, Young and Co. were agents of the plaintiff to effect insurance for him, until their authority ceased by reason of the plaintiff's refusal at 4.53 on the 1st May to extend the limit given to them. The insurance on which the action was brought was effected through entirely independent agents, Roxburgh, Currie, and Co., instructed after the authority given to others had ceased. But it appears that the information from Liverpool was given to Rose, Murison, and Thompson, whilst by admission they were agents of the plaintiff to effect insurance for him. The ship was in fact lost before the policy sued on was effected. But it was admitted that the plaintiff himself had no knowledge of the information given at Liverpool until after the policy was effected; and it is clear, therefore, that he and the defendant and Roxburgh, Currie, and Co. negotiated and effected the insurance on the bonâ fide view by all of them that the ship was no more than an overdue ship. No part of the negotiations with the defendant passed in any way through Rose, Murison, and Thompson. The defendant relies on the want of communication to him of the information obtained by Rose, Murison, and Thompson, of a material fact, which information came to them whilst they were agents of the plaintiff to effect insurance for him; and he insists on the application of a doctrine in the form that "the knowledge of an agent is the knowledge of his principal." The plaintiff insists that the only true doctrine is, that the assured is bound by the knowledge of his agent who effects the insurance for him, or through whom the insurance is effected, as if he, the assured, had himself that knowledge at the time of the insurance; but that he is bound only to this extent, that in case of misconduct of the agent in effecting the insurance, he, the assured, cannot enforce the contract any more than if he himself had been guilty of the same misconduct. The question thus raised is really, what is the true meaning of the phrase, "the knowledge of the agent is the knowledge of the principal?" Those who have used it could not have meant to say that what is known to an agent is necessarily in fact known to his principal; the phrase is only used in cases in which the principal is admitted to be in fact ignorant. The suggested meaning would therefore be an absurd contradiction of the assumption on which it is founded. The phrase is, therefore, figurative. It was used by the first person who used it as a means of expressing tersely the idea which that person intended to convey with regard to the case then before him. It has been used in the same sense by those who have subsequently adopted it in precisely the same, or in similar, circumstances. It is meant to be tersely descriptive rather than strictly accurate. One can only arrive at its more accurate and unfigurative meaning by considering carefully the circumstances with regard to which it has been used by persons whose authority is to bind or guide us. By these observations I wish to guard against a danger which always arises from the use in law of these figures of speech. Their terseness prevents them, as I have said, from expressing accurately the proposition they are used to enunciate. They are generally larger than that proposition. If then the terse expression is afterwards applied as an accurate expression of a legal proposition, it may be, and often is, used so as to embrace a case which, if the limitations of the real proposition are called to mind, is seen at once to be outside the more limited boundaries of the more accurate proposition, though within the larger boundaries of the picturesque phrase. As examples of what I wish to convey, I will deal with some of these oracular phrases. For instance, the following: "A man is taken to intend the natural consequences of what he does." If this were strictly adhered to, ninth-tenths of the cases of manslaughter would be cases of murder; an unskilful doctor would be a murderer; and so one acting in an uncontrollable access of passion. The phrase is, therefore, evidently too large. If literally applied, it would often be wickedly untrue. But as soon as you see that it has been only used as a guide in question of evidence, you perceive at once that it expresses only a good working rule from which to draw an inference of intention, if no other evidence counteracts the primâ facie inference. When used by judges charging a jury, it has always easily been understood in its more limited and accurate sense; when used by judges explaining the process of reasoning by which they have drawn a particular inference of intention, it has been used in the same sense. So the phrase, "A man is to be taken to know that which he wilfully abstains from knowing, or against which he wilfully shuts his eyes." It is a still more inaccurate phrase than the former; yet its meaning is sufficiently obvious. It cannot mean that a man does not know what it states he does know. It means that, if a man asserts that he did not know a certain fact, and evidence is given which shows that he did know it, unless, if such a thing could be, he must have, what is picturesquely called, wilfully shut his eyes against the knowledge, the true inference is that, although he may not have been told the exact circumstances, or may not have seen with his eyes the exact details, he did in truth know the fact with his mind, as much as if he had been told, or had seen every particular of it. Again, "A man who states that which is in fact untrue, reckless whether it is true or false, is to be taken to be malicious." It is a good working rule upon which primâ facie to found an inference of malicious intent; but the want of such an intention may be demonstrated by counter evidence, as that the story was carelessly told to amuse, or in order to divert from an apprehended danger or otherwise. One has, therefore, to extract from such phrases the real legal proposition contained in them. In making this search, one must recollect that every general proposition laid down by judges as a principle of law, as distinguished from an enactment by statute, is the statement of some ethical principle of right and wrong applied to circumstances arising in real life, i.e., in the life of social intercourse, or in the life of business. If the suggested principle is not obviously a rule of right and wrong, or if the suggested application cannot be supported by the suggested principle, the proposed application must be wrong or must be supported by some other principle of right and wrong, or cannot be supported at all.

