BILLS OF LADING ACT.

1. Indorsement by way of security only—Passing of property—Liability for freight.—A shipper of goods, who has indorsed a bill of lading in blank and delivered it to the indorsee simply by way of security for money advanced, does not thereby pass the property in the goods to the indorsee, so as to transfer to him all liabilities in respect of them within the meaning of sect. 1 of the Bills of Lading Act (18 & 19 Vict. c. 111), and consequently such an indorsee cannot be made liable in an action by the shipowner for freight. (H. of L. reversing Ct. of App.) Sewell v. Bendick page 79, 298, 376

2. Indorsement to repay advances—Passing of property—Liability for freight, &c.—Where bills of lading are indorsed for the purpose of enabling the indorsees to sell the goods named therein, and so recoup themselves for advances made by them to the indorsers, but with no intention of further passing the property, such indorsees do not incur any liability under the Bills of Lading Act (18 & 19 Vict. c. 111). BOND FOR SAFE RETURN.

See Restraint.

BOTTOMRY.

1. Bottomry bond—Essentials of—No maritime risk expressed—Advance for necessaries—Intention of parties.—A written agreement, made between the managing owner of a ship and another party, by which it is agreed that, in consideration of an advance for necessaries supplied to and for the use of the vessel, the managing owner undertakes to return the amount advanced "on the return of the said barque from her present voyage," and authorises the lender to cover the amount advanced by insurance on the barque, but which is silent as to maritime interest, is not a contract of bottomry, there being no words in the contract purporting to pledge the ship as security for the loan, and it not appearing that the parties ever had any intention of creating a bottomry bond (Ct. of App.) The Heinrich Bjorn page 391

2. Extent of master's authority—cargo owners—Amount of loan—Necessity.—The authority of a master to raise money on bottomry is limited as against the owners of cargo to such an amount as is necessary to enable the ship to complete her voyage with safety, and even where the money is advanced by a person who is not the ship's agent and has no interest in the repairs effected on the ship, and honestly believes from inquiries made that the money is necessary, he cannot recover as against the cargo owner anything in respect of items other than those which are in fact necessary. (Ct. of App., affirming Adm. Div.) The Pontida 284, 330

3. Practice—Default action—Affidavit of service—Writ—Order XIII. r. 2.—A plaintiff in an undefended bottomry action must, before he can obtain judgment by default, in addition to filing an affidavit of service in the Registry, as provided by Order XIII., r. 2, annex thereto the original writ. (Adm.) The Eppos 180

4. Registrar and merchants—Amount of claim—Reduction in—Commissions and premium—The registrar and merchants have a discretionary power to reduce items claimed for commissions and premium under a bottomry bond, should they deem them unnecessary or exorbitant, and the court will not interfere with this discretion, unless it be shown that the registrar and merchants have exercised it on an erroneous principle. (Ct. of App., affirming Adm. Div.) The Pontida ..... page 284, 330

CARRIAGE OF GOODS.

1. Bill of lading—Holder's liability for freight, demurrage, &c.—Presentation.—Where the holder of a bill of lading, under which he is entitled to the delivery of goods on certain terms as to freight, demurrage, and taking delivery, presents that bill of lading and demands delivery of the goods, he thereby primâ facie offers to perform those terms of the bill of lading on which alone the goods are deliverable to him. (Cave, J.) Allen v. Coltart and Co. ..... page 104

2. Bill of lading—Signature by agent for master—Short delivery—Estoppel—Bills of Lading Act.—The signature of a master's agent to a bill of lading does not estop the shipowner, and hence where a master's agent signs a bill of lading for more goods than had actually been put on board the ship, the shipowner is not liable to the assignees of the bill of lading, for not delivering all the goods named in the bill of lading, although all the goods had been floated alongside the ship, and mate's receipts given for them, but some were lost before they were shipped. (Ct. of App.) Thorman v. Burt, Boulton and Co. 563

3. Damage to cargo—General ship—Stranding—Duty of master as to repairs—If a vessel carrying a cargo belonging to different shippers after she has started on her voyage receive damage, the master, in considering what steps he shall take in regard to carrying on the cargo or first repairing the ship, is bound to consider not one individual interest, but the interests of all concerned, and to do that which a prudent master would do under the circumstances, whether it be to return to his port of loading and repair, or repair at the nearest possible place before proceeding, or go on without repairing; and if it be in his power to effect the repairs without any great delay or expense to the interests intrusted to his charge it is his duty to repair before proceeding. (Adm. Div.) The Rona 259

4. Damage to cargo—General ship—Stranding—Duty of master as to repairs—The R., a wooden vessel under charter-party from the port of New York to London with a cargo of grain and flour, whilst being towed down the New York river stranded on the Craven Shoal, about ten miles below New York. A tug towed at her for an hour and three-quarters before she was got off, during which time her decks and waterways were much strained, and she was then found to be making five inches of water per hour; but the master did not examine her or cause any repairs or caulking to be done, but proceeded on the voyage and encountered very severe weather. On arrival in London the flour of the plaintiff, which was immediately beneath the deck, was found to have been damaged by the sea water making its way through the deck, the grain at the bottom of the ship being uninjured. Held, that the master was negligent in not repairing; that is, in not caulking the deck before he proceeded on his voyage, that the ship was more liable thereby to sustain damage and to injure the cargo, and that the defendants were liable for the damage occasioned thereby. (Adm. Div.) The Rona..... page 259

5. Damage to cargo—Measure of damages—Delay—Discharge of cargo—Right to reship and carry on—Lien of shipowner—Freight.—The steamship K., having just started on a voyage from C. to B. with a cargo of coals, carried under charter for the plaintiffs, came into collision with the B. at the port of loading. The K. put back and discharged her cargo for the purpose of repairs. The coal was found to be damaged, and its owners (the plaintiffs) were advised that it was unfit for reshipment, and that, for the good of all parties interested, it should be sold at C., and not carried on to B. The owners of the K. refused to part with the cargo or to take any other cargo except upon fresh terms as to freight The plaintiffs made no inquiry as to these terms, and the coals were reshipped and carried on to B., where, being useless for the purposes of the plaintiffs' locomotives, for which they had been originally intended, they were used in the plaintiffs' smithies. The owners of the B. having admitted liability, and the damages being referred to the registrar, he reported that in his opinion the shipowner was not entitled to insist upon reshipment of the damaged cargo, and that the plaintiffs' damages were the loss they would have sustained if the coals had been sold at the port of lading. Held, on objection to the report, that the cargo, though damaged, was capable of being carried on, and that, therefore, the shipowner having a lien upon it for freight to be earned, was entitled to insist upon carrying it on, or to exact fresh terms as to freight for another cargo, and that the damages were the loss to the plaintiffs at B., and not at C.; but that it was the duty of the cargo owner to have inquired what the fresh terms as to freight were, so as to diminish the loss as far as possible, and that in ascertaining this loss the saving which could have been effected by shipping a fresh cargo on new terms must be taken into consideration by the registrar, and that the report must go back to the registrar to ascertain the damages upon this basis. Held, also, that the fact that the coal was used in the plaintiffs' smithies at B. did not necessarily show that the difference between the value of locomotive and smithy coals was the measure of the plaintiffs' loss, but the actual reduction in its value occasioned by the collision must be ascertained. (Adm. Div.) The Blenheim 522

6. Damage to cargo—Ship stranded—Salvage expenses—Liability of shipowners.—Where, owing to negligent navigation, a ship is cast ashore and her cargo thereby suffers damage and loss, money paid by the underwriters of the cargo to a salvage association, who are employed with the assent of the shipowners, for saving a portion of the cargo, is not a voluntary payment, and is recoverable by the cargo owners from the shipowners, being money paid on behalf of the cargo owners to avert a loss which would have fallen on the shipowners if the portion of the cargo had not been salved and sent on to its destination. (Ct. of App., affirming Huddleston, B.) Scaramanga and others v. Martin, Marquand, and Co. ...page 410, 506

7. Delivery of cargo—Bill of lading—To discharge in dock always afloat—Duty and right of shipowner.—Where a bill of lading incorporates a clause in the charter-party to the effect that "the ship shall proceed to a port to discharge in a dock as ordered on arriving, if sufficient water, or so near thereunto as she may safely get, always afloat," such clause is introduced in the interest of the shipowner, and restricts the generality of the power to name a dock; and while the obligation of the shipowner is to proceed to the dock named, if there is sufficient water to enter the dock when the order is given, on the other hand, if there is not then sufficient water, the ship is not bound to discharge in the dock named. (Cave, J.) Allen v. Coltart and Co. ... 104

8. Delivery of cargo—Landing—Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 63), s. 67—Notice of readiness to deliver.—The 7th subsection of the Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act 1862, s. 67, entitling the owner of goods to twenty-four hours' notice in writing of the shipowner's readiness to deliver the goods does not apply where the goods are landed under subsect. 6 of the same section for the purpose of convenience in assorting the same. (Adm.) The Clan Macdonald 148

9. Delivery of cargo—Landing—Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 63), s. 67,—Notice of readiness to deliver—Duty of consignee—Liability for charges.—It is the duty of the owner of goods who receives notice that his goods are landed under the provisions of sect. 67, sub-sect. 6, of the Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act 1862, and are ready for delivery, to take them within a reasonable time after the notice, and if he fails to do so, he will be liable for the charges occasioned by his delay. (Adm.) The Clan Macdonald 148

10. Delivery of cargo — Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 63), s. 67—Notice of readiness to deliver.—The notice required by sect. 67 of the Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act 1862 is sufficiently given to the owner of the goods if given to a lighterman employed by him to take delivery of the goods. (Adm.) The Clan Macdonald 148

11. Delivery of goods from ship's tackles—Discharge on to quay—Customs of port of London—Bill of lading.—Goods were shipped under a bill of lading at Calcutta to be delivered in like good order and condition from the ship's tackles (where the ship's responsibility shall cease) at the port of London, &c. On arrival in the port of London the consignee demanded overside delivery into lighters immediately from the ship's tackles. The shipowner landed them on the dock wharf, and was ready to deliver them thence into the consignee's lighters, but the consignee carted them away, thereby becoming liable to and paying certain dock charges. In an action by the consignee against the shipowner to recover the amount so paid, the jury found that there was a custom for steamships with a general cargo (the defendants' ships being such) coming into the port of London, and using the docks, to discharge the goods on to the quay and thence into lighters. Held, that the custom found was not inconsistent with the terms of the bill of lading, and that the shipowner was entitled to discharge the goods on to the quay, and was not liable for the charges sought to be recovered. (Ct. of App.) Marzetti v. Smith and Son ..... page 166

12. Demurrage—Charter-party—Prevention by frost—Goods not in dock or ready.—Where it is agreed by charter-party that a ship shall proceed to a certain dock and there load in the customary manner, an exception that the charterer is not to be liable for demurrage if the loading is prevented by frost is confined to such frost as prevents the actual loading on board of the goods which are in the dock ready to be loaded, and does not cover frost which prevents the shipper getting his goods to the dock. (H. of L., affirming Ct. of App.) Grant v. Coverdale and others 74, 353

13. Demurrage—Charter-party—"Prompt despatch in loading"—Cargo not produced fast enough.—Charterers are liable for delay under a charter-party providing that the ship shall receive prompt despatch in loading where the facilities of the port are greater than the production of the cargo from the mines, and in consequence of want of facilities in getting the cargo from the mines the ship is delayed in loading. (P. C.) Elliot v. Lord 63

14. Demurrage—Charter-party—Running days—Lay days—Custom of port—Removal of ship.—"Running days" in a charter-party, in the absence of custom, are consecutive days, but a custom of a port by which days occupied in moving the ship from one part of the port to another, are not counted as lay days is consistent with a charter-party providing for so many running days as lay days, and it is a reasonable custom. (Ct. of App.) Nielsen and Co. v. Wait, James, and Co. 553

15. Demurrage—Charter-party—Ship to discharge always afloat—Custom of port of Gloucester—Partial discharge at Sharpness—Time occupied going to and from Gloucester basin.—By charter-party it was agreed that the plaintiffs' steamship, having loaded a grain cargo, should therewith proceed to a port in the Bristol Channel as ordered, "or so near thereto as she may safely get at all times of tide and always afloat, eight running days, Sundays excepted, to be allowed the merchants if the ship be not sooner despatched for loading and discharging." The ship was ordered to discharge at Gloucester, and having arrived at Sharpness dock, which is within the port of Gloucester, but some miles from the basin where grain cargoes are discharged if the ship's burthen will admit, partial delivery was there made owing to the ship not being able to get to the basin till part of her cargo was discharged. The consignees then required the ship to be taken to the basin where the discharge was completed, when the vessel returned to Sharpness. In an action for demurrage, the following custom of the port of Gloucester was proved, viz., that the customary place for discharging grain cargoes was at the basin; that when vessels laden therewith were of too heavy a burthen to get there, they were lightened at Sharpness; that during the discharge at Sharpness the lay days counted, but that the time occupied in going up to the basin and returning to Sharpness was not counted. Held, that the custom was reasonable, and that it was not inconsistent with the express terms of the charter as to "running days," and that therefore the time occupied by the ship in going from Sharpness to the basin and in returning, ought to be excluded from the lay days. (Ct. of App.) Nielsen and Co. v. Wait, James, and Co. 553

16. Demurrage—Charter-party—Ship to proceed to and deliver at a port or as near as she can safely get at all times of tide and always afloat—End of voyage—Commencement of running days.—Where a ship, in pursuance of a charter-party providing that she shall load a cargo and being so loaded proceed to a port named, "or so near thereto as she may safely get at all times of the tide and always afloat," proceeds as near thereto as she can get in the then state of the tide with her full cargo always afloat, and then is ready and offers to deliver sufficient to enable her to get to the port named, the shipowner is entitled from the date of his readiness to deliver to demurrage as the words "at all times of the tide" relieve him from any liability to wait a reasonable time for the tide, and the voyage is therefore terminated on the ship's arrival at the nearest place to the port named, which she could reach with a full cargo in the state of the tides then prevailing. (North, J.) Horsley v. Price and Co. ..... page 106

17. Demurrage—Charter-party—To discharge alongside wharf or into lighter—End of voyage—Commencement of running days.—Where by the terms of a charter-party a ship was to load a cargo "and therewith proceed to D. and deliver the same alongside consignee's or railway wharf, or into lighters or any vessel or wharf where she may safely deliver, as ordered;" and upon her arrival at D. she was ordered to discharge at the railway wharf, but, owing to all the discharging berths being occupied, she was not berthed till twenty-four hours after her arrival in dock, the Court, in an action for demurrage, held that the voyage was not completed until the ship was berthed at the railway wharf, and therefore the defendants were not liable for demurrage for the period between the ship's arrival in dock at D. and her being berthed at the railway wharf. (Q. B. Div.) Murphy v. Coffin and Co. .....531 n.

18. Demurrage—Charter-party—To discharge at such "ready quay berth as ordered"—End of voyage—Commencement of discharging days.—Where by a charter-party it was agreed that the plaintiffs' vessel, after loading a cargo, should proceed "to London or Tyne Dock to such ready quay berth as ordered by the charterers," demurrage at an agreed rate per day, and the captain or owners to have an absolute lien on the cargo for all freight, dead freight, and demurrage, and the vessel was ordered by the charterers to a London dock, but upon her arrival there there was no quay berth ready for her reception, and a delay of one day was thereby caused in discharging her cargo, the court held, in an action by the shipowner claiming a lien upon the cargo for demurrage, that, on the true construction of the charter-party, the charterers were bound to name and provide a ready quay berth, and that for a delay caused by their neglecting to do so the plaintiffs were entitled to a lien on the cargo for demurrage, the damages being sufficiently in the nature of demurrage to come within the demurrage clause in the charter-party. (Ct. of App.) Harris and Dixon v. Marcus, Jacobs, and Co. 530

19. Excepted perils—Bill of lading—Collision—Negligence—Perils of the sea.—A collision between two ships caused by the negligence of either, without the elements contributing to the accident, is not a peril of the seas within the meaning of those words in a bill of lading. (Ct. of App., reversing Hawkins, J.)—Woodley and Co. v. Michell and Co. 71

20. Excepted perils—Bill of lading—Collision—Negligence—Perils of the sea.—The plaintiffs were the owners of a cargo of barley, shipped at Caen on board the defendants' schooner Kate for delivery in London. The bill of lading was in the usual form, the only exception contained in it being the exception of "perils of the sea." The Kate, while sailing up the Thames, collided with a steamer, and was sunk, and the cargo lost. In an action to recover the value of the cargo the jury found that the collision was caused by the Kate starboarding her helm, but that there was no negligence on her part. There was no finding as to the steamer. Held, that the loss was not occasioned by a peril of the sea. (Ct. of App., reversing Hawkins, J.) Woodley and Co. v. Michell and Co. ..... page 71

21. Excepted perils—Bill of lading—Damage to cargo—Unseaworthiness.—The excepted perils in a bill of lading have no application to the case of a ship sailing in an unseaworthy condition; and hence they are no defence to an action brought for loss or damage to the charterer's goods occasioned by such unseaworthiness. (Adm. Div.) The Glenfruin 413

22. Excepted perils—Bill of lading—Liability for damage to cattle—Foot-and-mouth disease—Unseaworthy ship.—A clause in a bill of lading exempting shipowners from responsibility for cattle, whether arising from "their escape from the steamer, or for accidents, disease, or mortality," and limiting their liability to 5*l.* per head, does not exempt them from liability for loss occasioned by their failing to provide a fit ship, as the clause applies only to things occurring during the voyage, and the shipowners are therefore liable for injury by foot-and-mouth disease caused by their negligence in not cleansing the ship before the commencement of the voyage. (Q. B. Div.) Tattersall v. The National Steamship Company Limited 206

23. Excepted perils—Bill of lading—Negligence of master and crew—Collision between ships belonging to same owners—Both ships to blame—Division of damages.—Where a vessel carrying cargo under a bill of lading providing against loss and damage from collision and loss or damage from any act, neglect, or default whatsoever of the pilots, master, mariners, or other servants of the owners in navigating the ship, collides with another vessel belonging to the same owners by reason of the joint negligence of both vessels and the cargo is lost, there is no liability under the contract of carriage, as such loss is covered by the above exceptions, but the owners are liable in tort for the negligence of their servants on board the vessel not carrying the cargo, and in such circumstances the Admiralty Court rule as to the division of damages applies, and the shipowners are liable for half of the loss. (Ct. of App.) The Chartered Mercantile Bank of India, &c. v. The Netherlands India Steam Navigation Company Limited 65

24. Excepted perils—Dangers and accidents of the sea — Charter-party — Bill of lading—Rats.—Damage to cargo caused by sea water entering through a pipe which has been gnawed through by rats, where there is no negligence on the part of the master and crew, and all reasonable precautions have been taken to keep down rats, is "a danger or accident of the seas" within the meaning of a charter-party and bill of lading. (Lopes, L.J. Since reversed by the Court of Appeal. See next volume.) Pandorf and Co. v. Hamilton, Fraser, and Co. 568

25. Freight—Advance of — Charter-party — Final sailing from port—Limits of port—Commercial or fiscal.—Where a charter-party provides for an advance of freight within a specified time from final sailing of the vessel from her last port in the United Kingdom, and the vessel is towed outside the limits of the port, as understood in its ordinary commercial sense, for the purpose of proceeding on her voyage, but is driven back by stress of weather, she is to be taken as having finally sailed from her last port, and her owners are entitled to the freight. (Ct. of App.) Price v. Livingstone ..... page 13

26. Freight—Lien—Bill of lading—Incorporation of charter-party—Rights of consignees.—Where by a bill of lading freight is payable at a certain rate and "other conditions as per charter-party," and by the charter-party freight is payable at a higher rate, and the shipowner is given an absolute lien on the cargo for freight, the shipowner has no right as against the consignees, who were not the charterers, to detain the cargo to enforce payment of freight at the rate mentioned in the charter-party, the conditions as to freight mentioned in the charter not being incorporated in the bill of lading, and the consignees being entitled to delivery upon payment of the freight mentioned in the bill of lading. (Ct. of App.) Gardner and Son v. Trechmann 558

27. Freight and demurrage—Bill of lading—Incorporation of charter—Inconsistent clause—Cesser of liability clause.—The words in a bill of lading "paying freight and all other conditions as per charter-party so far as they are consistent with the bill of lading, and therefore a charterer and shipper who is also the consignee and receiver of a cargo under a bill of lading containing the above words is not exempted from liability for demurrage at the port of discharge by reason of a clause in the charter-party stating that the responsibility of the charterer is to cease as soon as the cargo is on board, the vessel holding a lien upon the cargo for freight and demurrage. (Ct. of App., affirming Q. B. Div.) Gullichsen v. Stewart Brothers 130, 200

28. Lien of shipowner—Delay by negligence of shipowner—Discharge—Reshipment—Right to carry on—Freight.—When a cargo has been shipped, and the voyage is delayed by an accident not within the perils excepted in the contract of affreightment (to wit, a collision caused by the negligence of the carrying ship), in consequence of which the cargo has to be discharged, the shipowner has a lien on the cargo for the purpose of enabling him to earn his freight, and the cargo owner is not entitled to insist on delivery of the cargo without payment of freight before the completion of the voyage on which the freight is to be earned, but the shipowner may insist upon reshipping the original cargo if it is capable of being carried on. (Adm. Div.) The Blenheim ... 522

29. Loss of cargo—Measure of damage—Collision—Both ships to blame—Admiralty Court rule.—The Admiralty Court rule that in cases of collision the damages are to be equally divided where both ships are to blame, does not apply to actions for breach of contract of carriage brought by owners of cargo against the carrying ship to recover damages for loss of, or injury to, their goods, and hence the plaintiffs in such actions are entitled to recover their full damages from the owners of the carrying ship. (Adm. Div.) The Bushire ... 416

30. Loss of cargo—Negligence of shipowner—Measure of damages—Advance freight—Premium of insurance.—Where goods are shipped under a charter-party providing for an advance of freight within a month of the ship sailing "lost or not lost," and the advance is duly paid, but the ship and cargo on the voyage are lost by the negligence of the shipowners or their servants, the damages recoverable being the value of the cargo at its point of destination, the cargo owners are entitled to recover from the shipowner, as part of such value, the advance of freight and premiums of insurance paid on the cargo. (Denman, J.) Great Indian Peninsula Railway Company v. Turnbull .....page 465

31. Practice—Interrogatories—Damage to cargo—Anticipation of defendant's case—Inadmissibility.—Where, in an action by the shipper of goods against the shipowner for non-delivery, the defendant admits that the goods were not delivered, and alleges that he was prevented from delivering them by the perils excepted in the bill of lading, interrogatories for the purpose of showing that the ship was unseaworthy when she left port, and sank soon afterwards in consequence of a cock being left open, are inadmissible, the interrogatories not being based upon facts which must inevitably occur in the ordinary course of the voyage, and there being nothing to show that they were not purely hypothetical, as well as being objectionable, on the ground that the plaintiff's case was complete on the admission of non-delivery, and that they were administered merely for the purpose of anticipating the defendant's case. (Q. B. Div.) Grumbrecht and others v. Parry 176

32. Practice—Interrogatories—Damage to cargo—Details of navigation—Duty to inquire from agents.—In an action for damage to cargo the plaintiffs are entitled to answers to interrogatories respecting the details of the navigation of the vessel at the time the loss occurred, if the shipowners' servants or agents possess the necessary information and it would come to their knowledge in the ordinary course of business; and they are not excused from answering on the ground of want of personal knowledge of the facts inquired about. (Ct. of App., reversing Q. B. Div.) Bolckow, Vaughan, and Co. v. Fisher and others..... 20

33. Warranty of seaworthiness—Bill of lading—Latent defect—Breaking of screw-shaft.—The warranty of seaworthiness implied in a bill of lading is an absolute warranty that the ship shall be in fact fit for the voyage, and not merely that the shipowner shall take all reasonable care to make her so fit; and hence a latent effect in the screw-shaft existing prior to the commencement of the voyage, and resulting in the breaking of the shaft, is a breach of the shipowner's warranty of seaworthiness, although the shipowner may have taken all reasonable precaution in the selection of the shaft. (Adm. Div.) The Glenfruin... 413

CARRIAGE OF PASSENGER.

1. Passenger's ticket—Exceptions from liability—Loss of life—Collision—Negligence.—Under a contract by ticket for the carriage of a passenger by sea containing a notice that the shipowners will not be responsible for any loss, damage, or detention of luggage under any circumstances; nor for the maintenance or loss of time of a passenger during any detention of their vessels, nor for any delay arising out of accidents, nor for any loss or damage arising from perils of the seas, or from machinery, boilers, or steam, or from any act, neglect, or default whatsoever of the pilot, master, or mariners, the shipowners are not liable in an action for the loss of life of a passenger caused by the negligence of their servants in a collision with another ship. (Ct. of App., affirming Q. B. Div.) Haigh v. The Royal Mail Steam Packet Company 47, 189

2. Passenger's ticket—Exceptions from liability—Loss of luggage—Negligence.—Under a contract by ticket for the carriage of a passenger containing (inter alia) a condition that the shipowners will not be responsible for any loss or damage to luggage "in any circumstances" the shipowners are not liable for the loss of a passenger's luggage, even though occasioned by negligence. (Ct. of Ex.) Thompson v. Royal Mail Steam Packet Company .....page 190 n.

CHAIN CABLES AND ANCHORS ACT 1874.

Warranty—Application—British and foreign ships.—The 4th section of the Chain Cables and Anchors Act 1874 providing that contracts for the sales of chain cables shall, in the absence of an express stipulation to the contrary, be deemed to imply a warranty that the chain cable has been tested and stamped in accordance with the Chain Cables and Anchors Act 1864 to 1874 applies to all contracts for the sale of chain cables, and is not confined by the provisions of sect. 3 to contracts for the sale of chain cables for the use of British ships. (Q. B. Div.) Hall v. Billingham and Sons 538

CHARTER-PARTY.

1. Authority to charter — Master — Absence of owners.—The authority of a master to bind his owners by charter-party arises when he is in a foreign port, and his owners are not there, and there is difficulty in communicating with them. (Ct. of App.) The Fanny; The Mathilda..... 75

2. Authority to charter—Master—Broker—Foreign port.—A master has no authority to bind his owners by writing forward to a broker in a foreign port, prior to the ship's arrival therein, authorising the broker to charter his ship. (Ct. of App.) The Fanny; The Mathilda 75

3. Authority to charter — Master — Holding-out agent—Owners.—A master is not the agent for his owners to hold out a person as authorised to charter his ship, so as to bind the owners. (Ct. of App.) The Fanny; The Mathilda 75

4. Authority to charter—Master—Broker—Foreign port—Ratification.—G., a shipbroker at G. G., chartered the Finnish vessels F. and M. prior to their arrival at G. G., and without communication with the owners. G. had on several previous occasions chartered the F. and M. under similar circumstances, and all of these charter-parties had been carried into effect. After the arrival of the F. and M. at G. G., their masters were on several occasions at G.'s office, and were shown their charter-parties. A fortnight after the vessels' arrival at G. G., during which time freight had risen, the masters refused to take up the charter-parties. Held, that the masters by their conduct had not ratified the charter-parties in such a way as to make them binding. (Ct. of App., reversing Adm.) The Fanny; The Mathilda..... 75

5. Cancellation clause — Port of loading — Non-arrival of ship—Excepted perils.—The cancellation clause in a charter-party being for the benefit of the charterers, and the arrival of the ship on a date therein named being a condition precedent to the duty of the shipowner to load, the excepted perils mentioned in the charter-party have no application to such a clause, and hence, where the ship is prevented by these perils from arriving at the port of loading by the date mentioned, the charterers have the right to cancel. (Q. B. Div.) Smith v. Dart .....page 360

6. Port—Limits of—Commercial or fiscal.—In construing a charter-party, the word "port" is to be understood in its ordinary commercial sense, and not as defined for fiscal purposes. (Ct. of App.) Price v. Livingstone 13
Sailing Ship Garston Company v. Hickie and Co. 499

7. Practice—Evidence—Stamp Act 1870 (33 & 34 Vict. c. 97), ss. 15, 67, 68—Execution abroad.—A charter-party wholly executed by both parties thereto abroad, is duly stamped so as to be admissible in evidence if it has been stamped within two months after it has been first received in the United Kingdom as provided by sect. 15 of the Stamp Act 1870, and it is not necessary that such a charter-party should be stamped under sect. 68 of the same Act. (Adm. Div.) The Belfort 291

8. Practice—Evidence—Stamp Act 1870—Form of Stamp.—Semble, that a charter-party wholly executed by both parties thereto abroad must be stamped with an impressed stamp, and not with an adhesive stamp. (Adm. Div.) The Belfort... 291

9. Practice — Misdirection — Construction — Safe loading place.—In an action for breach of charter-party, an expression of opinion by the judge that certain port is a "safe loading place" is not a misdirection if he leaves the question to the jury. (Q. B. Div.) Smith v. Dart..... 360

COALING.

COLLISION.

1. Compulsory pilotage—Duty of master to interfere—Fog—Liability of owners.—Although the pilot in charge of a ship by compulsion of law is under ordinary circumstances solely responsible for getting the ship under way, yet, if the weather is so bad by reason of fog or other circumstances as to make navigation manifestly perilous and to give rise to a plain prospect of danger, it is the duty of the master to interfere, and he is to blame if he permits his vessel to get under way in such circumstances. (Adm. Div.) The Oakfield 575

2. Compulsory pilotage—Duty and power of pilot—Position of anchor.—The position of an anchor, which is required for letting go in a port, is within the discretion of the pilot in charge, and if damage is occasioned to another vessel by reason of the anchor so being placed with a compulsory pilot's consent or directions, the owners are exempted from liability for such damage. (Ct. of App.) The Rigborgs Minde..... 123

3. Compulsory pilotage — Exemption — Passing through limits of pilotage district—Coaling—Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 63) s. 41.—Where a steamship is passing through the limits of any pilotage district in the United Kingdom, on a voyage between two places, both situate out of such district, but stops at a port within that district for the purpose of coaling only, the provisions of sect. 41 of the Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act 1862 do not exempt her from compulsory pilotage, the words "loading or discharging" therein mentioned not being confined to cargo. (Ct. of App., affirming Adm.) The Winston .....page 143, 274

4. Compulsory pilotage—Lights—Breach of regulations—Duties of master and pilot.—The exhibition of an improper light, or the failure to carry the regulation lights, is not excused by the fact that it was done in obedience to the orders of a compulsory pilot, it being the duty of the master to see that the lights required by the regulations are carried. (Adm. Div.) The Ripon 365

5. Compulsory pilotage—Order by pilot on suggestion of master.—Exemption of owners.—Where a pilot in charge of a vessel by compulsion of law gives at the suggestion of the master an improper order which brings about a collision, such interference by the master does not transfer the responsibility of the pilot to the master so as to deprive the shipowners of the defence of compulsory pilotage to an action to recover the damages occasioned by the collision. (Adm. Div.) The Oakfield 575

6. Compulsory pilotage—Port of Hull—Change of pilots—Hull pilot Act (2 & 3 Will. 4, c. 105, Local and Personal), ss. 22, 36, 41.—Pilotage is compulsory on vessels coming into the port of Hull, and, where the vessel is going into dock, remains compulsory until she reaches her ultimate destination in the dock, and does not cease because the vessel anchors in the river waiting the tide to go into dock. The fact that the pilot who brings her to an anchor leaves her there, and she is taken on by another pilot in consequence of an arrangement among the Humber pilots, does not affect the compulsion. (Ct. of App.) The Rigborgs Minde 123

7. Costs—Both ships to blame—Defendant exempt by compulsory pilotage—No counter-claim.—The rule that where both ships are found to blame for a collision each party bears his own costs is to be followed in a case where the defendants' ship, which does not counter-claim, is held to be exempt from liability on the ground of compulsory pilotage. (Ct. of App.) The Rigborgs Minde 123

8. Costs—Claim and counter-claim—Cross reference.—In cases of collision, where both vessels are held to blame, and the amount of damage is referred to the registrar, and less than one-fourth is struck off the respective claim and counter-claim of the plaintiffs and the defendants, the costs of substantiating the plaintiffs' claim at the reference will be borne by the defendants, and the costs of substantiating the defendant's counter-claim at the reference by the plaintiffs. (Adm.) The Mary 33
The Savernake .....34 n.

9. Costs—Reference—Withdrawal of part of claim—Amount allowed.—Where a plaintiff in a reference in a collision action withdraws a large item of his claim at the reference and not before, and he recovers less than two-thirds of the amount originally claimed, but more than two-thirds of the amount which remains after his withdrawal of the above item, the original amount of his claim before withdrawal is the claim upon which costs are to be given, and he is not entitled to his costs. (Adm.) The Eilean Dubh 154

10. Costs—Both ships to blame—One exempt by reason of compulsory pilotage—Appeal—Decree below varied.—Where the Court of Appeal varies the decision of the Admiralty Court, finding one vessel solely to blame for a collision, by finding both vessels to blame, each party bears his own costs, both in the court below and in the Court of Appeal, and the fact that the owners of one are exempt from liability on the ground of compulsory pilotage makes no difference to this rule. (Ct. of App.) The Hector .....page 101

11. Damages—Advance as against freight—Bill of lading and policy assigned as security—Right of holders to recover—Shipowners' cargo.—Where cargo is shipped on the shipowners' account and money is advanced to them by persons who take as security an assignment of a policy of insurance on the freight, and a bill of lading signed by the master and indorsed by him with a receipt of a sum of money on account of freight named in the bill of lading, and the ship is run down and sunk by the negligence of another vessel, the persons advancing the money as holders of the bill of lading have sufficient interest in the goods and freight to entitle them to recover from the owners of the wrong-doing vessel the sum of money advanced on account of freight. (Adm.) The Thyatira 147

12. Damages—Both ships to blame—One exempt by reason of compulsory pilotage—Amount recoverable.—Where in an action of collision it is held that it was occasioned by the fault of both vessels, but one of such vessels is exempt from liability on the ground of compulsory pilotage, the latter vessel is entitled by the Admiralty Court rule to recover half the damages sustained by her in the collision, and is not limited to the difference between half her damage and half the damage of the other ship. (Ct. of App.) The Hector 101

13. Damages—Consequential—Loss of charter-party.—Where a vessel by reason of a collision brought about by the wrongful navigation of another vessel, is obliged to abandon a charter-party, the loss arising from the abandonment of such charter is a loss caused by the collision, and as such must be made good by the wrong-doing vessel. (Adm.) The Consett.....34 n.

14. Damages—Division of—Breach of regulations by one ship—Both to blame.—Where two vessels are damaged by collision, for which both are to blame, one for wrongful navigation and the other for a breach of the Regulations for Preventing Collision at Sea, it not being shown that such breach could not possibly have contributed to the collision the damages are to be divided between the parties, according to the Admiralty Court rule. (P. C.) The Hochung; The Lapwing 39

15. Damages—Latent damage not caused by collision—Repair required by Board of Trade surveyor—Liability for.—Where a ship is damaged by collision and on opening her up to effect the repairs rendered necessary by the collision, certain parts of her not injured by the collision are found to be rotten and have to be renewed by order of the Board of Trade official, the cost of such renewal cannot be charged to the collision damage, although such parts, but for such opening up would have lasted some years. (Adm. Div.) The Princess 451

16. Damages—Loss of freight—Shipowners' cargo—Assignment of freight—Assignees right on loss of ship.—Where shipowners ship their own goods in their own ship they may, by indorsement of a bill of lading naming the right of freight, assign under the name of freight the enhanced value of the goods at the port of destination so as to give the assignees a right of action against wrong-doers causing the loss of ship and cargo. Whether the amount assigned under the name of freight is within the enhanced value is a question for inquiry. (Adm.) The Thyatira 147

17. Damages—Measure of—Cargo owned by shipowner—Freight—Value at destination.—In a case of total loss at sea by collision, a shipowner who has cargo of his own on board is entitled to recover, in lieu of freight, what would have been the enhanced value of the cargo at its destination, less the expenses of earning that value, and that is the proper form of claim, and not a claim for expenses in making the ship fit for sea, &c. (Adm.) The Thyatira .....page 178

18. Damages—Measure of—Delay—Loss of market.—Where by reason of a collision between two steamships, occasioned by the negligence of one, goods carried by the other are delayed in transit. damages for loss of market are not recoverable from the owners of the wrong-doing steamer, such damages being too remote by reason of the uncertainty of the duration of a sea voyage. (Ct. of App.) The Notting Hill 241

19. Damages—Measure of—Loss of fishing—Average profits—Registrar and merchants.—Where the plaintiff in a damage action claimed for demurrage upon the basis of loss of fishing during repairs, and the registrar and merchants estimated that loss by taking the average catch of similar vessels during the period of repairs, the court, on objection to the registrar's report, confirmed the report with costs. (Adm.) The Risoluto..... 93

20. Damages—Measure of—Salvage consequent on collision—Commission on bail.—In a damage action the plaintiffs are not entitled to recover as part of their damages a sum paid by them as commission on bail given in an action brought against their ship by salvors whose services were necessitated by the collision. (Adm. Div.) The British Commerce 335

21. Dangerous machine—Steam steering gear—Duty to maintain efficient—Absence of negligence.—The rule that a man is bound to maintain his property in such a condition that it is not dangerous to the public, applies to fixed and immovable property only, and not to movable chattels, and hence does not apply to a ship and the parts thereof, so as to make the shipowner, in the absence of negligence, liable for a collision caused by a defect in the construction in the ship's steam steering gear. (Adm. Div.) The European 417

22. Dangerous machine—Steam steering gear—Latent defect—Absence of negligence—Public Highway.—The user of a ship steered by steam steering gear in a crowded river is not the user of a dangerous machine in such a way as to render the shipowner, in the absence of negligence, liable for damages resulting from a collision occasioned by a failure of the steering apparatus. (Adm. Div.) The European..... 417

23. Dangerous machine—Steam steering gear—Latent defect—Previous failure—Evidence of negligence.—Where a ship comes into collision in a crowded river with another vessel by reason of her patent steam steering going wrong and getting out of control, and it is shown that such steering gear has on a previous occasion gone wrong in a similar way, and that after being carefully examined by a competent engineer, who has not been able to discover any defect, it has been replaced in the ship without alteration, such user in a crowded river, the hand gear on the ship being available, is evidence of negligence, rendering the shipowner liable for the damage occasioned by the collision. (Adm. Div.) The European..... 417

24. Danube Regulations, Titre 2, cap. 2, art. 34—Duty of vessels as to side of river—Fog.—Under art. 34, cap. 2, titre 2, of the Danube Regulations, directing that, where two steamships meet going in opposite directions, "ils sont tenus de se diriger de telle sorte qu'ils viennent tous deux sur tribord. A cet effet le bâtiment qui remonte le fleuve doit appuyer vers la rive gauche, et celui qui descend vers la rive droite," vessels going down the river are bound to keep to the right bank, and if a vessel in a mist after sunset keep to the left bank and come into collision with another vessel, the breach of the rule is negligence. (Priv. Co.) The Yourri; The Spearman. 458

25. Humber Navigation Rules—Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea—Merchant Shipping Act 1873, s. 117.—The rules for the navigation of the river Humber are regulations contained in or made under the Merchant Shipping Acts 1854 to 1873, within the meaning of sect. 17 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1873; and hence their infringement will be visited with the result prescribed by that Act. (Adm. Div.) The Ripon .. 365

26. Humber Navigation Rules, arts. 2, 11—Anchor light astern—Stern light—Special circumstances.—Where a two-masted vessel in pursuance of art. 2 of the Rules for the Navigation of the River Humber, carries a second riding light astern in the position therein prescribed, and continues to carry such light after she gets under way and is crossing the river for the purpose of warning vessels going up or coming down of her position, the carrying of such a light at such a height above the deck is a breach of the regulations, and cannot be deemed to be the showing of a stern light within the meaning of art. 11, or warranted by the "special circumstances of the case," within art. 24. (Adm. Div.) The Ripon 365

27. Launch—Necessary precautions—Crowded river.—The duty of persons in charge of a launch, to take reasonable precautions to warn other vessels navigating the river before the vessel is launched, is to be construed as meaning that they are bound to take the utmost possible precautions. (Adm.) The George Roper 134

28. Launch—Necessary precautions—Tugs in attendance—River Mersey.—Tugs in attendance on a launch in the river Mersey should be dressed with flags, and should give warning to approaching vessels that the launch is about to take place. (Adm.) The George Roper 134

29. Lien—Priority—Seamen's wages—Foreign ship.—The plaintiffs in a damage action in which a foreign ship proceeded against has been sold by order of the court, and the proceeds brought into court to satisfy the claims against her, having no effective remedy except against the ship, are entitled to payment of their claim out of the proceeds in precedence to the seamen's claim against such proceeds for wages earned on the ship subsequently to the collision. (Ct. of App.) The Elin 120

30. Loss of life—Action for—Inquiry or refusal thereof by Board of Trade—Foreign ship.—Sect. 512 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, disentitling a party to bring an action to recover damages for loss of life or personal injury caused by a collision, unless the Board of Trade has completed or refused to institute an inquiry into the disaster, does not apply to foreign ships. (Adm. Div.) The Vera Cruz 254

31. Loss of life—Action in personam—Admiralty jurisdiction—Judicature Acts—Both ships to blame—Contributory negligence.—The Admiralty Court had no jurisdiction prior to the Judicature Act 1873 to entertain claims for loss of life, and there was consequently no rule in the Admiralty Court as to the division of damages in cases of loss of life, and as sect. 25, sub-sect. 9, of the Judicature Act 1873 has made no alteration in the principles of law as to the division of damages, passengers killed in a collision between two ships can recover nothing where both ships are to blame. (Adm. Div.) The Bernina 577

32. Loss of life—Action in rem—Both ships to blame—Admiralty rule as to division of damages—Death of master—Right of recovery.—The ships A. and V. C. came into collision, for which both were found to blame, the A. for breach of the statutory regulations for preventing collisions referred to in sect. 17 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1873, the V. C. for improper navigation. The master of the A. was drowned. His personal representative brought an action in rem under Lord Campbell's Act against the owner of the V. C. to recover damages for his loss, Held, that though the deceased was deemed to have been guilty of contributory negligence by reason of the breach of the regulations, the Admiralty Court rule as to the division of damages was applicable, and the plaintiff was entitled to recover half the damages sustained by the loss of the deceased. (Adm. Div.) The Vera Cruz .....page 254

33. Loss of life—Both ships to blame—Identification with carrying ship—Contributory negligence—Action in personam—Lord Campbell's Act 1846 (9 & 10 Vict. c. 93).—Where passengers are killed in a collision between two ships for which both are to blame, the deceased are so identified with their carrying ship as to be deemed to be guilty of contributory negligence, and hence their personal representatives suing the owners of the non-carrying ship under Lord Campbell's Act can recover nothing. (Adm. Div.) The Bernina ... 577

34. Merchant Shipping Act 1873, s. 16—Duty to render assistance—Vessel injured—Showing lights.—The duty to render assistance under sect. 16 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1873 is not confined to rendering actual assistance; but if a vessel whose duty it is to render assistance is so injured that the only assistance she can render is to burn rockets or hoist a globe light so as to indicate her position, she is bound to do so, and in default of so doing, she is, in the absence of proof to the contrary, to blame for the collision. (Adm.) The Emmy Haase 216

35. Practice—Bail—Counter-claim—Discontinuance of principal action—Admiralty Court Act 1861 (24 Vict. c. 10), s. 34.—The power of the Admiralty Division under sect. 34 of the Admiralty Court Act 1861 to order an action to be stayed until bail has been given to answer a cross-action or counter-claim, does not extend to making an absolute order to give bail, and in a damage action in which the plaintiffs had discontinued after the defendants had counter-claimed, the court refused to enforce an order, made by the registrar, to give bail to answer such counter-claim. (Adm.) The Alexander ... 89

36. Practice—British and foreign ships—Depositions before Receiver of Wreck—Inspection of documents—Privilege.—In a damage action, arising out of a collision between a British and foreign ship, copies of depositions made before the Receiver of Wreck by the crew of the British ship, and obtained from the Board of Trade by the owners of the British ship for the purposes of the action, are privileged, and inspection of them cannot be obtained by the owners of the foreign ship, even although the Board of Trade on the ground that no such depositions have been made by any member of the foreign crew, has refused to allow the foreign owners to see them. (Adm.) The Palermo 165

37. Practice—City of London Court—Warrant of Arrest—Execution—Bailiff—Contempt of court—County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 71), ss. 23, 35.—A warrant of arrest issued in an action in rem, instituted for collision in the City of London Court, and directed to the high bailiff of the said court and others the bailiffs thereof, is not duly executed if executed by a clerk in the bailiff's office, who is not a bailiff, and hence the master of the vessel so arrested is not guilty of contempt of court in removing her; but semble, if the warrant had been addressed to the clerk as an officer of the court it might, under the provisions of the County Court Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868, s. 23, have been duly served by him. (Adm. Div.) The Palomares ..... page 343

38. Practice—County Court action—Transfer to High Court—Consolidation—Conduct of action.—Where a County Court action, instituted to recover damages arising out of a collision with the defendants' vessel, is, at the instance of the plaintiffs, transferred to the High Court, and there consolidated with an action instituted in the Admiralty Division of the High Court by the defendants in the former action against the plaintiffs in that action subsequently to the institution of the County Court action, the plaintiffs in the County Court action, being the first to institute proceedings, will have the conduct of the consolidated actions. (Adm.) The Stork; The Never Despair 211

39. Practice—Default action in rem—Motion for judgment—R. S. C., Order XXVII., r. 11*—Affidavit.*—Where in an action in rem for collision the defendant makes default, the plaintiff should, on moving for judgment, support his claim by affidavit. (Adm.) The Spero Expecto 197

40. Practice—Evidence—Course—Mode of navigation—Trinity Masters.—Where the Admiralty Court is assisted by Trinity Masters, evidence as to a particular course and mode of navigation at a particular place in a dense fog and in a given state of the tide is not admissible. (Adm.) The Kirby Hall 90

41. Practice — Evidence — Engineer's log. — In a damage action the log kept by the engineer is admissible as evidence against his owners. (Adm. Div.) The Earl of Dumfries 342

42. Practice—Evidence—Vessel sunk in navigable river—Lighting of wreck—Message to harbour authorities.—Evidence showing that an officer of a sunken vessel sent a message to the harbour master informing him of the position of the wreck, and that the harbour master undertook to light the wreck, and that the messenger informed the officer of the harbour master's undertaking is admissible, as relating to an act done, and tending to disprove negligence on the part of the owners. (Ct. of App., reversing Adm.) The Douglas 15

43. Practice—Inspection by Trinity Masters—Admiralty Court Act 1861 (24 Vict. c. 10), s. 18.—In a collision action the court will not order the vessels to be examined by the Trinity Masters prior to the hearing of action except under very unusual circumstances, and especially not where the party applying has had the opportunity by his witnesses of inspecting the vessel himself. (Adm. Div.) The Victor Covacevich 417

44. Practice—Pleading—Proof secundum allegata et probata.—The rule that parties are only entitled to recover secundum allegata et probata is complied with in a cause of collision if one material allegation of negligence be proved, even if all others fail. (P. C.) The Hochung; The Lapwing 39

45. Practice—Preliminary Act—Action under Lord Campbell's Act—R. S. C., Order XIX., r. 28.—Order XIX., r. 28, directing that preliminary acts shall be filed "in actions in any division for damage by collision between vessels" applies to an action instituted in the Queen's Bench Division under Lord Campbell's Act, to recover damage occasioned by the death of the deceased in a collision at sea. (Butt, J.) Webster v. Manchester, Sheffield and Lincolnshire Railway Company page 256n.

46. Practice—Preliminary act—Distance and bearing—Amendment.—"The L. when first seen was at anchor" is an improper answer to art. 9 of a Preliminary Act inquiring the "distance and bearing of the other vessel when seen," and the court at the hearing ordered the party so answering to amend. (Adm. Div.) The Godiva 524

47. Practice—Preliminary Act—Incorrect answers.—Where in a collision action the questions in the Preliminary Act are improperly answered the court will always be disposed to view with suspicion the case of the party so answering, even though it appears to have been accidental, and if it proves to have been intentional the court will then scrutinise the case most closely and approach it with the gravest suspicion. (Adm. Div.) The Godiva 524

48. Practice—Security for counter claim—Foreign Government—Admiralty Court Act 1861 (24 Vict. c. 10), s. 34.—The Court of Admiralty has power under sect. 34 of the Admiralty Court Act 1861, to stay proceedings instituted by a foreign Government in rem for collision until the Government has given security for the amount of the defendants' counter-claim. (Ct. of App.) The Newbattle 356

49. Practice—Ship and freight under arrest with cargo on board—Marshal—Discharge and sale of cargo.—Where in an action in rem for collision against ship and freight, in which the defendants' ship was held solely to blame, and, being still under arrest with the cargo on board was ordered to be sold, the Court on motion directed the marshal to discharge the cargo, to retain the same in his custody as security for payment of the landing and other charges and freight, if any, due from the owners or consignees of the cargo in respect of the same, and that in default of any application for the delivery of the cargo within fourteen days, the marshal should be authorised to sell such part of the cargo as might be necessary to pay the said charges and freight, if any, due. (Adm. Div.) The Gettysburg 347

50. Practice—Tug as third party—Application for direction—R. S. C., Order XVI., rr. 18 & 21.—Where in an action for damage by collision the defendants had by notice brought in the owner of a tug towing the defendants' ship, and sought to make the tug liable for improper navigation and disobedience to orders, and the defendants applied for directions as to the mode of having the questions in the action determined, the Court declined to give directions, and dismissed the third party from the action upon the ground that questions between the defendants and the third party, totally different from those between the plaintiffs and the defendants, might arise in the case, and would be embarrassing to the plaintiffs. (Adm.) The Bianca 60

51. Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea—Duty to obey—When it arises.—Per Brett, M.R.: The duty to execute the manœuvres prescribed by the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea does not arise from the mere fact of risk of collision, but only if such fact ought under the circumstances to be within the knowledge of those in command of the ship. (Ct. of App.) The Beryl 321

52. Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea—Lights—Improperly carried—Look-out.—Where it is the duty of a vessel to carry or show lights, and those lights are not carried where they are visible, or are not shown, the court will not be extremely nice in finding another vessel to blame because those on board her fail to see the first-mentioned vessel within a few yards of the distance when such vessel ought first to have been seen. (Adm. Div.) The Pacific ..... page 263

53. Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea—Merchant Shipping Act 1873 (36 & 37 Vict. c. 85), s. 17—Infringement of Regulations—Death of master—Action under Lord Campbell's Act—Contributory negligence.—Sect. 17 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1873, providing that in cases of collision a ship which has infringed any of the regulations for preventing collisions, contained in or made under the Merchant Shipping Acts 1854 to 1873, shall be deemed to be in fault unless the circumstances of the case made departure from the regulations necessary, so far affects a master whose ship has infringed such regulations, that in an action under Lord Campbell's Act to recover damages resulting from the death of the master, he will be deemed to be in fault for a breach of the regulations, and therefore guilty of contributory negligence, so as to affect the right of recovery. (Adm. Div.) The Vera Cruz 254

54. Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea—Object of—Risk of collision.—The object of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea is not merely to prevent actual collision, but also risk of collision, and therefore the regulations should be applied, not only when there is actual risk of collision, but also where the circumstances are such that it is probable that risk of collision may be involved. (Ct. of App.) The Beryl 321

55. Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea—Sailing ships—Lights—Port and starboard tack ships—Merchant Shipping Act 1873, s. 17.—The barque A., while sailing at night on the port tack, sighted the barque B. on the port bow, showing no lights. Those on the A., thinking that the B. was heading the same way as the A., kept on, when suddenly it was seen that the B. was heading for the A., and, although the helm of the A. was put hard-a-port, the vessels came into collision, the stem of the A. striking the starboard side of the B. In an action for collision, the Court held that the B. was carrying no lights, and that this being a breach of the regulations which might possibly have contributed to the collision, the B. was to blame; and further, that, having regard to the difficulty occasioned by the absence of the B.'s lights, there was no negligence on the part of the A. in not sooner taking steps to keep out of the way of the B. (Priv. Co.) The Arklow 219

56. Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, arts. 2, 11—Lights—Flare up—Right to burn.—The burning of a flare by vessels other than overtaken and fishing vessels is not forbidden by art. 2 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, though blame may be attributed to a vessel exhibiting a flare if such an exhibition is misleading and contributes to collision. (Adm. Div.) The Merchant Prince..... 520

57. Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea 1863, art. 9—Steam trawler—Lights—Look-out.—A steam trawler, whilst fishing, was only carrying a white light when she ought to have been carrying the lights for a steamship under way. A steamship having a bad look-out, but with an officer on deck and in charge, was approaching the trawler, but did not see her until within a distance of from a quarter to half a mile, and then did not alter her course until too late to avoid a collision. Held, that, as the officer in charge might have acted sooner if he had seen a side light, and that, as it was not proved that the absence of the side lights could not by any possibility have contributed to the collision, the steam trawler was to blame for a breach of the regulations. (Ct. of App.) The Dunelm 304

58. Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea 1863, art. 9—Steam trawler—Speed—Lights.—A steam trawler with her nets down and attached thereto is "stationary" within the meaning of art. 9 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea 1863, although she has way on her through the water, provided such way is not more than is necessary to keep her under command, and in such circumstances she is bound only to carry the white light required by that article; but, if she exceeds that speed, she is bound by art. 3 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea 1880 to carry the lights of a steamship under way. (Ct. of App.) The Dunelm page 304

59. Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea 1863, art. 9—Ditto 1880, art. 11—Fishing smack—Lights—Stern light—Overtaking ship.—The bright white light carried by a trawling fishing smack when attached to her nets in pursuance of the provisions of art. 9 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions 1863, although visible astern, is not a white light shown from the stern to an overtaking ship within the meaning of art. 11 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions 1880. (Adm. Div.) The Pacific 263

60. Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, art. 10 (a)—Trawler's lights—Attached to nets but under way.—Art 10 (a). of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea 1884, requiring all fishing vessels of twenty tons net and upwards, "when under way," to carry the ordinary lights of a vessel under way, unless required by other regulations to carry the lights therein prescribed, is applicable to trawlers whilst engaged in trawling and in motion. (Adm. Div.) The Chuson ... 476

61. Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, art. 10 (a)—Trawler's lights—Bad look-out—Contribution to collision. — Where a steamship having come into collision with a trawler, which, in violation of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, was carrying a white masthead light in addition to side lights, and it appeared that those on board the steamship had not seen the white light, the court refused to hold the trawler to blame for the breach of the regulations, on the ground that it could not possibly have contributed to the collision. (Adm. Div.) The Chuson..... 476

62. Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, art. 13—Fog—Moderate speed.—Moderate speed, within the meaning of art. 13 of the regulations, varies according to the density of the fog; the thicker the fog, the slower ought to be the speed. (Ct. of App.) The Beta; The Peter Graham 276

63. Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, arts. 13 — Fog — Moderate speed—Approaching ships.—Art. 13 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, which provides that every ship shall go at a "moderate speed" in a fog, requires the speed to become more moderate as the two vessels get closer together. (Ct. of App.) The Dordogne 328

64. Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, arts. 13, 18—Fog—Sailing ships—Approaching signals—Shortening sail.—Where a sailing ship in a fog hears repeated whistles of an approaching steamship, indicating possible risk of collision, she is bound to take precautions, such as stationing men at the braces ready to put the sails aback, so as to stop her way in the event of a collision becoming imminent. (Adm. Div.) The Zadok 252

65. Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, art. 13—Fog—Sailing ship—Moderate speed—Bristol Channel.—Moderate speed for a sailing ship within the meaning of Art. XIII. of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions 1880 in a dense fog in the Bristol Channel, is the slowest speed that she can go so as to be under command, and, if she carries more sail than is necessary for this purpose, she will be guilty of a breach of the article. (Ct. of App.) The Beta; The Peter Graham ..... page 276

66. Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, arts. 13, 18—Fog—Steamship—Speed—Stopping and reversing—Signals.—Where those on a steamship in a dense fog hear the whistle or fog horn of another vessel more than once on either bow and in the vicinity from such a direction as to indicate that the other vessel is nearing them, it is their duty, under art. 18 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, to at once stop and reverse her engines, so as to bring their vessel to a standstill in the water. (Ct. of App.) The John McIntyre 278

67. Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, arts. 13, 18 — Fog — Steamship — Approaching signals—Stopping and reversing—Speed.—Where those in charge of a steamship in a dense fog hear a whistle and then others following it and getting nearer, even though the whistles get broader on their ship's bow, it is their duty on hearing the first whistle to reduce their speed, and as the vessels get nearer to bring their ship to as complete a standstill as is possible without putting her out of command, and when the other vessel has come close to, even though not in sight, to stop and reverse their engines. (Ct. of App.) The Dordogne 328
The Earl of Dumfries. (Adm.) ..... 329 n.

68. Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, arts. 13— Fog — Steamship — Moderate speed.—Where those in charge of a steamship in a dense fog hear a whistle ahead, it becomes their duty to act sooner with their engines than if the whistle is heard on either bow: and in such a case they ought to act on the probability that the whistle belongs to a vessel approaching them, and that therefore risk of collision may be involved. (Ct. of App.) The Ebor 560

69. Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, arts. 13, 18—Fog—Steamship—Speed.—Where those in charge of a steamship, going at a moderate speed in a dense fog, hear the steam whistle of another steamship in close proximity, but are unable to ascertain the course and position of the other vessel, it is their duty to stop and reverse the engines so as to take all way off her and bring her to a standstill, and if they neglect to do so, and a collision ensues, they will be held to blame for the collision. (Adm.) The Kirby Hall 90

70. Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, art. 13—Fog—Speed—Crossing track of vessels.—It is the duty of a steamship or sailing vessel, in accordance with art. 13 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions, when she is in a fog, passing across a course where it is to be expected that numerous vessels may be navigating, to reduce her speed to as low a rate as is consistent with her keeping good steering way. (Adm. Div.) The Zadok 252

71. Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, art. 13—Fog horn, effect of not hearing.—The fact of a fog horn, alleged to have been blown on board a sailing ship, not being heard by those on an approaching ship, is not of itself proof that such fog horn was not blown, nor is it necessarily proof that there was negligence on board the approaching ship in not hearing it, as the direction in which the sound would be transmitted is uncertain. (Adm. Div.) The Zadok 252

72. Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, art. 13—Sailing ship—Fog—Speed—Reducing sail.—Semble, that it is the duty of those in charge of a sailing ship, when in a dense fog they hear a succession of whistles approaching closer and closer, to reduce her speed by taking off sail so as to bring her to as near a standstill as possible while retaining command over her. (Ct. of App.) The Dordogne ..... page 328

73. Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, arts. 16, 20—Crossing and overtaking ship—Duty of.—Where one of two ships is at the same time crossing and overtaking the other, art. 20 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea 1880 applies, so as to render it the duty of the former to keep out of the way of the latter, notwithstanding the rule as to crossing ships, which in such cases does not apply. (Adm.) The Seaton 191

74. Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea 1884, arts. 16, 23—Steamships crossing—Going into dock — Special circumstances.—Where a steamship, in charge of a pilot, bound for Penarth Dock, and carrying the usual docking signal of two bright lights aft, saw, when crossing Cardiff East Flat, the red and masthead lights of a steamship coming down Cardiff Drain, bearing on her starboard bow and distant from three to four cables length; but the pilot in charge took no steps to get out of the way of the other vessel until a collision was inevitable, because he was of opinion that, as he was bound for dock, he was entitled to hold on, the Court held that his vessel was to blame for breach of art. 16 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions, there being no "special circumstances" warranting a departure from the regulations. (Adm. Div.) The Saint Andries 552

75. Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, arts. 16, 17, 18—Steamships crossing—Mode of keeping out of way.—Where one steamship is in such a position with regard to another vessel that it is her duty, under art. 16 (or, semble under art. 17), to keep out of the way of the latter, it is not obligatory on her to ease or stop and reverse her engines under art. 18, so long as there is no reason to suppose that she will not keep out of the way under the ordinary action of the helm. (P. C.) The Rhondda 114

76. Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, art. 18—Duty to stop and reverse—When it arises—Risk involved—Art. 18 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, directing that, when two steamships are approaching so as to involve risk of collision, they shall slacken their speed or stop and reverse if necessary, is applicable not only where the officer in command sees or ought to see that there is actual risk of collision, but also where he sees the other vessel doing something which may involve risk of collision. (Ct. of App.) The Stanmore 441

77. Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, art. 18—Duty to stop and reverse—When it arises—Risk involved.—Where a steamship is approaching another vessel so as to involve risk of collision, her master is not bound on making out the risk to instantly stop and reverse the engines in compliance with art. 18 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, but he is to be allowed a reasonably short time to judge what the best manœuvre is under the circumstances, though if he exceeds that time he will be held to blame for the collision. (Adm.) The Emmy Haase 216

lations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, a steamship approaching another vessel so as to involve risk of collision, is always bound to slacken her speed, but her duty to stop and reverse her engines is governed by the words "if necessary." (Ct. of App.) The Beryl .....page 321

79. Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, art. 21—Narrow channel—Falmouth harbour.—Art. 21 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions providing that "in narrow channels every steamship shall, when it is safe and practicable, keep to that side of the fairway or mid-channel which lies on the starboard side of such ship," applies to a steamship entering and passing up Falmouth harbour, and if a steamer going into that harbour keeps to the side of the channel which lies on her port hand, she violates the regulations. (Adm. Div.) The Clydach..... 336

80. Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, art. 21—Narrow channel—Straits of Messina.—The Straits of Messina between Ganzirri and Faro Point on the Sicilian shore and Pezzo Point and Alta Fiumara on the Calabrian shore are a little less than two miles in width, and are a narrow channel within the meaning of art. 21 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea. (Priv. Co.) The Rhondda..... 114

81. Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, art. 22—Keeping course—Slackening speed.—The duty of a vessel to "keep her course" under art. 22 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea is complied with if she keeps her heading, whilst checking her speed, because art. 22 covers direction only, and not speed. (Ct. of App.) The Beryl 321

82. Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, arts. 18, 23—Departure from—Not stopping and reversing—Only chance.—A steamship approaching another vessel so as to involve risk of collision is justified in keeping her engines going full speed ahead where she is placed in a position of unexpected danger by the neglect of the other vessel to exhibit one of her lights whilst showing the other in an improper place, and where such going ahead is, in fact, the only chance of avoiding a collision. (Ct. of App.) The Benares..... 171

83. Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, art. 23—Departure from—Special circumstances—Only chance.—Departure from the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea is justifiable under art. 23, where the departure is the only chance of avoiding the collision, and is, in fact, the best manœuvre under the circumstances. (Ct. of App.) The Benares..... 171

84. Tees Navigation Rules, art. 22—Speed over the ground—Not through water.—In art. 22 of the Rules for the Navigation of the River Tees, providing that "no steamship shall at any time be navigated in any part of the river at a higher rate of speed than a maximum speed of six miles an hour," the speed mentioned is speed over the ground and not through the water. (Ct. of App.) The R. L. Alston 43

85. Thames Conservancy Rules—Effect of breach—Merchant Shipping Act, 1873, sect. 17.—The Rules for the Navigation of the River Thames are not rules within sect. 17 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1873, and therefore a vessel is not to be "deemed to be in fault" for an infringement of these rules, unless it be shown that the infringement did, in fact, cause or contribute to the collision. (H. of L.) The Margaret; Cayzer and others v. The Carron Company..... 371
The Harton (Adm.)..... 213

86. Thames Conservancy Rules, art. 23—Rounding points—Blackwall Point.—Rules 23 of the Thames Conservancy Rules providing that steam vessels navigating against the tide shall before rounding certain points in the river ease their engines and wait till other vessels rounding the point have passed clear is not confined to the seaward side of a line drawn from Blackwall Point to Bow Creek, but applies to both sides of the point. (H. of L.) The Margaret; Cayzer and others v. The Carron Company.....page 371

87. Thames Conservancy Rules, art. 23—Rounding points.—The words "rounding a point," as used in art. 23 of the Thames Conservancy Rules, begin to apply when a vessel having to round is obliged to use her steering gear for the purpose of continuing her course round it, and cease to apply when that necessity terminates. (Ct. of App.) The Margaret..... 204

88. Thames Conservancy Rules, art. 23—Rounding points.—Art. 23 of the Thames Conservancy Rules applies during the whole time a steamship is rounding against the tide any of the points therein enumerated, and is not confined to the case of a vessel in the reach adjoining the point, and before she has begun to round it, sighting another vessel in the reach on either side of the point. (C. of App.) The Margaret..... 204

89. Thames Conservancy Rules, art. 23—Rounding points—Easing.—Where a steamship in the river Thames having come out of dock, and being bound down the river finds herself with the tide against her on the bend of any of the points enumerated in art. 23 of the Thames Conservancy Rules, where the river has begun to curve round, and those on board of her see another steamship in the reach below preparing to round the point with the tide, the first steamship is bound by the 23rd article to ease her engines and wait until the other vessel has passed clear. (Ct. of App.) The Margaret..... 204

90. Thames Conservancy Rules, art. 22, 23—Rounding points—Easing—Use of helm.—Where a vessel, proceeding down the river against a flood tide and about to round a point under her port helm, is bound to act under rule 23 of the Thames Conservancy Rules, she does not act inconsistently with rule 23 if she ports her helm in compliance with rule 22. (Adm.) The Margaret... 137

91. Tug and tow—Joint tort feasors—Agreement as to payment of damages between tug and tow.—The schooner J. M. S. having come into collision with a tug and her tow, a damage action in rem was instituted by the owners of the schooner against the tug to recover all the damages occasioned by the collision. Subsequently to the collision the plaintiffs received from the owners of the tow a sum of money, described in an agreement entered into between these parties "as an advance on account of the damages to be recovered from the owners of the tug." By the agreement it was agreed that the owners of the tow should give the plaintiffs all information and assistance necessary to bring the action to a successful issue; that if the schooner and the tug should both be held to blame, the plaintiffs should repay any sum by which the money already paid exceeded the moiety of damages recoverable against the tug; and that, as a basis of the arrangement, it was understood that the schooner should be found blameless for the collision. The Court, having found the tug alone to blame, held that the above payment was not such a payment by the tow in satisfaction of the damages occasioned by the collision as amounted to a settlement in discharge of the action, and was consequently no bar to the action, and that, notwithstanding the advance paid by the tow, the plaintiffs were entitled to recover from the defendants all the damages occasioned by the collision. (Adm. Div.) The Stormcock.....page 470

92. Tyne Navigation Rules, art. 20—Vessel entering river—Side of mid-channel.—Where a vessel entering the Tyne from the southward, in order to get upon a course to take her up the river on the north side, crosses from south to north of mid-channel at from two to three cables lengths outside the south pier she thereby infringes bye-law 20 for the Regulation of the River Tyne, directing that vessels shall be brought into the port to the north of mid-channel; and she ought, on the proper construction of the bye-law, to have crossed from south to north at some considerable distance outside the pierheads. (Adm. Div. Since affirmed on appeal. See next volume.) The Harvest..... 546

93. Vessel sunk in navigable river—Abandonment—Duty to light—Owners—Harbour master—Wrecks Removal Act 1877 (40 & 41 Vict. c. 67).—Where a vessel is sunk in a navigable river by collision, for which she is held solely to blame, a duty of lighting the wreck is not imposed upon her owners, though they claim the ownership, if the vessel has been abandoned, and the harbour master under the provisions of the Removal of Wrecks Act 1877 has undertaken to have the wreck lighted, and her owners are not liable for damage resulting from the absence of such lighting (Ct. of App., reversing Adm.) The Douglas 15

DAMAGE.

1 Falmouth Harbour—Harbour master—Authority of—Beaching—Negligence—Liability of commissioners.—It being within the scope of the authority of the harbour master of Falmouth Harbour, upon the proper construction of the Acts relating thereto, to regulate the place and manner of beaching a vessel therein for repairs, an order given by him to those in charge of a vessel to let go their anchor in such a way that the vessel sits upon it in beaching and is thereby injured, is negligence, for which the Harbour Commissioners, as his employers, are liable. (Ct. of App., affirming Adm.) The Rhosina 350, 460

2 Harbour master—Authority—Limits of harbour—Beaching ship—Negligence—Liability of commissioners.—Where a vessel is, in obedience to bye-laws, being beached in a harbour under the directions of the harbour master, and in order to reach the place of beaching selected by the harbour master she is properly passing through waters outside the limits of the authority of the Harbour Commissioners (whose servant the harbour master is), and while outside such limits damage is occasioned to her by the negligence of the harbour master in giving an improper order, the Harbour Commissioners are liable for the damage thereby occasioned. GENERAL AVERAGE.

1. Deck cargo—"At merchant's risk"—Jettison.—Words in a charter-party providing that a deck load of timber is to be carried at full freight, but "at merchant's risk," do not preclude the owner of the deck load from recovering general average contribution if the cargo is carried on deck by the custom of trade and is jettisoned. (Ct. of App., reversing Q. B. Div.) Burton and Co. v. English and Co......page 84, 187

2. Port of refuge expense—Perils of the sea—Reloading and subsequent expenses.—Where a vessel laden with cargo is compelled to put into port to repair an injury which is the subject of particular average, the expense of reloading the cargo, necessarily unloaded for the purpose of repairing the injury and expenses incurred for port charges, pilotage, and other charges subsequent to reloading, are not chargeable to general average. (H. of L., affirming Ct. of App.) Svensden v. Wallace 87, 232, 453

3. Salvage—Towage contract—Liability of cargo owners.—Where a master enters into a towage contract, rendering the shipowners liable to pay a sum of money named in the contract whether the services prove beneficial or not, and the ship and cargo are thereby saved, the remuneration agreed upon may be the subject of a general average contribution. (H. of L.) Anderson, Tritton, and Co. v. Ocean Steamship Company... 401

4. Salvage expenses—Reasonableness—What chargeable to general average—Question for jury.—The fact that a shipowner has become liable to pay, and has paid, a sum of money for services rendered to the ship and cargo, and that such payment was reasonable, does not show conclusively that the whole of such sum is chargeable to general average. Before the owners of cargo can become liable for a general average contribution it must be left to the jury to find what sum should properly be charged to general average under the circumstances. (H. of L., reversing Ct. of App.) Anderson, Tritton, and Co. v. Ocean Steamship Company 202, 401

5. Security—Liverpool bond—Deposit—Unreasonable form.—When there has been a general average loss incurred, and the contributions have not been ascertained, the shipowner is not entitled to make delivery of the cargo conditional upon the consignees signing an average bond in the form known as the Liverpool average bond, and making a deposit of 10 per cent. on the estimated value of their goods in the joint names, as provided by the bond, of the shipowners and their average adjuster, or in the names of the shipowners alone, or in the name of the average adjuster alone. A bond in such a form is unreasonable. (Ct. of App., affirming Q. B. Div.) Huth and Co. v. Lamport and another; Gibbs and Son v. Lamport and another 543, 593

6. Security for—Reasonableness of bond—Lien.—A shipowner has a lien on the cargo for general average, but if he requires security from the cargo owner for his contribution before delivering the goods, the required security must be reasonable. LIMITATION OF LIABILITY.

1. Costs—Issues raised by defendant.—In an action for limitation of liability, where the defendants raised an issue which was decided against them, the Court ordered the plaintiffs to pay all the costs of the action, except the costs incidental to the raising of such issue, as to which each party was to pay his own costs. (Adm.) The Warkworth 194

2. Crown—Admiralty stores—Admiralty suits Act 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 78), s. 3.—Assuming that the Crown is not bound by the Merchant Shipping Acts, it may nevertheless, under the provisions of the Admiralty Suits Act 1868, claim against the fund in a limitation of liability action in respect of the loss of Admiralty stores by collision. (Adm. Div.) The Zoe ..... page 58

3. Crown—Rights of—Amount of Shipowner's liability—Merchant Shipping Acts—Quære: Can the Crown, where a shipowner limits his liability, enforce any claim beyond the amount limited by the Merchant Shipping Acts? (Adm. Div.) The Zoe 58

4. Foreign ship—Crew Space—Merchant Shipping Act 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104), s. 21, sub-sect. 4 —Merchant Shipping Act 1867 (30 & 31 Vict. c. 124), s. 9.—The owners of a foreign ship, in limiting their liability, are entitled to the deductions in respect of crew space allowed by the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, s. 21, sub-sect. 4, if the provisions of that Act have been complied with, although there has been no compliance with the requirements of the Merchant Shipping Act 1867, s. 9. (Adm. Div.) The Palermo 369

5. "Improper navigation"—Caused by owner's servant or agent—Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act 1862, s. 54.—All damage wrongfully done by one ship to another whilst the ship that does the damage is being navigated, and where the wrongful act of the ship which does the damage is due to the negligence of any person for whose negligence the owner is liable, is comprised within sect 54 of the Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act 1862, unless such negligence occurs with the privity of the owner. (per Brett, M.R., Ct. of App.) The Warkworth 326

6. "Improper navigation"—Defect in machinery —Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act 1862, s. 54.—Where a ship is held liable for a collision caused by a defect in her machinery, and such defect is due not to the master or crew, but to the negligence or default of other persons who are employed by the shipowner to repair the machinery on shore before the commencement of the voyage, and for the purposes of the voyage, the collision is nevertheless occasioned by "improper navigation" within the meaning of sect. 54, sub-sect. 4, of the Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 63), so as to entitle the owner to limit his liability under the provisions of that Act. (Ct. of App., affirming Adm.) The Warkworth 194, 326

7. Master also part owner—Right of other owners—Reservation of master's liability.—In an action by shipowners to limit their liability in respect of a collision with their vessel, where it appeared that the master, who was on board at the time of the collision, was a part owner, and the collision occurred without the negligence or privity of the remainder of the owners, they have a right to have their liability limited, with a reservation of any right of action there may be against the master personally in respect of his negligence. (Adm.) The Cricket; The Endeavour 53

8. Practice — Bringing in claims—Extension of time—Laches.—In a limitation of liability action a claim may be brought in upon terms after the time fixed by the decree for bringing in claims has expired, provided the claimant has not been guilty of laches disentitling him to the indulgence. (Adm. Div.) The Zoe 583

9. Practice—Loss of life—Damage to ship, goods, and merchandise—Payment into court—Affidavit.—In an action of limitation of liability, where the plaintiffs have paid into court, or are willing to pay in, 8*l.* per ton in respect of damage to ship, goods, and merchandise, but seek in respect of the life claims to pay into court, or give bail for an amount less than their total liability under the Merchant Shipping Act, the court, before fixing such amount, will require the plaintiffs to state on affidavit the names of the persons killed and injured their condition in life, the number of those who are legally entitled to claim, the number of claims that have been settled, and the amounts paid in settlement. (Adm. Div.) The Dione ..... page 347

10. Practice—Loss of life—Damage to ship, goods, and merchandise—Stay of actions.—In an action for limitation of liability, where it appeared that all the claims in respect of loss of life had been settled, the Court ordered that upon payment in of 8*l.* per ton, all persons having any claim, either in respect of loss of life or damage to ship, goods, or merchandise, should be restrained from bringing any action in respect of the collision. (Adm. Div.) The Foscolino 420

11. Tonnage—Ship's register—Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act 1862, s. 54.—The tonnage in respect of which shipowners are entitled to limit their liability under sect. 54 of the Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act 1862 is the tonnage appearing on the ship's register which was in force at the time of collision. (Adm. Div.) The Dione 347

12. Two Collisions—Amount of liability—Separate acts of negligence — Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 63), s. 54.—Where a ship comes into collision with two vessels one after the other, there being a short interval between the two collisions, the shipowner will be entitled to limit his liability to 8*l.* per ton (there being no loss of life) if the first collision is the substantial and efficacious cause of the second, and there is no separate act of negligence on the part of those in charge of the plaintiffs' ship in respect of the second collision. MARINE INSURANCE.

1. Abandonment—Subrogation of rights—Chartered freight not earned—Separate underwriters on ship and freight.—Freight which has not been earned is not an incident of the ownership of a ship, and does not pass to the underwriters on the ship upon abandonment, and hence where shipowners effect a policy upon a ship with one set of underwriters, and upon freight with another, and whilst the ship is proceeding to her port of loading under charter-party, and before she has earned any freight, she is sunk by another ship, and her owners recover damages in respect of loss of ship and of loss of freight, the underwriters on ship have no right upon abandonment to the freight. (Ct. of App.) The Sea Insurance Company v. Hadden and another ..... page 230

2. Concealment—Material fact.—In marine insurance all facts which a prudent and experienced underwriter would take into consideration in estimating the premium are material and ought to be disclosed. (Ct. of App.) Tate and Sons v. Hyslop 487

3. Concealment — Material fact — Knowledge of agent—Ignorance of principal—Insurance through third party.—Where an agent, who is employed to effect an insurance for his principal, deliberately omits to communicate to that principal material facts which in the course of his employment have come to his knowledge, and which it is his duty to disclose to his principal, there is a concealment which will have the effect of vitiating an insurance subsequently effected by such innocent principal through another agent who is unaware of any such concealment of material information. (Ct. of App.) Blackburn, Low, and Co. v. Vigors 597

4. Concealment — Material fact — Lighterman — Common carrier—Contract limiting liability.—In effecting a policy of marine insurance on goods to be carried in London lighters, the disclosure of the fact that the lighterman is carrying them not as a common carrier but upon the terms that he will not be liable for loss unless caused by negligence is material, and ought to be disclosed to the underwriters, and its concealment vitiates the policy. ((Ct. of App., affirming Q. B. Div.) Tate and Son v. Hyslop 487

5. "Free from average under 3 per cent., &c."—Losses on separate voyage—On same voyage—Adding together.—Upon the true construction of the warranty in a time policy upon ship and freight "free from average under 3 per cent. unless general, or the ship be stranded, sunk, or burnt," the losses occurring upon different voyages cannot be added together, although separate and distinct average losses occurring during the same voyage can be added together to ascertain whether the aggregate loss exceeds the limit of 3 per cent. (Ct. of App.) Stewart and Co. v. The Merchants' Marine Insurance Company Limited 506

6. "Free from capture and seizure"—Application of—Belligerent—Barratry.—In a policy of marine insurance a warranty "free from capture and seizure" applies not only to capture or seizure by belligerents, but to any seizure, even if it be the result of a barratrous act of the master. (H. of L.) Cory v. Burr .....page 109

7. "Free from capture and seizure"—Seizure by African natives—Plunder—Constructive total loss.—The word "seizure" in a policy of marine insurance, in which the ship is "warranted free from capture and seizure and the consequences of any attempt thereat," includes a temporary seizure of the ship by African natives for the purpose of plundering the cargo, whereby the ship becomes a constructive total loss. (Cave, J.) Johnston and Co. v. Hogg and others 51

8. Freight—Charter—Option to cancel exercised—Perils insured against—Loss.—Where chartered freight is insured by a policy covering all risks incident to steam navigation, and the ship is chartered for a specific voyage, the charter-party containing a clause entitling the charterers, on the ship failing to arrive at the port of loading by a certain date, to cancel the charter-party, and owing to the failure of her machinery the ship does not arrive within the specified time, and the charterers thereon cancel, and no freight is earned, the loss of freight is not caused by the perils insured against, but by the exercise of the option to cancel. (Coleridge, C.J.) Mercantile Steamship Company Limited v. Tyser ..... 6 n.

9. Freight—Charter—Time policy—Peril within time—Loss after time—Liability.—A time policy on chartered freight for six months provided for payment of "loss of hire which may arise in clause 6 of charter-party for accidents occurring between the 15th April and the 15th Oct." The charter, after fixing the vessel for six months certain with option to the charterers to continue the charter for a further period, provided by clause 6 that, "in the event of loss of time by deficiency of men, collision, breakdown of engines, and the vessel becomes incapable of steaming or proceeding for more than forty-eight working hours, payment of hire to cease until such time as she is again in an efficient state to resume her voyage . . . . the acts of God, &c., excepted." During the currency both of the charter and of the policy the vessel sustained injury, but was able to complete her voyage. Owing, however, to the injury the charterers, who had exercised their option of extending the charter beyond the six months, refused to pay hire during the extended time until the vessel was fit to resume employment. In an action by the shipowner under the policy to recover the loss of freight for the extended time: Held, that though the accident occasioning the repairs had happened within the six months prescribed by the policy, the loss of freight had occurred subsequently to that time, and such loss was not covered by the policy. (Ct. of App., affirming Q. B. Div.) Hough and Co. v. Head 447, 505

10. Freight—Loss of—Admiralty Charter—Putting out of pay—Discharge—Perils of the sea—Causa proxima.—Where a ship is chartered by the Admiralty Commissioners for three months certain, and thenceforward until notice given, the charter-party containing a clause entitling the charterers, on the ship becoming incapable to perform efficiently the service contracted for, to put her out of pay, and before the expiration of three months the ship is rendered temporarily inefficient by reasons of the perils of the sea, and is thereupon by the commissioners put out of pay and discharged from the service, and the chartered freight outstanding is insured for three months under an ordinary time policy, the underwriters knowing of the existence of the charter-party, but not knowing its terms, the loss of freight not being proximately caused by perils of the sea, the shipowners are not entitled to recover it under the policy, (H. of L.) Inman Steamship Company v. Bischoff .....page 6

11. Freight—Time policy—Contract of affreightment—Knowledge of underwriters.—In the case of an ordinary time policy upon freight outstanding, the underwriters must be taken to have notice of the existence of a contract of affreightment, though not so as to extend the contract by implication to anything not covered by the terms of the policy. (H. of L., affirming Ct. of App.) Inman Steamship Company v. Bischoff..... 6

12. Insurable interest—Cargo—Sale of goods—Appropriation — Shipment F.O.B. — Floating policy—Declaration.—Where goods are shipped f.o.b., even though mixed with other goods of the same sort and not specifically appropriated to the buyer, if it appear that it was the intention of the parties, in the ordinary course of business, that the goods should be at the risk of the buyer, the buyer has an insurable interest in them, and if he has a floating policy on the goods he may declare in respect of the goods so shipped. (H. of L. affirming Ct. of App.) Stock v, Inglis 294, 422

13. Insurable interests—Ship—Mortgagees — Liability for value of ship—Mortgage paid off—Policy ceded to mortgagees.—When mortgagees of a ship by agreement with their mortgagors effect an insurance on the ship at the mortgagors' expense and hold the policy as part of their security, they have an insurable interest entitling them to sue on the policy, even if their mortgage has been paid off, where they have been compelled to pay to the mortgagors the value of the ship by reason of some default on their part, and the mortgagors have ceded to them their rights under the policy upon receipt of such payment. (Q. B. Div.) Levy and Co. v. The Merchants' Marine Insurance Company 407

14. Reinsurance—Ship—Constructive total loss—Notice of abandonment.—Notice of abandonment need not be given to the underwriters of a policy of reinsurance upon a constructive total loss of the ship insured. (Ct. of App.) Uzielli and Co. v. The Boston Marine Insurance Company..... 405

15. Reinsurance—Ship—Constructive total loss—Notice of abandonment—Sue and Labour clause—Agency thereunder—Amount of Liability.—Underwriters under an ordinary Lloyd's policy on a ship containing a suing and labouring clause in favour of the assured, their "factors, servants, and assigns," reinsured with the plaintiffs, who further reinsured with the defendants, for 1000*l.* subject to the same terms as those contained in the original policy, but to cover total loss only. The ship having gone ashore, her owners gave notice of abandonment to the original underwriters alone, who, having refused to accept the notice, floated the ship at considerable cost, and ultimately settled with her owners at 88 per cent. The plaintiffs having paid the original underwriters this 88 per cent., plus the expense of floating the vessel, making in all a loss of 112 per cent., sought to recover the same from the defendants. Held, that notwithstanding the settlement come to between the shipowners and the original underwriters, there had been a constructive total loss, that notice of abandonment to the defendants was unnecessary, that the defendants having insured only to the extent of 1000*l.* they were liable for no more, and that they incurred no liability under the suing and labouring clause, because the original underwriters who had floated the vessel were not the "factors, servants, or assigns" of the defendants. (Ct. of App.) Uzielli and Co. v. Boston Marine Insurance Company ..... page 405

16. Ship—Loss of—Barratry—Causa proxima.—Semble (per Lords Blackburn and Bramwell), that there is no rule of insurance law that where barratry is the remote cause of a loss it is to be looked to rather than the immediate cause. (H. of L.,) Cory v. Burr 109

17. Ship—Loss of—Capture—Barratry—Free from capture and seizure—Smuggling—Seizure—Causa proxima.—Where a ship is insured under a time policy of marine insurance covering the ordinary perils including "barratry of the master," there being also a warranty "free from capture and seizure and the consequences of any attempt thereat," and the ship is seized by foreign customs authorities in consequence of the barratrous act of the master in smuggling, and proceedings are taken to procure condemnation and confiscation of the ship, the underwriters are not liable for expenses incurred in resisting the proceedings of the foreign customs authorities, the causa proxima of the loss being seizure and not barratry. (H. of L.) Cory v. Burr 109

18. Total loss—Absolute—Policy against—Rights under—Perils of the sea—Constructive loss becoming absolute.—A policy against absolute total loss only covers any such loss of the thing insured as is sufficiently complete to entitle the owners to recover without notice of abandonment. Where, however, a ship is driven ashore, and by the continuous action of the perils of the seas becomes a total loss, the assured are entitled to recover, even though the ship were at the time of being driven ashore a constructive total loss only. (Q. B. Div.) Levy and Co. v. The Merchants' Marine Insurance Company 407

19. Warranty—Place of navigation—Admiralty chart—Effect given thereto—Judicial notice—In construing a warranty in a policy of marine insurance not to navigate in a particular part of the sea, the court should take judicial notice of the geographical positions of, and general names applied to a district as shown on the Admiralty chart. (H. of L.) Birrell v. Dryer 267

20. Warranty — Place of navigation — "No St. Lawrence"—Effect of.—The words "No St. Lawrence between Oct. 1 and April 1" in a warranty in a policy of marine insurance preclude the ship insured from navigating, not only the river, but also the Gulf of St. Lawrence. (H. of L.) Birrell v. Dryer 267

See Principal and Agent.

MARINE INSURANCE ASSOCIATION.

Policies not issued—Calls—Liability of member—Estoppel.—Where a mutual ship insurance company—the practice of which was, that after the expiration of the first time policy no new policy was issued, but instead thereof stamped receipts were given for calls—passed resolutions with its members' assent transferring its business and effects to a new company, on the terms of the new company paying all the debts and liabilities of the old, and a member of the old company continued to keep his vessels on the books of the new company, but in accordance with the practice of the old company received no policy of insurance, such member is liable to the new company for calls, he being estopped from saying that the contracts, towards the losses on which he is asked to contribute, were invalid by reason of their not being in writing or not being stamped in accordance with 30 & 31 Vict. c. 23. MASTERS WAGES AND DISBURSEMENTS.

1. Double pay—Nonpayment of Wages—Merchant Shipping Act 1854, s. 187—"Without sufficient cause."—Where, in an action for master's wages, it appears that, at the institution of the suit, accounts are outstanding between the owners and the plaintiff, and that the same have not been taken or settled, and that within two days of the institution of the suit the wages are paid, the owners have not refused to pay "without sufficient cause" within the meaning of sect. 187 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, and therefore the plaintiff is not entitled to recover ten days' double pay. (Adm. Div.) The Turgot 548

2. Double pay—Wages to date of final settlement—Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, s. 187—Merchant Seamen (Payment of Wages and Rating) Act 1880, s. 4—Question as to liability.—Under the provisions of sect. 187 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, and sect. 4 of the Merchant Seamen Act 1880, as to the nonpayment of wages, the right to recover ten day's double pay and wages to the time of final settlement is not enforceable where there is a bonâ fide question as to liability. (Adm. Div.) The Rainbow 479

3. Disbursements—Victualling contracts—Payment by master for provisions—Misappropriation by managing owner—Liability.—A master on his appointment agreed with the managing owner that he, the master, should find the provisions for the officers and crew at a certain rate per day. The master subsequently agreed with the managing owner, who was also a ship's store dealer, that the managing owner should supply the provisions and should charge them against moneys of the master which he held in his hands. The managing owner, however, debited his co-owners with the costs of the provisions, and fraudulently applied the master's money to his own purposes. Held, in an action in rem against the owners by the master to recover wages and disbursements, that the master was entitled to credit for such amount in the settlement of his accounts with the owners, the fraudulent application of his money by the managing owner being a wrong done to the co-owners for which he was not responsible. (Adm. Div.) The Dora Tully 550

4. Lien—Admiralty Court Act 1861 (24 Vict. c. 10), s. 10.—Quære, has a master under sect. 10 of the Admiralty Court Act 1861 a maritime lien for his wages and disbursements? (Ct. of App.) The Beeswing 484

5. Lien—Agreement to forego—Onus of proof.—Where shipowners, in answer to a claim for wages, plead an agreement between the managing owners and the plaintiff that the plaintiff shall, instead of receiving his wages, allow it to remain in the hands of the managing owners, and has thereby foregone his right against the ship, the onus is upon the defendants to clearly prove that there was an express arrangement to that effect, before the court will deprive the plaintiff of his right. (Adm. Div.) The Rainbow .....page 479

6. Lien—Bills of Exchange—Master liable thereon.—Where a master has incurred liability by drawing bills of exchange for goods supplied to the ship, although such liability is not discharged, he has a maritime lien on the ship to the extent of that liability. (Adm.) The Fairport 62

7. Lien—Bills of exchange—Payment not pressed—Laches.—The act of a master in not compelling payment against his ship for a liability that he has incurred by drawing bills of exchange, because he believes that they will be met by his owners, until he is actually sued upon them himself, does not amount to such laches as will forfeit his lien against a purchaser. (Adm.) The Fairport ... 62

8. Lien—Charter-party—Disbursements for ship and charterers—Rights in respect thereof.—Where a ship is chartered under a charter providing that the master shall be appointed by the charterers, that the owners are to provide and pay for all provisions and wages of captain and crew, and for the necessary equipment and efficient working of the ship, that the captain is to be dismissed by the owners if he fails to give satisfaction and that the charterers shall provide and pay for all coals, pilotages, port charges, &c., the master is the servant of the shipowners, and hence he has a right in rem for his wages and such disbursements as are necessary for the navigation of the ship, and which the charterers had not by the provisions of the charter-party undertaken to pay; and semble, per Brett, M.R., if the charterers had refused to make these disbursements, and without them the ship could not be navigated, the master would be entitled to charge them against the shipowners. (Ct. of App.) The Beeswing..... 484

9. Lien—Charter-party—Disbursements for ship and charterers—Rights in respect thereof—Drafts on owners.—Where a ship was chartered under a charter providing that the captain should be appointed and dismissed by the charterers, that the shipowners were to provide and pay for all provisions and wages of the captain and crew, and for the necessary equipment for the efficient working of the ship, and that the charterers should pay for all the coals, port charges, and other expenses, except those above stated, and the captain instituted an action in rem against the owners of the ship claiming in respect of disbursements, consisting of provisions and coals, in respect of which latter item he had given a draft on the shipowners, which draft had been dishonoured, the Court held that the master, having notice of the charter-party, was agent for both the owners and the charterers in respect of the liabilities of each, as determined by the charter, and that therefore the owners were liable in respect of the provisions, but not in respect of the coals. (Adm. Div.) The Turgot 548

10. Lien—Charter-party—Master servant of charterers.—Semble, where a master is the servant of the charterers and not of the shipowners, he has no right against the ship or owners in respect of wages and disbursements. (Ct. of App.) The Beeswing 484

11. Lien — Disbursements — Continuance — Purchasers for value—Laches.—A master of a ship has a maritime lien for his disbursements made in the service of the ship, and such lien attaches to the ship in the hands of bonâ fide purchasers without notice of the lien at the time of the purchase, unless it be lost by the laches of the master, (Adm.) The Fairport .....page 62

12. Lien—Loss of—Permitting owners to retain wages.—A master who, after receiving a portion of his wages from the managing owners, elects to allow the balance to remain in their hands at interest, by so doing loses his lien, and cannot recover the balance in rem, but if he has had no opportunity of receiving his wages, or has been refused payment of them on demand, the mere fact of his allowing them to remain in the managing owners' hands after they become due will not deprive him of his remedy. (Adm. Div.) The Rainbow 479

13. Misconduct—Dismissal—Forfeiture of right to damages—Mortgagee—Taking ship to sea.—The taking away by a master of a ship to sea, after she has been taken possession of by the mortgagees, against their wishes, is such misconduct, even when done by the orders of the mortgagor, his original employer, as will disentitle him to recover in an action in rem as against the mortgagees any compensation for dismissal by the mortgagees, upon their recovering possession of the vessel, before the term of his engagement has expired. NECESSARIES.

1. Advance to managing owner—Right against ship.—The plaintiffs, shipbrokers, had made advances to the managing owner of a foreign ship for purposes other than the ship. The managing owner applied for a further advance, but the freight of the ship being in the hands of other persons, the plaintiffs refused, but agreed to supply money for necessaries for the ship, provided they could get security for the sums advanced. The plaintiffs handed a cheque for 350*l.* to the managing owner as though for the purchase of necessaries, and this cheque the managing owner handed back to the plaintiffs in part payment of the old advance. At the same time the plaintiffs made a further advance of 200*l.* for necessaries to the managing owner, and it was agreed that, in consideration of the amount of the two advances for necessaries supplied, the managing owner should return the amount with interest and charges, and that the plaintiffs should be at liberty to cover the amount by insurance on the ship. Held that, under the circumstances, the plaintiffs were entitled to recover so much of 350*l.* as had been actually expended in necessaries (semble, because the transaction enabled the managing owner to expend that sum, or part thereof, in necessaries.) (Adm.) The Heinrich Bjorn ..... page 145

2. Advance to managing owner—Rights of Lender—Material men.—A contract entered into with the managing owner of a ship for a loan of money to be laid out in necessaries places the lender in the same position as a material man supplying the goods. (Ct. of App.) The Heinrich Bjorn... 391

3. Lien—Material men—British ship—Purchase for value—Vice-Admiralty Court Act 1863, s. 10, sub-sect. 10.—Material men supplying necessaries to a British ship in a possession in which a Vice-Admiralty court is established, do not, under the Vice-Admiralty Courts Act 1863, s. 10, sub-sect. 10, acquire a maritime lien, and the ship when in the hands of subsequent purchasers for value without notice of the debt cannot be made chargeable with the necessaries. (Priv. Co.) The Rio Tinto..... 224

4. Lien—Material men—Foreign ship—Purchase for value—3 & 4 Vict. c. 55, s. 6.—3 & 4 Vict. c. 65, s. 6, does not create a maritime lien in respect of necessaries supplied to a foreign ship, and hence material men cannot enforce their claim by proceedings in rem against the ship when in the hands of subsequent purchasers for value. (Ct. of App.) The Heinrich Bjorn 391

5. Premiums of insurance—Security for advances.—Premiums paid by a shipbroker at the owner's request, to procure insurance on the ship, for the purpose of covering advances for necessaries made by the shipbroker, are not themselves necessaries. (Adm.) The Heinrich Bjorn 145

6. Priority of liens—Possessory lien—Material men.—Material men who have a possessory lien on a foreign ship are entitled to be paid out of the proceeds of the sale of such ship in priority to other material men having no such lien, notwithstanding that the latter have recovered judgment against the ship before the material men having the lien have recovered judgment against the ship. (Adm.) The Immacolata Concezione 208

7. Priority of liens—Possessory lien—Material men—Seamen's wages.—As against material men having a possessory lien a mariner's claim for wages earned before that lien commenced, viaticum, subsistence money for the time between leaving the ship and returning home, and the costs of the action to recover such wages, &c., rank before the claim of the material men, but aliter as to the claim for wages earned after the possessory lien commenced. POOR RATE.

1. Harbour—Berwick—Rateable value—Tonnage dues—Harbour dues—Wet dock.—Under the local Acts applicable to Berwick Harbour the commissioners are entitled to levy harbour and tonnage dues on vessels entering and leaving the harbour, and in addition thereto to levy 2*d.* for every ton on any ship entering a wet dock made under the above Acts. The assessment committee, in assessing the commissioners to the poor rate as occupiers of the wet dock, included the harbour and tonnage dues. Held, that as the wet dock was not the sole meritorious cause of the commissioners' rights to the dues, the harbour and tonnage dues ought not to have been taken into account, but only the additional 2*d.* per ton on vessels actually using the dock. (Q. B. Div.)

2. Lighthouse — Exemption from rateability — General authority—Local authority—Merchant Shipping Act 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104), s. 430. —The 430th section of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 exempting lighthouse authorities from payment of rates and taxes in respect of lighthouses is only applicable to lighthouses under the control of general lighthouse authorities, and is not applicable to a lighthouse under the control of a local authority. (Q. B. Div.) The Mersey Docks and Harbour Board v. The Overseers of Llaneilian 248

3. Lighthouse—Telegraph station—Dwelling-house —Rateable value — Beneficial occupation. — A lighthouse, consisting of a tower and dwelling-house adjoining and owned by a body of public trustees, who have the right to levy such dues as are necessary to defray expenses and no more, is not rateable to the poor rate in respect of the tower, which consisted of a light room and telegraph room, it being incapable of profitable occupation, but the adjoining dwelling-house is to be assessed at a valuation which takes into consideration the existence of a tower and its use as a lighthouse and not at its value, supposing it to be disconnected from and independent of the tower. PRACTICE.

1. Action in rem—Power to add parties—Collision —Clause under Lord Campbell's Act—R. S. C., Order XVI., r. 11.—Plaintiffs commenced an action in rem under Lord Campbell's Act on the 4th Jan. 1884 in respect of loss of life by collision at sea on the 10th Jan. 1883. After the 10th Jan. 1884, it having been decided in the interim by the Court of Appeal that the Admiralty Court had no jurisdiction in such actions, the plaintiffs applied to add as defendants the owners of the wrongdoing ship personally. Application refused upon the ground that, under the provision of Order XVI., r. 11, proceedings against the parties proposed to be added would only be deemed to have commenced from the date of the service upon them of the writ of summons, and hence the action would not have been commenced against them within the time provided by Lord Campbell's Act, and the court being of opinion that it had no power to add parties as defendants in personam in an action in rem, thought it ought not to make the order merely because the objection as to time was an objection which ought strictly to be taken at a later stage. (Adm. Div.) The Bowesfield 265

2. Admission of claim—Counter-claim for larger amount—Judgment upon claim—R. S. C., Order XL., r. 11.—Where the plaintiff's claim for freight is admitted, but the defendants set up a counter-claim for damages for breach of a contract of carriage for a larger amount, the plaintiff is not entitled to judgment upon the claim, under Order XL., r. 11, as upon an admission in the pleadings. (Q. B. Div.) Mersey Steamship Company Limited v. Shuttleworth and Co. .....page 48

3. Admission of claim—Frivolous counter-claim— Judgment on admission.—Semble, where a plaintiff's claim for freight is admitted, but the defendants set up a counter-claim which is clearly frivolous for damages for breach of contract of carriage for a larger amount, the plaintiff would be entitled to judgment on his claim, and to have the sum claimed brought into court to await the result of the action. (Q. B. Div.) Mersey Steamship Company Limited v. Shuttleworth and Co.... 48

4. Appeal—Costs—Judgment affirmed for different reasons.—In a damage action where the judgment of the court below was affirmed, but for reasons other than those given by the judge below, the Court of Appeal ordered each party to pay his own costs. (Ct. of App.) The Dunelm..... 304

5. Appeal—Withdrawal of notice—Effect on cross-appeal—R. S. C., Order LVIII., r. 6.—Where an appellant withdraws his appeal after the respondent has given notice of motion by way of cross-appeal under Order LVIII., r. 6, should the respondent, determine to continue with his cross-appeal, his cross-notice will be treated as a substantive notice of appeal, in which case the original appellant may give a cross-notice of appeal that he intends to bring forward the subject-matter of his original appeal. (Ct. of App.) The Beeswing 335

6. Appeal from County Court—Time for—County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868, s. 27—County Courts Act 1875—The power conferred by sect. 27 of the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868 to extend the time within which an instrument of appeal may be lodged, provided sufficient cause be shown, is not altered or curtailed by sect. 6 of the County Courts Act 1875, this latter section merely providing an alternative mode of appeal. (Adm.) The Humber..... 181

7. Arrest by telegram—Issue of warrant—Removal from custody of Custom House officer—Contempt of court—R. S. C., Order IX., r. 12.—It having been the practice of the Admiralty Court and of the Admiralty Division to give directions by telegraph to the officers of customs to arrest a ship immediately on the issue of the warrant and before the warrant itself can have reached the officer, such arrest is valid, and if the owner or master remove her out of the jurisdiction after the officer of customs has taken possession of her, he is guilty of contempt of court, notwithstanding the provisions of Order IX., r. 12, as to the mode in which service of the warrant is to be effected. (Adm. Div.) The Seraglio 421

8. Collision—Damage to ship and cargo—Action by ship discontinued by consent—Ships held both to blame in cargo action—Limitation proceedings— Right of ship to claim.—Owners of ship and owners of cargo laden on board of her respectively instituted actions in rem against another ship for damage by collision. In the ship action the following agreement was signed by the parties: "We hereby consent to this action being discontinued without costs on the ground of inevitable accident," and the registrar made an order thereon discontinuing the action. In the cargo action both ships were held to blame, and the defendants therein obtained a decree limiting their liability. The plaintiffs in the ship action then obtained an order from the judge rescinding the order of discontinuance, and claimed against the fund in the limitation action. Held, that the agreement and consent order amounted to a mere discontinuance of the action, and not to a release of all rights possessed by the parties thereto against each other, and that, therefore, the plaintiffs in the ship action were entitled to claim against the fund. (Ct. of App., affirming the Adm. Div.) Ardandhu ..... page 573, 594

9. Collision—Loss of ship and cargo—Action by ship dismissed by consent—Ships held both to blame in cargo action—Limitation proceedings—Right of ship to claim.—Where owners of ship and owners of the cargo laden on board of her respectively institute actions against another ship for damage by collision, and in the ship action judgment is, by the consent of the parties, given, dismissing the action, but in the cargo action both ships are held to blame, and subsequently the defendants instituted an action for limitation of liability, the judgment in the ship action cannot be set aside by an order of the registrar in the absence of the plaintiffs in the cargo action, so as to enable the plaintiffs in the ship action to claim in the limitation action. Semble, the judgment in the ship action could only be set aside by the court itself upon the whole of the facts and the parties affected being brought before it; and quære whether any such order ought to be made. (Ct. of App.) The Bellcairn 503

10. Commission on bail—Costs—Damages—Discontinuance.—A successful defendant in an action in rem, where the action is decided in his favour or discontinued, cannot recover as costs the commission paid by him for bail to release his ship from arrest, though he may in some instances, where the arrest is made malâ fide or with gross negligence, recover it as damages. (Adm.) The Numida; The Collingrove 483

11. Costs—Action without authority—Knowledge of proceedings—Setting aside.—Where a shipowner applied to the court to set aside an order condemning him in the costs of unsuccessful legal proceedings taken in his behalf by the managing owner, on the ground that the proceedings had been instituted without his knowledge, consent, or ratification, and that the first intimation he had of the proceedings was a notice received by him about a month previous to the present application condemning him in the costs of such proceedings. the Court refused to grant the application, as it did not appear that the applicant, though he had no knowledge of the institution of, was not aware of the pendency of the proceedings, and because he had not at once applied to the court on becoming aware of the proceedings, instead of delaying to take any steps for over a month. (Adm. Div.) The Bellcairn 582

12. Costs — Counsel's fees— Collision — Registrar's discretion.—In any action for damage by collision where, the damage to one vessel amounting to 20,000*l.*, and to the other vessel to 2000*l.*, three counsel were instructed on behalf of the plaintiffs, and the fees marked on their briefs were respectively seventy-five guineas, fifty guineas, and thirty guineas, and the registrar, on taxation, reduced these fees to sixty guineas, forty guineas, and twenty-seven guineas; the Court, on appeal from the taxation, allowed the original fees, holding that they were proper fees in a case of that magnitude. (Adm. Div.) The City of Lucknow 340

13. Costs—Detention of witnesses.—Semble, the cost of detaining witnesses on shore may be allowed, although such witnesses are not called at the trial. This is a matter in the discretion of the registrar. (Adm. Div.) The City of Lucknow 340

14. Costs—Marshal's fees—Sale of ship—Mortgagees intervening — Necessaries action.—Where mortgagees intervened in a necessaries action which was discontinued by the plaintiff before coming to trial, the Court directed that the marshal's fees occasioned by the sale of the ship, which was ordered on the application of the mortgagees, should be borne by the mortgagees, who had received the proceeds of the sale, and for whose benefit it had been made. (Adm. Div.) The Colonsay ..... page 545

15. Costs—Printed evidence for use in court—Collision—R. S. C., Order LXVI., r. 7, and Appendix N.—In consequence of the negligent navigation of the M. the steamship P. M. came into collision with the M. and with the D. In a damage action instituted by the owners of the P. M. against the M., the plaintiffs were successful. In a damage action, instituted by the owners of the D. against the M. to recover damages arising out of the collision between the D. and the P. M., the plaintiffs were successful. In this latter action, by agreement between the parties, the evidence in the first action, which had been printed in the form of a record for the purposes of appeal, was admitted, and was supplied to the plaintiffs by the owners of the P. M., the defendants refusing to provide them with it. The registrar, on taxation, allowed the plaintiffs, the owners of the D., the amount paid by them to the owners of the P. M. for the printed evidence, and 3*d.* per folio for this printed evidence provided for the use of counsel in court in accordance with the terms of Appendix N. of the Rules of the Supreme Court 1883. On objection to the registrar's taxation the Court refused to disallow the 3*d.* per folio. (Adm. Div.) The Mammoth 289

16. Costs—Several claims—Ship sold in one action—Right to costs of sale.—Where, owing to the proceedings of one of several claimants against a ship, she is sold and the proceeds paid into court, so as to be available for all the claims, the party at whose instigation the ship is sold, though his claim is postponed after the others, is entitled to his costs up to and inclusive of the sale. (Adm.) The Immacolata Concezione 208

17. Costs—Three Counsel—Collision action—Registrar's discretion.—In a collision action where the trial promised to be protracted, and the damage done exceeded 2000*l.*, the Court refused to interfere with the registrar's discretion in allowing the costs of three counsel. (Adm. Div.) The Mammoth 289

18. Counter-claim—Cross action—Admiralty Court Act 1861, s. 34.—The words "cross-action" in sect. 34 of the Admiralty Court Act 1861 cover a counter-claim, and the court will stay a collision action till security is given for a counter-claim when covered by that section. (Ct. of App.) The Newbattle 356

19. Court of Appeal—Equal division—Decision not binding.—Although, in consequence of the Court of Appeal being equally divided in opinion, the decision of the court below stands, yet the Court of Appeal is not bound thereby on a subsequent occasion, though semble (per Brett, M.R.) it is otherwise in the case of the House of Lords. (Ct. of App.) The Vera Cruz 270

20. Default proceedings—Action in rem—Sale of foreign ship—Necessary affidavit.—The court will not order the sale of a foreign ship in a default action in rem merely on the affidavit to lead the warrant and the report of the marshal alleging that it is desirable the ship should be sold, but it further requires an affidavit verifying the cause of action and stating that no appearance has been entered on behalf of the ship. (Adm. Div.) The Hercules 545

21. Discovery—Security for costs—R. S. C., Order XXXI., rr. 25, 26.—The court or a judge is not bound under Order XXXI., r. 25, to made an order dispensing with security for costs of discovery because both parties consent to dispense with such security. (Ct. of App.) Aste, Son, and Kercheval v. Stunmore, Weston, and Co......page 175

22. Double litigation—Lis alibi pendens—Collision —Actions in rem—Bail—Stay of proceedings.—Where a collision action was instituted in Holland in which the defendants' vessel was released upon a letter of guarantee given between the parties, and the plaintiffs subsequently instituted a second action in this country, and re-arrested the vessel, the Court of Admiralty stayed the second action and released the vessel: The Court of Appeal (Baggallay and Fry, L.JJ., Brett, M.R. dissentiente) affirmed the order, being of opinion that the letter of guarantee being in principle equivalent to bail, the second proceedings in this country were vexatious, and that having the power to stay them they ought, under the circumstances, to exercise that power. (Ct. of App.) The Christiansborg 491

23. Double litigation—Les alibi pendens—Collision —High Court—Vice-Admiralty Court—Election —Stay of proceedings.—Where, in a damage action in personam for collision, it appeared that the defendants had, prior to the institution of the action in the High Court, instituted proceedings in rem against the plaintiffs to recover damages in respect of the same collision in a Vice-Admiralty Court near to the place where the collision occurred, the Court upon summons stayed all further proceedings in the High Court until after the Vice-Admiralty action had been heard. (Adm.) The Peshawur 88

24. Double litigation—Les alibi pendens—English and foreign courts — Judgment — Execution — Election—Stay of proceedings.—Although a plaintiff may be put to his election between two actions, where one is in an English court and the other abroad, on the ground of vexation, the court will not consider the double litigation vexatious, where there are substantial reasons to induce the plaintiff to sue in both countries, as where he can get a judgment in each action, but execution is more easily obtained in one country than in the other. (Ct. of App.) Peruvian Guano Company Limited v. Bockwoldt 29

25. Double litigation—Les alibi pendens—English and foreign courts—Subject-matter not identical —Election—Stay of proceedings.—Where an action was brought in England against D. and Co. claiming delivery of seven cargoes, damages, and an injunction against disposing of the cargoes, which were claimed by the plaintiffs, and were then in ships in British waters, and another action was commenced in a French court by the same plaintiffs against the same defendants for six of the same cargoes, the ships and cargoes having been removed to France after the institution of the English action, and the cargoes sold by D. and Co., it was held (affirming Bacon, V.C.) that the double proceedings were not vexatious, and therefore the plaintiffs ought not to be put to their election whether they would proceed in the French or English action. (Ct. of App.) Peruvian Guano Company Limited v. Bockwoldt 29

26. Interrogatories—Several defendants—Co-ownership action—Separate deposit—Security for costs —R. S. C., Order XXXI., r. 26.—Where in a co-ownership action, brought by a managing owner against his co-owners for an account to recover a balance, the plaintiff sought to interrogate the defendants, who were numerous, and to be dispensed from making the usual deposit, the defendants contending that a deposit ought to be made in respect of each defendant interrogated, the Court ordered a deposit of 5*l.*, and 10*s.* for each additional folio over five and no more. (Adm. Div.) The Whickham.....page 479

27. Joinder of parties—Defendants—Discretion of judge—Carriage of goods—R. S. C., Order XVI., r. 11.—Upon an application in an action against shipowners for damage to cargo, under Order XVI., r. 11, by the defendant or defendants on the record, that other defendants be added, the court or judge may exercise a discretion, and the order will not be made unless it is shown that the non-joinder complained of will prejudice the parties to the action, or that "the presence before the court of additional parties is necessary in order to enable the court effectually and completely to adjudicate upon and settle all the questions involved in the cause or matter." (Q. B. Div.) Leduc and Co. v. Ward and others 571

28. Judgment by default—Action in rem—Motion for judgment—R. C. S., Order XXVII., r. 11.—As under Order XIII., r. 12, default actions in rem are to proceed as if the defendant had appeared, Order XXVII., r. 11, as to setting down an action on motion for judgment where the defendant makes default in pleading, applies to such actions, and judgment therein is to be obtained under the provisions of that rule. (Adm.) The Spero Expecto 197

29. Judgment by default—Action in rem—Time— Rules of Supreme Court, Order XIII., r. 12.—In default actions in rem, before the plaintiff can obtain judgment under Order XIII., r. 12, the ten days within which the defendants might have pleaded must have elapsed, and notice of trial must have been filed in the registry. (Adm.) The Avenir 218

30. Mode of trial—Action in rem—Jury—Discretion —R. S. C., Order XXXVI., rr. 4, 6, 7.—Actions in rem are excluded from the operation of Order XXXVI., r. 6, giving the parties an absolute right to trial with a jury by virtue of the provisions of Order XXXVI., r. 4, and hence applications for a trial with a jury in such cases are to be made under Order XXXVI., r. 7 (a), which gives the judge a discretion as to the mode of trial. (Ct. of App.) The Temple Bar..... 509

31. Mode of trial—Action in rem—Master's wages— —Jury—Discretion.—In an action in rem for master's wages and disbursements set down for trial at the assizes, where the judge of the Admiralty Division had in his discretion refused to allow a trial by jury, the Court of Appeal declined to interfere with such discretion. (Ct. of App.) The Temple Bar 509

32. Notice of action—Form—Letter.—Where a notice of action is required, the notice given should not be construed strictly, but a letter, which merely states that damage has been sustained for which the defendants will be held responsible, is not a notice of action. (Priv. Co.) Union Steamship Company of New Zealand v. Melbourne Harbour Commissioners..... 222

33. Notice of action—Harbour commissioners— Officers.—Where harbour commissioners were constituted by Act of Parliament, and a section of the Act required notice of action to be given to "any person for anything done by him under this Act:" Held (affirming the decision of the court below), that the fact that this section occurred in a part of the Act headed "Officers" could not be held to limit it to acts done by officers of the commissioners, but that the commissioners as a body, were entitled to notice of action. (Priv. Co.) Union Steamship Company of New Zealand v. Melbourne Harbour Commissioners 222

34.—Pleadings—Form—R. S. C., Order XIX., r. 5.—The forms of pleading under Order XIX., r. 5, are not under all circumstances to be rigidly complied with, but are rather to be taken as the class of pleading it is desired to introduce. (Adm.) The Isis .....page 155

35. Priority of claims—Costs—Sale of ship—Mortgage—Material men.—Where after the commencement of a mortgage action against a British ship whose owners were domiciled in this country, material men with a possessory lien on the ship intervened, and the ship was sold by order of the court, but the proceeds proved only sufficient to satisfy the claim of the material men, the Court ordered that the taxed costs of the plaintiff in the mortgage action up to the date of the sale of the ship should be paid out of such proceeds. (Adm.) The Sherbro' 88

36. Reference—Costs—Collision—More than one-third of claim disallowed—Discretion.—The rule of the Admiralty Court, in damage actions, that where more than a third of the plaintiff's claim at the reference is disallowed he is condemned in the costs of the [reference, is not a hard and fast rule fettering the judge's discretion, and the judge is entitled, and ought to exercise his discretion as to costs according to the circumstances of each particular case. (Ct. of App.) The Friedeberg 426

37. Registrar's report—Confirmation—No objection thereto—Right to payment.—A report of the registrar and merchants does not necessarily stand confirmed by reason of the defendants failing to take objection thereto within the time provided for in rule 117 of the Admiralty Court Rules 1859, so as to absolutely entitle the plaintiffs to payment to them by the defendants of a sum of money which the court is of opinion ought not to have been allowed them in the report. (Adm.) The Thyatira 178

38. Registrar's report—Objection to—Time for—Extension.—The court has power to extend the time within which objection to the report of the registrar and merchants may be taken. (Adm.) The Thyatira 178

39. Sale of ship by marshal—Private contract—Appraisement—Several claims—Assent of and notice to claimants.—In an action for master's wages and disbursements, where the ship proceeded against was subject to other claims by mortgagees and material men, the Court upon motion, no opposition being offered, ordered an official appraisement of the ship to be made, and the ship to be sold by the marshal by private contract for a sum of money not less than the appraisement, upon proof that the mortgagees assented to such sale, and that notice of the motion had been served upon all the claimants. (Adm.) The Planet 144

40. Service of writ—Action in rem—Solicitors—Marshal.—In an action in rem, service of the writ of summons by a solicitor or his clerk, and not by the marshal, is a valid service. (Adm. Div.) The Solis..... 368

41. Service of writ out of jurisdiction—Action against underwriters—Co-defendants served within jurisdiction—R. S. C., Order XI., r. 1 (g).—The provisions of Order XI., r. 1 (g.) allowing service out of the jurisdiction where any person out of the jurisdiction is a necessary party to an action properly brought against some other person within the jurisdiction are applicable to the case of an action on a policy of marine insurance against several underwriters some of whom are within the jurisdiction and others resident in Scotland. (Q.B.Div.) The Steamship Thanemore Limited v. Thompson and others.....page 398

42. Solicitors costs—Lien—Italian ship—Expenses of sending of crew home—Payment by Italian Government—Charge by Italian Code—23 & 24 Vict. c. 127, s. 28.—Solicitors for defendants in a salvage action against a foreign ship, who are entitled to a charge upon the ship, or the proceeds thereof, for their costs and expenses incurred in the preservation of the property, do not take priority of the claim of the foreign Government, who, on the abandonment of the ship by her owners, are entitled, by the provisions of their Code, to a lien upon the ship, or the proceeds, for the expenses of sending back the ship's crew to their own country. (Adm.) The Livietta 151

43. Solicitor's costs—Italian ship—Expenses of sending crew home—Payment by Italian Government—Charge by Italian Code—23 & 24 Vict. c. 127, s. 28.—An Italian ship was brought into a British port by salvors. A salvage action having been instituted, the ship was sold by order of the court, and a sum was awarded out of the proceeds to the salvors. After payment of that sum, and the costs of the plaintiffs, a balance of 60*l.* 10*s.* 3*d.* remained in court. The defendants' solicitors had incurred expenses in pumping the ship, paying the marshal's possession fees, &c., and claimed a charging order upon the balance in court for such expenses, and sought payment out of such balance to them. The Italian Government, through their consul in this country, had sent home the crew of the ship, and had incurred expenses by so doing. By Italian law such last-mentioned expenses are a lien upon the ship. The Italian consul opposed payment out to the defendants' solicitors, and claimed priority for the lien of the Italian Government. Held, that the Italian Government was entitled to such priority. (Adm.) The Livietta 151

44. Solicitors' costs—Settlement by parties—Order on defendants—Collusion.—In a wages action, where the defendants effect a settlement behind the back of the plaintiffs' solicitor, and the plaintiffs fail to pay their solicitor's costs, the solicitor cannot obtain an order that the defendants should pay his costs, unless he show clearly that in making the compromise there has been collusion between the parties with the intention of depriving him of his lien. (Ct. of App.) The Hope..... 126

45. Third party—Indemnity—Express or implied—Damage to cargo—Order XVI., r. 48—Where a defendant claims to be entitled to indemnity over against a person not a party to the action leave will not be given under Order XVI., r. 48, to serve on him a third-party notice, unless the claim is on a contract of indemnity express or implied. (Ct. of App.) Spiller v. The Bristol Steam Navigation Company 228

46. Trinity Masters — Functions — Questions of nautical skill—Judge.—Per Brett, M.R.: The functions of the nautical assessors being to assist the judge by their advice, and not to control his decision, where the judge differs from his assessors on questions of nautical skill he is not bound by their opinion. 1. Bond for safe return — Conditions — Value—Practice.—In an action of restraint the proper form of bond is a bond for safe return, and not a bond to answer judgment in the action. The bond will be conditioned to the appraised or agreed value of the plaintiffs' shares, and not to double the value of such shares. (Adm. Div.) The Robert Dickinson page 341

2. Bond for safe return to particular port—Duration of—Second action—Right to bring.—Where minority owners have instituted an action of restraint claiming security for the safe return of the ship to a named port within the jurisdiction, and a bond is given by the defendants for that purpose, such bond remains in force until the ship returns to that port, and the plaintiffs are not entitled to institute another action for further security upon the ship's return to another port within the jurisdiction, and if such second action is instituted it will be dismissed with costs. ST. KATHARINE'S DOCK ACT 1864.

"Vessel" — Barge — Harbours, Docks, and Piers Clauses Act 1847, ss. 3, 4.—A barge simply propelled by oars is not a "vessel" within the meaning of sect. 101 of the London and St. Katharine's Dock Act 1864, notwithstanding that the Harbours, Docks, and Piers Clauses Act 1847 incorporated therewith provides that the word "vessel" shall include ship, boat, lighter, and craft of every kind, and whether navigated by steam or otherwise, and hence a barge owner is not liable under that section to a penalty for leaving his barge in the docks without any person on board. (Q. B. Div.) Hedges and Son (apps.) v. The London and St. Katharine's Docks Company (resps.) 539

SALE OF GOODS.

1. Bill of lading—Duty to forward—Duty to accept—Delay.—Per Brett, M.R.: In a contract for the sale of goods to be carried by ship to their destination it is implied that the shipper will forward the bill of lading with reasonable diligence, and if he do so, the purchaser cannot refuse to accept the goods because he gets the bill of lading after the arrival of the ship, and after charges in the nature of demurrage have been incurred. (Ct. of App.) Sanders Brothers v. Maclean 160

2. Payment against bill of lading—One only tendered—Duty of vendee—Where goods are bought abroad payment to be made in London in exchange for bills of lading, and one of a set of bills of lading made in parts is tendered to the vendee while the goods are still on the voyage, he is not entitled to refuse to accept the bill of lading merely on the ground that by taking one he runs the risk of the shipper or other person dealing fraudulently with the other parts, but he is bound to accept the goods and pay for them in accordance with the terms of his contract. (Ct. of App.) Sanders Brothers v. Maclean.....page 160

3, Payment by bills of exchange—Appropriation of shipments to payment—Failure of acceptors.—Where a firm abroad orders goods from a firm in this country, and the goods are supplied by an agent who draws bills of exchange upon the home firm while he sends the goods to the foreign firm with the bill of lading, stating that he draws against the shipments, there is no such appropriation of the shipments, or the proceeds of sale thereof, to meet the bills of exchange, as will enable the holders of the bills to sue the foreign firm on the failure of the home firm after the latter have accepted the bills. (Ct. of App., affirming Ch. Div.) Phelps, Stokes, and Co. v. Comber 245, 428

4. Payment by bills of exchange—Direction to charge against shipment—Specific appropriation.—The purchasers of bills of exchange, on the face of which there is a direction to the drawees to charge the amounts thereof against particular shipments of goods, who do not receive therewith the bills of lading, do not obtain thereby any lien or charge on the shipments. The statement in the bills only amounts to a representation that the bills are regular, and actually drawn against shipments, and not accommodation bills. And even when, in addition to such a direction in the bills of exchange, the letter of advice by the consignors to the consignees incloses the bill of lading, and states that against the consignments the consignors value on them for a particular sum in favour of the bill holder (naming him), there is no specific appropriation of the shipments or the proceeds of sale to meet the bills. (Ct. of App.) Brown, Shipley, and Co., v. Kough 433

5. Payment by bill of exchange—Direction to charge against shipment—Specific appropriation.—If the court in Frith v. Forbes (7 L. T. Rep. N. S. 261; 4 De G. F. & J. 409) did not rely on the special circumstances of that case as showing in fact that a specific appropriation of the shipments to meet the bills of exchange had been agreed on, but intended to lay down as a principle of law that a letter of advice, inclosing the bill of lading, and stating that against the consignments bills of exchange had been drawn in favour of the bill-holder constituted a specific appropriation in favour of the bill-holder, the decision in Frith v. Forbes is now overruled. (Ct. of App.) Brown, Shipley, and Co. v. Kough 433

6. Shipping documents—Bill of exchange—Acceptance made on condition—Right to goods—Consignee.—Where goods are consigned to a person in this country, and the consignor transmits the shipping documents and a bill of exchange to a creditor other than the consignee, and such creditor hands the shipping documents to the consignee with an intimation that they are at his disposal on his returning the bill of exchange duly accepted, the consignee must either accept the bill of exchange or return the documents, and if he refuses to accept the bill of exchange, but nevertheless takes possession of the goods, professing to retain the bill of lading as security for freight and other charges, the consignor's creditor is entitled to recover from the consignee as damages the value of the cargo less freight and interest on such value. (Ch. Div.) Rew v. Payne, Douthwaite, and Co...... 515

See Collision, No. 49—Marine Insurance, No. 12.

SALE OF SHIP.

1. Judgment—Res judicata—Estoppel—Shipbuilding agreement—Rectification.—After money has been paid under a judgment deciding on the construction of an agreement for the sale of a ship that the plaintiffs were not entitled to priority over the defendants, such judgment constitutes no bar to a subsequent action by the plaintiffs claiming rectification of the agreement, on the ground that such construction was contrary to the intention of the parties. (Kay, J.; since reversed by Ct. of App. See next vol.) Caird v. Moss.....page 565

2. Passing of property—Appropriation—Scotch law—Bankruptcy of vendor—Engine-building contract—Parts constructed and materials to pass—Mercantile Law Amendment (Scotland) Act 1856 (19 & 20 Vict. c. 60), s. 1.—By the law of Scotland the effect of the appropriation and acceptance of a specific chattel by the contracting parties is to perfect the contract of sale, and to give the purchaser a right to demand delivery, but the property in the chattel does not pass to him until he has obtained delivery under the contract; and sect. 1 of the Mercantile Law Amendment (Scotland) Act 1856 (19 & 20 Vict. c. 60) imposes no limitation upon the right of the vendor's creditors to attach goods in his custody until the contract of sale has been so perfected, and hence where engineers contract with shipbuilders to supply engines for their ships, and an agreement is subsequently entered into between the parties by which it is stipulated that on payment being made on account of any engines the portions thereof so far as constructed, and all materials laid down in the engineers' yard for the purpose of constructing the same, shall become and be held as the absolute property of the shipbuilders subject only to the lien of the engineers for the payment of the price or any balance thereof that may remain due, the shipbuilders are not entitled on the bankruptcy of the engineers, as against the trustee in bankruptcy, although they have paid large sums on account, to take possession of the materials which were in the engineers' yard at the time of their bankruptcy. (H. of L.) Seath and Co. v. Moore 586

3. Passing of property—Contract for building—Distress for rent—Landlord and tenant.—A ship which is being built under a contract providing that the purchaser shall pay by instalments at various stages of its construction, and that at the payment of each instalment the property in the ship as completed up to that time is to vest in the purchaser, is liable to distress in respect of the shipbuilders' rent, the circumstances of the case not coming within any of the exceptions which exempt goods on the premises of a tenant from liability to distress for rent due to the landlord. (Pollock, B.) Clarke v. The Millwall Dock Company..... 462

SALVAGE.

1. Agreement—Master—Crew—Costs.—Where seamen instituted a salvage action in the High Court, and sought to dispute an agreement made by their master for 200*l.*, which the court upheld, apportioning 40*l.* to the crew, the plaintiffs were condemned in the costs of the action. (Adm. Div.) The Nasmyth 364

2. Agreement—Master—Crew—Privity of contract.—Where the master of a salving ship agreed to render salvage services for a reasonable named sum the Court refused, in a salvage action instituted by some of the crew, to depart from the terms of the agreement upon the ground that the crew were not actual parties to it, holding that such a course would be prejudicial to the interests of commerce. (Adm. Div.) The Nasmyth page 364

3. Amount—Appeal—Damage sustained by salving ship—Loss of profit—Reduction of award.—In a service of considerable merit lasting for sixty-two hours, where the court below on a value of 67,200*l.* had awarded 5000*l.* for the service, and 3535*l.* 1*s.* 6*d.* for damages and expenses arising out of the service, the Court reduced the award to a lump sum of 6000*l.* (Priv. Co.) The De Bay 156

4. Amount—Derelict—Life salvage—Salvage of property,—In a case of salvage of a derelict the Court, having out of the proceeds of ship and cargo, amounting to 608*l.*, awarded one-half to the salvors of property, awarded 150*l.* to life salvors taking off the crew, together with costs to both plaintiffs. (Adm.) The Anna Helena ... 142

5. Amount—Derelict—Life and property—Salvage.—It is not the general rule in cases of salvage of derelicts to give one half the value of the property saved, although in some cases where values are small and the services meritorious, it may be proper to do so. (Adm.) The Anna Helena..... 142

6. Amount—Derelict—Salvage by sailing ship and steamship—Apportionment.—A brig on a voyage from Norway to Cardiff, with a crew of nine hands, fell in with a derelict brig, in risk of imminent loss, between Heligoland and the Dogger Bank, and put a mate and two hands aboard her, who shortly after endeavoured to regain their own vessel, but their boat was swamped and one of the men drifted astern and was rescued by a fishing smack. After great difficulty and much hardship the two men navigated the derelict in safety to within a few miles of Dungeness, when she was taken in tow by a steamship and placed in Dover Basin. In consolidated actions of salvage brought respectively by the owners, master, and crew of the brig, and by the owners, master, and crew of the steamship, the Court awarded one-half the value of the property salved, out of which three-fifths were apportioned to the salving brig. (Adm.) The Livietta..... 132

7. Amount—Services mainly towage—Apportionment between owners, master, and crew.—Where, in a salvage action, the court awarded a total sum of 4000*l.*, and there was no special danger to the master or crew, and the service was mainly towage, the Court apportioned 3000*l.* to the owners of the salving ship. (Adm.) The Kenmure Castle 27

8. Amount of award—Appeal.—Where the Admiralty Court on a value of 62,000*l.* awarded 6000*l.* to a steamship, which, at great risk to herself, got another steamship off a coral reef in the Red Sea, ninety-five miles from Suez, and so saved her from probable total loss, and then at her request towed her within a few miles of Suez, the Court of Appeal refused to reduce the amount of the award. (Ct. of App.) The Lancaster..... 174

9. Appeal—Practice—Amount—Privy Council—In salvage appeals, the Court of Appeal, following the rule of the Privy Council, will not interfere with the amount of the award, unless the amount has been estimated on wrong principles or upon a misapprehension of the facts, or unless, assuming the principles and facts to be correct, the amount of salvage is, in the opinion of the Court of Appeal, exorbitant in the sense of being beyond all reason. (Ct. of App.) The Lancaster 174

10. Bail.—Expenses of arrest on excessive amount—Practice.—In a salvage action in which the plaintiffs arrested the salved ship in the sum of 3000*l.* and the court on a value of 14,000*l.* awarded 450*l.*, the salvors were ordered to pay all the costs and expenses of finding bail for 3000*l.*, such sum being in the opinion of the court unreasonably excessive. (Adm.) The George Gordon .....page 216

11. Cargo—Liability of shipowner—Average bond—Duty to take delivery of cargo.—Where salvage services are rendered to ship, freight, and cargo, there is no duty on the owners of the salved ship before delivering the cargo to take a bond from the consignees thereof securing payment by the consignees to the salvors of salvage due in respect of the cargo. (Adm. Div.) The Raisby..... 473

12. Cargo—Liability of owners—Owners of salved and salving ships identical—Warranty of seaworthiness—Latent defect—Right of recovery—Counter-claim for amount paid to crew.—Where a screw-steamship carrying cargo under a bill of lading containing the exception "accidents of the seas and of navigation," becomes disabled through her main shaft breaking in consequence of a latent defect in existence prior to the sailing of the vessel, and another vessel belonging to the same owners renders salvage services, such owners are precluded from recovering salvage against the cargo by reason of the services becoming necessary through the breach of their warranty of seaworthiness. In these circumstances the right of the crew of the salving ship to recover for the services is not affected by such unseaworthiness; but the owners of the cargo, having to pay such salvage, are entitled to recover by way of counter-claim, from such of the plaintiffs as are owners of the salved ship, the full amount which they, the owners of cargo, have to pay to the crew for salvage; and the same rule applies to the case of an owner of a salving ship who is not also the owner of the salved ship. (Adm. Div.) The Glenfruin 413

13. Cargo—Services to—Liability of shipowners.—Where salvage services are rendered to ship, freight, and cargo, the shipowners are not personally liable for the services to the cargo. (Adm. Div.) The Raisby 473

14. Cargo—Services to—Liability of shipowners—Agreement for towage.—Salvage services were rendered by the steamship G. to the steamship R. and her cargo under the following written agreement signed by both the masters: "At my request, the captain of the steamship G. will tow my ship, the steamship R., to St. Nazaire, that being the nearest port for repairs. The matter of compensation to be left to arbitrators at home, to be appointed by the respective owners." The R. was towed to St. Nazaire, and thence proceeded to Dunkirk, where her cargo was delivered to French consignees. A salvage action in rem was commenced in England against ship, freight, and cargo, but the plaintiffs not being able to procure the appearance of the cargo owners, salvage was awarded in respect of ship and freight only. In a salvage action in personam against the owners of the R. to recover salvage for the services rendered to the cargo: Held, that the defendants were not liable under the agreement, and that there was no liability on shipowners to pay salvage for services to cargo. (Adm. Div.) The Raisby 473

15. Collision—One ship assisting the other—Right to reward—Merchant Shipping Act 1873, s. 16.—Where two ships having been in collision, one of them renders assistance to the other by towing her, being bound by sect. 16 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1873 to stand by and render assistance, quære, whether she is entitled to salvage remuneration, even though she is not to blame for the collision. (Adm. Div.) The Beta; The Peter Graham ..... page 276

16. Collision—Two ships in danger—Services to one—Benefit to other—Right to reward from both.—Where two vessels are in collision, and a salvor renders service to one, without a request from or engagement by the other, and the latter is thereby rescued from a position of immediate danger, such service being a direct benefit to both vessels, entitles the salvor to salvage reward from both. (Ct. of App.) The Vandyck 17

17. Costs—Action brought in improper amount—Small award—Both ships owned by same owner.—Where a steamship, disabled by the breaking of her crank-shaft, was towed a distance of about thirty miles without danger or risk by another steamship belonging to the same owners as the disabled vessel, and fifteen of the crew of the towing vessel instituted a salvage action in the sum of 5000*l.* against the vessel towed, and arrested the vessel, cargo, and freight therein, the Court held such services to be salvage services, but of so slight a character that on a value of 105,500*l.* it awarded 15*l.*, and ordered the salvors to pay all the costs of the action, expressing disapprobation both at the institution of the action in the High Court, and at the arrest of the vessel for such an amount. (Adm.) The Agamemnon 92

18. Costs—Tender—Payment into court—Practice. Where in a salvage action defendants with their statement of defence tender and pay into court a sum of money in satisfaction of the plaintiffs' claim, and plead such payment into court, and the sum paid in is held to be sufficient, the court will order the defendants to pay the plaintiffs' costs up to the date of the delivery of the statement of defence, unless the circumstances of the case render it just and expedient to order otherwise. (Adm. Div.) The William Symington 293

19. Damage to salving ship—Cost of repairs—Demurrage—Evidence—Amount recoverable.—In a salvage action evidence of the specific injuries sustained by the salving ship and the cost of repairs thereof, and of demurrage during repairs, was tendered in the Court of Admiralty, and rejected. Held, in the Court of Appeal (Baggallay and Lindley, L.JJ.), that the judge is bound to receive such evidence, and to include the loss shown in his award, except in cases where such evidence is immaterial by reason of the property saved being too small in value to satisfy such loss, or by reason of the services being so trifling as to render it unjust that the loss sustained by the salvors should be borne by the owners of the salved property, or where from other circumstances it is obvious that the court cannot give an amount sufficient to cover the loss; but, per Brett, M.R., that the admission of such evidence is entirely in the discretion of the judge, subject to his award being reviewed by the Court of Appeal in the event of its being shown that the rejection of the evidence improperly affected the amount of the award. (Ct. of App.) The City of Chester..... 311

20. Damage to salvor—Interest—Right to recover.—Interest on the amount of loss and damage sustained by rendering salvage services is not recoverable by salvors. (Priv. Co.) The De Bay 156

21. Damage to salving ship—Loss of profit—Evidence—Admissibility—Right to recover.—Where in rendering salvage services a ship has sustained actual damage and loss of profit which is capable of being accurately ascertained, evidence of the amount thereof is admissible on behalf of the salvors, and the court should, where there is a fund sufficient for the purpose without depriving the owner of the benefit of the salvage, award to the salvors the amount of such loss and damage in addition to the salvage reward. (Priv. Co.) The De Bay..... page 156

22. Damage to salvors—Loss of profits—Right to recover.—Where the steamship S. having broken down twelve miles east of Scarborough, was, in twenty-four hours, towed into the Tyne at different intervals, by the steam trawlers M. and F. A. and the smack S., and the master of the smack S. having entered into an agreement with the master of the steamship S., whereby he was, for the sum of 20*l.*, to procure assistance, had informed the trawler M. of the whereabouts of the steamship S. only on condition of sharing in the salvage earned by the M., the Court, on a value of 10,552*l.* 9*s.* 2*d.*, awarded to the M. 200*l.* in respect of the salvage, and 100*l.* for loss of profits and for repairs, to the S. 10*l.* and to the F. A. 70*l.* (Adm.) The Sunniside 140

23. Damage to salvor—Loss of profits—Right to recover—Evidence.—In a salvage action evidence of the loss of profits and damage sustained by the salving vessel is admissible as an element to be considered in awarding remuneration; but evidence of loss of profits is not to be taken in ordinary cases as a fixed figure always to be allowed as in the nature of damages. This rule does not apply with the same force to actual damage sustained. (Adm.) The Sunniside 140

24 Damage to salvor—Depreciation in value—Loss of charter—Right to recover.—Salvors are entitled to recover for general depreciation in the value of a sailing ship in consequence of the damage sustained, and for loss of charter-party if proved. (Priv. Co.) The De Bay 156

25. Life salvage—Agreement—Authority of master.—Semble, a master has no authority to bind his owners by an agreement to save the lives of himself and crew, as his owners have no beneficial interest in the subject-matter of such a contract. (Ct. of App.) The Renpor 98

26. Life salvage—Agreement—No property saved—Right to reward.—Where the steamship R. being in imminent peril of total loss, her master on behalf of himself and his owners entered into the following agreement with the master of the steamship M. L.: "It is hereby agreed between Thomas Gibb, the master of the above steamer, and Robert Osborn, master of the steamship R., that the above steamer M. L. agrees to stay by me until I am in a safe position to get to port, for the sum of 1200*l.*, my vessel being badly holed in starboard bow near collision bulkhead;" and in pursuance of the agreement the M. L., at great risk, stood by the R. until she sank, when the M. R. took off her master and crew; it was held (affirming Sir R. Phillimore), that no life salvage was recoverable, as no property had been saved, and that neither master nor owners were liable under the contract, as the condition "until I am in a safe position to get to port" had not been fulfilled. (Ct. of App.) The Renpor..... 98

27. Life salvage—No property saved—Right to reward.—Life salvage is only recoverable where ship, cargo, or freight is saved so that a fund out of which the award can be paid is realised; hence ineffectual attempts to save the property, though rendered at express request, give no claim to life salvage. (Ct. of App.) The Renpor 98

28. Incomplete service without benefit—Ship ultimately saved — No right to reward.—Where salvors in answer to a request for assistance render services which through no fault of theirs are ineffectual, and leave the vessel in distress in a worse position than the one in which they found her, they are entitled to no reward, even though the vessel be ultimately saved by other salvors. (Adm. Div.) The Cheerful .....page 525

29. Incomplete but beneficial service—Vessel ultimately saved—Right to reward.—Where a vessel engaged in rendering salvage services is compelled in consequence of the nature of her cargo to abandon the service before it is completed, she is not deprived of her right to reward if by the services already rendered she has brought the vessel she is assisting from a position of danger into a position of comparative safety, and the vessel is ultimately saved. (Adm.) The Camellia 197

30. Misconduct of salvors—Forfeiture—Diminution.—Misconduct on the part of salvors, other than criminal misconduct, works a diminution, but not a total forfeiture of reward. (Adm. Ct. of Cinque Ports.) The Marie..... 27

31. Misconduct of salvors—Loss of ship—Forfeiture of award—Counter-claim for damage to ship.—Where salvors, having taken possession of a derelict vessel, whose crew had taken refuge on board the salvors' vessel, improperly refused to put back the crew or take the proffered assistance of a tug, although they themselves had no local knowledge, and then brought the derelict to anchor in an improper place, in consequence of which she was lost, the Court, although the ship and cargo were subsequently raised, and realised 3075*l.*, refused to give any salvage remuneration, and condemned the plaintiffs in costs, but dismissed the counter-claim for damages. (Adm.) The Yan Yean..... 135

32. Practice — Pleading — Tender — Payment into court.—In the defence in a salvage action the mere offer by the defendants to pay a sum named in an agreement made prior to the rendering of the services without payment into court is a bad plea. (Adm.) The Nasmyth 364

33. Practice — Pleadings — Admission of facts—R. S. C., Order XIX., rr. 4, 5.—In salvage actions the plaintiffs in their statement of claim should state fully the material facts of the service, and if such facts are admitted by the defendants, the court will not allow the plaintiffs at the hearing to amplify them by evidence, except on special grounds. (Adm.) The Hardwick 199

34. Practice—Costs—Higher scale—Value of property salved—R. S. C., Order LXV., r. 9.—In a salvage action, where the value of the salving ship, together with cargo and freight, was 80,000*l.*, of the property salved 42,000*l.*, and the award 2400*l.*, the Court refused to allow costs on the higher scale, the rule being that in the absence of special circumstances of difficulty or urgency costs on the higher scale will not be allowed. (Adm.) The Horace 218

35. Practice — Pleadings — Form — Evidence—R. S. C., Order XIX., rr. 4, 5, 7.—In salvage actions it may be proper in some cases, owing to the practice of the court that where the defendants admit the facts alleged in the statement of claim, the plaintiffs are not allowed to give any evidence at the hearing, to use a fuller form of statement of claim than that given in the example in the appendix to the Rules of the Supreme Court 1883, and approaching more nearly to the old form. (Adm.) The Isis..... 155

36. Practice—Pleadings—Form—R. S. C., Order XIX., r. 7.—In a salvage action where the plaintiffs had delivered a statement of claim in the form No. 6, sect. 3 of Appendix C to the Rules of the Supreme Court 1883, the Court, on motion by the defendants, ordered the plaintiffs under Order XIX., r. 7, to deliver a further and better statement of the nature of their claim, and ordered the costs of the motion to be costs in the cause. (Adm.) The Isis .....page 155

37. Sale of ship and cargo before judgment—Deterioration in value—Order for sale—Default action.—Where in a salvage action in which no appearance had been entered it was alleged upon affidavit that the ship and cargo were daily deteriorating in value, and that large expenses were being incurred in respect of the charge of the property, and that the plaintiffs had been in communication with the owners as to a sale, the Court, on motion by the plaintiffs prior to decree, ordered an appraisement and sale of the property. (Adm.) The Anna Helena 61

38. Tender—Costs—Practice.—In a salvage action it is not necessary that a tender should be accompanied with an offer to pay the plaintiffs' costs up to the date of tender. (Adm. Div.) The William Symington 293

SHIPOWNERS.

1. British ship—British owners—Foreign registry—Liability—Merchant Shipping Acts.—Semble, where a ship is owned by an English limited company, which for the purpose of carrying on business in a foreign country is registered in that country as a foreign company, and the ship is also registered there, the ship is nevertheless a British ship, and, although not having a British registry, is subject to all the liabilities of a British ship. (Ct. of App.) The Chartered Mercantile Bank of India, &c., v. The Netherlands India Steam Navigation Company Limited 65

2. Conspiracy of shipowners to exclude others—Restraint of trade—Cause of action—Injunction—Damages.—The Court will not grant an interim injunction to restrain the existence of a combination of shipowners offering advantageous terms to shippers confining their shipments to the combination's ships, which combination is alleged by other shipowners to be a conspiracy for the purpose of ruining them by driving away the trade from their ships, where the parties complaining do not show that they will suffer irreparable injury by the continuance of the combination, and where it appears that if the plaintiffs establish their case they will recover ample compensation by way of damages. (Q. B. Div.) Mogul Steamship Company Limited v. McGregor, Gow, and Co. page 467

3. Conspiracy of shipowners to exclude others—Restraint of trade—Indictable offence—Right of action.—A combination by shipowners offering advantageous terms to shippers confining their shipments to the combination's ships, and alleged by other shipowners to be a conspiracy entered into for the object of ruining them by driving away the trade from their ships may be an indictable offence, and therefore actionable. (Q. B. Div.) Mogul Steamship Company Limited v. McGregor, Gow, and Co. 467

4. Co-owners—Order for an account—District registrar — Report — No appeal.—Where a district registrar has made an order in an action in the Admiralty Division for an account between the part owners of a ship that the accounts be filed, and that they be proceeded with, it is too late to take objection to his making such order after he has reported, there having been no appeal against such order (Adm. Div.) Gowan v. Sprott 288

5. Co-owners—Order for an account—District registrar—Report—Objection to—R. S. C., Order VI., r. 1.—Where an action is instituted in an Admiralty District Registry by part owners of a ship against the managing owner thereof for an account and the writ claims an account under Order III., r. 8, and an order for the filing of the accounts is made under Order XV., r. 1, and the account is proceeded with pursuant to order, and the district registrar reports thereon, such report is to be treated as the usual report in an Admiralty Court Action, and if the defendant seeks to take objection thereto, he must do so according to the provisions of Order LVI., r. 11, otherwise the plaintiff will be entitled to judgment thereon. (Adm. Div.) Gowan v Sprott 288

6. Co-ownership action—Claim by managing owners—Amounts left unpaid—Co-owners proceeded against—Stay of execution—Costs—Delay.—A managing owner, who had not delivered accounts for nine years, instituted a co-ownership action for settlement of accounts, and for payment of the balance found due to him, and claimed certain items in respect of materials supplied to the ship for which he had not paid, and for which the defendants were being sued in the Queen's Bench Division. The registrar in his report allowed the plaintiff these items. Upon application to confirm the report, and for judgment, the Court decreed payment of the amount found due by the registrar, but stayed execution until the defendants were protected against the claims in the Queen's Bench Division, and refused the plaintiff the costs of the action upon the ground of delay in rendering his accounts. (Adm. Div.) The Charles Jackson 399

7. Co-ownership action—Managing owner—Unpaid claims.—Quære: Is a managing owner entitled to recover against his co-owners in respect of sums of money due to third parties on account of the ship, but which he has not paid? (Adm. Div.) The Charles Jackson 399

8. Co-ownership action—Sale of ship—Minority and majority owners.—The High Court of Justice (Admiralty Division) will not, in a co-ownership action, order the sale of a ship on the application of either minority or majority owners, unless the applicants prove strong necessity for so doing. (Adm. Div.) The Marion ..... page 339

9. Expenses of voyage—Liability for—Time charter—Voyage charter.—Where a ship, having been chartered out and home under a time charter, is being brought home under a voyage charter in consequence of the time charter having been broken, the purchaser of shares purchasing during such homeward voyage is not liable for losses incidental to the voyage out under the time charter. (Adm. Div.) The Meredith 400

10. Managing owner — Right to remuneration — Commission profits.—Semble, that a managing owner may be entitled to some reasonable sum as a commission on profits, although he owns shares in the ship and no express agreement as to his remuneration has been entered into. (Adm. Div.) The Meredith 400

11. Practice — Co-ownership action — Registrar's report — Time for objection — Extension. — The Court will not extend the time for objecting to the registrar's report in a co-ownership action without special grounds being shown by the party seeking to object. (Adm. Div.) Gowan v. Sprott 288

STOPPAGE IN TRANSITU.

1. Duration of transit—Lien for freight—Notice to shipowner—Unpaid vendor—Sub-sale—Delivery order.—Where the master of a ship retains a lien for freight upon the cargo, the bill of lading of which cargo has been indorsed by the purchaser as security for an advance, the fact of a sub-sale and handing over of a delivery order for the cargo to the sub-purchaser, and actual receipt by him of part, does not put an end to the transitus, and the unpaid vendor has, upon giving due notice, the right to stop the purchase money payable by the sub-purchaser, after discharging the advance on the bill of lading. TOWAGE.

1. Agreement to pay for work done and to be done —Master's authority—Ship lost—Liability of owners.—The steamship W. having found the steamship A., on the 12th Feb. off Cape Finisterre in a disabled condition, towed her in heavy weather until the 14th Feb., when, in consequence of the condition of the A., the master of the W. proposed to abandon her. However, at the desire of the master of the A., it was agreed in writing that the W. should "stand by the A. as long as possible, and that the W. and the owners were to be paid for the time and towing already done and to be done from the 12th Feb. 1883." The W. thereupon again took the A. in tow, but on the 16th Feb., owing to stress of weather it was found necessary to abandon her, after which she was totally lost. In an action for towage against the owners of the A., the Court held that the agreement entered into by the master of the A. was a reasonable one, and one which, in his position of agent ex necessitate for his owners, he had an authority to enter into, and awarded the plaintiffs the sum of 400*l.* in respect of the services rendered prior to and after the agreement. (Adm.) The Alfred 214

2. Contract—Breach—Damage—Notice restricting liability for negligence.—A term in towage contract, by which tug owners exe pt themselves from liability for damage or loss occasioned by the negligence or default of their servants, covers damage occasioned in con equence of the act of the master taking in tow t oo many vessels at a time in contravention of a statutory bye-law of the port in which the towage takes place, although the number of vessels causes the tug to be of insufficient power for the service. (Ct. of App., affirming Adm.) The United Service ...55, 170

3. Contract—Breach—insufficiency of coal—Completion of towage—No damage—Right to recover. —Where in the course of towage the tug, owing to her having started with an insufficient supply of coal, is obliged to cast off to go to the nearest port to ship more coal, and then returns and completes the towage, the tug-owners are entitled to be paid the price agreed upon in the towage contract if the owners of the tow do not prove any damage to have been occasioned to them by the temporary discontinuance of the towage. (Adm. Div.) The Undaunted .. ..page 580

4. Contract—Warranty—Breach—Insufficiency of coal—Notice restricting liability.—In a towage contract there is an implied undertaking on the part of the tug-owners to supply an efficient tug with sufficient equipments, including a proper supply of coal; and hence, a term in the contract by which the tug-owners are exempted from liability for loss or damage occasioned by the negligence of their servants is no defence to an action for damages occasioned to the owners of the tow in consequence of the towage being discontinued owing to the tug having started with an insufficient supply of coals. (Adm. Div.) The Undaunted 580

5. Tug and tow—Duty to control navigation.—It is not the duty of those in charge of a tow which is being towed with a long scope of hawser by night at sea to direct the movements of the tug—the circumstances being different to towing by day in a river. (Adm Div.) The Stormcock 470

5. Seamen — Engagement by master — Agent for owners—Charter-party—Rights as to wages.—A master who, though appointed by the owners of the vessel, yet under the terms of the charter-party thereby becomes the charterers' captain, is as between the owners and the seamen the agent of the owners, and hence seamen engaged for a voyage are not bound to look into the title of the master who appoints them to ascertain whether he is the captain of the owners or the charterers. (Ch. Div.) Re The Great Eastern Steamship Company; Claim of Williams and others 511

6. Seamen—Foreign-going Ship—Lien—Voyage not proceeded upon.—Seamen engaged by the owners or their agent for a voyage upon a foreign-going ship are entitled to a lien for their wages upon the ship, and the proceeds of sale thereof, although the engagement of the seamen has not been in writing, and although the ship does not proceed upon the voyage. (Ch. Div.) Re The Great Eastern Steamship Company; Claim of Williams and others 511

7. Seamen—Termination of engagement—Merchant Seamen Act 1880 (43 & 44 Vict. c. 16), s. 4.—The words "at the end of his engagement" in the Merchant Seamen Act 1880 (43 & 44 Vict. c. 16), s. 4, sub-sect 1, mean the time at which a seamen's actual service terminates, and include the natural effluxion of the agreement as well as the discharge of the seaman in breach of the contract. And therefore, to entitle a seaman to wages to the date of final settlement, it is not necessary that the whole term of his engagement should have expired, but it is sufficient that his actual service on board ship should have ended. MARITIME LAW.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Nov. 3, 1881, and July 10, 1882.

(Before the LORD CHANCELLOR (Selborne), Lords BLACKBURN, WATSON, and FITZGERALD).

KEMP v. FALK. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF APPEAL IN ENGLAND.

Stoppage in transitu—Termination of transit—Sub-sale—Rights of original vendor against purchase money of sub-purchaser.

The consignees of a cargo of goods sold the cargo "to arrive," before the arrival of the ship, to sub-purchasers. The original purchaser having become bankrupt, the unpaid vendor gave a notice of stoppage in transitu to the master, after the sub-sales, and after a small part had been delivered. The bill of lading had been indorsed to a bank as security for an advance to the original purchaser, and the consignees remitted the proceeds of the sub-sales to the bank.

Held (affirming the judgment of the court below), that the case was governed by Re Westzinthus 5 B. & Ad. 817), and Spalding v. Ruding (6 Beav. 376), and that the vendor was entitled, as against the trustee in the bankruptcy, to the balance of the purchase money after satisfying the claim of the bank.

Ex parte Golding, Davis, and Co. (42 L. T. Rep. N. S. 270; 13 Ch. Div. 628 distinguished.

Per Lord Blackburn: Notice of stoppage in transitu given to a shipowner is not effectual till it is communicated to the master, but it imposes on the owner an obligation to send it on with reasonable diligence.

THIS was an appeal from a judgment of the Court of Appeal (James, Baggally, and Bramwell, L.JJ.), reported in 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 280; 14 Ch. Div. 446, and 42 L. T. Rep. N. S. 780, under the name of Ex parte Falk, Re Kiell, reversing a decision of Mr. Registrar Hazlitt, sitting as Chief Judge in Bankruptcy.

On the 25th March 1878 the respondent Falk, a salt merchant at Liverpool, sold to one Kiell, then a merchant in London, a cargo of salt, to be shipped at Liverpool on board the Carpathian, for Calcutta. Kiell paid 415*l.* 12*s.* 2*d.*, part of the invoice price, in cash; and gave his acceptance at four months for the balance, amounting to 847*l.* 8*s.* 6*d.*

On the 20th July Kiell became bankrupt, and the appellant, Kemp, was appointed trustee under his liquidation. On the 29th July the Carpathian arrived at Calcutta, and before the bankruptcy Kiell's agents had sold the cargo to sub-purchasers "to arrive."

On the 27th July Falk served a notice of stoppage in transitu on the owners of the Carpathian, which they communicated to their agents in Calcutta on July 31st; and it was communicated to the master on Aug. 5th, at which time a small part only of the cargo had been delivered, and the freight had not been paid.

The bill of lading had been indorsed for value to the Bank of Scotland, and the balance of the proceeds of the sub-sales, after satisfying the claim of the bank, was paid to the appellant as trustee in Kiell's liquidation.

The unpaid vendor, Falk, applied to the Court of Bankruptcy that the trustee might be ordered to pay the money over to him, but the learned Registrar refused his application. This decision was reversed by the Court of Appeal, as above mentioned, on the authority of the case of Ex parte Golding, Davis and Co. (42 L. T. Rep. N. S. 270; 13 Ch. Div. 628), and from their judgment the present appeal was brought.

The facts appear more fully in the report in the court below, and in the judgments of their Lordships.

Nov. 3, 1881.—The appeal came on for hearing before Lords Penzance, Blackburn, and Watson.

Benjamin, Q.C. and G. W. Lawrance appeared for the appellant.

Cohen, Q.C. and F. Thompson for the respondent.

Their Lordships expressed a wish for further information as to the sub-sales and the deliveries under them, and the appeal was accordingly adjourned.

July 10, 1882.—Bompas, Q.C. and G. W. Lawrance (Benjamin, Q.C. with them) appeared for the appellants, and argued that the right of stoppage in transitu was at an end when the cargo had been re-sold "to arrive." The cases of Re Westzinthus (5 B. & Ad. 817) and Spalding v. Ruding (6 Beav. 376) are distinguishable, and Ex parte Golding, Davis and Co., on which the court below based their judgment, went further than any previous authority, and cannot be maintained. At all events the right was gone when cash receipts were given to the sub-purchasers, or at latest on Aug. 2nd, when there was a part delivery. The facts show that the consignees were indorsees for value, and if that were so the right of stoppage was gone. The cash receipts given to the sub-purchasers were "documents of title" within sect. 5 of the Factors Act 1877 (40 & 41 Vict. c. 39), and the delivery of them took away the right of stoppage. They also referred to

Slubey v. Heyward, 2 H. Bl. 504;
Hammond v. Anderson, 1 B. & P. N. R. 69;
Crawshay v. Eades, 1 B. & C. 81;
Tanner v. Scovell, 14 M. & W. 28.

Cohen, Q.C. and F. Thompson, who appeared for the respondents, were not called upon to address the House.

At the conclusion of the arguments for the appellant, their Lordships gave judgment as follows:—

The LORD CHANCELLOR (Selborne).—My Lords: This seems to me a case of very great simplicity. It is admitted that but for the indorsement of the bill of lading of the cargo in the Carpathian, the right of stoppage in transitu would have been well exercised as against everybody on Aug. 5th, after which the greater part of the cargo was delivered. Then the question is, what is the effect of the indorsement of the bill of lading? It was an indorsement to the Bank of Scotland, who had advanced money upon it; and the cases of Re Westzinthus (ubi sup.), and Spalding v. Ruding (ubi sup.), clearly establish that the right of stoppage in transitu is not discharged absolutely by an indorsement of a bill of lading by way of security or pledge, but that it remains, in equality at all events, as it was before, subject to a charge in favour of the indorsee of the bill of lading, which must be paid off; and being paid off, the person entitled to and exercising the right of stoppage in transitu stands in exactly the same position as to everybody else as if there had been no security, and no pledge, and no indorsement of the bill of lading. And against what is that right of stoppage in transitu? Not against some imaginary interest of the purchaser, but against the goods themselves. It is a right to stop the goods; and I have no notion of any right of stoppage in transitu which is not a right to stop the goods when they are still in transitu in contemplation of law. It is a qualified right in the circumstances which I have mentioned, because it cannot be asserted as against the holder of the bill of lading without paying him off; but the instant his claim is discharged it is exactly the same right as if there had been no security as against the original purchaser, and as against, in my opinion, every one claiming under him. It was contended that when after an indorsement by way of security, such as was here made to the Bank of Scotland, there has been a sale of the goods "to arrive" by the original purchaser, without any document of title, a sale which passes to the sub-purchaser such equitable interest as his immediate vendor could convey, that displaces the right of stoppage in transitu established by the cases I have referred to. From the beginning of the argument I was totally unable to understand how that could possibly be. The indorsement of the bill of lading to the Bank of Scotland can confer no title whatever upon the other persons to whom the original purchaser transfers such rights as he has. He can transfer no greater or better right than he has, and the right which he has is a right subject to a stoppage in transitu in all cases in which the right of stoppage in transitu remains in favour of the original seller of the goods. I put, therefore, aside the whole argument founded upon the existence of sub-purchasers. I assent entirely to the proposition that where the sub-purchasers get a good title as against the right of stoppage in transitu there can be no stoppage in transitu as against the purchase money payable by them to their vendor; at all events, until I hear authority for that proposition, I am bound to say that it is not consistent with my idea of the right of stoppage in transitu that it should apply to anything except to the goods which are in transitu. But when the right exists as against the goods, it is manifest that all other persons who have, subject to that right, any equitable interest in those goods by way of contract with the original purchaser or otherwise, may come in; and if they satisfy the claim of the seller who has stopped the goods in transitu, they can, of course, have effect given to their rights; and I apprehend that a court of justice in administering the rights which arise in actions of this description, would very often find that the rights of all parties were properly given effect to, if so much of the purchase money payable by the sub-purchasers as might be sufficient for his claim were paid to the original vendor; and, subject of course to that, the other contracts would take effect in their order and in their priorities. I observe an illustration of that in the letter of Aug. 5th 1878, written by the respondent's solicitors, in which they say that they have been told that Messrs. Wiseman, Mitchell, and Co., have contracted for the sale of the salt upon certain terms; that they do not want to put them to inconvenience, and that therefore they will be quite ready, upon being paid what is due to them, to let that contract receive proper effect. That is merely a way of working out the right of stoppage in transitu, which is a right against the goods, and, as I said before, could be in no way whatever affected or prejudiced by any dealings between the original insolvent purchaser and persons purchasing under him without any title founded upon an indorsement of the bill of lading for value received. I put that argument entirely aside; and I then come to the question which has been argued upon the special circumstances of this case.

I assume that there was no stoppage in transitu effectually made till Aug. 5th. I put, therefore, entirely out of the question whatever had been done bonâ fide before that time; and the question is whether there was not, as against the cargo then remaining undelivered, an effectual stoppage in transitu. The facts appear to me absolutely to exclude the notion of a constructive delivery of the whole cargo having taken place before Aug. 5th, because it appears that the sub-purchasers, to some of whom small portions of the cargo had been delivered before Aug 5th, were all dealing separately from each other. Each of them contracted to buy a certain quantity of salt, for which they paid Messrs. Wiseman, Mitchell, and Co.; they took receipts from them for their own portions. They "took those receipts to the vessel, and the quantities of salt for which they had respectively thus paid were then weighed out and delivered to them respectively in the presence and under the supervision of the master or other officer of the ship, and the clerk of the consignees," without any arrangement as to the freight; from which it is apparent that nothing could be more separate and distinct than the delivery of each parcel in that case; and if there were no more than those facts, the delivery of one parcel could not possibly operate as a delivery of the whole. Then it was said that it ought to be considered, on account of the terms of the letter of Aug. 2nd 1878, that there was some constructive delivery of the whole cargo to the clerk of the consignees. That also appears to me to be a suggestion for which there is no warrant in the natural construction of the letter itself; a suggestion entirely unsupported by anything else, and really inconsistent with the fact that the delivery was not made by the clerk, but "in the presence of and under the supervision of the master or other officer of the ship, and the clerk." The clerk might be present, too, and might concur, but his concurrence could not mean that he had already become the possessor of the cargo, as if it had been taken out of the ship and delivered to him. The only other argument advanced was founded upon the fact that the consignees indorsed the bill of lading and delivered it to the captain. It was not indorsed to the captain for value, and there is nothing whatever to show that your Lordships ought to infer that it had been indorsed to somebody else for value. We know that it had been indorsed for value to the bank, and we know the extent of their claim under it; and the bank have been satisfied or must be satisfied. The suggestion that it was indorsed either to Messrs. Wiseman, Mitchell, and Co., as persons who are under contract or might be liable, or to any of the various sub-purchasers through them, is entirely without foundation; and in the agreed statement of facts no indorsement is mentioned at all, except the indorsement of the Bank of Scotland. It seems to me evident that the Bank of Scotland sent the bill indorsed to them in order that their own security might be realised, and it then came into the hands of Messrs. Wiseman, Mitchell and Co., for that purpose; and it is not said that the indorsement which preceded the delivery of the bill of lading to the captain by these gentlemen was for any special purpose whatever which could give any new title, legal or equitable, to anybody who had it not before. The result is that under those circumstances the case seems to me to be altogether within the ruling in the cases of Re Westzinthus (ubi sup.), and Spalding v. Ruding (ubi sup.), and therefore that the present appeal must be dismissed with costs.

Lord BLACKBURN.—My Lords: I perfectly agree in the result that this appeal must be dismissed with costs. Taking the agreed statement of facts it seems to me that the case is perfectly clear. We have no occasion to consider whether the case of Ex parte Golding, Davis and Co. (ubi sup.), was well or ill decided, because no point relating to it arises here, as was supposed in the court below. It appears that Mr Falk had sold to a Mr. Kiell a quantity of salt, which was shipped on board a vessel bound for Calcutta; that Kiell accepted a draft drawn against that cargo; that bills of lading were made out, which were signed, not by the master, as is usual, but by the shipowner himself; and that Kiell got those bills of lading. So far as that goes, nothing can be more firmly established than the law upon it. Falk, having delivered the goods and taken a bill of exchange, had no right whatever to meddle with those goods further, unless before the end of the transitus the purchaser became insolvent and stopped payment, and then if Falk had stopped the goods in transitu he would have been re-vested in his rights as an unpaid vendor as against Kiell. It is pretty well settled now that it would not have rescinded the contract. But before the end of the transitus come, his right to stop the goods in transitu might be defeated by an indorsement upon the bill of lading to a person who gave value. In the present case there was such an indorsement and transfer of the bill of lading, but it was only an indorsement and transfer for a particular and limited purpose. It appears that Kiell, in order to obtain an advance, got Messrs. T. Wiseman and Co., of Glasgow, the correspondents and agents of Messrs Wiseman, Mitchell, and Co. of Calcutta, to make an advance in his favour by drawing a bill of exchange upon him; and to secure the payment of that bill of exchange, the bill of lading was indorsed, and the Bank of Scotland, who discounted or took that bill, became holders of the bill of lading for the purpose of protecting themselves. It was clearly a transfer for value to the Bank of Scotland, and as such, so far as that went, it defeated the right of the stoppage in transitu at law. But the unpaid vendor's right, except so far as the interest had passed by the pledging of the bill of lading to the pledgee, or the mortgagee, whichever it was, enabled the unpaid vendor in equity to stop in transitu everything which was not covered by that pledge. That has been settled and considered law, or rather equity, ever since the case of Re Westzinthus (ubi sup.), and has been affirmed in Spalding v. Ruding (ubi sup.); and I have no doubt it is very good law upon that point. Here, therefore, the stoppage by Falk as unpaid vendor would re-vest in him his lien, except so far as concerned the Bank of Scotland, unless something else had happened. Now what has happened? The agreement was this: first of all it appears that Messrs. Wiseman, Mitchell, and Co., who were the persons to whom the goods were consigned, sent over to their correspondents, T. Wiseman, and Co., of Glasgow, a sale note, and then they forwarded it to Kiell and Co., in this letter: "Dear Sirs, we inclose sale note of your cargo of salt, ex Carpathian, to arrive," and so on. So that at that time it appears that Messrs. Wiseman, Mitchell, and Co. had entered into a contract at Calcutta for a sale of the goods "to arrive." The date of that letter was July 17th, a fortnight or so before the ship actually did arrive at Calcutta.

That, it was argued, put an end to the vendor's right to stop the goods in transitu, and pro tanto to the equitable right to stop them in transitu which remained in Mr. Falk. No sale, even if the sale had actually been made with payment, would put an end to the right of stoppage in transitu unless there were an indorsement of the bill of lading. Why an agreement to sell, unless it was made in such a way as to pass the right of property in the goods sold, should be supposed to put an end to the equitable right to stop them in transitu, I cannot understand. I am quite clear that it does not. It was next attempted to argue this: the Bank of Scotland, the holders of the bill of lading at Glasgow, forwarded the bill of lading in due course to their agents at Calcutta; and it is surmised that those agents must have been some persons different from Messrs, Wiseman, Mitchell and Co. I infer that Messrs. Wiseman, Mitchell, and Co. were the persons who acted as their agents in this transaction, but I do not think it matters whether they were or not. Those agents received that bill of lading well knowing (or at all events they ought to have known) that the Bank of Scotland had, by virtue of its bill of lading, a hold over the goods. They were entitled to see that the goods were not sold or disposed of in any way prejudicial to their lien; and if they were sold, that the money, or enough of it to repay the Bank of Scotland and secure them, should pass through their hands or the hands of their agents; and I see nothing that happened afterwards which shows that they acted otherwise than in strict conformity with the duty thus cast upon them. It was argued that, inasmuch as Messrs. Wiseman, Mitchell, and Co. had acted for Kiell and Co. in selling the goods, taking a del credere commission to secure that the people to whom they sold should pay the price, therefore they were persons who were entitled to have the bill of lading indorsed to them as a security. I am utterly unable to understand that argument; it is clear to me that they were not so entitled. The next thing which was said was this, that Messrs. Wiseman, Mitchell, and Co., who, I cannot but think, were the persons employed by the Bank of Scotland as their agents, did at some time, I do not exactly know when, indorse the bill of lading and show it to the captain. I do not think that that comes to more than this, that they gave the captain complete notice when he arrived at Calcutta: "We are the persons who have the legal right to the delivery of these goods, for we have the bill of lading, holding it under the Bank of Scotland, and consequently we are the persons entitled to the goods. You can deliver only to us without being responsible to us; if you deliver to us or with our sanction you will not be responsible to us." I can put no other meaning upon it. Then it was argued that this amounts to a delivery of the whole cargo by the shipowner to Messrs. Wiseman, Mitchell, and Co., who from that time forward would be holders of the goods, the ship owner, in whose physical possession the goods were, being changed from holding the goods as shipowner not having delivered the goods into a warehouseman holding those goods in his ship as a warehouse. I think that is an arrangement which might be made, although it is not a very convenient one. The freight was not paid, but I think it is possible to make an arrangement by which, though the freight is not paid, the shipowner changes himself completely into a warehouseman instead of being a carrier; he alters his responsibilities altogether, and by arrangement or agreement retains a lien over the goods until the freight is paid. I think that such a contract might be made; but when one is asked to say that such a contract was made, the non-payment of the freight is a very important element, leading one to say that no such contract was made at all. In this case I cannot help thinking that no such contract was made, and there is no reason why we should hold that it was. The shipowner acted in the same way as if it had not been made.

Then comes an argument which I really think is not tenable, and I should hardly mention it if it were not for the great importance of everything relating to the Factors Act, and of every question touching it in the commercial world. It was argued that the recent statute (40 & 41 Vict. c. 39, s. 5), which says that the transfer of a delivery order or any other document of title shall put an end to an unpaid vendor's right to countermand that delivery order and to keep the goods, operates just to the same extent and under the same circumstances as in the case of a bill of lading for goods at sea. In order to make out that proposition reliance was placed upon this fact, that Messrs. Wiseman, Mitchell, and Co., who were holders of the bill of lading, as I have already said, for the Bank of Scotland, wrote to the captain of the ship, saying, "In order to save trouble we will not sign delivery orders for salt, but have written our sircar on board the above vessel to deliver salt to those men who produce cash receipts from our cashiers;" and by some strange process of reasoning it was said that the man who brought and showed to the sircar of Messrs. Wiseman, Mitchell, and Co. a receipt for a sum of money paid to their cashier for the salt, was the holder of a document of title for the salt in such a way that the indorsement of it would put an end to the right of stoppage in transitu by Mr. Falk. Now in the first place the statute in question was never meant to have that effect. In the next place, it is an abuse of language to call such a receipt as this a document of title in any shape. Then the last attempt was to say that the stoppage in transitu was not until the 5th Aug. I see that Bramwell, L.J. takes a different view of the law from what I had always understood it to be. I had always myself understood that the law was that, when you became aware that a man to whom you had sold goods which had been shipped had become insolvent, your best way, or at least a very good way, of stopping them in transitu was to give notice to the shipowner in order that he might send it on. He knew where his master was likely to be, and he might send it on; and I have always been under the belief that although such a notice, if sent, cast upon the shipowner who received it an obligation to send it on with reasonable diligence, yet if, though he used reasonable diligence, somehow or other the goods were delivered before it reached he would not be responsible. I have always thought that a stoppage, if effected thus, was a sufficient stoppage in transitu; I have always thought that when the shipowner, having received such a notice, used reasonable diligence and sent it on, and it arrived before the goods were delivered, there was a perfect stoppage in transitu. Consequently I think that when notice was given to the shipowners (and although they had signed the bill of lading instead of the master, I do not think that that makes any difference), they were under an obligation to forward it with reasonable diligence, if they could, to the master. What the shipowners did was this: on the 31st July they sent this telegram: "Charterers Carpathian failed, unless bill of lading held for value don't deliver." That was, as it strikes me, a sending forward of the notice to stop the goods in transitu, and consequently I should say that the stoppage in transitu was complete on the 31st July. But it is not necessary to decide that point, for it is clear enough that the goods were not then delivered, and nothing was done which would be called a delivery of the whole or any part of them till the 3rd Aug., when a person brought one of these receipts for some small quantity of salt, and got it delivered. Then it was said that the delivery of a part is a delivery of the whole. It may be. In agreeing for the delivery of goods with a person you are not bound to take an actual corporeal delivery of the whole in order to constitute such a delivery, and it may be very well that the delivery of a part of the goods is sufficient to afford strong evidence that it is intended as a delivery of the whole. If both parties intend it as a delivery of the whole then it is a delivery of the whole, but if either of them dissents, then it is not so. I had always understood the law upon that point to have been agreed since the judgment of Parke, J. in Dixon v. Yates (5 B. & Ad. 313), and I rather think that the onus is upon these who say that it was intended as a delivery of the whole. Therefore the delivery of this particular parcel of salt was not a delivery of anything else. What we are now dealing with is the delivery of the salt which was delivered after the 5th Aug., which was quite sufficient to dispose of the whole sum now in dispute. We need not inquire what were the rights in any particular parcel of salt delivered on the 3rd Aug. The present question is with regard to the stoppage in transitu of the residue, after an undoubted notice was served on the 5th Aug. Is that subject to the rule that although the whole of the cargo could not be stopped because the bill of lading had been transferred to the Bank of Scotland, the interest which still remained in Kiell or his assigns, or in anybody else except those who had become transferees of the bill of lading, might be stopped, and might become vested in Falk the original vendor? I think there is no reason why it should not; and that being so, the judgment of the court below is right and ought to be affirmed.

Lord WATSON.—My Lords: It is not necessary for me to say much in regard to this case. I agree with your Lordships as to the result to which you come in point of fact, and, arriving at that result, it is quite impossible for me to hold, notwithstanding the very ingenious argument that has been addressed to us, that the case is not directly ruled by the cases of Re Westzinthus (ubi sup.) and Spalding v. Ruding (ubi sup.), There is no occasion for your Lordships to consider the effect or the propriety of the judgment of the Court of Appeal in the case of Ex parte Golding, Davis and Co. (ubi sup.). The law laid down by the other cases I have mentioned is very well established and very clear law, and, in my opinion, it directly applies to the facts of this case.

Lord FITZGERALD.—My Lords: I concur in the decision which has been announced by the Lord Chancellor. One of the questions before your Lordships' House is whether the transit of the goods had ended before the 5th Aug. 1878, when the vendor's notice to stop was delivered to the master of the Carpathian at Calcutta. "Transit" embraces not only the carriage of the goods to the place where the delivery is to be made, but also delivery of the goods there according to the terms of the contract of conveyance. Thus in this case "transit" means the conveyance of the goods to Calcutta, and their delivery "at the port of Calcutta" by the carrier, according to the terms of the charter-party and bill of lading, into the actual or constructive possession of the consignee. This seems to me to raise a question of fact which is not now open for controversy. It appears that the freight which was to be paid "on the right delivery of the cargo agreeable to bill of lading at a tonnage rate on the quantity delivered, in full of all port charges" was paid in two payments—on the 22nd Aug. and the 3rd Sept. 1878. It does not appear that the shipowners had on or before the 5th given up their lien for freight. No delivery orders had been given to the consignees or sub-purchasers. The course pursued by Wiseman, Mitchell, and Co., who stood in the position of consignees, was to indorse the bill of lading, and deliver it to the captain, with the letter of the 2nd Aug., and then as each sub-purchaser paid for the quantity he had purchased he got a receipt, took it to their clerk on board the ship, and his quantity was weighed out and delivered to him over the ship's side under the supervision of the master. The deliveries commenced on the 2nd Aug., when a small quantity was unshipped and delivered. No delivery took place on the 4th, and on the 5th a small quantity was delivered. But assuming that the delivery on the 5th took place before the notice to stop, there remained then in the ship in charge of the carrier far the greater portion of the cargo. It seems to me that at the time of the delivery of the notice to stop, that portion was still in transit, and liable to be stopped, and that there had been no actual delivery of the whole, and that the partial deliveries of the 2nd and 5th Aug. to different sub-purchasers of lots do not indicate any constructive delivery of part as representing the whole cargo, or give rise to any question of that character. This statement of facts seems to me to determine the whole controversy, for if there was nothing more there could be no doubt of the unpaid vendors' equity to stop the surplus after payment of the demands of the bank.

Another question was however raised, viz., whether the sub-sales of the whole cargo before the arrival of the Carpathian at Calcutta put an end to the right of the unpaid vendor to stop the goods, or defeated his equitable title to be paid out of the surplus of the unpaid purchase money. The facts again seem to prevent any such question arising. The argument in the court below was that the sub-sales amounted to a complete transfer of the property both legal and equitable in the goods, and that there was by the attornment of the master a complete delivery to the sub-purchasers before notice to stop was given, and that in such a state of facts it had never been held that the vendor had any right against the sub-purchaser's money. But we now learn that no delivery orders were signed by the master or by the agents, nor were any given by Wiseman, Mitchell, and Co. representing the consignees. The shipment in Liverpool was in bulk, "the ship not accountable for natural wastage," and each purchaser seems to have purchased not any specific lot, but so much, to be weighed out to him ex ship. I infer also that the money to be paid by the sub-purchasers for the quantity which remained in the ship after the deliveries of the 5th Aug. had not been paid to Wiseman, Mitchell, and Co. before the notice to stop. The foundation, therefore, on which the appellant here rested his argument in the court below is entirely removed.

Your Lordships ought to give full effect to the equitable principles on which the right of stoppage in transitu rests. It is a right founded on reason, and never works injustice. In affirming the decision of the court below your Lordships merely decide that the claims of the unpaid vendor against the surplus produce of his own goods, after providing for all prior rights, is superior to that of the creditors of Kiell, who had not paid for the goods. Confining myself to the facts of the case, I refrain from expressing any opinion how far a bonâ fide absolute sub-sale for cash made while the goods were at sea, and without notice of the claim of the unpaid vendor, may or may not affect the right of stoppage in transitu, though the subsale be unaccompanied by an indorsement and delivery of the bill of lading to the sub-vendee.

INMAN STEAMSHIP COMPANY v. BISCHOFF. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF APPEAL IN ENGLAND.

Marine insurance—Time policy—Loss of freight—Perils insured against—Causa proxima.

In the case of an ordinary time policy upon freight outstanding, the underwriters must be taken to have notice of the existence of a contract of affreightment, though not so as to extend the contract by implication to anything not covered by the terms of the policy.

A Government time-charter contained a clause enabling the charterers, in case the ship should become inefficient for the service contracted for, "to make such abatement by way of mulct out of the hire or freight of the said ship as they should adjudge fit and reasonable." The ship was rendered temporarily inefficient by reason of the perils of the sea, and the charterers exercised their power of mulct.

Held (affirming the judgment of the court below), that the perils of the seas were not the proximate cause of the loss of freight, so as to render the underwriters of an ordinary time policy "on freight outstanding" liable as for a loss by the perils insured against.

THIS was an appeal from the judgment of the Court of Appeal (Lord Coleridge, C.J., Baggallay, and Bramwell, L.JJ.) reported 6 Q. B. Div. 648, 4 App. Mar. Law Cas. 419, and 44 L. T. Rep. N. S. 763, reversing a judgment of Brett, L.J. in favour of the plaintiffs (the present appellants) at the trial.

The action was brought by the appellants, the owners of a steamship called the City of Paris, against the respondents, who were underwriters of a policy on freight outstanding under a charter-party.

The facts of the case, and the terms of the policy, and of the charter-party, appear from the judgments of their Lordships, and from the reports in the courts below.

Benjamin, Q.C. and French appeared for the appellants, and contended that the freight was lost by the perils of the sea within the meaning of the policy. The policy was effected with reference to the charter-party, and it was found as a fact at the trial that the charterers were justified in throwing up the charter, as the adventure was wholly frustrated by the inefficiency of the ship in consequence of running upon a rock:

Havelock v. Geddes, 10 East. 555.

[Lord BLACKBURN referred to Beatson v. Shanck, 3 East, 233.] The underwriters had notice of the charter, which was a Government charter specially framed to avoid all questions of reasonableness in continuing the adventure. In the case of Jackson v. Union Marine Insurance Company (L. Rep. 10 C. P. 125; 2 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 435; 31 L. T. Rep. N. S. 789), where the law gave an option to rescind the charter, the underwriters were held liable; here the power to rescind is given by the charter itself. That case laid down the principle that perils of the seas are not to be looked upon as a causa remota in such a case. Efficiency was a condition precedent in this charter.

Cohen, Q.C. and Barnes (C. Russel, Q.C. with them), for the respondents, maintained that the liability of the underwriters could not vary according to whether the charterers did or did not exercise an option given them by the charter but not referred to in the policy. The insurance was not on "chartered freight," but simply on "freight." The effect of the contention of the appellants would be to turn the policy into an insurance, not against the perils of the seas, but against the exercise of their power of mulct by the charterers. The causa proxima of the loss was the act of the Government. They referred to

THE MERCANTILE STEAMSHIP COMPANY LIMITED v. TYSER.

THIS was an action on a policy upon chartered freight, instituted by shipowners against one of the underwriters of the policy.

The action came on for trial in Dec. 1880, but was reserved for further consideration until Jan. 15, 1881.