These observations must be brought to bear upon the phrase with which we have to deal in the present case. That it expresses a properly limited proposition of law has been above alleged to be absurd. Let us try it in one or two obvious instances. It cannot mean that the law holds that the principal does in fact know what his agent knows, but what the law at the same time admits that the principal in fact does not know. The law is never founded on absolute nonsense. The law does not hold that for every purpose the principal is to be deemed to know whatever becomes known to an agent of his in the course of the agent's employment. A merchant sells goods at sea or in warehouse with a statement, not intended by him to be, or taken by the other party, as a warranty, that the goods are sound. If, when he makes such statement, he knows that it is untrue, he is guilty of fraud. If he does not know or suspect the contrary of what he has stated, but his correspondent, or captain, or warehouseman, does know the contrary, is the merchant guilty of fraud? Certainly not. Is he deemed to be guilty of fraud so as that an action could be maintained against him to recover damages for a fraudulent misstatement? Certainly not. The principal does not in fact always know all that his agent knows. If the law held that he was in all cases for all purposes to be deemed to know all that his agent knew, the law would in some cases mark him, with gross injustice, with an unwarranted stigma; the law would countenance a gross violation of a simple rule of right and wrong. The law does not deem that to be which in truth is not. All that the law does is that, in some cases, it regulates the rights and liabilities of a principal by the knowledge of his agents. But then it does so, not by virtue of a proposition that the knowledge of the agent is the knowledge of the principal, but upon another principle. In many kinds of contract, as of purchase and sale, or hiring and letting, if a man, instead of himself negotiating and making the contract, intrusts those acts to an agent, he, the principal, cannot enforce the contract made on his behalf by his agent, if the contract is brought about by conduct of the agent which would invalidate the enforcement of the contract, if the conduct had been pursued by the principal himself, had he himself made the contract. If the agent procures the contract by fraudulent misstatement, or a misstatement, or by a fraudulent concealment, or by a concealment which makes false the statements he has expressly or impliedly made, such contract cannot be enforced by the principal. It is treated as void if sued upon at common law, or it is set aside upon application in equity. But under neither procedure could damages be recovered against the innocent principal upon an allegation of actual fraud by him. It is obvious, then, that the law does not say, in such cases, that the principal does know, or is to be deemed to know, what his agent knows. The principle of law applied to the case is a rule of right and wrong, immediately recognised to be just when it is stated, that "a man cannot, by delegating to an agent to do what he might himself do, obtain greater rights than if he did the thing himself." This rule, and its application, is obvious, and was as well known and applied before as after the phrase now in question was invented, namely, that "what is known to an agent is known to his principal." This phrase, when examined, is seen to contain no principle of law whatever. In insurance law, if a contract of insurance is made directly between an assured and an underwriter, the contract cannot be enforced if in the course of the negotiations the assured has made a misstatement of a material fact, whether he has done so fraudulently or innocently, or if he has concealed a material fact, known to himself and not known to the underwriter, or which the underwriter ought to have known, whether he, the assured, has done so fraudulently or innocently. If then the agent of the assured to make the contract of insurance does that which if the assured himself had done it would have precluded him from insisting on the contract, the application of the principle above enunciated will prevent the principal from, in such case, being able to insist on the contract. The result is not the consequence of the phrase treated as a principle of law, though the phrase, in a certain sense, makes a sufficient picture of the result. The principle which is applied is one which can only be applied to the conduct of an agent by or through whom the contract is made, although the phrase in its terms would apply to other agents. Apply the phrase to other agents, as if it were a principle of law, and it will be seen to produce as manifest injustice in the case of insurance principals and agents as it has been shown it would produce in other cases. This alleged principle is not the law of England in any case, although in the case of certain agents the principal is held to warrant the honesty of the agent, and is thereby liable in respect of the agent's dishonesty. From these observations the conclusion is, that the phrase in question cannot really be used as a guide to determine the question of the defendant's liability or non-liability in the present action. We must seek elsewhere for the principle which is to govern the case.

We have to see whether any true principle of insurance law will make the defendant liable in the present case. In order to determine this question, we must see what circumstances have been held to prevent the enforcement of a contract of insurance, and what are the principles under which those circumstances have been held to have that effect. Then we shall see whether any of those principles are applicable to the circumstances of the present case. Mr. Arnould says that "the principle is now firmly established, that the misrepresentation from mistake, ignorance, or accident of any material fact, however innocently made, will avoid the policy quite as much as in cases where such misrepresentation arises from a wilful intention to deceive." And in another place: "Concealment in the law of insurance is the suppression of a material fact within the knowledge of either party, which the other has not the means of knowing or is not presumed to know. . . . Whether such suppression of the truth arises from the fraud of the assured (that is, from a wilful intention to deceive for his own benefit), or merely from mistake, negligence, or accident, the consequences will be the same." The substantial truth of these propositions is not disputed by anyone. They are a statement of the circumstances which will prevent the enforcement of the contract; but they do not contain the principle whereby such circumstances produce such an effect. As to this, Mr. Arnould says: "The doctrine of the English courts is, that in the case supposed, although no pretence exists for anything like actual fraud, yet the policy is to be considered void on the ground of constructive or legal fraud." This is directly in contradiction of what has been said in the former part of this judgment. Duer, however, as is well known, does not adopt this principle; but holds that it is a part of the contract that full disclosure shall be made as well as that every representation shall be accurate. But, if this be correct, the contract should never be set aside or treated as void on the ground of concealment; the contract should stand and be treated as broken by the assured. This view would raise new complications which have never yet been urged. Phillips, who is, in my opinion, always the more accurate guide, thus treats the matter of principle: "The effect of a misrepresentation or concealment in discharging the underwriters does not seem to be merely on the ground of fraud, as has been usually laid down by writers on insurance, but also on the ground of a condition implied by the fact of entering into the contract, that there is no misrepresentation or concealment. Mr. Duer criticises the phraseology of the books in putting the effect of a misrepresentation or concealment upon the contract entirely upon the ground of fraud. Mr. Arnould adheres to this application of that term for the sake of consistency with the general legal doctrine that what passes between the parties preliminary to a contract is not a part of it, and should not be imported into it. And since a representation through mistake or inadvertence has the same effect in reference to the underwriter as an intentional and literally fraudulent misrepresentation or concealment—namely, it induces him to enter into a contract which he would otherwise have declined, or to take a less premium than he would otherwise have demanded—he deems it to be excusable to apply the term 'fraud," and thus bring the doctrine on this subject nominally within the acknowledged general principle applicable to other contracts. But I cannot think that this anomalous use of the term is justifiable on this ground, since ambiguous phraseology is not to be tolerated in any science, and least of all in that of law, where it can possibly be avoided, as it may easily be in this case by stating the practical doctrine in direct terms, namely, that it is an implied condition of the contract of insurance that it is free from misrepresentation or concealment, whether fraudulent or through mistake." He says lower down: "The forfeiture of the insurance by misrepresentation or concealment is a forfeiture by a breach of a condition of the contract, so it seems to have been considered by Kent, C." This seems to me to be the true doctrine. The freedom from misrepresentation or concealment is a condition precedent to the right of the assured to insist on the performance of the contract, so that on a failure of the performance of the condition the assured cannot enforce the