The material facts are sufficiently stated in the judgment of the court.

May 21.—Lord COLERIDGE, C.J.—This was an action on a policy upon chartered freight lost under the following circumstances:—The charter-party, was made at New York on the 29th of July 1875, and the voyage was described as "a voyage from the port of New York to Odessa." The freight was agreed "during the voyage aforesaid," at "5500*l.* British sterling in cash at Hull, England, on the good and proper discharge of the cargo in the aforesaid port of Odessa;" and then, after some stipulations not material to be noticed, was the following: "If the vessel has not arrived at the port of New York on or before the 1st of September 1875, the charterers

Cur. adv. vult.

Aug. 1.—Their Lordships gave judgment as follows:

The LORD CHANCELLOR (Selborne).—My Lords: The question in this appeal is whether a loss of freight by the exercise of a power of mulct or abatement reserved by charter-party to the charterers, which power in this case arose and was exercised by reason of the ship being temporarily rendered inefficient for the service in which she was engaged by perils insured against, is a loss for which the insurers are liable under an ordinary time policy, "on freight out-have option of cancelling this charter-party." The policy, which was effected in London on Aug. 1, 1875, was "at and from London to New York, while there, and thence to Odessa, via Constantinople," and was a valued policy "at on chartered freight," and one of the conditions was "including all risks incident to steam navigation." The other risks taken were the ordinary ones, including perils of the seas. The clause in the charter containing what has been called the cancelling option was not mentioned to the defendant, and was not known to him at the time when the policy was effected. The ship (the Ganges) started on her voyage from this country on Aug. 7, and if all had gone well she had four or five days to spare for the performance of it, and might probably have arrived in New York in plenty of time to prevent the possible exercise of the cancelling option. But all did not go well; she broke down from some failure of her machinery in the British Channel; she had to put back for repairs, and the repairs took so long that it was impossible for her to reach New York till long after Sept. 8. Thereupon the charterers exercised their option, the charter was cancelled, and the freight lost. Under these circumstances, are the plaintiffs entitled to recover? It was argued for the defendants that the interest in the chartered freight had not commenced at the time when the charter was cancelled, that the freight was not lost by any of the perils insured against, and that the witholding from the underwriter the information as to the clause in the charter-party containing the cancelling option vitiated the policy. The first point, I think, must be decided for the plaintiffs. It appears to me that the reasoning of the judges in Barber v. Fleming (L. Rep. 5 Q. B. 59) is conclusive of this case, and especially the judgment of Sir James Hannen. By the very words of the policy here, the voyage in the course of which the freight was to be earned had commenced, although not that particular part of it for which freight was to be paid. This, according to Barber v. Fleming (ubi sup.) is sufficient; and if the second point were decided for the plaintiffs they would, in my opinion, be entitled to succeed. That point is whether the freight here was lost by any of the perils insured against, that is, by perils of the seas, or by any of the risks incident to steam navigation. I think it was not. I think the freight was lost by the exercise of the cancelling option which the charterers had the right to exercise. The breakdown of the ship gave the charterers the opportunity which it was at their pleasure to avail themselves of, or decline. Causa proxima and causa remota give rise, no doubt to subtle distinctions, to endless questions and decisions. Here it seems to me that it was not the perils of the seas which caused the freight to be lost, though it may be that these perils gave the charterers the right to cancel the charter. Nor, if I am right in what caused the loss of freight, will the cause as to the risks of steam navigation help the plaintiffs? These risks, I think, must mean physical risks, so to speak, incident to vessels propelled by steam machinery. The breakdown of an engine, the disabling of a screw, and things of that kind, if they caused the loss of freight, though they happened in calm water and fine weather, would be within the risks against which the underwriters contracted to insure. But if, as I think, they only gave occasion to that which was in itself the proximate cause of loss, they will not avail the plaintiffs. Still less, of course, will they avail if the proximate cause of loss was by no means the necessary result of the matters I have mentioned; and here it might or it might not, almost with equal probability, have been the interest of the charterers to cancel the charter. I believe this particular provision to be now for the first time the subject of litigation; and the question is therefore somewhat bare of authority. But the principles on which the cases of Hadkinson v. Robinson (3 B. & P. 388) and Philpott v. Swann (1 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 151; 5 L. T. Rep. N. S. 183; 11 C. B. N. S. 270) were decided, appear to me to govern the case before me. In the first case, Lord Alvanley held that in an action on a policy on cargo which covered restraint of princes, the loss of cargo, by its being sold for almost nothing at a port short of the port of destination, that port being reported to the master during the voyage as shut against English ships, was not a loss covered by the policy. In giving the judgment of the court in banco, Lord Alvanley says: "Where underwriters have insured against capture and the restraint of princes, and the captain learning that if he enter the port of destination the vessel will be lost by confiscation, avoids that port, whereby the object of the voyage is defeated, such circumstances do not amount to a peril operating to the total destruction of the thing insured. If they could, the same principle would have applied in case information had been received at Falmouth that the ship could not safely proceed to Naples." The application of these remarks is obvious. If the boiler had burst before the vessel started, but after the risk attached, whereby she had failed to reach New York, and the charter had been cancelled, the underwriter would equally have been liable. Philpott v. Swann (ubi sup.) is also much to the purpose. In that case the ship had been prevented from loading a certain portion of cargo by being blown out to sea from the east coast of Africa, and went to St. Helena to repair some damage. From St. Helena she came home without returning to load the deficient portion of her cargo. After argument, Willes, J., delivering the judgment of the court, held that a policy on cargo did not cover this loss which was caused by not returning to Africa, though that non-return had been caused by perils of the seas, which were insured against. These cases appear to me to warrant the conclusion at which I have arrived. Nor does Adamson v. Newcastle Steamship Freight Insurance Association (4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 150; 41 L. T. Rep. N. S. 160; 4 Q. B. Div. 462; 48 L. J. 670, Q. B.) in any way conflict with it. In that case Sir Alexander Cockburn and my brother Manisty held (Lush, J. dissenting) that certain words, not the same as the words here, cancelled the charter-party, irrespective of the option or wishes of the parties to it. The arguments of my brother Lush are certainly weighty; but the case itself, whether rightly decided or not, was a case upon the construction of other words than those before me, and has really no bearing on the present case. On this point, therefore, I think the defendant entitled to succeed. I think he is entitled to succeed also on the point as to non-disclosure. The evidence showed that this provision as to the cancelling option was of comparatively recent introduction into charter-parties, that it had come in with the greater prevalence of steamships in the mercantile marine, that it was sometimes inserted and sometimes not in the charters of steamships, and that there was no usage as to its disclosure or non-disclosure. It is plain that it may enormously increase the risk to be run. In this case there were four or five days to spare; but the argument as to its non-disclosure would have been the same as if there had been but an hour. I think, therefore, that the fact of this option existing in this charter was a fact which the assured was bound himself to disclose to the underwriter. The case of Bates v. Hewitt (2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 432; 15 L. T. Rep. N.S. 366; L. Rep. 2 Q. B. 595) appears to me to be directly in point. On the whole I give judgment for the defendant.

standing." It has been held by the Court of Appeal that they are not so liable, on the ground that the perils insured against were not the proximate cause of the loss. Although the charter-party is not mentioned in the policy, nor is the freight therein described as chartered freight, an insurance on freight must necessarily have reference to some contract of affreightment, under which, during the time covered by that policy, freight might be earned: and to ascertain what the freight insured was, in case of loss, the actual contract of affreightment must necessarily be regarded. In this case the insurers had express notice, by the letter of the 19th Feb. 1879, in which the order for the insurance was given, that the City of Paris, the ship mentioned in the policy, was an Inman steamer, then about to proceed on a voyage to Natal on Government charter. There were, at that time, hostilities in progress between this country and the Chief of Zululand, and the Government charter was for the use of the ship as a transport to convey troops and stores. That charter had reference to the general regulations for Her Majesty's transport service, and the special terms contained in it were in substance similar to those which had been long in use in Government charters for similar purposes, as appears from the case of Beatson v. Shanck (ubi sup.). Under these circumstances it appears to me that the question arising upon the policy ought to be determined in the same way as if the charter-party had been seen by the insurers, and referred to in the policy, though not, of course, so as to extend the contract of the underwriters by any unnecessary implication to anything not properly covered by the express terms of the policy.

The charter-party, dated the 20th Feb. 1879, was for the service and employment of the ship as a transport, on monthly hire, for the term of three calendar months certain, and thenceforward until the Board of Admiralty should give notice of discharge, such notice to be given when the ship was in port within the United Kingdom. The shipowners contracted to keep the ship in every respect seaworthy and fit for the service in which she was engaged; and the Board of Admiralty agreed to pay for the hire and freight of the ship, at the rate of 25*s.* per ton per calendar month, during such time as the ship should be continued in Her Majesty's employ, and should duly and efficiently perform that service, upon certificates, and by monthly instalments, with certain reserves, in the manner therein mentioned one month's freight being paid in advance. This agreement of the Board of Admiralty was, however, subject to a proviso, thus expressed:—"That if, at any time or times hereafter, it should be made to appear to the commissioners that any delay had been caused or had accrued by breach of orders or neglect of duty, or that the said ship has become incapable from any defect, deficiency, or breach of orders, or from any cause whatsoever, to perform efficiently the service contracted for, then and in every such case it should and might be lawful to and for the said commissioners to retain in arrear the pay of the ship for two months as aforesaid, and to put the said ship out of pay, or to make such abatement by way of mulct out of the hire or freight of the said ship as they should adjudge fair and reasonable." There is nothing else which I think material in the charter-party. Upon the construction of this charter-party, I am of opinion that it is not a condition precedent of the contract of the Board of Admiralty to pay the monthly hire and freight of the ship, that she should "duly and efficiently perform the service" for which she was engaged: (Boone v. Eyre, 1 H. Bl. 273, n.; Havelock v. Geddes, ubi sup.) I am also of opinion that the ship could not be discharged from that service, without the consent of the shipowner, elsewhere than within some port of the United Kingdom; and that the power reserved to the commissioners to "put the ship out of pay," for any of the causes mentioned, had reference only to a retention of the monthly payments, which ought otherwise to have been made, so that no exercise of that power could result in a loss of freight. The power, therefore, upon the exercise of which the present question depends is that of making "such abatement by way of mulct out of the hire or freight of the said ship" as the commissioners should adjudge fit and reasonable, being the same power which in the case of Beatson v. Shanck, already referred to, was adjudged by the Court of King's Bench to be valid in law. This, according to the terms of the charter-party, was a power depending upon a judgment to be exercised, not by any officer or officers in charge of troops or stores on board the ship, but by the commissioners for executing the office of Lord High Admiral.

The facts which are material are these. The ship proceeded with troops and stores to Simon's Bay, and there, on the 21st March 1879, she struck upon a rock, receiving such serious injury that she was rendered unseaworthy and incapable of efficiently performing the service for which she was engaged until she had received extensive repairs, which were not completed, so as to make her again seaworthy and fit to sail or to perform the service contracted for, until the 23rd May following, which was after the expiration of the time covered by the insurance. The freight down to the 21st March 1879, when she struck on the rock, was duly paid. On the 12th April 1879, Capt. Adean, the senior naval officer in Simon's Bay, instead of granting the usual certificate on which monthly payments were to be made according to contract, noted, on the form provided for that purpose, that the ship had been "inefficient since the 21st March 1879, having touched the Roman rock and sustained much damage;" also that the "City of Paris was discharged from Her Majesty's service on the 17th April 1879, having been retained so long on account of removal of Government stores, &c." The troops and stores on board had, in fact, remained in the ship until they could conveniently be transferred to other vessels, an operation which was not completed by the local agents of the Government until the 17th April 1879. The agents of the Government having declined to continue the employment of the ship, she returned to England in July 1879, and a correspondence between her owners and the Board of Admiralty, or their solicitors, which had been commenced when she was on her voyage homeward, was continued till the 2nd Aug. 1879. The owners did not profess to be able to insist upon any legal claim, but they asked for equitable consideration from Her Majesty's Government; and the Board of Admiralty ultimately decided to make them some allowance in respect of the expenses of the voyage homeward, but declined to pay freight for the period subsequent to the 21st March 1879. Having regard to the construction and legal effect of the charter-party, it appears to me that the acts of Captain Adeane at Simon's Bay, and the form of certificate signed by him on the 17th April, may be laid out of the case, inasmuch as the charter-party did not authorise the Board of Admiralty, and still less authorised their local agents, to discharge the ship from the service in which she was engaged, until she had returned to the United Kingdom; and the power of making an abatement by way of mulct out of freight was reserved only to the Board themselves, and cannot be regarded as having been finally exercised by them until after the ship's return to the United Kingdom. If the shipowners had voluntarily consented to a variation of the terms of the charter-party, involving a relinquishment of their claim to freight (which does not appear to have been the case), this could not have thrown upon the insurers any liability to which they would not otherwise have been subject: (Everth v. Smith, 2 M. & S. 278; Philpott v. Swann, 1 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 151; 5 L. T. Rep. N. S. 183; 11 C.B. N. S. 270.) The result is that, in my opinion, a right to the freight in question must be deemed to have accrued under the terms of the charter-party, but to have been subsequently, in July 1879, defeated under the power of abatement by way of mulct reserved by the contract to the Board of Admiralty.

It has not been without doubt, or, I must add, without reluctance, that I have come to the conclusion that this is not a loss so directly, proximately, and immediately resulting from the perils of the seas insured against, so as to make it payable under the terms of the policy by the insurers. The general principle of causa proxima, non remota, spectatur is intelligible enough, and easy of application in many cases; but that there are cases in which a too literal application of it would work injustice, and would not really be justified by the principle itself, is apparent from the observations of Pollock, C.B. in Montoya v. London Assurance Company (6 Ex. 458), of Erle C.J. in Ionides v. Universal Marine Insurance Company (1 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 353; 8 L. T. Rep. N.S. 705; 14 C. B. N. S. 259), and from Bondrett v. Hentigg (Holt N. P. Rep. 149). Nor do I think that the question can entirely depend upon the difference between a condition precedent (without which the right to freight would never accrue) and a condition subsequent, by which it might be defeated. The observations of Bramwell, B., at the conclusion of the judgment in Jackson v. Union Marine Insurance Company (ubi sup.), and from what took place during the argument of that case, as stated by Cleasby, B., appear to me to be adverse to so narrow a view. If, in the present case, the other terms of the charter-party being the same, a power had been reserved to the charterers or their agents to determine the contract and their liability to further freight, on the occurrence of any such damage to the ship by perils of the sea as might render her inefficient for the service which she had undertaken, and if such power had been exercised before any further freight was earned, I should have been of opinion that this was a loss of freight by perils of the sea for which the insurers were liable. Nor would it, in my opinion, have made any difference, although provision might have been made by the contract for the continuance of the troops and stores in the ship, after the exercise of the power to determine the contract, until such time as they could be conveniently landed or transferred to other vessels. But between such a case and that of a subsequent mulct under a special power, such as that contained in this charter-party, after freight had been earned which (unless the power of mulct were exercised) would be payable under the contract, there seems to me to be an important difference. The principle of such cases as Hadkinson v. Robinson (3 B. & P. 388), Taylor v. Dunbar (L. Rep. 4 C. P. 206), and M'Swiney v. Royal Exchange Assurance Corporation (14 Q. B. 634), seems to be here applicable, and obliges me to conclude that the risk of loss by the exercise, in such circumstances, of such a special power is different from the risk of loss by perils of the seas and ought to have been insured against in some more special manner, if it was the intention of the parties that it should be covered by the policy. I do not dissemble that there appears to me to be something of refinement in the distinction, which the rule laid down by the authorities, as applied to the particular facts of this case, obliges me to make; but, though refined, it seems to be a real distinction, and to justify the judgment of the court below. Upon the whole, therefore, I am unable to differ from the opinion which is entertained by others of your Lordships who heard this appeal, and I must move your Lordships to affirm the judgment appealed from, and to dismiss the appeal, with costs.

Lord BLACKBURN.—My Lords: This is an action on a time policy in the ordinary form, entered into in the name of the brokers for the plaintiffs, "for and during the space of three calendar months, commencing the risk on the 20th Feb. 1879, and ending on the 19th May 1879, both days inclusive, on the City of Paris steamship." The subject-matter of insurance is specified as "on freight outstanding," the perils are the usual perils, including those of the sea. The defendants are underwriters who subscribed this policy. The question is whether, under the circumstances, there has been any loss of freight against which the underwriters are bound by their contract to indemnify the plaintiffs. The adventure in respect of which the plaintiffs intended to make this assurance was under a charter-party under seal, made on the 20th Feb. 1879, between the Commissioners of the Admiralty, on behalf of Her Majesty, of the one part, and C. F. Ellis, on behalf of the now plaintiffs, owners of the City of Paris, of the other part, by which the owners let, and the Commissioners hired and took on freight the City of Paris "for service and employment as a transport on monthly hire for the space of three calendar months certain, and thenceforward until the commissioners" shall cause notice to be given to the plaintiffs or the master in charge of the ship "that she is discharged from Her Majesty's service, such notice to be given when the said ship is in port in the United Kingdom." The first month's pay was paid in advance. Before the underwriters agreed to the insurance they were informed that the City of Paris was the Inman steamer about to proceed on a voyage to Natal on Government charter, and they might if they pleased have seen the charter, so that there would be no ground for setting up any defence on the ground of non-disclosure or concealment, and no such defence was set up. But though the underwriters knew that this was the adventure upon which the ship was bound, and that there was such a charter-party, under which what was meant to be insured would accrue, it is not in any sense accurate to say that the policy must be read as if the charter-party were set out in it so as to affect its construction. The construction of the policy remains, that the underwriters are to make good any loss occasioned to the subject-matter of the insurance in this policy, described as "freight outstanding." "Freight," says Lord Tenterden, in Flint v. Flemyng (1 B. & Ad. 48), "as used in the policy of insurance, imports the benefit derived from the employment of the ship;" so that description covers the monthly hire of the ship for time. But as soon as it is ascertained that the policy attached on the hire under a particular charter-party, the charter-party must be read, in order to see how the subject-matter was affected by the misfortune which happened. Under one charter-party a temporary disablement of the ship might occasion a loss for which the underwriters on ship would be responsible, but which would not have any effect at all on the insured's right to recover the hire of the vessel while she was disabled. Under another, such a temporary disablement might deprive the shipowner of all claim for hire during the time she was disabled. In the first of these cases there could be no claim against the underwriters on freight, for there was no loss of freight. In the second, I do not see how it could properly be denied that there was such a loss. But the construction of the charter-party may be such, and this is the case now at bar, that it is a nice question whether the pecuniary loss which the assured have sustained in consequence of a peril of the sea is one which does or does not occasion a loss of the hire. If it does not occasion such a loss, though the consequence may be one which might have been insured against by an apt description, the underwriters on freight have not insured against it. Whether the individuals who subscribed this policy would have refused to insure at all on such a risk as being too speculative for them, or would have been willing to insure on an increased premium, I cannot tell. If what has happened is not a loss of freight within the meaning of the policy, they have a right to refuse to indemnify against it. The construction, therefore, of this charter-party is all important. I may observe that I do not think that it makes any difference in its construction that the charterers here are acting on behalf of Her Majesty, and that the regulations of Her Majesty's transport service are incorporated in and form part of the charter-party; and that two cases, Beatson v. Shanck (ubi sup.) and Havelock v. Geddes (ubi sup.), are very material authorities as to the principles upon which it should be construed. [His Lordship went through the clauses of the charter-party, and the facts of the case, and continued:] The owners say, and, it seems clear, say truly, that had it not been for the accident, which was a peril of the sea, they would have received pay from the 21st March 1879 till the 20th May 1879, when the policy expired by effluxion of time, and that they did not receive it at all: and they claim against the underwriters on freight to be indemnified against this. Brett, L.J. was of this opinion, and the plaintiffs before him had judgment against the underwriters. The Court of Appeal reversed this judgment.

It is clear that the pecuniary damage to the assured was precisely the same whether the hire for these two months was, in consequence of the perils of the sea never earned, or whether the commissioners had, in consequence of the perils of the sea, a right to make abatement by way of mulct to such amount as in their judgment was fit and reasonable, and to deduct that from the pay, and thought it fit and reasonable to deduct the whole. But the difference to the underwriters is considerable. In the first case the hire is clearly lost by the peril insured against. In the other I think it cannot properly be said that the hire has been lost at all, though the assured have had an equivalent mulct levied out of it. The courts below have not entered into the question of what was the construction of the charter party in any detail, Bramwell, L.J. in the Court of Appeal rather putting the judgment on the maxim causa proxima, non causa remota, spectatur, which is no doubt perfectly good law, and saying something about causa causans, and causa sine quâ non. I must own that I have always sympathised with what Lord Colonsay said in the case of Rankin v. Potter (ubi sup.): "Something is said about proximate and remote causes, and these are matters which are very apt to lead us into philosophical mazes;" which I think he did not use as a term of eulogy. I think, as he did, that when we get a clear view of the facts it is best to keep out of such philosophical mazes; and, as I think, the question here is not what was the proximate cause of a loss of freight, but whether there was any loss of freight. It seems to me clear that neither Captain Adean at the Cape nor the commissioners at home, nor anyone else, had power to discharge the City of Paris before the three months certain for which she was hired. Had she totally perished, so that she never could have been employed again at all, the hire would have ceased from the time of her destruction; but here use was made of her as a storeship till the 17th April, and after she was repaired she was capable of performing the work of a transport efficiently. In Havelock v. Geddes (ubi sup.), where by the terms of the charter-party the defendants had bound themselves to pay a monthly hire, and the shipowners had as here, covenanted, without any exception of the perils of the sea, to keep the vessel efficient, Lord Ellenborough, C.J. says: "The question then is whether, because the plaintiff has undertaken to keep the vessel tight, &c., the defendants have a right to deduct anything out of the freight they are to pay in respect of the time which may be taken up in making good such defects as may occur during the period for which the vessel is hired; and we are of opinion that they are not. From the accidents to which ships are liable, it was in the ordinary course of things to expect that this ship might want repairs in the course of her voyage, and when the defendants were making their bargain they should have stipulated to deduct for the time which might be exhausted in making these repairs, if they meant to make that deduction. Without such a stipulation, we think the true construction of the charter-party is, that while these repairs are going on the ship is to be considered in the defendants' service, and the defendants liable to continue their payments." No question as to insurance arose in that case, but it seems to me clear that, if the plaintiff had insured his freight he could not have recovered anything in respect of the peril of the sea causing the necessity for those repairs, for no part of the freight was thereby lost; any damage to the ship would be borne by the underwriters on ship; any extra expenses to which he was put in consequence of his covenant would have to be insured by a special description. It is, however, argued that in this charter-party the words in the covenant to pay the freight "during such time as the ship shall be continued in Her Majesty's employ, and shall duly and efficiently perform the service for which she is hereby engaged," amount to such a stipulation as Lord Ellenborough refers to.

In Maude and Pollock on Shipping (3rd edit. p. 235) it is said, I think quite accurately, "It is often difficult in construing charter-parties to ascertain whether particular stipulations amount to conditions precedent. This is to be determined by seeking for the intention of the parties as apparent on the instrument, and from the surrounding circumstances, and by applying the ordinary rules of construction to each particular case. It does not depend on any formal arrangement of the words, but on the reason and sense of the thing as it is collected from the whole contract. Generally speaking, any stipulation which goes only to a portion of the consideration, or, in other words, the breach of which would deprive the party who has a right to insist upon it of a portion only of the benefit of his contract, will be construed not to be a condition precedent. It must, however, be recollected that this rule, although a very useful one, is only a rule of construction, or means of discovering the intention of the parties, to be applied where the words will bear either sense. For it is clear that the courts will not make contracts for the parties, and that if they use language which distinctly shows that they intend such a stipulation to be a condition precedent, it will be so construed. Constructions, however, tending to absurd and unreasonable results, will be avoided, if this can be done without violence to the terms used, because, where the intention is not clearly expressed, the parties are not to be presumed to have meant to make an absurd or unreasonable contract." In this case the Government did receive some benefit from the employment of the ship between the 21st March and the 17th April, though she was disabled from duly and efficiently performing the service for which she was engaged; and cases may easily be supposed in which they might have received more. I am, therefore, strongly inclined to think that the words relied on, even if they stood alone, would not amount to a condition precedent. But it is not necessary to decide the point, for the words are materially qualified and their effect altered by what follows, which shows that the charterers were relying upon the stipulation mentioned in Beatson v. Shanck (ubi sup.). There, in a transport charter, the provision, as stated in the report, was that "upon the loss of time, breach of orders, or neglect of duty by the said master, or from the ship's inability to execute or proceed on the service in which she might be employed, being made to appear, the said commissioners should have free liberty and be permitted to mulct or make such abatement out of the freight and pay of the ship as should be by them adjudged fit and reasonable." The words in the charter-party now before us are slightly different, and there is introduced a power to the commissioners to "retain in arrear the pay of the ship for two months as aforesaid, and to put the ship out of pay," which, as I think, must be construed as enabling them not to discharge the ship, but to withhold the giving of the monthly bills previously stipulated for two months, during which time the commissioners would have time to consider how they should use the power to make abatement by way of mulct out of the pay. I think that Beatson v. Shanck (ubi sup.) puts the proper construction upon this clause. If any of the specified cases, including inability from any cause whatever to perform efficiently the service contracted for, arises, the parties have agreed that the commissioners may make such abatement by way of mulct as they shall adjudge fit and reasonable. All that a court of law can inquire into is, whether there was such a case as to give the commissioners jurisdiction; if there was, even if they make an abatement which in the opinion of the court was neither fit nor reasonable, the court cannot interfere, and I think that the commissioners may properly take into consideration many things besides the mere inability, so that it is not at all clear that the resolution to pay nothing for the period from the 21st March to the 17th April, though the ship was then retained in the service, and actually used, might not be reasonable and fit, though it certainly seemed to me at first to be an inequitable resolution. But can it be said that the making such an abatement by way of mulct or fine, not necessarily because of the peril of the sea, is a loss of the freight, though power is given to retain and levy it out of the freight? I think not, any more than the power conferred on the Admiralty Court to give damages against the ship for a collision occasioning damage to another ship, and to enforce the payment by a proceeding in rem against the ship, is a loss of the ship. That was the case of De Vaux v. Salvador (ubi sup.). The prejudice which the owner of the ship sustains in the last case is a consequence of the peril of the sea, the collision, and it may be, and every day is, insured against by a collision or running down clause now in common use, but it is not a loss of the ship. It may be doubted whether the prejudice which the shipowners in this case sustained from the abatement by way of mulct is so direct and immediate a consequence, for it may have been imposed, or at least its amount increased, for many other reasons, and it might be difficult, though I think it possible, to frame a clause to cover it. But I think that it should be insured against, if at all, under a clause framed for the purpose, as it is not a loss of freight. I therefore think that the judgment of the Court of Appeal is right, and should be affirmed.

Lord WATSON.—My Lords: The terms of the policy of the 22nd Feb. 1879 appear to me to be sufficient to include freight to be earned under a time charter; and seeing that the respondents when they accepted the insurance had notice that the City of Paris was under a contract of charter-party, I am of opinion that the policy attached to the freight therein stipulated for, whether they did or did not choose to inform themselves of the particulars of the contract, and consequently that the respondents became liable for such part of that freight as might be lost by any of the risks insured against during the period covered by the policy. There are two facts in the present case which have not been disputed. The first of these is, that the injury sustained by the vessel in Simon's Bay, and her consequent detention there while undergoing necessary repairs, were due to perils of the seas within the meaning of the policy. The second is, that the Commissioners of the Admiralty, who were the charterers, have not paid, and refuse to pay, freight subsequent to the 21st March 1879. Accordingly the only question which arises for decision is, whether the freight, which the vessel, in the absence of any casualty, would have earned between the 21st March and the 19th May 1879, is lost freight for which the insurers are liable. In order to appreciate the merits of that question, it is necessary to consider very carefully the terms of the charter-party. The engagement of the vessel was for an indefinite period, three calendar months being the minimum. Notice of discharge was only to be given when the vessel was in a port in the United Kingdom, and the owners were bound to keep her "staunch and substantial both above water and beneath, and in every respect seaworthy," at all times during the continuance of her charter. These stipulations seem to indicate that it was within the contemplation of both parties that the owners should from time to time, during the currency of the charter-party make such repairs upon the ship as were necessary to her efficiency as a transport. The clauses of the charter-party which bear upon the payment of freight, are somewhat peculiar, and the decision of the present case appears to me to depend upon the effect to be given to them. Freight is made payable at a monthly tonnage rate, during the time that the ship is in her Majesty's employ, and "shall duly and efficiently perform the service for which she is hereby engaged." The first month's freight is to be paid in advance. At the end of the second month the owner, on producing a certificate in due form, is entitled to a bill for a moiety of a month's freight; and at the end of the third month, upon production of a similar certificate, he becomes entitled to a bill for another moiety. At the end of the fourth and each succeeding month a bill for one month's freight is receivable upon a certificate being produced. The result of this arrangement is that, after the expiration of the first three months, the charterers have always from one to two months' freight already earned in their hands; and it is provided that the owner "shall be paid the balance of freight on the passing in the office of the requisite accounts and documents after the discharge of the said ship." Then follows the provision that if it shall be made to appear at any time to the commissioners that any delay has been caused by breach of orders, or that the ship became incapable from any cause whatsoever to perform efficiently the service contracted for, it shall be lawful for them "to retain in arrear the pay of the ship for two months as aforesaid, and to put the said ship out of pay, or to make such abatement by way of mulct out of the hire or freight of the said ship as they shall adjudge fit and reasonable."

If the facts of the present case were such as to bring it within the principle of Jackson v. Union Marine Insurance Company (ubi sup.) that would afford an easy solution of the only question in issue. In that event the Commissioners of the Admiralty would have been, at common law, entitled to rescind the contract of charter-party, in respect that the sea risk encountered by the City of Paris in Simon's Bay had made the object which the contracting parties had in view commercially impossible of attainment. But there is really no analogy between the case of a charter for a single voyage with a particular cargo, and that of a charter indefinite as to time, place, and cargo; and, moreover, it appears to me that, on a fair interpretation of this charter-party, it was mutually contemplated that the ship might be injured by perils of the seas, and that, whenever that occurred, she was to be repaired. In my opinion, neither the Commissioners of the Admiralty, nor their officials at Simon's Bay, had a legal right to terminate the contract and to discharge the City of Paris from Her Majesty's service on the 17th April 1879. It is, however, unnecessary to consider whether any liability would have attached to the insurers if the commissioners had insisted upon their right to discharge the vessel upon the 17th April, and had declined to pay freight upon that footing alone. The commissioners ultimately disallowed all claims for freight after the 21st March, but allowed the cost of coals consumed on the homeward voyage, and the case was presented to your Lordships as if the commissioners had not discharged the vessel at Simon's Bay, but had disallowed freight from and after the 21st March in consequence of her inefficiency to perform the service for which she had been engaged. In this aspect of the case it could hardly be maintained that the commissioners were not empowered by the terms of the charter-party to refuse payment of freight subsequent to the 21st March 1879; but, when that is conceded, the question still remains whether the payments so withheld constitute lost freight within the meaning of the policy.

The appellants in the first place maintain that, by the terms of the charter-party, the due and efficient performance of the service for which the vessel was engaged formed a condition precedent to the earning of freight. I am unable so to read the contract. The language of the leading clause with respect to freight does not appear to me to be fairly susceptible of that construction, and any such construction is quite inconsistent with the clause which follows, giving power to the commissioners to make an abatement by way of mulct out of the hire or freight of the ship. Reading the two clauses together, I think it is clear that freight was to run during the whole period of the vessel's engagement, but that the commissioners, in the event of delay occurring, or of the vessel becoming inefficient, were to have the power of declining to issue monthly pay bills (which I take to be what is meant by putting the ship out of pay), and of retaining the freight, deducting from its amount on final settlement any sum which they in their discretion might fix as a reasonable mulct in respect of such delay or inefficiency. If I am right in my construction of the charter-party the case turns upon a very narrow point. The inefficiency of the vessel was admittedly due to perils of the sea, which were within the risk insured by the policy, and, if it had been expressly stipulated in the charter-party that freight should cease to be payable so long as the ship was incapable from that cause of efficiently performing her contract, I do not doubt that the insurers would have been liable. That would have been a plain case of cesser or loss of freight by the perils insured against, but that is not the present case. The abatement of freight is not, in my opinion, necessarily dependent upon the fact that the vessel has been disabled by sea risks, but it is entirely dependent upon the discretion of the Commissioners of the Admiralty, who are not limited in the exercise of that discretion to considerations arising out of the casualty which has occasioned delay. They may quite legitimately take into account, in determining whether they will or will not inflict a mulct, the conduct of her owners under a totally different contract of charter-party, and many other considerations equally foreign to the ship or freight insured. In these circumstances, while I am conscious that the question is one of great nicety, I am unable to regard a disallowance of freight, which may be legitimately made on such considerations, as lost freight in the proper sense of the term. It appears to me that the deduction from freight, which the commissioners are empowered to make, is in truth and substance a penalty imposed upon the shipowner, which they are entitled to levy out of the freight retained in their hands. I am accordingly of opinion that the judgment of the Court of Appeal ought to be affirmed.

Lord FITZGERALD.—My Lords: The judgments of my noble and learned friends have my entire concurrence. As the charter was not limited in time, and might continue for a considerable period, it seems plain that its duration was not to be determined by any necessity arising for repairs, unless at least the repairs proved to be of so extensive a character, and likely to occupy so much time, as practically to put an end to the objects of the charter, and thus entitle the charterers to abandon the undertaking. The proviso so much commented on, which is the foundation of your Lordships' judgment, seems to me to have conferred on the commissioners large powers of a judicial character, to be exercised according to judicial discretion. They do not seem, either by themselves or their officers, to have directly and formally exercised those powers. It is not pretended that they determined to retain in arrear the pay of the ship for two months, and to put the ship out of pay; nor did they formally and directly adjudge and declare that it would be fit and reasonable to make any abatement by way of mulct out of the hire or freight of the ship. I have not been able to discover that Captain Adean had authority to discharge the ship from the service. Under such circumstances I should have had some difficulty in coming to the conclusion that the commissioners had legally exercised the powers conferred on them by the contract of affreightment, and had adjudged it to be fit and reasonable that there should be a mulct out of the freight. It seems, however, to be assumed on both sides that the commissioners did, in some form or other, exercise their powers, and did eventually adjudge it to be fit and reasonable to make, and did make an abatement by way of mulct out of the hire or freight equivalent to the two months' freight which had otherwise been earned.

It is on this that the plaintiffs seek to maintain the present action. I concur in the opinion that there has been no loss of freight within the terms of the policy. The freight was earned, but the plaintiffs have been deprived of it by the commissioners, in the exercise of the discretionary powers which the contract of affreightment vested in them. That was a risk against which the insurers did not insure. If, however, there was a loss of freight, it would remain to be considered whether "peril of the sea" was the immediate cause of the loss. The maxim, In jure non remota causa, sed proxima, spectatur, applies specially to marine insurances, so that in order to entitle the plaintiff to recover here the loss must be a direct, and not a remote consequence of the peril of the sea. The touching on the Roman rock was a peril of the sea, and probably but for that the ship would have completed her undertaking and earned her two months' freight, but it does not follow that the touching on the rock and consequent injury were the causa causans. The freight was not necessarily and directly lost by that calamity, and the consequent necessity for repairs. The plaintiffs were deprived of their right to the freight, if they were so deprived, by the action of the commissioners, or their officers, under the special provisions of the charter-party. The loss was not by the perils of the sea, but was occasioned by the contract. I concur in the opinion of Bramwell, L.J., in this case, that the loss was not the necessary and proximate effect of the perils of the sea, and that the plaintiffs have failed to establish the immediate relation of the one to the other.

COURT OF APPEAL.

SITTINGS AT LINCOLN'S INN.

Thursday, July 6, 1882.

(Before JESSEL, M.R., Sir JAMES HANNEN, and LINDLEY, L.J.)

PRICE v. LIVINGSTONE. (a)

Charter-party—Final sailing—Last port.

A charter-party provided that the owners of a vessel should receive an advance of one-third of the freight within eight days "from final sailing of the vessel from her last port in United Kingdom."

The vessel was loaded at Penarth Dock, and was towed by a steam-tug seven or eight miles, bringing her out about three miles into the Bristol Channel. The weather being threatening, she was there anchored, until the violence of the wind caused her cables to part, and she ran ashore. Part of the cargo was thrown overboard, and the remainder was damaged by the sea water.

(a) Reported by W. C. BISS, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The vessel had never left the port of Cardiff, as defined in the Gazette for fiscal purposes, although, taking the port in its ordinary commercial sense, she had done so and had been out at sea.

The owners claimed the amount of one-third of the freight, but the defendants contended that there had been no final sailing of the vessel from her last port, and that, therefore, they were not liable.

Held (affirming the decision of Lopes, J.), that the word "port" must be understood in its ordinary commercial sense; that the vessel had finally sailed as soon as she had left the port for the purpose of proceeding on her voyage without any intention of coming back; and that the owners were entitled to the freight claimed.

The defendants, on the 12th Oct. 1880, chartered of the plaintiffs a ship called the Buckhurst by a charter-party, which was partly in print and partly in writing. The material portions of the charter-party were as follows, the parts which were in writing being distinguished by italics:

It is this day mutually agreed between Messrs. W. B. Price and Co., owners of the good ship or vessel called the Buckhurst, and classed 100 A 1, of the measurement of 1850 tons or thereabouts, now building in the port of Dumbarton, and Messrs. Livingstone, Briggs, and Co., merchants, that the said ship being warranted tight, staunch, and strong, and classed as above during the voyage, shall with all possible despatch proceed to Penarth Dock, Cardiff, and after being in a loading berth . . . . shall there load a full and complete cargo of steam coals as ordered by the charterers, which they bind themselves to ship, &c., &c., and being so loaded shall proceed to Bombay, or so near thereunto as she may safely get, and deliver the same, &c., &c., the act of God, the Queen's enemies, fire, and all and every other the dangers and accidents of the seas, rivers, and navigation during the said voyage always mutually excepted. The freight to be paid on the quantity delivered at and after the rate of twenty-one shillings and sixpence per ton of 20cwt., or at the option of the agent of the P. and O. Steam Navigation Company at the port of discharge on the quantity shipped . . . . such freight to be paid as follows:—An advance of one-third by charterers acceptance at three months date and one-third at six months date from final sailing of the vessel from her last port in United Kingdom, clean bills of lading on charterers form for the cargo having been previously signed by the master and handed to the charterers, or at their option in cash within eight days from sailing under discount at bank rate, but not under 5*l.* per cent. per annum.

The vessel loaded a full and complete cargo at Penarth Dock on the 14th Jan. 1881, and was ready for sea the next day.

A steam-tug towed her out on the 16th Jan. for seven or eight miles to a point out in the Bristol Channel, about three miles from Lavernock Point, when, the weather being threatening, the captain anchored her.

The vessel continued anchored until the 18th Jan., but the violence of the wind caused the cables to part, and ultimately she was driven back and went ashore on Penarth Beach.

The captain ordered a portion of the cargo of coal to be heaved overboard, and the remainder was damaged by the sea-water.

The vessel had never left the port of Cardiff as defined in the Gazette for fiscal purposes, although, taking the port in its ordinary commercial sense, she had left it and had been out at sea.

The plaintiffs claimed 1056*l.*, the amount of one-third of the freight.

The defendants contended that there had been no "final sailing of the vessel from her last port in the United Kingdom," and that, therefore, they were not liable.

At the trial of the action, before Lopes, J. without a jury, judgment was given in favour of the plaintiffs.

The defendants appealed.

Hollams for the appellants.—The question turns upon the construction of the charter-party. The charter-party was designed to meet the case of a ship being driven back to port, and then the owners, having secured their freight, not being in a hurry to get off again. The vessel was never outside the port of Cardiff as defined in the Gazette for fiscal purposes. She had not finally sailed, and was driven back so as to be within the limits of the port in its ordinary commercial sense. If the vessel were driven by stress of weather into any port in the United Kingdom, such port would be covered by the words "last port." [Sir James Hannen referred to Roelandts v. Harrison (9 Ex. 444), as to the limits of the port of Cardiff, and to Hudson v. Bilton (6 E. & B. 565), as to final sailing.]

A. L. Smith, for the plaintiffs, was not called upon.

Jessel, M.R.—This case raises a simple point on a charter-party, which is partly in print and partly in writing. [His Lordship here read the material parts of the charter-party, distinguishing the parts in print and in writing.] Stress has been laid on the words "last port," but I am not much struck by them. If only one port is mentioned, it might be correct to strike out "last" from the printed form, but if there is only one port it must be but first and last, so I do not think that any stress is to be laid upon the expression. The question then is, what is meant by sailing from the last port? The word "port" must be understood in its ordinary commercial sense. There are ports which, like the port of Cardiff, extend miles for fiscal purposes, but they are not, for commercial purposes, to be treated as having that extent. This vessel was towed out to sea in the Bristol Channel, and had got seven or eight miles out of the port in its ordinary commercial sense. It was urged that she was driven back to Cardiff, and so had not finally sailed. That she was driven back is, to my mind, immaterial for the present purpose. She had finally sailed as soon as she had left the port for the purpose of proceeding on her voyage without any intention of coming back. It can hardly be seriously suggested that she had not "sailed" within the meaning of the charter-party, because she was in tow and her sails were not set. What is meant by "sailing" is departure from the port for the purpose of proceeding on her voyage.

Sir James Hannen.—The case of Hudson v. Bilton (ubi sup.) suggests the meaning of "final sailing;" the vessel must have got out of port ready for her voyage and for the purpose of proceeding on her voyage. It was held in that case that the vessel had not finally sailed, because her papers were not on board. In the present case everything was ready, and the fact that the vessel was driven back by stress of weather does not entitle us to say that she had not finally sailed. It is said that she had not finally sailed from her last port, but as only one port is mentioned, "last port" must mean the port of Cardiff. It has been contended that, as she was driven back, the port into which she was driven was her last port, and that she never sailed from it. But this cannot have been the meaning of the charter-party, for it would leave it undetermined when the bills were to commence running, until it was ascertained that she had not been driven back into any port in the United Kingdom. The port from which a vessel starts, intending to go on a voyage, is her last port.

Lindley, L.J.—The question is, whether this vessel had finally sailed from her last port in the United Kingdom. Final sailing, I apprehend, means getting clear of the port for the purpose of proceeding on a voyage. Here the vessel left the port of Cardiff with no intention of going back. If a vessel goes seven or eight miles from the Penarth Dock she is out of port, for she is fairly at sea. I think that no great weight is to be attached to the word "last" as it occurs in a printed form.

Appeal dismissed.

The Douglas. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM SIR R. PHILLIMORE.

Damage—Collision—Vessel sunk in navigable river—Liability of owner—Abandonment—Removal of Wrecks Act 1877 (40 & 41 Vict. c. 16), s. 4—Duty to give warning—Hearsay evidence—Wrongful rejection of evidence.

Where a vessel is sunk in a navigable river by collision, for which she is held solely to blame, a duty of lighting the wreck is not imposed upon her owners, though they claim the ownership, if the vessel has been abandoned, and the harbour-master under the provisions of the Removals of Wrecks Act 1877 has undertaken to have the wreck lighted, and her owners are not liable for damage resulting from the absence of such lighting.

Evidence showing that an officer of the sunken vessel sent a message to the harbour-master informing him of the position of the wreck, and that the harbour-master undertook to light the wreck, and that the messenger informed the officer of the harbour-master's undertaking, is admissible, as relating to an act done, and tending to disprove negligence on the part of the owners.

The D., by reason of a collision for which she was alone to blame, sank in the Thames. In answer to a message from her mate, sent shortly after she sank, the harbour-master at G. promised to light the wreck. Some hours afterwards the M. N. ran into the D., which had not yet been lighted.

Held, that no negligence or liability attached to the owners of the D. (b)

This was an appeal from a decision of Sir R. Phillimore, in which on the 25th April 1882, he held that the steamship Douglas was to blame for a collision between the s.s. Mary Nixon and the Douglas, while the latter vessel was lying sunken in Gravesend Reach, in the river Thames, about midnight on the 26th and 27th Oct. 1881, in consequence of a collision with another vessel.

The facts appear in the report of the case below before Sir R. Phillimore (46 L. T. Rep. N. S. 488; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 510; L. Rep. 7 P. D. 151), with the exception of the following, viz., that at the hearing of the action the defendants tendered the evidence of the master of the tug Endeavour, with the object of proving that he, at the request of the mate of the Douglas, shortly after the first collision, had informed the harbour master of the position of the Douglas, that the harbour master had informed him that immediate steps would be taken to have lights put on the Douglas, and that the master of the tug had told the mate of the Douglas of the undertaking of the harbour master. This evidence was not admitted on the ground that it was hearsay, and irrelevant, because it was not within the power of the defendants to shift the responsibility of guarding the Douglas from themselves to the harbour master. In answers to interrogatories, it further appeared that the defendants stated they had never given up their interest in the Douglas, and still claimed the ownership of the vessel.

(a) Reported by J. P. Aspinall and F. W. Raikes, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

(b) As several cases have recently arisen on the subject of obstruction in navigable channels, it may be well to here mention that the modern enactments relating to the removal of obstructions to navigation are contained in the Harbours, Docks, and Piers Clauses Act 1847 (10 & 11 Vict. c. 27), the Dockyard Ports Regulation Act 1865 (28 & 29 Vict. c. 125), and the Removal of Wrecks Act 1877 (40 & 41 Vict. c. 16). In addition to the above there are special provisions relating to the Thames and Mersey: (cf. 20 & 21 Vict. c. 147, s. 86; and 21 and 22 Vict. c. 92.) The above Acts give powers to harbour-masters, conservancy and lighthouse authorities to remove wrecks and other obstructions to navigation at the expense of the owner of the obstruction, and should the owner refuse to pay the cost of such removal, the obstruction may be sold and the cost paid out of the proceeds. The liability of a person who occasions damage by causing an obstruction in a navigable channel or harbour, and failing to properly mark the position of such obstruction, has been considered from the very earliest days of shipping. In the Black Book of the Admiralty, among the judgments of the sea (Laws of Oleron), we find that it was incumbent upon the master of a vessel which was lying in haven which dries at low water, to buoy and mark his anchors, and that where damage was done to other vessels by his failing to do so he was liable for such damage. The rule as to the use of a navigable river seems to me that it must be used in a reasonable manner and for reasonable purposes; to go beyond this and cause an obstruction is to render oneself liable for damage resulting from the obstruction (The Original Hartlepool Collieries Company Limited v. Gibb, 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 411; 36 L. T. Rep. N. S. 433); and where the obstruction is under statutory authority, the persons causing such obstruction are bound, if the obstruction is of a character to injure the property of the public, to take all precautions to avoid such injury: (Jolliffe v. The Wallasey Local Board, 2 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 146; 29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 582.) Without statutory authority no one has a right to cause an obstruction in a navigable river, though at the time it may not be a nuisance, lest it become in the future an impediment to navigation: (Attorney-General v. Terry, 2 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 174; 29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 716.) This even applies to the case of a private river where there are two riparian owners, each entitled to the soil ad medium filum aquæ, and one of the owners erects an obstruction on his own half of the soil: (Bickett v. Morris, 14 L. T. Rep. N. S. 835.

Bucknill, for the defendants, the owners of the Douglas.—The evidence as to the conversation between the master of the Endeavour and the mate of the Douglas was improperly rejected. It was most material for the purpose of proving absence of negligence on the part of the defendants. There was no negligence on their part.

Butt, Q.C. and Gainsford Bruce for the plaintiff.—The conversation referred to must not be admitted, inasmuch as it is heresay evidence, and further, it is immaterial under the circumstances of the case, seeing that the defendants were unable to delegate their duty to take due and proper care of the wreck to the harbour master. The defendants did not abandon the wreck. The defendants were legally bound to indicate the position of the wreck; through their fault an obstruction was caused in a navigable river, and yet no lights were placed upon the wreck. As a matter of fact those on board the Mary Nixon had no means of knowing of the presence of the wreck. By the Thames Conservancy Act 1857 (20 & 21 Vict. c. 147), ss. 86, 87, power is given to the conservators to remove vessels which are an obstruction to navigation, and by the Removals of Wrecks Act 1877 (40 & 41 Vict. c. 16), s. 4, it is provided that where any vessel is sunk, stranded, or abandoned, a conservancy authority "may" light or buoy such vessel until her raising, removal or destruction; the word "may" is used, and therefore the authority is not compelled to exercise the powers given by the Act. Even though the authority should exercise such powers, some considerable time would elapse before they were put in force. [Brett, L.J.—As the last act referred to has to do with the performance of a public duty, would not "may" in sect. 4 be read "must."] Brown v. Mallet (5 C. B. 599) and White v. Crisp (10 Ex. 312) are both authorities to the effect that the defendants were wrong in leaving the Douglas sunk at the bottom of the Thames, without taking proper and efficient steps to indicate her position to other vessels. It was quite possible for the crew of the Douglas to have themselves placed a light on the vessel, and they were wrong in merely presuming that the harbour master would necessarily do so:

Forbes v. Lee Conservancy Board, 4 Ex. Div. 116.
The Ettrick, sub nom. Prehn v. Bailey and others, 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 428, 465; 45 L. T. Rep. N. S. 399; 6 P. Div. 127.

Bucknill was not called upon in reply.

Lord Coleridge, C.J.—It seems plain to me that the judgment of the Admiralty Division cannot be supported. Two courses are open to us: we can either send the case back for a new trial, or pronounce judgment upon the material before us. As the evidence was not given, and it is not certain what it would turn out to be, we could only grant a new hearing if the rejection of the evidence tendered were the only matter which we had to determine; but upon the facts before us we can reverse the judgment of the Admiralty Division and enter judgment for the defendants. The only question upon the evidence before us is whether the defendants were guilty of negligence; of course I am not speaking of the original negligence conducing to the original collision. It appears from all the facts that was no negligence of which the plaintiff can take advantage. There was a collision between the Douglas the Duke of Buckingham and the Orion, and afterwards between the Douglas and the Mary Nixon. After the Douglas had been sunk, a light was fixed in her rigging. The master of the Douglas having been thrown into the water, was taken in a boat to near Gravesend. Then the tug called the Endeavour went to Gravesend; there the mate instructed the captain to go to the harbour master and to request him to take care of the wreck. The defendants caused the captain of the Endeavour to be called as a witness. The counsel for the plaintiff objected that the conversation between the harbour master and the captain of the Endeavour took place behind the back of the plaintiff, and therefore could not be received in evidence. The judge of the Admiralty Division excluded it. The objection has not been seriously supported to-day; for the evidence was tendered as relating to an act done and tending to disprove negligence, a competent person having been sent to inform the harbour master. It was urged that the evidence was immaterial, because the master and mate had no right to delegate their duty to take due and proper care of the wreck to the harbour master; for it appears clear that the defendants still claimed to be owners of it. The evidence was not immaterial. I think that it was wrongly rejected. But it was stated to the mate of the Douglas that the harbour master had undertaken to light the wreck; there was therefore evidence that the mate, who represented the defendants, thought that the harbour master had undertaken to light the wreck. The harbour master may exercise the powers of the Removal of Wrecks Act 1877, and it is unnecessary to give any opinion as to the construction of the Act, and to determine whether he must; for having the power he appears to have undertaken to do the duty. It is to go too far to say that the captain and the mate of the Douglas were guilty of negligence; for even upon the present facts it must be inferred that the mate asked the official to do that which he had the power by statute to perform.

It has been argued that an action is maintainable, because it does not appear that the harbour master performed the duty; but it must be inferred upon these facts that he undertook to do the duty, and at least the mate of the Douglas had fair ground for supposing that he would perform it. The master and the mate of the Douglas had no power to retain the Endeavour to light the wreck. No act has been pointed out which they might be fairly expected to do. The evidence was improperly rejected, but sufficient evidence is before us to show that all things reasonable were done; there is no ground for finding that the master and the mate of the Douglas were guilty of actionable negligence. I think it unnecessary to discuss the two cases which have been mentioned, Brown v. Mallett (ubi sup.) and White v. Crisp (ubi sup.) I entertain a great respect for the learned judges who decided them; but I do not think that they trench upon our decisions, for they assume that the possession and the control over the sunken ship must remain in the owners in order to render them liable; these cases may be good law, for in Brown v. Mallett (ubi sup.) it was held that the owner of the barge was exempt from liability, on the ground that the declaration did not show him to be in possession at the time of the damage to the plaintiff's steamship, and in White v. Crisp (ubi sup.) the action was founded on the circumstance that the defendants had the possession and the control of the wreck. Upon the grounds that I have stated, I am of opinion that the materials before us show that the judgment of the Admiralty Division must be reversed.

BRETT, L.J.—This is an action to recover damages for the injury occasioned to the plaintiff's steamship the Mary Nixon, by the negligence of those in charge of the defendant's steamship, the Douglas. The facts may be shortly stated as follows: the Douglas whilst going up the Thames came into collision with another vessel, the Duke of Buckingham, and sank; the collision was due to the negligence of those on board the Douglas; a light was fixed in her rigging, but it was extinguished upon her sinking. The mate of the Douglas went up to Gravesend and requested the captain of the tug called the Endeavour to ask the harbour master to fix some lights on the wreck; the harbour master said that he would do this, and his answer was reported to the mate of the Douglas. Before any lights were fixed to the wreck, the plaintiff's steamship in passing up the river struck against the sunken wreck of the Douglas, and sustained the injury, in respect of which this action is brought.

The liability of the defendants was alleged to exist upon three grounds. First, it was said by the plaintiff's counsel that a duty was imposed upon the defendants to light the wreck, that the duty was of the same nature as if the defendants had contracted with the plaintiff to light it, and that they are absolutely liable for the breach of it; this really seems to me to be almost the same as to argue that there was a contract; the contention is quite unsustainable, no duty, at least of that description can exist. Secondly, it was assumed in the argument that the defendants had committed an indictable offence in the channel of a navigable river; that was the effect of the argument addressed to us, although this contention was not put forward in direct terms. To wilfully scuttle a ship in a tide-way so as to cause an obstruction may possibly be an indictable offence; but what the defendants did was no indictable offence. Their own ship sank. It seems to me that no greater liability can exist against the defendants, than if their steamship had sunk without negligence. What is the liability of the owners of a sunken ship which is lying in a tide-way? If they keep possession of her, they must give notice where she has gone down. This is all their liability. Thirdly, it was said that the defendants did not take care to give notice where the wreck of the Douglas was lying. I incline to agree that if the owners of a wreck abandon it their liability ceases. But here the defendants claim the ownership of the wreck. It may be that the defendants did not hear of the accident for some time; as to those employed by them, the captain is primâ facie to act; it is for the plaintiff to prove that there was negligence. The captain appears to have gone ashore after the Douglas sank; what was he to do? He was not guilty of negligence. As to the mate, he gave instructions to the captain of the tug Endeavour to inform the harbour master. The latter evidently took it as a piece of information upon which he was to act, for he in effect promised to send lights within an hour. The mate of the Douglas had a right to assume that the harbour master would do what he promised. Upon the evidence before us there was no negligence and no liability upon the defendants. The judgment of the Admiralty Division cannot be supported. I say nothing as to Brown v. Mallett (ubi sup.) and White v. Crisp (ubi sup.), except that they were decided on demurrer.

COTTON, L.J.—I think that the evidence was improperly rejected. Under the removal of Wrecks Act 1877, s. 4, the harbour master had power to put up lights; and I think it became his duty to remove a dangerous obstruction. In my opinion the evidence, if it had been received, would have shown that the defendants had for the time abandoned the control of the wreck. There was therefore a wrongful rejection of evidence; but I agree that there ought not to be a new trial, for it is proved by the deposition of the mate of the Douglas that the collision was reported to the harbour master, and that the mate did receive a communication from the harbour master. This circumstance exonerates the defendants from the charge of negligence, for it gave the harbour master notice to perform the duty. The plaintiff cannot say that the injury to his steamship, the Mary Nixon, was occasioned by the defendant's wrongful act; his loss did not happen through their negligence.

Judgment reversed.

THE VANDYCK. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE PROBATE, DIVORCE, AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION (ADMIRALTY).

Salvage—Collision—Service without engagement—Right to reward.

Where two vessels are in collision, and a salvor renders service to one, without a request from or engagement by the other, and the latter is thereby rescued from a position of immediate danger, such service being a direct benefit to both vessels, entitles the salvor to salvage reward from both.

THIS was an appeal from a judgment of Sir R. J. Phillimore, judge of the Probate, Divorce, and Admiralty Division, by which he, in a salvage action had awarded 300*l.* to the steam-tug Stormcock for salvage services rendered by her to the steamship Vandyck. The action was tried on Nov. 23, 1881.

The statement of claim delivered by the plaintiffs, as far as is material, was as follows:

1. The Stormcock is a twin screw steam-tug belonging to the port of Liverpool, of the burthen of about 465 tons, and propelled by two distinct sets of direct acting compound engines of 250 nominal, working up to 1228 indicated horse power, and is of the value of 16,000*l.* or thereabouts, and has a crew of 14 hands, all told.

2. The Vandyck is a screw steamship of the burthen of about 1098 tons registered tonnage, and was built in the year 1867.

(a) Reported by J. P. ASPINALL, and F. W. RAIKES Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

3. On the 14th Oct. 1881, at about 4.15 p.m., the Stormcock was at the Liverpool landing-stage, in the river Mersey, having just returned from rendering assistance to another vessel called the Duchess of Argyle. There was a tremendous hurricane blowing at the time, with a very heavy sea running.

4. At 4.15 p.m., as aforesaid, those on board the Stormcock saw the Vandyck on the Cheshire side of the Mersey, opposite the Alfred Dock, in collision with a large ship which proved to be the Queen of Scots, and the Stormcock at once went to the assistance of both the said vessels.

5. The Stormcock, on reaching the said vessels, found that the Vandyck had drifted right across the bows of the Queen of Scots, striking her with her starboard quarter, and carrying away the jibboom and other head gear of the Queen of Scots. The two vessels were grinding against each other heavily, and a large hole had been knocked in the afterpart of the starboard side of the Vandyck, and her rudder-post had been carried away. The Queen of Scots had both her anchors down, and the propeller of the Vandyck had got between the anchors of the Queen of Scots, thus rendering it impossible for the Vandyck to use her propeller to get away from the Queen of Scots. The above-mentioned vessel, the Duchess of Argyle, was lying about two cables' length astern of the Vandyck.

6. The Vandyck and those on board her were then in a position of great danger from the said collision, and in order to free the said vessels from one another, it was necessary that the Queen of Scots should be towed ahead, and that her anchor chains should be slipped.

7. It was also necessary that the Queen of Scots should be towed away before her chains were slipped, in order that the Vandyck, when set free, might be better enabled to clear the Duchess of Argyle.

8. The Stormcock then gave the Queen of Scots a hawser, which was made fast, and the Stormcock went on ahead until the Queen of Scots was enabled to slip her anchor chains, and the two vessels were thus set free from one another.

9. But for the services rendered by the Stormcock as aforesaid, the Vandyck would in all probability have sustained considerable further damage, and have sunk together with her cargo.

10. In the performance of the said services, the Stormcock was in considerable danger, and ran great risk.

The statement of defence delivered by the owners of the Vandyck, and the owners of her cargo, so far as is material, was as follows:

2. A little after 4 p.m. on the 14th Oct. 1881, whilst the wind was blowing a gale from the N.W., and the tide was first quarter ebb, the steamship Vandyck, and the ship Queen of Scots, both of which were at anchor in the river Mersey, fouled one another; the port bow of the Queen of Scots coming in contact with the starboard bow of the Vandyck. The Vandyck was riding to her starboard anchor, and had her steam up; the Queen of Scots had her port and starboard anchor down. The Queen of Scots struck the starboard quarter of the Vandyck with her port bow, and the Vandyck fell away to the westward across the bows of the Queen of Scots, and the propeller of the Vandyck was fouled by the starboard anchor chain of the Queen of Scots, and in consequence thereof the Vandyck was unable to use her propeller, and the vessels fell alongside each other, the bows of the Queen of Scots to the stern of the Vandyck. The Vandyck had two tugs, the Merry Andrew and the Victory, in attendance upon her, and they made fast to a line carried from the port quarter of the Vandyck, and held the Vandyck; and the Queen of Scots then slipped her starboard chain, and the Vandyck at once came clear. The Vandyck then cast off the tow-rope, and her head fell round to the tide. The chain of the Vandyck parted with the strain upon it, and the Vandyck then steamed ahead across the river; but, as her rudder-head had been injured in the collision, a hawser was passed to the tug Victory in order that the Victory might assist the Vandyck to get her head to the southward; but the towing-hook of the Victory parted, and the Vandyck then proceeded without assistance to the south of the Woodside landing-stage, and brought up with her port anchor.

3. The defendants say that the rudder-head of the Vandyck was twisted, but they deny that the rudder-post to the Vandyck had been carried away as mentioned in the 5th paragraph of the statement of claim, and although they admit that the Queen of Scots cut into the after part of the starboard side of the main deck of the Vandyck, they say that the Vandyck was not damaged below the water-line, and that she made no water, and that, as soon as the propeller was clear of the starboard chain of the Queen of Scots, there was nothing to prevent the engines of the Vandyck being used.

4. The defendants deny that the Stormcock went to the assistance of the Vandyck, or rendered assistance to her. The defendants deny that the Vandyck was in a position of great danger, as alleged: the two tugs before mentioned were sufficient to render, as they did render to the Vandyck, all necessary assistance.

5. The defendants deny the 7th paragraph of the statement of claim, and they deny that the Stormcock had begun to tow the Queen of Scots before her starboard chain was slipped.

6. The defendants admit that the Stormcock gave the Queen of Scots a hawser, which was made fast as alleged in the 8th paragraph of the statement of claim, but they do not admit the residue of the said paragraph, and they say that any services rendered by the Stormcock were rendered to the Queen of Scots, and not to the Vandyck.

7. As to the 9th and 10th paragraphs of the statement of claim, the defendants deny that but for the services rendered by the Stormcock the Vandyck would have sustained further damages; and they do not admit that in the performance of the alleged services the Stormcock was in danger, or ran great risk.

The action was heard on Nov. 23, 1881, before the judge, upon viva voce evidence; and, by agreement between the parties, upon the evidence given in a prior salvage action instituted by the owners of the Stormcock and by the owners of two other tugs against the Queen of Scots in respect of the services rendered to the Queen of Scots after her collision with the Vandyck.

On behalf of the plaintiffs, the master of the Stormcock and the pilot on board the Queen of Scots gave evidence that the two vessels had been in collision about ten minutes when the Stormcock came up: that had the Queen of Scots slipped her cable without any tug to hold her, she must have fouled the Duchess of Argyle, which was directly astern of her; that each time the Queen of Scots fell against the Vandyck with the heaving of the sea, she cut into the Vandyck nearer the water-line, and that had it not been for the assistance rendered by the Stormcock to the Queen of Scots, the Vandyck would have gone down. The masters of the tugs Merry Andrew and Victory, called on behalf of the defendants, stated that before the Stormcock was fast to the Queen of Scots the Merry Andrew had made fast to the Vandyck; that the Victory was fast ahead of the Merry Andrew, and that independently of the assistance of the Stormcock, the two tugs, Merry Andrew and Victory, could have pulled the Vandyck clear. The Vandyck, and the cargo laden on board of her, were valued at 83,500*l*.

Myburgh (with him J. Walton) for the plaintiffs.—The Stormcock rendered a valuable salvage service to the Vandyck in holding up the Queen of Scots. No reasonable and prudent man would have refused the services rendered to the Vandyck, and although such assistance was rendered after an express request for assistance from the Queen of Scots, yet it was directly instrumental in saving the Vandyck. The services were directly and approximately beneficial to the Vandyck, and consequently should be remunerated by her:

Butt, Q.C. (with him G. Bruce) for the defendants

—There was no salvage service in its legal sense rendered by the Stormcock to the Queen of Scots. The services were rendered to the Queen of Scots, and directly for her benefit. Those on board the Vandyck never requested the Stormcock to act on their behalf, and moreover the Vandyck required no more assistance than was in the power of the two tugs, Merry Andrew and Victory, to give her. If the Queen of Scots abstained from slipping her chains from fear of fouling the Duchess of Argyle, that was a matter which could not be said to affect the Vandyck.

Sir R. J. Phillimore.—This is another branch of the great case which has occupied us so long. In this case the steam-tug Stormcock brings her action of salvage against the steamship Vandyck which at the time the services were rendered was in collision with the ship Queen of Scots. Now the first question the court has to decide is, was there any salvage service, in its legal sense, rendered by the plaintiffs to the Vandyck, inasmuch as there was no request made to the Stormcock to act on behalf of the Vandyck; and several cases were cited to the court to show that the owners of the Vandyck were under no liability to pay salvage remuneration. But I am of opinion that in the circumstances of this case the evidence shows that the services of the Stormcock were accepted by the Vandyck. The next question is, what was the value of the services so rendered to the Vandyck; and looking to the evidence, and after conferring with the Elder Brethren of the Trinity House, I am of opinion that a valuable salvage service was rendered to the Vandyck, though it was one of very short duration, lasting only twenty minutes, and though it is possible the Vandyck might have received great assistance from other tugs that were there. But looking to the evidence, especially to that of the pilot of the Queen of Scots, who described the injury which the Vandyck had sustained from the Queen of Scots, and to all the circumstances of the case, I am of opinion that a very valuable salvage service was rendered to the Vandyck, and I shall award 300*l*.

From this decision the defendants in the court below appealed, on the grounds that the Stormcock had rendered no salvage services to the Vandyck, and that the award given by the learned judge of the Admiralty Court was excessive.

On the 8th March 1882 the appeal came on for hearing.

Butt, Q.C. and G. Bruce for the appellants.—The services in question were forced upon the Vandyck; she neither requested nor required them. She had two tugs in attendance upon her, and could, with their aid, have extricated herself from collision with the Queen of Scots. Even if offered, the services of the Stormcock would not have been accepted. The Vandyck never was in danger; but it was most material for the Queen of Scots, a small sailing vessel, in collision with a big steamer, to extricate herself as speedily as possible. This being so, a prudent master on board the Vandyck would have considered it unnecessary to employ or accept the services of the Stormcock. In a very similar case, The Annapolis and The Golden Light (1 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 127; 5 L. T. Rep. N.S. 37; Lush. 355), where a vessel received benefit only indirectly, and there had been no acceptance on her part, it was held that she was not liable for salvage. There is no such thing as a salvage service, not founded on contract, either express or implied, and in the present case neither of these conditions exist.

Myburgh and Walton, for the respondents, were not called upon.

Lord Coleridge, C.J.—I am of opinion that the judgment of the court below must be affirmed. The law on the subject is to be found in The Annapolis (ubi sup.), and comes in effect to this, that, as far as services of this kind go, the right to be paid accrues if they are rendered when a vessel is so circumstanced that a prudent man would accept them. That this is the state of the law is affirmed by the Privy Council in express terms, We want no higher authority than this for ascertaining what is the law. Dr. Lushington in The Annapolis (Lush. 360) says as follows: "If persons are in a state of great and immediate danger, and means are offered to rescue them from that danger, and place them in a state of safety, is it not to be presumed they will accept that offer? And is it not fairly to be presumed that the H. M. Hayes would not have repudiated these services? Therefore I shall have no hesitation in saying that this was a salvage service, if you should hold that the H. M. Hayes was in immediate danger." Again at page 375, Lord Kingsdown, in the Privy Council, says: "They (their Lordships) agree with what they understand to be the opinion of the learned judge below, that it is sufficient if the circumstances of the case are such that, if an offer of service had been made, any prudent man would have accepted it. But in the present case the H. M. Hayes received only indirectly a benefit from the service rendered to the Golden Light. There was not only no acceptance of the service by her, but there was nothing done by the Storm King with a view to her benefit. She received benefit indirectly, as H.M.S. Majestic, or any other ship lying higher up the river than the H. M. Hayes may have received benefit." From this judgment it is obvious that to become entitled to salvage award no acceptance in point of form is required. In accordance with this judgment I am of opinion that the danger, to entitle salvors to recover remuneration, must be direct and immediate. It must not be indirect, because it would be obvious that, were it not otherwise, every ship within a certain distance which might or might not have suffered, might be considered liable to pay salvors, for averting the danger. The gentlemen who assist us are of opinion that the two ships were in great danger, and that the Vandyck could not have been got free by the two tugs which were assisting her. By the Stormcock bringing the Queen of Scots up to her anchors, the Vandyck was enabled to get clear of the Queen of Scots. There was, therefore, a great benefit conferred on the Vandyck by the Stormcock, and therefore, according to the law laid down in The Annapolis (ubi sup.) by Dr. Lushington, the Stormcock is entitled to savalge reward, and we think that the judgment of the learned judge below should be affirmed.

Brett, L.J.—I entirely agree with my Lord. Here, as we are advised that both ships were in very great danger, it cannot be doubted that what was done by the tug Stormcock did do a very great benefit to the Vandyck. It is said that the two tugs could not have cleared the Vandyck from the Queen of Scots, unless the other tug had dragged the Queen of Scots up to her anchors. Mr Bruce argued that it would not have mattered to the Vandyck if the Queen of Scots had slipped her anchors. Well, but the answer is, she would not, under the circumstances, have done so. In that case we have heard that the Vandyck would have been ground to pieces. So far the case is like The Annapolis (ubi sup.), if the H. M. Hayes was in danger. What does Dr. Lushington say: "If, looking at all the circumstances in which the H. M. Hayes was placed with regard to the facility or non-facility of dropping her second anchor, and the probability of her anchor holding, you should be of opinion that, at the time when the Storm King took the Golden Light in tow, there was then serious and probably immediate danger of the H. M. Hayes being injured, either by the collision with the Golden Light, or by driving upon other vessels, then I shall come to the conclusion that she is bound to pay salvage." Every word, therefore, he says there applies to this case. We do not know what advice was given to Dr Lushington in that case, but the Privy Council say that they agree with him as to the law. They disagree with him on the facts, and they come to the conclusion that there was only the slight danger admitted in the pleadings. It seems to me that the law applies to this case, and that the Vandyck must pay because she was in serious and immediate danger, and because she received benefit from the services of the Stormcock. Mr. Bruce says that as soon as the Stormcock had taken hold of the Queen of Scots, and was holding her up to her anchors for her own benefit, to prevent her breaking loose and probably drifting on to the Duchess of Argyle, and almost certainly receiving great damage, the Vandyck ceased to be in danger, and became able to get clear of the Queen of Scots and with the aid of her two tugs take care of herself. But you must take the moment before the Stormcock took hold of the Queen of Scots. If at that moment the master of the Vandyck had been asked if the tug should take hold of the Queen of Scots, he would at once have said "Yes," if he had been a prudent man. I am of opinion, therefore, that the Stormcock rendered salvage services in this case to the Vandyck, and as no serious argument has been directed to the question of amount, with a view of showing that the award is excessive, I think that the judgment of the learned judge below should be affirmed.

Holker, L.J.—On the night in question the weather was bad, and there was a strong sea, and the Vandyck had drifted down upon the Queen of Scots and got her propeller entangled in the chain of that vessel; and a hole had been made in her, and was being every moment enlarged. The gentlemen who assist us give an opinion that the two tugs could not, by themselves, have got her out of collision. Under these circumstances, without any command or any request from the Vandyck the Stormcock drags the Queen of Scots up to her anchors. Now comes the question, is the law correct? I, for one, think it a most sensible law. Lord Kingsdown, when delivering judgment in the Privy Council, says that their Lordships "agree with what they understand to be the opinion of the learned judge below, that it is sufficient if the circumstances of the case are such that, if an offer of service had been made, any prudent man would have accepted it." As I am of opinion that in the present case a prudent captain of the Vandyck would have accepted the services of the Stormcock, had they been offered him, I think the judgment of the learned judge in the court below must be upheld, and the appeal dismissed with costs.

Appeal dismissed with costs.

Damage to cargo—Negligence of master and crew—Practice—Interrogatories—Sufficiency of answer—Matters within knowledge of servant or agent.

In an action by the owners of cargo against the owners of ship for negligence in the navigation of the ship interrogatories were administered to the defendants, some of which inquired respecting the details of the navigation of the vessel at the time the loss occurred. The defendants refused to answer these interrogatories on the ground that they had no personal knowledge of the facts inquired about, though it was admitted that their officers and sailors, some of whom were still in their employment, possessed the necessary information.

Held, that the defendants must answer, inasmuch as a party interrogated is not excused from answering on the ground that he has no personal knowledge of the facts inquired about, if his servants or agents possess the necessary information, and it has come to their knowledge in the ordinary course of business.

The judgment of Field and Cave, JJ. reversed.

This was an action by the owners of cargo against shipowners for loss of cargo by the negligence of the servants of the defendants. The plaintiffs shipped, under a charter-party and a bill of lading, a cargo of iron on board the Claremont, a ship belonging to the defendants. The Claremont was wrecked, and the cargo and the vessel's log were lost. The plaintiffs sued the defendants, who pleaded that the loss was caused by perils excepted in the bill of lading. The plaintiffs administered (inter alia) the following interrogatories to the defendants:

5. At what time of the day on the 27th Jan. 1881 was Portland or Portland Bill sighted by those on board the steamship Claremont, and how did Portland or Portland Bill then bear, having regard to the position of the ship; What was the course on which the steamship Claremont was being steered when Portland or Portland Bill was first sighted on or about the 27th Jan. 1881? How far from the land was the said ship at that time? Were the Portland lighthouses, or either of them, seen or distinguished by any and what person on board the said ship, and when, on the said 27th Jan? Was not the land covered with snow? What means, if any, were taken to verify the distance of the Claremont from the land, or her position when Portland or Portland Bill was first sighted. What was the state of the weather at the time? State whether the weather was foggy or hazy.

14. Was the lead cast, or were any and what soundings taken, and when and where, by those on board the steamship Claremont after Portland or Portland Bill was sighted on the said 27th Jan., and prior to the time when the steamship Claremont stranded or struck? Was there anything, and what, to prevent such soundings being taken? If yes, give the result of such soundings.

18. Was any, and what calculation made on the 27th Jan. 1881, and by whom, and when, after Portland or Portland Bill was sighted, of the distance run by the steamship Claremont from any and what point?"

The defendants made the following answer to the above interrogatories:

Neither of us, nor either of the above-named defendants, were on board the ship at any of the times referred to in the said interrogatories, and we have no personal knowledge of the matters inquired into. We do not possess the information necessary to enable us to answer the said interrogatories correctly. The matters inquired into by the said interrogatories, with the exception of such matters as can be ascertained by reference to tide tables and weather reports, can only be answered by taking, in great detail, the statements of the officers and crew who were from time to time on watch on board the said steamship during the several times of the happening of the matters inquired into, and comparing their statements and drawing inferences therefrom. We have not yet obtained full and accurate statements from the said several persons, many of whom are no longer in our employment, and some of whom we hope to obtain as witnesses at the trial; and we submit that we are not bound to answer as to our belief as to the various matters referred to in the said interrogatories, for to do so would be to disclose the details of the evidence of the witnesses for the defence, and our belief as to the same. We believe that very serious prejudice may be caused to us if we are compelled to answer these interrogatories in detail before the trial, and especially before all the proofs to be used at the trial have been prepared. We submit that the said interrogatories have been exhibited unreasonably and vexatiously, and that under the circumstances aforesaid we ought not to be called upon to give any further answers to them.

This answer was held insufficient, and a further answer being ordered, the following answers were delivered:

To the fifth interrogatory we say that we believe that Portland Bill was sighted, the ship being on a course about east by south, about 11 a.m. on the 27th Jan. 1881, bearing from the ship about north-east, and more than twelve miles distant. The exact distance is matter of judgment, and we cannot form any belief as to the distance further than as above stated from the materials now before us. The weather was hazy. As to the other matters inquired into by this interrogatory, we say that they relate to matters of detail, concerning which we have no personal knowledge, and that we cannot answer them without disclosing in detail the evidence of witnesses we intend to call at the trial.

In answer to the 14th, 15th, 16th, 17th, 18th, 19th, and 20th interrogatories, we say that we have no personal knowledge of these matters, and that it is impossible for us to answer these interrogatories without examining the officers and crew of the ship and disclosing the details of the evidence we intend to call at the trial.

These answers were also held insufficient, and a further answer to the three interrogatories above set out was ordered. The following answer was then delivered by the defendants:

By way of further answer to the said interrogatories, we say that we believe Portland Bill was sighted, the ship being on a course about east by south, about 11 a.m. on the 27th Jan. 1881, bearing from the ship about north-north-east, and more than twelve miles distant; that the weather was then hazy. Save as aforesaid we have no knowledge or information respecting the matters inquired into by the said interrogatories, save as appears by the protest dated the 1st Feb. 1881, a copy of which the plaintiffs have had produced for their inspection, and also all the documents referred to in the defendants' affidavit of discovery, filed on the 21st March 1882. We have not obtained statements of the officers or of the crew, who were from time to time in charge of the said vessel, or on watch on board during the several times of the matters inquired into, beyond what appears from the said protest and documents scheduled to the defendants' affidavit of discovery. We further say that we are not mariners, and we have no knowledge of the management or navigation of a ship at sea which would enable us to give an opinion upon any of the matters inquired into by the said interrogatories.

The plaintiffs objected that this answer was still insufficient, and applied for a further and better answer, and it was ordered by Williams, J. at chambers that a further answer should be delivered; but that order was set aside by Field and Cave, JJ., sitting as a divisional court, their Lordships being of opinion that the answer last set out was sufficient.

The plaintiffs appealed.

Edge for the appellants.—The plaintiffs can only discover by means of interrogatories what went on on board the ship before the accident, as the vessel's log was lost; they have no other means of finding out whether the defendants' servants were negligent. The defendants can easily learn what their own servants did, and are not entitled to answer that they will not ask them.

[He was stopped by the court.]

Gainsford Bruce for the defendants.—The answer is sufficient. Questions of this sort never were allowed under the Common Law Procedure Act. Before the Judicature Act a party was only required to answer to the extent of his own information, and there is nothing in the Judicature Acts or Rules to alter this principle. He cited

Baggallay, L.J.—This is an action brought by the owners of the cargo against the owners of the vessel for negligence, and in the course of the proceedings interrogatories were exhibited for the examination of the defendants; some of these interrogatories asked questions regarding the navigation of the ship at the time of the accident, as for instance at what time a particular headland was sighted, whether soundings were taken and so forth. To these interrogatories answers were given which were held not to be sufficient, further answers were given which were again held not sufficient, and the third time it was agreed by a wise arrangement between counsel that a limited number of test questions should be taken on which the question in dispute should be raised. One of the interrogatories is as follows: [His Lordship here read the question and the answer to it.] It is contended by Mr Gainsford Bruce that if this action had been brought prior to the passing of the Judicature Acts no such discovery as this could have been asked for, and that there is nothing in those Acts to alter the old practice on this point. There is no doubt that before the Judicature Acts there was a difference between the practice at Common Law and in Chancery as regards discovery from parties. The old rule in Chancery was that if a party did not plead or demur he must answer fully; but there is no doubt that the rule often operated prejudicially and in a hard way upon parties, and it has been considerably modified by the new rules made under the Judicature Acts. So far as I am acquainted with the rules as to discovery in the Common Law Courts before the Judicature Acts, the Judicature Rules have increased the power which existed of enforcing discovery. The first rule of Order XXXI. is very general in its terms, and its generality is first modified by rule 5, which provides for the setting aside of interrogatories which have been unreasonably or vexatiously exhibited. Rule 19 also is a very important rule, and allows the court or a judge, if a party from whom discovery is sought objects to the same, and it appears that the right to the discovery sought depends upon any issue or question in dispute in the action, to reserve the question of the discovery until after the determination of such issue or question. This particularly applies to such cases as Benbow v. Low (ubi sup.). Now it is evident that as a general rule a shipowner has no knowledge of the nautical matters which precede the loss of his vessel, and under the old Chancery rule it is beyond all doubt that interrogatories such as those before us could be administered to the agents of the defendants, who had knowledge of the circumstances. Where an agent did an act in the course of his ordinary duty as agent, information as to the acts of that agent was often required and always allowed. The Attorney-General v. Rees (12 Beav. 50) was a case very like the present, and there the interrogatories were allowed. Of course in the case where the agent is a solicitor another question may arise and the interrogatories may be objectionable on other grounds; but in the case before us I see nothing objectionable in the interrogatories, and I am of opinion that the defendants have not sufficiently answered them. The appeal, therefore, must be allowed, and the order of Williams, J. must be restored.

Brett, L.J.—I am not prepared to retract the observations which I made at the beginning of my judgment in Parker v. Wells (18 Ch. Div. 477; 45 L. T. Rep. N. S. 517). I am still of opinion that such questions as the one at present before us are governed not exclusively by what has been the practice in Chancery, nor exclusively by what has been the practice at common law, but by the rules of the Judicature Acts. The question in this case is whether the answers to certain interrogatories administered to the defendants in the course of the case, which interrogatories are not themselves objected to, are sufficient; and the objection is that the defendants are not bound to answer, because in order to do so they must make certain inquiries of their servants or agents. It is argued that the defendants are not bound to make any such inquiries, but that it is sufficient for them to say in their answer, that they themselves were not personally present at the time the facts occurred which are being inquired about, but that their servants or agents were. Now, I think that of itself is not sufficient to excuse them from answering: it seems to me that a party interrogated is not excused from answering with regard to facts by saying that he himself was not present when the facts happened, but that his servants or agents were, if those facts were such as would be known in the ordinary course of business to his servants or agents. I think he would not be bound to answer if the facts were known only accidentally to his servants or agents, but only if they would come to their knowledge in the ordinary course of their business. I think also he would answer sufficiently if he said that although the facts were known to his servants or agents, yet they were not personally known to himself and that the agent who possessed the information was his agent no longer, and was no longer under his control; but that is not the position that is taken here; here the agent who possesses the information is the defendants' agent still, and there is no difficulty in obtaining from him that information.

Under these circumstances, the contention that the defendant is not bound to answer cannot be supported, and as this is the test on which the case has been made, by consent, to hang, therefore I think there must be further answers, subject to the rule I have indicated. Now, it is further argued that these interrogatories, if answered, would oblige the defendants to disclose their briefs; that is a figurative expression, but I take it to mean that as a rule a party can ask his opponents as to facts, but not as to his evidence of those facts; the plaintiffs here do not go beyond their rights in this respect. I agree that there is some limit to the enforcement of inquiry by means of interrogatories, if the defendants can show that in order to answer the interrogatories they will have to make inquiries which it is wholly unreasonable to ask them to make, that it will put them to unreasonable expense, or that the questions go into unreasonable detail, then I think that would be a ground for saying that they had answered sufficiently, but here the real ground of objection is that the defendants are not bound to make any inquiries, and will not make them. It is quite consistent with anything here that the defendants know who were the officers of the watch at the times inquired about, that those officers are still in their service, and may actually have been in their offices at the time when the defendants refused to answer these interrogatories, and yet the defendants maintain their right not to ask them; that contention seems to me to be wholly beyond their rights, and I am of opinion that the order of Williams, J. was right, and the Divisional Court was wrong in discharging it, and that therefore this appeal must be allowed. I wish to add that I have the gravest doubts whether these answers would not have been insisted on both in Chancery and at common law before the passing of the Judicature Acts.

Lindley, L.J.—The plaintiffs in this case are the owners of the cargo which was carried in a ship belonging to the defendants, which ship was lost. The plaintiffs brought an action for negligence against the defendants, and in the course of that action administered to them some interrogatories which the defendants declined to answer, and we have to say whether the defendants were right in their refusal. Now the way in which the case strikes me is this—it seems to me to resolve itself into the short question—can a person who is asked what he did by his servants or agents say "I do not myself know and I will not ask them?" I think it would be contrary to all principle to hold that this is so. Where a person does any acts by means of his servants and agents, and those acts aftewards become relevant in subsequent litigation, it seems to me that he does not sufficiently answer interrogatories about them by saying that he himself is ignorant, but that his agents possess all the information; he is bound to go further and ask his servants or agents for their information on the subject. The information acquired by his servants or agents in the ordinary course of their business is to all intents and purposes his knowledge, and I think we must treat it as such. I think therefore that the order of Williams, J. at chambers was right, and that this appeal from the Divisional Court must be allowed.

THE GOLDEN SEA. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM THE WRECK COMMISSIONER.

Appeal—Shipowner—Shipping Casualty Investigations Act 1879.

By the provisions of the Shipping Casualty Investigations Act 1879, no right of appeal from the decision of the Wreck Commissioner is given to a shipowner, though he appear as a party at the investigation and be condemned in costs.

The loss of a vessel which is due to improper ballast, purchased by the master, he knowing it to be largely composed of dirt, and no restriction being placed upon him by his owners as to price, is sufficient reason for the Wreck Commissioner suspending the master's certificate.

Semble, where the loss of a ship is due to improper ballast bought by the master without the knowledge or presence of the shipowner, and the shipowner has placed no restriction on the master as to price, no such blame attaches to the shipowner as will justify the Wreck Commissioner in condemning him in the costs of the Board of Trade inquiry.

THESE were two appeals on behalf of the master and managing owner respectively of the Golden Sea, a sailing ship of 1418 tons register, from a decision of the Wreck Commissioner, suspending the certificate of the master for three months, and condemning the managing owner in the sum of 100*l. nomine expensarum.*

The investigation was held under the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Acts at Bristol, on the 13th, 14th, and 15th Dec. 1881, before the Wreck Commissioner, assisted by nautical assessors. In answer to notices of investigation served on the master and managing owner, under Rule 5 of the Shipping Casualties Rules 1878, the master and managing owner appeared as parties to the investigation.

The material facts on which the learned commissioner founded his decision were the following: At Bristol the master of the Golden Sea bought ballast which was largely composed of dirt, soluble in water. The master bought the ballast on his own responsibility, none of the owners being present or interfering. The Golden Sea took the ballast on board, and on Oct. 4, 1881, proceeded to sea in ballast, with a crew of 23 hands, bound on a voyage to St. John's, New Brunswick. About Oct. 14 the ship met with bad weather, when she made water, which converted the ballast into mud, and thereby caused the pumps to be choked and ineffectual; and on the 20th she was abandoned by her master and crew, and foundered four hours after.

After the investigation before the commissioner, the following report of the court was sent to the Board of Trade:

The court, having carefully inquired into the circumstances of the above-mentioned shipping casualty, finds, for the reasons annexed, that the loss of the said vessel Golden Sea was due to the improper ballast which she took on board at Bristol; and which, having become converted into mud by the water she made, caused the pumps to be choked and the vessel to founder; but that the abandonment of the vessel when it took place was justifiable. For these wrongful acts and defaults the court suspends the certificate of Frederick Bowles, the master of the Golden Sea, for three months from this date, and condemns Richard George Guy, the managing owner of the said vessel, in the sum of one hundred pounds (100*l.*) nomine expensarum.

Dated this 15th day of Dec. 1881.

(Signed) H. C. ROTHERY, Wreck Commissioner.

We concur in the above report.

(Signed) { ROBERT HARLAND, K. METHVEN, } Assessors.

The Wreck Commissioner, in the annex appended to the report, after fully dealing with the facts in the case, which are set out in the judgment of the Court of Appeal, found the master to blame for purchasing ballast of an inferior quality. With regard to the owner, the Wreck Commissioner said as follows: "It was said by Mr Parr (counsel for the owner and master of the Golden Sea) that the owner having left the whole matter to the master, he was relieved of all responsibility, but that we cannot for any one moment admit. The owner cannot thus relieve himself of the responsibility which the law imposes upon him, of seeing that his vessel is sent to sea in a seaworthy condition. He knew that the vessel had cost them under 3*l.* a ton when they first sent her to sea about a year before, and that she could not, therefore, be a very high classed ship. He knew that on each of the two voyages on which he had sent her she had made a great deal of water, and had shown herself to be a very leaky vessel. He knew that after her last voyage, when it had been found necessary to throw overboard the whole of the deck cargo owing to the quantity of water which she made, she had undergone very slight repairs at Bristol. He knew, or ought to have known, the nature of this vessel's construction, and that any water getting into the vessel must pass over the ceilings to get to the pump well; that the pump sucked at fourteen inches, and that when there were sixteen inches in the well, the water would be over the ceilings; and yet he takes no steps to see that the master takes in proper ballast although he might and ought to have known that very improper ballast for a voyage across the Atlantic was frequently supplied to ships at Bristol. We think that the managing owner has been guilty of a serious dereliction of duty in this case, which has led to the loss of this vessel, and has exposed to the greatest risk the lives of all on board. Under these circumstances, and seeing that this is not the first inquiry of the kind which has taken place at Bristol, in which the character of the ballast supplied to ships at this port has been fully exposed; seeing, too, that after the inquiry in the case of the Acme an official notice was issued by the Board of Trade, warning all shipowners and shipmasters against the ballast supplied here, we think that it is right that an example should be made, in order that both shipowners and shipmasters should know that they have no right to risk the lives of seamen by putting a quantity of 'dirty ballast' on board their vessels. We shall suspend the master's certificate for three months from this day, and shall condemn the managing owner in the sum of one hundred pounds nomine expensarum."

April 3 and May 8, 1882.—From this decision the master and managing owner appealed, and their respective appeals now came on before the President and Sir R. Phillimore.

Dr. W. G. F. Phillimore, for the managing owner of the Golden Sea.—Counsel for the Board of Trade will argue that the Shipping Casualties Investigations Act 1879, sect. 2, gives no appeal to the managing owner. The owner appeared at the inquiry and took part in the proceedings. The words in the 2nd section referred to include the right of appeal on behalf of the owner. He has been condemned in costs, and in effect been pronounced guilty of sending the ship to sea in an unseaworthy condition. The reflection on his character arising from an adverse finding against him is so serious that, it is only just, he should possess the right of appeal.

Cottingham for the master of the Golden Sea.—The loss of the Golden Sea was not due to the wrongful act or default of the master within the words of sect, 242 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854. The loss of the vessel is to be attributed to the severe weather which the vessel met. Had it not been for the weather the master and crew would have had the time to keep the pumps clear.

Norris, Q.C. and Dankwerts, for the respondents, the Board of Trade, objected that the managing owner had no right of appeal, but were not called upon to argue the point. They contended that the decision of the Wreck Commissioner with respect to the master should be upheld.

Cur. adv. vult.

May 15, 1882.—The PRESIDENT (Sir James Hannen).—This is an appeal from a decision of the Wreck Commissioner, suspending the certificate of Frederick Bowles, the master of the Golden Sea, for three months, and condemning R. G. Guy, the managing owner of that vessel, in the sum of 100*l*. nomine expensarum. The learned Wreck Commissioner found that the loss of the Golden Sea was due to the improper ballast which she took on board at Bristol, and which, having been converted into mud by the water she made, caused the pumps to be choked and the vessel to founder. We entirely concur in this finding. The ballast was largely composed of dirt, which was liable to be washed away by the water which came into contact with it. The man who supplied it stated that it was not proper ballast for a ship without limbers, and that the common sense of the master would teach him that it was soluble in water. It was contended that this vessel had limbers, and therefore that there was no reason to suppose that water in ordinary circumstances would come in contact with the ballast; but whether there were what might technically be called limbers or not, we are of opinion that there was not sufficient security against the action of the water upon the ballast in the event of such ordinary incidents of the voyage arising, as the master was bound to contemplate and guard against. He himself says in his evidence that the pump sucked at fourteen inches, and that on the previous voyage he noticed that when there were sixteen inches of water in the well he would find water over the skin of the vessel. This would at once bring it in contact with the dirt ballast which was laid upon the skin, and the mud that then formed would be carried by the water into the pump well and would gradually choke the pumps. The Wreck Commissioner, with the concurrence of the assessors who assisted him, found that this was what in fact took place, and that the consequence was that with such ballast, with the water that there was in the vessel between the 14th and 20th Oct., when she was abandoned, it was impossible to keep the pumps clear. In this opinion we, together with our assessors, concur. The only point on which our assessors have felt any doubt is whether the gales which the vessel encountered between the 14th and 19th did not prevent the master and crew from doing more than was done to keep the pumps clear, and whether, therefore, the loss of the vessel must not be attributed to these gales. We, however, are of opinion that as the improper ballast contributed to the helpless condition in which the ship was on the 19th Oct., the master must be held responsible for that condition. It is possible that if the weather had been less severe, and the vessel had not sprung a leak, the pump well might have been kept clear; but, on the other hand, it is impossible to say that if the crew had only had to contend with ordinary water instead of water laden with dirt, they would not have been able to keep the vessel afloat. A master is not justified in proceeding on a voyage across the Atlantic with ballast on board of such a kind and so stowed as to clog the pumps in the event of bad weather, making the safety of the vessel depend on their proper action. We think that the event clearly establishes this. The master knew the character of the ballast. He bought it on his own responsibility, and no restriction was placed upon him by the owner as to the price he should pay. We have no doubt that he acted in what he thought was the interest of the owner in obtaining this cheap dirt rather than the better material which could have been obtained at a higher price, but this cannot relieve him of the responsibility for the consequences of his improper selection. We are therefore of opinion that the decision of the Wreck Commissioner as to the master was correct, and we dismiss his appeal.

With regard to the owner the case is very different. It has been our duty in the interest of the master carefully to investigate all the facts, and we feel bound to say that, so far as the case has been presented to us, we do not see any reason to impute blame to the owner. But an objection has been taken on behalf of the Board of Trade that no appeal lies from the decision of the Wreck Commissioner condemning the owner.

We feel constrained, though with great regret, to give effect to this objection. The appeal to this division is given by the Shipping Casualty Investigations Act 1879. By the 2nd section of that Act it is enacted, first, that "where an investigation into the conduct of a master, mate, or engineer, or into a shipping casualty has been held . . . . the Board of Trade may in any case, and shall" in certain cases order the cause to be reheard; secondly, that "where in any such investigation a decision has been given with respect to the cancelling or suspension of the certificate of a master, mate, or engineer, and an application for a rehearing has not been made, or has been refused, an appeal shall lie from the decision." We are of opinion that the clear meaning of these words is, that the decision from which an appeal is allowed is a decision with respect to the cancelling or suspension of the certificate, and not any other decision. If the reason of the enactment is considered, it confirms the view we take of the construction of the section. The decision of the Wreck Commissioner may deprive the master of the means of earning his livelihood. It was thought fit, therefore, to give the master a right of appeal. If it had been intended to give the owner a right of appeal, we cannot conceive any reason why it should be made to depend on whether the master's certificate had been dealt with, for the injury inflicted on the owner is the same, whether the master is found to blame or not. It is possible that no appeal was given to the owner because the Wreck Commissioner has only the power to express an opinion on his conduct, and has not directly the power of punishing him. But it is evident that the reflection on the character of the owner arising from an adverse finding against him is of a very serious nature. He has in fact, though not in form, been found guilty of a misdemeanour in sending a ship to sea in such an unseaworthy state that lives were likely to be thereby endangered. In addition to this, he has in effect been subject to a fine, nomine expensarum, of 100*l*. We think that an amendment of the law is called for, and that the right of appeal should be extended to the owner. Entertaining the opinion we have expressed, we are compelled to reject the owner's appeal, but we do so without costs.

THE LEON XIII. (a)

Jurisdiction—Wages — Foreign ship — Protest of consul.

In an action for wages and wrongful dismissal, brought by persons domiciled in England against a foreign ship in which they had served under articles signed in a port of the country to which the ship belonged, in which action imprisonment, hardship, and ill-treatment were alleged, the Court refused to exercise jurisdiction against the protest of the consul alleging that, by the law of the country to which the ship belonged, all disputes relating to the ship or claims against the owner or master were to be referred to and decided by the tribunals or consuls of that country.

The Nina ((3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 10, 47; 17 L. T. Rep. N. S. 391, 585; L. Rep. 2 P. C. 33) followed.

THIS was a motion on behalf of the owners of the Spanish steamer Leon XIII. to stay or dismiss an action brought against the Leon XIII. to recover wages and damages for wrongful dismissal.

It appeared that in Nov. 1881 the plaintiffs, John Wardrop, John Hodgson, and Thomas Baker, British subjects domiciled in England, were engaged by the defendants as first, second, and third engineers respectively on the Leon XIII., then at the port of Liverpool, for a voyage from Liverpool to Manilla and back, and the plaintiffs accordingly joined the ship. On arriving at Barcelona the plaintiffs, having hitherto signed no articles, here signed articles of agreement in the Spanish language before the Spanish officials. On the 21st Dec. the plaintiffs were imprisoned on board the ship by the master of the Leon XIII. for alleged misconduct and insubordination, and were kept in confinement until the 27th March 1882, when they were discharged at Manilla, after an alleged trial by a Spanish tribunal.

On the return of the plaintiffs to England they instituted on the 24th July 1882 an action against the Leon XIII., to recover their wages, and for damages for wrongful dismissal, and delivered their statements of claim.

On the 9th Oct., before any defence had been put in, the Spanish consul at Liverpool made a protest against the jurisdiction, which was filed by the defendants, and was as follows:

1. I, the undersigned, am the consul of Spain in Liverpool.

2. The above-named vessel, Leon XIII., proceeded against in this action, is a Spanish ship belonging to the port of Barcelona, of which the Marquis de Campo, a Spanish subject resident in Madrid, is the sole and duly registered owner. The said vessel carries the Royal Spanish mails between Spain and Manilla and Philippine Islands, which form a portion of the Kingdom of Spain.

3. The plaintiffs in this action served on board the said vessel during the voyage in respect of which they claim in this action, under articles of agreement which are in the Spanish language, and were made and signed by them before the duly-authorised Spanish officials at Barcelona, and which constitute the form of agreement prescribed and recognised by the Spanish law. I have perused the said agreement with the signatures thereto, and the same comprise, as I am informed and verily believe, the signatures of the plaintiffs in this action.

4. The voyage mentioned in the said articles is a voyage from Barcelona to Manilla and other ports, and back to Spain and Liverpool.

5. The plaintiffs in this action have, by the terms of their agreement and by the law of Spain, submitted themselves to the provisions of the same law, by which the plaintiffs are restricted from taking proceedings against the said vessel or her owners in countries other than Spain or her colonies, or Spanish consuls, and are required to submit any dispute or claim such as that raised in this action respecting the voyage in the said articles mentioned, or against the owner of or master of the said vessel, to the Spanish authorities in Spain, or in foreign countries to the Spanish consuls.

6. English vessels enjoy these privileges in Spanish ports. The settlement of accounts and of wages, &c., amongst the members of their crews, even though there may be Spanish subjects among them, are in Spain settled by the British consuls, or by the British tribunals and courts in England or in her colonies.

7. Spain concedes even still more privileges to British vessels. All acts of neglect, misdemeanour, or crime committed on board an English vessel in Spanish waters or ports, if they do not affect the public peace, are judged by the British consuls or the tribunals in England or her colonies, even though there are Spanish subjects amongst the crew compromised in the affair.

8. The engineers, John Wardrop, John Hodgson, and Thomas Baker, of the screw steamer Leon XIII., were guilty of insubordination, breaking through the discipline of the ship, and wanting in the respect due to the captain and officers. For this they were tried by the competent Spanish tribunal of Manilla, the sentences passed upon them being communicated to the British consul in Manilla and to the parties interested.

9. Under the circumstances above stated, I therefore most respectfully subject that it is not within the jurisdiction of this honourable court to entertain the plaintiffs' claim; and, as consul of Spain, I consider it my duty respectfully and formally to protest against the exercise of the jurisdiction of this honourable court in or about the plaintiffs' claim in this action, because this case has been already tried by a Spanish tribunal, and as, if under similar circumstances, such a case had occurred on board of an English vessel in Spain, the Spanish courts would leave the affair entirely under the jurisdiction of the British authorities.

Signed and sealed with the official seal of this Spanish consulate in Liverpool, the 4th day of October 1882.

T. ORTUNO, Spanish Consul.

This protest was supported by affidavit, accompanied by a copy of the said articles. The articles contained no words by which the plaintiffs submitted themselves to the Spanish law.

In answer to the said protest and the affidavits of the defendants, the plaintiffs filed affidavits alleging that they had been wrongfully imprisoned and dismissed by the master of the Leon XIII.; that they had been guilty of no misconduct or insubordination, and were improperly deprived of their wages; that they had not by signing articles intended to submit themselves to Spanish law or any other than English law; that they were shipped in an English port; that all that happened at Manilla was that the master of the Leon XIII. made a statement to the Spanish authorities in Spanish, of which language the plaintiffs were ignorant: that they (the plaintiffs) had no opportunity to reply or call witnesses; and that they were then released with an intimation to the effect that they had been sufficiently punished, but without being informed for what they had been so punished. The defendants now moved the court to stay or dismiss the action with costs.

Butt, Q.C. (with him Dr. W. Phillimore), for the defendants in support of the motion.—The jurisdiction of the court is not disputed. The case of The Nina (17 L. T. Rep. N. S. 391, 585; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 10, 47; L. Rep. 2 P. C. 38) is a direct authority that it has this jurisdiction which the court will only exercise when it is of opinion that, having regard to the reasons advanced by the consul, and the answers to them offered on the part of the plaintiffs, it is fit and proper that the suit should proceed." The circumstances of the present case are not sufficiently strong to induce the court to exercise its jurisdiction. The plaintiffs, by signing articles of agreement as they did, subjected themselves to the law of Spain. Dr. Lushington, in The Golubchick (1 W. Rob. 143), where the plaintiffs were Spanish mariners suing a Russian ship, lays it down as a "settled doctrine of law that, when a subject of one country enters into the service of a ship belonging to the subjects of another country, he must be considered pro hac vice to be a subject of that country to which the vessel belongs." The plaintiffs are therefore to be considered as Spanish subjects, and their action is only to be tried in accordance with Spanish law.

J. P. Aspinall for the plaintiffs, against the motion.—In The Nina Lord Romilly lays down that there are circumstances which, if sufficiently strong, will induce the court to exercise its jurisdiction. The facts of the present case are very strong. The plaintiffs are domiciled in England, they shipped at an English port, they were wrongfully imprisoned and allowed no opportunity of defence when brought before the alleged tribunal at Manilla, and improperly dismissed from their positions as engineers. They can get no efficient redress elsewhere; and if forced to prosecute their claim in Spain, the expense would be great and probably prohibitory. A consul is not in a position to decide whether the plaintiffs' conduct justified their dismissal, and, should the plaintiffs succeed before the consul, the ship might never return to England, as has happened before in the case of Spanish ships. In an American case, The St. Oloff (2 Pet. Adm. 428), the circumstances closely resembling the present, the court exercised its jurisdiction. The Nina is distinguishable on the ground that there the plaintiff signed articles, containing an express provision that he would submit himself to the provisions of the commercial code of Portugal. In the present case there is no such specific submission to the laws of Spain. Before deciding whether the court should or should not entertain the suit, it is only right, seeing the allegations of the plaintiffs, that some further investigations should be made as to their truth, and that the evidence of the plaintiffs should be taken.

Butt, Q.C. in reply.—It is ridiculous to say that the case is to be tried to see if it be a fit case to be tried. It is entirely a matter for the Spanish authorities to decide whether there has been a contravention of the Spanish law.

Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—I have had some doubts in the course of the arguments that have been addressed to me, but upon the whole I do not see any substantial difference that can be taken between this case and The Nina and the case of The Golubchick. There is no doubt the ship belonged to the Spanish nation. The words of Dr. Lushington in the latter case are material: "It is, I conceive, a settled doctrine of law that, when a subject of one country enters into the service of a ship belonging to the subject of another country, he must be considered pro hac vice to be a subject of the country to which the vessel belongs." These plaintiffs must be taken pro hac vice, for the purpose of this suit, to be Spanish subjects on board a Spanish vessel under the Spanish flag. There is no doubt at all as to the propositions discussed during the argument, or that the court has power to use a discretion in the exercise of its jurisdiction. Upon the whole, without entering into the cases that have been fully considered, and the principle of law laid down in the case of The Nina, I am of opinion that there is no distinction between the case of The Nina and the present case, and I must dismiss the action.

THE KENMURE CASTLE. (a)

Salvage—Award—Owners — Master and crew — Apportionment.

Where, in a salvage action, the court awarded a total sum of 4000*l.*, and there was no special danger to the master or crew, and the service was mainly towage, the Court apportioned 3000*l. to the owners of the salving ship.*

THIS was a salvage action brought by the owners, master, and crew of the steamship John David, of 1807 tons gross register, belonging to the port of Antwerp, against the steamship Kenmure Castle, her cargo and freight.

The Kenmure Castle, a screw steamship of 1268 tons register, with engines of 180 horse power nominal, was, on the 14th Nov. 1881, proceeding up the Red Sea, bound on a voyage from China to London, laden with a cargo of tea, and manned with a crew of twenty-seven hands. On the same day, when about twenty miles N.W. of the island of Jebel Zuker, it was found that her crank shaft was broken, and on the morning of the 15th Nov. the Belgian steamship John David, which was proceeding from Bombay to London with a full cargo of cotton and wheat, came up with the Kenmure Castle, and, after an interview between the two masters, they both signed a memorandum to the effect that the assistance of the John David to tow the Kenmure Castle to Suez had been requested by the master of the Kenmure Castle, that the question as to the amount of salvage remuneration should be referred to arbitration in London, and that should the John David be in want of coals they were to be supplied from aboard the Kenmure Castle at the rate then current at Suez. The Kenmure Castle was then lashed alongside the John David, in order to facilitate the transfer of coal from the Kenmure Castle to the John David, and towage commenced and lasted for several hours, when the lashings were cast off and the John David began to tow ahead of the Kenmure Castle. On the morning of the 19th Nov. the two vessels were again lashed together, and about fifty tons of coal transferred to the John David after which towing ahead of the Kenmure Castle was resumed, and on the 23rd Nov. the two vessels came to anchor in Suez Roads. By reason of the two vessels being lashed together, the John David sustained damage through bumping against the Kenmure Castle. Throughout the towage, which lasted ten days, the weather was fine and the crew of the John David was exposed to no danger or risk.

The value of the Kenmure Castle, her cargo and freight, were taken at 75,140*l.* the value of the John David at 75,000*l.*

Butt, Q.C. and Dr. W. G. F. Phillimore, for the owners and masters of the John David, contended that the steam power assistance given by the John David entitled her ownres to large remuneration.

Nelson, for one portion of the crew of the John David; Beaumont Morice, for the other portion of the crew of the John David.

Myburgh, Q.C. and Baden Powell, for the owners of the Kenmure Castle and the owners of her cargo.

Sir ROBERT PHILLIMORE.—This is a salvage service, rendered by one large screw steamer to another in the Red Sea, beginning on the 15th Nov. and lasting till the 25th of that month. The vessel to which the services were rendered was the Kenmure Castle, a screw steamer of 1268 tons register, and 180 horse power nominal, and she was on a voyage from China to London with a cargo of tea, and was manned with a crew of twenty-seven hands. On the 14th Nov., as she was prosecuting her voyage up the Red Sea, when twenty miles N. W. of Jebel Zuker, it was found that her crank shaft was broken. She was from that moment a log upon the water, perfectly unable to do anything for herself, and requiring steam power assistance. The vessel that rendered the salvage services in this case was the John David belonging to the port of Antwerp. She was a screw steamship of 1807 tons gross register, and was prosecuting a voyage from Bombay to London with a full cargo of cotton and wheat. It is a curious incident that the John David and the Kenmure Castle with her cargo were of nearly equal value. Now, the towage in this case was an easy one in one sense. The weather was fine, and the vessel met with no accident in the whole course of the towage, but at the same time the court takes into consideration what would have happened if bad weather had set in. The salved vessel was in a state in which salvage assistance was necessary. If the weather had become rough, she might have drifted on the coral reefs, of which there are so many in the Red Sea. It must be remembered that the salving vessel was bound in the same direction as the vessel salved, and that there was no danger to the salvors personally. Bearing all these matters in mind, I have come to the conclusion, after consulting with the Elder Brethren, that the salvage remuneration awarded in this case should be 4000*l.*, and I apportion it as follows: 3000*l.* to the owners of the John David, 400*l.* to her master, and 600*l.* to her crew. With regard to the services of the owners of the John David, I may say that the efficiency of the steam power of their vessel was a main ingredient in the salvage service. I award one set of costs only.

April 19 and 20, 1882.

(Before the JUDGE, A. Cohen, Esq., Q.C.)

THE MARIE. (a)

Salvage — Misconduct of salvors — Forfeiture — Diminution—Award.

Misconduct on the part of salvors, other than criminal misconduct, works a diminution, but not a total forfeiture of reward.

THIS was an action in rem instituted on behalf of the owners, master, and crew of the lugger Lady Compton of Deal, and the owners, master, and crew of the steam-tug Lord Palmerston of Dover, against the French brig Marie, her cargo and freight, to recover salvage reward for services rendered on the 26th March 1882.

On the 26th March 1882 the Marie was in the Downs, having lost her anchors and chains, and the wind was blowing a very heavy gale. As the Marie was in the neighbourhood of other vessels, those on board exhibited a signal of distress, in answer to which the Lady Compton went to the brig, and ten men from the Lady Compton boarded her. The brig was then got before the wind and, after rounding the South Foreland, the tug Lord Palmerston was engaged by the salvors to tow, and the brig was towed into Dover Harbour. The defence was that all the assistance requisite was the services of someone to pilot the Marie to Dover Roads; that it was against the wish of her master that the ten men of the Lady Compton assisted in the navigation of the Marie, but that they by superior force took possession of the Marie, and whilst on board her, prevented her crew from navigating the ship, which they were well able to do, and treated them with rudeness and violence.

Though the action was entered in the sum of 800*l.*, an appearance having been entered on behalf of the owners of the Marie, on application by the defendants, the Marie was released on bail in the sum of 400*l.*, and for the purpose of saving expense, and with the consent of the parties, the judge directed the action to be heard without pleadings. The Marie, her cargo and freight, were valued at 550*l.*

April 19.—The cause now came on for hearing before the judge.

Glyn, on behalf of the plaintiffs.—The services were meritorious salvage services, requiring much labour and risk. The weather was very bad and the Marie in great danger. The Dosseitei (10 Jur. 865), Hartford v. Jones (1 Ld. Raym. 393), and Nicholson v. Chapman (2 H. Bl. 254) are all cases in favour of the salvors.

Dr. W. G. Phillimore on behalf of the defendants.—The Marie was never in danger, and all that she required was pilotage assistance. The conduct of the salvors was violent and overbearing, and in opposition to the wishes of the master. Such misconduct deprives them of all salvage remuneration on the rulings in The Lady Worsley (2 Spks. 253), The Martha (Sw. 489), The Dantzic Packet (3 Hagg. 383), The Black Boy (3 Hagg. 386 n.), and The Champion (Br. & L. 69).

April 20.—The Judge (A. Cohen, Esq., Q.C.).—This is an action of salvage brought by the plaintiffs, the owners, master, and crew of the lugger Lady Compton, and the owners, master, and crew of the tug Palmerston, against the owners of the French brig Marie, of 108 tons register laden with a cargo of stone, and with her cargo and freight of the value of 550*l.* There are many facts in the case which are not at all in dispute. On the 26th of March last there was blowing an extremely heavy gale, and the Marie was in the neighbourhood of other vessels in the Downs. One anchor was slipped to avoid a collision, and then a second anchor was let go when she began to drive, and then that was also slipped. Under these circumstances, I think that the vessel was in distress and was in danger. A signal was hoisted on board the Marie; those on board the Lady Compton perceived the signal and went up to the brig, and ten men boarded the brig. The brig was got before the wind, and when they got round the South Foreland, a tug, which proved to be the Lord Palmerston, was hailed by the master of the lugger. An arrangement was made that the tug was to tow the brig and hold her in the roads; and it was agreed that the Lord Palmerston was to receive a proportion of the salvage remuneration. The tug took hold of the brig at about 10.30 and towed her until about 11.45, and then held her till the tide suited and ultimately took her into Dover Harbour. As to the facts which I have just mentioned, the evidence leaves no doubt. I am of opinion that these services rendered by the master of the lugger and the tug were salvage services, because the brig was in distress and in danger. But I am also of opinion that the services did not require much skill and labour and involved no risk at all; the services lasted but a very short time. I think that the services of ten men as salvors were by no means required; and I am of opinion that the master of the Marie, when he signalled, did not mean to signify more than that he wanted no other service than the services of a man who could pilot his vessel. If he had had a pilot on board all that he desired could have been done. There was no skill involved, and there was no necessity for those ten men to board this small brig, and I therefore do not think it right to award any larger amount of salvage remuneration, than it would have been the duty of the court to award, if only three men had boarded the brig. I come now to the services of the tug. The weather was not bad for the tug. She towed the vessel a short distance and held her for about two hours. The brig was not in danger.

But then it is said that all salvage remuneration in this case has been forfeited by misconduct, and that the conduct of the salvors was throughout violent, overbearing, and threatening. I believe that the evidence of the master of the brig is substantially true: that what he wanted was the service of some person who could pilot the vessel to Dover Roads, and he did not require the services of ten men to assist in the navigation of his vessel. I am, however, willing to assume that until Mr. Hodges, the agent, came on board, there was a misunderstanding between the salvors and the master of the brig. It is not quite certain what the master of the Marie intended to do, but I am willing to assume that he intended to go to Dover Roads, and remain there until he could get an anchor and chain, and that what was done up to the time when Mr. Hodges came on board, was not done contrary to the intentions of the master of the brig; but I am also of opinion, that after Mr. Hodges came on board the master and crew of the lugger did act in a violent and overbearing manner towards the master of the brig, and insisted on having their own way. It appears to me that a court of justice ought to express some kind of censure on ten men who boarded a small French brig, and who undoubtedly intended to have their own way, whatever the captain of that small vessel might do. On the other hand, I am also of opinion, that that misconduct is not such criminal misconduct as should lead to an entire forfeiture of salvage reward. In the case of The Atlas (1 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 168, 235; 6 L. T. Rep. N. S. 737; Lush. 518) it was held in substance that wilful or criminal misconduct of salvors may work a forfeiture of salvage, but that mere misconduct other than criminal, even though it occasions loss, will only work a diminution of reward. I cannot say that there was in this case wilful or criminal misconduct within the meaning of the judgment of The Atlas (ubi sup.). I entertain considerable doubt whether the master of the brig has sustained any pecuniary loss at all by what was done by the salvors, and see no reason to believe that the salvors did that which occasioned any extra expenditure. On the whole, taking into consideration the opinion of Dr. Lushington in the case of The Atlas, it is impossible to hold that what was done by the salvors worked a forfeiture of the whole of their remuneration; but I think that the plaintiffs' improper conduct during part of the time when they were rendering salvage services should lead the court to diminish the amount to which otherwise they would have been entitled, and I therefore award to the plaintiffs 70*l.* and costs. I observe with regret, no tender has been made in this case, but I do hope that in future, tenders will be made in cases where the services are similar to those in the present case. I also think it would be very desirable that in cases where tenders have been made, plaintiffs should consider the advisability of naming a sum, which, having regard to the amount of the tender, they would be prepared to receive in discharge of their claim. In this way many of these cases might be settled out of court, and thereby great expense saved to all parties, especially as the court would give costs with reference to the amounts so put forward by the respective parties as a proper salvage remuneration.

COURT OF APPEAL.

Feb. 14 and 16, 1883.

(Before Jessel, M.R., Lindley and Bowen, L.JJ.)

Peruvian Guano Company Limited v. Bockwoldt. (a)

Double litigation—Concurrent actions in English and foreign courts—Vexatious litigation—Election—Difference in subject-matter.

Although a plaintiff may be put to his election between two actions, where one is in an English court and the other abroad, on the ground of vexation, the court will not consider the double litigation vexatious, where there are substantial reasons to induce the plaintiff to sue in both countries, as where he can get a judgment in each action, but execution is more easily obtained in one country than in the other.

The court will not put a plaintiff, who is suing a defendant in two courts, to his election—not between the two actions, but—between so much of the subject-matter of one action as is embraced in the other.

An action was brought in England against D. and Co. for delivery of seven cargoes, for damages, and for an injunction against disposing of the cargoes, which were claimed by the plaintiffs, and were then in ships in British waters. Afterwards the ships and cargoes were removed to French ports and the cargoes were sold by D. and Co. An action having been commenced in a French court by the same plaintiffs against D. and Co. for six of the cargoes:

Held (affirming the decision of Bacon, V.C.), that the double proceedings were not vexatious, and therefore the plaintiffs ought not be put to their election whether they would proceed in the French or the English action.

On the 6th May 1880 the plaintiffs, an English company commenced the present action against Bockwoldt and others, who were captains of certain ships called the Charles Dickens, the Woodfield, the True Briton, the British Princess, the Chancellor, the North Star, and the Struan, for an injunction to restrain them from parting with certain cargoes of guano.

On the 8th June 1880 Messrs. Dreyfus Brothers and Co., merchants, of London and Paris, were made defendants in the place of the captains, who were dismissed from the action; and in the statement of claim it was alleged that the bills of lading had been improperly indorsed and delivered to Dreyfus Brothers and Co. (who had notice at the time that the cargoes belonged to the plaintiffs), and that they had intercepted the ships and induced the captains to deliver the cargoes abroad, instead of in London, the port at which the plaintiffs had ordered the captains to discharge. The plaintiffs claimed delivery to them of the cargoes, damages, and, if necessary, an injunction against the disposal of the cargoes, and a receiver.

On the 2nd Dec. 1882 Dreyfus Brothers and Co. were served with a citation to appear before the Tribunal of Commerce of the Department of the Seine, sitting at Paris, in an action by the plaintiffs for restoration of the cargoes of all the above ships, except the Struan, or payment of their value, and for damages.

At the commencement of the English action the ships were in British waters, but they had since been removed to ports in France, and it was admitted that all the cargoes had since been sold and the proceeds received by Dreyfus Brothers and Co.

On the 8th Dec. 1882 Dreyfus Brothers and Co. moved in the English action, on notice, before Bacon, V.C., that the plaintiffs might be ordered, within seven days after the order to be made on the motion, to elect whether they would proceed with the action so far as the same related to the ships Charles Dickens, Woodfield, True Briton, British Princess, Chancellor, and North Star, or the French action brought by them in respect of the cargoes of the said ships.

Ingle Joyce for the defendants.—Where a plaintiff had commenced two actions, one in England and one abroad, and had written to say that he elected to go on with the foreign action, the court stayed the English action:

Pieters v. Thompson, G. Coop. 294.

Millar, Q.C. and H. B. Buckley for the plaintiffs.—There is no such letter here as in Pieters v. Thompson; and there is no precedent for the order asked:

Cox v. Mitchell, 1 L. T. Rep. N. S. 8; 7 C. B. N. S. 58;

McHenry v. Lewis, 46 L. T. Rep. N. S. 567; 21 Ch. Div

(a) Reported by Frank Evans, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

This action is not now for goods, but only for damages.

Joyce in reply.—There must have been a previous order to elect in Pieters v. Thompson. (a) He also cited

(a) It appears, on searching at the Record Office, that on the 6th May 1815 (and therefore before the date of the decision reported G. Coop. 294) the following order was made by Lord Eldon, L.C. in Pieters v. Thompson: "Forasmuch as this court was this present day informed by Mr Heys, of counsel for the defendants, that the plaintiffs have exhibited their bill in this court against the defendants, the defendants have put in their answer thereto, and yet the plaintiffs prosecute (sic) the defendants both at law and in certain courts for one and the same matters, whereby the defendants are doubly vexed. It is ordered that the plaintiffs, their clerk in court and attorney-at-law having notice hereof, do, within eight days after such notice, make their election in which court they will proceed, and, if the plaintiffs shall elect to proceed in this court, then the plaintiffs are hereby stayed by injunction from proceeding in the courts abroad; but if the plaintiffs shall elect to proceed in the courts abroad, or in default of such election by the time aforesaid, then the plaintiffs' bill is from henceforth to stand dismissed out of this court as against the defendants, with costs to be taxed by Mr. Harvey, one of the masters of this court." The answer sworn on the 6th June 1815, in the same suit, was, so far as material, as follows: "And these defendants further say that since the complainants have filed their said bill against these defendants, and since these defendants have been served with process to appear and answer thereto, these defendants have received two several letters addressed to these defendants from two different persons, who are the agents of these defendants, at Amsterdam, in Holland, one of which letters purports to bear date at Amsterdam the 28th Feb. 1815, and to be signed by a person resident there called Rine Berenbrook, and is of the tenor or to the purport and effect following. ("Dear Sirs,—I am sorry to inform you that on the 25th inst., Messrs. Siedes Pieters and Sons of Learwarden [the plaintiffs] put in an arrest on all things as well on goods as money belonging to you, and at that period in my hands, as also those of Mr N. Bouvy. This arrest was authorised by the court on their having produced an abstract of your account with them showing a balance in their favour of 2138*l.* 3*s.* 8*d.* I have been extremely astonished by seeing this situation, and I hope you will find means to settle things in one way or the other, for as long as this arrest continues I have the hands entirely bound, and we cannot do anything together without compromising your safety); and the other of which letters purports also to bear date at Amsterdam, March 3, 1815, and to be signed by a person resident there called Nicholas Bouvy, and part of which, relating to the matter aforesaid, is of the tenor or to the purport and effect following videlicit: (This is to inform you that Siedes Pieters and Sons, at Learwarden, seized under my hands and directions much money and all what is belonging to you in order to find therein the payment of 2138*l.* 3*s.* 8*d.* sterling, which they say you are in debt. As the seizure must be prosecuted within eight days, I shall be obliged to make preparations for my defence. All the expenses will be at your charge); as in and by the said two letters, relation being thereunto had when produced, will appear. These defendants believe that the information contained in such two letters aforesaid is true, and that the complainants have, by process of the courts in Holland aforesaid, attached or seized goods and effects in that country which belong to and are the property of these defendants, having since been served with notice of such proceedings, and informed by their said agents at Amsterdam that the said complainants, the said Siedes Pieters and Gorben Pieters, were continuing the prosecution thereof, and these defendants have heard, and believe it to be true, that the complainants threaten and intend to attach other goods and effects which belong to and are the property of these defendants, and these defendants say that, by the means aforesaid, these defendants are and will be doubly vexed and harrassed by the complainants, who have filed their said bill in this honourable court against these defendants, and are proceeding in the court of justice in Holland aforesaid, against the goods and effects of these defendants, for the same matter, and these defendants deny all and all manner of unlawful combination and confederacy wherewith they are charged," &c.

Bacon, V.C.—It seems to be agreed that there is no authority on which the court can rely, one way or the other, for this application. The suit in this country alleges that the defendants Messrs. Dreyfus Brothers and Co. are in possession of cargoes to which the plaintiffs lay claim, and the claim asks that the defendants may be ordered to deliver those cargoes, or in the alternative to pay damages; but in the alternative only. Then it turns out that, although the defendants may be in possession of these goods, the goods are not in this country, so there can be no application in rem in this country relating to the cargoes, and no appointment of a receiver, or any other proceeding by which the court can take into its possession the thing in dispute. Then the plaintiffs, after instituting the suit in this country, find that they can have the relief which by the first prayer of the claim they desire to have, namely, the actual possession by delivery of the things in question, by proceedings in France. I cannot say that the suits are directly alike, or that there is no distinction in the relief asked. Suppose that in France the present plaintiffs should fail altogether, they may have a case in this country, and may obtain a decree in their favour. Suppose the plaintiffs should succeed in France, the effect of that upon the suit will be, that, whenever it comes on for hearing, the defendants will say, "You have had that which you sought to have." Therefore, it seems to me that natural justice does not interfere, and does not furnish me with any ground upon which I can proceed.

Certainly Pieters v. Thompson does not govern this case, because, although Mr. Ingle Joyce says it must be assumed that there was an order to elect, I can find no trace of it in the judgment as reported in Sir George Cooper's Reports. On the contrary, the application was to compel the plaintiffs to do that which they had promised to do. Proceedings were going on in the Dutch court, and the defendants said, "Do not let us be harassed here when we are called upon to defend the same case in the Dutch court." All that the court then required was, that the defendants should prove that the plaintiffs had elected, and that proof being furnished they stopped the proceedings. I do not think that case has any application to the case now presented. Nor has Cox v. Mitchell any application, for the courts of common law—I think I may say notoriously—had no jurisdiction on the subject of election; certainly in that case the court was not asked to exercise any such jurisdiction. There the party applying had been held to bail under the statute 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110. The proceeding, therefore, was most directly in personam. He asked to be released from bail because there was a suit pending in another country. One of the answers given in the judgment was, that it might suit the defendant's purpose very well to escape from the country in which the first suit was pending, and come here, thinking he was safe, and set the plaintiff at defiance. The Court of Common Pleas, therefore, acted on the only authority it possessed, the statutory authority. The man had been held to bail under circumstances which justified that proceeding, and the court declined to interfere with it. The judges referred very pointedly to the circumstance that nobody in the courts of common law ever heard of an application to stay such proceedings as had been there taken; but there is not a trace of any judgment on the subject of election. The cases before Sir Robert Phillimore, which are entitled to be treated no doubt with great respect, apply much more pointedly to this application; but they are cases of collision between ships, and the jurisdiction was over the ships themselves. I cannot say, in the present state of the authorities, which are imperfect, or on the natural justice of the case, that the plaintiffs, who claim the actual possession of these goods (which they cannot get in this country), are debarred from making the same claim in another country where it may be that they can obtain that possession, simply because they have asked here for possession, and in case they fail to obtain it, for damages. I can make no such order as Mr. Ingle Joyce asks for. The costs of the motion will be—costs in the action.

The defendants appealed.

Davey, Q.C. and Ingle Joyce for the appellants.—The defendants are doubly vexed by the proceedings in this country and in France, and the onus lies on those who doubly vex to show that the double vexation should not be stayed. [Jessel, M.R. referred to McHenry v. Lewis, 47 L. T. Rep. N. S. 549.] That was not a case of election; it was a motion to stay proceedings. In Pieters v. Thompson (G. Coop. 294) the plaintiffs, when suing both in England and in a Dutch court, were put to their election. That does not appear in the report, and Bacon, V.C. could not be persuaded that any order had been made in that case, but a search has since been made and the record of the order has been found. In Dawkins v. Simonetti (44 L. T. Rep. N. S. 266) Jessel, M.R. said: "Under the old practice, when a man was sued in equity as well as at law, the plaintiff was put to his election; and it was just the same when one suit was in an English court and the other suit in a foreign court. The practice was to move to stay the proceedings either in the foreign court or in the English court. In dealing with such a question the court prevented double vexation, but it always exercised a discretion." There being jurisdiction, this is clearly a case in which it ought to be exercised; there is the same subject-matter except that there is no action in France as to one of the cargoes. [Jessel, M.R.—Why were the French proceedings commenced? Millar, Q.C. for the plaintiffs.—The plaintiffs had a double remedy; they could sue both in England and France, and they thought that by suing in France they would get relief sooner, execution being more easily obtained. In McHenry v. Lewis it was held that whenever there was a different remedy in a foreign country the double proceedings were not vexatious. The property in this case is in France. Jessel, M.R.—How can we do the defendants any good by staying the action as to all the cargoes but one? I never saw a case of election between proceedings as to some part of the common subject-matter.] The defendants ought not to be put to the expense of calling witnesses in both proceedings as to the cargoes which are common to both actions. It is no objection that the subject-matter of the two actions is not exactly the same. In some cases under the old practice the plaintiff might be allowed to make a special election. As to proceeding for part in equity, and for another part at law, though this was not allowed as of course (Seton on Decrees, 3rd edit. 949), in one case leave was given to proceed at law to get judgment, and in the Court of Chancery for discovery of assets:

Barker v. Dumaresque, 2 Atk. 119; Barn. C. 277.

The plaintiffs ought not to be allowed to vex us by availing themselves of a technicality; they have omitted to make the French proceedings apply to all the cargoes in order to escape the general rule as to the subject-matter of both proceedings being the same. The court can, however, retain the foreign action if it thinks the continuance of the proceedings abroad will vex the defendants:

Wedderburn v. Wedderburn, 4 M. & C. 596.

[Jessel, M.R.—Is there any case in which, the subject-matter not being all the same in both actions, the court has ordered election as to part which is the same?] There is a form of order in Seton on Decrees (3rd edit. 948), "that the plaintiff be at liberty to make his election to proceed at law for &c. and in this court for &c.; and let the plaintiff's bill as to &c. (so far as he proceeds at law) stand dismissed." [Jessel, M.R.—The blanks probably refer to procedure, not subject-matter.] They also referred to

Anon., 1 Vern. 104;
Order in Chancery of 9th May 1839, 1 Beav. ix.;
United States of America v. Prioleau. (a)

Millar, Q.C., on behalf of the plaintiffs, offered to let the French proceedings stand over till judgment in the English action had been obtained, on the defendants undertaking to enter judgment in France according to the result of the English action; but the defendants' counsel stated that they had no authority to consent.

(a) In this case, which is not reported, Wood, V.C., on the 24th July 1867, made an order (on motion by some of the defendants), which appears in the Entry Book of Decrees and Orders, 1867, B. fo. 1966, as follows:

Upon motion this day made unto this court by counsel for the defendants, Charles Kuhn Prioleau, Theodore Dehon Wagner, James Thomas Welsman, and William Lee Trenholm, who alleged that the plaintiffs, having exhibited their bill against the defendants, the defendants (above named) put in their answers thereto, and yet the plaintiffs prosecute the said defendants in the Equity Circuit Court of the United States of America for the district of South Carolina, for one and the same matters, whereby the said defendants are doubly vexed, it is ordered that the plaintiffs, their solicitors and agents having notice hereof, do within eight days after such notice make their election in which court they will proceed, whereupon such further order shall be made as shall be just.

An ex parte order to elect had been moved for, but refused. A similar order to that above was made by Wood, V.C. on the 9th Nov. 1867 in United States of America v. Wagner. The plaintiff did not elect, and on the 3rd Dec. an ex parte motion was made for an order calling on the plaintiffs to comply with the order to elect, or that in default the bill might be dismissed. Wood, V.C., however, declined to make the order except on notice to the plaintiffs. On the 4th Dec. the plaintiffs served notices of motion to discharge both the orders; but the motions stood over, both actions were compromised, and no argument or decision took place.

Millar, Q.C. and H. B. Buckley, for the plaintiffs, were not called upon.

Jessel, M. R.—It is very important in these cases that the court should, in stopping an action, clearly see that it does not do injustice. Of course a man brings an action at the peril of having to pay the costs if the action does not succeed; and, as a general rule, that is sufficient to protect defendants from ill-founded actions. There is another protection, which is, that where the action is vexatious it may be stayed. Now, it may be vexatious on many grounds. It may be so utterly absurd that the court can see it cannot possibly succeed, but is brought only for annoyance; and then there is jurisdiction to stay the action. That is pure vexation. Or it may be vexatious in this way: the plaintiff, not intending to annoy or harass the defendant, but thinking he will get some fanciful advantage, sues him at the same time in two courts within the same jurisdiction—in two of the Queen's courts. That is vexatious, because, whatever the intention of the plaintiff may be, he cannot get any benefit in that way, and the defendant is harassed by two suits. Now, similar, although not perhaps the same, considerations apply in a case where the actions are brought, one in a foreign country and one in this country. I have recently had to consider the general rule in McHenry v. Lewis, and I went so fully into it there that I do not think it is necessary for me to discuss it further. It may be put shortly, as regards this case, in this way: It is not vexatious to bring an action in each country where there are substantial reasons of benefit to the plaintiff. He has the right to bring an action, and if there are substantial reasons to induce him to bring the two actions, why should we deprive him of that right? Seeking to obtain a substantial advantage is not vexatious. It is very unpleasant no doubt to be sued twice, and it is unpleasant to many people to be sued once; but still that does not make it vexatious, in a legal sense, where the plaintiff seeks to get a real substantial advantage. You cannot accuse him of vexation because he endeavours to obtain an advantage. As I put it in McHenry v. Lewis, and as I put it now, suppose in the one action a plaintiff could get execution against defendants residing and having large property in France, but not resident or having any property in England, that might be a good reason for suing them in France, and that might seem a reason for doing so when the action here was so advanced that the plaintiffs saw their way to a verdict here. The plaintiff says, "I shall get a verdict and judgment, but that will not avail me unless I can get execution. I can use the verdict and judgment in my French action; now I am here I will go on with my English action, and I will use the verdict in the French action with the view of getting judgment and execution." All that seems to be not unreasonable, and certainly not vexatious. That, I think, is one ground for declining to interfere.

But there is another ground. The plaintiffs say: "Our action in France does not relate to the same number of ships as the action in England does." Mr. Joyce said that this was a device to enable the plaintiffs to escape the rule; but, if it does enable them to escape it, it is a very good device. Take this case: The plaintiff has a right to six cargoes under the same title. The defendant has a place of business in England, and a place of business in France. The plaintiff brings an action for three cargoes in England, and three in France. Why may he not do so? He may think he may get sufficient to satisfy a judgment in England for three cargoes, but not for six. You could not stop the action in either country on the ground that the six cargoes were sued for under the same title. He, in fact, brings two actions for two different subject-matters. Does it make any difference that the action is for six in one country and one in the other? It appears to me that it cannot be so. He has a right to sue in each country for a different subject-matter. That brings me to the substance of the case. Supposing the plaintiffs specially elected, that is, elected to go on with the French action for six cargoes, and in England for one, which is what is suggested on the part of the defendant they might do, what good would that be to anybody? The two actions would still go on, and the only consequence suggested is, that a witness or two less would possibly—not necessarily—be required, in carrying on the litigation. That is not a ground for putting a man to his election. I asked whether any precedent could be found for putting a man to his election, simply because he might have to call a witness or two less in one of the two actions; and I need not say that such precedent could be produced. All the election rules proceed on the doctrine that you can put a final stop to at least one action, and this appears to be quite a novel attempt—and an attempt which is not founded in reason, or in sufficient reason—to stop one action on the ground that you can have a little less evidence in the other action, or try it in a less expensive mode. It seems to me that this, also, is a reason for our not interfering; and again the fact that there is no precedent for such an interference, is also a reason for this court not interfering. I think that if a precedent could have been found for an election, not between two actions, but between so much of the subject-matter of one action as is embraced in another, it would have been discovered a long time ago. The absence of precedent is not immaterial; and, considering the danger of depriving men of the opportunity of asserting rights which they are asserting bonâ fide, unless it is clear that the assertion of them is vexatious, I think we ought to be slow to extend the doctrine beyond the case to which our attention has been called. For these reasons I think the appeal should be dismissed with costs.

Lindley, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The principles by which the court ought to be guided on applications of this nature were fully examined and discussed in the case of McHenry v. Lewis, which came before the Court of Appeal just before Christmas. I have had an opportunity of reading the judgments in that case as reported in the Law Times—The case is not yet in the Law Reports—and it appears to me to be a most valuable decision. As I understand it, it comes to this—that where the plaintiff is suing in this country and abroad in respect of the same matter, and a motion is made to compel the plaintiff to elect, it is not sufficient for the person so moving to point out that two proceedings are being taken with reference to the same matter; but he must go a step further and show that there is vexation in point of fact; that is to say, that there is no necessity for harassing the defendant by double litigation. And I think the court ought to be very cautious before it interferes in cases of that kind, and for this reason: the court here is not, and cannot be, alive to all the advantages which a person may have in suing in the foreign court. It does not know with accuracy, unless the matter is called to its attention, what reasons there may be for preferring one court to another. If in any case it is established that there is nothing except vexatious litigation, there is ample jurisdiction in this court to make the order asked; but we ought to take care what we are about, and I am bound to say that in this case I do not see my way at all to make such an order as is asked. In other words, I do not see that there is such vexation in this case as to justify our interference. Apart from the fact that the action in France is for six cargoes, whereas the action here is for seven (a circumstance to which I will allude presently), I can see, after Mr. Millar's explanation, that there are certainly reasons—not vexatious reasons, not trumpery reasons, not harassing reasons—for bringing that action in France. The fact that the action in France is for six cargoes, and that the action here is for seven, satisfies me that it would be wrong to stop that action, because both actions must go on together, unless we see our way to stop one action altogether. I do not see how we are to do that. If we were to interfere in the way it is suggested that we ought to interfere, we should not accomplish what ought to be the result of interference, that is to say, stopping one action out of two; both actions would still go on. I think the appeal ought to be dismissed with costs.

Bowen, L.J.—I am of the same opinion; I think the law is clear enough. The difficulties which arise are the difficulties of administering or applying that law. When a plaintiff comes into an English court he asks for justice, and the court is bound not to refuse him justice; the court is bound, therefore, not to refuse to hear his case, and not to put him under difficulties in the way of having the action brought to a conclusion. Of course, that rule does not mean that a plaintiff, under the pretence of asking for justice, is to do that which is oppressive and vexatious; and the courts have always at law—with which I am more familar—and no doubt in equity also, interfered to prevent a plaintiff, under the colour of asking for justice, doing injustice for the sake of harassing others. Therefore, when what the plaintiff has been asking for has been frivolous, or sometimes when he has asked for it in a way which necessarily involves injustice, the courts have interfered. It seems to me that the principle upon which a plaintiff is put to his election, when it is suggested that a double action is being pursued, is a branch of the general law. The reason for putting him to his election and compelling him to decide whether he will go on with one action or the other is, that the prosecution of either one or the other appears to the court to be necessarily attended with injustice—that although one of the actions is right, two of them necessarily must be wroug. It is really a branch of the general law.

How are we to apply that doctrine to foreign courts? It seems to me we have no sort of right, moral or legal, to take away from a plaintiff any real chance he may have of an advantage. If there is a fair possibility that he may have an advantage, and a just advantage, by prosecuting a suit in two countries, why should this court interfere and deprive him of it? I think this case has illustrated, during its progress, the necessity of being very careful in exercising, on behalf of the court, this sort of prerogative power of interfering with actions. It turned out in the course of the argument that the French suit had this advantage, that the plaintiffs could, or thought they could, get execution more easily—and, as far as I know, they can get execution more successfully, and with more completeness—against the defendants than if they rested only on the English action. The defendants are so conscious, although they are applying to us to stay this action and to put the plaintiffs to their election, that there is something in that, that they cannot undertake (without referring to their clients abroad) to cure the blot, and put the procedure here on exactly the same footing with regard to the remedy as the procedure in France. That seems to me to illustrate exactly what was said by the court in the case of McHenry v. Lewis, and what I think ought always to be in the minds of the court in interfering with these actions. Persons who sue in different countries very often have reasons for doing so, which are not easily explained. There may be many reasons why a French action at the same time as an English action may not be vexatious or unreasonable. One obvious reason has been pointed out to us, and that is the facility of execution in the French action. I am myself very much impressed by the fact that, although we have had two cases within the last two months on this point, neither in the one case nor in the other have we had anything like a precedent shown us, or anything which approaches a light or easy interference on the part of the court in this country, to prevent double litigation, where the double litigation has no other element of oppression than this, that an action is going on simultaneously abroad.

Collision—Practice—Counter-claim—Reference — Costs.

In cases of collision, where both vessels are held to blame, and the amount of damage is referred to the registrar, and less than one-fourth is struck off the respective claim and counter-claim of the plaintiffs and the defendants, the costs of substantiating the plaintiff's claim at the reference will be borne by the defendants, and the costs of substantiating the defendants' counter-claim at the reference by the plaintiffs.

(a) Reported by J. P. Aspinall, and F. W. Raikes, Esqrs. Barristers-at-Law.

THIS was a motion by the defendants, in an action in rem for damage by collision, for an order that the plaintiffs should pay the defendants' costs of the reference to the registrar in respect of the counter-claim, together with the costs of the motion.

The action was brought by the owners of the steamship Violet against the steamship Mary to recover damages in respect of a collision between the two vessels. The defendants counter-claimed in respect of the damage occasioned in the collision to their steamship, the Mary.

On the 3rd May 1881 the action was tried, and both ships were held to blame, the defendants being condemned in half of the plaintiffs' claim and the plaintiff in half of the defendants' counter-claim. A reference was ordered to the registrar and merchants to assess the amount of the damages. The plaintiffs' claim amounted to 944*l.* 15*s.* 9*d.*, the defendants' claim amounted to 5711*l.* 14*s.*, and on the 14th April 1882 the registrar assessed the cost of the damage occasioned to the Violet by the collision at 775*l.*13*s.*3*d.* and the cost of the damage occasioned to the Mary by the collision at 4672*l.* 8*s.* 5*d.*, but made no recommendation as to the costs of the reference.

The defendants in the action now moved the judge to order the defendants' costs of the reference in respect of the counter-claim together with the costs of the motion to be paid by the plaintiffs.

Bucknill, on behalf of the defendants, in support of the motion.—In accordance with the rulings in The Consett (4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 230; 42 L. T. Rep. N. S. 33; 5 P. Div. 77) and in The Savernake (5 P. Div. 166), (a) this motion should be granted. The Consett decided that the costs of the reference as to damages in damage actions do not follow the costs of the action, but are in the discretion of the judge as the costs of a fresh litigation. It has been the practice of this court, where less than one-fourth of the claim or counter-claim has been struck off, that the parties bringing in the claim and counter-claim respectively should have their costs incidental to the reference. As the defendants are ready to pay the costs of the plaintiffs in respect of the reference, the plaintiffs should be ordered to pay the defendants' costs.

W. G. F. Phillimore, on behalf of the plaintiffs, against the motion.—The Consett is distinguishable from the present case because there the registrar (see 5 P. Div. 229) (b) disallowed

THE SAVERNAKE.

THIS was a damage action, instituted by the owners of the steamship Vesuvius against the steamship Savernake. The defendants counter-claimed in respect of damage sustained by the Savernake in the same collision.

The action was tried on the 24th July 1876, and both vessels being held to blame, the owners of both vessels were ordered to pay half the costs of the damages sustained by the other, and a reference was ordered to the registrar to assess the amount of the damage.

In May 1877 all proceedings in the action in the Admiralty Division were stayed until the decision in a limitation of liability action commenced in Nov. 1876, in the Chancery Division by the owners of the Savernake.

June 25.—Judgment was given in this latter action in favour of the owners of the Savernake, and by an order of the 19th July 1877 it was declared that the owners of the Vesuvius were entitled to prove for half their loss and damage minus half the loss and damage sustained by the owners of the Savernake. The same order directed that inquiries as to the distribution of the fund paid in court, viz., 5212*l.* 3*s.* 5*d.*, being 8*l.* per ton of the Savernake plus interest, should stand over until the registrar of the Admiralty Division had assessed the amount of the damages sustained by the owners of the Vesuvius.

On the 22nd March 1879, the Court of Appeal reversed that portion of the above order which related to what the owners of the Vesuvius were entitled to prove for, and held that the owners of the Vesuvius were entitled to prove against the fund in court for one-half of the loss or damage sustained by the Vesuvius, directing that such amount should be found by the Admiralty registrar.

July 22, 1879.—The owners of the Savernake brought in their counter-claim for 957*l.* 6*s.*, and on the 10th Nov. 1879, no tender having been made by the owners of the Vesuvius, the registrar issued his report, finding the sum of 848*l.* 13*s.* with interest due to the owners of the Savernake, but made no recommendation as to how the costs of the reference should be borne.

April 13, 1880.—The owners of the Savernake moved to condemn the owners of the Vesuvius in the costs of the reference.

Myburgh in support of the motion.—The costs of the reference are within the discretion of the court. No tender has been made by the owners of the Vesuvius, and the amount of the counter-claim has been but slightly reduced by the registrar: (The Consett, 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 230; 42 L. T. Rep. N. S. 33; L. Rep. 5 P. D. 77.)

THE CONSETT.

THIS was an appeal by the plaintiffs in a damage action from a portion of the registrar's report as to the loss sustained by the defendants by reason of a collision between the steamship Consett and the ship Jessore.

Jan. 25, 1878.—The action was heard, and the court found both vessels to blame and ordered a reference to the registrar and merchants to assess the amount of damages respectively sustained by both vessels. The registrar assessed the moiety of the loss sustained by the defendants at 1493*l.* 4*s.* The two last items numbered 22 and 23 in the defendants' claim, were in respect of consequential loss sustained by the Consett by the cancellation of a charter-party, which was necessitated by the above-mentioned collision, and these items the report had allowed. Upon this portion of the report, the plaintiffs now appealed. (The first twenty-one items of damage named and allowed in the report were in respect of the actual damage sustained by reason of the collision.)

June 7.—The petition on objection was heard.

Butt, Q.C. and Myburgh for the plaintiffs.

Cohen Q.C. and Phillimore for the defendants.

Sir ROBERT PHILLIMORE.—This is an appeal from the registrar assisted by merchants. The whole history of the case is very clearly set forth in the report. The appeal is not made upon the report generally, but only on one portion of it; and the question before me is, whether the loss of a beneficial charter is to be considered in estimating the damages which the counter-claimants sustained in the case. The collision took place on Oct. 10, 1877, and the Jessore sank. The Consett, at the time of the collision was under charter-party, whereby she was to proceed in ballast to Montreal to load a cargo of grain, and the freight was to be at the rate of 8*s.* 9*d.* per quarter, if the ship had to call for orders on the homeward voyage at either Queenstown, Falmouth, or Plymouth; and at a rate of 8*s.* 3*d.* per quarter if ordered direct from her port of loading to her port of discharge. The vessel left Antwerp on Oct. 8, between three and four o'clock in the morning, and came nearly half the defendants' claim. And it is further submitted that in The Consett the court expressly refrained from laying down any general rule as to the costs of references to the registrar. The question how the costs of the reference are to be borne, where the plaintiffs and defendants have had more than three-fourths of their respective claims allowed, is not controlled by any reported decision. The plaintiffs ought not to be condemned in the costs of this motion.

Sir ROBERT PHILLIMORE.—In this case I must follow the decision of the Court of Appeal in the case of The Consett, and applying the principle laid down in that decision, I think that the portion of the motion which asks for payment of the costs of the reference, so far as regards the counter-claim, is a proper application, and that it ought to be granted. With respect to the remainder of the motion, I think in the circumstances that the plaintiffs and defendants should each bear their own costs on this application before me to-day. There will, therefore, be no order as to the costs of the motion.

W. G. F. Phillimore.—It is presumed that the costs of the reference, so far as regards the claim of the plaintiffs, will be borne by the defendants. They admit that they are willing to pay such costs.

Sir ROBERT PHILLIMORE.—Yes; the plaintiffs ought to have the costs of substantiating their claim.

THE FAMENOTH. (a)

APPEAL UNDER THE SHIPPING CASUALTIES ACT 1879.

Board of Trade inquiry—Certificate of master—Merchant Shipping Act 1854, s. 242—Appeal—Evidence—Costs.

An error of judgment committed by a master of a ship, under circumstances of great difficulty and danger, is not such a wrongful act or default, within the meaning of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, s. 242, as will justify the suspension of his certificate, even where there has been loss of life.

An application for leave to adduce further evidence on appeal from the Wreck Commissioner should be made prior to the hearing of the appeal.

Costs of an appeal will be given against the Board of Trade if the decision of the appellate court is against the Board of Trade, and also costs of further evidence produced by the party proceeded against, if such evidence is produced merely to confirm the evidence given at the hearing below.

THIS was an appeal from a decision of the Wreck Commissioner by which he had, on the 28th April 1882, found William Cowan Auld, the master of the Famenoth, in default for loss of life occasioned by his not sending assistance to his boat's crew, under the circumstances hereinafter stated, and suspended his certificate for three months.

An inquiry was held at Westminster, on the into collision with the Jessore; on the 11th she came to Queenstown, where she remained. Great hopes were entertained that she would be able to proceed on her voyage in the middle of October, but, as the repairs were going on, it was found that she could not be got ready until the end of a fortnight, and that she would not be able to proceed before Nov. 1. It was calculated that she would not be able to arrive at Montreal and be able to take a fresh cargo before Nov. 25. And it appears from the evidence before the registrar, which it is not necessary to go into at length, as it has been fully discussed by counsel on both sides, that owing to the ice in the St. Lawrence, the usual time in the autumn up to which ships can leave Montreal is Nov. 25, but that there is a risk that ships leaving even on that date will be stopped by the ice. The owners of the Consett found themselves, they contend, in this position, that they were obliged to give up and abandon the charter. It was admitted that it was a profitable charter to them. It is not disputed by the appellants in this case, that demurrage or damages for detention might be awarded for the whole time the repairs were being done; but it has been said that the loss of a beneficial charter in this case is not a claim that can be dealt with under the head of damages; and it has been very fairly admitted that if the damage claimed under this head, or a legitimate portion of such damages, can be recovered, then the figures mentioned in the report are correct. The questions then arise, was it reasonably possible for the Consett to have performed her outward voyage under the charter? and if it was reasonably possible for her to have performed such voyage, had she any right to abandon her charter and oblige the appellants to pay the loss sustained? It is not contended that, if it was reasonably possible for her to have performed her charter, the damage for the loss of the charter could rightly be claimed. Now, the registrar and merchants have come to the conclusion that the risk of the Consett being unable to reach Montreal so as to sail on her homeward voyage before the St. Lawrence had been rendered unnavigable by ice, was such as it was not prudent to incur, and that the profit of a beneficial charter-party being lost was damage for which the appellants were liable. It is really a question of evidence whether it has been on the whole established that it was reasonably possible for the Consett to have performed the charter. I am of opinion that the evidence has established that it was not reasonably possible for her to do so; and if this proposition is established, the consequence must follow that the loss which the defendants have sustained by reason of the loss of a beneficial charter in this case must be included in the category of damages. I must therefore confirm the report and dismiss the appeal with costs.

June 17.—The defendants now moved the court to condemn the owners of the Jessore in the costs of and incident to substantiating the defendants' counter-claim before the registrar. The defendants claimed 2523*l.* 8*s.* 9*d.*; the registrar allowed 1493*l.* 4*s.*

W. G. F. Phillimore, for the defendants, in support of the motion.—The ordinary rule, condemning claimants in costs who have had a third of their claim struck off, does not apply to this case. The point of law raised before the registrar and on appeal was in both cases decided in favour of the defendants.

Myburgh for the plaintiffs.—The fact that a legal question has been decided against the plaintiffs at the reference does not oust the ordinary rule as to costs, where the registrar has disallowed nearly one-half of the defendants' claim: (The Empress Eugene, Lush. 138.)

Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—I am of opinion that the proper order to make in this case is, that the defendants, the owners of the Consett, shall have the cost of proving those items of their claim which are marked 1 to 21 (in the respect of the actual damage) in the schedule appended to the report of the registrar, and that each party shall pay a moiety of the reference fees. As to the residue of the costs of the reference and the costs in the action, each party must bear the share of such costs incurred by him. I make this decision in the peculiar circumstances of the cases.

27th and 28th April 1882, before H. C. Rothery, Esq., Wreck Commissioner, assisted by nautical assessors, into the circumstances attending the stranding of the sailing ship Famenoth, of Aberdeen, on the Pan Sand, off Whitstable, on the 27th March 1882, when five lives were lost. The facts of the case were, that the Famenoth left London on the 26th March, with passengers on board, bound for Otago, in tow of the steam-tug Benachie, and in charge of a duly licensed Trinity House pilot. On the 27th March, the wind blowing with great violence from the N.N.W., the Famenoth was driven on to the Pan Sand, off Whitstable, and remained there hard and fast aground. The master of the Famenoth, considering his position one of great peril, proceeded to transfer the passengers on board to the tug Benachie. The gig of the Famenoth, having transferred one boat's load to the Benachie, then went adrift, and notwithstanding the efforts of her crew, she was carried away by the force of the wind and sea, and the five hands in her were lost. At this time there were two tugs in attendance on the Famenoth, and a third was fast coming up; but no assistance was rendered to the gig, though an attempt to do so was made by the Benachie.

The report furnished by the Wreck Commissioner to the Board of Trade was as follows:

REPORT OF COURT.

The court, having carefully inquired into the circumstances of the above-mentioned shipping casualty, finds, for the reasons annexed, that the stranding of the said ship was due to her having been kept on a S.S.E. course for too long a time, instead of being laid on an E.S.E. course immediately after passing the West Girdler Buoy, heading for the Prince's Channel, and that the blame for the vessel having gone ashore rests with Edward John Taylor, the pilot who was in charge of her at the time, but was subsequently drowned.

The court is further of opinion that William Cowan Auld, the master of the Famenoth, is to blame for having kept the three steam-tugs, the Benachie, Daring, and Victoria in attendance on the vessel, instead of sending one of them off to the assistance of the five men who had gone adrift in the Famenoth's boat, the vessel herself being in no immediate danger, whereas the five men were in imminent risk of losing their lives.

For this wrongful act and default the court suspends the certificate of the said William Cowan Auld for three months.

The court is not asked to make any order as to costs.

Dated this 28th day of April 1882.

(Signed) H. C. ROTHERY, Wreck Commissioner.

We concur in the above report.

(Signed) BENJN. S. PICKARD, GEO. WM. WARD, R. WILSON, } Assessors.

With reference to the fourteenth question asked by the Board of Trade, viz.: "Whether, after the gig left the Benachie, the master of the Famenoth did or omitted any act the doing or omission of which conduced to the loss of the gig and those in her?" the Wreck Commissioner, in the annex appended to the report, after fully discussing the circumstances attending the loss of the gig, spoke as follows:

The whole responsibility, in our opinion, for the loss of the lives of these five men rests with the master of the Famenoth. He had two steamers, the Benachie and the Daring, alongside of him, and the Victoria was fast coming up; all the female passengers and children had been transferred to the Benachie and the Daring; his vessel was in no immediate danger; whereas he must have known, if he had thought of it, that the occupants of the boat would be in very great danger. As soon, therefore, as the Benachie had got back to him, he ought to have sent her to pick up the boat before it could reach the sands, over which it was no doubt driven, and where these unfortunate men in all probability perished; and for not having done so we think he is very greatly to blame.

I think that I have now answered all the questions which we have been asked, though not exactly in the order in which they have been put to us; and the last point which we have to decide is whether we are to accede to the application of the learned counsel for the Board of Trade that we should deal with this master's certificate. The master stated that it had never occurred to him to send the steam-tug after them, but in the opinion of the assessors it ought to have occurred to him. This is not a mere error of judgment; it is an act of negligence which has resulted in the loss of five valuable lives; and under these circumstances the assessors think that they would not be doing their duty unless they marked their sense of the master's conduct by suspending his certificate, and notwithstanding the very high character which we are told his owners are prepared to give him, and the time during which he is said to have been in their service, we think that we cannot do less than suspend his certificate for three months from this day. The court was not asked to make any order as to costs.

From this decision the master of the Famenoth appealed on the ground that the judgment of the Wreck Commissioner was wrong in finding that he had been guilty of negligence in not ordering the Benachie to follow the gig of the Famenoth and in suspending his certificate, because the evidence before the court did not justify the finding of any wrongful act or default on his part.

May 8.—Dr. Phillimore, on behalf of the master, moved the court (composed of Sir J. Hannen and Sir Robert J. Phillimore) for leave to produce further evidence on the hearing of the appeal.—As it was not until the actual hearing of the case that the appellant first became aware that the Board of Trade made charges against him in respect of his conduct, after the Famenoth had taken the ground, the appellant had failed to bring certain evidence on that point. He now desires to adduce the evidence of two passengers on board the Famenoth to justify his conduct in relation to the loss of the gig.

Israel Davis, on behalf of the Board of Trade, contra.

THE PRESIDENT (Sir J. Hannen).—We have decided to give the appellant leave to produce, on the hearing of the appeal, the further evidence which he has asked to be allowed to bring before us, but it must be understood that it will be a question for consideration hereafter how the costs should be borne. We think that it is right that the application for leave to give further evidence should have been made now rather than at the hearing of the appeal.

May 15.—The appeal now came on for hearing before the court (the President and Sir Robert Phillimore, assisted by Trinity Masters).

The Admiralty Advocate (Dr. Deane, Q.C.) and Dr. W. G. F. Phillimore appeared for the appellant.

Israel Davis appeared for the Board of Trade.

In accordance with the permission of the court as to the production of fresh evidence on behalf of the master, two passengers on board the Famenoth, who had been standing by the master when the boat drifted away, gave evidence confirming the truth of the statement of the master as to a conversation between him and the master of one of the tugs. The judgment contains, so far as is material, the fresh evidence and the result of the evidence given below.

The PRESIDENT (Sir James Hannen). — This is an appeal from a decision of the Wreck Commissioner, by which he found W. Cowan Auld, the master of the Famenoth, to blame for keeping three steam-tugs in attendance on his vessel, instead of sending one of them to the assistance of five men who had gone adrift in the Famenoth's boat, "the vessel herself being in no immediate danger, whereas the five men were in imminent risk of losing their lives." The master's certificate was suspended for three months. The Famenoth, of the port of Aberdeen, was on the 27th March last being towed down the river from the Nore by a tug called the Benachie. She had a crew of twenty-four hands, all told, and more than twenty passengers on board. She was in charge of a duly licensed Trinity pilot named Taylor. A violent gale from the north-west having come on, the Famenoth was driven broadside on the Pan Sand. The blame for this has been found to rest with the pilot, who was afterwards drowned. What occurred after the vessel struck is clearly stated in the Wreck Commissioner's report in the following passage: "As soon as it was seen that the vessel was hard and fast, the captain of the Famenoth began to take measures to provide for the safety of his passengers, and with this view orders were given to get out the starboard lifeboat, but before this could be done a sea struck her and stove her in, upon which orders were given to get out the gig, which was done, and the second and third mates, one able and one ordinary seaman, having got in, some six or seven of the female passengers and children were put into her. Taylor, the pilot, also got into her, but apparently without any orders from the captain. The boat then pushed off, and having got alongside the Benachie, which was lying off at a short distance to leeward, a rope was thrown to her, and all the passengers were then transferred to the Benachie. The master of the Benachie then hailed the men in the boat to take a turn round one of the thwarts of the boat, saying that he would tow them back to the ship; and shortly afterwards, thinking that the boat was fast, the master of the Benachie gave orders to go ahead. Unfortunately, however, the rope in some way or other slipped, and the boat went adrift, and she began to drift towards the sand; on seeing which the master of the Benachie at once backed astern until he was in ten feet of water, when, fearing to get his vessel aground, he put her ahead again; but the boat herself, notwithstanding the efforts of her crew to pull her to windward so as to regain the ship, was carried by the force of the wind and sea over the sand, and when last seen they were on the other side of the sand, but were still pulling to windward. The Benachie then returned to the Famenoth, but in the meantime another steam-tug, called the Daring, had come up, and the remainder of the female passengers having been put into the damaged lifeboat, they were sent off and taken on board the Daring. When, however, the Benachie came alongside, the captain of the Famenoth told the master of the Benachie to pass his tow rope on board, and a third tug, the Victoria, having come up, all three passed their tow ropes to the Famenoth, and began to tow. Up to this time the vessel was making no water, but they had hardly been towing for more than five minutes, when it was reported that she was filling fast, upon which the captain ordered them to cease, and the tow rope was slipped. The Benachie was then ordered to come alongside to take off the remainder of the passengers and crew. This she succeeded in doing, but not without considerable difficulty, at the same time smashing her sponson; and between one and two o'clock all hands had left the Famenoth and gone on board the Benachie."

On these facts eighteen questions were put by the Board of Trade. The only one which it is necessary to consider is the fourteenth: "Whether, after the gig left the Benachie, the master of the Famenoth did or omitted any act, the doing or omission of which conduced to the loss of the gig or those in her?" On this point the Wreck Commissioner's judgment is as follows: "But then the question arises, ought not some effort to have been made to follow the boat and pick her up? When the Benachie ceased following the boat over the sand she returned to the Famenoth; but in the meantime the Daring had come up, and the master of the Famenoth then desired them to pass their tow ropes on board, which they did, as did also the steam-tug Victoria, which came up shortly afterwards, and all these steam-tugs then began to tow the vessel, but had to leave off a few minutes afterwards owing to the Famenoth filling with water. During all this time the boat was, no doubt, being driven before the gale, notwithstanding all the efforts of her crew to keep her to windward. Now it certainly does appear to us that either the Benachie or one of the other steamers should have been sent round the sand to look after the boat and pick her up; for at this time all the female passengers and children had been safely transferred, part of them to the Benachie, part to the Daring; the Famenoth had two steam-tugs in attendance upon her, and a third was fast coming up, and the vessel herself was in no immediate danger. With the wind and tide as they then were, one of these steam-tugs could have run round to the south of the Pan Sand in a few minutes, and without any risk to herself or to those on board her; and had she been sent off at once, she would, in all probability, have picked up the boat long before it had reached the sands, and have rescued the men in her; and to us it is inconceivable why this was not done." The decision of the Wreck Commissioner rests upon these two propositions, that the master of the Famenoth kept the tugs in attendance instead of sending one of them after the boat, and that his vessel was in no immediate danger.

It appears from the evidence that when the boat was seen to be adrift, the master of the Famenoth signalled to the master of the Benachie to go after her, which he did; but before he could reach the boat the tug herself touched the ground. The boat continued to drive through the breakers over the sand into the open water beyond. The Benachie, finding that she could not follow the gig, returned towards the Famenoth to pick up another boat load of passengers, who were being embarked in the damaged lifeboat of the Famenoth; but as another tug, the Daring, had just arrived, it became unnecessary for the Benachie to take any passengers on board. The captain of the Famenoth, who had been engaged in getting the rest of the women and children into the lifeboat, while the Benachie was going after the gig, upon the tug returning, asked the captain why he had not gone to the gig? and he stated that he had gone as far as the draught of water would allow him, and this was the fact. This evidence of the captain, given before the questions affecting him were put by the Board of Trade, is confirmed by two witnesses who have been called before us. They say that the master of the Famenoth said, "Can't you do anything more for that boat?" The answer was that he could not go any farther after her. It has been observed of these witnesses that they fix the time of this incident later by the clock than the return of the Benachie from following the gig, but one of them expressly says that it was at that time, and we have no doubt that this is correct. In any case it confirms the inference we draw from the evidence of the captain of the Benachie that he was not prevented from going round the sand by the orders of the master of the Famenoth, but that it did not occur to him that it might be of use. Up to this point, therefore, no blame attaches either to the captain of the Benachie or of the Famenoth. But it is said that the captain of the Famenoth ought, at once, to have sent the Benachie round the sand, and that instead of doing so, he detained the tug to attend on him, and the Wreck Commissioner finds that no blame attaches to the captain of the tug, because he was bound to obey the orders from the Famenoth. But the captain of the tug does not excuse himself on this ground. He was asked, "Finding that the boat had driven across the sands, ought you not to have run down the channel by the North Tongue or round the sand a little farther to meet this boat driving down the channel and picked her up? A. Yes, it might have been done.—Q. If you had gone round you would have caught the gig before she would have been driven on to the Margate Sands, would you not? A. I do not say that.—Q. Did it not occur to you that it was a proper thing to do? A. No, or I should certainly have done it." The mode of getting round the sand by the channel by the North Tongue, suggested in this question, would have been useless, if adopted, for it would have taken the tug a course of many miles to get round. But it has, with more reason, been argued that the tug might have gone round by the western end of the Pan Sand. This, we are informed by our assessors, would have taken the tug a course of about three miles to bring her to the tail of the sand on the track of the gig. But whatever course it would have been possible to take, the answer of the tug master is distinct, that, if it had occurred to him that it was the proper thing to go round the sand, he would certainly have done so. This clearly shows that he did not feel restrained by any orders of the Famenoth from going after the gig. But, in fact, it did not occur to him to suggest to the master of the Famenoth that he could, by going round the sand, have a chance of overtaking the gig.

The question then arises whether there was culpable negligence on the part of the master of the Famenoth in not ordering the Benachie to go round the sand. It was clear that when his immediate anxiety as to the gig was relieved by seeing her on the other side of the sand, he turned his attention to saving the rest of the women and children. It does not appear, and there is no reason to suppose, that he had any special knowledge of the sands and the channels around them. He had lost the pilot, who was in the gig; and the deep sea pilot, who was on board did not suggest that the tug could go round the sand, and, as we have seen, the master of the Benachie did not suggest it. It is true, that by looking at the chart, we can now see a course that might have been taken round the sand, but we think that it cannot be imputed to the captain as culpable negligence that he did not see at the time that such a course might have been followed with a chance of success. We are of opinion that the master of the Famenoth did not recklessly detain the tug, knowing that it could have usefully followed the gig, but that not knowing that she could do so, he employed her with the two other tugs, in an endeavour to get his vessel off the sand. It is not disputed that this was a proper course for him to take, apart from the question of the propriety of his conduct with reference to the gig. It is unnecessary to refer more in detail to the non-employment of the Daring and the Victoria to look for the gig. If any one of the three tugs ought to have been sent, it would have been best to send the Benachie, as the masters of the other tugs did not know that the gig had gone adrift. But further, we are of opinion that the Famenoth was, and all on board her were, in immediate danger. That the captain of the Famenoth thought so is shown by his transferring the passengers into the tugs; but it is proved that it was blowing a hurricane at the time, and the vessel was being fast embedded in the sand. We are advised, and without such advice we should have thought it manifest, that the Famenoth and all on board her were in great and imminent peril, and, in fact, within a few minutes after the tugs began to tow the Famenoth was found to be filling fast. In such circumstances no one could predict what would happen to her. The fact that the Famenoth was afterwards got off, can make no difference in our consideration of the position in which her captain was at the time. He could have no assurance that the vessel and all on board her would not be lost, if he had not availed himself of the help of the tugs which he had at hand. We ought to add that our assessors are of the opinion, in which we concur, that in the circumstances the utmost that can be said against the behaviour of the captain of the Famenoth is that it manifested an error of judgment at a moment of great difficulty and danger, but that it did not amount to any act of culpable negligence. We, therefore, think that the judgment was erroneous and must be reversed.

Dr. Deane, Q.C.—As the costs of the appeal are in the discretion of the court and the appellant has been found guilty of no misconduct, it is submitted that the Board of Trade should bear such costs. The right of the appellant to costs is in accordance with the usual rule. In The Arizona (4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 269; 42 L. T. Rep. N. S. 405; L. Rep. 5 Prob. Div. 123; 49 L. J. 54, Prob.), where the court reversed the decision of the Wreck Commissioner suspending a master's certificate, the Board of Trade were ordered to pay the costs of the appeal.

Israel Davis.—The court has hitherto stated that which party should bear the costs incidental to the admission of fresh evidence on the hearing of the appeal, would be a question for consideration. This evidence was adduced by the appellant and the Board of Trade ought not to bear these costs.

The PRESIDENT.—Undoubtedly the court intimated at the time that, while admitting additional evidence, it would depend upon the effect of that evidence whether or not the costs would be given to either of the parties. That is to say, if the ultimate decision of the case had turned upon the additional evidence, then undoubtedly, it would have been a reason for not allowing the costs, although the appeal was successful; but in this case the additional evidence was only relied upon for the purpose of confirming the inference which we draw from the original evidence. The learned counsel for the Board of Trade has spoken of a direction, that the Board of Trade should pay the costs of the appeal, as being unfair to the court below, which had not the additional evidence before it. It must be remembered that it is a course which the law allows when, instead of a simple appeal, it permits a re-hearing, which is the case here; therefore, in no proper sense of the word, can it be said to be unfair. The object of all tribunals is to arrive at the truth and justice of the case before them, and that must be, in some cases attained by receiving additional evidence. We see no reason for saying that this evidence was kept back. The charge against the captain was only developed when all the evidence had been given. The two witnesses who have been called before us, are not shown to have been present at the hearing before the Wreck Commissioner; I do not think there was any suggestion that they were present. They were not seafaring people, but it turns out that they happened to be standing by the captain at the time when the boat drifted away, and they were able to confirm, by their evidence, the truth of the statement which the captain himself had made. We, therefore, think that there is no reason why the usual rule should be departed from in this case. It has been mentioned that we have not only in the case which immediately preceded this, The Golden Sea (47 L. T. Rep. N. S. 579; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 23; 7 P. Div. 194), but in other cases, given the Board of Trade the costs when it has succeeded; we must apply the same rule in favour of the appellant when the Board of Trade is unsuccessful.

THE HOCHUNG—THE LAPWING.

CHINA MERCHANTS' STEAM NAVIGATION COMPANY v. W. L. BIGNOLD, AND CROSS APPEAL. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM THE SUPREME COURT OF CHINA AND JAPAN.

Collision—Effect of infringement of regulations for preventing collision—Lights—Apportionment of damage—Merchant Shipping Act 1873 (36 & 37 Vict. c. 85), s. 17—Pleading—Variance—Secundum allegata et probata.

Where two vessels are damaged by collision, for which both are to blame, one for wrongful navigation, and the other for a breach of the regulations for preventing collision at sea, it not being shown that such breach could not possibly have contributed to the collision, the damages are to be divided between the parties, according to the Admiralty rule.

The rule that parties are only entitled to recover secundum allegata et probata is complied with in a cause of collision if one material allegation of negligence be proved, even if all others fail.

THESE were cross appeals from two decisions of the Supreme Court of China and Japan at Shanghai, sitting as a Vice-Admiralty Court (a)

(a) Reported by J. P. ASPINALL, and F. W. RAIKES, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

(a) The Vice-Admiralty jurisdiction of the Supreme Court for China and Japan was conferred upon it by the China and Japan Order in Council, dated March 9, 1865. This order was made under the provisions of the Act for the better government of Her Majesty's subjects resorting to China 1843 (6 & 7 Vict. c. 80) and of the Foreign Jurisdiction Act 1843 (6 & 7 Vict. c. 94). The above court exercises the jurisdiction of a Vice-Admiralty Court within China and Japan, and for vessels and persons coming to and within China and Japan. By a subsequent Order in Council, the China and Japan Order in Council, Aug. 14, 1878, which established in Japan a court styled Her Britannic Majesty's Court for Japan, the Vice-Admiralty jurisdiction possessed by the Supreme Court for China and Japan was extended to the Court for Japan. This last-mentioned Order in Council directs that any proceedings taken in China or Japan against one of Her Majesty's vessels, or the officer commanding the same as such, shall be taken only in the Supreme Court or in the Court for Japan, under their respective Vice-Admiralty jurisdiction.

On the subject of the jurisdiction, practice, and rules of Vice-Admiralty Courts, see vol. 1, pp. 477, 481, notes, where the Vice-Admiralty Courts then existing are set out.

A commission was issued on March 27, 1867, to the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty, empowering them to appoint a vice-admiral, judge, and other officers for a Court of Vice-Admiralty in the Straits Settlements, and accordingly a vice-admiral and a judge were appointed in the same year. Prior to this date Admiralty jurisdiction had been conferred by Letters Patent dated Feb. 25, 1837 (cf. 6 & 7 Will. 4, c. 53) upon the Court of Judicature at Prince of Wales Island, Singapore, and Malacca, now included in the Straits Settlements (cf. 29 & 30 Vict. c. 115), and on Nov. 19, 1823, a commission was issued under the Great Seal, authorising a Vice-Admiralty Court to be established at Prince of Wales Island, but apparently no appointment was ever made. Sect. 17 of the Vice-Admiralty Courts Act Amendment Act 1867 enacts that, "The Vice-Admiralty Court Act 1863 shall, together with this Act, apply to any Vice-Admiralty Court now established, or hereafter to be established in the Straits Settlements."

By an Order in Council, dated Jan. 9, 1863, Vice-Admiralty jurisdiction, excepting jurisdiction relating to prize or booty, was conferred upon the Supreme Consular Court for Constantinople; and by the same order the Provincial Consular Courts within the Ottoman Dominions were granted like jurisdiction within their respective districts. Dec. 4, 1875, a commission, empowering the Lords of the Admiralty to create a vice-admiral and a Vice-Admiralty Court for the Colony of Fiji was substituted for a prior commission of July 1, 1875, empowering the Lords of the Admiralty to appoint a vice-admiral and Vice-Admiralty Court for the "Fiji Islands." Under the latter commission a judge was appointed in 1876. Dec. 28, 1877, a commission was issued empowering the Lords of the Admiralty to appoint a Vice-Admiralty Court in the colony of the Leeward Islands in lieu of the several Vice-Admiralty Courts then existing in the islands of Antigua, Dominica, Montserrat, Nevis, Saint Christopher, and Tortola; and on Feb. 1, 1878, a commission was issued by the Admiralty dated the 28th July 1881, dismissing two cross petitions, filed respectively by the China Merchants' Steam Navigation Company and by Commander William Scott, in cross causes of damage. On the 21st July 1881 Commander Scott died, and on the following day an order was made substituting the first lieutenant of the Lapwing, Walter Bignold, in the commander's place, Bignold being duly authorised to be so substituted, and consenting. (a)

The cross causes of damage were brought in respect of a collision which took place between the Chinese Merchant Steamship Hochung and H.M. gun vessel Lapwing on the 17th April 1881 off Ocksen Island, in the Formosa Channel. The petition of the China Merchant Steam Navigation Company alleged (so far as is material) as follows:

4. About a quarter past 10 o'clock, p.m., of the 17th April 1881, the Hochung was about eleven or twelve miles E. by N. of Ocksen Island, steering N.E. ¼ E., magnetic, and with no sail set, was proceeding under steam at the rate of about nine knots an hour. The Hochung had all her regulation lights properly fixed and burning brightly, and a good look-out was kept on board of her.

5. In those circumstances a dark object was seen ahead on the starboard bow of the Hochung, and distant between one and two miles.

6. The said dark object was carefully examined and watched by the captain of the Hochung, who was in charge of the watch, and no light of any kind was visible.

7. In order to give a wider berth to the said dark object, the helm of the Hochung was put slightly to starboard.

8. A short time afterwards, the said dark object being then nearer, the masts and yards of a ship came into view, and smoke was also seen; but no lights being then visible, it was believed to be a steamer northward bound, and almost immediately afterwards, the masts appearing to open out very rapidly, a red light suddenly came into view, whereupon the helm of the Hochung was put hard-a-starboard, and the whistle was blown twice: but the steamer, which afterwards proved to be Her Brittanic Majesty's gun vessel Lapwing, came rapidly on towards the Hochung, and her stem having passed the Hochung's foremast, and a collision being imminent, the helm of the Hochung was put hard-a-port, as a last chance of avoiding the collision or easing the blow: but the Lapwing ran stem on into the Hochung, a little abaft the engine-room, striking her with great force, and the Hochung sank shortly afterwards.

The petition of Commander William George Scott was (so far as material) as follows:

2. The wind at this time (9.40 p.m. on the 17th April 1881), was northerly and light, the weather was overcast and gloomy, with occasional lightning and showers, and the Lapwing was steering S.W. by W. ½ W., and proceeding at a rate of about five to five and a half knots per hour, with her bow and stem lights properly exhibited, and a good look-out.

3. While on the aforesaid course, and about 10.15 to 10.20 p.m., the bright light of a steamship not under sail, which proved to be the screw steamship Hochung, belonging to the above-named defendants, was seen at a distance of three or four miles from the Lapwing, between one and two points on the latter's port bow.

4. Shortly afterwards the red light of the Hochung came into view under her bright light, and the course of the Lapwing was continued without alteration, until the two vessels had approached each other to a distance of between half to one mile, the Hochung then bearing about one point on the Lapwing's port bow.

5. At this time the helm of the Lapwing was ported gradually until she headed W.N.W., and then steadied, the red and white lights of the Hochung at the time of such steadying, bearing about five points on the port bow of the Lapwing.

6. Very shortly after this, the Hochung, which was proceeding at a rapid rate, altered her course; first, all three of her lights came into sight, then the red light was shut out, and only her green and white lights remained in view, and she continued her course right across the bows of the Lapwing at great speed. As soon as the alteration in the helm of the Hochung was perceived by the officer of the watch on board the Lapwing, the helm of the latter was put hard-a-port, the starboard engine was reversed full speed astern, and the port engine driven full speed ahead.

7. Finding that the Hochung continued to stand across the Lapwing's bows, the port engine of the Lapwing was also reversed full speed astern, but no change was made in her helm. When the Hochung was distant from the Lapwing, from about fifty to seventy yards, she apparently steadied her helm, and the two vessels came into collision, the Hochung passing in front of the Lapwing very rapidly, first carrying away the jib boom bowsprit and head gear of the Lapwing, and then the starboard quarter of the Hochung came into violent collision with the port side of the stem of the Lapwing, doing considerable damage to the latter vessel.

The cross causes were heard on several days during the month of July 1881, before the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of China and Japan upon viva voce evidence, and on the 28th July the learned judge dismissed both petitions, leaving each party to pay his own costs.

In the judgment of the learned judge, he came to the conclusion that, on the balance of testimony, the Hochung had failed to prove her case as to the relative position of the two ships, and that the masthead light of the Lapwing was not properly exhibited at the time of collision. With respect to the case of the Hochung, the learned judge said: "It was contended on behalf of the Lapwing that, if the court should come to the conclusion that the Lapwing was not on the starboard bow of the Hochung, as the latter had alleged, there would be an end of her case on the first petition, in conformity with the 'rigid but wholesome rule' that has been laid down in The Anne (Lush. 55), The East Lothian (4 L. T. Rep. N. S. 487; 1 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 76; Lush. 241), and The Haswell (Br. & Lush. 247), viz., that a plaintiff in Admiralty is only entitled to recover appointing a vice-admiral and judge. Apparently no appointment has been made under a commission dated Sept. 6, 1880, empowering the Lords of the Admiralty to appoint a vice-admiral and judge for the Gold Coast Colony (settlements on the Gold Coast and Lagos united) instead of the separate Vice-Admiralty Courts then existing.—ED.

(a) Crown ships cannot be arrested, but the usual course is for the Admiralty to direct their proctor to appear and defend the action (The Athol, 1 W. Rob. 374; The Volcano, 3 Notes of Cas.) In such cases the practice is to proceed against the officer in command of the ship at the time of the collision, and should the Crown vessel be held to blame, the Government indemnifies the officer as their agent (Rogers v. Dutt, 3 L. T. Rep. N. S. 160). In consequence of this immunity from arrest, questions have arisen under what circumstances a vessel may claim to be a Crown vessel (Fletcher v. Braddick, 2 N. R. 182; Hodgkinson v. Fernie, 26 L. J. 27, C. P.; The Parlement Belge, 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 83, 234). The regulations to avoid collision, made under the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, and of the Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act 1862, do not apply to Her Majesty's ships (The Topaze, 2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 38; 10 L. T. Rep. N. S. 659), but the Admiralty direct instructions similar to the above regulations to be issued to the officers in charge of Her Majesty's ships, and the breach of such regulations is always admitted by the Admiralty to be negligence (H.M.S. Supply, 2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 262; 12 L. T. Rep. N. S. 799).

This is, perhaps, the first instance where, in consequence of the death of an officer proceeded against, the officer next in command has been substituted in the deceased's place. It is, however, a useful practice where the Admiralty really intends to defend the action.—ED.

secundum allegata et probata. I understand the counsel for the Hochung to assent to this proposition—at any rate, he stated he had no authorities to cite in opposition to these—and, in my opinion, the proposition is well founded. I refer to the more recent case of The Alice and The Rosita (19 L. T. Rep. N. S. 753; 3 Mar. Law. Cas. O. S. 193; L. Rep. 2 P. C. 214) as an authority for these two positions—first, that, when two vessels are in motion, their bearings with regard to each other are a most material fact to be alleged and proved; and, secondly, that, where a material allegation of the plaintiff's is disproved by the evidence, the case must altogether fail." Then, after discussing the evidence, he proceeded: "I, therefore, on the balance of testimony, decide not only that the Hochung has not proved what she alleged, but that her allegation has been disproved, and, therefore, on the rule I have mentioned, her petition must be dismissed." With respect to the Lapwing, he said: "I think she must be taken, in her cross-petition and in her preliminary act, to allege that her regulation bow and steam (masthead) lights were properly exhibited at the time of the collision, especially when these documents are read in connection with the fifth and seventh paragraphs of her answer to the Hochung's petition. Now, it has been clearly shown that her steam (masthead) light at least was not properly exhibited at that time, for it had been hauled down after the Hochung had been reported, and from three to four minutes—it may have been longer—before the collision, and was not re-hoisted till after the collision. I consider the allegation as to lights being properly exhibited a most material one, and as it has been clearly disproved, I shall apply to the petition of the Lapwing the rule I applied to that of the Hochung, and dismiss it also. As in the result both petitions stand dismissed, there will be no order as to costs beyond ordering each party to pay one-half of the assessors' fees."

From this decision both parties now appealed. The case of the China Merchants' Steam Navigation Company on appeal submitted that the order or decree of the Supreme Court of China and Japan of the 28th July 1881, dismissing their original petition, was erroneous, and, further, that the petition against them was rightly dismissed in the court below, but that it should have been dismissed with costs for the following, among other reasons:

1. Because the lights of the Lapwing were not properly exhibited before the collision.
2. Because a proper look-out was not kept by those on board the Lapwing.
3. Because the helm of the Lapwing was improperly ported before the collision.
4. Because the engines of the Lapwing were not duly stopped and reversed.
5. Because the Lapwing was solely to blame for the said collision.
6. Because, even on the facts as found by the judgment, the court should have held both vessels to blame, and should have directed the damage to be divided.

In the case of Walter Lloyd Bignold on appeal it was submitted that the judgment dismissing the petition on behalf of the owners of the Hochung was right and ought to be affirmed, but that the judgment dismissing the petition on behalf of the Lapwing was wrong, for the following among other reasons:

1. Because the lights of the Lapwing were properly exhibited while the two vessels were approaching and in sight of one another, and ought to have been seen by those on board the Hochung.
2. Because the fact that the masthead light of the Lapwing was hauled down before the collision could not in the circumstances have contributed to the collision.
3. Because there was no look-out kept on board the Hochung.
4. Because the Hochung was to blame for the collision in not having kept a proper look-out, in having improperly starboarded her helm, and in not easing and not duly stopping and reversing her engines before the said collision.

Butt, Q.C., Cohen, Q.C., and Masterman, for the China Merchants' Steam Navigation Company. — The story on behalf of the Hochung, as to the relative bearings of the ships, when they became visible to and approached each other, is the true version. The Lapwing at the time of collision had no masthead light, and on the ruling of The Hibernia (31 L. T. Rep. N. S. 805; 2 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 454), even though the absence of the light did not contribute to the collision, which is denied by those on board the Hochung, the Lapwing should be held to blame. The non-compliance by the Lapwing with the regulations in respect to lights materially contributed to the collision. On the facts found below both vessels should be held to blame, and the damage divided.

Dr. Dean Q.C., A. Staveley Hill, Q.C., and Stokes for W. L. Bignold.—The judge in the court below has found on the balance of testimony, that the version of the Lapwing as to the relative, positions of the vessels was correct. Presuming that the masthead light of the Lapwing was wanting at the time of collision, yet, in accordance with the decision in The Fanny M. Carvill (302 L. T. Rep. N. S. 646; 2 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 565), the Lapwing would not be to blame, seeing that the absence of the masthead light could have had no possible connection with the collision. The decisions in The Anne (Lush. 55), The East Lothian (4 L. T. Rep N. S. 487; 1 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 76; Lush. 241), The Haswell (Br. & Lush. 247), and The Alice and the Rosita (19 L. T. Rep. N. S. 753; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 193; L. Rep. 2 P. C. 214), are authorities for the suit of the Hochung being dismissed, on the ground that the proof was not secundum allegata et probata.

The judgment of their Lordships was delivered by

Sir ROBERT P. COLLIER.—This is a case of collision between the Hochung, a steamer belonging to the China Merchants' Steam Navigation Company, and Her Majesty's gunboat Lapwing, which happened on the 17th of April 1881, about 10.30 p.m. twelve miles off Ocksen Island, on the coast of China. The weather seems to have been calm; there was very little wind. Cross-suits have been instituted by the Steam Navigation Company and by the lieutenant of the Lapwing, who has been substituted for the commander who is, unfortunately, dead. The cases of the two vessels may be very shortly stated. They were steering in almost opposite courses, so as to be nearly meeting vessels, there being but a point or a point and a half's difference between their courses. The Lapwing represents herself to have been steering S.W. by W.½ W; the Hochung N.E. by E.½ E. The case of the Hochung is in substance this: That she first saw, at a distance of two or three miles, the Lapwing as a dark object in the water, having no lights of any description on her starboard bow, and that the Lapwing continued on her starboard bow, and that being so the Hochung, supposing that the Lapwing was going to pass to starboard, starboarded her helm, and by that means turned to the northward; and that the collision occurred in consequence of the Lapwing porting her helm and thus meeting the Hochung. The case of the Lapwing is, that the two vessels were nearly meeting each other, their courses being only divergent by a point or a point and a half, and that they were port bow to port bow; that the commander of the Lapwing kept his course for a considerable time, when he ported his helm in order to give the Hochung a wider berth; that the Hochung, instead of continuing her course or porting in either of which cases there would have been no collision, starboarded her helm, and thereby came right across his bows, and this caused the collision. These are in substance the cases of the two vessels. There is also an allegation on the part of the Hochung that the Lapwing had no proper lights according to the regulations, and there is a denial of this on the part of the Lapwing. The learned judge found both vessels to blame. He adopted the version of the Lapwing as to the relative positions of the vessels, and as to the duty of each to steer her course under the circumstances, and he found the Hochung was to blame in that respect. He also found the allegation that proper lights had not been exhibited by the Lapwing proved. He therefore found both vessels to be in fault. Their Lordships are sensible of the advantage which the court below has of hearing and seeing the witnesses, and are not disposed to reverse decisions come to upon oral evidence, unless there is a very strong reason to suppose that the court below has come to a wrong conclusion. Their Lordships see no reason to suppose that the court has come to a wrong conclusion on either of the points which have been indicated. With respect to the positions and courses of the vessels, their Lordships observe that not only is there a conflict between the witnesses called on behalf of their respective vessels, but that some of the witnesses who are called by the Hochung who were on board the Lapwing, and who are disposed to give evidence in favour of the Hochung, corroborate the statements of the crew and officers of the Lapwing with respect to the courses of the two vessels. It is impossible for their Lordships, acting upon their general rules, to reverse a decision supported by such evidence. With respect to the question of lights it was admitted by the officer of the Lapwing that the principal light, the masthead light of the Lapwing had been hauled down some three or four minutes (it might have been more) before the collision; and this is confirmatory of the statement of the captain and crew of the Hochung that no light was visible on board the Lapwing. There is also some evidence (whether the learned judge attaches great importance to it or not does not distinctly appear) that her port side light was burning somewhat dimly, so that probably it could not be seen at so great a distance as it ought to have been, although unquestionably it was some time before the collision. Their Lordships therefore think that the finding of the learned judge upon the second point, namely, that the Lapwing failed to comply with the regulations with respect to exhibiting lights was proved.

The question then arises whether, this being so, the learned judge was right in dismissing both suits, and it becomes necessary to refer to the law bearing upon this subject. The 17 & 18 Vict. c. 104, s. 298, commonly called the Merchant Shipping Act, enacts as follows: "If in any case of collision it appears to the court before which the case is tried that such collision was occasioned by the non-observance of any rule for the exhibition of lights or the use of fog signals, issued in pursuance of the powers hereinbefore contained, or of the foregoing rule as to the passing of steam and sailing ship or of the foregoing rule as to a steamship keeping to that side of a narrow channel which lies on the starboard side, the owner of the ship by which such rule has been infringed shall not be entitled to recover any recompense whatever for any damage sustained by such ship in such collision, unless it is shown to the satisfaction of the court that the circumstances of the case made a departure from the rule necessary." This enactment for a certain time altered the rule of the Court of Admiralty that, where it appears that both parties in cross suits are to blame, the damage shall be apportioned between them. But the rule was restored by the 25 & 26 Vict. c. 63, which repealed the section last quoted and enacted (sect. 29) that, "If in any case of collision it appears to the court before which the case is tried, that such collision was occasioned by the non-observance of any regulation made by, or in pursuance of this Act, the ship by which such regulation has been infringed, shall be deemed to be in fault, unless it is shown to the satisfaction of the court that the circumstances of the case made a departure from the regulation necessary." In the absence, therefore, of any enactment to the effect that the plaintiff shall not be entitled to recover any recompense, the ordinary rule of the Admiralty became again applicable to cases of collision, where both parties were to blame. A more recent statute, the 36 & 37 Vict. c. 85, s. 17, further enacts that, "If in any case of collision, it is proved to the court before which the case is tried, that any of the regulations for preventing collision contained in or made under the Merchant Shipping Acts, 1854 to 1873, has been infringed, the ship by which such regulation has been infringed, shall be deemed to be in fault, unless it is shown to the satisfaction of the court, that the circumstances of the case made departure from the regulation necessary." This last enactment renders it unnecessary for the plaintiff to prove that the collision was occasioned by the non-observance of the regulations; he proves default on the part of the defendant by merely showing that the regulations have been infringed. This latter section has received interpretation from this board in several cases. It may be enough to refer to the case of The Hibernia (2 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 454; 31 L. T. Rep. N. S. 805.) In this case, decided on the terms of the last statute, it was held that a ship not exhibiting proper lights was in fault, even if the want of lights did not contribute to the collision. This case may be considered as having been qualified to a certain extent by a subsequent case, The Fanny M. Carvill (2 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 565; 32 L. T. Rep. N. S. 129, 646), in which this board, affirming a decision of Sir Robert Phillimore, expressed itself in these terms: "There remain, however, two other possible constructions. The fact is that, on proof of an infringement of any of the regulations for preventing collisions, there arises, subject only to the qualification contained in the final clause of the section, an absolute presumption of culpability against the vessel guilty of such infringement, to which the court is bound to give effect, whatever the nature of the infringement may be. The other is, that the infringement must be one having some possible connection with the collision, or in other words, that the presumption of culpability may be met by proof that the infringement could not by any possibility have contributed to the collision." And the same doctrine has been laid down by Sir Robert Phillimore in very much the same terms in a subsequent case of The Englishman (37 L. T. Rep. N. S. 412; 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 506; 3 P. Div. 18; 47 L. J. 9 Prob.).

Applying the law as thus laid down, it appears to their Lordships in this case that, at all events, it has not been shown that the non-compliance by the Lapwing with the regulations in respect to lights could not have contributed to the collision. (a) On the contrary, they are inclined to think that, in all probability, it did materially contribute to the collision. That being so, the ordinary rule of the Admiralty Court applies as to the division of damage. It has been suggested by one of the learned counsel for the respondents that the learned judge was right in dismissing both suits, or at all events in dismissing the suit of the Hochung, on the ground that the proof was not secundum allegata et probata; but it appears to their Lordships that there is a sufficient allegation on the part of the Hochung that the Lapwing infringed the regulations with respect to lights; and, putting aside all the rest of their allegations, that would entitle the owners of that vessel to recover upon the proof of the infringement of the regulation with respect to lights. The allegations of the Lapwing of improper navigation by the Hochung are also sufficient and established. That being so, the ordinary rule of the Court of Admiralty applies; and therefore it will be necessary that the judgment should be varied by directing that, instead of the two petitions being dismissed, the damage should be divided between the parties according to the Admiralty rule, which is, that each party shall obtain from the other half of the damage which he has suffered. Their Lordships will therefore advise Her Majesty to vary the judgment in the manner which has been above intimated. There will be no costs on either side.

(a) This decision applies the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Act 1873, sect. 17, in an action which is really against a Queen's ship, although there is nothing in the Statute saying that it shall apply to Queen's ships. If the court considered that the Act dealt merely with procedure, or that they could look behind the actual party, no exception could be taken to their decision, but the point does not seem to have been raised in argument. —ED.

COURT OF APPEAL.

SITTINGS AT WESTMINSTER.

Nov. 25 and 27, 1882.

(Before BAGGALLAY, BRETT, and LINDLEY, L.JJ.)

THE R. L. ALSTON. (a)

Collision—Speed—Rules for the Navigation of the River Tees, Art. 22.

In rule 22 of the Rules for the Navigation of the River Tees, providing that "no steamship shall at any time be navigated in any part of the river at a higher rate of speed than a maximum speed of six miles an hour," the speed mentioned is speed over the ground and not through the water.

Judgment of Sir Robert Phillimore reversed (46 L. T. Rep. N. S. 208; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 509 7 P. Div. 49).

THIS was an appeal by the plaintiffs from a decision of Sir Robert Phillimore assisted by Elder Brethren of the Trinity House, by which, on the 8th Feb. 1882, he had found the steamships Lady Mostyn and the R. L. Alston both to blame for a collision in the River Tees on Nov. 6, 1881, by reason of the construction which he placed upon rule 22 of the Rules for the Navigation of the River Tees.

The case is fully reported in the court below, where the facts are set out (4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 509; 46 L. T. Rep. N. S. 208). From this decision the plaintiffs, the owners of the Lady Mostyn, now appealed on the ground that the word "speed" in the above-mentioned 22nd rule, which is "no steamship shall at any time be navigated in any part of the river at a higher rate of speed than a maximum rate of six miles per hour" meant speed over the ground, and not through the water as held by the learned judge below.

Butt, Q.C, and Cohen, Q.C. for the appellants.—If the construction be through the water, a steamship with a three-knot tide could approach a vessel at anchor at the rate of nine miles an hour, and yet be within the rule, whilst a steamship going against the tide could only approach at the rate of three miles an hour. Nine knots an hour is an improper rate of speed in a crowded river, seeing that considerable damage may be caused by the wash to vessels at anchor and to the banks, quite apart from danger of collision. The succeeding rule which provides for a maximum rate of speed of three miles per hour in a fog, on the construction of the learned judge below, would make it perfectly legitimate with a three-knot tide for one vessel to go at six knots an hour in a fog, but the other, were the tide running at any rate over three knots an hour, could not go at all. On the construction of through the water, a vessel going against the tide has all the force of the tide to stop her progress if necessary; whereas in the case of a vessel going with the tide at about nine knots this force is wanting—in fact the tide helps to keep up her excessive rate of speed. In the regulations for the navigation of the Thames, speed is to be taken as rate over the ground, which shows that our construction of speed is workable, and commends itself to the Thames authorities. (a) It is obvious that rate over the ground can easily be ascertained by noticing the landmarks on the bank.

R. E. Webster, Q.C. and W. G. F. Phillimore for the respondents.—Speed can only be ascertained with certainty by noting the number of the revolutions of the engines. As the tide is ever varying in force, if speed means rate over the ground, it would be incumbent upon those navigating the Tees to be always watching the tide and varying the revolutions of their engines accordingly. There would be the further difficulty in the case of unknown eddies, tides at points, &c., which would make it constantly necessary to alter the speed of the steamship, supposing the existence and force of these eddies and tides were known. Besides it is only for a short time that the tide runs with such force as to give a vessel an undue rate of speed. The fact that in the Thames rules the words "over the ground" are inserted, shows that without them "speed" is to have its ordinary nautical meaning of rate through the water. Although by day it may be possible to approximate the rate over the ground by noticing landmarks, this is not so at night when landmarks are not visible. A vessel going with the tide requires considerable speed, to enable her to steer with ease and rapidity.

Butt, Q.C. in reply.—The difficulty as to varying tides and unknown eddies is easily met by going at a rate slightly within the maximum authorised rate.

Baggallay, L.J.—About two o'clock on the morning of the 6th Nov. last year, a collision took place in the river Tees between two steam-vessels, the Lady Mostyn and the R. L. Alston. There is a bye-law or rule regulating the navigation of steam-vessels in the river Tees, and that bye-law fixes the maximum of speed at which steam-vessels navigating the Tees may proceed. The rule is in these terms: "No steamship shall at any time be navigated in any part of the river at a higher rate of speed than a maximum rate of six miles per hour." Shortly before the collision, the Lady Mostyn was proceeding down the river with a speed of five knots over the ground, having at the time the tide against her, the rate of the tide being assumed for the purpose of the argument as three knots an hour. Consequently the Lady Mostyn, in order to proceed five knots over the ground, must have been proceeding at the rate of eight knots through the water. If the rate of speed referred to in rule 22 means the rate of going through the water, she was exceeding the maximum which the rule allowed her to adopt; if, on the other hand, the true meaning of the rate of speed in the rule was the rate of going over the ground, she was within the limit. The learned judge in the Admiralty Court has come to the conclusion that the true construction to be put on the rule is, that the rate of speed is to be regulated by the going through the water, and not by the going over the ground, and from that decision the present appeal is brought, and it is the only question which we have to consider on the present appeal. We must, first of all, have regard to what must be supposed to have been the object of the framers of this bye-law, which is made under Act of Parliament. I think there can be no question, that it was made for the purpose of protecting and guarding, as far as might be possible, against a collision in the river. It may perhaps be suggested that it was formed also with a view of protecting the banks of the river, which might be injured by a high rate of speed, but I think the more important object would be that of preventing collisions. Collisions may be of several kinds. There may be a collision between two steam-vessels proceeding in different directions; there may be a collision arising from a steam-vessel proceeding at a certain speed, and coming in contact with some fixed object, as for instance a vessel at anchor; or there may be a collision between a steam-vessel going at a certain rate of speed and some other vessel, not a steam-vessel perhaps, crossing the course, or otherwise moving about at a greater or less rate of speed in the current of the stream; and we must consider that this rule is intended to be applicable to each and every of the several kinds of collision which may occur. It appears to me that directly we attempt to test the meaning of the words "rate of speed" by considering how they would operate and bear on the case of a collision between a steam-vessel in motion and an object at rest, or slightly moving, the construction contended for by the appellants has every element of being the right construction. If the rule is to be the rate of going through the water, and not the rate of going over the ground, a vessel having the tide in her favour and approaching an object at rest, or only slightly moving, would be at liberty to go at the full extent of the six miles over the ground, together with whatever the rate of the tide might be at the time, bringing the speed up in the case assumed to nine knots an hour. Therefore one hardly requires to have the position more than stated, to say that one can hardly suppose that it was the intention of the framers of that regulation that, if there was a three-knot tide running, the vessel which was coming in with the tide in her favour might go at the rate of nine knots an hour, whereas the one which was coming with the tide adverse to her should only go at the rate of three knots an hour. That seems to me an unreasonable construction. Whereas the construction contended for by the appellants, which is the rate over the ground, would allow each one to approach at the rate of six miles an hour; and the risk of collision is proportionate to the rate at which the vessels are, if both are in motion, approaching each other, or if one is at rest and the other in motion, the rate at which the one is approaching the fixed object.

I confess it appears to me that that is sufficient to suggest what would be the proper interpretation to put upon the rule. If the other interpretation were put upon it, it seems to me that it would lead to an irrational conclusion. But it has been suggested, and the argument was put prominently forward by the counsel for the respondents, that the very object of this rule was, that there should be something in it by which the party navigating the vessel should know for certain what he ought to do. I ventured to suggest in the course of the argument that whoever had charge of the navigation must know at what rate his vessel was moving through the water substantially. If he is in any doubt so far as regards the actual rate of the tide, a small diminution from the maximum rate of speed allowed would be sufficient to enable him to proceed with reasonable certainty. At the same time, I cannot help thinking that the greater number of those navigating the river Tees must know at what rate of speed the tide is moving at a particular time when they are going up or coming down the stream; and although there may be some exceptional circumstances causing at a particular time some little variation, that is a matter that could be guarded against. The argument of the counsel for the respondents was that, although a man can approximately tell at what rate the vessel is going through the water, he cannot always tell at what rate she is going over the ground. If he cannot so accurately ascertain it, it seems to me that by a little care and a little keeping within the maximum amount he might always be on the safe side; but what the counsel for the appellants have said is a strong illustration that it is not so difficult to ascertain at what rate the ship is going over the ground, because, in the Rules for the Navigation of the River Thames, the rate of speed is there to be regulated in accordance with the rate of speed of going over the ground. It is therefore not so difficult to ascertain with any reasonable degree of certainty what is the rate of speed over the ground. I quite agree with the observation that the rules of one particular river can hardly be construed by the rules which are applicable to some other river; but it certainly appears to me to afford an answer to an argument such as that put by the counsel for the respondents, as to the rate being uncertain at which the vessel is going over the ground. I think that, although the object of the framers might have been to some extent for the protection of the banks of the river, what has been said with regard to the risk of collision appears to me a strong reason for the rule to be construed to mean the rate of speed over the ground rather than the rate of speed through the water, although the rate of speed might affect the banks of the river by reason of the wash. For these reasons I think that the construction which the learned judge has put upon the rule is not that which the words properly bear, and that this appeal should be allowed.

(a) The rule referred to is Rule 15 of the bye-laws for the regulation of the navigation of the river Thames approved by Order in Council, dated March 18, 1880, and is as follows: "Steam vessels navigating the river between Barking Creek and London Bridge, other than river passenger steamers certified to carry passengers in smooth water only, shall never exceed a speed of seven statute miles per hour over the ground whether with or against the tide."—Ed.

Brett, L.J.—In this case the vessel Lady Mostyn is found to be partly to blame, not on the ground of the speed at which she was approaching another vessel with regard to the two vessels themselves, but simply on the ground that she has committed a breach of one of the bye-laws of the Tees Conservancy regulations, and the question is raised, whether the construction which has been put upon one of these rules by the learned judge of the Admiralty Court is that which ought to be adopted, That is the only question which is before us. I think it must be obvious to anybody who reads this rule that it is capable of two constructions. It is unfortunately expressed in such language that it leaves it quite as much open with regard to its form of expression to the one interpretation as to the other. What, then, is to be done? We must try and get at the meaning of what was intended by considering the consequences of either construction. The rules are made for the navigation of a river which would be crowded with vessels, and of a river with banks in sight, and we must consider which is the more reasonable construction. Now it is undoubted, as my learned brother has pointed out, that there are three kinds of collision. With regard to a steam-boat she may be in danger of coming into collision with an approaching steamer; she may be in danger of coming into collision with a vessel at anchor; she may be in danger of coming into collision with a sailing vessel which is tacking across, and which therefore, in a narrow river and for the purposes of this rule would be in much the same position as a stationary object. With regard to the danger of collision there are always two matters to be considered as to the conduct of the vessels, one is as to her course and the other is as to her speed. There are rules for avoiding danger of collision in regard to both these considerations. There are always rules with regard to the course; that is to say, when a vessel is approaching another vessel she has to steer in a particular way. That is for the purpose of avoiding danger of collision with respect to her course. There are always other rules as regards the rate of speed, that is her facility for stopping in time to avoid a collision. This rule has nothing to do with steering; there are other rules, no doubt, with regard to steering. Rule 22 and the next one to it are concerned only with that part of the navigation of the steamship which relates to her power to stop herself when there is danger of collision.

I think we have exhausted almost every possible mode of viewing this case. The one which governs my decision certainly is this, that the rule is laid down with regard to the navigation of steamers in a crowded river with visible banks. I know that during the night the banks may not be seen; but these rules are made for the day as well as for the night, and probably are made for the day rather than for the night, because there is, I suppose, much more navigation in the day-time than in the night-time. On the construction of the rule—and this is what has most governed me—it must be obvious that a vessel going against a strong tide has a much greater facility than one which is going with the tide, because, however fast a vessel may be going through the water when she is going against the tide, the moment she tries to stop herself she has to assist her in stopping the force of the tide which is coming down upon her; whereas in the case of the vessel which is going with the tide the moment she tries to stop herself she has the force of the tide still carrying her on, and in order to stop herself really she must not only take off from herself the speed of which she herself is the cause, but she must so stop herself as to act against the force of the tide which is still carrying her on. It is said that, if the two vessels are approaching each other end on, the one against the tide and the other with it, that is not a matter to take into consideration. I very much doubt that; but it is most undoubted that it is very material when a vessel is approaching another vessel at anchor, or a vessel coming across the tide, which is very much the same as if she was stationary. It is impossible to understand that anybody drawing these rules with regard to the navigation of steamers in a crowded and somewhat narrow river, should be supposed to admit for a moment that a steamer should be approaching any fixed object, or even a moving object, at the rate of ten miles an hour. That seems to me to be monstrous, and could not have been intended. That seems to me to be the real consideration which governs this matter. No doubt we have had difficulties about this interpretation. The great difficulty put to us was, the difficulty of judging of the rate of speed, and it was said that, if a vessel is in motion, her rate of speed can only be judged by the rate at which she is going through the water. But when a vessel is in the ocean, it is very much as if those on board were in a carriage driving across Salisbury Plain without a mark on it, when no doubt it would be very difficult to tell at what rate the carriage is going; but when a carriage is going along a road marked with milestones, it is easy to tell at what rate the carriage is going by marking one milestone and seeing how long it is before reaching another. The points in a river with banks are very much more like a road marked with milestones than like Salisbury Plain, because there are marks and steeples and other things which everybody navigating the river knows perfectly well, and by which he can judge of the rate of speed at which the vessel is going over the ground. He can judge by seeing how long the vessel is in going from one known mark to another known mark on the bank. An expression used before us, which is one of the nautical expressions to which we are accustomed, is, that this is to be the rate at which the vessel is going "over the ground;" but there is another equally well-known expression, which in a river seems to me to be the more apt, that is, the rate at which she is going "by the land," that is, by any fixed object on the land. Therefore the difficulty of judging of the rate of speed seems to me to vanish. Then comes the question, whether the two rules (rules 22 and 23) must be construed both alike. That would lead to a difficulty, which is supposed to suggest itself under the second rule. There are, as Mr. Butt and Dr. Phillimore pointed out, questions of contrary difficulties. There are difficulties both ways, and I cannot say that I think it is a well-drawn rule, but I agree with Mr. Butt, that the difficulty which he puts against Dr. Phillimore is greater than the difficulty which Dr. Phillimore puts against Mr. Butt. That which governs me is, I think, the real impossibility of supposing that anybody would allow a steamer to go in a crowded river with the tide past the land at the rate of ten or eleven miles in the hour. I therefore venture to differ from the learned judge of the Admiralty Court as to the construction of this rule.

Lindley, L.J.—I also am of opinion that the construction put upon the 22nd rule by the learned judge in the court below cannot be supported. The duty of the court is to construe these rules. Rule No. 22 is one of a series headed, "Bye-laws for regulating the navigation of steam and other ships." Now the language of rule 22, which is the one we have to deal with, is this: "No steamship shall at any time be navigated in any part of the river at a higher rate of speed than a maximum rate of six miles an hour." The question is, what does that mean? Some light is thrown upon that by rule 29, which runs thus: "No ship shall be allowed to drift in any part of the river or harbour." Every ship must be properly navigated or moored. Therefore navigation, as I understand it, means "moving otherwise than by drifting;" that is, it seems to me, the motion imparted to the ship by steam, her engines, and so on. That is navigation, as I understand it. Now, we have to ascertain the rate of speed. Here again light is thrown upon this clause by other clauses, which refer to "dead slow," "full speed," "half speed," "quarter speed," and so on. I confess it seems to me, speaking rather as a landsman than as a nautical man, that what was meant by that was, the rate over the land, the rate at which the ship travels from one fixed point to another, the object being to avoid collision, either with fixed objects or with moving objects. If the objects are moving, they may be moving in the same direction, or in contrary directions; or they may be at anchor. That would be the construction that I should put upon it simply from a study of the rules and from considering the object which I conceive the rules have.

But I must say, I do feel considerably puzzled by the expression in the judgment below that the construction put upon the rule by the court below is the natural construction. I did not understand in what sense it could be supposed to be the natural view; but I think I understand what it is now, although I did not understand it at first. If the ship is out at sea without any visible object in sight and with no method of ascertaining the rate of speed over the ground, the only way of ascertaining the speed is, by the log or by the engines, that is, by the rate of the ship going through the water. That is intelligible enough, and one sees it is so. It is not possible in a moment, I suppose, to tell at what rate a ship is going, whether a steamship or a sailing vessel, over the ground, in a place where observations cannot be taken. It may be found out after a time at what rate she has been going, by taking certain observations at certain distances between certain points, and so it may be ascertained what distance she has traversed; but there is no way that I know of except by means of the log or some other such method of ascertaining at what rate a ship is going through the water. Therefore in that sense the rate of the ship might be said to be naturally the rate of the ship through the water. But totally different constructions apply to a vessel going along a river, and the same reasoning cannot be used. At all events in England our rivers are not so wide that we cannot tell at what pace we are going along the land, and that is really an answer to the observations of the respondents' counsel. His observation is quite true that it is difficult to tell at what rate the vessel is going, unless those on board have landmarks to guide them. They can tell if they have church towers or other things, or landmarks of any sort or kind which are known to navigators. Therefore the difficulty which he has suggested about the want of certainty, appears to me to be met by considering the place that the rules are dealing with. The other points that have been urged upon the court strengthen the same view, and I confess it appears to me the true construction of this rule is, that the rate of speed in 22 means rate of speed over the ground, and not rate of speed through the water. The judgment must therefore be reversed. The appeal will be allowed with costs, and the action remitted to the court below to be decided there in accordance with the construction placed by this court on the rule under consideration. (a)

QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION.

(Before CAVE and DAY, J.J.)

HAIGH AND OTHERS v. ROYAL MAIL STEAM PACKET COMPANY. (b)

Carriage of passengers—Death by negligence—Contract—Exemption from liability—Collision.

The ticket of a passenger by a steamer of defendants contained a notice that the defendants would not be responsible for any loss, damage or detention of luggage under any circumstances; and that they would not be responsible for the maintenance or loss of time of a passenger during any detention of their vessels, nor for any delay arising out of accidents, nor for any loss or damage arising from perils of the seas, or from machinery, boilers, or steam, or from any act, neglect or default whatsoever of the pilot, master, or mariners.

Held, upon demurrer, that this provision exempted the defendants from liability in an action for the loss of life of a passenger by negligence of the defendants' servants in a collision with another ship.

THIS was a demurrer to a statement of defence.

The plaintiffs, who are the executors of the will of Charles Schwind, deceased, sued for the benefit and on behalf of his wife and children, for damages, caused (as alleged) by the negligence of the defendants' servants on board the defendants' steamship Douro, whereby the said steamship having come into collision with another ship was sunk, and the said Charles Schwind lost his life.

The defendants, amongst other defences, alleged that the contract of carriage between themselves and the said Charles Schwind exonerated them from liability for the alleged negligence.

By consent of counsel on both sides the statement of defence was taken as amended by the substitution for the words therein used of the words printed on the passenger's ticket, which was given to the said Charles Schwind as a receipt for his passage money, signed by an agent of the defendants.

The following "notice" was the material part of the ticket:

Passengers not embarking after taking their passage will forfeit half the passage money.

Passengers are to pay for whatever wines, spirits, malt liquors, or mineral waters they may order.

Each adult saloon passenger is allowed to carry twenty cubic feet of luggage; above that quantity will be charged for. All specie, bullion, jewellery, or other treasures carried by passengers must be shipped as treasure, and paid for at the established rates of freight. Merchandise is not allowed to be carried under the designation of luggage.

Children paying half or quarter fares, or those conveyed free, are not to be allowed seats at the saloon table.

The company will not be responsible for any loss, damage, or detention of luggage under any circumstances.

All luggage will have to pass through the Customs House abroad, whether British or foreign, and must be distinctly labelled with the passenger's name and destination.

The company will not be responsible for the maintenance of passengers, or for their loss of time, or any consequence resulting therefrom, during any detention consequent upon the occurrence of any cause to prevent the vessels from meeting at the appointed places, nor for any delay arising out of accidents, nor for any loss or damage arising from perils of the sea, or from machinery, boilers, or steam, or from any act, neglect, or default whatsoever of the pilot, master, or mariner, nor for any consequences arising from sanitary regulations or precautions which the company's officers or Local Government authorities may deem necessary, or should such sanitary regulations or precautions prevent embarkation or disembarkation.

No person can be received on board the company's ships when suffering from any infectious disorder, and if in the course of the voyage any passenger should be found to be suffering from a disorder of that character, he will be required, at his own expense, to find accomodation at any port in which the vessel may happen to be at the time, or at the first port she may reach after discovery of the existence of the disorder, it being understood that, when sufficiently recovered, such passenger will be conveyed to his destination in one of the company's vessels.

Any passenger is liable to a penalty of 100*l.* who carries gunpowder or other goods of a dangerous nature (stat. 17 & 18 Vict. c. 104), for example, lucifer matches, chemicals, or any articles of an inflammable or damaging nature.

The steward's fee is charged in the passage money.

This ticket must be exhibited on board when required by the company's officers, and must be delivered up to the purser of the ship conveying passengers to their final destination.

Cohen, Q.C. (with him Lawrence) for the plaintiff.—The mere words "loss or damage," as here found in this notice, do not include loss of life, or damage to person; they refer rather to an injury caused to the pocket of a passenger by loss of luggage or other property, or damage by delay or inconvenience. The word "damage" has undergone conflicting judicial decisions; in the Franconia case (36 L. T. Rep. N. S. 640; 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 435; 2 Prob. Div. 163) the 7th section of the Admiralty Court Act 1861 (24 Vict. c. 10) was discussed by the Court of Appeal, the words being, "The High Court of Admiralty shall have jurisdiction over any claim for damages done by any ship;" although it was held that these words included in the jurisdiction of the court a claim for loss of life caused by collision, the Court of Appeal was equally divided on the subject. Here the words must be limited to the sense in which the other provisions are expressly applied; and if it should be considered there is an ambiguity in the words, they must be construed against the party in whose favour the exemption is provided.

Russell, Q.C. (with him Phillimore), for the defendants, was not heard.

Cave, J.—I do not think we need trouble the counsel for the defendants. Looking at the ticket and the circumstances of the contract, I cannot entertain a doubt about the meaning of these words. I think "loss or damage" must include the death of a passenger, if caused by any of the matters provided against. There are express provisions as to luggage preceding this particular exemption, and rendering these words inapplicable to a passenger's property; they can therefore, as it seems to me, only have any meaning in this provision if they refer to injury to life or person of a passenger. We refuse to allow the demurrer.

Day, J.—I am of the same opinion.

(Before Watkin Williams and Mathew, JJ.)

Mersey Steamship Company Limited v. Shuttleworth and Co. (a)

Practice—Action for freight—Admissions on pleadings—Admission of claim—Counter-claim—Motion for judgment on claim—Order XL., r. 11.

Where the plaintiff's claim for freight is admitted, but the defendants set up a counter-claim for damages for breach of a contract of carriage for a larger amount, the plaintiff is not entitled to judgment upon the claim, under Order XL., r. 11, as upon an admission in the pleadings.

Semble, if the counter-claim were clearly frivolous, the plaintiff would be entitled to judgment on the claim, and to have the sum claimed brought into court to await the result of the action.

This was a motion by the plaintiff for judgment upon admissions of fact in the pleadings.

The claim, which appeared by the indorsement upon the writ of summons, was for two sums of 687*l.* 6*s.* and 120*l.* 6*s.* 4*d.* for freight in respect of the carriage of certain goods belonging to the defendants, in a ship belonging to the plaintiffs.

The defendants in their statement of defence admitted the plaintiffs' claim, but set up a set-off and counter-claim for 5000*l.* for breach of contract by the plaintiffs in respect of the carriage of certain other goods belonging to the defendants, and loaded on board a ship belonging to the plaintiffs.

The plaintiffs then gave notice of the present motion for judgment on the claim, and that the money might be brought into court to await the decision of the cause.

By Order XIX., r. 3:

A defendant in an action may set off, or set up by way of counter-claim against the claims of the plaintiff, any right of claim, whether such set-off or counter-claim be sound in damages or not, and such set-off or counter-claim shall have the same effect as a statement of claim in a cross-action, so as to enable the court to pronounce a final judgment in the same action, both on the original and on the cross-claim. But the court or a judge may, on the application of the plaintiff before trial, if, in the opinion of the court or judge, such set-off or counter-claim cannot conveniently be disposed of in the pending action, or ought not to be allowed, refuse permission to the defendant to avail himself thereof.

By Order XL., r. 11:

Any party to an action may at any stage thereof apply to the court or a judge for such order as he may, upon any admissions of fact in the pleadings, be entitled to, without waiting for the determination of any other question between the parties . . . any such application may be made by motion so soon as the right of the party applying to the relief claimed has appeared from the pleadings. The court or a judge may, on any such application, give such relief, subject to such terms, if any, as such court or judge may think fit.

Gainsford Bruce for the plaintiff.—The claim is admitted, and a counter-claim is set up; therefore the plaintiff is entitled to judgment on his claim, under Order XL., r. 11, as it is admitted on the pleadings, and the money must be paid into court to await the decision of the cause. This very question has been decided quite lately in the case of Showell v. Bowron (L. T. March 24, 1883, p. 372; W. N. 1883, p. 50.) In that case also, as in this, the counter-claim was for damages, and was not in the nature of a set-off. For the purposes of the present motion, the plaintiff cannot say that the counter-claim is a frivolous one; it can only be said that it is in dispute. [Watkin Williams, J.—Order XIX., r. 3, gives a defendant a right to set up a counter-claim; your application, if successful, would practically deprive the defendants of this right, because the defendants might not be able to bring the money into court, and the plaintiff could issue execution. Moreover, Order XIX., r. 3, seems to show that in some cases a counter-claim is a defence to a claim. Mathew, J.—In the case in the Weekly Notes, the court may have thought the counter-claim fictitious.] If the court in each case has to inquire whether the counter-claim is bonâ fide, great expense will always have to be incurred. The plaintiffs ask in effect that security may be given for their claim. [Hollams.—This very question was discussed in chambers under Order XIV., r. 1, when the application was three times refused.] The power given to the judge by Order XIV., r. 1, is discretionary, and the application is made before any pleadings have been delivered. Here the application is one of right, for judgment on admissions in the pleadings. In strictness the plaintiffs are entitled to judgment and execution. They ask for this on the authority of Showell v. Bowron (ubi sup.).

F. W. Hollams, for the defendants, was not called upon.

Watkin Williams, J.—In this case I am clearly of opinion that Mr. Bruce is not entitled to the order which he asks for. The application is under Order XL., r. 11, to sign judgment upon admissions of fact in the pleadings. The plaintiffs brought an action to recover two sums of 687*l.* 6*s.* and 120*l.* 6*s.* 4*d.* for freight. The defendants by their defence admitted these sums to be due, but set up a counter-claim, in which they claimed 5000*l.* for breach of contract on the part of the plaintiffs in the carriage of certain goods in the plaintiffs' ship. Mr. Bruce contends that by Order XL., r. 11, he is entitled to judgment, because no defence is shown upon the statement of defence, and that he is entitled to judgment, with all its usual consequences. This is not, in my opinion, a correct rendering of Order XL., r. 11, and for this simple reason, that, if this were so, it would take away the right given to a defendant by Order XIX., r. 3, of defending an action by setting up a counter-claim. By this proposed construction of Order XL., r. 11, the defendants would be deprived of their rights under Order XIX., r. 3. I do not wish to say that in no case is a plaintiff entitled to judgment, either with or without execution. But no special circumstances have been brought before us by Mr. Bruce to induce us to allow the plaintiff to sign judgment. He puts his case upon the broad ground of principle, that, an admission having been made, he is entitled to judgment. This is not the true principle. I do not cast any doubt on the case of Showell v. Bowron (ubi sup.). The counter-claim in that case may have been a frivolous one, without any connection with the plaintiff's claim, and only set up for the purpose of putting off the evil day, and the court may have ordered the money to be paid into court in order to secure to the plaintiff the amount of his claim. This motion must be refused.

MATHEW, J.—I am of the same opinion. Mr. Bruce was constrained to admit that on his construction of Order XL., r. 11, he was entitled not only to judgment, but also to execution. Order XL., r. 11, applies only where final redress upon any admission can be given to a party, and which cannot be effected or altered in any way by any subsequent verdict or judgment. Mr. Bruce says, I am entitled as of right to final judgment. I cannot agree to that contention. Order XL., r. 11, refers to a different class of cases that chiefly occur in Chancery It in no way controls the earlier rule (rule 3 of Order XIX.), by which the defendant is entitled to set up and plead a counter-claim in answer to a claim. If Mr. Bruce's contention is right, it would equally apply to a set-off As to the case of Showell v. Bowron (ubi sup.), I can only assume that there the court exercised their discretion in a particular way, having regard to the nature of that counter-claim. In this case the application was practically gone into at chambers on an application under Order XIV., r. 1, when it was refused. This application cannot be granted.

Motion refused.

DICK AND PAGE v. BADART FRÈRES. (a)

Dock—Bye-law—Validity of—Ultra vires—Power to exclude "lumpers" not employed by dock company from company's premises—Harbours, Docks, and Piers Clauses Act 1847—10 Vict. c. 27, ss. 33, 81, 82, 83—27 Vict. c. xxxi., ss. 9, 90, 101, 102, and 115.

By the Harbours, Docks, and Piers Clauses Act 1847, s. 33, it was provided that upon payment of the authorised rates, the harbour, dock, and pier should be open to all persons for shipping and unshipping goods. By sect. 83 of the same Act, it was provided that the undertakers might make bye-laws (inter alia) for regulating the shipping and unshipping of all goods within the limits of the undertakers' premises; for regulating the duties and conduct of all persons, as well servants of the undertakers as others, who should be employed on the undertakers' premises; for regulating the duties and conduct of the porters and carriers employed on the undertakers' premises, and fixing the rates to be paid to them. The S. dock company, whose special-Act (27 Vict. c. xxxi.) incorporated the Harbours, Docks, and Piers Clauses Act 1847, made a bye-law excluding from their premises or any vessel therein certain labourers, called "lumpers," unless specially authorised by them.

Held, on further consideration, that such bye-law was ultra vires and invalid.

THIS action was tried at the London Michaelmas Sittings at Guildhall before Cave, J. and a common jury.

The jury found a verdict on the question of fact submitted to them, but the learned judge reserved the point of law for further consideration.

The plaintiffs were the owners of the steamship Homer, and she was chartered by Messrs. Grace and Co., of Alexandria, by a charter party dated the 7th Jan. 1882, whereby the ship was to go to Alexandria, and there load a cargo of cotton seed, and then proceed to a safe port in the United Kingdom, according to orders, freight to be paid in cash as therein provided, eleven working days (weather permitting) to be allowed the charterers for loading and discharging the ship, and ten days on demurrage, if required, at 6*d.* per gross register ton per day. The ship was accordingly loaded at Alexandria, and the cargo was shipped under a bill of lading, dated the 24th Feb. 1882, by which the cargo was to be delivered at the Surrey Commercial Docks to Messrs. John Peel and Co. or their assigns, and which stated that four working days (weather permitting) remained for the discharge of the cargo. The bill of lading was duly indorsed to the defendants.

The ship arrived on the 16th March, and notice was given to the defendants that this ship would be ready to discharge on the morning of Friday, the 17th March.

The plaintiffs gave the dock company notice that they would discharge the cargo by their own crew and by their own "lumpers" (i.e., labourers). The plaintiffs were bound to provide men to deliver the cargo over the ship's side; the defendants were bound to provide weights, scales, and weighers. The defendants asked the dock company to provide weights, scales, and weighers, to weigh out the cargo.

The dock company refused to provide weights, scales, and weighers, unless the plaintiff discharged the cargo by the dock company's servants and "lumpers.

In consequence of this refusal on the part of the dock company a delay of two days beyond the lay days occurred, and the plaintiff, on Monday, the 20th March, allowed the cargo to be discharged by the dock company's own servants. The plaintiffs claimed 64*l.* 4*s.* as demurrage in respect of this delay. The defendants contended that the delay was occasioned solely by the acts and default of the plaintiffs, and that the unloading was prevented by the plaintiffs not complying with the dock company's bye-laws:

The defendants relied on the following bye-laws

E

made under sect. 83 of the Harbour, Docks, and Piers Clauses Act 1847, and sect 90 of the company's special Act, which were as follows:—

1. No lumpers are allowed to work on board any vessel in the docks, or on the wharves or premises of the company, but such as are authorised by the company, unless permission in writing be previously obtained from the superintendent. And for every breach of this bye-law the person offending is liable to a penalty of not exceeding 5*l*.

2. Only servants of the dock company are allowed to perform any work within the dock premises, whether on ship, lighter, or on shore, with the following exceptions; Crews discharging the cargoes of their own ships. Stevedores and their men (when sanctioned by the company). Lightermen and carmen delivering or receiving goods, and lightermen navigating their craft.

The jury found that the dock company's refusal to provide weights, scales, and weighers prevented the discharge of the cargo. The case was reserved for further consideration upon the question whether the bye-laws set out above were valid or not.

By 10 Vict. c. 27, s, 33:

Upon payment of the rates made payable by this and the special Act, and subject to the other provisions thereof, the harbour, dock, and pier shall be open to all persons for the shipping and unshipping of goods, and the embarking and landing of passengers.

By sect. 81:

Where under the special Act the undertakers shall have the appointment of meters and weighers, the undertakers may appoint and licence a sufficient number of persons to be meters and weighers within the limits of the harbour, dock, and pier, and remove any such persons at their pleasure, and may make regulations for their government, and fix reasonable rates to be paid, or other remuneration to be made to them for weighing and measuring goods.

By sect. 82:

When a sufficient number of meters and weighers have been appointed by the undertakers, under the powers of this and the special Act, the master of any vessel, or the owner of any goods . . . . shall not employ any person other than a weigher or meter licensed by the undertakers, or appointed by the Commissioners of Her Majesty's Customs, to weigh or measure the same.

By sect. 83:

The undertakers may from time to time make such bye-laws as they shall think fit for all or any of the following purposes: (that is to say,)

For regulating the use of the harbour, dock, or pier;

For regulating the shipping and unshipping, landing, warehousing, stowing, depositing, and removing of all goods within the limits of the harbour, dock, or pier, and the premises of the undertakers:

For regulating the duties and conduct of all persons, as well the servants of the undertakers as others, not being officers of customs or excise, who shall be employed in the harbour, dock, or pier, and the premises of the undertakers:

For regulating the duties and conduct of the porters and carriers employed on the premises of the undertakers, and fixing the rates to be paid to them for carrying any goods, articles, or things, from or to the same:

. . . . provided always, that such bye-laws shall not be repugnant with the laws of that part of the United Kingdom where the same are to have effect, or the provisions of this or the special Act.

The Harbours, Docks, and Piers Clauses Act 1847, save so far as the clauses thereof are by this Act excepted or varied, is incorporated with this Act.

By sect. 90:

In addition to the power of making, altering, and repealing bye-laws contained in the Acts incorporated with this Act, the company may from time to time make, alter, and repeal such bye-laws, rules, and regulations as they think fit for the following purposes:

. . . . For regulating the conduct of all persons who shall enter, remain, or be employed in or about the works, or in or about any vessel therein.

By sect. 101:

The company from time to time may demand and take in respect of vessels entering or using the docks any sums not exceeding the rates specified in schedule (C.) to this Act.

By sect. 102:

The company from time to time may demand and take for all goods comprised in schedule (D.) to this Act, which shall be shipped or landed, received or delivered, at the docks, any sums not exceeding the rates mentioned in such schedule, and for all other goods any sums not exceeding the rates charged by other dock companies in the Port of London with respect to like goods.

By sect. 115:

The company may from time to time appoint and license so many persons as the company think sufficient to be meters and weighers within the limits of the docks.

Finlay, Q.C. and A. Gray, for the plaintiffs; Mellor Q.C. and Hollams, for the defendants.

The arguments appear sufficiently in the judgment of the learned judge.

CAVE, J.—This case is of very great importance to the dock company; but, after a very full and able discussion, I do not think that there is anything to be gained by taking time to consider my judgment, and so I shall at once proceed to state it. The real question I have to decide is, whether the bye-law now under discussion (because I consider that the second bye-law does not, for the purposes of this case, carry the matter further than the first bye-law) is a valid one or not. [The learned Judge read the bye-law.] The answer to this question depends upon whether the making of this bye-law is within the powers conferred upon the dock company by the Harbours, Docks, and Pier Clauses Act 1847, or by their special Act. The special Act incorporates the public Act. Sect. 83 of the public Act empowers the dock company to make bye-laws for the special purposes therein stated. Sect. 33 of the same Act is as follows: [The learned Judge read the section.] By this section the harbour, dock, and pier are to be open not only to the shipowner and the owner of goods, but also to their servants, whether engaged by the shipowner solely for duty in the dock, or engaged for other duties. Primâ facie, therefore, we ought to expect no bye-law which would exclude from the premises of the dock company any class of men. I now come to consider the words of sect. 83. Mr. Mellor relies on the words in the 4th clause of that section. This clause, say the defendants, gives the dock company power to make this bye-law. In my opinion it does not. It only provides that rules may be made to control the shipping or unshipping of goods, but does not affect the question as to who may be employed to ship or unship them. Then the 6th clause has been strongly relied on by the defendants. Now, it seems to me perfectly clear that when the section gives power to regulate the duties and conduct of all persons, whether servants of the dock company or others, the power so given cannot be used to exclude those very persons from the dock company's premises. A bye-law, made under this clause, which provided that only persons of good character were to be employed, or that contained provisions of a similar nature, could be good; but not so a bye-law excluding such persons. I come, then, to the conclusion that this bye-law is not warranted by the 6th clause, and I am unable to find any other clause or section by which it can be supported. The special Act, by sect. 115, empowers the dock company to appoint and license meters and weighers, and the public Act, by sect. 81 enables the dock company to fix reasonable rates to be paid to them; and sect. 82 of the public act prohibits the master of any vessel or the owner of any goods from employing a meter or weigher other than those so licensed. This section shows very strongly that, but for this express prohibition, the shipowner or goods owner might employ meters and weighers of their own. There are no similar clauses or sections taking away the shipowner's right to employ "lumpers." Hence sect. 33 is expressly applicable, and there is nothing in the Act to qualify it in the sense that this bye-law strives to do, and hence "lumpers" not employed or authorised by the dock company can come upon the dock premises to discharge their duties. Lastly, the last clause (10) in sect. 83, for regulating the duties and conduct of porters and carriers, and fixing the rates to be paid to them, extends to "lumpers" not employed by the dock company. The special Act fixes certain rates as a maximum. Mr. Finlay has pointed out, and this confirms me in my opinion, that the special Act does not limit in any way the charges for loading and unloading goods; hence if the dock company have the power of preventing any persons, not being their own servants, from loading or unloading, the dock company have the power of charging what they please for this class of work. There must be judgment for the plaintiff.

JOHNSTON AND CO. v. HOGG AND OTHERS. (a)

Marine insurance—Policy—Vessel warranted free from capture and seizure—Temporary seizure for purposes of plunder—Constructive total loss.

The word "seizure" in a policy of marine insurance, in which the ship is "warranted free from capture and seizure and the consequences of any attempt thereat," includes a temporary seizure of the ship for the purpose of plundering the cargo, whereby the ship becomes a constructive total loss.

A ship owned by the plaintiffs during the continuance of the risk covered by a policy with the above warranty, which the defendants had underwritten, got ashore on the African coast, and was forcibly taken possession of by natives, who ripped up the deck and plundered the cargo, and then deserted the ship.

The plaintiffs brought an action on the policy of insurance. The defendants contended that the loss was a loss by seizure within the meaning of the warranty. It was admitted that the ship thereby became a constructive total loss, and that due notice of abandonment had been given.

The jury found that the natives took possession of the ship to plunder the cargo, and not for the purpose of keeping her.

Held, that this seizure, though only temporary, was a "seizure" within the meaning of the words in the warranty, and that the defendants were not liable.

THIS case was tried during the London Michaelmas Sittings at the Guildhall, before Cave, J. and a common jury, and was reserved for further consideration.

Powell v. Hyde. 26 T. L. Rep. O. S. 74; 5 E. & B. 607; 25 L. J. 65 Q. B.

The facts and arguments appear sufficiently in the judgment.

Cur. adv. vult.

March 21,—CAVE, J.—The plaintiffs in this case were the owners of a vessel called the Cypriot; and they sued the defendants, underwriters at Lloyd's, on a policy of insurance effected on that vessel, alleging that she had been lost by perils insured against. The plaintiffs had in the policy warranted the vessel free from capture and seizure and the consequences of any attempt thereat, and the defence was that the loss was a loss by seizure within the meaning of that warranty. It was admitted by the parties that the Cypriot during the continuance of the risk became a constructive total loss by reason of the proceedings of and damage done by the natives as described in the examination of the master; that due notice of abandonment was given; and that the only issue to be tried was whether the loss was a loss by any of the perils from which the vessel was warranted free. From the examination of Edward Laidlow, it appeared that on the 7th Oct. 1879 the Cypriot got ashore while going down the Brass River. On the following day the natives took forcible possession of the ship, drove away the master and crew, and plundered the vessel in the manner there described. The consequence was, as stated in the admissions, that the ship became a constructive total loss. The jury found that the natives seized the vessel for the purpose of plundering the cargo, and not for the purpose of keeping her.

It was contended for the plaintiffs that to constitute a seizure of a vessel there must be a taking possession with intent to keep it as one's own, and not merely for purposes of plunder; and in support of this contention certain passages from well-known text writers were cited. In Phillips on Insurance, 3rd edit., vol. 1, sect. 1108, it is said speaking of loss by capture, that "by capture is meant the taking possession of property with the purpose of appropriating it to the captor's own use, by which it is distinguished from a mere detention with the design of ultimately liberating the property, as in the case of an embargo." For this position the case of Black v. Marine Insurance Company (11 Johnson's American Rep. 287) is cited. The author also says: "A seizure is equivalent to a capture, as it is made with the intention of depriving the owner of his property in the subject." But a little further on, sect. 1110, the author remarks: "The word 'capture' is of itself broad enough to comprehend any forcible seizure, arrest, or detention, which may be lawfully insured against." Moreover, in Black v. Marine Insurance Company, the court said: "Seizure may, in general, be applicable to a taking or detention for the violation of some municipal regulation." In Marshall on Insurance, 4th edit., p. 394, it is said: "Capture is when a ship is subdued and taken by an enemy in open war, or by way of reprisals, or by a pirate, and with intent to deprive the owner of it. Capture may be with intent to possess both ship and cargo, or only to seize the goods of the enemy, or contraband goods, which are on board a neutral ship. The former is a capture of the ship in the proper sense of the word; the latter is only an arrest and detention, without any design to deprive the owner of it." In Parsons on Insurance, vol. 1, p. 584, it is stated that "'Capture,' or its equivalent 'seizure,' means a taking with intent to keep: 'arrest' or 'detention,' a taking with intent to return the thing taken, as where a ship is arrested by an embargo, or stopped for search, or detained in a port by an actual blockade thereof, or perhaps by being lawfully restrained from entering her port of destination." At another page, p. 576, the author says: "If a seizure which (becomes a capture, if it be intended to take from the owner the property seized), &c.," which is hardly consistent with the previous definition of seizure.

Several cases were cited which had but a very remote bearing on the point in dispute. The only one it is necessary to mention is that of Rodocanachi v. Elliott (28 L. T. Rep. N. S. 840; 2 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 21; L. Rep. 8 C. P. 649), in which case Brett, L.J.—then Brett, J.—in the course of his judgment says (at p. 848 of L. T. Rep. and at p. 670 of L. Rep.): "Capture means the hostile seizure of goods with intent to deprive the owner of them;" upon which it is to be observed that, in the opinion of that learned judge, seizure plus the intent to deprive the owner of goods is equivalent to capture; from which it follows that the intent to deprive the owner of the goods is not implied in the word "seizure." The ordinary and natural meaning of "seizure" is a forcible taking possession. This was admitted by Mr Butt; but he contended that the word "seizure" had acquired a peculiar connotation in insurance law, and was in fact a technical term involving an intent by the person seizing to keep possession of the vessel as his own. In support of this proposition he relied on the passages above cited, and submitted that in this case what the natives had done was an arrest and not a seizure. In my opinion the word "seizure" must be taken in its ordinary and natural meaning, and is not a term of art. The passages I have cited from Phillips certainly do not prove that the word has any technical meaning; and the case of Black v. Marine Insurance Company (ubi sup.), which that author cites in support of his view as to the meaning of capture, shows, if anything, that seizure is a general term capable of a very wide meaning. Marshall seems to recognise two meanings of the word "capture," but certainly does not assert that the more restricted meaning is that in which alone the word is understood in insurance law. The passages from Parsons are not more definite: and that from the judgment of Brett, L.J. is rather in favour of the defendants. The seeming confusion in some of these passages arises from the desire of the authors in question to give a distinct and different meaning to such words as "capture," "seizure," "arrest," "detention," "restraint;" and the impossibility of accomplishing the task is shown by their attempts to distinguish between "arrest," "restraint," and "detention." I have no doubt that the word "seizure," like many other words, is sometimes used with a more general, and sometimes with a more restricted meaning; and whether it is used in a particular case with the one meaning or the other depends not on any general rule, but on the context and the circumstances of the case.

This brings me to the consideration of the policy sued on, and after reading it carefully I cannot find any indication that the word "seizure" is used in any but its ordinary and general signification. Indeed the words "free from capture and seizure, and the consequence of any attempt thereat, point to the more general meaning of the word "seizure," since, in the case of an unsuccessful attempt at seizure, it must obviously be difficult to say what the intention was of those who made the attempt. In this particular case, if the natives had been beaten off by the master and crew, it would have been far from easy to determine what their intention was with regard to the vessel, although it might have been easy to determine what their intention was with regard to the cargo. As to the contention that there was an arrest, the action of the natives cannot, to my mind, be correctly so described; although, if their act amounted to a seizure, it is immaterial whether it was or was not an arrest, unless these terms are mutually exclusive, which I do not think they are. In truth the natives neither intended to keep possession of the vessel as their own, nor to return it to the owners. Their object was plunder, and to facilitate that object they seized the vessel, not caring what became of it after their main object—that of plunder—was effected. Being clearly of opinion that the acts of the natives amounted to a seizure within the meaning of the warranty, I must direct the verdict and judgment to be entered for the defendants with costs.

THE CRICKET; THE ENDEAVOUR. (a).

Limited liability — Collision — Liability of part owners.

In an action by shipowners to limit their liability in respect of a collision with their vessel, and where it appeared that the master, who was on board at the time of the collision, was a part owner, and the collision occurred without the negligence or privity of the remainder of the owners, they have a right to have their liability limited, with a reservation of any right of action there may be against the master personally in respect of his negligence.

THIS was an action brought by the owners of the Cricket, a barque of 320 58 tons register, against the owners, master, and crew of the steam-tug Endeavour, for limitation of liability in respect of a collision between these vessels.

The Cricket, while on a voyage from Middlesboro' to Parnahiba, in the Brazils, came into collision on the 1st Dec. 1881 with the steam-tug Endeavour, then lying at anchor off Kingstown. Shortly afterwards the Endeavour sank, and was lost, with her coal, provisions, and sundry effects of her master and crew, but no loss of life or personal injury was thereby sustained.

On the 3rd Dec. 1881 an action in rem was commenced by the owners of the Endeavour against the present plaintiffs. The present plaintiffs entered an appearance in that action, and admitted their liability for the damages caused by the collision subject to a reference to the registrar and merchants to assess the amount.

The registrar, by his report dated the 8th March 1882, found that there was due to the owners of the Endeavour 3112*l.* 3*s.* 6*d.* and interest.

The plaintiffs in the present action, in their statement of claim, pleaded that the collision was not caused by or with the actual fault or privity of any of the plaintiffs, and that the registered tonnage of the Cricket calculated according to the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Acts was 320.58 tons and no more. The plaintiffs offered to pay into court the sum of 2564*l.* 13*s.*, being 8*l.* per ton on the registered tonnage together with interest.

The defendants alleged that the collision was caused by the negligence of one of the plaintiffs who was on board the Cricket at the time, being the master and a part owner.

The plaintiffs produced the managing owner as a witness, who proved that he was the owner of twenty-four sixty-fourth shares, and that the other shares were held by other plaintiffs, but that none of the plaintiffs save the master, James Cranch, were on board at the time of the collision.

Hall, Q C. (with him Nelson), for the defendants, submitted that in order to exempt the plaintiffs from liability beyond 8*l.* per ton, they ought to show that the loss and damage occurred without the fault or privity of the owners or any of them. There was no evidence that James Cranch had not been guilty of negligence, although he was one of the owners and master at the time of the collision. After the owners have paid 8*l.* per ton the master is liable in personam for the difference.

Phillimore, for the plaintiffs, contra.—The fact of the master being owner does not affect the question of limited liability:

The Spirit of the Ocean, 12 L. T. Rep. N. S. 239; 2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 192.

Even where one of the owners is master and has occasioned the loss by his negligence, the other owners are not liable beyond the statutory limit:

Wilson v. Dickson, 2 Barn. & Ald. 2.

Hall in reply.—All that was decided in Wilson v. Dickson (ubi sup.) was, that where owners are sued collectively the fact that one of them is personally responsible for the collision will not deprive them, as a body, of their right to limit their liability. Under any circumstances the decree ought not to preclude the defendants from their right of recovery against J. Cranch, and I would suggest that, if the court should decide against my contention, words should be inserted in the decree reserving my right against that plaintiff.

Sir R. PHILLIMORE pronounced that the owners of the vessel Cricket were entitled to limited liability according to the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 and the Merchant Shipping Act 1862, and that, in respect of loss or damage to ships, goods, merchandise, or other things, caused by reason of the improper navigation of the said vessel Cricket on the occasion of the collision between that vessel and the steamship the Endeavour on the 1st Dec. 1881 the owners of the said vessel Cricket were answerable in damages to an amount not exceeding 2564*l.* 13*s.*, and such sum being at the rate of 8*l.* for each ton of the registered tonnage of the said vessel Cricket without deduction on account of engine room, without prejudice to any right of action the defendants might have against the plaintiff James Cranch, the master of the said vessel. And he ordered that the defendant should have his costs.

Collision—Lights — Speed—Regulations for preventing collisions—Infringement—Arts. 3, 18.

A steamship, approaching another vessel so as to involve risk of collision, may be justified in keeping her engines going full speed ahead, where she is placed in a position of danger by the neglect of the other vessel to exhibit one of her lights whilst showing the other.

THIS was an action in rem, instituted by the owners of the steamship Gerarda against the barque Benares and her freight to recover the damages sustained by the Gerarda in a collision which took place between that vessel and the

Benares on the 24th Oct. 1882 in the English Channel.

The case on behalf of the plaintiffs was, that the Gerarda, a steamship of 1082 tons register, bound at the time of the collision on a voyage from Shields to Genoa with a crew of twenty-three hands and a cargo of coals, was, shortly before 3 30 a.m. on the 24th Oct. 1882, in the English Channel, the St. Catherine's Light bearing about N.W. ½ W., the wind being a strong breeze from about the south. The Gerarda was at the time under steam, making about seven knots and heading about W. by N. Under these circumstances those on board the Gerarda observed a green light about three-quarters of a mile off, and bearing about a point on the port bow, and immediately after what appeared to be a white light was seen near the green light. The helm of the Gerarda was then starboarded and steadied, and the two vessels were thus brought green light to green light. Directly afterwards the vessel herself (which proved to be the Benares) was seen at no great distance, and it was also seen that, though no red light was visible, the port side of the Benares was open, and there was danger of collision. The helm of the Gerarda was at once put hard-a-starboard, and her engines kept going to assist the helm, and she paid off quickly; but the Benares coming on struck the Gerarda on the starboard side abaft the engine room, cutting her down below the water's edge, and some hours afterwards the Gerarda sank, a portion of her crew saving themselves by climbing on board the Benares before the vessels separated.

In the statement of defence it was alleged that, under the circumstances aforesaid, the Benares, a four-masted iron barque of 1646 tons register, was in the English Channel off the Isle of Wight bound on a voyage from Calcutta to London. She was proceeding under topsail and main top-gallant sail and fore-topmast staysail, steering on E. by S. course and making about six knots. A good look out was being kept on board, and her regulation lights were burning brightly and duly exhibited. Under these circumstances the mast-head light of the Gerarda was seen about a point on the port bow and from three to four miles distant. Shortly afterwards the red light was seen and then the green light, the red light being shut in. The Benares was kept on her course until a collision was inevitable, when her helm was put hard-a-starboard in order to ease the blow, but immediately afterwards the vessels came into collision as above described. The defendants alleged that the collision was caused by the Gerarda, which was a steamer, improperly neglecting to keep out of the way of the Benares, and they counter-claimed for the damage sustained by their vessel.

The action came on for trial on the 16th Nov., when witnesses were examined on both sides.

The main point in dispute was whether the Benares had her red light exhibited or not. The plaintiffs' witnesses stated that when they got on board the Benares after the collision they saw that the red light was not in its proper place, but was actually in the lamp house, and had just been trimmed or was being trimmed. This was denied by the defendants' witnesses, who stated that it was in its place, and burning brightly.

Butt, Q.C. (with him W. G. F. Phillimore) for the plaintiff.—The evidence is conclusive that the Benares had no red light, and, further, that her green light was not in its proper place. The regulations for preventing collisions have thus been infringed, and it was this infringement which caused the collision. The fact that the Gerarda kept her engines going is, under the circumstances, justifiable.

C. Hall, Q.C. (with him Bucknill and Kennedy) for the defendants.—It was the duty of the Gerarda, being a steamer, to keep out of the way of the Benares. This she failed to do, because a good look-out was not kept on board of her. She admits that she kept her engines going through-out. The Benares had her proper side lights duly exhibited.

Butt, Q.C. in reply.

Sir ROBERT PHILLIMORE.—This is a case of collision which took place about 3.30 a.m. on Tuesday the 24th Oct. in this year between a steamship and a sailing ship in the English Channel. The direction of the wind was about south. The vessels which came into collision were a screw steamship called the Gerarda, of 1082 tons register, bound from Shields to Genoa with a crew of twenty-three hands and a cargo of coals, and a four-masted iron barque of 1646 tons register called the Benares, on a voyage from Calcutta to London, laden with a general cargo and manned by a crew of thirty-two hands all told. The Benares ran into the starboard side of the Gerarda abaft the engine room and sank her. The action in this case was brought by the owners of the Gerarda, who contended that the collision was caused by the Benares not having a red light duly exhibited and burning. On the other hand the defendants contended that the collision was caused by the improper navigation of the Gerarda which, being a steamer, should have kept out of the way of the Benares. Now, undoubtedly it was the duty of the Gerarda, being a steamship, to get out of the way of the Benares, but it was also the corresponding duty of the Benares to exhibit a proper red light in order to apprise the Gerarda of her position. We are of opinion that the evidence establishes that a red light was not duly exhibited on board the Benares. It is to be borne in mind that the Gerarda was entitled to have a red light exhibited not only at the time of the collision, or a few minutes before, but also for a reasonable time before the happening of the collision, in order that the Gerarda might be enabled to properly conduct her navigation. This being so, we are of opinion that the Benares was to blame for the absence of this red light. Now as to the statement of defence and counter-claim of the Benares, it simply comes to this, that a good look-out was not kept on board the Gerarda. A careful consideration of the evidence leads us to a contrary conclusion. We think there was a proper look-out kept on board the Gerarda. It now remains to be considered whether the Gerarda was or was not to blame for continuing her speed of seven knots an hour after there was danger of collision. It was the duty of the steamer under the rule to slacken her speed, unless it is shown that the circumstances of the case made a departure from the regulation necessary. Now, in our opinion, the Gerarda, having seen the green light only, was right in starboarding and in keeping on at full speed, this departure from the regulations on the part of the Gerarda being necessary to avoid collision. Had the Gerarda seen the red light of the Benares, this departure from the regulations for preventing collisions would not have been justified. The more the case is considered the more clearly it appears that the absence of the red light on board the Benares was the sole cause of the collision. Accordingly, I pronounce the Benares alone to blame for the collision.

THE UNITED SERVICE. (a)

Towage—Contract—Implied term—Notice restricting liability—Statutory bye-law—Negligence—Damage—Stranding—The Harbours, Docks, and Piers Clauses Act 1847—the Great Yarmouth Port and Haven Act 1866.

A term in a towage contract by which owners of tugs exempt themselves from liability as to damage or loss occasioned by the negligence or default of their servants, covers damage occasioned in consequence of the act of the master taking in tow too many vessels at a time in contravention of a regularly constituted bye-law of the port in which the towage takes place, even where the number of vessels causes the tug to be of insufficient power for the service.

The steam-tug U. S. was engaged to tow the R. R. down the river at Y., and out to sea. As the U. S. proceeded she took other vessels in tow, eventually having seven in tow at the same time. By a regulation made by the harbour or pier master under the Harbours, Docks and Piers Clauses Act 1847 and the Great Yarmouth Port and Haven Act 1866, a tug is forbidden to take more than six vessels in tow at the same time. The owner of the R. R. had previously to the towage received a notice from the owners of the U. S. exempting them from any liability in respect of any damage caused by the negligence or default of their servants, which was admitted to form part of the towage contract. On the way out to sea the pier master warned the master of the tug that he had too many vessels in tow. The tug nevertheless proceeded, and when at the entrance of the harbour the R. R. stranded, and became a total wreck.

Held, that the owners of the U. S. were protected by their notice from liabilty for the damage to the R. R.

THIS was an action brought by the owners of the fishing smack Red Rose to recover damages for injuries sustained whilst being towed by the tug United Service.

The plaintiff's re-amended statement of claim was so far as is material as follows :

1. The plaintiff was on the 2nd Nov. 1881 the owner of the fishing smack Red Rose of the port and harbour of Great Yarmouth, which is a harbour within the meaning of the Harbours, Docks, and Piers Clauses Act 1847.

2. The defendants are the owners of steam-tugs in the same port, and, among others, of the steam-tug United Service.

3. On the afternoon of the 3rd Nov. 1881, the United Service was lying moored at the quay at Great Yarmouth, alongside the brigantine Hannah, when the plaintiff requested the master of the United Service to take in tow the Red Rose and tow her to sea. The United Service shortly afterwards came down the river and harbour at Yarmouth, towing the Hannah to sea, and when alongside the Red Rose a line was sent by the master of the United Service on board the Red Rose, to which the Red Rose's crew made the latter's tow rope fast. This tow rope was then hauled on board the United Service and made fast, and the United Service proceeded to tow the Hannah and Red Rose side by side.

4. This is the ordinary way in which contracts for towage to sea are made by the defendants' servants on their behalf. In the absence of mention of any special sum there is a usual towage price, which the owner of the towed vessel thereby binds himself to pay, and the servants of the defendants show that they undertake the towage by sending their line on board the vessel to be towed.

5. Shortly after the Red Rose had been thus taken in tow, two other vessels were taken in tow by the United Service, and were towed side by side astern of the Hannah and the Red Rose.

6. The wind was from about south by east half east, blowing strong into the entrance of the river, and the tide was flood. In these circumstances the United Service had not, though her engines and machinery were in good order, power enough to tow more than the vessels she had in tow. Notwithstanding this, the United Service proceeded to take in tow, besides the four vessels already mentioned, two other vessels, which were arranged side by side behind the two previous vessels and finally a seventh vessel.

7. This seventh vessel was taken in tow in breach of one of the directions or regulations duly given or made by the harbour master or pier master, under the Harbours, Docks, and Piers Clauses Act 1847, and the special Act, the Great Yarmouth Port and Haven Act 1866. Such direction or regulation is as follows : "No steam vessel used for the purpose of towing vessels shall, at any one and the same time, tow, or have in tow, or aid or assist in towing, more than six vessels, and that such vessels in tow shall not, at any time, exceed more than two vessels abreast." Public notice is given of these directions and regulations, which are well known to the plaintiff and to the defendants, and to ship owners at Great Yarmouth generally, and were binding upon the defendants and their servants.

8. As the vessels approached the mouth of the harbour the wind and tide and the sea meeting them proved too strong for the United Service with so many vessels in tow, and she was unable to make head against the wind, tide, and sea, by reason of the number of the vessels in tow, and her crew, though a sufficient crew, were not numerous enough to get and keep all the ropes of the vessels in tow, in their proper positions over the stern, and several of the vessels in tow, including the Red Rose, were carried out of their course on the north shore and took the ground, and the Red Rose in particular so took the ground that she could not be got off, and became a total wreck, and was lost.

9. The master of the United Service, in taking and keeping so many vessels in tow, disobeyed the directions of the harbour master and pier master, and did not regulate his vessel according to the directions of the harbour master and pier master, made in conformity with the Harbours, Docks, and Piers Clauses Act 1847, and the special Act, for as much as he did not obey the directions and regulations mentioned in paragraph 7, which had been duly served upon him, or of which he had notice; and further, forasmuch as he disobeyed or neglected to comply with the oral directions of the harbour master and pier master, directing him that he had too many vessels in tow, and requiring him to leave some of them at the pier and tow them out afterwards.

10. The plaintiff claims to recover the damage occasioned by such wreck and loss.

11. The defendants rely upon the following notice given by them :

"Notice to shipowners, fishing boat owners, shipmasters, and others. The Great Yarmouth Steam-tug Company, Limited, owners of steam-tugs, Victoria, United Service, Express, Meteor, Sailor, Star, Pilot, and Andrew Woodhouse, respectfully give notice that they will tow vessels, boats, or other crafts by the above named steam-tugs on the following conditions only: That they are not to be answerable or accountable for any loss or damage whatever which may happen to or be occasioned by any vessel, boat, or any of the cargoes on board of the same while such vessel, boat, or craft is in tow of either of the steam-tugs in the river or at sea, and whether arising from or occasioned by any supposed negligence or default of them or their servants, or defect or imperfections in the said steam-tugs or either of them, or the machinery or any other part of the same, or any delay, stoppage, or slackness of the speed of the same however occasioned, or for what purpose wheresoever taking place, and that the owner or persons interested in the vessels, boats or crafts or of the cargoes on board the same so towing, undertake, bear, satisfy and indemnify the said tug owners against the same."

12. The plaintiff admits the receipt of this notice, and admits that it formed part of the contract between him and the defendants, but he says that the defendants are not protected against his claim by the terms of this notice.

13. The plaintiff says that there was an implied contract in law that the United Service would not undertake a work beyond her power to perform, and a further implied contract in law that she would not act unlawfully or in disobedience of the above mentioned printed or written and oral directions and regulations to the detriment of the plaintiff, and a further implied contract that her master would regulate his vessel in accordance with the directions of the pier master or harbour master.

14. The plaintiff further maintains that the breach of duty or misconduct of the master of the United Service in taking an excessive number of vessels in tow was not one of the matters excepted by the said notice.

The defendants in their statement of defence to the re-amended statement of claim, pleaded as follows:

1. With reference to the 6th paragraph of the amended statement of claim, the defendants deny that in the circumstances therein stated the United Service had not power enough to tow more than the vessels which she then had in tow. On the contrary the United Service had power enough to tow all the vessels which she took in tow.

2. With reference to the 7th paragraph of the amended statement of claim, the defendants deny that the said vessel was taken in tow in breach of the said bye-law or regulation. They deny that the said bye-laws or regulations were duly made by the authorities of the harbour, or that the same were made under the Harbours, Docks, and Piers Clauses Act 1847, and they deny that such bye-law or regulation was in the words or to the effect set forth in the 7th paragraph. The defendants further say that the said bye-law or regulation was ultra vires and invalid, and was not binding upon the defendants or their servants.

3. Even if the defendants were guilty of the alleged breach of the bye-law, and injury to the Red Rose resulted from the alleged breach, nevertheless no cause of action thereby accrued to the plaintiff, nor did he become entitled hereby to maintain this action against the defendants to recover damages for an injury resulting from such alleged breach of the said bye-law.

4. The alleged injury to the Red Rose was not the consequence of the alleged breach of the said bye-law, nor was the same caused by the United Service taking in tow more than six vessels.

5. With reference to the 8th paragraph of the amended statement of claim, the defendants say that the inability of the United Service to make head against the wind, tide, and sea was not caused by the number of the vessels in tow, or by her crew not being numerous enough to get and keep all the ropes of the vessel in tow in their proper position over the stern, or by any negligent act or omission on the part of the defendants or their servants.

6. The crew on board the Red Rose set too much canvas on her, and let her get too much to leeward, having regard to the direction and force of the wind and her relative position towards the United Service and the other vessels then in tow, and thereby materially contributed to the stranding of the Red Rose.

7. The injury to the Red Rose was also brought about by the negligence and improper conduct of the crews on board the Dolphin, Flash, and Galatea, then also in tow, setting too much canvas, and also in steering those vessels so as to let them go too much to leeward.

8. With reference to the 9th paragraph of the amended statement of claim, the defendants deny that the master of the United Service disobeyed any verbal directions of the harbour master or pier master, or that the master failed to regulate his vessel according to the directions mentioned in the said paragraph. The defendants deny that even if the harbour master or pier master did give any such directions the same were heard or understood by the master of the United Service, and they deny that even if the said directions had been obeyed, such obedience would have averted the stranding of the Red Rose; on the contrary, such obedience would have resulted in the stranding of all the smacks then in tow. Even if the master of the United Service did disobey the said verbal directions of the harbour master or pier master, nevertheless no cause of action accrued thereby to the plaintiff, nor did he become thereby entitled to maintain this action against the defendants to recover damages for an injury resulting from such alleged disobedience of such directions.

9. The defendants do not admit the damage alleged to have been sustained by the plaintiff by the alleged wreck or loss.

10. With reference to the 11th and 12th paragraphs of the amended statement of claim, the defendants rely on the said notice as forming part of the contract between the plaintiff and defendants, and repeat the same, and plead it as a defence to all the matters and causes of action set forth and alleged in the amended statement of claim, and say that the defendants are by the terms of such notice, protected against the claim of the plaintiff.

11. With reference to the 13th paragraph of the amended statement of claim, the defendants say that there was no implied contract in law that the United Service would not act in disobedience of the said directions and regulations to the detriment of the plaintiff and that there was no implied contract in law that the master would regulate his vessel in accordance with the directions of the pier master or harbour master.

12. With reference to the 14th paragraph of the amended statement of claim, the defendants say that the breach of duty or misconduct of the master of the United Service (if any such were committed) in taking more than six vessels in tow was one of the matters excepted by the said notice.

Butt, Q.C (with him Phillimore), in opening the case for the plaintiffs, stated briefly the facts of the case.—The tug United Service had been engaged to tow two vessels (of which the Red Rose was one) out to sea. The tide was then setting up, and the wind about S. by E. As the tug proceeded down the river she took other vessels in tow, and before she breasted the lifeboat house she had six vessels in tow. She then eased and took a seventh in tow astern of the others. As the tug proceeded out to sea the pier master hailed the master of the tug that he had too many vessels in tow, and that he should leave some of them at the pier and return for them when he had taken the remainder out to sea. The master of the tug however said that it was all right, and that he could manage them all. The seventh vessel had been taken in tow in breach of the regulations made by the harbour master or pier master as in the 7th paragraph of the re-amended statement of claim set forth. Besides this, the master of the tug had disobeyed the oral directions of the pier master. The pier master and the harbour master were in the same category in the Act of Parliament (the Harbours, Docks, and Pier Clauses Act 1847, 10 & 11 Vict. c. 27). The authority of the pier master extended up the river, and was collateral with the authority of the harbour master. He further maintained that there was (1) an implied contract in law that the United Service would not undertake a work which was beyond her power to perform; (2) an implied contract in law that she would not act unlawfully or in disobedience of the printed or oral directions and regulations to the detriment of the plaintiff; and (3) an implied contract that her master would regulate his vessel in accordance with the directions of the pier master or harbour master; and further, that the breach of duty or misconduct of the master of the United Service in taking an excessive number of vessels in tow was not one of the matters excepted by the said notice.

Before any evidence was given on either side,

Webster, Q.C. (with him Hall, Q.C. and Witt), for the defendants, submitted that, taking the facts stated by the plaintiffs, and appearing in the statement of claim as admitted, the defendants were thereon entitled to judgment. The plaintiffs admit that the terms of the notice form part of the towage contract. That notice covers all damage, however occasioned. Assuming for sake of argument that the master of the tug by taking a seventh vessel in tow broke the bye-law made by the harbour master or pier master as alleged in the 7th paragraph of the re-amended statement of claim, nevertheless the notice covered the breach of that bye-law. These same regulations and also the notice given by the tug owners have already been discussed:

Symonds v. Pain, 30 L. J. 256, Ex.

The liability of the company was restricted by their notice, which was an express term in the towage contract. A contractor may always exempt himself from a common law liability for negligence by an express term or notice:

Peninsular, &c., Steam Company v. Shand, 12 L. T. Rep. N. S. 809; 2 Mar. Law Cases O. S. 244; 3 Moore P. C. N. S. 272.

Negligence resulting in the infringement of bye-laws or regulations made under the authority of an Act of Parliament or Order in Council can be put on no higher ground than ordinary negligence at common law, because the mere breach of a statute does not give a cause of action:

Stevens v. Jeacocke, 11 Q. B. 731.

The fact that a mere breach of a bye law made under a statute has caused damage does not vest a right of action in the party suffering the damage against the person guilty of the breach:

Atkinson v. Newcastle, &c., Waterworks Company, 36 L. T. Rep. N. S. 761; 2 Ex. Div. 441.

In the present case the tug owners are protected not only from the negligence of the master of the tug, but also from any wilful act and default:

Taubman v. The Pacific Steam Navigation Company, 26 L. T. Rep. N. S. 704; 1 Asp. Mar. Law Cases 336.

Even if the tug owners are not protected by the terms of their notice from liability for the breach of an implied condition precedent, in this case there is no breach of such a condition, for the alleged negligence of the master was committed after the towage contract had commenced:

Steel v. State Line Steamship Company, 37 L. T. Rep. N. S. 333; 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 516; 3 App. Cas. 72.

Butt, Q.C. and Dr. Phillimore, contra, argued that the towage contract was made according to the law at the time existing. Whether determined by statute or otherwise, it was an implied term that the tug should not take more vessels in tow than she was capable of taking in safety. Whether the statute applied or not, the implied term exists: (1 Maude & Pollock, 357.) The owners of the tug could not protect themselves against the unseaworthines of the tug. On the authority of Steele v. State Line Steamship Company (37 L. T. Rep. N. S. 333; 3 App. Cas. 72; 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cases, 516) they argued that there was an implied warranty that the tug should be "tow-worthy."

Webster, Q.C. in reply.

Cur. adv. vult.

Jan. 23.—Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—The question which I have now to decide is an important one, though lying within narrow limits. It arises in an action for breach of contract brought by the owner of a smack against the owners of a steam-tug engaged to tow the smack. The facts which I have to deal with are set forth in the allegations in the plaintiff's statement of claim. They have not been proved, but are admitted as true by the defendants for the sake of argument in order that the legal question which arises may be decided. They are shortly as follows. On the 3rd Nov. 1881 the plaintiff, who was owner of the fishing smack Red Rose, of the port and harbour of Great Yarmouth, requested the master of the steam tug United Service, belonging to the defendants, to tow the Red Rose out to sea. The United Service was at that time lying moored at the quay at Great Yarmouth alongside of a brigantine called the Hannah, and the Red Rose was some little way lower down the river. In compliance with the plaintiff's request, the United Service, being under the command of her master, a servant of the defendants, came down the river and harbour having the Hannah in tow, and when alongside the Red Rose she made that vessel fast to herself, and proceeded seawards, having the Hannah and the Red Rose both in tow side by side. Shortly afterwards two other vessels were taken in tow by the United Service, and were towed side by side of each other, astern of the Hannah and the Red Rose. The wind at this time was blowing strongly into the entrance of the river, and the tide was flood. The engines and machinery of the tug were in good order, and she appeared able to manage the four vessels which she already had in tow, but could do no more. She proceeded, however, to take in tow two other vessels, besides the four already mentioned, and finally a seventh vessel. As the vessels approached the mouth of the harbour the wind and sea proved too strong for the tug with so many vessels in tow; the tow-ropes got out of order, and ultimately the Red Rose was carried out of her course, took the ground so that she could not be got off, and became a total wreck.

For this loss the plaintiff claims damages. The seventh vessel was taken in tow in breach of a regulation duly made by the harbour master or pier master under the Harbours, Docks, and Piers Clauses Act 1847, and the special act, the Great Yarmouth Port and Haven Act 1866, a regulation which forbids a tug to take more than six vessels in tow at once. The master of the tug moreover disobeyed certain oral directions given him by the pier master with regard to the vessels he was towing. Before entering into the towage contract mentioned above, the plaintiffs had received the following notice, issued by the defendants, which, he admits, formed part of the contract: "Notice to shipowners, fishing boat owners, shipmasters, and others.—The Great Yarmouth Steam Tug Company Limited, owners of steam-tugs Victoria, United Service, Express, Meteor, Sailor, Star, Pilot, and Andrew Woodhouse, respectively give notice that they will tow vessels, boats, or other crafts by the above-named steam-tugs on the following conditions only, that they are not to be answerable or accountable for any loss or damage whatever which may happen to or be occasioned by any vessel, boat, or craft, or any of the cargoes on board of the same, while such vessel, boat, or craft is in tow of either of the steam-tugs in the river or at sea, and whether arising from or occasioned by any supposed negligence or default of them or their servants, or defects or imperfections of the said steam-tugs, or either of them, or the machinery, or any other part of the same, or any delay, stoppage, or slackness of the speed of the same, however occasioned or for what purpose wheresoever taking place; and that the owner or persons interested in the vessels, boats, or crafts, or of the cargoes on board the same so towing, undertake, bear, satisfy, and indemnify the said tug owners against the same." The defendants rely upon this notice as protecting them against the plaintiffs claim in respect of the alleged wrong-doing of their servant, the master of the United Service.

The contention of the plaintiff is that the defendants are liable notwithstanding the notice—that it was an implied term of the contract that the master of the tug (1) should obey the regulations framed under the statutory authority, and (2) should under the general law, apart from any statutory rule, take no more vessels in tow than the tug was competent to manage—that this implied condition is in the nature of a warranty, and that a breach of it constitutes something more than the negligence against which the defendants are protected by this notice. According to the argument of the plaintiff's counsel, the negligence referred to in the notice is merely the ordinary negligence of a tug master during the performance of a towage contract, not a breach of a warranty implied in the contract, and that if such warranty was intended to be negatived, the notice should have expressly provided for it. It appears to me that the only point to be decided is whether or not the words in the notice, "negligence or default of . . . their servants," cover the alleged wrong doing of the master of the tug in disobeying the statutory regulations, and the directions of the pier master, and taking in tow more vessels than his tug was competent to manage. It is important to observe that the tug is admitted to have been competent to tow four vessels, and that at the time when the performance of the contract began, and during the first part of such performance, the tug was altogether within her right, the alleged unlawfulness not occurring until the seventh, or at least the fifth and sixth vessels were taken in tow, when part of the contract had already been performed.

Of the authorities cited, I think the case of Steel v. The State Line Steamship Company (3 App. Cas. 72) was most in point. In that case a bill of lading contained a special clause which added negligence of the persons in the service of the ship to the usual excepted perils. Part of the cargo was damaged during the voyage by sea water coming through an insufficiently secured port-hole. It seems to have been considered that if the evidence had established the fact that the deficiency of the port-hole had arisen during the voyage through negligence of the crew and was not due to any defect existing before the departure of the ship from harbour then the ship owners would have been protected by the special clause in the bill of lading. The circumstances of the present case seem to me to be analogous. I am of opinion that the alleged wrong doing, as it arose entirely during the performance of the contract, was "negligence and default" within the meaning of the notice issued by the defendants, and nothing more. I cannot allow that the somewhat subtle distinction attempted to be drawn by the plaintiff's counsel between negligence and breach of a warranty implicitly contained in the contract is to be found in the circumstances before me, nor am I able to see any material difference between the negligence of the master in breaking a statutory rule, and his negligence in breaking the general law. On these grounds I pronounce on the question before me in favour of the defendants.

(Before Sir ROBERT PHILLIMORE and TRINITY MASTERS.)

THE LANCASTER. (a)

Salvage—Award—Amount.

Where a steamship at great risk to herself got another steamship off a point in the Red Sea, ninety-five miles from Suez, surrounded by coral reefs, and so saved her from probable total loss, and then at her request towed her within a few miles of Suez, the Court on a value of 62,000*l. awarded* 6000*l.*

THIS was a salvage action brought by the owners, master, and crew of the steamship Ossian against the steamship Lancaster, her cargo and freight.

The plaintiffs' statement of claim was so far as material as follows:—

1. The Ossian was a screw steamship of about 1210 tons register at the time the services hereinafter stated were rendered. She was owned by some of the plaintiffs, and was on a voyage from Suez to Tuticorin in the East Indies in ballast, where she was under a charter to load a cargo of sugar for Liverpool, the freight of which amounted to 6500*l.*

2. On Tuesday the 30th May 1882, at about 5 a.m., the Ossian was passing down the Red Sea about ninety-five miles from Suez, and the wind was from the N. and N.W. blowing a strong breeze with a heavy sea running and surf breaking, when those on board the Ossian observed the Lancaster, which is a screw steamer of about 1200 tons register (and which the captain of the Ossian had learnt at Suez was in distress) aground at a point of the shore which is surrounded by coral reefs and about five miles north of the point known as Ras Garib, and as the Ossian came near the Lancaster signalled "Can you tow me off?"

3. The Ossian at once made towards the Lancaster, and when within a short distance brought up by her starboard anchor. A boat from the Lancaster with her captain in it came alongside the Ossian, and it being too rough and boisterous for the Lancaster's captain to get on board the Ossian, the captain of the latter vessel managed with great difficulty and at much peril to leap into the said boat, and it thereupon, in a heavy sea and surf and strong wind, proceeded towards the Lancaster, which was boarded by both captains with some difficulty.

4. The captain of the Ossian then ascertained, as the facts were, that the Lancaster with a cargo of wheat from Bombay for the United Kingdom had been ashore as above stated since the night of Saturday the 27th of May 1882, that whilst so ashore she had signalled to two steamers, both of which had, because of the danger attached thereto, refused compliance with her request; that she was bumping and sliding on the rocks, that her stern post and bottom were started; that she was holed and making water in the after hold; that her after ballast tank was full of water, and that she had jettisoned 300 tons of cargo.

5. Jettisoning the cargo as aforesaid did not at all assist in getting the Lancaster off the rocks on which she was aground, but, on the contrary, increased the peril of her position by enabling the sea and wind to have greater power in rolling and bumping her upon the rocks.

6. Both the captain of the Lancaster and the captain of the Ossian considered it very doubtful, owing to her dangerous position, and the state of the wind and sea, whether the Ossian could possibly succeed in getting the Lancaster afloat, and the master of the Lancaster being anxious that the Ossian should not leave her side, if unable to tow her off, made the following offer to the captain of the Ossian, which he accepted:

"Tuesday, 30th May 1882.

"I this day offer W. Tillar, Master Ossian, one hundred pounds per day for standing by and rendering any service I may need, and as long as I may need, but not over seven days. In case the ship is got off, this is to be void, and claims settled by arbitration."

7. The master of the Ossian then managed, with much risk and difficulty, to return to his vessel in the Ossian's life boat, and brought his vessel as near as he dared to the Lancaster, in order to endeavour to tow her off the rocks. By this manœuvre the Ossian was necessarily brought into such dangerous proximity to numerous coral reefs that, to prevent her also getting aground, which in the then condition of the wind and high sea running was imminently probable, she was compelled to put out two anchors to seaward. Those on board the Ossian then prepared to run a line on board the Lancaster. This, after considerable difficulty and risk, the sea still running very high, and the wind being strong, they succeeded in doing, and afterwards in connecting the two ships by means of the Lancaster hawser.

8. The Ossian being then under steam attempted to move the Lancaster, but was obliged to increase the pressure in her boilers to upwards of 70lbs., and after a considerable time succeeded in making the Lancaster move, and ultimately in getting her off the reef on which she had settled. The Lancaster's propeller slowly reversing she ultimately came off, and was towed into deep water by the Ossian. During the assistance so rendered the risk and danger to the Ossian was increased by her chains fouling both her anchors so laid out as aforesaid, and in addition the tow rope got foul of the propeller, rendering it necessary for the mate of the Ossian to dive repeatedly in order to cut and clear the same. These operations took six hours' incessant labour on the part of a large number of the Ossian's officers and crew, and were effected at great jeopardy to the lives and safety of some of them. During the whole of this time, from the wind and sea prevailing with the screw rendered useless, the Ossian was in great peril and risk.

9. The Ossian succeeded in towing off the Lancaster at about 4.30 on Tuesday, and then, at the request of the captain of the Lancaster, proceeded to take her in tow for the port of Suez, then ninety-five miles distant. After towing her to within a few miles of that port, there being a strong head wind and a heavy sea, and the Lancaster steering very badly throughout the towage, the hawser parted on being shortened at the request of the master of the Lancaster, and the Ossian prepared to send a fresh hawser aboard, when the captain of the Lancaster intimated that he thought his vessel could steam without towing if the Ossian kept by her.

10. Owing to the damage the Lancaster had received while ashore she was so disabled as to make it unsafe and imprudent for her to proceed alone to Suez, and it was on this account that the master of the Lancaster begged those on board the Ossian to stand by his ship, although she was then so near to Suez, till he reached that place, so as to be ready and at hand to render such assistance as might be necessary. This the Ossian did, and the Lancaster going ahead dead slow reached Suez safely in company with the Ossian on Wednesday the 31st May.

11. The place where the Lancaster went aground is one of very great peril. It is surrounded by dangerous coral reefs, and the Lancaster, owing to the position in which she was lying, was exposed to the full force of the wind and sea, and, had not those on board the Ossian come to her assistance, the Lancaster, her crew and cargo, would probably have been destroyed and lost. As it was, when the Lancaster arrived at Suez the remainder of her cargo had to be discharged, and the vessel had to undergo considerable repairs before she was able to proceed on her homeward voyage.

12. The said services were rendered with considerable skill and promptitude, and with great risk to the captain and several of the Ossian's crew, and the Ossian was exposed to very great risk and damage in rendering the said services.

14. The Ossian was of the value of 30,000*l*. In rendering the said services her owners incurred damage and expenses to the amount of about 400*l*., and she deviated from her voyage and was delayed a considerable time in the performance thereof.

The defendants, whilst substantially admitting the services of the Ossian as set forth in the statement of claim, pleaded that the state of the weather and the risk and peril to the Lancaster and to the Ossian were greatly exaggerated, that the jettison of the cargo did materially assist the Lancaster in getting afloat, that the steam power of the Lancaster materially assisted the Ossian, and that the Lancaster would in time have floated quite apart from any assistance rendered by those on board the Ossian.

Feb. 20.—The action came on for hearing before the judge, assisted by Trinity Masters, upon vivâ voce and printed evidence. The log of the Ossian and the protest of her master were put in by the plaintiffs. The value of the Lancaster, her cargo and freight, were taken at 62,000*l*.

Myburgh, Q.C. (with him L. E Pike) for the plaintiffs. The services to the Lancaster were rendered at great peril to the Ossian and those on board of her, seeing the dangerous coral reefs which were in the immediate vicinity. But for the services of the Ossian the Lancaster must have been lost.

Cohen, Q.C. (with him M'Leod, Q.C., and J. P. Aspinall) for the defendants.—The risk and peril to the salvors have been greatly exaggerated. Had the Lancaster continued to jettison her cargo she would have come off without any assistance.

Myburgh, Q.C. in reply.

Sir ROBERT PHILLIMORE.—This is a most meritorious case of salvage service. The service was rendered by one very large steamer, the Ossian, to another very large steamer, the Lancaster. Whilst passing along the Red Sea about ninety-five miles from Suez, the Lancaster struck upon a rock five miles north of the point known as Ras Garib. Coral reefs were all around her at the time, and the state of her peril may be taken from the captain's own protest, which gives the epitome of the service rendered in words which are true and cannot be gainsaid. The material portion of the protest commences as follows:—"Left Bombay on May 10th 1882, bound for Dunkirk. May 20th, passed Aden. May 27th, strong wind and heavy sea, weather very hazy. At 8.30 p.m. Ras Garib abeam. At 9.15 p.m. the ship took the ground and struck repeatedly with great violence. Immediately reversed engines full speed astern, squared the yards, set topsail and foresail, and did all possible to try and back the ship off, but without avail. Seeing the vessel's critical position consulted the officers, and taking into consideration the great distance to the nearest port, from whence help could not possibly be had in less than six days, decided that the only means of saving the ship and cargo was to jettison a portion of the cargo." And then the captain proceeds to state as follows:—"In the interest of all concerned commenced throwing overboard the cargo from the hatchways in order to lighten the fore-end. 28th May, continued to jettison. Let go starboard anchor to keep ship's bow from driving in shore, owing to the heavy swell running. Ship thumping heavily. 2 p.m.: Tried to put out anchor from starboard quarter, but was prevented by the heavy sea. About 3 p.m. carpenters reported the No. 3 ballast tank to be filling. Set pumps working continually. Supposed hole in ship's bottom, as the tank completely filled. 3.30 p.m.; Signalled an Irish line steamer for assistance. He replied, 'Too much sea on.' Gave him ship's name and asked to be reported. 6.20 p.m.: Signalled for assistance to a steamship bound towards Suez, but got no reply. 29th May: Fresh gale and short sea, ship thumping heavily. 6 a.m.: Started discharging from the after hatches on account of ballast tank filling; stern of ship striking heavily. 8 a.m.: Got the boats ready for lowering, as the after peak was found to have filled. 5.30 p.m.: Succeeded in carrying out an anchor from the starboard quarter about 100 fathoms seaward, and kept a continual strain on it to keep the ship's stern from working in shore. 30th May: Gale and sea continues. Engineer reported ship straining under engine room; still jettisoning cargo."

Whilst the Lancaster was in this condition she received the services rendered by the Ossian in this case. It is not immaterial to remember that before the Ossian came up the Lancaster had made signals to two other vessels passing up the Red Sea, and that they had been either unable or unwilling to render assistance to her. The effect of the help rendered to her by the Ossian was to release her from a position of the greatest peril; and, according to the clear and decided opinion of the Elder Brethren, if she had remained many hours longer in the position in which she was when the Ossian came up, she would have been lost with all on board. It is not necessary to say more. Every element that could constitute a most valuable salvage service was present in this case; and one circumstance to be borne in mind is, that the services were not effected without jeopardy to all on board the Ossian, as, on the Lancaster coming off the reef, the chains of the Ossian fouled both the anchors of that vessel, and the tow rope got foul of the Ossian's propeller, so as to render it for the time useless.

The only question remaining to be considered is the amount of compensation that should be awarded by the court. The value of the ship, cargo, and freight is about 62,000*l.*, and, after due consideration and consultation with the Elder Brethren of the Trinity House, and taking into consideration all the facts, I award 6000*l.* Out of this award the mate and those men belonging to the crew of the Ossian who acted as divers at great peril to themselves should receive such shares of the award as will adequately reward their services.

THE BIANCA. (a)

Practice—Collision—Tug and tow—Third party—Directions—Order XVI., rr. 18 and 21.

Where in an action for damage by collision the defendants had by notice brought in the owner of a tug towing the defendants' ship, and sought to make the tug liable for improper navigation and disobedience to orders, and the defendants applied for directions as to the mode of having the questions in the action determined, the Court declined to give directions, and dismissed the third party from the action upon the ground that questions between the defendants and the third party, totally different from those between the plaintiffs and the defendants, might arise in the case, and would be embarrassing to the plaintiffs.

THIS was a summons in the Admiralty Division, referred by the Liverpool District Registrar to the judge, in an action of damage, to obtain directions under Order XVI., r. 21, as to the mode of having the questions in the action determined.

The collision, out of which the action for damage arose, took place about two p.m. on the 15th Jan. 1883, in the river Mersey, between the steam tug Gamecock, which was lying at anchor, and the ship Bianca, which was being towed out of dock and across the river by the steam-tug Rescue.

On the 5th Feb. the owners of the Gamecock instituted an action against the Bianca. The owners of the Bianca appeared, and on the 12th Feb. the plaintiffs delivered their statement of claim.

On the 6th March the defendants, the owners of the Bianca, obtained leave by the judge's order to serve a notice on the Liverpool Steam Tug Company Limited, the owners of the steam-tug Rescue, claiming indemnity from them in respect of the damage proceeded for, pursuant to Order XVI., r. 18. This notice was duly served, and on the 15th March an appearance was entered for the Liverpool Steam Tug Company Limited, in pursuance of the above notice.

On the 17th March the defendants took out a summons in the Liverpool District Registry, in the following terms:

Let the plaintiffs, defendants, and the owners of the steam-tug Rescue, their solicitors or agents, attend me, at 3, Brunswick-street, Liverpool, on Monday, the 19th inst., at eleven o'clock in the forenoon, to show cause why the district registrar should not give directions as to the mode of having the questions in this action determined pursuant to the rules of the S. C. Order XVI., r. 21.

On the 19th March the summons was heard, when the owners of the steam-tug Rescue refused to undertake the burden of defending the action, and the summons was adjourned until the 29th March, to enable the defendants to put in their defence.

On the 28th March the defendants delivered their statement of defence, paragraph 10 of which was as follows:

10. In the alternative the defendants say that the said collision was due to the negligent and improper navigation of the Rescue, and to the disobedience of those on board of her to the orders of those on board of the Bianca.

The adjourned summons came on for hearing before the district registrar on the 29th March, and he, having read the statement of defence, adjourned the summons to the judge in chambers, where the parties were represented by counsel.

Roscoe, in support of the summons, for the defendants.—The questions between the defendants and the third parties are similar to those between the plaintiffs and defendants. Expense will be saved by the third parties being bound by the decision in this action:

The Cartsburn, 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 202; 5 P. Div. 59; 41 L. T. Rep. N. S. 710; Benecke v. Frost, 1 Q. B. Div. 419; 34 L. T. Rep. N. S. 728.

Kennedy, for the plaintiffs, against the summons.—10th paragraph in the statement of claim is embarassing to the plaintiffs. It is obvious from that paragraph that questions not at issue between the plaintiffs and defendants may arise between the defendants and the third parties:

Schneider v. Batt, 8 Q.B. Div. 701; 44 L. T. Rep. N. S. 142;
Horwell v. London General Omnibus Company, 2 Ex. Div. 365; 36 L. T. Rep. N. S. 637; Treleven v. Bray, 1 Ch. Div. 176; 33 L. T. Rep. N. S. 827;
Bower v. Hartley, 1 Q. B. Div. 652.

W. G. F. Phillimore, for the third parties, opposed the summons and asked to be dismissed from the proceedings.

Upon the conclusion of the arguments the judge announced that he would take time to consider and would give judgment in court.

April 5.—BUTT, J.—I have looked through the authorities that were cited, and the conclusion to which I have come is, that there are valid reasons why, in the exercise of my discretion, I should decline to give any directions under Order XVI., r. 21, in this case. Assuming that I have power to give such directions, I see no sufficient reason in this case why, in the face of the plaintiffs' opposition, I should embarrass them and the defendants with any further questions as to the rights and liabilities of the defendants and the third parties inter se. It is probable—to say the least of it—that there will arise in the case (for I have read the pleadings) questions between the defendants and the third parties totally different and distinct from those between the plaintiffs and the defendants. Under these circumstances the third parties, the owners of the steam-tug Rescue, must be dismissed from these proceedings.

Upon the application of counsel for the third parties and the plaintiffs, the learned Judge ordered the defendants to pay the costs of all proceedings taken by them to bring in the third parties.

THE ANNA HELENA. (a)

Salvage—Derelict — Default action — Sale before judgment.

Where in a salvage action, in which no appearance had been entered, it was alleged upon affidavit that the ship and cargo were daily deteriorating in value, and that large expenses were being incurred in respect of the charge of the property, and that the plaintiffs had been in communication with the owners as to a sale, the Court, on motion by the plaintiffs prior to decree, ordered an appraisement and sale of the property.

THIS was an unopposed motion by the plaintiffs in a salvage action, in which no appearance had been entered by the defendants, to obtain, prior to decree, an order for the appraisement and sale of the property salved. The action was brought by the owner, master, and crew of the fishing smack John Ellis, against the owners of the Dutch schooner Anna Helena, her cargo and freight, to recover reward for salvage services rendered in Dec. 1882 to the Anna Helena and her cargo, by bringing her into Newcastle derelict, and in a waterlogged condition.

The Anna Helena was placed in the care of the receiver of wreck at Newcastle, in whose charge she had remained until her arrest in this action, when she passed into the custody of the marshal. It being found impossible to settle the amount of salvage out of court, this action was brought on the 17th April 1883 but no appearance had been entered either for ship or cargo.

The plaintiffs now applied for the sale of the property salved upon the affidavit of the owner of the John Ellis, supported by correspondence from the Dutch consul at Newcastle, who represented the owners and underwriters of the Anna Helena. The fifth paragraph of the said affidavit was as follows:

5. I am informed and believe the said vessel and her cargo are daily deteriorating in value, and that large expenses are and have been incurred in respect of the charge of the property, and it is therefore desirable that the same should be realised without delay.

May 1.—J. P. Aspinall moved the court to order a commission to issue for the appraisement and sale of the Anna Helena and her cargo.

BUTT, J.—I think that, although there is no appearance by the defendants, as it is sworn upon affidavit that the property is daily deteriorating, I will under the circumstances order it to be sold before decree.

THE FAIRPORT. (a)

Disbursements of master—Maritime lien—Liability—Transfer of ship—Laches—Admiralty Court Act 1861, s. 10.

A master of a ship has a maritime lien for his disbursements made in the service of the ship, and such lien attaches to the ship in the hands of bonâ fide purchasers without notice of the lien at the time of the purchase, unless it be lost by the laches of the master.

Where a master has incurred liability by drawing bills of exchange for goods supplied to the ship, although such liability is not discharged, he has a maritime lien on the ship to the extent of that liability.

The act of a master in not compelling payment against his ship for a liability that he has incurred by drawing bills of exchange, because he believes that they will be met by his owners, until he is actually sued upon them himself does not amount to such laches as will forfeit his lien against a purchaser.

THIS was an action brought by Edward Stewart Dargie, of Arbroath, the master of the steamship Fairport belonging to the port of Arbroath, against that vessel and her owners intervening for disbursements made on behalf of the vessel whilst the plaintiff was master.

The plaintiff indorsed his writ for a claim for disbursements made during the time he was master of the vessel, and claimed 300*l.* (inclusive of costs). The plaintiff did not deliver any statement of claim, but gave notice in lieu thereof. The defendant's statement of defence was as follows:

1. The plaintiff was at some time prior to the 14th Oct. 1881, master of the steamship Fairport. The owners of the Fairport, while the plaintiff was master, were George Pitcairn Roy, and Peter Smart Roy, and John Smart Roy.

2. The defendants, on the 14th Oct. 1881, purchased for valuable consideration the sixty-four sixty-fourth shares of and in the said vessel the Fairport from the then owners, the said George Pitcairn Roy, and Peter Smart Roy, and John Smart Roy, and the said shares were transferred to them by bills of sale of that date according to the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Acts, and they were afterwards duly registered as the owners of the Fairport, and are now such owners.

3. The disbursements, if any, made by the plaintiff were made before, and the plaintiff ceased to be her master before the purchase of the Fairport by the defendants.

4. The defendants deny that the plaintiff at any time made such disbursements as claimed, and say, that if he did he was repaid and reimbursed all such disbursements.

The plaintiff had joined the vessel as her master in March 1879, and at that time she was owned by Messrs. Roy and Sons of Arbroath.

In September 1879 the vessel was sent to Sunderland to take in coal for London, in charge of the plaintiff, who was instructed to communicate with Messrs. Lunham and Co. of London, who were the time charterers of the vessel. The plaintiff brought the vessel to London, and was then instructed by the charterers to proceed on voyages to the Mediterranean and back. Before he started, he was directed by Messrs. Roy and Sons to pay for the coal, which he took on board at the different ports at which he called, by bills drawn on Messrs. Lunham and Co. On his outward voyage he called at Gibraltar, took in coal, and drew a bill on Messrs. Lunham and Co., which was by them paid. He took in a further supply at Malta, and on the return journey at Gibraltar, in January 1880, drew bills as before, which also were paid by the charterers.

In April 1880 the vessel was again sent out to the Mediterranean in charge of the plaintiff. She called at Gibraltar for coal, and the plaintiff drew a bill on Messrs. Lunham and Co. for 40*l.* 14*s.* This bill was indorsed originally to Murietta and Co. and afterwards to De Mattos and Co., who then became the holders; it was accepted by Messrs. Lunham and Co. but never paid.

On the 4th May 1880 the vessel was again at Gibraltar, and a further supply of coal was obtained from Messrs. Longlands, Howell, and Co., and the plaintiff drew a bill for 58*l.* 18*s.* 10*d.* on Messrs. Lunham and Co., payable to the order of Messrs. Longlands, Howell, and Co. This second bill was indorsed to Messrs. De Mattos and Co., but was not accepted by Messrs. Lunham and Co., who had become insolvent. Messrs. Roy and Sons were applied to, but they refused to pay these two bills, and on the 7th June 1880 (shortly after they had become due) Messrs. De Mattos and Co. commenced proceedings against the plaintiff. The writ was served on the plaintiff in August 1880, and he then went to sea.

On the 17th July 1881, whilst he was at sea, judgment was given against him for 113*l.* 8*s.* 2*d.* On his arrival in England he took proceedings against the vessel on the 23rd Nov. 1881 to recover the amount of his liability under the bills, and the vessel was arrested in this action.

On the 14th Oct. 1881 the vessel was sold by Messrs. Roy and Co. to a Mr. J. J. Wallace and others, who appeared in the action as defendants.

Nov. 30.—The action came on for hearing.

Barnes for the plaintiff.

W. G. F. Phillimore for the defendants.

The arguments sufficiently appear in the judgment.

Cur. adv. vult.

Dec. 12.—Sir R. PHILLIMORE delivered judgment as follows:—This is an action in rem, in which the plaintiff, who was formerly master of the steamship Fairport, seeks to recover a sum of money, for which he has become liable, on two bills of exchange drawn by him whilst he was master in order to provide necessaries for the vessel. The Fairport was owned by Messrs. Roy and Sons of Arbroath, in Scotland. In the spring of 1880 she was chartered by Messrs. Lunham and Co of London, and sent to the Mediterranean with the plaintiff as master. On the 12th April 1880 the plaintiff obtained coals at Gibraltar for the use of his vessel, and paid for them by drawing a bill for 40*l.* 14*s.* on Lunham and Co. He did this in accordance with his previous practice on similar occasions, and in obedience to instructions received from the charterers and confirmed by Messrs. Roy and Sons, the owners of the vessel. On his return voyage, on the 4th May 1880, he obtained a further supply of coals and other necessaries at Gibraltar, paying for them as before by a bill which he drew on Messrs. Lunham and Co. for 58*l.* 18*s.* These two bills came into the hands of a Mr. De Mattos, who is still the holder of them. The first bill was accepted by Lunham and Co., the second was not, and Lunham and Co. having shortly afterwards become insolvent, neither of the bills was met at maturity, nor have they been subsequently met. Mr. De Mattos, as holder of the dishonoured bills served a writ on the plaintiff as drawer in Aug. 1880, and obtained judgment against him in July 1881 for 113*l.* 8*s.* 10*d.*, being the amount of the two bills and costs. This sum has not yet been paid. In Oct. 1881 Messrs. Wallace and Co., the defendants in this action, bought the Fairport from Roy and Sons, and in the following November the plaintiff began the present action in rem to recover the above-mentioned sum of 113*l.* 8*s.* 10*d.* with costs. A writ was issued in this court, and the vessel has been arrested.

The defence raised by Messrs. Wallace and Co., the present owners, is reducible to the three following propositions, two of law, one of mixed law and fact. The two propositions of law are: 1. That a master's disbursement does not constitute a maritime lien. 2. That even if it does, the subject of the present action is a liability, and not properly a disbursement, the plaintiff as yet having actually paid nothing, and that a mere liability cannot create a maritime lien. 3. The proposition of mixed law and fact is that if there were a maritime lien, the plaintiff is precluded by his own laches from enforcing it against a bonâ fide purchaser for value. The law as to the first proposition appears to me to be laid down correctly in the judgment of Dr. Lushington in The Mary Anne (L. Rep. 1 Adm. & Eccl. 8; 13 L. T. Rep. N. S. 384; 2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 294), which expressly decides that since the passing of the 10th section of the Admiralty Court Act 1861 a master has a maritime lien for his disbursements. I followed this decision in The Feronia (L. Rep. 2 Adm. & Eccl. 65; 17 L. T. Rep. N. S. 619; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 54), and I may observe also that it is treated as settled law in the last edition (4th edit.) of the Maude and Pollock's Law of Merchant Shipping (vol. 1, pp. 86. 125). The second proposition depends upon the true construction of the words in the before-mentioned 10th section, "disbursements made by him," and the cases of The Chieftain (B. & L. 104; 8 L. T. Rep. N. S. 120; 1 Mar. Law. Cas. O. S. 327) and The Edwin (B. & L. 281; 10 L. T. Rep. N. S. 658; 2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 36) were cited by the defendant's counsel in support of his contention that disbursements must mean money actually paid by the master, and cannot be applied to a mere liability created as in the present case by a bill of exchange drawn by him and afterwards dishonoured. Both these cases were carefully considered in the judgment in The Feronia (ubi sup.), in which case I held that the money earned by freight having been paid into court, the liabilities incurred by the master for the benefit of the ship were to be considered as disbursements, and to be discharged out of the fund in court. In the present instance there is no freight paid into court. But the court has its hand upon the res, and ought not to part with it, in my opinion, until justice is done to all parties. The judgment in The Feronia was followed in a subsequent judgment which I delivered in The Marco Polo (24 L. T. Rep. N. S. 804; 1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 54), and was mentioned without disapprobation in the case of Re Rio Grande do Sul Steamship Company (5 Ch. Div. 282; 36 L. T. Rep. N. S. 603; 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 424). I must also refer to the report of the registrar in the case of the Red Rose, which is printed at the end of the case of The Feronia (ubi sup.), and which is stated in the judgment in that case to have been approved by Dr. Lushington. Upon the whole I think that any doubt that may have arisen from the decisions in The Chieftain and The Edwin, must be holden to be now set at rest, and that the law is correctly laid down in The Feronia. The conclusion at which I arrive is that the liability which the plaintiff has incurred for the use of the ship is a disbursement within the meaning of the 10th section of the Admiralty Court Act 1861, and that he is entitled to a maritime lien on the ship.

It remains to consider the question of laches. The law on this subject is established by the cases of The Bold Buccleugh (7 Moo. P. C. C. 267; 3 W. Rob. 229). and The Europa (8 L. T. Rep. N. S. 368; 1 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 337; B. & L. 89; 2 Moo. P. C. C., N. S. 1). It results from these cases that a maritime lien is not indelible, and may be lost by negligence or delay where the rights of third parties may be compromised; but, where reasonable diligence is used and the proceedings are had in good faith, the lien travels with the thing into whatsoever possession it may come. What constitutes reasonable diligence must depend upon the particular circumstances of each case. In the present case I hold that it is proved that until judgment was actually obtained against the plaintiff (who by the way was continually at sea), he believed, and not unreasonably so, that his liability would not become absolute, and that Messrs. Roy and Sons, his previous employers, would protect him from having to meet the bills himself. I am of opinion that he cannot fairly be charged with such want of diligence as would forfeit his lien. If it were necessary to decide whether the defendant, Mr. Wallace, was, as a matter of fact, aware of the liability attaching to the ship when she was bought by his firm, I should be inclined to believe the positive evidence of Mr. Breslauer on the subject in preference to that of Mr. Wallace, who could only speak to his want of recollection of the alleged conversations. I pronounce for the plaintiff in this case.

ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF QUEEN'S BENCH FOR LOWER CANADA, QUEBEC (APPEAL SIDE).

Charter party—Construction—"Prompt despatch"—Demurrage—Delay in loading owing to want of facilities at mines.

A ship was chartered to load a cargo of coals, and to "receive prompt despatch in loading" It was proved that the facilities of the port were greater than the production of the mines, and that in consequence of want of facilities for getting the coals down from the mines the ship was delayed in loading.

Held (reversing the judgment of the court below), that the charterers were liable under the charter-party for the delay so caused.

THIS was an appeal from a judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench for Lower Canada, (appeal side), consisting of Ramsay, Monk, and Baby, J.J. (Cross J. dissenting) which had reversed a judgment of the Superior Court (Torrance, J.) in an action brought by the appellants as owners of the ship Gresham, against the respondents as charterers, to recover damages for demurrage under a charter-party.

The facts of the case appear fully from the judgment of their Lordships.

Butt, Q.C, and J. G. Witt appeared for the appellants.

Cohen, Q.C., and W. W. Kerr for the respondents.

The following cases were cited in the course of the arguments:

Their Lordships took time to consider their judgment.

March 8.—The judgment of the Court was delivered by Sir RICHARD COUCH. — This is an appeal from a judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench for Lower Canada, in the province of Quebec (appeal side), in an action by the appellants against the respondents to recover damage in the nature of demurrage for the detention of the appellant's ship, the Gresham, at Sydney, Nova Scotia, whether she had gone to load under a charter-party dated the 12th June, 1872. Torrance, J., as the judge of the Superior Court for Lower Canada, province of Quebec, district of Montreal, on the 21st May 1880, decided that the Gresham was unduly detained for seventeen days, and condemned the defendants in 850*l*., damages, with interest and costs. This decision was reversed on the 21st March 1882, by three of the judges of the Court of Queen's Bench (appeal side), one judge, Cross, J., dissenting. No objection was made in this appeal to the amount of the damages, and it was agreed before their Lordships by the respondents' counsel that, if the appellants are entitled to recover damages, they are to be calculated for seventeen days at the rate of 50*l* per day as was adjudged by Torrance, J.

The appellants were the owners of a steamship called the Gresham, and the defendants were merchants trading at Montreal, under the firm of Lord, Magor, and Munn. On the 12th June 1873 the plaintiffs, through Mr. John G. Sidey, their agent at Montreal, entered into a charter-party with the defendants for the hire of the Gresham, then at Liverpool. The material part of it is as follows: "It is this day mutually agreed between J. G. Sidey, of Montreal, agent of the good steamship or vessel called the Gresham, whereof is master, of the measurement of $\frac{1801}{1162}$ tons, or thereabouts, now in Liverpool, of the one part, and Messrs. Lord, Magor, and Munn, of Montreal, that the said ship being tight, staunch, and strong, and every way fitted for the voyage, shall, with all convenient speed, sail and proceed to Sydney or other port, or so near thereunto as she may safely get, and there load from the factors of the said merchant a full and complete cargo of coals, taking her turn with other steamers, but taking precedence of sailing vessels, and receive prompt despatch in loading and discharging, and to load and discharge always afloat." The Gresham, under the command of E. G. Bulkeley, the master, proceeded from Liverpool to Sydney, and arrived there on the morning of Saturday, the 19th July 1873, when the master, about 9 a.m. on that morning, notified to Messrs. Archibald and Co. of Sydney, the agents of the charterers there, that she was ready to receive and load her cargo under the charter-party. On the 25th July a few bunker coals were shipped, but no cargo coals were shipped on board the Gresham until the 4th Aug., on which day she began to take in cargo coals, and finished loading on the 13th. She was then compelled to leave with less than her full cargo by 300 tons, but no question arises as to this. The appellants in their declaration alleged that the defendants did not according to the terms of the charter-party load the Gresham with a full and complete cargo of coals, taking her turn with other steamers, but taking precedence of sailing vessels, and afford and give the said steamship prompt despatch in loading her cargo of coals. And the defendants by their plea averred that they complied with the conditions of the charter-party, and that the Gresham had her turn with other steamers, taking precedence of sailing vessels, according to the custom and usage of the port of Sydney, and had prompt despatch in loading at Sydney. The material evidence upon this matter is that of Mr. Frederick N. Gisborne, the only witness called for the defendants, and the entries in a shipping book of which he produced a copy, and which he said contained a complete history of the business done during the period to which they relate. Mr. Gisborne stated that he was the engineer of two or three coal companies at Sydney; that all vessels loading from the mines he was attending to were of necessity reported to him, and no other person had any right to enter reports of vessels. Each vessel was put down in turn in the book at the time it was reported, and they were loaded in that order. None of the steamships that were berthed or reported after the Gresham were loaded before her, and the Hibernia being reported before the Gresham was loaded before her. They gave the Gresham coal as fast as they could deliver it—as fast as facilities of the mines would allow—the facilities of the pier were greater than the production of the mines, and the vessels could have been loaded in a shorter time or with more despatch if the facilities at the mines had been better. The following is a copy of the entries in the shipping book: "Extracts from Shipping Book, 1873:—S.S. Kangaroo.—Telegraph Cable Fleet. Commenced loading, 19th July. Completed, 24th. Cargo, 761 tons. S.S. Gresham.—Reported, 22nd July. Commenced loading, 25th. Completed, 13th Aug. Cargo, 1830½ tons. Schr. Heroine.—Arrived, 22nd July. Loaded, 24th. Cargo, 120 tons. Schr. Fear Not.—Arrived, 24th July. Loaded, 25th Cargo, 52 tons. Schr. Trial. — Reported, 25th July. Loaded, 26th. Cargo, 41 tons. S.S. Hibernia.—Telegraph Fleet. Reported, 19th July. Commenced loading, 30th. Completed 5th Aug. Cargo, 1901 tons. Schr. Rebecca Ann.—Arrived, 31st July. Loaded, 1st and 2nd Aug. Cargo, 192 tons. S.S. Alpha.—Completed discharging, 1st Aug. Commenced loading, 7th Aug. Completed, 16th. Cargo, 1959 tons. S.S. R. M. Hunton, took 143 tons bunker coal, 6th and 7th Aug. S.S. Crosby, took 234 tons bunker coal, 11th and 15th Aug." It was explained by Mr. Gisborne that the three schooners, Heroine, Fear Not, and Trial, occupied inside berths where no large steamers could lie, and the loading of them did not interfere with the loading of the larger vessels. But the Hibernia, which was reported on the 19th July, did not commence loading until the 30th, and between the 24th and 30th only three small cargoes of 120, 52, and 41 tons respectively were loaded, viz, on the 24th, 25th, and 26th. No coals were loaded on the three following days, and the loading of the Hibernia's cargo of 1901 tons was completed between the 30th July and the 5th of August. The loading of the Gresham's cargo, 1830½ tons, was completed between the 4th and 13th of Aug., only a few bunker coals having been loaded on the 25th of July.

These dates show the time within which it was possible to load the cargo if the coals had been ready. The arrival of the Gresham having been notified to the defendants' agents on the 19th July, the plaintiffs were, by the terms of the charter-party, entitled to a full and complete cargo of coals on that day. The respondents' counsel did not dispute that when the ship is ready to load the charterers must have a cargo ready, but he contended that they were not bound to do anything till the ship was in her turn, and it was not shown that she did not begin to load before the 5th Aug. because the cargo was not ready. The facts, however, are that the defendants employed the same person, the agent of the coal companies, to load the Gresham as was employed to load the Hibernia. In consequence of the delay in getting the coals down from the mines, there was not a sufficient supply at the port, by which the loading of the Hibernia was delayed. This deficiency of coals, and not the waiting for her turn was the cause of the Gresham not sooner obtaining her cargo. The defendants undertook that the ship should receive prompt despatch in loading, and their Lordships are of opinion that they are responsible for this delay. It is not necessary to consider whether the Gresham was thus delayed for the whole of the seventeen days, it having been agreed that 850*l.* shall be taken as the amount of the damages.

Their Lordships therefore will humbly advise Her Majesty to reverse the decree of the Court of Queen's Bench (appeal side), and to affirm the judgment of the Superior Court of the 21st May 1830, with costs. And the respondents will pay the costs of this appeal.

COURT OF APPEAL.

Nov. 10, 11, 13, 14, 15, 1882, and Jan. 17, 1883.

THE CHARTERED MERCANTILE BANK OF INDIA, LONDON, AND CHINA, v. THE NETHERLANDS INDIA STEAM NAVIGATION COMPANY LIMITED. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION.

Bill of lading—Exceptions—Collision—Negligence or default of master or servants—Negligence of servants on board another ship—Liability of shipowner — Damages — Judicature Act 1873 (36 & 37 Vict. c. 66), s. 25, sub-sect. 9.

Where a vessel carrying cargo under a bill of lading providing against loss and damage from collision and loss or damage from any act, neglect, or default whatsoever of the pilots, master, mariners, or other servants of the owners in navigating the ship, collides with another vessel belonging to the same owners by reason of the joint negligence of both vessels and the cargo is lost, there is no liability under the contract of carriage, as such loss is covered by the above exceptions, but the owners are liable in tort for the negligence of their servants on board the vessel not carrying the cargo.

Under such circumstances the Admiralty Court rule as to the division of damages applies, and the owners' liability is one half the damage, their liability in respect of the carrying ship being covered by the bill of lading.

Semble, where a collision between two ships is caused by the negligence of either or both, such collision is not an accident or peril of the sea within the meaning of a bill of lading. (b)

Semble, where a ship is owned by an English limited company, which for the purpose of carrying on business in a foreign country is registered in that country as a foreign company, and the ship is also registered there, the ship is nevertheless a British ship, and, although not having a British registry, is subject to all the liabilities of a British ship.

The plaintiffs shipped specie on board the defendants' ship, under a bill of lading which contained the following: "Accidents, loss, and damage from . . . . collision . . . . and all the perils, dangers, and accidents of the sea . . . . and steam navigation of whatsoever nature and kind soever, and accidents, loss or damage from any act, neglect, or default whatsoever of the pilots, master, mariners, or other servants of the company, in navigating the ship . . . . excepted."

The defendants were an English limited company,

(a) Reported by P. B. HUTCHINS, Esq., Barrister-at-law.

(b) See Woodley and Co. v. Mitchell and Co., p. 71, where this point has later been expressly decided.—ED.

but their ships were registered in Holland in the name of a Dutch company composed of the same persons as the defendant company, and carried the Dutch flag. The contract was in English, and made at an English port.

On the voyage the carrying ship came into collision with another ship, also belonging to the defendants, and was sunk, and the plaintiffs' specie was lost.

In an action to recover the value of the specie, the jury found that the carrying ship was in some degree to blame, but the other ship was mainly in fault.

Held, that the question of the defendants' liability depended on English law, and they were liable independently of contract, for the negligence of their servants on board the ship which came into collision with the carrying ship.

Held, also, that the exceptions in the bill of lading exempted the defendants from liability for collision caused by the negligence of their servants on board the carrying ship, but that the acts of their servants on board the other ship was not a breach of the contract contained in the bill of lading.

Held, also, that as both ships were to blame, the Admiralty rule as to damages applies, by sect. 25, sub-sect. 9, of the Judicature Act 1873, and therefore the damage occasioned by the collision should be equally divided between the two ships, and, the defendants' liability as owners of one of the ships being excluded by the terms of the bill of lading, they were only liable for half the damage.

APPEAL by the defendants from the judgment of Pollock, B., Manisty and Stephen, JJ. (reported 46 L. T. Rep. N. S. 530; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 523; 9 Q. B. Div. 118).

The plaintiffs sued to recover the value of specie shipped under a bill of lading on board the defendants' steamship Willem Kroon Prins der Nederlander, to be carried from Singapore to Sourabaya, lost on the voyage owing to a collision with another steamship called the Atjeh, also belonging to the defendants.

The facts and the material terms of the bill of lading are shortly stated in the head-note, and more fully in the judgments of Pollock, B. in the court below, and of Lindley, L.J. in the Court of Appeal.

The Divisional Court held the defendants liable for the full amount of the damage occasioned by the collision.

Nov. 10, 11, 13, 14, and 15, 1882.—Benjamin, Q.C., and Cohen, Q.C. (F. W. Raikes with them), for the defendants, in support of the appeal.—The defendants cannot be liable in contract, for the terms of the bill of lading expressly exclude their liability. It is true that it has been held in several cases that the exceptions contained in bills of lading did not exempt the shipowners from liability for loss caused by the neglect or default of persons whom they themselves employed:

Phillips v. Clark, 2 C. B. N. S. 156; 26 L. J. N. S. 168, C. P.;
Lloyd v. The General Iron Screw Collier Company Limited, 10 L. T. Rep. N. S. 586; 3 H. & C. 284; 2 Mar Law Cas. O.S. 32;
Grill v. The General Iron Screw Collier Company Limited, 14 L. T. Rep. N. S. 711; 18 L. T. Rep. N. S. 485; L. Rep. 1 C. P. 600; L. Rep. 3 C. P. 476; 2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 362; Czech v. The General Steam Navigation Company, 3 Mar Law. Cas. O. S. 5; 17 L. T. Rep. N. S. 246; L. Rep. 3 C. P. 14.

These decisions, however, have no application to the present case, for the terms of the bill of lading are different, the form having been altered for the express purpose of excluding the kind of liability which in those cases was held not to be excluded. It is impossible to say that the defendants can be liable in contract as owners of the Atjeh, for carriers of goods by sea do not contract with reference to the acts of persons on board ships belonging to them, other than the ship in which the goods are carried, and such persons have nothing to do with the carriage. Again, the defendants cannot be held liable in tort for the negligence of those on board the Atjeh. An action does not lie in England for a tortious act done in a foreign country, unless it is shown that such act is illegal in the foreign country where it was done:

Phillips v. Eyre, 22 L. T. Rep. N. S. 869; L. Rep. 6 Q. B. 1.

The Atjeh was commanded by a Dutch captain, and sailed under the Dutch flag, and a Dutch corporation were the legal owners; therefore she was a Dutch, not an English ship, and a Dutch ship on the high seas is, for the purpose of liability for tortious acts committed on board, to be treated as foreign territory:

Lloyd v. Guibert, 13 L. T. Rep. N. S. 602; L. Rep. 1 Q. B. 115; 2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 283.

It follows, therefore, that the case is governed by Dutch law, and there is nothing to show any liability by that law. Assuming, however, that the defendants are liable for the acts of those on board the Atjeh, still they cannot be liable for the whole amount of the damages occasioned by the collision, for by sect. 25, sub-sect. 9, of the Judicature Act 1873, "In any cause or proceeding for damages arising out of a collision between two ships, if both ships shall be found to have been in fault, the rules hitherto in force in the Court of Admiralty, so far as they have been at variance with the rules in force in the courts of common law, shall prevail." According to the Admiralty doctrine the defendants, as owners of the Atjeh, would only be liable for half the loss:

The Milan, 5 L. T. Rep. N. S. 590; 1 Mar. Law Cas. O.S. 185; Lushington, 388; 31 L. J. 105, Adm.;

and their liability as owners of the Kroon Prins is excluded by the bill of lading.

Butt, Q.C. and Myburgh, Q.C. (Barnes with them) for the plaintiffs.—The plaintiffs have a double remedy, for the defendants are liable either in contract or in tort. The argument for the defendant is an attempt to set up the Dutch law as to one part of the case, and the English law as to the other. The words in the bill of lading are not sufficient to exempt the defendants from liability where they owned both the ships which came into collision. Both the ships are English, and the contract is English; therefore the case is governed by English law. But, assuming that the ships are Dutch, the English law would still prevail. It is not correct to speak of a foreign ship as part of the territory of a foreign power for the purpose of such a case as the present, for cases of collision between foreign ships on the high seas are decided in English courts according to English law:

The Johann Friederich, 1 Wm. Rob. 35;
Reg. v. Keyn, 2 Ex. Div. 63.

Even assuming that the Dutch law applies, the defendants are still liable; in the absence of evidence to the contrary, the Dutch law would be assumed to be the same as the English, but the evidence goes to show that the defendants would be liable for a tort according to the Dutch code. The rule as to dividing the damages does not apply where the same person is the owner of both ships.

Cur. adv. vult.

Jan. 17, 1883.—The following judgments were delivered:—

Brett. L.J.—The facts will be stated in the judgment of Lindley, L.J., but as the decision of the Divisional Court has made the case one of considerable general importance, I think it right to express my own individual opinion. So far as the action is founded on contract, it must be first observed that the whole of the contract is in writing. It was, no doubt, a contract for the carriage of goods, but by the consent of the parties it was reduced into the form of a bill of lading. But the whole contract is in the bill of lading, and you cannot look for any term of it outside the bill of lading. The questions are—By what rule or by what law is the effect of that contract to be determined? what is its true construction? and, to what matters does it apply? The defendants suggested that it was a Dutch bill of lading, and that it must be construed according to Dutch law. I doubt whether the construction would be different under Dutch law from the construction under English law; but it seems to me clear beyond all question that it is an English bill of lading, and must be construed according to English rules of construction. It is said that the bill was given by the captain of a ship which was registered in Holland and carried the Dutch flag. If it was really an English ship, of course the whole of that argument falls to the ground. But it seems to me that, even if the ship was a Dutch ship, the contract was still an English contract. It may be true primâ facie that if a ship carries the flag of a particular country a contract respecting the carriage of goods by her is to be taken to be made under the law of that country. But that fact is not conclusive; it is a question of the intention of the parties, and one must look at all the circumstances. In the present case, every one of the persons for whose benefit the ship was employed and was earning profit was an Englishman. The company was registered in Holland as a Dutch company, but it was also registered in England as a limited company. The contract was made in an English port by the servant and agent of the defendants in order to obtain a profit for them. It was entered into with an English merchant for the carriage of goods from an English port to a Dutch port. It was drawn up in the English language in the ordinary form of an English bill of lading, and the defendants were described in it as an English limited company. Taking all these circumstances into consideration, the inference seems irresistible that the contract was intended to be an English contract, even if the ship was a Dutch ship, which I think she was not. If so, the contract must be construed according to the rules of English law.

The goods were lost as the immediate result of a collision at sea. If there had been no exception in the contract, it would not have signified how the goods were lost. The bill of lading contained first an absolute contract for the delivery of the goods, and the defendants would, if there had been no exception, have been liable for the mere non-delivery of the goods. But the bill of lading contained exceptions, and the question is whether they relieve the defendants from liability for the loss in such a case as the present. There are three kinds of collision. A collision may arise from mere accident, without any fault on either side. Such a collision is within the description of accidents of the sea: and if there had been no exception of collisions the shipowner would be absolved from liability by reason of the exception of accidents. But a collision may also arise from the default of those who are on board the ship which is carrying the goods, without any default of those who are on board the other, or from the sole default of those on board the other ship, or the crews of both ships may be in default. If the collision were caused by the sole default of those on board the other ship, the shipowner would be liable, though there was no default on the part of his servants. To meet this liability the exception of collisions was inserted, and the court has no right to limit the meaning of the word. It covers every kind of collision; it certainly covers the case where there is no default on the part of the carrying ship.

But the loss may be the immediate result of a collision brought about by the negligence of those on board the carrying ship. If such a case is treated as a collision, it would be covered by the exception of collisions. But we are entitled to look at the real cause of the loss, the causa causans, not the causa proxima. In every bill of lading there is an implied contract on the part of the shipowner that the master and the crew shall use ordinary care in the carriage of the goods, and the negligence of the master and the crew is a breach of the implied condition; and as the court is entitled to look at the causa causans, it may hold that the loss was really occasioned by the negligence of the master and crew, and treat the collision as only a circumstance in the case, and hold the loss occasioned by the breach of that implied contract not to be covered by the exception of collisions: (see Lloyd v. The General Iron Screw Collier Company Limited, 10 L. T. Rep. N. S. 586; 2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 32; 3 H. & C. 284; Phillips v. Clark, 2 C. B. N. S. 156.) In order to meet this the shipowners in the present case have insisted on the stipulation excepting loss resulting from the default of their servants, and this was assented to by the shippers. The liability of the shipowner on this implied contract is therefore eliminated, and he cannot be held liable for a loss occasioned by the negligence of his servants, whether that loss was the immediate result of a collision or not. You cannot rely on the implied contract by the shipowner that the goods should be carried with reasonable care by his servants. Of course, if any personal negligence of the shipowner could be relied on as the cause of the loss, that would not be within the exception. If, for instance, he were to employ as master a person known to be of drunken habits, and the loss was the natural consequence of the drunkenness of the master, the owner would be liable. And so, also, if the owner chose to appoint as master a person known to be incompetent, or chose to direct the master not to employ a pilot in entering a particular port. A loss caused by the negligence of the servants of the owner is alone excepted. It is said that the owners in the present case are liable because the loss was occasioned by the negligence of their servants on board another ship. This depends on whether any contract can be implied by the shipowner as to the care which should be used by their servants on board another ship. How is it possible to imply such a contract? You can only imply a contract when you are bound to come to the conclusion that at the time of entering into the contract the parties must have intended such an implication. It seems impossible to hold that, in making a contract in relation to the carriage of goods by a particular ship, the parties can have had in their contemplation the conduct of persons on board another ship. The exception does not apply to them, not because those persons are not within its words, but because they are not within the contract at all, and the owners cannot be held liable by contract for the conduct of their servants on board another ship. Therefore, so far as the plaintiff's case is based on contract, they cannot recover for the negligence of the shipowners' servants on board the other ship, because they must rely on the contract contained in the bill of lading, and they cannot recover for the negligence of the owners' servants on board the carrying ship, because that is covered by the exception.

It remains to consider whether the defendants are not liable in tort, or in an action on the case. The jury found that the collision was occasioned in part by the negligence of the defendants' servants on board both the ships. It was suggested that the ships were Dutch ships, and that by the Dutch law the defendants were not liable, and that this court must administer Dutch law. This raises the questions whether the ships, or rather whether the Atjeh was a Dutch ship, and whether, if it was, the defendants are not liable. I am of opinion that the ships were both English ships, not Dutch. It was said that they were both Dutch ships because they were registered in Holland and carried the Dutch flag. The defendants were an English joint-stock company limited, composed of English shareholders alone—there was not a foreign shareholder; and for the purpose of carrying on a particular trade from Holland it was necessary that they should be registered in Holland, and for that purpose they were registered in Holland, and had their ships registered in Holland. But the Dutch company had no power to deal with the ships, and they did not do so. Every appointment was made by the English company. The captain of the Atjeh though he was a Dutchman, was the servant of the English company and owed obedience to them. Does the mere fact that the ship was registered in Holland and carried the Dutch flag make it a Dutch ship? It is absurd to suppose that the mere carrying of a flag by a ship can make her the ship of the country whose flag she carries. Pirates always carried the flags of every nation, and yet they were hanged by every nation. The nationality of a ship, unless she is employed by a Government under letters of marque, turns on her ownership; and in the present case it is clear that the owners were an English company, and the mere fact of the registration of the ship in Holland for the purpose of a particular trade could not make her a Dutch ship. It was said that she could not be a British ship, because she was not registered in England, as required by the Merchant Shipping Acts. But those Acts apply only to British ships; and before a ship can be registered under them she must be a British ship. If a ship which is a British ship is not registered under the Acts she cannot obtain the advantages given by registration, but her owners cannot avoid liability by omitting to register. The nationalty of a ship depends upon her ownership, and for the purpose of liability it is immaterial whether she is registered or not. But, assuming that both ships were Dutch, nevertheless it seems to me that, if this action had been tried in Holland, the defendants would have been liable. The loss did not occur in Holland, or in any place under the exclusive jurisdiction of the Dutch courts. It is not like the case of a tort committed in a foreign country within its exclusive jurisdiction. Then no action for the tort can be maintained in this country, unless it could be maintained in the foreign country. But here the loss occurred on the high seas, which are within the common jurisdiction of all countries. From time immemorial actions for such a tort have been maintained, even against foreigners who could be served in this country, and they are tried according to maritime law as administered in this country, and by that law the owner of a ship is liable for the negligence of the master and crew: (see The Milan, 5 L. T. Rep. N. S. 590; 1 Mar. Law Cas. 185; Lushington, 388; 31 L. J. 105, Adm.; The Leon, 44 L. T. Rep. N. S.

613; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. O.S. 404; 6 P. Div. 148.) It seems to me that the defendants are liable for the negligence of the master and crew of the Atjeh, even if she were a Dutch ship.

The jury have found that the collision was the result of the combined negligence of the defendants' servants on board both the ships. If in such a case the two ships belonged to different owners, each of the owners would have to pay half the loss. The defendants are relieved by the conditions of the bill of lading from that half of the loss which would otherwise have fallen on them as owners of the Kroon Prins, but they are not relieved from the other half, for which they are liable in consequence of the negligence of their servants on board the Atjeh. I may add that if shipowners were to venture to draw up bills of lading in such a form as to absolve themselves from liability for loss occasioned by their personal negligence, and it were found that shippers of goods could not resist this, the shipowners would assuredly be met by an Act of Parliament, just as railway companies have been.

Lindley, L.J. read the judgment of himself and Baggallay, L.J. as follows:—This is an appeal by the defendants from a judgment of Pollock, B., Manisty and Stephen, JJ. The facts are not in dispute. They are thus stated in the report in the court below (9 Q. B. Div. 118; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 523). The action was brought by the plaintiffs as owners of goods shipped at Singapore under the bill of lading in the defendants' vessel the Willem Kroon Prins der Nederlander, to be carried to Sourabaya, and lost through a collision between that vessel and the Atjeh, another vessel of the defendants. The collision took place on the high seas. The bill of lading, which was in the English language, and in which the defendants were described by their above corporate name, excepted, among other things (1) collision (2) accidents, loss or damage from any act, neglect, or default whatsoever of the pilots, master, or mariners, or other servants of the company in navigating the ship. The jury found at the trial that the Atjeh was mainly in fault in causing the collision, but that the Kroon Prins was also in some degree to blame. The Divisional Court held that the defendants were liable by virtue of their contract for the whole of the loss. In addition, however, to the facts there mentioned, it was stated to us that the two ships were registered in Holland in the name of a Dutch company, composed of the same persons as the English company who are the defendants. The Dutch company was, in fact, a bare trustee of the ships for the defendants, and the object of forming the Dutch company, and of having the ships registered in Holland in the name of that company, was to enable the defendants to trade with those ships to Java, which is a Dutch possession. The counsel for the defendants, while denying all liability on the part of the Dutch company, waived any advantage which might be taken of the fact that the Dutch company was not in form a party to this action, and admitted that for all the purposes of this action the defendants represented the Dutch company. The court below decided in the plaintiffs' favour on the ground that the contract contained in the bill of lading was governed by English law, and not by Dutch or Dutch-Indian law; and upon the further ground that, according to English law, the defendants were liable for a breach of the contract to carry contained in the bill of lading. In this view of the case it became unnecessary to consider the liability of the defendants, irrespectively of the contract. Nor did the court below express any opinion upon that point.

Upon the first point the decision of the court below appears to me correct. The parties to the contract were English, although the master who signed the bill of lading was a Dutchman. The contract was in the English language, and was made at Singapore, which is an English port, where English law prevails. The ship sailed under the Dutch flag, was bound to a Dutch port, and was commanded by a Dutch captain. As regards the privileges of trade, which the ship might enjoy as a Dutch ship in Dutch ports, the parties, no doubt, relied on the Dutch law, but as regards the construction and effect of the contract itself as between the plaintiffs and the defendants, there can, I think, be no doubt that the parties were contracting with reference to English law, and not with reference to the law of the country under whose flag the ship sailed in order to obtain the privilege of trading with Java. This conclusion is not at all at variance with Lloyd v. Guibert (L. Rep. 1 Q. B. 115; 2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 283), but rather in accordance with it. It is true that in that case the law of the flag prevailed, but the intention of the parties was admitted to be the crucial test, and the law of the ship's flag was considered as the law intended by the parties to govern their contract, as there really was no other law which they could reasonably be supposed to have contemplated. The plaintiff there was English, the defendant French, the lex loci contractus was Danish, the ship was French, her master was French, and the contract was in the French language. The voyage was from Hayti to Liverpool. The facts here are entirely different, and so is the inference to be deduced from them. The lex loci contractus was here English and ought to prevail unless there is some good ground to the contrary. So far from their being such ground, the inference is very strong that the parties really intended to contract with reference to English law. In order to determine the effect of the contract according to English law, it is necessary to ascertain its true meaning, and in particular the extent of the express exception of collision from the liability undertaken by the defendants. If the word "collision" means every collision, however caused, then the defendants, having expressly stipulated against liability for collision, are not liable for a breach of their contract to carry. Again, if the word "collision" means every collision except a collision caused by the negligence of those engaged in carrying the goods, then, again, the defendants having expressly stipulated against liability for collision, even though so occasioned, are not liable for any breach of their contract to carry. But if the word "collision" means collision not occasioned by the negligence of the defendants or their servants, then the defendants will not have excluded their liability for damage by all collisions, but only for such as may not have been occasioned by the negligence of themselves or their servants in the navigation of the carrying ship; they will not have excluded their liability for damage by collision occasioned by the negligence of themselves or their servants otherwise than in the navigation of the carrying ship. If the word "collision" means what is now supposed, it will follow that in the events which actually happened the defendants will be liable for a breach of their contract to carry. For their contract is to carry safely except in the excepted cases, and upon the present supposition the case which has arisen will not be one of them. The contract in this case is contained in a bill of lading. The contract has reference to a particular ship—viz., to the ship on board of which the goods are to be put; the goods are to be delivered on the safe arrival of that ship, and the conditions and exceptions contained in the bill of lading all have reference to the voyage of that ship and to her captain and crew. The first set of exceptions includes collision, and perils, dangers, and accidents of the sea. The second exception extends to loss or damage from any act, neglect, or default of the master, mariners, or other servants of the company in navigating the ship. The carriage of the goods on board the ship referred to in the bill of lading is the subject to which the contract refers, and in construing it this must be borne in mind. As a mere matter of construction, I should come to the conclusion that the word "collision" in the bill of lading meant every collision between the carrying ship and any other, but that, inasmuch as the word "collision" alone would not or might not extend to collisions occasioned by the negligence of those in charge of the carrying ship, additional words were inserted to cover even this case. Certain authorities, however, were referred to for the purpose of showing that the word "collision" does not extend to collisions occasioned by the negligence of the carrier or his servants, but the authorities referred to do not go this length; they are all confined to negligence on the part of those who are in charge of the goods to be carried. The word "collision" as construed in those cases was restricted, but only so far as the true construction of the whole contract required. We are now asked to restrict it further, and, as it appears to me, to an extent not warranted by the rest of the contract or by the authorities. On the one hand, care must be taken not to confine a general principle to cases which merely illustrate its application; but, on the other hand, care must be taken not to apply decided cases so as to defeat the real object and meaning of persons when expressed in sufficiently plain language. The introduction of the word "collision" in addition to risks and dangers of the sea, shows that something was intended to be excepted which those words would not or might not themselves include. But such expressions as "perils of the sea, accident, or damage of seas" and the like in charter-parties and bills of lading have been long held to extend to collisions not occasioned by the negligence of the master or crew of the carrying ship: (Buller v. Fisher, Abbott on Shipping, 12th edit. p. 592.) And, on the other hand, such expressions have been held not to apply to collisions occasioned by such negligence: (Lloyd v. General Iron Screw Collier Company, 2 Mar. Law Cas. O.S. 32; 3 H. & C. 284; Grill v. General Iron Screw Collier Company, L. Rep. 1 C. P. 600; 2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 362; and 3 C. P. 476.) So an exception of leakage and breakage has been held not to include leakage or breakage caused by the carelessness of the shipowner or his servants in stowing: (Phillips v. Clark, 2 C. B. N. S. 156; Czech v. General Steam Navigation Company, L. Rep. 3 C. P. 14; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 5; see also The Chasca, L. Rep. 4 Ad. & Ec. 446.) Having regard to these decisions, the introduction of the word "collision" into the bill of lading in this case would not exonerate the defendants from liability in respect of a collision caused by the negligence of their servants who had charge of the ship in which the plaintiffs' goods were being carried but this liability is expressly excluded by additional words. These additional words were probably inserted to meet, not only the decisions referred to, but also the more general observations of several eminent judges to the effect that the shipowner cannot protect himself from liability for the misconduct of his servants by the use of general words only: (see per Kelly C.B. in L. Rep. 3 C. P. 481; per Willes, J. Ib. p. 19; per Lush, J. in L. Rep. 9 Q.B. 549.) In truth it is the application of this principle which gives rise to the difficulty which the court has to solve. The plaintiffs themselves invoke this very principle and rely upon it, and contend that the general word "collision" is not sufficient to protect the defendants from liability for the negligence of their servants, whether in the management of the carrying ship or any other. This, moreover, is the view taken by the court below. The answer to it is that the meaning of the parties must be gathered from the whole contract, and that all the exceptions taken together show that what the parties really intended was to exclude all collisions, even though attributable to the negligence of those who were entrusted with the carriage of the plaintiffs goods. This intention might no doubt have been expressed more plainly, but the closer the course of decision on this subject is studied the more plain does it, I think, become that the real meaning of the parties was as above stated. I am aware that in questions arising on bills of lading and charter-parties the rule is to regard the causa causans rather than the causa proxima, and that there is a difference in this respect between such documents and policies of insurance. But this rule is, after all, subordinate to the true construction of the contract, and ought not to be applied so as to defeat the intention of the parties as therein expressed. For example, if the Atjeh had been owned by strangers, and the collision had been caused wholly by the negligence of her captain, the loss of the plaintiff's goods would, as between them and the defendants, be regarded as a loss by collision within the true meaning of the bill of lading, and not as a loss by an unexpected peril—viz., the negligence of the captain of the Atjeh. This illustration shows that the liability of the carrier turns on the true construction of the contract, and that the distinction between causa proxima and causa causans is not the test of liability. The word "collision" may cover both or only the first, according to the meaning of the parties as expressed in the contract. For the above reasons I am unable to concur in the view taken by the court below, that the defendants are liable on the contract—i.e., for a breach of their contract to carry safely.

It becomes, therefore, necessary to consider whether the defendants are liable to the plaintiffs for the loss of their goods apart from the contract into which the parties entered by the bill of lading

It is contended that because both ships were registered in Holland in the name of a Dutch company, and were both lawfully sailing under the Dutch flag, and came into collision on the high seas, the plaintiffs' rights apart from the contract must be decided by the Dutch law. But although both ships may have been Dutch, and entitled by the law of Holland to trade with Dutch ports in Java, yet it is not to be forgotten that both ships, were, in fact, owned beneficially by the defendants, and were both navigated by persons who were in fact the servants of the defendants. What, then, is the law applicable, as between the plaintiffs and the defendants, to a loss of the plaintiffs' goods occasioned by a collision between these two ships? What reason is there for saying that Dutch law, as distinguished from English law or the general maritime law, is to govern such a case? The reason alleged is that, each ship being Dutch, the law of the flag—that is the Dutch law—regulates the persons on board each ship, and determines the rights and liabilities of her owners both towards the captains and crews, and towards the owners of the cargoes on board. This reason is based on a very common and fruitful source of error—viz., the error of identifying ships with portions of the territory of the states to which they belong. The analogy is imperfect, and is more often misleading than the reverse, as I have endeavoured to point out before: Reg. v. Keyn, 2 Ex. Div. 93, 94.) In this particular case the analogy appears to me more misleading than usual. I am not aware of any decision in this country to the effect that, where two ships come into collision on the high seas, the rights and liabilities of their respective owners have been held to depend on the laws of the respective flags of the ships. The law applicable in this country to cases of collision on the high seas is the maritime law as administered in England, and not the laws of the flags: (see The Johann Friederich, 1 W. Rob. 35; The Leon, 6 P. Div. 148; and Foote on Private International Law, pp. 398 and 403.) According to the maritime law, the defendants, as principals of the captain of the Atjeh, are clearly liable for the consequences of his negligence. If it be objected that the Dutch company, and not the defendants, are the owners of the Atjeh, and responsible for the acts of her captain, the objection is answered by the admission made by the defendants' counsel in this court, that the defendants represent the Dutch company for all the purposes of this action. Probably, even without this admission, the result would be the same, considering that the Dutch company were bare trustees for the defendants. But the admission gets rid of all difficulty with respect to ownership, such as had to be encountered in The General Steam Navigation Company v. Guillou (11 M. & W. 877).

Assuming, then, that the defendants are liable to the plaintiffs for the loss occasioned by the negligence of the master of the Atjeh, it is necessary to determine the amount of damages to which the plaintiffs are entitled. The action, viewed as an action of tort, appears to come distinctly within sect. 25, clause 9, of the Judicature Act 1873, and the rules of the Admiralty Court have to be ascertained and applied. It becomes unnecessary, therefore, to discuss the doctrine laid down in Thorogood v. Bryan (8 C. B. 115) and other cases of that class, for the Admiralty Court has never adopted that doctrine: (see The Milan, 31 L. J. 105, Adm. and 1 Lush. 388, 403; 1 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 185; 5 L. T. Rep. N. S. 590.) According to the rules of the Admiralty Court, if the two ships had belonged to different owners, then, as both ships were to blame, the plaintiffs would have been entitled to recover one-half of the amount of their loss from the owners of the Atjeh, and one half from the owners of the Kroon Prins. As both ships belong to the same owners, the above rule would render the defendants liable for both halves, i.e., for the whole of the loss, and this would be the proper result, were it not for the special stipulation contained in the bill of lading, which exonerates the defendants from the share of the loss attributable to the negligence of those in charge of the Kroon Prins. The contract in this case exonerates the defendants from half of the loss and leaves them liable for the other half, and the plaintiffs are entitled to judgment on this footing. Unless the parties can agree upon the sum for which judgment is to be entered, the amount must be ascertained by a reference to a master or a referee. The plaintiffs will be entitled to the costs of the action, but, the appeal having been to a great extent successful, each party should pay his own costs of the appeal.

WOODLEY AND Co. v. MICHELL AND Co. (a)

Bill of lading—Perils of the sea—Collision—Negligence.

A collision between two ships caused by the negligence of either is not a peril of the seas within the meaning of those words in a bill of lading.

The plaintiffs were the owners of a cargo of barley shipped at Caen on board the defendants' schooner Kate for delivery in London. The bill of lading was in the usual form, the only exception contained in it being the exception of "perils of the sea." The Kate, while sailing up the Thames, collided with a steamer, and was sunk, and the cargo lost. In an action to recover the value of the cargo the jury found that the collision was caused by the Kate starboarding her helm, but that there was no negligence on her part. There was no finding as to the steamer.

Held, that the loss was not occasioned by a peril of the sea.

THIS was an appeal by the plaintiffs from the judgment of Hawkins, J. at the trial of the action.

The action was brought by the plaintiffs, who were indorsees for value of a bill of lading against the defendants, who were the owners of the schooner Kate, to recover the value of a cargo of barley shipped on board that vessel. The cargo was shipped at Caen in Normandy, on board the Kate, to be carried to London, under a bill of lading, which contained only one exception, that of "perils of the sea." While the Kate was sailing up the Thames she came into collision with the steamer Fyneoor, and was sunk and the cargo lost. The plaintiffs sued the defendants to recover the value of the cargo, alleging negligence on board the Kate. The defendants denied the negligence, and pleaded that the loss was occasioned by a "peril of the sea." At the trial before Hawkins, J. the jury found that the collision was in fact caused by the Kate starboarding her helm, but that there was no negligence on the part of those in charge of her. There was no finding as to the Fyneoor. Upon these findings Hawkins, J. entered judgment for the defendants.

The plaintiffs appealed.

Butt, Q.C. and Tyser for the appellants.—On these findings the plaintiffs are entitled to judgment. A collision is not a "peril of the sea" within the meaning of those words in a bill of lading, except in the case of a collision absolutely accidental and not in any way caused by the act of man:

> The Chartered Mercantile Bank of India v. The Netherlands India Steam Navigation Company, 52 L. J. 220, Q. B.; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 65.

"Peril of the sea" in a bill of lading has a different meaning to those words in a policy of insurance. The rule in the case of a policy of insurance is that the causa proxima of the loss is to be regarded; but the rule in the case of a bill of lading is that the causa causans is to be looked to. They cited

> Dixon v. Sadler, 8 M. & W. 895.

Webster, Q.C. and Sutton for the respondents.—A peril of the sea is such an accident as may be expected to happen on the sea. [The Court referred to Lloyd v. The General Iron Screw Colliery Company, 3 Hurl. & C. 284; 2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 32.] The passage from Parson's Maritime Law there quoted is altered in later editions (see ed. 1869, vol. 1, bk. 1, chap. 7, p. 259.) If the passage as altered is good law this case is clearly within it. [Brett, L.J.—I doubt whether the passage quoted from the later edition of Parson's Maritime Law is correct.]

Brett, L.J.—I am of opinion that this appeal must be allowed. The jury have found that this collision between a sailing vessel and a steamer was caused by the sailing vessel starboarding her helm, but they have also found that, under the circumstances, this starboarding of the helm was not an act of negligence; and there has been no finding at all as to the steamer. The question is whether, on these findings, judgment ought to be entered for the plaintiffs, who are the owners of the cargo on board the sailing vessel, or for the defendants, who are the owners of the sailing vessel. It seems to me that, in such a case as this, it was only necessary for the plaintiffs to prove non-delivery of the cargo—the defendants could only answer that in one way, by showing that such non-delivery was caused by something excepted by the bill of lading. Now the bill of lading only excepts "perils of the sea," the defendants, therefore, had to bring this case within that exception. I am not prepared to retract anything I said in The Chartered Mercantile Bank of India v. The Netherlands Steam Navigation Company (ubi sup.), but I am bound to say that I do not think that all I there said was so necessary for the decision of that case as to make it binding on us here. We need not now consider whether all that was said there was right or wrong. This much, however, I must say here—that although a collision which happens without any negligence on the part of either vessel is, or may be, a peril of the sea, yet a collision which happens in consequence of the negligence of those on board either of the vessels, so that without some negligence somewhere it would not have happened, is not a "peril of the sea" within the meaning of those words in an English bill of lading. On the findings of the jury in this case, I therefore think the defendants must fail, as the jury have only found that the collision happened without negligence on board one of the two vessels. But if we look at the findings by the light of the facts of the case, then I think it appears at once inevitable that the defendants must fail, because the moment it appears that the collision was between a sailing vessel and a steamer the court is bound to take notice of the rule that it is the duty of the sailing vessel to keep her course, and the duty of the steamer to keep out of the way. The defendants then, as it seems to me, are in this inevitable difficulty. The only way in which the finding of the jury can be dealt with is to assume that the Kate was put into a position of such extreme peril by the negligence of the steamer, that those in charge of her may be excused from obedience to the rule. Even if there was no negligence on board the Kate, there must have been some on board the steamer, and it is clear law that a collision which happens in consequence of negligence on either vessel cannot be said to be a "peril of the sea" within the meaning of those words in a bill of lading.

Cotton, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The plaintiffs sue for non-delivery of the cargo; the defendants are clearly liable unless there is something in the bill of lading to excuse them from their liability. The defendants say that they are excused under the exception of perils of the sea. There is no decision binding on this court which lays down that a collision caused by the negligence of either vessel is a peril of the sea; and it appears to me that, where there is in fact no peril arising either from the waves or the wind, and an accident happens in consequence of a negligent act of someone that accident cannot properly be said to arise from a peril of the sea. Here the defendants are in this dilemma—that, in order to prove that there was no negligence on their own ship, they are obliged to assume negligence on board the steamer. I agree with Brett, L.J. that the finding of the jury can only be right on the supposition that the steamer was guilty of negligence. Therefore, it seems to me that whichever way we look at it, the defendants are liable, and that this appeal must be allowed.

Bowen, L.J.—The plaintiffs are entitled to succeed unless the defendants can show that the loss was occasioned by a peril of the sea. The jury have found that the loss was caused by the starboarding of the helm of the carrying vessel, the Kate; and they have added that there was no negligence on board the Kate. It is clear to my mind that on this finding alone the owners of the Kate are not entitled to judgment. But it does not stop there, because we have to consider whether, taking the findings of the jury in conjunction with the admitted facts of the case, we are of opinion that the loss was caused by a peril of the sea. Now, the facts are that the Kate was going up the Thames under no sort of peril of wind or tide, and in no danger whatever, and the steamer was coming down. All that can be urged is that the Kate was driven to starbord her helm by the action of the steamer. Under these circumstances I think there is, at any rate, no evidence that the loss was occasioned by a peril of the sea; and, though I do not in the least dissent from what has been said by Brett, L.J., I think it sufficient to say that in the present case the findings of the jury do not entitle the defendants to judgment.

The Leon XIII. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM THE PROBATE, DIVORCE, AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION (ADMIRALTY).

Jurisdiction — Wages — Foreign ship — Protest of Consul.

In an action for wages and wrongful dismissal brought by persons domiciled in England against a foreign ship, in which they had served under articles signed in a port of the country to which the ship belonged, in which action imprisonment, hardship, and ill-treatment were alleged, the Court refused to interfere with the discretion of the judge below in declining to exercise jurisdiction against the protest of the consul, which alleged that, by the law of the country to which the ship belonged, all disputes relating to the ship, or claims against the owner or master, were to be referred to and decided by the tribunals or consuls of that country.

This was an appeal by the plaintiffs from a decision of Sir Robert Phillimore, given on the 7th Nov. 1882, by which he had declined to exercise jurisdiction in a wages action brought by seamen against a foreign ship.

The action was brought by three English engineers against the Spanish steamer Leon XIII. to recover wages and damages for wrongful dismissal. After the statement of claim had been delivered, the Spanish Consul at Liverpool made a protest against the jurisdiction of the English court, and on motion by the owners of the Leon XIII., the court refused to exercise jurisdiction.

The facts of the case are fully reported in the court below: (47 L. T. Rep. N. S. 659; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 25; 8 P. Div. 121.)

April 25.—Brett, M.R.—In this case an action has been brought against a Spanish ship in the Admiralty Court by certain engineers who had served on board the defendants' ship. The action was brought to recover wages due, compensation for wrongful dismissal, and perhaps to recover damages for alleged false imprisonment. I say "perhaps" because it must be noticed that in the statement of claim there is no prayer for damages for false imprisonment, unless it be considered as included in the prayer for general relief. The suit then having been instituted in the Admiralty Court, a protest was presented by the Spanish consul at Liverpool, in which it is asserted that the dispute ought to be tried, not in the Admiralty Court, but by the Spanish consul, and though there is some alleged difficulty as to what consul is meant in the protest, it seems to me clear that it means the Spanish consul at Liverpool, that is to say, at the place where the ship was seized and the dispute arose. The consul's protest was supported by his affidavit, and both protest and affidavit allege these grounds why the case should not be tried in the Admiralty Court: that although the plaintiffs are British sailors, yet they entered into a contract with the master of a Spanish ship, and that it was made in a Spanish port. I think this latter fact is immaterial. Although the plaintiffs are Englishmen, they have entered into a contract to serve on board a Spanish ship, and nowhere else. The consul also alleges facts which are evidence to show that the contract is a Spanish contract in the Spanish language, and in the form of Spanish articles, all being strong, indeed, I may say conclusive, evidence to show that the contract of service was a Spanish contract of service. The consul goes on to state that a Spanish seaman serving under such articles is liable in case of a dispute between him and the shipowner to have it settled by Spanish law, and by Spanish law the plaintiffs can only have the case settled before a Spanish court or a Spanish consul abroad, meaning thereby, as I have said, the consul at the place where the dispute arises. To this protest and affidavit no answer by affidavit has been made, that is, no sworn answer, that the Spanish consul's statement of the Spanish law is an erroneous exposition of that law.

Under these circumstances, and with that evidence before him, the learned judge of the Admiralty Court held, in obedience to the decisions of Dr. Lushington and the Privy Council, that he had, notwithstanding the protest, jurisdiction to try the action, but that he had a discretion to exercise in respect of it, namely to decide whether he should try it himself or leave the parties to go before the Spanish consul; in other words, to refer the matter to be tried by the consul. Then this is an appeal against that decision, on the ground that the learned judge erroneously exercised his discretion. The learned judge, in giving his judgment states that he gives his decision first of all on the ground that a man "must be considered pro hâc vice to be subject of that country to which the vessel belongs." That is his first ground; and then he says "upon the whole, without entering into the cases which are fully considered, and the principles of law applicable to them in the case of The Nina (ubi sup.), I am of opinion that no difference is established between that case and the present, and I must dismiss this suit," meaning that he could see no difference between this case and the principles of law acted on in former cases. These principles are distinctly stated in The Nina (ubi sup.), and The Golubchick (ubi sup.), and it is clear that the court, even though there is express provision in the articles that the seamen bind themselves to go before the tribunals of the country to which the ship belongs, is not ousted of its jurisdiction. But it is equally clear that though the Admiralty Court has the jurisdiction, yet in each particular case it will exercise its discretion and consider if it will entertain the action or not. It seems to me that The Nina lays down this ground to guide the judicial discretion, that if all the foreign consul does is to protest without giving reasons, then the Court of Admiralty in its discretion will proceed with the action. But if he does give reasons, then the Court of Admiralty will inquire into the reasons, and allow them to be contradicted. Then when it has entered into the facts it will proceed to exercise its discretion in each particular case. In The Nina the circumstances were that certain English sailors entered into articles on a Portuguese ship, and I will assume that under those articles they undertook to abide by the decision of a Portuguese tribunal. But there it is to be noticed that there was no negative stipulation that they would not apply to an English court for redress. There was there an affidavit of the consul supporting the protest that by Portuguese law these sailors could only proceed before a Portuguese tribunal. Then the Court of Admiralty held that, though not bound to give up its jurisdiction, yet under the circumstances of such a protest it would decline to go further with the matter, and released the ship. The court held that the fact of the sailors being British seamen would not cause them to entertain the action, if, being British seamen, they had bound themselves by a foreign contract to serve on board a foreign ship. That entirely supports the proposition laid down by the learned judge here, that when seaman enter into the service of a Spanish ship, with Spanish papers and a Spanish flag, they are to be taken to be, pro hâc vice, Spanish subjects. Therefore the case is to be decided as if these men were Spanish sailors serving on board a Spanish ship, and under Spanish articles; and the consul says that being such they can only complain to a Spanish court or consul, and he therefore submits that the court should not exercise jurisdiction. In The Nina the court acted in accordance with the consul's wish; so here, when the learned judge says, "I abide by The Nina," he means to say, and does in effect say, although not literally, that, applying the principles in The Nina, these engineers are to be considered as Spanish sailors; and that in the face of the protest, which he thinks a fair and proper one, the court will not exercise its jurisdiction.

It is then said that the learned judge has exercised his discretion wrongly. What then is the rule as regards this point in the Court of Appeal? The appellant must show that the judge has exercised his discretion on wrong principles, or that he has acted so differently from what is the view of the Court of Appeal that they are justified in saying he has exercised it wrongly. I cannot see that any wrong principle has been acted on by the learned judge, or anything done in the exercise of his discretion so unjust or unfair as to entitle us to overrule his discretion. He acted expressly in accordance with The Nina, and I think the judgment is correct.

Then it is suggested that the materials before the learned judge were erroneous, and that the consul's statement of Spanish law was incorrect. Perhaps if this had been distinctly proved before us now, it may be that we might have altered the decision of the learned judge, but as the matter stands we have no materials before us to show that the consul's statement of the Spanish law is erroneous; and, although a long period of time has elapsed since the hearing of this case in the court below, nothing in the nature of evidence has been brought before us to support the assertion of the appellants' counsel, and we are not bound to take their statement as to the contents of the Spanish code. There is no suggestion that an affidavit can be obtained, and it is said there is no Spanish expert in London or any of the large English seaports. We cannot act on these suggestions; there is really no good ground advanced why we should have different materials before us. We are in fact powerless to overrule the learned judge, so that these men must go before the Spanish consul at Liverpool, and the appeal must be dismissed with costs.

Charter-party—Exception—Frost preventing loading—Demurrage.

It was agreed by charter-party that the plaintiffs' ship should proceed to Cardiff East Bute Dock, and there load in the customary manner a cargo of iron. The charter-party contained the following clauses: "Cargo to be supplied as fast as steamer can receive. Time to commence from the vessel being ready to load, and ten days on demurrage at 40l. per day. Except in case of hands striking work, or frost, or floods, or any other unavoidable accident preventing the loading and unloading, in which case owners to have the option of employing the steamer in some short voyage trade until receipt of written notice from charterers that they are ready to resume employment without delay to the ship."

The ship arrived in the East Bute Dock, and loading was commenced, but was interrupted by

The Fanny; The Mathilda. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE PROBATE, DIVORCE, AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION (ADMIRALTY).

Charter-party — Shipbroker — Master — Agent — Ratification—Foreign port.

G., a shipbroker at G. G. chartered the Finnish vessels F. and M. prior to their arrival at G. G., and without communication with the owners. G. had on several previous occasions chartered the F. and M. under similar circumstances, and all of these charter-parties had been carried into effect. After the arrival of the F. and M. at G.G. their masters were on several occasions at G.'s office, and were shown their charter-parties. A fortnight after the vessels' arrival at G.G., during which time freights had risen, the masters refused to take up the charter-parties.

Held, that the masters by their conduct had not ratified the charter-parties in such a way as to make them binding.

A master has no authority to bind his owners by writing forward to a broker in a foreign port, prior to the ship's arrival therein, authorising the broker to charter his ship.

The authority of a master to bind his owners by charter party arises when he is in a foreign port, and his owners are not there, and there is difficulty in communicating with them.

A master is not the agent for his owners to hold out a person as authorised to charter his ship, so as to bind the owners.

This was an appeal from the judgment of Sir Robert Phillimore, given on the 13th June 1882, by which he, reversing the decision of the judge of the Grimsby County Court, held that the owners of the Finnish ships, Fanny and Mathilda, were liable for non-performance of two charter-parties signed by a Grimsby shipbroker, named Grauberg, under the circumstances hereinafter stated.

Ebenhard Grauberg, a native of Finland, carrying on business at Grimsby as a shipbroker for a period of fifteen years, had during that time acted as agent for Finnish ships, he being the only person in Great Grimsby who could speak the Finnish language. Since 1876 he, without any communication with the owners of the ships Fanny and the Mathilda, had, by authority from the masters, made two charter-parties for outward cargoes for the Fanny and nine for the Mathilda, all of which had been accepted by the masters of the respective vessels and duly carried out. These charter-parties had been entered into by Grauberg prior to the arrival of the vessels in Grimsby, and were signed by him "as agent."

The following were undisputed facts in the case with respect to the two charter-parties now in question: The charter-party relating to the Fanny was made on Sept. 15, 1881 by Grauberg, and purported to be made between the Master of the Fanny and E. Bannister and Co. (the plaintiff firm), in respect of the carriage of coals to Cronstadt. On Sept. 16, 1881 a similar charter-party relating to the Mathilda was entered into by Grauberg, and Bannister and Co. Both these charter-parties were signed by Bannister, and by Grauberg "as agent." Sept. 24, 1881 the two vessels arrived in the port of Great Grimsby, when they were boarded by Frost, Grauberg's clerk, and there was some conversation between him and the respective masters as to the chartering of their vessels. Sept. 26, the masters were at Grauberg's office, and were subsequently there on other occasions. Oct. 4, Grauberg dined with the masters on board the Mathilda. Oct. 5, Grauberg received the following letter from the master of the Fanny:

> Grimsby, Oct. 5, 1881.—Herr Ed. Grauberg.—I do not accept your freight or your charter-party for 7*l.* 10*s.*, as I can obtain better freight. I have tried to see you several times, but could not find you. (Signed) A. Yrjola.

Oct. 6, Bannister wrote to the master of the Fanny to take cargo on board, in answer to which the master wrote saying that he had not fixed his ship with Bannister; and Oct. 8, the master of the Mathilda in answer to a similar letter from Bannister, dated Oct. 7, wrote to the same effect. The masters were both Finns, and the charter-parties were drawn up in English.

The evidence on behalf of the plaintiff was that Frost, on boarding the vessels, had informed the masters of the charter-parties, at which they had expressed satisfaction; that on Sept. 26, the masters at Grauberg's office had expressed themselves satisfied with the charter-parties; that on Sept. 29, the masters were shown the charter-parties, and after reading them the master of the Fanny took his away with him, and the master of the Mathilda returned his to Grauberg.

(a) Reported by J. P. Aspinall, and F. W. Raikes, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

On behalf of the owners of the Fanny and the Mathilda the evidence was that Grauberg had never before chartered the vessels without express authority from the masters; that on the present occasion he had no such authority; that when Grauberg's clerk had alluded to the vessels being already fixed, the masters had denied Grauberg's authority to do so; that on Sept. 29, Grauberg informed the masters he could guarantee them freight at 7*l.* 10*s.*; that on Oct 4, the master of the Fanny was for the first time told by Grauberg of his charter-party, when it was given to him by Grauberg, and that on being informed of its contents, he returned it to Grauberg; and that the master of the Mathilda saw his charter-party for the first time on Oct. 7, when ordered by Bannister to take on board cargo.

Actions were commenced in the Great Grimsby County Court in Oct. 1881 by Edward Bannister under the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Amendment Act 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 51) for damages for non-performance of the charter-parties, and the ship's were arrested in these actions. The subject-matter of both actions being the same, the actions were tried together on viva voce evidence, and judgment was entered for the shipowners. As the learned County Court entirely rested his decision on the ground that the masters could not delegate their authority to enter into charter-parties without leave from their owners, he found none of the facts in dispute.

From this decision the plaintiffs appealed; and the appeal came on for hearing before Sir R. Phillimore on the 6th June 1882.

J. P. Aspinall and Phillimore for the appellants.—Grauberg having on previous occasions chartered the ships Fanny and Mathilda, and all of these charters having been carried out, had what amounted to a general antecedent authority to bind the ships. He had, for a course of years, chartered all Finnish ships coming to Great Grimsby, and was recognised as authorised to bind Finnish ships which had taken up previous charters made by him. This is a case where the exigencies of business require that the masters should appoint a sub-agent for chartering their ships, and it is immaterial, when they have thus delegated their authority, if the charter-parties are entered into prior to the arrival of the ship in port. In De Bussche v. Alt (8 Ch. Div. 286; 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 584; 38 L. T. Rep. N. S. 370) the Court of Appeal lays it down that there are circumstances, by reason of usage or of the nature of the particular business, under which an agent is entitled to delegate his authority to sub-agents, and so bind his principal. Story, J., in sect. 14 of his Law of Agency recognises this power of an agent, and specifically instances the case of a master employing a broker to charter his ship. Apart from the question whether the masters actually delegated their authority or not, their continuous employment of Grauberg, coupled with the fact that all Finnish ships so employed him, would amount to a holding out of Grauberg as authorised to charter their ships, within the decision of Smith v. Maguire (3 H. & N. 560), so as to bind their owners. A passage in cap. xvii., s. 443, of Story's Law of Agency is to the same effect. Even presuming that under the circumstances of the case there was no general antecedent authority in Grauberg to bind the owners by charter-party, yet, seeing the previous relations between Grauburg and the Fanny and Mathilda, it requires but a slight act on the part of the masters to justify the court in deciding that the charter-parties were ratified. Putting aside all previous relations, it is contended that the conduct of the masters amounted to a ratification.

Butt, Q.C. and Witt for the respondents.—Grauberg, notwithstanding the fact that certain charter-parties entered into by him for Finnish vessels were carried out, has no authority to bind shipowners by charter-parties entered into prior to the arrival of the vessels in port, the terms of which subsequently the masters could never see until arrival. His previous employment gives him no general antecedent authority to bind the owners, seeing that the charter-parties were made prior to the arrival of the vessels in port, and he had received no communication from the owners authorising him to fix their vessels. Grauberg should have confined himself to looking out for charters and submitting them to the masters on arrival. The onus is on the plaintiff to prove ratification of the charters, by the masters, and this he has failed to do. The charter-parties being in English, and the masters speaking only Finnish, even if the charters were shown to them they would be ignorant of their contents. On the masters understanding that the charters purported to be an agreement between Bannister and their vessels, fixing the vessels for Cronstadt at 7*l.* 10*s.* they at once repudiated the charters.

Sir Robert Phillimore.—The court is indebted to counsel on both sides for a good argument and for a pertinent reference to authorities. These two cases, the circumstances of which are so nearly similar that it is unnecessary to deal with them separately, come before me on appeal from the judge of the County Court of Lincolnshire, holden at Great Grimsby. The appellant, who was the plaintiff in both actions in the court below, is a Mr. Bannister, a merchant of Great Grimsby, and the respondents (defendants in the court below) are the respective owners of the two vessels. The claim in both instances is for damages for non-performance of a charter-party, and is made under the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Amendment Act of 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 51), being a claim arising out of an agreement made in relation to the use or hire of the ships. The charter-parties in question were not signed by the owners or by the captains of the vessels, but by a Grimsby shipbroker named Grauberg. The appellant does not contend that Grauberg had any specific authority in respect of these particular charter-parties, but, as I understand, contends that Grauberg had what amounted to a general antecedent authority to bind the respondents by agreements such as those in dispute, and that, even if this were not so, the captains had subsequently adopted or ratified these particular charter-parties, which adoption or ratification would be binding on the owners. The respondents deny both previous authority and subsequent adoption or ratification. It appears from the evidence that Grauberg had been a shipbroker at Grimsby for fifteen years, and had constantly acted as agent for Finnish vessels, he being the only person in that town who could speak the Finnish language. He had acted for the Fanny and for the Mathilda, which were both Finnish vessels, since 1876, and had made during that time two charter-parties for the former, and eight or nine for the latter. These charter-parties were signed by E. Grauberg "as agent," and were all carried into effect. On the 15th Sept. 1881 the charter-party of the Fanny, now in question, was entered into. It purported to be an agreement between the captain of the Fanny and E. Bannister and Co., the appellant's firm, and stipulated that the vessel should take on board a cargo of coals at Grimsby, and deliver them at Cronstadt at a freight of 7*l.* 10*s.* per keel of 21⅓ tons. It was signed by the appellant on behalf of his firm, and by Grauberg, who signed as agent, as on previous occasions. On the next day a charter-party, similar in all respects was made and signed by the same persons for the Mathilda. The two vessels were at that time absent from Grimsby, but on Sept. 24 they arrived at that port, and were boarded by a clerk of Grauberg's, named Frost. At this point there arises a discrepancy between the accounts given by Grauberg and Frost on the one side, and by the captains of the two vessels on the other, and an important issue of fact is raised. In dealing with this issue I am not assisted by the judgment of the learned judge of the County Court, who rested his decision on other grounds, and did not express any opinion as to which of the conflicting accounts ought to be believed. I regret that I have not had the advantage of having the witnesses personally before me, and am obliged to draw from a careful examination of the printed evidence, the best conclusion in my power. The result is that I am of opinion that the evidence of Grauberg and Frost is worthy of credit, and that the evidence of the captains of the two vessels is not. I therefore consider it proved that on Sept. 24 Frost informed both captains on board their respective vessels that these charter-parties had been made for them, and that the captains did not repudiate the charter-parties, and further, that during the succeeding days both captains were more than once at Grauberg's office, and had conversation with him, and that certainly as early as the 29th he showed them the charter-parties, and told them what he had done, and that he did not receive any intimation of dissent on their part until six days later, when it was time for them to take their cargoes on board and sail. It has been urged that the captains did not understand the language in which the charter-parties were written; but I have come to the conclusion, looking to all the circumstances, that they were made substantially cognisant of their contents, sufficiently at least to know the obligations which they were incurring. It is undisputed that on Oct. 5 the captain of the Fanny wrote to Grauberg, saying that he could obtain better freight, and throwing up his charter-party, and three or four days later the captain of the Mathilda wrote, throwing up his charter-party.

Mr. Bannister thereupon brought his action in the County Court against the owners, and the learned judge decided against him, principally on the grounds that the maxim Delegatus non potest delegare applied to this case; that the masters were only the agents of the owners, and, though in that capacity they could make contracts to carry goods or freight, they could not delegate that authority without special leave, which leave was not shown; that therefore the circumstances relied upon by the plaintiff to prove ratification by the captains were, even if accepted as true, most insufficient to bind the owners. He further decided that no proof had been given that the owners had in any way antecedently constituted Grauberg their agent, for the purpose of fixing their vessels with contracts.