contract. I have thought it necessary to bring out this view, because it seems to me that the only persons who can attach a condition to a contract are those who in fact make the contract. Those who have nothing to do with the making of the contract cannot have anything to do with agreeing to a condition which is to affect the attaching of the contract. He who makes the contract agrees to the condition that it shall not be binding on the person whose alter ego or representative he is if he has made any misrepresentation, or has been guilty of any concealment. This confines the purview of alleged misrepresentation or concealment to those persons only. It confines the consideration of an agent's conduct to the agent by or through whom the contract is made. Mr. Arnould uses the phrase, "the principle here is that what is known to the agent is impliedly known to the principal." But this is applied to the immediately preceding paragraph, which is, "If, however, the information so communicated by the assured to the underwriter proceeds from an agent of the assured, whose duty it was to give the intelligence, the assured is just as responsible for the truth of the information as he would be for the truth of a positive representation made by himself of the same facts." It seems to me that the phrase "the agent whose duty it was to give the intelligence" means, in this context, the agent whose duty it was to give the intelligence to the underwriter; i.e., it means the agent who effects or through whom is effected, the contract of insurance. And if so, the phrase as to knowledge is not wanted as a principle; there is another governing principle which suffices. Duer, in his Lecture 13, discusses the cases of Fitzherbert v. Mather (1 T. R. 12) and Gladstone v. King (1 Mau. & S. 35), and then states that "to these decisions, if they are to be considered as affirming the rule that the knowledge of an agent not authorised to insure may in some cases be justly imputed to his principal, so that his silence shall have the effect of a concealment avoiding the policy or exonerating the underwriters from the loss, the reasoning and authority of a very eminent judge, distinguished for his accurate and profound knowledge of commercial law"—referring to Story, J.—"are directly and irreconcilably opposed." Duer, in sect. 28 (Lecture 13) gives his own view; but it is based entirely on his view that it is a part of the contract, not by way of condition, but by way of contractual undertaking, that no concealment of any kind shall occur. It will be found that Phillips in his italicised propositions, which are, in my opinion, always nicely accurate, confines himself entirely to the acts or omissions of agents by or through whom the contract is effected (see sect. 543): "A misrepresentation or concealment by the agent for effecting the insurance will defeat it, though not known to the assured." It is clear, I think, that in sect. 549 he prefers the reasoning of Story, J. in Ruggles v. General Interest Insurance Company (4 Mason, 74) to that of the English judges, as reported in Fitzherbert v. Mather (ubi sup.) and Gladstone v. King (ubi sup.); and I think that the concluding paragraph of that section is rather forced from him by those cases than acquiesced in by his conviction. "I accordingly cannot but conclude," he says, "that a policy made, as the case supposes, under an essential misunderstanding by both of the parties, into which they are purposely and fraudulently led by a third, whether he be agent of one or both, or neither, is void." I do not think that the mind of the writer went with that halting proposition.

But then another rule is suggested in argument, partly countenanced by Arnold and Duer, though they seem to base it on the English cases of Fitzherbert v. Mather (ubi sup.), and Gladstone v. King (ubi sup.) rather than on any process of reasoning, and it seems to be this: "Where any servant or agent of the assured ought by reason of the duty imposed upon him by his position with regard to the assured to make to him a true and immediate communication of a circumstance which, in insurance law, is a material circumstance, and if he, neglecting such duty, either makes a false communication, or fails to make an immediate communication, or any communication at all, to his principal or employer, and, by reason thereof, the principal or employer, the assured, fails to disclose that which, if he had known it, he would have been bound to disclose, the contract of insurance cannot be enforced." This suggested rule would be well founded, if the phrase that the knowledge of the agent is the knowledge of the principal were a legal proposition; but it is not. To support the rule some principle must be vouched. The rule contains two assertions on which it is based: the first, that there are servants and agents of the assured who, by reason of their position as such, are bound to give, not only true but immediate communication of certain facts; the second is, that the underwriter has a right to assume, as the foundation of his contract, that such servants and agents have fulfilled the suggested duty. As to the first, no one doubts but that it is the duty of a servant or agent, as it is of everyone who makes a statement, to make it truthfully; but is it true to say that all servants and agents are, or even that any servant or agent is, bound, by reason only of his relation as such to his employer, to make an immediate communication of everything that has happened concerning his principal's affairs? I know of no such duty arising from the mere relation of master and servant, or of principal and agent. A manager of a mercantile establishment in a distant country probably makes only periodical reports. There is no apparent necessity for his making more frequent reports. There is no necessary reason why the captain of a ship should immediately report every accident to the ship, which accident would usually be already repaired. The law has no right to imply a duty as attached to the relation which does not necessarily follow from the relation. The supposed duty must exist whether the subject-matter is or is not insured, or is or is not to be insured. There is nothing on which to found the suggested implied duty. I feel certain that no such duty does in fact generally exist. As to the second, even supposing that such an implied duty does exist as between master and servant, or principal and agent, is it true to say that underwriters do rely upon an undertaking by the assured that his servants or agents will fulfil their duty? Such a reliance has never yet been proved in fact to be the rule of underwriters and assured. I believe it to be incapable of proof, because it is wholly untrue in fact The underwriter has been taught to rely, and does rely, upon the conduct of those with whom he deals, not upon the conduct of those with whom he has no relation, and of whose existence in many instances he knows and can know nothing. He is entitled to uberrima fides from those with whom he deals. But the doctrine of uberrima fides is fulfilled completely if those with whom he deals deal with him in accordance with that rule. The suggested doctrine strikes an assured who has complied in every possible sense with that exceptional rule of conduct of uberrima fides. A court of law has no right to imply this reliance of an underwriter, unless the implication is a necessary implication. It remains only then to deal with the cited cases, and to deal with them in a court of error, where they are not to be followed or distinguished, but to be considered. And it may be wise to observe that they do not construe a contract or document, so that, whether right or wrong, other contracts and documents have been formed upon them, but lay down, as it is said, principles of law. And further they have never been absolutely acquiesced in, but have been canvassed and criticised from the time they were decided until now. The case of Fitzherbert v. Mather (ubi sup.) is difficult to appreciate, so far as consists in gathering the principle which ought to be extracted from it on which the judges founded their decision. I confess that the reported judgment of Buller, J. puzzled me for long. I think I now understand it from the gloss put upon the judge's phraseology by Duer in note 11 to Lecture 14. Buller, J., he says, is still more explicit: "Though the plaintiff be innocent, yet if he build his information on that of his agent (which clearly means, if he adopt the information of his agent, and by submitting it to the underwriters makes it the foundation of the contract) and his agent be guilty of a misrepresentation, the principal must suffer." The gloss within the brackets, which I think is correct, shows that the case was decided on the view that the assured, who himself made the contract, made a representation which was a misrepresentation into which he, the assured, was led, by adopting and using innocently the misrepresentation of his agent. If this be the true interpretation of the case, it is in no way exceptional, but is within the most ordinary rule of insurance law. The case of Stewart v. Dunlop (4 Bro. Par. Cas. 483) is founded entirely on an inference of fact, more or less rightly inferred, that the agent who effected the insurance knew the information which had arrived in town. As to the case of Gladstone v. King (ubi sup.), it is one of those cases which is differently explained by everyone who deals with it. Everyone points out that the resulting decision, that the fraud of the master did not avoid the policy, but only exonerated the underwriter from payment of the average loss incurred before the policy, is strange and isolated. Duer doubts whether the letter written by the captain to his owners was not shown by the assured to the underwriters. If it was, it is again a case