From this decision Mr. Bannister is now appealing. Now I am of opinion—and indeed it is admitted by the counsel for the respondents—that the learned judge in the court below has over-strained the application of the legal maxim on which he relies. The maxim in question is unquestionably a rule, but it is one subject to various exceptions and qualifications. The law is plainly laid down in the judgment of the Court of Appeal, in De Bussche v. Alt (38 L. T. Rep. N. S. 370; 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 584; 8 Ch. Div. 310), where the following passage occurs: "The first condition raises a question which, as it appears to us, does not present any difficulty. As a general rule, no doubt the maxim Delegatus non potest delegare applies, so as to prevent an agent from establishing the relationship of principal and agent between his own principal and a third person; but this maxim, when analysed, merely imports that an agent cannot, without authority from his principal, devolve upon another obligations to the principal which he has himself undertaken to personally fulfil; and that, inasmuch as confidence in the particular person employed is at the root of the contract of agency, such authority cannot be implied as an ordinary incident in the contract. But the exigencies of business do from time to time render necessary the carrying out of the instructions of a principal by a person other than the agent originally instructed for the purpose, and where that is the case the reason of the thing requires that the rule should be relaxed, so as on the one hand to enable the agent to appoint what has been termed a "sub-agent" or "substitute" (the latter of which designations, although it does not exactly denote the legal relationship of the parties, we adopt for the want of a better, and for the sake of brevity); and on the other hand to constitute in the interests and for the protection of the principal a direct privity of contract between him and such substitute. And we are of opinion that an authority to the effect referred to may and should be implied, where from the conduct of the parties to the original contract of agency, the usage of trade, or the nature of the particular business which is the subject of the agency, it may reasonably be presumed that the parties to the contract of agency originally intended that such authority should exist, or where in the course of the employment unforeseen emergencies arise which impose upon the agent the necessity of employing a substitute; and that where such authority exists, and it is duly exercised, privity of contract arises between the principal and the substitute, and the latter becomes as responsible to the former for the due discharge of his duties which his employment casts upon him as if he had been appointed agent by the principal himself." I will also refer to the opinion of Story, who says, in sect. 14 of his Law of Agency, "In general, therefore, when it is intended that an agent shall have power to delegate his authority, it should be given him by express terms of substitution. But there are cases in which the authority may be implied; as where . . . . it is the ordinary custom of trade . . . . so where, by the custom of trade, a shipbroker or other agent is usually employed to procure freight or charter-party for ships seeking a freight, the master of such ship who is authorised to let the ship on freight will incidentally have the authority to employ a broker or agent for the owner, for this purpose." It appears to me that the present case is precisely one of those contemplated in the passages which I have just read, and that the captains were able to constitute Grauberg as sub-agent, and to constitute a privity between him and the respondents. In my judgment, therefore, there was a ratification of the charter-parties which was binding upon the respondents. I consider also that the evidence is sufficient to show such a continuous employment of Grauberg by the captains—an employment which was in conformity with the usages of the Finnish trade at Grimsby—as would constitute a holding ont to third persons that Grauberg was their authorised agent in the matters in question, as would, in fact, amount to an antecedent general authority. In so doing the captains were acting within their powers as agents for the owners, who would, according to the authorities which I have cited, be estopped from repudiating the acts of a sub-agent so constituted. This doctrine of holding out a person as agent is well explained in the judgment of Pollock, C.B. in Smith v. Maguire (3 H. & N. 560): "I think that questions of this kind," says the learned Chief Baron, "whether arising on a charter-party, a bill of exchange, or any other commercial instrument, or on a verbal contract, should be decided on this principle. Has the party who is charged with liability under the instrument or contract, authorised and permitted the person, who has professed to act as his agent, to act in such a manner and to such an extent that, from what has occurred publicly, the public in general would have a right to reasonably conclude and persons dealing with him would naturally draw the inference, that he was a general agent? If so, the principal is bound, although, as between him and the agent, he takes care on every occasion to give special instructions; and I think it makes no difference whatever, whether the agent acts as if he were the principal or professes to act as an agent, as by signing 'A. B., agent for C. D.'"

I will refer also to the following passage in Story's Law of Agency, cap. 17, s. 443; "But the responsibility of the principal to third persons is not confined to cases where the contract has been actually made under his express or implied authority. It extends further and binds the principal in all cases where the agent is acting within the scope of his usual employment, or is held out to the public or to the other party as having competent authority, although in fact he has, in the particular instance, exceeded or violated his instructions and acted without authority. For in all such cases, where one of two innocent persons is to suffer, he ought to suffer who misled the other into the contract by holding out the agent as competent to act and as enjoying his confidence." The conclusion from the premises which I have stated is, that I must reverse the judgment of the County Court, on the grounds both of general antecedent authority and subsequent adoption or ratification. I pronounce for the appellants. The question of damages in both cases will be referred to the registrar here. An application has been made to me as to the costs of certain witnesses in the court below. The question as to these costs I shall also refer to the registrar here, and if he has any difficulty he will apply to the court.

From this decision the defendants appealed, and on the 2nd March 1883 the appeal came on for hearing.

Witt (with him Butt, Q.C.) for the appellants.

The arguments used were substantially the same as those in the court below.

March 3.—Brett, L.J.—This case, which comes from the Admiralty Court, is in a peculiar position. The case was heard by the County Court judge at Grimsby, who did not decide any questions of fact, resting his decision entirely on a point of law. It seems to me, however, that he dealt with the case in such a manner that I should have no difficulty in determining on which side he believed the witnesses to be most credible. The case then went on appeal to the Admiralty Court, where it was before the learned judge in the same position as it now comes before us, the whole of the evidence being on paper, so that we have precisely the same materials to form our judgment upon as the learned judge in the court below. It was heard in June 1882, in the Admiralty Court, and now comes here in March 1883, the County Court judge having decided the case in 1881; so that, even were we to send it back to him, it is now too late for him to give us any opinion as to the credibility of the witnesses on either side from their demeanour before him. It is impossible for the County Court judge, with all his duties, to carry his mind back to this case. It would only be possible for him to read the printed evidence, as we have done, and draw his own inferences of fact. Therefore we must decide the case, as it seems to us, on an examination of this printed evidence. Of course, under these circumstances, there is considerable difficulty.

On the question whether there was a general antecedent authority, there was no evidence of any direct communication between Grauberg and the shipowners, and the inference for us to draw as to ratification is an inference from the action of the captains. Now suppose that the captain before the ships had arrived at Great Grimsby had written to Mr. Grauberg asking him to make charter-parties for them before their arrival. To my mind no captain before arrival has any authority in law to bind his owners by such letters, and a charter-party so made would not be binding on the owners, unless subsequently ratified. It appears that on some occasions letters have been written to Grauberg, at Grimsby, by the captains, from Cronstadt, ordering the ship to be chartered in a particular way, which is a practice open to every possible objection. The captains might actually have been writing from Cronstadt, while the owners were in the same town with them. The authority of the captain to bind his owners by charter-party only arises when he is in a foreign port and his owners are not there, and there is difficulty in communicating with them. The system of a master writing forward in the way I have described to have his ship chartered might counteract the very orders of the owners, who had themselves written to the very same place. If, therefore, it could be shown that the captains had ever authorised Grauberg to make the charter parties in question they would not, apart from ratification, be binding upon the owners. If a captain in 1880, when at Grimsby, thinking he will be there again in 1881, authorises Grauberg to make a charter-party for him in 1881 before his ship arrived, that is contrary to business and law. It was said that there was evidence of a holding out of Grauberg as agent. If so, it must be a holding out to Bannister. But that could only be a holding out by the captains, and, although a captain has a right to bind his owners by a charter, he has no right under the circumstances to bind his owners by a holding out. If the owners had held out the agent at Grimsby to a particular party as the person authorised to make charters, then they would be bound by it; but a captain is not the agent of the owners for that purpose. Therefore, if it were proved in this case that the captains had held out Grauberg as their agent to make charter-parties, this would not bind the owners. There was therefore no authority in Grauberg to make charterparties so as to bind the owners.

But suppose he made charter-parties, and the masters did ratify them, the general rule is, that no person can ratify unless he could have made the contract to be ratified: but supposing, for the purposes of the present case, that the captains could ratify the charters, how does the matter stand? The plaintiff was content to take a charter party not signed by the captain, and without even knowing whether the ship was in port or not. If he deals in that way he consequently runs the risk of Grauberg's authority. Therefore the onus of proving the ratification, when business is carried on in this loose and improper way, lies on the plaintiff. The point of the case is, whether Grauberg has shown this. I will not now dissect the evidence. I am only unprepared to say that the captains knowingly ratified these charter-parties in such a way as to make the act a complete ratification. On this point there is a direct conflict of evidence. Upon that conflict, which is before us on paper, I am not able to know the truth. I therefore think the respondent must fail because there is no evidence to satisfy any tribunal that the masters, knowing the contents of the charter-parties, ratified them.

HIGH COURT OF JUSTICE.

QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION.

Dec. 2 1882, and Feb. 19, 1883.

(Before FIELD, J.)

BURDICK v. SEWELL. (a)

Bill of lading — Indorsement of, by way of security for money advanced—Liability of indorsee for freight—Passing of property in goods —Bills of Lading Act (18 & 19 Vict. c. 111), s. 1.

The mere indorsement and delivery of a bill of lading by a shipper of goods by way of security for money advanced does not "pass the property" in the goods within the meaning of sect. 1 of the Bills of Lading Act (18 & 19 Vict. c. 111) so as to render the indorsee liable to the shipowner for freight.

THIS action, tried before Field, J., was brought by the plaintiffs as owners of the steamship Zoe to recover the sum of 174*l.* 8*s.* 9*d.* in respect of freight for the carriage of goods from London to Poti, in Russia.

The defendants were bankers at Manchester, to whom the shipper had indorsed the bill of lading for the goods as security for advances made by them to enable the shipper to pay for the goods which he had caused to be manufactured in this country. The facts fully appear in the judgment of the learned judge.

Feb. 19.—FIELD, J.—This action was tried before me without a jury, and raises a difficult and important question as to the effect of the Bills of Lading Act (18 and 19 Vict. c. 111) in transferring liability for freight from the shippers to an indorsee of a bill of lading. It was brought by the plaintiffs, the owners of the ship Zoe, to recover 174*l.* 8*s.* 9*d.*, freight and charges in respect of sixty cases of machinery shipped by one Nercessiantz and carried to Poti in the Black Sea under a bill of lading dated the 21st Sept. 1880, whereby the goods were made deliverable to shippers or assigns, of which bill of lading the defendants became indorsees under the following circumstances: On the 26th Oct. 1880 Nercessiantz (who had been engaged in previous business transactions with the defendants, bankers at Manchester) applied to them for an advance of 300*l.* to enable him (as he said) to complete his payment in this country for the machinery represented by the bill of lading in question, which he had caused to be manufactured in this country, to supply an order in Georgia; and, as a security for the advance, he proposed to indorse the bill of lading to them. He had, however, already (as he said), sent out one of the parts, and the defendants, whilst declining to make the full advance without the deposit of the third part, consented to advance 50*l.* conditionally upon his undertaking to procure and deposit the third part against the advance of the balance by way of security for the whole. Accordingly, on the 30th Nov., Nercessiantz brought the third part and deposited it indorsed in blank (the other two having been already indorsed) and obtained the balance of the advance, saying that he was shortly going out to Poti to superintend the receipt and delivery of the machinery, and that the amount advanced would be repaid before he left England, and that he would call again and make definite arrangements for that purpose. This, however, he never did, and the defendants in consequence in the following month of February indorsed and sent out one part of the bill of lading to their agents at Tiflis, with instructions to make inquiries and protect their interests there. In the meantime, and as far back as Sept. 1880, the Zoe had arrived at Poti, and no one appearing to clear the goods they were, on the 14th Oct., landed and warehoused at the Russian Custom-house with (as I infer) the usual stop for freight. Things remained in this state until the month of September in the following year, Nercessiantz not only not appearing to clear the goods, but taking no notice of the communications addressed to him by the agents of the ship, and also by those of the defendants. By the Russian law goods landed and not cleared within twelve months are liable to be sold for duty and charges, the only mode of avoiding the sale being to reship the goods to some other than a Russian port; and in Aug. 1881 the defendants' agents at Tiflis advised them of this state of the law, and of the imminence of sale for these claims, and asked for instructions. The member of the defendants' firm who had made the advance to Nercessiantz, and was conversant with his affairs, was at this time on his way to Poti in reference to these and other matters of business there; and the defendants' firm in England wrote to the ship's agent at Poti, advising him that they held the bills of lading, and that Mr. Sewell would probably communicate personally with them. This he appears to have done, and the defendants on the 28th Sept. also wrote to the plaintiffs' agent in London to the same effect, and requested him to hold for them any proceeds of the sale beyond what was enough to answer their own freight and charges. The sale however (which soon afterwards took place) by the Russian Custom-house officials appears to have produced no more than sufficient for their own claim, and the plaintiffs thereupon required payment of the freight and charges from the defendants, and, on refusal, brought the present action.

Upon the argument before me it was contended on their behalf that the "property" in the bill of lading and goods had under these circumstances passed to the defendants within the meaning of the Bills of Lading Act, and that they, as indorsees, were liable; the defendants, on the other hand, contending that the transaction was one of mere "pawn or pledge" by which no property passed sufficient to render the defendants liable. In order to say which of these two contentions ought to prevail, the intention of the parties to the contract as gathered or to be implied from the circumstances of the transaction must be looked at. Now, advances against deposit of goods are probably some of the most ordinary transactions either of common or commercial life, and if there is delivery, and there are no terms expressed either verbally or in writing, giving any larger effect to the contract, it is known as a contract by way of "pawn or pledge," the legal effect of which is that only a special property passes from the borrower to the lender, although coupled with a power of selling the pledge and transferring the whole property in it on default in payment at the stipulated time, if there be any, or at a reasonable time after demand and nonpayment, if no time for repayment be agreed upon: (Pothonier v. Dawson, Holt's N. P. 383; and Donald v. Suckling, L. Rep. 1 Q. B. 585). Moreover, until such default, although the lender may assign the pledge to another to the limited extent of his own interest in it, i.e. as a security for the amount due, he cannot pass the whole and entire property in the goods to another, for by the contract the general property remains in the pawnor, who by virtue of that general property may determine the special property by tender of the secured amount, and may immediately recover the pledge on the refusal in a possessory action. Delivery is, however, an essential element of every contract by way of pledge. Such delivery may be actual, as is the every-day life transaction with the pawnbroker, or it may be constructive either by making the custody of the pledgor that of the pledgee (Reeves v. Capper, 5 Bing. N. C.), or (if the goods are still under the operation of a bill of lading) by indorsement of the bill; and the latter form of the transaction is one very commonly adopted in commerce. As, however, in the case of land by a conveyance by way of mortgage, so also in that of goods, a more effective security may be created by bill of sale, and by the usual terms of such an instrument the whole and entire property in the goods is assigned and passes to the lender, subject to the usual stipulations as to possession and sale, leaving, however, nothing in the way of legal property in the borrower, but only an equitable right to redeem. This latter form of security, although very usual in money-lending transactions of a mere individual character, is not, I believe, usually adopted in those purely commercial transactions where advances are obtained against goods represented either by warrants or bills of lading, these being two of the ordinary modes by which goods are made a security for an advance, within one of which the transaction now in question must be ranged. The question in the present case resolves itself into this, whether the security was intended to operate, or by implication of law arising upon the undisputed facts did operate, in the same way as an assignment by bill of sale or as a mere pledge. If the former, the whole and entire property would pass, and as a consequence the liability to freight would be transferred to the defendants, for although, as suggested by the defendants' counsel it is highly probable that neither Nercessiantz nor the defendants had in their minds at the time the liability to freight, yet, if the latter took the security of a contract by which "the property passed" to them, they cannot take the good and reject the bad. On the other hand, if the contract, although carried out by the indorsement of the bill of lading, remained merely a pledge, I think it clear that the property, as expressed in the act, did not pass, for by those words I understand the whole and entire legal property and not merely the limited interest which is transferred by the contract of pledge.

Now the plaintiffs' counsel contended that the former was the true effect of the indorsement, and he relied upon the opinion to that effect expressed by Brett, L.J. in the recent case of Glyn, Mills, and Co. v. The East and West India Dock Company (43 L. T. Rep. N.S. 586; 6 Q.B. Div. 480; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 345.) There Brett, L.J., after adverting to the peculiar facts of that case, says: "The legal effect of the transaction, in my opinion, was, hat by the indorsement of the bill of lading the egal property in the sugar was transferred to the plaintiffs, and, as between them and Cottam, Morton, and Co., a legal right to the immediate actual possession of the sugar by the plaintiffs on the arrival of the ship: but by the letter of charge there was left to Cottam, Morton, and Co. an equitable right to resume the legal and absolute ownership of the sugar on repayment of the advance, and an equitable right that the plaintiffs should not for a specified time exercise any rights of ownership over the sugar, but that Cottam, Morton, and Co. might exercise any such rights as would not be inconsistent with the validity of the plaintiff's security. The relation between two such parties was likened by Willes, J., in Meyerstein v. Barber (L. Rep. 2 C. P. 38, at p. 51), to that between a pledgor and pledgee of goods where the goods under pledge are left in or given into the actual custody of the pledgor to be used by him, but are held to be nevertheless in the constructive possession of the pledgee for the purpose of the validity of the pledge, inasmuch as without such possession there could be no valid pledge which was, nevertheless, intended to be valid. I think, however, that he was speaking of the likeness of the business view in the two cases, and not of the legal view, To say that an indorsement of a bill of lading for an advance is only a pledge seems to me to be inconsistent with what has always been considered to be the result of Lickbarrow v. Mason (1 Sm. L. C. 7th edit. 756), namely, that such an indorsement passes the legal property, It is suggested that an indorsement of a bill of lading, when accompanied by such a letter of charge, has not the same full effect in passing the property as if there was no such letter of charge. But, upon consideration, I am of opinion that an indorsement of a bill of lading for an advance does, by the mercantile law of England, pass absolutely the legal property in the goods to the indorsee and a consequent right in law of immediate actual possession against all the world except someone who may have an independent superior legal right of temporary possession. The right of the borrower of an advance on an indorsement of a bill of lading is, in my opinion, an equity which exists only between him and the lender. I think the indorsement of a bill of lading for an advance has by the law merchant the same effect as a bill of sale has by the common law to pass the legal property in goods, and in either case an equity may be reserved which is still an equity though recognised by the common law courts."

I apprehend, however, the language of the learned Lord Justice in that case must be read as applied to the facts of that particular case, and as I on the hearing of that case, which was tried before me without a jury, came to the conclusion that the intention of the parties and the implication of law from the dealings was that the whole and entire property did pass, I agree in the view of the Lord Justice thus limited and understood. I thought in that case of Glyn v. The East and West India Dock Company that the indorsement, coupled with the terms of the indorsement of the 15th May, and the transactions between the parties did amount in effect to a mortgage (see Flory v Denny, 7 Ex. 581), and that the right of property as well as that of possession had passed to the plaintiff; and although my judgment was reversed in the House of Lords upon another ground (which the learned counsel for the plaintiff declined to argue before me), my view as to the property passing was supported by Baggallay, L.J., and Brett, L.J., dissentiente, however, Bramwell, L.J., and abstinente the House of Lords on the final appeal. Lord Bramwell, however, considered the transaction in that case as not amounting to any more than a pledge, expressing his view of the transaction thus (43 L. T. Rep. N. S. at p. 590; 6 Q. B. Div. 490; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 345): "I do not think that the property in the sugars was passed to the plaintiffs with an equity of redemption, or some other equity in Cottam and Co. I think that what took place was a pledge at common law, with a right in the plaintiffs to sell in certain events, and with a common law right to redeem in Cottam and Co. I think, if there had been instead of a symbolical, an actual delivery of goods from Cottam and Co. to the plaintiffs on the same terms, as for instance, of a case of diamonds, that the general property would not have been transferred but would have remained in Cottam and Co. the plaintiffs having only a special property and right of possession. I cannot think that any action could have been maintained against them under the Bills of Lading Act for the freight, or any action by the dock company for warehouse rent, or charges, or otherwise, supposing such action would lie against some one; they did, however, by the handing over to them of the bill of lading indorsed under the agreement, acquire a special property and right of possession. And I cannot doubt that, as against an actual wrongdoer, and against any person who had actually converted the sugars to his own use, as by their consumption and sale, or dealt with them under a claim of title, they might have maintained a action such as the present, as they would have been able to do if the supposed case of diamonds had been taken from them and delivered to a person who sold them or used them, and would not give them up. Why, then, is not this action maintainable? The plaintiffs have a special property, and the defendants have disposed of the goods in a way they had no right to do."

It is between these conflicting views of such high authority that I have to find my way to a result in the present case. In the view of the limited effect of the observations of Brett, L.J. which I have expressed the learned counsel for the plaintiff did not concur. He contended that it was the intention of the Lord Justice to enunciate the general proposition that by the law merchant of England the necessary legal implication from or effect of an indorsement of a bill of lading for an advance was, that by it the whole and entire legal property passed; or at least said that was the true deduction from the case of Lickbarrow v. Mason (ubi sup.), referred to by the Lords Justices, as well as from the subsequent authorities; and I proceed, therefore, to the consideration of them. In the last-mentioned case the action was brought by an indorsee for value of a vendee against persons claiming under the vendor, and the question to be decided was, whether, under the circumstances, the vendor could stop in transitu the goods comprised in the bill of lading, the vendee having become insolvent. The question, therefore, to be decided was not limited, as in the present case and in that of Glyn, Mills, and Co. v. The East and West India Dock Company, to the claim of two rivals immediately claiming title under the indorsement of different parts of the bill of lading, but as to the effect of a general and unrestricted indorsement to a third party claiming bonâ fide and for value, and without notice of any contract or equities existing between the immediate parties to the indorsement. The Court of Queen's Bench held that, as between these parties, the property passed to the indorsee free from any restriction, just as if the goods had been actually delivered to him, and gave judgment for the plaintiff. The Court of Exchequer Chamber reversed this judgment, on the ground that the operation of the indorsement was no more than an indication to the master of the person to whom the goods were to be delivered, and that the indorsee had no better title to them than his indorser, and gave judgment for the defendant. The judgment of the Exchequer Chamber was, however, in its turn reversed by the House of Lords, presumably on the basis of the reasoning of Buller, J. in the opinion delivered by him in the House. But I do not understand that case as holding that, as between the immediate parties, the law merchant implies that of necessity the indorsement has that operation; and indeed, in the case of Hibbert v. Carter (1 T. Rep. 745), Buller, J., upon whose reasoning the House of Lords decided Lickbarrow v. Mason, seems to me to have laid down the contrary. Hibbert v. Carter was an action on a policy of insurance with a denial of interest. The plaintiff had effected the insurance on instructions and account (as expressed in the policy) of Kerr, of whom he was the general consignee, but Kerr had before the insurance was effected, unknown to the plaintiff, indorsed the bill of lading to a creditor, Delpratt, and Buller, J., at the trial, there being no evidence of the circumstances attending the indorsement, held that by this indorsement the whole property had passed to the latter, and would have nonsuited the plaintiff, but that the defendants had omitted to pay the premiums, for which therefore the plaintiff had a verdict. In banco, however, the Court modified the general proposition there apparently laid down, holding that, although generally where a bill of lading is taken by a creditor as a security for a debt the whole property passes; parties are always at liberty to vary this general rule by entering into any particular agreement between themselves; and, upon evidence being given by affidavit that the consignor had no intention of passing the whole property to Delpratt by indorsement, but merely intended to give him a charge upon the net proceeds in the plaintiff's hands, directed a new trial, upon which the plaintiff had a verdict. Buller, J., before whom the case was again heard, said that the primâ facie transfer of the whole property is subject to be controlled by the evident intention of the parties. This case was thus decided before the case of Lickbarrow v. Mason, and was referred to by Buller, J. in that case, and with approval. It could not therefore have been his intention in Lickbarrow v. Mason to have said anything in conflict with it, and if his language and that of the other judges who took part in that case is read, keeping this in mind, I do not think that Mr Hall's contention is supported by that decision.

In Lickbarrow v. Mason, in the court below, Ashurst, J. thus expresses himself: "When a man sells goods he sells them on the credit of the buyer; if he deliver the goods the property is altered and he cannot recover them back again, though the vendee immediately becomes a bankrupt. But where the delivery is to be at a distant place, as between the vendor and the vendee the contract is ambulatory till delivery; and therefore, in case of the insolvency of the vendee in the meantime, the vendor may stop the goods in transitu. But as between the vendor and the third person the delivery of a bill of lading is a delivery of the goods themselves; if not, it would enable the consignee to make the bill of lading an instrument of fraud." Then he says: "If the consignor had intended to restrain the negotiability of it he should have confined the delivery of the goods to the vendee only, but he has made it an indorsable instrument. So it is like a bill of exchange, in which case as between the drawer and the payee the consideration may be gone into, yet it cannot between the drawer and the indorsee." Then he goes into the reasons of that and says; "The rule is founded purely on principles of law, and not on the custom of merchants. The custom of merchants only establishes that such an instrument may be indorsed, but the effect of that indorsement is a question of law, which is that, as between the original parties, the consideration may be inquired into, though when third persons are concerned it cannot. This is also the case with a bill of lading." Therefore it seems that Ashurst, J, did not intend to lay down a general proposition that a mere indorsement of necessity passed the property, but only as between third parties. Buller, J.'s judgment in that court does not deal with the particular question, and I will advert presently to his opinion delivered in the House of Lords. Grose, J, says very much the same thing. He says: "I conceive this to be a mere question of law whether as between the vendor and the assignee of the vendee the bill of lading transfers the property. I think that it does" (carefully guarding his proposition to that particular relation, and not giving it any greater effect.) In the Exchequer Chamber Lord Loughborough delivered a very celebrated judgment, which was reversed no doubt, but that does not take away the value of it as a clear statement of his view. He reasoned upon different principles altogether, he took it that the bill of lading was a contract, as undoubtedly it is, between the shipper and the ship master, and is no contract with anybody else; that it contains merely the terms upon which the master says, "I receive the goods," and contains his undertaking to deliver them, so that it is no more than a receipt, or a direction to the master as to whom he was to deliver the goods. He says this: "By the delivery on board, the ship master acquires a special property to support that possession which he holds in the right of another, and to enable him to perform his undertaking. The general property remains with the shipper of the goods until he has disposed of it by some act sufficient in law to transfer property. The indorsement of the bill of lading is simply a direction of the delivery of the goods." Then he says, "Goods in pawn, goods bought before delivery, goods in a warehouse, or on shipboard, may all be assigned." And he winds up in the result by saying that it passes such right as, and no better than the person assigning had in it. No doubt Lord Loughborough's judgment has never been followed, and, on the contrary, the judgment of Buller, J. has. When it came before the House of Lords there was a considerable difference of opinion (in those days as now): five judges in the Exchequer Chamber differed with Buller, J., and there never has been a positive decision reported anywhere of the House of Lords; but the opinion of Buller, J. has always been taken as the law, and been adopted and followed as the law up to the present day. I refer to his language to show that he only decides the point as between third parties, and not between the immediate parties. He says, speaking of the case of Godfrey v. Furzo (3 P. Wms. 185), upon which he commented a good deal: "The next point there stated is, what is the law in the case of a pure factor without any demand of his own? Lord King says he would have no property. The expression is used as between consignor and consignee, and obviously means no more than that in the case put the consignor may reclaim the property from the consignee. The reason given by Lord King is, because in this case the factor is only a servant or agent for the merchant beyond sea. I agree, if he be merely a servant or agent, that part of the case is also good law, and the principal may retain the property" (Lord King held that no property passed by the indorsement of the bill of lading); and then he says: "But then it remains to be proved that a man who is in advance or under acceptances on account of the goods is simply and merely a servant or agent, for which no authority has been or, as I believe, can be produced." Then he says, after going into the facts: "As between the principal and a mere factor, who has neither advanced nor engaged in anything for his principal, the principal has a right at all times to take back his goods at will; whether they be actually in the factor's possession or only on their passage makes no difference, the principal may countermand his order, and though the property remain in the factor till such countermand, yet from that moment the property revests in the principal, and he may maintain trover." It is true in that case there was an informality, the result of which was that a venire de novo was directed, which came on for trial, and upon that occasion the jury found a special verdict; and Mr. Hall relied a good deal upon the terms of that special verdict. It is thus stated in Lickbarrow v. Mason: "A venire facias de novo having been accordingly awarded by the Queen's Bench, a special verdict was found upon the second trial containing in substance the same facts as before with this addition, that the jury found that by the custom of merchants bills of lading for the delivery of goods to the order of the shipper or his assigns are, after the shipment and before the voyage performed, negotiable and transferable by the shipper's indorsement and delivery, or transmitting of the same to any other person, and that by such indorsement and delivery or transmission the property in such goods is transferred to such other person," so that there is here no limitation either as to the parties or in reference to the operation of the bill of lading as a mere complement of delivery. But I apprehend that this also must be read as applied to the facts of that particular case, and Lord Tenterden considered unquestionably that the true effect of that case was in the limited way I have expressed it, as will be seen from the statement of it in Abbott on Shipping, 7th edit. p. 533, and 11th edit. p. 432, in which he says: "It is now the admitted doctrine of our courts that the consignee may, under such circumstances, confer an absolute right of property upon a third person indefeasible by any claim on the part of the consignor." Those words show, in my judgment, the limitation he put upon the proposition—that is to say, as between third parties—and Lickbarrow v. Mason is no authority for extending the proposition to the immediate parties to the contract.

But then the plaintiff relied upon observations made and language used by the learned Lords Hatherley and Westbury in giving judgment in the more recent case of Meyerstein v. Barber. In that case the question did arise, as in this case, as to the effect of such an indorsement as between the immediate parties, and I cannot distinguish the facts in Meyerstein v. Barber from those of the present case. There was in that case, as in this, simply an advance and deposit of an indorsed bill of lading by way of security, and no formal instrument of any kind executed. The question in that case arose thus: the plaintiff was indorsee of the bill of lading, first in point of time, but taking only one part, and the only possession or right of possession which he had at the time of the conversion by the defendant was that which was given him by the indorsement. The defendant Barber, on the other hand, was indorsee by subsequent indorsement and delivery to him of the second part of the bill of lading, and he had clothed his title with possession by obtaining warrants in his own name, and thus been guilty of a conversion. Upon the argument the plaintiff's case was, that the indorsement was by way of pledge, and that by it sufficient right of property had passed to him to entitle him to maintain trover against the defendant; and the defendant's argument, based upon the contention that both transactions were only by way of pledge, was that, inasmuch as the plaintiff had not and the defendant had obtained delivery, which is, as I have before observed, the essential complement of a pawn, the latter had a better title. In the Court of Common Pleas, and also in the Exchequer Chamber, the transaction was treated by everybody as one of pledge, the language of Erle, C.J., Williams, J., and Martin B., being expressly to that effect, and concurring in holding that the mere indorsement of the bill of lading was such a delivery of the goods as amounted to a valid pledge entitling the plaintiff to hold the goods as against Abraham, his indorser, and all claiming title under him; and the judgment was affirmed by the House of Lords. It is no doubt true that Lord Hatherley and Lord Westbury, in giving their advice to the House, used expressions which appear to be to the effect that by the indorsement the whole and entire property passed to the plaintiff. However, reading those expressions as applicable to the particular facts of the case, I do not think that the learned Lords intended to say anything more than that, as between the first and second indorsees, sufficient property had passed to the plaintiff to entitle him to maintain the action, and that the indorsement per se amounted to a delivery. In expressing this view Lord Hatherley indeed speaks of the transaction as a pledge and it must be recollected that a mere pledge with its limited operation passes property quite sufficient to maintain a possessory action against a wrongdoer: (Ayres v. South Australian Banking Company, L. Rep. 3 P. C. 548.) The decision in that case really was that, under the circumstances, the bill of lading had not fulfilled its office, and was therefore capable of assignment. In expressing this view of Meyerstein v. Barber I am not unmindful of the expressions used by Brett, L.J. in Glyn, Mills and Co. v. East and West India Dock Company (6 Q. B. Div, 490; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 345) in regard to that case, and to which I have already referred. I am unable, with the greatest possible respect, to concur in that view of Meyerstein v. Barber; and it seems to me that the parties intended, both as matter of law and business, that the transaction in that particular case was a pledge.

Having considered these authorities, and a great many more which I do not cite, I have come to the conclusion that, far from supporting the plaintiff's proposition, they show that as between the immediate parties the intention must prevail; and in the present case I come to the conclusion, upon the facts, that the parties did not intend anything more than a pledge—i.e., not to take the whole property in the goods out of Nercessiantz, but to leave the general property with him, contemplating that he would deliver the goods to the parties for whom he had bought them, and that the possession of the bill of lading would enable the defendants to stop their advance out of the proceeds by making them necessary parties to the delivery, or, at the lowest, to put it in their power to compel the borrower to redeem the pledge and thus obtain the only document by which the borrower could obtain delivery of the goods and perform the contract. If such is the true result of the facts, the Bills of Lading Act does not apply, and I therefore am of opinion that no sufficient property passed to render the defendants liable. The question in the present state of the authorities is, no doubt, not free from difficulty, and no one is more conscious than I am of the little practical value attaching to my judgment; but I have done the best I can to form a judgment, and it is for the defendants with costs.

Judgment for the defendants.

(Before CAVE and DAY, JJ.)

BURTON AND Co. v. ENGLISH AND Co. (a)

Charter-party—Deck load at merchant's risk—Jettison—General average.

The plaintiffs' deck cargo of timber on board the defendants steamship was jettisoned on a voyage from the Baltic to London. The charter-party contained a clause that the steamer should be provided with a deck load, if required, at full freight, but at merchant's risk.

Held, that these words prevented the plaintiffs from recovering a general average contribution from the defendants.

THIS was a special case, stated by an arbitrator as follows:

1. The plaintiffs are timber merchants, carrying on business in London. The defendants are the owners of the steamship Harvest.

2. In the month of June 1881 the plaintiffs chartered the Harvest to load a cargo of goods at Finnklippan in Sweden (in the Baltic) and proceed therewith to London, and there deliver the said cargo on being paid freight as in the said charter mentioned. [The charter-party was made part of the case, but the only material clauses were the following:

The vessel was to load, always afloat, from the factors of the said merchants a full and complete cargo not exceeding 480 standards of mill-sawn deals, and (or) battens with sufficient ends, 8 feet and under, as required by captain for broken stowage only. The steamer to be provided with a deck load, if required, at full freight, but at merchant's risk, which they bind themselves to ship, not exceeding what she can reasonably stow and carry,

At certain freights, in full of all port charges and pilotage (the act of God, the Queen's enemies, fire, restraint of rulers and princes, and all and every other dangers and accidents of the seas, rivers, and steam navigation, and to machinery or boilers, of whatever nature or kind, during the said voyage always mutually excepted).

In case of average, same to be settled in accordance with the law and custom at Lloyd's.

The captain is to telegraph from his last discharging port to the New Gellivara Company Limited of Finnklippan, naming the probable date of the steamer's arrival, and to apply to them for cargo.

In the margin,

The master has liberty to load firewood or lathwood for steamer's benefit, also 250 to 300 tons iron as ballast.]

3. The vessel duly proceeded to Finnklippan, and there loaded from the agents of the plaintiffs 37,518 pieces of redwood battens under deck, and at the request of the shipowner, made in pursuance of the stipulation in the said charter-party, the said agents also loaded 5892 pieces of redwood battens on the deck of the ship, and the master of the ship signed a bill of lading for the whole of the said goods, referring to conditions "as per charter-party."

4. Pursuant to the above stipulation in the margin of the said charter-party the defendants entered into a second charter-party with the New Gellivara Company, under which the said New Gellivara Company shipped, and the said master took on board the said ship under deck as ballast, 300 tons of iron, and the master signed bills of lading for the said iron, referring to conditions as per charter-party.

(a) Reported by M. W. MCKELLAR, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

[The second charter-party contained the same exceptions of risks as the first, and the only material clause was a parenthesis, "steamer brings a cargo of deals, including deck load, for owners' benefit."]

5. It was proved by the plaintiffs that there is a custom or usage for ships carrying timber cargoes upon voyage from Finnklippan, and from other Baltic ports in the neighbourhood, to English ports and ports on the continent of Europe to carry a deck cargo of timber upon such voyages, and that such custom existed at the time of the effecting of the said charter-parties, and thence and until the arrival of the said ship in London upon the voyage in question in this action.

6. The vessels sailed on her voyage from Finnklippan to London with the said goods, and on the 12th July 1881 stranded, and was in danger of being lost, and with a view to lighten her, and to get her off the ground, a part of the deck load of timber was necessarily jettisoned, and was lost. The vessel being thus lightened came off the ground and completed her voyage, and delivered the remainder of her cargo safely.

7. It is admitted that the said cargo was necessarily and properly jettisoned, and that such jettison was necessary to save ship and the rest of the cargo.

8. From the commencement of the said voyage until its completion the cargo of timber was and remained the property of the plaintiffs, and the cargo of iron was and remained the property of the New Gellivara Company. The New Gellivara Company acted as agents for the plaintiffs in the shipment of the said cargo of timber. Before shipment of any of the cargo of wood and iron, the New Gellivara Company were aware of the terms of the first charter-party, and knew that the ship was to carry a deck load.

9. It was proved by the evidence of eminent average adjusters that it has been the practice of English average adjusters up to the present time, in cases where deck loads are carried under charter-parties or bills of lading, providing that such deck loads shall be carried at merchant's risk, to exclude all claims by owners of such deck loads to have losses by jettison of such deck loads made good by general average contribution, and that they act in such cases upon the construction which average adjusters put upon the above words "at merchant's risk" contained in charter-parties and bills of lading. The practice of average adjusters on this and all other points is based upon what the adjusters believe to be English law. There is an association of adjusters at which points of practice are discussed and regulated, and whenever a decision of a competent court of law is given upon any point affecting their practice the association holds a meeting and alters their practice so as to accord with the law as laid down by the decision. This evidence was adduced by the defendants to show the practice of average adjusters, and not (as expressly admitted) any custom at Lloyd's. The average adjusters called were unable to state, in the absence of papers or documents to refer to, whether they had been called upon to admit or exclude a claim for a jettisoned deck load, where such deck load had been shipped under a charter-party or bill of lading containing the exact words "the steamer to be provided with a deck load if required at full freight, but at merchant's risk," but stated that, in their view, it was immaterial whether the goods were shipped on deck at the request of the charterer or the shipowner. The evidence as to the practice of adjusters was produced by the defendants, and was objected to by the plaintiffs upon the ground that the legal right of the parties could not be affected by the practice of adjusters, that such practice could not amount to a custom, and if it did, it was not shown to be a custom at Lloyd's and was consequently not within the charter-party.

The evidence was admitted subject to the opinion of the court on its admissibility.

10. The plaintiffs contend that the value of so much of the deck load as was so jettisoned under the circumstances aforesaid must be made good in general average or contribution, and that they are entitled to recover from the defendants, as owners of the vessel, a general average contribution or a contribution in respect of the said loss proportioned to the value of the said vessel and her freight. The defendants contend that no general average contribution, or contribution of any sort, is payable by them in respect of the said jettison of the said portion of the said deck load.

The question for the opinion of the court is, whether the plaintiffs are, under the circumstances herein stated, entitled to recover a general average contribution or a contribution from the defendants.

If the court should be of opinion in the affirmative, then it is to be referred to an average stater or other arbitrator to be agreed upon between the parties or appointed by a judge in chambers if the parties differ, to assess the amount of such general average contribution, and judgment is to be entered for the plaintiffs for the amount so assessed with costs; if the court should be of opinion in the negative, judgment is to be entered for the defendants with costs.

Cohen, Q.C. (with him Barnes) for the plaintiffs.—It must first be observed that the practice mentioned in the case is a very different thing from a custom, The meaning of "merchant's risk," as the words are here used and under circumstances of this nature, has been substantially decided. In Crooks v. Allen (41 L. T. Rep. N. S. 800; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 216; 5 Q. B. Div. 38) Lush, J., following the previous decision of Blackburn, J. and himself in Schmidt v. Royal Mail Steamship Company (42 L. J. 646, Q. B. Div.; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 217, n.), limited the application of exemptions in a bill of lading to the contract of carriage, and held that "unless the contrary appears, the words used must be so construed" as to have no effect upon general average contribution. There are many other cases in which exemptions in bills of lading and charter-parties have been held inapplicable to everything but the liability of the shipowner as a carrier. For instance:

Steel and others v. State Line Steamship Company, 37 L. T. Rep. N. S. 333; L. Rep. 3 App. Cas. 72; 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 516;

Taylor v. Liverpool and Great Western Steam Company, 2 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 275; 30 L. T. Rep. N. S. 714; L. Rep. 9 Q. B. 546;

Macawley v. Furness Railway Company, 27 L. T. Rep. N. S. 485; L. Rep. 8 Q. B. 57;

Wright v. Marwood, 45 L. T. Rep. N. S. 297; 7 Q. B. Div. 62; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 451.

Myburgh Q.C. for the defendants.—The words "at merchant's risk" must be construed so as to have some meaning; and they would have none if the defendants are liable for general average contribution. They cannot apply to negligence of seamen without more express adaptation than that contained in this charter-party: (see Maude & Pollock, 4th edit. p. 357.) [CAVE, J.—Do you contend that these words exclude contribution from other cargo owners?] Yes, certainly; that is the only meaning they can have. The cases of Wright v. Marwood and Macawley v. Furness Railway Company have therefore no authority in the present contract. All other possible risks of the merchants are covered by the words of the charter-party:

D'Arc v. London and North-Western Railway Company, 30 L. T. Rep. N. S. 763; L. Rep. 9 C. P. 325; Hall v. Great Eastern Railway Company, 33 L. T. Rep. N. S. 306; L. Rep. 10 Q. B. 437.

Cohen, in reply.—The exemption from negligence depends upon the words of each contract; and these words may be interpreted to have a meaning if they apply to that only:

Austin v. Manchester, Sheffield, and Lincolnshire Railway Company, 21 L. J. 179, C. P.

March 19.—CAVE, J. delivered the judgment of the Court (Cave and Day, JJ.):—This is an action by the shipper against the shipowner to recover a general average contribution, or a contribution in the nature of general average, for the jettison of a deck cargo of timber, and it is admitted that, by reason of a custom to carry deck cargoes of timber on similar voyages, the shipowner is liable, unless he is protected by the terms of the charter-party. That instrument provides that the ship shall load a full and complete cargo of deals at Finnklippan and deliver them at the Surrey Commercial Docks, the act of God, the Queen's enemies, fire, restraint of rulers and princes, and all and every other dangers and accidents of the seas, rivers, and steam navigation, and to machinery or boilers, of whatever nature or kind during the said voyage, always mutually excepted. The important stipulation is as follows: "The steamer to be provided with a deck load, if required, at full freight, but at merchant's risk." For the plaintiffs it was contended that the words "at merchant's risk" have reference solely to the liability of the shipowner as carrier, and do not apply to a claim for general average contribution, which is not a risk to which the shipowner is exposed as a carrier, but one to which he is exposed as owner of the ship in common with the owners of the cargo; and in support of this contention Schmidt v. Royal Mail Steamship Company (42 L. J. 646, Q.B. Div.; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 217, n.) and Crooks v. Allen (4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 216; 41 L. T. Rep. N. S. 800; 5 Q.B. Div. 38) were cited. In the former of these cases it was held that an exception in a bill of lading of "fire on board and the consequences thereof" did not relieve the shipowner from liability to a general average contribution in respect of damage done to the cargo by pumping in water to extinguish a fire. In the latter case it was held that a condition in a bill of lading, "the shipowner or railway company are not to be liable for any damage done to any goods which is capable of being covered by insurance," did not exempt the shipowner from liability to contribute to a general average loss caused by the ship being scuttled on the occasion of a fire breaking out in the hold. In the former of these cases the exception of fire on board was inserted among other exceptions relieving the shipowner from liability as carrier; and in the latter case the carriage on board the ship and the carriage by railway were linked together, which went to show that the exception was to apply to things for which a railway company would be liable in respect of carriage on land, which could not include general average contribution. Lush, J., however, who took part in the decision of both those cases, laid down the principle that the office of the bill of lading is to provide for the rights and liabilities of the parties in reference to the contract to carry, and is not concerned with liabilities for general average, and that unless the contrary appears the words must be construed with reference to the contract to carry.

It was contended for the plaintiffs that this principle must apply in the present case, and that, as the words "at merchant's risk" are capable of being construed to refer to the negligence of the master and crew, they must be taken to have that meaning. We do not think that Lush, J. meant to assert that the language of a bill of lading cannot be construed to apply to a general average contribution, if that is its more natural meaning. Undoubtedly the ordinary use of a bill of lading is to regulate the respective rights and liabilities of the shipowner and the shipper or his assigns; but there seems no reason why, if the shipowner desires to make any stipulation with regard to his liability, or that of the owners of cargo to average contribution, he should not introduce it into a bill of lading. Even where the ship is put up as a general ship, and there is a custom to carry deck loads, there is no reason why a shipowner should not, with a view to getting a higher rate of freight from the owners of cargo below deck, stipulate with the owner of a deck cargo that he should make no claim for a general average contribution in respect of the jettison of the deck load, and such a stipulation, if made, would not unnaturally find its place in the bill of lading.

What then is the natural meaning in this case of the words "at merchant's risk" in the charter-party? Mr. Cohen had some difficulty, looking at the exceptions which applied to the cargo below deck, in pointing out what were the additional matters intended to be covered by the words "at merchant's risk;" but ultimately he contended that it meant risk of loss by the negligence of the master and crew. This, however, would lead to the anomaly that the shipowner would be liable to general average contribution where, as here, the deck cargo was necessarily and properly jettisoned, but would be free from liability if it was unnecessarily and improperly jettisoned, which seems absurd. By our law, agreeing in this respect with the law of most foreign countries, deck cargo jettisoned is not entitled to general average contribution, and the reason usually assigned is, that it is a dangerous cargo certain to be jettisoned before any other, and liable to be unduly jettisoned before any other, and liable to be unduly jettisoned owing to the facility of doing it when cargo under the hatches would not be. We have, however, introduced an exception to this general rule where, as here, there is a custom in the trade to carry a deck cargo, although in the absence of such custom there is no such exception solely by reason that the cargo has been shipped on deck by agreement with the shipper: (Wright v. Marwood, 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 451; 45 L. T. Rep. N. S. 297; 7 Q. B. Div. 62.) If in interpreting the words "at merchant's risk" we are driven to choose, as Mr. Cohen seems to admit we are, between the risk of jettison and the risk of all kinds of negligence of the master and crew, we are of opinion that the former is the more natural meaning, and although the plaintiffs are not bound by the practice of average adjusters, yet, in a matter of some doubt like this, we are fortified in our opinion by finding it to be in accordance with that practice. If the plaintiffs are not entitled to recover a general average contribution, we think it follows from Wright v. Marwood that they are not entitled to recover contribution of any other kind. There will, therefore, be judgment for the defendants with costs.

SVENSDEN v. WALLACE BROTHERS. (a)

General average — Particular average — Putting into port to repair—Expenses of warehousing and reloading cargo—Charges for entering and leaving port.

A ship laden with cargo whilst on a voyage from Rangoon to London was compelled to put into port in consequence of an injury which was the subject of particular average. Certain expenses necessary for her repairs were there incurred in warehousing and reloading the cargo, and in respect of port dues on entering and leaving the port.

Held, that the putting into port was an act of voluntary sacrifice undertaken for the common benefit of the adventure, and that those expenses were consequent upon it, and were therefore chargeable to general average.

THIS was a case tried before Lopes, J. at Guildhall, and reserved for further consideration.

The statement of claim alleged that—

1. The plaintiffs were the owners of the ship Olaf Trygvason, and the defendants the owners of a cargo of rice shipped on board the said ship at Rangoon, and delivered at Liverpool in Oct. 1880.

2. During her voyage from Rangoon to Liverpool the ship met with heavy weather and sprang a dangerous leak, in consequence of which the master was compelled for the preservation of the ship and cargo to bear up for St. Louis, Mauritius, and take refuge in that port.

3. At St. Louis the ship was surveyed, and such repairs were done as were necessary in order to enable her to prosecute her voyage to Liverpool.

4. Certain expenses were incurred in respect of the said ship taking refuge in St. Louis which were the proper subject of general average, and the same were defrayed by the plaintiffs.

5. The said general average expenses consisted, among other things, of charges for pumping the ship, for landing, storing, and reshipping the cargo, and for port dues in respect of entering and leaving the said port.

6. The proportion of the said general average expenses payable by the defendants amounted to 770*l.* 2*s.* 4*d.*

By their statement of defence the defendants admitted their liability to repay to the plaintiffs the expenses in respect of the storage or warehouse rent of the cargo at St. Louis, but denied their liability in respect of the expenses of reshipping the cargo, and the port charges, pilotage, and other claims subsequent to the reloading of the said cargo. They accordingly paid to the plaintiffs the sum of 681*l.* 13*s.* 1*d.* in respect of those parts of the claim which they admitted.

They further pleaded as follows:

The said cargo of rice was laden on board the said ship or vessel Olaf Trygvason, at Rangoon, a port in the East Indian possessions of Her Majesty the Queen of England and Empress of India, to be carried to Liverpool in pursuance of the terms of a certain contract, and before and at the time of the making of the said contract there had been and was at Rangoon, and at Liverpool and elsewhere in England, and in the British empire, a well-known and approved usage and custom of trade amongst shippers, shipowners, merchants, underwriters, and average staters, that expenses incurred in and about the warehousing, storing, and reshipping of cargoes, rendered necessary for the purpose of repairing damage occasioned to the ships on board which they were laden by perils of the seas, and also expenses incurred for and in and about defraying port charges, pilotage, and other outward dues, to enable the said ships to proceed on their voyages with the said cargoes, are not contributed for by any general average or payment in the nature of general average among all the owners of the ship, freight, and cargo on board any such ship, but that the expenses of warehousing and storing such cargo are apportioned amongst the owners of the said cargo alone, and the expenses of reloading such cargo, the port charges, pilotage, and other outward dues, are apportioned amongst and borne by the owners of the ship and freight, of which said usage and custom the plaintiffs and defendants at the time of the making of the said contract for the carriage of the said cargo of rice had notice, and the plaintiffs and the defendants made the said contract with reference thereto, and that by reason of the said usage and custom the defendants are not liable to pay the said sum of 770*l.* 2*s.* 11*d.* or any part thereof, save and except the sum of 681*l.* 13*s.* 1*d.* so paid as aforesaid.

LOPES, J.—The amount in dispute in this action is small, 88*l.* 19*s.* 10*d.*; but the principle involved is important. It is intended, as I understand, not only to raise a point not decided in the case of Attwood v. Sellar (41 L. T. Rep. N. S. 83; 42 L. T. Rep. N. S. 644; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 153, 283 4 Q. B. Div. 342; 5 Q. B. Div. 286), but also to test the propriety of the case of Attwood v. Sellar, decided in the Appeal Court. The distinction between the present case and the case of Attwood v. Sellar is this: In Attwood v. Sellar the vessel went into a port of refuge in consequence of an injury which was the subject of general average; in the present case in consequence of an injury which was the subject of particular average. It was determined by the case of Attwood v. Sellar that when a vessel goes into a port of refuge in consequence of an injury to her which is the subject of general average, the expenses of warehousing and reloading goods necessarily unloaded for the purpose of repairing this injury, and expenses incurred for pilotage and other charges in leaving the port, are the subject of general average. I am bound by the case of Attwood v. Sellar, and if in this case the vessel had gone into a port of refuge in consequence of an injury which was the subject of general average, I mean an act of voluntary sacrifice, I should have been bound to have given the plaintiffs judgment for 88*l.* 19*s.* 10*d.*, for the only distinction between that case and the present is the injury which caused the respective vessels to seek a port of refuge. I have now to determine whether there is any practical difference, so far as the incidence of expenses is concerned, between the case of a ship necessarily seeking a port of refuge in consequence of an injury which is the subject of general average and a ship necessarily seeking a port of refuge in consequence of an injury which is the subject of particular average. I can see no practical distinction. The putting into a port of refuge, if necessary, is an act of voluntary sacrifice undertaken for the common benefit of the adventure, ship, cargo, and freight; and I think every expense consequent upon it incurred to enable the ship afterwards to proceed safely on her voyage with her cargo so as to earn her freight is incurred for the common benefit of the adventure, and is chargeable to general average. There are expressions in the judgment in Attwood v. Sellar, both in the court below and the Appeal Court, which would seem to cover this point. They are, however, obiter dicta, and were not necessary for the decision of that case.

It seems to me that the point relied on by the defendant, that the expenses of going out of port are not chargeable to general average because the cargo is in safety when the port is reached, is unsustainable. The cargo is in safety when the port is reached; still it must be admitted that the expenses of unloading are general average expenses. Such an argument would be equally cogent whether the cause of putting into port was a general or a particular average damage. In Attwood v. Sellar, however, it was held that the expenses of going out of port were general average expenses. I am of opinion the plaintiffs are entitled to judgment for 88*l.* 19*s.* 10*d.*, with interest in the usual way and costs. I have not thought it necessary to cite authorities. So far as the principle involved in Attwood v. Sellar is concerned, the authorities are most exhaustively dealt with by Thesiger, L J. in his most able judgment in that case in the Appeal Court. With regard to the other question raised in this case not decided in Attwood v. Sellar, there is little authority to be found.

The Sherbro. (a)

Mortgage action—Material men—Sale of ship—Costs—Priority—Practice.

Where after the commencement of a mortgage action against a British ship whose owners were domiciled in this country, material men with a possessory lien on the ship intervened, and the ship was sold by order of the court, but the proceeds proved only sufficient to satisfy the claim of the material men, the Court ordered that the taxed costs of the plaintiff in the mortgage action up to the date of the sale of the ship should be paid out of such proceeds.

This was an application to the judge in court by the plaintiff in a mortgage action against the British ship Sherbro, asking for an order that he should be paid his costs in such action, out of a fund in court, the proceeds of the sale of the vessel mortgaged.

After the action had been commenced, Messrs. Sage and Son, material men, having a possessory lien on the ship, intervened in the action, and also brought an action under sect. 4 of the Admiralty Court Act 1861 (24 Vict. c. 10) to enforce their claim. No appearance was entered by the mortgagor (the owner who was domiciled in this country), and with the consent of the plaintiff and Messrs. Sage and Son the vessel was sold in the action by order of the court, the proceeds amounting to 359*l.* The total claim of Sage and Co. exceeded the fund in court.

Sage and Co., as material men taking precedence of the mortgagee, applied for payment out, but, the mortgagee opposing, 300*l.* was paid out to them in part satisfaction of their claim, the balance remaining in court subject to questions of priority of other claims and costs.

Another action had been commenced by the master of the ship for wages.

The plaintiff now moved the court for payment of his costs out of the 59*l.* still remaining in court.

W. G. F. Phillimore for the mortgagee, in support of the application.—If it had not been that the mortgagee had prosecuted this action and arrested and sold the ship, Messrs. Sage and Son would not have been able to enforce their claim. The court should therefore reward the mortgagee's exertions on behalf of Sage and Son by giving him his costs up to the sale of the ship.

Nelson, contra, for Sage and Son.—Another action had been commenced by the master, in which we could have enforced our claim. Moreover, we had a common law remedy. We are the successful parties, and therefore should not be made to bear the mortgagee's costs, a large portion of which was recklessly incurred, after he had notice of our possessory lien.

Phillimore in reply.

Sir ROBERT PHILLIMORE.—I think that the plaintiff is entitled to receive his taxed costs up to the date of the sale of the ship, out of the balance of the fund in court, and I shall make the desired order, and at the same time order that whatever remains after the plaintiff's claim for costs has been satisfied, shall be paid out to the interveners.

THE PESHAWUR. (a)

Practice—Collision—Lis alibi pendens—Stay of proceedings.

Where, in a damage action in personam for collision, it appeared that the defendants had, prior to the institution of the action in the High Court, instituted proceedings in rem against the plaintiffs to recover damages in respect of the same collision in a Vice-Admiralty Court near to the place where the collision occurred, the Court upon summons stayed all further proceedings in the High Court until after the Vice-Admiralty action had been heard.

THIS was a summons by the defendants in a damage action in personam in the High Court, to obtain a stay of proceedings on the ground that proceedings in an action in rem, arising out of the same collision, instituted by the present defendants against the present plaintiffs were pending in the Vice-Admiralty Court at Ceylon.

The collision out of which the actions arose took place on the 15th Oct. 1882 in the Indian Ocean near the island of Ceylon, between the plaintiffs' steamship Glenroy and the steamship Peshawur belonging to the Peninsular and Oriental Steam Navigation Company.

On the 6th Dec. the owners of the Glenroy instituted an action in personam against the Peninsular and Oriental Steam Navigation Company, in which action an appearance was entered by the defendants.

On the 30th Jan. the defendants took out a summons calling upon the plaintiffs to show cause why all further proceedings in the action should not be stayed pending the determination of an action in rem for the same cause of action, instituted by the Peninsular and Oriental Steam Navigation Company against the owners of the Glenroy, in the Vice-Admiralty Court of Ceylon.

The defendants supported the summons by affidavit, in which it was alleged as follows:—That on the 17th Oct. the defendants instructed their agents in Ceylon to institute an action in rem in the Vice-Admiralty Court against the Glenroy; that such action was instituted prior to the action in the High Court; and that expense and time would be saved by trying the action in Ceylon, because the Glenroy was confined exclusively to trading between Calcutta and other ports in the Indian Ocean, and because at the date of the affidavit the Peshawur was expected shortly to arrive at Ceylon.

The counter affidavit filed by the plaintiffs alleged that the plaintiffs could not counter-claim in the action alleged to be pending in the Vice-Admiralty Court of Ceylon; that neither expense nor time would be saved by trying the action in the Vice-Admiralty, seeing that the respective owners of both vessels were resident and domiciled in England; and that, should the plaintiffs obtain judgment in Ceylon, such judgment could not be there enforced, as there was no property of the defendants in Ceylon.

The summons having come on in chambers, was adjourned into court.

Roscoe, in support of the summons, for the defendants.—The court has a discretion, and should in the interest of all parties stay further proceedings in this action. Thereby much expense and time will be saved. It is to be noticed that the action in Ceylon was commenced prior to the proceedings in the High Court.

W. G. F. Phillimore, for the plaintiffs, against the summons.—This is an action of considerable importance, which should be tried in the High Court. The suitors are resident, and domiciled in this country. No extra expense will be incurred by trying the action in the High Court, and to have the action tried in Ceylon might prejudice the plaintiffs.

Sir ROBERT PHILLIMORE.—There are two questions raised in this case: first, whether I have the power, in my discretion, to direct a stay of proceedings in the action brought in this court by the owners of the Glenroy against the Peninsular and Oriental Steam Navigation Company; and, secondly, whether, if I have this power, I ought in the circumstances to exercise it in favour of the defendants in the action here. Now I think I have a discretion as to whether I should stay the proceedings here, or allow them to go on, and I shall exercise this discretion in favour of stopping all proceedings in the action in this court until after the suit at Colombo has been heard.

THE ALEXANDER. (a)

Collision — Practice — Bail — Counter-claim — Admiralty Court Act 1861 (24 Vict. c. 10), s. 34.

The power of the Admiralty Division under sect. 34 of the Admiralty Court Act 1861 to order an action to be stayed until bail has been given to answer a cross-action or counter-claim does not extend to making an absolute order to give bail, and in a damage action in which the plaintiffs had discontinued after the defendants had counter-claimed, the Court refused to enforce an order, made by the registrar, to give bail to answer such counter-claim.

(a) Reported by J. P ASPINALL and F. W. RAIKES, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

THIS was a motion by the defendants in a damage action of collision, asking that the plaintiffs should, within four days, give bail to answer defendants' counter-claim and costs.

On the 5th May the action was brought by the owners of the Earl of Zetland, against the owners of the Alexander, to recover damages in respect of a collision between the two vessels. The defendants counter-claimed.

The Alexander was arrested, whereupon bail was given in the sum of 700*l*.

On the 23rd May, the defendants, on application to the registrar, obtained the following order: "Upon hearing both solicitors, it is ordered that plaintiffs do give bail to answer defendants' counter-claim and costs, in the sum of 2000*l*."

On the 28th May the defendants' solicitors received from the plaintiffs' solicitors a written notice that they wholly discontinued the action. Up to the date of the present action there had been no compliance with the above order, and the defendants were now moving the court to have that order enforced within four days.

W. G. F. Phillimore in support of the motion.—Although the defendants have discontinued the action, the counter-claim still lives by virtue of the authority of McGowan v. Middleton (W. N. 1883, p. 75), which overruled Vavasseur v. Krupp (15 Ch. Div. 474), and a decision of Sir R. Phillimore's founded on Vavasseur v. Krupp, viz., The Albatross (not reported). That being so, the plaintiffs should give bail under sect. 34 of the Admiralty Court Act 1861. [BUTT, J.—The only authority for compelling bail is under the Act of Parliament. Under the rules there is power given the defendants to arrest the plaintiffs' vessel. [BUTT, J.—The power to arrest does not necessarily compel bail.]

T. Bucknill against the motion.—The registrar has no power to make the order. All the court can do is, in the words of the section, "suspend the proceedings in the principal cause until security has been given to answer judgment in the cross-cause."

BUTT, J.—The only way I can deal with the matter is this: It seems that per incuriam a wrong order has been made; and, as I cannot make a new order enforcing an order which I think wrong originally, I must refuse this application.

THE KIRBY HALL. (a)

Collision—Fog—Speed—Admissibility of evidence—Nautical assessors.

Where a steamship, going at a moderate speed in a dense fog, hears the steam-whistle of another steamship in close proximity, but is unable to ascertain the course and position of the other vessel, it is the duty of those in charge of her to stop and reverse the engines so as to take all way off her and bring her to a standstill, and if they neglect to do so, and a collision ensues, she will be held to blame for the collision.

Where the Admiralty Court is assisted by Trinity Masters, evidence as to a particular course and mode of navigation at a particular place in a dense fog and in a given state of the tide is not admissible.

THESE were consolidated actions in rem, instituted respectively by the owners of the steamship City of Brussels and owners, and by the owners of the cargo laden on board the City of Brussels, against the steamship Kirby Hall and her freight, to recover the damages sustained by reason of a collision between the two above-named steamships on the 7th Jan. in Liverpool Bay, near the north-west lightship. The Kirby Hall counter-claimed for the damages sustained by her in the said collision.

The plaintiffs alleged that, a little after 6 a.m. on the day of the collision, their vessel, the City of Brussels, a screw steamship of 2435 tons register, whilst on a voyage from New York to Liverpool with mails, a general cargo and passengers, and manned by a crew of one hundred hands all told, had arrived off the north-west lightship, near the entrance to the sea channels leading to the river Mersey. The wind was about S.E., there was a dense fog, and the tide was flood. Under these circumstances, by the order of the pilot, the City of Brussels having been turned round, her head was brought about W.N.W., and her engines having been stopped, she drifted slowly towards the bar stern foremost, drifting about a knot an hour or rather more, to E.S.E. with the tide. A good look-out was being kept on board her, and her regulation lights were duly exhibited and burning brightly. Shortly before 6.50 a.m., under these circumstances, those on board the City of Brussels heard the whistle of a steamer, which afterwards proved to be the Kirby Hall, on their starboard side before the beam. The whistle was answered each time it was heard, and after it had been so sounded and answered several times, the masthead light of the Kirby Hall was seen about a ship's length off, about two points forward of the starboard beam of the City of Brussels. The engines of the City of Brussels were at once reversed full speed, and the Kirby Hall was hailed to go astern; but the Kirby Hall coming on at great speed with her stem struck the starboard side of the City of Brussels abaft the foremast, doing her so much damage that she shortly afterwards sank with everything on board her, and ten lives were lost.

The statement of defence, so far as is material, was as follows:

1. The Kirby Hall is an iron screw steamship of 2700 tons gross, and 1759 tons registrar, belonging to the port of Liverpool, and was, at and before the time of the collision hereinafter mentioned, on a voyage from Glasgow to Liverpool with a crew of twenty-five hands and about 840 tons of cargo and 792 tons of coal on board.

2. In the course of the said voyage, the Kirby Hall, at about 0.55 a.m. on the morning of the 7th Jan., the Chicken Rock Light being then in sight and bearing N.E., was placed on a S.E. ½ S. course and so proceeded until about 5.10 a.m. on the said morning, when the weather became foggy and the steam-whistle was blown, and the Kirby Hall was slowed and then stopped. There was little or no wind. The regulation lights of the Kirby Hall were duly exhibited and were burning brightly, and a good look-out was being kept on board of her.

3. After being stopped for a few minutes, the Kirby Hall was put on a S.E. by S. ½ S. course and again proceeded at slow speed, her steam-whistle sounding duly at short intervals.

4. Under these circumstances, at about 6.45 a.m. the flood tide then running, those on board the Kirby Hall heard the foghorn of the north-west lightship apparently nearly ahead of them, and after it had been heard a second time and a dense fog still continuing, the master of the Kirby Hall was about to bring to an anchor, when the whistle of a steamship, which afterwards proved to be the City of Brussels, was heard on the port bow of the Kirby Hall. The engines of the Kirby Hall were then working dead slow, and the whistle of the City of Brussels was then heard again, but closer on the port bow. The engines of the Kirby Hall were thereupon immediately stopped, and her helm was put hard aport, when a white light of the City of Brussels was seen by those on board the Kirby Hall nearly ahead and about from one to two ship's lengths distant, and the engines of the Kirby Hall were immediately reversed full speed astern, but shortly afterwards the stem of the Kirby Hall came into contact with the starboard side of the City of Brussels near the fore-rigging. The Kirby Hall received some damage from the said collision, and the City of Brussels sank in about forty minutes.

8. Those on board the Kirby Hall did all in their power to avoid and prevent the said collision. The said collision was, as regards the defendants and the Kirby Hall and those on board of her, an inevitable accident.

9. The said collision and the damages consequent thereon were caused by the improper conduct and neglect of those on board the City of Brussels, in not keeping a good and sufficient look-out, and in not keeping out of the way of the Kirby Hall, or taking timely and proper measures to do so, and in not reversing the engines in due time, and in placing, keeping, and navigating the City of Brussels improperly and in an improper manner under the circumstances in the track and fairway of vessels bound to and from the port of Liverpool.

In the reply delivered by the plaintiffs it was alleged that, at the time of the collision, the City of Brussels was in charge of a compulsory pilot, and that if the collision was occasioned by any negligence on board the City of Brussels, it was occasioned solely by the neglect or default of the pilot.

Feb. 10.—The action came on for trial. During the plaintiffs' case it was proposed to adduce evidence on behalf of the plaintiffs to prove that the City of Brussels was being navigated in the customary manner of the place at the time of the collision.

Butt, Q.C. in support of the evidence.—Evidence as to a particular mode of navigation in a particular place has been given in this court:

The Velocity, L. Rep. 3 P. C. 44; 21 L. T. Rep. N. S. 686; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 308;
The Andalusian, 2 P. Div. 231.

It is to be remembered that this is not a question of general seamanship, on which it is the province of the Trinity Masters to decide, but a custom observed at a particular place and under particular circumstances, viz., when the tide is flood and there is a dense fog.

Sir F. Herschell (S.G.) contra.—It is always the practice of this court, when there are assessors sitting to assist the court, to reject evidence as to seamanship and nautical skill. It would be a dangerous practice to break through the rule. In the case of The Earl Spencer (L. Rep. 4 A. & E. 431; 2 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 523; 33 L. T. Rep. N. S. 235) your Lordship refused to allow evidence as to the customary mode of navigation in a particular place.

Sir ROBERT PHILLIMORE.—I think on the whole I ought not to admit the evidence in question. I think it is evidence on a point on which it is the province of the Trinity Masters to advise the court, and I do not think I ought to do anything which will go any way towards allowing the examination of expert witnesses on questions of nautical skill and seamanship in cases where the court is assisted by the Trinity Masters.

The evidence on behalf of the plaintiffs fully supported the allegations in the statement of claim, whilst the master of the Kirby Hall admitted that he did not stop and reverse his engines on hearing the first whistle from the City of Brussels, and that it was upon the whistle being heard a second time closer on the port bow of the Kirby Hall that the engines were stopped and the helm put hard-a-port.

Butt, Q.C. (with him Webster, Q.C. and W. G. F. Phillimore) for the plaintiffs.—[During the argument the Judge stated that, in his opinion, in which he was supported by the Trinity Masters, the City of Brussels was not to blame under the circumstances for not having anchored, and that she in no way contributed to the collision.] It has been laid down by the Privy Council, in The Frankland (1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 489; 27 L. T. Rep. N. S. 633; L. Rep. 4 P. C. 529), affirming the judgment below, that a steamship going in a fog and hearing a whistle sounded in the vicinity is bound to stop. This decision has been acted upon in subsequent cases. Yet the Kirby Hall, in total ignorance of the whereabouts of the vessel whose whistle she had heard, kept her engines going and ported her helm. It is a matter of common knowledge that it is almost impossible in a dense fog to ascertain the direction from whence sounds come. Under these circumstances, it was the duty of those on board the Kirby Hall to take all way off her as speedily as possible.

Sir F. Herschell, S.G. (with him P. Myburgh, Q.C. and Bucknill) for the defendants.—The court is not bound by the decision in The Frankland (ubi sup.), as the circumstances in the present case are different; and indeed it cannot with reason be maintained that in all cases a steamer in a dense fog is to stop immediately the whistle of another steamship is heard. Each case must be decided according to its particular circumstances, and in the present case everything that was reasonable and prudent was done by those on board the Kirby Hall. Her engines were stopped immediately the second whistle was heard, and it is to be noticed that the requirements of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, article 13, is, that a vessel in a fog shall go at a moderate speed. The navigation of the Kirby Hall was in every way seamanlike and in accordance with the regulations, and if the collision was not caused by the negligence of those on board the City of Brussels, it was the result of an inevitable accident.

Butt, Q.C. was not called upon in reply.

Sir ROBERT PHILLIMORE.—This is a case of collision which happened between six and seven o'clock on the morning of the 7th Jan. 1883 in Liverpool Bay near the north-west lightship. The vessels which came into collision were, the screw steamship City of Brussels and the screw steamship Kirby Hall. The City of Brussels was a very large steamer of 3700 tons gross, and the Kirby Hall was of 2700 tons gross. The City of Brussels was proceeding from New York to Liverpool with seventy passengers and a crew of one hundred hands, and the Kirby Hall was proceeding with a crew of twenty-five hands and 792 tons of coal on board from Glasgow to Liverpool. The stem of the Kirby Hall came into contact with the starboard side of the City of Brussels, which received such damage in the collision that she sank in about forty minutes. There was a dense fog at the time, as dense a fog as one can well imagine, according to the account given by both sides; and I think the doctrine laid down in the case of The Frankland (ubi sup.), to which the court has been referred, is one which covers the present case, and upon the principles of which the present case must be decided. A passage in my judgment in that case has been referred to in the argument, but I will read it again: "Both vessels were going, in truth, in the most absolute uncertainty," which was the case here, "as to the proceedings of the other, and in such a state of circumstances I have had to ask myself this question: Could anything have been done to avoid this collision which was not done? And the opinion of the court, fortified by that of its nautical assessors, is, that upon hearing the whistles of each other so near and approaching each other, each vessel ought not only to have stopped, but to have reversed until its way was stopped"—that is the part of the judgment of the Court of Admiralty to which attention should be more carefully drawn—"when it could have hailed and ascertained with certainty which way she was proceeding, and by that means the collision would or might have been avoided."

I have already arrived, and I mentioned the fact at an earlier stage of this case, at the conclusion that the City of Brussels is free from blame for the collision. We have therefore now only to deal with the questions, whether the Kirby Hall is to blame, or whether the collision was an inevitable accident. Taking into consideration the judgment to which I have just referred and others to which the attention of the court has been drawn, and having special reference to the facts of this case, we have arrived without hesitation at the conclusion that the Kirby Hall is solely to blame by reason of not stopping her way in the water when the whistle of the City of Brussels was heard the first time, and instead thereof going ahead without knowing where the City of Brussels was or what she was doing. And we wish to state, with as much emphasis as possible, that those in charge of a ship, in such a dense fog as was described in this case, should never conjecture anything when they hear a whistle in such close proximity as was the case here, whether the sound appears to them to come from a vessel approaching them or not. In the dense fog, which is proved to have prevailed in this case, those on board the Kirby Hall were bound not to speculate, but to bring their vessel to a standstill at once. It is upon these principles that I decide the present case and pronounce the Kirby Hall alone to blame for this collision.

THE AGAMEMNON. (a)

Salvage — Towing disabled steamer — Crew — Excessive claim.

Where a steamship, disabled by the breaking of her crank-shaft, was towed a distance of about thirty miles without danger or risk by another steamship belonging to the same owners as the disabled vessel and fifteen of the crew of the towing vessel instituted a salvage action in the sum of 5000*l. against the vessel towed, and arrested the vessel, cargo, and freight therein, the Court held such services to be salvage services, but of so slight a character that on a value of* 105,500*l. it awarded* 15*l., and ordered the salvors to pay all the costs of the action, expressing disapprobation both at the institution of the action in the High Court, and at the arrest of the vessel for such an amount.*

THESE were consolidated salvage actions brought by part of the crew of the steamship Telemachus, belonging to the port of Liverpool, against the steamship Agamemnon, her cargo and freight. The Agamemnon was arrested in the sum of 5000*l.*

The Agamenon, a steamship of 2347 tons (gross tonnage), with engines of 300 horse-power was, on the 4th Oct. 1882, in the Mediterranean Sea, bound on a voyage from Shanghai to London, laden with a general cargo, carrying five passengers, and manned by a crew of forty-eight hands all told. On the same day, when off the Bay of Tunis, it was discovered that the crank of the crank-shaft of the Agamemnon was broken. Her engines were accordingly stopped, and she was put under sail until such time as the broken crank could be replaced by the spare one which was on board her. At about 8.30 p.m. on the same day the steamship Telemachus, which belonged to the same owners as the Agamemnon, bound on a homeward voyage from China in cargo, sighted the Agamemnon, which had three red lights up to signify that she was not under control. The Telemachus bore down upon the Agamemnon, when she was informed of the accident, and lay by her till the next morning. The Telemachus was then attached ahead of the Agamemnon, and at 7.30 a.m. began to tow, the two vessels being headed in for Tunis, which port they both reached, and were safely anchored in at about 3 p.m. on the same day. When the towage began Tunis was distant about thirty-one and a half miles, and bore about S.W. by W. Throughout the weather was fine, and the plaintiffs were exposed to no danger.

April 23.—The action came on for hearing, when the counsel for the plaintiffs applied that the case might be postponed on the ground of the absence from England of several material witnesses. This application was opposed, and the Court ordered the case to proceed subject to the plaintiffs' case being prejudiced by the absence of the witnesses.

H. Lush-Wilson for the plaintiffs.—The services were clearly salvage services. The plaintiffs were put to extra labour and fatigue other than was contemplated when they entered into their articles. If the vessels had belonged to different owners, the towing vessel would have got salvage, in which her crew would have participated. The salved property was of great value, and the plaintiffs are entitled to a reasonable award:

The Jubilee, 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 275; 42 L. T. Rep. N. S. 594.
The Sappho, L. Rep. 3 P. C. 694; 1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 65; 24 L. T. Rep. N. S. 795.

W. G. Phillimore, for the defendants.—This was merely a towage of one partially disabled vessel by another vessel belonging to the same owners. To constitute salvage where the services consist in towing, there must be probable danger to the towed vessel. Here there was none:

The Strathnaver, L. Rep. 1 App. Cas. 58; 34 L. T. Rep. N. S. 143; 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 113;
The Princess Alice, 3 W. Rob. 138.

The plaintiffs should never have brought this action in the High Court, and ought to be condemned in costs for so doing.

Lush-Wilson in reply.

BUTT, J.—I have already expressed my opinion during the course of this case, that this action ought never to have been brought in the High Court. I do think that it is an abuse of the process of the court to arrest a ship for such a claim as this, and to insist on bail being given in the sum of 5000*l*. No respectable practitioner should lend himself to this kind of proceedings, for it looks very much like an attempt to extort money by putting the owners to inconvenience and expense.

As regards the merits of the action, I have had grave doubts whether I ought not to dismiss it. It is difficult from a common-sense point of view to say that these men should have any extra reward, as they received pay during the time the services were being performed, and in rendering them they had not to incur hardships; on the other hand the authorities go to the extent of saying that if a vessel renders services to another, the crew of the salving ship are entitled to participate in the reward. I am clearly bound, I think, by the case of The Sappho (ubi sup.), which decided that where the salving and salved vessel belong to the same owners, the crew are entitled to salved reward. I am constrained from holding that, if the Telemachus had belonged to other owners than those who were also owners of the Agamemnon, she would not be entitled to some reward; for though the Agamemnon was in no serious danger, yet she was broken down. She properly put up three red lights to signify that she was not under control, and she was in an unmanageable state near a coast, and it would have taken those in charge of her three or four days to have replaced the broken crank-shaft. If, then, these vessels had belonged to different owners, both the owners and crew of the Telemachus would have been entitled to salvage. Therefore I am bound to make some award. But I have this in my power to give the plaintiffs what I think fit. I shall give them the sum of 15*l*. which is exactly 1*l*. a head, but I shall condemn them in the whole costs of this action, as I think that this suit should have been brought in the County Court, and that the defendants' ship should not, especially as it belonged to such a well-known and solvent firm, have been arrested in so trivial an action.

THE RISOLUTO. (a)

Collision—Reference—Loss of fishing—Measure of damages.

Where the plaintiff in a damage action claimed for demurrage upon the basis of loss of fishing during repairs, and the registrar and merchants estimated that loss by taking the average catch of similar vessels during the period of repairs, the court, on objection to the registrar's report, confirmed the report with costs.

AN appeal from the registrar's report by the defendants.

This was a damage action brought against the Italian barque Risoluto and her freight by the owner, master and crew of the French fishing brig Emma of 143 tons and manned by a crew of twenty hands, to recover damages arising out of a collision between the two vessels on the 6th July 1881, in the North Atlantic Ocean off Newfoundland.

The owners of the Risoluto defended the action, and it was heard on the 13th and 14th March 1882 when the court found the Risoluto to have been alone to blame for the collision, and referred the question of damages to the registrar and merchants.

At the time of the said collision the Emma was cod-fishing on the Great Bank of Newfoundland, and by reason of the collision she had to put into St. Pierre Miquelon, an island off the south coast of Newfoundland, for repairs, whence she did not get back to the fishing grounds until the 26th Aug. 1881.

On the 4th Aug. 1882 the reference came on before the registrar, assisted by Mr. Young and Mr. Sellar.

In addition to the costs of repairs, the plaintiffs claimed as demurrage 30,000 francs, grounding such claim "on the basis of the loss of fish which average catches of other vessels showed she (the Emma) would have taken from the 6th July 1881, the date of the collision, to the 26th Aug. 1881, or 30,000 cod, at an average of one franc per cod." In support of this claim the plaintiffs filed affidavits sworn to by the owners of French fishing vessels varying from 100 to 281 tons, which were cod-fishing off Newfoundland during the season in question, in which were given from the entries in their books the number of fish caught from the 6th July to the 26th Aug. by the respective vessels, such number varying from 25,000 to 51,000.

In a counter-affidavit filed on behalf of the defendants, and sworn to by their agent in England, it was alleged that the Emma during the whole of the season, from the end of April to November, ought, in order to pay expenses whilst absent from her home port, to take 60,000 fish, of the value of 60,000 francs; that, in order to arrive at this value, the share of the crew had been included, but interest on ship and equipment, together with depreciation by wear and tear were omitted; and that the profits made at the Newfoundland cod fisheries were not in excess of the ordinary profits made by similar sized vessels engaged in other trades.

The registrar reported that the loss sustained by the plaintiffs amounted to 1473*l.* 16*s.* 5*d.* together with interest, 22,000 francs of which was for loss of fishing during the period mentioned above. The registrar and merchants arrived at the sum of 22,000 francs on the basis of the probable catch of fish which the catches of other vessels showed the Risoluto would have taken.

A portion of the notes on the reference, drawn up for the use of the court, were as follows:

A sum of 22,000 francs was allowed for loss of fishing. The vessel had a crew of twenty hands and eight small boats, it being the practice for the boats, with two men in each and long-lines, to surround the vessel whilst fishing. An immense number of French as well as native and somewhat smaller vessels are engaged in the trade, some of them landing their fish from time to time, and others, including the Emma, taking everything they catch to Bordeaux, receiving a bounty for so doing from the French Government. The cod fishery opens late in April and ends in November. The Emma had left Dieppe as usual about the middle of March, with the necessary salt to preserve the fish to be caught by her, going straight to St. Pierre, to procure herrings as bait for the early fishing, and afterwards, having damaged her windlass, she had returned to St. Pierre, and, having got a supply of bait for the later fishing, had only just resumed fishing when the collision in question occurred. At the close of the season she proceeded to Bordeaux and landed and sold 36,474 cod, which realised 37,855 francs. It was proved that the average number of fish caught by other vessels in those seas greatly exceeded that quantity, and that unless that was the case, the proceeds would not cover the expenses. The registrar and merchants therefore came to the conclusion on the information furnished, especially by the defendants, that 22,000 francs should be allowed as the loss sustained by the interruption to the fishing occasioned by the collision, an allowance for demurrage in the usual way being inapplicable to this case.

From the report the defendants appealed to the court, and on the 9th Aug. 1882, a notice of objection was filed in the registry by the defendants, the chief ground as to the demurrage allowed being that the registrar had estimated the loss of fishing on wrong principles, and had received improper evidence.

March 6.—By arrangement between the parties, the objection was heard on motion.

Bucknill for the appellants.—The evidence as to the average takes of other vessels should not have been received. The evidence upon which the registrar ought to have estimated this claim for demurrage should have been the profits of the Emma herself during preceding years. Evidence showing the takes of other vessels, different from the Emma in tonnage and in number of crew, is too speculative to found this sum of 22,000 francs upon.

W. G. F. Phillimore in support of the report.—All objections as to evidence should have been taken before the registrar. The principle upon which the registrar acted is not new:

The Gleaner, 38 L. T. Rep. N. S. 650; 3 Asp. Mar. Cas. 582.

We have discharged the onus upon us of proving that we have sustained a direct loss arising from the non-employment of the Emma in consequence of the collision:

The Clarence, 3 W. Rob. 283.

Bucknill in reply.

Sir ROBERT PHILLIMORE.—Taking into consideration all the circumstances of this case, and the authorities on the question, and the fact that the registrar was assisted by Mr Young, who has had so large an experience in these cases, I am of opinion that I ought not to interfere with the report of the registrar. I therefore dismiss the motion with costs.

JUDICIAL COMMITTEE OF THE PRIVY COUNCIL.

March 6 and 7, 1883.

(Present: The Right Hons. Lord BLACKBURN, Sir BARNES PEACOCK, Sir ROBERT P. COLLIER, and Sir RICHARD COUCH.)

THE FERRET; JOSEPH PHILLIPS AND OTHERS v. THE HIGHLAND RAILWAY COMPANY. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM THE VICE-ADMIRALTY COURT OF VICTORIA.

Jurisdiction—Wages—Joint action by six seamen—Order in Council—2 Will. 4, c. 51, s. 15—Merchant Shipping Act 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104), s. 189.

A vice-admiralty court has jurisdiction to entertain an action for wages and compensation for wrongful dismissal brought by any number of mariners not exceeding six, under Order in Council pursuant to 2 Will. 4, c. 51, provided that the total amount found due to all the plaintiffs conjointly exceeds 50*l.*, although the amount found due to each is less than that sum.

THIS was an appeal from a judgment of the Vice-Admiralty Court of the Colony of Victoria dismissing an action in rem brought by the appellants who were seamen for the recovery of their wages, compensation for wrongful dismissal, and viaticum to England.

The action was brought on the 24th Aug. 1881, according to the rules and regulations made by an Order in Council, dated the 27th June, 1832, pursuant to the Act 2 Will. 4, c. 51, by which it was provided (inter alia) that, in suits for mariner's wages, the mariner may proceed against the ship, freight and master, or the ship and freight, or the owner, or the master alone, and any number of mariners not exceeding six may proceed jointly in one action.

The facts of the case were as follows: Oct. 1880 the plaintiffs shipped under articles on the steamship Ferret, for a voyage, not to exceed three years, from Cardiff to Marseilles, thence to any ports between the 75 deg. of latitude north, and 65 deg. of latitude south, and return to a port of discharge in the United Kingdom, or on the continent of Europe. The Ferret proceeded on her voyage from Cardiff, but shortly after passing Gibraltar in darkness, the name and number of the ship was altered by order of the master Thomas Watkins, and of James Stewart Henderson, the reputed owner of the ship, the name Bantam being substituted for her former name. Then, or shortly afterwards, James Stewart Henderson, who had been on board since the commencement of the voyage, told the crew that he was the legal owner of the vessel, that it was bound on an important secret expedition, and that he would shoot any of the crew who did not obey him. Acting under duress, the crew, including the plaintiffs, promised to obey. The ship then after touching at one of the Cape de Verde Islands, and at Santos, and having on the voyage her name changed to the India, reached the Cape of Good Hope about the end of Jan. 1881. There Thomas Watkins, who had been master of the ship since she started from Cardiff, left her, and a man named Wright, who until then had acted under the name of Carlyon as chief officer, thenceforth assumed to act as master. On the 14th Feb. 1881, the ship left the Cape of Good Hope, and reached Melbourne on the 19th April 1881. The ship was there seized by order of the Government, and the crew were turned out of her. Wright, Henderson, and the purser, were prosecuted for conspiracy, and convicted on the 14th July 1881. The seamen required as witnesses were paid by the Government, the others were placed in the Sailors' Home, and offered a certain allowance. Several accepted this allowance, and were engaged as seamen on board vessels in the port. The six plaintiffs refused the amount offered to them, and commenced proceedings, each of them claiming an amount exceeding 50*l*.

The action came on for hearing on Dec. 23, 1881, on vivâ voce and documentary evidence, and on Jan. 10, 1882, the learned judge gave judgment, dismissing the action without costs on the ground that he had no jurisdiction, because the sums found due to each of the plaintiffs were less than 50*l*.

The learned judge in his judgment, after shortly stating the facts, with respect to his reasons for dismissing the action, said: "At the conclusion of the evidence in support of the allegations it was contended for the respondents that the court possessed no power to entertain a question of damages or compensation for wrongful discharge, and that the amount on which the jurisdiction of the court depended was that found to be actually due to each seaman, and not to all the seamen collectively, but to each separately. To this contention the petitioners answered that the plea of tender had determined the question of jurisdiction, it was then too late to consider such an objection, and, even if entertained, the interpretation put by the respondents on the statute 17 & 18 Vict. c. 104, s. 189, was erroneous. The first objection has already been decided. In The Great Eastern (L. Rep. 1 Ad. & E. 384; 2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 553; 17 L. T. Rep. N. S. 228) a claim was entertained for compensation in the nature of damages for a wrongful discharge of seamen before the expiration of the term of agreement. So also in The Blessing (L. Rep. 3 P. D. 35; 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 561; 38 L. T. Rep. N. S. 259) it was ruled by Sir Robert Phillimore, that the words in the statute 'claim for wages' included a claim for wrongful dismissal, apart from wages. With these decisions, especially in this jurisdiction, in which compensation may be regarded as in the light of wages earned, I have no hesitation in overruling this objection. The proper intepretation of the statute 17 & 18 Vict. c. 104, s. 189, involves a more difficult question. In The Fairy Queen (3 Ir. Jur. 283) it was held that the action was barred by the statute 7 & 8 Vict. c. 112, s. 16. No doubt there the words used are not the same as in the subsequent enactment. The one, the earlier enactment, prohibits the institution of a suit for wages; the later, the institution of a suit for the recovery of wages by or on behalf of any seaman or apprentice, &c., but the difference between the words in the earlier and the more recent enactment was caused apparently in order to avoid the difficulty pointed out by Parke, B. in Hollingworth v. Palmer (4 Ex. 284). The court is of course bound by the words used, not by the reason, if it were so, for which they were used. The subject-matter of several suits by separate persons could not be united in one action at law, although several seaman may for special reasons sue for their wages in Courts of Admiralty. If this be so the restriction ought to be the same in all the courts, for all are classed together, Admiralty, and Common Law, &c. Were this restriction in derogation of common law rights, the words ought to be construed strictly, but if the right of seamen to unite in one action the subject-matter of several is confined to Courts of Admiralty the clause need not be so rigidly interpreted. Its construction presents some difficulty, but I think it is a bar to a suit even in the Admiralty jurisdiction, unless some one at least of the suitors establishes a claim to 50*l*., when each one so establishing his right may recover. There remains the question of whether the plea of tender precluded the respondents (the defendants) from raising the question of jurisdiction. Some difficulty, I must be allowed to observe, is experienced in adjudicating in Admiralty suits at the present day in accordance with a procedure framed fifty years ago. Adhering, however, to those rules, as must be done so long as they are in force, I think the course taken is justifiable. The plea is not according to the observation of Willis, J. in Rossi v. Grant (5 C. B. N. S. 701) a plea to the jurisdiction, but a plea in bar. Dr. Lushington in The Blakeney (Swa. 428) no doubt decided that 'an absolute appearance once made cannot be recalled, all objections to the jurisdiction must be taken on the earliest occasion,' but the same very learned judge in The Harriet (5 L. T. Rep. N. S. 210; 1 Lush. 291; 1 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 152) evidently after appearance, held expressly with regret, that the evidence showed the claim for wages was barred as it did not amount to the minimum of 50*l*. A similar construction is also put by text writers of some repute (Williams and Bruce, Admiralty Jurisdiction, p. 176, note c.) on the same statute. I think, therefore, the respondent was not precluded from raising the objection to the jurisdiction. For, until all the evidence has been given, the amount due on which the jurisdiction depends cannot be accurately ascertained. With a view of diminishing the costs in a suit in which so many were interested, and the amounts were so small, and with the consent of the parties, I determined the amount instead of remitting the matter to the registrar and merchants, and allowed the sums set forth in the case for wages and compensation. I granted no allowance for viaticum, as the evidence showed that all the suitors could have obtained employment on ships bound direct to London at much higher wages than they were receiving on board the Ferret. As in no one case did the sums so allowed reach the minimum 50*l*. I dismissed the suit, but, following the course taken in the case of The Harriet (ubi sup.), without costs."

The sum found by the learned judge to be due to the plaintiffs amounted in all to 203*l*. 19*s*. 8*d*.

From the above decision the plaintiffs now appealed, and in their case submitted that the judgment of the court below was erroneous, and ought to be reversed, or the cause remitted with proper directions for the following, among other reasons:—

1. Because the court had jurisdiction to give judgment for the sums awarded by it to each of the appellants on one or other of the following grounds (1): That each of the appellants claimed a sum exceeding 50*l*.; (2) that the sum awarded to the appellants exceeded 50*l*.; (3) that it did not appear that the owners or any legal master of the ship resided within twenty miles of the place where the seamen were put on shore; (4) that the respondents waived objection to the jurisdiction; (5) that the ship was under arrest at the time of the suit being brought; (6) that all suits for seamen's wages can be entertained by the Vice-Admiralty Court of the colony of Victoria.

2. Because the learned judge of the court below ought not to have admitted evidence of the payment of the Government to the seamen, and ought to have awarded to each of the appellants a sum of money as viaticum.

In the case of the respondents, on appeal, it was submitted that the decree dismissing the action was right for the following, amongst other reasons:—

1. Because the amount due to each of the promovents was less than 50*l*.

2. Because the said action was a suit or proceeding for the recovery of wages under the sum of 50*l*., within the meaning of the statute 17 & 18 Vic. c. 104, s. 189.

3. Because it was not shown by or on behalf of the promovents that any of the excepted circumstances referred to in the statute 17 & 18 Vict. c. 104, s. 189, existed in the present case.

4. Because the respondents did not, by the plea of tender or in any other way, preclude themselves from objecting to the jurisdiction of the said court in respect of the said action.

5. Because the said court had no jurisdiction in respect of the said action.

March 6.—The appeal came on for hearing. Jeune (Wyke with him) for the appellants.—The cases of The Harriet (ubi sup.) and Rossi v. Grant (ubi sup.) do not touch the present case, because in those cases the sum found due to the plaintiffs did not amount to the sum required by the statute. Here the sums found due exceeds 50*l*., and it is immaterial that the particular items are less than 50*l*. 203*l*. 18*s*. 9*d*. has been found due in one and the same action, and therefore the requisite of the recovery of 50*l*. has been complied with. The six plaintiffs have brought their action under the Order in Council, pursuant to 2 Will. 4, c. 57, and in that action over 50*l*. has been recovered. The word "seaman" in sect. 189 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 should be read as including the plural. This is borne out by the Interpretation Act (13 & 14 Vict. c. 21). If so, the statute is clearly complied with. The plaintiffs also claimed more than 50*l*. apiece, and if the judge had given viaticum, as he should, the amounts recovered would have in all cases exceeded 50*l*. The Fairy Queen (ubi sup.) is not in point, because the words in sect. 16 of 7 & 8 Vict. c. 112, on which the case was decided differ materially from sect. 189 of 17 & 18 Vict. c. 104. With respect to the residence of the master within twenty miles, how can it be said that Wright was a legally substituted master when he wrongfully took possession of the ship, and of his own will took command of her? The owners would not be bound by the acts of such a substituted master, and should not now be allowed to set up that he was a master within the meaning of the section. How can it be said that Wright was a master against whom the seaman could have a remedy?

Hollams (with him A. Cohen, Q.C.) for the respondents.—The sums found due to each of the plaintiffs were less than 50*l*., and the plaintiffs cannot now say that Wright was not the master, seeing that they by their conduct have recognised him as such. Hence the plaintiffs have not shown that any of the excepted circumstances in sect. 189 exist in the present case. The plaintiffs' remedy was to proceed in a summary manner before justices, as is contemplated in sect. 188, and to uphold the plaintiffs' contention would be practically to make that section almost nugatory. It cannot be said that sect. 189 is complied with because the total amount of wages exceeds 50*l*., inasmuch as the decree is for the particular items found due to each, and such items are all under 50*l*. The Fairy Queen is directly in point, and in that case the learned judge rejected the petition of the seamen when the aggregate amount of the claims of a crew for wages exceeded 20*l*., but the claim of each individual was less than 20*l*.

Jeune was not called upon to reply.

Their Lordships' judgment was delivered by Sir BARNES PEACOCK.—This was a suit brought by six seamen, in the Vice-Admiralty Court of Melbourne, to recover wages and compensation for wrongful dismissal. The suit was brought by the six seamen jointly, the amount claimed for each being a larger sum than 50*l*.; but the judge reduced the amount due to each of the plaintiffs to a sum less than 50*l*., the total, however, amounting to 203*l*. 19*s*. 8*d*. The first question to be considered is whether the judge had jurisdiction. That depends upon the 189th section of the Merchant Shipping Act of 1854. Previously to the passing of that Act His Majesty King William IV., by an Order in Council made under the authority of an Act of Parliament, passed in the second year of his reign, ordained certain rules and regulations to be acted upon by the Vice-Admiralty Courts abroad. One of those rules was contained in the 15th section. It states than any number of seamen, not exceeding six, may join in one action in a Vice-Admiralty Court to recover their wages. It was therefore at the time of the passing of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, lawful for six seamen, if they pleased, to join in one action in the Vice-Admiralty Court to recover their wages; and compensation also falls under that rule. The 188th section of that Act enacted that: "Any seaman or apprentice, or any person duly authorised on his behalf, may sue in a summary manner before two justices of the peace acting in or near the place at which the service has terminated, or at which the seamen or apprentice has been discharged, or at which any person upon whom the claim is made is or resides, for any amount of wages due to such seaman or apprentice, not exceeding 50*l.* over and above the costs of any proceedings for the recovery thereof." The 189th section, which is the section relied upon, enacted that "No suit or proceeding for the recovery of wages under the sum of 50*l.* shall be instituted by or on behalf of any seaman or apprentice in any court of admiralty or vice-admiralty, or any court of session in Scotland, or in any superior court of record in Her Majesty's dominions unless the owner of the ship is adjudged bankrupt or declared insolvent, or unless the ship is under arrest or is sold by the authority of any such court as aforesaid; or unless any justices, acting under the authority of this Act, refer the case to be adjudged by such court, or unless neither the owner nor the master is or resides within twenty miles of the place where the seaman or apprentice is discharged."

The question, then, is, whether this enactment prevents several seamen from joining in one suit in a vice-admiralty court to recover wages when the total amount of the wages claimed exceeds 50*l.*, and the wages of each is less than 50*l.* Having reference to the Interpretation Act (13 & 14 Vict. c. 21), which was in force when the Merchant Shipping Act of 1854 was passed, and by which it is enacted that words in the singular number shall include the plural, their Lordships are of opinion that they may read sect. 189 as if it had said "No suit or proceeding for the recovery of wages under the sum of 50*l.* shall be instituted by or on behalf of any seaman or seamen." It was contended that the section could not be read in that way, inasmuch as it speaks of actions brought in any of Her Majesty's courts of record, in which six seamen cannot join; but it does not follow that because six seamen cannot join in a suit in one of Her Majesty's courts of record they are not to join in a suit in the Vice-Admiralty Court under the provisions of the rules to which allusion has already been made. Their Lordships think that the 189th section must be read reddendo singula singulis, and that if six seamen join in a suit in a vice-admiralty court, where six seamen may join, and the total amount of the wages due to the six exceeds 50*l.*, they may proceed in that suit, although the wages of each included in the amount sought to be recovered are less than 50*l.*

It was agreed that the judge instead of sending the matter to the registrar to assess the amount, should himself ascertain it; and he found with regard to each of the six that the wages and compensation due was a sum less than 50*l.*, but that the total amount due to the six was 203*l.* 19*s.* 8*d.* Their Lordships think that the judge had jurisdiction under the rule and section, to which allusion has already been made, to award that sum of 203*l.* 19*s.* 8d. partly for wages and partly for wrongful dismissal. In the first place, there was a contract entered into by Watkins, who was the duly authorised master of the owners at Cardiff. He entered into a contract with the seamen, and they were hired at certain fixed amounts for a period of three years for a certain voyage. It appears that the master left the ship at the Cape, and that a man named Wright, who was then the mate, took possession and ran away with it for the purpose of stealing it. When the ship arrived at Melbourne on the 22nd April 1881 the Government seized it on behalf of the owners upon the ground that it was in the possession of men who had stolen it, and they put the seamen ashore. Three days afterwards, on the 25th April, the ship was delivered up by the Government to the agent of the owners. The agent took possession, and the owners must be bound by his act. By taking possession of the ship they ratified what the Government had done in taking possession of it on their behalf, and putting the seamen ashore. The seamen contended that they were entitled not only to their wages up to the time of the seizure, but to compensation for being turned out of the ship after it arrived at Melbourne. If the seamen had been participes criminis, if they had joined Wright in endeavouring to steal the ship, of course they would not have been entitled either to wages or to compensation: but that defence was never made. The seamen, although they were at first arrested, were never tried for the offence of complicity. They were discharged, and no defence was set up in the suit in the Vice-Admiralty Court that the plaintiffs were not entitled to their wages upon the ground of complicity. A sum, not including compensation, was tendered to them for their wages up to the date of the seizure of the ship. Nothing was offered by way of compensation for the wrongful dismissal. The learned judge who tried the case said: "In consequence of information received by the Government, the steamer had been seized by the officers of Customs. The master and mate were arrested, and the seamen removed from the vessel, some of the crew being kept under the surveillance of the police as witnesses, awaiting the trial of the master and mate. The seamen required as witnesses were paid by the Government; the others were placed in the Sailors' Home, and offered a certain allowance. Several accepted this allowance, and were engaged as seamen on board vessels in the port. The promoters refused the amount offered them, and instituted the present proceedings." Their Lordships are of opinion that, under the circumstances (no defence having been set up that the plaintiffs were guilty of complicity), they were entitled to recover their wages, and a reasonable and proper amount for compensation. The judge fixed the amount which he would have awarded, if he had had jurisdiction, at 203*l.* 19*s.* 8*d.*, but he dismissed the suit upon the ground that he had no jurisdiction, inasmuch as the suit was for wages under the amount of 50*l.* Their Lordships ought to give the same judgment as the judge would have given if he had considered that he had jurisdiction and had referred it to the registrar to assess the amount, and the registrar had fixed it at 203*l.* 19*s.* 8*d.* and the judge confirmed the report of the registrar.

Several other points were made, and, amongst others, that Wright was the substituted master, notwithstanding he took the command after Watkins left, for the purpose of stealing the ship; and that although in gaol for stealing the ship, he was residing within twenty miles of the place where the seamen were discharged, within the meaning of the 189th section. Their Lordships consider that the point on which the judgment has already been pronounced is sufficient to decide the case, and that it is not necessary to express an opinion upon the other points. Under these circumstances their Lordships will humbly advise Her Majesty that the judgment of the judge be reversed, and that, instead thereof, a decree be given in the suit for the plaintiffs for the sum of 203*l.* 19*s.* 8*d.*, to be distributed amongst the several plaintiffs in the manner in which the learned judge has divided the total amount amongst them, with costs in the lower court. The respondents must pay the costs of this appeal.

COURT OF APPEAL.

Friday, April 20, 1883.

(Before Brett, M.R., Cotton and Bowen, L.JJ.)

The Renpor. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM THE PROBATE, DIVORCE, AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION (ADMIRALTY).

Life salvage—No property salved—Agreement—Right of recovery.

Life salvage is only recoverable where ship, cargo, or freight is saved, so that a fund out of which the award can be paid is realised; hence ineffectual attempts to save the property, though rendered at express request, give no claim to life salvage.

Semble, A master has no authority to bind his owners by an agreement to save the lives of himself and crew, as his owners have no beneficial interest in the subject-matter of such a contract.

Where the steamship R. being in imminent peril of total loss, her master on behalf of himself and his owners, entered into the following agreement with the master of the steamship M.L.: "It is hereby agreed between Thomas Gibb, the master of the above steamer, and Robert Osborn, master of the steamship R. that the above steamer M.L., agrees to stay by me until I am in a safe position to get to port, for the sum of 1200*l., my vessel being badly holed in starboard bow near collision bulkhead"; and in pursuance of the agreement the M.L., at great risk, stood by the R. until she sank, when the M.L. took off her master and crew; it was held (affirming Sir R. Phillimore), that no life salvage was recoverable as no property had been saved, and that neither master nor owners were liable under the contract, as the condition "until I am in a safe position to get to port" had not been fulfilled.*

This was a demurrer to a statement of claim in a salvage action, in which the owners, master, and crew of the steamship Mary Louisa claimed salvage reward in respect of services rendered to the steamship Renpor and to her master and crew.

The statement of claim, so far as is material, is as follows:

1. The plaintiffs are the owners, master, and crew of the screw steamship Mary Louisa, and the defendants are the owners and master of the screw steamship Renpor.

2. The Mary Louisa is a screw steamship of 1976 tons register, propelled by engines of 200 horse-power nominal, and was at the time of the occurrences hereinafter mentioned in the course of her voyage from Newcastle-upon-Tyne to New York, laden with a general cargo and manned by a crew of twenty-three hands. The value of the Mary Louisa, her cargo, and freight, was about 40,000*l.*

3. On or about the 10th April 1882, in the course of the said voyage, the Mary Louisa came into a vast field of ice, extending, as it was subsequently ascertained, for many hundred miles, and consisting of large floes and hummocks, with frequent icebergs of large size. By the exercise of great care and caution and skill in the navigation of the Mary Louisa, she was conducted through the ice-fields at considerable risk, but without sustaining damage. About noon on the 13th April, whilst still in the ice-field, and after having, during the early part of the day, passed about thirty large icebergs, those on board the Mary Louisa observed a large steamer about four miles to the southward and westward of them in the ice, making signals for assistance.

4. Thereupon, the course of the Mary Louisa was directed with difficulty through the pieces of ice towards the steamer, which proved to be the steamship Renpor of 1323 tons gross register on a voyage from West Hartlepool to Boston with a heavy cargo of pig iron and some potatoes, and on coming up with her, it was found that she had been in collision with the ice and had her starboard bow stove in below the water-line, and that she was making a great deal of water and the water was gaining on her in spite of the efforts of the crew to plug the holes and to keep the water down by pumping. The crew of the Renpor were worn out by constant exertion and exposure to cold. Although cargo had been jettisoned from the fore-part of the vessel, the Renpor was in imminent danger of sinking, and the lives of all on board of her were in peril. It was unsafe for the crew to trust to their boats owing to the quantities of ice around the ship; and the Renpor was about 1000 miles from land. The quantity of water coming into the forepart of the ship caused so much pressure on the forward bulkhead, that there was great danger that the bulkhead would suddenly give way and the Renpor would at once go to the bottom.

5. When the Mary Louisa approached the Renpor the master of the latter informed the master of the Mary Louisa of the condition of his vessel, and about 5 p.m. on the said 13th April, the weather at the time being thick and threatening, the master of the Renpor boarded the Mary Louisa and requested her master to remain by him so long as the Renpor and the lives of those on board the Renpor continued exposed to danger.

6. The master of the Mary Louisa informed the master of the Renpor that he was ordered, as the fact was, not to delay his voyage to render salvage services, except in order to save life, but having regard to the danger in which the lives of the master and crew were placed, he would accede to the request of the master of the Renpor, provided that he would enter into a written agreement. Accordingly, the following agreement was entered into by the master of the Mary Louisa on behalf of himself, and the owners, and the remainder of the crew of that vessel, and by the master of the Renpor, on behalf of himself and the owners of the Renpor, and signed by the said masters.

"Lat. 43° 30′ N. Long. 50° 00′ W.—Mary Louisa, April 13th, 1882.—It is hereby agreed between Thomas Gibb, master of the above steamer, and Robert Osborn master of the s.s. Renpor, that the above steamer Mary Louisa agrees to stay by me until I am in a safe position to get to port for the sum of 1200*l.*, my vessel being badly holed in starboard bow near collision bulkhead."

The master of the Renpor then returned to his ship.

7. In pursuance of the said agreement the Mary Louisa was kept in the neighbourhood of the Renpor during the night of the 13th April, the Renpor, owing to the fog, being at times lost sight of, and her position being only distinguished by the sound of her steam-whistle; and at 2 a.m. the next morning, rockets were sent up from the Renpor as signals of distress, and the Mary Louisa was thereupon taken with great skill and with the utmost expedition possible under the circumstances, towards the Renpor, and, when in a position in which the Renpor could approach her, she was stopped for the Renpor to come up. As the Renpor appproached, those on board of her were heard to be crying out that the Renpor was sinking and asking for immediate assistance.

(a) Reported by J. P. Aspinall and F. W. Raikes, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

The forward bulkhead had suddenly given way, and the Renpor was sinking.

8. The Mary Louisa remained as close to the Renpor as was safe until about 3 a.m., when the master and the whole of the crew of the Renpor, twenty in all, were, by their own boats, got on board the Mary Louisa. As soon as they were all on board, the Mary Louisa steamed clear of the Renpor and lay by her until she sank, about 9 a.m.

9. The Mary Louisa with the crew of the Renpor proceeded on her voyage to New York, where she arrived on the 19th April. The Mary Louisa had previously relieved another vessel in the course of her voyage, and was short of provisions.

10. The above-mentioned services were rendered with great care and skill, and in rendering the said services the Mary Louisa and her crew were exposed to risk of collision with the Renpor, and loss occured to the owners of the Mary Louisa by reason of the delay to their ship caused in rendering the said services, and they incurred risk in respect of the cargo on board the Mary Louisa. The Mary Louisa was in attendance on the Renpor for sixteen hours, and she was further delayed in proceeding out of her course in order to reach the Renpor.

11. By reason of the said services the lives on board the Renpor were saved.

12. The plaintiffs say that they were at all times ready and willing to perform the said agreement and that they have performed the same; and they have done all things necessary on their part to entitle them to recover from the defendants the said agreed sum of 1200*l*.

The plaintiffs claim:

1. That the court will pronounce for the said agreement.

2. Judgment for the sum of 1200*l*., or such other sum together with the costs as to the court may seem just.

3. Such further and other relief as the nature of the case may require.

The defendants demurred to the whole of the statement of claim, alleging that

The same is bad in substance and in law, on the grounds that the agreement therein pleaded is not alleged to have been performed, and that no cause of action arose till its performance, and on the ground that no property of any of the defendants is therein alleged to have been saved; and as to the defendant, the master of the steamship Renpor, on the further ground that he is not shown to be under any personal liability on the agreement therein pleaded; and, as to all the defendants, on other grounds sufficient in law to sustain this demurrer.

Aug. 2.—The demurrer came on for argument.

W. G. F. Phillimore for the defendants, in support of the demurrer.—The agreement was never carried out, and therefore, neither the owners nor the master of the Renpor are liable under it. The Renpor never was "in a safe position to get to port," and it makes no difference that the plaintiffs were ready and willing to carry out the agreement, or that in attempting to do so they imperilled themselves and their property. Apart from the agreement, the defendants are not liable for life salvage, because no property has been saved, and in no case has the Admiralty Court awarded life salvage where no property has been saved:

G. Bruce, contra, for the plaintiffs.—The defendants are liable for a quantum meruit under the agreement. The lives of the crew were saved and efforts were made to save the property. Irrespective of the agreement, the owners of the Renpor are liable for salvage, upon the authority of Dr. Lushington in The Undaunted (Lush, 90; 2 L. T. Rep. N. S. 520.) In that case Dr. Lushington said that salvors working under an express request are entitled to salvage award, although no property is saved. Here there was an express request, and the plaintiffs are, therefore, to be distinguished from mere volunteers, who are only entitled to salvage when property is saved. The authority is the same in The E. U. (1 Spinks 63). Life salvage has been awarded to salvors, who have themselves saved no property, where the property has been saved by other persons, and if so, can it with reason and justice be denied to the present plaintiffs, whose efforts are equally as meritorious as the life salvors in those cases:

The Cargo ex Schiller (ubi sup.);
The Fusilier (ubi sup.).

In The Medina (1 P. Div. 272) life salvage was given, though no property was saved. The decision in The Johannes (ubi sup.) does not affect the principles of salvage, and entirely turned upon the interpretation of an Act of Parliament.

W. G. F. Phillimore in reply,—In The E. U. (ubi sup.) and The Undaunted, as a matter of fact, the property had been saved, although not by the plaintiffs, and hence there was a fund out of which salvage could be paid. In The Medina (ubi sup.) the services consisted in saving more than life, because there the passengers were carried to their destination, whereby the owners of the Medina were enabled to carry out their contract of carriage and so earn freight.

Sir R. Phillimore.—I am of opinion that this demurrer is good, and that it must be sustained. In this case there is no vessel or property out of which a salvage reward can be given, and there is no personal liability on the part of the master or owner to pay any sum or salvage services rendered. The law was, I think, correctly laid down by me, in accordance with other cases, in the case of The Sarpedon (3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 509; 37 L. T. Rep. N. S. 505: 3 P. Div. 28) as follows: "I consider it to be now a fixed principle of salvage law that, in the absence of any special contract, some property in the ship or cargo must be saved in order to found the liability of the owners of the ship or cargo to payment of salvage remuneration." Now, it is contended in this case that there is a special contract which is binding upon the parties. The words of this contract are: "It is hereby agreed between Thomas Gibb, master of the above steamer, and Robert Osborn, master of the s.s. Renpor, that the above steamer Mary Louisa agrees to stay by me until I am in a safe position to get to port for the sum of 1200*l*., my vessel being badly holed in starboard bow near collision bulkhead." Well, now the vessel was lost a few hours afterwards, and, therefore, he never was put "in a safe position to get to port" by Thomas Gibbs, master of the steamer. He never was in that position. But it has been contended (with abundant ingenuity, I must say), that "in a safe position to get to port" does not mean "to get to port," but "stay by me as long as I thing necessary." That would be, I think, not introducing explanatory words into the agreement, but making a new agreement altogether. First of all, it is said that the agreement was fulfilled by the master being ready to render assistance at the time when the vessel went down; and then it is contended, as I understand, if it was not carried into effect, that there should be a quantum meruit; and then, thirdly, it was contended that outside the agreement a fair sum could be claimed from the master. It may be my fault, but I am unable to follow the argument by which some of these strong propositions were said to be supported. It seems to me that the words of the agreement are perfectly plain and intelligible. If the Renpor had been taken by the Mary Louisa "into a safe position to get to port," the conditions of the agreement would have been fulfilled; but it is admitted she did not get to port, and, as I have already said, other words must be necessarily introduced into the agreement to make it intelligible.

Now, it is said independently of the agreement altogether, that the master of the Mary Louisa is entitled to some sum of money, some remuneration, because, at the request of the master of the Renpor, he stood by him, and that he did all things necessary to entitle him to recover. This proposition, as I understand it, is not to be found in the agreement itself, but it rests upon the general law. I can only say that I think no case has been made out against the master which would enable the Mary Louisa to sustain that position, and that really the more the matter is looked at, the more simple it appears to be. The only question I have to ask myself in this case is, whether the demurrer is sustainable which impugns this contract, inasmuch as the conditions of it were never fulfilled, and inasmuch as the vessel never was put in a "safe position to get to port." Upon the facts admitted in this case, it appears to me to be so, and, therefore, I pronounce in favour of the demurrer.

From this judgment the plaintiffs appealed, and the appeal came on for hearing on the 16th and 20th April 1883.

Arthur Charles, Q.C. and Gainsford Bruce, for the appellants, used substantially the same argument as that in the court below.

W. G. F. Phillimore, for the respondents, was not called upon.

Brett, M.R.—In this case, I am of opinion that the judgment of the court below is right and must be affirmed. The suit is brought under the following circumstances: The defendant's vessel, the Renpor, was in the greatest possible danger; she was surrounded by ice, she could not move out of it, and she was 1000 miles from land when the plaintiffs' vessel came up with her. The Renpor very shortly afterwards sank, but before that happened the plaintiffs' steamer got off and saved the lives of her master and crew. The plaintiffs' vessel while rendering this service was in considerable danger, and there were therefore present several of the elements of a salvage service, namely, danger to the lives and property, both of salvors and salved, and a service rendered.

Now, it is said that this action is maintainable, irrespective of the agreement which was entered into by the masters in writing, as a life salvage service. As I have already said, there are many elements present which entitle the plaintiffs to salvage, but there is one element wanting, which is invariably required by Admiralty law in order to found an action for salvage. There must be something saved, more than life, which will form a fund out of which salvage may be paid. In other words, the saving of life alone, without the saving of ship, cargo, or freight, is not enough to justify salvage being recovered in the Admiralty Court. Life salvage, it is true, may by statute be payable under some circumstances, but then it must be paid by the Board of Trade. It is said that, under some circumstances, if life is saved, after the services have been requested by the master of the ship which is in danger, the shipowner is bound to pay salvage, although there is no res saved, and The Undaunted (ubi sup.), has been cited in support of this proposition. The E. U. (ubi sup.) has also been relied on as an authority in favour of it, more especially a dictum of Dr. Lushington, which is to be found in that case. But The Undaunted is really no authority in favour of the plaintiffs' contention, because in that case the ship was saved, and therefore there was a fund from which payment could be made. The question in that case was, whether the plaintiffs could be paid out of that fund, and it was decided that they could, because they had exerted themselves to save the ship at the request of the master. It is now unnecessary to say whether we agree with that decision or not, but it in no way breaks the fundamental law of the Admiralty Court, that something must be saved in order to give valid grounds for a salvage action. The E. U. (ubi sup.) is a similar case; but there a supposititious case is mentioned by Dr Lushington, which is supposed to support the plaintiffs' contention in the present case. If Dr. Lushington did state this supposed case as containing his view of the law, it is contrary to what he has laid down before; but if it does mean that, with all respect for his great authority, I am unable to agree with him. But I doubt if it is an exact statement of the learned judge's opinion, and also whether, on consideration, he would have so decided. The cases of The Fusilier (2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 37, 177; Br. & L. 341), The Zephyr (2 Hagg. 43), and The Cargo ex Schiller (ubi sup.) are contrary to the plaintiffs' contention, and support the fundamental Admiralty Court rule that some property must be saved to give rise to a claim for salvage.

Then it has been argued that an action in the nature of a common law suit could be brought on this agreement, which is binding on the shipowner. But there are two circumstances necessary in order to make an agreement binding on an owner: Firstly, the contract must be made under a necessity, and secondly, it must be made for his benefit. I desire not to appear to say a cruel thing, but I must express a doubt whether if an agreement is made only for the purpose of saving a master and crew, without regard to any saving of the property of the shipowner, though it be in a case of necessity, yet as the subject-matter is without benefit to the shipowner, the master has authority to bind the owner to a money payment. But if this agreement was not merely one by which the lives of the master and crew were to be saved, what does it mean? The contract must be read, having regard to the circumstances and the parties to it, and it is idle to suppose that those on the Renpor had made up their minds that the ship would sink at once. What undoubtedly was contemplated was the possibility of the vessel arriving safely in port. The words "me" and "I" in the contract, clearly mean the ship and master and crew—the ship, master, and crew are treated as one thing. The words are "to stay by me until I am in a safe position to get to port." Thus it is a contract which the master would have authority to make, and would bind the owner to pay the sum mentioned in it for staying by until the ship was safe. Therefore, in order now to make this money payable, you must put in the words "or sink," or else the condition is not fulfilled. Any question of a quantum meruit claim arising out of it is one which, though mentioned during the discussion of the case, cannot be seriously argued. I think, therefore, that the agreement is a proper salvage agreement which fixes the amount of salvage to be paid for services to both life and property, but leaves untouched all the other conditions necessary to support a salvage award, and, as on principle, and on the construction of the contract itself, there must be something saved, I am of opinion that neither owner nor master are liable in this action, because no res have been saved. Therefore, in my opinion, this appeal must be dismissed, and the judgment below affirmed.

COTTON and BOWEN, L.JJ. concurred.

Appeal dismissed.

THE HECTOR. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE PROBATE, DIVORCE, AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION (ADMIRALTY.)

Practice—Costs—Collision—Both vessels to blame—Appeal—Judgment below varied—Compulsory pilotage—Amount recoverable.

Where the Court of Appeal varies the decision of the Admiralty Court, finding one vessel solely to blame for a collision, by finding both vessels to blame, each party bears his own costs, both in the court below and in the Court of Appeal, and the fact that the owners of one are exempt from liability on the ground of compulsory pilotage makes no difference to this rule.

Where in an action of collision it is held that it was occasioned by the fault of both vessels, but one of such vessels is exempt from liability on the ground of compulsory pilotage, the latter vessel is entitled by the Admiralty Court rule to recover half the damages sustained by her in the collision, and is not limited to the difference between half her damage and half the damage of the other ship.

THIS was an appeal from a decision of Sir Robert Phillimore, by which he had found the steamship Hector solely to blame for a collision which took place in the English Channel on the 1st Sept. 1881 between that vessel and the steamship Augustus. The defendants had pleaded compulsory pilotage, but the learned judge held that, under the circumstances of the case, this plea could not be sustained.

(a) Reported by J. P. ASPINALL, and F. W. RAIKES, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

March 9.—On appeal the Court varied the decision of the court below by finding both vessels to blame, but further held that the defendants had established their plea of compulsory pilotage, and were thereby exempt from liability in respect of the said collision.

The question then arose how the costs of the appeal were to be borne, and the court directed this question to be reserved for a further inquiry to ascertain what was the practice in a case like the present, where the decision below finding one vessel solely to blame was varied by both vessels being held to blame.

March 10.—Myburgh, Q.C. (with him Butt, Q.C.) for the appellants.—Although the old Admiralty Court rule was that where both vessels are held to blame there should be no order as to costs, yet James, L.J., in the case of The Condor (4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 115; 40 L. T. Rep. N. S. 442; 4 Prob. Div. 115), derogates from that rule, and lays it down that there should be one uniform practice as to costs, and that a successful appellant should get his costs. The owners of the Hector are successful appellants, and should therefore get the costs.

W. G. F. Phillimore for the respondents.—James, L.J., in a case subsequent to The Condor (ubi sup.), The Milanese (4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 318; 43 L. T. Rep. N. S. 107), upheld the old Admiralty Court rule. The owners of the Hector are not entirely successful appellants, seeing that they are partly to blame for the collision. They have only succeeded in getting both ships to blame.

BRETT, L.J.—We have not to deal in this case with a case which might arise—which is this, that the Admiralty Court should have found both vessels to blame, and that on appeal we should affirm that judgment. In that case the appeal would have been obviously and clearly wrongly brought. As to that case, therefore, we need say nothing. But in this case the Admiralty Court has found one of the two vessels to blame, whereupon the other vessel appealed, and we, differing from the Admiralty Court, have come to the conclusion that both vessels were to blame, and that therefore the judgment in the Admiralty Court ought, in our view—we say no more than that—to have been that both vessels were to blame. Well, then, it is true that the appellant was, as it were, forced to bring the appeal, because, if he had sat contented with the judgment, he was made solely liable to pay all the damage done to the other vessel, and to pay all the costs of the action. He could not sit still under such a judgment. He was obliged to appeal, and he does appeal. Well, two modes of appeal might arise. He might appeal, and state as the sole ground of appeal that the judgment ought to have been that both vessels were to blame. If he did that, he would succeed absolutely on the ground of his appeal, if we found that that was right. But even then I am not prepared to say that we should give costs, for a reason which I shall presently mention. Then the other mode is to appeal and to state that the judgment ought to have been entirely in his favour in the court below. Well, then, if you take the grounds of his appeal and the ground of his argument, here he fails to support the ground of his appeal entirely; he fails to support his argument entirely, but he succeeds in part. But then there arises this difficulty, that by claiming more than he has got, he has done no harm to the other parties, because it is absurd to suppose that if he had claimed the judgment that both vessels were to blame they would have accepted that settlement. He has, therefore, done no harm by it. He is forced to appeal, and he succeeds in altering the judgment, and he has done no harm to the other party by claiming more. Therefore I hardly think that that can be the ground upon which the rule is supposed to have been established.

My own view of the matter is that the Admiralty Court, which always exercised a very wide jurisdiction with regard to the discipline of the seas, laid down this rule, as a matter of discipline to enforce discipline at sea, viz.: if both vessels are to blame, neither of them shall gain by any litigation in the matter; and I think that the Privy Council adopted that view of it, and carried it out, except where there were exceptional circumstances. I should say that an exceptional circumstance would be where the appeal is avowedly brought only for the purpose of getting the judgment that both vessels were to blame. That might have been an exception; but I am not sure of that. No; I would not say that that would be an exception. I think it is an exception where the judgment of the court below has been that both vessels are to blame, and that question and that judgment are affirmed. That would be the exception, and perhaps that is the only one. I think the Privy Council came to the conclusion that they, acting in Admiralty, would carry out the same rule that the Admiralty Court had fixed upon in order to preserve discipline at sea, namely that neither party, if both were to blame, should gain anything by the litigation.

Now, it was supposed for a moment that James, L.J. was derogating from that rule in this case (The Condor, ubi sup.) which has been cited to us. But I do not think he did. I think he must have been alluding to some other form or to some exception to that case, because after that, in The Milanese (ubi sup.), it is obvious that he and the Court of Appeal at all events referred to the old rule. I think the better way to solve the matter is to say that, in order to preserve care at sea, where it is so important that care should be observed, the Court of Appeal will adopt the rule of the Admiralty Court and the rule of the Privy Council to this extent, that (unless in some exceptional case), where both vessels are to blame, they will not allow either vessel to gain by the litigation. Therefore the costs of the appeal will not be given any more than the costs of the action.

Cotton, L.J.—I agree with the rule; but I do not know if it is to be settled on reason or sound principles whether I should have so laid it down. Whoever appeals, I think, ought to get the costs of a successful appeal, and to pay the costs of an unsuccessful one.

Bowen, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. What I add is not for the purpose of adding any weight or authority to the matter as to the practice which Brett, L.J. has so competently dealt with. The rule is based, I think, upon common sense. When two ships are equally in fault, it is, as he says, a matter of discipline that neither ship should benefit by the litigation. Now I should have said that a party appealing ought to pay the costs of an appeal in one contingency and one only, where both ships are held to blame. If the appeal is brought to set the court right where the court below is wrong, having held one ship alone to blame it seems to me that the costs of the appeal ought to follow the general rule that the litigation ought to be borne equally by both sides. The appeal is a step in the litigation, and a necessary and natural step. But if the appeal is brought to set the court wrong where the court below is really right, as where it has held both ships to blame, why of course the person who is unwise enough to try to set the court wrong ought to bear the costs. In this particular case they bring the appeal to set the court right, and although they sought to go further and make the court find the respondent's vessel alone to blame, this case does not fall under the class of cases to which I have alluded, where the sole object of the appeal is to set the court wrong. I should like to add, in order to make my meaning quite clear, that, in my opinion, if the only object of the appeal is to set the court wrong, then the person who brings the appeal ought to pay. That is what I meant to say. That should be the exception.

May 2.—The owners of the Augustus applied to the court to ascertain the effect of the judgment given in this case by the Court of Appeal on March 9.

The Court of Appeal, varying the decision of the court below, had found both vessels to blame, but held that the Hector had satisfactorily established the plea of compulsory pilotage, the judgment being "that the Hector recover half her damages, and the Augustus nothing at all." The present application was for an order that the judgment should be drawn up in accordance with the case of The Stoomvaart Maatschappy Nederland v. The Peninsular and Oriental Steam Navigation Company (L. Rep. 7 App. Cas. 795; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 567; 47 L. T. Rep. N. S. 198), and should read "that the Hector should recover a moiety of the excess of her damage over that of a moiety of the damage done to the Augustus."

The following Acts of Parliament were referred to:

The Merchant Shipping Act 1854, sect. 388:

No owner or master of any ship shall be answerable to any person whatever for any loss or damage occasioned by the fault or incapacity of any qualified pilot acting in charge of such ship within any district where the employment of such pilot is compulsory by law.

The Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act 1862, sect. 54:

The owners of any ship, whether British or foreign, shall not in cases where all or any of the following events occur without their actual fault or privity, that is to say . . . (4) Where any loss or damage is, by reason of the improper navigation of such ship as aforesaid, caused to any other ship or boat, or to any goods, merchandise, or other things whatsoever on board any other ship or boat, be answerable in damages . . . in respect of loss or damage to ships, goods, merchandise or other things, whether there be in addition loss of life or personal injury or not, to an aggregate amount exceeding eight pounds for each pound of the ship's tonnage.

R. Webster, Q.C. and W. G. F. Phillimore (with them Stubbs), for the owners of the Augustus, in support of the application.—17 & 18 Vict. c. 104, s. 388, says: "No owner or master of any ship shall be answerable to any person whatever." 25 & 26 Vict. c. 63, s. 54, says: "The owners of any ship, whether British or foreign, shall not . . . be answerable in damages." These sections are, therefore, almost indentical in words and purpose, both limiting the amount of the shipowner's liability under specified circumstances. The House of Lords has decided in The Stoomvaart Maatschappy Nederland v. The Peninsular and Oriental Steam Navigation Company (ubi sup.) that sect. 54 of 25 & 26 Vict. c. 63 is to be applied to a case like the present after the liability of the shipowners irrespective of the statute is determined. It therefore follows that sect. 388 of the Merchant Shipping Act (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104) 1854 is to be applied at the same time, and, if so, the owners of the Augustus are liable only for a moiety of the damage suffered by the Hector less a moiety of the damage suffered by the Augustus.

Charles, Q.C. (with him Myburgh, Q.C.) for the owners of the Hector, contra.—The decision in the House of Lords is not applicable to the present case, as the sections in question are widely different. Sect. 54 assumes a liability and then limits it. Sect. 388 says there shall be no liability. It is therefore useless to argue that in the present case the liability is to be arrived at by striking a balance, seeing that the liability of the owners of the Hector is zero; in other words, sect. 54 is to be applied at the end of the action, and sect. 388 at the beginning. They referred to

The Demetrius, L. Rep. 3 Ad. & E. 523; 26 L. T. Rep. N. S. 324; 1 Mar. Law Cas. 250.

Webster, Q.C. in reply.

Brett, M.R.—It seems to me that this case is not governed by the case of The Stoomvaart Maatschappy Nederland, v. The Peninsular and Oriental Steam Navigation Company, and that the two sections, sect. 388 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, and sect. 54 of the Merchant Shipping Amendment Act 1862 are to be applied at different periods of the dispute between the parties. The effect of the decision in the House of Lords was, as I understand it, that the sect. 54, which was to limit the amount of the shipowner's liability, was not to be applied until the liability, irrespective of the statute, was ascertained according to the ordinary practice of the Admiralty Court. Where in the Court of Admiralty there were counter-charges against the two vessels for the same collision, either the two vessels were reciprocally seized by both parties in the Admiralty Court, or both the parties were reciprocally brought before the court. There were, therefore, two actions, and each party was plaintiff in an action. But by the practice of the Admiralty Court, as stated by Dr. Lushington and other judges of that court before him, the Admiralty Court exercised a power which the Common Law Courts could not. Where there were counter-claims in respect of the same collision, although the actions were brought by the opposing parties as separate actions—which they were at the commencement by reason of the seizure of the ships at different times, and irrespective of each other—the Admiralty Court exercised the power of consolidating the two actions for the purposes of the trial, and, if convenient, tried the cross suits at the same time; but, if inconvenient, the court had power to try them separately. Again, where there were cross actions in respect of the same transaction, the Admiralty Court exercised this further power, which the common law courts also exercised, viz., having determined the liability of the parties in the cross actions, the Admiralty Court would not issue what was equivalent to execution for each party, leaving them to settle what that should be, but issued a monition for the balance. There was, therefore, only one party who eventually was made to pay, viz., the party against whom the balance was. Therefore, in construing the statute, it is to be remembered that the 54th section was founded upon the assumption that the vessel is the thing out of which the damages are to be paid. And if the ship is under arrest the Admiralty Court can order the ship to be sold; but where the ship fetches more than the 8*l.* per ton, then, under certain circumstances, the owners can limit their liability to 8*l.* per ton. That is the assumption upon which the statute was passed, and in The Khedive it was held that the section was not to be applied until the amount of damages had been settled for which, but for the statute, the monition would have gone. That reasoning, however, will not apply to the present case, for the section limiting liability is applicable at the end, not at the beginning, of the trial, as sect. 388 of the Act of 1854 is. There never has been any doubt at common law, irrespective of the statute, that the moment the plea of compulsorily pilotage is satisfactorily made out, the shipowner is relieved from liability. All the Act did was to make the matter more certain, so that there might be no doubt. The shipowner cannot be held liable for the act of a person who is not his servant, and about whose services he has no choice, and he is not, therefore, liable in respect of a collision caused solely by the fault of a compulsory pilot.

The judgments in the Admiralty Court, I cannot help thinking, although we have no information as to that, have always been drawn up in the same form as the one before us. Certainly the judgment in the case of The Demetrius (ubi sup.) was so drawn up, and I cannot think that that is an isolated case. If the Admiralty Registry were examined, I believe it would be found that this case had arisen over and over again, and that the judgments had been drawn up in the same way. I must say it would be a surprise to me that this were only the second case. But what happens if the statute be taken as applicable to the liability of the owners of the Hector? There is a collision between these two ships; each ship, if the action was brought in the ordinary way, would seize the other in the Admiralty Court, so that there would be a cross action. With regard to the Augustus, she has been found to blame for the collision, so that she must pay, if nothing else happens, all the damage which the Hector has suffered. With regard to the Hector, it has been found not that her owners are to blame, but that her navigation is to blame through the fault of the pilot. The owners are not liable for his default, and therefore are not liable for anything to the owners of the Augustus. The result then is that the liability of the owners of the Augustus is declared, but that of the owners of the Hector is denied, and they are dismissed from the suit. There is, therefore, no balance to be calculated, and the owners of the Hector are not liable for a penny of the damage done to the Augustus, the owners of which ship must go against the pilot and get what they can. The Hector is, therefore, entitled to succeed, but she is suing in the Court of Admiralty, which has had a constant practice from the time when there first were compulsory pilots, that where in these suits it was found that the navigation of the ship was wrong, although it was the wrongful act of the compulsory pilot, the shipowner can only recover half the damage. That is the way the judgment has here been drawn up, and it must be held to be right.

Cotton, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. It is argued that the words of sect. 388 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 and sect. 54 of 25 & 26 Vict. c. 63 are so nearly the same, that a similar construction is to be put upon both, and that therefore the section doing away with the liability of the owner for the act of the pilot is to be applied at the same stage as sect. 54 of 25 & 26 Vict. c. 63. Sect. 388 does not limit the amount of liability, but says that the owner is not to be liable when the loss is sustained by the default of the compulsory pilot. But sect. 54 is different. This latter section assumes a liability for damages; it does not relieve the owner from liability for the damage, it only says that the owner shall not be required to pay, under certain circumstances, more than a certain amount in respect of the damage. As the owners of the Hector are not responsible for the wrongful act of the pilot, and are, therefore, under no liability, there can be no balance between the two claims for the purpose of ascertaining the limit of the amount to be paid.

It was argued that the present case was governed by the decision in the House of Lords. But is it so? In that case the owners of both ships were liable to pay half the damage done by their respective ships. The reasoning in that decision applies only to the case where there is an interlocutory judgment for the purpose of ascertaining and fixing the amount for which the owners are answerable. And when one comes to look at that case, it is seen that Lord Blackburn there says the proper form of decree is that formed by the Admiralty Court, and also points out that the judgment of the House of Lords is only to apply to a case where the owners of both ships are liable in consequence of the collision having been occasioned by those for whose acts they are answerable, that is, the master and crew. When that is the case, of course a balance must be struck, which is arrived at by dividing the damages for which they are liable, and paying over the balance to the party to whom it is due. I therefore think this case is in no way governed by the case of The Stoomvaart Maatschappy Nederland v. The Peninsular and Oriental Steam Navigation Company (ubi sup.), seeing that the owners of the Hector are relieved from all liability by reason of the wrongful act being that of the compulsory pilot.

Bowen, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. I would only add that it seems to me there is a broad distinction between sect. 54 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1862 and sect. 388 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854. The 54th section expressly assumes a case where liability exists, and then proceeds to limit the measure of damages, whereas sect. 388 has nothing at all to do with any measure of damages, and says there shall be no liability at all. Bearing this in mind, all that has been said by the Master of the Rolls and Cotton, L.J. follows by a necessary train of logic.

Allen and Others v. Coltart and Co. and others. (a)

Bill of lading—Terms and conditions of—Delivery of goods—Liability of holder of bill of lading—Ship ordered to discharge in a particular dock on arrival—"If sufficient water"—Demurrage.

Where bills of lading are indorsed for the purpose of enabling the indorsees to sell the goods named therein, and so recoup themselves for advances made by them to the indorsers, but with no intention of further passing the property, such indorsees do not incur any liability under the Bills of Lading Act (18 & 19 Vict. 111).

Burdick v. Sewell (5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 79; 48 L. T. Rep. N. S. 705; 10 Q. B. Div. 313) followed.

Where the holder of a bill of lading, under which he is entitled to the delivery of goods on certain terms as to freight, demurrage, and taking delivery, presents that bill of lading and demands delivery of the goods, he thereby prima facie offers to perform those terms of the bill of lading on which alone the goods are deliverable to him.

Where a bill of lading introduces a condition in the charter-party to the effect that "the ship shall proceed to a port to discharge in a dock as ordered on arriving, if sufficient water, or so near thereunto as she may safely get, always afloat," it is a clause introduced in the interest of the shipowner, and restricts the generality of the power to name a dock; and while the obligation of the shipowner is to proceed to the dock named, if there is sufficient water to enter the dock when the order is given; on the other hand, if there is not then sufficient water, the ship is not bound to discharge in the dock named.

The defendants, the holders of a bill of lading, ordered a ship, on arriving, to discharge at a particular dock; at the time of giving the order, and for nearly a month afterwards, it was impracticable, owing to the state of the tides, for the ship to enter the particular dock. The ship entered another dock, but the defendants refused to accept delivery at the latter dock.

Held, that the defendants were liable for demurrage for the time beyond the lay days.

The facts and arguments appear sufficiently in the judgment.

Cur. adv. vult.

June 12.—Cave, J. delivered the following judgment.—In this case, which was tried before me at Liverpool, the plaintiffs, who are shipowners, sued the defendants for delay in taking delivery of goods shipped on board the plaintiff's ship Bridge- water under a bill of lading of which the defendants were holders. On the 6th Nov. 1880 the Bridgewater was chartered by the plaintiffs to Messrs. Knight and Co., of Quebec, under a charter which provided that the ship should load a cargo of timber at Quebec, "and, being so loaded, shall therewith proceed to Liverpool to discharge in a dock, as ordered on arriving, if sufficient water, or so near thereunto as she may safely get, always afloat, and there deliver the same as per bills of lading." The cargo was loaded and bills of lading were signed, which provided for the delivery of the cargo at the port of Liverpool "unto the order of the shipper or his assigns, he or they paying freight for the said goods, dead freight, and demurrage, if any may be shown due, as per charter-party, conforming to all the conditions thereof, with average accustomed." The ship arrived in the Mersey on the 16th June 1881, when the defendants, Messrs. Robert Coltart and Co., who were the holders of two out of five bills of lading, ordered her to the Canada dock: the other defendants, who were the holders of the remaining three bills of lading, took no part in this order. At the time when the order was given there was not sufficient water to enable the ship to enter the Canada Dock, nor was there sufficient water for that purpose until the 14th July; and the ship went into the Morpeth dock, at Birkenhead, that being a proper course to take under the circumstances, and there remained until the 14th July, when she was taken into the Canada dock.

When the ship first arrived in the Mersey, the plaintiffs set up a claim to detain the cargo until payment of a sum claimed for the detention of the ship at Quebec for 103 days. This claim the plaintiffs afterwards abandoned and the question disputed at the trial was, whether this claim of the plaintiffs was the sole cause of the delay in the delivery, or whether there was a further delay after that claim had been abandoned, owing to any refusal by the defendants, Messrs. Coltart and Co., to take delivery elsewhere than in the Canada dock. Upon this question the jury found a verdict for the plaintiffs for 100*l.* against Messrs. Coltart and Co., and by my direction a verdict for the defendants, Dempsey and Harrison. At the trial Mr. Crompton, on behalf of Messrs. Coltart and Co., took certain points of law, which it was agreed I should reserve for further consideration, and the jury were discharged on the terms that, if the discussion of these legal points involved the determination of any question of fact which had not been submitted to the jury, I should have power to determine it. The case was heard on further consideration on the 29th May. The first contention was, that Messrs. Coltart and Co. had no property in the goods, as they only held the bill of lading to recoup themselves for advances they had made on the timber, and consequently were not liable as assignees of the bill of lading under the 18 & 19 Vict. c. 111, s. 1, and in support of this contention Burdick v. Sewell (5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 79; 48 L. T. Rep. N. S. 705; 10 Q. B. Div. 313) was cited. I am of opinion that this contention is well founded. I think that, under the circumstances proved at the trial, I ought to hold that the intention of Messrs. Knight and Messrs. Coltart and Co. was, that the latter should hold the bill of lading and the timber merely as a security to cover the advances they had made, and that the intention of both parties in giving and receiving the indorsed bill of lading was not to pass the property to Messrs. Coltart and Co., but to enable them to obtain possession of the timber on its arrival in Liverpool, in order that they might have the security of the timber for their advances. It appears to me, however, that the plaintiffs are entitled to maintain this action, quite independently of 18 & 19 Vict. c. 111. As far back as 1811 it was held in Cook v. Taylor (13 East. 399), that where the master of the ship had contracted by bill of lading with the shippers to deliver goods to certain persons or their assigns, he or they paying freight for the same, the demanding and taking of such goods from the master by a purchaser and assignee of the bill of lading without the freight having been paid, was evidence of a new agreement by him as the ultimate appointee of the shippers for the purpose of delivery, to pay the freight due for the carriage of such goods, the delivery of which was only stipulated to be made to the consignees named in the bill of lading or their assigns, he or they paying freight for the said goods. It is true that the decision only extends to the payment of freight, but that is because that was the only condition of delivery in the bill of lading there under consideration; the ground of the decision is, that where goods are deliverable to the holder of a bill of lading on certain conditions being complied with, the act of demanding delivery is evidence of an offer on his part to comply with those conditions, and the delivery, accordingly, by the master is evidence of his acceptance of that offer. Thus, when the bill of lading stipulated on the face of it for the payment of demurrage, it was held that the taking of the goods under it by the indorsee, was evidence of an agreement to pay the demurrage: (Stindt v. Roberts, 5 D. & L. 460.) This case is explained by Parke, B. in Young v. Moeller (5 El. & Bl. 762), as establishing the principle that the receipt of the cargo by an indorsee of the bill of lading is evidence of an agreement to be bound by its terms whatever they may be. Thus, in Wegener v. Smith (15 C. B. 285) it was held that the acceptance of a cargo by the indorsee of the bill of lading, whereby the goods were deliverable to order "against payment of the agreed freight and other conditions as per charter-party," was a circumstance from which the jury might imply a contract on his part to pay the demurrage stipulated by the charter-party, notwithstanding his refusal at the time of receiving the goods to pay the demurrage. This case was expressly approved of and followed in Porteus v. Watney (4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 34; 39 L. T. Rep. N. S. 195; 3 Q. B. Div. 534).

Is there, then, evidence in this case on which I ought to find that the defendants Coltart and Co. agreed to take delivery on the terms of the bill of lading? I am of opinion that there is. It seems to me that, if the holder of a bill of lading, under which he is entitled to the delivery of goods on certain terms, presents that bill of lading and demands delivery of the goods, he thereby primâ facie offers to perform those terms of the bill of lading on which alone the goods are deliverable to him. According to the evidence of Mr. Castle which I do not find to be contradicted, Mr. Coltart said he had a right to name the dock according to the charter-party, and he had named the Canada dock and wanted delivery there. He named the Canada dock, not because he refused to perform the conditions of the bill of lading, but because he conceived that under those conditions, he was entitled to name the Canada dock. It is true that at first the plaintiff refused to accept Mr. Coltart's offer to fulfil the conditions of the bill of lading and take delivery; but the jury have found in effect that afterwards the plaintiff was ready and willing to deliver on the terms of the bill of lading, and that there was a delay caused by the refusal of Messrs. Coltart to accept delivery elsewhere than in the Canada dock. Having regard to this finding of the jury, I think I ought to come to the conclusion that there was an agreement between the plaintiff and the defendants Coltart and Co. that the former should give and the latter should take delivery under the terms of the bill of lading; and that there was a delay in such delivery by reason of the defendants Coltart and Co. refusing to take delivery elsewhere than in the Canada dock.

This brings me to the second question in the cause, which is, whether under the terms of the bill of lading the defendants Coltart and Co. were justified in refusing to take delivery elsewhere than in the Canada dock. If they were, they are entitled to judgment. If they were not, then the jury have found that they have broken their agreement to take delivery on the terms of the bill of lading and have assessed the damages at 100*l*. Now, as I have said, the bill of lading introduces all the conditions of the charter-party, one of which is that the ship shall "proceed to Liverpool to discharge in a dock as ordered on arriving, if sufficient water, or so near thereunto as she may safely get, always afloat." It is important to ascertain the meaning of the words actually used, and cases decided on the construction of charter-parties containing different language are not of much assistance. The controversy in this case turns on the meaning and application of the words "if sufficient water," and one method of arriving at their force is, to consider what the construction of the charter-party would be if they were absent. The cases of Parker v. Winlow (7 El. & Bl. 942), Bastifel v. Lloyd (1 H. & C. 388), and Dahl v. Nelson (4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 392; 44 L. T. Rep. N. S. 381; 6 App. Cas. 38) were cited as establishing that, where a shipowner undertakes to proceed to a wharf in a tidal harbour (which cannot be reached during the neap tides), or as near as he may safely get, and the ship arrives during the low tides, the master must wait for the higher tides, on the ground that his contract is to go to the wharf if, in the ordinary course of navigation, it can be reached, and that the shipowner takes on himself the risk of delay from the ordinary course of navigation. In the cases cited the ships could have got to the wharves to which they had contracted to go at ordinary spring tides, and the delay did not exceed ten days. In this case there were but two or three days in the month when the Bridgewater could have got to the Canada dock, and the time between the giving the order and the first day when the vessel could get into the dock was twenty-six days. Assuming, however, for the purposes of this case, that such a delay is one arising from the ordinary course of navigation, it is necessary to ascertain the effect of the words "if sufficient water," Mr. Crompton contended that they mean "if sufficient water in the ordinary course of navigation;" or, in other words, they mean nothing more than the words "always afloat" at the end of the clause. This construction, however, would give no meaning at all to the words "if sufficient water." I can see no other way of construing them than to put on them a meaning which shall restrict what would be the meaning of the clause if they were absent. It seems to me that they are introduced in the interest of the shipowner, and restrict the generality of the power to name a dock: that the obligation of the shipowner is to proceed to the dock named if there is sufficient water to enter the dock when the order is given, and if there is not then sufficient water the ship is not bound to discharge in the dock named. It is contended that, if this is the construction, the shipowner would be justified in refusing to go to the dock if there were not sufficient water at the time, although there might be in two or three days, The answer to that, I think, is, first, that if the construction I have put on the charter-party is the only one that gives any meaning to the words "if sufficient water," it is no answer to say that that construction might in certain cases be productive of hardship on the shipper; and secondly, that as the shipowner, if he cannot get to the dock named, must go as near thereunto as he can safely get always afloat, he would find it to his advantage to exercise his rights reasonably, and rather wait two or three days than to insist on delivery being taken at some place where possibly the discharge might occupy a longer time, while the charterer on the other hand would find it to his interest, if there was a convenient dock with sufficient water, to name that dock rather than one to which the ship would not get without a delay of two or three weeks. For these reasons I am of opinion that there must be judgment for the plaintiffs against the defendants Coltart and Co. for the sum of 100*l*. assessed by the jury, with costs.

Judgment was given for the other defendants at the trial.

HORSLEY v. PRICE AND CO. (a)

Charter-party—Construction—"At all times of the tide"—Shipowner's duties—Demurrage.

A charter-party provided that a steamship should load a cargo of timber, and being so loaded proceed to Sharpness, "or as near thereto as she may safely get at all times of the tide and always afloat."

On the 5th Sept. 1882 the ship arrived at King Road, a place sixteen miles from Sharpness, and not within the ambit of its port, but which in the state of the tides prevailing on that day was as near thereto as she could get with her full cargo always afloat. The captain offered to deliver at King Road the whole cargo, or so much as would lighten the ship enough for her to proceed to Sharpness. The charterers refused.

On the 9th Sept. the state of the tides permitted the ship to proceed, and she did proceed to Sharpness, and delivered her cargo.

Held, that, on the true construction of the charter-party, the ship was not bound to reach a spot within the ambit of the port of Sharpness, and that the insertion of the words "at all times of the tide" relieved the shipowner from any liability to wait a reasonable time for the tide, and that he was entitled to demurrage, on the basis of the voyage having terminated on the ship's arrival at the nearest place to Sharpness that she could reach with a full cargo in the state of the tides prevailing at the time of her arrival.

THIS was the further consideration of an action tried before North J. without a jury upon circuit. The following statement of the facts is taken from the judgment :—

The plaintiff was the owner of a steamship named the Halo, of 924 tons, and on the 26th July 1882 he chartered her to the defendants through their agents. The charter-party provided that the ship, which was then at Rouen, should proceed to Ljusne (Soderhamn), a Swedish port in the Baltic, or so near thereunto as she may safely get, and, there load always afloat from the factors of the charterers a full cargo of deals and battens, and, being so loaded, should therewith proceed to Sharpness, "or so near thereto as she may safely get at all times of the tide and always afloat," and deliver the same on payment of freight, The only other material stipulations in the charter-party were that the cargo should be discharged with all despatch, as customary, and that demurrage was to be paid at the rate of 35*l.* a day, that the cargo was to be taken from alongside the vessel at the expense of the charterers, and that demurrage was to be payable if more than six days were occupied in discharging.

On the 5th Sept. the Halo arrived with her cargo at King Road, an open roadstead in the Severn, opposite the mouth of the Avon, where ships can lie at anchor, but there is no wharf; it is within the ambit of the port of Bristol. Sharpness is a place fifteen or sixteen miles higher up the Severn, and is not within the port of Bristol, but is within that of Gloucester. It was admitted that King Road was the nearest place to Sharpness; that the Halo could reach it with her full cargo on board in the then state of the tides in the Severn at any time up to the 9th. In that state of things various communications took place between the persons acting for the ship and the charterers respectively, and the result of the evidence on that subject was, in the opinion of the court, that the ship's agents alleged that the voyage was complete, and offered to deliver the cargo at King Road, or if the charterers would lighten the vessel by taking delivery of part, then to proceed to Sharpness with the remainder, and in either case to enter the ship at Bristol; but that the defendants' agents declined that offer and refused to take delivery of any part of the cargo at King Road, or to recognise the ship at all until she arrived at Sharpness. Under these circumstances the ship was not entered at Bristol, as such entry would have been useless.

She remained at King Road till the 9th, and on that day the tides just permitted her to go on to Sharpness, and she arrived that evening.

On Monday, the 11th, she began the discharge of her cargo, which was completed on the 14th.

H. Matthews, Q.C., and Lawrence for the plaintiff.—The state of the tides from the 5th Sept. to the 9th prevented the ship getting to Sharpness always afloat, the plaintiff was therefore entitled to adopt the alternative and deliver the cargo as near as she could safely go with full cargo:

Shield v. Wilkins. 15 L. T. Rep. O. S. 117; 5 Ex. 304.

The plaintiff was ready to deliver at King Road on the 5th Sept.; for the evidence shows that the preliminary objection taken by the defendants that he had not entered the ship at Bristol and could not deliver was waived. The lay days, therefore, began to run from the 5th Sept. They referred to Hotham v. The East India Co., 1 T. R. 638, 645.

J. J. Powell, Q.C., Anstie, Q.C., and H. D. Greene for the defendants.—The words "at all times of the tide" are new and must be construed reasonably, and as they are ambiguous, most strongly against the shipowner who inserted them. The result of the plaintiffs construction would be, that if at any point of the voyage, even in leaving the port of departure, the ship arrived at a place she could not pass at dead low water, she could claim that the voyage ended there. The captain was bound to go on if he could get on without unreasonable delay; the state of the tide is one of the ordinary risks of navigation which fall on the shipowner:

Bastifell v. Lloyd, 1 H. & C. 388; 31 L. J. 413, Ex.
Schilizzi v. Derry, 25 L. T. Rep. O. S. 66; 4 E. & B. 873;
Metcalfe v. Britannia Iron Works Co., 3 Asp. Mar. Cas. 313; 35 L. T. Rep. N. S. 796; 1 Q. B. Div. 613; and 36 L. T. Rep. N. S. 451; 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 407; 2 Q. B. Div. 423.

The words "at all times of the tide" cannot refer to the verb "get" which proceeds them; they mus be taken with the words "always afloat" which follow. The important point is that a ship should be always afloat when lying in port. That is what the parties meant the words "at all times of the tide" to refer to. The legal result is the same as if those words were omitted:

Hillstrom v. Gibson, 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 362; 22 L. T. Rep. N. S. 248; 8 Sess. Cas. 3rd ser. 463.

The charter-party is made out on the ordinary printed form for the port of London, but those words are struck out, and the port of Sharpness written in. Where part of a document is on a printed form, and the rest written in by the parties, the written part must prevail:

Mercantile Marine Assurance Co. v. Titherington. 11 L. T. Rep. N. S. 340; 34 L. J. 11, Q.B.; 5 B. & S. 765.

Even if the plaintiff had a right to terminate the voyage at King Road, his proper claim is not for demurrage. He ought to have delivered and warehoused the cargo at Bristol, or sent part by lighters up to Sharpness, and sued us for the expenses:

Cur. adv. vult.

June 16.—NORTH, J. (after stating the facts of the case as above):—This action is brought to recover 105*l.* for three days' demurrage, upon the basis that the ship's voyage terminated, upon the true construction of the charter-party, on her arrival at King Road on the 5th, that the six lay days expired on the 11th, and that demurrage is payable for the three subsequent days. This action is defended upon the footing that the voyage was not completed until the ship's arrival at Sharpness on the 9th, when the six lay days began to run, and that the cargo having been completely discharged within the six days, no demurrage is payable. A subordinate point is raised by the pleadings that the plaintiff never was ready and willing to deliver the cargo at King road, inasmuch as no delivery could take place without the ship being first entered at Bristol, which was never done: but, as I find that the parties did offer to make such entry, and the defendant refused to accept, this defence fails. To adopt the language of Lord Mansfield in Jones v. Barkley (ubi sup.), "the party to perform must show that he was ready; but if the other party stops him, on the ground of an intention not to perform his part, it is not necessary for the first to go further and do a nugatory act."

The principal question in this case is when the voyage was terminated, and when the lay days began to run, and this depends upon the true construction of the charter-party, and principally on the words "at all times of the tide." It appears from Parker v. Winlow (ubi sup), Bastifell v. Lloyd (ubi sup.) and Nelson v. Dahl (ubi sup.), that when the charter-party provides that a ship shall go to a harbour named, or as near thereto as she can safely get, the primary object is to get to the place named, and the alternative condition does not arise unless the cause which prevents the immediate arrival of the ship at the place named is such that it cannot be got rid of by the shipowner by reasonable means, and within a reasonable time, having regard to the nature and the object of the voyage; and further, that if the cause of detention be the arrival of the vessel during the low tides, her having to wait for the tide to increase is one of the ordinary incidents of navigation, and the shipowner must submit to the delay so occasioned. No one could say that four days' waiting for such a purpose was not reasonable, and it was not disputed that if the words "at all times of the tide" had not been found in the charter-party, the plaintiff must have borne the risk of the delay at King Road, the lay days would not have commenced till the 9th, and the defendants would have been entitled to judgment. What, then, do the words mean? The defendants cannot say that they have practically any meaning at all. Their contention is that they are not to be read in connection with the previous words, "so near thereto as she may safely get," but with the succeeding words, "and always afloat," and that the whole sentence thus read means simply that the ship is, during the progress of the voyage, and while lying at the port of discharge, to be afloat at all times of the tide, that is to say, always. There are several reasons why I cannot adopt this construction. The words in common use to provide for this purpose are "always afloat," or "lie always afloat," and I have no recollection of having ever myself seen a charter-party or policy containing the words "at all times of the tide," though the words "so near thereto as she may safely get, and lie afloat at all times of the tide" are found in the Scotch case of Hillstrom v. Gibson (ubi sup.); but in that case the words "and always" are not found. In the present case the usual phrase "always afloat" is found, and I am asked in effect to treat the words "at all times of the tide" as surplusage, adding nothing to the meaning of the contract. This, in my opinion, I cannot do. They are not words of usual occurrence; they are, as pointed out by Baron Channell in Bastifell v. Lloyd, essentially words put in by the shipowner, and I must give them a meaning, if possible.

In the present case there is one reason which appears to me absolutely conclusive why I should not adopt the defendant's construction, which is this, the charter-party shows that the shipowner considered it quite as important that the vessel should be always afloat at the loading port as at the port of discharge. He provides for it in both places by the use of the words "always afloat," but in speaking of the port of discharge the words, "at all times of the tide" are added; and the only conclusion I can come to is, that they are intentionally introduced there for the purpose of making provision for something not otherwise provided for, and in contemplation of some event possibly arising at the ship's destination not anticipated at the loading port. I do not forget Mr. Green's argument that, as the word "Sharpness" is written in the charter-party, and the words "or as near thereto as she may safely get" are printed, I must strike out the latter words, and read the charter-party as providing for the port of arrival being Sharpness only. If his view was sustainable, I should have to do more, for I should have also to strike out the words "at all times of the tide and always afloat," and this certainly would simplify the construction of the document; but it is sufficient to say that I cannot strike out or reject any words, but must construe the document as it stands, and must give every portion of it some signification, if possible. In my opinion, the words "at all times of the tide" were put in on purpose to make the contract different from what it would have been if they had not been inserted, in other words, to relieve the shipowner from a burden which the law would have thrown upon him in the absence of those words, viz., the risk of delay upon arrival from the state of the tides in the river to which the charterer's convenience required the ship to go. It is obvious that every day's delay must be a considerable loss to the shipowner, and this charter-party seems to me expressly designed to relieve the owner at the charterer's expense from a chance of loss, to which he was possibly awakened by the decision in Nelson v. Dahl (ubi sup.). The point which arose for decision in Hillstrom v. Gibson and Capper v. Wallace (ubi sup.), viz., whether and how far it was incumbent on the shipowner to discharge part of the cargo at King Road, and so by lightening the vessel enable her to proceed to Sharpness with the residue, does not arise here for on the evidence I find that the plaintiff offered to adopt this course, and the defendants declined to consent to it, pointing out that it would not be of any use. It was said that a construction of the charter-party which enables the shipowner to end the voyage at a point short of Sharpness, when by a short and reasonable delay he would have been able to carry his whole cargo to that destination, is a hard and unreasonable one. But if it appears to me, as it does, the only one which gives a proper signification to the words used by the parties, I cannot reform the contract upon any such ground as suggested; and further, any argument founded upon hardship is open to this rejoinder, that it is the interest of shipowners to act reasonably towards charterers; and in the present case the plaintiff actually did more than he was bound to do, and for their accommodation, and to save them expense, did wait at King Road, and ultimately proceeded to Sharpness, and in my opinion he is only acting reasonably in claiming payment as agreed for the time so lost to him. This seems to me a far more appropriate and reasonable course for the shipowner to adopt than that which Mr. Anstie says was his only and proper one, viz., to have himself discharged the cargo at King Road at the end of the lay days, and warehoused it at Bristol, leaving the charterers to get it as they could, and then to have sued the charterers for damages from their refusal to take delivery at King Road.

It was also argued by Mr Anstie that the decisions in Schilizzi v. Derry, and Metcalfe v. The Britannia Iron Works (ubi sup.) show that the words "as near thereunto as she can safely get" must be construed to mean a point within the ambit of the port named as near the port itself as she can safely get. It is not for me to say after those decisions that such a construction would be adding words to the charter-party not found there, but to make those cases analogous at all to this present I should certainly have to add words to those charter-parties which were not found there, viz., some such words as "in all states of the river" in the first case, "and at all seasons of the year" in the second. In the present case I cannot accede to the contention so urged. If I were to read the words "to Sharpness, or as near thereunto within the ambit of that port" (or the port of Gloucester, if you will), "as she could safely get at all times of the tide and always afloat," I should be reading the charter-party ut magis pereat quam valeat, for it is not suggested that any such place exists, or that the ship ought to have gone or could have gone to any port above King Road short of Sharpness itself; and, therefore, what I am asked to do is to exclude from this charter-party all the qualifying words following the word "Sharpness," and this I cannot do. I may add that, in the case of The Alhambra (44 L. T. Rep. N. S. 637; 6 P. Div. 68), the contention that the words "within the ambit of the port" were to be read into a charter-party providing that a ship should go to a port, or as near thereto as she could safely get, does not seem to have occurred to the judges of the Court of Appeal, or to the experienced counsel who argued that case.

I think I have noticed all the arguments addressed to me on behalf of the defendants except one founded on the case of Hayton v. Irwin (ubi sup.), and that I am obliged to pass over without comment, because, probably from my own fault, I was quite unable to follow it, or to see its application to this case. Under these circumstances there will be judgment for the plaintiff for 105*l.*, and the costs will follow the event.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

April 27 and 30, 1883.

(Before the Lord Chancellor (Selborne), Lords Blackburn, Bramwell, and Fitzgerald.)

Cory v. Burr. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF APPEAL IN ENGLAND.

Marine insurance—Barratry — Warranty "free from capture and seizure"—Proximate cause of loss—Smuggling.

In a policy of marine insurance a warranty "free from capture and seizure" applies not only to capture or seizure by belligerents, but to any seizure, even if it be the result of a barratrous act of the master.

In a time policy the ordinary perils, including "barratry of the master," were enumerated, and the subject-matter of the insurance was "warranted free from capture and seizure, and the consequences of any attempt thereat." During the continuance of the policy the ship was seized and detained by the Spanish authorities in consequence of the barratrous act of the master in smuggling.

Held (affirming the judgment of the court below), that such seizure was covered by the warrantry, and that the underwriters were not liable.

Semble (per Lords Blackburn and Bramwell), that there is no rule of insurance law that where barratry is the remote cause of a loss it is to be looked to rather than the immediate cause.

This was an appeal from a judgment of the Court of Appeal (Lord Coleridge, C.J., Brett and Cotton, L.JJ.) reported in 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 559, 9 Q. B. Div. 463, and 47 L. T. Rep. N. S. 181, affirming a judgment of the Queen's Bench Division (Field and Cave, JJ.), reported in 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 480, 8 Q. B. Div. 313, and 45 L. T. Rep. N. S. 713, upon a special case.

The action was brought by the appellants, the owners of the steamship Rosslyn, against the respondent, who was one of the underwriters of a time policy of insurance, to recover the expenses they had incurred in obtaining the release of the ship, which had been seized by the Spanish revenue authorities under circumstances which appear in the head-note in the judgment of Lord Blackburn.

Webster, Q.C. and Tyser (Myburgh, Q.C. with them) appeared for the appellants, and contended that the warranty in the policy applied only to capture or seizure by belligerents. This seizure was not within the warranty, it was the result of an act of barratry, which is one of the perils insured against, and was in fact a continuing act up to the seizure. If barratry was not within the warranty, then a seizure which is the consequence of a barratrous act cannot be either. They referred to Cohen, Q.C. and Barnes, who appeared for the respondent, were not called upon to address the House.

At the conclusion of the arguments for the appellants their Lordships gave judgment as follows:

The LORD CHANCELLOR (Selborne).—My Lords: This is an appeal from a unanimous judgment of the Court of Appeal affirming a unanimous judgment of the Queen's Bench Division; and I believe that all your Lordships agree that it is not necessary to call upon the counsel for the respondent. I am by no means sure that it might not be sufficient for me to say simply that I agree with the judgments given by Field and Cave, JJ., and also in the reasons which they gave for those judgments, and in the reasons which were given in the Court of Appeal. I will, however, make one or two observations upon the principal points on which the case depends. Everything depends upon the construction of the words of the warranty in the policy, the warranty being "free from capture and seizure, and the consequences of any attempts thereat." The first question which has been considered in the argument has been, what is the meaning of the words "capture or seizure?" "Warranted free," clearly means that the insurers are not to be liable for the things to which the warranty applies. I own that I should have hesitated, even if there had been no authority, before I should have been brought to agree with the view which was thrown out in the course of the argument, and which Brett, L.J. seemed to think might have influenced him if there had not been authority against it — I mean the view that "capture and seizure" in such a warranty must be taken to mean primâ facie belligerent capture and seizure only. My reasons for saying so are that the word "seizure" is used as well as the word "capture." I am disposed to agree that if the word "capture" had stood alone it might have appeared to point to a belligerent capture, but the addition of the word "seizure" is only officious, as I read the warranty, by supposing that it is to exclude that narrow construction of the word "capture," and to let in other "seizures," such as Cotton, L.J. suggests, by means of the revenue laws of a foreign state. The facts of this case show what the nature and effect of such a seizure is. The ship was seized in every sense we can put upon the word "seized." It was taken forcible possession of, and that not for a temporary purpose, not as incident to a civil remedy and the enforcement of a civil right, not as security for the performance of some duty or obligation by the owners of the ship, but it was carried into effect in order to obtain a sentence of condemnation and confiscation of the ship; and the case states that that would have been the result of the seizure which took place in the present instance if money had not been paid to redeem the ship from that confiscation and total loss. To my mind those facts are properly described by the word "seizure" in its natural sense, and unless there is something else in the policy to show that the word was meant to bear a different sense, not inclusive of such a state of facts, I should have said in the absence of authority, that they were included. But then we find that there were two authorities, which show, at all events, that these words in such a warranty cannot be restrained to a belligerent capture. In the case of Kleinwort v. Shepard (1 E. & E. 447) there was a capture by a mutinous crew—an act which might be described as piracy on the part of that crew undoubtedly, and might therefore have come within the word "pirates," as mentioned in the policy, but it was not a belligerent capture beyond all doubt. In the other case, Powell v. Hyde (5 E. & B. 607), there was no belligerent capture, there was an accident. The ship was shot at and sunk by a friendly power mistaking her for an enemy. That would certainly not be a belligerent capture, but it was regarded as a "capture" in the sense which was to be obtained from the juxtaposition of the words "capture" and "seizure," and the comparison of them with the other words which occur in the body of the policy, and show that it was meant to cover and include all sorts of losses of that kind—losses by "men-of-war," by "enemies," by "pirates," by "rovers," by "takings at sea," by "arrests, restraints, and detainments of all kings, princes, and people."

Therefore, both on authority and on principle, I reject the idea that these words "capture and seizure" can be so narrowly construed as to exclude such a seizure as that which took place in the present case. But then it is contended that if the claim might have been made upon the footing of barratry, though there was a capture or seizure, and though the capture or seizure only caused the loss, and there would have been no loss without the capture or seizure, yet that if a claim might be made upon the footing of barratry, then the warranty does not apply. I confess I have never seen how such a construction could be put upon the policy and the warranty, taken together, without leading to consequences altogether destructive of the whole operation of the warranty. Because—let me suppose the case of a belligerent capture—that capture is as much attributable to "men-of-war" or "enemies," or "taking at sea," as any seizure by reason of barratry can be attributed to barratry; indeed, more directly and immediately. Men-of-war and enemies might or might not have taken the ship, but their coming into contact with the ship, their firing at her—we may suppose their placing her in a position of jeopardy—is the first step towards "capture or seizure," which is its consequence. Then the argument, if it is sound as to barratry, would seem to be sound as to men-of-war and enemies also, that because there is an express insurance against those things, therefore a "capture or seizure," and consequently an attack by men-of-war or enemies, is to be taken out of the warranty. I might follow it further as to "pirates," and as to "restraints and detainments of kings, princes, and people." It is quite manifest that the object of this warranty is, and must be, to except such losses, otherwise covered by the policy, and coming within its express terms, as arise out of, and are as losses occasioned by, "capture or seizure." That appears to me to be equally the case whether remotely it was occasioned by barratry or not; in fact, the remoter it is the stronger the argument that it must be the case as to barratry. Therefore, I entirely agree both in the conclusions and in the reasons of the two courts below.

Lord BLACKBURN.—My Lords: I also agree entirely in the result to which the courts below have come, and with one exception, which perhaps is not very material, I agree with their reasoning; but I think it is necessary to say that I do not at present agree in one thing said. A passage was cited from Arnould on Insurance (vol. ii., p. 838), which lays down that, while it is very true that the general rule is that in insurance you look to the proximate cause and not the remote cause, there is an exception in the case of barratry, and that the remote cause may be looked to there. I can only say that I think there is no other authority for such a rule, and, though certainly Field, J. and Brett, L.J. seemed to suppose naturally, on the authority of that statement in the text-book, that this was a rule of insurance law, I, as at present advised, do not think that it is. The very instances which are given in the passage from Arnould are instances in which the courts thought rightly or wrongly—I think rightly—that the cause of loss was barratry, and that the consequence for which the parties were entitled to be indemnified was not a remote consequence. That is all I say upon that part of the subject. I am merely putting in a protest against what may be hereafter cited as being an established principle of insurance law. For my own part I do not think that it is.

Now, proceeding from that to the rest of the case, I thoroughly agree in the judgments which were pronounced below. The policy here is in the ordinary Lombard-street form, which has been in use for more than a century, and contains the ordinary enumeration of the perils against the loss from which the underwriters undertake to indemnify the assured. Many of these, as for instance, "men-of-war." "enemies," "pirates," "rovers," and, I may add, "barratry of the master or mariners," do not in themselves necessarily occasion any loss; but when by one of these the subject assured is taken out of the control of the owners, there is a total loss by that peril, subject to be reduced if by subsequent events the assured either do get, or but for their own fault might get, their property back: (Dean v. Hornby, 3 E. & B. 180.) There are other perils, such as "takings at sea," "arrests, restraints, and detainments of princes," which from their nature involve such a taking of the subject insured out of the control of the owners. That being the case, supposing there had been no warranty at all, was there a loss here which would be one for which the underwriters would be liable? Upon the facts stated, I cannot doubt it. The definitions of barratry in the case of Earle v. Rowcliffe (8 East. 126) has never been departed from. The effect of that case is that the act of a captain, for his own purposes and to serve his own ends, engaging in a smuggling transaction which might tend, and in this case did tend, to the injury of his owners, and to the ship being seized, is barratry. The captain in the present case had done that: he had employed the ship for the purpose of carrying tobacco. When he was off the coast of Spain he caused the engines to be stopped to look out for the ship into which he had intended to tranship the tobacco in order that it might be smuggled, and he proceeded "dead slow" while he was looking out for that vessel. That was a clear case of barratry. While he was doing this "two craft came alongside with Spanish revenue officers on board, who seized the ship, and took her into Cadiz." Now, first of all, was that act of the two Spanish revenue officers in taking and seizing this ship, in itself one of those matters which would be covered by the insurance against the enumerated perils? I cannot myself doubt that it was. I cannot doubt that it came quite within the terms, "restraints and detention by a prince or people," namely, the Government of Spain, and their seizing the vessel was, I think, a thing for which the owners might have recovered under that head. But, it was also, I think, not at all a remote, but a direct and immediate consequence of the barratrous act of the captain, and it might, therefore, have been recovered for in the old times, when we were particular about pleadings under a count in which it was laid as being barratry, and the loss as being a consequence of it. The case that was referred to of Havelock v. Hancill (3 T. R. 277) is a case where the party recovered on a count for barratry, which would not in itself occasion any damage—but it was held good on demurrer—and in those days they were particular upon demurrer—the count alleging almost identically the same thing as happened here, except that the seizure was by the English Government for smuggling against the English law, instead of being by the Spanish Government for smuggling against the Spanish law. That was a case in which the underwriters were held to be resposible, and I think myself that they might also have been held responsible if the count had alleged the loss to have been occasioned by restraint of princes.

Now comes the question, Does this warranty free the underwriters from that responsibility? That is the main question. First, let us see what the warranty is. There are warranties which in effect merely say, We will define the sort of adventure in which you shall be engaged when we are to indemnify you; for example, it shall be warranted that the ship shall not sail anywhere except in the Mediterranean, or something of that sort, defining the risk which they are to encounter; and if the ship goes out beyond that distance, then it is like a deviation, she has incurred a different kind of risk from that which the underwriters undertook to bear—it has become altogether a different adventure. That is one description of warranty. But there is another which has been for a long time used, expressed in the phrase "warranted free from" particular things. I need only point, as I did in the course of the argument, to the ordinary warranty which is printed at the foot, and has been so for more than a century, known as the memorandum, "corn, fish, salt, fruit, flour, and seed are warranted free from average, unless general, or the ship be stranded; sugar, tobacco, hemp, flax, hides and skins are warranted free from average under 5*l.* per cent. and all other goods; also the ship and freight are warranted free from average under 3*l.* per cent., unless general, or the ship be stranded, sunk, or burnt." That kind of warranty, "warranted free" in that sense, means that, although the general terms of the policy would have covered this, yet, considering the special riskiness of the particular matter, the underwriters, unless they are paid a premium for consenting to take it in, do not choose to be liable where the particular thing happens which they have stipulated by this warranty that they shall be warranted free from. Now here they are "warranted free from capture or seizure, and the consequences from any attempts thereat." It was argued that here they have not been warranted free from barratry. That is true; but the barratry would itself occasion no loss at all to the parties insured if it had not been that the Spanish revenue officers doing their duty—they were quite right in that respect—had come and seized the ship. The barratry of the captain in coasting along there—hovering, as we should call it, along the coast—in order that the small smuggling vessel might come and take the tobacco, would have done the insured no harm at all. The underwriters do undertake to indemnify against barratry; they do undertake to indemnify against any loss which is directly sustained in consequence of the barratry; and in this case, I think, as I said before, the seizure was as direct a consequence of the barratry as could well be. But still, as Field, J. says, it was the seizure which brought the barratry into operation. I think that is the phrase which he uses. The seizure brought the loss into existence—it was a case of seizure. Then why should it not be protected by this warranty?

The American cases which have been referred to are quite different; they are founded upon the case of Havelock v. Hancill (ubi sup.). There the voyage was described as "any lawful adventure," or "any lawful voyage," and if it had been not a lawful voyage it would have been like a deviation. It would have been a different kind of adventure from that of which the underwriters took the risk. The fact of its being not a lawful voyage would have made it one for which they had not engaged to be responsible. The underwriter in that case might have said: "Non hæc in fœdera veni. I have engaged to indemnify you against the risks of a lawful voyage, you engaged in an unlawful voyage." But the answer was: "This was not an unlawful voyage, for what was done here was to engage in a lawful voyage, and the barratry of the captain did not make that voyage unlawful." The decision has stood now for a century, and has not been quarrelled with. I should have thought that that was as plain a decision as one could wish for. The American courts upon that—with some want of logic, I cannot help thinking—drew the inference that, where there was a warranty free from seizure and capture in consequence of illicit trading they were to hold that it was to be an illicit trading to which the insured was a party. I think that is what it comes to, or at least to which the owner of the ship was a party. I think that it is an illogical consequence, and I do not approve of the reasoning by which it was come to. But it is sufficient to say that it has nothing to do with the present case. There was no illicit trading here, there was nothing but the act of barratry. There are no such words used here as "warranted free from capture or seizure in consequence of illicit trading," if that would have made any difference. The question then is reduced, as it seems to me, to this: When the whole loss was occasioned by that which was certainly a "seizure," it is within the meaning of the warranty? I say certainly it is. If it were perfectly res integra there would be something to be said in favour of holding that "capture" and "seizure" ought to be limited, or might be supposed to be limited, to belligerent risks—risks in time of war—although I think that there would be a great deal to be said against it. But the point is not new. In Kleinwort v. Shepard (ubi sup.) the decision was this: the seizure was one which was in no wise connected with the acts of foreign princes or their subjects, it being the act of coolies, who were not pirates in the sense of being assailing thieves, for they were lawfully in the ship; they were passengers who rose in mutiny; they were not barratrous, for they were not the captain nor the crew, they were neither the one nor the other; but it had been held in the case of Naylor v. Palmer (10 Ex. 382), which I argued myself, that whether they were pirates or not, it was quite clear that they were ejusdem generis, and consequently they came within the words "and other perils." It was at least another peril which was clearly covered. Now in the case of Kleinwort v. Shepard (ubi sup.) it was decided that a seizure of that sort was a seizure within the perils which were warranted against. That is in fact a much stronger decision than the present. All that is necessary to say in the present case is that the warranty is against a seizure by a power. I do not say at all that Kleinwort v. Shepard (ubi sup.) is not perfectly right. I only say that it goes further than is required here, and I also say that I quite agree with what was thrown out in the American case, and again to-day, that, when a decision has been come to and acted upon, which has stood for thirty years, as to the construction of such words as these, it requires some very strong reasoning to justify one in saying that we should now hold that where people have used these identical words, knowing the meaning which has been previously put upon them by a judicial decision, they do not mean the same thing. Consequently, I think that strong reasoning will be required for reversing the case of Kleinwort v. Shepard (ubi sup.). But it is enough to say that this was a seizure, being the act of the power which made that seizure, and therefore that the court below are perfectly right in the conclusion at which they have arrived.

Lord BRAMWELL.—My Lords: I am of the same opinion. What was in contemplation by the parties in this case may be very doubtful; and I should have thought that it was very doubtful also what was the meaning of these words originally; but a meaning has been put upon them, and, that meaning having been acted upon, I think it is desirable that it should be abided by, because undoubtedly people who make contracts make them in reference to the well-understood meaning of such words, and if that meaning is an inconvenient one they can alter the words. I think that the meaning of the words which are here to be construed is now plain. The warranty is a warranty "free from capture and seizure;" it is perfectly general in its terms. If the vessel has been captured or seized, and a loss has been thereby occasioned, it is within the warranty. Now it is said here that the loss was not from the seizure, but that in truth it was from the barratry, and it is ingeniously suggested that the seizure was "an intermediate step." But it was the ultimate and final step which occasioned the loss, and but for the payment of money the ship would have been confiscated, which would have been merely a following up of the seizure. One might put this case: Supposing the ship had been confiscated and sold, and then the Spanish Government, upon some representations made to them, had returned a portion of the proceeds, would there not have been a loss by seizure? There would. And is it not equally so now? To my mind that point is really not tenable. But then it is said that when barratry is the causa remota of the loss it nevertheless may be relied upon without reference to the causa proxima. Now I will say nothing as to any general rule, except to express a doubt as to whether what Brett, L.J. said about that matter is perfectly correct. I have a misgiving about it, but I do not consider it necessary to determine anything of that sort here. It is possible that in some cases where there has been barratry, and a consequent loss within the perils insured against, you might call that a loss by barratry. In my opinion you cannot do so in this case. Call it an ultimate loss if you like. That ultimate loss was by a seizure, and that was warranted against.

Lord FITZGERALD.—My Lords: I entirely agree. The question arises on the proper interpretation of the limitation of the liability of the insurers contained in the clause, "warranted free from capture and seizure, and of any attempt thereat." This warranty must be taken to apply to some of the risks previously enumerated, and to limit the otherwise unlimited liability of the insurers. On looking back to the enumeration of the perils which the policy was intended to cover, we find some the generality of which may be the subjects of the limitations expressed in the warranty. For example, "arrests, restraints, and detainments of all kings, princes, and peoples of what nation, condition, or quality soever; barratry of the master and mariners, and all other perils, losses, and misfortunes." The contention of the plaintiffs is that the warranty does not apply where, as in the case before us, the seizure has been the immediate consequence of the barratrous act of the master, and, on the other hand, the defendant insists on the literal construction of the warranty as embracing all cases in which the ship has been taken forcible possession of by superior power or authority. If the latter construction is to prevail, then the defendant contends that, the seizure having been the immediate proximate cause of the loss, he, the insurer, is exempt from liability. The question seems a simple one; but, if we depart from the literal construction, we may be led into complications and metaphysical refinements from which mercantile contracts ought, as far as possible, to be free. If the question had come before us unfettered by authority, and if the decision in the court below had been in favour of the plaintiffs, I should have been content. But I have an invincible objection to uncertainty in the interpretation of mercantile contracts. The literal interpretation of the exemption would embrace all cases of capture or seizure which would otherwise have been within the perils insured against, and so far as the authorities have gone they are in favour of the defendant's contention. I allude to Powell v. Hyde and Kleinwort v. Shepard, which have been already commented upon. In the construction of this warranty it is observable that capture and seizure do not mean the same thing. "Capture" would seem properly to include every act of seizing or taking by an enemy or belligerent. "Seizure" seems to be a larger term than "capture," and goes beyond it, and may reasonably be interpreted to embrace every act of taking forcible possession, either by a lawful authority, or by overpowering force. I am quite satisfied with, and adopt, the interpretation put upon those words in the judgments of the courts below, following the views put forward in the cases of Powell v. Hyde and Kleinwort v. Shepard (ubi sup.). It was urged upon us that it was unreasonable and unjust as applied to the present case. It appears to me, on the contrary, that the warranty, as now interpreted, was a reasonable stipulation for the insurers to make.

I find the following to be the definition of "barratry" given by Willes, J. in Lockyer v. Offley (1 T. R. 252): "Barratry is every species of fraud or knaverey of the master by which the freighters or owners are injured." Now it is obvious with so loose a definition as that, there may be instances of barratry which may be either harmless, or effect but a small loss; for instance a deviation, or wilful delay. But barratry may also consist in a very small matter, over which the owners or freighters have no control, the effects or consequences of which may be very serious, and I can well understand the prudence of insurers stipulating, "We will not be responsible for seizure caused by some barratrous act of the master or crew, rendering not only the ship, but also the cargo, liable to confiscation." If such be the interpretation which is to be put upon the contract, I ask the question, By what was the loss occasioned? I apprehend that there can be but one answer to this question, namely, that the loss arose from the seizure. There was no loss occasioned by the act of barratry. The barratry created a liability to forfeiture or confiscation, but might in itself be quite harmless. But the seizure which was the effective act toward confiscation, and the direct and immediate cause of the loss, was not because the act of the master was an act of barratry, but that it was a violation of the revenue laws of Spain. Now in the same clause of the warranty the words are "warranted free from capture and the seizure, and the consequences of any attempt thereat." If in place of the Spanish cruiser having seized their vessel she had failed to seize her, but in the attempt had sunk the vessel, I should have put the same question, "What caused the loss?" and the proper answer would have been: "Not the barratrous act of the captain, but the sinking of the vessel by the Spanish cruiser." On these grounds I agree that the judgment of the court below should be affirmed.