of innocent misrepresentation by the assured himself. The case is criticised by Phillips in sect. 683. The reasoning of Story, J, in Ruggles v. General Interest Insurance Company (ubi sup.) seems to me to dispose of all that has been supposed to result from the case of Gladstone v. King (ubi sup.). He first gives strong reasons for supposing that the case was in reality decided as upon an innocent misrepresentation. If not, he on p. 78 deals with the suggested reasoning "The principle contended for," he says, "is new. If well founded it must have often occurred. The general silence, therefore, is against it, but not decisive of its merits. Upon what grounds does it stand? Not upon the ground of agency, for the master was not the agent as to the insurance. Not upon the ground of imputed knowledge or fraudulent concealment, for that is excluded by the argument. It must, then, be upon the ground that the act of the master binds the owner, and that an omission of duty to his owner, by which third persons are prejudiced, destroys the rights of his owner, however innocent he may be. There is certainly no public policy or convenience in such a principle. The owner does not guarantee the fidelity of the master to all the world, or to the insurer in particular." In this as matter of truth and real business conduct, I entirely agree. I see no warrant for any other inference. I think it more candid to say at once that, in my opinion, Gladstone v. King (ubi sup.), as reported, and certainly as relied on, is wrong. I do not think that an assured can properly be said to guarantee the fidelity of any of his agents. Certainly I cannot bring my mind to say that the underwriter is to be assumed to rely upon the diligence and accuracy of an agent of the assured, of whose existence, as in this case, he could not have had a suspicion. Even if what is said about a captain or correspondent were true, which I think it is not, the present case goes far beyond; for the defendant, the underwriter, had no reason to suppose that any other agent had been intrusted to insure. I am prepared to decide this case upon the old, simple, recognised, and easily justified rule, that a contract of insurance is rendered abortive by an innocent misrepresentation or concealment of a material fact known to the assured, or to an agent of his by or through whom the contract is made, and which fact the underwriter neither knows nor is bound to know; but is not rendered abortive by the misrepresentation or concealment of any other person or agent, whether innocent or fraudulent. I can find a simple principle to support the first, namely, the principle I have before stated, that a man cannot, by delegating to an agent to do what he might do himself, obtain greater rights than if he did the thing himself; I can find no principle on which to support the contrary of the second. Before closing, however, there remains the case of Proudfoot v. Montefiore (16 L. T. Rep. N. S. 585; 2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 572; L. Rep. 2 Q. B. 511), which, on account of its importance, I reserved for minute consideration, until after I had exhausted principle and all other authorities. It is made in the judgment to depend on the cases of Fitzherbert v. Mather (ubi sup.), and Gladstone v. King (ubi sup.): "Upon the above facts," the judgment says, "the question arises whether the plaintiff, the assured, is so far affected by the knowledge of his agent of the loss of the vessel and damage to the cargo, as that the fraud thus committed on the underwriter through the intention or concealment of the agent, though innocently committed, so far as the plaintiff is concerned, will afford a defence to the underwriter on a claim to enforce the policy. Two cases decided in this court, one in the time of Lord Mansfield, the other in that of Lord Ellenborough, establish the affirmative of this proposition." I have already endeavoured to show that Fitzherbert v. Mather (ubi sup.) does by no means support this proposition. If Gladstone v. King (ubi sup.) does support it, I must say that, as I cannot agree with that case so interpreted, I cannot agree with this case founded on it. The Chief Justice then states that the reasoning of Duer fully establishes that the judgment of Story, J., in Ruggles v. General Interest Insurance Company (ubi sup.) is erroneous. If Mr. Duer's view is right, that there is a contractual undertaking by the assured that every material fact shall be disclosed, it follows, of course, that Story, J. is wrong. But, as I have said, I look in vain in a policy in ordinary form for any such contract. The Chief Justice then lays down the following proposition: "If an agent, whose duty it is, in the ordinary course of business, to communicate information to his principal as to the state of a ship and cargo, omits to discharge such duty, and the owner, in the absence of information as to any fact material to be communicated to the underwriter, effects an insurance, such insurance will be void, on the ground of concealment or misrepresentation. The insurer is entitled to assume, as the basis of the contract between him and the assured, that the latter will communicate to him every material fact of which the assured has, or in the ordinary course of business ought to have, knowledge; and that the latter will take the necessary measures, by the employment of competent and honest agents, to obtain through the ordinary channels of intelligence in use in the mercantile world, all due information as to the subject-matter of the insurance. This condition is not complied with where, by the fraud and negligence of the agent, the party proposing the insurance is kept in ignorance of a material fact, which ought to have been made known to the underwriter, and through such ignorance fails to disclose it." Now, I will again examine the different parts of this proposition. The duty relied upon, namely, that of communication by an agent or servant, cannot be a duty imposed in a particular case by a specific order of the owner to his servant or agent, for if so, the alleged infirmity in the policy will depend upon whether such order has or has not been given. It must therefore be a duty, if any, held to arise in contemplation of law necessarily by reason of the relation between owner and agent. And, as I have before stated, the alleged duty is useless for the purpose for which it is suggested, unless the duty is a duty to give immediate information. I know of no such implied duty. I know of no agent or servant of a shipowner, still less of an owner of cargo, whose implied duty it is, by any implication which a court is justified in making, to communicate immediate information of every or of any accident happening to the ship or cargo in the course of a voyage. The proposition is again, I venture to say, obviously inaccurate in coupling concealment and misrepresentation, as if the doctrines of insurance law were identical as to both. If the owner makes a misrepresentation, the policy no doubt cannot be enforced, however much the owner may have been misled into making the representation. But, with regard to concealment in the sense of mere non-disclosure, the law is not the same as in the case of misrepresentation. The proposition then states "that the insurer is entitled to assume, as the basis of the contract between him and the assured, that the latter will communicate to him every material fact of which the assured has knowledge." This is undoubtedly correct, it being the necessary consequence of the doctrine of uberrima fides. But the proposition proceeds, "that the insurer is entitled to assume that the assured will communicate to him every material fact of which the assured ought in the ordinary course of business to have knowledge." This branch assumes that the assured has not the knowledge; the doctrine of uberrima fides therefore does not reach it. Why the insurer has a right to assume that the assured will communicate to him what the assured by the hypothesis does not know is a proposition which passes my comprehension. The proposition then lays down "that the insurer has a right to assume that the assured will take the necessary measures, by the employment of competent and honest agents, to obtain all due information." But the proposition, by using the phrase "the necessary measures," assumes that, although the assured has taken every reasonable, or even possible, measures to employ competent and honest agents, he may have failed to succeed, and therefore had failed to take "the necessary measures." And it fails to touch the case of there being, by accident or momentary negligence of the agent, a failure, although the agent is in every sense a competent and honest agent. It seems to me that this whole proposition is a finely written deduction from the case of Gladstone v. King (ubi sup.); but that, as a business or legal proposition, it will not bear close examination. It is further suggested in this case of Proudfoot v. Montefiore (ubi sup.) that the proposition laid down in it rests on a ground of public policy. But in the first place it seems difficult to see how public policy can be affected by any circumstances relating to the power between the parties of enforcing or repudiating a contract of insurance any more than of any other contract. And, secondly, it seems difficult to reconcile the interference of the doctrine of public policy in the case of a contract of insurance on ship or goods lost or not lost, one step beyond affirming that the parties who are allowed by law to enter into this hazardous and well-nigh gambling speculation of whether a loss has or has not already happened must be equally informed or equally ignorant. I am, for all these reasons, of opinion that in this case the plaintiff was entitled to recover, and that the appeal should be dismissed.