SCICLUNA AND ANOTHER v. J. P. STEVENSON; THE RHONDDA. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM THE VICE-ADMIRALTY COURT OF MALTA.

Damage—Collision—Narrow channel—Current—Special circumstances—Crossing steamships—Stopping and reversing—Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, Arts. 16, 18, 21, 22, 23, and 24.

The Straits of Messina between Ganzirri and Faro Point on the Sicilian shore and Pezzo Point and Alta Fiumara on the Calabrian shore are a little less than two miles in width, and are a narrow channel within the meaning of art. 21 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea.

Where one steamship is in such a position with regard to another vessel that it is her duty, under art. 16 (or, semble, art. 17), to keep out of the way of the latter, it is not obligatory on her to ease or stop and reverse her engines under art. 18, so long as there is no reason to suppose that she will not keep out of the way under the ordinary action of the helm.

The R., on rounding Faro Point on her starboard side, at a distance of half a mile, into the Straits of Messina, observed the A.-L. at a distance of about half a mile and about a point on the starboard bow of the R. The A.-L., being also on the Sicilian side of the Straits of Messina, and having that shore on her port side, the R. at once put her helm hard-a-port, but failed to answer her helm in consequence of a strong current. She then blew her whistle and stopped and reversed her engines full speed. The A.-L. did not ease or stop her engines, but put her helm hard-a-port, and was struck by the R. nearly amidships and sunk. In an action brought by the A.-L. against the R.:

Held, that the place in question was a narrow channel within the meaning of art. 21; that the A.-L. was to blame for being on the wrong side of the channel; that the circumstances were not such as to justify the A.-L., under arts. 23 and 24, for a breach of the arts. 18 and 22; that the R. was not to blame for not having eased or stopped and reversed on first seeing the A.-L., she not being under art. 18, so long as there was no reason to suppose that she would not answer her helm and so clear the A.-L. (a)

THIS was an appeal from the decision of Sir A. Dingli, K.C.M.G., judge of the Vice-Admiralty Court of Malta, by which, on the 23rd June 1882, he had found the French steamer Alsace-Lorraine alone to blame for a collision which took place in the Straits of Messina about two a.m. on the 30th Nov. 1881, between that vessel and the British steamer Rhondda, and in consequence of which the Alsace-Lorraine, together with her cargo, sank and became a total loss.

At the time of the collision the Alsace-Lorraine, a screw-steamer of 375 tons burthen and with engines of 75 horse-power, was on a voyage from Brindisi to Cette with a cargo of wine; and the Rhondda, a screw-steamer of 638 tons burthen and propelled by engines of 98 horse-power was on a voyage from Marseilles to Samos, in ballast.

The weather was fine but without any moon, and the wind was very light from the S.E.

The action was brought by the underwriters of the Alsace-Lorraine and her cargo, and they alleged that the Alsace-Lorraine was navigating the straits, keeping on the Calabrian shore, which was on her starboard side, going about six knots an hour, and that the Rhondda, whose masthead light had been observed over the point of the Faro (the extreme point of Sicily), was observed to round that point, and to be steering a course about S.W. ¼ S.; that the Alsace-Lorraine, whose course had on sighting the masthead light of the Rhondda over the land been altered a little to starboard, had got the Rhondda about one or one and a half points on her (the Alsace-Lorraine's) port bow, and that under these circumstances the Rhondda was observed to be "bearing almost directly upon the Alsace-Lorraine, and to avoid a collision the helm of the latter vessel was put hard-a-port, but notwithstanding this step, the Rhondda, which did nothing apparently to avoid a collision, ran into the Alsace-Lorraine, ... striking the Alsace-Lorraine almost amidships with such violence that she sank in deep water in about twelve or fifteen minutes after collision, with the cargo of wine on board of her."

No special allegation was made in the libel of

(a) Reported by J. P. ASPINALL and F. W. RAIKES, Esqrs. Barristers-at-Law.

(a) The following are the Articles of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea (1880), which were discussed in the case:

Art. 16. If two ships under steam are crossing so as to involve risk of collision, the ship which has the other on her own starboard side shall keep out of the way of the other.

Art. 18. Every steamship when approaching another ship so as to involve risk of collision shall slacken her speed, or stop and reverse if necessary.

Art. 21. In narrow channels every steamship shall, when it is safe and practicable, keep to that side of the fairway or mid-channel which lies on the starboard side of such ship.

Art. 22. Where, by the above rules, one of two ships is to keep out of the way, the other shall keep her course.

Art. 23. In obeying and construing these rules due regard shall be had to all dangers of navigation, and to any special circumstance which may render a departure from the above rules necessary in order to avoid immediate danger.

Art. 24. Nothing in these rules shall exonerate any ship, or the owner or master or crew thereof, from the consequences of any neglect to carry lights or signals, or of any neglect to keep a proper look-out, or of the neglect of any precautions which may be required by the ordinary practice of seamen or by the special circumstances of the case.

the plaintiffs as to any act of negligence on the part of the Rhondda except the foregoing; but the collision was alleged to have been "imputable solely to the master and crew of the Rhondda, and to the negligent and improper navigation of that vessel in the Straits of Messina," and to have been "in no way imputable to the Alsace-Lorraine or any person on board of her, who all did the utmost in their power to avoid or prevent the said collision."

The defendants, who made no counter-claim for the damage sustained by them in the collision, alleged that, on entering the Straits of Messina, about half a mile from the Faro Light, which was on the starboard side of the Rhondda, and when that light was bearing about N.W. ½ N., they suddenly saw the masthead and green lights of the Alsace-Lorraine about half a mile off, and about one point on the Rhondda's starboard bow, "that the helm of the Rhondda was at once put hard-a-port, but that she failed to answer her helm, owing to the strong current, and that the engines were at once stopped and reversed full speed, and the steam-whistle blown, but that about three minutes afterwards a collision ensued. . . the Rhondda's starboard bow coming in contact with the port-side of the Alsace-Lorraine about amidships, and considerable damage being done to the Rhondda." It was also alleged on the part of the Rhondda that "the Alsace-Lorraine did not keep to the side of the Straits of Messina which lay on her starboard side" (art. 21), and denied that the collision was due to any negligence or default of those on board the Rhondda, and alleged that it "was entirely caused by the improper navigation of the Alsace-Lorraine, and by the neglect and default of those on board the latter vessel, who failed to comply with the provisions contained in art. 21 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea."

The case was heard on documentary proofs brought in by the parties, and on evidence given viva voce, the proctors of both parties agreeing in accordance with a precedent in the court, that professional witnesses, Staff Commander A. de G. Sutton, R.N., H.M.S. Inflexible, for the plaintiffs, and Staff Commander G. K. Moore, R.N., H.M.S. Thunderer, for the defendants, should be produced before the court for examination, and that the judge might freely confer with them also in chambers. Many witnesses locally acquainted with the Straits of Messina, and of whom several were fishing in the straits at the time of the collision, were called by both sides, to prove on which side of the straits the vessels were navigating previous to and at the time of the collision, and also as to the direction and force and existence of the current at the time and place; and on these three points there was a great conflict of testimony.

A great number of questions were asked both by the court and by the parties of the professional witnesses with respect to the existence and effect of a current on a ship, and also as to the manœuvres performed by both ships.

On the 23rd June the learned Judge delivered a judgment dealing at great length with the evidence, but finding that a channel of a width of 1 mile 1600 yards (the average width of the straits between Ganzirri and Faro on one—the Sicilian—side and Pezzo Point and Alta Fiumara on the other, the Calabrian) was unquestionably a narrow channel within the meaning of the rule. That the Rhondda met the Alsace-Lorraine on the side of the Straits which lay on the former vessel's starboard side. That at the moment when the Rhondda ported her helm to avoid meeting the Alsace-Lorraine there was a current running northwards, and that there was nothing to lead to a belief that there was not also a counter-current which produced the whirls shown on the chart by scrolls. That there was nothing to exclude the possibility, or even probability, that the Rhondda might have had her bow in one eddy and her stern in another at the time of porting her helm, and that her answering her helm in that case would be retarded. That there was no reason for not giving credit to the evidence that the helm of the Rhondda was ported, but the ship did not answer owing to a current which took her on her starboard bow. That when the captain of the Rhondda gave the order for porting he had no reason to suspect that the ship would not obey the helm, and . . . that if that manœuvre had been successful the collision would have been avoided. That if between the order for porting and the order for stopping and reversing the engines a minute elapsed . . . no procrastination could be imputed to Captain Stevenson, or to any person on board the Rhondda; and that, seeing the danger of a collision, he, Captain Stevenson, took all the precautions in his power to avoid it. That the Alsace-Lorraine was not justified in porting, as the vessels were not meeting end on within the meaning of rule 15, nor was the circumstance that the Rhondda did not come to starboard a special circumstance such as within articles 23 and 24 to excuse the Alsace-Lorraine for porting. That the Alsace-Lorraine was approaching the other ship in a manner to involve a risk of collision, and nevertheless she did not slacken her speed or reverse her engines. That the plaintiffs had not made out their case, and that they had failed in proof of the libel by them given: and he dismissed the defendants from the suit and condemned the plaintiffs in costs.

From this judgment the plaintiffs appealed, alleging in their case the following reasons for its reversal:

(1) Because it appears by the evidence that the Alsace-Lorraine was being navigated with all due and proper care in a proper and seamanlike manner, and in accordance with the rules of navigation.

(2) Because the judgment of the court below is wrong in ruling that the Alsace-Lorraine infringed art. 21 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea.

(3) Because it appears by the evidence that the Rhondda was navigated in a careless manner, and without a proper look-out being kept on board her, and without taking proper measures with helm or engines for rounding into the straits.

(4) Because the Rhondda did not keep out of the way of the Alsace-Lorraine, as it was her duty to do.

(5) Because the Rhondda was not prevented from keeping out of the way of the Alsace-Lorraine by any current as alleged.

(6) Because the Alsace-Lorraine was right in porting when and as she did.

(7) Because it was not the duty of the Alsace-Lorraine to starboard.

The respondent, on the other hand, maintained in his case that the judgment of the court below was right, and that it should be affirmed and the appeal dismissed with costs for the following reasons:

(1) Because the manœuvres executed and attempted by those on board the Rhondda were the right and proper manœuvres.

(2) Because the Alsace-Lorraine was seen as soon as it was possible to see her in the position in which she was, and after seeing her nothing was neglected on board the Rhondda to prevent the collision.

(3) Because the Rhondda was navigated in a proper manner, and on that side of the fairway or mid-channel of the Straits of Messina which lay on her starboard side, the said straits being a narrow channel within the meaning of art. 21 of the International Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea.

(4) Because so far as the Rhondda was concerned the collision was an inevitable accident.

(5) Because the Alsace-Lorraine was navigated in an improper manner, and was not kept on that side of the fairway or mid-channel of the Straits of Messina which lay on her starboard side, the said Straits of Messina being a narrow channel within the meaning of art. 21 of the International Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, and it being at the time safe and practicable for the Alsace-Lorraine to keep to that side of the fairway or mid-channel which lay on her starboard side.

(6) Because there was no proper look-out kept on board the Alsace-Lorraine, in consequence of which the Rhondda was not seen in proper time, and the manœuvres executed and attempted on board the Rhondda were not observed as they should have been.

(7) Because those on board the Alsace-Lorraine improperly neglected to keep their course.

(8) Because the helm of the Alsace-Lorraine was improperly ported when the Rhondda was observed before the collision.

(9) Because the helm of the Alsace-Lorraine was improperly put hard-a-port and her course directed across the bow of the Rhondda before the collision.

(10) Because, when the Alsace-Lorraine was approaching the Rhondda in such a manner as to involve risk of collision, those on board of her failed to slacken her speed, or to stop and reverse their engines.

(11) Because the said collision and the damages consequent thereon were caused wholly by neglect or default of the Alsace-Lorraine, or some person or persons on board of her, and were not caused or contributed to by the Rhondda, or by any person or persons on board of her.

The appeal came on for hearing before the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, assisted by nautical assessors, on the 31st May, and was heard on that day and on the 1st, 2nd, and 5th June.

Russell, Q.C. and Dr. Phillimore (with them Dr. Stubbs) for the appellants.—The judgment of the court below is wrong, and must be reversed. The learned judge found the Alsace-Lorraine to blame on three grounds: (1) Because the place where the collision happened is, he says, a narrow channel, and because the Alsace-Lorraine was on the Sicilian side of it. This consists first of a misapprehension of the scope of art. 21, and secondly of a view of the position of the Alsace-Lorraine which is not borne out by the evidence. Art. 21 was never meant to apply to a sea passage nearly two miles wide, and in which there is room for any probable number of ships to pass and cross one another. A provision similar in terms to this was contained in the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104), s. 297. That section was repealed by the Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 63); but whilst it was in force, in no instance is there a case reported where it was held to apply to a channel like this. It was, and this article is, meant to apply to the crowded navigation of narrow rivers:

The Panther, 1 Spinks, 31.

The rule is in fact meant to apply only to those channels which are so narrow as to render the performance of the ordinary manœuvres for vessels passing and crossing each other dangerous, which certainly is not the case in a place two miles broad. But even if this were to be held a narrow channel, the evidence does not support the view that the Alsace-Lorraine was nearer to the Sicilian than the Calabrian coast. It will be found, on carefully weighing the evidence and the answers of the experts, that she was, for practical purposes, near mid-channel. The second ground on which the learned judge finds the Alsace-Lorraine to blame is for porting her helm; but, if it was right for the Rhondda to port so as to pass port side to port side, we had a right to expect she would port, as indeed she had been doing, to come round the Faro Point, and if we were justified in that expectation, our porting could not do any harm, but would facilitate her manœuvre. The third ground of blame alleged is that we did not stop and reverse. The answer is, that we were not bound to stop and reverse at a time when by the exercise of ordinary care and skill the Rhondda could have avoided us. So long as this was the case we were not approaching so as to involve risk of collision, and when we find that by the neglect of the Rhondda so to manœuvre with her helm as to keep out of our way, as it was her duty to do, and see that vessel at a few ship's lengths off coming straight down on us without altering her course, we are put by her action in a position such as to render a departure from the rules not only justifiable, but necessary, under art. 23. Had we stopped our vessel right in the way of the approaching ship, it would at once have rendered a collision absolutely inevitable; the only way to attempt to avoid it then was to go on full speed, so as, if possible, to get clear before she reached us. The Alsace-Lorraine was not therefore to blame on any of the grounds alleged against her. The judge was also wrong in finding the Rhondda not to blame. If the current exists, a person in charge of a ship should make himself acquainted with its direction and force, and if he is not acquainted, especially in a place like this, where no doubt at certain times the currents are very violent, he should take a pilot who does know about them. It amounts to this, if the current existed the master of the Rhondda negligently omitted to make himself acquainted with it and to take measures to guard against its effects. If it did not exist, he has no excuse for not keeping out of our way. There can be no doubt that under art. 16 he was bound to keep out of the way. The real cause of this collision, however, was the bad look-out on board the Rhondda. There can be no excuse for her not having seen the Alsace-Lorraine until the Rhondda had actually come round Faro Point and straightened her course to S.W., at a distance of half a mile from the land—a distance which, the joint speed of the two vessels being fifteen miles an hour, would be traversed in two minutes, a space of time in which the use of the helm alone could not avoid a collision. She was also to blame because, when she did discover us at that short distance in a position in which it was her duty under art. 16 to keep out of the way, she did not at once stop and reverse. The non-observance by the Alsace-Lorraine of arts. 18 and 22 was justified under the circumstances by art. 23, and within the principle on which, in the case of The William Frederick v. The Byfoged

Christensen (4 App. Cas. P. C. 669; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 201; 41 L. T. Rep. N. S. 535), the Judicial Committee held that the William Frederick was justified in luffing, the Byfoged Christensen pertinaciously refusing to keep out of the way; and the conduct of the Rhondda, even assuming the current to have operated as alleged, is condemned by the case of The Khedive (5 App. Cas. H. L. 876; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 360; 43 L. T. Rep. N. S. 610), as in the relative positions of the vessels at half a mile distant she was bound to keep out of the way, by stopping and reversing, there being already danger of collision apparent to her, though not to the Alsace-Lorraine, on whom the onus of getting out of the way did not lie, and who had a right to expect the Rhondda to perform her duty.

At the close of the appellants' argument, and after consultation, the Committee informed the respondents' counsel that they were of opinion that the Alsace-Lorraine was to blame, and directed them to confine their arguments to the question whether the Rhondda was not also to blame for not seeing the Alsace-Lorraine sooner, and for her manœuvres after seeing that vessel, especially in not stopping and reversing at an earlier period.

Webster, Q.C. and Dr. Raikes for the respondent.—Those on board the Rhondda could not have seen the Alsace-Lorraine at an earlier period than they did. It is impossible to see the side lights over the land, and the Alsace-Lorraine being a small vessel, her masthead light would be at a very small elevation; and therefore, even if the masthead light of the Rhondda, which was a vessel nearly double her size, was ever visible to the Alsace-Lorraine over the point, it does not follow that the masthead light of the Alsace-Lorraine was ever visible to the Rhondda. As soon as the point was cleared the Alsace-Lorraine was seen in shore and coming out from the shore, her lights being mixed with the shore lights on the Sicilian coast. The Rhondda would have no reason to expect a steamer coming towards her on that coast in breach of the regulations, and therefore one white light amongst many, which would, as the Rhondda came round the point, be altering their relative position to each other as seen from that vessel, would not particularly draw attention; had the light been that of a sailing ship lawfully there, there would have been no difficulty in clearing her, as there being little or no wind, she would be making no way through the water, and the least movement of the helm of the Rhondda would have cleared her. As soon as the lights were made out at a distance, which must have been more than half a mile, although the Alsace-Lorraine was already in the wrong for being where she was, the Rhondda acted in the right way, having a red light one or one and a half points on her starboard bow. She had no reason to suppose that she would not alter one point under an hard-a-port helm in the distance of over half a mile which intervened between her and the Alsace-Lorraine; and therefore, whilst there was no reason to suppose that she would not answer her port helm, she was not approaching the Alsace-Lorraine so as to involve risk of collision within the meaning of art. 18. That article did not apply until it became apparent that the ship from some cause did not answer her helm. When that was apparent it became at once evident that there was danger of collision, and then it became the duty of the Rhondda to stop and reverse, which she did. The Khedive (4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 360; 5 App. Cas. 876; 43 L. T. Rep. N. S. 610) is really a direct authority in our favour. It is not held there, or in any other case, that the duty to stop and reverse arises whilst there is no reason to suppose that the ships will not clear by the ordinary manœuvres of the helm, because, so long as that is the case, there is no "danger of collision." It is only when from any cause the collision cannot in all human probability be avoided by the action of the helm, that the duty arises to stop and reverse, and as soon as that duty arose it was performed. Had the Alsace-Lorraine stopped and reversed when we did, and when our whistle gave her notice of something unusual, the collision could not have occurred, and therefore no blame can be attached to the Rhondda, the existence and direction of the current at that particular point being unknown. No inference adverse to the Rhondda can be drawn from the fact that she has not counter-claimed or brought a cross-action for her damage, for the Alsace-Lorraine having sunk, there was no res to arrest and sue, and therefore the defendants would have got no fruit from a judgment in their favour, the owners of the Alsace-Lorraine being French, and having no property in Malta or this kingdom.

Dr. Phillimore in reply.—In addition to the cases mentioned above, reference was made in the argument to the case of The Jesmond and Earl of Elgin (L. Rep. 4 P.C. 1; 1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 150; 25 L. T. Rep. N. S. 514).

June 4.—The judgment of the Committee was delivered by Sir J. HANNEN.—The first question to be considered in this case is, whether or not the Strait of Messina is a narrow channel which makes it the duty of a vessel passing along it to keep to its own starboard side. Their Lordships do not propose to define what is a narrow channel, or to lay down what particular width or length will constitute it. It is sufficient to say that they are of opinion that this is a narrow channel within the meaning of art. 21 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea allowed by Her Majesty in Council on the 14th Aug. 1879, and that they concur in the opinion which the learned judge in the court below has expressed upon that point. It has not been suggested that there were any circumstances which would excuse the departure from the rule if it be applicable. But the contention in the court below was that there had not been an infringement. The whole case evidently proceeded upon a consciousness on the part of those on board the Alsace-Lorraine, that to establish that they were not to blame, they had to prove that she was keeping along the Calabrian coast; but their Lordships concur with the learned judge of the court in Malta that this contention has not been established, and that the evidence is really overwhelming that the course of the Alsace-Lorraine was along the Sicilian shore, and therefore that she infringed the rule contained in art. 21, without which infringement on her part the accident could not have happened. It follows, therefore, that the onus is upon the Alsace-Lorraine to prove that those on board the Rhondda were wholly or partly to blame.

It was contended on behalf of the appellants that, if the Rhondda had kept a good look-out, she ought to have seen the Alsace-Lorraine sooner than she did, and that if she had done so the accident might have been avoided; and they complain that the learned judge in the court below did not deal with this point; but it does not appear that it was ever insisted upon in the court below. If the appellants had intended to raise that point, questions should have been put, and an opportunity given at the trial to the opposite party to remove any doubt, if any doubt existed upon the subject. Their Lordships are of opinion that the fact that the Alsace-Lorraine was not seen by the Rhondda across the neck of land to the west of Faro may be dismissed from consideration, as it is probable that when the Alsace-Lorraine had passed over from Pezzo Point to Sicily and was close under the shore it would be impossible that its lights should be seen by the Rhondda. It is, however, admitted that the Rhondda did not see the Alsace-Lorraine until she herself had rounded or was round—the phrases differ—the Faro Point; and the question is, whether there was negligence on her part in this respect. Questions have arisen as to the exact position of the two vessels at the time when they first saw one another. Both the captain and the man at the helm of the Rhondda speak of the white light of the Alsace-Lorraine being mixed with the lights of Messina; and if a line be drawn from some point of that considerable tract which may be included in the general name of Messina—there may be lights along a considerable extent of coast, and we do not know what particular lights they refer to—that would bring the Rhondda to a point somewhat to the north-west of the position in which she is roughly indicated to be by the drawing upon the chart. That, however, is so entirely out of any proportion that it affords but a very uncertain guide. There can be no doubt that the Rhondda was coming round under a port helm, otherwise she could not have got into the position in which the witnesses for the Alsace-Lorraine allege she was; and, assuming her to be on a line drawn from Messina past the coast and beyond Capo di Faro at half a mile outside the Faro light, as it is said she was, and putting the Alsace-Lorraine at the same distance, not exceeding half a mile, on the other side, it would make them a mile distant at the time when they first sighted one another. That distance would not be traversed in a straight line, and therefore it would give more than a mile to be travelled; but, extending it even to a mile and a half, it does not give a space which would take any very considerable time for these vessels to cover, having regard to the speed at which they were going, one of them at the rate of nine miles an hour and the other six. Now here is the positive statement of the captain of the Rhondda, supported by the evidence of the helmsman and of the chief mate, that, as soon as the Alsace-Lorraine was seen emerging from the Faro Point, the process of porting the helm of the Rhondda was ordered, and was carried out. The explanation given by Stevenson, the captain, is contained in these words: he says, "she appeared to be coming out from the land, as she was too close to the land of Sicily." Silly, the helmsman, is asked, "How was it you did not see the other steamers' lights before? (A.) Because, I suppose, she was steaming very close to the Sicily coast. We did not see her light before we rounded the Faro Point." That is the evidence given by them, which was accepted by the learned judge below. He found that as soon as the Alsace-Lorraine became visible to the Rhondda the order to port the helm was given, and that it was carried out; and their Lordships are not in a position to hold that he arrived at an incorrect conclusion. Now, if that was the order given, and if that order was so carried out, was it a wrong manœuvre? It was not suggested in the court below that it was a wrong manœuvre. The case presented and maintained by Lelièvre was, that the accident happened because the Rhondda did not continue to port her helm. That is the contention. He says that she was under a port helm, that she ought to have continued so, and that if she had been so, there would have been no accident. Now, in answer to the questions which were put to the experts, and which form part of the record, they say, in the state of things which existed, or appeared to exist, when the Rhondda saw the Alsace-Lorraine coming out from the Faro Point and showing her red light, it was the duty of the Rhondda to keep out of the way; and that of course is obvious under the rule. They further say that there was time to do it. So no doubt there would have been unless some obstacle had arisen. Further they say that she might have reversed in three minutes and in the distance of a mile. That will be dealt with presently. Then they say that at the time when she discovered, if it be true that she did discover, that she was not obeying her helm, it would have been impossible for the collision to be avoided by the Rhondda going round to her own port side; but that it was the duty of the Rhondda, when a risk of collision arose, to slacken or stop and reverse. The contention on the part of the Rhondda is that this is precisely what she did; and their Lordships are of opinion that this is established.

The next question is whether or not the Rhondda failed by her own fault to keep out of the way of the Alsace-Lorraine under the 16th article; and that, no doubt, was the substantial question as to the conduct of the Rhondda which was contested in the court below. Lelièvre says, "As soon as the Rhondda saw our manœuvre she ought to have starboarded, that is, gone to the starboard and passed astern. If the Rhondda had continued her way without deviation she would have avoided the Alsace-Lorraine, but she made a movement to port, and that caused the collision." He goes so far as to say, that not merely was there a cessation to keep the course round, but that she actually went the other way, which might be the effect of the current, if in fact it was strong enough to push her in that direction, The evidence of Stevenson, Silly, Bray, and Hookey shows that the order to hard-a-port was given, and that no other order was given, but that, in fact, it did not take effect. Now, if that evidence is to be relied upon—and the learned judge had the opportunity of seeing these witnesses and hearing the manner in which they gave their evidence, and their Lordships cannot say that he was not justified in believing their evidence—that disposes of the case; because, if once it is established that the order to port was given, and that if it had been carried out it would have taken the Rhondda clear of the Alsace-Lorraine, then, if the Rhondda was prevented from carrying out that manœuvre, it becomes merely an interesting speculation what the actual cause was. Undoubtedly it was strongly in evidence that there was such a stream at this place whether it be called current or eddy, and that it was calculated to have an effect in the manner suggested on a vessel coming round into the neck of the channel. It is easy to conceive, when one looks at the confirmation of the coast, that this current would be deflected by the Faro Point, and would be felt upon the starboard bow of a vessel precisely at the point where the Rhondda had arrived. There is the statement that this did take place. If it be the fact that it took place—which must depend, of course, upon the veracity of these witnesses—it remains only for the experts to reconcile their theory with the fact, and the fact cannot be displaced by their theory. Their Lordships are of opinion that there was abundant evidence in support of the conclusion the court did arrive at, that there was a current or eddy which had the effect on the action of their vessel alleged by the witnesses on board the Rhondda. But it is further contended that precautions ought to have been taken by the Rhondda to avoid this current, or whatever it is to be called, because it is found noted in the charts, and must be taken to be a thing that persons navigating this channel ought to have in their contemplation. But there is nothing to show that, under ordinary circumstances, there would be any risk in a vessel coming round there. The current and the eddy are variable. Nobody can tell for certain that they will be felt at a particular place; and, above all, the Rhondda had no reason to anticipate that the operation of the current or eddy would have any bearing upon her duty with reference to the Alsace-Lorraine, because she had a right to expect that the coast would be clear from steamers coming out in the direction in which the Alsace-Lorraine was.

Then, further, it is said that, at any rate, she violated her duty in not reversing her engines sooner. The vessels were about a mile apart from one another when first sighted. As they were meeting, she would not have so much as a mile to go to come to the point of collision. Her engines were reversed, which it appears would take from two to three minutes. It appears that they had already been completely reversed, so that twelve revolutions had been taken at full speed astern, and therefore that shows that for a very considerable portion of the time we are now dealing with the order had been given to reverse her engines, and that this order had been complied with, since her engines were actually going astern at the time of the collision. Then, if this be so, all the time that has to be accounted for is the short period between seeing the Alsace-Lorraine and the order being given that the engines should be reversed. The reason given for its not having been done sooner is, that it was not until the captain found that the vessel was not obeying her helm that he became aware of the necessity of taking this step of reversing the engines. Their Lordships are of opinion that if that was the fact, as they, with the learned judge below, come to the conclusion that it was, then no blame can be imputed to the captain of the Rhondda for not having stopped and reversed sooner. Upon this point, the case of The Khedive has been referred to; but it will be found that it is not alppicable to the present case. By that decision the wholesome rule was laid down that where one of these regulations has prescribed something to be done, the captain of a vessel who departs from it will not be justified merely by its being thought that a man of ordinary skill and nerve would do as he did; if he sees there is danger of collision, then it is his duty to obey the rule. In that case it was thought to be clear that the captain did see there was danger of collision, and therefore that he could not be excused for not having obeyed the rule. But Lord Blackburn points to the state of facts which, as had been found by the learned judge below and their Lordships also found, existed in this case, for he says: "I think, further, that where a sudden change of circumstances takes place which brings a regulation into operation, though the thing prescribed by the regulation is not done by the person in charge, yet the regulation can hardly be said to be infringed by him till he knows or ought to have known, and but for his negligence would have known of the change of circumstances": (5 App. Cas. 894; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 360; 43 L. T. Rep. N. S. 610.) Lord Watson says, to the same effect: "Had it been possible to hold upon the evidence that the period in question was so brief, and the Voorwart's sudden change of course so startling, that the captain could not be fairly expected to suppose, and did not believe the fact, that a collision was imminent before he gave the order to stop and reverse, I should in that case have acquitted the Khedive of fault on the ground that the 16th article could not reasonably be held to apply before the moment at which it was actually obeyed." That is the state of facts which their Lordships are of opinion existed here. The captain gave the order to hard-a-port. If the ship had obeyed her helm she would have been taken clear, and no collision would have taken place. It was only when the captain discovered that his vessel was not obeying her helm that the risk of collision appeared to him, and it was only then that it became his duty to stop and reverse; and that is precisely what he says he did, and what the fact of the engines being already working in the opposite direction when the collision took place proves he had done at a period of two or three minutes before the collision took place. With regard to the case of The Earl of Elgin (4 Privy Council Appeals, 1; 1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 150; 25 L. T. Rep. N. S. 514), the marginal note very plainly shows that it is in no way an authority against the view that has been presented in this case: "Art. 16 of the Admiralty Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea only applies when there is a continuous approaching of two steamships. When two ships under steam 'are meeting end on or nearly end on, so as to involve risk of collision' as provided for in Art. 13, and one of them at a proper distance ports her helm sufficiently to put her on a course which will carry her clear of the other, and enable her to pass on the port side, she thereby determines the risk, and is not approaching another ship so as to involve risk of collision within the meaning of art. 16, and is not bound to slacken speed or stop." Applying that ruling to this case, when the Rhondda's helm was put hard-a-port, that manœuvre, if it had been successful, would have put her on such a course as would have determined the risk, and therefore the duty of slackening speed did not arise. It only arose when it was discovered that this manœuvre could not be carried out.

Adopting this view of the case, it becomes immaterial to consider the other measures of the Alsace-Lorraine which were taken after her sighting of the Rhondda; because their Lordships are of opinion that it is established that the Alsace-Lorraine, by proceeding along the wrong side of the channel, and coming out suddenly from under the land at that side, occasioned the collision which afterwards happened, and that she has failed to establish that the Rhondda, by anything she did, contributed to it, or could in any way have avoided it, but that she was prevented from doing that which would have avoided the collision by the action of the current or eddy upon her in the manner which has been described by the several witnesses. Their Lordships are therefore of opinion that this appeal should be dismissed with costs, and they will humbly advise Her Majesty to that effect.

COURT OF APPEAL.

Friday, May 4, 1883.

(Before Brett, M.R., Cotton and Bowen, L.JJ.)

The Elin. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE PROBATE, DIVORCE, AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION (ADMIRALTY).

Collision — Wages — Maritime liens — Priority— Foreign ship—Proceeds of sale.

The plaintiffs in a damage action, in which a foreign ship proceeded against has been sold by order of the court, and the proceeds brought into court to satisfy the claims against her, having no effective remedy except against the ship, are entitled to payment of their claim out of the proceeds in precedence to the seamen's claim against such proceeds for wages earned on the ship subsequently to the collision.

Quære, would this decision apply to the case of a British ship?

This was an appeal from a decision of Sir Robert Phillimore in a damage action instituted Nov. 24, 1881, by the owners of the English barque Paria against the Russian barque Elin. The collision took place in the Downs on the 21st Nov. 1881.

After the collision salvage services were rendered to the Elin, in respect of which an action was commenced on the 11th Jan. 1882.

On the 19th Jan. 1882 a wages action was brought against the Elin by her master and crew.

On the 25th Dec. 1881 liability was admitted in the damage action, and on the 10th Feb. 1882 the Elin was sold, realising 726*l.* 18*s.* 9*d.*, which was paid into court.

On the 2nd May 1882 judgment was given for the plaintiffs in the salvage action, and 243*l.* 18*s.* 8*d.* was paid out of the proceeds in court to the salvors' solicitors.

On the 7th March 1882 judgment in the wages action was given for the plaintiffs in the sum of 123*l.* 12*s.* 1*d.*

The balance in court being 483*l.* 0*s.* 1*d.*, and the damage sustained by the Paria exceeding 1200*l.*, a summons was taken out by the owners of the Paria calling upon the defendants to show cause why the 483*l.* 0*s.* 1*d.* should not be paid out to them, and the plaintiffs in the wages action moved the judge in court to order that their claim should be satisfied out of the 483*l.* 0*s.* 1*d.* On the hearing of the summons and motion it was agreed to state a special case.

The special case was as follows:—

1. On the 21st Nov. 1881 the Russian barque Elin, when in the Downs, while on a voyage from Skelefica to Cette, with a cargo of wood, came into collision with the English barque Paria, in which collision both vessels sustained damages.

2. On the same date, after the collision, salvage services were rendered to the Elin by salvors, and with their assistance the Elin was safely brought by her own crew into the port of London, and to a discharging berth, where the discharge of her cargo, which was not completed until the 24th Dec. 1881, was performed by the said crew, and a large sum for wages, which would otherwise have been paid to labourers from the shore, was saved.

3. On the 24th Nov. 1881 the owners of the Paria commenced this action against the Elin and her freight to recover damages occasioned by the said collision, and the Elin was arrested.

4. On the 11th Jan. 1882 an action for salvage was commenced on behalf of Pilcher and others for some of the services rendered as hereinbefore stated to the Elin and her cargo. Another action for the other services was on behalf of Buchan and others commenced on the 28th Jan., and by an order of court, dated the 18th Feb., these two actions were consolidated. On the 2nd May 1882 judgment was given in these consolidated actions, by which judgment the sum of 500*l.* and costs were adjudged to the plaintiffs in the said consolidated actions.

5. On the 28th Dec. 1881 the owners of the Elin admitted liability for the damage occasioned by the said collision, and determined to abandon the voyage and not to repair the Elin, and the owners of cargo on board the Elin thereupon obtained their property in London from the owners of the Elin without paying any freight, except an advance paid to the master at the port of loading on giving bail to answer the claim in the consolidated salvage action. The cargo was discharged by the crew of the Elin, as previously stated.

6. On the 19th Jan. 1882 an action (1882, K. No. 61) was commenced in the Admiralty Division of the High Court of Justice, on behalf of the master and crew of the Elin, against the Elin and her freight for wages from the month of May 1881 to the 15th Jan. 1882, on which date all these plaintiffs, except the master, were dismissed from the ship, and up to which date all these plaintiffs, except the master, had remained in the service of the ship. These plaintiffs also claimed ten days' double pay and the expenses of their journey home.

7. On the 7th Feb. 1882 the owners of the Paria applied for and obtained an order for the sale of the

(a) Reported by J. P. Aspinall, and F. W. Raikes, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

Elin, and the Elin was subsequently sold by the marshal after her cargo had been discharged as aforesaid, and the full proceeds were paid into court.

8. On the 7th March 1882 the plaintiffs in the wages action other than the master obtained judgment for the wages and ten days' double pay and their expenses home, and the plaintiff, the master, obtained judgment for the expenses of his return home, his wages having been by special agreement made payable only out of freight earned.

9. The salvors have received their salvage, so far as it was adjudged against the Elin out of the fund paid into court as stated in paragraph 7, and the balance is insufficient to satisfy the claims of the Paria and of the crew.

10. On the 27th June 1882 a summons on behalf of the plaintiffs in this action, asking for payment of their claim out of the fund in court, came on and was adjourned into court. On the same day a motion by the plaintiffs in the wages action for payment of their claim out of the fund in court also came on, and the plaintiffs in the wages action abandoning the claim of the master to be paid in priority to the plaintiffs in this action, and the claim of the seamen to be paid their wages earned before the date of the collision in like priority to the plaintiffs in this action, but insisting upon their claim to be paid all the subsequently earned wages, ten days' double pay, and expenses home of the crew, in priority to the plaintiffs in this action, an order was made on the adjourned summons and motion that a special case should be stated in this action as between the plaintiffs in this action and the plaintiffs the crew in the wages action for determining their respective priorities.

The questions for the decision of the court are:

1. Whether the owners of the Paria are entitled to have their claim satisfied out of the balance of the said fund in court in priority to the wages of the crew of the Elin earned subsequently to the date of the collision, their ten days' double pay and their expenses home, or in priority to any and which of these sums.

2. How the costs of and incidental to this special case are to be borne.

July 25.—The case now came on for argument before Sir R. Phillimore.

Stokes, for the owners of the Paria.—On the authority of Dr. Lushington in The Linda Flor (6 W. R. 197; 30 L. T. Rep. O.S. 234; Swa. 309) the claim of the owners of the Paria should take precedence over the claim for wages, even though they be earned subsequently to the collision in respect of which the owners of the damaged vessel claim. The crew, if the res be insufficient, have a remedy in personam against the owner. To allow the seamen to be paid out of the res in priority to the damage claimant would be to unfairly prejudice the rights of the damage claimant, and at the same time to unjustly indulge the owner of the wrong-doing ship by enabling him to pay claims out of the res, for which he could otherwise be made liable. That would be to diminish the liability of the wrong-doer; and, moreover, it is not unjust to say that the seamen's claim shall be postponed, seeing that the collision was brought about by their misconduct. In The Linda Flor (ubi sup.) Dr. Lushington confirms a like decision which he had arrived at in The Chimœra (not reported), where the circumstances were similar. These decisions were given in 1853 and 1857 respectively, and have ever since stood unchallenged. In The Duna (5 L. T. Rep. N. S. 217; 1 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 159; 6 Irish Jur. N. S. 358), an Irish case, the decision follows Dr. Lushington in The Linda Flor. Again, the general rule that maritime liens rank in an inverse order will not apply, as the lien of the owners of the Paria is ex delicto, and as such takes precedence of the crew's lien ex contractu:

The Benares, 7 N. of C. Sup. p. 1;
The Duna, ubi sup.;
The Aline, 1 Wm. Rob. 111.

W. G. F. Phillimore and L. P. Beaufort for the crew of the Elin.—Maritime liens rank in inverse order, and therefore the wages lien, which has attached later than the damage lien, should take priority. Bottomry takes precedence of damage:

The Aline, (ubi sup.);
The Bold Buccleuch, 7 Moo. P. C. Cas. 267.

Salvage takes precedence of damage:

The Cargo ex Galam, 9 L. T. Rep. N. S. 950: Br. & L. 167; 1 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 408;
Attorney-General v. Norstedt, 3 Price, 97.

But wages take precedence of bottomry and salvage:

The William F. Stafford, Lush. 69;
The Selina, 2 N. of C. 18;
The Union, Lush. 128.

Therefore, if seamen's wages are preferred to salvage and bottomry, and salvage and bottomry are preferred to damage, seamen's wages must necessarily take precedence of damage. Moreover, it has ever been the custom of the Admiralty Court to strenuously uphold the lien for seamen's wages: The Union (ubi sup.) The Linda Flor was decided without any consideration of the rules and principles governing maritime liens, and its supposed equitable grounds are erroneous, as the shipowner is not limited to proceeding in rem, but has the same remedy as the seamen by proceeding personally against the owners of the res. All that The Benares (ubi sup.) decided was, that the owner of the wrong-doing vessel could not recoup himself out of the res for wages paid by him to his crew in precedence to the damage claimant.

Stokes in reply.

Sir Robert Phillimore.—This is a special case stated in order to obtain a decision between two competing maritime liens on the proceeds of a vessel sold by the marshal of this court. The facts are shortly as follows: The Russian barque Elin came into collision with the English barque Paria in November last, and both vessels sustained injury. After the collision salvage services were rendered to the Elin, and she was safely brought into the port of London by her own crew with the assistance of the salvors. Shortly afterwards four several actions were brought against the Elin: the first by the owners of the Paria for damages sustained by the collision; the second and third, which was consolidated, by two sets of salvors respectively, and the fourth by her own master and crew for wages earned both before and after the collision, for ten days' double pay and the expenses of their journey home. In the first action the owners of the Elin admitted damages, and the vessel was on the application of the owners of the Paria sold by the marshal, and the proceeds paid into court. In the consolidated salvage actions judgment was given against the Elin, and the amount has been paid out of the aforesaid proceeds of sale. In the fourth action the crew obtained judgment for their wages and ten days' double pay and their expenses home, and the master obtained judgment for his expenses home only. The proceeds of sale are insufficient to satisfy the amounts awarded by the court to the owners of the Paria, and to the master and crew of the Elin. It is admitted that the claim of the Paria takes precedence over the claim of the master, and also over that of the crew so far as regards wages earned before the collision; but a question has been raised as to whether the Paria can demand priority over the wages earned by the crew after the collision, the ten days' double pay, and the expenses of their journey home.

It is to decide this point that the special case has been stated in which it is agreed that the questions for the decision of the court are: (1) Whether the owners of the Paria are entitled to have their claim satisfied out of the balance of the said fund in court in priority to the wages of the crew of the Elin earned subsequently to the date of the collision, ten days' double pay, and their expenses home or in priority to any and which of these sums; (2) How the costs of and incidental to this special case are to be borne. Various decisions were cited to me as bearing upon the subject. Some of them relate to questions of civil contract, such as bottomry, and not to liabilities arising out of a delictum, such as damages occasioned by a collision; but there is one case which seems to me directly in point, and the authority of which is binding upon me. That is the case The Linda Flor (ubi sup.), decided by Dr. Lushington after careful consideration in 1857. In this case the facts were very similar to those of the present case, priority for wages earned, both before and after the collision, being claimed over damages occasioned by the collision. Dr. Lushington says: "This is a foreign vessel proceeded against in a cause of damage and condemned to pay that damage. The master and crew have commenced proceedings for their wages. The owners of the vessel and cargo receiving the damage object, because the proceeds are insufficient to satisfy all the claims, and therefore the consequence would be that those who have suffered from a wrong-doing would recover less than their loss. The same question was agitated in The Chimœra, and I was then of opinion that the mariner could not maintain the claim to the prejudice of the parties damnified by the collision. I adhere to that opinion, and I do so especially for the following reasons: That by the maritime law of all the principle maritime states, the mariner has a lien on the ship for his wages against the owner of that ship; that he has also a right of suing the owner for wages due to him; that some uncertainty may exist as to the maritime lien when in competition with other liens or claims, and amongst these I might instance the case of a ship in the yard of a shipwright (in such a case, I should have no difficulty in saying that, the lien of the shipwright would be superior to the lien of the mariner). That in the case of a foreign ship doing damage and proceeded against in a foreign court, the injured party has no means of obtaining redress save by proceeding against the ship herself, and that, I apprehend, is one of the most cogent reasons for all our proceedings in rem. That in a case where the proceeds of a ship are insufficient to compensate for damage done, to allow the mariner to take precedence of those who have suffered damage would be to exonerate so far the owner of the ship to whom the damage is imputed, at the expense of the injured party—the wrong-doer at the expense of him to whom wrong has been done. Then, as to the mariner, what is the hardship to which he is exposed? It is true he is debarred from proceeding against the ship, but his right to sue the owner remains unaffected. It is, however, not to be forgotten that in all these cases of damage, or nearly all, the cause of the damage is the misconduct of some of the persons composing the crew. This is not the case of a bankrupt owner; it will be time to consider such a case when it arises." The authority of this case has never been questioned, and has always been treated as undoubted law. In The Duna (5 L. T. Rep. N. S. 217; 1 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 159), a case decided in the Irish Admiralty Court in 1861, The Linda Flor was followed, and an elaborate judgment was delivered in which the principles on which that decision rested were fully set forth, and the distinction was pointed out between an obligatio ex contractu, which is the basis of an action for wages, and an obligatio ex delicto upon which the liability for damage is founded. I observe that, in last edition of Mr Maude and Baron Pollock's Law of Merchant Shipping, the decision in The Linda Flor (ubi sup.) is quoted and treated as settled law. The question, therefore, is not res integra, and it is not my duty to consider whether, if it were so, the priority of the seamen's lien ought to be established. I consider myself bound by the decision in The Linda Flor, and I decide on all points raised in the special case in favour of the owners of the Paria. I shall leave each party to bear their costs of the special case.

From this decision the seamen appealed, and on May 4, 1883, the appeal came on for hearing.

W. G. F. Phillimore in support of the appeal for the seamen.

C. Hall, Q.C. and Stokes, for the respondents, were not called upon.

The arguments for the appellants were substantially the same as that used in the court below.

Brett, M.R.—The question, and the sole question, here is, whether we are prepared to overrule the decisions in The Chimœra, The Linda Flor, and The Duna (ubi sup.), and say that the principles as laid down in The Benares (ubi sup.) are all wrong. It has been argued that those decisions are wrong in that they break through the rule of the Admiralty Court as to the priority of maritime liens. It seems to me that the principles of these decisions are wholly independent of the rule as to the priority of maritime liens. The rules as to priority of maritime liens, whatever they may be—and we are not now called upon to say what they are—have been laid down by Dr. Lushington, and were perhaps known better to him than to anyone else. He never intended to break the rules as to maritime liens, and the decisions in The Benares, The Chimœra, and The Linda Flor are wholly independent of them. The rule which he acted on was this, that in the case of a foreign ship which had wrongfully injured another ship the liability of her owner to the owner of the injured ship, subject to any limitation by Act of Parliament, was the whole value of the ship and freight; that is, in the English Admiralty Court into which the ship was generally seized, although not always, as bail might be given and she be bailed out. Now that being the measure of the liability of a foreign owner under those circumstances, the question arose whether he could relieve himself of that liability by the payment of wages to the crew out of the proceeds of ship and freight, for which wages he would be liable otherwise than out of ship and freight. If the Admiralty Court allowed seamen to recover wages out of this fund, it would in so doing give a relief to the owners of the wrong-doing ship. Dr. Lushington, in the exercise of the great equitable maritime jurisdiction of the Admiralty Court, and not being bound by any rule of the municipal law either common or equitable, treated the matter on broad principles of justice, and came to the conclusion that it would be unjust to the owner of the injured ship and an unjust indulgence to the owner of the wrong-doing ship, if he allowed the seamen's wages to be paid out of the proceeds of ship and freight, bearing in mind that these wages could be recovered aliunde. And he came to that conclusion wholly independently of any considerations as to priority of maritime liens, and upon a principle of justice so as not to do injustice to the owner of the injured vessel, and not to give an unjust indulgence to the owner of the wrong-doing vessel.

The whole question here is, whether there is any principle on which we can say that these decisions are wrong, after they have stood unquestioned for so many years. It is said that they break the rule as to the priority of maritime liens; but it seems to me that they do not, and that those rules are left standing untouched. Now is there anything unjust in those decisions? I am not prepared to say that in one sense it may perhaps be somewhat hard on the seamen not to allow them to obtain their wages from the res in court; but it must be borne in mind that they may recover them upon their contract with the owners of the vessel on which they have served. I think with Dr. Lushington that as between the shipowners a contrary decision would be more unjust, seeing the hardship it would inflict on the owner of the injured ship. I cannot therefore disagree with Dr. Lushington's large view of justice, and this appeal must be dismissed.

Cotton, L.J.—The case referred to, The Linda Flor, decided in 1857, seems to me to be in point, and there is also a previous decision, The Chimœra of earlier date. That, however, does not appear to be the earliest case, as the principle acted upon in The Linda Flor seems to have been laid down in The Benares by Dr. Lushington, and he ever after acted upon it. The question therefore is, whether we are to overrule this long series of cases, based as they are on the equity of the Admiralty Court. I doubt whether they would be applicable in the case of a bankrupt owner, or where for some other reason the crew would be unable to enforce their claim. But in this case it is not shown that the crew have no other remedy, and the principle that the owner of the ship which has caused the damage shall not be at liberty to withdraw any part of the fund, arising from the value of his ship and freight, to the prejudice of the claimant for damage, is I think a just one. For my part I can see no reason therefore why we should reverse after this long lapse of time the existing rule, which has been formulated by these several decisions.

Bowen, L.J. concurred.

Appeal dismissed.

The Rigborgs Minde. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM THE PROBATE, DIVORCE, AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION (ADMIRALTY).

Collision—Compulsory pilotage — Anchor — Hull Pilot Act (2 & 3 Will. 4, c. 105, Local and Personal), ss. 22, 36, and 41.

Pilotage is compulsory on vessels coming into the port of Hull, and, where the vessel is going into dock, remains compulsory until she reaches her ultimate destination in the dock, and does not cease because the vessel anchors in the river waiting the tide to go into dock. The fact that the pilot who brings her to an anchor leaves her there, and she is taken on by another pilot in consequence of an arrangement among the Humber pilots, does not affect the compulsion.

The position of an anchor, which is required for letting go in a port, is within the discretion of the pilot in charge, and if damage is occasioned by reason of the anchor so being placed with the pilot's consent or directions, the owners are exempted from liability for such damage.

The rule that where both ships are found to blame for a collision each party bears his own costs is to be followed in a case where the defendants' ship, which does not counter-claim, is held to be exempt from liability on the ground of compulsory pilotage.

This was an appeal from a decision of Sir Robert Phillimore in a damage action, by which he on the 8th June 1882 had found the Danish schooner Rigborgs Minde alone to blame for a collision in the Humber Dock of Hull, with a flyboat belonging to the trustees of the Aire and Calder Navigation Company.

The facts alleged on behalf of the plaintiffs were as follows:—

About 6.30 p.m. on the 4th March, the flyboat No. 12, of about eighty tons, with two hands on board, laden with a cargo of wheat, was crossing the Humber Dock, from the Railway Dock, being pushed by boat-hooks, and making about a knot an hour. The weather was fine and clear, the wind about N.W. and the tide nearly high water. Under these circumstances the Rigborgs Minde was seen about fifty yards off, broad on the starboard bow of the flyboat, proceeding along the dock at about four knots an hour. A collision being imminent, the helm of the flyboat was ported, but the Rigborgs Minde came on, and with the fluke of her anchor, which was hanging at her bows in the water, struck the flyboat on her starboard side, penetrating her side about amid-ships and causing her to sink. The plaintiffs charged the Rigborgs Minde with excessive speed, with neglect in not having a check rope to the dolphins, and having the stern rope slacked too much, and with breach of the rules and regulations of the Humber Dock by reason of the mode in which the anchor was carried.

The defendants alleged that under the circumstances above-mentioned the Rigborgs Minde, a schooner of 150 tons register, having cast off the tow rope from her tug, was in the Humber Dock in charge of a duly licensed pilot, proceeding to the Prince's Dock to unload. She had a stern rope made fast to the west side of the dockhead, the rope being paid out as required. On her port hand were three dolphins, and whilst the Rigborgs Minde was so proceeding the flyboat was seen broad on the port bow, about ten yards off, rounding the innermost dolphin. Although the flyboat was immediately hailed by those on board the Rigborgs Minde to hold on by the dolphin, she was propelled across the bows of the Rigborgs Minde, and sustained the damage complained of. The defendants also pleaded compulsory pilotage.

The owners of the Rigborgs Minde did not counter-claim.

The dock regulations above-mentioned are made under and by virtue of the Harbours, Docks, and Piers Clauses Act 1847 (10 & 11 Vict. c. 27), s. 52, and direct

> That every vessel before entering into or passing out of either the locks or basins, or of the entrance thereof respectively, and before removing from one part of any dock to another, and during the time of such removal, and whilst lying in any dock, shall have her anchors in on deck, &c.

June 8, 1882.—The action came on for hearing upon vivâ voce evidence before Sir R. Phillimore, assisted by Trinity Masters. Evidence on behalf of the defendants showed that the Rigborgs Minde, an inward-bound vessel in charge of a duly licensed pilot, had come up to and anchored off the Island pier in the Humber Dock; that after a temporary anchorage she had then proceeded on in charge of a fresh pilot; that only one set of pilotage dues had been paid for both pilots; that the position of the anchor was in accordance with the directions of the pilot, and that when lowered it caught in the bobstay, which, as they contended, was due to an inevitable accident. It also appeared that it was customary, by arrangement between the Humber pilots, for the pilot who brought a vessel into the river to leave her where the vessel temporarily anchored in the river to wait till the tide served, and return to the out district, and for a fresh pilot to take the vessel on to her place of destination in the port.

Butt, Q.C. (with him Bucknill) for the plaintiffs.

W. G. F. Phillimore (with him F. W. Raikes) for the defendants.

Sir Robert Phillimore.—I am of opinion that, if the anchor of the Rigborgs Minde had been lowered sufficiently, there would have been no damage. I and the Trinity Masters believe that the anchor-stock caught on the bobstay as it was being lowered, and that it was held in such a position as to cause the pea of the anchor to go through the flyboat, and this occasioned her to sink. If the anchor had been low enough the bobstay would have fended off the flyboat, and if the stern rope had been held on taut when the flyboat was first seen, the schooner would not have come up ahead, and there would have been no collision. I pronounce the schooner alone to blame for this collision.

From this judgment the defendants appealed, and on the 30th April the appeal came on for hearing.

W. G. F. Phillimore and F. W. Raikes for the appellants, the owners of the Rigborgs Minde.—The flyboat was alone to blame. If any blame attaches to the navigation of the Rigborgs Minde, the responsibility is upon the pilot who was in charge of the vessel by compulsion of law:

The Maria, L. Rep. 1 A. & Ecc. 358; 2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 528; 16 L. T. Rep. N. S. 717;
The Hull Pilot Act (2 & 3 Will. 4, c. 105), ss. 22, 36, and 41 (Local and Personal).

The charges against the Rigborgs Minde are excessive speed, absence of check rope to the dolphins, failing to haul the stern rope taut, and carrying the anchor in an improper manner. Assuming these charges to be correct, they are all matters within the province of the pilot. With respect to the manner of catting the anchor, the selection of an anchorage place, and mode of anchoring and preparing to anchor, there are two decisions to the effect that these matters are within the pilot's province:

The Gipsy King, 2 W. R. 537;
The Christiana, 7 Moo. P. C. C. 172.

The remaining point is whether the crew of the Rigborgs Minde were guilty of any negligence in the mode of letting go the anchor, and the fact of its catching in the bobstay is submitted to be under the circumstances an inevitable accident.

Hall, Q.C. and Bucknill for the respondents.—It cannot be said that the Rigborgs Minde was in charge of a compulsory pilot. She had very properly come up as far as the Pier Island in charge of a compulsory pilot, who then left her. But then all compulsion ceased. She remained anchored there really in the port, for a couple of hours, and then for her own convenience chose to take the assistance of a pilot to navigate her from one place in the dock to another. All that the Act requires is that a vessel coming into and out of the port shall be under the charge of a duly licensed pilot. But this vessel had ceased to be a vessel coming into the port. She had already come in and been anchored for a substantial time. The same question arose in The Maria (ubi sup.), and was there decided in accordance with our contention.

Raikes in reply.

The sections referred to in the Hull Pilot Act (2 & 3 Will. 4, c. 105) are as follows:—

> Sect. 22. And whereas the guild or brotherhood of masters and pilots, seamen of the Trinity House in Kingston-upon-Hull commonly called "The Corporation of the Trinity House in Kingston-upon-Hull" have, as well by usage for a long period of years as by virtue of letters patent, or charters granted to them by the Crown, been empowered to appoint pilots to conduct ships or vessels sailing or navigating, into or out of the port of Kingston-upon-Hull and the limits and liberties thereof, and into and out of and upon the River Humber and from the said river out to sea, and between Flamborough Head northward and Winterton Ness southward, and into and out of the several ports, creeks, harbours and places situate between those two last-mentioned headlands or places, in pursuance of which powers the said corporation have from time to time appointed a sufficient number of pilots for the purpose before mentioned. Be it further enacted that it shall be lawful for the said guild or brotherhood of masters and pilots seamen of the Trinity House in Kingston-upon-Hull, commonly called "The Corporation of the Trinity House in Kingston-upon-Hull," and they are hereby required to grant licences under their common seal to such persons as they shall after due examination approve of and think properly qualified to be pilots for conducting ships and vessels into and out of the port of Kingston-upon-Hull, and of the port of Great Grimsby in the county of Lincoln, and upon any part of the river Humber, below the said port of Kingston-upon-Hull, and so far out to sea as to bring the North Ness of Dimlington on the coast of Holderness to bear or be seen a sufficient distance clear or open of the land to the southward thereof, so as to pass clear of a certain sand or shoal, called the New Sand, and also so far along the coast to the northward thereof as the said North Ness of Dimlington, and to the southward thereof as a certain point or headland on the coast of Lincolnshire, commonly called or known by the name of Donna-Nook; and the persons so licensed shall for the purposes of this Act be called "Humber Pilots," and all ships and vessels sailing, navigating, and passing as aforesaid, except as hereinafter provided, shall be conducted and piloted within the limits aforesaid by pilots so licensed, and by no other pilots or persons.

Sect. 36. And be it further enacted that the master or other person having the command of any ship or vessel which, under the provisions of this Act, shall be liable to pilotage, shall, on arriving at or within the limits for which pilots are directed to be licensed under this Act, display and keep flying or hoisted the usual signal for a pilot to come on board, by hoisting a flag in the daytime and a light in the night time at the masthead in a conspicuous situation clear of the sails and rigging of the vessel, and so as to be distinctly visible; and if any Humber pilot shall be within hail or approaching, and within a reasonable distance of any such ship or vessel with the proper distinguishing flag flying in his vessel or boat, the master or other person having the command of such ship or vessel shall, by heaving to in proper time, or shortening sail, or by all practical means consistently with the safety of the ship or vessel, facilitate such pilot getting on board; and every master or other person having the command of any such ship or vessel who shall not display and keep flying or hoisted such signal for a pilot to come on board from the time such ship or vessel shall have arrived off any or either of the limits before specified, as the case shall be, or who shall not heave to, shorten sail, or otherwise consistently with the safety of the ship or vessel facilitate such pilot getting on board as aforesaid, shall forfeit and pay double the amount of the sum which would have been demanded for pilotage of such ship or vessel from the place or distance where such ship or vessel, under the provisions of this Act, ought to have displayed and kept flying or hoisted such signal for a pilot to come on board as aforesaid.

Sect. 41. And be it further enacted, that every such pilot as aforesaid who shall be employed to pilot or conduct any ship or vessel into the said port of Kingston-upon-Hull, shall and is hereby required to take the same to such place of delivery, whether in the haven or the old harbour or in any of the wet docks of the said port, as the master or commander of such ship or vessel shall require, or so near thereunto as he can safely get, and then moor such ship or vessel in some proper situation without being paid any other rate than is hereby directed to be paid for piloting such ship or vessel into the said port; and in case the attendance of any such pilots shall be required to take care of such ship or vessel from such first mooring, and to conduct her higher up the said haven or old harbour or into any of the said wet docks or other place of delivery, the pilot who shall have brought the said ship or vessel to such mooring, or some other of the said Humber pilots, to be by the said commodore of pilots appointed for that purpose, on the application of the master or commander of such ship or vessel shall attend and shall be paid for unmooring, transporting, and removing such ship or vessel to her place of delivery as aforesaid, if such ship or vessel shall draw thirteen feet of water or upwards, not less than nine shillings, nor more than eleven shillings; and if such ship or vessel shall draw ten feet of water and upwards, and not exceeding thirteen feet, not less than six shillings and sixpence, nor more than eight shillings and sixpence, and if such ship or vessel shall draw under ten feet of water, not less than four shillings nor more than six shillings, according to the discretion of the said commissioners.

Brett, M.R.—In this case the collision has taken place between two vessels in the Humber Dock at Hull, and the learned judge of the Admiralty Court has held that the schooner, the defendant's vessel, was solely to blame. Although he has not mentioned anything with regard to compulsory pilotage in his judgment, yet I cannot help thinking that he was of opinion that a compulsory pilot was on board the vessel and that the Rigborgs Minde was to blame in respect of something which was not covered by the fact of a compulsory pilot being on board; and if he was dealing with this case as one of compulsory pilotage I think he must have considered that the fault was in the manner and mode in which the anchor was let go at the time when the pilot finally ordered it to be let go. The question is whether we agree with the learned judge. The first point then is whether there was a compulsory pilot on board the Rigborgs Minde, and on the construction of the Hull Pilot Act it is clear to me that the pilot taken on board a vessel inward bound to the port of Hull is a compulsory pilot. In this opinion I am confirmed by Dr Lushington when he decided the case of The Maria (ubi sup.). There has, however, been an attempt made to show that by reason of the change of pilots, the compulsory pilotage had ceased. But it is a common custom for pilots to settle among themselves to divide their duties. One brings a ship up to the port, another takes her into dock, and the two performances of their duty by these pilots must be considered as a single pilotage service, so that here there was really only one act of pilotage although performed by two pilots, for which one set of pilotage dues was paid. It has also been argued that compulsory pilotage had ceased because the Rigborgs Minde had anchored off the Island Pier before she was taken into dock, and it was tried to bring the case within the authority of The Maria, and to say that the vessel was not under compulsion because she had already come into the port and at the time of the collision was merely moving from one part to another. But a temporary anchorage has not this effect, and I am of opinion that the compulsion is not at an end until the vessel is finally anchored at her destination, and until that time the Rigborgs Minde was always an inbound vessel. And it must be noticed that Island Pier, even if in the Humber Dock Basin, is practically in the river, and that this vessel was bound for the Prince's Dock, to which she had to pass through the Humber Dock Basin. Therefore, during her progress to her destination it is clear that pilotage is compulsory. [His Lordship then discussed the navigation of the fly-boat, and found that she was to blame.]

It is next said that the Rigborgs Minde came up the dock too fast, and was going at the rate of four knots. If she was going at that rate which I, on an examination of the evidence, think was not the case, yet there is nothing to show that she was not going at a pace which the pilot meant her to go, and if it was too fast, that was the fault of the pilot. As regards a check rope to the dolphins, it was the fault of the pilot not to have one, and if the stern rope was slacked too much it was slacked in accordance with the orders of the pilot. Lastly it is said that her anchor was wrongly and improperly slung as the ship went up the dock, and that when the final order to let go was given it was done in an unseamanlike manner. But all of these matters, with the exception of the last, are concerned with the navigation of the ship, by way of steering her on her course, and attention to them is within the pilot's duty. Now let us see how the anchor was placed. According to the evidence it is clear that it was placed by the pilot's orders as he wished, for the purpose of being let go at any moment, and there is the authority of Dr Lushington in The Gipsy King (ubi sup.) to show that this is a matter under the control of the pilot, so that, if there was anything wrong in the placing of the anchor, that was the fault of the pilot. Assuming, then, that anything done wrongly up to the moment of letting go the anchor was the fault of the pilot alone, anything done wrong after that moment would no doubt be the fault of the crew, and anything done in letting it go was the action of the crew, and the question if they did or did not execute the order properly is one of seamanship, and for our assessors to decide. We therefore follow a practice, which I wish were more done in the Admiralty Court, of reading out the questions and answers put by us to them, so that the parties may know how much of the decision is due to them, and how much to us. The question we have put to them is that, taking for granted the anchor to be placed as described, was the fact of the anchor catching in the bobstay due to a want of reasonable skill and care on the part of those whose duty it was to lower it? They have answered that in their opinion there was no want of reasonable skill and care, and that the catching of the anchor in the bobstay was an accident.

On all of these grounds I am of opinion that there was no fault on the part of the master and crew of the Rigborgs Minde, and that the negligence on board the Rigborgs Minde, which caused the collision, was that of the pilot, and as we consider the flybcat to blame on the facts, both vessels must be held to blame for this collision, but the owners of the Rigborgs Minde are exempt from liability through the fault being that of the compulsory pilot.

Cotton, L.J.—Having looked carefully at the sections of the Act, I am of opinion that, on the construction of sects. 22, 36, and 41, pilotage was certainly compulsory on the Rigborgs Minde. I agree, also, that the change of pilots does not make the pilotage less compulsory.

Bowen, L.J. concurred.

May 1.—The defendants applied to the court to know how the costs were to be borne.

Phillimore, for the appellants.—Although it has been laid down by this court in the case of The Hector (ante, p. 101; 48 L.T. Rep. N.S. 890; 52 L.J. 51, P. D. & A.), that where both ships are held to blame there shall be no costs, yet this case materially differs from The Hector. We have here made no counter-claim, and have established the plea of compulsory pilotage. We are, therefore, entirely successful. In The Hector the owners of The Hector counter-claimed, and were therefore only partially successful in the Court of Appeal.

Hall, Q.C., for the plaintiffs (respondents).—The rule laid down in The Hector was absolutely general, and the present case is no exception.

Brett, M.R.—No costs will be given on either side, here or in the court below. Both vessels were to blame. It is a fixed rule of Admiralty procedure, both in the court of first instance and in the Court of Appeal, that in such cases there should be no costs on either side. That rule is not altered by the fact of the fault on one of the vessels being solely the fault of a compulsory pilot in charge.

The Hope. (a)

Solicitor's lien for costs—Settlement by parties—Collusion—Wages action—Practice.

In a wages action, where the defendants effect a settlement behind the back of the plaintiff's solicitor, and the plaintiffs fail to pay their solicitor's costs, the solicitor cannot obtain an order that the defendants should pay his costs, unless he show clearly that in making the compromise there has been collusion between the parties with the intention of depriving him of his lien.

This was an appeal from an order of Sir Robert Phillimore, made in chambers, in an action for seamen's wages and damages for wrongful dismissal, by which he ordered that the defendants should pay the taxed costs of the action to the plaintiffs' solicitors.

The action was commenced on the 17th Jan. 1883, in the Liverpool district registry, by the plaintiffs, two seamen, against the owners of the ship Hope, and on the 19th the defendants' solicitors gave an undertaking to appear. On the 22nd the plaintiffs accepted 5*l.* each from the defendants in settlement of their claim and costs, and thereupon left the country without paying their solicitors their costs. The plaintiffs' solicitors then made an application to the district registrar at Liverpool for an order that the defendants should pay their taxed costs, alleging that the settlement had been made "behind their backs."

The Liverpool Registrar referred this application to Sir Robert Phillimore, who ordered that the defendants should pay the taxed costs of the plaintiffs' solicitors.

From this order the defendants now appealed.

Bigham for the defendants (the appellants).—The plaintiffs' solicitors, in order to justify this order, must show that it was effected fraudulently, with a view of depriving them of their costs. Of this there is no evidence. It has nowhere been decided that parties, after they have employed solicitors, may not compromise, provided such compromise be bonâ fide. All the authorities upon the point support this contention:

Brunsdon v. Allard, 2 E. & E. 19;
Sullivan v. Pearson; Ex parte Morrison, L. Rep. 4 Q.B. 153; 19 L. T. Rep. N. S. 430;
Nelson v. Wilson, 6 Bing. 568;
Clark v. Smith, 6 Man. & G. 1051; 13 L.J. 97, C.P.

Nasmith for the solicitors.—The appellants must show that the learned judge took a wrong view of the evidence before him. The fact that the parties on one side to this settlement were sailors is suggestive that after the sailors got the money they would be at very little trouble to pay their solicitors. Sailors belong to a migratory class. The ways of sailors were well known to the defendants, who were shipowners, and who should not therefore have put the sailors in a position to defraud their solicitors.

Brett, M.R.—We have some difficulty in dealing with this case, seeing that it was taken by Sir Robert Phillimore in chambers, where the learned judge had not the advantage of having the authorities on the point cited to him. I do not think we can differ from the judge merely on the ground that he took a wrong view of the evidence. We differ from him in that he decided this case on wrong legal principles in holding that, if a compromise is made between the parties to the cause without the knowledge and acquiescence of the plaintiffs' solicitors, the defendants should pay the plaintiffs' solicitors' taxed costs. There is strong evidence to show that the compromise was made without the knowledge or acquiescence of the plaintiff's solicitors, and that the defendant knew that the plaintiffs had employed solicitors. The cases which have been cited to us show that the mere fact that a compromise has been effected without the knowledge of the solicitor is not sufficient; but that it must be further shown clearly that there was the intention in the minds of both of the parties to deprive the plaintiffs' solicitors of their lien for costs. It seems to me that in this case there is absolutely no evidence of such collision, or that it was in the minds of the defendants to deprive the plaintiffs' solicitors of the fruits of what they had done. We are asked to say that that is the necessary inference to be drawn from a settlement of this kind having been made by sailors with shipowners. But there is no rule of law that sailors are to be presumed to be cheats, nor is there any evidence at all as to that. This case, therefore, has not been brought within the rule laid down in the cases which have been cited, and this appeal must therefore be allowed.

Lindley, L.J.—I also think that this order must be discharged. I do not think that there is any difference in the principles to be applied to cases in the Admiralty Division, and to those in any other divisions of the High Court. It seems to me that there is not any rule or practice which prevents parties effecting a compromise without the intervention of their solicitors. Therefore a litigant who employs a solicitor in the ordinary way can compromise the action; but this principle or rule has been engrafted upon that, namely, that the compromise must be honestly effected, and not for the purpose of cheating the solicitors. The general rule is correctly stated in Archbold's Practice (13th ed., pp. 142, 143), where, after referring to the solicitors Act 1860 (23 & 24 Vict. c. 127), s. 28, which enables the court to make a charging order upon property recovered or preserved through the instrumentality of the solicitor, it is stated that a "solicitor has also, it is said, a lien for his costs upon a judgment recovered by his client, or upon money or costs awarded or ordered to be paid to him in a cause in which the solicitor was employed; and this even though the client had previously become a bankrupt. This lien, however, is in truth merely a claim to the equitable interference of the court." Then it runs on thus, which I think is right, "the court will exercise this equitable interference when the solicitor has given the opposite party or his solicitor notice of his lien, and that he claims the amount payable to his client to be paid to him in the first instance; in which case the opposite party will at his peril pay the client, or release the claim, or compromise it without the assent of the solicitor. So the court will exercise it, though no such notice has been given in cases where it is clearly made out that there has been some collusion or fraudulent conspiracy between the parties to cheat the solicitor of his costs. But unless such notice be given, or there has been such collusion or fraudulent conspiracy, the client, although he sues in formâ pauperis, may compromise with the other party, and give him a release without the intervention of his solicitor." In support of every one of these propositions a number of authorities are therein cited. Here there is no evidence that it was the intention of the parties to defeat the plaintiffs' solicitors of their lien for costs, and we cannot presume that sailors are cheats.

Fry, L.J.—It appears to me that the law which governs this case was correctly laid down by Tindal, C.J., in Nelson v. Wilson (ubi sup.), when he says that "it is undoubtedly competent for the party to settle the case without the intervention of his attorney; and if the attorney proceeds in order to secure his costs, he is bound to make out a clear case of fraud between the plaintiff and defendant to deprive him of such costs." In my opinion the plaintiffs have failed to establish such a clear case of fraud in this case. I therefore think the order was wrong, and this appeal must be allowed.

HIGH COURT OF JUSTICE.

QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION.

March 10 and April 5, 1883.

(Before Kay, J.)

Dormont v. Furness Railway Company. (a)

Harbour authority—Sunken wreck—Duty to remove obstacle to navigation—Removal of Wrecks Act 1877 (40 & 41 Vict. c. 16), s. 4—Action against harbour authority for injury caused to plaintiff's ship by sunken wreck.

The plaintiffs' ship was injured and sunk by striking against a sunken wreck in Piel Channel, a channel leading into Barrow harbour. The defendant company had, under local Acts, power to remove wrecks and obstructions from the channel in question. They were also, by virtue of those Acts, the harbour authority within the meaning of the Removal of Wrecks Act 1877. The defendants had taken possession of the wreck a few days before the plaintiffs' vessel struck upon it, and had partially removed it when the accident happened. The plaintiffs sued the defendant company for the damages caused by the accident, and it was admitted that, if responsible, they were guilty of negligence.

(a) Reported by J. G. Alexander, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Semble, the defendants were not responsible for the damage occasioned under sect. 4 of the Removal of Wrecks Act, as the language of the section is permissive, and could not be read as imposing a duty upon harbour authorities; nor had they rendered themselves responsible by taking possession of the wreck.

By one of the local Acts the defendants were empowered to receive a certain proportion of the light dues from ships entering Piel Channel, and those dues were to be applied for maintaining, improving, regulating, and buoying the channel.

Held, that this cast upon the defendants an obligation to remove the obstruction, and to take the necessary means for warning vessels away from it, upon the principle of Mersey Board v. Gibbs (14 L. T. Rep. N. S. 677; L. Rep. 1 H. L. 93), and that on this ground the plaintiffs were entitled to recover.

Dicta in The Douglas (47 L. T. Rep. N. S. 502, 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 15; 7 P. Div. 151), as to the effect of section 4 of the Removal of Wrecks Act, doubted.

THIS was the further consideration of an action tried before Kay, J. and a special jury at Liverpool. At the trial the amount of damages was agreed, and a verdict taken, subject to the question whether the defendant company was liable. The facts of the case, and the statutory enactments bearing upon them, are sufficiently set out in the judgment.

Gully, Q.C. and Henn Collins (W. R. Kennedy with them) for the plaintiffs.—The action is brought against the defendants as being the harbour authority for the port of Barrow, who are authorised by their local Act to take tolls from ships approaching within the prescribed limits of their harbour; under these circumstances they are subject to a common law obligation to keep the approaches to the harbour in a safe condition for those whom they invite to use it. Even if they are not otherwise liable under the local Acts, as we contend they are, they have at all events rendered themselves liable by taking possession of the wreck:

Winch v. Conservators of the River Thames, L. Rep. 9 C.P. 378;

Forbes v. Lee Conservancy Board, 4 Ex. Div. 116.

The rule applied in these cases is really that which the House of Lords acted upon in Mersey Board v. Gibbs (14 L. T. Rep. N. S, 677; 2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 353; L. Rep. 1 H. L. 93). The principle of that decision covers the present case, as the defendants receive the tolls and are bound to apply them in buoying the harbour. Another question is, whether the defendants are not liable under the Removal of Wrecks Act (40 & 41 Vict. c. 16), s. 4. We contend that that section throws upon the defendants, who are the harbour authority under the Act, the duty of initiating proceedings, for neglect in the performance of which they are liable, or at all events that they become liable under that section when they have initiated proceedings, as was the case here. The word "may" in that section is to be read as "must," it confers on the harbour authority the right as against the owners of the wreck to take possession of it although it has not been relinquished, and this accounts for the use of words which are primâ facie permissive only. The dicta of Brett and Cotton, L.J.J., in The Douglas (47 L. T. Rep. N.S. 502; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 15; 7 P. Div. 151), are in favour of this view.

C. Russell, Q.C. and Aspland for defendants.—The plaintiffs' vessel was not going into Barrow harbour, but into Piel, and the defendants therefore incurred no duty towards her, as they are expressly prohibited from levying dues beyond the limits of Barrow harbour, and this ship would not have paid them any dues at all. The only power given to the defendants in respect of Piel harbour is that vessels using that harbour pay 3*d.* per ton per annum in respect of light dues, and that sum is paid into a fund, of which any surplus which may remain after certain payments thereout come into the hands of the defendants. This brings the case directly within the decision of Forbes v. Lee Conservancy Board (ubi sup.). The Act does not impose any duty upon the defendants with regard to the navigation of the channel, and there must be a duty imposed before they can be made liable:

Collis v. Selden, L. Rep. 3 C. P. 495.

The word "may" is used throughout the statutes relating to the removal of wrecks in such a way as to show that it was intended only to confer on harbour authorities discretionary powers with regard to the subject, to be exercised or not, as they may think proper. The observations of Brett and Cotton, L.JJ. in The Douglas are merely obiter dicta, quite unnecessary for the decision in that case.

Gully, in reply, referred to White v. Crisp (10 Ex. 312), as showing the duty of the owner of a sunken wreck to do everything in his power to warn other vessels off, and that his responsibility ceases on abandonment.

Cur. adv. vult.

April 5.—KAY, J.—On the 8th Sept. 1882 the plaintiffs' sloop, the Agnes, was making her way by Piel Channel to Piel harbour, near Barrow, when she struck upon a sunken wreck, and was so much injured that she went down. The wreck was a ship called The Brothers which had sunk in that place on the 19th July 1882. The place where The Brothers sank is outside the harbour of Barrow, but is in the channel leading to that harbour, and leading also to Piel harbour. The defendants, the Furness Railway Company, have a certain authority over both the harbours and the channel leading to them, and it was admitted upon the trial of this action that, if it was their duty to remove the wreck of The Brothers or to protect ships coming up the channel from the danger of running upon it, the defendants had been guilty of negligence, and the amount of damage was agreed. It was also admitted that upon the 3rd Aug. 1882 the defendants took possession of the wreck of The Brothers and proceeded to remove it, and they had partially done so by the 8th of that month.

It is argued that under the Acts of Parliament which relate to the matter a duty to protect ships against this wreck was thrown upon the defendants; and secondly, that, even if that were not so, by taking possession and commencing to destroy it they have assumed that duty, and are therefore liable. There is no evidence as to how The Brothers was sunk—whether by negligence of the master or not. I think I must infer that after being sunk she was abandoned by the owner. By a statute passed in 1863 the harbour of Barrow was vested in the defendants, the Furness Railway Company, and sect 14 defined the limits of the harbour and provided that the company should have jurisdiction over Piel harbour and Piel Channel beyond these limits, "for the purpose of maintaining, improving, regulating, and buoying the said harbour and channel" to a point there mentioned as Helpsford Scar, which is further seawards than the place where this accident occurred; but it was further provided that such powers should not confer on the company the right to levy dues or rates beyond the limits of the harbour of Barrow, and that the defendants should not in anywise impede the present access to Piel harbour, or diminish or affect in any way its present use, conveniences, privileges, or immunities as a harbour of refuge. By another Act passed in 1879, reciting that section, it was provided that the powers of the harbour master should comprise and include the harbour of Barrow and Piel harbour and Piel Channel beyond the place of this accident, but that nothing in the Act should confer upon the company the right to levy dues or rates beyond the limits of the harbour of Barrow; and by sect. 29, after certain deductions, one-half of the residue of certain light duties, to which ships entering or leaving Piel harbour or Piel Channel were liable to contribute, were to be paid to the defendant company, and to be applied by them in "maintaining, buoying, lighting, regulating, and improving Piel harbour and Piel Channel as far as Helpsford Scar, and for no other purpose." The 17th bye-law gave the harbour master power to remove wrecks and obstructions, and to retain anything so removed to defray the expenses of such removal. In 1877 there was passed a general Act to facilitate the removal of wrecks obstructing navigation. Sect. 4 provides, "where any vessel is sunk, stranded, or abandoned in any harbour or tidal water under the jurisdiction of a harbour or conservancy authority, or in or near any approach thereto, in such manner as in the opinion of the authority to be, or be likely to become, an obstruction or danger to navigation in that harbour or water, or in any approach thereto, the authority may take possession of and raise, remove, or destroy the whole or any part of the vessel, and may lift or buoy any such vessel or part until the raising, removal or destruction thereof, and may sell, in such manner as they think fit, any vessel or part so raised and removed, and also any other property recovered in the exercise of their powers under this Act, and may out of the proceeds of such sale reimburse themselves for the expenses incurred by them under this Act, and shall hold the surplus, if any, of such proceeds in trust for the persons entitled thereto." Sect. 5 gives a similar power to the general lighthouse authorities for that part of the United Kingdom in or near which the wreck is situate if there is no harbour or conservancy authority having no power to remove the same. It is argued that the 4th section of this statute, although in terms permissive, imposes a duty upon the harbour or conservancy authorities, and this argument is to some extent strengthened by the 3rd section, which defines harbour and conservancy authority as including all persons or bodies of persons intrusted with the duty or invested with the powers of improving harbours or tidal waters. In the case of an authority intrusted with such duty at least it may be plausibly argued that this addition to their powers implies an additional duty. On the other hand, if sect. 4 imposes this duty upon a harbour authority, it is difficult to avoid the conclusion that sect 5 must impose a like duty upon the lighthouse authority where there is no harbour or conservancy authority. In the case of The Douglas (ubi sup.), Brett, L.J. during the argument observed that the statute related to the performance of a public duty, and asked whether the word "may" in sect. 4 was not to be read "must." I do not find anything to that effect in his judgment in that case. Lord Coleridge declines to give an opinion upon the point, but Cotton, J.L. intimates that under that section it became the duty of the harbour master to remove a dangerous obstruction.

The reluctance of the court to construe permissive words in a statute as obligatory is shown by the language used by the noble Lords in the case of Julius v. The Bishop of Oxford (42 L. T. Rep. N. S. 546: 5 App. Cas. 214), in which the principal authorities on the subject are referred to and commented on. It is obviously a strong construction to treat permissive words as imposing a serious obligation which, if neglected, may expose the body so empowered to heavy damages, and I should hesitate to hold on this ground alone that the defendants were liable. Nor do I see, if the owners of The Brothers had not become by negligence or otherwise liable for the consequences of the ship being sunk in the Piel Channel, how the harbour authority by simply commencing to remove the wreck can be held to have incurred a duty not otherwise cast upon them. But by the Act of 1879 the defendants were empowered to receive a certain proportion of the light dues from ships entering Piel harbour and Piel Channel, and these dues were to be applied by them in maintaining, buoying, lighting, regulating, and improving Piel harbour and Piel Channel up to and beyond the place of the accident. It seems to me that these words did impose upon them an obligation to remove such an obstruction as this wreck, and to mark its position by buoys until removed, and to apply whatever funds they might receive under the Act for that purpose, and on that ground I think the action against them must succeed. The case, in my opinion, comes within the authority of The Mersey Docks Trustees v. Gibbs (ubi sup.), and judgment must accordingly be given for the plaintiffs for the agreed amount of damages, and for the costs of the action.

GULLICHSEN v. STEWART BROS. (a)

Charter-party—Cesser of Liability clause—Bill of lading—"All other conditions as per charter-party."

A clause in a charter-party, whereby the responsibility of the charterer is to cease as soon as cargo is on board, the vessel holding a lien upon the cargo for freight and demurrage, is not applicable to liability for demurraye at the port of discharge; and therefore a charterer, who is also the consignee and receiver of a cargo, under a bill of lading containing the words "paying freight and all other conditions as per charter-party," is not exempted by such clause from liability for such demurrage.

THIS was a special case stated by the parties, pursuant to the Rules of the Supreme Court, Order XXXIV., r. 1, the following being the material parts thereof:—

The plaintiff is a shipowner residing in Norway, and is the owner of the vessel Alette. The defendants are timber and general merchants, carrying on business at 3, Fen-court, Fenchurch-street, in the city of London.

This action is brought to recover the sum of 56*l*. 13*s*. 4*d*., for the demurrage of the said vessel.

On the 13th Dec. 1881, a charter-party was entered into between the plaintiff, through his agent, and the defendants, under which the Alette was to load from the defendants at Miramichi or Dalhousie a cargo of deals and battens, to be carried at a certain rate of freight to a safe port on the west coast of Great Britain. The charter-party contained the following clauses:

It is agreed that as this charter-party is entered into by the charterers for account of another party, their responsibility ceases as soon as the cargo is on board, the vessel holding a lien upon the cargo for freight and demurrage. The usual customs of each port to be observed by each party in cases where not specially expressed.

Seventeen days, Sundays and holidays excepted, are to be allowed the merchant (if the ship be not sooner despatched) for lading, and for discharging cargo fifteen like days. Lay days to commence when ship is ready in a proper loading and discharging berth respectively; demurrage at the rate of fourpence per register ton per day to be paid to the ship if longer detained.

Messrs. R. A. and J. Stewart, of Miramichi, shipped on the Alette, under the charter-party, a cargo of wood goods in two lots, one consisting of 401,000 pieces of palings, and the other of 20,523 pieces of deal and deal ends, and 274,118 pieces of palings, and two sets of bills of lading were signed in respect of the said cargo, one of them being for the 401,000 pieces of palings, and the other for the 20,523 pieces of deal and deal ends and the 274,118 pieces of palings. By the said bills of lading the goods were made deliverable at the port of discharge on the river Mersey to the defendants or to their assigns, he and they paying freight and all other conditions as per charter-party.

The defendants, on the 28th June 1881, while the vessel was on her voyage, indorsed for value the first of the two bills of lading mentioned in paragraph 5 of this case (that is to say, the bill of lading for 401,000 pieces of palings) over to Messrs. Banks and Ratcliffe, who had purchased these goods for 194*l*. 7*s*. 4*d*., and on or about the 7th July 1881, whilst the vessel was still on her voyage, they for value, viz., for 210*l*. 13*s*. 1*d*., indorsed on the second bill of lading, mentioned in the said paragraph, the following words: "Deliver to Messrs. Harrison, Robinson, and Co., the deals and deal ends, number in all 20,523 pieces, containing 247,085 superficial feet according to other side," and delivered such bill of lading so indorsed, to Messrs. Harrison, Robinson, and Co., who had purchased the said 20,523 pieces of deal and deal ends for 210*l*. 13*s*. 1*d*.

The defendants were the owners and receivers of the 274,118 pieces of palings, the remainder of the cargo.

The ship was ready in a proper discharging berth at Liverpool, and the dicharge was commenced on the 11th July 1881, and was not completed until the 1st Aug. 1881, on which day the discharge of the whole cargo was completed. The discharge of the said 274,118 pieces of palings was not completed until the said 1st Aug. 1881. (The remainder of the cargo could not be discharged until after the said 274,118 pieces had been discharged.) The said vessel was therefore detained five days beyond the said fifteen days. The detention of the vessel arose through no default of the ship.

The court is to have power to draw inferences of fact.

The defendants contend that their liability ceased on the cargo being shipped, and that the plaintiff was bound to exercise his lien.

The question for the opinion of the court is, whether upon the facts above set out the defendants are liable. If the court find for the plaintiff, then judgment is to be entered for him for 56*l*. 13*s*. 4*d*., and costs; but if the court find for the defendants, then judgment is to be entered for them with costs.

French for the plaintiff.—The plaintiff is entitled to recover this demurrage from the defendants under the terms of the charter-party and bill of lading, The words of the bill of lading "all other conditions as per charter-party" incorporate the conditions of the charter-party as to demurrage, and the defendants therefore as consignees are liable under them for this amount:

Porteus v. Watney, 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 34; 39 L. T. Rep. N. S. 195; 3 Q. B. Div. 534.

It will doubtless be contended that, as the consignees are in this case charterers also, they are exonerated from liability by the cesser clause, but this clause only exonerates the charterers from claims made against them in their character as charterers, and is not applicable to, and has no effect on, demurrage at the port of discharge. [He was stopped by the court.

Edwyn Jones for the defendants.—The defendants are not liable for this demurrage. They are not liable under the bill of lading, for that contains no provision as to demurrage, and, as to the words, "they paying freight and all other conditions as per charter-party," it was held by the Court of Appeal in Porteous v. Watney (39 L. T. Rep. N. S. 195; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 34; 3 Q. B. Div. 534), that this language "imports a liability on the part of the consignee for demurrage co-extensive with the liability of the charterer," and the decisions in Wegener v. Smith (15 C. B. 285; 24 L. J. 25, C. P.) and in Smith v. Sieveking (4 E. & B. 945; 5 E. & B. 589; 24 L. J. 257, Q. B.) are to the same effect. In this case the charter-party provides, "that, as this charter-party is entered into by the charterers for account of another party, their responsibility ceases as soon as the cargo is on board, the vessel holding a lien upon the cargo for freight and demurrage." This clause clearly protects the defendants from any liability for demurrage at the port of discharge, the shipowner having expressly discharged them, reserving a lien on the cargo for his own protection. In Gray v. Carr (25 L. T. Rep. N. S. 215; 1 Mar. Law Cas. 115; L. Rep. 6 Q. B. 522) there was a cesser clause, "the owners to have an absolute lien for all freight, dead freight, demurrage, and average," and the bill of lading contained, as in the present case, the words, "and all other conditions as per charter-party," and there the court held that the shipowners had a right of lien against the consignees for demurrage, but not for damages for detention at the port of loading. It was not argued in that case that the shipowner would have been entitled to recover in an action against the consignees apart from his lien. In French v. Gerber (36 L. T. Rep. N. S. 350; 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 403; 1 C. P. Div. 737; 2 C. P. Div. 247) it was held that the cesser clause discharged the charterers from liability for giving orders for the ship to discharge at a port which was not a good and safe port (contrary to the stipulations of the charter-party), Mellish, L.J. saying, "the true construction of the charter appears to me to entirely exonerate the charterers in respect of subsequent breaches." Apart from the express words of the bill of lading there is no implied contract rendering the consignee liable to pay demurrage, since it is not stated in the case that more than a fair and reasonable time was occupied in discharging the ship:

Evans v. Forster, 1 B. & Ad. 118;
Horn v. Bensusan, 9 C. & P. 709.

Synnott, for French, in reply.—There is no force in the argument that, because a remedy by lien is given, therefore the remedy by action for breach of contract is gone. [POLLOCK, B.—As you have not alleged that there was unreasonable delay in discharging the ship, you must show a breach of contract on the part of the defendants. We cannot reject the words of the bill of lading, "all other conditions as per charter-party."] Those words incorporate the clauses of the charter-party existing at the time of the alleged breach. They incorporate, therefore, the conditions of the charter-party as to the mode of the discharge of the cargo, but do not incorporate the "cesser" clause, which applies to the charterers in their character as charterers only, and does not apply to them in the character of consignees and dischargers of the cargo. In Gray v. Carr (1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 115; 25 L. T. Rep. N. S. 215; L. Rep. 6 Q. B. 534, 540) Brett, J. says, with respect to similar words in the bill of lading in that case, that they were "satisfied by making them applicable to damages in the nature of demurrage for any delay which may occur through the default of the consignee at the port of discharge." The words therefore only incorporate the conditions of the charter-party which are applicable. The cesser clause is not applicable, because it is a personal clause, the sole object of which is to protect the charterer from personal liability at the port of loading. This is clear from the observations of Cleasby, B. in Gray v. Carr (ubi sup.). "It appears," he says, "clear to me that whether the demurrage days are occupied in the loading of the ship, or in the discharge of it, the charterer is equally discharged from personal liability as soon as a sufficient cargo is loaded." The clause therefore does not affect the liability of the defendants as consignees.

Edwyn Jones called the attention of the court to Sanguinetti v. The Pacific Steam Navigation Company (3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 300; 35 L. T. Rep. N. S. 658; 2 Q. B. Div. 238).

POLLOCK, B.—This action is brought to recover the sum of 56*l.* 13*s*, 4*d.*, claimed for demurrage upon the delay in discharging a ship called the Alette, which was chartered under a charter-party of the 13th Dec. 1881, entered into between the shipowners and the defendants to load from the defendants at Miramichi or Dalhousie a cargo of deals and battens to be carried at a certain rate of freight to a safe port on the west coast of Great Britain. In this charter-party there was the usual clause as to the time to be allowed for loading and discharging the cargo, which was: "Seventeen days, Sundays and holidays excepted, are to be allowed the merchant (if the ship be not sooner despatched) for loading, and for discharging cargo fifteen like days. Lay days to commence when ship is ready in a proper loading and discharging berth respectively; demurrage at the rate of fourpence per register ton per day to be paid to the ship if longer detained." The cargo was duly loaded and forwarded to this kingdom, and the bill of lading under which the cargo was actually shipped contained the words, "he and they (i.e., the defendants or their assigns) paying freight and all other conditions as per charter-party." Now, this amount is not claimed against the defendants for undue delay in unloading the vessel, as in the old case of Randall v. Lynch (2 Camp. 352), because the plaintiff in his statement of claim does not put forward that as the ground of his claim. But the claim is for demurrage due under the bill of lading, which refers in the manner I have just mentioned to the charter-party.

Let us see, then, in what way the consignee is liable under the bill of lading. This appears from the case of Harman v. Gandolph (Holt. 35), where it is said that "the consignee by taking to the goods contracts with the owners of the vessel to perform the terms upon which they have undertaken to convey and deliver them." That is the way the contract arises. Now, in this case, the words of the bill of lading "paying freight and all other conditions as per charter-party," clearly incorporate into the bill of lading so much of the charter-party as has reference to the receipt of the cargo, and the loading of the ship. This, however is not a claim for demurrage at the port of loading, but at the port of discharge, a fact which becomes important when we come to consider how much of the charter-party is incorporated into the bill of lading. For there is in the charter-party a clause which is called the cesser clause, and which runs: "It is agreed that, as this charter-party is entered into by the charterers for account of another party, their responsibility ceases as soon as the cargo is on board, the vessel holding a lien upon the cargo for freight and demurrage." Now, it is perfectly intelligible that that clause should have full effect in exonerating the charterers from all liability for anything occurring after the shipment of the cargo, because it is very reasonable that they should say that they, being agents for other parties, are not going to be liable for anything that occurs after shipment, the goods being always subject to the shipowner's lien. But it does not follow because the charterer is freed from liability at the port of discharge by that clause, that the shipowner's right to sue the consignee for freight and demurrage is displaced. In answer to this, the defendants contend that if you import the charter-party at all into the bill of lading you must import the whole of it, including the cesser clause. But in this case the shipowner is not suing the defendant as charterer, but as assignee of the bill of lading, and the only part of the charter-party which is important at the present time is that which has reference to the delivery of the cargo, and to my mind it seems unreasonable, as a matter of commercial usage, to say that into whosoever's hands the cargo might come they would not be responsible personally for demurrage under the charter-party.

I am of opinion, therefore, that the consignee is not less liable because he happens to be the charterer, the ground of his being released from liability as charterer being found in his being agent for other parties. But, apart from this consideration, we have the clear authority of Cotton and Thesiger, L.JJ. in Porteous v. Watney (39 L. T. Rep. N. S. 195; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 34; 3 Q. B. Div. 534) for saying that a provision similar to that which is found in the bill of lading in the present case only incorporates into the bill of lading so much of the charter-party as is applicable. I think, therefore, that in this case there must be judgment for the plaintiffs with costs.

Lopes, J.—It is important in this case to remember that this is a claim for demurrage not at the port of loading, but at the port of discharge, and not against the defendants as charterers of the ship, but as consignees of the cargo; and the question for us to consider is what is the contract entered into by the bill of lading. That document contains the words "he and they paying freight and all other conditions as per charter-party." The charter-party, therefore, must be looked at, for it would be impossible for us not to give effect to the words "and all other conditions as per charter-party." Those words must be looked at with reference to what the charter-party contains. Now, it is clear from the judgments of Cotton and Thesiger, L.JJ. in Porteous v. Watney (ubi sup.), that these words only import into the bill of lading such of the provisions of the charter-party as are consistent with the circumstances of the case at the time when it becomes necessary to construe the bill of lading. We are bound, therefore, to incorporate the provisions of the charter-party as to demurrage, because those conditions are applicable to demurrage at the port of discharge such as has arisen in this case; but it is equally clear that we cannot import the earlier provisions of the charter-party, which run, "It is agreed that as this charter-party is entered into by the charterers for account of another party, their responsibility ceases as soon as the cargo is on board, the vessel holding a lien upon the cargo for freight and demurrage," for that provision has reference only to the time when "the cargo is on board," and has no application to the state of things at the port of discharge. I think, therefore, that while the condition as to demurrage is applicable to the circumstances of this case, that which only relates to the time when "the cargo is on board" is not applicable, or, in other words, that the cesser clause has no application here, and I think that there should be judgment for the plaintiff for 56*l.* 13*s.* 4*d.* with costs.

The Livietta. (a)

Salvage—Derelict—Amount of award—Apportionment.

A brig on a voyage from Norway to Cardiff, with a crew of nine hands, fell in with a derelict brig, in risk of imminent loss, between Heligoland and the Dogger Bank, and put a mate and two hands aboard her, who shortly after endeavoured to regain their own vessel, but their boat was swamped and one of the men drifted astern and was rescued by a fishing smack. After great difficulty and much hardship the two men navigated the derelict in safety to within a few miles of Dungeness, when she was taken in tow by a steamship and placed in Dover Basin.

In consolidated actions of salvage brought respectively by the owners, master, and crew of the brig, and by the owners, master, and crew of the steamship, the Court awarded one-half the value of the property salved, out of which three-fifths were apportioned to the salving brig.

These were consolidated actions of salvage brought respectively by the owners, master, and crew of the Norwegian brig Julie, and by the owners, master, and crew of the British steamship Walton, against the Italian brig Livietta, her cargo and freight.

The statement of claim on behalf of the owners, master, and crew of the Julie alleged their services to be substantially as follows:

The Julie, a brig of 257 tons register, was, on the 13th Nov. 1882 in the North Sea, bound on a voyage from Arendal to Cardiff, laden with a cargo of mining timbers and manned by a crew of nine hands all told. On the same day, at about 9 a.m., when between the Dogger Bank and Heligoland, those on board the Julie sighted a brig (which proved to be the Livietta) lying to, there being a light easterly wind. The mate and two hands of the Julie having boarded the Livietta, it was found she was laden with wheat, derelict and in a very crippled condition, there being two and a half feet of water in the hold, the pumps choked, no pump gear and no anchors. The mate and the two hands set sail upon the Livietta and proceeded in company of the Julie. Meanwhile the wind had increased to a gale from the east with a high sea, and at 10 a.m. on the 14th of November, those on board the Livietta, fearing to lose sight of the Julie in the boisterous weather, and fearing the Livietta would founder as the water was increasing, determined to leave the Livietta. In attempting to do so, which involved great risk to the Julie by reason of her approaching close to the Livietta, the boat was swamped, and the mate and one hand succeeded in getting on board the Livietta again, and the other hand drifted astern in the swamped boat and was ultimately rescued by means of a lifebuoy by a fishing smack. After several ineffectual attempts to send the Julie's lifeboat to the assistance of the two men on the Livietta, the Julie endeavoured to keep by the Livietta, but lost sight of her during the afternoon. The Livietta was then with much difficulty navigated up the English Channel. At 4.30 p.m. the North Hinder light was sighted, and at midnight the South Foreland light, the course being shaped for Dover and flareup lights being burned for a pilot or tug. By this time the water had increased to five feet, the wind had decreased, but the sea had got worse and was running very high. Towards morning on the 15th Nov., the wind having become more northerly, the Livietta drifted from the shore, and at 8 a.m. the Varne light was sighted. The Livietta was then tacked in towards the land, and at noon Dungeness was sighted, when in answer to a signal of distress the steamship Walton came off and towed the Livietta off Dover, when she was taken by a tug into the harbour, having at this time five and a half feet of water in her hold amidships.

After the Julie lost sight of the Livietta she experienced very bad and adverse weather, and in consequence of her being short-handed, by reason of the absence of the mate and two hands, the master and crew underwent much extra fatigue and exertion. She was three times driven back off the Lizard, and on the 23rd Nov. put into Falmouth as a harbour of refuge, having lost her lower foretopsail. She did not arrive at Cardiff till Dec. 16, having lost about 24 days, and being put to considerable expense at Falmouth. Those on board the Livietta when attempting to get back to the Julie lost their coats, boots, oilskins, and changes of clothing. In consequence they were constantly exposed to the weather and had no change, and their feet being uncovered suffered considerably. Except on one occasion they were unable to light a fire on board the Livietta or to cook their food. They had very little to eat or drink, were unable to go to sleep during the whole time they were on board the Livietta, and were in constant fear of foundering. In rendering the said services the Julie incurred expenses to the amount of 63*l*. 8*s*. 2*d*. The value of the Julie was about 2000*l*.

The statement of claim on behalf of the owners, master, and crew of the Walton alleged their services to be as follows:

The Walton, a steamship of 688 tons register, with engines of 99 horse power nominal, was, on the 15th Nov. 1882 about noon off Dungeness, on a voyage from Algiers to Leith and Newcastle, with a cargo of esparto grass and a crew of nineteen hands all told. At such time those on board the Walton sighted the Livietta, which was distant about six miles, bearing about S.S.E. and flying signals of distress. The sails were observed to be flying about in great confusion, and she was driving towards the French coast with her head to the westward. The chief mate and four men from the Walton boarded the Livietta and found her in charge of two men from the Julie, who were much exhausted and in want of assistance. After some difficulty, and without assistance from the two men from the Julie, the Walton was made fast ahead of the Livietta, three men from the Walton remaining on board the Livietta to stow the sails and make her ready for harbour. After about one hour's towing two more hands were put on board the Livietta to assist, and at 4.30 p.m. the Walton arrived off Dover pier with the Livietta in tow, and the Livietta was taken into the basin by a tug for 10*l*. At the time of receiving the services, the Livietta and the two men on board of her were in a position of extreme danger. The men were too exhausted and had not strength enough to set her sails, which were in a state of confusion, she had no anchors, and her pumps were choked and useless. She had from six to seven feet of water in her hold, and her cargo of grain was wet and deteriorating rapidly.

By the consent of the cargo owners, the cargo was sold by the Marshal of the court for the sum of 1344*l*., which was paid into court. An appearance was entered by the owners of the Livietta and of her cargo, and 500*l*. was tendered by the cargo owners, but refused as insufficient. The owners of the Livietta did not deliver a statement of defence.

The ship had not been sold and the value had not been ascertained.

In the statement of defence delivered on behalf of the owners of cargo, the allegations in the statement of claim on behalf of the Julie were admitted, save that the Julie by reason of being short-handed was in any way inconvenienced or put to expense, and that but for the services of the Julie the Livietta must have been lost; or that by reason of the services, the Livietta and her cargo were rescued and brought into a place of safety. With respect to the services of the Walton, they were also admitted, except the allegation that at the time of the Walton's services the Livietta and the two men on board her were in a position of extreme danger.

Jan. 30.—The case came on before the judge on the pleadings, no witnesses being called.

G. Bruce for the owners, master, and crew of the Julie.—The services of those from the Julie were in the highest degree meritorious. The property salved was saved from certain destruction, and in rendering the services the salvors greatly imperilled their lives, and underwent most unusual exertions. The owners of the Julie have been put to great expense by loss of time and damage to property. Under these circumstances 500*l*. is insufficient.

The Rasche, L. Rep. 4 A. & E. 127.

W. G. F. Phillimore for the owners, master, and crew of the Walton.—The Walton completed the service and so saved the Livietta and the lives of the original salvors. Without her assistance the Livietta would have been lost. Seeing that the values are small and the claimants many, a large proportion should be given.

Bucknill for the owners of cargo on the Livietta.—The tender is over one-third. The services of the two men from the Julia were no doubt meritorious, but not efficacious. The Walton only towed in calm weather for about two hours.

J. P. Aspinall, for the owners of the Livietta, stated that the owners of the ship would pay as salvage a sum bearing the same proportion to the value of the ship as that awarded against the cargo bore to the value of the cargo.

Sir ROBERT PHILLIMORE.—I pronounce against the sufficiency of the tender made by the owners of the cargo of the Livietta in this case, and I award a moiety of the value of the property proceeded against as salvage remuneration for the services rendered by the plaintiffs. Of this award I apportion three-fifths to the owners, master, and crew of the Julie. The owners, master, and crew of the Walton will receive the remainder of the moiety, and I allot two-thirds of this remainder to the owners of the Walton.

THE STEAMSHIP BENTINCK COMPANY LIMITED v W. H. POTTER & SON; THE GEORGE ROPER. (a) Collision—Launch—Necessary precautions—River Mersey.

The duty of persons in charge of a launch, to take reasonable precautions to warn other vessels navigating the river before the vessel is launched, is to be construed as meaning that they are bound to take the utmost possible precautions.

Tugs in attendance on a launch in the river Mersey should be dressed with flags and should give warning to approaching vessels that the launch is about to take place.

THIS was a damage action in personam instituted by the owners of the screw steamship Bentinck against the owners of the launch George Roper to recover damages arising out of a collision between the two vessels in the river Mersey on the 10th Feb. 1883. The defendants counter-claimed.

The facts alleged on behalf of the plaintiffs were as follows: — The screw-steamship Bentinck, belonging to the port of Whitehaven, of 555 tons register, and manned by a crew of seventeen hands all told, was, shortly before 1 p.m. on the 10th Feb., proceeding down the river Mersey on the Cheshire side of mid-channel, bound on a voyage from Garston to Belfast with a cargo of coals. The wind was S., the weather fine and clear, and the tide last quarter flood, and a good look-out was being kept on board the Bentinck, which was being navigated at slow speed, stopping when necessary to avoid the craft in the river. As the Bentinck came down towards Brunswick Dock, her engines were stopped to allow a steamer, the Merchant, coming out of Brunswick Dock to straighten down the river. The helm of the Bentinck was put to starboard, so as to keep clear of the Merchant. The Merchant, however, starboarded also, and thereupon these on board the Bentinck observed the launch George Roper coming across the river stern first, about 300 yards off, and broad on the starboard bow. Previously to the launch being seen an order had been given to go slow ahead, but it was at once countermanded, and the engines of the Bentinck were immediately put full speed astern, but the George Roper's starboard side came into collision with the stem of the Bentinck and the Bentinck received considerable damage. The plaintiffs charged against the defendants (1) that the George Roper was improperly launched at a time when the river was not clear, and without a proper look-out being had, or proper precautions being taken to see that the river was clear; (2) that a proper, sufficient, and usual notice or warning of the launch was not given before the launch, and proper steps were not taken to apprise those navigating the river that the launch was coming away; (3) that the George Roper was not furnished with a proper anchor, or with one ready for letting go, or if there was any such anchor ready, those on board and in charge of her improperly neglected to use it; (4) that the George Roper when she got into the river was not properly navigated or towed so as to avoid collision with the Bentinck; (5) that the defendants were the builders of the George Roper, from whose yard she was launched, and they or their servants had the management of the launching operations; and lastly, that the collision and the damage to the Bentinck was caused by the negligence of the defendants and their servants.

The facts alleged on behalf of the defendants were as follows:—On the 10th Feb., the defendants, intending to launch the ship George Roper from their building yard, situated on the Liverpool side of the river Mersey, had taken all reasonable steps to indicate to vessels navigating the river that a launch was about to take place. Flags were displayed from poles on board the launch, and a large red flag, a usual and well-known signal on the Mersey that a launch is about to take place, was flying at the end of the building yard. Two steam tugs were also in the river opposite the yard, each flying a large burgee, which is also a well-known signal that they were in attendance upon a ship about to be launched. It was high water about 1.10 p.m., and it is a well-known rule that the launching of vessels takes place at slack tide (high water), and it was notorious on that day that the launch would take place at that time. In these circumstances, at about two minutes to 1 p.m., the river being clear of craft, the defendants launched the vessel, and, whilst she was crossing the river stern first from the Liverpool to the Cheshire side, those on board her observed the Bentinck (which they had previously seen nearly a mile distant) coming down the river. There was then plenty of room and time for the Bentinck to have avoided the launch, either by going ahead of her, or by easing or stopping and reversing; but the Bentinck, coming on apparently under a starboard helm, and without taking any steps to avoid the launch, struck her with considerable violence on the starboard side, doing her considerable injury. Before the collision the Bentinck was loudly hailed to go astern.

The defendants charged the plaintiffs with (1) failing to keep a good look-out; (2) failing to ease or stop and reverse in time; (3) and with improperly and negligently omitting to keep out of the way of the launch.

By way of counter-claim the defendants said:

1. They repeat the several allegations hereinbefore made.

2. The defendants have suffered great damage by reason of the collision, and have thereby made themselves responsible, and have become liable to the owners of the launch for a large sum of money in respect of a breach of their (the defendants') contract with the owners, caused solely by the matters herein complained of.

The plaintiffs replied joining issue on the defence, and denying that the defendants had suffered great damage by reason of the collision, or that they had made themselves responsible or had become liable to the owners of the launch for a large sum of money in respect of a breach of their contract with the owners; and upon this reply issue was joined by the defendants.

April 27.—The action came on for hearing, when viva voce evidence was given on both sides. The allegations in the statement of claim were substantially proved by the evidence for the plaintiffs. The defendants proved that they had conducted a very large percentage of the launches in the river Mersey for upwards of twenty-three years, and had hitherto never met with an accident, and that the mode of conducting a launch as alleged by them was their usual method.

Russell Q.C. (with him W. G. F. Phillimore) for the plaintiffs.—It is laid down in The Blenheim (2 W. Rob. 421) and The Andalusian (2 P. Div. 231) what is the duty of those in charge of a launch to take reasonable precautions. Reasonable precautions in the river Mersey can only be the utmost possible precautions. The precautions in the present case are manifestly insufficient, and the fact that the defendants have never before had an accident is immaterial.

Myburgh Q.C. (with him Bucknill) for the defendants.—It is unreasonable to cast upon shipbuilders the wide duty of taking the utmost possible precautions. It cannot be said that those precautions must be taken which the highest ingenuity can suggest. In The Blenheim (ubi sup.) all that is required is reasonable notice, and in that case, where the circumstances were very similar to the present, those in charge of the launch were held free from blame. The defendants have conducted a very large number of launches for upwards of twenty-three years, and this is their first accident, which shows that hitherto their precautions have been sufficient.

Russell, Q.C. in reply.

BUTT, J.—This case does not to my mind present much difficulty, and the Elder Brethren take the same view as myself. Now the first question is, What is the duty of those in charge of a launch in the river Mersey? and this has been laid down in the case of The Andalusian (ubi sup.). It seems to me that I am bound by that case. I may say I entertain a view quite in accordance with the law as laid down there, and I have no hesitation in stating that that is the law. It is given in these words: "The law throws upon those who launch a vessel the obligation of doing so with the utmost precaution, and giving such a notice as is reasonable and sufficient to prevent any injury happening from the launch; and, moreover, the burden of showing that every reasonable precaution has been taken, and every reasonable notice given, lies upon her and those managing the launch." Mr. Myburgh said that this comes to a question of reasonable precautions as no one is bound to do more than take reasonable precautions, but this is really no more than a change of terms. For what is a reasonable precaution in launching a vessel is in fact the utmost precautions under the circumstances. So, when you set a vessel going, without engines or helm, and with only a tug to manage her, off the ways at the speed of seven knots an hour across the fairway of the river Mersey, the utmost precautions are certainly only reasonable. What, then, are the usual precautions? Now, I venture to say that a usual precaution is to have one tug decorated with a show of flags. This is well known, certainly to all seamen, usually to mean that a launch is taking place. Why this precaution should not have taken place in this instance, I am at a loss to conceive. I am of opinion that they should be taken in all cases of a launch in the Mersey. The defendants chose to trust to something else. Properly enough, no doubt, there were two tugs in attendance, one at the yard, and one out in the middle of the Mersey. Now, as to the decoration of the tugs. When I refer to the evidence of Mr. Potter, one of the defendants, I find he himself says that he thinks it is the custom to have more flags than one to show that the tugs are not engaged in the ordinary way, and that something unusual is going to happen; and if that precaution had been taken it is clear the collision would not have taken place. In The Andalusian it was held that it was the duty of one or other of the tugs to give warning to approaching vessels. What, then, is the state of things here? The United Service, the tug lying out in the river, sees three vessels coming down a mile off; she knows the launch is likely to come across their course, but, as they get nearer, takes no steps to warn them of the launch. This appears to me to be a clear neglect of duty, for this tug might have steamed up and given warning to the approaching vessels. It further appears that Mr. Potter went to a place where he could see if the river was clear in the vicinity, then descended to the platform and within two minutes, the launch, a vessel of great length and tonnage, was in the water. Mr. Potter was in ignorance that three vessels were coming down the river towards the place where the launch must go, and, not knowing this, he gives the order for the launch to be set off. Both the tug masters, however, were aware that three vessels were under way down the river, but they give no warning, which, as I have said, is a neglect of duty. I cannot help thinking that it is negligence on the part of those in charge of a launch to set her going on the ways without taking all steps to be certain that nothing is approaching the place of the launch at the time. [The learned Judge then considered the evidence with regard to the navigation of the Bentinck, and finally pronounced those in charge of the launch alone to blame.]

THE YAN YEAN. (a)

Salvage — Misconduct of salvors — Forfeiture of award—Counter-claim.

Where salvors, having taken possession of a derelict vessel, whose crew had taken refuge on board the salvors' vessel, improperly refused to put back the crew or take the proffered assistance of a tug, although they themselves had no local knowledge, and then brought the derelict to anchor in an improper place, in consequence of which she was lost, the Court, although the ship and cargo were subsequently raised, and realised 3075l., refused to give any salvage remuneration, and condemned the plaintiffs in costs, but dismissed the counter-claim for damages.

THIS was a salvage action instituted by the owners, master, and crew of the steamship Kirkstall against the owners of the steamship Yan Yean, her cargo and freight.

The plaintiffs alleged that on the 3rd April the

(a) Reported by J. P. ASPINALL and F. W. RAIKES, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

Kirkstall, being close to Lavernock Point, fell in with the Yan Yean, signalling for assistance. The crew of the Yan Yean took refuge on a cutter in tow of the Kirkstall. Some of the crew of the Kirkstall then boarded the Yan Yean, and saved her from drifting on to Lavernock point, and took her towards Cardiff, and anchored her on Cardiff Flats. During the night, in consequence of the severity of the weather, the Yan Yean dragged her anchor, came into collision with another vessel, and ultimately foundered. The Yan Yean was subsequently raised by her owners and brought into port.

The material allegations in the statement of defence was that in consequence of the negligence of the Kirkstall's crew in coming alongside the Yan Yean, those on the Yan Yean, fearing she would sink, jumped on board a cutter in tow of the Kirkstall; that the plaintiffs improperly refused to put back the crew of the Yan Yean, or to take the assistance of a tug, although they themselves were not acquainted with the locality; that the plaintiffs brought up the Yan Yean in an improper and exposed place, in consequence of which she sank, and so occasioned great expense to her owners; and that the plaintiffs were not entitled to any salvage remuneration.

The defendants claimed 2000*l.* damages.

The further facts fully appear in the judgment.

The value of the ship and cargo when raised amounted to 3075*l.*

The action came on for hearing on viva voce evidence.

W. G. F. Phillimore for the plaintiffs.—In this case life and property exceeding in value 3000*l.* have been saved. If the conduct of the salvors was improper, it must be criminal before it would work an entire forfeiture:

The Atlas, Lush. 518; 1 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 235; 6 L. T. Rep. N. S. 737.

There is no case in which the conduct of the salvors, being analogous to the present case, all remuneration was forfeited. The refusal of the salvors to take the tug was a mere error in judgment, not sufficient to work a diminution, much less a forfeiture. Dr. Lushington in The Charles Adolphe (Swa. 153) gave salvage where the salvors had refused to allow the master and crew to return to their vessel. If in this case there was any negligence which diminished the value of the res, the salvors will suffer for it, as the court has a smaller value to make an award upon. But undoubtedly the salvors are entitled to some award, seeing that the services have resulted in the preservation of a considerable property, without which services the Yan Yean would have been surely lost. The evidence of misconduct must be conclusive, and the onus of proving it is on the defendants:

The Charles Adolphe (ubi sup.).

Kennedy for the defendants.—All that the Yan Yean required was a towage service, yet the salvors violently took possession of the vessel, and continued their services long after they were necessary. The salvors, knowing nothing of the locality, refused the assistance of the master of the tug and of the master of the Yan Yean, both of whom possessed the requisite knowledge. In this case there are present criminal misconduct, negligence, and consequent loss, which, when combined, are amply sufficient to work a total forfeiture of remuneration:

The Charles Adolphe (ubi sup.);
The Duke of Manchester, 6 Moo. P. C. C. 91.

Independently of the refusal to take assistance, the consequent loss is alone sufficient to work a forfeiture. The Atlas (ubi sup.) is not in point, on the ground that remuneration should be given, because in that case there was no refusal to take assistance.

Cur. adv. vult.

June 26.—Sir JAMES HANNEN.—This is a claim for salvage. The casualty out of which this action arose took place as long ago as the 3rd April 1881. The action was commenced on the 8th April, and was languidly pursued till March 1882, when the statement of defence and counter-claim were delivered, and then, to use the language of the clerk to the plaintiff's solicitors, the action "fell asleep," and so continued till it unfortunately occurred to the plaintiffs in February of this year to awaken it.

The facts are these. The Kirkstall, a screw-steamer of 238 tons register, was proceeding up the Bristol Channel to Newport with a cargo of pig iron. She had a pilot boat in tow, which had been picked up in a disabled condition. At 5 p.m. she was abreast of Lavernock Point, the wind blowing a fresh gale from the east, when she observed farther out in the Channel a vessel, which turned out to be the Yan Yean, a steam barge of 90 tons, bound from Port Talbot, near Swansea, to Bristol, laden with tin plates. The Yan Yean had her head to the west; the sea was breaking over her, and she had become unmanageable. Those on board of her were making signals for assistance by holding up a rope, indicating a wish to be towed. The Kirkstall endeavoured to approach her, and in so doing by an accident, for which I am advised, and think, no blame is imputable to the Kirkstall, the pilot cutter which she had in tow came in contact with the Yan Yean. The captain and all his crew in alarm, immediately jumped on board the pilot cutter, and the Yan Yean was left with no one on board. In this condition she drifted inside of Lavernock Point to the north into comparatively smooth water, where she would have gone on shore on a hard beach, if the master of the Kirkstall had not ordered a boat to be lowered, in which the mate and two of his crew went to the Yan Yean and got on board of her. The evidence is conflicting whether an offer was made to the captain of the Yan Yean to take him on board his vessel, and whether he refused. I am of opinion that no such offer was made; but that, on the contrary, the master of the Yan Yean requested to be taken on board, and that the mate of the Kirkstall refused to take him. Those in the Kirkstall's boat having boarded the Yan Yean let go her anchor, and found that there was very little water in the boiler. The boat was therefore sent back to the Kirkstall to fetch an engineer. The second engineer was accordingly sent, and when the boat was passing the pilot cutter, in which the master and crew of the Yan Yean still were, the master again requested to be taken on board his vessel; but he was again refused. Apart from the questions arising on this refusal, I am of opinion that the Kirkstall had, up to this point, rendered valuable salvage services to the Yan Yean, for which she would have been entitled to substantial salvage remuneration. The second engineer of the Kirkstall attended to the boiler and engines of the Yan Yean, and she was soon in a condition to steam towards Cardiff. Whilst the Yan Yean was at anchor, a steam tug came up and offered to tow the Yan Yean to a safe place at Cardiff for 10*l*. The mate of the Kirkstall refused to give more than 5*l*. He then took the Yan Yean towards Cardiff, and anchored her on the Cardiff Flats. There was no reason why she should not have been taken within the pier-head or the Ely Harbour, in either of which places she would have been in safety. The Cardiff Flats where she was anchored is a place where small vessels are sometimes allowed to take the mud. But it is very exposed, especially to east winds; and I am advised, and think that, as there was nothing to prevent the Yan Yean being taken into a secure berth, it was negligent and unskilful to place her on the flats. On the night of the 3rd April the wind increased to a gale from the east, and the mate and the three men who were in charge of the Yan Yean, becoming alarmed, left her and took refuge on board a vessel called the Varna. The Yan Yean afterwards dragged her anchor to the edge of the drain, or passage through the flat, where she sank. The Yan Yean was afterwards raised at an expense of 125*l*., but her cargo was seriously damaged by being under water.

In these circumstances I was asked to decree salvage remuneration. I have already said that I consider that valuable services were rendered by the mate of the Kirkstall and his companions in going on board the Yan Yean and getting her anchor out before she ran ashore at Lavernock Point; but I do not consider that there was any difficulty or risk in doing this. The mate, however, was guilty of very reprehensible misconduct in refusing to take the master of the Yan Yean on board his ship. He was further not justified in refusing the aid of the tug for so small a sum as 10*l*., as he had not himself the local knowledge which would have enabled him to take the Yan Yean to a place of safety. If the mate had brought the Yan Yean into harbour, I have the authority of Dr. Lushington for holding that the refusal to take the master on board would not work a total forfeiture of salvage remuneration. But in this case there can be little doubt that the ultimate loss arose from the mate's refusal to restore the captain of the Yan Yean, or to accept the aid of the master of the tug, from either of whom he might have obtained the local knowledge, which it is to be presumed he did not himself possess. It was laid down by the Privy Council in the case of The Duke of Manchester (ubi sup.) that, if by the negligence of the salvors, a ship is led into peril as great as that from which she has been rescued, all claim to salvage is forfeited. In this case I am advised that the risk of total loss, if the Yan Yean had been allowed to drift on Lavernock Point was great. But, on the other hand, it is a matter of the vaguest speculation whether the ship and cargo did not sustain as much damage from the sinking in the "drain" as would have resulted from taking the shore at Lavernock Point. As, therefore, the misconduct of the salvors was great, and has resulted in a loss which cannot clearly be seen to be less than that from which the vessel was saved, I am of opinion that the plaintiffs are not entitled to salvage. I do not, however, consider that the circumstances call for the condemnation of the owners of the Kirkstall in damage beyond the forfeiture of salvage; but, as I think that the action ought not to have been brought, the plaintiffs must pay the costs.

THE MARGARET. (a)

Collision—Thames Conservancy Rules, 1880, arts. 22 & 23—Tide—Blackwall Point.

Where a steamship in the river Thames, having come out of dock and being bound down the river, finds herself with the tide against her on the bend of any of the points enumerated in rule 23 of the Thames Conservancy Rules, where the river has begun to curve round, and those on board of her see another steamship in the reach below preparing to round the point with the tide, the first steamship is not bound by the 23*rd rule, as that only applies to the case of a vessel not having reached the point.*

Where a vessel, proceeding down the river against a flood tide and about to round a point under her port helm, is bound to act under rule 23 of the Thames Conservancy Rules, she does not act inconsistently with rule 23 if she ports her helm in compliance with rule 22.

THIS was a damage action in rem, instituted by the owners of the steamship Clan Sinclair, against the owners of the steamship Margaret, to recover damages arising out of a collision between the two vessels off Blackwall Point in the river Thames. The defendants counter-claimed.

The statement of claim, in substance, alleged as follows:—At about 1.30 p.m. on March 9th, 1883, the Clan Sinclair, a screw steamer, of 1911 tons register, and manned by a crew of seventy-five hands all told, left the South West India Dock in charge of a duly licensed Trinity House pilot. The Clan Sinclair proceeded down the river in tow of a steam-tug, being bound for Calcutta, viâ Liverpool, with a general cargo. The weather was fine and clear, the tide last hour's flood, and running about two to two and a half knots an hour, and the wind was a fresh breeze from the N.E. A good look-out was being kept on board the Clan Sinclair. At about 1.34 p.m. the Clan Sinclair was proceeding down the river about mid-channel, under her own steam and with the tug ahead, at a speed of about three to four knots through the water, and was about to round Blackwall Point under a port helm. A steamer, which proved to be the Margaret, was then seen by those on board the Clan Sinclair over the land of Blackwall Point to be coming up the river, and bearing about three to four points on the starboard bow of the Clan Sinclair. The Margaret appeared to be coming full speed round Blackwall Point, as if under a starboard helm, and as though she intended to pass to the south of the Clan Sinclair on her starboard side. When it was seen that the Margaret was rounding the point, the engines of the Clan Sinclair were stopped and reversed full speed, and the tow-rope of the tug was slipped to enable the Margaret to pass to the south of the Clan Sinclair, and on her starboard side, but the Margaret, when she approached the Clan Sinclair, and was still on her starboard bow, ported her helm and attempted to cross the bows of the Clan Sinclair, and coming on at full speed, struck the starboard side of the stem of the Clan Sinclair with her own port side abaft the midships, and did her great damage.

In the statement of defence and counter-claim delivered on behalf of the defendants, the material allegations were as follows:—At about 1.45 p.m. on March 9, 1883, the wind being about E.N.E., the weather fine and clear, and the tide in the last quarter's flood of about two knots force, the steamship Margaret, of 255 tons register, manned by a crew of fifteen hands, and laden with a general cargo, was steaming in mid-channel, up Bugsby's Reach in the river Thames, on a voyage from Boness to London. Her speed was from five to six knots an hour over the ground, her engines were at half speed, and a good look-out was being kept on board her. In these circumstances those on board the Margaret saw the masts of the steamship Clan Sinclair over the land at Blackwall Point, from half to three quarters of a mile off, and about three points on the port bow. The engines of the Margaret were put to dead slow, and shortly afterwards, when the hull of the Clan Sinclair was seen, the helm of the Margaret was ported and her whistle was blown one short blast, and her engines were stopped. At this time the Clan Sinclair, which had a tug attached to her, was on the southern side of the channel, in such a position that it was proper for her and the Margaret to pass each other port side to port side. The Clan Sinclair, however, canted, with her head to port as if under a starboard helm, and the tide took her on her starboard bow and she cast off her tug, and headed for the Margaret, causing danger of collision. When the two vessels were within a ship's length of each other, the Margaret, which had hitherto been kept so as to pass on the port side of Clan Sinclair, had her engines put full speed ahead and her helm hard-a-starboarded to swing her quarter off. But the Clan Sinclair with her stem took the port side of the Margaret abaft midships, doing her so much damage that she shortly sank. The defendants alleged that the plaintiffs had failed to comply with rules 14, 22, and 23, of the Rules and Bye-laws for the Navigation of the River Thames.

In the reply the plaintiffs joined issued on the statement of defence and counter-claim.

The Rules for the Navigation of the River Thames referred to are as follows:

14. Every steam-vessel when approaching another vessel, so as to involve risk of collision, shall slacken her speed, and shall stop and reverse if necessary.

22. When two steam-vessels proceeding in opposite directions, the one up and the other down the river, are approaching one another so as to involve risk of collision, they shall pass one another port side to port side.

23. Steam-vessels navigating against the tide shall, before rounding . . . Blackwall Point, ease their engines and wait until any other vessels rounding the point with the tide have passed clear.

April 28.—The action came on for hearing before the judge, upon viva voce evidence. The main questions in dispute were the speed of the respective steamers, and their respective manœuvres after sighting one another. These questions are fully dealt in the judgment.

Myburgh, Q.C. and Hollams (with them Russell, Q.C.) for the plaintiffs.—The navigation of the Clan Sinclair was seamanlike, and in compliance with the Rules for the navigation of the river Thames. Rule 23, as interpreted by the Court of Appeal in The Libra was not broken by The Clan Sinclair. The circumstances in The Libra (L. Rep. 6 P. Div. 139; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 439; 45 L. T. Rep. N. S. 161) differ in this material circumstance, that from the moment the Clan Sinclair left the dock she was on the point, whereas in The Libra the Libra was coming down the reach which led up to the point. Hence the Clan Sinclair being always on the point, could only absolutely obey the rule by going backwards to the reach above the point. What she did, was to go at the slowest possible speed which would enable her to be under command, and by so doing she did her best to comply with the rule. The navigation of the Margaret was improper, and she alone to blame.

Hall, Q.C. and Phillimore for the defendants.—The Clan Sinclair clearly violated rules 22 and 23. The decision in The Libra lays it down that a steamship navigating against the tide on approaching any of the points named in the rule, is to wait until vessels approaching it with the tide have passed clear of her, the waiting ship. Yet here those on the Clan Sinclair, who avowedly see the Margaret across the point, keep their engines going and never attempt to wait.

BUTT, J.—In considering this matter it is important to remember that these are two ships of very different sizes. The Margaret is a comparatively small steamer of 255 tons nett; the Clan Sinclair is a screw steamer of 1911 tons nett, and she is 355 ft. long between the perpendiculars. This latter is the ship that comes out of the South West India Dock, practically where the curve of Blackwall Point begins, and she has to navigate down against the flood tide, having a tug to assist her.

The first, and possibly the most serious, point that is made against her is this: it is said that whatever else there may be in the mode in which these vessels were navigated, the Clan Sinclair must be held to blame for disobedience of the 23rd rule of the Rules and Bye-laws for the Navigation of the River Thames. It is said that she broke that rule, which provides that "Steam-vessels navigating against the tide shall, before rounding Blackwall Point (for I leave out all the other points), ease their engines, and wait until any other vessels rounding the point with the tide have passed clear." Now it is clear this vessel never had her engines going other that at an extremely easy rate from the time she got into the river, and therefore in one sense at all events she had eased, and she was going down very slowly. But then it is said that is not sufficient. It has been laid down, it is said, in the Court of Appeal, that the meaning of the words of that rule are that a vessel going down against the tide, and meeting one coming up, must ease and bring herself practically to a standstill, and so remain until the vessel coming up shall have passed her, or so far to a standstill as this, that the vessel coming up shall have come round the point and have passed her (the vessel going down) before she has reached the point. The present Master of the Rolls, in The Libra (ubi sup.), lays down the construction to be put on that rule in these words: "All that the 23rd rule says is, when it is likely that they"—that is, the two vessels—"may meet on the point"—that is. as I understand it, anywhere in the bend where there is a serious curve—"the vessel which is going against the tide shall wait. I think the meaning is, that she shall so far check her speed as to prevent her coming up to the point at the same time when the other vessel would come there. The vessel going against tide is not only to wait until the other has passed the point, but to wait until the other has passed her." Now, that is the interpretation put upon this rule in the Court of Appeal, and by one of the judges of the Court of Appeal, who of all others is most experienced in cases of this kind, and had I not liked the decision in this case, but had I entertained any doubt as to its accuracy, I should feel myself bound explicitly to follow it. But as a matter of fact I have no hesitation about the matter, for I think it is entirely in accordance with the true construction of the rule, and in dealing with this case I am not going to depart by a hair's breadth from what is there laid down.

But there is another question which arises, which is this: Does this rule 23 apply to the circumstances of this case? The rule clearly contemplates two vessels in different reaches, and the one coming down and the other coming up, sighting each other across the point, or if not across the point, at all events at a time when one vessel is in one reach and the other in the other, and it contemplates the vessel which has the tide against her stopping in the reach where she is, until the other has passed her. The words of the rule worthy of remark begin in this way: "Steam vessels navigating against the tide shall before rounding the point;" that is to say, it assumes the case of vessels in different reaches and the measures are to be taken before coming to the point. Now the peculiarity in this case is that this large vessel, the Clan Sinclair, has come out of the South West India Dock, and although I do not say she comes out on the pitch of the point, or anything like it, yet she does comes out in a position where she was originally on the bend, and where the river has begun to bend round, and unless she goes astern up the river towards London, instead of pursuing her way seawards, she can never get into the position contemplated by the rule. She cannot stop above the point altogether till the vessel coming up has rounded and passed clear of her. She is not, therefore, within the letter of the rule, and I do not think she is within the spirit of the rule. But this may be, that if she is not in a position to comply entirely and completely with the prescription of the rule, she may still, under the circumstances, do what she can to render obedience to that rule, that is to say, to ease and to wait in the position in which she finds herself. She cannot, as I pointed out, without going astern, wait in the reach above the bend. The nearest compliance she can effect with the rule is to go very easy and wait all she can in the position in which she finds herself. And if the Clan Sinclair did that, I think she will have given as much compliance and as much effect to the rule as she could do. Now I think for the reasons which I will give directly, she did that. I think it is clear that those in charge of her had the rule present to their minds at the time, and that they did what they could to comply with it. Now, let us consider for a moment, that being their intention, what they did to carry out that intention. It appears that the vessel had little way on her from the first, and that she materially reduced it, and had brought herself almost to a standstill at the time when this collision happened, and that is no less apparent from the strong evidence given on her behalf, than, as I think, the bulk of the evidence adduced by those who represent the Margaret. One must not forget one thing. It is suggested that this vessel might have stopped almost immediately outside the South West India Dock entrance, but a large steamer, 355 feet long, and of the tonnage this vessel is, cannot afford to lose way and get out of command in such a place as the river at Blackwall Point. And although she had a tug in attendance to assist her, it is almost a necessity that she should keep her engines moving, and I think, and the Elder Brethren agree with me in this, that that is about all she did on this occasion. [His Lordship then discussed the evidence as to the speed of the Clan Sinclair, and the nature of the blow inflicted on the Margaret, and came to the conclusion that the headway of the Clan Sinclair was practically off her at the time of the collision]. We think, therefore, that so far as a compliance with rule 23 is concerned, there was as much compliance with it as was possible for this big steamer, coming out where she did, and not having been navigated down the reach above, and that she was not in fault for any disobedience to that rule.

But then it is said rule 22 does not conflict with that. It does not necessarily conflict with it, but it would be rather hard to say that a vessel is not only to stop herself dead in the water, but also to use her helm effectually. I am not venturing to find fault with what has been said in the case of The Libra (ubi sup.), but I think it is clear that those on the Clan Sinclair thought it their duty to bring her as near to a standstill as possible. They ported their helm at the same time, and certainly there is no breach of compliance with rule 22 in porting your helm, because, if you can act under it at all, that is what you are bound to do. Therefore in that respect we do not think any blame whatever attaches to the Clan Sinclair. [His Lordship then discussed generally the navigation of both vessels, and came to the conclusion that the Margaret had been recklessly navigated, and pronounced her solely to blame for the collision.]

THE SUNNISIDE. (a)

Salvage—Evidence—Loss of profits—Damage—Practice.

In a salvage action evidence of the loss of profits and damage sustained by the salving vessel is admissible as an element to be considered in awarding remuneration; but evidence of loss of profits is not to be taken in ordinary cases as a fixed figure always to be allowed as in the nature of damages. This rule does not apply with the same force to actual damage sustained. (b)

Where the steamship S., having broken down twelve miles east of Scarborough, was, in twenty-four hours, towed into the Tyne, at different intervals, by the steam trawlers M. and F. A. and the smack S., and the master of the smack S. having entered into an agreement with the master of the steamship S., whereby he was, for the sum of 20*l. to procure assistance, had informed the trawler M. of the whereabouts of the steamship S. only on condition in sharing in the salvage earned by the M., the Court, on a value of* 10,552*l.* 9*s.* 2*d., awarded to the M.* 200*l. in respect of the salvage, and* 100*l. for loss of profits and for repairs, to the S.* 10*l. and to the F. A.* 70*l.*

THESE were salvage actions instituted by the owners, master, and crew of the steam trawler Monarch; by the owners, master, and crew of the smack Sirius; and by the owners, master, and crew of the steam trawler Flying Arrow, against the owners of the steamship Sunniside, her cargo and freight, to recover salvage award. The first two actions were consolidated.

In addition to the facts which appear in the judgment it was proved that the master of the smack Sirius, having fallen in with the Sunniside, agreed, for the sum of 20*l.*, to take a telegram ashore and send off a tug to the assistance of the Sunniside; that he did send the telegram and engaged a tug, the Monarch, but stipulated with the master of the Monarch that he should receive one-third of any salvage remuneration the Monarch might earn, and refused, unless his terms were accepted, to give the position of the Sunniside.

The value of the Sunniside was 10,000*l.*, of her cargo 293*l.*, and of her freight 259*l.*

Gully, Q.C. (with him Bucknill) for the Monarch.

J. P. Aspinall for the Sirius.

W. G. F. Phillimore for the Flying Arrow.

Mgburgh, Q.C. (with him J. Edge) for the defendants.

During the course of the hearing a question arose as to the admissibility of evidence as to the damage and loss of profit incurred by the Monarch, by reason of the services.

Myburgh, Q.C.—Such evidence is inadmissible. Salvors voluntarily give up their earnings and run the risk of damage, owing to the probability of large remuneration if successful. In awarding salvage these two elements are taken into consideration, and if two separate sums are awarded to compensate for loss of profit and damages sustained, the owners of salved property will be paying the salvors twice over in respect of the same thing.

Gully, Q.C. and Bucknill, contra.—In order to enable the court to arrive at what sacrifices have been endured by the salvors, and so award due remuneration, evidence as to loss of profits and damage sustained should be admitted:

The Norden, 1 Spk. 185;
The Salacia, 2 Hagg. 262.

Sir JAMES HANNEN.—I am of opinion that this evidence ought not to be altogether excluded, although perhaps it ought not to be taken into consideration as an exact element of consideration. It is to be remembered that it materially assists the court in arriving at an adequate reward.

The evidence was then given, and after the various parties had been heard, judgment was given as follows:—

Sir JAMES HANNEN.—The material facts to which I have to call attention are these:—On Nov. 7, at 10 a.m., the Sunniside, a steamer bound for Shields, met with the misfortune of her engines breaking down, and though she put up what sail she could, yet she was not able to be steered. The steering gear was not out of order, but she could not get steerage way in the course she was pursuing with the sails she had. Her position was about twelve miles east of Scarborough, and the wind S.W., and, though it varied during the period that we have to consider, it was always off the shore. On Nov. 8, at 9 a.m., the smack Sirius, which had come to the Sunniside, was engaged for some particular purpose to render a service to the Sunniside; what that service was is to some extent, though very little, in dispute. I find in the log of the Sunniside, which has been put in, it is entered "9 a.m., Nov. 8, engaged the smack Sirius, to go to Scarborough to engage a tug." The captain's statement of what he did with the master of the Sirius was as follows: "I engaged him to take a telegram and send a tug," and in cross-examination, when he was asked what passed, he said, "I said to him, will you take a telegram and send me a tug. He said he would for 20*l.* I told him to send me a tug off. I had the telegram ready made out." The only answer which in any degree tends to modify that, is this: "It might be after giving him the telegram that I mentioned sending the tug. When he came with the tug I told him I did not want his services any more." The master of the Sirius' account of it is really not substantially different. He says, "I was to engage a tug;" then he says, in cross-examination, that he saw the telegram which was "I have sent for tug." He also said, "I was to bring the tug. The captain of the Sunniside asked me to bring it. I never refused to give information. I said I would place him where the ship was. I was not asked for any information. I thought I had the right to make the bargain I did." The agreement mentions that he was for 20*l.* to take the telegram; but I come to the conclusion that he saw what that telegram was, and he knew what were its words. I draw the inference from his own statement that he perfectly understood that the service which he was expected to render for that 20*l.*, was not merely to take the telegram ashore and despatch it, but to give information that the ship was in distress, and to direct a tug, if he could find one, to come out to her assistance. In my opinion what he ought to have done would have been entirely within the limits of his rights and duties, viz., to have told the tugman all that he knew. "I have seen a vessel in such and such a position which is in want of assistance and you can go if you like." If he had done that he would not have been called on to do anything more. If he had given this information to the master of the tug, then of course he would have been entitled to make any bargain he pleased, but in doing as he did, in my judgment, he acted quite improperly. For it appears from the evidence of the master of the tug that he came to him and said, "There is a vessel in distress; I shall not tell you anything about it unless you agree to give me one-third." As a matter of fact he did go himself and took his tug with him. This is to be observed with regard to giving information where the vessel was, that it was broad daylight, and they sighted the Sunniside within an hour after starting. Then the Monarch took the Sunniside in tow, and then the Sirius had a rope passed from the Monarch to her, and the Sirius towed or attempted to tow. It is admitted that the master of the Sirius was not asked to do that, and when questions were put to him with regard to whether or not his services were ever disclaimed, whether he was ever told that he need not go on towing, he said, "No, he could not have done that, he could not make me hear." He was ahead of the tug and had the matter in his own hands. There was no possibility of preventing him going on rendering such services as he was rendering. However, the towing in this fashion went on until 1.30 a.m., on Nov. 9, and then, as one of the engines had been got to work to some extent, the Sunniside was making such way that the towing of the Sirius could not be kept up even in appearance, and the Sirius was cast off by those on board the Monarch.

I should observe that in the meantime a little earlier, the Flying Arrow had arrived on the scene, but though she tendered her services they had been refused; but, hoping for the job, she kept accompanying the Sunniside until 4 a.m., when her services were undoubtedly engaged. It is clear, therefore, that the services of the Flying Arrow were accepted, and there seems to have been a reason for it, for the master of the Sunniside says that at that time the wind had shifted, and it had become more difficult to make the Tyne, and I do not doubt that under the influence of those considerations, he engaged the Flying Arrow to assist him. But, then, the next question is, how long did she continue to render any service? and I am sorry to say upon this point, as upon some other points—one in particular—there is a difference in the evidence which has been given which can scarcely be accounted for by the different views which the witnesses take of transactions of this kind. The captain of the Monarch says that the Flying Arrow only towed for ten minutes before her rope broke. The captain of the Sunniside says that she towed for twenty minutes, and those on the Flying Arrow said she towed for a full hour. However, at the end of whatever time it was, the rope broke, and notwithstanding some efforts to get it again—for that is admitted by those on board the Sunniside—they could not get attached again. At 6.30 a.m. the engine had got started again, and then the Monarch was cast off. From that time the Sunniside was able to dispense with any services, and her own engines brought her close to the Tyne. After 6.30 the Monarch never towed again, but was only in attendance, and came up when the Sunniside had got to the harbour, and then, as has been explained, attended on her, being ready to render her service in the navigation up the river, and at about 8.30 the harbour was entered. When entering the harbour the Flying Arrow was again towing, but the question is how long before had she begun to tow. I am sorry to say that this is a point upon which there is a discrepancy among the witnesses; but I come to the conclusion that all the Flying Arrow did was, when the Sunniside had practically completed the process of extricating herself from the difficulty and danger she had been in until she got one engine in working order again, that then the Flying Arrow was attached for the purpose solely of assisting the Sunniside in the navigation up the river. I have described the extent to which I consider these several vessels have rendered services, and I now proceed to say the amount which it appears to me they ought to receive. With regard to the Monarch, I consider that she was the vessel which performed the real salvage service.

The question arose at the hearing yesterday as to the admissibility and effect of evidence of what a salving vessel might earn. I was asked to reject that evidence, but that I did not consider myself at liberty to do, because it appears to me it is admissible in evidence as an element to be considered in determining what remuneration should be paid to a vessel which renders salvage service. But I remain of the opinion I expressed yesterday, after considering it further, that it is not to be taken in ordinary cases as a fixed figure always to be allowed as in the nature of damage, and then to superadd to that the amount for salvage service as distinct. I think they must be considered, under ordinary circumstances, together. There are various reasons which recommend themselves to my mind for that course. It is to be remembered that the reason why so high a rate of remuneration is given to salvage services is because of the sacrifices which the salving vessel makes; but to give, as it were, damages for the sacrifices made, and to give a high rate of salvage remuneration, would be giving that remuneration twice over. As a rule, therefore, it appears to me that the loss of trade, and so on, cannot be taken as an actual figure in the calculation of what the salvage is to be. The same remarks apply, though not with the same force, to the question of damage done. But there is a reason in this case why a distinction should be drawn, and I propose to do it for the purposes of this case only. The master of the Sirius made the bargain I have mentioned, and with this bargain I have nothing to do in this case. I am of opinion that his own evidence shows that in going out with the Monarch he was going out for the purpose of enabling the Monarch to earn that money, of which he was to get a share. I consider that the Sirius services in the matter are reduced simply to the assistance, such as it was, as she was able to render by towing during those hours that she did tow, and for any further remuneration she has cast in her lot with the Monarch, and I have nothing to say to that. But as it would plainly be wrong that, in getting her one-third, she should have one-third of the money which it would cost to put the Monarch in repair again, and as it would plainly be wrong that she should have one-third of any compensation which can properly be attributed to the loss of profits which the Monarch might have made in this case, I propose to discriminate and to mention the sum which I think should be given by way of salvage service, pure and proper, and I fix them for the Monarch at 200*l.*, and I allow 100*l.* beyond for loss of profit and repairs. To the Sirius, in addition to the 20*l.* which she got for this, which is in itself no doubt a salvage service—I am very doubtful myself whether anything more is due, but erring rather upon the side of liberality than otherwise—I assign, in addition to the 20*l.*, 10*l.*, making 30*l.* in all, to the Sirius. With regard to the Flying Arrow, I consider that though she was not able to render a very great service, yet that she did render some salvage services, and for them I allot her the amount of 70*l.*

A question having arisen as to how the costs were to be borne, the learned Judge stated that he would take time to consider it.

June 26.—Sir JAMES HANNEN.—In this case a question has arisen as to costs. I do not propose to allow any separate costs. I have consulted with Butt, J., and I allow one set of costs only to the Monarch and the Sirius.

July 9.—A difficulty having arisen as to the interpretation of the judge's order of the 26th June as to costs, the defendants now applied that the Flying Arrow should not be allowed separate costs. The Judge directed that the Flying Arrow was to be allowed no costs from the delivery of the statement of claim up to the preparation of the brief.

THE ANNA HELENA. (a)

Life and property salvage—Derelict—Amount of award.

In a case of salvage of a derelict the Court, having out of the proceeds of ship and cargo, amounting to 608*l.*, awarded one-half to the salvors of property, awarded 150*l. to life salvors taking off the crew, together with costs to both plaintiffs.*

It is not the general rule in causes, of salvage of derelicts to give one half the value of the property saved, although in some cases where values are small and the services meritorious, it may be proper to do so.

AGAINST the Dutch schooner Anna Helena two actions were instituted, one for salvage of ship and cargo by the owners, master, and crew of the smack John Ellis, the other for life salvage by the owners, master, and crew of the fishing smack Lusty.

(a) Reported by J. P. ASPINALL and F. W. RAIKES, Esqrs. Barristers-at-Law.

On the 6th Dec. 1882 the fishing smack Lusty, 84 tons register and of the value of 1450*l.*, was lying to about 180 miles N.E. by E. from Spurn, when those on board her, at about 1.30 p.m., sighted the schooner Anna Helena flying signals of distress. On coming up with the Anna Helena, she was found to be waterlogged, and in a position of great danger. Her crew at once asked to be taken off. Notwithstanding the heavy sea and bad weather, the salvors at once put out their boat, which after much risk succeeded in bringing off the crew of the Anna Helena. Efforts were then made to save the vessel, but she was lost sight of in a snowstorm. The crew of the Anna Helena were much exhausted from cold, exposure, and want of food. On the morning of the 7th Dec. one of the salvors was washed overboard and lost. The crew of the Anna Helena at their request were taken to Hull. The services lasted from the 6th Dec., 1.30 p.m. till the 9th Dec. 5 a.m. and were rendered during very severe weather. By reason of the services the Lusty lost her fishing.

The Anna Helena was eventually picked up by the smack John Ellis, and after a service of about six days was brought into Shields.

On the 3rd Feb. the life salvors commenced an action in the County Court of Northumberland, holden at Newcastle, but, before any steps were taken, the Anna Helena was arrested under the warrant of the High Court in a salvage action by the salvors of the ship and cargo, and thereupon upon application an order was made by the judge of the High Court to transfer the action to the High Court.

In the action for salvage of ship and cargo on behalf of the John Ellis the Anna Helena was sold and the gross proceeds of sale amounted to 608*l.*, without deducting any marshals's or other expenses.

On the 12th June the action on behalf of the property salvors came on for hearing.

J. P. Aspinall, for the plaintiffs, stated the facts.

Sir J. HANNEN.—I have read the pleadings and the affidavit. The value is small, but the services were rendered at some risk, and it is a case in which I think that half the value should be allowed. I award 304*l.* and costs.

June 26.—The life salvage action now came on for hearing as an undefended action.

It appeared that the marshal's expenses in the action were about 100*l.*, and the plaintiffs' costs in the property salvage action about 60*l.*, so that the sum of 464*l.* was, as matters then stood, payable out of the fund in court.

W. G. F. Phillimore, for the life salvors, submitted that the life salvors were entitled to a substantial reward, and that, as the life salvors were entitled to precedence, it ought to be given without reference to the award to the property salvors.

J. P. Aspinall, for the property salvors, submitted that there was enough to pay the life salvors for the services and costs without affecting the award to the property salvors, and that the award ought not to be such as would affect the property salvors' right.

The court was referred to the following cases:

The Cargo ex Fusilier, 2 Mar. Law Cas. O.S. 177; 12 L. T. Rep. N. S. 186; Br. & L. 341;

The Coromandel, Swa. 205.

Sir JAMES HANNEN.—In a salvage case, recently before me (The Argonaut, June 19, 1883) it may be that I used a hasty expression implying that in the case of a derelict, the rule is to give salvors one-half, and my judgment in favour of the property salvors here might confirm that impression. However, I had no intention of so laying down a general rule. Each case must depend upon its own circumstances. Where values are small and services great, it may be proper to give half, and these circumstances existed in these cases. In this case I certainly think if I had known of this present claim I would not have given the property salvors a moiety. In this case the services are highly meritorious. It is impossible to lay down any general rule in salvage actions, but I think I do justice by allowing 150*l.* and costs, in which sum the personal representatives of the salvor who lost his life are to share.

THE WINSTON. (a)

Collision—Compulsory pilotage—Passing through the limits of a pilotage district—Exemption—The Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 63), s. 41.

Where a steamship is passing through the limits of any pilotage district in the United Kingdom, on a voyage between two places, both situate out of such district, but stops at a port within that district for the purpose of coaling only, the provisions of sect. 41 of the Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act 1862 do not exempt her from compulsory pilotage, the words "loading or discharging" therein mentioned not being confined to cargo.

THIS was a damage action in rem, instituted by the owners of the steamship Warwick Castle, against the owners of the British steamship Winston, to recover damages arising out of a collision between the vessels in Dartmouth Harbour, on the 27th Sept. 1882.

The facts shortly were: That the Warwick Castle, an iron steamship of 1892 tons register, whilst on a voyage from London to South Africa, with a general cargo, was lying in Dartmouth Harbour, when the steamship Winston coming out of the harbour, ran into the Warwick Castle, and did her great damage. The owners of the Winston admitted that the collision was caused by the improper navigation of their vessel, but claimed exemption from liability on the ground of compulsory pilotage. In the plaintiff's statement of claim it was alleged that the pilotage of the Winston was not compulsory, and alternatively, if the Winston was compulsorily in charge of a pilot, the collision was not caused by his negligence, but by the negligence or default of the master, officers, or crew of the Winston.

(a) Reported by J. P. ASPINALL and F. W. RAIKES, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

The defendants in the statement of defence, substantially alleged as follows: The Winston, a screw steamer of 911 tons register, belonging to the port of West Hartlepool, bound, with four passengers on board, on a voyage from New York to Newcastle, and laden with a general cargo, had on the 27th Sept., put into Dartmouth Harbour, and anchored alongside of and loaded from the coaling hulk about twenty tons of coal, which she required, to enable her to proceed on her voyage. On the same day at about 2 p.m., she being then in charge of a duly licensed and qualified pilot, who had previously navigated her into the harbour, weighed her anchor and cast off and proceeded down the harbour. Under these circumstances the collision occurred. All the pilot's orders were obeyed and they caused the collision. Dartmouth Harbour, where the Winston loaded her coals, and where the collision occurred, is a Trinity House out-port district, and a pilotage district, within which the employment of a pilot is compulsory by law. The Winston was not bound to Dartmouth nor to any place within this limit, except so far as she put into Dartmouth in order to obtain coal for the prosecution of her voyage, and she did not discharge or load anything in Dartmouth except the coal.

The plaintiffs admitted that at the time of the collision the Winston was in charge of a duly licensed pilot and in a Trinity House outport district.

The Acts of Parliament referred to in the argument were as follows:—

The Merchant Shipping Act 1854:

379. The following ships, when not carrying passengers, shall be exempted from compulsory pilotage in the London district, and in the Trinity House out-port districts; that is to say . . . . (6). Ships passing through the limits of any pilotage district on their voyage between two places, both situate out of such limits, and not being bound to any place within such limits, nor anchoring therein.

388. No owner or master of any ship shall be answerable to any person whatever for any loss or damage occasioned by the fault or incapacity of any qualified pilot acting in charge of such ship within any district where the employment of such pilot is compulsory by law.

Merchant Shipping Act (25 & 26 Vict. c. 63) 1862:

41. The masters and owners of ships passing through the limits of any pilotage district in the United Kingdom on their voyage between two places, both situate out of such districts, shall be exempted from any obligation to employ a pilot within such district: Provided that the exemption contained in this section shall not apply to ships loading or discharging at any place situate within such district, or at any place situate above such district on the same river or its tributaries.

W. G. F. Phillimore (with him Raikes) for the defendants.—Sect. 41 of 25 & 26 Vict. c. 63, enacts that pilotage shall be compulsory where the vessel loads or discharges within a pilotage district. The circumstances of this case clearly come within that section. The Winston was loading coal in Dartmouth harbour, which is admitted to be a Trinity out port district. It cannot be contended that the words "loading or discharging" do not apply to the case of a vessel taking on board coal for the purposes of her voyage:

Muller v. Baldwin, 2 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 304; L. Rep. 9 Q. B. 457; 30 L. T. Rep. N. S. 864.

The policy of the Legislature is to enact that such vessels as are mentioned in the section shall not be exempt when they are using the port, and clearly a vessel uses a port when she goes in to coal just as much as when she loads or discharges cargo. Again, sect. 388 of the same Act exempts shipowners from liability where the pilot is in charge of the ship "within any district where the employment of such pilot is compulsory by law." Dartmouth harbour is a district where the employment of a pilot is compulsory by law, and therefore the owners of the Winston are entitled to exemption. Inasmuch as at common law no person is liable for the fault of a servant who is forced upon him by the Legislature, and in whose employment he has no choice, this section would be superfluous unless it has the meaning contended for.

Cohen, Q.C. (with him Bucknill) for the plaintiffs.—The words "loading or discharging" must be taken together. Discharging can refer to cargo alone, therefore loading is restricted to the same thing. The argument that the owners of the Winston are protected by sect. 388 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, is disposed of by the case of The Lion (L. Rep. 2 P. C. 525; 21 L. T. Rep. N. S. 41; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 266).

Phillimore, in reply.

Sir JAMES HANNEN.—On the question of fact, I am of opinion that it is established that this collision arose from the negligence or want of skill on the part of the pilot. It has been proved that the pilot was in charge of the vessel, though the mate was on deck ready to do any duties which were incumbent upon him, and that the crew were there also ready to do whatever was necessary. The captain has said that he gave general orders that the directions of the pilot were to be obeyed, and I think that there was no fault imputable to the captain in having left the deck. I think he was justified in leaving the deck to attend to the providing of coals. Unless, therefore, something definite were suggested to my mind which raised the question whether something had been improperly done or something omitted to be done by the crew, I cannot myself indulge in speculations upon the subject, particularly in the absence of any evidence to rebut the evidence of the defendants. Therefore, on this question of fact, I find that the collision was due solely to the fault of the pilot.

With regard to the first question of law, I feel myself bound to follow the decision of the Privy Council in The Lion (ubi sup.), but it is unnecessary for me to discuss that point, as I have formed an opinion in conformity with Dr. Phillimore's argument on the other question. I quite agree, however, with Mr. Cohen that it is difficult to define what the policy of these separate enactments may have been. It is, perhaps, true, as Dr. Phillimore has argued, that the changes of words in the statutes on the subject were made to suit the varying circumstances of shipping, and that the draftsman used phrases applicable to one state of facts without thinking of the difficulties of courts of law to apply them to different states of facts. With regard to the exemption, when the Act spoke of vessels anchoring, the idea was that that was a using of the port by the vessel; but so many vessels would have in passing through the pilotage district necessarily to anchor, that it was felt that that was not a definition of the circumstances that was satisfactory as to this particular section which we have under consideration. It seems to me that the idea was that, in case of a vessel passing through a pilotage district along the coast, that then there is no reason why such a vessel should be required to take a pilot. But, if the vessel were to make use of the port, then it was thought that she should not be exempted from compulsory pilotage. But in this section one only of the objects for which the port is used is referred to, though it might well have been supposed that some such general phrase as I have mentioned would have been adopted, for it is difficult to see why, if the vessel comes into harbour, it should not be compulsory to take a pilot, who has given assurances that he is fit to pilot the vessels, and whose employment gives security to other vessels. But the Legislature has not thought fit to use such a general expression, but uses the words, "loading or discharging at any place situate within such district." Now, as the words are so limited, what is to guide us? The Legislature has not said to what extent or for what purpose the words "loading or discharging" are to be taken. It seems to me (so far as I can see) the proper construction is this—if a vessel makes use of a port for the purpose of loading or discharging anything, whether it be cargo or coals, for the purpose of carrying on the voyage, she brings herself within the terms of the Act, and the obligation lies upon her of taking a pilot. For these reasons I am of opinion that it has been established that the exemption of compulsory pilotage applies in this case.

THE PLANET. (a)

Practice—Sale of ship—Appraisement—Private contract.

In an action for master's wages and disbursements, where the ship proceeded against was subject to other claims by mortgagees and material men, the Court upon motion, no opposition being offered, ordered an official appraisement of the ship to be made, and the ship to be sold by the marshal by private contract for a sum of money not less than the appraisement, upon proof that the mortgagees assented to such sale, and that notice of the motion had been served upon all the claimants.

THIS was a motion by the plaintiff in an action for master's wages and disbursements against the owners of the steamship Planet, for a sale of the ship by private contract.

The action was commenced on the 25th June 1883, in the City of London Court, but transferred by order to the High Court. An appearance was entered for the defendants, who admitted liability, and consented to a reference to assess the amount of their liability.

Five actions for necessaries had also been commenced against the ship, in all of which George Havaldt, a mortgagee, had intervened.

Havaldt was first mortgagee of fifty-four sixty-fourth shares of the ship, and, on the claims being made against the ship, had taken possession of the ship as respects these shares.

Messrs. Zuluetta were first mortgagees of the remaining ten sixty-fourth shares, and were also second mortgagees of the whole ship.

The owner of the vessel was in embarrassed circumstances, and not in a position to satisfy the claim against the ship.

On the 8th July 1883 the solicitors for the plaintiff served the following notice on the other claimants:

We, Stocken and Jupp, solicitors for the plaintiff in this action, give notice that we shall by counsel, on the 16th day of July, 1883 move the judge in court to direct that the plaintiff in this action be at liberty to sell by auction or by private contract, with the approval of the court, the above-named steamship, her tackle, apparel, and furniture, and pay the proceeds of the said sale into court.

July 16.—The plaintiff now moved for the ship to be appraised by the marshal, and sold by private contract for a sum not less than the appraisement.

J. P. Aspinall, for the plaintiff, in support of the motion.—A sale in the manner proposed will be beneficial to all parties interested, as the offer made will most probably considerably exceed the amount which would be realised by a sale by public auction. [Sir J. HANNEN.—I am told by the officials of the court that sale by private contract is entirely opposed to the practice, and that it enables claimants who are dissatisfied to say afterwards that a larger sum might have been realised by public auction.] Although that might be so in most instances, in this particular case, the mortgagees and owners consent and no opposition is offered, although all claimants have been served with notice of motion. The provision that the offer is not to be taken if it be less than the official appraisement precludes any future objection to the amount realised.

W. G. F. Phillimore, for Havaldt the mortgagee, consented.

Vennell, for the owners of the ship, also consented.

Sir JAMES HANNEN.—I have some hesitation in departing from the practice of the court. But in this case, as I think it will be beneficial to the parties, and assuming that the written consent of the second mortgagees and proof of service of notice of this motion on the other claimants be produced to the registrar, I order that the ship be appraised and sold by the marshal by private contract, if he shall think fit, for a sum not less than the appraisement.

THE HEINRICH BJORN. (a)

*Necessaries—Managing owner—Advances—Policy of insurance—*3 & 4 Vict. c. 65, s. 6.

The plaintiffs, shipbrokers, had made advances to the managing owner of a foreign ship for purposes other than the ship. The managing owner applied for a further advance, but the freight of the ship being in the hands of other persons, the plaintiffs refused, but agreed to supply money for necessaries for the ship, provided they could get security for the sums advanced. The plaintiffs handed a cheque for 350*l. to the managing owner as though for the purchase of necessaries, and this cheque the managing owner handed back to the plaintiffs in part payment of the old advance. At the same time the plaintiffs made a further advance of* 200*l. for necessaries to the managing owner, and it was agreed that, in consideration of the amount of the two advances for necessaries supplied, the managing owner should return the amount with interest and charges, and that the plaintiffs should be at liberty to cover the amount by insurance on the ship.*

Held that, under the circumstances, the plaintiffs were entitled to recover so much of 350*l. as had been actually expended in necessaries (semble, because the transaction enabled the managing owner to expend that sum, or part thereof, in necessaries).*

Premiums paid by a shipbroker at the owner's request, to procure insurance on the ship, for the purpose of covering advances for necessaries made by the shipbroker, are not themselves necessaries. (b)

THIS was an action for necessaries by Messrs. C. and C. J. Northcote, shipbrokers, against the Norwegian vessel, Heinrich Bjorn.

At the time the money claimed by the plaintiffs was alleged to have been advanced on behalf of the ship, she belonged to one Gunder Abrahamsen, and was lying in the port of Liverpool. She was subsequently sold to her present owners, the defendants in this action.

The particulars of the plaintiffs' claim were as follows:—

March 25.	To amount paid for premiums on insurance of 650*l.*	68	6	8
	To amount paid to the owners and master of the vessel in respect of disbursements of which the plaintiffs are unable to give the details, which are known to the defendants	550	0	0
March 27.	To amount paid by the plaintiffs in respect of further disbursements not included in the above sum 550*l.*	64	19	6

(b) It is to be noticed that in The Riga (vol. 1, p. 246) Sir Robert Phillimore decided that premiums paid by a shipbroker at the owner's request to procure insurance on freight are necessaries. This is hardly consistent with the present decision. If Sir James Hannen's reasoning on this point be looked at, it would appear to apply with equal, if not greater force, to the facts in The Riga.—ED.

nary course to the managing owner. The defendants admitted their liability in respect of the sum of 64*l.* 19*s.* 6*d.*, as being the amount of a bill of exchange drawn by the master of the Heinrich Bjorn upon the plaintiffs to procure necessaries, and paid the said sum into court.

The plaintiffs alleged that the advances had been expended in necessaries, but did not prove the dates when they were supplied.

The further facts of the case fully appear in the judgment of the court.

June 26.—At the close of the plaintiffs' evidence, Myburgh, Q.C. (with him Pyke) submitted that the plaintiffs had made out no case.—All that has been proved is that money has passed from the plaintiffs to Abrahamsen. There is no proof that this money was expended in necessaries on behalf of the ship. The agreement between the plaintiffs and Abrahamsen no doubt speaks of the advance being for necessaries; but it is submitted that this is not sufficient to give the plaintiffs a lien on the ship under 3 & 4 Vict. 65, s 6. The onus is upon them to prove that the money was actually expended in necessaries. With regard to the first item of the claim, viz., the amount paid for premiums on insurance, it cannot be said that the insurance of a vessel comes within the meaning of necessaries.

Hall, Q.C. (with him Bucknill) for the plaintiffs.—The word "necessaries" is sufficiently comprehensive to include premiums on insurance:

The Riga, 1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 246; 26 L. T. Rep. N. S. 202; L. Rep. 3 Ad. & E. 516.

With regard to the other item, the fact that it was advanced for the purchase of necessaries is sufficient to give the plaintiffs a lien upon the ship. Though the transaction by which the money passed hands may seem strange, that in itself is no bar to the claim, supposing the transaction to have been bonâ fide. The defendants bought the ship with a knowledge of the lien upon her. They stand therefore in the shoes of Abrahamsen. In the agreement between Abrahamsen and the plaintiffs it is stated that the advance is for necessaries. The defendants are therefore now estopped from denying that the money is not recoverable as necessaries. Reference was made to

Cur. adv. vult.

July 23.—Sir JAMES HANNEN.—This is a suit for necessaries supplied to the ship Heinrich Bjorn, a Norwegian vessel. It is sought to be enforced against the defendants, who have purchased the ship since the alleged supply. In March 1882 the Heinrich Bjorn was lying in the port of Liverpool in need of certain necessaries. Gunder Abrahamsen, the then owner of five-sixths of the vessel and managing owner, was indebted to the plaintiffs in 398*l.* on a general account unconnected with the ship, and required a further advance. This the plaintiffs refused to make, and pressed Abrahamsen, who was then in England, for payment. The Heinrich Bjorn was at that time in the hands of Messrs. Broderson, Vaughan, and Co., ship builders of Liverpool, and they had received, or were about to receive, the freight due on the ship's voyage to Liverpool out of which freight they were to disburse the ship. Abrahamsen, in order to induce the plaintiffs to make the further advance he required, proposed, if they distrusted him, to give them a lien on the ship, and to this the plaintiffs agreed.

The manner in which this arrangement was attempted to be carried out was as follows: The sum which was required for the disbursement of the ship for its outward voyage was estimated at 350*l.* Instead of paying 350*l.* of the debt due, and the plaintiff advancing that sum to Abrahamsen for the purchase of necessaries, it was agreed that this amount should be settled in account between them as though this had been done, and to symbolise the arrangement the plaintiffs handed Abrahamsen a cheque for 350*l.* as for necessaries, which he immediately returned to the plaintiffs in discharge of so much of the debt due to them. The plaintiffs made a further advance of 200*l.* to Abrahamsen, and an agreement was then drawn up of the 23rd March, in which it was stated that in consideration of the plaintiffs advancing an amount of about 600*l.* for necessaries supplied to the Heinrich Bjorn, Abrahamsen undertook to return the amount advanced with interest, and all charges on the return of the vessel from her then present voyage, concluded for him by the plaintiffs, and he authorised the plaintiffs to cover the said amount advanced by insurance on the ship, &c., out and home at his cost. The plaintiffs effected this insurance and paid premiums amounting to 68*l.* 6*s.* 8*d.*, and this is the first item in the claim for necessaries now sued for. I am, however, of opinion that premiums for insurance cannot be regarded as necessaries. The expression "necessaries supplied," in the 3 & 4 Vict. c. 65, s. 6, which gave the Admiralty Court jurisdiction over foreign ships, though it is not to be restricted to things absolutely and unconditionally necessary for a ship in order to put to sea (The Perla, ubi sup.) must still be confined to things directly belonging to the ship's equipment necessary at the time and under the then existing circumstances for the service on which the ship is engaged: (The Alexander, ubi sup.) But the insurance of a vessel is something quite extraneous to its equipment for sea, and however prudent it may be for an owner to insure, it is a prudence exercised for his own protection, and not for the requirements of the vessel, which is the sense in which the word necessaries is used in the statute.

With regard to the second head of claim for disbursements, I am of opinion that the plaintiffs are entitled to receive so much of the sum of 350*l.* as was in fact expended in necessaries for the Heinrich Bjorn. The plaintiffs and Abrahamsen attempted to create a charge on the ship for the further amount of 200*l.* advanced to Abrahamsen, and for the balance of the 398*l.* not discharged by the return of the cheque for 350*l.* and for the premiums of insurance. They thought they could do this by treating the whole account as though it were for necessaries, but it was not competent for them to do so. In whatever other way Abrahamsen might have given a charge on the ship on his shares in it, he could not do so by calling things necessaries which were not so in fact. But, assuming that 350*l.* was bonâ fide, required for necessaries, then though the mode of carrying out the arrangement between the plaintiffs and Abrahamsen was peculiar and calculated to excite suspicion, I think that when explained it does establish the plaintiffs' right to recover that amount in this action. If the plaintiffs had advanced 350*l.* in the purchase of necessaries, their right would have been clear, and I do not think that it was necessary that the additional steps should be gone through, first, of Abrahamsen obtaining the freight from the brokers at Liverpool and paying it over to the plaintiffs, and then of the plaintiffs advancing the sum required for necessaries to Abrahamsen. With regard to the amount, it seems probable that the 340*l.* had been correctly arrived at. The defendant's letter of 30th Aug. 1882 shows that he bought Abrahamsen's share in the ship with a knowledge that the plaintiffs asserted a prior claim upon it for 350*l.* I do not, however, think that this precludes him from disputing the amount, and therefore, if it be desired by the defendant, it must be referred to the registrar and merchants to ascertain how much of the 350*l.* was expended in necessaries.

THE THYATIRA (No. 3222).

COCKBAIN, ALLARDICE, AND CO. v. THE OWNERS OF THE THYATIRA AND HER FREIGHT. (a)

Collision—Owners of ship and cargo identical—Advance on account of freight—Assignees of bill of lading—Loss of ship and cargo—Right of action.

Where cargo is shipped on the shipowners' account and money is advanced to them by persons who take as security an assignment of a policy of insurance on the freight, and a bill of lading signed by the master and indorsed by him with a receipt of a sum of money on account of freight named in the bill of lading, and the ship is run down and sunk by the negligence of another vessel, the persons advancing the money as holders of the bill of lading have sufficient interest in the goods and freight to entitle them to recover from the owners of the wrong-doing vessel the sum of money advanced on account of freight.

Where shipowners ship their own goods in their own ship they may, by indorsement of a bill of lading naming the rate of freight, assign under the name of freight the enhanced value of the goods at the port of destination so as to give the assignees a right of action against wrong-doers causing the loss of ship and cargo.

Whether the amount assigned under the name of freight is within the enhanced value is a question for inquiry.

THIS was an action (1882. C. No. 3222. Fo. 283) by Messrs. Cockbain, Allardice, and Co. against the owners of the vessel Thyatira, to recover alleged advanced freight, lost by reason of a collision between the Thyatira and the Atmosphere, the ship in respect of which the freight had been advanced.

The owners of the Thyatira admitted that the collision was due to the wrongful navigation of their vessel. At a reference to the registrar in an action (1882, O; No. 125, fo. 125), by the owners of the Atmosphere to recover for the loss of their vessel the defendants had been found liable for 576*l.* 7*s.* 6*d.* in respect of disbursements to send the vessel to sea, and other sums as advances, &c., to the crew, in all 783*l.* 14*s.*

The Atmosphere and the cargo laden on board of her belonged to the same owners, who had obtained an advance of 1000*l.* from the plaintiffs in the present action, and had given as security an assignment of a policy of insurance on the freight and a bill of lading signed by the master and indorsed by him with a receipt of 1000*l.* on account of freight named in the bill of lading.

The defendants, in the statement of defence, denied that the 1000*l.* advanced was in respect of freight.

The further facts appear sufficiently in the judgment.

June 28.—At the close of the plaintiffs' case, Grilly, Q.C. and Bucknill submitted that the evidence failed to prove the plaintiffs' right to recover. There has been no advanced freight, and the shipowner cannot by taking out a policy upon something he calls advanced freight thereby create advanced freight. All that happened was a loan by the plaintiffs, and the shipowners, to give security, take out a policy upon so-called advanced freight. The profit which the shipowner hopes to get from carrying his own cargo in his own ship is necessarily a speculative one, and dependent upon the rise and fall of the market where the cargo is sold. This cannot be recovered from the defendants:

The Parana, 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 399, 220; 2 P. Div. 118; 36 L. T. Rep. N. S. 388; 35 L. T. Rep. N. S. 32.

Again, in another action brought by the owners of the Atmosphere against the Thyatira 783*l.* 14*s.* has been recovered for disbursements. The defendants cannot also be made liable for freight.

Cohen, Q.C., with him Pollard, for the plaintiffs.—Whatever the 1000*l.* loss be called, it was so much in the nature of advanced freight that the plaintiffs are entitled to recover it under that name, and were justified in insuring it under that name:

Flint v. Flemyng, 1 B. & Ad. 45;
Hall v. Janson, 4 E. & Bl. 500; 24 L. J. 97, Q. B.

If the cargo owner and shipowner had been different persons, the defendants would have had no defence, and how can the fact of the cargo owner and shipowner being the same person affect their liability? The case of The Parana (ubi sup.) is not in point, because here there is no question of accidental variation in price of market, the sum claimed being beyond doubt within the profit which must have been made. This case also differs in being a claim against a wrong-doer, and in such cases it has ever been the policy of the law to exact compensation to the uttermost farthing.

Cur. adv. vult.

July 10.—Sir JAMES HANNEN.—Messrs. S. Vaughan and Co. were the owners of the ship Atmosphere in which they shipped a cargo of 1650 tons of their own coal from Liverpool to Valparaiso. The price of coal at Liverpool was 9*s.* per ton, and it would have fetched from 30*s.* to 33*s.* per ton at Valparaiso. Messrs. S. Vaughan and Co., desiring an advance of 1*l.* per ton on this cargo, the plaintiffs, Messrs. Cockbain and Co., agreed to make it on the terms that Messrs. S. Vaughan and Co. should hand them "bills of lading together with policies of insurance to cover them in case of loss." This arrangement was carried out in the following manner. The master of the Atmosphere signed bills of lading for 1650 tons of coal deliverable to Messrs. S. Vaughan and Co., or assigns, they paying freight at the rate of 23*s.* per ton, and he indorsed on the bill of lading a receipt for 1000*l.* on account of freight. An insurance was effected in the Thames and Mersey Marine Insurance Company, described as "advanced freight, valued at 1000*l.*" This policy, together with another on cargo and the bill of lading, duly indorsed, were handed to the plaintiffs on their making an advance of 1650*l.* The Atmosphere, while on her voyage to Valparaiso, was run down and sunk by the Thyatira.

This action is brought by the plaintiffs against the owners of the Thyatira to recover compensation for the loss occasioned to them by the sinking of the Atmosphere, "whereby," as alleged in the statement of claim, "the said advanced freight of 1000*l.* became and was wholly lost." The action is in fact brought for the benefit of the insurance company, who have paid the amount of 1000*l.* insured by them. This, however, can in no way affect the rights or liabilities of the parties in this action. The defendants deny their liability to the plaintiffs, contending that no freight in advance was in fact paid, and so that none has been lost. If Messrs. Vaughan and Co. had had on board the Atmosphere a cargo belonging to other persons they would not have had the cargo, together with the freight to be earned by carrying it, to offer as security for the proposed advance, but as they were the owners of the cargo they had not any claim to freight, properly so called, to offer as security. They had, however, the prospective benefit to be derived from the carriage of the coal in their own ship; that is, the enhanced value of the coal when conveyed to the port of delivery, and this, though not strictly freight, is so like it that it has been held (Fint v. Flemyng, 1 B. & Ad. 45) that it may be insured under that name. It was perfectly competent for Messrs. S. Vaughan and Co. to transfer the benefit of this enhanced value under any name whatsoever to the plaintiffs. If it be regarded from the point of view of the shipowner, it is freight; but if regarded from the point of view of the cargo owner, it is freight paid in advance, because the holder of the bill of lading would have been entitled to receive the cargo at Valparaiso without paying any freight. The plaintiffs, who are the holders of the bill of lading, have been deprived of this benefit by the wrongful act of the Thyatira, and for this they are entitled to compensation. What is the proper amount of that compensation? It is not to be computed according to the rate of freight mentioned in the charter-party, because that might only be an imaginary sum exceeding what would have been obtained as freight, or as increased value by reason of not having to pay freight, but there is nothing to contradict the evidence that the enhanced value of the cargo at Valparaiso would have been at least 21*s.* per ton, or 1732*l.*; more, in fact, than the amount sought to be recovered in this action as the equivalent for advanced freight. It cannot, therefore, be contended that the benefit which would have been derived from carrying the cargo to Valparaiso is estimated in this action at an exaggerated amount.

The case of the Parana (ubi sup.) was relied on by the defendants. It was there held that damages cannot be recovered for delay in the carriage of goods on a long voyage by sea, where there has been an accidental fall in the price between the time when the goods ought to have arrived and the time when they did arrive. But no question of rising or falling market occurs in this case. The plaintiffs' estimate of loss is not based on the highest price that could in any circumstances be obtained at Valparaiso, but on uncontradicted evidence that that which they have lost, namely, the increased value of the cargo free of freight, would have been far more than the 1000*l.* claimed in this action. It was further contended by the defendants that, if the 1000*l.* now claimed is to be regarded as freight, Messrs. S. Vaughan and Co. have claimed, in another action brought by them against the Thyatira and her owners, the disbursements made in order to earn the so-called freight, and that the defendants ought not to be called on to pay both disbursements and freight. This however is no defence to this action, in which the plaintiffs are suing as holders of the bill of lading, and cannot be prejudiced by what has passed without their concurrence between Messrs. S. Vaughan and Co. and the defendants. Messrs. S. Vaughan and Co. are not before me on this occasion, and I therefore abstain from expressing an opinion whether they are or are not entitled to recover the disbursements they claim.

THE CLAN MACDONALD. (a)

Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. 63), s. 67—Landing—Warehousing charges—Notice to consignees—Duty of shipowner.

The 7th sub-section of the Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act 1862, s. 67, entitling the owner of goods to twenty-four hours' notice in writing of the shipowner's readiness to deliver the goods does not apply where the goods are landed under sub-sect. 6 of the same section for the purpose of convenience in assorting the same.

In such latter case it is the duty of the owner of goods, who receives notice that the goods landed under sub-sect. 6 of the same section are ready for delivery, to take them within a reasonable time after the notice, and, if he fails to do so, he will be liable for the charges occasioned by his delay.

Notice to a lighterman employed to take the goods is notice to the owner of the goods.

The steamship M. having arrived, on the 12*th Dec., in dock in the port of London, with a general cargo, began to unload on the quay on the* 13*th, and had unloaded a portion of cargo belonging to certain consignees, when their lighter arrived to receive their cargo. On the* 14*th the lighterman and lighter again attended, but could get no* information as to when the particular cargo would be delivered. On the 14th the owners of the M. received a letter from the firm of lightermen employed by the consignees, stating that they had made application at the M. for delivery of their cargo, and that they refused to be liable for any dock or landing charges, the cargo having been shipped under a bill of lading directing it "to be delivered from the ship's tackles." On the 15th, the landing and sorting of the cargo being completed, the plaintiff's lighterman was informed that the cargo would be delivered to him the next day. The goods were not taken away until the 29th, when the plaintiffs paid the dock company's charges under protest.

In an action by the assignees against the shipowners to recover such sum the Court held that, inasmuch as the plaintiffs had had notice on the 15th that they could have the goods on the following day, they had been guilty of unreasonable delay in not taking delivery before the 29th, and could not recover the dock charges from the shipowners.

THIS was an action by assignees of cargo against the owners of the steamship Clan Macdonald to recover 26*l* 12*s*., dock charges incurred through the alleged default of the defendants.

The action had been instituted in the City of London Court, but had been transferred to the High Court.

The facts and points in dispute sufficiently appear from the judgment of Sir James Hannen.

July 12.—At the hearing the defendants attempted to prove that the discharge of the cargo was effected according to the custom of the port of London, with regard to the discharge of vessels in dock, viz., by the cargo being unloaded by the dock company's servants, and by them landed upon the dock quay, and sorted ready for removal by the parties entitled to take delivery of the goods from the vessel. This alleged custom the evidence failed to establish.

Bucknill for the plaintiffs. — The contract between the shipowner and the owners of cargo is contained in the bill of lading. It is there said that the jute is "to be delivered from the ship's tackles." The defendants, for no valid reason, have chosen to disregard the bill of lading, and have landed the goods on the quay. They are therefore liable for any charges arising out of their so acting:

Marzetti v. Smith, W. N. 1883, p. 119.

No satisfactory evidence has been given of any custom to establish their right to violate the bill of lading, and land the jute on the quay. Our lighter attended two consecutive days, and yet could get none of the cargo, the defendants insisting upon landing the whole upon the quay. Wilson v. London, Italian, and Adriatic Steam Navigation Company, Limited (L. Rep. 1 C. P. 61; 13 L. T. Rep. N. S. 435; 2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 279) decides that 25 & 26 Vict. c. 63, s. 67, does not empower shipowners to land all the cargo, because part has been landed before the consignees are ready to take delivery. Even assuming that 25 & 26 Vict. c. 63 s. 67, applies, the plaintiffs are entitled to succeed. Under sub-sect. 7, under the circumstances of this case, the shipowner is bound to give twenty-four hours' notice in writing of his readiness to deliver the goods. This he has not done. The mere verbal notice to the lighterman is not sufficient, nor is the letter of the 16th the notice contemplated by the Act.

Pollard for the defendants.—This case is governed by the 67th section of 25 & 26 Vict. c. 63. The sub-sections there enumerated are only to apply when there has been a failure on the part of the goods owner to make entry, or having made entry to land or to take delivery of the goods. The owner of the goods has failed to take delivery:

The Energie, L. Rep. 6 P. C. 306; 2 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 555; 32 L. T. Rep. N. S. 579.

The sub-section which applies is the 6th, and not the 7th, that applying to the cargo being discharged overside. But here, as contemplated by the 6th sub-section, the goods were landed for assortment. All that the 6th sub-section requires is that the goods shall, if demanded, be delivered to the owner within twenty-four hours of assortment, and this we were ready to do. Even assuming that the 7th sub-section applied, would this entitle the owners of the goods, after it had come to their knowledge that they could have the goods, to leave them at the dock for any length of time at the shipowner's expense?

Bucknill in reply.

Cur. adv. vult.

July 23.—Sir JAMES HANNEN.—The plaintiffs were owners of a consignment of jute in the ship Clan Macdonald, under bills of lading containing the following clauses: "500 bales of jute, to be delivered subject to the exceptions and conditions hereinafter mentioned, and from the ship's tackles." "The goods are to be discharged from the ship as soon as public intimation shall be given that she is ready to unload, and if not thereupon removed without delay by the consignee, the master or agent is to be at liberty to land the same, or, if necessary, to discharge into hulk, lazaretto, or hired lighters, at the risk and expense of the owners of the goods." The ship arrived in the East and West India Docks on the 12th Dec., and began to unload on the 13th. The whole of the cargo, which was a general one, was landed on the dock quay, and there sorted. Twelve of the bales of jute were landed on the morning of the 13th, and on the afternoon of that day the lighterman employed by the plaintiffs attended with a barge to receive the jute, but was informed that it was not ready, and that the whole cargo would be landed. On the 14th the lighterman again attended, but could get no further intimation as to when the jute would be delivered. The cargo was then being discharged, and parcels of the jute, as they were come to, were from time to time landed on the quay, and there sorted. On the 14th the plaintiffs wrote the following letter to the defendants: "We have made application at the ship Clan Macdonald for delivery of 500 B/, 80 B/, and 115 B/, jute marked respectively E P  , but, having failed to obtain delivery or correct information of the time when delivery could be given, we have lodged on board the usual notices, duplicate of which we inclose." The inclosed notice was as follows: "To the owners of the ship Clan Macdonald. With reference to the 500 bales jute per the above vessel as per particulars at foot, we hereby give you notice that in compliance with the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act 1862, we have made due entry and sent craft (with documents in proper order) alongside the above-named vessel, and have offered and been ready to take delivery of the above-mentioned goods, and you having failed to make such delivery, and you having also failed at the time of our said offer to give us correct information of the time when such goods can be delivered, we hereby give you notice, and require you to give us twenty-four hours' notice in writing of your readiness to deliver the said goods; and further, that we will not be responsible for any dock or landing charges on the same. And we give you further notice that in the event of any further default in making complete delivery at the proper time of the aforesaid goods, we shall claim from you 12*s.* 6*d.* per day for detention of lighterman and craft, whether such detention be caused by your making default in delivery at the proper time of a part of such goods, or of the whole quantity thereof." To this the defendants replied as follows: "We return documents received from you this morning. The dock company state that every despatch is being given your craft alongside our steamers Clan Macdonald and Clan Mackenzie, and further state that if any delay is caused it is caused on account of your not having sufficient men to receive the goods. We can, therefore, admit of no liability in the matter." Some further correspondence followed, and on the 16th the defendants wrote as follows: "Your favour of yesterday to hand inclosing documents, which we again beg to return, as we can admit of no liability in the matter. On making further inquiries of the dock company, we are informed that they arranged with your man to go at 8 a.m. this morning, and that up to 12.30 neither the man nor the craft had put in an appearance." On the 15th the landing and sorting of the cargo was completed, and the plaintiffs' lighterman was informed on the afternoon of that day that the jute would be delivered to him on the following morning, and that a gang of men would be in attendance to deliver the goods into his barge. The men were in fact ready to do so, but the lighterman did not attend. If he had attended at any time during business hours on the 16th the jute would have been delivered to him free of charge; but, as the goods were not taken away on the 16th, the dock company from that time held them for charges, without payment of which the goods could not have been delivered. The goods were not taken away until the 29th, when the dock company's charges had amounted to 26*l.* 12*s.* This sum was paid by the plaintiffs, and they now seek to recover it from the defendants.

The plaintiffs contend that the defendants were bound, under the terms of the bill of lading, to deliver the jute over the side of the ship, and that having neglected to do so, and landed the cargo, they remained liable for any charge to which the jute was subject, unless they had given twenty-four hours notice in writing that it was ready for delivery. The defendants, on the other hand, allege that the cargo was discharged according to the custom of the port of London with regard to the discharge of vessels in port, viz., by the cargo being unloaded by the dock company's servants, and by them landed upon the dock quay, and sorted ready for removal by the parties entitled to take delivery of the goods from the vessel. They further rely upon the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act 1862, sect. 67. The alleged custom was not established by the evidence. The real question in dispute between the parties, as appears from the correspondence, turns on the proper construction and application of the 67th section of the Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act of 1862. By that section it is enacted that "when the owner of any goods imported in any ship from foreign parts into the United Kingdom fails to make entry thereof, or having made entry thereof, to land the same or take delivery thereof, and to proceed therewith with all convenient speed by the times severally hereinafter mentioned, the shipowner may make entry of and land or unship the said goods at the times in the manner and subject to the conditions following." Then follow seven sub-sections setting forth various cases in which the section becomes applicable. The 6th and 7th are the material ones, which enact (6) "If any goods are, for the purpose of convenience in assorting the same, landed at the wharf where the ship is discharged, and the owner of the goods at the time of such landing has made entry and is ready and offers to take delivery thereof, and to convey the same to some other wharf or warehouse, such goods shall be assorted at landing, and shall, if demanded, be delivered to the owner thereof within twenty-four hours after assortment; and the expenses of and consequent on such landing and assortment shall be borne by the shipowner. (7.) If at any time before the goods are landed or unshipped the owner thereof has made entry for the landing and warehousing thereof at any particular wharf or wharehouse other than that at which the ship is discharging, and has offered and been ready to take delivery thereof, and the shipowner has failed to make such delivery, and has also failed at the time to give the owner of the goods correct information of the time at which such goods can be delivered, then, the shipowner shall, before landing or unshipping such goods, under the power hereby given to him, give to the owner of the goods or of such wharf or warehouse as last aforesaid twenty-four hours' notice in writing of his readiness to deliver the goods, and shall if he lands or unships the same without such notice, do so at his own risk and expense."

The first question which arises on this section is the meaning of the words, "When the owner of any goods fails to make entry and to take delivery thereof and to proceed thereof with all convenient speed." These words no doubt include a case of default on the part of the owner of goods to take delivery of them, but they also apply to cases in which the goods owner is not in default, where he from any cause fails to obtain delivery. This is pointed out in the case of The Energie (ubi sup.). It is there said: "Their Lordships conceive that the word 'failed' need not be taken to imply wilful default in the cargo owner, but that, upon the true construction of the section, the shipowner is at liberty to land the goods under it whenever the delivery of them to the owner within the proper time has been prevented by the force of circumstances, whether the latter is or is not to blame. They think that this construction is justified by some of the provisions of the section, which in certain cases throw the cost and expense of the landing upon the shipowner." I do not think in the present case there was any wilful default on the part of the goods owner, but in fact he had no barge in attendance to take delivery of this jute when the first twelve bales had to be disposed of, and, in considering the question which afterwards arose, it is to be remembered that if the jute had been delivered overside it would have caused the detention of the barge during the whole time that the ship was being discharged, because the bales came to hand at intervals down to the end of the three days during which the unloading was proceeding. But I am of opinion that there was a failure on the part of the goods owner to take delivery by the time mentioned in the 6th sub-section of the 67th section, that is, the time when it becomes necessary for the purpose of convenience in assorting the goods to land them at the wharf. The shipowner was therefore entitled under that sub-section to land the jute at his own expense, and he became bound within twenty-four hours after assortment to deliver them to the goods owner if demanded. This would have been on the 16th, and if the plaintiffs had demanded the goods on that day they would have received them without charge. On the other hand, it was the duty of the plaintiffs to take delivery of the goods within a reasonable time after they knew that they could receive them. This would not necessarily be on the 16th, and, if the plaintiffs had been in ignorance that they could receive them on the 16th, I should not consider that their failure to demand them within twenty-four hours after their assortment would render them at once liable to the charges arising from their remaining on the dock quay. But it is clear that the failure of the plaintiffs to take delivery did not arise from ignorance that they could have the goods, but from a preconceived determination to try the question whether or not they were entitled to insist on a twenty-four hours' notice in writing under the 7th sub-section of the 67th section. I am of opinion that where goods are landed under the 6th sub-section the 7th is not applicable. That sub-section relates to the case of a vessel discharging overside where the necessity to land for sorting does not arise. Even if the 7th sub-section were applicable, I do not think it would make any difference in the position of the parties. Where the several conditions enforced on the goods owner by the 7th sub-section have been complied with, it becomes the duty of the shipowner to give the goods owner twenty-four hours' notice in writing of his willingness to deliver the goods, with the consequence that if he lands or unships the goods without such notice, he does so at his own risk and expense. But this does not mean that the goods are to remain at his risk and expense for any time that the goods owner thinks fit to leave them at the wharf, though he has notice that he may receive them by sending for them; and there is no necessity for this notice being in writing. The notice in writing referred to in the 7th sub-section is only required as a condition of the shipowner's right to land the goods at the goods owner's risk and expense. If without this notice the goods are landed, this would be done at the shipowner's risk and expense, but the duty of the goods owner remains to take away the goods within a reasonable time after he has notice, whether written or verbal, that he can receive them. In the present case notice was given to the lighterman on the 15th that he might have the goods on the 16th, and I have no doubt that he knowingly left the officers of the dock company under the impression that he would then come and fetch them, but being aware of the dispute which had arisen as to the necessity for a written notice, he abstained from going to receive the goods.

It was contended for the plaintiffs that the lighterman was not their agent to receive notice when the goods would be ready for delivery, but I am of opinion that, as he was sent by the plaintiffs to receive the goods, information as to the time when they would be delivered was so connected with the service for which he was employed that the plaintiffs are bound by the notice given to him. But, in any case, the letter of the 16th did give the plaintiffs notice that they could receive the goods by sending for them. The plaintiffs were bound to act on this notice within a reasonable time, but the correspondence shows that the plaintiffs refused to act upon this, or any notice other than some special twenty-four hours' notice in writing, to which they considered themselves entitled under the 7th sub-section. The charges, therefore, to which the goods became subject, arose, not from the plaintiffs' ignorance of the time when they could receive the goods, but from their voluntarily allowing them to become and remain subject to charges in order that they might test their view of the law, in which I consider them mistaken. I am therefore of opinion that the defendants are entitled to judgment with costs.

Solicitor's lien—Salvage—Italian Code—Priority—Seamen's wages—23 & 24 Vict. c. 127, s. 28—17 & 18 Vict. c. 104, s. 205.

Solicitors for defendants in a salvage action against a foreign ship, who are entitled to a charge upon the ship, or the proceeds thereof, for their costs and expenses incurred in the preservation of the property, do not take priority of the claim of the foreign Government, who, on the abandonment of the ship by her owners, are entitled, by the provisions of their Code, to a lien upon the ship, or the proceeds, for the expenses of sending back the ship's crew to their own country.

An Italian ship was brought into a British port by salvors. A salvage action having been instituted, the ship was sold by order of the court, and a sum was awarded out of the proceeds to the salvors. After payment of that sum, and the costs of the plaintiffs, a balance of 60*l.* 10*s.* 3*d. remained in court. The defendants' solicitors had incurred expenses in pumping the ship, paying the marshal's possession fees, &c., and claimed a* charging order upon the balance in court for such expenses, and sought payment out of such balance to them. The Italian Government, through their consul in this country, had sent home the crew of the ship, and had incurred expenses by so doing. By Italian law such last-mentioned expenses are a lien upon the ship. The Italian consul opposed payment out to the defendants' solicitors, and claimed priority for the lien of the Italian Government.

Held, that the Italian Government was entitled to such priority.

THIS was an application in a salvage action against an Italian brig by the defendants' solicitors for payment out of 60*l.* 10*s.* 3*d.* (being the remainder of the proceeds of the ship in court) in satisfaction of their costs.

The ship was brought into an English port by salvors, and at their suit she was arrested, and an action instituted against her.

After the institution of the action the ship was definitely abandoned by her owners as a total loss.

The ship was sold by order of the court, and the proceeds paid into court. On the hearing of the action on the 30th Jan. 672*l.* was awarded. After payment from such proceeds of the amount awarded for salvage, together with the plaintiffs' costs of action, the balance remaining in court amounted to 60*l.* 10*s.* 3*d.*

The crew of the Livietta had been, in accordance with the provisions of sect. 56 of the Italian Code, sent back to Italy by the Italian consul in London, and the expenses thereby incurred were paid by the Italian Government, who were opposing the present application on the ground that they were entitled by virtue of the provisions of the Italian Code to a lien upon the proceeds in court in respect of the cost of sending the crew back to Italy, such cost amounting in all to 62*l.* 7*s.* 4*d.*

The defendants' solicitors, who had been instructed by the agents of the Italian underwriters to whom the ship had been abandoned, were now applying for payment of their costs out of the fund in court. The defendants' solicitors had incurred expenses by giving a personal undertaking that bail should be put in by paying the marshal's possession fees, and by pumping the ship, &c.

The sections of the Italian Code referred to are as follows:

Art. 56. The owners and charterers are also responsible jointly for payment of the taxes and other maritime dues, for premiums and wages, and for retention of wages due to the cassa degli invalidi of the mercantile marine for the expenses of board and return to their country of the men composing the crew, and for every outlay made on their behalf by Government agents if such expenses are to be chargeable against the ship.

The liability to refund the expenses of board and return to their country of the men forming the crew ceases in cases of shipwreck and abandonment of the vessel, but repayment of the same shall be effected out of the salvage or the value thereof with privilege, according to the terms of article 133.

For reimbursement of the expenses referred to in this article, harbour masters may issue injunctions, which shall be rendered executory by decree of the President of the Civil Tribunal saving appeal to the said tribunal within the term of twelve days, and on payment of the amount, for which the appellant must produce a receipt attached to his appeal, without which it will be inadmissible.

Art. 133. Out of the proceeds of the sale of the ship and cargo will be privileged in the following order: First, the expenses of sale; secondly, the expenses of salvage and safe keeping of the effects wrecked, including the remuneration of the persons who effected the salvage, and the expenses of conveyance of the harbour employés.

Out of the residue of the ship, and out of the freight, will be privileged the keep of the captain and crew, indemnities for their return to their country, and the wages of the said crew, and afterwards privileged debts in accordance with the commercial laws.

The 205th section of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104) referred to in the case, is as follows:

Wherever any British ship is transferred or disposed of at any place out of her Majesty's dominions, and any seaman or apprentice belonging thereto does not in the presence of some British consular officer, or if there is no such consular officer there, in the presence of one or more respectable British merchants residing at the place, and not interested in the said ship, signify his consent in writing to complete the voyage if continued; and whenever the service of any seaman or apprentice belonging to any British ship terminates at any place out of Her Majesty's dominions, the master shall give to each such seaman or apprentice a certificate of discharge in the form sanctioned by the Board of Trade as aforesaid, and, in the case of any certificated mate whose certificate he has retained, shall return such certificate to him, and shall also, besides paying the wages to which such seaman or apprentice is entitled, either provide him with adequate employment on board some other British ship bound to the port in Her Majesty's dominions at which he was originally shipped, or to such other port in the United Kingdom as is agreed upon by him, or furnish the means of sending him back to such port, or provide him with a passage home, or deposit with such consular officer, or such merchant or merchants, as aforesaid, such a sum of money as is by such officer or merchant deemed sufficient to defray the expense of his subsistence and passage home; and such consular officer or merchants shall indorse upon the agreement of the ship which the seaman or apprentice is leaving the particulars of such payment, provision or deposit; and if the master refuses or neglects to comply with the requirements of this section, such expenses as last aforesaid, if defrayed by such consular officer, or by any other person, shall, unless such seaman or apprentice has been guilty of barratry, be a charge upon the ship to which such seaman or apprentice belonged and upon the owner for the time being thereof, and may be recovered against such owners with costs, at the suit of the consular officer or other person defraying such expenses, or, in case the same has been allowed to the consular officer out of the public moneys, as a debt due to Her Majesty, either by ordinary process of law, or in the manner in which seamen are hereby enabled to recover wages; and such expenses, if defrayed by the seaman or apprentice, shall be recoverable as wages due to him.

The 28th section of 23 & 24 Vict. c. 127, referred to, is as follows:

In every case in which an attorney or solicitor shall be employed to prosecute or defend any suit, matter, or proceeding in any court of justice, it shall be lawful for the court or judge before whom any such suit, matter, or proceeding has been heard or shall be depending, to declare such attorney or solicitor entitled to a charge upon the property recovered or preserved, and upon such declaration being made such attorney or solicitor shall have a charge upon, against, and a right to payment out of the property, of whatsoever nature, tenure, or kind the same may be, which shall have been recovered or preserved through the instrumentality of any such attorney or solicitor, for the taxed costs, charges, and expenses of or in reference to such suit, matter, or proceeding; and it shall be lawful for such court or judge to make such order or orders for taxation of and for raising and payment of such costs, charges, and expenses out of the said property as to such court or judge shall appear just and proper; and all conveyances and acts done to defeat, or which shall operate to defeat, such charge or right, shall, unless made to a bona fide purchaser for value without notice, be absolutely void and of no effect as against such charge or right; provided always, that no such order shall be made by any such court or judge in any case in which the right to recover payment of such costs, charges, and expenses is barred by any Statute of Limitations.

July 30.—At the hearing it appeared that the defendant's solicitor had obtained a charging order from the judge without all the facts being before him, and it was thereupon agreed that the matter should be argued as if no such order had been obtained.

W. G. F. Phillimore in support of the solicitors' application.—The 23 & 24 Vict. c. 127 gives solicitors a charge upon property recovered or preserved by their instrumentality. In this case property has been preserved by the solicitors. Dr. Lushington has in several cases preferred the solicitor's claim to others of very high rank. The solicitor's should be preferred on the principle that the last lien takes precedence of all others, because without it the other liens would be lost:

The Soblomsten, L. Rep. 1 Ad. & Ec. 293; 2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 436; 15 L. T. Rep. N. S. 393;
The Jeff Davis, 2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 555; 17 L. T. Rep. N.S. 151; L. Rep. 2 Ad. & Ec. 1;
The Heinrich, L. Rep. 3 Ad. & Ec. 505; 1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 260; 26 L. T. Rep. N. S. 372.

J. P. Aspinall, contra, on behalf of the Italian Government.—None of the cases quoted support the priority of the solicitors' charge to the claim of the Italian Government. They no doubt are cases where the solicitor's claim took high rank, but the circumstances were very different from the present. Moreover, the Legislature never contemplated including such a case as the present under 23 & 24 Vict. c, 127, s. 28. In the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, s. 205, we find a provision, very similar to the provision in the Italian Code, empowering the British consul to send home British sailors under circumstances like the present, and giving the consul a charge upon the ship for the money so expended. The money so expended is in the nature of viaticum, and as such has always taken high rank in the Admiralty Court. By way of reciprocity, the lien given by Italian law should rank the same as that given by ours. At the time when the property was being preserved by the defendants' solicitors the lien of the Italian Government had already attached. The solicitors are therefore only entitled to a charging order subject to this lien, and such lien is not to be superseded by a charging order subsequently obtained. In The Gustaff (1 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 230; Lush. 506; 6 L. T. Rep. N. S. 660) viaticum took precedence of a shipwright's lien, and it was then laid down that the shipwright's lien was subject to all existing obligations then complete and due against the vessel. So here the solicitor's lien must be subject to the existing lien of the Italian Government. In The Heinrich (ubi sup.) it is to be noticed that the master was a part owner, and in consequence of this it was that his wages were postponed to the solicitor's charge. In The Jeff Davis (ubi sup.) the solicitor's claim was given precedence of a claim quite unconnected with the ship.

Cur. adv. vult.

Aug. 6.—Sir JAMES HANNEN.—Two actions were instituted by the steamship Walton and the brig Julie for salvage services rendered by them to the Italian brig Livietta. Messrs. Thomas Cooper and Co., solicitors, were instructed by the agents of the Italian underwriters, to whom the Livietta had been abandoned, to appear in these actions and defend their interests. In the result the Livietta was sold by order of the court, and the salvage and costs due to the plaintiffs having been paid out of the proceeds of the sale, a balance of 60*l.* remains in court. Messrs. Cooper and Co. assert that this sum has been preserved through their instrumentality, and claim to be entitled under the 23 & 24 Vict. c. 127, s. 28, to a charge upon the amount now in court for their costs, charges, and expenses in the said action, amounting to 92*l.* 7*s.* 11*d.* I do not consider that the whole sum remaining in court has been preserved by Messrs. Cooper and Co.'s services; but they have, by payments which they have made, and by giving bail, saved the fund in court from some charges which would otherwise have fallen upon it. The Italian Government, through its consul, prefers a claim to be paid out of the proceeds of the ship remaining in court the expenses it has been put to in sending back to Italy the crew of the Livietta; and proof has been given that by the law of Italy the Italian Government is enabled, in case of shipwreck and abandonment of the vessel by the owners, to be repaid out of the salvage the expenses of sending the crew home, "after payment (1) of the expenses of sale, and (2) of the expenses of salvage and safe keeping of the effects wrecked, including the remuneration of the persons who effected the salvage, and the expenses of conveyance of the harbour employés."

The question is, whether the claim of the Italian Government is to be preferred to that of Messrs. Cooper and Co. The Italian law on this subject is very similar to our own. By the 205th section of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 the expense of sending seamen belonging to a British vessel home from a place abroad where their services have terminated, is to be paid by the master, and, if not paid by him, may be defrayed by the consular officer, and shall in that case be a charge upon the ship, and may be recovered against the owners with costs; and if allowed to the consular officer out of the public moneys, may be recovered as a debt due to Her Majesty either by ordinary process of law or in the manner in which seamen are enabled to recover wages. The same measure which we should expect to be meted in similar circumstances by the Italian tribunals to our Government ought to be applied in this case to the Italian Government. The object of the 28th section of 23 & 24 Vict. c. 127 is to prevent the client who has had the benefit of his solicitor's services from carrying off the spoils of victory without applying them toward the remuneration of these services. It was not, I conceive, intended to give the solicitor priority over claims giving a lien which could have been enforced in the suit by other persons against the property which was the subject of litigation. A mortgage created by the client to a person having no notice of the litigation would not be superseded by a charging order subsequently obtained by the solicitor, and a charge created by the law must, I think, be put on an equal footing with one arising out of the contract of the client. Such charges in effect diminish the property or the value of the property which could be recovered or preserved by the solicitor's instrumentality. In the present case the Livietta, when it came within British jurisdiction, was already by the law of its flag subject, in the events which had happened, to a charge in favour of the Italian Government for the expense of conveying its crew to Italy. It appears to me that this charge should, on general principles, as well as by analogy with our own statute, rank as high as wages. Where the law imposes on the ship, in the event of shipwreck, a charge for the expenses of the seamen's reconveyance to their own country, this must be looked upon as a part of the terms upon which the seamen engage for the voyage, and is another form of remuneration for the services the sailors rendered up to the time of the wreck.

In The Gustaf (ubi sup.) Dr. Lushington held that the claim of seamen for their wages earned before a ship came into a shipwright's hands took precedence of the shipwright's common law right of lien for repairs; and, in the case of foreigners, that they were entitled, in addition to their wages, to priority for what the learned judge terms the "ordinary allowance for return to their country." In support of the solicitors' charge reliance was placed on The Soblomsten (ubi sup.), where Dr. Lushington ordered the funds in court to be applied, first, in satisfaction of the proctor's costs, and, secondly, of a shipbroker's claim for necessaries supplied after the arrest of the ship. But, as the learned judge had pointed out in The Gustaf and other cases, the "supplying of necessaries does not give ab origine a lien, but only a statutory remedy against the res, which is essentially different." The same observation applies to the case of The Heinrich (ubi sup.), where the claim of a solicitor was preferred to one for necessaries, with this additional circumstance, that the necessaries were there supplied after the institution of the original suit. Priority was also given in that case to the solicitor's claim over that of the master's claim for wages, but it appeared that he was a part owner, and had himself instructed the solicitors to defend the suit, and on this ground it was held that he could not enforce his claim to wages, to the prejudice of the solicitors. In The Jeff Davis (ubi sup.) priority was given to the claim of the solicitor over that of the holder of a garnishee order; but there the claim of the solicitor was preferred to a debt of the client wholly unconnected with the ship. This does not appear to me to tend to show that Sir R. Phillimore would have preferred the solicitor's claim to that of seamen for their wages, to which the present case must, I think, be likened. For the reasons above given, I am of opinion that the Italian Government is entitled to an order for payment out of the sum in court of the expenses of sending back the crew of the Livietta to Italy.

Collision—Practice—Reference—Amount of claim—Amount allowed—Costs.

Where a plaintiff in a reference in a collision action withdraws a large item of his claim at the reference and not before, and he recovers less than two-thirds of the amount originally claimed, but more than two-thirds of the amount which remains after his withdrawal of the above item, the original amount of his claim before withdrawal is the claim upon which costs are to be given, and he is not entitled to his costs.

(a) Reported by J. P. ASPINALL and F. W. RAIKES, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

THIS was a motion by the defendants, in an action in rem, for damage by collision, that the plaintiffs should be condemned in the costs of the reference, on the ground that their claim had been disallowed by more than one-half.

The action was brought by the owners of the steamship Marie against the steamship Eilean Dubh to recover damages in respect of a collision between the two vessels. The defendants counter-claimed in respect of the damage occasioned by the collision to their steamship the Eilean Dubh.

On the 6th March 1883 the court found both vessels to blame, and condemned the defendants in half the plaintiffs' claim, and the plaintiffs in half the defendants' counter-claim. A reference was ordered to the registrar and merchants to assess the amount of the respective damages.

The plaintiffs' claim sent in for the reference amounted to 1253*l.* 19*s.* 5*d.*, the defendants' claim to 822*l.* 12*s.* 11*d.* At the hearing of the reference on July 26 the plaintiffs withdrew certain items of their claim, amounting in all to 464*l.* 18*s.* 11*d.*, on the ground that such items had been inserted by mistake, owing to the fact that the Marie had been in a collision with another vessel on the same day as the collision with the Eilean Dubh, and such items were chargeable to the other steamer, and not to the Marie. By the above withdrawal the plaintiffs' claim was reduced to 789*l.* 0*s.* 6*d.*

On the 9th Aug. the registrar issued his report, and therein allowed 565*l.* 9*s.* to the plaintiffs, and 620*l.* 3*s.* 3*d.* to the defendants. The defendants had claimed 259*l.* 11*s.* 3*d.* for demurrage and loss of freight, and had been allowed 72*l.* The registrar had left each party to bear their own costs.

Roscoe, on behalf of the defendants, in support of the motion.—The rule in cases of this sort has always been that the plaintiff pays the costs of the reference, if the registrar disallows more than one-third of his claim:

The Empress Eugenie, Lush. 138.

In this case the claim was for 1253*l.* 19*s.* 5*d.*, and the sum allowed is 565*l.* 8*s.*, so that more than half has been disallowed. The fact of the items being withdrawn at the reference does not affect the rule. The object of the rule is to prevent exorbitant claims, and so prevent expenditure in supporting and opposing such claims. The withdrawal at the reference reduces the claim only after this expenditure has been incurred.

Nelson, on behalf of the plaintiffs, against the motion.—It is submitted that inasmuch as the items withdrawn were inserted by mistake, the amount which remains after the items have been deducted is the claim upon which costs are to be given, and if so, less than one-third of our claim has been struck off. With regard to expenditure, this reference must have been fought out even if our original claim had been what it was after the withdrawal of the above items, because the plaintiffs had made such an excessive claim upon us for demurrage and loss of freight. They actually claimed 259*l.* 11*s.* 3*d.* and only got 72*l.* The rule referred to is not universal, and this is a case where an exception should be made:

The Gleaner, 3 Asp. Mar. Cas. 582; 38 L. T. Rep. N. S. 650.

Roscoe in reply.—Whatever was struck off our claim for demurrage and loss of freight, the fact remains that we claimed 822*l.* 12*s.* 11*d.* and got 620*l.* 3*s.* 3*d.*

Sir JAMES HANNEN.—I understand from the registrar that the point which much influenced him at the reference was the withdrawal of these items, and he accordingly appears to have left each party to bear their own costs, thinking that the withdrawal, by diminishing the claim of the plaintiffs, brought them within the protection of the rule referred to. I, however, am of opinion that, if the original claim was persisted in up to the hearing of the reference, the withdrawing of certain items then ought not to make any difference. The case had already come into the hands of counsel, and expenses had been incurred in regard to the excessive claim, whereas, if these items had never been inserted, a fair offer might have been made by the defendants and accepted by the plaintiffs. I therefore think if an improper claim is withdrawn merely at the reference, it ought to make no difference, and the usual rule must be applied as if the original amount had been adjudicated upon. I accordingly condemn the plaintiffs in the costs of the reference and of this motion.

THE ISIS. (a)

Salvage—Practice — Form of Pleadings — Order XIX., rr. 4, 5 and 7.

In a salvage action where the plaintiffs had delivered a statement of claim in the form No. 6, sect. 3 of appendix C. to the rules of the Supreme Court 1883, the Court, on motion by the defendants, ordered the plaintiffs, under Order XIX., r. 7, to deliver a further and better statement of the nature of their claim, and ordered the costs of the motion to be costs in the cause.

The forms of pleading under Order XIX., r. 5, are not under all circumstances to be rigidly complied with, but are rather to be taken as the class of pleading it is desired to introduce.

In salvage actions it may be proper in some cases, owing to the practice of the court that where the defendants admit the facts alleged in the statement of claim, the plaintiffs are not allowed to give any evidence at the hearing, to use a fuller form of statement of claim than that given in the example in the appendix to the Rules of the Supreme Court 1883, and approaching more nearly to the old form.

THIS was a motion by the defendants in a salvage action for an order that the plaintiffs should deliver a further and better statement of the nature of their claim, and be condemned in the costs of the motion.

Salvage services having been rendered by the plaintiffs to the steamship Isis, they on the 4th Sept. 1883 instituted an action for salvage against the owners of the Isis, her cargo and freight, and on the 5th Nov. 1883 delivered the following statement of claim :—

The plaintiffs, William Hodds and sixteen others above named, are the owners, masters, and crew of the yawl Band of Hope, of Winterton, in the county of Norfolk. The plaintiffs, Charles Larter and nineteen others above named, are the crew of the Royal National Lifeboat Institution's lifeboat Husband, of Winterton aforesaid. The other plaintiffs are the Great Yarmouth Steam-tug Company, Limited, who are the owners of the steam-tugs United Service, Express, and Meteor, and the masters and crews thereof respectively.

The said plaintiffs rendered salvage services to the derelict steamship Isis, on the Hasbro' Sands, and off the coast of Norfolk, during the 19th, 20th, 21st, and 22nd of Sept. 1883. Particulars :

1. Value of the Isis at the time of the services... ... ... Value of cargo... ... ... Freight
2. Value of Band of Hope	200	0	0
3. Value of United Service	2500	0	0
4. Value of Express	2000	0	0
5. Value of Meteor	2500	0	0
6. Damage sustained by United Service	30	0	0
7. Damage sustained by Express	15	0	0

The plaintiffs claim such amount of salvage as may be just. Delivered the 5th day of Nov. 1883, by Pritchard and Sons, agents for C. H. Wiltshire, plaintiffs' solicitor.

The defendants thereupon served the plaintiffs with the following notice of motion :

We, Thomas Cooper and Co., for the defendants in this action, give notice that we shall by counsel on the 13th Nov. 1883 move the judge in court to direct the plaintiffs to deliver a further and better statement of claim, or such particulars as will give the defendants sufficient information of the nature and circumstances of the alleged salvage services rendered by the respective plaintiffs to the said steamship Isis, to enable the defendants to have the opportunity of making a tender in the action, and why the defendants should not have ten days for delivering statement of defence after such further and better statement of claim for particulars have been delivered, and why the plaintiffs should not be condemned in the costs of this application.

Nov. 13.—The motion now came on before the judge in court.

Phillimore, for the defendants, in support of the motion.—The form of salvage statement of claim in the appendix to the Rules of the Supreme Court 1883 is not applicable to this case. Upon this statement of claim we are quite unable even to approximate to the value of the services. We are therefore unable to make an adequate tender, and so settle the matter. It has been the practice in many salvage actions for the defendants to admit the statement of claim, and thereby the expense of witnesses at the trial is saved.

J. P. Aspinall for the plaintiffs, contra.—I admit that further information should be given than is provided for by the form. The rule, however, says that any longer forms shall be deemed prolix. [Sir JAMES HANNEN.—But it says they must be sufficient.] We have complied with the form, and if not sufficient, the plaintiffs have the remedy of applying for particulars. [Sir JAMES HANNEN.—The very object of the rules is to avoid these constant applications for particulars.] Then the only alternative is to go back to the old form of pleading in these actions. [Sir JAMES HANNEN.—It is extremely likely that may be so. That, however, must be left to the pleaders, and it will be a matter for taxation. The rule only requires that these forms shall be used where they are sufficient, and if it be that per incuriam enough had not been put in, the rules provide for further particulars. The object was to secure as much succinctness of statement as was considered necessary for information. I am sure, if the Profession will carry it out in this spirit, it will be feasible. But I am of opinion that in this case sufficient particulars have not been given. I think counsel practising in this court might shorten salvage pleadings very easily. I am sure, if they apply their minds to it, they will be quite able to give particulars. Phillimore.—The difficulty in this case is that the rule says these forms shall be sufficient. Sir JAMES HANNEN. — Quite the contrary. It implies that there may be cases in which it may not be sufficient, and you must not take it that you are slavishly to adhere to the words and forms of these specimens. They are only to be taken as indications of the character of pleading which it is desired to introduce. You must try seriously to give the material information in a succinct form.] It has always been the practice of this court, if the defendants chose to admit the facts as set out in the statement of claim, to go to trial on the admitted facts. By so doing the plaintiffs are bound down to those facts, and are not allowed at the hearing to give any evidence. For this reason, unless the practice of the court is deviated from, the setting out of the minutest details of a salvage action is essential.

Sir JAMES HANNEN.—That is no doubt a very serious difficulty. I really must say, while I wish it to be understood that my decision only applies to this particular case, that it appears to me probable that it will be found necessary in many cases to make use of a form of pleading more nearly approaching to the old form of statement of claim, than the example which is given in the appendix to these rules. Because undoubtedly the general object of these rules is to save expense, and I can speak from my own experience, though it is slight, that the defendants in these salvage actions do frequently assent to the statements made in the statement of claim, and the case proceeds to trial upon that basis. It would certainly lead to a very great additional expense if the plaintiffs in salvage actions were obliged to keep their witnesses for the purpose of proving at the trial the facts which were summarised in the statement of claim, and which would also make it necessary that the defendants should also keep their witnesses for the purpose of meeting some possible state of facts of which they would have had no sort of information from the statement of claim. Therefore, while my decision applies to this particular case, my observations have a wider scope. I accordingly direct this statement of claim to be amended, and order the costs of the motion to be costs in the cause. (a)

(a) In consequence of this order the plaintiffs delivered a statement of claim in the form given in the appendix to the Rules of the Supreme Court 1883, under which particulars of the service were given under the heads of—(1) Description of salvors; (2) Position and condition of the salved ship; (3) Nature of the services; (4) State of the weather; (5) Risk, Fatigue, and Exposure; (6) Special service; (7) Duration of services; (8) Effect of the services; (9) Values; (10) Damage sustained. The action came on for hearing on Dec. 14, when Butt, J. awarded 1700*l.* on a value of 17,000*l.* In commenting upon the above form of statement of claim, his Lordship remarked that, if in salvage actions full particulars of the services were to be given, he considered the old form of statement of claim to be the best, as it told the story consecutively, and not in the disjointed way occasioned by particulars.—ED.

WILLIAM BIRD AND OTHERS v. THOMAS GIBB AND OTHERS; THE DE BAY. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM THE VICE-ADMIRALTY COURT OF MALTA.

Salvage—Amount—Damage—Loss of profit—Separate award for damages—Evidence.

Where in rendering salvage services a ship has sustained actual damage and loss which is capable of being accurately ascertained, evidence of the amount thereof is admissible on behalf of the salvors, and the court should, where there is a fund sufficient for the purpose without depriving the owner of the benefit of the salvage, award to the salvors the amount of such loss and damage in addition to the salvage reward.

Interest on the amount of loss and damage is not recoverable by salvors.

Salvors are entitled to recover for general depreciation in the value of a salving ship in consequence of the damage sustained, and for loss of charter-party if proved.

In a service of considerable merit lasting for sixty-two hours, where the court below on a value of 67,200l. had awarded 5000l. for the service, and 3535l. 1s. 6d. for damages and expenses arising ont of the service, the Court reduced the award to a lump sum of 6000l.

THIS was an appeal from a judgment of the Vice-Admiralty Court of Malta in an action of salvage instituted by the respondents, the owners, master, and crew of the steamship Mary Louisa, for the recovery of salvage in respect of services rendered to the steamship De Bay and her cargo in the Mediterranean.

The services consisted in towing the De Bay from close to Sicily to Valetta in Malta for sixty-two hours under the circumstances set out in their Lordships' judgment.

At the time of rendering the services the Mary Louisa was bound from Marseilles to Girgenti in ballast, under a charter-party dated 7th Dec. 1881, whereby it was agreed that the Mary Louisa should, after discharge of her cargo at Marseilles, proceed to Girgenti and other ports named in the charter-party and load a certain cargo and deliver the same at New York or Baltimore, on being paid the lump sum of 2800*l.* for any four of the above ports, charterers having the privilege of using one or two additional ports, paying 50*l.* for each additional port used, 25*l.* to be deducted for each loading port less than four not used. It was also agreed that should the steamer not arrive and be ready to receive her cargo at her first loading port on or before 20th Dec. 1881 the charterers were to have the option of cancelling the charter-party. In consequence of the salvage services the Mary Louisa not being able to arrive at Girgenti on or before 20th Dec. her owners telegraphed to the charterers the circumstances, and in reply received a telegram that the charterers cancelled the charter-party. Thereupon another charter-party dated 28th Dec. 1881 was entered into for the Mary Louisa, whereby it was agreed that the vessel should proceed to Italian, Sicilian, or Spanish ports and there load a certain cargo and deliver the same at New York or New Orleans for a lump sum of 2600*l.* for freight for any four of the loading ports taken in rotation, charterers having the privilege of using one or two additional ports, paying 50*l.* for each additional port used, and should any of the four ports named as loading ports not be used, the sum of 50*l.* should be deducted from amount of charter for each one not so used. The Mary Louisa, accordingly, when repaired, loaded her cargo at certain ports in Sicily and then proceeded to New York and duly discharged her cargo. The owners of the Mary Louisa now claimed damages against the owners of the De Bay as follows:

The difference between the lump sum of 2800*l.* for freight under the charter-party dated 7th Dec. 1881, and the sum of 2600*l.* for freight under the second charter-party dated 28th Dec. 1881—200*l.*

Five per cent. commission on freight and demurrage under cancelled charter-party of 7th Dec. 1881—140*l.*

Loss sustained as follows: As vessel only used two ports for loading and as under second charter-party 100*l.* has been deducted where under first or cancelled charter-party the amount for two ports would only have been 50*l.*—50*l.*

The value of the De Bay was agreed at 27,000*l.*, her cargo at 38,000*l.*, and the freight at 2200*l.*

On the 30th June 1882 the Judge of the Vice-Admiralty Court gave judgment, and after fully detailing all the facts of the case, and the contentions on both sides, stated that the nautical experts, who had the confidence of both parties, had agreed on the vouchers before them, that the loss or disbursement sustained by the Mary Louisa from demurrage, from cancellation of her charter-party, from destruction of her stores and provisions, and for costs of repairs with other incidental expenses, amounted to 2035*l.* 15*s.* 6*d.*, and that the depreciation of the Mary Louisa taken at 5 per cent. on 30,000*l.*, her estimated value, was 1500*l.*, and the learned judge adopting these conclusions took the loss and damages suffered by the Mary Louisa at 3535*l.* 1*s.* 6*d.* and he awarded the sum of 5000*l.* for salvage services, and pronounced for the respondents in the sum of 8535*l.* 1*s.* 6*d.* and costs, and condemned the defendants and their bail therein.

The particulars of the damage and expenses incurred by the Mary Louisa (referred to in the judgment as at p. 116 of the Appendix) were as follows.

Demurrage from 14th Dec. 1881, day on which Mary Louisa took De Bay in tow to that of her departure from Malta 31st of same month at 40*l.* per day—680*l.*

Depreciation in Mary Louisa's value by over straining, racing of engines, &c., 30,000*l.* at 5 per cent.—1500*l.*

Loss on charter commission on freight &c., as per documents—390*l.*

Cancelling charter and Lord Mayor's fees as per documents exhibited—4*l.* 16*s.* 7*d.*

Cost of repairs and expenses in Malta as per account—645*l.* 5*s.* 8*d.*

Sundry telegrams, about 12*l.*

Six months interest on the above items amounting to 3423*l.* 2*s.* 3*d.* at 6 per cent per annum—102*l.* 19*s.* 3*d.*

From the decision below the defendants appealed. The case on behalf of the appellants submitted that the judgment was wrong and should be reversed for the following among other reasons:

1. Because the amount awarded is so large as to be excessive and unreasonable.
2. Because the learned judge in making up the amount has included items which ought not to be included, and has allowed some of these items twice over, and has allowed too large a sum to many of the items and amounts which were not proved nor substantiated and which are not proper to be allowed as substantive claims in actions for salvage.
3. Because the evidence does not support the findings and conclusion of the learned judge.
4. Because the sentence or judgment in awarding the sum awarded is wrong, and so wrong that it should be corrected on appeal.

In the case on behalf of the respondents it was submitted that the judgment below should be affirmed for the following amongst other reasons:

1. Because the respondents by their services, rescued the De Bay, her cargo, and freight, and passengers from total loss.
2. Because the services of the Mary Louisa were well and efficiently performed, and were attended with much labour and fatigue to her master and crew.
3. Because the sum awarded was arrived at by the court below after the most careful consideration of all the evidence given and the facts of the case.
4. Because the award is neither exhorbitant nor excessive.
5. Because the said award is in full accordance with the law and practice of the courts of Admiralty and Vice-Admiralty in salvage actions.

May 29.—The appeal came on for hearing.

Webster, Q.C. and W. G. F. Phillimore (with them J. G. Alexander) for the appellants.—The sum of 8535*l.* 1*s.* 6*d.* is out of all proportion to the services rendered. Moreover it has never been the practice to award one sum in respect of losses and expenses sustained by the salving vessel, and another for her services. The items upon which the learned judge below based his award are in many instances incorrect, and some of them never should have been taken into consideration at all. Sir Robert Phillimore has often, in making awards, declined to consider the amount of coals consumed. The fact that in rendering salvage services the salving vessel is delayed is always taken into consideration in fixing the amount of the award, and demurrage should not therefore be allowed as a separate item in addition. Loss of charter-party ought not to be considered:

The Cybele, L. Rep. 2 P. Div. 224; 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 478, 532; 37 L. T. Rep. N. S. 165, 773;
The Star of India, 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 261; 1 P Div. 466; 35 L. T. Rep. N. S. 407;
The Martha, 3 Hagg. 434.

There is no case except derelicts where so large a proportion of the property saved has been awarded as in this. Salvage was originally considered as compensation for personal skill and services. The reward to the owners was subsequently introduced in consequence of the risk run by their ships, especially as regards steamships:

The Enchantress, Lush. 93.

The following cases were cited in support of the contention that the award was out of proportion to the services:

The Ellora, Lush. 550; The Rochester, Mitchell's Maritime Register, Dec. 23, 1881, p. 1615: The Viking, Ib., Dec. 24, 1880, p. 1646; The Rhynland, Ib., March 25, 1881, p. 368; The Batavia Ib., May 13, 1881, p. 590; The Celtic Monarch

Ib., July 15, 1881, p. 904; The Avlona, Ib., March 10, 1882, p. 303.

Cohen, Q.C. and J. P. Aspinall for the respondents.—The cases cited out of Mitchell's Maritime Register merely contain the allegations in the pleadings, and do not give the findings of the judge upon which the award is based. The facts in The Ellora (ubi sup.) bear no analogy to the present case. It is an unprecedented course to take objection to the items, when no objections have been taken in the court below, moreover those items are correct. In a large number of cases similar to the present, an almost proportionate award has been made:

The Lancaster, 8 P. Div. 65; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 58; 48 L. T. Rep. N. S. 679;
The Kenmure Castle, 7 P. Div. 47; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 27; 48 L. T. Rep. N. S. 661;
The City of Chester, Mitchell's Maritime Register, Jan. 28, 1881, p. 111.

A large amount of salvage should be awarded on grounds of public policy, and the sum awarded is not so excessive as to induce this court to alter it:

The Amerique, L. Rep. 6 P. C. 468; 2 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 460; 31 L. T. Rep. N.S. 854.

It is to be remembered that salvage services are in this peculiar position, that, if unsuccessful, there is no reward, and therefore the award should be high. If the 5000*l.* given for the services pure and simple were held to be enough, the owners of the Mary Louisa would be entitled to deduct the damages sustained by their vessel before apportioning the salvage amongst the officers and crew. If the damages are 3500*l.*, then only 1500*l.* would be left for division among officers and crew, which is manifestly insufficient for such a service. In several cases a separate award has been made by this court in respect of damage and loss sustained. Reference was made to the following cases:

The Cuba, Lush. 14;
The Chetah, L. Rep. 2 P. C. 205; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 177; 19 L. T. Rep. N. S. 621;

Cur. adv. vult.

June 30.—Their Lordships' judgment was delivered by Sir JAMES HANNEN.—The Mary Louisa, a new steamer of 1287 registered tonnage, with engines of 200 horse power, and a crew of twenty-six hands, left Marseilles on 11th Dec. 1881, in ballast, bound for Girgenti, in Sicily, under charter-party, to load from that and other ports a cargo of fruit for New York or Baltimore. At 8 p.m. of the 13th Cape Gianitola, in Sicily, was sighted, and at 10 p.m. three vertical red mast-head lights of a steamer were seen on the starboard bow, the signal indicating that she had broken down, and rockets were also being fired from her. This steamer proved to be the De Bay, which had lost her propellor, and was heading towards the coast of Sicily at a distance of about ten miles. The De Bay was a screw steamer of 1085 tons register, of 160 horse power, and a crew of thirty-seven hands, with a general cargo, and five adult passengers and three children, bound for Rangoon. The master of the De Bay requested to be towed to Malta. The master of the Mary Louisa hesitated, as he would thereby be deviating from his voyage to Girgenti, then nearly accomplished, and might forfeit his charter-party; but, in consideration of the risk to the De Bay, and the lives of those on board of her if assistance were not given, he ultimately consented to take the De Bay in tow to Malta. At 2.30 a.m. of the 14th the towage commenced, a steel hawser from the De Bay, and a new thirteen inch Manilla rope of the Mary Louisa being used. The wind gradually increased to a gale, causing great difficulty in the towing; and, ultimately, at 3.20 p.m. of the 14th, the steel hawser parted, and soon after the Manilla tow rope also gave way, and great danger arose of the propellor of the Mary Louisa becoming fouled in the hawsers. It was impossible to renew the towage that afternoon, and the Mary Louisa, at the request of the De Bay, endeavoured to remain by her during the night, but, in consequence of the violence of the storm the vessels lost sight of one another. At 9 a.m. of the 15th the Mary Louisa, which had been in search of the De Bay, again sighted her, and at 10.45 came up with her. The steel hawser and Manilla rope were again made fast, and the towage was resumed; the steel hawser, however, parted, and the towage was continued with the Manilla hawser throughout the rest of that day and the following night; and on the 16th, at 5 p.m., the two vessels arrived at Valetta. The services thus rendered to the De Bay lasted altogether during a period of sixty-two hours. In the earlier part of this time these services were rendered in circumstances of great difficulty and some danger, and during the twenty hours in which they were interrupted the Mary Louisa showed great perseverance in standing by the De Bay, and seeking her in order to renew the efforts for her assistance. The agreed value of the De Bay, her cargo and freight, is 67,000*l.*

A suit for salvage was instituted by the Mary Louisa in the Admiralty Court at Malta against the De Bay. The court was assisted by two experts, Captain Keston, chosen by the plaintiffs, and Captain Dyer by the defendants. Captain Keston places a much higher estimate than Captain Dyer does on the value of the services rendered by the Mary Louisa to the De Bay, but Captain Dyer stated that in his opinion "the service rendered by the Mary Louisa to the De Bay was most important and valuable, being conducted with much perseverance." He further says, "The captain and crew of the Mary Louisa should be well considered, for they showed much perseverance in sticking by the De Bay, and they had a most trying and anxious time throughout." Captain Bird, in a declaration made before a notary, on the 21st Dec., stated that the Mary Louisa prolonged her voyage and "suffered considerable damages consequent on the services rendered," and that his own "vessel was in a perilous condition, being unmanageable and near the land and reefs." Upon this and other evidence in the cause their Lordships think that the judge was well warranted in finding that the De Bay, and her cargo, crew and passengers were "rescued from a serious danger of total loss, though without any serious danger incurred by the Mary Louisa." For these services the learned judge awarded the sum of 8535*l.* 1*s.* 6*d.* It was objected on behalf of the defendants that this sum is excessive, and the decision of the learned judge was specially impugned on the ground that he has allowed the specific amount of 3535*l.* 1*s.* 6*d.* for the damage, losses, and expenses alleged to have been incurred by the Mary Louisa, to which he has added 5000*l.* for salvage services. The particulars of the damage, losses, and expenses will be found at page 116 of the appendix. It was contended that some of these items ought not to be taken into consideration at all, as, for instance, the loss on charter; and it was further contended that in no case ought the items of loss or damage to the salving vessel to be allowed, as "moneys numbered," but that they should only be generally taken into account when estimating the amount to be awarded for salvage remuneration. Their Lordships are of opinion that this objection is not well founded. It was argued that, by allowing the several items of the account, and then a further sum for salvage, the salvors would receive payment for their losses twice over, but this is only on the supposition that the court below, after giving the amount of the alleged losses specifically, has considered them again generally in awarding 5000*l.* for simple salvage services. It is not to be presumed that the learned judge has fallen into such an error, and, indeed, it appears that he has not done so, but that he considered the 5000*l.* a reasonable amount for salvage reward, wholly irrespective of damage and expenses. Their Lordships are of opinion that it is always justifiable and sometimes important, when it can be done, to ascertain what damages and losses the salving vessel has sustained in rendering the salvage services. It is frequently difficult and expensive, and sometimes impossible, to ascertain with exactness the amount of such loss, and in such cases the amount of salvage must be assessed in a general manner upon so liberal a scale as to cover the losses, and to afford also an adequate reward for the services rendered. In the assessment of salvage, regard must always be had to the question whether the property saved is of sufficient value to supply a fund for the due reward of the salvors, without depriving the owner of that benefit which it is the object of the salvage service to secure to him. If, as in the present case, the fund is ample, it is but just that the losses voluntarily incurred by the salvor should be transferred to the owner of the property saved, for whose advantage the sacrifice has been made, and, in addition to this, the salvor should receive a compensation for his exertion, and for the risk he runs of not receiving any compensation in the event of his services proving ineffectual; for, if no more than a restitutia in integrum were awarded, there would be no inducement to shipowners to allow their vessels to engage in salvage services. If there be a sufficient fund, and the losses sustained by the salvors are ascertained, it would be unreasonable to reject the assistance to be derived from that knowledge when fixing the amount of salvage reward, and their Lordships are unable to appreciate the argument that that which is known may be taken into account generally, but not specifically. There are several reported cases in which the Court of Admiralty has, besides awarding salvage services, decreed payment of damage and losses sustained by the salvor, and has directed them to be ascertained and reported on by the registrar and merchants: (The Salacia, 2 Hagg. 270; The Oscar, 2 Hagg. 261; The Watt, 2 W. Rob. 72; The Saratoga, 1 Lush. 322.)

Their Lordships are therefore of opinion that the learned judge below has not adopted an erroneous principle in first estimating the amount of loss sustained by the Mary Louisa, and then adding to it an amount for salvage services, but their Lordships are not prepared to accept all the items of loss which have been allowed in the court below. For example, their Lordships do not consider that the loss on charter-party was established by the evidence. This item as to 200*l.* appears to have been arrived at by simply deducting the difference of freight payable under the substituted charter-party which the Mary Louisa obtained, from that which she would have received under the one which she lost. But these charter-parties were for different voyages and under different conditions. The sum to be paid under the original charter-party included remuneration for proceeding from Marseilles to Girgenti in ballast, which the Mary Louisa had not to do under the second charter-party. With the exception of the loss of commission on the freight under the first charter-party, which is alleged to have been paid, though the proof of this loss is not very satisfactorily established, there is nothing to show that the second charter-party was not as profitable as the first. Their Lordships think that the item of interest ought not to have been admitted, and there are other items in the account which their Lordships would feel disposed to disallow if the matter were now being investigated for the first time before them, but no objection appears to have been taken to these in the court below, and they do not in their aggregate amount to a sufficient sum to warrant the variation of the judgment appealed from. It is only where the amount awarded is grossly in excess of what appears to be right that their Lordships would feel justified in overruling the decision of a court below on a question of salvage. There is one item, however, of the claim for losses which calls for special notice; it is the sum of 1500*l.* for general depreciation of the Mary Louisa. Their Lordships consider this a very large amount to allow for the depreciation of the vessel beyond the damage actually ascertained and repaired at Malta. This sum was arrived at on the assumption that the overstraining of the vessel and racing of the engines during the towage would be equivalent to six months' ordinary wear and tear of the vessel. Captain Keston was disposed to fix it at a higher amount. Mr. Hinchcliffe, a surveyor called for the plaintiff, fixed the amount of general depreciation at 5 per cent. Captain Baines, another surveyor, stated that the general depreciation would amount to four or five months' wear and tear, or, at the utmost, six months. Captain Dyer ultimately joined with Captain Keston in reporting that the explanation given at a conference they had with the surveyors allowed them to come to the conclusion that the wear and tear might amount to 5 per cent., which, upon the estimated value of 30,000*l.*, would give 1,500*l.* It appears, therefore, that it was not disputed by the defendants and it seems probable that some depreciation of the ship beyond the damage which could be actually seen would arise from straining, and upon the evidence before the court at Malta, their Lordships are not in a position to hold that the sum of 1,500*l.* awarded was grossly excessive, still less to hold that the claim for general depreciation should be altogether disallowed.

But, while their Lordships are of opinion that the learned judge has not erred in the principle upon which he has based his judgment, and that the amount which he has allowed for loss and damage is not so excessive as in itself to call for an alteration of the judgment, it is obvious that when the claim of loss, damage, and expenses have been ascertained and allowed, as in this case, with assumed exactness the rate of salvage remuneration pure and simple to be allotted in addition must be estimated on a more moderate scale than where the amount of losses, &c., cannot be fixed with precision, and their Lordships are of opinion that in awarding the sum of 5000*l.* in addition to the estimated losses, the learned judge has adopted too high a standard of remuneration, and that the amount ought to be reduced. Their Lordships have the less hesitation in diminishing the amount awarded, as they are able to see that the learned judge has proceeded upon what their Lordships consider an erroneous view of the evidence with regard to this sum of 5000*l.* The Mary Louisa arrived in Valetta on the 14th Dec. On the 17th she was surveyed by Messrs. Hinchcliff and Stacey for the plaintiffs, and they gave a written report in which, in addition to the specific damages they pointed out, they state that the vessel was much strained and damaged in decks and upper works by the heavy work she had done. After this survey, the two captains had a conversation, in which Captain Bird, the captain of the De Bay asked Captain Gibb, the master of the Mary Louisa, "what he thought would be a reasonable compensation for what he had done." Captain Gibb replied, "Do you think 5000*l.* remuneration would be unreasonable?" Captain Bird said, "Not at all, I think it very fair indeed," and on the 20th Dec. he telegraphed to his owners: "Mary Louisa amicably demands 5900*l.*; considering important salvage rendered, amount reasonable. Wire instructions." The learned judge observes upon this evidence that he thinks that this must have been meant to be only for the reward and not including the expenses, because it does not appear that on the 21st, when the conversation took place and the telegram was forwarded, they had any knowledge of what the expenses would come to, and that he cannot believe they would have seriously made to their respective owners a proposal of 5000*l.* intended to cover a loss exceeding 3500*l.*, leaving for apportionment a sum less than 1500*l.* Their Lordships are of opinion that, although the captains did not know the exact amount of the damages, they knew their general nature, and that they did intend the 5000*l.* to include the whole claim. As this was never agreed to it was not binding either on the parties or on the court, but the learned judge appears to have taken it as a fair amount to be awarded for salvage in addition to expenses, because, he says he "did not think that there was reason for reducing the sum which Captain Bird declared in his opinion was a fair and reasonable proposal." Their Lordships think that this is not the true construction of Captain Bird's language and telegram, and therefore that undue weight has been given to the supposed agreement of the captains. Taking all the circumstances into consideration, their Lordships are of opinion that 6000*l.* is a sufficient amount to award, and they will humbly advise Her Majesty that the judgment should be varied by reducing it to that amount. Each party will bear his own costs of the appeal.

COURT OF APPEAL.

April 6 and 28, 1883.

(Before BRETT, M.R., COTTON AND BOWEN, L.JJ.)
SANDERS BROTHERS v. MACLEAN AND CO. (a)

Sale of goods—Payment against bills of lading—Bill of lading in triplicate—Tender of two only—Time of tender.

Where goods are bought abroad, payment to be made in London in exchange for bills of lading, and one of a set of bills of lading made in parts is tendered to the vendee, while the goods are still on the voyage, he is not entitled to refuse to accept the bill of lading merely on the ground that he, by taking one, runs the risk of the shipper or other person dealing fraudulently with the other parts, but is bound to accept the goods and pay for them in accordance with the terms of his contract.

Per Brett, M.R.: In a contract for the sale of goods to be carried by ship to their destination it is implied that the shipper will forward the bill of lading with reasonable diligence, and if the shipper do so, the purchaser cannot refuse to accept the goods because he gets the bill of lading after the arrival of the ship, and after charges in the nature of demurrage have been incurred.

M. and Co., the defendants, bought goods from S., the plaintiff, to be shipped from Sebastopol to Philadelphia; payment to be made in London in exchange for bills of lading. The bills of lading were made out in triplicate, two of which sets were forwarded by the shipper to the plaintiff in London, and one retained by himself. The plaintiff tendered the two bills to the defendants duly indorsed, but the defendants refused to accept them or pay for the cargo, on the ground that they were entitled to all three. The plaintiff telegraphed for the third part, and afterwards tendered all three, but the defendants refused to accept them and pay for the cargo, on the ground that, in consequence of the delay, expenses and demurrage would be incurred.

Held, that the defendants were not entitled to refuse to accept the two bills of lading when first tendered:

Held further (per Brett, M.R.), that the defendants were not entitled to reject the cargo on the grounds stated for refusing to accept the second tender of all the parts of the bill of lading.

THIS was an action for not accepting a quantity of old iron rails, sold by the plaintiff to the defendants. The bought note which was addressed to the defendants, Messrs. Maclean, Maris, and Co., was as follows :—

(a) Reported by A. A. HOPKINS, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

London, May 7, 1880.

Gentlemen,—We have this day bought for your account, by your authority, from Messrs. Sanders Brothers, of 25, Abchurch-lane, 2000 (say two thousand) tons of old iron flange rails at the price of 82s. (say eighty-two shillings) per ton, including cost, freight, and insurance to Philadelphia, U.S.

Shipment to be made during the months of July and (or) August next.

Payment to be made in net cash in London in exchange for bills of lading and policies of insurance of each cargo or shipment. A sworn weigher's certificate to be given for each cargo with the shipping documents, or sellers to be answerable for United States Customs weights.

In pursuance of this contract the plaintiffs, on the 17th July 1880, caused to be shipped on the steamship Coronilla, at Sebastopol, 1136 tons of old iron rails, for Philadelphia, U.S. The master of the ship delivered a set of three bills of lading in respect of the shipment to a Mr. Mollivo, the shipper of the rails. Mollivo forwarded two of these bills of lading from St. Petersburg to the plaintiffs in London, retaining the other in his hands, but dealing with it in no way.

On the 3rd Aug. 1880 the plaintiffs tendered the two bills of lading, duly indorsed, to the defendants in London, but the defendants refused to accept them, or to pay for the cargo, on the ground that the bill of lading appeared to be made out in triplicate, and they were entitled to refuse to accept unless all three were offered them.

The plaintiffs having obtained the third part of the bill of lading, tendered all three on the 9th Aug. 1880, but the defendants refused to accept them or pay for the cargo, because the vessel had so far proceeded on her voyage that she would arrive at Philadelphia before the bill of lading could be sent there by the defendants, and that warehouse and other expenses would be incurred in consequence.

The cause was tried before Pollock, B. in London, in Dec. 1881, and the learned judge then asked the jury the following questions :—1. Has a custom been proved that in the case of a contract such as was made between the plaintiffs and the defendants the vendee is bound to accept bills for his goods when only two bills of lading are tendered? 5. Has a custom been proved that in the case of a contract such as was made between the plaintiffs and the defendants the vendee is bound to accept bills against shipping documents, although they are tendered at a date when the cargo, having gone forward to America by steamer, will arrive before the bills of lading can arrive?

The jury answered the first question thus: "The custom has not been proved by the evidence, but it is the unanimous opinion of the jury that it is the usual practice of the City of London to do so." And they answered the second question thus: "The custom has not been proved by the evidence, but it is the unanimous opinion of the jury that where due diligence has been employed, and in this instance they believe that the plaintiffs did exercise such diligence, the vendee is bound to accept such bills of lading."

After argument upon further consideration the learned judge directed the verdict and judgment to be entered for the defendants.

The plaintiffs appealed.

Sir F. Herschell (S. G.) and Shiress Will for the plaintiffs.—The first tender was good. The defendants rely upon Glyn, Mills, and Co. v. East and West India Dock Company (7 App. Cas. 591; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 580; 47 L. T. Rep. N. S. 309), but that case has not altered the law as laid down in Barber v. Meyerstein (L. Rep. 4 H. L. 317; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O.S. 449; 22 L. T. Rep. N.S. 808). Any one of a set of bills of lading duly indorsed and delivered passes the property, and therefore the tender of 3rd Aug. 1880 was a good tender apart from any custom. But if not, then the tender of 9th Aug. 1880 was a good tender.

There is no implied warranty that the bills of lading shall reach the defendants in time for them to forward them to America before the arrival of the goods.

Webster, Q.C. and Moulton for the defendants.—The defendants are entitled to have the cargo delivered to them free of all expense. A delivery of shipping documents is not a sufficient delivery if it appears that the cargo is subject to liens and charges in favour of bailees: (Benjamin on Sales, 3rd edit. p. 688). It appears by the bills that they are in triplicate, the purchaser may therefore refuse to accept two:

Cur. adv. vult.

April 28.—Brett, M.R.—The action in this case was brought for the non-acceptance of a cargo of railway iron. The contract was a contract of sale of the railway iron for forward deliveries of shipments to be made within certain months. Payment was to be made in London against bills of lading. The vessel containing the cargo in question sailed from Sebastopol for Philadelphia, but before she arrived there the defendants declared that they would not accept the cargo, and the question is whether they were justified in this refusal. The refusal arose in this way: On the 3rd Aug. the plaintiffs offered to the defendants two copies of the bill of lading duly indorsed in favour of the defendants, but the defendants refused to accept them, because it appeared that the bill of lading had been drawn in triplicate, and that, therefore, they were entitled to all three copies, and to refuse to accept the cargo and to decline payment until all three copies were in their hands. The third copy of the bill of lading was still in the hands of a gentleman in St. Petersburg, who was the original shipper of the cargo from Sebastopol. Upon the refusal of the defendants to pay against the bills of lading offered to them the plaintiffs wrote to St. Petersburg and obtained the third copy of the bill of lading, and afterwards upon the 9th Aug. they tendered all three parts to the defendants, but the defendants again refused to accept them. On this second occasion the refusal was on these grounds: By the 9th Aug. the ship had got so far on its voyage to Philadelphia that it would arrive there before the bills of lading could be forwarded from London to reach the defendants' agents in Philadelphia, and therefore, there being no one there authorised to receive the cargo, the captain would have a right to land and warehouse it at the expense of the consignee, or, if his ship was detained in consequence, he would be entitled to demurrage under the charter-party or bill of lading.

I do not know that either of the reasons given by the defendants for refusing the cargo are the real reasons, but, if they are good and legal grounds for the refusal, the defendants have a right to rely upon them. Now the learned judge, Pollock, B., asked the jury at the trial whether after the objection taken on the 3rd Aug. the plaintiffs made all reasonable efforts to obtain all the copies of the bill of lading in time and the jury found that they did so; the learned Baron, however, directed the verdict and judgment to be entered for the defendants on the ground that it was a good and legal ground for refusing to accept a cargo under such a contract as this that all the existing copies of the bill of lading were not offered to the defendants; and he held further that the tender of the 9th Aug. had not cured the defect in the tender of the 3rd Aug. Now I cannot agree in this opinion as to either of those tenders, and I think both of those tenders good. With reference to the first the question is this: whether, where payment for shipments of goods sold under a contract of sale is to be made against the bill of lading of the shipment, it is a part of that contract that the vendor must offer all the existing copies of the bill of lading in order to entitle himself to be paid. Now, if only one copy of the bill of lading has been dealt with and indorsed, it is known law that a delivery of such indorsed bill of lading, with an intention to pass the property, passes the property, and will entitle the person to whom it is delivered to demand the goods upon their arrival. Moreover it is known law that under these circumstances no subsequent indorsement of any of the other copies of the bill of lading has any effect upon the property in the goods. It was urged, however, not that this view of the law had been altered, but that a difficulty had arisen which rendered it unsafe for a vendee to accept the first indorsed copy of the bill of lading only, because, if the shipper kept in his possession any other copy of the bill of lading, he might fraudulently indorse it, and present it so fraudulently indorsed to the captain, and obtain possession of the goods, and the shipowner would then be absolved as against the real owner of the goods for having delivered them up upon such a bill of lading, the indorsement of which was fraudulent. This was so decided in the House of Lords in the case of Glyn, Mills, and Co. v. East and West India Dock Company (ubi sup). I say nothing about that decision except that it is to be loyally followed. I think it was inevitable, upon that decision, that a practical difficulty would arise, and that someone would avail himself of it as an excuse for rejecting a cargo. That has now happened, and the question is, whether there is anything in that case to alter the old law. Now, in the case referred to, the House of Lords distinctly stated that the old law was not altered, and that the first copy of the bill of lading properly indorsed for value, and delivered with the intention to pass the property, passes the property, and that no subsequent indorsement of any other copy is of any effect. All that they decided was that, although the true owner of the goods could sue the person who had obtained possession of the goods, yet he could not sue the captain or the shipowner, because, when he took the first indorsed copy of the bill of lading he took it subject to this contingency, that if the goods were delivered by the captain to someone else upon a subsequent copy of the bill of lading fraudulently indorsed by the consignor he could not sue the shipowner, but he could sue anyone else who had dealt with the goods which were his property. If this be true, could it be the intention of this contract, which states expressly that payment is to be made against bills of lading, that, although the bill of lading presented would be presented according to the custom of merchants, with a view to pass the property in the cargo, yet that the vendee should have a right to reject the cargo because all the three copies of the bill of lading were not presented to him? I do not think that such is the effect of the decision of the House of Lords, and it would certainly be contrary to the known principles of mercantile law and to the practice of merchants with respect to bills of lading. Therefore I cannot agree with the decision of the learned judge upon this point.

This is of itself sufficient to decide this case, but because the second point was argued, and is an importanf point in mercantile law, I desire to say for myself that I think the second tender of the 9th Aug. was a good tender, even assuming that the first was bad. It was argued that all three copies of the bill of lading were not presented until so late a date that the vessel would arrive at Philadelphia before it would be possible to forward there the bills of lading, and that in such a contract as this there is an implied condition that the bills of lading should be delivered to the consignee or vendee in time for him to send them forward, so that they should be at the port of arrival at the time the vessel arrived there, and that if this condition was not fulfilled the vendee had a right to reject the cargo. It was argued that, if we did not go this length, we must at least hold that it was an implied condition that the bills of lading should be delivered to the vendee in time to be forwarded to the port of arrival before any charges or expenses were incurred, and that if this condition was not fulfilled the vendee had a right to reject the cargo. The first objection to this contention seems to me to be this, that we have no right to import anything into a contract which it is not clear was present to the minds of the parties at the time the contract was made and agreed to by both of them. Let us consider these contentions separately. Take the case of a cargo worth 20,000*l.*: if the bill of lading were to arrive the day after the vessel, it would be monstrous to hold that the vendee might reject the whole of this cargo, though no damage had been done to anyone. In the same way, a cargo of 20,000*l.* might be shipped to a place where it would be for the benefit of the vendee to have it, but where it would be ruin to the vendor if he had to sell it again there, and yet because charges of 10*l.* had been incurred, the vendee would have a right to reject the whole cargo. Even supposing there was an express stipulation in the contract that the bills of lading should be delivered to the vendee in time to be forwarded to the port of arrival before any charges are incurred, yet the rule is not to construe a stipulation to be a condition unless so expressly stated, or unless it goes to the whole value of the contract, and obviously the breach of such a stipulation would not go to the whole value of the contract. If, therefore, an express stipulation of this nature in the contract would not amount to a condition, no such condition can be implied.

On the other hand, it cannot be intended by merchants that, after a cargo has been shipped to a purchaser, the consignor should keep the bills of lading in his hands for as long as he pleases; the question, therefore is, what stipulation with regard to this must be implied. The stipulations to be implied in all mercantile contracts are always that the parties will do what is mercantilely reasonable, and obviously, after a shipper has destined a cargo to a purchaser, it is reasonable that he should not keep the bills of lading in his pocket, but should forward them with all reasonable speed to his vendee. What is reasonable speed must depend upon the circumstances of each case. If in the present case the bills of lading had been in London, I should have thought they ought to have been delivered sooner than if they had to be obtained from St. Petersburg. The jury found expressly that all reasonable exertions had been made to deliver the bills of lading in time, and therefore, even if I had thought the first tender was bad, I should have come to the conclusion that the second was good. In either view of this case, then, I am of opinion that the judgement of Pollock, B. cannot be supported and must be reversed.

Cotton, L. J.—This was an action by the vendors upon a contract entered into between them and the defendants for the sale of a cargo of iron. I will only say generally that the cargo was to be paid for in London upon delivery of bills of lading, and that when two of a set of three bills of lading were tendered to the defendants they refused to accept them on the ground that all three parts were not forthcoming. The question for our decision is, whether the plaintiff did perform all that he was bound to do under his contract in order to entitle him to payment for the cargo. By the terms of the contract, "Payment is to be made in London in cash in exchange for bills of lading and policies of insurance." As a fact the third part of the bill of lading was in St. Petersburg in the hands of the shipper of the cargo, to whom the cargo originally belonged, and from whom the plaintiffs had ordered it, but he had in no way dealt with this part, and the two parts tendered to the defendants were in every way effectual to pass the property in the cargo.

It is argued on the part of the defendants that the third part of the bill of lading being outstanding, they were not secure, and that is no doubt true to this extent, that it did enable the person in whose hands the outstanding part was to commit a fraud if he were so minded, and by presenting this part of the bill to obtain the cargo and defeat the defendants. Therefore, this fact did without doubt expose the defendants to some risk, but the question was whether what was done on this occasion of the 3rd Aug. was in accordance with the terms of the contract. There is no stipulation in the contract other than what I have read, namely, that payment shall be in exchange for bills of lading, which I take to mean, that payment shall be made upon delivery to the purchaser of a duly indorsed bill of lading effectual to pass the property in the cargo. If the parties had intended to make any stipulation of the sort contended for or to insure the purchaser against all risks they should have put it in the contract, but they have not done so. Now although without doubt, if the third part of a bill of lading is indorsed and parted with to someone before the tender of the other parts, the tender of those parts would not be a tender complying with the contract, because they would not be effectual to pass the property in the goods, yet, if the person to whom they are tendered refuses to accept them because he does not know whether the third part has been dealt with or not, he does so at his own risk, and if it afterwards turns out that the tender made to him was a good tender, in compliance with the contract, of a bill of lading effectual to pass the property, then he has committed a breach of the contract in refusing to accept such tender, and to pay for the cargo. Therefore I think the tender of the 3rd Aug. was a good tender, and ought to have been accepted by the defendants, and this really decides the case, as there is no question but that the tender of this date was made in amply sufficient time. I give no opinion upon the other point, which arises out of the tender of all three parts of the bill of lading on the 9th Aug., as it becomes unnecessary to decide it in consequence of my opinion on the other point. I will only say that I do not in any way look favourably upon the contention that, in this or any other similar contract, there is an implied condition that bills of lading should be tendered in time to be sent out to the port at which the ship is to arrive before the time of her arrival there. For the reasons I have given I think the judgment of the learned Baron cannot be sustained, and that this appeal must be allowed.

Bowen, L.J.—On the 3rd Aug. 1880 the plaintiffs tendered to the defendants two of the set of bills of lading which the plaintiffs had received from St. Petersburg from the shipper of the goods. The third of the set had been retained in St. Petersburg by the shipper, and it is an admitted fact in the case that it never was in any way dealt with or attempted to be dealt with. The defendants refused to accept the tender so made on the 3rd Aug., and the first question is, whether they were entitled to refuse it as not in accordance with the contract. It was contended before us that, under the present contract, a tender of the bill of lading was imperfect unless it included not merely those bills of lading which had been effectually dealt with, and were sufficient to pass the property, but also a third bill of lading, which was not in England, and which had still remained in the Russian shipper's hands. This is a question of construction of the contract, although the contract is in common form, and our decision, therefore, may possibly affect other cases than that immediately before us. The cargo had been shipped upon the 17th July 1880 at Sebastopol. The captain of the vessel had retained one copy of the bill of lading for himself; and had delivered a set in triplicate to the shipper. The set of three had been sent to St. Petersburg for the purpose of obtaining a consular certificate. The shipper had thence forwarded two out of the set of three to the plaintiffs, his correspondents and vendees, keeping one of the set in his own hands, of which, however, no sort of use was made. The point for our decision is, whether in tendering the two bills of lading received by them, without the third so retained in St. Petersburg, the plaintiffs were entitled to payment of the price of the goods under the contract.

I am of opinion that the first tender of the 3rd Aug. was perfectly good. The law as to the indorsement of bills of lading is as clear as, in my opinion, the practice of all European merchants is thoroughly understood. A cargo at sea, while in the hands of the carrier, is necessarily incapable of physical delivery. During this period of transit and voyage the bill of lading by the law merchants is universally recognised as its symbol, and the indorsement and delivery of the bill of lading operates as a symbolical delivery of the cargo. Property in the goods passes by such indorsement and delivery of the bill of lading, whenever it is the intention of the parties that the property should pass, just as, under similar circumstances, the property would pass by an actual delivery of the goods. And for the purpose of passing such property in the goods, and completing the title of the indorsee to full possession thereof, the bill of lading, until complete delivery of the cargo has been made on shore to someone rightfully claiming under it, remains in force as a symbol, and carries with it not only the full ownership of the goods, but also all rights created by the contract of carriage between the shipper and the shipowner. It is a key which, in the hands of a rightful owner, is intended to unlock the door of the warehouse, floating or fixed, in which the goods may chance to be. The above effect and power belong to any one of the set of original bills of lading which is first dealt with by the shipper. Except in furtherance of the title so created of the indorsee, the other originals of the set are as against it perfectly ineffectual and have no efficacy whatever, unless they are fraudulently used for the purposes of deceit. By inveterate practice among most of the commercial nations of Europe, bills of lading have long been drawn by the shipowner in sets of three or more. Sometimes one of the set is retained by the captain, the others being transferred by the captain to the shipper. Sometimes the whole of the set are handed, upon shipment, to the merchant, the captain retaining a copy only. This practice of drawing bills of lading in triplicate may be at the present day, and under the altered conditions of communication between one part of the world and another, less valuable than it was when originally introduced, but it certainly had its distinct uses in the early stages of European commerce, and it still survives. If it survives it is probable that the commercial world still finds it more convenient or less troublesome to preserve it than to change it. And it is plain that the purpose and idea of drawing bills of lading in sets—whatever the present advantage or disadvantage of the plan—is that the whole set should not remain always in the same hands. The possibility of its separation is intentionally devised for the purpose not of fraud, but of protecting honest dealing. The separation may conceivably afford opportunities of fraud if the holders choose to be dishonest, but on the whole the commercial world is satisfied to run the risk of this contingency for the sake of the compensating advantages and conveniences which merchants, rightly or wrongly, have, till lately at all events, believed to be afforded by the system of triplicates or quadruplicates. The shipper or his vendees may prefer to retain one of the originals for their own protection against loss, or to transfer it to their correspondents. In such case they are in the habit of treating the remainder of the set as the effective documents, and as sufficient for all purposes of negotiating the goods comprised in the bill of lading.

The question we have to decide is whether the tender to the vendee of the only effective originals of the set is a sufficient tender under their contract, notwithstanding the absence of a third original, which is outstanding in the hands of the shipper, but which it is admitted in the present case has been in no way dealt with by him, and which has always remained in his hands as an ineffective and innocent triplicate. If we were to hold that such a tender is not adequate, we must, as it appears to me, deal a fatal blow at this established custom of merchants, according to which, time out of mind, bills of lading are drawn in sets, and one of the set is habitually dealt with as representing the cargo independently of the rest. If the set for purposes of contract like the present must always be kept together, the whole object, be it wise or unwise, of drawing bills of lading in triplicate is frustrated; for, if one of the set were lost, or had been forwarded by the shipper or any subsequent owner of the cargo to his correspondent by way of precaution, the cargo becomes unsaleable. The only possible object of requiring the presentation of the third original must be to prevent the chance, more or less remote, of fraud on the part of the shipper or some previous owner of the goods. But the practice of merchants, it is never superfluous to remark, is not based on the supposition of possible frauds. The object of mercantile usages is to prevent the risk of insolvency, not of fraud; and anyone who attempts to follow and understand the law merchant will soon find himself lost if he begins by assuming that merchants conduct their business on the basis of attempting to insure themselves against fraudulent dealing. The contrary is the case. Credit, not distrust, is the basis of commercial dealings; mercantile genius consists principally in knowing whom to trust and with whom to deal, and commercial intercourse and communication is no more based on the supposition of fraud than it is on the supposition of forgery. It appears to me accordingly that a tender is, at all events, in compliance with the present contract, by which all effective bills of lading in existence are tendered. If, indeed, the absent original had been misused so as to defeat the title of the indorsees of the tendered residue of the set, the tender would have been bad. But the vendee was not entitled to reject the tender of the only effective documents on the bare chance that a third effective bill of lading might possibly have been dealt with when in fact it had not. The person who rejects effective and adequate documents of title on the ground that another document may possibly be outstanding, does so at his own risk. If his surmise turns out to be well founded, his rejection of the tender would be justified. But if it is a mere surmise, and has no foundation in fact, he has chosen, by excess of caution, to place himself in the wrong. The bill of lading, I have said, may be regarded as the key of the warehouse where the goods are. Can a person who has contracted to pay on delivery of the keys of the warehouse refuse to accept the keys tendered to him on the ground that there is still a third key in the hands of the vendor which, if fraudulently used, might defeat the vendee's power of taking possession? I think business could not be, and is not, carried on upon any such principle.

The argument has been pressed upon us that, in the absence of the St. Petersburg original, there might be a difficulty in negotiating the two bills of lading out of the set of three. People who lend money upon or who purchase bills of lading can make their own terms. Whether they will trust to the current bills of lading produced in any case is a matter for themselves, and one upon which they would probably be guided by their faith in or distrust of their customer. But I do not believe that such suspicion, when it exists, is the natural or necessary consequence of the presentation of the two bills of lading without the third. We have had also pressed upon us in argument the decision in the House of Lords in the case of Glyn, Mills, and Co. v. East and West India Dock Company (ubi sup.); but that decision did not profess to alter the established usage of European merchants. It only showed that it was attended, in the case of fraud, with a risk which had not hitherto been sufficiently understood. If the mercantile world, having its attention called to this risk, chooses to alter its mode of doing business, that is a matter for its own decision. It may not think the disadvantage of the risk, even when explained, sufficient to justify a departure from the known and recognised modes of transacting commercial business. But until and unless it alters its method of dealing, and the forms of the well-known contracts by which it is done, I can only interpret its usages and its contracts as I find them, and as I am satisfied they are understood by the commercial world. I entertain no doubt that in the present instance the tender of the only effective bills of lading in existence was a sufficient tender, and that it would be so considered by any jury of merchants. As, in my judgment, the tender of the 3rd Aug. was sufficient, it becomes unnecessary to discuss the validity of the later tender of the 9th Aug. I in no way dissent from what the Master of the Rolls has said, but I do not think it necessary to decide or to express a final opinion about it. Judgment reversed.

Collision—British and foreign ships—Inspection of documents—Depositions before Receiver of Wreck—Board of Trade—Privilege.

In a damage action, arising out of a collision between a British and a foreign ship, copies of depositions made before the Receiver of Wreck by the crew of the British ship, and obtained from the Board of Trade by the owners of the British ship for the purposes of the action, are privileged, and inspection of them cannot be obtained by the owners of the foreign ship, even although the Board of Trade, on the ground that no such depositions have been made by any member of the foreign crew, has refused to allow the foreign owners to see them.

(a) Reported by J. P. Aspinall and F. W. Raikes, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

This was an appeal from a decision of Butt, J. given in a motion by the defendants in a damage action for inspection of copies of depositions made by the master and certain of the crew of the plaintiff's ship before the Receiver of Wreck.

The collision occurred between the British steamship Rivoli and the foreign steamship Palermo, on Aug. 25, 1883. On the 27th Aug. an action in rem was instituted by the owners of the Rivoli against the Palermo. The defendants applied on the 10th Oct. to the Board of Trade for copies of the depositions of the master and crew of the Rivoli. In reply they were informed that, as no depositions had been made by anyone belonging to the Palermo, the Board of Trade declined to furnish copies of the depositions made by those from the Rivoli. The defendants' solicitors thereupon applied to the plaintiffs' solicitors, asking them whether they had in their possession any copies of depositions made by the master and crew of the Rivoli.

Being unable to obtain such information, the defendants applied to the registrar for leave to administer interrogatories to the plaintiffs, asking them if they had copies of the depositions in their possession. The registrar referred the matter to the judge, and on the 13th Nov. the application came before Sir James Hannen in court, who directed interrogatories to be administered. In answer to such interrogatories, the plaintiffs admitted that depositions had been made before the Receiver of Wreck by the master and crew of the Rivoli, and said as follows: "I am informed by my solicitors, and believe, that after the proceedings in this action had been commenced by my said solicitors, they, for the purpose of advising me and my co-owners as to our rights against the defendants in this action, and for the purpose of this action and for their own use therein, obtained copies of such depositions, and that such copies are in their possession."

Nov. 17.—The motion now came on in court before Butt, J.

Dr. Stubbs, for the defendants, in support of the motion.—These depositions do not come within the compass of privileged documents:

Bustros v. White, L. Rep. 1 Q.B. Div. 423; 34 L. T. Rep. N. S. 835.

The original depositions are not privileged, and can it be said that copies of them are? These depositions were made before the action came into existence, and were in no way made for the purposes of the action. Again, this is not res integra, as Sir Robert Phillimore, in the case of The Turgot (not reported), under very similar circumstances, ordered inspection of depositions made before the Receiver of Wreck by members of the crew of a British ship, whose owners were plaintiffs in that action.

W. G. F. Phillimore, contra.—The Turgot is not in point. In that case the owner of the British ship inserted the depositions in their affidavit of documents as unprivileged. The copies now in question were got by the defendants' solicitors for the purposes of the action, and for the purpose of forming part of the brief. That being so, they are privileged:

Stubbs, in reply, cited

Nordon v. Defries, 8 Q. B. Div. 508.

Butt, J.—In this case I am not disposed to order discovery of these documents, which are copies of depositions made for purposes of the Board of Trade. In the first place, I am not at all sure that the Board of Trade would not be right in refusing copies of such documents as these in question. I do not myself clearly know what these documents are. I know there are documents taken by the Board of Trade officials for various statistical purposes, and I think it very undesirable that such reports should be disclosed, because the consequence would be that owners of ships would instruct their masters to give as little information as possible to the Board of Trade, and so the public interest would be injured. I am therefore not at all disposed to go out of my way to force disclosure of the copies of these documents. In the next place, I think that the doctrine of discovery has gone quite far enough. I do not presume to think that the authorities on this subject have gone too far, but I myself do not intend to go an inch further. Now, what are the facts here? Discovery is sought of copies of certain depositions made for the purposes of the Board of Trade. These copies, of which discovery is sought, were obtained for the purposes of this suit, and are, as the phrase is, to form part of the brief. That being so, I think they come within the term "privileged," and I will not go out of my way to inquire what the originals might be, as it is the copies of which discovery is sought, and not the depositions themselves. Therefore this motion must be dismissed, and the costs made costs in the cause.

From this decision the defendants appealed.

Dec. 3.—The appeal came on for hearing.

Carriage of goods—Bill of lading—"From the ship's tackles"—Discharge on to quay—Custom of port.

Goods were shipped under a bill of lading at Calcutta to be delivered in like good order and condition from the ship's tackles (where the ship's responsibility shall cease) at the port of London, &c. On arrival in the port of London the consignee demanded overside delivery into lighters immediately from the ship's tackles. The shipowner landed them on the dock wharf, and was ready to deliver them thence into the consignee's lighters, but the consignee carted them away, thereby becoming liable to and paying certain dock charges. In an action by the consignee against the shipowner to recover the amount so paid, the jury found that there was a custom for steamships having a general cargo (the defendants' ships being such) coming into the port of London, and using the docks, to discharge the goods on to the quay and thence into lighters.

Held, that the custom found was not inconsistent with the terms of the bill of lading, and that the shipowner was entitled to discharge the goods on to the quay, and was not liable for the charges sought to be recovered.

In this case a rule nisi was obtained upon the part of the plaintiff calling upon the defendants to show cause why the verdict obtained from them at the trial of the action at the Guildhall before Cave, J. should not be set aside, and a new trial had on the ground of misdirection.

The action was brought by Charles Thomas Marzetti, a bonded warehouseman carrying on business in the city of London, against George Smith and Son, shipowners, to recover 102*l.* 2*s.*, which the plaintiff alleged he had been compelled to pay to the London and St. Katherine Docks Company in order to obtain delivery of certain chests of tea.

The plaintiff, in his statement of claim, alleged that he was the consignee of certain chests of tea shipped on board the defendants' ships at Calcutta, under bills of lading which were so far as material to the following effect:

Shipped in good order and condition by Messrs. Cresswell and Co., of Calcutta, or received in good order and condition for shipment on board the steamship City of . . . . lying in the port of Calcutta, and bound for London, chests of tea being marked and numbered as per margin; and to be delivered, subject to the exceptions and conditions hereinafter mentioned, in the like good order and condition, from the ship's tackles (where the ship's responsibility shall cease) at the aforesaid port of London, or so near thereto as she may safely get, unto order, or to his or their assigns. . . . The following are the exceptions and conditions above referred to: . . . . The goods are to be discharged from the ship as soon as public intimation is given that she is ready to unload, and if not thereupon removed without delay by the consignee, the master or agent is to be at liberty to land the same; or if necessary, to discharge into bulk, lazaretto, or hired lighters, at the risk and expense of the owners of the goods. . . .

That on the arrival of each of the respective ships the plaintiff passed an entry for delivery of the tea overside into his lighters, and demanded of the owners delivery into his lighters, but that the defendants in each case wrongfully, and contrary to the direction of the plaintiff, discharged and landed the same on the wharf or quay belonging to the London and St. Katharine's Docks Company; that the plaintiff thereupon applied to the dock company for delivery, but the company refused to deliver until payment by him of certain amounts for rent, landing, wharfage, and delivery, amounting in all to 102*l.* 2*s.*, which the plaintiff was compelled to pay to obtain delivery of the tea, and these were the sums which the plaintiff claimed to recover from the defendant.

The defendants, in their statement of defence, pleaded (inter alia) that the said teas were delivered from the ship's tackles at the port of London within the true intent and meaning of the bills of lading for the same, according to the usage of the port of London with respect to the delivery of goods from general ships arriving in the Victoria Docks, in accordance with which usage the docks company take all the goods on board out of the ship and put them on to the quay alongside the ship.

The case came on for trial at the Guildhall, in May 1880, before Huddleston, B., who nonsuited the plaintiff.

A rule for a new trial having been granted by Grove and Mathew, JJ., the case was tried a second time in Dec. 1882, at the Guildhall, before Cave, J., when the jury found that there was a well-known custom and usage for steamships having a general cargo (the defendants' ships being such) coming into the port of London and using the docks to discharge the goods on to the quay and thence into lighters, and not to discharge them directly into lighters, and the learned judge thereupon gave judgment for the defendants.

A rule nisi for a new trial was thereupon obtained on the part of the plaintiff calling upon the defendants to show cause why the verdict should not be set aside, and a new trial had, on the ground that, if there was a custom proved as alleged, the same could not and did not control the contract contained in the bill of lading, and that the learned judge misdirected the jury in telling them that it was not inconsistent with the contract.

The 67th section of the Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 13) referred to in the argument is as follows:

67. Where the owner of any goods imported in any ship from foreign parts into the United Kingdom fails to make entry thereof, or having made entry thereof to land the same or take delivery thereof, and to proceed therewith with all convenient speed, by the times severally hereinafter mentioned, the shipowner may make entry of and land or unship the said goods at the times, in the manner, and subject to the conditions following (that is to say):

(5) If, at any time before the goods are landed or unshipped, the owner of the goods is ready and offers to land or take delivery of the same, he shall be allowed so to do, and his entry shall in such case be preferred to any entry which may have been made by the shipowner:

(6) If any goods are, for the purpose of convenience in assorting the same, landed at the wharf where the ship is discharged, and the owner of the goods at the time of such landing has made entry and is ready and offers to take delivery thereof, and to convey the same to some other wharf or warehouse, such goods shall be assorted at landing, and shall, if demanded, be delivered to the owner thereof within twenty-four hours after assortment; and the expense of and consequent on such landing and assortment shall be borne by the shipowner.

Butt, Q.C. (with him Wood Hill), for the defendants, showed cause.—The case of Petrocochino v. Bott (2 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 310; 30 L. T. Rep. N. S. 841; L. Rep. 9 C. P. 355) is conclusive in this case. It has now been found as a fact that it is the custom for general ships coming into the port of London and using the docks to discharge the goods on to the quay, and thence into lighters. No distinction can be drawn between the words of the bill of lading in that case "from the ship's deck" and the words in the present bill of lading "from the ship's tackles." Brett, J. there says: "If delivery is by the usage of the port to be made in a certain manner, a delivery in that manner satisfies the shipowner's undertaking to deliver at the port, unless there be something in the terms of the contract inconsistent with it," and "it seems to me that this bill of lading could not more accurately describe the mode of delivery from the ship's deck to an intermediate place of delivery." There is nothing in the bill of lading in this case inconsistent with the custom of the port. The condition therein providing that the goods are to be discharged from the ship as soon as public intimation is given that she is ready to unload, and if not thereupon removed without delay by the consignee, the master or agent is to be at liberty to land the same, cannot be construed as forbidding the shipowner to land the goods according to the usual custom, because the shipowner brings his lighters alongside, and is ready to take immediate delivery overside.

F. O. Crump (with him C. Russell, Q.C.) in support of the rule.—The point in this case differs from that raised in Petrocochino v. Bott (ubi sup.). In that case no demand was made by the consignee for delivery into lighters immediately from the ship's deck, and the question was whether the goods having been discharged on to the quay with the view of being delivered thence into the consignee's lighters, without any objection on the part of the consignee, the ship's responsibility ceased when the goods had been placed on the quay, or continued until they had been placed in the consignee's lighters. In this case the consignee asked for overside delivery directly from the ship's tackles into his lighters, in accordance with the terms of the bill of lading. This the shipowner refused, and is seeking to set up a custom of the port inconsistent with the written contract contained in the bill of lading, contrary to the decision of the Court of Appeal in Hayton v. Irwin (4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas, 212; 41 L. T. Rep. N. S. 666; 5 C. P. Div. 130). It is on this case that the plaintiff relies, the case of Petrocochino v. Bott not being in point. Secondly, the plaintiff on the arrival of the ship passed an entry for delivery of the tea overside, and thereupon the 5th sub-section of the 67th section of the Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 63) came into operation. That sub-section provides that "if at any time before the goods are landed or unshipped the owner of the goods is ready and offers to land or take delivery of the same, he shall be allowed so to do, and his entry shall in such case be preferred to any entry which may have been made by the shipowner." Under that sub-section the plaintiff was clearly entitled to delivery overside in accordance with his entry. Even if the custom is to be imported into the bill of lading, it cannot be imported into the Act of Parliament. [MATHEW, J.—Does not the 6th sub-section apply here?] No; the plaintiff was willing to wait till his goods were arrived at in the course of unloading, and could be delivered to him in the regular course. The effect of the 5th sub-section is that the mode of discharge elected by the consignee is to be preferred to that elected by the shipowner, and in this case the shipowner, notwithstanding that the consignee has done everything to comply with the Act of Parliament, has insisted on landing them on the quay.

Butt, Q.C. was heard upon the effect of the Act of Parliament.—The 67th section does not apply at all in this case. It only applies where the owner "fails to make entry" of the goods, "or having made entry thereof fails to land the same or take delivery thereof and to proceed therewith with all convenient speed." At any rate it was not the object nor is it the effect of the Act to derogate from the shipowner's rights or to interfere with the custom of the port. If the section does in any sense apply, the shipowner then has a right to land the goods under the 6th sub-section for the purpose of assorting them. It must be remembered that the shipowner was ready to deliver the goods from the quay into the plaintiff's lighters free of charge, but the plaintiff preferred to remove them in carts by land, whereby he incurred these charges which he is now seeking to recover.

Grove, J.—I am of opinion that this rule must be discharged. The sole question, although for the purposes of the argument it has been subdivided into others, is whether the custom assumed in this case is to be imported into the bill of lading and into the Act of Parliament. Is then the bill of lading so framed as to exclude the customary mode of delivery in the port of London? The words in the bill of lading providing for delivery are these, "to be delivered subject to the exceptions and conditions hereinafter mentioned, in the like good order and condition, from the ship's tackles (where the ship's responsibility shall cease), at the aforesaid port of London, or so near thereto as she may safely get, unto order or to his or their assigns." Now it is said that, if by the custom of the port of London, by which goods are not delivered direct from the ship's tackles, the goods are placed upon the quay even for a minute, the plaintiff does not get the benefit of the contract into which the defendant has entered with him. I do not read the contract from this narrow point of view, and moreover I read this clause as having been inserted for the benefit of the shipowner. It is clearly to protect him and to enable him to oblige the owner of the goods. Usually where a clause is inserted in a contract for the benefit of one of the parties to it, that party can dispense with it, and the other party cannot oblige him to take notice of it, unless it is for the benefit of both. This is the rule which we must apply in this case. The plaintiff's construction of the clause makes it obligatory on the shipowner whether it is easy or whether it is difficult, whether it is customary or whether it is not, to deliver the goods to him directly from the ship's tackles, and the contract, he says, is not performed unless the goods are handed literally from the ship's tackles to the particular barge of the consignee. There is nothing in the words of the clause which requires this application of it. I read it as meaning "to be delivered from the ship's tackles in the usual mode adopted in the port of delivery," not in the most different mode from it that there can be. The owner might, for instance, invert the present case, and in a port where it was the custom to discharge into lighters might insist on the ship approaching a jetty and delivering his goods direct from the ship's tackle, and refuse to have them brought to him in lighters although it cost him nothing. The plaintiff, in fact, wants to insert in the contract the word "immediately" before the words "from the ship's tackle." I think that the words are sufficiently complied with, provided the owner is put to no expense, if the goods are put on to the wharf and thence into lighters. In this case they are delivered in the port of London, and the usual mode of delivery is to place them first on to the quay. It is almost necessary to do this, from a commercial point of view, for the convenience of sorting them, for some portions of the cargo must of necessity be placed under others, and you cannot sort the various portions on deck properly. What then can be more convenient than to put them all on to the quay and sort them, and to allow the ship to deliver them from her tackle on to the quay as soon as possible? Possibly, if there were no other means of taking away the goods from the wharf than overland, the defendants might be liable for the expenses; but in this case the ship was willing to deliver them into barges as the plaintiff wanted them. I see nothing, therefore, to exclude the ordinary custom which is universal in that locality from this bill of lading, the principle being that, unless the terms of the bill of lading are repugnant to the ordinary custom, the custom must be read into it.

But it is said that among the exceptions in the bill of lading is this, "the goods are to be discharged from the ship as soon as public intimation is given that she is ready to unload, and if not thereupon removed without delay by the consignee the master or agent is to be at liberty to land the same, or if necessary to discharge into hulk, lazaretto, or hired lighters, at the risk and expense of the owners of the goods." Mr. Crump has founded an argument on those words, but they simply mean that, under the circumstances there mentioned, the shipowner may do what is most convenient for the ship, and may land them if landing them is more convenient to the ship, and on the other hand if less convenient may deposit them in lighters. They show that the shipowner may do what is most convenient if he takes proper care of the goods, and does not put the owner of them to unnecessary expense. In this case the shipowner did not insist on the consignee's taking the goods overland; on the contrary, he was ready to put them into the means of conveyance the consignee wanted without putting him to any expense, and doing it in a way which insured accuracy, and did away with any liability to mistake. There were very similar words in the bill of lading in the case of Petrococchino v. Bott (2 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 310; 30 L.T. Rep. N.S. 841; L. Rep. 9 C.P. 355). In that case it is true the words were "from the ship's deck;" but there is practically no difference between the words "deck" and "tackle," inasmuch as the goods are moved from the deck by the tackle. There the majority of the court considered that, if delivery is by the usage of the port to be made in a certain manner, a delivery in that manner satisfies the shipowner's undertaking to deliver at the port, unless there be something in the contract inconsistent with it. This is an express decision in point, putting aside the statute, the bearing of which was not mentioned in the case.

And now I pass to the statute 25 & 26 Vict. c. 63, the material part of which is the 5th sub-section of the 67th section, which is, "Where the owner of any goods imported in any ship from foreign parts into the United Kingdom fails to make entry thereof, or having made entry thereof, to land the same or take delivery thereof, and to proceed therewith with all convenient speed, by the times severally hereinafter mentioned, the shipowner may make entry of and land or unship the said goods at the times, in the manner, and subject to the conditions following: that is to say, (5) If at any time before the goods are landed or unshipped the owner of the goods is ready and offers to land or take delivery of the same, he shall be allowed so to do, and his entry shall in such case be preferred to any entry which may have been made by the shipowner." That section again must be subject to the natural or incidental conveniences of landing. Its object is not to oblige the shipowner to do that which is inconvenient and calculated to derange the whole course of traffic, but to allow him to carry on his business in the usual and proper manner. That it has that meaning the 6th sub-section of the same section is strong evidence. That sub-section provides that, "if any goods are, for the purpose of convenience in assorting the same, landed at the wharf where the ship is discharged, and the owner of the goods at the time of such landing has made entry, and is ready and offers to take delivery thereof, and to convey the same to some other wharf or warehouse, such goods shall be assorted at landing, and shall, if demanded, be delivered to the owner thereof within twenty-four hours after assortment; and the expense of and consequent on such landing and assortment shall be borne by the shipowner." Now within the evidence in this case we should assume that it is more convenient to sort the goods on the wharf than on the deck. Possibly in the case of small coasting vessels such a course of business might be possible, but in a large ship such as this it is quite obvious that it is impossible to sort the various parcels on the deck of the vessel, and the shipowner therefore lands them for the purpose of sorting them and delivering them to the plaintiff expeditiously. Custom in all these cases is of the essence of the matter, and must come in in every case, varying in each according to local considerations, and I see nothing to lead us to make a rigid rule irrespective of custom and practical convenience. Construing then the bill of lading and the sections of the Act as narrowly as I can, I am of opinion that judgment must be entered for the defendants.

Mathew, J.—I am of the same opinion, and I regret that in such a case as this a second trial should have been necessary. The case came before us by reason of a non-suit having been entered at the first trial before Huddleston, B., and we thought it right to send it down to ascertain the existence or non-existence of a custom, and whether the mode of delivery adopted in this case is the mode usually adopted in the docks of the port of London, and it has now been found that it is. Is there any difficulty, then, in reading the custom into the bill of lading? I see none whatever, and it must therefore be interposed after the words "to be delivered from the ship's tackles," so as to make the bill of lading read "from the ship's tackles in the customary manner;" that is, from the ship's tackle on to the quay and thence into lighters or otherwise at the option of the consignee. There is nothing inconsistent with this in the following words of the clause, and I know of no principle under which the words of the other clause contained in the exceptions can be said to prohibit this customary delivery. I think that the case of Petrocochino v. Bott (ubi sup.) is precisely in point. The subject-matter of that case, and the words of the bill of lading are similar to the present; and Brett, J. there said: "Thus the mode and manner of delivery of goods according to the usage of the port of London is, not an immediate delivery from the ship to the consignee, but from the ship to the quay, and from the quay to the consignee. Having regard to that usage the bill of lading is drawn. It seems to me that it could not more accurately describe the mode of delivery from the ships deck to an intermediate place of delivery."

But it has been contended that the bill of lading must not be construed in this way, because the Act of Parliament prescribes an imperative mode of delivery, and that the object of the statute is to direct delivery overside at the option of the consignee, but on turning to the Act it is obvious that the Act says nothing of the kind. Its object is to provide for the shipowner's lien for freight, and on the other hand to secure delivery to the consignee free from charge unless he makes default and is not ready to take the goods in due course. It does not, therefore affect the question, and as my interpretation of the bill of lading is entirely in favour of the defendants, I think that judgment must be entered for them.

Rule discharged.

From this decision the plaintiff appealed, and the appeal was heard on the 19th June.

F. O. Crump (Charles Russell, Q.C. with him) for the appellant.

Cohen, Q.C. and Wood Hill, for the respondents, were not called on.

Brett, M.R.—In this case the plaintiff sued the shipowner for refusing to deliver the cargo in accordance with the interpretation put by the plaintiff upon the terms of the bill of lading. The facts are, that the ship arrived in a London dock and took a quay berth, her other side being open to the water in the dock, so that she could be approached by lighters in the dock. The plaintiff insists that he has a right under the terms of the bill of lading to have his goods delivered upon the water side of the vessel into lighters lying alongside, while the defendants contend that no such interpretation can be placed upon the words of the bill of lading, and that there is a well-known custom for vessels such as this coming into the port of London and using the docks to discharge the goods on to the quay and thence into lighters, and not to discharge them directly into lighters. This custom the jury found to exist, at the trial. The question is, which of these two contentions is well founded, and that question depends upon what is the true construction to be placed upon the terms of the bill of lading, and whether those terms are so distinct as to render the evidence of the custom given at the trial inadmissible on the ground that it contradicts the express terms of the contract between the parties,

A further question arises upon the Merchant Shipping Act 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 63), because it is argued by the plaintiff that, inasmuch as he passed an entry for the delivery of his goods overside into lighters, sub-sect. 5 of sect. 67 of that Act comes into operation, and that sub-section is in these terms: "If at any time before the goods are landed or unshipped the owner of the goods is ready and offers to land or take delivery of the same, he shall be allowed so to do, and his entry shall in such case be preferred to any entry which may have been made by the shipowner." I will deal with the point made under the statute at once. I do not think that this sub-section will bear the construction contended for by the plaintiff. The section is dealing with the case of a consignee failing to be ready to take delivery when the shipowner is ready to land his goods; and the Act provides that, as long as the consignee is present and ready to take delivery, delivery shall be made to him, but otherwise the shipowner may land the goods himself; but there is nothing in the section of the Act which has been relied upon to oblige the shipowner to deliver to a consignee, who is ready to take delivery, in any way he may please and in a manner opposed to the custom of the port at which the vessel may be. The section referred to simply gives power to a shipowner to deliver goods not to a consignee personally, subject to certain conditions, one of which is the condition in the sub-section relied upon that the consignee shall be entitled to personal delivery if he is ready and willing to take it. As to the question upon the construction of the bill of lading, the words of the bill of lading are, "to be delivered . . . . from the ship's tackles." I should think the proper construction to be placed upon these words would be doubtful in the absence of proof of any custom of the port of delivery; but when it is shown that the custom of the port of delivery is that ships which have a quay berth shall deliver upon the quay only, then I think we must read into that bill of lading the words "upon the quay," and if we do so, then nobody can say that they, by their addition, contradict the contract between the parties; they only explain it. It appears to me, therefore, quite impossible to say that evidence of the custom could properly have been excluded on the ground that it contradicted the express terms of the bill of lading.

Lindley, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The plaintiff claims under the bill of lading to have his goods delivered to him in a manner that is not in accordance with the custom of the port of delivery, and it is argued on his behalf that the terms of the bill of lading are so express as to exclude evidence of the custom which it is said, contradicts them. The way to test that contention seems to me to read the proved custom into the bill of lading, and then to see if it becomes in its terms contradictory. If we follow that test, I think it is plain that by adding after the words "from the ship's tackles" the words "on to the quay," or some similar words, we in no way make the bill of lading at all inconsistent; and therefore I think that the plaintiff must take delivery of his goods according to the custom of the port of delivery. I think the decision of the Divisional Court was right, and must be affirmed.

Fry, L.J.—I am of the same opinion.

Towage contract—Implied warranty—Notice restricting liability—Negligence—Statutory bye-law — Damage — Stranding — The Harbours, Docks, and Piers Clauses Act 1847*—The Great Yarmouth Port and Haven Act* 1866.

A term in a towage contract, by which tug-owners exempt themselves from liability for damage or loss occasioned by the negligence or default of their servants, covers damage occasioned in consequence of the act of the master taking in tow too many vessels at a time in contravention of a statutory bye-law of the port in which the towage takes place, although the number of vessels causes the tug to be of insufficient power for the service.

The steam-tug U.S. was engaged to tow the R. R. down the river at Y., and out to sea. As the U. S. proceeded she took other vessels in tow, eventually having seven to tow at the same time. By a regulation made by the harbour or pier master under the Harbours, Docks, and Piers Clauses Act 1847*, and the Great Yarmouth Port and Haven Act* 1866*, a tug is forbidden to take more than six vessels in tow at the same time. The owner of the R. R. had, previously to the towage, received a notice from the owners of the U. S. exempting them from any liability in respect of any damage caused by the negligence or default of their servants, which was admitted to form part of the towage contract. On the way out to sea the pier master warned the master of the tug that he had too many vessels in tow. The tug nevertheless proceeded, and when at the entrance of the harbour, by reason of the tug being unable to command the seven tows, the R. R. stranded, and became a total wreck. In an action for the damage to the R. R.:*

Held (confirming the judgment below), that the owners of the U. S. were protected by their notice from liability.

This was an appeal by the plaintiffs from a judgment of Sir Robert Phillimore, dated Jan. 23, 1883, by which he had found in favour of the defendants.

The action was brought by the appellants for damage sustained by their fishing smack the Red Rose, whilst being towed out of Great Yarmouth Harbour by the defendants' tug the United Service. A term of the towage contract was a notice given by the defendants to the plaintiffs stating that they would not be responsible for any damage occasioned to the tows by the negligence or default of their servants. The master of the tug after commencing to tow the Red Rose took in tow other vessels, amounting in all to seven. By a regulation made under the Harbours, Docks, and Piers Clauses Act 1874, and the Great Yarmouth Port and Haven Act 1866, it is enacted as follows: "No steam vessel used for the purpose of towing vessels shall, at any one and the same time, tow or have in tow, or aid, or assist in towing, more than six vessels."

By reason of the number of vessels in tow the United Service was unable to keep the tows in their proper course, and the Red Rose in consequence stranded and was lost.

(a) Reported by J. P. Aspinall, and F. W. Raikes, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

The other facts of the case fully appear in the report of the case below (5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 55; 48 L. T. Rep. N. S. 486; L. Rep. 8 P. Div. 56).

W. G. F. Phillimore for the appellants.

Webster Q.C. and Witt, for the respondents, were not called upon.

The arguments were substantially the same as those in the court below.

The following authorities were cited in argument:

The Julia, 14 Moo. P. C. 210; Lush. 224;
Steel v. The State Line Steamship Company, 37 L. T. Rep. N. S. 333; L. Rep. 3 App. Cas. 72; 3 Mar. Law Cas. 516;
The Minnehaha, 4 L. T. Rep. N. S. 811; Lush. 335; 1 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 111; Worms v. Story, 11 Ex. 427.

Brett, M.R.—In this case we see no difficulty. An action has been brought against the owners of the tug United Service for damage to the Red Rose whilst being towed by the United Service. A term of the contract was, that the owners of the tug would not be responsible for damage caused by the negligence or default of their servants. A local statutory bye-law says, no tug shall take in tow more than six vessels at a time. The tug master here took in tow more than six vessels, and more than his tug could manage, and by so negligently acting caused the mischief complained of. The duty of the captain of the tug was to take in tow as many vessels as he could manage. If he took more, and did so negligently or unskilfully, no doubt his owners would have been liable if there had not been this notice. It has been argued that the tug owners are liable, because it is said there was an implied warranty that the tug should be fit to perform the towage, and that the master would act in conformity with the statutory bye-law. But this action could only have been maintained primâ facie on the ground of negligence, and against this the owners have protected themselves. This appeal must, therefore, be dismissed with costs.

Baggallay and Bowen, L.JJ. concurred.

Collision—Regulations for preventing collisions—Infringement—Lights—36 & 37 Vict. c. 85, s. 17.

Departure from the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea is justifiable under article 23, where the departure is the only chance of avoiding the collision, and is, in fact, the best manœuvre under the circumstances.

A steamship approaching another vessel so as to involve risk of collision is justified in keeping her engines going full speed ahead where she is placed in a position of unexpected danger by the neglect of the other vessel to exhibit one of her lights whilst showing the other in an improper place, and where such going ahead is, in fact, the only chance of avoiding n collision.

(a) Reported by J. P. Aspinall and F. W. Raikes, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

This was an appeal by the defendants in a damage action from a judgment of Sir Robert Phillimore, by which he had found the defendants' barque Benares alone to blame for the collision.

The collision took place between the steamship Gerarda and the barque Benares in the English Channel at about 3.30 a.m. on the morning of 24th Oct. 1882. The learned judge below found that the Benares was to blame for not having a red light duly exhibited, and that the Gerarda, by reason of this departure from the regulations on the part of the Benares, was justified by article 23 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea in starboarding and keeping on at full speed. The facts of the case are reported in the court below (48 L. T. Rep. N. S. 127; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 53).

C. Hall, Q.C. and Bucknill (with them W. R. Kennedy) for the defendants, in support of the appeal.—[During the course of the argument their Lordships stated that, acting on the advice of their nautical assessors, they had come to the conclusion that the Benares was in fault, and that the captain of the Gerarda had, in starboarding his helm and keeping his engines full speed adopted the only chance of escape, and had in fact, by so doing, executed the best manœuvre under the circumstances.] Even so, the Gerarda is to blame for infringing the Regulations for Preventing Collisions, as interpreted by the House of Lords:

The Khedive, 43 L. T. Rep. N. S. 610; L. Rep. 5 App. Cas. 876; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 360.

The 18th article of the regulations directs that a steamship, when approaching another so as to involve risk of collision, shall slacken her speed or stop and reverse. The 23rd article, however, allows a departure from the 18th article under special circumstances. These two articles were both fully considered in The Khedive (ubi sup.), and, as there interpreted by the House of Lords, the circumstances of the present case did not justify the Gerarda in infringing article 18. Their Lordships, in The Khedive, most strenuously upheld the necessity of rigidly obeying these rules, and the only justification for departing from them is where the vessel departing is threatened by some immediate danger, external to herself and the approaching ship, as, for instance, a peril of the sea. The argument that, if that be so, the Legislature has commanded captains, rather than disobey these rules, to seek certain death in obedience to them, although there is just a chance of escape by disobeying them, is not quite accurate. The Legislature knows that no sane and reasonable captain would, however much the Legislature might direct him, commit his ship and crew to certain destruction rather than disobey the regulations. But what they say is, that it is so important that no encouragement whatsoever should be given to captains to disobey these regulations, that even where a captain takes the only means of avoiding a disastrous collision and disobeys the regulations, his owners must be held liable. No doubt the result of this is, that in particular cases hardships will occur, but it is more beneficial to the community at large, that this at first sight harsh construction should be upheld rather than that obedience to these regulations should be in any way left to the discretion of the captains. The consequences of a less harsh construction would be that masters would be continually departing from the regulations, and so cause a great increase in the number of shipping disasters.

Finlay, Q.C. and W. G. F. Phillimore, for the respondents, were not called upon.

Brett, M.R.—In this case there has been a collision between the barque Benares and the steamer Gerarda, and what the Court of Admiralty has to do under such circumstances is to come to a decision as to what were the real circumstances and the real positions of these vessels when they approached each other. It has been urged that the court is bound to take the evidence exactly as it is given on the one side or the other. But the Court of Admiralty knows how difficult it is for witnesses, even if they intend to state the exact truth, to tell the circumstances exactly. The court has to determine from the evidence on both sides and from the circumstances of the case, which cannot be contradicted and cannot be doubted, what were the positions of these vessels. In this case it is said by the appellants that those on board the Gerarda have given the actual bearings of these ships with regard to each at the time when first seen—the actual bearings of the ships and not the appearance of the lights. In my opinion that evidence cannot be correct. If that evidence were correct, the collision never could have taken place in the manner in which it did. These vessels appeared to those on the Gerarda to be approaching end on, or nearly end on, and it would seem that they considered that the Benares was somewhat on the port side of the Gerarda. In my opinion these vessels were, in fact, approaching each other port side to port side. But the Gerarda was led into a mistaken view of the condition of things by the misconduct and negligence of those on board the Benares. The Gerarda had a right to the assistance, considering the state of the night, of the lights of the Benares, in order to enable her to know exactly where the Benares was. The court below has come to the conclusion that, by negligence on board the Benares, that assistance was not given, and so far as the evidence goes it seems to me that that is the right conclusion. It is clear that no red light could be seen. I have the strongest suspicion that the green light was not in its place, and that it could be seen without the starboard side being exposed. If the Benares had had a red light the other vessel would have seen it, but by a want of a red light, and very likely by want of both lights, she gave no notice of where she was. Therefore it seems to me that the vessels had approached very close, by the fault of the Benares, and by her fault alone, when the Gerarda acted as she said she did. The conclusion therefore to which I arrive, and to which those who assist us have arrived, is that, when the Gerarda saw the Benares the vessels were very much closer than has been stated by the Gerarda. That was due to the fault of the Benares. Now, supposing the green light of the Benares was seen either by the fault of the Benares in its not being in its proper place, or by her being thrown off the wind (if it was seen at all), the Gerarda did no wrong in starboarding. It was impossible for her to see that at the time the green light was disclosed to her, she was so near to the other vessel that if she starboarded that would not be sufficient without stopping her engines. There was nothing to show her that there was then danger of collision, whereas there ought to have been. But eventually the vessels came so near to each other that the Gerarda could see, notwithstanding the want of lights, the position in which she was, and the fact that the other vessel was showing her port side. Under these circumstances, what was her captain to do, it being always remembered that this position is brought about by the fault of the Benares? By the 18th article of the present Regulations for Preventing Collisions, there being nothing else in the circumstances, he ought to have stopped and reversed. Therefore, unless he was within some other rule, he comes within the terms of that rule, and has broken it. But the rules of navigation are not contained in one rule, but in all the rules, and the 23rd rule is as much to be observed as the 18th, and the navigation of a steamer is to be conducted, not upon the 18th rule alone, but upon the 18th and the 23rd. It is true, as I understand the case of The Khedive (ubi sup.) that though the Benares had put the Gerarda's officer into such a position that any reasonable man would have done what the officer of the Gerarda did, yet if, nevertheless, the court upon the whole facts could not come to the conclusion that the case was brought within the 23rd rule, then the owner of the Gerarda must be liable, although his servant had done that which every reasonable man would have done. I accept that proposition as the law laid down by the House of Lords in the case of The Khedive (ubi sup.), harsh as it may seem. Then we come to see whether this case is brought within the 23rd rule. It is brought within the 23rd rule, and therefore taken out of the 18th rule, if the necessity of the particular case was such, and the circumstances were so special, that they rendered a departure from the 18th rule necessary in order to avoid immediate danger. We are advised that in this case the ships were in such a position at the moment when the 18th rule would have applied, that the only chance and the best thing to do on the part of the Gerarda was to put her helm hard-a-starboard and to proceed at full speed and more than that, that as a fact, and not merely in the thought of the captain, it was the only means of avoiding a dangerous collision. If the circumstances of the vessels at the time when the 18th rule would have applied, were such, that the only thing to avoid, and the only means of avoiding an immediate and dangerous collision, was not to act upon the 18th rule, but to act in the way the captain did, then in my opinion it was necessary, within the meaning of the 23rd rule, to do what this captain did, in order to get the chance of avoiding and to avoid immediate danger. If that be so, this case is within the 23rd article, and is taken, by reason of its being in the 23rd, out of the 18th. Now, it is said that that is not so, even if it be true that it was the best thing to do, and the only means of avoiding danger to these two vessels, and in that sense necessary to avoid immediate danger; because it is said that the meaning of this rule is, that the danger spoken of in article 23 is not the danger to either of the vessels approaching each other, but some outside danger. It is certain that the House of Lords never said that in The Khedive (ubi sup.). They were not called upon to decide such a thing in The Khedive, and never did decide such a thing.

It is suggested that Lord Blackburn did use that language. I do not believe it. I would almost say I cannot believe that that was his judgment. Enough for me to say that I do not believe he said so. It cannot be the opinion of the House of Lords, because if it was, it would make the rule absolutely ridiculous. Therefore, upon the advice given to us, and acting upon that advice, I think that this case was within the 23rd rule, and therefore that the Gerarda was the innocent vessel and the Benares solely to blame.

Baggallay, L.J.—I am of the same opinion, and in the few observations I shall make I will follow the argument of Mr Hall on the case of The Khedive (ubi sup.). What was decided in The Khedive according to the marginal note is this: "The Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, made under the authority of the Merchant Shipping Acts 1854 to 1873,, must under sect. 17 of 36 & 37 Vict. c. 85, be strictly followed. Actual necessity, not considerations of discretion and expediency, even though skilfully acted upon, can alone excuse their non-observance." Now, I think it is clear, upon a consideration of this case. that each one of the three learned Lords in The Khedive based his decision entirely upon the circumstances of the case. It was clearly proved that there had been a departure from the strict rule imposed by the 16th article of the old rules, requiring that, "Every steamship, when approaching another ship so as to involve risk of collision, shall slacken her speed or, if necessary, stop and reverse." It was proved, but not admitted, that what was done was not strictly correct, inasmuch as the captain of the Khedive did not stop and reverse or even slacken his speed, and therefore there had been a departure from the rule. But it was sought to be said there was no departure from the 23rd rule. The argument of counsel on the one side was that, assuming there had been a departure from the rule, nevertheless the Khedive was exculpated by article 23, and therefore there was no liability. On the other hand it was said that article 23 did not absolve the owners of the Khedive. In the course of the judgment of Lord Blackburn, he referred to the question put to the assessors by the present Master of the Rolls in the court below in the following words: "If this order which he gave was not absolutely right under the circumstances (that is, the order that the engineers should stand by the engines), was that such an order as a captain of ordinary care, skill, and nerve might be fairly as a seaman excused for giving, under the circumstances in which this captain was placed?" The answer in the affirmative was relied upon by the counsel for the Khedive as sufficiently justifying the departure from the regulation.

The argument chiefly turned upon the 17th section of 36 & 37 Vict. c. 85, which is: "If in any case of collision it is proved to the court before which the case is tried that any of the regulations for preventing collisions contained in or made under the Merchant Shipping Acts 1854 to 1873 has been infringed, the ship by which such regulation has been infringed shall be deemed to be in fault, unless it be shown to the satisfaction of the court that the circumstances of the case made departure from the regulation necessary." Of course, when you are trying to see whether any regulation has been infringed you must look at the whole body of regulations applicable to the particular case, and not say because one regulation has been infringed there has necessarily been an infringement. I will not refer in detail to the judgments of the three lords. I merely call attention to the fact that they all concur in the mode of dealing with this question. Reference has been made to Lord Hatherley's judgment, and I will just refer to the following passage: "Therefore, my Lords, I think that the regulations having been departed from by the Khedive, that vessel must be deemed to be in fault, unless the master produces a statutory exculpation, and proves it to the satisfaction of the court. That does not appear to have been done in this instance. It follows that the course we must take will be to restore the judgment of the Court of Admiralty, and to reverse that portion of the decree of the Court of Appeal which exempts the Khedive from liability." Therefore the question was not whether the circumstances were such as to make it necessary, in order to avoid danger, that the rule must be departed from, but whether, having actually been departed from, the circumstances were such that the master might be excused in taking the course he did. In the present case I think you must read the 23rd article in connection with the 18th article and, acting on the advice of those gentlemen who assist us, I have come to the conclusion that this case does fall within article 23, and that there was sufficient justification for the departure from article 18.

Bowen, L.J.—I am of the same opinion, and I will only add a few words as to the points of law argued by Mr. Hall and Mr. Bucknill. It seems to me that the case of The Khedive decided that it is no answer, when the rule has been infringed, to say that the person infringing acted with the best motives, and according to the best lights of his profession. The question here is, whether the rules have been obeyed. Article 18 provides, "Every steamship, when approaching another ship so as to involve risk of collision, shall slacken her speed, or stop and reverse if necessary." If that rule stood alone, it might be said (though I will not say that even then some other doubt might not arise) probably with accuracy, that that rule had been infringed. But we must also look to article 23, which is to be read with article 18. and enacts that, "In obeying and construing these rules due regard shall be had to all dangers of navigation, and to any special circumstances which may render a departure from the above rules necessary, in order to avoid immediate danger." The House of Lords has pointed out, and I cheerfully and willingly accept their view, that this article is to be read by the light of the words of sect. 17 of the Merchant Shipping Act of 1873, which provides that, "Unless it is shown to the satisfaction of the court that the circumstances of the case made departure from the rule necessary," the ship infringing shall be deemed to be in fault. This enactment, that it must be shown to the satisfaction of the court, if there has been an infringement, that the circumstances of the case made a departure from the rule necessary, is not unlike in words to article 23, which says that, in considering the question whether an infringement has taken place or not, "regard is to be had to the special circumstances which may render a departure from the rules necessary in order to avoid immediate danger."

First of all, in order to excuse non-compliance with article 18 it must be shown that what the captain did was reasonable. That I agree with. Again, it is not enough to show that what he did was advisable. I agree with that also. But then comes the question whether departure from the rule is to be excused when departure is necessary. The law says it must then be excused. Then was it necessary here? Can it be said that it is not necessary even when it is the only chance of safety? Mr. Hall argued, though not with such force upon this particular point as upon the others, that success is the only justification. But that hardly stands, because sect. 17 of 36 & 37 Vict. c. 85 assumes there has been a collision. But then Mr. Hall says, to justify a departure, there must be some risk other than mere danger of collision, as a peril of the sea or land. But just let us consider what extraordinary results would ensue if this were so. A man when he is placed in a position of danger by some peril of the sea may refrain from stopping, and yet to escape from imminent loss of life and ship by collision he may not. I put an extreme case, but putting an extreme case is the fairest way of testing the law, so as to see whether the rule of law contended for would not reduce the rule to an absurdity. The truth is that, unless you adopt some limitation of the rule, it is a captain's duty to sail blindly, or rather with his eyes open, into the jaws of death. If he obeys the rule, let us assume it is certain death for his passengers and crew. He has just one chance; he may, by disobeying the rule, possibly save them. If it is true that that is just the only one chance, then it seems to me it ought to be a case in which a departure from the rule is necessary, otherwise a captain at sea may be trained in the impression that he is better off with his passengers and crew at the bottom of the sea and the rule obeyed, than in taking the one chance of safety remaining to him. I cannot believe that this was the view of the House of Lords. I am of opinion that departure from article 18 is justified when such departure is the one chance still left of avoiding danger which otherwise is inevitable.

Salvage—Award—Amount—Appeal—Privy Council.

In salvage appeals, the Court of Appeal, following the rule of the Privy Council, will not interfere, with the amount of the award, unless the amount has been estimated on wrong principles or on a misapprehension of the facts, or unless, assuming the principles and facts to be correct, the amonnt of salvage is, in the opinion of the Court of Appeal, exorbitant in the sense of being beyond all reason.

Where the Admiralty Court on a value of 62,000*l. awarded* 6000*l. to a steamship, which, at great risk to herself, got another steamship off a coral reef in the Red Sea, ninety-five miles from Suez, and so saved her from probable total loss, and then at her request towed her within a few miles of Suez, the Court of Appeal refused to reduce the amount of the award.*

This was an appeal by the defendants from a judgment of Sir Robert Phillimore in a salvage action by which he had on a value of 62,000*l.* awarded 6000*l.* to the salvors.

The services consisted in getting a steamship off a coral reef in the Red Sea, and towing her within a few miles of Suez. The facts of the case fully appear in the report below (48 L. T. Rep. N. S. 679; L. Rep. 8 P. Div. 65; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 58).

Cohen, Q.C. (with him J. P. Aspinall) for the appellants.—The award is so excessively large as will warrant this court in reducing it. An agreement had been made that the salvors should be paid 100*l.* a day whether successful or not. There, therefore, was not present that element of risk usually run by salvors of getting nothing if unsuccessful. Further, the Ossian ran no risk of vitiating her policies of insurance, and being in ballast, was under no liability to owners of cargo in case of mishap.

Myburgh, Q.C. (with him L. E. Pyke), for the respondents, was stopped by the court.

Brett, M.R.—The rule of the Privy Council, which was formerly the Court of Appeal in Admiralty actions, and whose rules we, as the now Court of Appeal, follow as nearly as we can, was that, where an appeal was brought against the amount awarded, either because it was too large or too small, the Court of Appeal would not interfere unless it was shown that the amount of salvage had been estimated on wrong principles, or on a misapprehension of the facts as to the difficulty or danger of the service, or unless, assuming the facts and the principles to be right, the amount of salvage was, in the opinion of the court, exorbitant in the sense of being beyond all reason. In this case the two ships were of considerable value. The facts of the case show, and we are advised by our assessors, that the position of the Lancaster was extremely perilous, and that if she had not been got off she would in all probability have gone to pieces, and become an absolute loss. Therefore she was saved from probable total loss. The Ossian also was put into great peril of being placed in the same position as the Lancaster, because she might, if her cables had parted or from some other accident, have gone on to the coral reef herself. The Ossian, therefore, was not only in danger of slight damage, she was in danger of loss herself. If that is so, there are present the two great elements on which the court awards large salvage remuneration. We think, therefore, the learned judge has acted upon right principles, and that the governing facts were rightly decided, and it is to be noticed, in accordance with the opinion of each of his assessors.

In the present case, then, asuming the learned judge has acted on right principles, and on a true apprehension of the facts, can we say that the amount awarded is unreasonably exorbitant? It is a large award, but we do not say it is too large. But it is not necessary for us to consider whether we might differ from it if the matter had been originally before us; we can only alter it if we think it exorbitant as being unreasonable. We, however, do not consider it unduly exorbitant. Having regard to what I have said, this appeal must therefore be dismissed with costs.

Baggallay and Bowen, L.JJ. concurred.

APPEAL FROM THE QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION.

Practice—Discovery—Interrogatories—Security for costs of discovery—R. S. C. 1883, Order XXXI., rr. 25, 26.

The court or a judge is not bound under Order XXXI., r. 25, to make an order dispensing with security for costs of discovery because both parties consent to dispense with such security.

This was an action by the holders of a bill of lading against the shipowners to recover a sum of 100*l.* which had been paid by the plaintiffs for dock charges, and which they alleged was payable by the shipowners as landing charges. The contention on the part of the defendants was, that the charges in question were warehouse and storage charges, which they were not liable to pay.

On the summons for direction an order was made by the Master that both sides should answer interrogatories, and should give discovery of documents, and the question as to requiring a deposit as security for the costs of discovery under Order XXXI., rr. 25, 26, (b) was referred to the judge, and came on before Field, J. at chambers, when both parties consenting to waive any claim to security, an application was made for an order dispensing with the deposit. Field, J. refused to make such an order, and his refusal was affirmed by the Divisional Court, Lord Coleridge, C.J. and Stephen and Mathew, JJ.

The plaintiffs appealed.

(a) Reported by P. B. Hutchins, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

(b) By the Rules of the Supreme Court 1883, Order XXXI., r. 25: In every cause or matter the costs of discovery, by interrogatories or otherwise, shall, unless otherwise ordered by the court or a judge, be secured in the first instance as provided by rule 26 of this order, by the party seeking such discovery, and shall be allowed as part of his costs where, and only where, such discovery shall appear to the judge at the trial, or, if there is no trial, to the court or a judge, or shall appear to the taxing officer to have been reasonably asked for.

Rule 26. Any party seeking discovery by interrogatories shall, before delivery of interrogatories, pay into court to a separate account in the action, to be called "Security for Costs Account," to abide further order, the sum of 5*l.*, and if the number of folios exceeds five, the further sum of 10*s.* for every additional folio. Any party seeking discovery otherwise than by interrogatories shall, before making application for discovery, pay into court, to abide further order, the sum of 5*l.*, and may be ordered further to pay into court as aforesaid such additional sum as the court or a judge shall direct. The party seeking discovery shall, with his interrogatories or order for discovery, serve a copy of the receipt for the said payment into court, and the time for answering or making discovery shall in all cases commence from the date of such service. The party from whom discovery is sought shall not be required to answer or make discovery unless and until the said payment has been made.

Pyke for the plaintiffs.—The decision of the Divisional Court amounts to this, that there is no power under any circumstances to dispense with security. The effect so holding would be to deprive the words in rule 25 "unless otherwise ordered by the court or a judge" of all meaning. There is therefore power to dispense with security, and Field, J. so held in the present case, and in Hall v. Liardet, No. 2 (L. T. 17th Nov. 1883, p. 42; W. N. 17th Nov. 1883, p. 175), and in Burr v. Hubbard (L. T. 1st Dec. 1883, p. 77; W. N. 1st Dec. 1883, p. 198). Here the deposit ought to be dispensed with, for both parties consent, and they are competent to waive the provisions of the rules which were introduced for their own benefit. Rules 1 and 12 of Order XXXI. are sufficient to prevent abuse of the process of discovery.

Barnes, for the defendants, supported the same contention, and referred to Compagnie &c., Du Pacifique v. Guano Company, L. T. 10th Nov. 1883, p. 24; W. N. 10th Nov. 1883, p. 166.

Brett, M.R.—In this case an application was made to Field, J. at chambers for an order to dispense with the security for costs of discovery which is directed to be given under Order XXXI., rr. 25, 26. The learned Judge inquired the grounds on which the order was asked for, and he was told that the other side assented to the security being dispensed with. He thought that this was not sufficient in the particular case before him, and he exercised his discretion by refusing to make the order asked for. There was an appeal to the Divisional Court, and the decision appealed from was affirmed, but the court took higher and stronger grounds than the judge at chambers, and not only said that in this particular case ought the order to be refused, but said that what was asked for could not be done in any case. They said that the terms of rule 26 are absolute, and that rule 25 does not give a discretion. There is an appeal to us, and it is argued that by reason of the consent any discretion which might otherwise be given by rule 25 is done away with, and Field, J. was bound to make the order asked for. Now before the Rules of 1883 came into operation what used to happen? There can be no doubt that the practice of delivering interrogatories was greatly overdone. They were delivered in many cases when they were quite unnecessary, and the answers were not often read at the trial. The rules were made not merely to protect clients who wish to be protected, but also to protect feeble clients in spite of themselves, and in order to introduce a mode of checking a gross abuse which had previously prevailed. To my mind the right construction is obvious on the face of the rules. It is said that the Divisional Court decided that the rules are not elastic, and there must be a deposit in all cases, and the judge cannot do away with it under any circumstances. It is not necessary to decide the question, but I cannot, as at present advised, agree to that view, for it takes away the whole effect of rule 25. As at present advised I should adhere to what Field, J. said in the case which was cited to us in argument (Hall v. Liardet, No. 2, Weekly Notes, 17th Nov. 1883, p. 175), and to say that there is a discretion. I have a strong opinion as to this, but what I have said is not to be taken as a decision. Then if rule 25 allows the exercise of discretion, can we say that Field, J. was wrong in the present case in holding that he was not prevented by the consent of both parties from ordering security to be given. I am of opinion that the point is clear, and I have no doubt that the consent of the parties does not deprive the judge of the power to refuse to make an order dispensing with security. The rule was made for the protection of the ultimate client, whether he consents to dispense with security or not. I am of opinion that the decision of Field, J. in the present case cannot be found fault with.

BOWEN, L.J.—Before the Judicature Acts there was on the one side the old Chancery system, under which the principles of discovery were applied widely and liberally, and on the other side there was the common law system, under which the same liberal view of the right to discovery was not taken, and it was more difficult to obtain discovery by interrogatories. Then came the Judicature Acts and Orders, which introduced on the common law side (whether for good or for evil may be doubted) more machinery for the purpose of obtaining discovery, and placed within the reach of litigants and solicitors a perfect but expensive means of attaining this object. The result was a great increase of interlocutory proceedings, and therefore, on the ground of public policy, and with the view of checking the unnecessary expenditure thus occasioned, the new rules have provided certain restrictions. In the present case Field, J. was asked to dispense with the costs of discovery; that is, otherwise to order within the meaning of rule 25, and the party making this application produced the consent of the other side. The learned judge said this was not enough, and refused to make the order asked for, and the question which we now have to decide is whether he was bound to make that order because both parties wanted it. In my opinion, by the new rules protection is given to all litigants for the sake of the poorer class. The conclusion at which Field, J. arrived was, that he would not consider it enough that both sides had consented, and I think he was right; I think he exercised his discretion rightly. The Divisional Court affirmed his decision, but on the ground that he had no discretion to dispense with security. I have great doubt whether that is right, but I do not wish to decide as to this. We do not decide that security may not be dispensed with, but what we do decide is that under Order XXXI., r. 25, a judge is not bound otherwise to order simply because both parties choose to consent that he shall do so.

Appeal dismissed.

HIGH COURT OF JUSTICE.

QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION.

Monday, Dec. 10, 1883.

(Before GROVE, J., HUDDLESTON, B., and HAWKINS, J.)

GRUMBRECHT AND OTHERS v. PARRY. (a)

Practice—Loss of cargo—Interrogatories—Application to strike out under Order XXXI., r. 7.

In an action by the shipper of goods against the shipowner to recover damages for non-delivery the defendant admitted that the goods were not delivered, and alleged that he was prevented from delivering them by the perils and casualties excepted in the bill of lading. The plaintiffs delivered interrogatories for the purpose of showing that the ship was unseaworthy when she left the port, and sank soon afterwards in consequence of a pipe or cock having been left open.

The defendant applied, under Order XXXI., r. 7, to strike out the interrogatories on the ground that they were unnecessary, prolix, and oppressive.

Held, that the interrogatories could not be allowed; they were not based upon facts which must inevitably occur in the ordinary course of the voyage, and there was nothing to show they were not purely hypothetical; they were also objectionable upon the ground that the plaintiffs' case was complete on the admission by the defendant of non-delivery, and they were put for the purpose of finding out and anticipating what the defendant's case was.

Bolckow, Vaughan, and Co. v. Fisher (47 L. T. Rep. N. S. 724; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 20; 10 Q. B. Div. 161) distinguished.

THIS was an action to recover damages for the non-delivery of certain goods shipped by the plaintiffs on the defendant's ship William Hartmann, to be carried from Glasgow to Lisbon.

The statement of claim alleged that in the month of Dec. 1882 the plaintiffs delivered to the defendant certain goods to be carried from Glasgow to Lisbon upon the terms of a bill of lading, by which the goods were to be delivered at Lisbon in the like good order and condition in which they were shipped, certain perils and casualties excepted; that the goods were not delivered and the defendants were not prevented from delivering them by any of the excepted perils and casualties. The plaintiffs further alleged that at the time the vessel sailed she was not seaworthy, and not reasonably fit to carry the goods to their destination.

The defendant admitted in the statement of defence that the goods were not delivered at Lisbon, but denied that the vessel was unseaworthy or not reasonably fit for the voyage, and further alleged that amongst the perils and casualties excepted by the bill of lading were accidents from machinery, boilers, steam, and any other accidents of the seas, rivers, and steam navigation of whatever nature and kind soever; and the defendant was prevented from conveying the said goods in the said voyage and delivering them at Lisbon by reason of such excepted perils and casualties, and not otherwise.

The plaintiffs delivered twelve interrogatories to the defendant for the purpose of showing that the vessel sank in consequence of some pipe or cock having been left open when the vessel left the port. The defendant took out a summons under Order XXXI., r. 7 (a), calling upon the plaintiffs to show cause why nine of the interrogatories should not be struck out. The learned judge at chambers refused to strike them out, affirming the refusal of the master, and thereupon the defendant appealed to the Divisional Court.

The interrogatories objected to were as follows:

3. Did not the William Hartmann leave Glasgow and depart on the voyage in the said bill of lading mentioned between 7 and 8 p.m. of the 20th Dec. 1882, or at some other and what time?

4. Did not the master shortly after, and whether or not at about 9 p.m., discover that the vessel had taken a list to port, and did he not about five minutes later, or at some other and what time, find that there was water over the stoke-hole plates, and that the port side of the engine-room platform was flooded? Were not the fires shortly after washed out by the water? Was not the vessel some distance above Dowling when the list was discovered?

5. Was not a tug engaged by the master, and did not the tug tow the William Hartmann as far as Carlsdyke Bay, near Greenock, and did not the vessel there sink at about midnight, or at some other and what time and place?

6. Did not the master on the following day engage a diver, and did not the diver go down into the engine-room, and did he not close the injection cock, or some other and what cock or aperture, and whether or not which he found open?

7. State exactly what the diver did, and what steps were taken by him with a view to stopping the entrance of water and enabling the ship to be floated?

8. Was not the ship then pumped out and floated, and taken to the Albert Quay, Greenock? Did she make any, and what water after the cock or aperture found by the diver had been closed by him, and if so state to the best of your knowledge, information, and belief, the cause of the leak which remained.

9. Describe exactly to the best of your knowledge, information, and belief, the aperture through which the water which caused the vessel to sink entered, and explain how the water had entered the vessel by means of such aperture. If the water did not enter the vessel directly from the aperture, state through what pipes, tubes, cocks, or other apparatus the water passed before it could escape into the bilges of the vessel.

10. Give the diameter or size of the aperture and also the diameter or size of the smallest pipe, tube, or cock through which the water would have to pass before it could escape into the bilges of the vessel.

11. Was the vessel surveyed at Greenock and elsewhere to ascertain the cause of her sinking? State to the best of your knowledge, information, and belief, how the aperture by which the water had entered the vessel came to be open, and state on what facts or appearances you base your opinion.

12. If you are unable to answer the above interrogatories from your personal knowledge, you are required to make full inquiry of the master, officers, and crew of the steamer, or such other of your servants as may be cognisant of the matters inquired after, and to make answer from the information so obtained from them.

Fox for the defendant.—The plaintiffs' case is complete upon the pleadings, and the burden of proof is upon the defendant to show that the cause of the loss was within the excepted perils. Interrogatories are admissible on two grounds—to obtain information, and to facilitate proof; but the plaintiffs cannot bring these interrogatories within either of those rules. They have all the information as appears from the interrogatories, and they do not want to prove anything, because the defendant admits that the goods were shipped at Glasgow, and not delivered at Lisbon. The plaintiffs will rely on Bolckow, Vaughan, and Co. v. Fisher (5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 20; 47 L. T. Rep. N. S. 724; 10 Q. B. Div. 161), but in that case the interrogatories had been answered, and the only question was the sufficiency of the answer. Here we are applying to strike out the plaintiffs' interrogatories, and refuse to answer them at all. Under the old rules we should have had to take the objection in answer, but the new rule is much wider. I submit they are unnecessary, prolix, and oppressive within the meaning of Order XXXI., r. 7.

Barnes for the plaintiff.—I contend that the interrogatories are necessary for the plaintiffs' case, and also that they are not within rule 7 of Order XXXI. A main issue in the case is, whether the vessel was seaworthy when she left the port, and the interrogatories are necessary to prove that she was not. The defendant cannot take advantage of the excepted perils if the ship was unseaworthy when she left the port, and the plaintiffs have alleged that in the statement of claim:

Steel v. The State Line Steamship Company, 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 516; 37 L. T. Rep. N.S. 333; 3 App. Cas. 72.

If the defendant can bring his case within the excepted perils the burden of proof is shifted back on to the plaintiffs, and the interrogatories are necessary for the purpose of rebutting the proof that the vessel was seaworthy. A party may interrogate in order to meet a case which he anticipates will be the case of the defendant. [HAWKINS, J.—The owners have no knowledge of these facts, and if they merely say that they have been told that certain circumstances existed, and that they believe it to be true, could you put that in evidence in support of your case?] Yes, every person who is interrogated is bound to answer to the best of his belief, and if he states that he believes a certain thing to be true it is an admission. The case of Bolckow, Vaughan and Co. v. Fisher (ubi sup.) is directly in point. He also cited

Eade v. Jacobs, 37 L. T. Rep. N.S. 621; 3 Ex. Div 335;
Attorney-General v. Corporation of London, 2 Mac. & G. 247;
Phillips v. Routh, 26 L. T. Rep. N.S. 845; L. Rep. 7 C. P. 287;
Attorney-General v. Gaskill, 47 L. T. Rep. N.S. 566; 20 Ch. Div. 519.

GROVE, J.—In this case certain interrogatories are objected to by the defendant, who asks that they may be struck out under Order XXXI., r. 7, which provides that interrogatories may be set aside on the ground that they have been exhibited unreasonably or vexatiously, or struck out on the ground that they are prolix, oppressive, unnecessary, or scandalous. I am of opinion that these interrogatories have been exhibited unreasonably, and that they are vexatious, and to some extent oppressive. They throw upon the defendant an unreasonable burden, and on these grounds I think that on the whole they should be struck out. I do not say that some parts of them may not be admissible, but, if I was to go through them for the purpose of dissecting them and say what particular part was good and what bad, I should be taking upon myself the burden of settling the interrogatories, and that is not any part of the business of this court. We must deal with them as a whole, and on a question of principle. There are twelve interrogatories, and ten of them are objected to. I need not go through them all, but I will read those which are most objectionable. [The learned Judge read most of the interrogatories.] Now are these reasonable? They do not ask whether certain things happened or were done which might be expected in the ordinary course of navigation, but they assume that a cock was left open, and that a diver went down to examine it without giving in the slightest degree the source of their information. The plaintiff might have obtained the information upon which he bases these interrogatories from a newspaper. It is said that, if this is so, and the facts are not true, the defendant has only to deny them; but it is to be deemed a part of our system that a man may ask his opponent anything which he chooses even from his imagination, and not only ask him, but compel him to make inquiry from other persons? It appears to me that would be carrying interrogatories to a most unreasonable and oppressive extent, and would add to the expense and defeat the object of interrogatories altogether.

(a) Order XXXI., r. 7: Any interrogatories may be set aside on the ground that they have been exhibited unreasonably or vexatiously, or struck out on the ground that they are prolix, oppressive, unnecessary, or scandalous; and any application for this purpose may be made within seven days after service of the interrogatories.

I do not feel myself bound by the case of Bolckow, Vaughan, and Co. v. Fisher (ubi sup.), because I think it may be distinguished on two grounds. The main distinction is, that in that case they had answered, but insufficiently, and it was shown by their answers that, although they had no personal knowledge of the facts, they did know by their servants; then again, in that case there was no application to set aside the interrogatories, and therefore the party interrogated had undertaken to answer them, and the objection was taken by the other side that the answers were insufficient. The interrogatories in that case were not based upon a mere hypothetical state of facts as in the present case, but were directed to those circumstances which must occur in the ordinary course of navigation, and to the inevitable events which must have happened in the ordinary course of the voyage. That is entirely different from the present case, where there is no reason to believe that the facts were not invented by the plaintiff, except perhaps that a person would not be likely to put a series of interrogatories without some foundation. For these reasons I do not consider myself bound by the case of Bolckow, Vaughan and Co. v. Fisher (ubi sup.), and I am of opinion that this appeal should be allowed.

Huddleston, B.—I have some difficulty in arriving at a conclusion in this case, in consequence of the decision of the Court of Appeal to which my brother Grove has referred. I think in all these cases it is a matter of discretion of the judge, and he must be guided by the information he is able to obtain as to the facts, and whether the interrogatories will facilitate proof. The real object of these interrogatories appears to be to anticipate the defendant's case, or to meet the case which the plaintiff anticipates the defendant will set up. The plaintiff's case is complete on the proof of shipment and non-delivery which is admitted by the defendant. Then the defendant relies upon the exception in the bill of lading, and in order to meet that, and for the purpose of finding out what the defendant's case will be, these questions are asked by the plaintiff. I do not think that is allowable, and I therefore am of opinion that these interrogatories cannot be allowed. Now comes the difficulty to which I referred, namely, the case of Bolckow v. Fisher (ubi sup.) which was decided by the Court of Appeal, and which seems to embrace all the points in this case, and I own I do not see clearly the distinction between that and the present case, which my brother Grove has pointed out. I have no doubt that these interrogatories ought not to be allowed, and although I feel pressed by the case of Bolckow v. Fisher, I think there may be a distinction, and I do not, therefore, dissent from the judgment of my brother Grove, and I am of opinion that the interrogatories should be struck out.

Hawkins, J.—I am of the same opinion, and I think these interrogatories should be struck out, on the ground that they are prolix, unnecessary, and vexatious under Order XXXI., r. 7. Long before these rules the law on this subject was laid down by James, L.J. in the case of Saull v. Browne (30 L. T. Rep. N.S. 697; L. Rep. 9 Ch. App. 346) in the following terms: "The rule is quite clear that a person answering is obliged to answer fully, unless he can make out an exceptional case, viz., that the discovery is sought vexatiously or oppressively, or is discovery which it will be burdensome or injurious to the defendant to give, and which probably may never be used at all. The court in such a case, as was said in Elmer v. Creasy (29 L. T. Rep. N.S. 129 & 632; L. Rep. 9 Ch. App. 73), may be trusted to exercise a proper control over any attempt on the plaintiff's part to press for any such minuteness of discovery as would be either vexatious or unreasonable, as indeed it can do in every case in which it is satisfied that any kind of discovery is required vexatiously or oppressively." I am of opinion, therefore, that the interrogatories should be struck out.

Appeal allowed.

The Thyatira (No. 125). (a)

Collision — Consequential damage — Registrar's report—Objections—Practice.

A report of the registrar and merchants does not necessarily stand confirmed by reason of the defendants failing to take objection thereto within the time provided for in rule 117 of the Admiralty Court Rules 1859, so as to absolutely entitle the plaintiffs to payment to them by the defendants of a sum of money which the court is of opinion ought not to have been allowed them in the report.

The court has power to extend the time within which objection to the report of the registrar and merchants may be taken.

In a case of total loss at sea by collision, a ship-owner who has cargo of his own on board is entitled to recover, in lieu of freight, what would have been the enhanced value of the cargo at its destination, less the expenses of earning that value, and that is the proper form of claim, and not a claim for expenses in making the ship fit for sea, &c.

THIS was a motion by the plaintiffs in a damage action (1882 O. No. 125, fo. 125) for an order that the registrar's report, dated 11th July 1882, should be confirmed, and that the defendants should pay to the plaintiffs the sum of 1000*l.*, being the balance of the sum by the said report found due from the defendants to the plaintiffs, together with interest thereon, and that in default of such payment within fourteen days the plaintiffs should be at liberty to sign judgment, and issue execution for the said amount and interest.

The action arose out of the loss of the vessel Atmosphere and her cargo in consequence of a collision between her and the vessel Thyatira on the 27th Jan. 1882. On the 27th April the defendants admitted liability, and agreed to a reference to the registrar and merchants to assess the amount of the damage.

The plaintiffs thereupon brought in a claim for the value of the Atmosphere and her cargo, and the costs of the necessary disbursements to send her to sea.

The report of the registrar was as follows:

Whereas the defendants have admitted liability for the damage caused to the plaintiffs by the collision in question in this action, subject, however, to a reference to the registrar assisted by merchants, to assess the amount thereof. Now I do most humbly report that I have, with the assistance of Messrs. Sidney Young and Thomas Sellar, of London, merchants, carefully examined the claim filed by the plaintiffs, together with the accounts and vouchers, and the papers and proceedings brought in, and having on the 6th July 1882 heard the evidence of John Starr de Wolf, H. E. Betts, and John Herron on behalf of the plaintiffs, and also what was urged by the solicitors on both sides, I find that there is due to the plaintiffs, for the damages proceeded for, the sum of 6269*l.* 1*s.* 7*d.*, together with interest thereon at the rate of 4 per cent. per annum, as stated in the schedule here annexed.

Schedule.

	Claimed.	Allowed.
Value of the ship Atmosphere, 1378 tons	£4455 0 0	£4100 1 0
Necessary disbursements to send vessel to sea	602 11 8	576 7 6
Advances paid to crew	71 5 0	71 5 0
Balance of wages paid to crew	144 1 6	144 1 6
Cargo	823 7 10	823 7 10

[The balance of the sum found due was in respect of the effects of the crew, which is not material.]

After this report had been issued, but before the money found due therein had been paid over to the plaintiffs, Messrs. Cockbain, Allardice, and Co. made a claim upon the owners of the Thyatira for 1000*l.* in respect of advanced freight, under the following circumstances: The owners of the Atmosphere had, at the time of the collision, on board the Atmosphere cargo belonging to themselves. This cargo had been lost by reason of the collision. Previous to the collision 1000*l.* had been advanced to the owners of the Atmosphere by Messrs. Cockbain, Allardice, and Co., who took as security an assignment of a policy of insurance on the freight, and a bill of lading, signed by the master of the Atmosphere, and endorsed by him with a receipt of 1000*l.* on account of freight named in the bill of lading. Messrs. Cockbain, Allardice, and Co. now claimed that they were entitled to recover this 1000*l.* from the owners of the Thyatira, by whose wrongful act they alleged it had been lost.

In consequence of this claim it was arranged (as seen by the correspondence hereinafter set out) that the amount found due by the report, less the sum of 1000*l.*, should be paid to the owners of the Atmosphere, and that the 1000*l.* should be deposited in a bank pending the action (1882 C. N. 3222, fo. 283) brought by Messrs. Cockbain, Allardice and Co. The sum of 1000*l.* was accordingly deposited in the joint names of the parties' solicitors.

The following is the correspondence referred to:

On the 7th March 1883 the plaintiffs' solicitors, Messrs. Stokes, Saunders, and Stokes, wrote to the defendants' solicitors, Messrs. Pritchard and Sons, as follows:

21, Great St. Helens, London, E.C., 7th March 1883. Dear Sirs.—Thyatira.—We wish you to distinctly understand that, although we have consented to the deposit of the 1000*l.* in the joint names of our Mr. Stokes and Mr. Freshfield, we do not admit, and never did intend to admit, that that sum, which was recovered in the damage action, can be applied to the payment of Messrs. Cockbain's claims. You will please therefore accept this as notice that, whatever be the result of the action by Messrs. Cockbain, we shall apply to the Admiralty Division for an order for the payment to our clients of the 1000*l.* deposited.—Yours, truly, STOKES, SAUNDERS, and STOKES. Messrs. Pritchard and Sons.

To this Pritchard and Sons replied as follows:

9, Gracechurch-street, London, E.C., 7th March, 1883. Dear Sirs.—Thyatira.—We quite understand this deposit is made on the terms mentioned in your letter of this day's date, and that should Messrs. Cockbain, Allardice, and Co. succeed in their claim (which by the way we do not at all anticipate), a question may arise between you and us as to the payment of the deposit.—Yours truly, PRITCHARD and SONS. Messrs. Stokes, Saunders, and Stokes.

The action of Messrs. Cockbain, Allardice, and Co. was heard on the 38th June 1882, by Sir James Hannen, who, after consideration, delivered judgment on 9th July in favour of the plaintiffs, finding that the 1000*l.*, although not strictly speaking advanced freight, was enhanced value of the cargo at its destination, and as such might be recovered by the plaintiffs: (5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 147; 49 L. T. Rep. N.S. 406; L. Rep. 8 P. Div. 155.)

The Admiralty Court Rule (1859), No. 117, referred to in the argument, is as follows:

A proctor intending to object to the registrar's report shall within six days from the filing of the report file in the registry a notice, a copy of which shall have been previously served on the adverse proctor, and within a further period of twelve days he shall file his petition in objection to the report. (a)

J. P. Aspinall for the plaintiffs, in support of the motion.—Under the terms of the Admiralty Court Rule (1859) No. 117, it is now too late for the defendants to take objection to the registrar's report, which has become confirmed by lapse of time and the practice of the court. By the report it has been found that we are entitled to this 1000*l.* Moreover, the defendants cannot go behind that report, which finds that this 1000*l.* is due to us.

Bucknill, for the defendants, contra.—The very fact of this application by the plaintiffs is conclusive that the report does not stand confirmed by mere lapse of time. This 1000*l.* was to be kept back until the liability of the defendants to Messrs. Cockbain, Allardice, and Co. had been ascertained. They have been found liable for 1000*l.* to Messrs. Cockbain, Allardice, and Co., and their liability to the plaintiffs in the damage action, having regard to the decision in Messrs. Cockbain's action, should be re-investigated.

Aspinall, in reply.

Sir JAMES HANNEN.—This application is made to me now, and I have to consider whether or not I can see any reason why I should make the order which I am called upon to make. If, as Mr. Aspinall has suggested, but not argued—certainly has not supported by authority—it was not necessary to come to me, he can do whatever the practice of the court allows him to do. But judging by analogy derived from the practice of those courts with which I have been conversant during all my professional life, I can only say that if I am called upon to make an order I must see that it is right that I should make it. As the facts stand in this case, I am of opinion that it is not right that I should make the order confirming the registrar's report. With regard to the periods of time that have been referred to in the practice, these are not absolutely binding upon the court. The court can for good reason extend the time, and had I been asked, when the parties began to see what questions might arise in this case, to extend the time in order that these questions might be raised, I should certainly have done so; but as a matter of fact, when the parties did begin to see what questions might arise, they came to an agreement between themselves that this 1000*l.* should be deposited to abide the determination of the very question which I have to determine to-day. I therefore consider that it is "at large," and I am entitled to consider what is right to be done between these parties. Now it is plain from my point of view (I may be wrong, in which case I shall be set right by a superior authority) that the owners of ship and cargo brought in their claim on a mistaken footing, and that they take credit to themselves as it were, I find from the registrar's report, for not claiming anything in respect of freight, and so they brought in, instead of a claim in respect of freight, a claim for expenses in making the ship fit for sea and so on. In my judgment the proper form of claim would have been for enhanced value in lieu of freight. Of course from that would have to be deducted the expenses of earning that enhanced value in lieu of freight. The registrar has not made his report upon that footing at all, but, misled by the form of the contention between the parties at that time, has awarded a sum for making the ship fit for sea and so on.

Now, having arrived at the conclusion that I have, viz., that 1000*l.* of the enhanced value has to be paid to those to whom it has been assigned as security, there remains the balance of the enhanced value, which may be recovered. What that will be is a question of figures, and I will not enter at all or attempt to enter into the computations which Mr. Aspinall has been instructed to lay before me. They may be correct, but, as I see that the registrar proceeded upon what I consider an incorrect basis in his original report, I decline to confirm it. I therefore send it back to him to report in conformity with the principle in the case which I have already decided of The Thyatira (ubi sup.), and with the further light which may be derived from the observations I have made on this occasion.

THE EPPOS. (a)

Practice—Bottomry action—Default action—Affidavit of service—Writ—Order XIII., r. 2.

A plaintiff in an undefended bottomry action must, before he can obtain judgment by default, in addition to filing an affidavit of service in the Registry, as provided by Order XIII., r. 2, annex thereto the original writ.

THIS was a motion for judgment by the plaintiffs in an undefended bottomry action instituted upon two bonds against the foreign ship Eppos. No appearance had been entered in the action.

The plaintiffs were now moving the court to pronounce for the validity of the two bonds and for condemnation of the defendants in the sums due thereon and costs.

Order XIII., r. 2, provides that

> Where any defendant fails to appear to a writ of summons, and the plaintiff is desirous of proceeding upon default of appearance under any of the following rules of this Order, or under Order XV., r. 1, he shall, before taking such proceeding upon default, file an affidavit of service, or of notice in lieu of service, as the case may be.

In compliance with this rule the plaintiffs had filed an affidavit of service, but had not annexed the writ.

F. W. Raikes, for the plaintiffs, in support of the motion.—No appearance having been entered by the defendants, the plaintiffs have satisfied the requirements of Order XIII., r. 2, and now move for judgment.

Sir JAMES HANNEN.—I am told that hitherto the practice of the registry has been that the plaintiff should, on filing the affidavit of service, annex to it the original writ. I allow the motion on condition that the plaintiffs file in the registry a fresh affidavit of service and annex the original writ.

THE HUMBER. (a)

Practice—Appeal from County Court—Court of Passage—31 & 32 Vict. c. 71, ss. 26, 27—38 & 39 Vict. c. 50, s. 6.

The power conferred by sect. 27 of the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868 to extend the time within which an instrument of appeal may be lodged, provided sufficient cause be shown, is not altered or curtailed by sect. 6 of the County Courts Act 1875, this latter section merely providing an alternative mode of appeal.

THIS was a motion before the Divisional Court of the Probate, Divorce, and Admiralty Division by the plaintiffs in a damage action for leave to file a notice of appeal from the decision of the judge of the Court of Passage at Liverpool, and for leave to adduce further evidence at the hearing of the appeal.

The collision which gave rise to the action occurred between the Russian schooner Siber, belonging to the plaintiffs, and the steamship Humber. At the time of the collision the Humber was in charge of a pilot by compulsion of law.

The action came on for trial on the 17th Oct. 1883 in the Court of Passage at Liverpool, before the judge, assisted by nautical assessors. The learned judge found the pilot of the Humber solely to blame, and pronounced against the plaintiffs' claim and the defendants' counter-claim. Against this decision the plaintiffs appealed.

Immediately after this decision the plaintiffs, who were resident abroad, were telegraphed to by their solicitors for instructions. Their answer, received on the 26th Oct., was to appeal at once. On the next day, which was the tenth day after the trial, and therefore the last day for lodging the instrument of appeal, the plaintiffs' and defendants' solicitors attended before the deputy-registrar of the Court of Passage for the purpose of fixing the amount of security for costs to be given under 31 & 32 Vict. c. 71, s. 26. The question of security was then discussed and adjourned by the deputy-registrar, without prejudice to the plaintiffs' right to lodge notice of appeal on that day. Notice of appeal was accordingly lodged in the Admiralty District Registry at Liverpool on the 27th Oct., and a cross-notice of appeal was also lodged by the defendants. An order was subsequently made for security to be given by both parties by cash deposit in court of 40*l.*, and such deposit was made. The defendants subsequently gave notice of their objection to the plaintiffs' notice of appeal on the ground that it was bad, as the security had not been given before the notice was lodged.

With regard to fresh evidence it was alleged in an affidavit filed on behalf of the plaintiffs that the only witnesses from the deck of the Humber called by the defendants were the pilot and master, although at the time of the collision there were others of the crew on deck, and that after the trial two members of the crew of the Humber who had been on deck at the time of the collision had made statements to the plaintiffs' solicitor which strongly supported the plaintiffs' contention that the collision was due to the negligence of the crew of the Humber, and not to the pilot.

The sections in the Acts of Parliament referred to are as follows:—

The County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act (31 & 32 Vict. c. 71) 1868, ss. 26, 27:

Sect. 26. An appeal may be made to the High Court of Admiralty of England from a final decree or order of a County Court in an Admiralty cause, and by permission of the judge of the County Court from any interlocutory decree or order therein, on security for cost being first given, and subject to such other provisions as such orders shall direct.

Sec. 27. No appeal shall be allowed unless the instrument of appeal is lodged in the registry of the High Court of Admiralty within ten days from the date of the decree or order appealed from; but the judge of the High Court of Admiralty may, on sufficient cause being shown to his satisfaction for such omission, allow an appeal to be prosecuted, notwithstanding that the instrument of appeal has not been lodged within that time.

The County Courts Act 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 50):

Sect. 6. In any cause, suit, or proceeding, other than a proceeding in bankruptcy, tried or heard in any County Court, and in which any person aggrieved has a right of appeal, it shall be lawful for any person aggrieved by the ruling, order, direction, or decision of the judge, at any time within eight days after the same shall have been made or given, to appeal against such ruling, order, direction, or decision by motion to the court to which such appeal lies, instead of by special case, such motion to be ex parte in the first instance, and to be granted on such terms as to costs, security, or stay of proceedings as to the court to which such motion shall be made shall seem fit. And if the court to which such appeal lies be not then sitting, such motion may be made before any judge of a superior court sitting in chambers. And at the trial or hearing of any such cause, suit, or proceeding the judge at the request of either party shall make a note of any question of law raised at any such trial or hearing, and of the facts in evidence in relation thereto, and of his decision thereon, and of his decision of the cause, suit, or proceeding, and he shall at the expense of any person or persons, being party or parties in any such cause, suit, or proceeding, requiring the same for the purpose of appeal, furnish a copy of such note, or allow a copy to be taken of the same by or on behalf of such person or persons, and he shall sign such copy, and the copy so signed shall be used and received on such motion and at the hearing of such appeal.

W. G. F. Phillimore, for the plaintiffs, in support of the appeal. [At the close of the plaintiffs' arguments in support of fresh evidence being adduced, their Lordships informed Dr. Phillimore that he had failed to show sufficient reasons to justify them in acceding to that part of his application, and requested him to argue the other point, viz., whether or not their power to extend the time within which the instrument of appeal is to be lodged was taken away by 38 & 39 Vict. c. 50, s. 6.]—The court still has discretion under 31 & 32 Vict. c. 71, s. 27, to enlarge the time within which the instrument of appeal may be lodged. This power is not taken away by 38 & 39 Vict. c. 50, s. 6, which merely provides an alternative mode of appeal. There is nothing in the later Act which in terms repeals the mode of appeal provided in the earlier Act. Since the later Act has been in operation, appeals have been brought under the provisions of the earlier Act:

The Amstel, 2 P. Div. 186.; 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 488; 37 L. T. Rep. N. S. 138;
The Ganges, 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 317; 5 P. Div. 247; 43 L. T. Rep. N. S. 12.

Myburgh, Q.C. (with him T. T. Bucknill) for the defendants.—In neither The Amstel (ubi sup.) nor The Ganges (ubi sup.) was this point argued or decided. Seeing the importance or uniformity of practice, it is unreasonable to contend that the only effect of the later Act is to provide a new form of appeal. There is authority for saying that the court has no power to extend the time for moving by way of appeal against a decision of a County Court beyond the eight days limited by sect. 6 of the County Courts Act 1875:

Tennant v. Rawlings, 4 C. P. Div. 133.

The PRESIDENT (Sir J. Hannen).—I am of opinion that we still have discretionary power to extend the time within which the instrument of appeal may be lodged, and that we ought to grant this application, because it is plain that this difficulty has arisen from a mere slip, the circumstances of which were known to the defendants at the time. Therefore no wrong will be done by extending the time. It is not as if the parties had been lying by, and then made this application as an afterthought. I think, therefore, there ought to be an extension of the time. I myself cannot see what answer there is to this, that by sect. 27 of the earlier Act discretion is given to the court to extend the time, and there is nothing in the later Act which says this is repealed.

BUTT, J.—I am of the same opinion. I am under the impression that the Act of 1875 merely provided a new mode of appeal, but did not take away the then existing form of appeal. In that I am fortified by an existing order referred to in Mr. Pitt-Lewis's County Court Practice, at page 577. He says: "In reference to appeals by motion under the County Courts Act 1875, s. 6, it is provided by the County Court Rules 1876 as follows: 'The foregoing rules in this Order shall not apply to appeals by motion, but such appeals may be had under the provisions of sect. 6 of the County Courts Act 1875.' Order XXIX., r. 12." Now what does that show? Why, that there is another mode of appeal, that is, the old mode under the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act of 1868. Therefore, as the President has said, the section conferring this discretion is not repealed by the Act of 1875, and accordingly I agree with him, and think the time should be extended.

It was accordingly ordered that the notice of appeal and cross-notice of appeal should be lodged within three days.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

MILDRED, GOYENECHE, AND CO. v. MASPONS Y HERMANO. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF APPEAL IN ENGLAND.

Principal and agent—Undisclosed principal—Foreign consignor—Privity of contract—Set-off—Factors Act (6 Geo. 4, c. 94).

Where goods are consigned to persons who, knowing that the consignor is acting for an undisclosed principal, insure the goods whilst on their voyage in their own names for the benefit of all parties interested, and on the ship carrying the goods being totally lost, receive the money due on the policy, the undisclosed principal is entitled to recover this money (less expenses in respect of the insurance) against the consignees, who cannot set it off against the balance of their general account with the consignor.

The appellants, an English firm, traded with a Spanish shipping agent at Havannah, and a cargo of goods was consigned to them through him by the respondents, who were Spanish merchants at Havannah.

The appellants knew that the agent was acting for an undisclosed principal. They insured the cargo in their own names for the benefit of all parties interested, and, on the ship being totally lost, received the money due on the policy.

The shipping agent having become insolvent, the respondents claimed the whole sum, less premiums and expenses. The appellants claimed a lien on the amount for the balance due to them from the agent on their general account with him.

Held (affirming the judgment of the court below), that there was privity of contract enabling the respondents to bring an action against the appellants, and that the latter had no right to any such lien as they claimed.

Semble, that the case was within sect. 1 of the Factors Act (6 Geo. 4, c. 94).

THIS was an appeal from a judgment of the Court of Appeal (Jessel, M.R., Lindley, and Bowen, L.JJ., reported in 9 Q. B. Div. 530, and 47 L. T. Rep. N. S. 318), reversing a judgment of Manisty, J.

The facts appear from the head-note, and also from the judgment of Lord Blackburn, and are set out in the report in the court below.

Cohen, Q.C., Davey, Q.C., and Arbuthnot appeared for the appellants, and contended that there was no privity of contract between the parties, and therefore the plaintiffs, the present respondents, could not recover:

Elbinger Actien Gessellschaft v. Claye, L. Rep. 8 Q.B. 313; 28 L. T. Rep. N. S. 405.

Secondly, the defendants had a right to set off their claims against the agents, Demestre and Co.:

The case is not to be determined by Spanish law, but that law is material as showing the authority given by the respondents to Demestre and Co. See the Spanish Commercial Code, ss. 118, 119.

The Solicitor-General (Sir F. Herschell, Q.C.) and Barnes, for the respondents, argued that the evidence showed the relationship between the respondents and Demestre was that of principal and agent, and that the appellants knew that Demestre had an undisclosed principal. The contention of the appellants goes beyond any existing decision. In addition to the authorities cited on the other side, they referred to

The Spanish law has not the effect contended for by the appellants.

Davey, Q.C. was heard in reply.

At the conclusion of the arguments their Lordships took time to consider their judgment.

July 16.—Their Lordships gave judgment as follows:

Lord BLACKBURN.—My Lords: I have come to the conclusion that the order appealed against is right, and should be affirmed. The dispute arises out of the insolvency of Demestre, Chia, and Co., a firm of merchants carrying on trade at the Havannah. The appellants, Mildred and Co., are merchants, trading in London, and were correspondents of Demestre, Chia, and Co., who, at the time they stopped payment, on the 18th Sept. 1880, were largely indebted on the balance of the account between them to Mildred and Co. On the 28th July 1880 Mildred and Co, received from Demestre and Co. a telegram in the following terms:—"Insure all risks, 8000*l*. Cargo tobacco, Spanish schooner Bachi, first veritas; destination Gibraltar; consigned to you." Their answer by letter was: "In accordance with your instructions, we have opened a provisional policy for said amount, at the premium of 60 shillings per cent. sailing on 1st Aug., 80 shillings per cent. sailing on 20th Aug., 6*l*. 6*s*. after last date. To pay particular average if it amounts to 5 per cent. on each series of ten bales running numbers on landing. On receipt of shipping documents, we will have the policy duly extended." On the 3rd Aug. they received a further telegram, dated 31st July: "Bachi despatched to day, will sail to-morrow; insure 3000*l*. more." And they accordingly increased the provisional insurance to 11,000*l*. No explanation was given at the trial as to what a provisional policy was, and I do not recollect ever to have met with the phrase before; but this much is plain, that all the terms of the policy were agreed on, but that Mildred and Co. were not to make themselves liable to the underwriters for the premiums until they had in their possession the shipping documents, so as to have something on which they had a hold; and that they did make themselves liable for the premiums as soon as, and not till, they had got those shipping documents. On the 9th Aug. they received a letter from Demestre and Co., inclosing the charter-party of the Bachi. I shall have to read that letter afterwards. I need at present only say that the charter-party was in the name of Demestre and Co. On the 17th Aug. they received a letter dated 31st July, which I shall also have to read. It is enough at present to say that it inclosed the bills of lading and invoice of the cargo of tobacco per Bachi, and that both of these were in the name of Demestre and Co., and that the letter repeated the telegram, stating that "the Bachi was despatched to-day, Saturday, will sail to-morrow." Mildred and Co., now having the shipping documents, proceeded to have the policies, to use their own phrase, extended. The first was a policy with the Royal Exchange Assurance Company, in the ordinary form of the policies of that company: "Mildred, Goyeneche, and Co., as well in their own name as for and in the names of every other person or persons to whom the same doth, may, or shall appertain in part or in all, doth make assurance and causeth themselves and them and every of them to be assured, lost or not lost, at and from Havannah to Gibraltar," on tobacco, valued at 11,000*l*., per Bachi. The policy then proceeded, in the usual form of such policies, to specify that the premium was to be 3 per cent. on 3500*l*., part of the 11,000*l*., and the seal of the company was affixed on the 18th day of (a) August 1880. Mildred and Co. seem to have shown the telegram of 31st July, and from it it was naturally but erroneously thought that the Bachi sailed on the 1st Aug., and that the premium therefore was to be 3 per cent. It was discovered afterwards that she did not sail till the 4th Aug., and, therefore, that the premium ought, according to the terms provisionally agreed upon, to have been 4 per cent. This error was corrected by an indorsement, under the seal of the company, bearing date the 29th Sept. 1880. But the policy itself bore the date the 18th Aug. Two other policies, one in the Universal Marine for 3500*l*., and another in the Marine Insurance for 4000*l*., were executed on the same 18th Aug. They were in the forms adopted by those companies, and therefore differed slightly in form, but in substance were precisely the same as that with the Royal Exchange Assurance Company. Each was "lost or not lost" each was for a premium of 3 per cent. and on each was a memorandum rectifying this mistake. The position of Mildred and Co. was that they held the charter-party, invoice, and bills of lading of the tobacco by the Bachi, all made out in the name of Demestre and Co. They also held three policies on this tobacco to the aggregate amount of 11,000*l*., insured in their own names, lost or not lost, and for the premiums on which they had pledged their credit to the companies. That being so, the Bachi was lost on the 12th Aug., and news of this event arrived in London on the 23rd Aug. Mildred and Co. proceeded to make claims on the insurance companies. They were adjusted as a total loss, and on the 8th Oct. the companies paid to Mildred and Co. 10,881. 13*s*. 11*d*. It is not explained, and is not now material, why they did not pay 11,000.

In the meantime Demestre and Co. stopped payment on the 18th Sept., the balance of the account between Demestre and Co. and Mildred and Co., being heavily in favour of Mildred and Co. The respondents, Maspons and Brother, who were a firm trading at Havannah, gave notice to Mildred and Co. that the Maspons were owners of the cargo by the Bachi, and claimed the insurance money. The precise date is not, I think, given, but it was admitted at the trial that it was before any portion of the money was received by Mildred and Co, It was never, I think, disputed by any one that Mildred and Co. had a right to retain so much of the insurance money as would repay them the premiums, stamps, and commission in respect of this transaction of insurance; but Mildred and Co. claimed a right to retain the whole money until they were repaid all for which they could establish a lien against Demestre and Co. This was denied by Maspons, and the action was brought to try that question. I pass by, at present, all questions about the form of the pleadings, and about privity of contract and agency, on which a good deal of argument has been employed, both in the court below and at your Lordships' bar. I will say a few words on those points afterwards. For the present I address myself exclusively to the question on the merits, which not only is of importance to the parties as involving a large sum of money, but is of great public importance as affecting the very extensive business carried on by merchants dealing with foreign correspondents, who are entrusted on commission, by others with goods for consignment or sale, and ship them in their own names. I think, however, when the documents proved, and the answers of the jury to the questions asked them at the trial are considered, this question on the merits, though very important, is not of much difficulty. Maspons and Brother were a firm trading at Havannah. They had had previous dealings with Demestre and Co., entrusting them with goods for consignment, on which Demestre and Co. sometimes made them advances. Demestre and Co. had shipped those goods in their own name to their own correspondents, who conducted the transactions abroad according to the orders they had received from Demestre and Co. The returns always were consigned to Demestre and Co., who accounted for them to Maspons and Co., and for all this Demestre and Co. charged Maspons and Co. a commission. This is a common course of business. One great object in conducting business thus is, that as the returns pass through the commission merchant's hands he has a security for any advance he may have made; and the entrusting party often, if not always, gets an advance which he would not otherwise obtain. Maspons not only knew that Demestre and Co. had a correspondent in London, but they knew the name of that correspondent to be Mildred and Co., and that they were a house in good repute. They never, however, had any communication with them direct until they made the claim on the policies; and Mildred and Co. did not till then know the name of Maspons at all. Maspons had entrusted Demestre and Co. with a small quantity of tobacco for sale in Gibraltar, by way of trying the market, which Demestre and Co. had shipped in their own names; and Maspons were contemplating a greater adventure if that small sample fetched a good price. I mention this as explanatory of the letters which I shall presently read, on which, in my mind, the question depends. Maspons and Brother, having made up their minds to enter on this greater adventure, purchased the tobacco, which was afterwards shipped by the Bachi. They applied, partly by word of mouth and partly in writing, to Demestre and Co. to conduct this consignment for them on commission. They evidently expected that Demestre and Co. would, besides making the necessary shipping disbursements which they did, make them a large advance, but, probably owing to their stoppage, no such advance was in fact made. They negotiated for arrangements that the tobacco should be sold under the superintendence of Mildred and Co., whom they knew to be Demestre's English correspondents, and that the proceeds should be transmitted by Mildred and Co. to Demestre and Co., but, the tobacco having perished at sea, those arrangements never came into operation. Maspons (it is not now material to inquire what influenced them to do so) having arranged with the captain of the Bachi the terms of the charter, caused it to be made out by him, with Demestre and Co., in their own name. The invoice was also made out in Demestre and Co.'s name, as shipped by them to Mildred, Goyeneche, and Co., London, for account and risk of whom it might concern. The bills of lading also were made out in the name of Demestre and Co., deliverable to their order. Maspons at first requested Demestre and Co. to insure the goods with the Lloyd Habanero, but changed their minds, and requested them to have them insured in London, which was accordingly done, as I mentioned before. And then the two letters were put in evidence, that of the 24th July, which inclosed the charter-party, and that of the 31st July, which inclosed the invoice and bills of lading. Of those I will now read the part bearing on this transaction, from the translation from the Spanish: "Although we have not received advice from you with regard to the bales of tobacco which we shipped to you by way of trial, in view of news of the rise of tobacco in the German markets, the interesado has decided on making the shipment which he proposed to make previously. To that end we have chartered the Spanish brig Bachi, Captain Uribe, for Gibraltar and Marseilles, on the conditions stated in the inclosed charter-party. The cargo will consist of 1500 tierces leaf tobacco, and about 550 quintals picadura (cigarette tobacco), which we are going to ship to your consignment with B/Lading to order, that you may order the reshipment in Gibraltar of the whole or a part to whatever destination you may judge most convenient. You will also consign the ship, forwarding to your correspondents in Gibraltar the charter-party. The cargo, in order to please the interesado, we will insure here with the Lloyd Habanero. It may be found convenient to keep some tierces of tobacco and picadura in Gibraltar, and ship by the same vessel 250 quintals picadura for Marseilles. In that case you will give your orders accordingly, and have the remaining tierces reshipped. We will forward you in due course the invoice and B/Lading, and we propose despatching the vessel in about eight days. Messrs. Mildred Goyeneche and Co. London.

"Havana. 31st July 1880.—We confirm our letter of the 24th instant, of which we inclose duplicate, with that of the invoice of drafts of the B/L of spars per Eduardo and charter per Bachi. . . . We are despatching the Bachi, which sails to-morrow for its destination, and we inclose B/Lading and invoice of its cargo, comprising: M. G. C. 1/1500 tierces leaf tobacco, 1/156 barrels ground picadura, 1/154 bags tobacco, 1/50 boxes pressed picadura, which you will please sell for the best, as if it were your own affair, in accordance with our letter of the 24th inst. The invoice amounts to §50,854. 61 gold, and against this shipment we propose to value upon you for the present 3000*l.*, to 4000*l.* at 60 $^{a}/_{s}$ sight. We mentioned to you in our last that, to oblige the interesado, we would effect here with the Lloyd Habanero the insurance on said shipment, but, having convinced him of the convenience of effecting it with you, we requested you, on the 26th inst., per cable, to do so as follows: 'Insure all risk, 8000*l.*, cargo, tobacco, Spanish brig Bachi, first veritas; destination, Gibraltar; your consignment,' which we confirm, and, having cost more than we thought, we are going to cable you again. Bachi despatched to-day, Saturday, will sail to-morrow; insure 3000*l.* more.—We are, &c. (Signed) Demestre and Chia Co."

Manisty, J., who tried the cause, left to the jury nine questions. I do not quite make out why the ninth question was asked. The special jury answered them, and I do not see how, on the evidence, they could have answered them in any other way than they did. The questions and answers were as follows: "1. Were the goods which constituted the cargo in question the property of the plaintiffs?—Yes. 2. Were the defendants employed by the plaintiffs to sell the goods in question for them, and to account to them for the proceeds, and did the defendants accept that employment?—Not employed directly for plaintiffs, and defendants did not accept such employment. 2. Or were the defendants employed by Demestre and Co. to sell the goods and account to them for the proceeds, and did they accept that employment?—Yes. 4. Did the defendants know or have reason to believe that Demestre and Co. were acting as agents for some other person or persons not named?—Yes. They knew or had reason to believe it. 5. Were the defendants employed by the plaintiffs to receive the amount of the insurances for them, and to account to them for the same, and did they accept that employment?—No. 6. Did the defendants receive the amount of the insurances as agents for and on account of the plaintiffs, or as agents for and on account of Demestre and Co?—They received it for and on account of Demestre and Co. and the individual interested. 7. Did the plaintiffs authorise Demestre and Co. to ship and consign the goods to the defendants in their own names, and were they so shipped and consigned?—Yes. 8. On whose behalf and for whose benefit were the insurances effected?—For all parties whom it might concern. 9. Is there a usual ordinary and well-known course of business between freight consignors and merchants in London, for the latter to make advances to the former against goods and usual shipping documents, on the terms that the London merchants are to be entitled to hold the proceeds of all the goods so consigned, or if they are lost by the perils of the seas the insurance money against any balance that may be due to them on their general account current with the consignors?—There is not sufficient evidence to enable the jury to decide." Manisty, J., seems to have felt that he was not able to do justice in the case without taking an account between Maspons and Demestre and Co., or their representatives, and not seeing how to do this he entered judgment for the defendants. That difficulty was got over in the Court of Appeal, which, by the order now appealed against, directs such an account to be taken. If their order was in other respects right, it is not appealed against because of their ordering that account to be taken, which indeed seems to have been done at the instance of the defendants, now appellants.