Lindley, L.J.—This was an action brought on a policy of insurance on the steamship Florida (lost or not lost) subscribed by the defendant, and dated the 2nd May 1884. The claim was for a total loss by perils of the sea; and the material defence was that the defendant was induced to subscribe the policy by the wrongful concealment by the plaintiff and his agents of certain material facts known to the plaintiff or his agents and unknown to the defendant. The case was tried before Day, J. At first there was a jury, but the jury were discharged by consent, the defendant by his counsel electing not to go to the jury on the question whether the plaintiff himself concealed any information known to him; the defendant was content to rest his defence on the undisputed facts, and on the point of law arising from them. Day, J. gave judgment for the plaintiff for the whole sum claimed. The undisputed facts of the case were as follows: The plaintiff was an underwriter and insurance broker at Glasgow, and was underwriter of a policy on the ship. The policy had been effected by the owners of the ship through Rose, Murison, and Thompson, of Glasgow, who were the brokers for effecting insurances upon her. The ship had sailed from New York on the 11th April 1884, and was due at Glasgow on or about the 25th. The ship not having arrived, the plaintiff, desiring to protect himself from loss, endeavoured on the 30th April to effect a reinsurance. He first attempted to do this through Roxburgh, Currie and Co.; but, the terms being too high, no insurance through them was then effected. The next day—viz., on the 1st May—the plaintiff saw Mr. Thompson, a member of the firm of Rose, Murison, and Thompson, and asked him about the ship, and requested him to telegraph to the London agents of his firm—viz., to Rose, Thompson, Young, and Co.—to effect an insurance for 1500*l.* at 15 guineas; and a telegram to this effect was accordingly sent by Rose, Murison, and Thompson, of Glasgow, to Rose, Thompson, Young, and Co., of London, between 11 and 12 o'clock. At 12.30 on the same day, a Mr. Murray gave Murison important information brought to

Glasgow by another ship, and which information was calculated to excite suspicion of the loss of the Florida some days previously. It was afterwards proved that this suspicion was well founded, and that the Florida had, in fact, been lost some days previously. The information thus communicated by Murray to Murison was communicated to him because Rose, Murison, and Thompson were brokers to the ship, and had, as already stated, effected insurances upon her. The information thus obtained by Murison was never disclosed by him to the plaintiff; and, having regard to what took place at the trial, the plaintiff himself must be assumed to have known nothing whatever about the matter, and to have concealed nothing himself. Shortly after the above interview, Rose, Thompson, Young, and Co., of London, telegraphed to Rose, Murison, and Thompson, of Glasgow, "Twenty guineas paying freely, and market very stiff. Likely to advance before day is out." This telegram was shown to the plaintiff. Rose, Murison, and Thompson then telegraphed back, not in their own names, but in the name of the plaintiff, to Rose, Thompson, Young, and Co., "Pay 20." The plaintiff being thus put in direct communication with Rose, Thompson, Young, and Co., received a telegram back to the effect that nothing could be done for less than 25 guineas; but ultimately the plaintiff effected an insurance through Rose, Thompson, Young, and Co., for 800*l.* at 25 guineas. This, however, is not the policy sued on in this action. On the same 1st May, and after the plaintiff had been put in direct communication with Rose, Thompson, Young, and Co., and had been told by them that nothing could be done for less than 25 guineas, the plaintiff effected another insurance on the Florida through Roxburgh, Currie, and Co., for 500*l.* at 25 guineas. This again is not the policy in question in this action. On the next day—viz., the 2nd of May—the plaintiff, through Roxburgh, Currie, and Co., effected a further insurance with the defendant for 700*l.* at 30 guineas; and this is the policy on which this action is brought. The defendant resists payment on the ground that he was not informed of the facts which had been communicated to Murison by Murray on the 1st May, and which, it was admitted, were material to the risk. The plaintiff's counsel conceded that, if the plaintiff had himself known of those facts, and had concealed them from the defendant, he would not be liable on the policy. The plaintiff's counsel further conceded that, if the policy in question had been effected through Rose, Murison, and Co., and they had concealed from the defendant the information given by Murray to Murison, the defendant would not be liable to the plaintiff on the policy. But the plaintiff's counsel contended that, as the plaintiff himself acted in good faith, and in ignorance of the facts disclosed to Murison, and did not effect the policy sued on through him, or his firm, but through other agents who knew no more than the plaintiff himself knew, the plaintiff is entitled to recover on the policy. This was the view adopted by the learned judge who tried the action. The defendant, on the other hand, contends that the knowledge acquired by Murison, whilst he was endeavouring to effect an insurance for the plaintiff, must, in point of law, be imputed to them; and that, as between the plaintiff on the one side and the defendant on the other, the plaintiff, rather than the defendant, must suffer from the omission on the part of Murison to communicate what he knew to the plaintiff. In support of this contention certain authorities were referred to which it is necessary to examine. The first is Fitzherbert v. Mather (1 T. R. 12). That was an action on a marine policy on a cargo of oats (lost or not lost) belonging to the plaintiff. The policy was effected through a person of the name of Fisher. The oats were bought by Bundock, acting for the plaintiff, from a person named Thomas, who shipped them, and who, by Bundock's orders, sent a bill of lading and invoice to Fisher. Thomas also wrote to Fisher, stating that the oats had been shipped, and that the vessel, on board which they were, had sailed. After this letter was written, but before it could have left the town where it was posted, Thomas learned that the vessel was lost. But he said nothing about it, and sent no further letter, and Fisher knew nothing of the loss. He acted bonâ fide, and effected the insurance after he had received Thomas' letter above alluded to. It is not stated that this letter was shown to the defendant, although there is some reason for supposing that it was. But, even if it was not, still the information on which Fisher acted was obtained from Thomas, who was directed by Bundock, and it would seem also by the plaintiff, to communicate with Fisher; and Thomas wrote to Fisher expressly that he might insure if he liked. Moreover, the plaintiff himself instructed Fisher to insure as soon as the bills were sent him. The court construed this as meaning as soon as they came from Thomas. The court appear to have come to the conclusion that the plaintiff referred Fisher to Thomas for information, and thereby, in effect, through Thomas supplied Fisher with defective information. The court held that the policy was effected by misrepresentation; that Thomas had been guilty, if not of fraud, at least of great negligence; that the concealment by him from Fisher, and therefore from the underwriter, of the loss of the oats, vitiated the policy, although both the plaintiff and Fisher acted in perfect good faith. It is to be observed that Ashurst, J. decided this case on the ground that Thomas knowledge was to be treated as the knowledge of the plaintiff; but the rest of the court seem to have treated the case as one of direct misrepresentation, though an innocent one so far as the plaintiff and Fisher were concerned. The next case is Gladstone v. King (1 Mau. & Sel. 35). This was an action on a policy on a ship lost or not lost. The plaintiffs were her owners, and they claimed to recover damages for an injury sustained by the ship by getting on a rock before the policy was effected. The captain of the ship had written to the plaintiffs after the accident, and before the policy was effected; but he had not alluded to the accident, and the plaintiffs knew nothing of it until after the ship arrived home. The court nevertheless decided that the plaintiffs could not recover. The court held that it was the duty of the captain to inform the plaintiffs of the fact that the ship had been on a rock and sustained injury, and that his omission in this respect, by means of which the owners were prevented from disclosing the accident to the underwriters, operated as an exception of that particular risk out of the policy. Lord Ellenborough, in this case, appears to have been influenced by the consideration of the danger there would be to underwriters if captains were permitted to wink at accidents without hazard to the owners, and so always enable them to throw past losses on insurers. This case certainly went beyond Fitzherbert v. Mather (ubi sup.), for the captain had nothing to do with the insurance, and he was not referred to by the plaintiffs for information. What, however, he knew was treated as impliedly known to the plaintiffs, although he did not tell them what he knew. The next case is Proudfoot v. Montefiore (16 L.T. Rep. N. S. 585; L. Rep. 2 Q. B. 511). It was an action on an agreement to insure some madder belonging to the plaintiff. Rees was the plaintiff's agent at Smyrna to buy and ship madder for him; and Rees had bought and shipped for the plaintiff a cargo of madder on board a vessel which was lost soon after she sailed. Rees knew of the loss, and might have informed the plaintiff of it by telegram; but he purposely refrained from doing so in order that the plaintiff might be able to insure in ignorance of what had occurred. The plaintiff did, in fact, insure the cargo before he knew of the loss, and the slip was signed by the defendants in ignorance of what had happened. The court decided against the plaintiff, although he personally had acted in good faith, and had concealed nothing within his personal knowledge. The grounds of the decision are given on page 521 as follows: "Notwithstanding the dissent of so eminent a jurist as Story, J., we are of opinion that the cases of Fitzherbert v. Mather (ubi sup.) and Gladstone v. King (ubi sup.) were well decided; and that if an agent, whose duty it is, in the ordinary course of business, to communicate information to his principal as to the state of a ship and cargo, omits to discharge such duty, and the owner, in the absence of information as to any fact material to be communicated to the underwriter, effected an insurance, such insurance will be void on the ground of concealment or misrepresentation. The insurer is entitled to assume, as the basis of the contract between him and the assured, that the latter will communicate to him every material fact of which the assured has, or in the ordinary course of business ought to have, knowledge; and that the latter will take the necessary measures, by the employment of competent and honest agents, to obtain, through the ordinary channels of intelligence in use in the mercantile world, all due information as to the subject-matter of the insurance. This condition is not complied with where, by the fraud or negligence of the agent, the party proposing the insurance is kept in ignorance of a material fact, which ought to have been made known to the underwriter, and through such ignorance fails to disclose it. It has been said, indeed, that a party desiring to insure is entitled, on paying a corresponding premium, to insure on the terms of receiving compensation in the event of the subject-matter of the insurance being lost at the time of the insurance, and that he ought not to be deprived of the advantage, which he has paid to secure, by the misconduct of his agent. But to this there are two answers: first, that, as we have already pointed out, the implied condition on which the underwriter undertakes to insure—not only that every material fact which is, but also that every fact which ought to be, in the knowledge of the assured shall be made known to him—is not fulfilled; secondly, as was said by the court in Fitzherbert v. Mather (ubi sup.), where a loss must fall on one or two innocent parties through the fraud or negligence of a third, it ought to be borne by the party by whom the person guilty of the fraud or negligence has been trusted or employed. By thus holding, we shall prevent the tendency to fraudulent concealment on the part of masters of vessels and agents at a distance, in matters on which they ought to communicate information to their principals; as also any tendency on the part of principals to encourage their servants and agents so to act. For these reasons our judgment must be for the defendant."