It is somewhat singular that neither the learned judges below nor the very able counsel who argued below and at your Lordships' bar, seem to have remembered that for the last sixty years the subject with which we are now dealing has been regulated by statute. (a) Yet it is so. The first of what are commonly called the Factors Acts (4 Geo. 4, c. 83, which received the Royal assent on the 18th July 1823) dealt entirely with the subject of consignees. It was re-enacted, with some slight alterations, in the first section of the 6 Geo. 4, c. 94 (Royal assent 5th July 1825), of which I will read so much as bears on the present case: "From and after the passing of this Act (5th July 1825), any person or persons intrusted for the purpose of consigment or of sale with any goods, and who shall have shipped them in his own name, shall be deemed and taken to be the true owner thereof, so far as to entitle the consignee to a lien thereon in respect of any money, &c., advanced by such consignee to or for the use of the person in whose name such goods shall be shipped, or on any money, &c., received by him to the use of such consignee in the like manner, to all intents and purposes as if such persons were the true owners of such goods, provided such consignee shall not have notice by the bill of lading or otherwise, at or before the time of such advance of money, &c., or of such receipt of money, &c., in respect of which such lien is claimed, that such person so shipping in his own name is not the actual and bonâ fide owner of such goods." That enactment has never been altered, and its provisions have, in practice, been found to work so harmoniously with the practice of merchants that I am not aware that any case has ever arisen requiring a court of law to construe it, which probably is the reason why an Act of such importance is not familiar to every one; but so it is, that it was only almost at the end of the argument at your bar that a member of this House recollected this Act, and asked if it did not affect the question. Lord Tenterden's abstract of these two Acts is quoted in Cole v. North-Western Bank (L. Rep. 10 C. P. 354; 32 L. T. Rep. N. S. 733.) This statute renders it unnecessary to consider the decisions previous to that enactment, most of which are cited in the judgment of the Court of Appeal. I may say, however, that I think that the enacting part merely confirms what had been previously decided, and what the Court of Appeal have (without having their attention called to the statute) again decided to be the law. The proviso may, however, have the effect of extending the rights of consignees. For I take it that the common law was that knowledge, however obtained, that the goods were not the property of the person dealing as a principal, prevented the advancer from having a lien for the advances made after such knowledge, on the ground that it was unjust, with knowledge, to take one man's goods to pay another's debts. Those who promoted the Factors's Acts thought that this principle ought to be modified for the convenience of commerce. It is said (Paley on Agency, by Lloyd, 226), and though I do not know how it was, it is probable, that in the Bill which afterwards became the 4 Geo. 4, c. 83, as it was introduced, the proviso was that the consignee should not have notice by the bill of lading, and that Lord Eldon in committee added the important words, or otherwise. Still it is notice and not merely knowledge; and notice and knowledge are not necessarily the same. The fourth question was not framed with this distinction in view.

I should be unwilling, without more consideration, to decide either way, whether knowledge, however acquired, did or did not deprive the consignee of his rights of lien for advances made subsequent to the acquiring of that knowledge, and it is unnecessary to decide that question now, for notice undoubtedly does so deprive him. In the present case the knowledge was conveyed by the two letters I have read, inclosing the one the charter-party and the other the invoice and the bills of lading. And I think knowledge conveyed by the consignor to the consignee in such letters is notice. It is not necessary that there should be notice of the name of the person who has an interest, but only that there is a person having such an interest, or as in the Spanish letter he is called an interesado; that is enough to give the consignee notice that the consignor "is not the actual and bonâ fide owner of such goods," or rather of the whole interest in such goods. But so far as the consignor has an interest by way of lien or otherwise paramount to that of the interesado he is the actual owner, and the consignee has his lien. The order appealed against is, therefore, I think, right, as far as the merits go.

I will now proceed to make a few remarks on what I may call the technical points. The plaintiffs, in their statement of claim, say: "The plaintiffs claim (1) 11,000*l.*, with interest, until payment; (2) a declaration that the said sum of 11,000*l.* is the money of the plaintiffs as against the defendants; (3) such further and other relief as the nature of the case may require." This seems to me to be exactly what would have been more briefly stated on the old system of pleading under a count for "money had and received to the use of the plaintiffs." The first eighteen paragraphs of the statement of defence amount to saying that the money was not had and received to the use of the plaintiffs, but to the use of the defendants and other persons who had a lien paramount to the plaintiffs. That would, under the old system of pleading, have amounted to the general issue; and under it the defendants could have raised the whole question decided on what I have called the merits. It was, I think, at your Lordships' bar contended that the plaintiffs could not have maintained money had and received, even if there had been no lien at all, as suppose that the balance between the plaintiffs and Demestre and Co. had been in favour of the plaintiffs, and the balance as between the defendants and Demestre and Co. had been in favour of Demestre and Co., still it was said that money had and received would not have lain, for the defendants received the money to the use of Demestre and Co. exclusively. Had their relation to them been that of servant to master, as in Stephens v. Badcock (3 B. & Ad. 354), that would have been so. I am not able to understand how that could be maintained after the answers of the jury to the sixth and eighth questions. By the 19th and 20th paragraphs of the defence it is alleged: "19. The city of Havannah, where the plaintiffs are carrying on business, is in the island of Cuba, a colony of Spain, and governed by the law of Spain, and the plaintiffs, and their factors and agents, the said Demestre Chia and Co., who also carry on business in Havannah aforesaid, conducted all the business relating to the shipment of the said cargo of tobacco to the defendants in Havannah aforesaid, and subject to the said law of Spain. 20. By the law of Spain, whenever an agent deals in his own name with the business intrusted to him by his principal, a third person with whom such agent contracts is bound to consider the agent as a principal entitled to deal with the subject-matter of the contract as his own property, and the principal of such agent has no right of action against the third party, unless the principal obtains an assignment from the agent, and the third person so contracting with the agent, as aforesaid, has no right of action against the principal. It was under this law of Spain that the defendants, who have had long experience in commerce with Spain and her colonies, accepted the consignment of the said cargo." No evidence whatever was given of that part of the allegation as to the law of Spain which I have marked in italics. The portions of the Spanish Code cited seem to me to go far to show that the law of Spain does differ from the law of England to some extent. Article 119 of the Spanish Code seems to show that the law of Spain does not establish privity of contract between a principal and those with whom his agent has made a contract to the same extent as the law of England. But the plaintiffs' case in no respect depended on the existence of any privity of contract between the plaintiffs as principals of Demestre and Co. and the defendants. They had a right, so long as the goods remained in specie, a right consequent on their property, to demand and take their goods from Mildred and Co., on satisfying whatever lien paramount to their right there was on the goods; this depended not on agency nor on privity of contract, but upon property. And the defendants having effected the insurance for the benefit of all whom it concerned, they had the same right to demand the insurance money that they would have had to demand the goods. They must satisfy every lien on the policy, paramount to their own, but after doing so are entitled to the surplus. It was contemplated by Maspons and Demestre that the tobacco was to be sold, and the proceeds were to be remitted. Had this been done questions might have arisen, for the solution of which it might have been necessary to consider whether there was privity of contract, and to discuss the doctrines laid down in the cases cited in the judgment of the Court of Appeal. Should any such questions arise in some other case, the reasoning in the judgment will be well worthy of consideration. But the goods perished at sea, when the only thing done had been to effect the insurance. With great respect to Lindley, L.J., I will not follow him in discussing questions which do not arise. I think, therefore, that the order appealed against should be affirmed, and the appeal dismissed, with costs.

The LORD CHANCELLOR (Selborne).—My Lords:

I agree with the conclusion of my noble and learned friend. The fact that the appellants had notice of the respondents' interest is enough, in my opinion, to decide this case. There is one observation of my noble and learned friend as to a possible distinction between "notice" and "knowledge" as to which I should desire to reserve the expression of any opinion on my own part until some case arises in which the question whether actual knowledge, however acquired, is or is not notice, may become material.

Lord FITZGERALD.—My Lords: I concur in the conclusion at which Lord Blackburn has arrived. There were but two questions in the cause when the facts came to be properly understood, though some other matters were very elaborately discussed. The first question was whether the plaintiffs could in their own names maintain any action against the defendants: for the present I pass that question by. The second question was as to the extent of the defendant's lien, which went to the whole merits of the action. That the defendants had a lien for their outlay and commission in respect of the policies of insurance was not disputed. Lindley, L.J., in delivering the judgment of the Court of Appeal, says, with accuracy, that this question of lien must be determined by English law, and depends on a question of fact, namely, whether the defendants knew before their alleged lien accrued that Demestre and Co. were acting for a principal whose name was not disclosed. I think this is correct, whether the rights of the parties are to be determined by the Factor's Act, or by analogy to it, or at common law. On this question of fact there is no opening for any doubt. The lien, if any, of the defendants never attached, speaking accurately, on the cargo of the Bachi, for they never had possession, or the right to the possession, of the cargo, or made any advances on it. Both ship and cargo had perished before the bill of lading and other shipping documents reached the defendants, and before any insurance had been effected. Assuming that the policies represented the cargo, they were not effected till the 18th Aug., 1880, and before that day the defendants had received Demestre and Co.'s letter of the 24th July, 1880, in which occur the passages, "the interesado has decided on making the shipment which he proposed to make previously. To that end we have chartered the Spanish brig Bachi," and "the cargo, in order to please the interesado, we will insure here with the Lloyd Habanero." We have thus a clear intimation to the defendants that there was a party interested, and such party is described as the interesado making the shipment, at whose desire it had been intended to effect the insurances with the Lloyd Habanero. The notice to the defendants is in effect that there is a third party, who apparently had the whole interest in and control over the cargo. The Factors Act, sect. 1, deals with the apparent ownership of goods, and provides that for certain purposes, and under certain circumstances, the apparent owner shall be deemed to be the true owner, so as to entitle his consignee to a lien for advances, but notice to the consignee deprives him of the statutable protection. It may be open to argument and consideration whether that enactment directly embraces, or is applicable otherwise than by analogy to the case before us, but it being quite clear that the defendants had notice that Demestre and Co. were not the actual and bonâ fide owners of the cargo, the defendants can have no benefit from the statute, and if they claimed their alleged lien on the proceeds of the policy at common law, the notice equally excludes that lien.

On the question as to whether the plaintiffs had a right to intervene, and in their own names sue the defendants for the money received on foot of the policies of insurance, I think there never was an opening for doubt. The defendants having notice of "the interesado" effect the policies "as well in their own names as for and in the name and names of all and every other person or persons to whom the same doth, may, or shall appertain, in part or in all, doth make assurance, and causeth themselves, and them and every of them, to be assured." Prior to the effecting of these insurances they had received the invoice of the goods, headed thus: "Invoice of the following goods shipped by us on board the Spanish brigantine Bachi, Captain Uribe, for Gibraltar, and consigned to Messrs. Mildred, Goyeneche and Co., London, for account and risk of whom it might concern." Before the receipt of any part of the insurance moneys the defendants had notice that the plaintiffs were the interesado, and if the plaintiffs are entitled to recover any part of the proceeds, as your Lordships hold that they are, then the money so received by the defendants is money had and received by the defendants for the use of the plaintiffs, which, in justice and good conscience, they ought to pay over, and an action lies at the suit of the plaintiffs to recover it.

Order appealed from affirmed, and appeal dismissed with costs.

COURT OF APPEAL.

Dec. 17 and 18, 1883.

(Before BRETT, M.R., BAGGALLAY and BOWEN, L.JJ.)

BURTON AND CO. v. ENGLISH AND CO. (a)

Charter-party—Deck load at merchant's risk—Jettison—General average.

Words in a charter-party providing that a deck load of timber is to be carried at full freight, but "at merchant's risk," do not preclude the owner of the deck load from recovering general average contribution if the cargo be carried on deck by the custom of trade and jettisoned.

The plaintiffs' deck cargo of timber on board the defendants' steamship was jettisoned on a voyage from the Baltic to London.

The charter-party contained a clause that the steamer should be provided with a deck load, if required, at full freight, but at merchant's risk.

Held (reversing the judgment of Cave and Day, JJ.) that these words did not prevent the plaintiffs from recovering a general average contribution from the defendants.

(a) Reported by A. A. HOPKINS, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

This was an appeal from a judgment of Cave and Day, JJ. upon a special case, reported 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 84; L. Rep. 10 Q. B. Div. 426; 48 L. T. Rep. N. S. 730.

The Divisional Court gave judgment in favour of the defendants.

Austin v. Manchester, Sheffield, and Lincolnshire Railway Company, 21 L. J. 174, C. P.

Brett, M.R.—In this case the plaintiffs were timber merchants, who, at a Baltic port, shipped upon a vessel belonging to the defendants a cargo of timber, part of which was, according to the contract, stowed upon the deck, and part in the hold, and also a cargo of iron. The vessel was taken up by the plaintiffs under a charter-party, and the goods were put on board under a bill of lading which incorporated the charter-party. During the voyage, and in a case of necessity, part of the timber which was stowed on the deck was jettisoned by the captain of the vessel for the safety of the adventure. This action was then brought by the plaintiffs to obtain from the defendants general average contribution in respect of the cargo so jettisoned. It is said that the defendants, the shipowners, are not liable to make this contribution by reason of a stipulation which is contained in the charter-party, or in the bill of lading which incorporates the charter-party. In the first place, I wish to point out that this is not a general ship; it is a ship taken up by the charterer for the purpose of carrying two or three different sorts of cargo, but it is not a general ship. The clause in the charter-party which is relied upon by the defendants is as follows: "The steamer to be provided with a deck load, if required, at full freight, but at merchant's risk." Now, the first remark which arises upon that stipulation is, that it is obviously made in favour of the shipowner; it gives him leave to carry some cargo upon deck so that he can earn a larger freight, and it absolves him from some of the risks which he would otherwise be open to as a carrier.

Cave, J. has held that these words absolve the shipowner from this liability upon which he is sued in this action, and the question before us is, whether he was right in so holding. That which seems to have most weighed upon his mind to lead him to this decision seems to have been this, that to hold that the shipowner was liable for this contribution would lead to the anomaly that the shipowner would be liable to general average contribution where, as here, the deck cargo was properly jettisoned, but would be free from liability if it was unnecessarily and improperly jettisoned; at first sight that seems a captivating point, and I do not wonder that it led the learned judge to the decision at which he arrived, and the question is, whether we can agree with his view. This stipulation contained in the charter-party is clearly a limitation of the liability of the shipowner in respect of his contract of carriage, and is a stipulation in his favour; therefore, according to the general rule, we must construe it, if we have any doubt, against the person in whose favour it is made. I now come to consider by what right the owner of the cargo claims a general average contribution; does he claim it in any way under the contract of carriage or under some other right? It seems to me that this stipulation in this charter-party is intended to cover every act of the master which, being done as servant of the shipowner, would make the shipowner liable, but for the words of the stipulation. Therefore, it would cover the case of improper jettison by the captain, it would cover the case of collision brought about by the negligence of the captain or crew, or the case of loss caused by stranding the vessel by reason of the negligence of the captain or crew. And I think that if the liability of the shipowner to pay this contribution can be properly said to arise in consequence of an act done by the captain or crew as his servants, then it follows that the shipowner is free from liability under these words.

How, therefore, does the claim for this contribution arise? It does not arise in consequence of an act done by the captain or crew as servant of the shipowner, because, if it did, the claim of the cargo owner would be a claim for the whole value of the lost cargo, and not for a contribution towards that value. The theory of the thing is, that the captain does this act of jettison, not as the servant of the shipowner, but as the servant of the cargo owner; it is taken to be a voluntary sacrifice for the safety of the whole adventure, to which the cargo owner consents. By what law or right, then, does a claim for general average contribution arise? It has been hinted by Lord Bramwell (Wright v. Marwood, 4, Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 451) that it may arise from an implied contract between the parties, and although I always differ from any opinion of Lord Bramwell with great doubt, I can hardly agree with this view. It seems to me that it does not in any way arise upon contract. There is no such right in a contract of carriage by land; if goods are in a warehouse and are on fire, and are carried out to save the building, no claim for general average can arise. It seems to me that the right arose at the time of the making of the Rhodian laws, it is a consequence of the peculiarity of sea danger, and has become incorporated into the municipal law of England as a law of the ocean and of marine risk, because when two parties were jointly in danger of the same misfortune, natural justice required that any loss falling upon one party for the safety of the whole adventure should be recouped by the other party in proportion. Now, if this is so, and if this liability does not arise upon the contract of carriage, it will not be covered by the words in the contract of carriage, and for these reasons I venture to disagree with the judgment of the learned judge who tried this case.

It seems to me that his difficulty does not, in reality, arise; because the act of the captain in making an improper jettison of the deck cargo, and his act in making a proper jettison as here, for the safety of the whole adventure, is an act done in each case in a different capacity. In the one case it is done in his capacity as servant of the shipowner and, but for these words, would render the shipowner liable; in the other case it may be said to be done as servant of the cargo owner, for the safety of the whole adventure, and the general maritime law then gives the cargo owner, quite apart from the contract, a right to general average contribution at the hands of the ship owner. For these reasons I cannot agree with the judgment of Cave, J., and I think this appeal should be allowed.

Baggallay, L.J.—The question in this case arises in consequence of a stipulation which is contained in the charter-party, and I will very concisely state the reasons which lead me to differ from the conclusion at which the learned judges in the court below arrived. I do not in any way dissent, and I do not think the learned judges below dissented from the principle laid down by Lush, J. in the two cases to which Cave, J. refers in his judgment, that the office of the bill of lading is to provide for the rights and liabilities of parties in reference to the contract to carry, and is not concerned with liabilities for general average, and that, unless the contrary appear, the words must be construed with reference to the contract to carry. Adopting that principle, the learned judges in the court below applied it to this case; I in no way differ from the principle, but from the facts of this case I draw a different inference from that which was drawn by Cave and Day, JJ., and I think that this appeal must be allowed.

Bowen, L.J.—This case raises a question of the proper construction of a charter-party, and I therefore look to see whether any rules of construction have been laid down which will help us to a right conclusion in this case. Now, we are presented with a canon of construction by the late Lush, L.J., which he laid down in the case of Schmidt v. The Royal Mail Steamship Company (45 L. J., 646 Q.B.) in these terms: "The office of the bill of lading is to provide for the rights and liabilities of the parties in reference to the contract to carry, and is not concerned with liabilities to contribution in general average." Now, the first remark I have to make about that principle is, that it is not a rule of law; it is really in the nature of a wise observation brought to bear upon the construction of mercantile documents from the experience of those who were very conversant with such documents. The next rule of construction which we have to follow is this, that if the provision in question is a stipulation in favour of one party or the other, we must so construe it as not to give it any extension in favour of that party beyond what is fairly necessary upon the words of the clause in question. Now, the words in the charter-party are these: "The steamer to be provided with a deck load, if required, at full freight, but at merchant's risk." That is clearly a stipulation in favour of the shipowner, and primâ facie it is clearly meant to relieve him from some of the risks which would otherwise fall upon him as a carrier under his contract of carriage.

It seems to me clear that these words would cover the case of the negligence of his captain or crew, by reason of which negligence the cargo was damaged or lost; but the question is, does it cover this case, which is a claim for general average contribution, in consequence of what was a general average act? How, then, does this claim arise? It arises in this way—it is part of the law of the sea, of the law maritime which is incorporated into the municipal law of England, and it arises in consequence of an act done by the captain upon the theory that the cargo owner consents to that act being done, on the assumption that he shall be indemnified against the loss thus occasioned upon a general average basis. I do not think the words relieve the shipowner from contribution to such a claim as this; the point, however, is not very clear. I find it difficult not to think that the persons who drew this charter-party were thinking of the deck cargo and of its risk of jettison, but they have not expressed it clearly, and of one thing I am quite certain that if shipowners wish to make it appear that they absolve themselves by their charter-parties from this liability in the case of deck cargoes, they can make it appear clearly on the words. My judgment is based upon the ground that in this case that intention is not clear enough.

APPEAL FROM THE QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION.

Carriage of passengers—Loss or damage—Death by negligence—Wrongful act, neglect or default—Exemption from liability—Lord Campbell's Act (9 & 10 Vict. c. 93), s. 1.

The ticket of a passenger by a steamer of defendants contained a notice that the defendants would not be responsible for any loss, damage, or detention of luggage under any circumstances; and that they would not be responsible for the maintenance or loss of time of a passenger during any detention of their vessels, nor for any delay arising out of accidents, nor for any loss or damage arising from perils of the seas, or from machinery, boilers, or steam, or from any act, neglect, or default whatsoever of the pilot, master, or mariners.

Held (affirming the judgment of Cave and Day, JJ., on demurrer), that this provision exempted the defendants from liability in an action for the loss of life of a passenger by negligence of the defendants' servants in a collision with another ship.

Appeal by the plaintiffs from the judgment (5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 47) of Cave and Day, JJ. in favour of the defendants on demurrer to a statement of defence.

The plaintiffs, who were the executors of the will of Charles Schwind, deceased, sued for the benefit and on behalf of his wife and children, for damages caused (as alleged) by the negligence of the defendants' servants on board the defendants' steamship Douro, whereby the said steamship, having come into collision with another ship, was sunk, and the said Charles Schwind lost his life.

The defendants, amongst other defences, alleged that the contract of carriage between themselves and the said Charles Schwind exonerated them from liability for the alleged negligence.

The defendants relied on the following clause which was contained in the ticket given by them to Charles Schwind when he paid his passage money:

> The company will not be responsible for the maintenance of passengers, or for their loss of time, or any consequence resulting therefrom, during any detention consequent upon the occurrence of any cause to prevent the vessels from meeting at the appointed places, nor for any delay arising out of accidents, nor for any loss or damage arising from perils of the sea, or from machinery, boilers, or steam, or from any act, neglect, or default whatsoever of the pilot, master, or mariners, &c.

The rest of the conditions contained in the ticket will be found in the report of the case in the court below (5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 47; 48 L. T. Rep. N. S. 267).

By Lord Campbell's Act (9 & 10 Vict. c. 93), s. 1:

> Whensoever the death of a person shall be caused by the wrongful act, neglect, or default, and the act, neglect, or default is such as would (if death had not ensued) have entitled the party injured to maintain an action and recover damages in respect thereof, then, and in every such case, the person who would have been liable if death had not ensued shall be liable to an action for damages, notwithstanding the death of the person injured.

A. T. Lawrence (Cohen, Q.C. with him), for the plaintiffs, in support of the appeal.—The cause of action is not within the exception contained in the clause printed on the ticket. The words "loss or damage" do not apply to personal injury, and certainly not to personal injury resulting in death:

> Smith v. Brown, 1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 56; 24 L. T. Rep. N. S. 808; L. Rep. 6 Q. B. 729;
> The Franconia, 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 415, 435; 36 L. T. Rep. N. S. 445, 640; 2 P. Div. 163.

Any contract which the deceased may have entered into by taking the ticket cannot bind his wife and children, or take away the right of his executors to sue under Lord Campbell's Act for their benefit. The case of Griffiths v. The Earl of Dudley (47 L. T. Rep. N. S. 10; 9 Q. B. Div. 357) is distinguishable, for there the workman had contracted for himself and his representatives, and any person entitled in case of death, not to claim compensation, and moreover the decision turned partly on the words of the Employers' Liability Act 1880 (43 & 44 Vict. c. 42).

Charles Russell, Q.C. and Phillimore for the defendants.—The party injured could not have maintained an action if death had not ensued, and therefore the executors cannot recover under Lord Campbell's Act. The words of the contract expressly exclude the defendants' liability, and the decisions in Read v. The Great Eastern Railway Company (28 L. T. Rep. N. S. 82; L. Rep. 3 Q. B. 555), and Thompson v. The Royal Mail Steam Packet Company (June 1875, Exchequer, before Kelly, C.B., Bramwell and Cleasby, B.B., not reported), are strong authorities in their favour. The words "loss or damage" are sufficient to cover loss of life or personal injury. The word "damage" is used in that sense in the New Testament: "I perceive that this voyage will be with hurt and much damage, not only of the lading and ship, but also of our lives:" (Acts of the Apostles, chap. xxvii., v. 10.) (a)

A. T. Lawrence replied.

July 30, 1883.—The judgment of the court was delivered by Brett, M.R.—The question to be determined in this case is whether the executors of a person named Schwind can maintain an action against the defendants under Lord Campbell's Act (9 & 10 Vict. c. 93) on behalf of the widow and children of the deceased. They certainly can, unless they are prevented by something beyond the mere law of negligence. The defendants rely upon a contract entered into between themselves and the deceased, by virtue of which, if the accident had happened without causing his death, he would not have been entitled to recover against them. For the plaintiffs it was argued that the representatives of the deceased could recover on behalf of the widow and children, although if he had survived he might not have been entitled to recover. I am of opinion that this contention is inconsistent with the obvious interpretation of Lord Campbell's Act, and that it is clear, under the statute, that the executors can recover only where the deceased himself could have recovered if he had not been killed.

The question, therefore, is whether the contract between the defendants and the deceased would have prevented him from maintaining an action against them for personal injury caused to him by the negligence of their servants. That question depends upon the construction of the passenger's ticket, which formed the contract relied upon by the defendants. The ticket was given to the deceased as a receipt for the passage money paid by him for the carriage of himself and his luggage, and applied both to the person and the luggage of the passenger. With regard to the luggage, this stipulation contained in the ticket, was that the defendants would not be responsible "for any loss, damage, or detention of luggage under any circumstances." In Thompson v. The Royal Mail Steam Packet Company (b), the court construed a stipula-

(a) In the Revised Version the words are, "I perceive that the voyage will be with injury, and much loss, not only of the lading and the ship, but also of our lives."

(b) COURT OF EXCHEQUER.

June 4, 1875.

(Before Kelly, C.B., Bramwell and Cleasby, BB.)

Thompson v. Royal Mail Steam Packet Company.

This was an action brought by a passenger on board the defendants' s.s. Elbe to recover damages for the loss of his box, while on a voyage from Southampton to Colon.

Among the conditions printed on the ticket which the plaintiff had signed were that "the company will not be responsible for any loss or damage to luggage in any circumstances," and that the company should be at liberty to land any passenger suffering from an infectious disease. Some days after the Elbe sailed the plaintiff fell ill of typhoid fever, and was landed at Kingston, Jamaica, insensible. His box was also landed on the wharf by the defendants, but the plaintiff never heard or saw anything of it afterwards.

At the trial at Guildhall, the learned judge directed a nonsuit, but gave the plaintiff leave to move to enter the tion which was in very similar terms to that contained in the ticket in the present case. The words there were "the company will not be responsible for any loss or damage to luggage in any circumstances," and the court held that the words "in any circumstances" applied to loss or damage to luggage occasioned by negligence. It had been previously decided that a stipulation that the company would not be responsible for any loss or detention of goods did not include loss occasioned by negligence; but, after this point had been so decided, the words "under any circumstances" were inserted in the contract, in addition to the words which had been held insufficient to cover a loss occasioned by negligence. I agree with the decision of the Court of Exchequer, and I think these words must have been intended to carry the case further, and that they would be sufficient to include loss or damage to luggage occasioned by negligence. If that is so, the ticket in the present case would cover the case of loss or damage to luggage.

The ticket, however, is also a passenger ticket, and contains the stipulation against responsibility with regard to passengers on which the defendants rely. I confess this seems to me to be a somewhat odd stipulation, for I cannot understand how there can be any loss or damage to a passenger, as such, exclusive of loss or damage to his property, for which the shipowner could be liable if it were caused by perils of the sea. Again, by reason of the words "from machinery, boilers, or steam," if damage were caused by the accidental explosion of a boiler, or from some accident not occasioned by negligence, the shipowners would not be liable. Therefore, if we exclude the words which are inapplicable to the present case, the stipulation as to passengers will read as follows: "The company will not be responsible for any loss or damage arising from any act, neglect, or default whatsoever of the pilot, master, or mariners." It has been suggested on the part of the plaintiffs that the word "damage" cannot be correctly applied to personal injury, and certainly it is not a very usual expression to say that a man is damaged; it seems more natural to say that he is hurt. Personal injury cannot be included under the word "loss;" but, although "injury" would have been a more apt word, I think there can be no doubt that "damage" may include personal injury. Here the sentence in which the word occurs appears to be solely applicable to passengers personally, and we are unable to come to the conclusion that personal injury is not covered by the words of the stipulation; and we think that personal injury to a passenger, caused by the negligence of the pilot, master, or mariners, is an injury from which the defendants have relieved themselves by the contract contained in the ticket. After careful consideration of the case, and after considerable hesitation, we have come to the conclusion that we cannot differ from the decision of the Divisional Court, and we think that if the passenger had not been killed, but only injured, he could not have recovered for the injury. If this is so, it follows that his executors cannot recover under Lord Campbell's Act. We are, therefore, of opinion that this appeal ought to be dismissed.

Judgment affirmed.

Kelly, C.B.—The words of the contract are clear. No doubt can exist as to their meaning. The contract is to convey the passenger and his luggage from port to port with the stipulation that the company will not be responsible for loss of luggage "under any circumstances." Putting aside the authorities, the company are not liable "under any circumstances," and this court cannot make them so. Cases may have been decided where wilful negligence made the company liable in spite of the exceptions. I will not say that there was not some degree of negligence in this case. However, I will not hold the company liable without the authority of the House of Lords that such stipulations are wholly void. This rule must therefore be discharged.

Bramwell, B.—I concur. This contract must be construed strictly. Now we are asked to say that people cannot make their own bargains, but that the court must make them for them. Cases have arisen when legislation was necessary to protect the poorer and more ignorant classes, as for instance the Truck Act. Steamboat companies and passengers are however rational beings. If these were improper agreements, they would not be entered into. It would be unreasonable to prohibit such agreements. These companies have to protect themselves against bad servants and false claims, though perhaps the stipulations are too strong for honest cases. If these stipulations pressed hardly on the public, companies would soon be started to insure the safety of luggage on special terms. It would be most mischevious to upset the conditions of carriage. It can make no difference that the clause relating to illness comes after the luggage clause. The words are too plain to admit of doubt.

Cleasby, B.—I am of the same opinion. The court in this case has to deal with the effect of this stipulation. The plaintiff's contention is that when the obligation is particular, the exception is removed, and that, under the peculiar circumstances of the case, the defendants should be liable for negligence. It is not, however, made out that any new duties arose so as to make the company liable. There is nothing in this case analogous to deviation. Some care may have been necessary, but no special obligation arises.—Ed.

THE SEATON. (a)

Collision—Overtaking and crossing ship—Duty of—Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea 1880, arts. 16, 20.

Where one of two ships is at the same time crossing and overtaking the other, art. 20 of the Regulations for Preventing Collision at Sea 1880 applies, so as to render it the duty of the former to keep out of the way of the latter, notwithstanding the rule as to crossing ships, which in such cases does not apply.

This was an action in rem instituted by the owners of the Italian steamship Polcevera against the British steamship Seaton and her freight to recover damages sustained by the Polcevera in a collision, which took place between that vessel and the Seaton on the 31st Jan. 1883 in St. George's Channel. The defendants counter-claimed.

The allegations on behalf of the plaintiffs were as follows:

The Polcevera, a steamship of 1734 tons register, bound at the time of the collision on a voyage from Greenock to Cardiff, in ballast, with a crew of twenty-eight hands, was between 2 and 3 p.m. on the 31st Jan. off Cardigan Bay in St. George's Channel, the wind being east and the weather fine and clear. The Polcevera was at the time under steam, making about nine or ten knots an hour, and heading about S.W. by S. Under these circumstances those on board the Polcevera observed the Seaton about eight or nine miles distant, and from four to five points on the port bow, apparently on a rather more westerly course than the Polcevera. About 3.30 p.m., when the South Bishop Rock Lighthouse was bearing about S., and from ten to twelve miles distant, the course of the Polcevera was altered to south half-west in order to pass between the Grassholm and Scomer Islands. The Seaton was then from three to four miles distant. The course of the Polcevera was then kept, and the vessels got down to South Bishop Light, and were drawing nearer together, when the Seaton was seen to be porting her helm, and coming off to starboard and causing danger of collision. As the collision became imminent, the helm of the Polcevera was put hard a-port; but the Seaton continued to approach under a port helm and at considerable speed, and with her starboard bow struck the portside of the Polcevera about midships and did her great damage.

The allegations on behalf the defendants were as follows:

The steamship Seaton, bound on a voyage from Garston to Cardiff, was, shortly before 4.30 p.m., in St. George's Channel off the South Bishop Rock, proceeding under steam and sail on a S.W. by S. course, and making about eight knots an hour. Under these circumstances the Polcevera, which had been observed by those on board the Seaton from the time when she first came into sight on the Seaton's starboard quarter, had overtaken and was passing the Seaton on the latter's starboard side, and at such a distance and in such a direction as to have done so in safety, when suddenly and without any warning, the helm of the Polcevera was improperly starboarded, and she attempted to cross the bows of the Seaton from starboard to port, rendering thereby a collision inevitable. The helm of the Seaton was at once hard-a starboarded, and her engines were stopped and reversed full speed, and the Polcevera was loudly hailed, but she kept on and struck the Seaton on the starboard bow with her own port side amidships, doing her damage.

Nov. 2.—The action came on for trial on viva voce and documentary evidence.

The following of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea were referred to during the argument:

Regulations of 1863, art. 17:

Every vessel overtaking any other vessel shall keep out of the way of the last-mentioned vessel.

Regulations of 1880, arts. 16 and 20:

16. If two ships under steam are crossing so as to involve risk of collision, the ship which has the other on her own starboard side shall keep out of the way of the other.

20. Notwithstanding anything contained in any preceding article, every ship, whether a sailing ship or a steamship, shall keep out of the way of the overtaken ship.

W. G. F. Phillimore, with him W. R. Kennedy, for the plaintiffs.—Although the Polcevera was originally an overtaking ship, she had for a considerable period of time before the collision virtually overtaken the Seaton. In this state of affairs she, at the distance of from three to four miles, and in the ordinary course of navigation, starboards. The Polcevera and the Seaton, then, are at a distance of over three miles on intersecting courses, and hence it was the duty of the Seaton, under art. 16 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, she having the Polcevera on her starboard side, to have kept out of the way. [BUTT, J.—Is that so? Article 17 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions of 1863 seems to have left a doubt in some cases as to the relative duties of ships, one of which is both overtaking and crossing at the same time. To remove such doubt art. 20 of the Regulations of 1880 was passed. And as this latter regulation is the one in force, it is the overtaking and not the crossing rule that is to prevail where there is any doubt. Now, the Polcevera was clearly an overtaking ship, though it is quite true she may have been at the same time a crossing one. A vessel may be both overtaking and crossing, as when she is on an intersecting course, and is also overtaking the other vessel.] In this case the Polcevera had ceased to be an overtaking ship at the time where she was put on a course to cross the Seaton. It would be unreasonable to contend that because a vessel was at some remote period of time abaft the beam of another, the overtaking rule is to continue to apply until the overtaking ship has passed the other, without any regard to the lateral distance between the two vessels:

The Cayuga, 14 Wallace (Amer.) 270. (a)

The opinion expressed by Brett, L.J., in The Franconia (3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 295; L. Rep. 2 P. Div. 8; 35 L. T. Rep. N. S. 721), to the effect

(a) The head-note to this case, which was decided by the Supreme Court of the United States in 1871, is as follows:—"Although where two steamships are running in the same direction—the ship astern sailing faster than the ship ahead—the ship astern is in general bound to adopt the necessary precautions to avoid a collision, the rule does not in general apply in a case where the ships are running on intersecting lines and the faster sailer is thus coming up. In such a case the 14th article governs, and the ship which has the other on her own starboard side must keep out of the way." The article 14 referred to is in terms identical with article 16 of our present Regulations for Preventing Collisions. The reasoning of the learned judge (Clifford, J.) seems to be that there may be many cases of one ship overtaking and crossing another where the necessity for precaution only arises when the two ships are abreast of one another. In other words, there is no necessity for the application of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions until the overtaking ship has ceased to be an overtaking ship. The question of overtaking is then a thing of the past, and the crossing rule is to be applied. It should be remembered that this case was decided in 1871 prior to the operation of the present rules. But even so, there seem grave objections to this decision. In the first place there is introduced in all cases a difficult question as to the exact bearings of the vessels at the time when precautions first become necessary. And further, neither vessel would know until the last moment what her duty was or what course the other vessel proposed to adopt. Mr Justice Butt's decision, on the other hand, lays down a clear rule applicable to all cases, and so prevents any chance of vacillation, a course productive of so many collisions.—ED.

that where two steamships are on converging courses, but one abaft the beam of the other and going at a greater speed than the other, they are not to be treated as crossing ships, was much doubted by the Court of Appeal in the later case of the Peckforton Castle (3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 533; 37 L. T. Rep. N. S. 316; L. Rep. 3 P. Div. 11).

Hall, Q.C. (with him T. T. Bucknill), for the defendants, was not called upon.

BUTT, J.—It seems to me and the Elder Brethren that this is a very clear case. These two vessels were originally steering pretty nearly parallel courses, and if they had kept on the same courses there would have been no danger. But a new state of things is brought about by a manœuvre at some time or other on the part of the Polcevera, which instead of continuing her course alters considerably to the south. By so doing she assumes a course, which, if she be the quicker ship, will cause her to intersect the course of the other vessel. In other words she starboards her helm, so as to throw herself across the bows of the Seaton. Now what is her answer to this charge? I confess I do not understand her alleged justification. It does not, however, follow from this that she is wholly to blame. The plaintiffs allege that when the ships were approaching one another, the Seaton was seen to port, and they say that that was the cause of the collision. There is evidence on their part that the Seaton did port, but it does not affect my judgment, for I think the evidence is clear enough that the position of great and imminent danger was brought about by the original starboarding of the Polcevera. I hold that the latter was an overtaking ship, and that she threw herself across the bows of the English ship, and is therefore, for the reasons I have given during the argument, in fault for this collision.

THE BERYL. (a)

Collision—Crossing ships—Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, Arts. 16, 18, 22.

The steamships A. and B. were on courses crossing one another at right angles, the A. having the other on her starboard hand. As they approached one another the B., seeing the A. was taking no steps to keep out of the way, at a distance of from a quarter to half a mile, eased her engines and whistled.

As they got nearer, the A. still not altering her course, the engines of the B. were stopped and reversed full speed astern, but the vessels came into collision.

It was admitted that the A. was to blame, but it was contended by the A. that the B. was also to blame for not stopping and reversing when she first saw there was risk of collision and that the A. was not getting out of her way.

Held, that, although it was the duty of the B. to keep her course, it was still her duty to stop and reverse in due time, and that, under the circumstances, she had stopped and reversed in due time, and that the A. was alone to blame for the collision.

THIS was an action in rem, brought by the owners of the steamship Abeona against the owners of the steamship Beryl to recover damages occasioned by a collision between the two vessels on the 10th Sept. 1883. The defendants counter-claimed.

The material facts alleged on behalf of the plaintiffs were as follows:—Shortly before 11.30 p.m. on the 10th Sept. the Abeona, on a voyage from Rotterdam ta Sunderland, was in the North Sea, steering north-east, and making about seven and a half knots an hour. Her regulation lights were duly exhibited and burning, and a good look-out was being kept on board her. In these circumstances those on board the Abeona saw the masthead light of the Beryl about two miles off, and bearing about abeam on the starboard side. Shortly afterwards the green and red lights were seen. The Abeona kept on, expecting the Beryl would pass astern; but the Beryl ported her helm and shut out her green light and caused danger of collision, coming on at a great rate. The engines of the Abeona were thereupon stopped and reversed full speed, and her helm was put hard-a-starboard; but the Beryl with her stem and port bow struck the Abeona on the starboard fore-rigging, doing her so much damage that she sank in a few minutes. The plaintiffs (inter alia) charged the defendants with neglect of art. 18 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea.

The facts alleged on behalf of the defendants were as follows:—At the place aforesaid the Beryl, on a voyage from Wyburg to London, was steering south-west by south, and making about eight knots an hour, when those on board of her observed at a distance of about four miles, the masthead light of the Abeona bearing about three points on their port bow. Shortly afterwards the green light became visible. The Beryl was kept on her course, but the Abeona, instead of keeping out of the way of the Beryl, approached, and although the whistle of the Beryl war twice blown, and her engines were eased, and when a collision became imminent were stopped and reversed full speed astern, the Abeona with her starboard bow struck the stem and port bow of the Beryl, doing her considerable damage.

The action came on for hearing on Nov. 27 before the judge, assisted by Trinity Masters. At the close of the plaintiffs' case, the judge having intimated that he was unable to accept the evidence of the plaintiffs, and considered the Abeona to be to blame, the plaintiffs' counsel admitted that the Abeona was in fault, but contended that the Beryl was guilty of contributory negligence in not stopping and reversing her engines in due time.

It was proved that, when the vessels were distant from one another between a quarter and half a mile, the Beryl whistled and eased her engines, and still seeing the Abeona kept her course, stopped, and reversed her engines full speed astern.

Hall, Q.C. (with him W. G. F. Phillimore) for the plaintiffs.—The house of Lords has laid down in the most emphatic terms the duty of strictly and immediately complying with the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea:

The Khedive, 4 Asp. Mar. Cas. 360; 43 L. T. Rep. N. S. 610; L. Rep. 5 App. Cas. 876.

(a) Reported by J. P. ASPINALL and F. W. RAIKES, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

In this case the Beryl has admittedly failed to comply with art. 18. Her duty was, the moment there was danger of collision, to stop and reverse. All she does is to ease, and only stops and reverses when a collision is inevitable. By so acting she has infringed the rule.

Myburgh, Q.C. (with him Kennedy) for the defendants.—The navigation of the Beryl was most careful, and strictly in accordance with the Regulations for Preventing Collisions. Her duty under art. 22, by which she is bound when she first sees the Abeona, is to keep her course. This she does, at the same time easing her speed. She has a right to assume that the Abeona will keep out of her way. The moment she sees that the Abeona is determined to neglect that duty, she at once, in compliance with art. 18, stops and reverses full speed astern.

The Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea referred to in the argument are as follows:

18. Every steamship, when approaching another ship so as to involve risk of collision, shall slacken her speed, or stop and reverse if necessary.

22. Where by the above rules one or two ships is to keep out of the way, the other shall keep her course.

BUTT, J.—In this case we see no difficulty in finding the Abeona solely to blame. The plaintiffs' counsel having admitted the Abeona to be in fault, has argued that the Beryl was also to blame for not easing or stopping and reversing in due time. Discarding the evidence from the Abeona, which I do not accept, it seems that these vessels were on crossing courses at about right angles, the Beryl being on the starboard side of the Abeona. It was therefore the duty of the Abeona, in accordance with art. 16 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, to keep out of the way of the Beryl, and the corresponding duty of the Beryl, under art. 22, to keep her course. Now, what happens? The plaintiffs admit that the Beryl kept her course, but it is said that she kept it too long. In other words, the counsel for the plaintiffs contended that, though art. 22 was applicable, yet she should not have disregarded art. 18, and that, in accordance with the latter article, she should have stopped and reversed. I agree that art. 22 is not to override art. 18, and that in the position in which these ships were placed both articles must be considered to be applicable.

Now, how are the facts? These two vessels being at some considerable distance from one another, those on the Beryl, seeing the Abeona is keeping her course, whistle, and soon after whistle a second time. Thereupon the engines of the Beryl are eased, and this is done from a quarter to half a mile distant from the Abeona. The master of the Beryl had thought that the Abeona would port her helm and go under his stern, and he acts rightly in keeping on for some time, in order to give the Abeona the opportunity of so doing, because, if she had done so in proper time, the speed of the Abeona would have assisted this manœuvre. It was the duty of the master of the Beryl to suppose that the Abeona would act in accordance with the regulations for preventing collisions, and it was not for him to suppose that those in command of the Abeona would disobey the article of the regulations by which they were bound. But when at a distance of from a quarter to half a mile the master of the Beryl found that the Abeona was not keeping out of his way, the engines of the Beryl were eased. If the Abeona had not then also eased, no collision even then would have occurred, because the relative positions of the vessels were such that, if the Abeona had then kept on, she would have passed clear. But by easing she counteracted the Beryl's manœuvre. Then the Beryl stopped and reversed her engines when close to the Abeona, as did the latter; but it was too late, and a collision occurred. I am therefore clearly of opinion that from first to last the navigation of the Abeona was reckless and wrong; and, on the other hand, that the Beryl was properly navigated in accordance with the regulations.

THE TYNE STEAM SHIPPING COMPANY LIMITED v. BRITISH SHIPOWNERS COMPANY LIMITED.

THE WARKWORTH. (a)

Limitation of liability — Collision — Defect in machinery — Improper navigation — The Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 63), s. 54.

Where a ship is held liable for a collision caused by a defect in her machinery, and such defect is due not to the master or crew, but to the negligence or default of other persons who are employed by the shipowner to repair the machinery on shore before the commencement of the voyage, and for the purposes of the voyage, the collision is nevertheless occasioned by "improper navigation" within the meaning of sect. 54, sub-sect. 4 of the Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 63), so as to entitle the owner to limit his liability under the provisions of that Act.

In an action for limitation of liability, where the defendants raised an issue which was decided against them, the Court ordered the plaintiffs to pay all the costs of the action, except the costs incidental to the raising of such issue, as to which each party was to pay his own costs.

THIS was an action for limitation of liability brought by the Tyne Steam Shipping Company Limited, the owners of the screw steamship Warkworth, against the owners of the vessel British Enterprise.

The collision in consequence of which this action was instituted occurred on the 17th April 1883. At the time of the collision the British Enterprise was lying in the river Tyne moored at buoys taking in cargo. The persons in charge of the Warkworth, which was steered by a steam-steering apparatus, saw the British Enterprise in due time and took proper steps to keep out of her way. Owing, however, to a defect in the steering apparatus, the Warkworth failed to answer her helm, and came into collision with the British Enterprise which shortly afterwards sank. An action was thereupon instituted by the owners of the British Enterprise against the Warkworth. The defendants pleaded inevitable accident.

On the 29th June 1883 the damage action was tried before Sir James Hannen, and it was proved that the steering apparatus had been inspected at Rotterdam six months before the collision, that the cause of the defect was the using of an improper pin which came out of its place in the apparatus, that the pin in question had been lost subsequently to the collision, and that it was not the duty of the ship's engineer to overhaul the apparatus,

Sir JAMES HANNEN found the Warkworth solely to blame, and delivered the following judgment:—The defendants lie under insuperable difficulties in the case probably from the negligence of some one or other, because they have unfortunately allowed the pin, the all important object in this transaction, to be lost, and therefore we are unable to see what its nature was, and to judge whether there was any impropriety in its use, and then to endeavour to ascertain to whom the use of it is to be attributed. But there is also another difficulty which the defendants have made, that is, that while they take credit for having had an inspection during the period that this vessel has been in their possession, they have not given us any evidence of the result of that inspection. We are left therefore to conjecture. It is a misfortune of course of employers that they are responsible for the acts of those whom they employ, although they themselves may have done all that is right. Of course I have nothing to say against the defendants themselves, but they are responsible for those whom they employ. The evidence in this case lies in a very narrow compass. A proper steering gear of well recognised and approved principles was adopted, and the maker of that apparatus has been called, and he has told us that he has distinct recollection of this particular pin, and it is not merely because it is his practice to make use of a particular kind of pin, but he recollects in this particular instance a split pin was used for the purpose of keeping this nut in its place. It is obvious that all things must wear out and that there must be therefore an inspection from time to time to guard against something unforeseen taking place. The first question in the case no doubt is, whether or not there has been an inspection at a sufficiently short series of intervals—on this the evidence stands thus: One gentleman has said that he thinks that an apparatus of this kind should be inspected every two months. The master himself says that he thinks there should be an inspection every six months. An inspection took place at Rotterdam six months before the collision. If that is so, so far as the period would go, the evidence of Mr. Nicholl would tend to establish that there was a sufficient time. Of course the inspection cannot be taking place every week or every fortnight, the same as there is of the gear on the deck, but I certainly myself am disposed to think, and the Trinity Brethren who assist me are also of opinion, that the inspection ought to take place more frequently than once in six months. But I do not propose to rest my decision upon that, but I rest it upon these grounds: It being proved that there was a split pin in originally, the pin having now being lost, and the evidence of the only person who speaks to the condition of that pin before it was lost being that it was not, so far as he recollected, a split pin, coupled with the fact that there was a taking off of the cover, and inspection at Rotterdam, leads me to the inference that from some cause or other the original and proper pin had been taken out and an improper pin had been put in, and that this has been the cause of the accident. That being my view, I think the defence is not established, and that the plaintiffs are entitled to recover.

Dec. 12.—The limitation of liability action now came on for hearing.

The evidence in the damage action was put in and two witnesses were called on behalf of the plaintiffs the owners of the Warkworth, to prove that it was the duty of the ship's engineer to look to the steering apparatus when the ship was away from her home port, although at the hearing of the damage action their own ship's engineer had stated it was not his duty to do so.

The 54th section of the Merchant Shipping Act 1862, on which the argument turned, is as follows:—

> The owners of any ship, whether British or foreign, shall not in cases where all or any of the following events occur without their actual fault or privity; (that is to say):
>
> (1) Where any loss of life or personal injury is caused to any person being carried in such ship:
>
> (2) Where any damage or loss is caused to any goods, merchandise, or other things whatsoever on board any such ship:
>
> (3) Where any loss of life or personal injury is by reason of the improper navigation of such ship as aforesaid caused to any person carried in any other ship or boat:
>
> (4) Where any loss or damage is by reason of the improper navigation of such ship as aforesaid caused to any other ship or boat, or to any goods, merchandise, or other things whatsoever on board any other ship or boat:
> be answerable in damages in respect of loss of life or personal injury, either alone or together with loss or damage, to ships, boats, goods, merchandise, or other things to an aggregate amount exceeding fifteen pounds for each ton of their ship's tonnage; nor in respect of loss or damage to ships, goods, merchandise or other things, whether there be in addition loss of life or personal injury or not, to an aggregate amount exceeding eight pounds for each ton of the ship's tonnage; such tonnage to be the registered tonnage in the case of sailing ships, and in the case of steamships the gross tonnage without deduction on account of engine room.

Finlay, Q.C. and Barnes for the plaintiffs, the owners of the Warkworth.—The words "improper navigation" cover a case like the present. The meaning of these words has already been considered in Good v. The London Steamship Owners Mutual Protection Association (L. Rep. 6 C. P. 563), where it was held that a loss occasioned in consequence of a steam-cock being left open was a loss within the meaning of these words. If this defect in the steering apparatus had been due to the ship's engineer, the collision would clearly have been due to "improper navigation." Can it make any difference if it is due to a marine engineer, who is equally a servant of the owners? Whatever be the strict technical meaning of navigation, the Legislature never meant to exclude such a case as the present from the operation of the statute.

Webster, Q.C. and W. G. F. Phillimore for the defendants.—The contention of the plaintiffs amounts to this, that improper construction is improper navigation. Primâ facie improper navigation is the negligent government of the ship by her master and crew, and inasmuch as this is a statute which confers a privilege on a wrongdoer at the expense of an innocent sufferer, the words of the statute must be construed strictly and in no way strained to embrace a state of circumstances not clearly within their meaning:

The Ettrick (sub nomine Prehn v. Bailey), 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 465; 45 L. T. Rep. N. S. 399; L. Rep. 6 P. Div. 127;
The Andalusian, 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 22; 39 L. T. Rep. N. S. 204; L. Rep. 3 P. Div. 182;
Gale v. Laurie, 5 B. & Cr. 156;
Chapman v. Royal Netherlands Steam Navigation Company, 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 107; 40 L. T. Rep. N. S. 433; L. Rep. 4 P. Div. 157.

Yet the plaintiffs are here seeking to say that the improper act of a marine engineer before the voyage commences brings this case within the meaning of "improper navigation." In Steel v. The State Line Steamship Company (3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 516; 37 L. T. Rep. N. S. 333; L. Rep. 3 App. Cas. 72), although one of the exceptions in the bill of lading was damage caused by navigation, the House of Lords held that all the exceptions must be taken to refer to a period subsequent to the sailing of the ship. If so, the neglect of the marine engineer before the ship sails cannot come within the meaning of "improper navigation."

Finlay, Q.C. in reply.—In Steel v. The State Line Steamship Company, the House of Lords did not decide that navigation was confined to the action of the master and crew after the ship had sailed. What they did decide was that the parties to the contract contained in the bill of lading meant the exceptions to apply only to a period subsequent to the sailing of the ship. In other words, their Lordships decided what was the intention of the parties, and not the meaning of navigation.

BUTT, J.—This is an important case, and a case involving a very considerable difficulty. I think it being pretty certain that whatever way I decide, it will go to the Court of Appeal, I therefore do not see that anything would be gained by my reserving judgment. In the first place I do not agree with what has been said in disparagement of the Acts allowing limitation of liability. I do not agree that they are anything but valuable Acts of Parliament, and I do not agree with the contention that, because they are said to interfere with what have been called common law rights, they are therefore to be construed differently to other statutes. In approaching this particular statute it seems to me that the intention of the Legislature in all these Acts of Parliament has been to relieve shipowners from the liability caused by the negligent acts of their servants. When I say relieve them from their liability, I do not mean altogether but to some extent only. Primâ facie I do not see why the amount of relief should be limited to a case in which damage has occurred through the negligence of the master and crew, and why the Act should not apply to the negligence of persons other than the master and crew employed by the shipowner to attend to the ship in preparation for the voyage, as for example, a marine engineer, employed while the ship is in port to overhaul the machinery. It seems to me that this conclusion is strengthened by the wording of the two first sub-sections which omit the words "improper navigation," and allow limitation of liability generally where the loss occurs without the actual fault or privity of the owners. It seems to me that this shows an intention to relieve the shipowner in all cases where damage has been caused by the negligence of his servants, and he himself has not been to blame. But it is said that might be all very well if it were not for the positive wording of the sub-section in question, and that in this particular case it is sub-sect 4 which applies, and that sub-section prevents limitation of liability from applying, except in a case where the loss or damage is by reason of the "improper navigation" of such ship. It is said that "improper navigation" cannot be made to include anything other than the negligence of the master and crew in the course of the voyage. Primâ facie it would seem to me improper navigation for a steamship to run into a vessel at anchor. Improper navigation in such a case may be, for example, caused by the negligence of the persons in charge of the ship, or by improper loading of the stevedore; but, assuming a case in which the ship is so negligently loaded by the stevedore that it is found after the voyage has commenced, and too late to remedy it, that the vessel will not answer her helm, and she runs into another vessel through no fault of the master or crew, I confess I do not see why that is not improper navigation. I suggested during the course of the argument other possible states of circumstances, as where persons at the order of the shipowner supply improper coals to the ship, and the engineers are unable to keep steam in their boilers, and in consequence a collision occurs. Why is not that "improper navigation?" The words "improper navigation" do not necessarily exclude that state of circumstances.

Let us now suppose that an accident has occurred from the falling out of such a pin as in the present case, and that that pin has been put in by the chief engineer during the course of the voyage. It would not be contended that that was not "improper navigation." Let us now go a step further, and suppose that the ship's engineer had put the pin in while in port an hour before the ship started on her voyage. Could it be said then that the collision was not caused by improper navigation? Now, suppose that while the ship is in port a marine engineer is sent by the owners to overhaul the machinery, and he, in the ordinary course of his business, puts in the pin. Why would that be less improper navigation if it be put in by the marine engineer than by the ship's engineer? I therefore have a strong feeling that this case is within the intention of the Act, and feeling that, I do not hesitate to say I feel strengthened in refusing any interpretation of the Act which would thwart that object. I therefore come to the conclusion that I am not prevented from saying that there has been a loss by reason of the improper navigation of this ship, and I am of opinion that this Act applies. I accordingly grant a decree for the plaintiffs in the terms prayed for.

Barnes.—It is submitted that, as the defendants have failed to establish the issue they have raised, the plaintiffs are entitled to costs:

THE SPERO EXPECTO. (a)

Collision — Practice—Default action in rem.—Motion for judgment—Order XXVII., r. 11.

As under Order XIII., r. 12, default actions in rem are to proceed as if the defendant had appeared, Order XXVII., r. 11, as to setting down an action on motion for judgment where the defendant makes default in pleading applies to such actions and judgments therein is to be obtained under the provisions of that rule.

Where in an action in rem for collision the defendant makes default, the plaintiff should on moving for judgment, support his claim by affidavit.

THIS was a motion under Order XXVII., r. 11, by the plaintiffs, in an undefended damage action in rem, asking the court to "pronounce for the plaintiffs' claim for damage, and to condemn the vessel Spero Expecto in the said damage and in costs, and to refer the said claim to the registrar, assisted (if necessary) by one merchant, to report the amount thereof, and to order the said vessel to be appraised and sold."

The action was instituted on the 16th Oct. 1883, by the owners of the fishing lugger Undine against the French fishing smack Spero Expecto, in consequence of the latter vessel having sailed into the fishing nets of the Undine, which were, in consequence, lost.

The writ was served on the Spero Expecto on the 10th Nov. No appearance was entered by or on behalf of the defendants. The plaintiffs' preliminary act and statement of claim were filed in the registry on the 24th Nov. Affidavits verifying the statement of claim, and as to service of writ, were also filed.

W. G. F. Phillimore, for the plaintiffs, in support of the motion.—As no appearance has been entered by the defendants, the plaintiffs, under the provisions of Order XIII., r. 12, have filed an affidavit of service and a statement of claim. That being done, the same rule says the action may proceed as if the defendant had appeared. The plaintiffs, therefore, under Order XXVII., r. 11, have set down the action on motion for judgment. That order empowers the plaintiff in certain actions where the defendant makes default to set down the action on motion for judgment, and appears to apply to an Admiralty action in rem. [BUTT, J.—I see that by Order XL., r. 1, it is provided generally that, unless otherwise provided, the judgment of the court shall be obtained by motion. What do you say as to the application of that rule?] That order does not strictly apply to the circumstances of the plaintiffs' case, whereas the one under which they are moving does. In support of the allegations in the statement of claim we have affidavits. [BUTT, J.—Are affidavits necessary?] Sir Robert Phillimore considered them to be so:

The Sfactoria, 35 L. T. Rep. N. S. 431; 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 271; L. Rep. 2 P. Div. 3.

Moreover, Order XXXVII., r. 2. provides that in default actions in rem evidence may be given by affidavit. That appears to bear out Sir R. Phillimore's view. [BUTT, J.—Yes, I think that rule makes it clear.]

BUTT, J. accordingly gave judgment for the plaintiffs, with a reference to the registrar, assisted by one merchant.

THE CAMELLIA.

Salvage—Ineffectual attempts—Right to award—Costs.

Where a vessel engaged in rendering salvage services is compelled in consequence of the nature of her cargo to abandon the service before it is completed, she is not deprived of her right to reward if by the services already rendered she has brought the vessel she is assisting from a position of danger into a position of comparative safety, and the vessel is ultimately saved.

THIS was an action for salvage instituted by the owners, master, and crew of the steamship Victoria against the owners of the steamship Camellia, her cargo and freight.

The services consisted in towing the Camellia, which was found in the Atlantic Ocean by the Victoria, disabled and flying signals of distress, a distance of about eighty-five miles. The hawser then parted, and, although the master of the Camellia was desirous of the towing being continued, the master of the Victoria, considering that by attempting to do so he would endanger his own cargo, and also being of opinion that by his past services the Camellia had been put into a safe position to continue her voyage under sail, he determined to cease rendering further assistance. The Camellia was ultimately towed into Queenstown by a tug which had been sent out in search of her. The defendants (inter alia) pleaded that the salvors by abandoning the Camellia had forfeited all claim to salvage. The further facts of the case appear in the judgment of the court.

Jan. 11.—The action now came on for hearing on documentary and viva voce evidence before Sir J. Hannen assisted by Trinity Masters.

Cohen, Q.C. (with him French) for the plaintiffs, —The plaintiffs have rendered salvage services, and are entitled to a substantial reward in respect of them. The salvors abandoned the Camellia because they could not have continued their services without endangering their cargo, and because, when they left the Camellia, she by their services had been brought into such a position that she was able in safety to continue her voyage without further assistance. It has never been laid down that where salvors, after they have rendered substantial assistance, discontinue doing so out of consideration for the safety of their own ship, and in the bonâ fide belief that the other ship has been put into a position of continuing her voyage in safety, are to be deprived of all reward. Moreover, salvage has been awarded by this court to salvors whose efforts have proved ineffectual:

The Undaunted, 2 L. T. Rep. N.S. 520; Lush. 90; The Melpomene, 2 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 122; 29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 405; L. Rep. 4 Adm. & Ecc. 129.

It is to be remembered that the present services

did in fact contribute to the ultimate safety of the ship, inasmuch as she was towed a considerable distance on her course, and nearer to the tug sent for her.

Dr. Phillimore (with him Kennedy) for the defendants.—The plaintiffs in this case have rendered no salvage services. Neither The Undaunted (ubi sup.) nor The Melpomene (ubi sup.) is in point. In The Undaunted the services, although ineffectual, were performed under an agreement between the salvors and the master of the salved ship. Again in The Melpomene (ubi sup.) the salvors went out in answer to signals of distress, and were only prevented from rendering services by causes over which they had no control. In the present case there is a voluntary abandonment of the Camellia, and, as the defendants submit, an improper one. Hence on the authorities, these plaintiffs can have no claim to salvage :

Cohen, Q.C. in reply. Cur. adv. vult.

Jan. 22.—Sir JAMES HANNEN.—The material facts of this case are as follows : The Camellia, an iron screw steamship of 880 tons register, rigged as a two-masted schooner, with a crew of twenty hands all told, left Baltimore on the 11th June 1883, on a voyage to Londonderry. The value of the ship, cargo, and freight was 23,419*l.* On the 25th June the tail of the propeller shaft broke, and the propeller became useless. The Camellia proceeded under canvas until the 30th June, by which time she had sailed 126 miles to the eastward, and had reached lat. 49° 29′ N., long. 21° 20′ W., when she fell in with the Victoria. The Victoria was a steamship of 3989 tons gross, 2449 nett, with engines of 400 horse-power, and a crew of fifty-four hands all told, on a voyage from Boston to Liverpool. She had on board a cargo of 616 cattle, 2752 sheep, besides dead meat, and a general cargo of American produce. The value of the ship was 35,000*l.*, of the cargo 41,536*l.*, and freight 4692*l.* The Camellia was flying signals of distress, and requested to be taken in tow.

The first question in dispute is as to the condition of the Camellia at this time. For the Victoria it is alleged that the wind was west, and that the Camellia was lying nearly head to wind quite out of her course, and that her master was vainly trying to pay her head off to the eastward. For the Camellia it is denied that she was lying nearly head to wind, or that her master was vainly trying to pay her head off to the eastward, and it is alleged that she was heading northward, a position in which she had been voluntarily placed by putting her helm to starboard, and backing her yards when the Victoria was seen. She had just split her foresail, and another was about to be bent. On this point I am of opinion that the contention of the Camellia is well founded, and that there was nothing to have prevented her paying off to the eastward again without the assistance of the Victoria. The Victoria took the Camellia in tow at about 8.10 p.m. on the 30th, and continued towing until 7.45 a.m. the next morning, when the hawser broke. The Camellia signalled to the Victoria to take her in tow again, but the latter, in consequence of the risk there would have been of damage to the cattle and sheep in turning round to connect the vessels, and seeing that the Camellia was able to proceed on her voyage under sail, left her, signalling that she would report her.

In these circumstances it is contended on behalf of the Camellia that the Victoria rendered her no salvage services, and that she improperly abandoned the attempt to salve, and therefore that the suit should be dismissed. I am of opinion, however, that salvage services to some extent were rendered. It is obvious that a steamer whose propeller is broken, though she may have sailing power, is subject to greater risks than she is in ordinary circumstances expected to encounter. She is exposed for a longer time to the dangers of bad weather, and she is not able to beat up against unfavourable winds with the same facility as a vessel constructed for navigation with sails alone. She is liable, therefore, to be driven out of her course if a change of wind should occur, and it becomes of great importance to her that the time and distance during which she may be exposed to these dangers should be shortened as much as possible. In the present case the Camellia was towed on her course a distance of eighty-five miles ; but, what is of more importance, she was hastened on her voyage about seventy hours, whereas up to the time of her being taken in tow she was sailing only at the rate of one mile an hour. She was also brought from ten to fourteen miles to the north, and so to that extent nearer to her proper track from which she had been carried somewhere about thirty miles. I am advised that there was nothing in the weather during the towing which would indicate any difficulty or danger in the course of the service. But it is contended that the Victoria by abandoning the Camellia has forfeited all right to claim for salvage services. I find as a fact that the Victoria did not leave the Camellia because she was unable to see that the Camellia was signalling to be again taken in tow, but because, from the nature of her cargo, she would have run a considerable risk of loss and damage to it by turning round to windward to connect the two vessels, and I am advised that this was a reasonable apprehension. I am also advised that, though the weather was worse after the towing ceased than when it commenced, there was nothing in it which made it unreasonable on the part of the master of the Victoria to consider that the Camellia could proceed on her voyage under sail without any other than that general risk which I have referred to as attending any steamer which has lost her steam power. I am advised and I think that there was no misconduct on the part of the master of the Victoria, and that, balancing the risk to the interests which were committed to his charge with that to which the Camellia was still exposed, he did not act improperly in going on when the hawser broke.

Several cases were cited in support of the defendant's contention that the plaintiffs were entitled to nothing. There can be no doubt that services, however meritorious, which do not in any way contribute to the ultimate safety of the ship are not entitled to salvage reward. That was the case of The Edward Hawkins (ubi sup.). There the vessel taken in tow was after the parting of the hawser driven away by a gale towards a dangerous coast, from which she was saved by her own anchors. The towing in no way assisted her, and therefore no salvage was earned. On the other hand, in The E. U. (ubi sup.), Dr. Lushington puts the case of a vessel in a disabled state being brought on its way and then abandoned by the salvors in consequence of the tempestuous weather or other circumstances, and afterwards being saved by other salvors. He says that it is by no means to be laid down as clear law that the original salvors are not entitled to some reward. Again, in The Killeena (ubi sup.), Sir Robert Phillimore says, "Now, there is no doubt that where a set of salvors have done some acts which tend to the ultimate salvage of a vessel they are usually entitled to some remuneration," and he then proceeds to consider the facts which he thinks show that the alleged salvors had improperly abandoned the ship in danger. In the case of The Nellie (ubi sup.) Sir Robert Phillimore held that where in consequence of a bonâ fide mistake towing was not resumed after the hawsers had parted, yet, as beneficial services had been rendered, the salvors were entitled to be paid. Also in The Melpomene (ubi sup.) Sir Robert Phillimore says: "There are no cases which stand in the way of my adopting as a principle this, which appears to me to be of considerable importance to the interests of commerce and navigation, namely, that where a vessel makes a signal of distress, and another goes out with the bonâ fide intention of assisting that distress, and, as far as she can, does so, and some accident occurs which prevents her services being as effectual as she intended them to be, and no blame attaches to her, she ought not to go wholly unrewarded." In The Yan Yean (ubi sup.) I was of opinion that the salvors had by negligence brought the salved vessel into as great peril as that from which they had rescued her, and therefore that no claim for salvage existed. I am of opinion that the principle laid down by Dr. Lushington and Sir Robert Phillimore in the cases I have referred to, namely, that services which have contributed to the ultimate safety of a vessel, if interrupted before completion, without default of the salvors, are entitled to some remuneration, is applicable not only to the case of a vessel saved from imminent risk of wreck, but also to a case like the present where the vessel is brought into a position of greater comparative safety than that in which she was when she asked for assistance.

I was asked by the plaintiffs to take into consideration, when estimating the amount of salvage to be awarded, certain damage alleged to have been done to the Victoria's machinery, and loss consequent upon this. I am of opinion that it is not established that the damage was occasioned by the salvage services, and it is therefore unnecessary to consider whether to any and to what extent special damage should be taken into account in estimating salvage. I have now given my view of the facts. They lead me to the conclusion that a moderate sum ought to be awarded, and that sum I fix at 200*l.*, of which I give two-thirds to the owners, and one-third to the crew.

Jan. 30.—The plaintiffs applied for the costs of the action.

Cohen, Q.C. (with him Roscoe), in support of the application, referred to Garnett v. Bradley (3 App. Cas. 944; 39 L. T. Rep. N. S. 261) and The Fenix (Swa. 13).

Phillimore (with him Kennedy), contra, referred to The Silesia (4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 338; 5 P. Div. 177; 43 L. T. Rep. N. S. 319).

Sir JAMES HANNEN.—I am of opinion that some costs should be given to the plaintiffs, as the case was of some difficulty. The question raised was one which it was desirable should be tried in the High Court. The salvors therefore are entitled to the general costs of the action, but not to those occasioned by the claim for special damage.

THE HARDWICK. (a)

Salvage—Practice—Pleadings—Admission of facts—Evidence—Order XIX., rr. 4, 5.

In salvage actions the plaintiffs in their statement of claim should state fully the material facts of the service, and if such facts are admitted by the defendants, the court will not allow the plaintiffs at the hearing to amplify them by evidence, except on special grounds.

THIS was a salvage action instituted by the owners, master, and crew of the steam trawler Flying Sprite, against the owners of the steamship Hardwick and freight.

On the 11th Dec. 1883 the plaintiffs delivered their statement of claim, in which the facts of the service were set out at length. The defendants in the statement of defence, with the exception of denying the values as stated by the plaintiffs, admitted the allegations in the statement of claim.

The services were shortly as follows:—

On the 13th Sept. 1883 the Flying Sprite found the Hardwick in the North Sea in a sinking condition occasioned by collision with another vessel. The Flying Sprite thereupon took the Hardwick in tow, and grounded her on the North Beach at Scarborough. Temporary repairs were there effected to her, and she was on the 18th Sept. taken into Hartlepool.

At the hearing the plaintiffs' counsel proposed to call evidence to amplify the statement of claim by proving that the place where the Hardwick had been grounded was in fact the best place the salvors could have taken her to. To this evidence the defendants objected.

Hall, Q.C. (with him Bucknill) for the plaintiffs in support of the evidence.—Though it may be the general practice of this court to preclude evidence in a salvage action where the defendants have admitted the allegations in the statement of claim, yet it is not the universal practice. The court has a discretion, and should in this instance exercise it in favour of the plaintiffs.

Dr. Phillimore (with him Raikes), for the defendants, contra.—If evidence is to be given where the defendants have admitted the allegations in the statement of claim, the advantage of setting out fully the facts in the statement of claim is done away with. The double expense of lengthy statements of claim and evidence will thereby be incurred. In this particular case no good reasons have been shown why the practice of the court should be departed from.

Sir JAMES HANNEN.—It is suggested that I have a discretion as to admitting evidence in a case like the present. In that I agree. I think that, if anything material to the decision of the case is omitted in the statement of claim, I might possibly admit evidence by allowing the statement of claim to be amended and admitting evidence in support of the amendment. I may perhaps here say that this and other cases which have recently been before me show the advantage of adhering to the old practice in regard to statements of claim in salvage actions. Much expense is saved by the admission of facts, and by the court giving its decision on such admissions. But this valuable practice of admitting the facts alleged in the statement of claim would become useless if, notwithstanding that the material facts are set out by the plaintiffs, and admitted by the defendants, evidence in addition were to be admitted. The result would be that neither the court nor the defendants would be sure that all the facts were before them, nor whether the defendants' admissions were final or not. It must therefore be taken that such facts are alleged in a salvage statement of claim that, if admitted, they will constitute the whole of the plaintiffs' case, and, further, that evidence will only be admitted subject to the discretion of the court, and on special grounds. In this particular case I see no reason why the proposed evidence should be admitted, and I accordingly reject it.

GULLICHSEN v. STEWART BROTHERS. (a)

Charter-party—Cesser clause—Bill of lading—Incorporation of conditions of charter-party in bill of lading.

A charter-party contained stipulations in the usual form for payment of freight and demurrage, and also a stipulation that "as this charter-party is entered into by the charterers for account of another party their liability ceases as soon as the cargo is on board, the vessel holding a lien upon the cargo for freight and demurrage."

The charterers having placed the cargo on board at the port of loading, a bill of lading was signed whereby the goods were made deliverable to themselves at the port of discharge, "they paying freight and all other conditions as per charter-party."

In an action by the shipowner against them, as consignees of the cargo, for demurrage in respect of delay at the port of discharge.

Held (affirming the judgment of Pollock, B. and Lopes, J.), that the words of the bill of lading incorporated the terms of the charter-party only so far as they were consistent with the bill of lading, and that the cesser clause being inconsistent with the bill of lading was not incorporated, and, therefore, that the plaintiff was entitled to maintain the action.

THIS was an appeal from the judgment of the Divisional Court (consisting of Pollock, B. and Lopes, J.) reported 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 130; 49 L. T. Rep. N. S. 198.

A special case was stated by the parties, pursuant to the rules of the Supreme Court 1875, Order XXXIV., r. 1, the following being the material parts thereof:

The plaintiff is a shipowner residing in Norway, and is the owner of the vessel Alette. The defendants are timber and general merchants, carrying on business at 3, Fen-court, Fenchurch-street, in the city of London.

This action is brought to recover the sum of 56*l.* 13*s.* 4*d.* for the demurrage of the said vessel.

On the 13th Dec. 1881 a charter-party was entered into between the plaintiff, through his agent, and the defendants, under which the Alette was to load from the defendants at Miramichi or Dalhousie a cargo of deals and battens, to be carried at a certain rate of freight to a safe port on the west coast of Great Britain.

The charter-party contained the following clauses:

It is agreed that as this charty-party is entered into by the charterers for account of another party, their responsibility ceases as soon as the cargo is on board, the vessel holding a lien upon the cargo for freight and demurrage. The usual customs of each port to be observed by each party in cases where not specially expressed.

Seventeen days, Sundays and holidays excepted, are to be allowed the merchant (if the ship be not sooner despatched) for lading, and for discharging cargo fifteen like days. Lay days to commence when ship is ready in a proper and loading and discharging berth respectively, demurrage at the rate of fourpence per register ton per day to be paid to the ship if longer detained.

Messrs. R. A. and J. Stewart, of Miramichi, shipped on the Alette, under the charter-party, a cargo of wood goods in two lots, one consisting of 401,000 pieces of paling, and the other of 29,523 pieces of deal and deal ends, and 274,118 pieces of palings, and two sets of bills of lading were signed in respect of the said cargo, one of them being for the 401,000 pieces of palings, and the other for the 20,523 pieces of deal and deal ends, and the 274,118 pieces of palings.

By the said bills of lading the goods were made deliverable at the port of discharge on the river Mersey to the defendants or to their assigns, "they paying freight and all other conditions as per charter-party."

Whilst the ship was on her voyage the defendants indorsed for value the first of the two bills of lading to a purchaser, and having sold a portion of the cargo comprised in the second bill of lading they indorsed on that bill of lading an order for delivery to the purchasers of that portion of the cargo, the defendants themselves being the owners and receivers of the remaining portion.

(a) Reported by A. A. HOPKINS, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The ship was ready in a proper discharging berth at Liverpool, and the discharge was commenced on the 11th July 1881, and was not completed until the 1st Aug. 1881, on which day the discharge of the whole cargo was completed. The said vessel was therefore detained five days beyond the said fifteen days. The detention arose through no fault of the ship, but because the remainder of the cargo could not be delivered to the purchasers thereof until after the delivery to the defendants of their portion.

The court is to have power to draw inferences of fact.

The claim was made against the defendants as consignees of the cargo. The defendants contend that their liability ceased on the cargo being shipped, and that the plaintiff was bound to exercise his lien.

The question for the opinion of the court is, whether, upon the facts stated, the defendants are liable.

If the court find for the plaintiff, then judgment is to be entered for him for 56*l.* 13*s.* 4*d.* and costs; but if the court find for the defendants, then judgment is to be entered for them with costs.

After hearing argument the Divisional Court gave judgment in favour of the plaintiff.

The defendants appealed.

Edwyn Jones, for the defendants, repeated the arguments used in the court below. He cited

Porteous v. Watney, 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 34; 39 L. T. Rep. N. S. 195; 3 Q. B. Div. 534;
Gray v. Carr, 1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 115; 25 L. T. Rep. N. S. 215; L. Rep. 6 Q. B. 522; Sanguinetti v. Pacific Steam Navigation Company, 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 300; 35 L. T. Rep. N. S. 658; 2 Q. B. Div. 228.

Synnott, for the plaintiff, was not called upon to argue.

Lord Coleridge, C.J.—I must say that I think this case becomes perfectly clear when the document upon which the action is founded is critically considered. Now, the action is brought upon the contract contained in the bill of lading, which contains these words, "consignee paying freight and all other conditions as per charter-party. Here, then, the express contracts contained in the charter-party as to the payment of freight and demurrage are incorporated into the bill of lading and bind the consignee just as much as if the very words of the charter-party with respect to this had been written into the bill of lading. But then it is said that there is a condition in the charter-party providing for a cesser of the liability of the charterers as soon as the cargo is on board, and that this cesser clause must likewise, by the words I have referred to, be taken to be incorporated into the bill of lading; it is also said that here the charterers and the consignee are the same persons, and that therefore by virtue of the cessor clause their liability ceased as soon as the vessel was loaded. Now, it is true that the charter-party contains such a cessor clause, and it is also true that the charterers and consignees are the same persons, but it seems to me that you cannot incorporate, by means of these words in the bill of lading, such of the conditions contained in the charter-party as are inconsistent with the bill of lading; the bill of lading must incorporate such parts of the charter-party as are consistent with it. Now, it would be quite inconsistent with the contract of a bill of lading that the liability of the consignee to pay freight and demurrage should cease upon the loading of the vessel, and therefore, when there is an express contract in the charter-party providing for this payment, I think it is impossible to incorporate into a bill of lading which refers to the charter-party an inconsistent cesser clause providing for the ceasing of that liability. I think that this appeal must be dismissed.

Brett, M.R.—In this case there was a charter-party signed by R. A. and J. Stewart Brothers, as charterers, and probably it was so signed by them as to make them liable upon it, if it were not for the cesser clause contained in it. But Messrs. Stewart being only agents for other parties, a cessor clause, providing for the ceasing of their liability on the charter-party, is inserted. Now, if the charterers had done nothing more, then of course their liability on the charter-party would have ceased, in the terms of the cesser clause, upon the loading of the vessel. But they did something more; the goods being shipped, they took two bills of lading, by which the goods were deliverable at the port of discharge to them or their assigns. Now, that contract upon the bill of lading, it must be borne in mind, is quite distinct from the contract upon the charter-party; by the bill of lading the defendants contract not as charterers but as shippers, and it is upon the contract contained in the bill of lading to pay freight and demurrage, by incorporation from the charter-party, they are sued. Therefore we must have regard to the contract contained in the bill of lading only. Now, if every word which ought to have been incorporated out of the charter-party into this bill of lading had been written therein, then it becomes absurd to suppose the cesser clause could possibly have been written into this bill of lading, because the effect of that cesser clause would be to make every part of the contract on the bill of lading cease the moment the bill of lading was given. That would be absurd. Then, how much of the contract contained in the charter-party must be read into this bill of lading? Clearly, as much of it as is consistent with the contract of the bill of lading. Now, there is a contract in the charter-party for the payment of freight and demurrage which is consistent with the bill of lading, and must therefore be read into it, under the words in the bill of lading which incorporate the charter-party; and, therefore, I think the defendants are liable upon the contract made in the bill of lading. I think the decision of the Divisional Court was right and must be affirmed.

Bowen, L.J.—I think this case is quite clear. The contract sued upon is the contract made by the terms of the bill of lading. That document provides that the goods shall be deliverable to the defendants or their assigns, &c., he and they paying freight and all other conditions as per charter-party." That seems to me to incorporate the charter-party to some extent—the question is to what extent? Surely the answer must be to the extent of incorporating all that can properly be incorporated without destroying the bill of lading. But the cesser clause cannot be incorporated without making the whole bill of lading useless, and therefore I think it cannot be read into the bill of lading.

Appeal dismissed.

APPEAL FROM THE QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION.

Voluntary sacrifice to save ship and cargo—Towage agreement—General average contribution—Liability of owners of cargo.

Where the captain of a ship which is in danger, in order to save a ship and cargo, agrees to pay a sum of money, for assistance, if it is reasonable to make the agreement and the amount paid is under the circumstances reasonable, the shipowner is entitled to recover a general average contribution from the owner of the cargo, although the agreement under which the money is paid is a towage, and not a salvage, agreement.

A ship was aground and in peril, and the captain signalled to another ship and obtained assistance, whereby the ship and cargo were saved. An arrangement existed, which was known to the captain when he signalled, and to which the owners of both ships were parties, that for services rendered under such circumstances a sum of 2500*l. should be payable in all cases, whether the services proved beneficial or not.*

In an action by the shipowners against owners of cargo to recover a general average contribution in respect of the sum of 2500*l. so paid, the jury found that what the captain did was reasonable, and that the sum paid was reasonable under the circumstances.*

Held that, as the 2500*l. was payable whether the services rendered proved beneficial or not, the agreement was a towage agreement, but that, as there was extraordinary danger and the payment was a voluntary sacrifice made in order to save the ship and cargo, it gave rise to a general average contribution, and the plaintiffs were entitled to recover.*

Judgment of Grove, Lopes, and Mathew, JJ. reversed.

This action was brought by the plaintiffs, the owners of the steamer Achilles against the defendants, who were owners of a portion of the cargo, to recover a sum of 162*l.* 11*s.* 7*d.*, alleged to be due as a general average contribution. The Achilles ran aground on a bank in the Hankow river, in China, and her captain, finding that the ship and cargo were in danger, signalled for assistance to the captain of another steamer called the Shanghai. The Shanghai came to the assistance of the Achilles, and after some difficulty succeeded in getting her off the bank, and the ship and cargo were saved. A claim was afterwards made on behalf of the owners of the Shanghai against the owners of the Achilles for a sum of 2500*l.*, alleged to be due for the services rendered by the Shanghai in consequence of an arrangement existing between the owners of different ships trading on the Hankow river, and to which both the plaintiffs and the owners of the Shanghai were parties. The effect of this arrangement was that a charge of 2500*l.* should be made in all cases for assisting ships which were in distress on the river for any period not exceeding twenty-four hours; this sum was payable whether the services rendered proved beneficial or not. The captain of the Achilles was aware of the existence of this agreement when he signalled for assistance. The plaintiffs having paid the sum of 2500*l.* to the owners of the Shanghai sued the defendants to recover the sum of 162*l.* 11*s.* 7*d.* as a general average contribution in respect of their proportion of the cargo. The defendants denied that the amount claimed was due, but paid a smaller sum into court.

At the trial before Cave, J. the jury found that the captain of the Achilles intended to make the plaintiffs liable to pay the 2500*l.*, and that he signalled to the Shanghai, knowing that this was the charge for assistance, and, further, that what he did was a reasonable course for him to pursue, and that the charge of 2500*l.*, was reasonable under the circumstances.

Cave, J. gave judgment for the plaintiffs. The Divisional Court (Grove, Lopes and Mathew, JJ.) directed judgment to be entered for the defendants, and the plaintiffs appealed.

Nov. 21 and 23, 1883.—The appeal was argued by H. Matthews, Q.C. and Gainsford Bruce (H. D. Greene with them) for the plaintiffs (apps.), and by Cohen, Q.C., and J. G. Barnes for the defendants (resps.).

Cur. adv. vult.

(a) Reported by P. B. Hutchins, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

(a) On reference to this case we find that Clifford, J. is there reported to have said on the question raised in this case as follows: "The settled rule is, that when the ship is accidentally stranded in the course of her voyage, and by labour and expense she is set afloat and completes her voyage with the cargo on board, the expenses incurred for that object, as it produced benefit to all, so it shall be a charge upon all, according to the rates of apportioning general average." This proposition appears to cover the present case, and it is to be noticed generally that the tendency of the American decisions seems to be to consider such expenses as those incurred in the present case to be within general average, while the English authorities on the whole appear to incline to the other view. The expediency and justice of holding the present sacrifice to be general average are obvious; and moreover it is important to notice that the three great requisites necessary to bring a sacrifice within general average are present, viz., that the sacrifice should be voluntary, necessary and effectual. The mere fact that th

Dec. 21.—The following judgments were delivered:—

Brett, M.R.—In this case an action was brought by shipowners against the owners of the cargo to recover a general average contribution. The case was tried before Cave, J. and a jury, and at the trial it was proved that the plaintiffs' ship had got aground on a bank in the river Hankow, in China, and was in such a position that the ship and cargo were in danger. The captain thereupon signalled to another ship which came to his assistance, and ultimately towed the plaintiffs' ship off the bank, and so saved the ship and cargo. It was also proved that there existed an old agreement between the owners of different ships in the river Hankow, by which it was agreed that no assistance should be given by one ship to another for any less sum than 2500*l.* This no doubt is a large sum, but the fact of the existence of such an agreement shows the unusual danger of the river to both ships, that is, both to the ship requiring and to the ship affording assistance, so I think it is questionable whether we could say that it was an unreasonable agreement. In the present instance both captains were aware of the existence of the agreement; the captain of the plaintiffs' ship, who signalled, says he meant the owners of the other ship to be paid, and the other captain gave no indication that he did not mean to act on the agreement, and he had no right to risk his owners' ship by agreeing to give assistance to another ship on his own terms. The jury found there was an agreement to pay this sum of 2500*l.*, and I should say so too, if I had to decide the question, in the first place because it is impossible to say that the captain of the Shanghai meant to commit a breach of his duty towards his owners; but, secondly, if we were to suppose that he did mean this, he gave no indication of his intention. But the jury have found that there was an agreement to pay the money, and I agree with their finding. It is clear, to my mind, that there was a contract.

Then there arises a dispute as to the nature of the contract. For the plaintiffs it is urged that it was a salvage contract, and that there must be contribution, while on the other side it is said that it was a towage contract, and that there can be no contribution. I am of opinion that, as the sum of 2500*l.* was to be paid, whether the vessel was towed off the bank or not, therefore it was a towage contract. Then there remains the question whether contribution can be payable in the case of a contract for towage. The owners of the ship which was assisted could not get contribution from the owners of the cargo unless they themselves were bound to pay the money demanded from them as the price of such assistance. We must consider the following questions. Did the contract bind the owners of the ship which was assisted? Did the circumstance authorise the making of a contract? Was it a reasonable contract? It is not a reasonable contract unless the circumstances were such as to make it reasonable to make a towage contract, and unless the amount is reasonable. The jury have found that it was reasonable in both these respects, and I agree with their finding. This being so, can it give rise to a general average contribution? Wherever there is extraordinary danger, and a voluntary sacrifice is made in order to save ship and cargo, and both are saved, the party making such sacrifice is entitled to call on the other party for a general average contribution. The present case comes within that proposition, and I know of no authority which says that such a towage contract is not the subject of general average. Therefore, although I think this was a towage contract, I nevertheless think the plaintiffs are entitled to a general average contribution. The point was not taken in the Divisional Court, where it was held that, notwithstanding the verdict of the jury, there was no contract at all. For the reasons I have given, I am of opinion that the plaintiffs are entitled to judgment, and that this appeal ought to be allowed.

Baggallay, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. There are four questions: First, was there an agreement made; secondly, was it reasonable to make an agreement; thirdly, were the terms of the agreement reasonable; and, fourthly, was the expenditure justified? I think all these questions should be answered in the affirmative.

Bowen, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. In the first place, was there an agreement to pay this sum of 2500*l.*? The captain of the plaintiffs' ship knew that his owners would have to pay it, and as against this all that can be said is that, although everyone else knew that the services were to be paid for, the captain of the ship which rendered those services had an idea that the owners would not charge for them. If he had communicated this idea to the plaintiffs' captain there might have been some foundation for the respondents' contention, but he concealed it, and therefore this idea of his is wholly immaterial. For the reasons given by the Master of the Rolls, I think there was a contract, and that it was a towage contract, and the jury thought it was right that such a contract should be made, and therefore the contract was binding. There was a general average act, for there was a voluntary sacrifice, and therefore I think the owners of the cargo are bound to contribute. The point was not made in the court below, nor was it made effectually in this court until the reply.

Judgment reversed.

sacrifice, if it possesses these characteristics, is towage and not salvage, seems immaterial. Of course where there is salvage the presumption that there was extraordinary danger to justify the sacrifice is stronger than in the case of towage, which usually is a mere incident in the carriage of the goods, and which primâ facie it is the duty of the shipowner to provide at his own expense. It is, however, clear that the towage service here rendered does not in any sense come within the ordinary course of navigation, a fact which obviates the difficulty that not unfrequently arises under circumstances like the present in determining whether the alleged sacrifice was part of the shipowner's general duty to carry the cargo safely to its destination. If so, it not being a sacrifice, but a duty, the cargo owner cannot be made liable to a general average contribution.—Ed.

The Margaret. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM BUTT, J.

Collision—Thames Conservancy Rules, art. 23—Blackwall Point—Tide.

Where a steamship in the river Thames having come out of dock, and being bound down the river finds herself with the tide against her on the bend of any of the points enumerated in art. 23 of the Thames Conservancy Rules, where the river has begun to curve round, and those on board of her see another steamship in the reach below preparing to round the point with the tide, the first steamship is bound by the 23*rd article to ease her engines and wait until the other vessel has passed clear.*

Art. 23 of the Thames Conservancy Rules applies during the whole time a steamship is rounding against the tide any of the points therein enumerated, and is not confined to the case of a vessel in the reach adjoining the point, and before she has begun to round it, sighting another vessel in the reach on the other side of the point.

The words "rounding a point," as used in art. 23 of the Thames Conservancy Rules, begin to apply when a vessel having to round is obliged to use her steering gear for the purpose of continuing her course round it, and cease to apply when that necessity terminates.

This was an appeal by the defendants in a damage action in rem from a decision of Butt, J., in which he found that the steamship Margaret was alone to blame for a collision between the Margaret and the steamship Clan Sinclair in the river Thames on the 9th March 1883.

The facts were that the Clan Sinclair, having come out of the South-West India Docks on the bend of Blackwall Point, proceeded down river under her own steam with a tug ahead at a speed of three to four knots through the water against a flood tide of two to two and a half knots. The Margaret was coming up the river, and when in Bugsby's Reach the masts of the Clan Sinclair were seen over the land on the port bow. The Margaret proceeded to round the point under a starboard helm, and on approaching the Clan Sinclair attempted unsuccessfully to pass port side to port side, and the two vessels came into collision. The Clan Sinclair failed to reduce her speed till immediately before the collision, when her engines were stopped and reversed.

The further facts of the case are fully set out in the report of the case below: (ante, p. 137; 49 L. T. Rep. N. S. 332; 8 P. Div. 126.)

Butt, J. had found that art. 23 of the Thames Conservancy Rules did not apply to the circumstances of the case, and that, assuming it did, the Clan Sinclair had complied with it so far as was possible.

The rules for the navigation of the river Thames referred to are as follows:

14. Every steam-vessel when approaching another vessel, so as to involve risk of collision, shall slacken her speed, and shall stop and reverse if necessary.

22. When two steamships proceeding in opposite directions, the one up and the other down the river, are approaching one another so as to involve risk of collision, they shall pass one another port side to port side.

23. Steam-vessels navigating against the tide shall, before rounding . . . . Blackwall Point, ease their engines, and wait until any other vessels rounding the point with the tide have passed clear.

Webster, Q.C. and Hall, Q.C. (with them Dr. Phillimore) for the appellants, the owners of the Margaret.—The interpretation put by the learned judge below upon rule 23 of the Thames Conservancy Rules, is wrong. The rule covers a case like the present where those on the Clan Sinclair, while she is on the point, sight the Margaret, about to round the point with the tide. If the rule applies, she has failed to comply with it, inasmuch as she did not ease and wait within the meaning of the rule. Moreover, the Clan Sinclair failed to comply with rule 22, which directs that ships, one going up and the other down the river, when approaching so as to involve risk of collision, shall pass port side to port side.

Russell, Q.C. and Myburgh, Q.C. (with them Hollams) for the respondents, the owners of the Clan Sinclair.—The 23rd rule says that vessels "before rounding the following points" shall ease and wait. In this case the Clan Sinclair had already commenced to round the point, and therefore the rule does not apply:

The Libra, 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 439; 45 L. T. Rep. N. S. 161; 6 P. Div. 139.

Assuming the rule applied, the Clan Sinclair complied with it, seeing that she was going as slow as was possible under the circumstances.

Brett, M.R.—In this case the owners of two vessels bring cross-actions in respect of a collision off Blackwall Point in the Thames, and the learned Judge of the Admiralty Division, assisted by Trinity Masters, has found that, in respect of the collision, the Margaret was solely to blame, and that the Clan Sinclair was not at all to blame. It becomes necessary to consider what are the rules of navigation applicable to the two vessels. This is a collision in the Thames off what is called Blackwall Point. Now, the navigation of steamships off Blackwall Point is partly to be governed by the 23rd rule of the Bye-laws for the Navigation of the River Thames. The question to be considered is, What is the meaning of the rule which says that "steam-vessels navigating against the tide shall, before rounding the following points, viz.: . . . . Blackwall Point, ease their engines, and wait until any other vessels rounding the point with the tide have passed clear"? It seems to me that the first thing to be considered is, what is the meaning of "point?" Now, it is clear that the officers of this vessel knew what was meant. This is a nautical rule, and is written, therefore, in nautical language, and it is written with regard to a winding river where there are what sailors call "points," that is, where the land goes from a straight line into the river, so that the river is obliged to wind round the point. Therefore the point is not a mathematical point, and it seems to me that the proper way of defining the "point," under these circumstances, is this: that the point begins where a vessel having to go round it, either up or down the river, would, if there were nothing in the way, be obliged to use its steering gear for the purpose of continuing her course, and that it ends where the necessity of using the steering gear ceases. Therefore the point lies within the limits.

The next question is, what is the meaning of "before rounding the following points"? Is it before a vessel begins to round, or is it before she has finished getting round, what I call the point? It seems to me that it applies from the time when, if there was nothing in the way, a vessel begins to use her steering gear for the above purpose, and ends at the place where she would cease using her steering gear and would go straight on her course as before. Therefore, where the vessel is going against the tide, it seems to me that the words "before rounding" mean before the vessel has finished rounding the point in the sense in which I have described the point—that is to say, that the rule applies, not only before the vessel begins to round the point, but it applies during the whole time that she is rounding it. In the case of The Libra (ubi sup.), the circumstances were, that the vessel navigating against the tide sighted the other, while in the reach above the point, and before she had begun to round. It is now suggested that the rule does not apply to the circumstances of the present case, because it is said that this court said in The Libra that the rule would not apply to the case of a vessel already on the point. That does not seem to me to be the effect of the decision in The Libra. I think that the rule applies, even if the vessel is on or off the point, at the time when those on board of her ought first to see the other vessel. The application of the rule must of course differ according to circumstances. Now, clearly, if the vessel is not already on or off the point she ought, as much as she can, not to go on to the point until the other vessel comes round and is clear. But if she is already on the point what is she to do? She cannot then stay so as to enable the other vessel to have cleared the whole point before she clears it herself. It seems to me, therefore, that she ought, under those circumstances (it is a little difficult to express it), to remain as nearly as she can in the same place with respect to her course up and down the river. I do not say that if she is in the middle of the river she is bound to stay in mid-river, or that if she is on one side of the river she is bound to stay on that side; but she is bound not to go further than she can help on a course which, if she goes on, will be taking her further round the point. If that be so, in order to obey this 23rd rule, under the circumstances of the present case, the Clan Sinclair should not have gone lower down the river, when she ought first to have seen the Margaret, than it was necessary she should go so as to enable her to be safe both as to herself and other craft. I mean to say that she was not bound to stop so as to lose all command over herself and thus become a source of danger to herself and other vessels. The rule does not say "stop," but "ease," and the question is, how much ought she to have eased. I think that, being in the position she was, she ought to have eased so much as to prevent herself, as far as she could with safety, from going down the river farther than was necessary. If she had eased as the learned judge and The Trinity Masters in the court below found, that is, if she had eased as much as she could with safety, I should think she obeyed the rule. But if she did not ease as much as that, then I think she disobeyed the rule. This is a very strict reading of the rule, but, as I understand it, it ought to be read so in order to prevent collisions off these points, which are precarious points for navigation in the river.

Now, reading the rule in this way, the next question to consider is, whether this rule replaces other rules. To my mind, as I said in the case of The Libra (ubi sup.), it does not. If the circumstances of the case are such that any other rules would apply, I think they apply on these points or off these points just as much as if the vessel were anywhere else. But, as a fact, if a ship is brought as near to a standstill as she can be with safety, it will be found difficult, so far as she is concerned, to apply any other rules to her. They may or they may not apply. It having been said that the Clan Sinclair ought to have stopped so as to take all way off her, I put the question to our assessors, because, if she could have brought herself to a dead stop with safety, I should say she ought to have done so. Therefore, I put this question: "Could the Clan Sinclair, with safety to herself and the navigation of the river—assuming that she had little way on her at the beginning—do more than reduce her speed, so as to keep her engines moving her to enable her to steer?" They answer, "No." She was not bound therefore, to bring herself to such a standstill. If she did all that could be done with safety to keep herself in the same place in which she was with respect to her position up and down the river, then she did all that was required of her. The learned judge and the Trinity Masters have found that she did that, and if we can uphold that finding, then his decision is right. Now, there seems to me to be evidence in words in support of either view of the question. I mean there is evidence in words as to the number of minutes and as to the distances traversed in those minutes, and as to the opinions and views of people looking on. If the only evidence had been that evidence in words, inasmuch as there is a conflict of evidence, I do not think we could have overruled the finding of the learned judge; but it seems to me that there are facts which determine that conflict of evidence in words. Upon that I have asked the gentlemen who assist us this further question, "Is there anything in the nautical facts of this case to make you differ from the learned judge and the Trinity Masters in finding that from the time the Clan Sinclair left the dock until the collision she did no more than keep her engines merely moving?" They answer that the nautical facts of the case show that this vessel did more than keep her engines merely moving. Then I put them this question, so as to make the matter perfectly clear, "Could the Clan Sinclair have gone slower, and yet kept herself under command?" They answered that she could. If so, it seems to me that she broke the 23rd rule, according to the strict interpretation that I have put upon it, because she, as a fact might have kept herself higher up the river than she did between the time when she ought to have first seen the Margaret and the time of the collision. A great deal has been argued about the want of a look-out. As far as my judgment is concerned, I think the Margaret ought to have been seen sooner than she was. But I do not think it makes any difference in the decision, for, assuming she ought not to have been seen sooner than she in fact was, even upon that assumption our assessors do not think that the Clan Sinclair did all she possibly could to wait in the river where she was, so as to keep herself from meeting the Margaret on or off any part of the point sooner than she did. Therefore, although I think it is very strict law as applied to the Clan Sinclair, because, according to all the ordinary rules of navigation I cannot see that she did anything wrong, but think she was, as a fact navigating with all the care that was necessary, yet, beccause she has broken this rule according to its strict interpretation, I think she must be held partly to blame for this collision. I put this strict interpretation upon the rule because I think it was intended that it should be construed strictly, and also because I think it is right that the court should hold a very firm hand over sailors who are navigating this river, in order to prevent, if possible, two vessels coming near each other at all whilst they are off these difficult points of navigation.

With regard to the Margaret I have no doubt that her navigation was of the most rash description. It seems to me clear that she broke the rule which says that when a steamship is approaching another ship so as to involve danger of collision, she ought to stop and reverse. That does not mean that she ought to stop and reverse at the last moment, but that she ought to do so the moment the danger is disclosed. It is clear to my mind that she did not, but came on as nearly as possible at the same pace till the collision. The rule applied the moment there was danger of collision, whether or not she was on or off the point. But I am not at all prepared to say that the rule of passing port side to port side does not apply off these points. It may or may not. It is difficult to say that if a vessel going against the tide has brought herself to such a standstill as to be only just under command the rule is to apply to her. Unless she is stopped at some particular part of the point the rule can hardly apply. For instance, if the Margaret had come round under a sharp starboard helm, the two vessels would never have been in a position to pass port side to port side. The result is, with regard to the Clan Sinclair, that she has, by breaking the 23rd rule in its strictest interpretation, made herself partly to blame, and, although the Margaret was ten times more to blame, nevertheless the legal result is that the damages between the two vessels are to be calculated according to the ordinary mode of calculating such matters. According to the rule we have laid down, each party must bear their costs, both in the court below and on appeal.

BAGGALLAY, L.J.—I concur in the judgment of the Master of the Rolls. As to rule 23, I may say that I think it by no means a clear rule, and one couched in terms too vague and general. The question which arises on reading it is, what is a point? As to that, I think the definition given by the Master of the Rolls is correct It scems to me that it commences, when a vessel begins to use her steering gear for the purpose of getting from one reach to another, and ends when the necessity for so doing ceases. Then what does "wait" mean? It does not mean to come to an actual standstill, but rather means to go as slow as is consistent with safety. Now, I am strongly of opinion that the Clan Sinclair did more than keep her engines merely moving, and I may say that I do not think the navigation of the Clan Sinclair was so careful as the Master of the Rolls does. I however agree that the Margaret was also much in fault, and therefore the result is that both must be held to blame.

LINDLEY, L.J.—I also concur. It is clear from the established facts of the case that the Clan Sinclair did more than merely keep her engines moving. She therefore did not ease and wait within the meaning of the rule. That being so, I think she was to blame.

(Before DAY and SMITH, JJ.)

TATTERSALL v. NATIONAL STEAMSHIP COMPANY LIMITED. (a)

Bill of lading—Limitation of liability—Neglect of duty to provide a ship fit for its purpose.

Certain cattle were shipped on board a steamer for conveyance from London to New York under a bill of lading which provided "that these animals being in sole charge of shippers' servants, it is hereby expressly agreed that the National Steamship Company, or its agents or servants, are as respects these animals in no way responsible either for their escape from the steamer or for accidents, disease, or mortality, and that under no circumstances shall they be held liable for more than 5l. for each of the animals."

Held that the above clause limiting the liability of the shipowners to 5l. for each of the cattle did not apply to loss or damage arising from a breach of the shipowner's duty to provide a ship fit for its purpose as it only applied to matters occurring during the voyage, and that therefore the defendants were liable for the cattle being infected with foot-and-mouth disease, which was occasioned by the negligence of their servants in not cleansing the ship before receiving the cattle on board.

THIS was an action brought by the plaintiff as owner of certain cows to recover from the defendants damages alleged to have been sustained by the plaintiff through the said cows having caught the foot-and-mouth disease whilst being carried in the defendant's steamer from London to New York.

In pursuance of a judge's order the following case was stated for the opinion of the court.

On the 6th Jan. 1881 the plaintiff shipped on board the defendant's steamer France ten head of cattle, amongst other animals, to be carried from London to New York, upon the terms contained in a bill of lading.

During the voyage some of the cattle were affected with foot-and-mouth disease, and were so affected on being landed at New York.

On her voyage from New York to London immediately preceding the voyage in question, the

(a) Reported by W. P. EVERSLEY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

France had on board cattle affected with foot-and-mouth disease, and it was admitted, for the purposes of the case that the plaintiff's cattle caught the foot-and-mouth disease while on board the France, owing to the negligence of the defendants' servants in not properly cleansing and disinfecting the steamer before receiving the cattle on board and signing the bill of lading. By reason thereof the plaintiff sustained damage amounting to more than 5*l.* for each of the said cattle.

The question for the court was whether or not in the circumstances the defendants were liable for more than 5*l.* for each of the said cattle.

The following were the material parts of the bill of lading:

Shipped upon the France eight stallions, twenty-six mares, six colts, and ten cows, seven dogs, to be delivered (subject to the following exceptions and conditions): These animals being in sole charge of shippers' servants, it is hereby expressly agreed that the National Steamship Company, Limited, or its agents, or servants, are, as respects these animals, in no way responsible for either their escape from the steamer or for accidents, disease, or mortality, and that under no circumstances shall they be held liable for more than five pounds for each of the animals; all dogs to be placed wherever the captain may appoint, but at the sole risk of the shipper and (or) owner; the act of God, the Queen's enemies, pirates, robbers, thieves by land or at sea, barratry of masters or mariners, restraint of princes, rulers, or people; loss or damage resulting from heat, boilers, steam and steam machinery, including consequences of defect therein, or damage thereto, collision, stranding, straining, or other perils of the seas, rivers, steam and steam navigation; and all damage, loss, or injury arising from the perils or matters above mentioned, and whether such perils or matters arise from the negligence, default, or error in judgment of the pilot, master, mariners, engineers, stevedores, or other persons in the service of the shipowner.

Petheram, Q.C. (J. C. Erle with him) for the plaintiff.—The bill of lading came into operation when the cattle were put on board. It is admitted that the ship was infected, and infected through the negligence of the defendants. The limitation of liability to 5*l.* only applies to the causes of loss or damage expressly mentioned in the bill of lading and arising during the voyage. In all other cases of loss or damage the parties are remitted to their common law rights. The words "disease or mortality" mean disease or mortality in ordinary cases, that is, caused by ordinary circumstances. The loss here arose from negligence prior to the voyage, and so the bill of lading does not exempt the defendants from full liability:

Steel v. State Line Steamship Company, 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 516; 37 L. T. Rep. N. S. 333; 3 App. Cas. 72.

J. Fox for the defendants.—It is conceded that the defendants are not protected from liability for disease if caused by their negligence. But the defendants are not liable beyond 5*l.* per head of cattle. A shipowner can make a contract that he will not be liable for the negligence of his servants, and this will cover negligence before or after the commencement of the voyage. Therefore a shipowner is in much the same position as a railway company was in before the passing of the Railway and Canal Traffic Act 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 31), s. 7. Hence the cases that affect the liability of a railway company before that Act are relevant, and these cases show that the fact that the act of negligence occurred before the transit commenced makes no difference. McManus v. Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Company (33 L. T. Rep. O. S. 259; 4 H. & N. 327), was a case decided after the passing of that Act, but if the special contract had been made before the Act the court would have held that the defendants were not liable. The words of exemption in that case were, "damage or injury however caused," which correspond with the words, "under no circumstances," used in the present bill of lading. In that case the horse-box was insufficient for its purpose, and so the negligence occurred before the commencement of the journey; and yet, except for the Act, the court would have held the defendants free from liability. The Warkworth (ante, p. 194; 49 L. T. Rep. N. S. 715; 9 P. Div. 20) also shows that the negligence contemplated in this bill of lading may include negligence prior to the voyage. The saving clause in the bill of lading exempts the defendants from liability for the negligence of any person in their service. This includes the crew in the ship, and also the servants on shore, and this is shown by the introduction of the word "stevedores" in the clause, as their duties are performed before the voyage commences. The defendants, therefore, are not responsible to a greater extent than 5*l.* per head for disease however caused, even by negligence before the commencement of the voyage. He also cited

Brown v. Manchester, Sheffield, and Lincolnshire Railway Company, 8 App. Cas. 703;
Shaw v. York and North Midland Railway Company, 13 Q. B. 347; 18 L. J. 181, Q. B.

Day, J.—In this case I am of opinion that judgment should be entered for the plaintiff. It is quite clear, according to the opinion of Lord Blackburn in Steel v. State Line Steamship Company, that where there is a contract to carry goods in a ship there is a duty on the part of the shipowner to furnish a ship that shall be reasonably fit for its purpose, unless there is a contract or agreement to the contrary. Now, the ship in this case was not reasonably fit for its purpose, and hence there was a breach of duty in this respect on the part of the defendants, and in consequence of that breach of duty the plaintiff has suffered damage. But it is said that 5*l.* for each of the animals is all that the plaintiff is entitled to. I have looked in vain through the bill of lading for words which restrict the amount for which the shipowner is liable by reason of his breach of duty to provide a ship fit for its purpose. The bill of lading applies to the carriage of the cattle, but does not by its terms deal with a breach of duty on the part of the shipowners to provide a fit ship for the carriage of the cattle. If the damage had occurred through sea perils by reason of the defendants' negligence, during the course of the voyage, in a ship originally fit for its purpose, then I agree that the limitation of 5*l.* a head would have applied. But these cattle were not damaged by any thing occurring during the course of the voyage, but by reason of the defendants' servants neglecting their preliminary duty of seeing that the ship was fit for the purpose for which it was used. The defendants, therefore, have been guilty of a breach of duty from which damage has happened to the plaintiff, and so we must answer the question in favour of the plaintiff.

Smith, J.—This is an action by the plaintiff against the National Steamship Company to recover damages for injuries to his cattle, and the question arises as to the true meaning of a very special bill of lading; that is, special in the sense that is applied to a special class of goods, namely, horses, cows, and dogs; and the question which we have to determine is, whether the plaintiff is entitled to recover more than 5*l.* for each of the animals. It is conceded that the damage arose through the shipowners' negligence in allowing their ship to become infected before the voyage commenced. Now, it was the duty of the shipowners to have their ship in a fit state for the purpose for which it was to be used: (Steel v. State Line Steamship Company, ubi sup.) That, then, being their duty, does the bill of lading exempt them from liability for breach of that duty? In my opinion, certainly not. The bill of lading deals with the contract of carriage from London to New York, and it does not by its terms deal with anything that took place before the commencement of the voyage. Mr. Fox argued that because the word "stevedores" is introduced into the clause in the bill of lading exempting the defendants from liability arising from the negligence of their servants, and because the stevedore is a landsman engaged on duties that arise before the commencement of the voyage, therefore the negligence contemplated by the bill of lading would include negligence arising before the voyage commenced. But the word "stevedore" is introduced because the stevedore may very often have been negligent in packing or stowing the goods, and damage may result therefrom, owing to perils of the sea during the voyage; so this argument in no way advances Mr Fox's case. Then it is said that as under the bill of lading the animals were in the sole charge of the shippers' servants, the steamship company were to be in no way responsible for disease or mortality, and under no circumstances whatever creating any liability were they to be liable for more than 5*l.* per head. Now, it is conceded that the words "in no way responsible for disease or mortality," mean in no way responsible unless the disease or mortality is brought about by the negligence of the master or crew. Then follow the words, "under no circumstances shall they be liable for more than 5*l.* for each of the animals;" and in my opinion the whole passage ought to read thus: The steamship company are in no way responsible for disease or mortality, unless it is brought about by the negligence of the master or crew during the voyage, and even then they shall not be liable for more than 5*l.* per head. This seems to me the proper reading of this bill of lading, and as this disease was caused by neglect to provide a ship reasonably fit for its purpose before the voyage commenced, the damage is not limited to 5*l.* per head, and the question asked of us must be answered in the affirmative. There must, therefore, be judgment for the plaintiff.

ADMIRALTY BUSINESS.

Thursday, Dec. 20, 1883.

(Before Butt, J.)

The Immacolata Concezione. (a)

Priority of liens — Wages — Necessaries—Subsistence money—Viaticum—Possessory lien—Costs.

Material men who have a possessory lien on a foreign ship are entitled to be paid out of the proceeds of the sale of such ship in priority to other material men having no such lien, notwithstanding that the latter have recovered judgment against the ship before the material men having the lien have recovered judgment against the ship.

Where, owing to the proceedings of one of several claimants against a ship, she is sold and the proceeds paid into court, so as to be available for all the claims, the party at whose instigation the ship is sold, though his claim is postponed after the others, will have his costs up to and inclusive of the sale.

As against material men having a possessory lien a mariner's claim for wages earned before that lien commenced, viaticum, subsistence money for the time between leaving the ship and returning home, and the costs of the action to recover such wages, &c., rank before the claim of the material men, but aliter as to the claim for wages earned after the possessory lien commenced.

This was a special case stated by the registrar for the opinion of the court as to the order in which the several claims against the foreign steamship Immacolata Concezione were to rank. The ship had been sold in the action (mentioned below) instituted in the City of London Court, by Walker and Co., and the proceeds, amounting to 2328*l.* 6*s.* 7*d.*, paid into court. This sum was insufficient to satisfy the various claims against the ship.

1. The Immacolata Concezione is a foreign steamship, and one of which no owner or part owner was at any of the dates hereinafter mentioned domiciled in England or Wales.

2. On the 15th Sept. 1882, Edmund Walker and others instituted a suit against the steamship in the City of London Court to recover the sum of 105*l.* for necessaries supplied to the said steamship. At the time of such supply and of the institution of such suit the said vessel was in the graving dock of Alfred Carter as hereinafter mentioned, and within the jurisdiction of the said court. The said steamship was arrested in the said dock on the 15th Sept. 1882 by the bailiff of the said court, and on the 20th Sept. 1882 Mr. Gaillard entered an appearance in the said suit as owner of the said steamship. The suit came on for trial in the City of London Court on the 11th Oct. 1882, and it was then adjudged that the plaintiffs do recover against the said Mr. Gaillard and the said steamship the sum of 105*l.*, together with the costs of action. On the 17th Oct. 1882 a warrant of execution was issued on the said judgment, and on the 27th Oct. 1882 the bailiff of the said court seized the said steamship under the said execution; copies of the said judgment and warrant of execution are annexed hereto and form part of this case. The plaintiff paid fees to the high bailiff of the City of London Court for such arrest and execution of judgment, amounting to 16*l.* 7*s.*

3. By an order of this division of the High Court of Justice, made on the 3rd Nov. 1882, the bailiff of the City of London Court being still in possession of the said steamship under the said execution, the said suit was transferred as 1882, No. 2571, fo. 380, to the High Court of Justice, without prejudice to the rights of priority, if any, possessed by the said plaintiffs.

4. On the 31st March 1882, the steamship being then in the port of London and in need of repairs to hull and engines, was placed in the dry dock of the plaintiff Alfred Carter, by desire of A. Gaillard, the managing director of the company to which the said ship belongs, for the purpose of such repairs, it being arranged with the said A. Gaillard that Seaward and Co. should execute the engineering and iron work and the said Alfred Carter the shipwright's and wood work, and after the said steamship was put into the said dry dock work was done upon her in the dock by Messrs. Seaward and Co., and by the said Alfred Carter as hereinafter stated.

5. On the 18th Sept. 1882 the plaintiffs Seaward and Co. instituted an action 1882, S. No. 4198, fo. 327, in this division of the High Court of Justice, against the owners of the said vessel, claiming for certain equipments, repairs and necessaries made and supplied to the said vessel in and subsequent to the month of April 1882, to the alleged amount of 251*0l.* 4*s.* 3*d.* with interest from the 1st Aug. 1882 and costs. At the time of the making and supply of such equipment, repairs, and necessaries, and at the time of the institution of the said action, the said vessel was in the graving dock of Alfred Carter. The said plaintiffs arrested the vessel on the 18th Sept. 1882 while still in the said graving dock by a warrant of this court, and she remained under arrest of this court till the date of her sale by the court as hereinafter stated. On the 19th Dec. 1882 the said plaintiffs obtained judgment in this action subject to a reference as to the amount to the registrar and merchants together with costs, and the judge of this division condemned the said vessel in the amount due in respect of such claim, but without prejudice to other claims against the said vessel.

6. On the 21st Sept. 1882 the plaintiff Alfred Carter instituted an action in this division, 1882, C. No. 4674, fo. 331, against the owners of the said vessel, to recover the sum of 157*0l.* 10*s.* 3*d.* in respect of certain necessaries, alterations, and repairs supplied, made, and done by him to the said vessel in the months of April, May, and June 1882. The said plaintiff also claimed 69*6l.* for dock rent from the 1st April till the date of his bringing his action, and a further sum for dock rent from that time forward till judgment or removal of the said vessel. On the said 21st Sept. the vessel was arrested in this action.

7. The said plaintiff Alfred Carter is a shipwright, and is owner of a graving dock at Millwall in the county of Middlesex, and the said vessel was placed in his dock, as stated in paragraph 4, on the 1st April 1882, and remained in the said dock from the said 1st April 1882, when his work on her began, to the 24th June, when work on the vessel was discontinued, and thence-forward to the date next hereinafter mentioned, on or about the 26th Sept. the said vessel, which was then in possession of the marshal under the warrants dated the 18th and 21st Sept. 1882, and was also in the custody of the bailiff of the City of London Court under the warrant from that court, was by the order of the 25th Sept. 1882 removed by the marshal from the plaintiffs' dock into Millwall dock. Such order was expressed to be made without prejudice to the possessory lien of the said plaintiff Alfred Carter on the said vessel. The expenses of such removal were paid by the marshal and have been deducted by him from the proceeds of the sale. On the 19th Dec. 1882 the said plaintiff obtained judgment in favour of his claim subject to a reference as to the amount to the registrar and merchants, together with costs, and the judge condemned the said vessel in the amount due in respect of the said claim and costs, but without prejudice to other claims against the said vessel.

8. On the 31st Oct. 1882 the plaintiffs Corbriere and others the officers and crew of the vessel instituted an action 1882, C. No. 5089, fo. 391, in this division, claiming for wages and disbursements and passage home a total sum of 473*l.* 11*s.* 5*d.*, also a further claim to have their wages and disbursements allowed them from the date of the writ until payment of the principal sum claimed, together with any further sum found to be due. The dates during which the said master stated his wages to have been earned and his disbursements to have been made were from the 27th May to the 9th Oct. 1882, that is during the time that the said vessel was in the dry dock of the plaintiff Carter, or during her subsequent custody by the court. As regards the seamen, two of the said plaintiffs began their service on the 22nd Feb., and the remainder on the 27th March 1882; all the said seamen, save one who was paid off in September, stated that their services lasted till the 9th Oct. The said plaintiffs on the 30th Jan. 1883 obtained judgment, the said judge pronouncing in favour of their claim subject to a reference to the register and merchants, together with costs, and condemning the said vessel in the amount due in respect of their said claim, but without prejudice to other claims against the said vessel.

9. On the 12th March 1883 the plaintiffs Robertson and Co. instituted an action in this division, 1883, R. No. 603, fo. 132, against the owner of the said vessel, for necessaries supplied to the said vessel in the months of May and June 1882, to the amount of 39*l.* 6*s.*, and on the 19th March 1883 they served the writ on the assistant registrar, the proceeds of the sale of the said vessel being then in court, but they have not proceeded further therein.

10. The said vessel was on the 21st Nov. 1882, by an order made by the judge in action No. 2571, fo. 380, ordered to be appraised and sold, and all questions as to priority of payments out of the proceeds of such sale were reserved. The said vessel was accordingly sold, and the net proceeds of such sale now in court amount to the sum of 232*8l.* 6*s.* 7*d.*

12. The said sum in court being admittedly quite insufficient to meet the claims of all the plaintiffs in the above-mentioned actions, by direction of the registrar this case has been stated so as to obtain the decision of the court on the questions of the priority of claims of the different plaintiffs before he should proceed to the references ordered in the said several judgments, and none of the references to the registrar and merchants ordered by the court have yet been held.

13. The owners of the said vessel entered appearances in the actions mentioned in the 2nd 4th, and 6th paragraphs of this case, but afterwards withdrew from them and abandoned their defence. L'Armament Compagnie Nationale D'Assurances on the 27th Oct. 1882 entered an appearance in each of the actions mentioned in the 2nd, 5th, and 6th paragraphs of this case claiming to be mortgagees of the said vessel, and defended such actions, The said mortgagees, who are a foreign corporation not carrying on business with the jurisdiction, were by the judgments in the said two actions No. 4198 and 4674 condemned in the costs occcsioned by their said intervention. The other actions in the High Court have been undefended.

14. It is admitted by all the parties to this special case that, subject to the rights of the plaintiffs in the suit instituted in the City of London Court under their execution the seamen are entitled to their wages earned up to the 2nd April 1882 in priority to the other claims but no further. The questions for the decision of the court are: (1) In what order the several claims of the several plaintiffs are to be paid out of the fund in court. (2) In what order the costs of the plaintiffs in the said several actions are to be paid. (3) How the costs of and incidental to this special case are to be borne.

Gainsford Bruce for Walker and Co.—Messrs. Walker have obtained judgment in a court of competent jurisdiction. None of the present claimants appeared in that action. They are bound by that action. If so, this court has no right to withhold from my clients what has been decreed to them by a competent court. [BUTT, J.—I do not at all agree with that proposition. The judgment in your favour entitles you to your money, provided there are no other claimants before this court who have prior claims to you.] At any rate Messrs. Walker should have the costs of their action. Had it not been for their action the ship could not have been sold. [BUTT, J.—Inasmuch as your proceedings have subserved the interest of the other parties, I think you are entitled to your costs up to and inclusive of the sale of the ship.]

W. G. F. Phillimore for A. Carter.—The mere fact of the City of London Court judgment being in favour of Messrs. Walker gives them no priority over my client, who has a common law possessory lien. [BUTT, J.—I have made up my mind to decide against Mr. Bruce's contention on that point, except as to costs to which I think he is entitled.] Whatever his rights as to costs may be he should not be allowed the costs of keeping the officer of the City of London Court in possession of the ship after she had been arrested by the marshal of this court. That is already settled by authority:

The Rio Lima, L. Rep. 4 Ad. & Ec. 157; 2 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 143; 29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 517.

I do not contend that Messrs. Seaward's claim ranks after Carter's, but admit that it ranks equal with Carter's. As to the seamen, their claim for wages earned after Carter's possessory lien attached should be postponed to my claim. As to their claim for subsistence money, that is part of the wages earned subsequently to the possessory lien, and if those wages are precluded the subsistence money is also precluded:

The Gustaf, 1 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 230; I L. T. Rep. N. S. 660; Lush. 506.

T. T. Bucknill (with him Nelson) for Messrs. Seaward and Co.—By reference to paragraph 4 of the special case, it will be seen that Messrs. Seaward are in the same position as Carter, and therefore have a possessory lien. [BUTT, J.—I do not at all consider that paragraph 4 discloses that you have a possessory lien.] Mr. Gaillard arranged with my clients that it should be so, Carter always understood it to be so, and his counsel now admits it is so. If, however, the special case does not sufficiently disclose it, the evidence in the action brought by us against the ship amply proves it. [BUTT, J.—I cannot now go behind what is in the special case. Although very loth to do so, I must send the case back to the registrar to find whether or no this alleged agreement existed. To save expense, I shall allow costs only to one of the other parties to oppose you. Subject to this question, I will to-day deal with the priorities of the other parties.]

Roscoe for the master and seamen.—The seamen are entitled to their wages prior to Carter's possessory lien. They ought also to get subsistence and passage money home:

The Gustaf (ubi sup.);
The Carolina, 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 141; 34 L. T. Rep. N. S. 399.

Pyke for Robertson and Co.—At the time of the arrest of the ship, the sails, in respect of which Messrs. Robertson claim, were in their possession. They, therefore, had a possessory lien. The marshal of the court under the authority of the court took them from Robertson and Co. This fact does not appear in the special case. [BUTT, J.—If that be so, it is a question which must be sent back to the registrar. As I think it has arisen out of a misunderstanding, your client need not pay any costs incurred by this question being referred to the registrar.] It is unnecessary to send the matter to the registrar, as the court has power under Order XXVIII., r. 12, to amend the case if it thinks fit.

BUTT, J.—In this case the claims of the respective parties, wherever it may be necessary, will be referred to the registrar, assisted by merchants, to ascertain the amounts due. In dealing with the matter now I am only going to address myself to the order in which they are to rank against the fund in court. It appears to me that the fund in court has been practically placed in court in a position to be available to these various claimants who have rights of action against it, by Messrs. Walker and Co. the plaintiffs in the City of London Court. That being so, I think they are entitled to the costs of their action up to and inclusive of the costs of sale in priority to other claimants; but inasmuch as they chose to keep the officer of the City of London Court in possession of the ship after she was taken possession of by the marshal of this court, I think the expenses of the officer of the City of London Court cannot be allowed them. I think, therefore, as to costs, that they are entitled to be paid in priority to all the rest, subject to the exception I have mentioned. I next consider the claim of Alfred Carter. He received the ship into his dock on the 31st March 1882, for repairs, and had a possessory lien on her. But for The Gustaf (ubi sup.), I should not be quite sure that his possessory lien did not take precedence over every other claim. I should not be quite sure whether any claim should compete with his common law lien. But The Gustaf is an authority to the contrary, and one by which I am bound and on which I mean to act. I shall, therefore, give priority to Carter's claim over all the other claims except the costs of the plaintiffs in the City of London Court, and except that part of the claim of the mariners which represents their wages earned before the ship came into the possession of Carter, and except perhaps the claim of Seaward and Co. Now The Gustaf is a clear authority to this effect, that the claim of mariners to their wages has priority over a shipwright's common law possessory lien, so far as it is for wages accrued due to the mariners previous and up to the time when the possessory lien commences. Therefore, up to 2nd April, the wages of the mariners must be allowed, whatever the amount may be found due by the registrar, and allowed in priority to the claims of Messrs. Carter and Seaward and Co. With regard to their claim for wages earned subsequently to the possessory lien of Carter, that will not rank before, but after, Carter's claim.

With regard to the claim for subsistence money, I have already intimated that the sailors have no claim to it except perhaps for the period of time between the date when they left the ship and the date when they did or might have reasonably returned to their country. What that amount may be I shall leave to the registrar to determine. I think I have said that they are entitled to the cost of their passage home, if found due by the registrar, and that the cost should take rank with their wages. But I do not decide that any passage money is due to them. That is a question for the registrar. It may well be that, having regard to the terms of their contract or for some other good reason, they are disentitled to any. Therefore, their passage money and subsistence money may rank with their original claim for wages, that is, that part of their wages earned previously to the possessory lien of Carter. Now as regards Robertson and Co., the sailmakers, it seems to me clear that there has been a misunderstanding, and this is a question on which further evidence should be taken, and the case must therefore be sent back in order that it may be taken. If the sails or any of them were in Messrs. Robertson's possession at the time of the arrest of the ship by the marshal, and he then under the authority of this court got possession of the sails from Robertson and Co., I think they had a possessory lien, and it would be an act of injustice to deprive them of their right. Therefore I will ask the registrar to inquire of the marshal how that matter stands, and if as a fact Robertson and Co. had possession of the sails, they must rank before all other claims except wages. If it can be ascertained what were the net proceeds of the sails, then they will be entitled to have their lien satisfied to that amount. I hardly think it worth while, as the amount is small, to trouble about this interfering with the claim for wages, and it would be as well, if no opposition is offered, to give them what the sails realised.

That disposes of everything except costs. With regard to them I give costs in each case, and they are severally to rank with the respective claims, except in the wages action, in which case the costs are to rank with that portion of the wages earned previously to Messrs. Carter's lien. With regard to Messrs. Seaward's claim, that must go back to the registrar, and he must find one way or the other whether it was arranged by Gaillard, Seaward and Co., and Carter, that this alleged agreement was made by which Carter was to protect Seaward and Co.'s claim. If so, there will be a decree for the amount found due to Seaward and Co., and a declaration that they are entitled to rank with Carter. If, on the other hand, it is found by the registrar that no such arrangement was made, then Seaward and Co. will be postponed to Carter. Should there be any opposition before the registrar to Seaward and Co. making out this alleged agreement, I will order them to pay the costs of only one opponent, and will leave it to the parties to decide who that shall be.

THE STORK; THE NEVER DESPAIR. (a)

Collision—Practice—County Court action—Transfer to High Court—Consolidation—Conduct of action.

Where a County Court action, instituted to recover damages arising out of a collision with the defendants' vessel, is, at the instance of the plaintiffs, transferred to the High Court, and there consolidated with an action instituted in the Admiralty Division of the High Court by the defendants in the former action against the plaintiffs in that action subsequently to the institution of the County Court action, the plaintiffs in the County Court action being the first to institute proceedings, will have the conduct of the consolidated actions.

THIS was an appeal under sect. 50 of the Judicature Act 1873 from the judge in chambers to the judge in court.

On the 15th Jan. 1884 the General Steam Navigation Company's steamship Stork came into collision with the brig Never Despair, which was riding at anchor in the river Thames. On the 26th Jan. the General Steam Navigation Company entered an action (1884, Fo. 44, M. No. 2811.) in the City of London Court against the owners of the Never Despair claiming 100*l.* damages. In the deposition of the master of the Stork made before the Receiver of Wreck, the damage to the Stork was stated to be about 5*l.*

(a) Reported by J. P. ASPINALL, and F. W. RAIKES, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law

On the 29th Jan. the owners of the Never Despair instituted an action (1884, M. No. 359 Fo. 40) in the Admiralty Division of the High Court against the owners of the Stork, claiming 600*l.* damages sustained by them in the same collision.

The plaintiffs in the City of London Court thereupon took out a summons, calling on the defendants, the owners of the Never Despair, to show cause why the City of London Court action should not be transferred to the Admiralty Division of the High Court, and the action instituted in the High Court consolidated with the transferred action, and why the plaintiffs in the City of London Court should not have the conduct of the consolidated actions.

The summons came on in chambers on the 5th Feb. before the judge, who ordered the transfer of the City of London Court action and its consolidation with the High Court action, giving the conduct of the consolidated actions to the plaintiffs in the action instituted in the High Court.

Feb. 10.—The plaintiffs in the City of London Court action (1884, Fo. 44. No. 2811) now moved the judge in court "to reverse or vary the order made herein dated the 5th Feb. 1884, whereby it is amongst other things ordered that this action be consolidated with action 1884, M. No. 359, Fo. 40, and the plaintiffs herein ask that action 1884, M. No. 359, Fo. 40, be consolidated with this action, and that they have the conduct of the actions when so consolidated and the costs of this application."

Dr. Phillimore (with him E. Pollock), for the General Steam Navigation Company, in support of the motion—The plaintiffs in the City of London Court being the first to institute proceedings should have the conduct of the consolidated actions. It has been the practice of this court to so order under circumstances like the present. We very properly brought our action in the County Court, having regard to the amount of our damage. Had we in the first instance brought our action in the High Court, we of right would have had the conduct. On the owners of the Never Despair instituting an action in the High Court, we, in order to save the expense of two actions, rightly apply for a transfer and consolidation. Therefore by the force of circumstances we have virtually been compelled to come to this court, and, seeing that we were the first to institute proceedings, we should have the conduct of the consolidated actions.

Nelson on behalf of the owners of the Never Despair, contra.—The transfer and consolidation having been obtained at the instance of the plaintiffs in the City of London Court, they should accept things as they find them in the High Court—in other words, at the date of the transfer there was then an action in the High Court, and that action should be the principal action. Moreover, having regard to the fact that the Stork only suffered damage to the value of 5*l.*, and that the collision is caused by her running into the Never Despair while at anchor, it is unreasonable to say that the owners of the Stork should have the conduct.

Cur. adv. vult.

Feb. 14.—Sir JAMES HANNEN.—In a motion recently before me, in which a suit of damage having been instituted in the City of London Court, and a suit afterwards instituted in this court in respect of the same collision, and the City of London Court action having been transferred to this court, and the two suits consolidated at the instance of the plaintiffs in the City of London Court, the question arose whether the conduct of the consolidated suits should be given to the plaintiffs in the City of London Court, or to the plaintiffs in the High Court. When this question first came before me on the application in chambers, I acted upon the view that the plaintiffs in the City of London Court suit having been the parties who took the step by which that suit was transferred to this court, must accept the position of affairs they found when their suit was brought into this court, and that consequently the suit which was already in this court when the order of transfer was made must be deemed the principal one, and the plaintiffs in that suit have the conduct of the consolidated suits.

On the question being brought on appeal to me in court, I took time to consider in order that I might be informed as to what the practice had been. I have had several instances submitted to me, and I may refer especially to one in 1882, the circumstances of which were very similar to the present case. (a) In the case I refer to there was one suit instituted in the City of London Court on the 11th Aug. 1882, and another suit instituted in this court on the 12th Aug. 1882. The suit in the City of London Court was transferred to this court, and on a summons taken out by the plaintiff in the City of London Court an order was made in the registry consolidating the two suits, and giving to the plaintiff in the City of London Court action the conduct of the consolidated actions. On appeal to the judge of this court (Sir Robert Phillimore) he rejected with costs the application of the appellants, the plaintiffs in the action in the High Court, to give them the conduct of the consolidated suits. As in this case the practice of the court on the point was clearly settled by Sir Robert Phillimore, it is not my intention to differ with the view of that learned judge who had such great experience of the practice of this court. I therefore must vary the order I made in chambers by giving the conduct of the consolidated action to the plaintiffs in the suit instituted in the City of London Court.

(a) The following is a copy of the memorandum of the previous decisions furnished to Sir James Hannen by the Registrar:—The Cosmopolitan (1874).—First action in the City of London Court instituted by the owners of the Cosmopolitan against the Vialka. The second action in the High Court of Admiralty instituted by the owners of the Vialka against the Cosmopolitan. On motion by the plaintiffs in the second action, the judge (Sir Robert Phillimore) transferred the first action to the High Court and made it the principal cause. The Bjorn (1882).—First action in the City of London Court, brought by the owners of the Wear against the Bjorn on the 11th Aug. 1882. The second action in the High Court of Justice, instituted by the owners of the Bjorn against the Wear on the 12th Aug. 1882. On summons on behalf of the plaintiffs in the first action it was transferred to the High Court, and the second action was consolidated with it, the transferred action being made the principal one. A corresponding order was made on a cross-summons taken out on behalf of the plaintiffs in the second action on the same day. An appeal from such order was afterwards rejected with costs by Sir Robert Phillimore." The opinion first formed by Sir James Hannen would appear more consonant with justice and reason than the practice laid down by Sir Robert Phillimore. The accidental circumstance that the plaintiff in the County Court has been the first to institute this action hardly seems in itself sufficient reason for giving him the conduct of the consolidated actions, where he, to suit his own convenience, has had his action transferred to the High Court, and where his alleged damage, as in the present case, is but a trifling sum. According to Sir J. Hannen's first view, the plaintiffs in the City of London Court having been the parties who took the step by which their suit was transferred to the High Court should accept the position of affairs which they found when their suit was brought into the High Court, and it is to be hoped that, should the question come before the Court of Appeal, it will take a similar view.—ED.

In accordance with this decision the following order was drawn up: "The President, having maturely deliberated, varied the order of the 5th instant so far as regards the consolidation of these actions, by directing that action Fo. 40 be consolidated with action Fo. 44, in lieu of action Fo. 44 being consolidated with action Fo, 40."

THE HARTON. (a)

Collision—Thames Conservancy Rules, Art. 14—Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea—Merchant Shipping Act 1873 (36 & 37 Vict. c. 85), s. 17.

The Thames Conservancy Rules are not regulations "made under or contained in" the Merchant Shipping Acts 1854 to 1873, *and consequently sect.*17*of The Merchant Shipping Act* 1873 does not apply to such rules, and therefore a vessel is not to be "deemed to be in fault" in an action for collision unless it be shown that in fact the infringement did contribute to the collision.

THIS was a damage action in rem instituted by the owners of the sailing barge George and Jane against the owners of the steamship Harton, to recover damages arising out of a collision between the two ships on Friday, the 5th Oct. 1883, in Gravesend Reach.

The facts alleged on behalf of the plaintiffs were as follows:—At nine p.m. on the 4th Oct.; the sailing barge George and Jane in ballast and manned by a crew of two hands, came to anchor in the Thames just above Coal House Point, close to the Oven's Buoy and near to the north shore. The anchor light was thereupon hoisted and was burning brightly at the time of the collision. At about 12.30 a.m. on the 5th Oct. the tide being first quarter flood, the weather squally, and the wind N.N.W. The steamship Harton came into collision with the George and Jane, doing her so much harm that she shortly after sank. The plaintiffs charged the defendants with failing to keep a good look-out or to stop and reverse their engines in accordance with Art. 14 of the Thames Conservancy Rules 1880.

The facts alleged on behalf of the defendants were as follows: At about 12.15 a.m. on the 5th Oct. 1883 the steamship Harton, of 326 tons registered, with a crew of fifteen hands all told, and in the course of a voyage from Newcastle-on-Tyne to London, was in the river Thames, rounding at the speed of about four knots, Coal House Point, to the north of mid-channel. The night was dark but clear, the tide flood, and the wind N.N.W., and the Harton had her regulation lights duly exhibited and burning brightly. Under these circumstances the look-out reported a vessel (which proved to be the George and Jane) right ahead but with no lights, and though the helm of the Harton was at once ported and her engines stopped, she struck the George and Jane with her port bow, and caused her to sink. The defendants charged those on board the George and Jane with lying at anchor in an improper place, and failing to exhibit a light.

Articles 7 and 14 of the Thames Conservancy Rules are as follows:

7. A steam-vessel, a sailing vessel, or a barge when at anchor in the river, shall carry where it can be best seen at a height not exceeding 20ft. above the hull, a white light in a globular lantern of not less than 5in. in diameter, and so constructed as to show a clear uniform and unbroken light visible all round the horizon at a distance of at least one mile.

14. Every steam-vessel, when approaching another vessel so as to involve risk of collision, shall slacken her speed, and shall stop and reverse if necessary.

Feb. 22.—At the hearing the evidence of the defendants that the barge had no light was corroborated by the evidence of the master and mate of the steamship Black Boy, which had gone up the river just ahead of the Harton.

The defendants admitted that they did not reverse their engines.

T. T. Bucknill on behalf of the plaintiffs.—The barge being at anchor, and it being sufficiently proved that she had a light, the steamer is to blame. Assuming the barge had no light, the steamer is to blame for not having reversed her engines when first the barge was reported. It is submitted that a breach of the Thames Conservancy rules is in itself prima facie evidence of negligence.

Dr. Phillimore on behalf of the defendants, the owners of the Harton.—The evidence proves the barge had no light; hence, those on the steamer were only able to first see her at such a distance that the master of the steamer had no time to consider the question whether reversing was advisable or not, and further, as a fact, if the engines had been reversed, it was then useless. By reason of the negligence of those on the barge, the steamer is unexpectedly placed in such a position that her master should be excused for not reversing, assuming it was his duty to do so:

No; The Bywell Castle is expressly approved by Lord Blackburn. The Bywell Castle (ubi sup.) is also distinguishable from The Khedive. In The Khedive the master had time to make up his mind, but made it up wrongly. In The Bywell Castle the master had no time to make up his mind at all. Moreover, an infringement of the Thames Conservancy Rules should not be visited with the consequences that result from an infringement of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions, because the Thames Conservancy Rules are neither "contained in or made under the Merchant Shipping Acts 1854 to 1873:" (36 & 37 Vict. c. 85, s. 17.)

Bucknill in reply.—The Bywell Castle (ubi sup.) is not in point, seeing that the master of the steamer here deliberately refrained from reversing his engines. As to the effect of the infringement of the Thames Conservancy Rules, reference was made to the following cases:

The Condor, 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 115; 40 L. T. Rep. N. S. 442; 4 P. Div. 115;
The Lady Downshire, 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 25; 39 L. T. Rep. N. S. 236; 4 P. Div. 26.

BUTT, J.—In this case the first question which arises is this, had the barge any light at the time of the collision? Before dealing with that there is, however, one observation I wish to make, and in which the Trinity Masters concur, viz., that this barge was anchored too far out in the river. On the question of the light I come to the conclusion that the barge had no light exhibited at the time of collision. No doubt a light had been up in the course of the night. The captain knew nothing beyond this, that over an hour before the collision a light was burning. The mate's evidence is that he saw the light burning just at the moment of collision. The account that he gives is that he went up to have a look at the weather. But the account given by the master before the Receiver of Wreck is that the mate went to see if the lamp was burning brightly. This fact throws considerable doubt on the rest of the mate's evidence. On the other side it is sworn positively that this barge was reported without a light, which is corroborated by the master and mate of the steamer Black Boy. On the whole, I think that the defendant's story is true, and that the barge was without a light. Now, that being so, the barge is clearly to blame.

The question then arises is the steamer also to blame? It has been contended that she should be held to blame for not reversing her engines the moment that the barge was reported. The witnesses on behalf of the steamer have said that the state of the night was such that it was only possible to see a vessel without a light at about one ship's length off. Witnesses from the steamer Black Boy have said that they made out the barge at two ship's lengths. The truth evidently lies somewhere between the two. Taking that to be so, the question arises, ought the master of the steamer at once to have reversed his engines? There is some difference of opinion on this point between my assessors and myself, but I think he ought to have done so. It is to my mind not sufficient excuse to say that it would have thrown his vessel athwart the stream, and so caused danger. On this point, however, we are agreed, viz., that it would have made no difference, and that no beneficial effect would have been then produced by reversing. That being so, am I bound to condemn the steamer for infringement of the Thames Conservancy Rules, assuming my view as to this master's duty to be correct? I do not think I am so bound. I have not here to apply any statutory provisions so as to draw an inference of that blame, which would arise under sect. 17 of the Merchant Shipping Act from disobeying Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea. It seems to me clear that this rule is not one of those regulations within the meaning of sect. 17. (a) I therefore think I am not bound, and that I cannot apply that section. It follows, therefore, that, as the omission of reversing would have made no difference, the steamer is not to blame. I would only just say in conclusion that, if a vessel will choose to lie in such a position as this without a light, the court ought not to strain matters against another vessel which runs into her owing to her position and the absence of her light. On the other hand, I, of course, think that the court ought always to look with jealousy on the working of a steamer's engines. For these various reasons I think the barge was alone to blame.

THE OWNERS OF THE STEAMSHIP WELLFIELD v. ADAMSON AND SHORT; THE ALFRED. (b)

Towage agreement—Master's authority—Agent of owners.

The steamship W. having found the steamship A. on the 12th Feb. off Cape Finisterre in a disabled condition, towed her in heavy weather until the 14th Feb., when, in consequence of the condition of the A., the master of the W. proposed to abandon her. However, at the desire of the master of the A. it was agreed in writing that the W. should "stand by the A. as long as possible, and that the W. and owners are to be paid for the time and towing already done and to be done from the 12th Feb. 1883." The W. thereupon again took the A. in tow, but on the 16th Feb., owing to stress of weather, it was found necessary to abandon her, after which she was totally lost. In an action for towage against the owners of the A., the Court held that the agreement entered into by the master of the A, was a reasonable one, and one which, in his position of agent ex necessitate for his owners, he had an authority to enter into, and awarded the plaintiffs the sum of 400l. in respect of the services rendered prior to and after the agreement.

THIS was an action in personam brought by the owners, master, and crew of the steamship Wellfield against the owners of the late steamship Alfred for towage services.

The facts alleged on behalf of the plaintiffs were as follows:

(a) This decision confirms what has long been the opinion of Admiralty practitioners. The same question arose in The Condor (vol. 4, p. 115), but was not decided. This case is a striking instance of the unequal penalties imposed by the Legislature upon wrongful acts of equal magnitude. Thus disregard of one of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions (referred to in sect. 17 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1873) in the open sea is visited with liability, whereas disregard of identically the same regulation in a crowded river like the Thames is immaterial, unless it is shown that the breach of the regulation did in fact contribute to the collision. If a breach of a regulation in the open sea is to be visited with the drastic consequences of sect 17 of the M. S. A, 1873, it certainly seems unjust and unreasonable not to exact the same penalties for a breach of the same regulation in a crowded river, where the utmost care in navigation is at all times so important.—ED.

(b) Reported by J. P. ASPINALL and F. W. RAIKES, Esqrs. Barristers-at-Law.

The steamship Wellfield, of 1235 tons nett, while on a voyage from Cardiff to Aden, fell in with the steamship Alfred off Cape Finisterre on the 12th Feb. 1883. The Alfred was flying signals for assistance, and on coming up with her it was found that her engine-room and stokehole were half full of water, and that she was generally unmanageable. The Alfred was a steamship of 1062 tons gross register, and was on a voyage from the Black Sea to the United Kingdom with a cargo of grain.

At the request of the master of the Alfred, she was, with considerable difficulty and danger, taken in tow by the Wellfield and towed towards Corunna until the evening of the 14th Feb. During the towage the Alfred sheered violently, and the hawsers twice parted, and the Wellfield was exposed to considerable danger by reason of the heavy weather.

On the 14th the master of the Wellfield proposed to abandon the Alfred in consequence of her unmanageable condition and the danger run by his own ship. The master of the Alfred, however, persuaded him to make another attempt to save the Alfred, and the following agreement was entered into by the two masters:

I, J. O. Landells, master of the steamer Alfred, of Newcastle, on behalf of owners, insurance, etc., etc., agree with master, and owners of the Wellfield, that she, the said ship, stands by the Alfred as long as possible, and that the Wellfield and owners are to be paid for the time and towing already done and to be done from the 12th Feb. 1883. (Signed) J. O. LANDELLS, Master steamship Alfred.

The Wellfield accordingly continued towing till 11 p.m. on the 14th, when, owing to the severity of the weather, the hawser again broke. Towing was renewed at noon on the 15th, but on the 16th it was found necessary to abandon the Alfred, which was ultimately lost. The Wellfield was detained six days on her voyage, and the plaintiffs claimed 1000*l.* or such other sum as the court should think fit to award.

The statement of defence, so far as is material, was as follows:

3. The defendants deny that the master of the Alfred promised the master or crew of the Wellfield that the owners of the Alfred should pay the master or crew of the Wellfield for their services rendered or to be rendered whether or not they should ultimately succeed in saving the Alfred, or that he made any such promise. If the master of the Alfred made any such promise as alleged, which is denied, he had no authority to make the same, or to bind the defendants thereby.

4. If the master of the Alfred ever signed the agreement alleged in the 10th paragraph of the statement of claim, which is not admitted, he did not sign, and had no authority to sign, the same on behalf of the defendants or as their agent, or to bind the defendants thereby.

5. If the alleged agreement was entered into by the master of the Alfred, which is not admitted, it was not entered into by him as the agent of the defendants. The said master of the Alfred had no authority to enter into the said alleged agreement as the agent or on behalf of the defendants. The alleged services, work, and labour were not, nor were any of them, rendered or done for the defendants, or at the request of the said master. As their agent the said master had no authority to make any such request on behalf of the defendants as alleged.

6. The said alleged services were rendered and the said work was done by the master and crew of the Wellfield with the object and intention of salvage services being claimed therefor, and not otherwise. The Alfred was abandoned by the Wellfield, and afterwards foundered and was totally lost. No benefit was derived from the said alleged services or work.

8. The defendants deny that they are under any liability to the plaintiffs in respect of any of the matters in the statement of claim alleged.

Dr. Phillimore (with him Beaufort) for the plaintiffs.—The agreement is a reasonable one, and, if so, it is binding on the owners of the Alfred Having regard to the position in which the master of the Alfred was placed, he only acted reasonably in promising to pay the Wellfield for services which if successful would have saved property of considerable value. The plaintiffs therefore are undoubtedly entitled to be paid for the whole of their towage services, both before the agreement was entered into and after.

Gainsford Bruce, Q.C. (with him Edge), for the defendants.—Had the plaintiffs succeeded in bringing in the Alfred, their action, instead of being for towage, would have been for salvage. Having failed to save the Alfred, they now seek to make her owners liable for these alleged towage services. As to the agreement it is submitted that it is so unreasonable, and was entered into under such duress, that the court will give no effect to it. It cannot be said that the master of the Alfred had any authority to agree on behalf of his owners that payment should be made in respect of the services which had been rendered prior to the towage agreement. Those services were clearly contemplated as being salvage, and as such cannot be converted into towage by this agreement.

BUTT, J.—The first question which arises in this case is, whether the agreement made between the masters of these two vessels, representing their owners, is a binding one. There seems to be no doubt as to the terms of the agreement. When the agreement was entered into, the Wellfield had towed the Alfred for two days, and there was then great doubt as to whether any further efforts would be successful. Under these circumstances the master of the Wellfield, having come to the conclusion that it was not worth his while going on if his services were to be unsuccessful, made up his mind to leave the Alfred, unless some agreement were entered into to induce him to stay and continue his assistance. It is clear that the master of the Alfred thought that things were not hopeless at that time. If he had thought so he never would have offered a single penny for further assistance. What does he do? He enters into an agreement by which he, on behalf of his owners, assents to pay a few hundred pounds in the hope of saving a great many thousands. Primâ facie, that is not an unreasonable thing to do. This being a towage suit and not a salvage suit we have no evidence of the value of the Alfred. She is a vessel of 1062 tons gross register. It is for the chance of saving this vessel, probably worth 15,000*l.*, that the agreement is entered into. It must also be remembered that she had a cargo of barley on board. Acting upon the best view I can take of the circumstances, I shall award 100*l.* a day for the time the Alfred was being towed, making in all 400*l.* Had the Wellfield brought the Alfred into dock on salvage terms she would have had a very large award. But 400*l.*, in my view, is a fair towage remuneration. The position of the master of the Alfred was that at an expenditure of 400*l.* he obtained for his owners the chance of saving 15,000*l.* or 20,000*l.* That does not look like an unreasonable agreement, and I fail to see anything in the evidence to the contrary

There is nothing to show that if the weather had moderated the Alfred might not have been saved. The agreement therefore is not unreasonable, and it is clear as a matter of law, that the master being the agent ex necessitate of his owners was authorised to enter into this agreement. But it is said even so he has no right to enter into an agreement to pay for towage in the past. But it seems to me that if it was reasonable to make the agreement for future towage, it was not unreasonable to agree to pay for the towage that had been done. On the whole, therefore, I think that the master acted reasonably. It is clear that he thought he was acting reasonably, and that there was some chance of saving this valuable property. This he did for the comparatively small sum of 400*l.*

THE GEORGE GORDON. (a)

Salvage—Arrest of ship in excessive amount—Bail—Costs—Practice.

In a salvage action in which the plaintiffs arrested the salved ship in the sum of 3000*l. and the court on a value of* 14,000*l. awarded* 450*l., the salvors were ordered to pay all the costs and expenses of finding bail for* 3000*l., such sum being in the opinion of the court unreasonably excessive.*

THIS was a salvage action instituted by the owners, masters, and crews of the steamtugs Fylde and Wyre, against the owners of the steamship George Gordon.

The services consisted in towing the George Gordon off the Furness Bank, where she had taken the ground in a fog. During the rendering of the services there was a strong wind with a heavy sea. The plaintiffs instituted the action in the sum of 3000*l.* for which amount bail was required and given. The value of the George Gordon was 14,000*l.*

Dr. Phillimore and T. T. Bucknill for the plaintiffs.

Myburgh, Q.C. and F. W. Raikes, for the defendants.

The Court after hearing the evidence awarded 450*l.*

Raikes applied that the expenses of finding bail might be borne by the plaintiffs. Having regard to the services and the value of the property salved, the George Gordon was arrested in an exorbitant sum. The defendants have been put to considerable expense in finding bail, and it is submitted that the cost of their so doing should be borne by the plaintiffs.

Phillimore, contra.—It is to be remembered that the sum of 3000*l.* is to cover not only the award, but also the costs of the action. Moreover salvors cannot but help putting a higher value upon their services than the court does. The defendants never asked to have the bail reduced.

BUTT, J.—Parties should not arrest a ship for an exorbitant sum; but if they do so it is no excuse to say that the defendants did not as it were struggle to get free by applying to have the bail reduced, nor that the solicitors were ignorant of the facts of the case at the time of the arrest. Where it is possible, they should ascertain the circumstances before the ship is arrested. I never will sanction the course taken in this case, and I therefore order that the plaintiffs do pay all the costs and expenses to which the defendants have been put by finding bail.

THE EMMY HAASE. (a)

Collision—Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, art. 18—Merchant Shipping Act 1873 (36 & 37 Vict. c. 85) s. 16.

Where a steamship is approaching another vessel so as to involve risk of collision, her master is not bound on making out the risk to instantly stop and reverse the engines in compliance with art. 18 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, but he is to be allowed a reasonably short time to judge what the best manœuvre is under the circumstances, though if he exceeds that time he will be held to blame for the collision.

The duty to render assistance under sect. 16 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1873 is not confined to rendering actual assistance; but if a vessel whose duty it is to render assistance is so injured that the only assistance she can render is to burn rockets or hoist a globe light so as to indicate her position, she is bound to do so, and in default of so doing, she is, in the absence of proof to the contrary, to blame for the collision.

THIS was an action in rem instituted by the owners of the steamship Mulgrave against the owners of the steamship Emmy Haase to recover damages occasioned by a collision between the two vessels in the North Sea, on the 2nd Feb. 1884. The defendants counter-claimed.

The facts alleged on behalf of the plaintiffs were as follows:—Shortly before 5.40 a.m. on the 2nd Feb. 1884, the steamship Mulgrave, of 1106 tons net register was in the North Sea heading S.E. ½ S., and making abont eight knots an hour. Her regulation lights were duly exhibited, and burning brightly, and a good look-out was being kept. The weather was dark, the tide ebb, and the wind a gale from the North East. Under these circumstances the masthead light of a steamship which proved to be the Emmy Haase was seen right ahead about two miles distant. The helm of the Mulgrave was ported, so that the vessels might pass port to port, but when the Emmy Haase, which exhibited no side lights, had approached so near that her hull was visible, she was seen to be crossing the bows of the Mulgrave from port to starboard. The engines of the Mulgrave were immediately stopped, and her helm put hard-a-starboard, and in order that she might answer her helm more readily, and as the only chance of avoiding a collision, her engines were not reversed. Notwithstanding these manœuvres the vessels came into collision, doing one another considerable damage. The anchor of the Mulgrave was swept off the deck in the collision, and brought her up, and she there remained at anchor for over an hour. The plaintiffs charged the defendants, amongst other things, with not easing, stopping, or reversing their engines in due time.

The facts alleged on behalf of the defendants were as follows:—Shortly before 5.30 a.m. the steamship Emmy Haase of 1082 tons net register was in the North Sea, steering a course of N. by W. ¾ W., and making about nine knots per hour. Her regulation lights were properly exhibited, and a good look-out was being kept on board of her. Under these circumstances the masthead and green lights of a steamer which proved to be the Mulgrave was seen about half a point on the starboard bow of the Emmy Haase, and distant between two and three miles. The helm of the Emmy Haase was starboarded a little and then steadied. When the Mulgrave had approached to within about 400 yards of the Emmy Haase she was seen to shut in her green light and open her red. The engines of the Emmy Haase were thereupon stopped, and immediately afterwards an order was given to reverse the engines, but before the engines could be reversed the two vessels came into collision, both sustaining great damage. The defendants amongst other things charged the plaintiffs with failing to render assistance after the collision as provided by sect. 16 of 36 & 37 Vict. c. 85.

Sect. 16 of 36 and 37 Vict. c. 85 is as follows:

In every case of collision it shall be the duty of the master or person in charge of each vessel, if and so far as he can do so without danger to his own vessel, crew, and passengers (if any) to stay by the other vessel until he has ascertained that he has no need of further assistance, and to render to the other vessel, her master, and crew, and passengers (if any) such assistance as may be practicable, and as may be necessary in order to save them from any danger caused by the collision, and also to give to the master or person in charge of the other vessel the name of his own vessel and of her port of registry, or of the port or place to which she belongs, and also the names of the ports and places from which and to which she is bound.

If he fails so to do, and no reasonable cause for such failure is shown, the collision shall, in the absence of proof to the contrary, be deemed to have been caused by his wrongful act, neglect, or default.

Art. 18 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea is as follows:

Every steamship when approaching another ship so as to involve risk of collision shall slacken her speed, or shall stop and reverse if necessary.

It was proved that those on the Mulgrave had not attempted to render any assistance whatsoever by burning rockets to indicate her position or otherwise. One of the main points in dispute was as to the duration of time between the moment when the master of the Emmy Haase saw that there was danger of collision and the time when he ordered his engines to be reversed. It is found by the court to have been something considerably more than a minute.

Hall, Q.C. (with him Bucknill) for the plaintiffs.—Having regard to the fact that the Mulgrave was brought to anchor involuntarily, and moreover, that she sustained considerable damage, it was impossible that she should render assistance to the Emmy Haase. It is established by the evidence that those on board the Emmy Haase saw there was danger of collision some few minutes before her engines were reversed. That being so, she has broken art. 18 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea. With regard to that article the House of Lords have said in The Khedive (4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 360; 43 L. T. Rep. N. S. 610; L. Rep. 5 App. Cas. 876) that, under such circumstances, a master's duty is to obey the rule instantly. [BUTT, J.—I doubt whether any court ever said that. Surely one must allow a master some short time to judge what he is to do. It may be that his duty is to go ahead, and not to reverse his engines.] Even so, the master here, after he has taken in the situation, fails to reverse until the very last moment.

Dr. Phillimore (with him Raikes) for the defendants.—The Mulgrave might have rendered assistance by burning rockets to indicate her position, and by failing to do so has made herself liable under the Act. The master of the Emmy Haase only refrained from reversing during a reasonably short period of time in order that he might judge what rule of navigation applied to the circumstances of the case:

The Khedive (ubi sup):
The Benares, 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 171; 49 L. T. Rep. N. S. 702; 9 P. Div. 16.

BUTT, J.—In this case I and the Trinity Masters think it quite clear that the evidence satisfactorily establishes that the Emmy Haase carried proper regulation lights, which were burning at the time of collision, and that they ought to have been seen by those on board the Mulgrave at a considerably greater distance than they in fact were. The conclusion, therefore, to which I have come is that the cause of the collision was a bad look-out, leading to a very wrong manœuvre on the part of the Mulgrave, and, therefore, that the Mulgrave was to blame I have no doubt.

I think also that the Mulgrave was to blame with reference to the statutory enactment as to rendering assistance in cases of collision. We think it is impossible that the lights burnt on the Emmy Haase could not have been seen by those on board the Mulgrave; and though the injury to the Mulgrave may have been so great that she could not render assistance by standing by after the collision, yet I think it would have been rendering assistance within the meaning of the Act of Parliament if she had sent up rockets or hoisted a globe light (a). I think, therefore, that the Mulgrave is also to blame for this, the consequence being that she is to blame both for improper navigation and for disobedience to the enactment requiring her to render assistance.

(a) In The Adriatic (vol. 3, p. 16) Sir Robert Phillimore held that the duty imposed by the statute is not complied with, where it being practicable and safe for a steamer to lower a boat to render assistance, although possibly dangerous to stay by the injured ship, she continues her voyage without lowering her boat and merely hails and signals for other vessels to go to the assistance of the injured ship. Under this section the question arises whether a vessel, having rendered assistance in compliance with the statute, is entitled to recover salvage in respect of such assistance. Where the necessity for such assistance is brought about by the negligence of the assisting ship, it is only in accordance with the usual principles governing salvage that she should receive no remuneration. Where, however, the necessity for the assistance is brought about by the negligence of the assisted ship, it would hardly appear reasonable to refuse the innocent vessel remuneration for services which were rendered necessary by the wrongful act of the other ship. However, under these circum.

We now come to the question whether the Emmy Haase reversed her engines in due time. That is a matter on which I myself have had very considerable doubt, and I am not quite certain whether if I had been left to myself I should have decided as I am going to do. It is, however, the opinion of the Trinity Masters that, having regard to the manœuvres of the Mulgrave, and taking the evidence on both sides, there must have been a want of exercise of proper vigilance on the part of those on the Emmy Haase, or the wrong manœuvre of the Mulgrave would have been observed by them in sufficient time to have enabled them to stop and reverse their engines with effect. We cannot accept the story that only one minute or something less elapsed between the time when the red light of the Mulgrave was seen and the time of the collision. We think there must have been more, and something considerably more. If that is so we do not think the Emmy Haase did right in not sooner reversing her engines.

Although the question does not now arise, I may say that I believe in all these cases where it is necessary to stop and reverse that instantaneous stopping and reversing, in compliance with art. 18, the very instant there is danger of collision, is not what is required. A man has to judge whether stopping and reversing is necessary, and he has also to judge whether any other rule applies. I do not think that a court of justice can say that a man has acted wrongly in not stopping and reversing instantaneously; some short time must be allowed. If in this case I had been alone I might have decided that the engines of the Emmy Haase had been stopped and reversed in due time, and that this short period of time had not been exceeded; but the Trinity Masters have so strong a view on this point, that I do not feel myself entitled to differ from them. The result is, I must hold both these vessels to blame.

Practice—Default action in rem—Bottomry—Order XIII., r. 12.

In default actions in rem, before the plaintiff can obtain judgment under Order XIII., r. 12, the ten days within which the defendants might have pleaded must have elapsed, and notice of trial must have been filed in the registry.

THIS was a motion for judgment by the plaintiffs in a default bottomry action in rem.

An affidavit of service and statement of claim had been filed by the plaintiffs in accordance with Order XIII., r. 12, but the ten days within which, by Order XXI., r. 6, the defendant must plead had not yet elapsed.

W. J. Stewart, for the plaintiffs, in support of the motion.—The plaintiffs have complied with all the necessary formalities and now ask for judgment. [BUTT, J.—I notice that Order XIII., r. 12, says that where the affidavit of service and statement of claim have been filed, "the action may proceed as if such party had appeared." That involves the lapse of a certain period of time before you can ask for judgment. So far as I see that time has not elapsed.] That is so. We have neither given notice of trial nor waited for the time to elapse within which a defendant, who had appeared, might deliver his statement of defence. But it is within the power of the court to dispense with both these matters if it sees fit. If, however, the court should think otherwise I would ask for judgment subject to the defendant's not pleading within the proper time.

BUTT, J.—The plaintiffs must wait for the full time to elapse within which the defendant might plead, and they must also give notice of trial in the registry before they can get judgment. It is, in my opinion, most undesirable that ships should be seized and sold in great haste, and I therefore think that the fullest time should be allowed between the seizure and sale. With regard to the conditional judgment that I cannot consent to.

April 21.—Notice of trial having been filed in the Registry and the required time having elapsed, Sir J. Hannen now gave judgment for the plaintiffs.

Salvage—Practice—Costs on higher scale—Order LXV., r. 9.

In the absence of special circumstances of difficulty or urgency, costs on the higher scale will not be allowed.

In a salvage action, where the value of the salving ship, together with cargo and freight, was 80,000*l.*, of the property salved 42,000*l.*, and the award 2400*l.*, the court refused to allow costs on the higher scale.

THIS was an application by the plaintiffs in a salvage action for costs on the higher scale.

The services consisted, shortly, in the steamship Historian towing the steamship Horace about 140 miles for three days in the Atlantic Ocean during severe weather.

The value of the Historian, her cargo and freight was in all 80,000*l.* The value of the property salved was 42,000*l.* The court awarded 2400*l.*, of which 1900*l.*, was apportioned to the stances, Butt, J. in The Peter Graham (see post) refused to give the innocent vessel salvage, apparently on the ground that, as the duty is obligatory under the statute, the assistance rendered cannot come within the scope of salvage, lacking as it does the important element of being voluntary. It may, however, be noticed that the point was not argued, and it is therefore to be hoped that the learned judge will more maturely consider the matter should the question again arise. With reference to this subject see The C. S. Butler, vol. 2, p. 237.—ED.

owners of the Historian, and the remainder given to her master and crew.

Dr. Phillimore on behalf of the plaintiffs,—It is submitted that this is a case in which costs should be allowed on the higer scale. By Order LXV., r. 8, costs on the higher scale may be allowed "on special grounds arising out of the nature and importance, or the difficulty or urgency of the case." It is submitted that this case is so important, having regard to the value of the property salved, that costs on the higher scale should be allowed. The value of the property saved is 42,000*l.*, the services were most meritorious, and the award is 2400*l.*—facts which are sufficiently special to warrant the allowance of the higher scale.

Sir JAMES HANNEN.—Until some rule is laid down by higher authority upon the subject, it must be taken that something special must be brought to my notice. It must be remembered that the new scale of costs has been drawn up with a view to uniformity, and it was intended to do away with the old rule of thumb higher and lower scale. Formerly there was a diversity of practice. In the Court of Chancery, if the matter in dispute was above 1000*l.*, then, however simple the question might be, costs were given on the higher scale. That was not thought to be just. On the other hand, in the common law courts, although there was power to give costs on the higher scale, I may say, from my experience, that it was very rarely done. I myself do not remember it ever being done. Taking into account that diversity of practice, there has been a new standard scale prepared; but, as there may be in some cases circumstances of urgency or difficulty, it was thought right to bestow upon the judges the power of giving costs on the higher scale. Those circumstances of urgency must however be clearly shown to exist. In ordinary circumstances it must be taken that the scale which has now been made is the one to be usually adopted. I see nothing to distinguish this from the ordinary case, and must therefore refuse the application.

EMERY v. CICHERO; THE ARKLOW. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM THE VICE-ADMIRALTY COURT OF NEW BRUNSWICK.

Collision—Regulations for preventing Collisions at Sea—Infringement—Lights—Merchant Shipping Act 1873, s. 17.

The barque A. while sailing on the port tack sighted the barque B. on the port bow, showing no lights. Those on the A. thinking that the B. was heading the same way as the A. kept on, when suddenly it was seen that the B. was heading for the A., and although the helm of the A. was put hard-a-port, the vessels came into collision, the stem of the A. striking the starboard side of the B.

In an action for collision the Court held that the B. was carrying no lights, and that this being a breach of the regulations which might possibly have contributed to the collision, the C. was to blame; and further, that, having regard to the difficulty occasioned by the absence of the B.'s lights, there was no negligence on the part of the A. in not sooner taking steps to keep out of the way of the B.

THIS was an appeal by the defendants in a damage action from the judgment of the judge of the Vice-Admiralty Court of New Brunswick, finding the bargue Arklow alone to blame for the collision.

The collision took place in the Atlantic Ocean between the barques Bunin and Arklow, at about 2 a.m. on the 30th March 1881.

The case on behalf of the appellants, the owners of the Arklow, was that the Arklow was on the port tack, steering about E. by S., and having her regulation side lights burning brightly; that under these circumstances the Bunin was made out on the port bow of the Arklow, and having no lights visible, it was concluded she was going the same way as the Arklow, and that the Arklow was kept on her course, when suddenly it was seen that the Bunin was heading for the Arklow under a starboard helm, and, although the helm of the Arklow was put hard-a-port, the Bunin struck the Arklow, doing her damage. The appellants charged the Bunin with neglecting to display proper lights, and with improperly starboarding shortly before the collision.

The case on behalf of the respondent, who was the plaintiff in the court below, was that the Bunin was sailing close-hauled on the starboard tack with her regulation lights duly exhibited and burning brightly when the red light of the Arklow was seen on the starboard bow of the Bunin; and that the Arklow, although she was sailing free, failed to take any steps to keep out of the way of the Bunin, and came into collision with her, doing her so much damage that she was wholly lost. The respondent charged the Arklow with having improperly failed to keep out of the way of the Bunin.

The further facts of the case appear in their Lordships' judgment.

At the trial below the learned judge, who was assisted by nautical assessors, after finding that the Arklow was to blame, dealt as follows with the question of the lights of the Bunin: "I consider the point whether the Bunin carried proper lights left in so much doubt by the conflict of evidence that I am of opinion that the lights of the Bunin were not fairly visible to the Arklow, but I agree with the shipmasters that the omission of these lights is immaterial, as it clearly appears that the absence of lights did not contribute to or cause the collision."

From this decision the owners of the Arklow were now appealing and they submitted that it was wrong, and should be reversed for the following among other reasons:

1. Because the inability of the Arklow to see the Bunin's lights caused or contributed to the collision.

2. Because it was not and could not have been decided that the inability of the Arklow to see the Bunin's lights might not by possibility have caused or contributed to the collision.

3. Because the Bunin did not keep her course.

4. Because the learned judge has not decided whether the Bunin did or did not keep her course.

5. Because the learned judge has not considered the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Act 1873 in this behalf and has not himself decided or asked the assessors the question or found upon the points required by this Act.

6. Because upon the evidence before the court, a decree in favour of the plaintiff (the respondent) cannot be supported.

The respondent submitted that the decree appealed from should be confirmed for the following among other reasons:

1. That the collision and the losses and damage consequent thereon was solely due to the negligence of those on board the Arklow.

2. That the Arklow being on the port tack and having the wind free, did not keep out of the way of the Bunin, which was on the starboard tack and close hauled, in accordance with the 14th rule for Preventing Collisions at Sea.

3. That the evidence sufficiently established that the Bunin before and at the time of the collision was carrying her proper regulation lights.

4. That those on board the Arklow did not keep a proper and sufficient look out.

5. That no blame is to be attached to those on board the Bunin, and that she did not cause or contribute to the collision by neglect to carry proper lights or otherwise.

6. That the said decree was in accordance with the evidence.

Hall, Q.C. and Bucknill, on behalf of the owners of the Bunin, contra.

Nov. 21, 1883.—Their Lordships' judgment was delivered by Sir JAMES HANNEN.—The case presented on behalf of the Bunin, the complaining vessel below, was as follows: That on the 30th March 1881, as she was proceeding on a voyage from Havre to Baltimore, at two o'clock in the morning, the weather being dark but clear and the wind from the north-west, she was steering a course south-west by west half-west, close-hauled, on the starboard tack; that her lights were properly burning; and that she was proceeding at the rate of six and a half knots an hour when the red light of a ship, which proved to be the Arklow, was seen on the starboard bow; that she, the Bunin, kept her course; but that the Arklow, by some unaccountable mismanagement, as it is stated, ran into the Bunin, striking her about the fore rigging on the starboard side with her stem. On the other hand, for the Arklow, it was alleged that she was steering a course east by south half-south, the wind being in the north, when a vessel was seen a point and a half on her port bow showing no lights whatever; that she was thought to be going the same way as the Arklow, but that, after examination through the glass, and watching her for some appreciable time, it was discovered that she was approaching the Arklow under a starboard helm; that then the Arklow's helm was put hard aport and her after sails taken off. In confirmation of the statement that there were no lights visible upon the Bunin, it is alleged and stated by several witnesses that a green light was seen moving upon the Bunin just before the collision; and in confirmation of the statement that the Bunin did not keep her course, but approached under a starboard helm, it is stated that her spanker jibed from port to starboard—it is said, indeed, just before the collision. Now, in the circumstances alleged on the one side and on the other, it was undoubtedly the duty of the Bunin to keep her course, and it was primarily the duty of the Arklow to keep clear; but the Arklow alleges, by way of excusing herself for not having kept clear, that there was no light visible on the Bunin, and that it was therefore impossible to know in what direction she was sailing, and therefore impossible to take measures for the purpose of preventing the collision with her.

The first question of importance in the case is, whether or not the lights of the Bunin were burning for any serviceable purpose, On this point the learned judge in the court below, after consulting the assessors, says: "I consider the point whether the Bunin carried proper lights left in so much doubt by the conflict of evidence, that I am of opinion that the lights of the Bunin were not fairly visible to the Arklow;" and then he goes on to deal with the case upon that footing. The peculiar language which is used by the learned judge about their not being fairly visible may possibly have reference to the evidence which has been given that a green light was seen not in its proper place, but moving on the Bunin, immediately before the collision. Their Lordships agree in the view which was taken by the learned judge below upon this point that the lights of the Bunin were not in such a position as to be visible to those on board the Arklow, and that those on board the Bunin are responsible for that departure from the proper rules of navigation. Their Lordships arrive at this conclusion upon an examination of the evidence on the one side and on the other. It is very much to be regretted that the court below was obliged to rely solely upon affidavits which, from their language and general contents, it is pretty plain were drawn by somebody with a view to the supposed facts of the case, and were then laid before the witnesses for the purpose of getting their evidence, and leaving them, as it were, to take exception to anything which they found in those statements. Thus all the witnesses but one on behalf of the Bunin say, in general terms, that lights were burning according to the regulations, but there is only one of them who speaks to the fact of his having actually seen that the lights were burning at the time of the collision, and that is the witness Lazzarini, whose duty it appears to have been to light and trim the lamps, which he says he had done at eight o'clock. He does, indeed, say that when he was called on deck by hearing that something wrong had happened he did not see that the lights were burning. On the other hand, the witnesses for the Arklow all agree that there was no light visible on the Bunin; and they make that statement with certain particularity which impresses their Lordships in favour of their statements as against the general statements, with the exception mentioned, of those on board the Bunin. For instance, it is stated that, the vessel having been reported by the look-out man, and the mate and another of the crew who was with him having seen the vessel looming in the distance, the mate fetched the captain's glasses for the purpose of examining it more carefully. That is a particularity which cannot be disregarded, except on the supposition that the mate and the witness who confirms him are deliberately stating that which they must know to be false, and going much further than a mere assertion that they were doing their duty. In addition to that, there are several witnesses who say that they saw a green light moving on the vessel immediately before the collision as though the green light had, either for the purpose of being trimmed or from some other accident, not been in its place, but that when the vessels were found to be approaching one another the green light was being moved from one place to another. Their Lordships, therefore, come to the conclusion that the lights of the Bunin were not properly burning. But the learned judge below says that this question of the lights is immaterial when it appears that their absence did not cause the collision. On this part of the case their Lordships are unable to concur with the judgment of the learned judge below. The principle in cases of this kind, where there has been a departure from an important rule of navigation, is this, that if the absence of due observance of the rule can by any possibility have contributed to the accident, then that the party in default cannot be excused. (a) On this point their Lordships can entertain no doubt that the absence of proper lights must have occasioned an entire change in the course of events which followed upon the Bunin being visible to the Arklow. Without those lights the statement made by the witnesses on board the Arklow commends itself at once to credence, that they did not know in what direction this vessel was going, and that it took an appreciable time before a judgment could be formed upon that subject, during the whole of which time it must have remained a matter of pure chance whether it would be right to take one manœuvre or another. Their Lordships are therefore of opinion that the Bunin was clearly to blame, and that she was to blame in a matter which makes her responsible.

The only question that remains, therefore, is whether or not it has been shown that the Arklow was also to blame. It lies on the Bunin, which is shown to have been in default, to establish, to the satisfaction of the tribunal that has to determine it, that the Arklow was in fault. Now, on this part of the case it is to be observed that the time which has to be dealt with is very short. The vessels were approaching at a speed which would bring them together at the rate of a mile in five minutes. Reference has been made to the marginal note upon the diagram furnished by the Arklow, in which it is said that when first seen the Bunin was about six cables' distance, which would be a distance of 1200 yards. One of the witnesses for the Arklow says the Bunin was seen about four minutes before the collision. It is obvious that these statements as to time and distance cannot be dealt with as exact computations, but only indicate the rough conjectures which the witnesses were able to make at the time. But it is obvious that some space of time must have been occupied in fetching the glasses, which would diminish the period of time with which we are dealing. Secondly, it is stated, and no reason to doubt it is suggested, that the helm of the Arklow had been ported before the collision; that is to say, that a step had been taken for the purpose of avoiding the approaching danger: and Nilson, one of the witnesses, says that the Arklow had under her port helm come round two points, and that this had been done when it was seen that the Bunin was approaching under a starboard helm. It is clear, therefore, that we have but a very short space of time indeed during which the hesitation on the part of those on the Arklow was manifested as to what course they should take. Considering the difficulty occasioned by the absence of lights on board the Bunin, which prevented the possibility of seeing what course she was steering, their Lordships are of opinion that it has not been established that there was negligence on the part of those on board the Arklow in not sooner porting the helm, as it is clear she had to some extent done before the collision. Another point has been discussed, which was not dealt with in the court below, and that is whether or not the Bunin kept her course. Her witnesses allege that she did keep her course. On the part of the Arklow it is alleged that she came round under a starboard helm, and so came down upon the Arklow. In support of that statement it is alleged that she jibed; and it has been argued that credence ought not to be given to that statement because it is said the Arklow had gone off only to the extent of half a point, while it is represented that the Bunin had got round a great number of points—the exact number it is not necessary to specify, but so as to bring her head pointing south before it would be possible that she would jibe. It is to be observed, however, that the two periods of time that were referred to by Mr. Hall are not properly to be compared, because the evidence on the part of the Arklow is that it was discovered that the Bunin was, to use the expression of the witnesses, coming down upon them under a starboard helm, and that it was apparently which showed the direction which the Bunin was taking, and it was then, after that had been seen, that the helm of the Arklow was ported. There was, therefore, some time before the porting of the helm during which the starboarding of the helm of the Bunin had taken place. But, further than this, it is to be observed that where a collision of this kind occurs the exact succession or occurrence of events is not accurately noted by the witnesses, and it may well be that the jibing of the spanker, which is referred to by the witnesses as taking place immediately before the collision, may in fact have taken place at the time of the collision, and in consequence of the collision, by the head of the Bunin being driven sharply round. On the whole, their Lordships are of opinion that it has been established that the Bunin was to blame, and that it has not been established that the Arklow was to blame; and their Lordships will, therefore humbly advise Her Majesty that the decision of the court below should be reversed with costs.

(a) We notice that in the report of this case, both in the Law Reports (9 App. Cas. 136) and in the Law Journal (53 L. J. 9, Priv. Co.), this proposition is given as the head-note to the case. However, notwithstanding the generality of the words here used, it is to be presumed that the proposition only applies to the circumstances of the present case, that is, where the "departure from an important rule of navigation" is a departure from the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, referred to in sect. 17 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1873. In other words, by an important rule of navigation, their Lordships must mean a rule of navigation contained in any of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions. If the proposition is not meant to be so restricted in its application, the result would be that in many cases shipowners would be held liable for collisions where the accident was not occasioned by the negligence of their servants, and where there had been no breach of the regulations. Thus it is an important rule of navigation to have a good look-out. Yet it is possible to conceive that in many cases the court might find, as a fact, that the absence of the look-out did not contribute to the collision; but applying the words of the Privy Council in their strict sense, the party in default could not be excused, because the absence of due observance of this important rule of navigation might by possibility have contributed to the accident. The principle laid down by the Privy Council in cases where there has been a departure from the Regulations for Preventing Collisions is, that the party infringing the regulation is to be held to blame, unless he shows that the infringement could not, by any possibility, have contributed to the collision: (The Fanny M. Carvill, vol. 2, p. 565.) Having regard to the circumstances of the present case, in which the main issue was as to the exhibition of the lights required by the regulations, it is to be assumed that it was to this principle that their Lordships were referring.—ED.

UNION STEAMSHIP COMPANY OF NEW ZEALAND v. MELBOURNE HARBOUR COMMISSIONERS. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM THE SUPREME COURT OF THE COLONY OF VICTORIA.

Practice—Damage—Notice of action—Sufficiency—"Person"—Corporation.

Where a notice of action is required, the notice given should not be construed strictly, but a letter, which merely states that damage has been sustained for which the defendants will be held responsible, is not a notice of action.

Where harbour commissioners were constituted by Act of Parliament, and a section of the Act required notice of action to be given to "any person for anything done by him under this Act:"

Held (affirming the decision of the court below), that the fact that this section occurred in a part of the Act headed "Officers" could not be held to limit it to acts done by officers of the commissioners, but that the commissioners, as a body, were entitled to notice of action.

Eastern Counties Railway Company v. Marriage (9 H. L. Cas. 32; 3 L. T. Rep. N. S. 60) distinguished.

THIS was an appeal from a judgment of the Supreme Court of the colony of Victoria (Stawell, C.J., Williams and Holroyd, JJ.), overruling a demurrer to a plea of the respondents (the defendants below) and discharging a rule to show cause why a verdict entered for them should not be set aside, and a verdict entered for the plaintiffs pursuant to leave reserved.

(a) Reported by C. E. MALDEN, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The action was brought to recover damages for injuries sustained by the appellants' steamship Rotorua in consequence of the alleged negligence of the respondents.

The action was tried before Holroyd, J. and a jury, who found all the issues of fact in favour of the plaintiffs, the appellants, and assessed the damages at 5210*l.* 14*s.* 1*d.*, but the learned judge directed the verdict to be entered for the defendants on the ground that no notice of action had been given to them as required by sect. 46 of the Melbourne Harbour Trust Act 1876.