The last authority which it is necessary to refer to is Stribley v. The Imperial Marine Insurance Company (3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 134; 1 Q. B. Div. 507). It was an action by the owners of a ship for a total loss; and one point raised was whether the fact that the captain had not informed the plaintiff, and that he, therefore, had not informed the defendant of the fact that the vessel had encountered a storm and lost an anchor before the policy was effected, vitiated the policy. It was held that it did not. I understand this decision as, in substance, similar to Gladstone v. King (ubi sup.). The principle on which Fitzherbert v. Mather (ubi sup.) and Gladstone v. King (ubi sup.) are based has been much discussed, and, as stated by the court in Proudfoot v. Montifiore (ubi sup.), Story, J. in Ruggles v. General Interest Insurance Company (4 Mas. 74) declined to follow it. His view, however, is opposed to that of the Supreme Court of the United States (12 Wheaton 408), and to that of Phillips and Duer (sect. 549), and has not been adopted in this country. It appears to me to be established by the cases to which I have referred that, in order to prevent fraud and wilful ignorance on the part of persons effecting insurances, no policy can be enforced by an assured, who has been deliberately kept in ignorance of material facts by someone whose moral, if not legal, duty it was to inform him of them, and who has been kept in such ignorance purposely in order that he might be able to effect the insurance without disclosing those facts. The person who allows the assured to effect a policy under such circumstances as I am now supposing does not act fairly to the underwriters; and, although such person may owe them no legal duty, the assured cannot, in fairness, hold the underwriters to the contract into which they have, in fact, entered under these circumstances. The assured may himself be perfectly innocent when he effects the insurance; but as soon as he is informed of the facts it ceases to be right on his part to take advantage of the concealment without which that insurance would not have been effected. In other words, the assured cannot take advantage of the ignorance in which he has been improperly kept by one who ought to have told him the truth. If it was the legal duty of the person who has so kept him in ignorance to inform him of the facts concealed, it is, I think, clearly settled that he cannot avail himself of his own personal ignorance of them. But if there is no such legal duty to him, the same consequence appears to me to follow if there was a moral duty to tell him the truth. He may exclude all legal duty to be informed of what has occurred by giving instructions dispensing with information; and such instructions may be given for reasons which exclude all inference of fraudulent intent on his part. But in such a case it appears to me that he cannot enforce a contract of insurance obtained by such unfair means as those supposed. In my opinion, Duer (2, sect. 647) and Phillips (1, sect. 537) are both right in contending that fraud on the part of the assured is not essential to discharge the underwriters on the ground of misrepresentation or concealment. It is a condition of the contract that there is no misrepresentation or concealment either by the assured or by anyone who ought, as a matter of business and fair dealing, to have stated or disclosed the facts to him or to the underwriter for him. If this view of the law be correct, it follows that the plaintiff cannot recover in this action. The omission of Murison to tell the plaintiff what he knew, and the remarkable course his firm took of discontinuing negotiations themselves, and of putting the plaintiff in direct communication with Rose, Thompson, Young and Co., are only to be explained upon the theory that the plaintiff was purposely kept in ignorance in order that he might insure on more favourable terms than he otherwise might have done. It appears to me to have been clearly Murison's duty to the plaintiff to give him the information he had, so that he might, by disclosing what he knew, and increasing his offer, cover the increased risk. Murison was not a stranger under no obligations to the plaintiff. He was employed by him to effect an insurance, and whilst so employed he acquired important knowledge respecting the ship. I cannot doubt that it was his duty to disclose this to the plaintiff, and not to let him go on to insure in ignorance of what it was of the utmost importance he should know. The plaintiff cannot, in my opinion, obtain any advantage from this breach of duty to himself. As between himself and the defendant, the plaintiff is the person to suffer from the mistaken view his own agents took of their own duty. Their conduct vitiates this policy, although it was not effected through them, nor until after their agency had ceased; for, had it not been for their breach of duty, the policy could never have been effected for the premium which the plaintiff paid. I have not based my judgment on the maxim that the knowledge of an agent is the knowledge of his principal; for, like the Master of the Rolls, I distrust such general expressions, which are quite as likely to mislead as not. But, for the reasons I have stated, the decision of Day, J. was, in my opinion, erroneous, and judgment ought to be entered for the defendant, with costs here and below.

Lopes, L.J.—I have arrived at the same conclusion as Lindley, L.J.; but the case is so important that I wish to give a separate judgment stating my reasons. It is unnecessary to re-state the facts of this case. They have been already fully stated, and are undisputed. I propose shortly to state the conclusion at which I have arrived after much consideration, and my reasons for that conclusion. It is clear law that, if the policy sued on in this action had been effected through the agents to whom the material communication was made, and who suppressed it, the assured, though ignorant of the communication, could not have recovered from the underwriters, because there had been a concealment of a material fact by the agent of the assured. The knowledge of the agent in such circumstances would be the knowledge of the principal—a phrase which I understand to mean that the principal is to be as responsible for any knowledge of a material fact acquired by his agent employed to obtain the insurance as if he had acquired it himself. In what does the present case differ from the one above stated, where the law is clear? It differs only in this, that here the policy was effected not through the agent who had acquired and concealed the information in order that his principal might effect an insurance upon favourable terms, but through another agent subsequently employed, who, as well as his principal, was innocent of any previous concealment. The plaintiff's contention is, that it is only the concealment of material facts by the agent who effects the policy that vitiates it, not the concealment by any other agent, and the learned judge in the court below so held. The question raised seems to be whether, if an agent employed to effect an insurance purposely omits to communicate material facts which came to his knowledge during his employment (facts which it was his duty to communicate to his principal), it is a concealment which will avoid an insurance effected by an innocent principal through another agent ignorant of any such concealment. Authority and principal compel me to answer that question in the affirmative. I will first deal with the authorities. The earliest case is Fitzherbert v. Mather (1 T. R. 12). In that case it seems to have been held that, where the conduct of the assured was wholly free from blame or suspicion, his policy was avoided by the concealment and virtual misrepresentation of an agent who had no authority to procure or direct the insurance. He was the consignor and shipper of the goods insured. The judges thought the letter was a misrepresentation. The court clearly thought that it was the duty of the agent to have given information of the loss. The concealment of the agent was the ground of the decision. The insured was held to be affected by the concealment of an agent other than an agent employed to obtain an insurance. The next case is Gladstone v. King (1 Mau. & S. 34). The insurance was on a ship on a specified voyage. It was made after the risks had commenced; but by its term (lost or not lost) it related to their commencement, and covered all prior losses. When the policy was effected, no such loss was known to the owners to have occurred; but a partial loss had in fact occurred which the master had neglected to communicate, although the information might have been given in time to have governed the terms of the insurance. He had in fact written to his owners after the loss had happened, and they were in possession of his letter when they effected the policy, but it contained no mention of the loss, nor does it appear from the report that this letter was shown to the underwriters. In that way representation was made to them founded upon its contents. In respect to them the case was simply that of the concealment of a loss, which was unknown to the assured, but which their agent was bound to communicate, and might have communicated, and it was so treated by all the judges. It was for the recovery of the partial loss that the action was brought; and it was the opinion of the court that the concealment of the master, although not being fraudulent, it did not operate to avoid the policy, yet exonerated the underwriter from the payment of the loss. Lord Ellenborough remarks that unless this rule was adopted, the master would be instructed to remain silent in all similar cases, and they (the underwriters) would incur the certainty of being rendered liable for all antecedent average losses that they could not prove to have been known to the assured. These decisions established that the knowledge of agent, not authorised to insure, may be imputed to his principal, so that his silence shall have the effect of a concealment avoiding the policy and exonerating the underwriters from the loss. They seem to me à fortiori cases to the present. The master had nothing to do with the insurance. His knowledge was, however, imputed to the plaintiffs, although he did not communicate to them what he knew. Proudfoot v. Montefiore (16 L. T. Rep. N. S. 585; 2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 572; L. Rep. 2 Q. B. 511) is a comparatively recent case. The plaintiff in Manchester employed an agent at Smyrna, who purchased and shipped for him there a cargo of madder, of which he advised him on the 12th Jan., and forwarded the shipping documents on the 19th. The ship sailed on the 23rd of that month, and went ashore the same day, whereby there was a total loss of the cargo. Next day the agent had intelligence of the loss, and might have telegraphed the casualty to his principal immediately, but refrained on purpose that his principal might insure the cargo. On the 26th, which was the earliest post day for England, he announced the loss to his principal by letter. Meanwhile, before the arrival of that letter, after the loss had been posted in Lloyd's Lists, the principal effected an insurance on the cargo. It was held the policy was void on the ground of concealment of material facts known to the agent, and therefore known to the principal. All the cases, both English and American, were reviewed, and the judgment of the court, consisting of Cockburn, C.J., Blackburn and Shee, JJ., was delivered by Cockburn, C.J., and unless that judgment is overruled it is clear that an assured cannot recover on a policy, when he has been designedly kept in ignorance of material facts by somebody whose duty it was to communicate them. The Chief Justice in his judgment says: "There was, therefore, no fraud or undue concealment by the plaintiff" (the assured) "of a material fact within his personal knowledge. On the other hand it is clear that the fact of the loss of the vessel and damage to the cargo might have been communicated to him by Rees by means of the telegraph; but was purposely kept back by the agent for the fraudulent purpose of enabling the plaintiff to insure. We think it clear, looking to the position of Rees as agent to purchase and ship the cargo for the plaintiff, that it was his duty to communicate to his principal the disaster which had happened to the cargo; and looking to the now general use of the electric telegraph in matters of mercantile interest between agents and their employers, we think it was the duty of the agent to communicate with his employers by that speedier means of communication." Further on the Chief Justice says, "that, if an agent, whose duty it is, in the ordinary course of business, to communicate information to his principal as to the state of a ship and cargo, omits to discharge such duty, the owner, in the absence of information as to any fact material to be communicated to the underwriter, effects an insurance, such insurance will be void on the ground of concealment or misrepresentation." Then come these very important words: "The insurer is entitled to assume, as the basis of the contract between him and the assured, that the latter will communicate to him every material fact of which the assured has, or in the ordinary course of business ought to have, knowledge; and that the latter will take the necessary measures by the employment of competent and honest agents to obtain, through the ordinary channels of intelligence in use in the mercantile world, all due information as to the subject-matter of the insurance. This condition is not complied with where, by the fraud or negligence of the agent, the party proposing the insurance is kept in ignorance of a material fact which ought to have been made known to the underwriter, and through such ignorance failed to disclose it." The case we are now considering is a much stronger case than Proudfoot v. Montefiore (ubi sup.), for here the agent, who designedly withheld material information, was at the time employed by the assured to effect an insurance. The case of Stribley v. The Imperial Marine Insurance Company (3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 134; 1 Q. B. Div. 507) does not appear to me to carry the matter beyond the cases already cited.

The authorities therefore support the conclusion at which I have arrived. I fail, however, to see why, in principle, there should be any distinction between the case where the insurance is effected by the agent who obtained the information, and when it is effected by another agent employed about the insurance. In both cases the assured, by a suppression of what ought to have been communicated to him, obtains an insurance which he would not otherwise have got. The underwriters are as much misled in the one case as the other. In both cases there is misconduct on the part of the agent of the assured; in both cases the underwriters are free from blame. It seems to me unjust, and against public policy, that a person, through whose agent's fault the mischief has happened, should profit to the detriment of those who are in no way in fault. On the ground of the implied contract between the parties, I am of opinion that the defendant is entitled to succeed. The concealment by an agent who is bound to give the intelligence violates the undertaking on which the contract is founded, in the same way as a similar concealment by a principal. The underwriter has a right to believe, when he accepts the risk, that he is placed in possession of all the information which the assured himself has, or which it was the duty of any agent of his to communicate. The underwriter does not intend to insure risk concealed by some agent employed to obtain an insurance, who ought to have communicated them to his principal, any more than he does risks concealed by the agent actually effecting the insurance, or concealed by the principal himself. It is admitted that freedom from misrepresentation or concealment is a condition precedent to the right of the assured to insist on the performance of the contract, so that, on a failure of the performance of the condition, the assured cannot enforce the contract. I entirely agree; but it is insisted also that, if the misrepresentation or concealment is by an agent, it does not vitiate the policy when the principal is innocent, unless the agent be the agent employed to effect the insurance. I cannot accede to that. I think there must be a freedom from misrepresentation or concealment, not only so far as the agent by or through whom the policy is effected is concerned, but in respect of any agent employed by the assured to obtain the policy, whose duty it was to communicate material facts to his principal. Any more limited construction, to my mind, would be against public policy, against principle, contrary to authority, and would tend to encourage fraud and collusion in transactions where uberrima fides is essential. The appeal, in my opinion, must be allowed.