The facts of the case appear sufficiently from the judgments of their Lordships.

Macnaghten, Q.C., and J. D. Wood (H. Davey, Q.C. with them) appeared for the appellants, and contended that the letter of Oct. 21, 1881 (set out in the judgment) was a sufficient notice of action: See

Smith v. West Derby Local Board, 3 C. P. Div. 423; 38 L. T. Rep. N. S. 716;
Jones v. Bird, 5 B. & Ald. 837;
Jones v. Nicholls, 13 M. & W. 361; 14 L. J. 42, Ex.

Further, the section requiring notice does not refer to the commissioners themselves, but only to their officers; it is qualified by the preceding heading:

Eastern Counties Railway Company v. Marriage, 9 H. L. Cas. 32; 3 L. T. Rep. N. S. 60.

Webster, Q.C. and Malleson, who appeared for the respondents, were not called upon to address their Lordships.

At the conclusion of the argument for the appellants, their Lordships' judgment was delivered by

Sir ROBERT P. COLLIER.—The facts of this case, as far as they are material, may be shortly stated. The cause of action is that a vessel belonging to the plaintiffs, and going into Melbourne Harbour, fell foul of a cable attached to the anchor of a dredge which was in the middle of the stream, having been placed there by the defendants, and thereby sustained considerable damage. The declaration contained two counts, one alleging negligence on the part of the defendants in mooring the dredge where they did, and the second complaining that they had not given notice whereby the danger might have been avoided. To this declaration there were many pleas by the defendants, denying their liability, and also denying most of the allegations in the declaration; and there was a further plea, in these terms: "And for an eighth plea to the said declaration, the defendants say that the alleged grievances were committed by the defendants after the passing of the Melbourne Harbour Trust Act 1876, and were committed by the defendants under and by virtue of the said Act; and no notice in writing of the intention to sue out the writ in this action was delivered to the defendants or left at their usual place of abode one month before the suing out of the said writ, pursuant to the said Act." The plaintiffs demurred to that plea, and also joined issue upon all the allegations contained in it. Upon the case going down for trial the jury found all the questions which may be said to relate to the merits of the case in favour of the plaintiffs; but the judge, nevertheless, thought that a verdict should be entered for the defendants upon this plea. The jury therefore, by his direction, assessed damages contingently; and leave was given to the plaintiffs to move to enter a verdict for them for the amount of those damages. That rule, coming before the Supreme Court, was discharged, and judgment was entered for the defendants. Against that judgment the present appeal is brought.

The argument upon this appeal has been restricted to two questions, with which alone their Lordships propose to deal. The first question was whether assuming a notice of action to be necessary, one was given; and, secondly, whether a notice of action was necessary. The 46th section of the Melbourne Harbour Trust Act is in these terms: "All actions to be brought against any person for anything done under this Act shall be commenced within six months after the act complained of was committed, and no writ shall be sued out against nor any copy of any process served upon any person for anything done by him under this Act until notice in writing of such intended writ or process shall have been delivered to him or left at his usual place of abode by the agent or attorney of the party who intends to cause the same to be sued out, or served at least one month before the suing out or serving the same. Such notice shall clearly and explicitly set forth the nature of the intended action and cause thereof, and on such notice shall be indorsed the name and place of abode of the party intending to bring such action, and the name and place of business of his attorney or agent." Then it goes on to say that the defendant may plead the general issue, and that he may tender evidence. It is contended that a letter written by Messrs. McMeckan, Blackwood, and Co., agents of the plaintiffs, on the day after the accident occurred, is a sufficient notice of action under this Act. The letter is as follows:—"Union Steamship Company of New Zealand Limited, Melbourne, 21st October 1881. The Secretary, Melbourne Harbour Trust Commissioners.—Sir, we have the honour to bring under your notice a very serious accident that happened to Rotorua steamer, owned by this company. When coming up the river yesterday morning, and close to the Junction Point, and a little way below the Platypus, she struck the chain of that dredge, it being laid in mid-channel. The damage sustained is of an extensive character." Then the damage is specified. "The surveyors are now surveying, and may yet discover further damage. Possibly you may desire to send some of your officers to view the extent of the mischief, all of which we must hold the commissioners responsible for." It appears to their Lordships that the court below were right in holding that this was not a notice of action in compliance with the statute. It was clearly not intended to be. It does not give notice of any intended writ or process whatever; it does not clearly and explicitly set forth the cause or nature of the action; it does not give the name or place of business of the attorney or agent who is to bring the action. It appears to want all the necessary characteristics of a notice of action as prescribed by the statute. Some cases have been quoted for the purpose of showing that notices of action are not to be construed with extreme strictness, a rule to which their Lordships subscribe. Cases have been quoted in which notices of action have been upheld which would have been bad upon special demurrer, or perhaps upon general demurrer; but those cases have no bearing on the present, where the notice of action is not, in form or substance, a compliance with the Act.

The question which remains is whether or not the defendants are entitled to a notice of action. "In the construction and for the purposes of this Act the following terms shall, if not inconsistent with the context or subject-matter, have the respective meanings hereby assigned to them." Then come these words: "Person shall include a corporation." It, therefore, lies upon the counsel for the plaintiffs to show that to hold that a person in sect. 46 includes a corporation is inconsistent with the context or subject-matter. The argument to this effect is that sect. 2 declares the Act to be divided into parts, and part 2 is headed "Officers"; that when we come to part 2, in sect. 33 we find the heading "Officers" and a number of sections grouped together under that heading; that, therefore, the word "person" in sect. 46 must be confined to "officers." The case in the House of Lords, of The Eastern Counties and London and Blackwall Railways v. Marriage (9 H. L. Cas. 32), has been cited as an authority for this argument on the part of the plaintiffs. It should be observed as to that case, which dealt with the construction of the Lands Clauses Act, that in that Act were several headings so drawn as to be applicable grammatically to the sections which followed them. The heading then in question was this: "And with respect to small portions of intersected land, be it enacted as follows." Then came two sections: first, the 93rd, relating to lands not being situated in a town; and then the 94th, beginning with "If such land shall be so cut through and divided." It was held by the House of Lords that "such land" referred, not to land mentioned in sect. 93, but referred back to the heading before sect. 93; namely, "with respect to small portions of intersected land, be it enacted as follows." That case appears to their Lordships to have no application to the present. Here the heading "Officers" is not such a heading as could be grammatically read into any of the sections which follow. It seems to their Lordships to have been inserted for the purpose of convenience of reference, and not intended to control the interpretation of the clauses which follow. It may be, indeed, that the fact of a clause being found in a certain group may in some cases possibly throw some light upon its meaning; but it appears to their Lordships that the construction contended for on the part of the plaintiffs that the term "officers" controls the meaning of the word "person" in sect. 46, applying it solely to officers and negativing its application to a corporation is untenable. If we examine the clauses which follow under the head of "Officers," we find that they do not relate solely to officers or to their powers or to their duties. The very first section which follows this heading (sect. 33) gives to the commissioners power "from time to time to appoint a secretary, treasurer, and clerk, and appoint or employ such engineers, surveyors, collectors, and other officers, servants, and persons to assist in the execution of this Act as the commissioners shall think necessary or proper." This section, therefore, under the heading "Officers," confers not merely powers upon officers, but a most important power upon the commissioners; a power without which they would be unable to act, for a corporation can only act through its officers. There are further provisions in sect. 40, enabling them to appoint a harbour-master and so on. It appears to their Lordships that, powers having been given to the commissioners under these sections to appoint officers, and they being capable only of acting through their officers, it was a very proper and convenient place to insert a section which determined under what circumstances actions should be brought against them in respect of the acts of their officers. Accordingly, sect. 46 appears to their Lordships to be quite in its proper place, putting the interpretation upon it that it refers to actions brought not only against officers for anything done under the Act, but against the commissioners themselves for anything done by their officers on their behalf; and all reasoning and probability would point to this having been the intention of the Legislature. It would be almost impossible to give any good reason why officers should be entitled to a notice of action, and the commissioners not; or why officers should be entitled to tender amends, and the commissioners should not. Their Lordships will humbly advise Her Majesty that the judgment of the court appealed against be affirmed, and that this appeal be dismissed. The appellants must pay the costs of the appeal.

LAWS AND OTHERS v. SMITH; THE RIO TINTO. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM THE VICE-ADMIRALTY COURT OF GIBRALTAR.

Necessaries — Material men — Maritime lien — British ship—3 & 4 Vict. c. 65—Admiralty Court Act 1861—Vice-Admiralty Courts Act 1863 (26 Vict. c. 24), s. 10.

Material men supplying necessaries to a British ship in a possession in which a Vice-Admiralty court is established, do not, under the Vice-Admiralty Courts Act 1861, s. 10, sub-sect. 10 acquire a maritime lien, and the ship when in the hands of subsequent purchasers for value without notice of the debt cannot be made chargeable with the necessaries.

THIS was an appeal by the defendants in a necessaries action from a judgment of the Vice-Admiralty Court of Gibraltar of the 2nd Feb. 1883, whereby the appellants and their bail were condemned in the sum of 312*l.* 0*s.* 9*d.* and costs.

The action was instituted by the respondent, W. J. S. Smith, on the 27th Dec. 1881, against the owners of the British steamship Rio Tinto to recover the price of certain necessaries supplied to the vessel at Gibraltar.

During the years 1879 and 1880 the Rio Tinto was on four occasions at Gibraltar, and there supplied with coals and other necessaries by W. J. S. Smith, the respondent, the date of the first supply being the 18th Oct. 1879, and the date of the last the 10th July 1880.

At the time when these necessaries were supplied the owner and master of the Rio Tinto was James Hough. On the 17th Sept. 1880 Hough sold the Rio Tinto "free from incumbrances," to one Henry James Baldwin, and on the 14th Oct. 1881 Henry James Baldwin sold her to the present appellants by bill of sale containing a covenant that the vessel was "free from incumbrances."

After the last supply of coals on the 10th July 1880 the Rio Tinto did not return to Gibraltar until the 27th Dec. 1881, when she was arrested in the present suit.

The learned judge of the Vice-Admiralty Court gave judgment on the 2nd Feb. 1883 in favour of the respondent (the plaintiff below), treating his right as a maritime lien, and holding therefore that it survived the transfer of the vessel to the appellants. He further held that in the circumstances the respondent used all due diligence in asserting his lien.

From this judgment the owners of the Rio Tinto appealed, and it was submitted on their behalf that the judgment was wrong, and should be reversed for the following among other reasons:

1. Because there was no maritime lien and no right to seize the vessel in the hands of innocent purchasers for value.
2. Because the title of the appellants as purchasers for value prevailed over any title of the respondent.
3. Because, assuming there was a maritime lien, the respondent did not use diligence in asserting it.

In the case on behalf of the respondent it was submitted that the judgment below was correct and ought to be affirmed for the following among other reasons:

1. That the coals were supplied and the disbursements made by the respondent, and not by the respondent as agent for Lambert Brothers.
2. That the coals were supplied and the disbursements made on the credit of the vessel and not on the credit of Captain Hough.
3. That the case is within the meaning and purport of 26 Vict. c. 24 as regards "necessaries."
4. That the lien of the respondent was not forfeited by any laches.

Cohen, Q.C. and Dr. Phillimore for the appellants, the owners of the Rio Tinto.—It is submitted that the Vice-Admiralty Courts Act 1863, s. 10, sub-sect. 10, which gave the Vice-Admiralty Courts jurisdiction in respect of necessaries, created no maritime lien. If so, the Rio Tinto, being in the hands of purchasers for value without notice of any incumbrance, cannot be made liable. It may be argued by the respondents that the Vice-Admiralty Courts Act 1863, s. 10, sub-sect. 10 is in pari materiâ with 3 & 4 Vict. c. 65, s. 6, which gave the High Court of Admiralty jurisdiction over claims for necessaries supplied in England to foreign ships. On the construction of this latter Act it has been held that a maritime lien is created by it in the case of necessaries supplied to foreign ships:

The West Friesland, Swa. 454;
The Ella A. Clark, 1 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 325; 8 L. T. Rep. N. S. 119; Br. & Lush. 32;
The Two Ellens, 1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 208; 26 L. T. Rep. N. S. 1; L. Rep. 4 P. C. 161.

It is true that in both Acts the words are the court "shall have jurisdiction." But the reason given by the courts for holding that 3 & 4 Vict.

(a) Reported by J. P. ASPINALL and F. W. RAIKES, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

c. 65 gives a maritime lien is not the use of the words "the High Court of Admiralty shall have jurisdiction," but it is the fact that the Legislature, after saying the court shall have jurisdiction in the case of salvage and collision, places necessaries next. By so doing the Legislature strongly indicates that, as there is a maritime lien in the case of salvage and collision, there is also to be one in the case of necessaries supplied to foreign ships. That reason does not exist in the Vice-Admiralty Courts Act 1863. The particular sub-section (10) conferring jurisdiction in respect of necessaries immediately follows one conferring jurisdiction in respect of disputes between co-owners, in which case it cannot be maintained for a moment that a maritime lien is given. Moreover, 3 & 4 Vict. c. 65 applied to foreign ships, in which case there were peculiar reasons for deciding that a maritime lien was created by the statute. In the present case the ship proceeded against is British, and those reasons are therefore wanting. Notwithstanding the dictum in The Bold Buccleugh (7 Moo. P. C. 267), that "in all cases where a proceeding in rem is the proper course there a maritime lien exists," the words "shall have jurisdiction" are not in themselves sufficient to create a maritime lien. The Bold Buccleugh was, moreovor, a damage case, and the proposition quoted is but a dictum. Moreover, subsequent decisions have limited the comprehensive language of that dictum:

The Gustaf, 1 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 230; Lush. 506; L. T. Rep. N. S. 660;
The Two Ellens (ubi sup.);
The Pacific, 2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 21; 10 L. T. Rep. N. S. 541; Br. & Lush. 243;
The Mary Ann, 2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 294; 13 L. T. Rep. N. S. 384; L. Rep. 1 Ad. & Ec. 8.

For instance, both mortgagees and material men can proceed in rem against a British ship, and yet in neither case is there a maritime lien. The fact is that the Vice Admiralty Courts Act 1863, s. 10, sub-sect. 10, is in pari materiâ with the Admiralty Court Act 1861, s. 5. No maritime lien is created by sect. 5 of the Admiralty Court Act 1861, and so with the Vice-Admiralty Courts Act, which was passed only two years later. If not, Vice-Admiralty courts would have greater jurisdiction than the High Court, which is improbable. It is to be noticed that the only Vice-Admiralty court in which the action can be instituted is the Vice-Admiralty Court which is in the possession where the necessaries were supplied. This limitation is incompatible with the essential characteristics of a maritime lien, which should be capable of being enforced by all courts of competent jurisdiction. Even assuming that a maritime lien exists, the respondent has lost it by laches:

The Bold Buccleugh (ubi sup.);
The Europa, 1 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 337; 8 L. T. Rep. N. S. 368; Br. & Lush. 89;
The Charles Amelia, 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 203; 19 L. T. Rep. N. S. 429; L. Rep. 2 Ad. & Ec. 330.

Meadows White, Q.C. and Bigham, Q.C. for the respondent. — It is submitted that the Vice-Admiralty Courts Act 1863 has conferred the same jurisdiction within the limits of sect. 10, sub-sect. 10, as the High Court of Admiralty was given in the case of necessaries supplied to foreign ships. The wording of the two Acts is similar, and if the one creates a maritime lien so does the other. Moreover, the reasons why a maritime lien should exist in the case of foreign ships supplied with necessaries in England also exist here. The Rio Tinto, quâ Gibraltar, was a foreign ship. It is also to be noted that sub-sect. 10, sect. 10 of the Vice-Admiralty Courts Act 1863 speaks of necessaries supplied to "any ship," making no distinction between British and foreign ships. The conclusion to be drawn from this is that, inasmuch as there should undoubtedly be a maritime lien in the case of foreign ships, the Legislature, by drawing no distinction, indicates that a maritime lien is given in the case of British ships which, as pointed out before, are in many cases foreign, quâ the possession. And should it be laid down that no maritime lien is created by the statute in the present case—which is that of a British ship—the Court cannot, in subsequent cases, decide otherwise in the case of foreign ships, which will give rise to palpable hardships. Notwithstanding what has been said adverse to the proposition in The Bold Buccleugh (ubi sup.), yet where a proceeding in rem is given, in the absence of strong reasons to the contrary, a maritime lien is created:

The Alexander, 1 W. Rob. 288; 1 N. of Cas. 188.

The chief reason for deciding in The Two Ellens (ubi sup.) that the Admiralty Court Act 1861, s. 5, does not create a maritime lien in the case of necessaries supplied to a colonial vessel in England does not exist here. According to the wording of the Admiralty Court Act 1861 jurisdiction is only given over necessaries, provided that, at the time of the institution of the suit, no owner is domiciled in England or Wales; and hence, if there were a maritime lien, it would be liable to be extinguished or revived by the domicile of the owners at the institution of the suit. That objection does not exist in the case of the Vice-Admiralty Courts Act 1863, s. 10, sub-sect. 10. The reason why the suit must be instituted in the Vice-Admiralty Court in the possession in which the goods are supplied is merely one of expediency and in no way inconsistent with the creation of a maritime lien. The reason is the saving of expense which would be caused by bringing witnesses from a distance to any Vice-Admiralty Court in which the plaintiff might choose to sue. As to the question of laches, there has been no such delay as should take away the lien.

Dr. Phillimore, in reply, referred to 30 & 31 Vict. c. 114, s. 31, and argued that if a maritime lien was created by the Vice-Admiralty Courts Act, it was also created by 30 & 31 Vict. c. 114, which gave jurisdiction to the Court of Admiralty in Ireland over necessaries.

3 & 4 Vict. c. 65, s. 6:

Be it enacted that the High Court of Admiralty shall have jurisdiction to decide all claims and demands whatsoever in the nature of salvage for services rendered to, or damage received by, any ship or sea-going vessel, or in the nature of towage, or for necessaries supplied to any foreign ship or sea-going vessel, and to enforce payment thereof, whether such ship or vessel may have been within the body of a county or upon the high seas at the time when the services were rendered or damage received, or necessaries furnished in respect of which such claim is made.

The Admiralty Court Act 1861, sect. 5:

The High Court of Admiralty shall have jurisdiction over any claim for necessaries supplied to any ship elsewhere than in the port to which the ship belongs, unless it is shown to the satisfaction of the court that, at the time of the institution of the cause, any owner, or part owner of the ship is domiciled in England or Wales.

The Vice-Admiralty Courts Act 1863, sect. 10:

The matters in respect of which the Vice-Admiralty Courts shall have jurisdictions are as follows: (9) Claims between the owners of any ships registered in the possession in which the court is established, touching the ownership, possession, employment, or earnings of such ship; (10) claims for necessaries supplied in the possession in which the court is established to any ship of which no owner, or part owner, is domiciled within the possession at the time of the necessaries being supplied.

The Court of Admiralty (Ireland) Act 1867, sect. 31:

The Court of Admiralty shall have jurisdiction over any claim for necessaries supplied to any ship elsewhere than in the port to which the ship belongs.

Cur. adv. vult.

Feb. 9.—Their Lordships' judgment was delivered by Sir JAMES HANNEN.—The Rio Tinto, a British steamer, of which George Hough was owner and master, was, in the year 1879, engaged in the Mediterranean trade. In October of that year she put into Gibraltar, and, being in want of coal, obtained from a firm there, trading under the style of the London Coal Company, of which the respondent, W. J. Smith, was the managing partner, a supply to the amount of 72*l.* 10*s.* 9*d.*, and, on subsequent occasions, obtained further supplies, as follows: 1879, Nov. 13th, 107*l.* 11*s.* 8*d.*; 1880, May 6th, 132*l.* 14*s.* 11*d.*; July 10th, 56*l.* 6*s.* 1*d.* In August 1880 she again required coals, but, as the previous quantities had not been paid for, the agent of the London Coal Company refused to furnish more, but ultimately did so to the extent of 67*l.* 1*s.* 5*d.*, upon a guarantee for that amount being given by the ship's broker in London. This sum was afterwards paid. The Rio Tinto did not again put into Gibraltar while Hough remained owner or master. On the 17th Sept. 1880, Hough sold the vessel to one Baldwin, who, on the 14th Oct. sold it to the appellants. Both Baldwin and the appellants purchased without notice of any claim against the vessel in respect of the coals supplied by the respondent's firm. On the 27th Dec. 1881 the Rio Tinto again put into Gibraltar, when she was arrested in the Vice-Admiralty Court of that place at the suit of the respondent for the coals supplied in October and November 1879 and May and July 1880. At the hearing af the cause in February 1883 the learned judge of the Vice-Admiralty Court pronounced for the claim of the respondent for the coals as necessaries, holding that this claim created a maritime lien which attached to the ship from the time of the supply, into whosesoever possession she might come, and could be enforced in the Vice-Admiralty Court as against a subsequent purchaser withont notice, and he further held that the respondent had not by laches on his part lost the right to enforce his claim.

Several questions were raised by the appellants in the court below, which have been abandoned before their Lordships. It is not now disputed that the coals were supplied by the respondent on the credit of the owners, and it is admitted that the coals were necessaries; but it is contended (1) that no maritime lien attached to the ship, and (2) that if it did, it was lost by laches. The case, in so far as it affects the jurisdiction of Vice-Admiralty Courts, is of considerable importance, and as the decisions bearing on the subject are not uniform it may be advisable to review them with some minuteness. It was long ago decided in the courts of common law, and finally held by this tribunal, in the case of The Neptune (3 Knapp, 94), that material men never had any lien on the ship itself in respect of supplies furnished in England, and the language of Lord Tenterden in his treatise on shipping was adopted as correct. "A tradesman who has furnished ropes, sails, provisions, or other necessaries for a ship is not, by the law of England, preferred to other creditors, nor has he any particular claim or lien upon the ship itself for the recovery of his demands," and the reason of this, as the learned author states in an earlier passage, is because the law of England never had adopted the rule of the civil law with regard to necessaries furnished here in England. It has also been held by this tribunal that Vice-Admiralty Courts had not (apart from statute) more than the ordinary Admiralty jurisdiction, "that is, the jurisdiction possessed by Courts of Admiralty antecedent to the passing of the statute 3 & 4 Vict. c. 65, which enlarged it." It follows, therefore, that (apart from statute) a Vice-Admiralty Court had not jurisdiction to enforce any claim by way of maritime lien on the ship itself for necessaries supplied in the circumstances of this case. But it is contended for the respondent that such jurisdiction has now been conferred by the 10th section of the Vice-Admiralty Act 1863 (26 Vict. c. 24), subsect. 10, by which jurisdiction is given in respect of "claims for necessaries supplied in the possession in which the court is established to any ship of which no owner or part owner is domiciled within the possession at the time of the necessaries being supplied."

Before considering the effect of this subsection, it is necessary to examine some previous kindred enactments, and the first of these is the 3 & 4 Vict. c. 65, s. 6: "the High Court of Admiralty shall have jurisdiction to decide all claims and demands whatsoever in the nature of salvage for services rendered to or damage received by any ship or sea-going vessel, or in the nature of towage, or for necessaries supplied to any foreign ship or sea-going vessel, and to enforce the payment thereof, whether such ship or vessel may have been within the body of a county or upon the high seas at the time when the services were rendered, or damage received, or necessaries furnished, in respect of which such claim is made." The effect of this enactment first came under consideration in The Alexander (1 W. Rob. 288; 1 Notes of Cas. 188). The necessaries were supplied to a foreign ship prior to the passing of the Act. Proceedings were subsequently taken under the 6th section, and it was held that the court had jurisdiction. Some remarks of Dr. Lushington have a bearing on the present question; he says: "In the first place the statute does not create a lien at all," and, after reading the section, he proceeds, "the court shall have jurisdiction; it simply gives the court jurisdiction in any and every lawful mode which the court has the power of exercising. I wish to draw attention particularly to the fact that no lien whatever is established by the Act." The next case to which it is necessary to call attention is The Bold Buccleugh (7 Moo. P. C. 267). That was an action for damage done by a Scotch steamer to an English vessel in the Humber. The vessel was arrested at Hull, after sale to a purchaser without notice of the claim against her in respect of the damage, and it was held by this tribunal that damage creates a maritime lien on the ship causing the damage, and that such lien travels with the thing into whosesoever possession it may come, and when carried into effect by a proceeding in rem, relates back to the period when it first attached. It is to be observed that this was a suit for damage, as to which there is now no doubt that it creates a maritime lien. Upon this point their Lordships remark: "But it is further said that the damage confers no lien upon the ship, and a dictum of Dr. Lushington, in the case of The Volant (1 W. Rob. 387) is cited as an authority for this proposition. By reference to a contemporaneous report of the same case (1 Notes of Cas. 508), it seems doubtful whether the learned judge did use the expression attributed to him by Dr. W. Robinson. If he did, the expression is certainly inaccurate, and being a dictum merely, not necessary for the decision of the case, cannot be taken as a binding authority." The decision, therefore, in The Bold Buccleugh that damage confers a maritime lien, valid against a subsequent purchaser without notice, and that this lien may be enforced under the 6th section of the 3 & 4 Vict. c. 65, does not govern the present case, where the question is whether the mere conferring upon Vice-Admiralty Courts jurisdiction over claims for necessaries in certain cases carries with it the creation of a maritime lien for such necessaries. Some passages, however, in the judgment in The Bold Buccleugh appear to have led Dr. Lushington to the conclusion that he was bound by that decision to hold that the 6th section of the 3 & 4 Vict. c. 65 did create a maritime lien in the case of necessaries as well as in the case of damage. In The West Friesland (Swa. 454) he held that coals supplied to a foreign steamship were necessaries, and that they created a lien under 3 & 4 Vict. c. 65, s. 6, which continued notwithstanding the sale of the ship, if there were no laches. And in The Ella A. Clarke (Br. & L. 32; 32 L. J. 211, P. M. & A.), the same learned judge held that a claim for necessaries supplied to a foreign ship might be enforced by proceedings in rem under the 6th section, notwithstanding a subsequent and bonâ fide transfer to a British owner and he says (p. 36): "It is true that in The Alexander I am reported to have said that the Act of 3 & 4 Vict. did not create a lien, though it gave a remedy against the ship. I intended to state that there might be a distinction between a provision for proceedings by arrest of the ship and the express creation of a lien, and to leave all such questions open. The case of The Bold Buccleugh, however, renders the discussion of this question useless."

With regard to these cases, their Lordships have only to repeat what was said of them in the judgment of this tribunal in the case of The Two Ellens (1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 108; L. Rep. 3 A. & E. 345; L. Rep. 4 P. C. 161): "These decisions may be supported upon the ground that though it is perfectly true that the only words used in the section are 'that the High Court of Admiralty shall have jurisdiction' (which words seem hardly sufficie t in themselves to create a maritime lien), yet, looking at the subject-matter to which that section relates, it appears designed to enlarge the jurisdiction which the Court of Admiralty already had in matters forming the subject of maritime lien. There are strong grounds for holding that as respects salvage and as respects collisions, which already gave a maritime lien when they occurred on the high seas, it was intended that they should also when they occurred in the body of a county equally give a maritime lien, and that being so as to salvage and collision it might well be said that necessaries immediately following, it was intended that the same rule should apply in the case of necessaries." In the present case, however, it will be found that the creation of the alleged maritime lien is made to depend solely on the words "the High Court of Admiralty shall have jurisdiction," which, as their Lordships in The Two Ellens pointed out, are not sufficient in themselves to create a maritime lien.

The Admiralty Court Act 1861 (24 Vict. c. 10), and the decisions upon it, must next be considered. By the 5th section, it is enacted that the High Court shall have jurisdiction over any claim for necessaries supplied to any ship elsewhere than in the port to which the ship belongs, unless it is shown to the satisfaction of the court that, at the time of the institution of the cause, any owner or part owner of the ship is domiciled in England or Wales. Dr. Lushington was at first disposed to hold, on the supposed authority of The Bold Buccleugh, that this section gave material men a maritime lien (The Skepwith, 10 Jur. N. S. 445; 2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 20), but he afterwards in The Pacific (Br. & L. 243) gave a considered judgment to the effect that the 5th section of the Act of 1861 confers no maritime lien on the material men, but only the right to sue the ship. In The Mary Ann (L. Rep. 1 Ad. & Ec. 8) he developed his views on the subject more fully. He there says (p. 11): "There is a clear distinction between a maritime lien and a claim the payment of which the court has power to enforce from the ship and freight. A maritime lien springs into existence the moment the circumstances give birth to it, as damage, salvage, and wages; but it does not follow that because a claim may by Act of Parliament be enforceable against the parties that, therefore, it created a maritime lien. Besides, looking at the whole Act, it is impossible to maintain that a maritime lien is created by every one of the numerous sections which commence with the words, 'The High Court of Admiralty shall have jurisdiction.' In some of the sections these words are accompanied by a proviso incompatible with a maritime lien, as is pointed out by Mr. Maclachlan in reference to the 4th section, and as the court has held with regard to the 5th section in the case of The Pacific. So, also, it could hardly be argued that it was intended to create a maritime lien by the 8th section, in favour of co-owners, or by the 11th section in favour of mortgagees. In my opinion the words 'the High Court of Admiralty shall have jurisdiction' mean only what they purport to say, neither more nor less, that is that the court shall take judicial cognisance of the cases provided for. By themselves the words leave open the question whether or not a maritime lien is created. The answer to this question depends on other considerations." It appears to their Lordships that this reasoning, which was adopted by this tribunal in the case of The Two Ellens, is applicable to the question now under consideration. The 10th section of the Vice-Admiralty Act 1863 is divided into eleven sub-sections. The 10th, relating to necessaries, is immediately preceded by one relating to claims between owners, as to which it cannot be supposed that it was intended to confer a maritime lien, yet the two sub-sections are equally governed by the same introductory words: "The matters in respect of which the Vice-Admiralty Courts shall have jurisdiction are as follows." It has been argued that a different construction to that which the 5th section of the Admiralty Act 1863 has received, should be put on the 10th sub-section of the 10th section of the Vice-Admiralty Act 1863, because by the latter the jurisdiction is made to depend on there being no owner domiciled in the possession at the time of the necessaries being supplied. But in the absence of a domiciled owner credit is probably given to the ship, and there is, therefore, in such a case reason for giving the Vice-Admiralty Court of the place jurisdiction, which would include the power to proceed in rem, but it does not suggest a reason why the fresh incident of a maritime lien should attach from the time of the supply—a lien which is to travel with the ship into whosesoever hands she may pass, yet only capable of being enforced at one place. Their Lordships are thus led to the conclusion that there is nothing from which it can be inferred that by the use of the words "the court shall have jurisdiction" the Legislature intended to create a maritime lien with respect to necessaries supplied within the possession. Adopting this view, it becomes unnecessary to determine whether or not, if such a lien had existed, it was lost by any laches on the part of the respondent. Their Lordships will humbly advise Her Majesty that the judgment of the Vice-Admiralty Court be reversed, with the costs of this appeal and the costs in the courts below.

Spiller v. The Bristol Steam Navigation Company. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION.

Practice—Third Party—Indemnity—Order XVI., r. 48*—Damage to cargo.*

Where a defendant claims to be entitled to indemnity over against a person not a party to the action leave will not be given under Order XVI., r. 48, to serve a third-party notice unless the claim is on a contract of indemnity.

An owner of cargo sued the charterers of the ship for damage to the cargo. Defendants applied for leave to serve a third-party notice on the ship-owner, alleging that the damage to cargo was caused by a breach of warranty of seaworthiness contained in the charter-party.

Held (affirming the order of Grove, J. and Huddleston, B.), that, as no contract of indemnity was shown, leave must be refused.

Pontifex v. Foord (49 L. T. Rep. N. S. 808; 12 Q. B. Div. 152) approved.

This was an action brought to recover damages for injury alleged to have been caused to certain sugar belonging to the plaintiff while it was being conveyed on a voyage from Amsterdam to Bristol, on board the steamship Dale, of which the defendants were charterers.

It was suggested on the part of the defendants that the damage, if any, was caused by the breach of a warranty of seaworthiness alleged to be contained in the charter-party by which they hired the ship from the shipowner, who was named Aitken, and was resident in Scotland.

Bucknill for the defendants.—If the ship was unseaworthy, as alleged in the statement of claim, the defendants have a right to be indemnified by Aitken, who is the owner of the ship, and who had given an undertaking to keep the vessel seaworthy during the time of the charter. I make this application under Order XI., r. 1, sub-sect. (g) (a). In the case of Lenders v. Anderson (12 Q. B. Div. 50) it was decided that there was no power to grant leave to serve a writ where the defendant is domiciled and ordinarily resident in Scotland or Ireland, but that decision was upon sub-sect. (e) of the same rule. The words of sub-sect. (g) are wide enough to include this case. [Huddleston, B.—Why should a person be brought in as a third party when he could not be made a defendant?] He need not appear, if he is served with a notice. [Huddleston, B.—But if he does not he admits the validity of the judgment, and his own liability to indemnify.] He may not be a "necessary party," but I submit he is a "proper party" to the action within the meaning of the rule. [Grove, J.—I do not read the words "proper party" in the sense of a person against whom the defendant has a right of action, but a "proper party" to the action by the plaintiff.] If the defendant is liable to the plaintiff by reason of the unseaworthiness of the ship he clearly has a right of action against Aitken, who is a proper party to the action because he is bound to indemnify the defendant.

Grove, J.—This case is not free from difficulty, but I think we should be arriving at a very extravagant conclusion if we decided that, although a person domiciled in Scotland cannot be served with a writ of summons, he may be served with a third-party notice, and so be brought in as a party to the action. Supposing the case stands as it is, the defendant has a remedy against Aitken. Before the Judicature Act there would have been (a) Order XI., r. 1; "Service out of the jurisdiction of a writ of summons or notice of a writ of summons may be allowed by the court or a judge whenever:

(a) Reported by P. B. Hutchins, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

"(g) Any person out of the jurisdiction is a necessary or proper party to an action properly brought against some other person duly served within the jurisdiction."

two separate actions, and of course there may be now. Aitken cannot be made a defendant because he is domiciled in Scotland, but if Mr. Bucknill's contention is right he may be made a third party and be bound by the judgment if he does not appear and defend the action. This seems to be a very extraordinary proposition, and would get rid of the decision in Lenders v. Anderson (ubi sup.). In my opinion the words "proper party to an action," in Order XI., r. 1, sub-sect. (g), do not mean any person who may be brought in as a third party for collateral purposes, but any person against whom the action may be properly brought. Aitken is not a defendant, although the verdict may bind him if he is brought in as a third party, and I do not think he is "a necessary or proper party to the action," within the meaning of the rule. By granting this application we should virtually contravene the spirit of the Act in allowing a Scotchman or Irishman to be brought to England in an action to which he was not an immediate party, while a defendant liable could not be brought. Therefore this appeal must be dismissed.

Huddleston, B.—I am of the same opinion. The only power to allow the service of a writ out of the jurisdiction is now derived from the Judicature Acts. The Court of Chancery formerly had jurisdiction to grant leave to serve a writ out of the jurisdiction in all cases which the court thought proper; but it was decided by the late Master of the Rolls in Eager v. Johnstone (47 L. T. Rep. N. S. 685; 22 Ch. Div. 86) that the old practice as to service out of the jurisdiction is no longer in force, and that no leave to serve a defendant out of the jurisdiction can be given except in the cases specified in Order XI., r. 1. In the case of Lenders v. Anderson we decided that there is no power to allow service of a writ out of the jurisdiction in actions for breach of contract under Order XI., r. 1, sub-sect. (e), where the defendant is domiciled or ordinarily resident in Scotland or Ireland, but Mr Bucknill says that a person may nevertheless be served with a third-party notice under Order XVI., rr. 48 and 49. If this argument is right it can only be under sub-sect. (g) of Order XI., r. 1, and therefore we must look at the words of that rule. Service of a writ of summons may he allowed where any person out of the jurisdiction is "a necessary or proper party to the action." Is Aitken "a necessary or proper party?" He is clearly not a necessary party, and I think he is not a proper party. If he is served with a notice he must either come in and dispute the plaintiff's claim in the action against the defendant, or in default of his so doing he shall be deemed to admit the validity of the judgment against the defendant, and his own liability to contribute or indemnify as the case may be. I am of opinion that Order XI., r. 1, sub-sect. (g), does not apply to third-party procedure, and I think that it is not applicable to a third party domiciled or ordinarily resident in Scotland or Ireland.

From these judgments the defendants appealed.

By Order XVI., r. 48:

Where a defendant claims to be entitled to contribution or indemnity over against any person not a party to the action, he may by leave of the court or a judge issue a notice (hereinafter called the third party notice) to that effect, stamped with the seal with which writs of summons are sealed. A copy of such notice shall be filed with the proper officer and served on such person according to the rules relating to the service of writs of summons.

Service out of the jurisdiction is provided for by Order XI.

Gaskell, for the defendants, moved by way of appeal.—The defendants have a claim against the shipowner within the meaning of Order XVI., r. 48, and ought therefore to be allowed to serve him in Scotland under Order XI., r. 1. [Brett, M.R.—This cannot be a claim for contribution; is it a claim for indemnity over? There is no contract of indemnity; how then can it come within Order XVI., r. 48?] The word "contract" is not to be found in the rule. This court is not bound by the decision of the Divisional Court in Pontifex v. Foord (49 L. T. Rep. N.S. 808; 12 Q. B. Div. 152.) The measure of damages against the third party would be the same as against the defendants, and therefore the case is within the rule.

Brett, M.R.—The rule relating to giving notice to third parties has been altered. The old rule (R. S. C. 1875, Order XVI., r. 18) provided that "Where a defendant claims to be entitled to contribution, indemnity, or other remedy or relief over against any person not a party to the action, he may by leave of the court or a judge issue a notice, &c." Now, what was the meaning of the word "indemnity" there, and when was a person entitled to indemnity under that rule? Only when there was a contract of indemnity, either express or implied; there could be no right to indemnity in any other case. Therefore, to bring a case within the meaning of the word in the old rule, it was necessary to show a contract. It is true that the old rule also contained the words "or other remedy or relief," but in the present rule (R. S, C. 1883, Order XVI., r. 48) the words are, "Where a defendant claims to be entitled to contribution or indemnity over against any person not a party to the action, &c." We must put the same meaning on these words in this rule as the same words bore in the old rule, and therefore the present rule only applies where the third party is bound to indemnify the defendant, and in order that he may be so bound there must be a contract either express or by implication. In the present case there is no contract to indemnify. It is true that here apparently the shipowner must have anticipated that there would be a claim over, and therefore the damages recoverable from him in the event of the defendants' case against him being made out would probably be the same as the damages recoverable by the plaintiff from the defendants; that, however, is a mere accident, and this is not enough to give the defendant a right to serve the third party, for there must be a contract. The other words which occurred in the old rule have been struck out in Order XVI., r. 48, and the case does not come within the meaning of the word "indemnity" within that rule. Then, if the case does not come within the words of the rule where it is sought to serve a third party who is resident in England, it follows that it is not within the rule when it is sought to serve a third party resident in Scotland. What the mode of trial of the two actions should be we need not say, but I have come to the conclusion that the defendants are not entitled to bring in a third party in this action. I am of opinion that the construction put upon Order XVI., rr. 48, 52 by Pollock, B. in Pontifex v. Foord (12 Q. B. Div. 152) is right, and that the present application ought to be refused.

Bowen, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. I agree with the decision in Pontifex v. Foord (12 Q. B. Div. 152), and with the observations of Pollock, B. in that case. The old rule gave a wider power than the present. That was found to work inconveniently, and the rule was altered deliberately. The words were chosen with reference to the class of business which usually gives rise to these questions, and the words of the new rule are such as to include only cases of contribution or indemnity. Here, as against Aitken, the shipowner, there was no contract of indemnity, nor was there any indemnity, as such, because there was no contract. The fact that the damage in both cases would probably be the same is an accident, and cannot convert the claim into a claim for indemnity.

Fry, L.J.—I am entirely of the same opinion. This is not strictly a legal claim to indemnity. Mr. Gaskell said that the rule applies wherever the measure of damages against the third party would be the same as the measure of damages against the defendants. I am unable to accede to this contention, and am of opinion that the word "indemnity" in Order XVI., r. 48, should have its strict legal construction.

Application refused.

The Sea Insurance Company v. Hadden and Another. (a)

Marine insurance—Ship and freight insured with different underwriters—Payment for total loss on ship—Right of underwriters on ship to recover the damages paid to the assured by the wrong-doing vessel in respect of loss of freight.

The defendants effected with the plaintiffs a policy of insurance upon a vessel belonging to the defendants, and also insured the freight with other underwriters.

Before any freight had been earned, but while the vessel was proceeding to her port of loading under charter-party, she was run into and damaged by another ship. The defendants abandoned her to the plaintiffs, who paid as for a total loss. Afterwards the defendants recovered in the Admiralty Division against the owner of the other ship damages in respect of the loss of the ship and of the loss of freight. In an action by the plaintiffs to recover the damages so paid to the defendants in respect of the loss of freight:

Held, that the plaintiffs were not entitled to recover these damages, as freight which has not been earned is not an incident of the ownership of the ship and does not pass to the underwriters on the ship upon abandonment.

This was an appeal from a judgment of Day, J. on further consideration, after trial at Liverpool.

The facts of the case sufficiently appear from the judgment.

(a) Reported by A. A. Hopkins, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

At the trial before Day, J., at Liverpool, there was no dispute as to the facts, and the questions of law raised were reserved by his Lordship for further consideration. The questions of law having been argued before him, the learned judge gave judgment in favour of the defendants.

The plaintiffs appealed.

Cohen, Q.C. and Barnes (C. Russell, Q.C. with them) for the plaintiffs.—The question is whether the plaintiffs, who were the insurers of the ship and paid as for a total loss, are entitled to recover the amount which has been recovered by the shipowner in respect of unearned freight. No freight was earned, and damages were recovered by the defendant in the Admiralty Court against the wrongdoer in respect of the loss of power to earn freight. The plaintiffs are entitled to these damages. The fact that the freight is insured is immaterial. [Brett, M.R.—Take the case of the ship and freight both being insured. Then you say that the shipowner may go to the Admiralty Court and get damages in respect of both heads of loss, and hand all over to the insurer of the ship and leave the insurer on the freight out altogether.] Yes; because the insurer on the ship, who pays as for a total loss, takes the ship with all its incidents, and freight is incident to the ship:

Crompton, Q.C. and W. R. Kennedy for the defendants.—Unearned freight is not incident to the ship; there is no authority for that proposition. The insurers on the ship are of course entitled to the damages recovered in respect of the loss of the ship, but the freight is already insured and subject to the rights of the underwriters on the freight. To uphold the contention of the appellants would be to make a contract of insurance more than a mere contract of indemnity. They cited:

Hickie v. Rodocanachi, 4 H. & N. 455;
Keith v. Burrows, 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 481; 37 L. T. Rep. N. S. 291; 2 App. Cas. 636.

Cohen, Q.C. in reply.

Brett, M.R.—In this case the shipowner insured his ship and also his freight with different underwriters. The ship was damaged by collision; and, in respect of that collision, the damage caused to the ship was so serious that she was abandoned to the underwriters on the ship, and the property in the ship therefore passed to the underwriters on the ship, who paid as for a total loss. Now, the ship was under charter. That being so, the shipowner sues the owner of the colliding ship in the Admiralty Court, in respect of the damage caused by the collision. What, then, does he sue him for? For the injury he has suffered by the negligence of the colliding ship. What has he suffered? He has suffered the damage done to his ship and another loss beside, which is this—he had a contract of charter-party, and, in consequence of the collision, he has been deprived of the opportunity of making profit by earning freight. Now, the underwriters on the ship, having paid for a total loss, have sued the shipowner to recover whatever the shipowner has recovered by way of salvage out of his loss, and they claim to have everything that the shipowner has recovered from the owners of the wrong doing vessel in the Admiralty Court. But they are only entitled to what comes to the shipowner as salvage in respect of the loss of his ship. Therefore, the question arises, Is the contract of affreightment, when it is in some way saved out of the loss, to be regarded as a salvage on the loss of the ship? If it is, then, when the underwriter on the ship pays as for a total loss, if the contract of affreightment is salvage, he is entitled to the contract, and therefore he might sue upon it. There is no authority for any such proposition as that. If he might sue upon the contract of affreightment, he might sue for the breach of it—this it is clear he cannot do. Therefore, if this case is put upon the doctrine of salvage, it is plain, I think, that the contract of affreightment does not pass to the underwriters on the ship.

But it is said, further, that it does pass to them because it is incident to the ownership of the ship. Now, is that true? is a contract of affreightment incident to the ownership of the ship? Whether or not a certain ship is under a contract of affreightment is a mere accident; that contract is an independent contract of which the ship is not the subject-matter, and which is no part of the ship and which is, in fact, wholly independent of the ship. Therefore, it seems plain that such a contract is not within the definition of an incident of ownership of the ship. The absence of the contract of affreightment does not diminish the value of the ship, nor does its existence, as was pointed out by Bramwell B. in Hickie v. Rodocanachi (ubi sup.), increase its value. It is therefore a contract independent of the ship, although it can only be performed by the ship. Now, if authority be wanted upon the question of what is incident to the ship and passes with it when the property in the ship passes, I turn to the judgment of Lord Bramwell, then Bramwell, B., in the case of Hickie v. Rodocanachi (ubi sup.). That learned judge there says: "The case was very ably argued on both sides before us on the 4th May, when Mr. Blackburn, for the defendant, claimed that benefit as a matter of principal as well as of authority. He said that a contract of insurance was one of indemnity; that an insurer was in the nature of a surety, and entitled to the benfit of all the securities the insured possessed. But, in truth, this argument tells against him. The common insurance on a ship is in no way concerned with the freight in course of being earned. It is an insurance on the absolute value, not on that and the vessel's adventitious advantages. If any question of the value of the ship arose, the insured could not include the freight as an item in the calculation, any more than he could the prospect of winning a wager that he had made, that she would arrive at her port of destination. It is the goods, not the ship, which are increased in value by the arrival of the ship, or rather their arrival, and if they arrive the freight is earned. But the matter needs no argument; it is enough to refer to the practice of separate insurance on freight." That puts very clearly that by the practice of merchants the ship and her freight are two entirely separate things. Then Bramwell, B. goes on: "If, then, the loss of freight is no part of the loss of the ship, consequently the insurer of ship ought to have no benefit from the earning of freight unless he helps to earn it." I will deal with that shortly. Then, at the end of his judgment, he says—"On these grounds we are satisfied that the captain, in such a case as the present, acts for the owners of the ship, and not for the underwriters; and that they are not entitled to any benefit from the freight acquired: that the underwriters may indeed, be entitled to advantages attached to the ship, but not to those arising from contracts the fulfilment of which can be, and is, detached from the ship." Now, the contract of affreightment can be, and often is, detached from the owner of the ship; for instance, the shipowner may fulfil it by means of another ship. That judgment which I have just read seems a strong authority for the proposition that a contract of affreightment is not incident to the ownership of the vessel.

Again, Mr Kennedy's argument tends strongly in the same direction. If the vessel is insured by one set of underwriters and the freight is insured by another set, then whatever is salvage from the loss of the ship goes to the underwriters of the ship, and whatever is salvage from the loss of the freight goes to the underwriters of the freight. How, then, are the damages which have been recovered in this case from the owners of the colliding vessel made up? They are made up of damages given in respect both of the loss of the ship and of the loss of freight; therefore one set of damages ought to go to one set of underwriters and the other set to the other. It seems to me to be conclusive that the underwriters on the ship cannot recover what they here claim, because it seems clear that this recovery of damages in respect of the loss of freight is not a salvage which is a salvage out of the loss of the ship. But it is said, and a great deal is founded on this, that, where the ownership of the ship is transferred, either by sale or abandonment to underwriters after the voyage has commenced, and where the goods which have been shipped on board originally are carried to their destination by the underwriters, the underwriters or the vendee of the ship can sue the owners of the goods for freight. It seems to me that is under a totally different head of law. It is the law of England that goods having been carried to their destination, the owner of these goods cannot be allowed to have the benefit of the carriage of the goods on board the ship without paying for it. To whom has he to pay? He cannot be made to pay by the person with whom he made the contract of carriage, if that person has not fulfilled it. Whom, then, must he pay? He must pay the person who is the owner of the ship at the moment when the payment becomes due—that is, the moment when the goods are delivered; and, inasmuch as that cannot be the former owner of the ship, it must be the existing owner. But that does not seem to me a payment under the original contract of affreightment; it is a payment for work and labour done, which, where there has been an original contract of affreightment, is invariably taken by the tribunal which tries the question as the measure of the value of the work and labour done. I think, therefore, the judgment given by Day, J. was right, and ought to be affirmed.

Baggallay, L.J.—Agreeing as I do with the judgment of the Master of the Rolls, I will only say a few words as to the argument used by Mr. Kennedy. Supposing that so much of the amount as has been assessed by the registrar and merchants had not been paid over to the underwriters on freight, it might then be considered that two parties are claiming, each by virtue of having paid sums of money in respect of their insurance. Then, says Mr. Kennedy, on what grounds is the underwriter on freight to be deprived of his right to be recouped the sum which he has paid under his contract of insurance? To hold so would be in direct opposition to the reasoning in the judgments in the case of Castellain v. Preston (ubi sup.). None of the cases cited to us carry the principle to the extent which has been contended for by the appellants. The case of Simpson v. Thomson (ubi sup.), which was perhaps most relied upon by the appellants, turned upon the circumstances of the case and certain dicta only could be relied upon, because the actual decision was adverse to the claim of the appellants.

Lindley, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. It appears to me that it lies upon the plaintiffs to show on what principle they are entitled to the sum of money which was assessed in the Admiralty proceedings by way of compensation for loss of freight. They put the case in two ways. Let us first look at it as a question of contract, apart from all questions of ownership of the vessel. Then it is obvious that an insurance on the ship and an insurance on the freight are two different things, and that the ship does not include freight at all. An insurer on ship is not liable for the loss of freight. How, then, is an underwriter of the ship entitled to anything received by the shipowner in respect of the loss of his freight? Looked at from this point of view, the argument of Mr. Kennedy is quite unanswerable. Then it is said that, having regard to the abandonment, the underwriter on the ship has become the owner, and, as such owner, is entitled, not only to the freight, but also to anything that the owner may get by way of compensation for the freight never having been earned. As regards that, I agree with what has been said by the Master of the Rolls, and I will only add this further observation. At what time does the insurer of the ship become the owner? Upon abandonment. At that time what has become of the freight? The freight is already subject to the rights of other persons with whom it has been insured. The argument is that the underwriter on the ship is, because he is entitled to the ship, also entitled to the freight, throwing out of sight all the contracts to which the freight is already subject. It appears to me that the insurer on the ship is, in this point of view, claiming more than he can establish any right to; for, on the one hand, he is asking for the freight, and, on the other, he is repudiating the claims of those who have already acquired a right to the freight by reason of the policy on the freight as distinguished from the ship. I am of opinion that the judgment below was right, and must be affirmed. Appeal dismissed.

APPEAL FROM THE QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION.

General average—Perils of the sea—Putting into port to repair—Landing cargo—Expenses of reloading and leaving port.

Where a vessel laden with cargo is compelled to put into port to repair an injury which is the subject of particular average, the expense of reloading the cargo, necessarily unloaded for the purpose of repairing the injury and expenses incurred for port charges, pilotage, and other charges subsequent to reloading, are not chargeable to general average.

A ship sprang a leak on a voyage, and was compelled to put into port. In order to repair the ship it was necessary to land the cargo. The repairs were executed, and the ship was reloaded and completed the voyage.

Held, by Brett, M.R. and Bowen, L.J. (Baggallay, L.J. dissenting), that the expenses incurred in respect of reloading, port charges, pilotage, and other charges subsequent to reloading were not chargeable to general average, and therefore the shipowners were not entitled to recover contribution from the owners of the cargo in respect of such expenses.

Judgment of Lopes, J. reversed.

This was an appeal by the defendants from the judgment of Lopes, J., which is reported ante p. 87; 48 L. T. Rep. N. S. 795; 11 Q. B. Div. 616.

Cur. adv. vult.

April 9, 1884.—The following judgments were delivered:

Brett, M.R.—This was an action brought by the plaintiffs, owners of a Norwegian ship, against the defendants, owners of cargo on board, to recover a general average contribution in respect of expenses incurred. The facts stated to have been proved in evidence were as follows: The cargo was shipped at Rangoon to be carried to Liverpool. During the voyage the ship, by reason of tempest, sprang a dangerous leak; the captain, for the safety of ship and cargo, put into Port Louis, in the Mauritius, to repair. When in port it was necessary, in order to repair the ship, but not otherwise necessary, that the cargo should be landed, and it was landed; the cargo was warehoused: the ship was repaired; the cargo was reloaded; the ship was piloted out to sea; the ship arrived safely at Liverpool. Upon demand the defendants acceded to pay contribution in respect of the towage, pilotage, and port dues inwards, and in respect of the unloading of the cargo, and admitted their liability to pay the warehouse rent of the cargo, but refused to contribute towards the reloading of the cargo, or the pilotage or port dues outwards. The items in dispute, therefore, in the action were the items charging contribution in respect of the reloading, and the pilotage and port charges outwards. The case was tried before Lopes, J. without a jury, and the learned judge gave judgment in favour of the plaintiffs for all and each of the items in dispute, on the ground that the case was governed by the decision in Atwood v. Sellar (4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 153; 41 L. T. Rep. N. S. 83; 4 Q. B. Div. 342; affirmed, 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 283; 42 L. T. Rep. N. S. 644; 5 Q. B. Div. 286), either as being directly within the decision in that case, so as to bind this court now, or as being within the principles on which that case was decided. It is to be remarked that in this case the original damage was caused by perils of the sea; that the first act of sacrifice was the incurring of expenses in taking the ship and cargo into port for the safety of both ship and cargo: that the unloading of the cargo was necessary in order that the ship might be repaired, but not necessary on account of any danger or damage to be suffered, or of any damage already incurred by the cargo; that the warehousing was probably necessary for the safety of the cargo; that the reloading and outward expenses were necessary for the purpose of carrying the voyage to a successful termination.

It was contended before us on the part of the plaintiffs that the case was completely bound by the decision in Atwood v. Sellar (ubi sup.), because the putting into port to repair in this case was a general average act, and all the subsequent acts were the consequences of that act, just as much as all the acts subsequent to cutting away the mast were the consequences of that act in Atwood v. Sellar (ubi sup.). It was further contended that if the case was not absolutely bound as by the authority of, yet it was within the principles on which the judgment in Atwood v. Sellar (ubi sup.) was based. It was argued that there is no distinction between the cases of a ship putting into a port of distress for the safety of both ship and cargo after a damage in itself a general average sacrifice, or after a damage caused by perils of the sea or other accident; and that in all cases all such items as were in dispute in this action must follow the decision in Atwood v. Sellar. It was contended on behalf of the defendants that none of the disputed items could entitle the plaintiffs to a general average contribution, because they were incurred in order to enable the plaintiffs to earn their freight, and were incurred when neither ship nor cargo was in danger. In order to support the argument on the part of the plaintiffs Mr. Russell enunciated the following proposition as governing all questions of general average expenditure. The proposition, he said, which is affirmed by the decision in Atwood v. Sellar (ubi sup.) is, that all extraordinary expenses are to be allowed as matters for general average contribution, which were reasonably incurred for the benefit and safety of the whole adventure, or were the reasonable and natural consequences and results following upon an act done in view of danger to the whole adventure, and for the benefit of the whole adventure. If this is a true proposition, in the sense in which it was intended by Mr. Russell that it should be accepted by us, it rules the case in favour of the plaintiffs. In order to determine whether we can adopt it in that sense, it is necessary to criticise it very carefully. It does not speak of expenses incurred merely for safety or preservation, but for benefit and safety. It does not speak of safety of ship and cargo, but of safety of the whole adventure. It does not speak of the expenses of an act of sacrifice done for safety, or of expenses incurred for safety, but of expenses which were the reasonable and natural consequences and results following upon an act done for safety. If "benefit" means the same as "safety," the phrase in which the word is used is tautologous; if benefit means more than safety, we must determine whether any other benefit than that of safety can be vouched in order to sustain a claim for general average. If by "the whole adventure" is meant only "ship, freight, and cargo," it is but an equivalent phrase for "ship, freight, and cargo;" but if more is meant, if it is intended to bring in a benefit to "the adventure of carrying the goods to their destination," we must determine whether such larger meaning can be recognised. We must further determine whether the description of the expenses which may be brought into account is not too expansive.

It was urged that even if the proposition is stated in terms larger than have hitherto been recognised in English law, yet it ought now to be adopted in order to bring the principle of English law on the subject into consonance with the laws of all other countries. But to this I cannot agree. It is useless to inquire whether the law is, as stated, the same in all European countries. For if it is, yet no English court has any mission to adapt the law of England to the laws of other countries; it has authority only to declare what the law of England is. And even if we could do what is suggested, I should doubt the expediency of making the law of the greatest commercial and maritime country in the world bend to the law of other countries where commercial operations are far less extensive, and where commercial adventure is far more timid. As to the cognate law of America, it has been declared over and over again that the English and American courts have diverged upon this particular head of law, the law of general average. The question therefore must be, what is the law of England in this matter. The governing principle or proposition, which has been adopted in its terms by a succession of English courts as the true statement of the governing principle, is that which was stated by Lawrence, J. in Birkley v. Presgrave (1 East, 220). It has been considered to be one of the many happy expositions of mercantile law made by that learned person, in terms so broad and yet so accurate, as show that he was one of the greatest mercantile lawyers who has ever adorned our profession in this country. His proposition is thus expressed: "All loss which arises in consequence of extraordinary sacrifices made or expenses incurred for the preservation of the ship and cargo come within general average, and must be borne proportionably by all who are interested." This proposition, read with regard to expenses, will read thus: All loss which arises in consequence of extraordinary expenses incurred for the preservation of the ship and cargo comes within general average. But the loss which arises from an expense is the expense itself. Therefore we must read thus: Every expense incurred for the preservation of the ship and cargo comes within general average. Applying this rule in its ordinary sense to each item successively claimed as an item of expenditure in respect of which a general average contribution in any given case is due, the question must be: "Was this item of expenditure, at the moment it was incurred, incurred for the safety of both the ship and cargo? The word "benefit" is not used by Lawrence, J., but it is used by Lord Kenyon in the same case. He says, "for the benefit of the whole concern." But the word "benefit," thus used by him with regard to the same facts in the same case in a judgment agreeing with the judgment of Lawrence, J. sitting by his side, must have been intended to mean the same as the word "preservation" used by that learned judge. The words have been usually used as equivalent. Thus, Mr. Arnould, in stating the definition of a general average loss, says: "A general average loss may be defined to be a loss arising out of extraordinary sacrifices made, or extraordinary expenses incurred for the joint 'benefit' of ship and cargo." And for his authority he cites: "per Lawrence, J. in Birkley v. Presgrave" (ubi sup.), where the word used is "preservation." In almost the next sentence, Arnould says: "In order to entitle the party sustaining such loss to a general average contribution, it must appear to have been incurred with a view to the general safety of the whole adventure, i.e., of the ship, cargo, and freight." It is obvious on reading Arnould that he constantly uses the words as equivalent. And so have many judges from time to time. Mr. Russell used the word "benefit" in his argument as having in his proposition a larger meaning than "safety" or "preservation," and therefore his proposition is in this respect intended to be, and is larger than the proposition of Lawrence, J. Again Lawrence, J. says, "for preservation of 'ship and cargo;'" but Mr. Russell says, "for the whole adventure." Lord Kenyon speaks of "the whole concern." Arnould speaks of "the whole adventure, i.e., of the ship, cargo, and freight," thus giving his own equivalent. The point was distinctly argued in Job v. Langton (6 E. & B. 779). Mr. Mellish says: "It is contended on the other side, that all extraordinary expenses incurred for the preservation of the whole maritime adventure, that is, for bringing the ship and goods safely to their destination, are general average. That is too wide a proposition." Mr. Blackburn argues: "The primary object is the arrival of the ship with her cargo at her destination. Ordinary acts done to bring this about are done by the shipowner as part of his duty; but extraordinary acts done for this object give rise to general average." Lord Campbell, dealing with this contention, says: "Mr. Blackburn's position, that the end in view of every maritime adventure being the arrival of the ship with her cargo at her destination, extraordinary acts done to effectuate this give rise to general average, would justify him in contending that these expenses do not constitute particular average; but unfortunately for him the expenses incurred in repairing the ship would according to this reasoning equally be general average." In that case, therefore, the point being distinctly raised, it was determined that the use of the phrase for the benefit of "the whole adventure," with the meaning given to it as used in his own proposition by Mr. Russell in his argument, in this case, is contrary to the law of England. Here again, therefore, the proposition of Mr. Russell is too large. Again Lawrence, J. speaks of every expense incurred for the safety of the ship and cargo, meaning, as I have said, that the question as to each separate item claimed must be: was this item of expenditure, at the moment it was incurred, incurred for the safety of both ship and cargo? But Mr. Russell says all extraordinary expenses which were reasonably incurred for the benefit and safety of the whole adventure, or were the reasonable and natural consequences and results following upon an act done in view of danger, &c. The question under this as to an item would be, was this item of expenditure a reasonable and natural result in the ordinary course of business following upon some other act of sacrifice, or some other act of expenditure? The difference is, that under the rule of Lawrence, J. no act or item of expenditure could be allowed which was not itself directly done or incurred for the preservation of the ship and cargo; whereas under Mr. Russell's rule an expenditure would be allowed, which itself was not incurred for the preservation of the ship and cargo, if in the usual and natural course of business it would be incurred after some act of sacrifice done or some other act of expenditure incurred, which act was done or which other expenditure was incurred, directly for the safety of ship and cargo.

It is obvious that the proposition of Mr. Russell is larger than the rule of Lawrence, J. But if the proposition of Lawrence, J. is the true and accepted law of England, as I think it is, no court now existing has power to alter that principle while it is the law. We must reject the proposition suggested in argument, and abide by the proposition decided in judgments. We have to apply the rule as stated by Lawrence, J. to the case of a ship putting into a port of distress for repairs in consequence of damage done by sea perils. If there is danger to the preservation of both ship and cargo from destruction, if the ship remains at sea, the act of putting into port to repair is an extraordinary act which may well be called a general average act. If in order to do that act, an expenditure is reasonably incurred, that expenditure is a general average expenditure. If in order to do that act, towage, pilotage, or inward dues must be paid, those expenditures are all and each general average expenditures. When the ship is in the port of distress for repair, other acts are often done, and other expenditures are often incurred, which must each be considered. Each of these must be considered as if it were the sole act or expenditure, and also whether it may be treated as a part of another act or expenditure. When the ship is in the port of distress, it often happens that the cargo is unloaded and warehoused or otherwise protected, and if necessary manipulated; the ship is repaired, the cargo is reloaded, the ship is taken out to sea and proceeds on her voyage. When the ship and cargo are in the port, both may still be in danger of destruction, or the ship alone, or the cargo alone. If both ship and cargo are in danger, it is impossible to conceive, as a fact, that anything which can substantially be called repairs can be done to the ship whilst the cargo is in her. The cargo must then be landed for the safety of both. But the ship alone may be in danger, as for instance, of breaking her back on a falling tide if the cargo be left in her, though the cargo, from its nature, would not be in danger. In such a case the cargo must be landed solely for the safety of the ship. The cargo alone may be in danger, as if the injured ship be on the ground and safe, but the cargo be perishable if wetted; then the cargo must be landed, but solely for the safety of the cargo. Or it may be necessary to land the cargo, though neither it nor the ship be in immediate danger, or though the ship only be in danger, because the injury to the ship cannot be repaired without the removal of the cargo. In the first case the cost of unloading, treating the unloading as within itself the sole act done, is clearly a general average expenditure. In the second, third, and fourth cases the expenditure, treated as if it were the cost of the sole act done, cannot be a general average expenditure. But we must consider whether any of the three can be treated as part of another act which is a general average act. The only act to which they can be referred is the act of going into port to repair. In the second and third cases which arise, whether the repairs to the ship could or could not be done as a matter of carpentering without the cargo being removed, it cannot be truly said that the landing of the cargo is a part of the act of going into port to repair. In the fourth case, if you take the act of sacrifice to be not merely the going into port, but the going into port to repair, and if the one act be the going in to repair, and the repair cannot be done without the landing of the cargo, which is the hypothesis, then the landing of the cargo is a part of the act of going into port to repair. It is a part of the act which is done in order to put the ship into such a position that she can be repaired, which is the real meaning of the colloquial maritime phrase "going in to repair." The expression, then, is going in for repairs. The real accurate meaning is going in to be repaired, or going in so as to be in a position which will enable her to be repaired. The landing of the cargo in such a case is upon the hypothesis so necessary a part of the act of taking the ship into port so as to be in a position to be repaired, that such act cannot be said to be usefully completed until the cargo is landed. This fourth case has always been treated as if the going into port to repair were one act, and as if that were the one act of sacrifice. The cost of unloading has consequently in such case always been allowed as a general average expenditure. Treated in this way, which seems to be a not unreasonable way of treating the case as matter of business, the allowance of the item is not against the principle of law, and therefore is rightly allowed. When the cargo is landed, it may or may not, according to its own nature, or the circumstances of the locality, require to be warehoused or otherwise protected. It may, in consequence of partial damage already suffered, or from its own nature, require for its own safety to be manipulated, as, for instance, to be unpacked or dried; but such acts cannot possibly be necessary for the safety or preservation of the ship. She is at that moment safe or unsafe. But these acts cannot contribute in any way to her safety if she is unsafe. They cannot be said to be a part of the act of going into port to repair, they have no reference to the act of repairing, or of putting the ship into a position in which she can be repaired. They are therefore not within the principle. The repairing of the ship has nothing to do with the safety of the cargo. It is done in respect of the ship alone. The reloading of the cargo and the outward expenses are expenses of acts done when both ship and cargo are safe from existing danger, and are therefore not within the rule. They cannot be said to be a part of the act of placing the ship in a position to be repaired.

Unless, therefore, we are bound by authority to hold otherwise, I am of opinion that, according to the law of England, when a ship is obliged, for the safety of ship and cargo, to go into and goes into a port of distress in order to repair damage done by sea-peril, the expenses of going into the port are general average expenses; that if it is necessary for the safety of both ship and cargo to unload the cargo, or if it is necessary to unload the cargo in order to repair the ship, though it is not necessary for the safety of the cargo, the expense of unloading the cargo is a general average expense; but if the unloading of the cargo is not for either of these causes the expense of unloading is not a general average expense. I am of opinion, in the same way and in the same case, that the expense of warehousing, guarding, or manipulating the cargo, of repairing the ship, of reloading the cargo, of taking the ship out of port, of the charges of going out of port, are not general average expenses. It is said, however, that we are bound by the decision of the Court of Appeal in Atwood v. Sellar (ubi sup.), or that we ought to decide this case according to the principles on which that case was decided. And if within ordinary rules that case binds us, I will not hesitate to obey it, though with deference I could not have agreed with it. In that case the vessel was obliged to put into port in order to repair the loss of a mast cut away in severe weather, in order then to save the ship and cargo from immediate danger. "The question," says the judgment, "is whether in the case of a vessel going into port in consequence of an injury which is itself the subject of general average, the expenses of warehousing and reloading goods necessarily unloaded for the purpose of repairing the injury, and expenses incurred for pilotage and other charges on the vessel leaving the port, are the subject of general average also" (5 Q. B. Div. 288). "We have, therefore," it is afterwards said at page 294, "the law, as laid down by the courts for a considerable portion of the period over which the practice of average adjusters stated in the special case extends, running counter to that practice by recognising, as regards port of refuge expenses, a distinction between cases where a ship puts into a port of distress for repair of damage caused by a voluntary sacrifice, and cases where it puts in for repair of damage caused by peril of the seas." "It is not necessary," it is said at p. 297, "for us to decide in the present case whether Hall v. Janson (4 E. & B. 500; 24 L. J. 97, Q. B.) was rightly decided, and whether the expenses in dispute in the present case would properly belong to general average if the original cause of damage to the ship had only been a cause belonging to particular average." After these quotations it is impossible, in my opinion, to say that the decision in that case binds us by authority in this case. The Court expressly stated that it did not decide what would be the law applicable to a case like the present. I purposely abstain from entering into all the observations made in the judgments of Cockburn, C.J., in 4 Q. B. Div., and Thesiger, L.J., in 5 Q. B. Div. I do not think that the real ground of the decision in Atwood v. Sellar (ubi sup.) in the Court of Appeal was that all the acts done in a port of distress are one continued act. What is the one act? By what name can it be expressed? Warehousing the cargo, reloading it, going out of port, cannot be said to be parts of the act of taking the ship into port in order to enable her to be repaired. Reloading the cargo and taking the ship out of port, when the ship is repaired, cannot be parts of the act of repairing the ship. The real ground of the decision was, I think, that where the putting into port for repairs is the necessary consequence of a previous general average sacrifice, the law of England is as elastic in respect of the subsequent acts done and expenses incurred in the port as the American and other laws are stated to be in all cases of a ship necessarily putting into a port of distress to repair. And for that proposition there were before the decision in Atwood v. Sellar (ubi sup.) many weighty dicta by English authors of authority and English judges; but all which dicta drew a distinction between the going into a port of distress in consequence of a voluntary sacrifice, and of putting into port in consequence of a particular average damage. I adopt that distinction, because I do not think that we are bound in the present case by the decision in Atwood v. Sellar (ubi sup.), and the propriety of that decision with reference to the facts on which it was decided, we are not at liberty to question. I have carefully examined all the cases cited to us. I do not think that any of them are decisive of the case before us. I therefore think it useless to enter, in this judgment, into a minute discussion of them. I have looked carefully into valuable books written by great average staters, but cannot accept their views on either side as authority. No one can study the law successfully without reading them. No one can give judgment without referring to them for valuable aid, but they must not rule the decisions of courts as by authority. The only further reference I think it useful to make to former cases is, that in my opinion the decisions in Da Costa v. Newnham (2 Term Rep. 407) and Moran v. Jones (7 E. & B. 523) cannot be supported. I am of opinion that the appeal should be allowed, and that judgment should be entered for the defendants.

BAGGALLAY, L.J.—I have had an opportunity of perusing and considering the judgment which has just been delivered by the Master of the Rolls, and also that which will presently be delivered by Bowen, L.J., and I regret that I am unable to agree with them in thinking that this appeal should be allowed. I regret it because I think it very undesirable that so important a principle as that which will be affirmed by their judgments should have any doubt thrown upon its soundness by reason of any dissent on my part from the views expressed by them. I am very sensible that in saying this I am attributing too much importance to my own views upon a subject with which they are much more familiar than I am; but, having been a party to the judgment delivered by Thesiger, L.J. in Atwood v. Sellar (4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas., 283; 42 L. T. Rep. N. S. 644; 5 Q. B. Div. 286), which was the subject of much consideration by the judges on whose behalf it was delivered, and having, since the arguments on this appeal were concluded, carefully reconsidered that judgment, I feel bound to express the opinion at which I have arrived, and to state concisely the reasons by which I have been influenced in forming that opinion. In doing so I propose, in the first place, to compare the circumstances under which the decision in Atwood v. Sellar (ubi sup.) was arrived at with those with which we have to deal on the present appeal. For conciseness and convenience of comparison I will refer to the ships as A. and B., and will deal with them as having encountered the same storm and as having sought the same port of refuge. The circumstances may be then stated as follows: Two ships, A. and B., each on a voyage from a foreign port to Liverpool, and having a valuable cargo on board, encountered a violent storm; the master of A., to avoid a more serious injury, cut away one of his masts; B. sprung a dangerous leak; both, for the safety of ship and cargo, put into a port of refuge to repair the injuries they had sustained; to effect such repairs and to enable the ships to prosecute their respective voyages, it became necessary in the case of each ship to discharge the whole or a portion of her cargo; in addition to the port dues and other expenses incident to her entering the port, further expenses were incurred in respect of each ship in unloading, warehousing, and reloading her cargo whilst she remained in port, and for pilotage and other charges on leaving the port to prosecute her voyage. The only difference between the circumstances of A. and those of B. was in the nature or character of the injury which occasioned her putting into port. The cutting away of one of the masts of A. was the subject of general average; in other words, her putting into the port of refuge was occasioned by a general average sacrifice; whilst the putting into port of B. was occasioned by her springing a dangerous leak, which was a particular average loss. But in each case the putting into port for the safety of the ship and cargo was an act of sacrifice, giving rise to claims for general average contribution. In the case of A. this act of sacrifice followed, or was a continuation of, the original act of sacrifice, whilst in the case of B. it was itself the original act of sacrifice; in each case the proximate cause of the extraordinary expenses incurred was the putting into the port of refuge. If it had been left to average adjusters, previously to the decision in Atwood v. Sellar (ubi sup.), to adjust the losses in respect of the expenses incurred by the two ships, they would, in accordance with a practice of many years' duration, have dealt with them as follows: In respect of each ship they would have treated the expenses incurred in entering the port and of discharging the cargo as general average, those incurred in warehousing the cargo as particular average on the cargo, and the pilotage and other charges incidental to leaving the port as particular average on freight; the fact that in the case of A. the putting into port was occasioned by a general average sacrifice, whilst in the case of B. it was occasioned by a particular average loss, would in no way have affected the adjustment of the losses incurred by reason of the putting into port; and properly so, if I am correct in the view which I have expressed, that in each case the putting into port was an act of sacrifice and the foundation of a claim for general average contribution. That the practice of the average adjusters was based upon the principle that the putting into port to refit is in itself an act of sacrifice, is evidenced by their treating the expenses incidental to entering the port of refuge and of discharging the cargo as the subject of general average contribution; upon no other principle could the practice be supported. But the decision in Atwood v. Sellar (ubi sup.) established that, whilst the practice of the average adjusters was in accordance with legal principles, so far as it treated the expenses of entering the port of refuge and of discharging the cargo as the subject of general average contribution, it was erroneous in the case of A. in limiting the expenses, which were the subject of general average contribution, to those last-mentioned, and that the expenses of warehousing and reloading the cargo and those incidental to leaving the port were equally the subject of general average contribution. But if, in the case of A., the expenses of warehousing and reloading the cargo, and of leaving the port were properly held to be the subject of general average contribution, I am unable to suggest any reason satisfactory to myself, why the like principle should not be applied in the case of B.; in that case the expenses of unloading, warehousing, and reloading of the cargo and the coming out of port were as consequent upon the putting into port as they were in the case of A.; if they ought not to be treated as the subject of general average contribution in the case of B. they ought not, according to the view which I take of the circumstances of the two cases, to have been so treated in the case of A.

It has been pressed upon us in argument that in the judgment which was delivered in Atwood v. Sellar (ubi sup.) care was taken to avoid intimating any opinion as to how a case similar to that now under consideration should be dealt with. I cannot assent to this view of the scope of the judgment; it is doubtless true that it was not intended to express any decided opinion upon the question referred to, but attention is distinctly directed (see 5 Q. B. Div. p. 289) to the case of a ship which has been damaged by perils of the sea, and has subsequently put into a port of refuge, and a distinction as regards any claim to general average contribution is drawn between a case in which the goods are unshipped and in safety, and the common danger consequently at an end, before the ship puts into port, and one in which the goods are not unshipped until after the ship has put into port, and in which there is consequently a common danger at the time when the ship put into port. And similar views are indicated in the comments upon the case of Job v. Langton (6 E. & B. 779). For the reasons which I have thus concisely stated, I am of opinion that Lopes, J. arrived at a correct conclusion, and that the appeal should be dismissed.

Bowen, L.J.—This case raises the important question whether certain port of refuge expenses incurred by a vessel which, in consequence of a particular average loss, has put into port to repair, are properly a subject of general average contribution. The plaintiffs are the shipowners and the defendants the owners of cargo. The vessel, in her voyage from Rangoon to Liverpool, met with heavy weather and sprang a dangerous leak. The captain, for the sake of the preservation of ship and cargo, took refuge in the Mauritius, and was there compelled, in order to prosecute his voyage, to execute certain repairs upon the ship. In order to enable such repairs to be made the cargo was landed, warehoused, and reloaded, after which the vessel sailed for Liverpool. The expenses of unloading cargo have been accepted by the defendants as the subject of general average contribution, and the defendants have admitted their liability to pay the whole storage or warehouse rent of the cargo. The action was brought to recover general average contribution from the cargo in respect of its reloading, and port charges, pilotage, and other claims subsequent to the reloading. The cause was tried before Lopes, J., who held that the plaintiffs were entitled on all the items in question to succeed, and this appeal is brought from his judgment in their favour. It is essential at the outset to bear in mind two things, the nature of every general average sacrifice, and the object of every general average contribution. A general average sacrifice is an extraordinary sacrifice voluntarily made in the hour of peril for the common preservation of ship and cargo. There is no difference in principle between a mast voluntarily cut away, an extraordinary expenditure voluntarily incurred, and extraordinary loss of time and labour voluntarily accepted, provided that in each case the sacrifice is made for the common safety in a time of danger. Next as to the object of general average contribution. It is to indemnify the person making the general average sacrifice against so much of the loss caused directly thereby as does not fall to his own proportionate share. This pro ratâ indemnity will not be complete without including in the calculation expenses which, though not themselves within the definition of voluntary sacrifice, nevertheless are directly caused by a voluntary sacrifice, and must therefore be recouped if the loss which the sacrifice causes is to be borne pro ratâ. "All loss," says Lawrence, J., in the case of Birkley v. Presgrave (1 East, 228), "which arises in consequence of extraordinary sacrifices made or expenses incurred for the preservation of the ship and cargo comes within general average, and must be borne proportionately by all who are interested." The question whether extraordinary expenditure after the entry into a port of refuge is rightly chargeable to general average, necessarily depends on the circumstances of each case. Each item of expenditure which is challenged must be considered on its own merits with reference to two tests. The first test is whether such item itself fulfils, as against some or all of the interests to be considered, the definition of a general average sacrifice; the second is whether such item, though not itself a general average sacrifice, is nevertheless an expenditure caused or rendered necessary by one. No supposed conveniences of calculation and no practice of average adjusters can justify taking one man's money to pay what by law is another man's individual loss. It has, however, been urged by the respondents' counsel that a more liberal view ought to be taken of the principles that regulate general average: and in particular with regard to port of refuge expenses. It is not necessary, it has been argued, that the expenditure or sacrifice should have been made for the common safety of ship and cargo, if it is made for the benefit of both, and in order to enable the vessel to bring her voyage and the common adventure to a successful issue. This doctrine has been advocated by various writers, and has engrafted itself upon the law of more than one foreign country; but whatever its theoretical value, it is not the law of England (see Harrison v. Bank of Australasia, 1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 198; 25 L. T. Rep. N. S. 944; L. Rep. 7 Ex. 39). Exceptional cases, such as those suggested in the judgments delivered in Job v. Langton (27 L. T. Rep. O. S. 218; 6 E. & B. 779) and Walthew v. Mavrojani (22 L. T. Rep. N. S. 310; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 382; L. Rep. 5 Ex. 116), may be imagined in which the safety of the ship and cargo, and the safety of the common commercial enterprise would be almost convertible terms, and with reference to such cases it is possible to conceive that expenses after the ship and cargo were in safety from the sea, might, on the ground of a physical danger common to both, be brought into general average. But (exceptional cases apart) it is not sufficient, according to English law, that an expenditure should have been made to benefit both cargo-owner and shipowner. The idea of a common commercial adventure as distinguished from the criterion of common safety from the sea, would lead to the inclusion in general average of, at all events, temporary repairs of the ship caused by particular average loss, and would enable the shipowner to complete his part of the contract of affreightment by means of a money contribution levied perforce upon the cargo owner. The chief English case of note in which language occurs that seems at first sight to favour the notion that a common adventure is the true criterion, is Hall v. Janson (4 E. & C. 500; 24 L. J. 97, Q. B.), where it was held that the unloading and reloading of cargo, for the sake of effecting repairs upon the ship, might give rise to a liability to contribution on the part of freight. Since freight perishes if the voyage is frustrated, it may not have been unreasonable to hold that freight ought to contribute to the expenses incurred in unloading and reloading a cargo, the unloading of which is solely undertaken for the sake of repairing the ship. This limited proposition, with which alone Hall v. Janson (ubi sup.), was concerned, by no means warrants the conclusion that the cargo ought in turn to contribute whenever any expenditure is incurred, not of saving the vessel and its contents, but merely for the sake of prosecuting the voyage. In the subsequent case of Walthew v. Mavrojani (ubi sup.), the English doctrine has been restated and explained, and the language of the court in Harrison v. Bank of Australasia (ubi sup.) is to the same effect.

We have been asked on another and a different principle to depart from the strict English theory in favour of port of refuge expenses following upon a particular average loss, upon the ground that they all form part of a continuous operation, the whole of which was contemplated by the captain at the time when he put into port. The intentions of the captain are no doubt material in considering the question whether the act done by him was performed only for the benefit of his ship, or for the common preservation of both ship and cargo. But it does not follow, because his intentions are examinable to this extent, that everything which the captain intended in his own mind to do after common safety should have been attained, also ought to be chargeable to general average. Intentions which go beyond what is needed for common salvation only show that, in addition to intending that which was a general average sacrifice, it was intended further to do something which was not a general average sacrifice, nor directly caused by one. On such a ground repairs of the ship in port ought themselves to be included, for the captain probably intended these, though he intended them as a means, not of saving the cargo, but of earning his own freight. In my opinion, the two tests which I have enunciated cannot be qualified or extended so as to embrace any such considerations. The next step is to apply these two tests to the case before us, the damage which the vessel here received, and which compelled her to put into a port of refuge, being a particular average loss. And, first, as to the expenses of putting into port. Two views may theoretically be taken of the act of putting into port in a case like the present, though such expenses are now universally accepted as general average charges. These expenses might conceivably be considered as an exception to the general law, in virtue of which exception, though the bearing up for port was not a general average act of sacrifice in itself, its expenses are, for the sake of public policy, universally recognised as a subject-matter of contribution. The other and more general view is, that the bearing up for a port is to be treated as an act of general average sacrifice, because it is undertaken, as a rule, in the hour of danger for the common safety of ship and cargo: (Benecke, p. 192.) For the purpose of the present argument, I will assume that the latter view, which was pressed upon us by the respondents' counsel is the more correct. We come then to the unloading of cargo when the port of refuge has been reached. In practice it has in recent times become common to carry these unloading expenses to general average, both where the repairs of the vessel have been rendered necessary by a general average act and where they are rendered necessary by a particular average loss. Nor is it necessary to discuss a practice which may have become inveterate, and which is found adequate. Still, if strict theory were to be in each case relied upon, such unloading ought, as it seems to me, to be dealt with specifically in every instance by applying to it the two tests I have named. If necessary for the common preservation of both ship and cargo, the unloading will be in itself a general average sacrifice: (see The Copenhagen, 1 Chris. Rob. 289.) If not so necessary, it will not in itself amount to a general average sacrifice at all, but it may nevertheless be properly included as a subject-matter of contribution whenever the expenditure is directly caused by some antecedent act of general average sacrifice. It has been maintained by some that the unloading, which is effected to enable the ship to be repaired after a particular average loss, may properly be treated as an act done for the common safety of ship and cargo, on the ground that if the cargo were not unloaded, ship and cargo would both be locked up indefinitely, and the voyage placed permanently in suspension. Reserving to one's self the right to consider any special circumstances in other cases arising from the character of the cargo or otherwise that might render unloading necessary for the preservation of both cargo and ship within the meaning of such test, I am unable to adopt the theoretical view that unloading becomes an act of sacrifice simply because it releases cargo and ship from the dead-lock that would otherwise ensue. Physical safety has been attained, and it appears to me to be the duty of the shipowner, under his contract of affreightment, either to proceed with his voyage or else to land his cargo, unless it is to be transhipped direct. In the case of Plummer v. Wildman (3 M. & S. 482), the unloading of the cargo, which was necessary for the repairs, was charged to general average, but in that case the repairs, owing to an antecedent sacrifice which necessitated them, were themselves held to be general average. In the case of Hall v. Janson (ubi sup.), where the unloading was spoken of as chargeable to general average, the question at issue in the action was as to the liability to contribute not of cargo but of freight. In the present case the unloading expenses have been by common consent and in comformity with a very common practice dealt with as the subject of general average contribution; and it is therefore unnecessary to decide what would be in other cases the law on the point. The goods having been landed there is an end of all danger common to ship and cargo.

The contest between the parties and the present instance turns wholly on items of expenditure subsequently incurred. These cannot be brought into general average on the ground that they are general average sacrifice in themselves, for the hour of danger and of sacrifice is over. They can only become so chargeable if it can be shown that they are part of the loss which some antecedent act of sacrifice entails. The first item in controversy which we are asked to consider relates to the warehousing of the cargo. Now, primâ facie warehousing the cargo is a charge that ought to be borne by the cargo, which benefits exclusively by it. It may, conceivably, in some cases have been rendered necessary by an antecedent sacrifice so as to fall within the definition of the loss caused thereby. But the only antecedent sacrifice in the present case was the putting into port for refuge, and it is difficult to see how as between ship and cargo the warehousing of the cargo was caused by the mere putting into port. The defendants have admitted their liability to bear the charge in full. In my opinion there is no reason to treat the warehousing in the present case as other than a charge on cargo. We come next to the reloading. Reloading is not an act of sacrifice, for long before it occurs both ship and cargo are safe. Is it then caused by any act of sacrifice, or is it part of the loss, in other words, which an antecedent act of sacrifice involves? Where, for example, a ship has cut away a mast and has put into port to repair the damage so caused, and been compelled, in order to repair this special damage, to unload and to reload the cargo, it may follow, according to the decision in Atwood v. Sellar, that such expenses are all part of the loss involved in the original sacrifice. But in the present instance the only sacrifice has been the putting into port, and the reloading expenses are not part of the loss which putting into port has caused, but a loss caused by the captain's decision to repair his ship, and to unload and reload the cargo for that purpose. The charges of reloading in such a case ought in principle to fall upon the freight, or else upon the freight and the ship together if the two interests are severed. I come next to the charges outward, and this seems to me to raise a more difficult question. Expenditure of this description is not in itself a general average sacrifice, but may it not be said that it has been caused by one, on the ground that a ship which goes into port will have to come out again, and that the former operation directly causes the latter? If strict theory is to be applied there might seem to be a difference between the cases in which the vessel has done nothing in the port of refuge beyond availing herself of a temporary shelter and the cases where she puts in in order to repair damage and because it was not safe for her to continue her voyage without such repairs. In the former case, where shelter alone is sought the vessel might plausibly be said to come out simply because she previously went in. In the latter case, where she puts in for repairs, the proximate cause of her coming out is not that she put in, for she could not have resumed her voyage had not the necessary repairs been effected upon her while in harbour; but that the master when in harbour decided, in the discharge of his duty and in the interest of his owners, on repairing the ship, reloading the cargo, and carrying on the voyage. The outward expenses ought, therefore, as it seems to me, in the present instance to fall on freight. I proceed, lastly, to consider the authorities with a view of inquiring whether any of them are inconsistent with the conclusions at which I have arrived above. The authority of Da Costa v. Newnham (2 Term. Rep. 407) has been so shaken by subsequent decisions that it cannot any longer be relied on. In Plummer v. Wildman (3 M. & S. 482) the question arose as to repairs and disbursements. The vessel had met with a collision which broke her false stern and her knees, and the master was in consequence obliged to cut away part of the rigging of her bowsprit and to return to port to repair the damage sustained by the accident and the cutting away. The ship could not have prosecuted her voyage nor kept the sea with safety without returning and repairing in Jamaica. On her return thither the cargo was relanded and warehoused in order that such temporary repairs might be done as would enable her to prosecute her voyage, and part of the disbursements consisted in the defrayment of these expenses. The plaintiffs in an action for general average contribution claimed, amongst other things, disbursements for pilotage inwards, for surveying, ascertaining, and repairing the damage necessary for her to resume her journey, and the expenses of landing and warehousing, and reloading, and crimpage to replace deserters during repairs. Lord Ellenborough and the rest of the court allowed as general average so much of the expenses of repairs as were absolutely necessary to enable the ship to prosecute her voyage, but disallowed the captain's expenses in port. Le Blanc, J. adds that the unloading might be general average if it was necessary to repair the ship. But the language of the court in this case can only be considered as consistent with later authority as it is explained and interpreted in Power v. Whitmore (4 M. & S. 141). The vessel in Power v. Whitmore had suffered sea damage in a storm, and for the safety of ship and cargo put into Cowes, where she lay four days. She repaired her damage at Cowes, and sailed again the next day; but the day after was driven back by adverse winds and tempestuous weather, and remained at Cowes a fortnight farther. The question raised was whether the owner of cargo was liable to general average contribution in respect of the following items: (1) wages of the captain and crew at Cowes; (2), provisions consumed there; (3) repair of her bowsprit, and (4) supply of three coils of rope. All these charges were disallowed. Lord Ellenborough doubted the correctness of the language of Beawes cited in Da Costa v. Newnham (2 Term. Rep. 407), and distinguished Plummer v. Wildman (3 M. & S. 482), on the ground that the repairs of the ship were there rendered necessary to repair the original act of sacrifice: (see Harrison v. Bank of Australasia (25 L. T. Rep. N.S. 944; 1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 198; L. Rep. 7 Ex. 39). In the case of Hallett v. Wigram (15 L. T. Rep. O. S. 137; 9 C. B. 580) the question of general average contribution arose upon demurrer. It appeared upon the pleadings that the ship had encountered a storm and been compelled to return to Adelaide for repair. It was alleged upon the pleadings that the return to Adelaide, the unloading of the cargo, and the repair of the damage, were all necessary for the preservation of the ship and cargo, and that the repairs were necessary for the completion of the voyage and for the conveyance of the cargo to the port of delivery, which could not otherwise have got there, and that the master, being unable to raise money for the payment of the repairs, sold a portion of the cargo to enable him to do so. The Court held that the repair of the sea damage must be borne by the shipowner. Wilde, C.J. quotes with approval the following passage from Abbott; "It seems to result from these decisions, that if a vessel goes into port in consequence of an injury which is itself the subject of general average, such repairs as are absolutely necessary to enable her to prosecute her voyage, and the necessary expenses of port-charges, wages, and provisions during the stay, are to be considered as general average; but if the damage was incurred by the mere violence of the wind and weather, without sacrifice on the part of the owners for the benefit of all concerned, it falls, with the expenses consequent upon it, within the contract of shipowner 'to keep his vessel tight, staunch, and strong' during the voyage for which she is hired." Hall v. Janson (4 E. & B. 500; 24 L.J. 96, Q.B.) has been cited by the counsel for the respondents as an authority to prove that the expenses of unloading and reloading cargo constitute a claim to general average contribution, though the original cause of putting into port was a particular average loss. The real question raised in Hall v. Janson, which was a case decided on demurrer, was whether the declaration set out facts from which a liability of the freight to contribute to general average might arise. All that was necessary for the purpose of the decision was the proposition that under circumstances such as those set forth in the declaration, freight might be liable to contribute to general average. The expressions of Lord Campbell as to the liability of cargo, when the expenditure has been necessary for the purpose of prosecuting the voyage are obiter dicta and at variance with later authority. That the unloading and reloading were necessary for the repairs of the ship may be an argument to show that freight ought to contribute—but this argument is inapplicable, as it seems to me, to the case of the cargo, which has not necessarily anything to do with the repairs of the ship. In Job v. Langton (6 E. & B. 779) the ship with a general cargo on board had run ashore on the coast of Ireland, and it became necessary to discharge the whole of the cargo and ballast before she could be got off. The question which arose was whether the expenses incurred in getting off the ship and taking her to Liverpool for repair after the entire cargo was discharged were chargeable to general average or to particular average to the ship alone, and the court had power to draw inferences of fact. Lord Campbell and the Queen's Bench decided that the expenses were particular average on the ship, having been incurred after the cargo had been safely discharged and warehoused, and pointed out that if the learned counsel's position for the defendants were true, that the end in view of every maritime adventure being the arrival of the ship with her cargo at her destination, extraordinary acts done to effectuate this gave rise to general average, it would follow by a parity of reasoning that expenses incurred in repairing the ship at Liverpool ought equally to be general average. A question arose in Moran v. Jones (7 E. & B. 523) as to the liability of the cargo owner to general average. The inferences of fact drawn by the Court of Queen's Bench may or may not have been correct, but the decision has reference only to the special facts of that case. In Walthew v. Mavrojani (22 L. T. Rep. N. S. 310; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O.S. 382; L. Rep. 5 Ex. 116) it was decided that extraordinary expenses incurred in getting off a stranded ship after the cargo has been removed to a place of safety are not, in the absence of exceptional circumstances, general average. Bovill, C.J. in his judgment refers with approval to Hallett v. Wigram (9 C.B. 580), and the judgment of Wild, C.J., as also to the decision in Job v. Langton (6 E. & B. 779), and distinguishes Moran v. Jones (7 E. & B. 523). "The claim," he says, "has been put upon the ground that the adventure was not complete, and that until it was terminated there was a common interest that it should be carried out; but that argument is in direct contradiction to the principle laid down with respect to repairs which are equally necessary to enable the ship to complete the adventure, but which are not matters of general average." "The proposition," says Sir James Hannen, "that general average includes all extraordinary expenses incurred for the purpose of continuing the voyage, is not warranted by the principle which governs contribution to general average." In Harrison v. Bank of Australasia (25 L. T. Rep. N. S. 944; 1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 198; L. Rep. 7 Ex. 39) a question arose as to the right of the shipowner to charge the cargo with general average contribution in respect of spars and wood cut up by the captain in an emergency to burn with his coal, of extra coal purchased from a passing vessel, and of injury done to a donkey engine through its being continuously employed for pumping. The court unanimously held that no claim to contribution arose in respect of the coals or the donkey engine, but differed on the question of fact whether there was such an imminent peril as to justify the sacrifice of the spars and wood. But all agreed as to the principles which regulate the law of general average. Cleasby, B. expressed himself as follows: "Some difficulty is created in this case by referring to American authorities on this subject, and (to Stevens on Average, and other works of a similar nature. The law in America does not in all respects agree with ours on the subject of general average (as will be pointed out shortly), and the other works referred to do not, in my opinion, correctly state the English law on the subject. We were pressed with many authorities to show that imminence of danger was not necessary to make the expenses incurred by a vessel in going into port to repair, a subject of general average. It is undoubted that when some sacrifice has been made (for example, cutting away masts, &c.), the expenses consequent upon going into port after the danger is over to repair this loss are in England the subject of general average; because going into port, though there is no imminent danger at the time, yet being rendered necessary by the sacrifice made in imminent danger, stands upon the same footing as the sacrifice itself. But the expenses attending the going into port to repair sea damage caused by a storm when no sacrifice has been voluntarily made, do not, it is submitted, form items of general average according to English law, although they are regarded as doing so in America: 3 Kent's Commentaries (10th edit.), p. 329, and note." Kelly, C.B., in delivering the judgment of himself and Bramwell, B., adds that the ingredients of a case of general average are,—peril of the seas imminent, certain loss in a short time unless something not to be anticipated should intervene, and a sacrifice of the property of one for the benefit of all. And he proceeds to cite as the true principle applicable to these cases the passage from Abbott on Shipping referred to by Wilde, C.J. in the case of Hallett v. Wigram (9 C. B. 580), which I have already mentioned.

We have, however, been asked to consider the present case as governed by the judgment of the Court of Appeal in Atwood v. Sellar, where it was held that port of refuge expenses of the same character as those now in issue were properly chargeable to general average. The broad and obvious distinction is that in Atwood v. Sellar there was a general average sacrifice of a portion of the ship herself which rendered necessary the repairs of the vessel in port, and the unloading, warehousing, and reloading of the cargo for that purpose. The Court of Appeal in terms abstained from pronouncing on the question that has now arisen, and unless it follows as a necessary implication from their judgment that the port of refuge expenses ought to be similarly treated where there is no general average act which renders necessary any unloading or repairs in port, the matter is not concluded by that authority. The principle of law, however, that appears to be the basis of the decision in Atwood v. Sellar is, that an expenditure directly caused by a general average sacrifice is part of the loss that it entails, and becomes the subject of general average contribution. The port of refuge expenses which the present respondents claim to treat as general average have not been caused by the putting into port, and there was no still earlier general average sacrifice to cause them, as in Atwood v. Sellar. They cannot, therefore, in the present case, be said either to be general average sacrifices themselves, nor caused by any general average sacrifice. In my opinion the judgment of Lopes, J. ought to be reversed, and the action dismissed with costs here and below.

APPEAL FROM THE PROBATE, DIVORCE, AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION.

Collision—Carriage of goods—Late delivery—Loss of market—Damages for delay in contract and in tort—Measure of damages.

Where by reason of a collision between two steamships, occasioned by the negligence of one, goods carried by the other are delayed in transit, damages for loss of market are not recoverable as being too remote by reason of the uncertainty of the duration of a sea voyage.

The Parana (3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 220, 399; 36 L. T. Rep. N. S. 388; 2 P Div. 118) followed.

This was a motion in the Probate, Divorce, and Admiralty Division before the President, Sir James Hannen, by the plaintiffs, owners of cargo, in a consolidated action brought by the owners of the steamship Clymene, and the owners of her cargo, against the steamship Notting Hill, to refer back the report of the registrar and merchants on the grounds hereinafter set out.

The action arose out of a collision which occurred in Gibraltar Bay, and, after the institution of the suit, the defendants admitted their liability, and the plaintiffs' claims were thereupon referred to the registrar and merchants.

The claims brought into the registry by the owners of cargo, together with the facts of the case, were set out by the registrar in the following report:

On the 27th Nov. 1882 the steamship Clymene, bound from Salonica to London with a cargo of maize and barley, arrived at Gibraltar. She was to have resumed her voyage on the 28th after taking in coal and water, but about 9.30 on that morning, as she lay moored alongside of a hulk taking in coal, she was run into by the steamship Notting Hill, which struck her on the port side, making a large hole abaft the fore rigging. In order to beach the vessel, her moorings were cut and her engines were put on full speed ahead, but she took the ground with nineteen feet of water round her, and the water rapidly flooded her from the stokehole bulkhead to the collision bulkhead and subsequently her forepeak, but did not enter her afterhold. The grain in the forehold was much damaged by the sea water, and when the hole in the vessel's side had been pitched by divers the water was pumped out and the damaged portion of the cargo was discharged into lighters with so much of the sound cargo as was deemed necessary to lighten the ship. The discharge of the cargo occupied about a fortnight, and the vessel having been temporarily repaired, the dry portion of the cargo was reshipped and the Clymene left Gibraltar on the evening of the 30th Dec.

She arrived in London on the 5th Jan., and on or about the 15th, her remaining cargo having been discharged, the ship was put into Limekiln Dock for permanent repairs, which were completed on the 2nd Feb. 1883.

Claims for damage were brought in by the owners of the Clymene and the owners of her cargo. The shipowners claimed (1) For the delay and temporary repairs at Gibraltar; and (2) for the permanent repairs and for the time occupied by them after the arrival of the vessel in the port of London. The charges at Gibraltar were found on the whole to be necessary and reasonable, and little deduction has been made from them except from the remuneration claimed for the services of the ship's agents there, the total amount charged for which exceeded 2600*l.* Of the expenses in London the charges for repairs in the engine room have been for the most part disallowed, as they were not proved to be consequent on the collision and apparently would have been needed independently of it in order to conform with the regulations under which the classification of the vessel could alone be maintained. Some deductions have also been made from the ships' chandlers' account for items which seemed not wholly chargeable to the collision, and for the value of damaged ropes and canvas, for which it was considered that credit ought to have been given. On the cargo-owner's claim an important question arises. The cargo consisted of 4319 quarters of maize and 5309 quarters of barley, which had been shipped at Salonica in Nov. 1882. Of the maize 3317 quarters had been sold for arrival to Messrs. E. Gripper and Sons, and 1002 quarters to Messrs. Lock and Co. at the price of 34*s.* 10½*d.* per quarter less freight and discount. Both sales were included in one contract made on the 20th Nov., seven days before the Clymene reached Gibraltar, by the terms of which the purchase money was payable on the 20th Feb. 1883, but in fact it was paid on the 6th Dec. preceding, the amount actually paid, after deducting freight and discount, being 6518*l.* 4*s.* 9*d.*, or nearly at the rate of 30*s.* 2*d.* per quarter net. It should be added that of the maize so bought Messrs. Gripper and Sons had, on the 24th Nov., sold for arrival 100 quarters at 38*s.*, and on the 27th Nov. 370 quarters at 38*s.* 6*d.* per quarter, but next day news having come of the collision the sales were necessarily discontinued.

Of the entire shipment of maize little more than one-half (2317 quarters) was delivered in London, the portion damaged by immersion having, by the advice of the surveyors, been sold by auction at Gibraltar, where the net proceeds realised by the sale amounted to only 7060*l.* 7*s.* 8*d.*, or, at the exchange of 3*s.* 10¼*d.* to the dollar, 1360*l.* 10*s.* 5*d.*

A further loss was sustained on the maize which was delivered in London. At the end of November, and early in December, the supply of maize in the London market was very small, and the prices were proportionately high, but from about the middle of December—chiefly in consequence it was stated, of importations of maize from America—there was a rapid and continued fall in prices, and consequently the maize, with which the Clymene arrived on the 8th Jan., only realised prices varying from 31*s.* 9*d.* to 33*s.* a quarter—in all 3714*l.* 9*s.* 2*d.*, of which, after payment of freight and other expenses, there remained a balance of only 3256*l.* 9*s.* 2*d.*, being at the rate of a little more than 28*s.* a quarter.

The result was that the whole cargo of maize for which the claimants had paid 6518*l.* 4*s.* 9*d.* realised only: (1) The damaged maize sold at Gibraltar, 1360*l.* 10*s.* 5*d.*; (2) The remainder delivered in London, 3256*l.* 9*s.* 2*d.* = 4616*l.* 19*s.* 7*d.*; showing a loss of 1901*l.* 5*s.* 2*d.*

But the owners of the maize claimed a much larger sum. In estimating their loss they put the sound value of the cargo not at the price at which it had been bought, which was 34*s.* 10½*d.* less freight and discount, but at 40*s.* per quarter, on the ground that they might have obtained that price for it if there had been no collision, and if consequently the Clymene had arrived in London early in December instead of in January; accordingly they claimed the difference between the value of the maize at 40*s.* per quarter (less freight and other charges which they would have had to pay on arrival) and the price actually realised, and they estimated the loss so sustained at 3116*l.* 10*s.*

As regards the maize which was delivered in London, whether the loss sustained by the owners be taken at the difference between the price paid by them for the cargo and the amount realised in London, viz., as the difference between that amount and the price which might have been obtained if the delivery of the cargo had not been delayed by the collision, it appears to me that in neither case can the claim be allowed consistently with the decision of the Court of Appeal in the case of The Parana (3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 220, 399; 36 L. T. Rep. N. S. 388; 2 Prob. Div. 118). In that case the arrival of the ship having been delayed for more than a month in consequence of the defective state of her engines, the owners of part of her cargo consisting of bales of hemp claimed the difference between the market value at the time when the hemp might have been sold if the ship's arrival had not been delayed by the condition of her engines, and the market value at the time when the hemp was actually ready for sale, and it was held by the Court of Appeal (reversing the decision of the judge of the Admiralty Court, and confirming the registrar's report) that the claim for loss of market could not be allowed.

It was objected by the plaintiff's solicitor that the claim in the case of The Parana (ubi sup.) was for damage arising from breach of contract, not, as in this case from a tort, and that consequently one of the grounds of the decision of the Court of Appeal, viz., that a fall in the market price could not have been in contemplation of the parties when the contract was made, does not exist in the present case. It was also urged that, as Messrs. Gripper and Sons had before hearing of the collision begun to sell the maize purchased by them at 38*s.* or 38*s.* 6*d.* per quarter, they would certainly, but for the collision, have continued to sell it at the same, or even a higher price, and would have disposed of all the maize before the market price fell—that the maize was in fact as good as sold at that price before the collision. But however great the probability that if the arrival of the Clymene had not been delayed by the collision the whole of the maize would have been sold at a considerable profit, it appears to me that the loss of that profit is a loss of market which cannot be allowed unless the decision in the case of The Parana is applicable only to a claim for damages arising from a breach of contract, and not to a claim for damages arising from a tort. Looking to the grounds of that decision, I do not think that it is so restricted, for in either case the loss of market is an accidental loss, not necessarily or naturally consequent upon the delay in the arrival in the cargo, whether that delay has arisen from the defective condition of the carrying ship, or from a collision caused by the wrongful act of another vessel. The allowance of such a claim would also be contrary to the long-established practice of the Admiralty Court. In the case of The Parana, Mr. Rothery, then registrar of the Admiralty Court, reported that, although the case of the loss of markets through the delay in the delivery of goods must frequently have arisen in the Admiralty Court, as for instance, when a vessel has been run into by another, and the delivery of the cargo has been delayed by the vessel having to put into port for repairs (the very case now under consideration), yet he might say with certainty that no such claim had ever yet been preferred, certainly not during his experience of nearly twenty-four years as registrar of the court. This statement is referred to as follows in the judgment of the Court of Appeal: They (the registrar and merchants) said that it had never been the practice in the Court of Admiralty to give such damages, and though it constantly happened that by accident such as collisions goods were delayed in their arrival it had never been the custom to include in the damages the loss of market, and we are of opinion that the conclusion which the registrar and merchants came to was right." I should add that I know of no later case in which such a claim has been allowed. In accordance, therefore, with the conclusion of the registrar in that case I have only allowed in respect of that portion of the maize which was delivered in London a sum which was considered sufficient to compensate the owners for the loss of interest on their capital during the delay in delivery.

To the damaged maize which was sold at Gibraltar a different rule applies. On that portion of the cargo the cost price has been allowed, with the addition of a sum to represent the merchant's profit less the proceeds realised by the sale at Gibraltar. It might perhaps have been an equitable adjustment of the claims for the maize delivered in London, if the loss had been estimated in the same way by allowing a reasonable profit in addition to the cost price, deducting, of course, the proceeds realised; but although this is a usual mode of computing the compensation due for cargo which has been totally lost, or which in consequence of a collision has been sold in damaged state, I am not aware that it has ever been adopted where the cargo has only been delayed in delivery; and in view of the decision in the case of The Parana I do not feel myself at liberty to apply it to that portion of the maize which the Clymene ultimately brought to London. The claim of the owners of the barley which formed the remainder of the cargo has been dealt with in the same manner as the claims in respect of the maize. But on the barley the loss sustained through fall of market was comparatively insignificant, the market price having fallen only from 26*s*. 3*d*. to 25*s*. 3*d*. per quarter during the detention of the Clymene, consequently the disallowance on the claim of the barley owners is comparatively small. On the other hand, the claim for maize has been very largely reduced. This, however, is a case in which the reduction has been occasioned not by the fictitious or exaggerated character of the claim, but by the owners having included in it a loss of market actually sustained and for which they may not unnaturally have thought that they are entitled to compensation. In these circumstances I am of opinion that the owners of the maize as well as the other claimants in the case may be allowed the costs of the reference. J. G. Smith, Assistant Registrar.

The following were the sums claimed and allowed to the plaintiffs:

	Claimed.	Allowed.
Messrs. Gripper and Co. (maize) } Messrs. Lock and Co. (do.)	3116 10 0	1800 0 0
Messrs. Sturdy Bros. (barley)	2538 15 5	2270 0 0

To this report Messrs. Grippper and Lock objected by way of motion, and filed the following objections:

1. Because by the said report the plaintiffs are not allowed the profit in the said report called the loss of market actually sustained by them on the cargo of the Clymene, the plaintiffs will contend that they are entitled to 3116*l*. 10*s*. or such other sums as the registrar and merchants may find or the actual profit or loss of market sustained by them in consequences of the said collision.

2. The plaintiffs contend in the alternative that the registrar's report finding that they sustained an actual loss of 1901*l*. 5*s*, 2*d*. (being the difference between the amount paid and the amount received by them for the sale of the cargo of maize), they are in any event entitled to be awarded the sum of 1901*l*. 5*s*. 2*d*. instead of 1800*l*. or 101*l*. 6*s*. 2*d*. more than is due to them by the said report.

3. The plaintiffs will also contend as an alternative to objection No. 1, that in addition to the said sum of 101*l*. 5*s*. 2*d*. they are further entitled to the sum of 40*l*. 3*s*. 1*d*. and 154*l*. 3*s*. 4*d*., together 194*l*. 6*s*. 5*d*., being the actual profit made by them as stated in the said report on the sale of 100 quarters of maize at 38*s*., and 310 quarters at 38*s*. 6*d*.

4. The plaintiffs will also contend as a further alternative to No. 1, that in addition to the sums of 101*l*. 5*s*. 2*d*. and 194*l*. 6*s*. 5*d*. they are entitled beyond those sums to a sum named in the registrar's report as the merchants profit on the cargo sold at Gibraltar beyond the sums of 1901*l*. 5*s*. 2*d*.

J. P. Aspinall (with him Nelson) in support of the motion.—The plaintiffs are not excluded in this case from recovering for loss of market by the ruling in The Parana (3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 220, 339; L. Rep. 2 P. Div. 118: 35 L. T. Rep. N.S. 32; 36 L. T. Rep. N. S. 388). The Parana was a case of contract; this is a case of tort, and as such the tort feasor should be made liable to the last farthing of damage arising from the tort. In The Parana it appeared that the arrival of the ship at the port where the goods were to be sold was incapable of being approximately ascertained. In that case and the present it is said that no such damage has been allowed in the Admiralty Registry. That arises from the fact that until recent years the Mediterranean carrying trade was done entirely by sailing vessels the date of whose arrival could in no way be estimated. Now the trade is done by steamers, and their arrival can be estimated within a few hours, and they are for the purposes of the market as punctual as the railway goods service, and in the carriage of goods by railway the respondents would clearly be entitled to damages for loss of market:

O'Hanlan v. Great Western Railway Company, 6 B. & S. 484.

Damages for loss of charter-party by collision have been allowed in the Admiralty Registry:

The Star of India, 1 P. Div. 466; 45 L. J. 102, Adm.; 35 L. T. Rep. N. S. 407; 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 261;

The Consett, 5 P. Div. 229; 42 L. T. Rep. N. S. 33; 49 L. J. 24, Prob.; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 230.

This is in the nature of damages for loss of profits, and is an answer to the argument that no contingent profit should be allowed because an accident might occur preventing the arrival of ship and goods, and consequently the earning of the profit. These goods were sold to arrive, and hence there was in existence an actual contract whereby the consignees would derive a profit in the same manner as shipowners would derive profit from a charter-party actually entered into.

W. F. Phillimore and Barnes in support of the report.—The principle adopted by the registrar is the only correct one, when one looks at the decision of the Court of Appeal in The Parana (ubi sup.). It will be seen that the decision there includes such cases as the present. The cases of The Star of India (ubi sup.), and The Consett are on quite a different footing from the present case, inasmuch as in those cases contracts had been entered into that a fixed sum should be paid for the carriage of goods. Here the amount sought to be recovered is too speculative. As pointed out in The Parana, loss of market under similar circumstances must have arisen thousands of times in the Admiralty Registry, and yet never once has it been allowed.

J. P. Aspinall in reply.—Although similar cases of loss of market may have come before the registrar, and never been allowed, if they have arisen since the steam carrying trade came into existence, it is submitted that this practice has been formed upon a mistaken view of the law. We are now trying to correct that mistake.

Sir James Hannen.—I have no hesitation in saying that if I considered this case free from authority I should hold that the registrar's report could not be supported. The difficulties which have been suggested in argument, and which were suggested in the case of The Parana (ubi sup.), I confess appear to me to be very far from conclusive upon the subject. There are unfortunately difficulties in every judicial investigation, but it is the duty of the tribunal, whether judge or jury, to overcome those difficulties and arrive at the conclusion which they consider proper.

And I must say it appears to me that the passage which has been read from Lord Blackburn's judgment in O'Hanlan v. The Great Western Railway Company (ubi sup.) is applicable to all these cases where the question is what amount of damages should be allowed. He says: "Setting aside all special damage," and no question of special damage was left to the jury, "the natural and fair measure of the damages is the value of the goods at the place and time at which they ought to have been delivered to the owner. Now the value of the goods at the place of delivery must be the market price if there is a market there for such goods. If there is not, either from the smallness of the place or the scarceness of the particular goods, the value at the time and place of delivery would have to be ascertained as a fact by the jury, taking into consideration various matters, including any addition to the cost price and expenses of transit, the reasonable profits of the importer which are adjusted by what is called the higgling and bargaining of the market." And so with regard to all these other cases which have been put, it would be a question for the jury or for the registrar and merchants to say whether they had the materials upon which to arrive at the conclusion as to what would have been the price realised had the vessel not been interrupted in her voyage in the manner in which she was.

Nor can I regard the possibility of some other collision taking place as being worthy to be taken into consideration. That is a contingency which would happen in every case, and it would be competent for every wrong-doer to say, "Oh! If I had not done you a wrong somebody else might have done it." But I consider, as I have already said, that with regret I feel myself bound by the authority of The Parana (ubi sup.). Undoubtedly that case was one of contract, and therefore there is a distinction between the present case and that, and if the present case should be taken to the Court of Appeal, I shall be very glad if that court should feel itself justified in treating the distinction I have mentioned as a valid one. But the reason why I do not feel myself justified in so treating it here is, that I find that it was directly under the consideration of the court. In Mr. Rothery's report he goes into the practice of the Admiralty Court during the whole time that he had been registrar, and refers to cases of collision, and his and the merchant's opinion is adopted and sanctioned by the Court of Appeal. "They said," I quote from the report, "that it had never been the practice im the court of Admiralty to give such damages, and though it constantly happened that by accidents such as collisions goods were delayed in their arrival, it never had been the custom to include in the damages the loss of market, and we are of opinion that the conclusion which the registrar and merchants came to was right." Therefore, as I say, the distinction was directly under the attention of the court, and though the decision to this extent in The Parana is certainly not in accordance with my own view of the law, and I should decide this motion differently had I been free, yet I do not feel that I should be justified in acting in contravention to what seems to me to be laid down in that case.

With regard to the other points which have been made, I do not think that that evidence supports them. I was struck at first with the fact that the registrar shows a loss of 1901*l.*, whereas he only gives 1800*l.*, but that is explained. He is lumping together the two transactions when he works it out, showing a loss of 1901*l.*, and there is nothing to show that his computation is incorrect, if you separate the two portions of maize, viz., that which was sold at Gibraltar being damaged from that which was sold in London. He has in effect said, considering himself bound by the decision in The Parana (ubi sup.): "It is impossible to establish any loss on the goods which were brought to London, because whatever they sell for is to be treated as their proper price, and so there never could be a loss." That is one of the anomalies, shall I say, which the rule of law, as laid down, leads to. But then, with regard to the maize sold at Gibraltar, he has allowed a profit with interest. Why he has done so it is not shown, and has only been worked out by Dr. Phillimore from conjecture; but there is nothing to show that he has not done that which he alleged he has done, and I do not doubt therefore he has done it, viz., allowed on the maize sold at Gibraltar a profit with interest. Then with regard to the portions which were resold, that really rests upon the conjecture of Mr. Aspinall. There is nothing to show that there has been any actual loss on the sale in any other sense than that there has been a loss on the whole cargo in not being able to get that which buyers would have been willing to give if it had arrived in time. The phrase "on arrival" would naturally import that such goods only were sold as should arrive in that ship. If it were so, then I do not know any reason why these goods should not have been taken by the buyer, but it is sufficient to say that there is nothing to show that there has been any legal loss which can be put on the same footing as a loss of charter-party, which has been already entered into. That disposes of all the points in the case, and for the reasons I have given I must confirm the registrar's report, and I suppose I must say with costs.

From this judgment the plaintiffs now appealed.

April 30.—Aspinall and Nelson (C. Hall, Q.C. with them) for the appellants.—The learned judge in the court below based his judgment on the case of The Parana (ubi sup.), which he considered applicable to this case, and therefore binding upon him. But the distinction between that case and the present is, that that case was one of contract and this is one of tort. This distinction the learned judge considered to be a valid one, but nevertheless a distinction to which he felt unable to give effect on account of The Parana. In this case the goods were being sold to arrive, and they arrived long after the time at which, but for the collision, they would have arrived; in the meantime the market had gone down. [Bowen, L.J.—And therefore, if when goods arrive by sea they are not necessarily to be sold on arrival, damages in that case do not flow. Brett, M.R.—But if the market goes up instead of falling, would not the damages be less?] Where a person bought goods and resold them at a profit before delivery, and the goods were not delivered, the vendor was held entitled to recover the price at which he had resold them:

France v. Gaudet, L. Rep. 6 Q. B. 199.

The distinction between carriage of goods by sea and by land is one of degree, not one of principle. The regularity with which steam-vessels arrive within a few hours of a calculated time has reduced this distinction to a vanishing point. There is no doubt that in the carriage of goods by land damages for delay are recoverable:

O'Hanlan v. Great Western Railway Company (ubi sup.).

Such damages ought therefore to be recoverable in cases like the present. There are cases recorded in the Admiralty Registry where such damages have been allowed by the registrar and merchants. The other cases cited below were also mentioned.

W. G. F. Phillimore and Barnes, for the respondents, were not called upon.

Brett, M.R.—The only question in this case is whether the damages claimed for delay in the arrival of the goods are too remote. The rule with regard to questions as to remoteness of damage is precisely the same whether the damages are claimed in respect of contract or in respect of tort, and it has been so laid down in Hadley v. Baxendale (9 Ex. 341; 23 L. J. 179, Ex.) and other cases. In Mayne on Damages, p. 39, it is thus laid down: "The first and in fact the only inquiry in all these cases is, whether the damage complained of is the natural and reasonable result of the defendant's act; it will assume this character if it can be shown to be such a consequence as in the ordinary course of things would flow from the act, or in cases of contract if it appears to have been contemplated by both parties." The latter part of this is only a repetition of the phrase in Hadley v. Baxendale (ubi sup.) which has since been frequently criticised. In that case the goods were delivered to a carrier with notice of a contract which made the delivery of the goods within a certain time an essential part of the contract. We have to apply that rule here, as to the point whether the damages are too remote.

The very point was dealt with in The Parana (ubi sup.), where the question arose as to the application of the rule in the case of loss of market through delay, occasioned by a collision, though it was not the point in the actual decision. Mellish, L.J. there said that loss of market in the sense that you are entitled to the difference between the price when the goods arrived and the price when they ought to have arrived is on an ordinary voyage so uncertain that it cannot be the natural and reasonable consequence in every case. And I am of opinion therefore that it is not the natural and reasonable result of a collision at sea. He said that loss of market by delay arising from a collision was too remote to be taken into account as a head of damage when damages are claimed in respect of a collision. That is an authority absolutely binding upon us. For my part I do not wish to say that if I had had to decide that case I should have decided it differently. I can see no distinction between the principles there laid down and those which we have now to apply. It is true, that was an action of contract, and here the question arises in tort; but in the passage I have quoted from Mayne on Damages, which is founded on the case of Hadley v. Baxendale (ubi sup.), no distinction is made between the two kinds of actions in considering the natural and reasonable result of an act. I say therefore, upon the question of remoteness of damage, there is no difference between actions upon contract and those not upon contract. As to the question whether the market value of the goods is to be taken upon the day of collision, it appears to me that it cannot be so taken—certainly not in this case, because no damage has been done which has not been allowed for except damage by delay, and that damage by delay does not occur upon the day of collision.

Bowen, L.J.—I am of the same opinion.

Fry, L.J.—I am of the same opinion, considering myself bound by the case of The Parana.

HIGH COURT OF JUSTICE.

CHANCERY DIVISION.

May 6, 8, and 12, 1884.

(Before Bacon, V.C.)

Phelps, Stokes, and Co. v. Comber. (a)

Bills of exchange—Counterfoils—Bills of lading—Consignor and consignee—Appropriation of shipments to meet bills—Agent of two firms—Notice.

Johnston, Pater, and Co., merchants, of Pernambuco, ordered goods of their agents Samuel Johnston and Co., of Liverpool, the principle partner in both firms being the same individual.

The Liverpool firm sent the order to their agent at New York, who bought the goods, and sent them and the bills of lading to Pernambuco.

In order to pay for the goods, the agent drew bills of exchange on the Liverpool firm, and sent the bills with counterfoils attached to Liverpool.

Each counterfoil was headed as follows, "Advice of draft. To Messrs Samuel Johnston and Co., Liverpool," and after stating the number, date, and amount of the draft, and the shipments against which it was drawn, concluded as follows, "Please protect the draft as advised above and oblige drawer."

Samuel Johnston and Co. accepted the bills, and detached the counterfoils.

The agent sold the bills to bankers in New York shortly before the Liverpool firm stopped payment.

The agent gave notice, by telegram, of the failure, to the Pernambuco firm.

The Pernambuco firm received the proceeds of the sale of the goods, and applied them in payment of the balance due to them from the Liverpool firm.

Held, on action by the bankers against the Pernambuco firm for payment of the bills, or an account, that there was no appropriation of the shipments, nor of the proceeds of the sale thereof, to meet the bills of exchange.

The plaintiffs in this action were bankers at New York, and the defendant, at the time of the transaction in dispute, was carrying on business as a merchant at Pernambuco under the name of Johnston, Pater, and Co., and at Bahia under the name of Johnston, Comber, and Co. In May 1879 Samuel Johnston and Co. were the bankers and agents at Liverpool of Johnston, Pater, and Co. and Johnston, Comber, and Co., and R. B. Borland was general agent in New York of all the three firms.

In May 1879 the Pernambuco firm ordered the Liverpool firm to send certain goods to them for some of their customers in Brazil; the Liverpool firm sent the order to R. B. Borland, who bought the goods in New York.

R. B. Borland sent the goods, and the bills of lading, by the steamship Glensannox, to Pernambuco, and to pay for the goods drew three bills of exchange upon the firm of Samuel Johnston and Co. One numbered 401 was dated the 9th May 1879, and was drawn for a sum of 1500*l.* payable on the 23rd July 1879 and the other two, numbered respectively 402 and 404, were dated the 16th May 1879, and drawn for sums of 1500*l.* and 2000*l.* respectively payable on the 30th July 1879.

There was attached to each of the said bills, at the time when the same was drawn, a counterfoil, with a perforated line between the bill and the counterfoil.

Each counterfoil was headed as follows, "Advice to draft. To Messrs Samuel Johnston and Co., Liverpool," and after stating the number, date, and amount of the draft, and the shipments against which it was drawn, concluded as follows, "Please protect the draft as advised above and oblige drawer."

R. B. Borland sent the bills of exchange, and copies of the bills of lading, to Samuel Johnston and Co., and meantime sold the bills to Phelps, Stokes, and Co. in New York.

Samuel Johnston and Co. accepted the bills, and detached and retained the counterfoils.

On the 10th June 1879 Samuel Johnston and Co. stopped payment, and immediately on ascertaining this fact the plaintiffs and the said R. B. Borland telegraphed to Pernambuco, informing Johnston, Pater, and Co. (who had been previously instructed as to the purchase and shipment of the goods, and as to the three bills being drawn against and charged on the said goods) that they must hold the said shipments by the Glensannox, and the proceeds of the sale thereof, as security to the plaintiffs as the holders of the bills. The telegram was as follows:

Having pledged documents and shipment Glensannox hold proceeds subject order Phelps, Stokes, and Co. and Bank British North America.

The Glensannox arrived at Pernambuco, and the defendant, or his firm of Johnston, Pater, and Co., after receiving the telegram, obtained possession of the goods, transferred them to the Brazilian purchasers, and received the proceeds and applied the same in the payment of the balance due to them from the Liverpool firm.

The plaintiffs claimed payment of the bills, or an account, and an order for payment out of the proceeds of the goods, and a receiver.

The defendants denied that R. B. Borland was agent of the three firms, or had authority to pledge the goods.

By an agreement made the 11th Dec. 1877, between Carruthers Charles Johnston, of Liverpool, of the one part, and Robert Bell Borland of the other; after reciting that C. C. Johnston was desirous of appointing the said R. B. Borland as agent to represent the partnership firms of Samuel Johnston and Co. of Liverpool, Johnston, Pater, and Co. of Pernambuco, and Johnston, Comber, and Co. of Bahia, on commission in the United States of America for the term of five years from the 1st Jan. 1878, upon the terms and conditions hereinafter contained, it was agreed between the parties thereto as follows:

That the said R. B. Borland shall for and during the period of five years from the said first day of Jan. 1878, enter into the service of the said C. C. Johnston, and well and faithfully act for him as agent on commission, as may from time to time be required by him the said C. C. Johnston, in the United States of America, and shall and will, during the said term, diligently attend the business concerns of the said C. C. Johnston, and the said firms of Samuel Johnston and Co., Liverpool, Johnston, Pater, and Co., Pernambuco, and Johnston, Comber, and Co., Bahia. That all business transactions by the said R. B. Borland on behalf of the said firms shall be charged by commission only, in conformity with the rates which have been heretofore charged by the said R. B. Borland since Jan. 1, 1873, under a written agreement and power bearing date 28th Dec. 1872. Provided, however, that in cases of mutual agreement, the scale of commissions may be modified by the parties to this agreement as circumstances warrant.

That the said R. B. Borland shall not enter into any speculative business whatever, but confine himself entirely to that of commissions only, and in case of any other commissions being offered to him by other firms, he shall first submit the same for the approval of the said C. C. Johnston, in writing, before proceeding with the transaction thereof.

That the said R. B. Borland shall be at liberty to make advances on shipments of produce consigned to the said C. C. Johnston, to the extent of not exceeding three-fourths of the net value thereof, and he is hereby authorised and empowered to draw on the said Samuel Johnston, and Co. for the amount of all such advances, and also for the amount of any orders given by the said firms of Samuel Johnston and Co., Johnston, Pater, and Co., and Johnston, Comber, and Co.

That the said R. B. Borland shall use his best endeavours and utmost exertions in obtaining consignments of and orders for produce, in connection with the said firms.

Charles Carruthers Johnston was alleged by the plaintiffs to be the chief partner in all the three firms, and the evidence of W. H. Brown, the broker who sold the bills of exchange, and of S. P. Slater, clerk of the plaintiffs who bought them, and also of one of the partners of the plaintiffs' firm, was taken in New York before examiners, with a view to show that the plaintiffs bought the bills on the understanding that the goods shipped by the Glensannox were appropriated to meet the bills.

The evidence of R. B. Borland was also taken on this point, and on behalf of the defendants, to show that pressure was put upon him by the plaintiffs to send the telegram of the 10th June 1879.

C. C. Johnston, Thomas Comber, and Thomas Comber Griffiths were also examined in England with regard to the connection of the three firms, and the authority of R. B. Borland to act as agent for them, or to pledge the goods.

R. T. Reid, Q.C., M.P. and Northmore Lawrence for the plaintiffs.—The question to be decided in this action is, whether Borland had authority to create any charge on the goods consigned by the Glensannox, or on the proceeds of the sale of them, whether he purported to create such charge, and whether the plaintiffs bought the bills of exchange on the faith of his making such charge. The agreement of the 11th Dec. 1877 made Borland agent of the three firms, and under it he had authority to pledge the goods, and the evidence of Brown and Slater showed that the bills of exchange were purchased on the faith of Borland pledging the goods, and being authorised to do so. In Frith v. Forbes (7 L. T. Rep. N. S. 261; 4 De G. F. & J. 409) the court held that there was appropriation of cargo to meet bills of exchange. Ex parte Carruthers (3 De G. & Sm. 510) was a different case. In Robey and Co. Perseverance Ironworks v. Ollier (27 L. T. Rep. N. S. 362; L. Rep. 7 Ch. App. 695) Frith v. Forbes was discussed, and the references to that case in the judgments of James and Mellish, L.JJ. are in our favour. Then the defendant received the goods, after notice that they were purchased by means of the bills of exchange, and that they were pledged to meet the bills. It was not competent for them to receive the goods and dishonour the bills. There was a clear intention that there should be an equitable lien on the cargo. All the three firms had notice of the transactions.

Marten, Q.C. and F. Thompson for the defendants.—The letters of advice on the counterfoils, if purporting to pledge the goods, were only a security to Samuel Johnston and Co. The letters of advice were detached by Samuel Johnston and Co. when they accepted the bills, and could confer no benefit upon the plaintiffs. The plaintiffs had nothing to rely upon but the credit of the acceptors of the bills. If the bills of lading are not annexed to the bills of exchange, the only security is the credit of the acceptors:

Robey and Co. Perseverance Ironworks v. Oliver, 27 L. T. Rep. N.S. 362; L. Rep. 7 Ch. App. 695.

In the present case the bills of lading had gone to Pernambuco. [BACON, V.C.—The question I have to decide is, whether from all the documents Borland had the power to make, and did make, an equitable assignment.] The advice and draft on the counterfoil does not amount to an equitable assignment. The bills of lading and the goods went to Pernambuco; it is clear that no charge was intended:

Re Entwistle; Ex parte Arbuthnot, L. Rep. 3 Ch. Div. 477.

Ex parte Banner; Re Tappenbeck, 34 L. T. Rep. N. S. 199; L. Rep. 2 Ch. Div. 278.

There was no appropriation to meet the bills, therefore no equity arose in favour of the holders of the bills to have the proceeds applied in payments of the bills under the doctrine of Ex parte Waring there referred to. No specific lien was given to Borland on the goods or the proceeds of the sale of them:

Thomson v. Simpson, L. Rep. 5 Ch. App. 659.

As to Brown and Slater, a conversation between them could not alter the letter of advice:

Citizens Bank of Louisiana v. First National Bank of New Orleans, L Rep. 6 E. & Ir. App. 352.

As to the agreement of the 11th Dec. 1877, there was no authority given by that to Borland to give any pledge in respect of goods bought by him in New York on commission. In executing orders Borland might draw to the full amount, but he had no authority to pledge the goods. The evidence of Carruthers Charles Johnston showed that he never authorised Borland to make any pledge or charge in respect of the goods ordered, or in respect of the proceeds of the sale of the goods. The counterfoils were merely letters of advice, as between the drawer and drawee of the bills of exchange, and the plaintiffs could not have the benefit of them. Mr Johnston said that, though he was partner in all the three firms, he did not communicate the agreement of the 11th Dec. 1877 to the Pernambuco and Bahia firms. Primâ facie there was no intention of appropriation. As to the conversation between Slater and Brown, general information was given to Slater, the buyer, on behalf of Phelps, Stokes, and Co., that the bills were drawn against consignments for the purpose of showing that the bills represented bonâ fide transactions, but no specific information was given by Brown, the broker, as to shipment against which the bills were drawn. The mere fact of the bills being drawn against goods does not of itself create a charge; and, in this case, the parties never intended, and never did create a charge.

R. T. Reid, Q.C. in reply.—Frith v. Forbes (sup.) is in our favour, and Robey and Co. Perseverance Ironworks v. Ollier (sup.) differs from the present case in that here it was impossible for the bills of lading to be sent with the bills of exchange; the bills of lading had to accompany the goods to Pernambuco. In Ex parte Banner; Re Tappenbeck (sup.) the doctrine of Ex parte Waring was introduced by the circumstances of the bankruptcy. He referred to Re Entwistle; Ex parte Arbuthnot (sup.);

Rankin v. Alfaro, 36 L. T. Rep. N.S. 529; L. Rep. 5 Ch. Div. 786.

As to the counterfoils, why were they appended except to show that the bills were drawn against the shipments? As to the evidence, both Brown and Slater thought that the bills were drawn against shipments, and that there was an hypothecation. If on the facts it was the intention of Brown and Slater that there should be an hypothecation, that disposes of the question of law. Then the defendant says that Borland had no authority to pledge the goods, but by the agreement, and on the evidence, he clearly had authority, and all the firms had notice. Then the defendant, if he refuses to pay the bills of exchange, ought to give up the bills of lading:

Shepherd v Harrison, 1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 66; 24 L. T. Rep. N. S. 857; L. Rep. 5 H. of L. 116.

If the principal takes the bills of lading from his agent, he must take the bills of lading subject to the charge made by the same agent in favour of the acceptors of the bills of exchange. Borland was entitled to raise money by pledging the goods, and his principals are bound by his acts.

BACON, V.C.—The course of mercantile business with regard to specific appropriation is well known, and in the present case I must rely upon the facts, the law upon the subject being plain. Johnston and Co. were merchants at Liverpool, and also at Pernambuco under another firm name. They employed Borland as their agent in New York. The firm at Pernambuco wrote to the firm at Liverpool desiring a purchase to be made in the United States, and the Liverpool firm sent the necessary instructions to Borland. He without any funds or credit that I know of, had to pay for the goods purchased and ship the goods to Pernambuco. Acting within the scope of his authority, he drew bills on the Liverpool house, and to each of these bills was attached a counterfoil stating the particulars of the draft, and of the shipments against which it was drawn. His duty being to charge the Liverpool firm with a commission, he drew the bills and sent them to that firm for acceptance. In the meantime he sold the bills of exchange to the plaintiffs in New York, and he had to transmit the bills of lading to his principals at Pernambuco. It was impossible that the bills of lading could go to Liverpool, for they had to accompany the goods to Pernambuco. There was no hypothecation of the bills of lading to the plaintiffs or any one else. It was said the plaintiffs had a charge on the proceeds of the goods, but there was no intention on the part of any of the three firms, or their agent, to create a charge in favour of the plaintiffs. By his letter Borland merely said, "You may properly accept the bills of exchange because I have shipped the goods." The plaintiffs relied on the solvency of the Liverpool firm, and the counterfoils only meant that the shipments had been made. When the bills were presented for acceptance, Samuel Johnston and Co., as the drawees of the bills, kept the counterfoils. The firm at Pernambuco did not receive any notice of the particulars of the bills. They only knew the goods had been purchased, for they received the goods, and the bills of lading, which were indorsed in favour of the purchasers, who it appeared paid the money to the firm at Pernambuco. The plaintiffs said that the Pernambuco firm should have applied the proceeds of the goods in discharge of the bills, but there was no contract whatever to this effect. The evidence of Brown and Slater, and the telegram of the 10th June 1879, carry the case no further. I find nothing in the shape of an appropriation for payment of the bills out of the proceeds of the goods.

It appears to me that the case is entirely covered by the decision of the Court of Appeal in Ex parte Banne; Re Tappenbeck (34 L. T. Rep. N. S. 199; L. Rep. 2 Ch. Div. 278). As regards the counterfoil, it is impossible to say that it has in terms any application to particular goods. The only meaning of it is that "when you have accepted the bills you will have become purchasers of the goods I have ordered for you," In my opinion it is quite clear that a charge by the counterfoil upon the goods cannot be sustained, and is altogether contrary to established law. I much regret the decision at which I have to arrive in this case, for it is fair justice and honesty on the one side, and law on the other. What is the real nature of the case? Johnston and Co. of Pernambuco on the one side, and Johnston and Co. of Liverpool, the same Johnston on the other; Johnston and Co. of Pernambuco received the proceeds of these goods, and thereout paid the debt due to them from Johnston and Co. of Liverpool, and ignored the plaintiffs' just claim altogether. A more unfair and unjust transaction could not be, but I feel bound by authority to hold that there is not sufficient in the case to amount either to an hypothecation of the goods, or a charge on the goods, though I am very sorry so to decide. The action must therefore be dismissed.

Marten, Q.C.—With costs?

BACON, V.C.—Samuel Johnston has acted two parts, and the defendant has got the money in his pocket, and has succeeded in retaining it. I dismiss the action, but will make no order as to costs, for the whole transaction is a plain dishonesty, and I hope the example will not be followed; Samuel Johnston of Pernambuco, and Samuel Johnston of Liverpool, have received the plaintiffs' money, and kept it.

March 10 and May 30, 1884.

(Before Lord COLERIDGE, C.J. and MATHEW, J.)

THE MERSEY DOCKS AND HARBOUR BOARD v.
THE OVERSEERS OF LLANEILIAN. (a)

Lighthouse — Poor-rate — General lighthouse authority — Part of tower used as telegraph station—"Beneficial occupation" — Adjoining buildings—Merchant Shipping Act 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104), s. 430.

The appellants appealed against a poor rate made by the respondents in accordance with a supplemental valuation of rateable hereditaments in the parish of Llaneilian, wherein the appellants were assessed in respect of a lighthouse, telegraph station, houses, buildings, and land at Point Lynas, at the gross estimated value of 305l., and rateable value of 244l.

The appellants were incorporated as a body of public trustees by the Mersey Docks and Harbour Act 1857, and the property, powers, rights, and privileges of the Liverpool Dock Trustees, including the right to levy certain harbour and light dues on vessels entering the port of Liverpool, were vested in the appellants. The tolls were so fixed that with the other receipts of the appellants applicable to conservancy purposes they should not be higher than necessary for conservancy expenditure, and therefore no profits were receivable by the appellants from the occupation of any of the property.

The lighthouse consisted of a tower and a dwelling-house adjoining. In the tower there was the light-room, which contained the flash-light with clock-work for regulating the flashes, and also a room used for working a telegraph wire which was one of the connections of the wire from Birkenhead to Holyhead, maintained by Her Majesty's Postmaster-General for the exclusive use of the appellants under an agreement. The dwelling-house adjoining the tower and the other premises were occupied by the light-keepers as servants of the appellants.

The tower of the lighthouse had no occupation value except as a lighthouse and as a telegraph station.

The appellants contended that it was not rateable, on the ground that it was exempted by the 430th section of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, and that it was not and could not be the subject of any beneficial occupation, and they contended that the premises other than the tower ought to be assessed upon their value to be let from year to year, supposing they were not used for the light or telegraph, but were disconnected therefrom and applied to any other purposes for which they might be available.

The respondents contended that the whole of the premises ought to be assessed upon their existing value to the existing occupiers.

Held, that the tower was incapable of profitable occupation as a lighthouse, but it being also used as a telegraph station, it was in that respect capable of a beneficial occupation, and therefore rateable, and that, with respect to the adjoining houses, it having been found as a fact that their value was enhanced from being used in connection with the tower, the assessment made on that footing was correct.

(a) Reported by H. D. BONSEY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Held, also, that the 430th section of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 did not apply, and was applicable only to lighthouses under the control of general lighthouse authorities.

Case stated under 12 & 13 Vict. c. 45, s. 11, the material part of which is as follows:—

1. In Aug. 1879 the respondents made a supplemental valuation list of rateable hereditaments in the parish of Llaneilian, in the county of Anglesey, and therein assessed the appellants in respect of a lighthouse, telegraph station, houses, buildings, and land, at Point Lynas, at the gross estimated value of 305*l.*, and a rateable value of 244*l.* The assessment committee of the Anglesey Union confirmed the assessment.

2. On the 19th May 1882 the respondents made a poor rate for the said parish, in accordance with the said supplemental valuation list. The appellants gave notice of appeal to the quarter sessions for the county of Anglesey against the rate, whereupon this case was stated by the consent of the parties and by order of one of the judges of the Queen's Bench Division.

3 and 4. Prior to the year 1857, the docks at Liverpool were vested in the corporation, under the name of the Trustees of the Liverpool Docks, who were empowered to levy certain dues on vessels entering the port of Liverpool, and amongst others, certain harbour and light dues. The appellants were incorporated as a body of public trustees by the Mersey Docks and Harbour Act 1857, and amongst other matters the property powers, rights, and privileges of the Liverpool Dock Trustees, including the right to levy dues as aforesaid, were transferred to the appellants, who are now regulated by the said Act of 1857; the Mersey Dock Acts Consolidation Act 1858; the Mersey Docks (Ferry Accommodation) Act 1860; the Mersey Docks (Various Powers) Act 1867; the Mersey Docks (Liverpool River Approaches) Act 1871; the Mersey Docks Act 1874, and other statutes.

5. By sect. 54 of the said Act of 1857:

The following account shall be kept separately, and shall be dealt with as distinct sources of income and expenditure (that is to say):

(1.) An account of all sums received and disbursed by the board in respect of the following matters, and hereinafter called "conservancy receipts" and "conservancy expenditure;" that is to say, in respect of the maintenance of buoys, landmarks and telegraphs, the expense of lights and lifeboats, the expense of the marine surveyor, the expenses to be incurred as hereinafter mentioned, with the consent of the Commissioners for the Conservancy of the River Mersey, in improving of the port of Liverpool, or the navigation of the river Mersey, the expenses to be incurred in the exercise of the jurisdiction hitherto vested in the corporation of appointing a water bailiff and removing sunken vessels and other impediments to the navigation.

(2.) An account of all sums received and disbursed by the board in the exercise of the powers hitherto vested in the Liverpool Pilotage Commissioners, hereinafter called "pilotage receipts" and "pilotage expenditure."

(3.) An account of all other sums received and disbursed by the board in pursuance of this Act, and hereinafter called "general receipts" and "general expenditure."

By sect. 55 of the same Act:

The board may, with the consent of the Conservancy Commissioners, apply any portion of their general receipts, after providing for the expenses and charges incidental to the Mersey Dock estate, in improving the port of Liverpool or the navigation of the river Mersey; they may also increase or diminish and again increase any rates or dues leviable by them in pursuance of this Act, either generally or in respect of any particular articles.

And sect. 56 of the same Act:

The following rules shall be observed by the board with respect to the moneys received by them under this Act (that is to say):

(1.) The conservancy expenditure shall be defrayed out of the conservancy receipts.

(2.) The pilotage expenditure shall be defrayed out of the pilotage receipts.

(3.) No portion of the conservancy receipt or pilotage receipts shall be applied in aid of the general expenditure.

(4.) No sums shall be payable in respect of docks by any vessel that does not use the same.

(5.) Save as by this Act provided no moneys receivable by the board shall be applied to any purpose, unless the same conduces to the safety or convenience of ships frequenting the port of Liverpool, or facilitates the shipping or unshipping of goods, or is concerned in discharging a debt contracted for the above purposes.

6. Certain lighthouses, lightships, buoys, beacons, landmarks, seamarks, and lifeboats, and lifeboat-houses became vested in the appellants on their incorporation. By sect. 104 of the said Act of 1858, the appellants were empowered to purchase land in convenient situations for the erection of lighthouses, and by sect. 156 of the same Act they are empowered to establish and to alter or remove floating lightships in or near the sea channels within or near the port of Liverpool, subject as to the erection or removal of lighthouses, and the placing or removal of lightships, to the sanction of the Trinity House. Under the said Acts, and the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, s. 394, the appellants may not discontinue any of their lighthouses without the sanction of the Trinity House.

10. By sect. 238 of the said Act of 1858, certain rates called harbour rates, specified in schedule D. to that Act, were made payable to the appellants in respect of all vessels coming into or going out of the port of Liverpool, and not entering into the docks, according to their tonnage, burthens, and to their respective voyages. By sect. 3 of the Mersey Docks Act 1874 the harbour rates set forth in the schedule to that Act were substituted from and after 1st Oct. 1874 for the said rates in schedule D. to the Act of 1858, and it was provided that the appellants might when and as they should deem it expedient so to do from time to time lower and again advance these rates, but so that the same should never exceed the amounts mentioned in the schedule to that Act, and so that the same when so lowered or advanced should not be with the other receipts of the board applicable to conservancy account higher than was necessary for the purposes of conservancy expenditure. The harbour rates actually levied have been about one half of those mentioned in the said schedule.

11. By sect. 230 of the said Act of 1858, certain dock tonnage rates shown in schedule B. to that Act were made payable to the appellants on all vessels entering into or leaving the docks, according to their tonnage, burthens, and according to their respective voyages. These rates included dock dues, lighthouse dues, and floating-light dues, as shown in the said schedule. By sect. 270 of that Act the appellants were empowered from time to time to lower all or any of the rates mentioned in the said schedule B., and again to advance them. The lighthouse dues and floating-light dues included in the dock tonnage rates were kept separate from the dock dues and were carried to conservancy account and applied for conservancy purposes, but by sect. 5 of the said Act of 1874 it was provided that they should no longer be so dealt with, and should be deemed part of the receipts applicable to the general expenditure.

12. By sect. 6 of the said Act of 1874:

From and after the passing of this Act, all sums received by the board in respect of harbour rates and the conservancy portion of the dock tonnage rates, whether under the Act of 1858 or under this Act, and all sums disbursed by the board in respect of conservancy expenditure as defined by sect. 54, sub-sect. 1 of the Act of 1857, shall be deemed to be conservancy receipts or conservancy expenditure as the case may be, and shall be accordingly thenceforward included in the separate account of conservancy receipts and conservancy expenditure which by that section the board are required to keep, and such account shall be called the conservancy account.

14. All the accounts of the appellants are annually audited by a special auditor appointed for the purpose by the Board of Trade under sect. 8 of the Mersey Docks Act 1867.

15. With the consent of the special auditor, a sum of 500*l.* is annually debited to the conservancy account in respect of a portion of certain general expenses of the appellants, which the appellants allege are partly incurred on conservancy account, such as the salaries and office expenses of the general secretary, treasurer, accountant, solicitor, and auditor, and their clerks. There is no permanent debt incurred on conservancy account, though the account is occasionally in arrear owing to larger expenses than usual being incurred in the erection of lighthouses and the undertaking of other structural works. On the 1st July 1881 there remained in hand a surplus of conservancy receipts over conservancy expenditure, amounting to 22,875*l.* The conservancy expenditure for the year preceding was 26,294*l.*, and the receipts 44,430*l.* (including a balance of 5782*l.* carried forward on 1st July 1880). The surplus or deficit on the account in any year is carried forward to the same account in the year following.

16. The lighthouse at Point Lynas, on the north coast of the island of Anglesey, in respect of which the appellants have been assessed as aforesaid, is one of the lighthouses which were maintained by the trustees of the Liverppol Docks and the lease of which for a term of twenty-one years expiring in 1862 became vested in the appellants on their incorporation as aforesaid. The appellants have always since worked and maintained the lighthouse for the convenience and safety of ships frequenting the port of Liverpool, but the light is also of use to other vessels navigating the eastern ports of the Irish Channel.

17. Prior to 1872 poor rates were paid in respect of the lighthouse and lightkeeper's house upon an assessment of 12*l.*, and from 1872 to 1877 (when the present dispute first arose) upon an assessment of 20*l.*, and from 1877 to 1879 upon an assessment of 50*l.* net rateable value. None of the private Acts by which the appellants are regulated contain any express provision exempting the lighthouse or the other assessed premises from the payment of poor rates.

18. Between Nov. 1877 and Aug. 1879 the appellants purchased the freehold of the site of the said lighthouse and of some adjoining land, together about sixteen acres, at a cost of about 3000*l.*, and they spent a sum of about 5600*l.* in structural improvements of the lighthouse in constructing new lighting apparatus, and in erecting two four-roomed houses for the lightkeepers, and a stable. The two houses are in an exposed situation, and partly on that account and partly with a view to making a handsome group of buildings they were built more substantially and expensively than ordinary dwelling-houses with similar accommodation usually are. The said houses, stable, and land, if not used in connection with the lighthouse, might be let by the appellants to other tenants at a rent.

19. The lighthouse consists of a tower and a dwelling-house adjoining. In the tower is the light-room, which contains the flash-light, with clockwork for regulating the flashes, all fitted on cast-iron columns, and on a circular cast-iron base for the light attached to the freehold, and also a room used for working a telegraph wire, which is one of the connections of the wire, from Birkenhead to the south stack, Holyhead, maintained by Her Majesty's Postmaster-General for the exclusive use of the appellants, as mentioned in paragraph 8. The said room is one of the telegraph stations of the appellants within the meaning of the agreement referred to in paragraph 8, and the telegraph wire therefrom is worked by them as mentioned in paragraph 7 and 8. The dwelling-house adjoining the tower and the other premises are occupied by the lightkeepers as servants of the appellants.

21. The tower of the lighthouse has no occupation value except as a lighthouse and as a telegraph station, and the appellants under the present circumstances are the only persons to whom it is of value for those purposes. The appellants contend that it is not rateable on the grounds that it is exempted by the 430th section of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, and that it is not and cannot be the subject of any beneficial occupation, and they contend that the premises other than the said tower ought to be assessed upon their value to be let from year to year, supposing they were not used for the light or telegraph, but were disconnected therefrom and applied for any other purposes for which they might be available.

22. The respondents contend that the whole of the premises ought to be assessed upon their existing value of the existing occupiers.

23. If this court shall be of opinion that the appellants are rateable in respect of the tower and the other premises as used at present for and in connection with the light and telegraph, the present assessment of the appellants' premises is to stand. If in respect of the tower as a telegraph station only, and not as a lighthouse, and the other premises at their value as now used and occupied, the gross estimated rental is to be reduced to 95*l.*, and the rateable value to 76*l.* But if the appellants are rateable in respect only of the premises other than the tower upon their value supposing they were not used for the light or telegraph but were disconnected therefrom, then the gross estimated rental is to be reduced to 45*l.*, and the rateable value to 40*l.*

Carver (Bigham, Q.C. with him) for the appellants.—The lighthouse belongs to the appellants in their capacity of harbour authority, and it is not capable of a profitable occupation; they are expressly restricted by statute from making any profit. In Reg. v. The Metropolitan Board of Works (19 L. T. Rep. N. S. 348; L. Rep. 4 Q. B. 15) it was held that the sewers were not rateable to the poor rate, on the ground that they were not the subject of a beneficial occupation; and that case was followed in The Metropolitan Board of Works v. The Overseers of West Ham (L. Rep. 6 Q.B. 193). The tower of the lighthouse is incapable of having a beneficial occupation, even if the adjoining buildings are. It is submitted that the lighthouse is exempt from rates by the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104) s. 430. (a)

The following cases were also cited:

Mersey Docks v. Cameron, 12 L. T. Rep. N. S. 643; 11 H. of L. 443;

Corporation of Worcester v. The Droitwich Assessment Committee, 34 L. T. Rep. N. S. 288; 2 Ex. Div. 49;

The Mayor of Lincoln v. Holmes Common, L. Rep. 2 Q. B. 482;

Hare v. Overseers of Putney, 45 L. T. Rep. N. S. 337; 7 Q. B. Div. 223;

Lewis v. Churchwardens of Swansea, 25 L. J. 33 M. C.

Marshall (McIntyre, Q.C. with him) for the respondents.—Sect. 430 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 applies only to lighthouses under the general lighthouse authorities, and not to a lighthouse under a local authority as in this case; the fact that the property is used for public purposes is no ground of exemption:

Greig v. The University of Edinburgh, L. Rep. 1 H. of L. Sc. App. 438.

There is nothing to prevent a tenant renting the whole of the Mersey Docks estate, and the lighthouse would increase the value of the estate; it is one of the means by which they obtain dues. This case is distinguished from the cases of Reg. v. The Metropolitan Board of Works and The Metropolitan Board of Works v. The Overseers of West Ham (ubi sup.) because, as payment was made for the use of the sewers, there is no suggestion that a profit could have been made out of the whole system in the sewers cases. It does not follow that, because you cannot get a hypothetical tenant, the property is not rateable.

May 30.—The judgment of the court (Lord Coleridge, C.J. and Mathew, J.) was delivered by Mathew, J.—The assessment appealed against seems to have been made on a calculation of what a landlord might charge by way of rent for the premises rated, and not upon an estimate of the rent at which the premises might reasonably be expected to let from year to year, and we are of opinion that the assessment cannot be maintained. It appears from the statement in the special case that the funds out of which the lighthouse and adjoining premises have been acquired and are maintained are chiefly obtained from tolls levied by the appellants under their statutory powers upon vessels using the Mersey Docks or entering the port of Liverpool. These tolls are directed to be so fixed that with the other receipts of the appellants applicable to conservancy purposes they shall not be higher than is necessary for conservancy expenditure. No profits are therefore receivable by the appellants from the occupation of any of the property in question, and if none of the property rated were capable of being used except upon the conditions imposed on the appellants, it would seem that no assessment could be made: (see Corporation of Worcester v. Droitwich, 2 Ex. Div. 49.) But, as has been settled by the well-known decisions cited in the course of the argument (the Mersey Docks v. Cameron, 11 H. of L. Cas. 443; The Governors of St. Thomas's Hospital v. Stratton, L. Rep. 7 H. of L. 477; Greig v. University of Edinburgh, L. Rep. 1 H. of L. Sc. App. 348), the fact that profits are not earned by the appellants would not extinguish the rateable character of the premises in question if it could be shown that the property was capable of being beneficially occupied in the hands of a tenant from year to year. The question, therefore, seems to be whether any, and if any what, portion of the property is thus capable of a beneficial occupation. With respect to the tower, even if the tolls were received in Liverpool as part consideration for the maintenance of the lighthouse it would seem that the payment would not be a ground for treating this part of the property as rateable: (see Rex v. Coke, 5 B. & C. 797) But the tolls are not so receivable. The lighthouse is a charge upon the funds created by the appellants' statutes. It represents not income but expenditure. In the hands of an ordinary tenant it would yield no return, and would be incapable of profitable occupation as a lighthouse. That it represented an outlay of capital would not render it assessable any more than the property of an analogous character held not to be rateable in Reg. v. The Metropolitan Board of Works (L. Rep. 4 Q. B. 15), and in The Metropolitan Board of Works v. The Overseers of West Ham (L. Rep. Q. B. 193). But the lighthouse is also used as a telegraph station, and for that purpose it seems to have been found as a fact that it is capable of beneficial occupation. In this respect, upon the authority of the decisions last referred to, it would seem to be rateable, and the rateable value we gather has been fixed at 96*l.* We see no reason for differing from this conclusion.

Then with respect to the adjoining houses, it seems also to have been found as a fact that their value is enhanced from their being used in connection with the tower, and we think that the assessment made on this footing should stand at the rateable value of 76*l.* It remains to deal with the point which was made, but not much insisted upon by the learned counsel for the appellants viz., that the property was exempted from being rated under sect. 430 of the Merchant Shipping Act. It seems clear that the Act only applies to lighthouses in charge of the general lighthouse authorities referred to in the statute, and not to those which like the lighthouse at Point Lynas are under the control of a local authority. We direct the rate to be amended in accordance with our judgment, without costs.

(a) 17 & 18 Vict. c. 104, s. 430: All lighthouses, buoys, beacons, and light dues, and all other rates, fees, or payments accruing to or forming part of the said fund, and all premises or property belonging to or occupied by any of the said general lighthouse authorities, or the Board of Trade, which are used or applied for the purposes of any of the services for which such dues, rates, fees, and payments are received, and all instruments or writings used by or under the direction of any of the said general lighthouse authorities or the Board of Trade, in carrying on the said services, shall be exempted from all public, parochial, and local taxes, duties, and rates of every kind.

THE ZADOK. (a)

Collision—Fog—Steam whistle—"Moderate speed"—Regulations for preventing Collisions, Arts. 12 and 13.

It is the duty of a steamship or sailing vessel, in accordance with art. 13 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions, when she is in a fog, passing across a course where it is to be expected that numerous vessels may be navigating, to reduce her speed to as low a rate as is consistent with her keeping good steering way.

Where a sailing ship in a fog hears repeated whistles of an approaching steamship, indicating possible risk of collision, she is bound to take precautions, such as stationing men at the braces ready to put the sails aback, so as to stop her way in the event of a collision becoming imminent.

The fact of a foghorn, alleged to have been blown on board a sailing ship, not being heard by those on an approaching ship, is not of itself proof that such foghorn was not blown, nor is it necessarily proof that there was negligence on board the approaching ship in not hearing it, as the direction in which the sound would be transmitted is uncertain.

A steamship which was proceeding dead slow in a fog, sighted the sails of a sailing ship about two points before the starboard beam of the steamship and about a ship's length distant. The helm of the steamship was immediately starboarded, and her engines set full speed ahead, but the sailing ship struck the steamship about amidships on her starboard side. The Court, having been advised by the Trinity Brethren that it would have been useless and improper for the steamship to have stopped her engines, and that the best chance of escaping the casualty was to put the engines full speed ahead:

Held, that the steamship was justified in departing from the regulation as to stopping and reversing.

THIS was a damage action in rem, instituted by the owners of the steamship Iduna against the owners of the barque Zadok, to recover damages occasioned by a collision between the two vessels, on the 25th May 1883 in the English Channel. The defendants counter-claimed.

The facts alleged on behalf of the plaintiffs were as follows: Shortly after 7 a.m., on the 25th May 1883, the steamship Iduna, of 547 tons net register, manned by a crew of eighteen hands all told, and bound on a voyage from South Shields to Malaga, was in the English Channel, off the Isle of Wight. At this time there was a thick fog, with a fresh wind from about east. The Iduna with her engines at dead slow, was steering W. by S. ½ S., and making between two and three knots an hour. Her whistle was being duly sounded at proper intervals, and a good look-out was being kept on board her. In these circumstances, those on board the Iduna saw the loom of the sails of the barque Zadok about two points before the Iduna's starboard beam and about a ship's length distant. The helm of the Iduna was immediately put to starboard and her engines were set full speed ahead to clear the Zadok if possible; but the Zadok, which was under a press of canvas, approached at great speed and came into collision with the Iduna, the barque's stem striking the Iduna's starboard side abreast of the boilers. The plaintiffs charged the defendants, inter alia, with breach of arts. 12 and 13 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea.

The facts alleged on behalf of the defendants were as follows: Shortly before 7 a.m. on the 25th May 1883, the barque Zadok, of 602 tons register, manned by a crew of sixteen hands, and bound on a voyage from Iquique to Hamburg, was in the English Channel, off the Isle of Wight. At this time the wind was very light from about the east, and there was a thick fog. The Zadok was close hauled on the port tack, heading about S.E. by S., and making about two or two and a half knots an hour. Her mechanical foghorn was being sounded at short intervals, and a good look-out was being kept on board her. In these circumstances those on board the Zadok heard three times the whistle of a steamer, apparently on the port bow, and each time the whistle was immediately answered by the foghorn of the Zadok, which was kept on her course. Very shortly afterwards those on board the Zadok perceived the Iduna about two points on the port bow apparently three or four ships' lengths off and approaching quickly. The foghorn of the Zadok was again blown, but the Iduna came on rapidly and collided with the Zadok, the stem of the Zadok and the starboard side of the Iduna coming into contact. The defendants charged the plaintiffs, inter alia, with breach of art. 13 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea.

The Regulations for Preventing Collisions, above referred to, are as follows:

Art. 12. A steamship shall be provided with a steam whistle or other efficient steam sound signal, so placed that the sound may not be intercepted by any obstructions, and with an efficient foghorn to be sounded by a bellows or other mechanical means, and also with an efficient bell. A sailing ship shall be provided with a similar foghorn and bell.

In fog, mist, or falling snow, whether by day or night, the signals described in this article shall be used as follows; that is to say, (b) a sailing ship under way shall make with her foghorn, at intervals of not more than two minutes, when on the starboard tack one blast, when on the port tack two blasts in succession, and when with the wind abaft the beam three blasts in succession.

Art. 13. Every ship, whether a sailing ship or steam ship, shall in a fog, mist, or falling snow, go at a moderate speed.

The plaintiffs called evidence to prove that the Zadok was under a press of canvas at the time of the collision. They also put in the log of the Zadok, which showed that, with the same wind blowing and with the same sails set as at the time of the collision, the Zadok had previously been making five knots and more in the hour. The plaintiffs further proved that, at the time of the collision, their vessel was only making between two and three knots an hour.

Myburgh, Q.C. (with him Dr. Phillimore) for the plaintiffs.—The navigation of the Iduna was in every way careful and proper. Her steam whistle was duly sounded in accordance with art. 12 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions, and her speed was moderate within the meaning of art. 13. The Zadok, on the contrary, was not going "at a moderate speed." It is to be remembered that she was under a large press of canvas, that the wind was a fresh breeze, and that at the place where the collision occurred numerous vessels would be passing to and fro. She was probably making six knots, which cannot, under the circumstances, be called "a moderate speed." Again, the fact that those on board the Iduna heard no foghorn is strong proof that no foghorn was blown. No precautions seem to have been taken to put the sails aback in the event of collision, though it was known that another vessel was in the immediate vicinity.

Webster, Q.C. and Bucknill for the defendants.—It being primarily the duty of the steamer to keep out of the way of the Zadok, the court, in the absence of strong proof to the contrary, should find the plaintiffs to blame. It is submitted that the Zadok was being navigated as slowly as was possible to enable her to answer her helm. She was, therefore, going at a moderate speed. The fact that those on board the Iduna did not hear the barque's foghorn bears out the allegation that there was a want of due vigilance on the part of those on the Iduna.

Myburgh, Q.C. in reply.

Sir JAMES HANNEN.—It is common ground in this case that there had been foggy weather, off and on, for some time before the collision; and that there had come down, on the spot where the collision took place, a bank of fog, for some considerable time before the collision occurred, which of course made it necessary for both vessels to take proper precautions. Now the evidence satisfies me that on board the steamer care had been taken some time before the collision. Of course that does not prove that at the time of collision, and immediately before, care was being taken; but, at any rate, it has a tendency to show that those on board the Iduna were alive to the necessity of taking proper precautions against casualties arising through the fog, and the evidence proves that those on board the Iduna were discharging the duty imposed upon them under the rules on the subject of blowing their steam whistle every two minutes or so. That is admitted by those on board the Zadok. It was the duty of both vessels to go at a moderate speed, and it appears to me that the object with which that rule of conduct is imposed is, not merely that they should be going at a speed which will lessen the violence of a collision, but also that they should be going at a speed which will give as much time as possible for making any proper manœuvres which may become necessary under unforeseen circumstances—for in a fog it cannot be told exactly from what quarter danger may come. Now, the evidence of the Zadok establishes that on the Iduna the whistle was being blown properly, and it is to be observed that the whistle was heard certainly three times, and that it was heard on each of those two occasions within intervals of something approaching two minutes from a direction bearing about on the same point from the Zadok, namely, from one to one and a half points on her port bow. The evidence is all one way upon that subject, viz., that the sound of each of those whistles was heard, and that finally the Iduna herself was seen with about that bearing from the Zadok. That tends strongly to corroborate the evidence of those on board the Iduna, that that vessel was going at a moderate speed, for, if she had been going at the rate of speed which she is represented by those on board the Zadok to have been going, it is obvious that during those five or six minutes during which those several signals were heard, she would have had an opportunity of greatly changing her position with regard to the Zadok, which it appears she did not do. The Zadok, however, we know was approaching the Iduna with her stem towards her. I therefore think that this evidence corroborates the evidence of those on board the Iduna, that she had been brought to a rate of speed as slow as it was possible for her to be brought to without stopping altogether. Now, on the other hand, with regard to the Zadok, the entries in the log carry the case thus far: they satisfy me—and I may say in passing, that, though I speak of my own judgment, wherever it relates to any nautical matter I am speaking on the advice and with the concurrence of The Trinity Masters—that this vessel, under similar conditions to those in which she was sailing at the time of the collision, i.e., close-hauled and with a moderate breeze, was capable of going at a much greater rate than the witnesses from the Zadok have represented her to be going. Those entries establish that she was capable of going, and that she had gone, five knots an hour under similar conditions, and I am bound to say that the impression left upon my mind by the evidence is that she was at the time of the collision going faster than that.

At present there is a degree of uncertainty as to what construction is to be put upon the phrase that steamers and sailing vessels are to go "at a moderate speed in a fog," and I am disposed to think that no absolute statement of rate of speed can be fixed upon. But it appears to me that the object of the rule is this, that when a fog comes on, it is the duty of the ship, whether she be a sailing vessel or a steamer, to moderate her speed as much as she can, yet leaving herself with the capacity of being properly steered. Of course, in the case of a sailing vessel, we know that she must have way on, and her sails full, otherwise she will not have the power of controlling her movements; but, subject to that, in a fog, where she cannot see her way, it is her duty to moderate her speed down to this standard. Of course some margin must be allowed for the particular circumstances of the case, and it is not to be said that exactly the same rule would apply to a sailing vessel out in mid-ocean; but when one has to deal with a case like this, of a vessel which is passing across a course in which it is to be expected that numerous vessels may be, it is her duty to reduce her speed, as I have said, to as low a rate as is consistent with her keeping good steerage way on her. In this case it is proved that the Zadok, if she had not literally every stitch of canvas set, yet she had very nearly all the canvas set she could carry. I come to the conclusion, therefore, that she was going at a speed which, in the circumstances, was not moderate and that therefore she has infringed the rule. In addition to that I am advised that the course pursued by the Zadok was not proper and seamanlike in this, that, though the whistle of the Iduna was heard once, twice, and thrice, yet no precaution whatever was taken on board the Zadok to guard against a contingency which she was warned might happen. I am advised that men should have been stationed so as to work on the braces and to put the foresails aback by letting the braces fly. However, no precaution was made to do anything on board the Zadok. Those on board her seem to have thought that she, being a sailing vessel, and the Iduna being a steamer, the Zadok had a right to keep her course and do nothing. That is not the view I take, nor the view which I am advised should be taken.

There now remain two other points to be dealt with. First, as to the foghorn. There is a body of evidence that this foghorn was blown; on the other hand there is ample evidenee that those on board the Iduna were alert and on their guard specifically against the dangers likely to happen in a fog, and they all swear that they did not hear the foghorn. Now, I have only to repeat what I said in the case of The Elysia (not reported), namely, that proof that a foghorn was blown, yet was not heard at a distance it might be expected to be heard, cannot be accepted as proof that there was negligence on the part of those who did not hear it. The conditions under which sound is transmitted are not yet known with sufficient certainty, and no evidence has been given me upon the subject. But, speaking on it as a matter of general knowledge, I do not consider that the fact of those on board the Iduna not hearing a foghorn proves that no foghorn was blown. On the other hand, I do not consider that the proof that the foghorn was blown establishes that those on board the Iduna were negligent in not hearing it. It is easy to imagine that this foghorn, though blown, was not blown with its full force, and it may have been that, from the quarter in which the wind was, the sound would be carried away. I therefore come to the conclusion that it was from no want of proper vigilance on the part of those on board the Iduna that the foghorn was not heard, and that therefore their conduct must be judged precisely as though no foghorn had been blown at all. Then, the condition of things was this: that the Zadok suddenly made her appearance on the starboard side of the Iduna, coming directly towards her, and then comes the question, What ought to have been done on the part of the Iduna? It has been strenuously argued by Mr. Webster that the duty was imperatively imposed upon her of stopping and reversing her engines. I am advised by the Trinity Brethren that, in the condition of things represented by those on board the Iduna—which I accept as the true version of the facts—it would have been useless and improper on their part to have stopped and reversed. As things then appeared, the best chance of escaping from the casualty was to put the engines full speed ahead and starboard the helm. I am, therefore, led to the conclusion that the Zadok is solely to blame for this collision.

THE VERA CRUZ. (a)

Collision—Both ships to blame—Lord Campbell's Act (9 & 10 Vict. c. 93)—Board of Trade—Contributory negligence—Breach of Regulations for preventing collisions—Division of damages—The Merchant Shipping Act 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104), s. 512—The Merchant Shipping Act 1873 (36 & 37 Vict. c. 85), s. 17.

Sect. 512 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, disentitling a party to bring an action to recover damages for loss of life or personal injury caused by a collision, unless the Board of Trade has completed or refused to institute an inquiry into the disaster, does not apply to foreign ships.

Sect. 17 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1873, providing that in cases of collision a ship which has infringed any of the Regulations for preventing collisions, contained in or made under the Merchant Shipping Acts 1854 to 1873, shall be deemed to be in fault unless the circumstances of the case made departure from the regulations necessary, is applicable to the case of a master whose ship has infringed such regulations, so that in an action under Lord Campbell's Act, to recover damages resulting from the death of the master, he will be deemed to be in fault for a breach of the regulations, and therefore guilty of contributory negligence, so as to affect the plaintiff's right of recovery.

The ships A. and V. C. came into collision, for which both were found to blame, the A. for breach of the statutory regulations for preventing collisions referred to in sect. 17 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1873, the V. C. for improper navigation. The master of the A. was drowned. His personal representative brought an action in rem under Lord Campbell's Act against the owner of the V. C. to recover damages for his loss.

Held, that though the deceased was deemed to have been guilty of contributory negligence by reason of the breach of the regulations, the Admiralty Court rule as to the division of damages was applicable, and the plaintiff was entitled to recover half the damages sustained by the loss of the deceased.

THIS was an action in rem brought under the provisions of Lord Campbell's Act by Mary Seward, the widow and administratrix of William Seward, deceased, late master of the British schooner Agnes, against the owners of the Spanish steamship Vera Cruz, to recover compensation for the injury sustained by the plaintiff by reason of William Seward's death, which was occasioned by a collision between the Agnes and the Vera Cruz on waters within Her Majesty's dominions. The collision took place in the Crosby Channel near the entrance to the river Mersey between the Crosby and Formby Lightships on the night of the 12th Aug. 1882; and by reason of the collision the Agnes was sunk and her master and some of her crew and passengers were drowned.

Another action in rem had been brought against the Vera Cruz by the owners of the Agnes to recover damages for the loss of the Agnes. In this last-mentioned action the Court had found both ships to blame, the Vera Cruz for negligent and improper navigation, the Agnes (which was at anchor at the time of the collision) for a breach of 37 & 38 Vict. c. 52, s. 1 (An Act to make Regulations for Preventing Collisions in the Sea Channels leading to the river Mersey), in not having the after light of her two anchor lights at double the height of the other. (a) At the hearing of the last-mentioned action it was arranged that the evidence taken should be received as evidence in the life action.

The defendant had filed a petition on protest against the jurisdiction of the court to entertain the action. On the petition coming on for hearing, the learned judge being bound by the decision in The Franconia (3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 435; 36 L. T. Rep. N. 640; 2 P. Div. 163) dismissed it. (b)

The plaintiff's solicitors had failed to give notice to the Board of Trade of her intention to bring her action as required by sect. 512 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, which is as follows:

In cases where loss of life or personal injury has occurred by any accident in respect of which the owner of any such ship as aforesaid is or is alleged to be liable in damages, no person shall be entitled to bring any action, or institute any suit or other legal proceeding in the United Kingdom, until the completion of the inquiry (if any) instituted by the Board of Trade, or until the Board of Trade has refused to institute the same; and the Board of Trade shall for the purpose of entitling any person to bring an action or institute a suit or other legal proceeding be deemed to have refused to institute such inquiry whenever notice has been served on it by any person of his desire to bring such action or institute such suit or other legal proceeding, and no inquiry is instituted by the Board of Trade in respect of the subject-matter of such intended action, suit, or proceeding for the space of one month after the service of such notice.

Gainsford Bruce, Q.C. and French for the plaintiff. — With regard to sect. 512 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, it is submitted that its application is confined to British ships, and that therefore, it would not apply to the Vera Cruz, which is a Spanish ship. The section speaks of the inquiry being held in respect of "any such ship as aforesaid." To ascertain the meaning of these words, it is necessary to refer to sects. 503 and 504, which are repealed sections allowing shipowners to limit their liability. It has been decided that these sections only apply to British ships:

The Wild Ranger, Lush. 553;
Cope v. Doherty, 4 K. & J. 367; 27 L. J. 600, Ch.

Therefore "any such ship as aforesaid" is a British ship. True it is that the Merchant Shipping Act 1862 extends limitation of liability to foreign ships, and that it is thereby enacted that that Act "shall be construed with and as part of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854." But this does not prove that the Legislature in 1862 meant in extending limitation of liability to foreign ships to also extend the inquiry mentioned in sect. 512 to foreign ships, and therefore, in the absence of express words, the section should be construed as only applying to British ships. Moreover, having regard to the mode of procedure incidental to the inquiry, it is to be assumed that it was meant that the section should be confined in its application to British ships. Again, the right of proceeding in rem, as the plaintiff is here doing, was given in 1861 by sect. 7 of the Admiralty Court Act of that year. It was in 1854 that the above-mentioned sect. 512 became law, at which time the only proceeding was in personam. Can it therefore be said that sect. 512 is to be applied to a proceeding which was not in existence when sect. 512 came into operation?

The Mullingar, 1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 252.

Though both these ships have been held to blame, it cannot be said that the deceased was guilty of contributory negligence so as to affect the rights of the plaintiff. By reason of sect. 17 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1872 the Agnes was held to blame because her lights did not comply with the regulations. But it has not been found that the infringement of the rule did in fact contribute to the collision. The section is in its nature penal, and therefore in the absence of express words it should be confined to the owners of the statutory wrong-doing ship, and not extended to the master:

Thorogood v. Bryan, 8 C. B. 115;
Armstrong v. Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Company, L. Rep. 10 Ex. 47; 33 L. Rep. N. S. 228.
The Milan, Lush. 388;
The Khedive, 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 360; 43 L. T. Rep. N. S. 610; L. Rep. 5 App. Cas. 876.

Even assuming that the deceased was guilty of negligence, yet, inasmuch as those on the Vera Cruz by the exercise of ordinary care and diligence might have avoided the collision, the defendants are not entitled to take advantage of the deceased's statutory negligence, so as to escape liability:

Radley v. London and North-Western Railway Company, L. Rep. 1 App. Cas. 754; 35 L. Rep N. S. 637;
Davies v. Mann, 10 M. and W. 546;
Tuff v. Warman, 5 C. B. N. S. 573.

The Admiralty Court rule as to the division of damages does not apply in the present case. By sect. 25, sub-sect. 9 of the Judicature Act 1873, it is enacted that where both ships are found to blame, "the rules hitherto in force in the Court

(a) Sect. 1 is as follows: Any general regulations for preventing collisions at sea for the time being in force under the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Acts, shall be construed as if the following regulations were added thereto: that is to say (2) Every ship at anchor in the said sea channels or approaches, within the limits aforesaid, shall carry the single white light prescribed by article 7 of the General Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, made under the authority of the Merchant Shipping Acts Amendment Act 1862, at a height not exceeding twenty feet above the hull suspended from the forestay or otherwise near the bow of the ship where it can be best seen; and in addition to the said light, all ships having two or more masts shall exhibit another similar white light at double the height of the bow light at the main or mizen-peak, or the boom topping lift, or other position near the stern where it can best be seen.—ED.

(b) On appeal, the Court of Appeal has since this date reversed this decision, and held that the High Court of Justice (Admiralty Division) has no jurisdiction to entertain an action in rem brought under Lord Campbell's Act: (see The Vera Cruz, post.)—ED.

of Admiralty," if in conflict with the rules of common law, shall prevail. Inasmuch as at present there is no Admiralty rule in respect of a case of this kind, the court is invited to follow the common law rule and give full damages and not a moiety:

If, however, the court should think fit to apply the Admiralty Court rule, then the question of contributory negligence is immaterial, and the plaintiff recovers half the damage she has sustained:

The Milan, Lush. 388.

Dr. Phillimore and Bucknill for the defendants.—The court has no jurisdiction to entertain this action:

Smith v. Brown, L. Rep. 6 Q. B. 729; 1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 56; 24 L. T. Rep. N. S. 808;

It is true that, in order to ascertain the meaning of "any such ship" in sect. 512 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, one must look to sect. 505, which is the section as to limitation of liability. But it has been decided that Part IX. of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, within which is sect. 512, is applicable to the case of damage done to a foreign ship by collision with a British ship within Her Majesty's dominions, as was the case here:

The General Iron Screw Colliery Company v. Schurmanns, 4 L. T. Rep. N. S. 158; 29 L. J. 876, Ch.

Moreover by reason of the Merchant Shipping Act 1862, which is to "be construed with and as part of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854," sect. 504 of the Act of 1854 is replaced by 54 of the Act of 1862, which extends limitation of liability to foreign ships. Therefore the "any such ship" mentioned in sect. 512 covers both British and foreign ships, and if so, the plaintiff has not complied with the requirements of that section, and hence is debarred from prosecuting this action. With regard to the objection that the mode of procedure incidental to the inquiry could only be conveniently applied to British ships, the same objection applies to colonial vessels, and yet undoubtedly the section covers them. Although it was not until 1861 that the right of proceeding in rem was given in a case like the present, and sect. 512 became law in 1854, yet the words used "no person shall be entitled to bring any action, or institute any suit or other legal proceeding "are sufficiently wide to cover a proceeding in rem, which it is to be noticed is not a new right of action, but merely a more effective means of enforcing a right of action already existing in 1854. By reason of sect. 17 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1872 the Agnes had been held to blame for infringement of a statutory regulation. In other words, her master was guilty of statutory negligence. Where a ship is found to blame for breach of a statutory regulation, the rights of owners of cargo are affected thereby. If so, it follows that a master who has been guilty of the breach is affected. Inasmuch as there is no Admiralty Court rule as to division of damages under circumstances like the present, the common law rule applies. If so, the plaintiff is debarred from recovering anything, inasmuch as the deceased has been found partly to blame for the collision in failing to obey the regulations:

Thorogood v Bryan (ubi sup.);
Butterfield v. Forrester 11 East, 60;
Bridge The Grand Junction Railway Company, 3 M. and W. 244;
Dowell v. General Steam Navigation Company, 5 Ell. and B. 195;
The George and Richard, L. Rep. 3 A. & E. 466;
The Milan, Lush. 388.

The doctrine that the negligence of the plaintiff is immaterial, if the defendant by the exercise of reasonable care and caution might have avoided the accident, is but a dictum of Lord Truro in Radley v. London and North-Western Railway Company, and is not supported by authority.

G. Bruce, Q.C. in reply.—The case of The General Iron Screw Colliery Company v. Schurmanns is not in point, inasmuch as there the wrong-doing ship was a British ship, and the question was whether her owners could limit their liability as against the owners of the foreign ship which had been damaged by the collision.

Cur. adv. vult.

April 18.—BUTT, J.—On the night of the 11th Aug. 1882 the schooner Agnes was run into and sunk by the Spanish steamship Vera Cruz near the Crosby Lightship, outside the entrance of the river Mersey. William Seward, the master, and three others of the crew of the Agnes were drowned. Before and at the time of the collision the Agnes had two anchor lights burning, one on the forestay and one on the topping lift aft. These lights were good lights, but the one aft was some feet lower than it should have been pursuant to the regulations in force at the place of collision, one of which directs that the fore-

(a) This was a summons in judges' chambers by the plaintiff in an action instituted in the Queen's Bench Division under Lord Campbell's Act, calling upon the defendants to show cause why a preliminary act should not be filed.

The action was brought in personam against the Manchester, Sheffield, and Lincolnshire Railway Company, by a widow to recover damages due to the death of her husband which had been occasioned by a collision at sea.

Jan. 1, 1884.—F. W. Raikes, for the plaintiff, in support of the summons.—By Order XIX., r. 28, it is ordered that preliminary acts shall be filed "in actions in any division for damage by collision between vessels." The present case is therefore covered by that order.

Bucknill, for the defendants, contra.—The word "damage" does not apply to an action for personal injury.

BUTT, J.—I am unable to see why if it is right that a preliminary act should be filed where damage is done to goods by a collision, a preliminary act should not be filed if the damage is done to the person. No good reason can be suggested for such a distinction, I shall therefore make the order unless the rule prevents me. The rule speaks of "actions for damage by collision." Can it be argued that there was not damage by collision "in this case?" It is said that a technical meaning is to be given to the word "damage," but I do not think so. I shall therefore order the preliminary act to be filed.

most of the two lights shall be carried at a height not exceeding 20 feet above the hull, and the light aft at double the height of the other. The 17th section of the Merchant Shipping Act 1873 provides: "If, in any case of collision, it is proved to the court before which the case is tried that any of the regulations for preventing collision contained in or made under the Merchant Shipping Acts 1854 to 1873 has been infringed, the ship by which such regulation has been infringed shall be deemed to be in fault unless it is shown to the satisfaction of the court that the circumstances of the case made the departure from the regulation necessary." It is admitted that this section applied to the Agnes. Two actions in rem were brought against the Vera Cruz. In the first action the plaintiffs were the owners of the schooner in a suit for damages occasioned by the collision. In the second action the plaintiff is the administratrix of William Seward, the master of the Agnes. She claimed damages for the loss of her late husband and of her son, Thomas Seward, who was an apprentice on board, and who was also drowned; but at the trial of the action the claim for damages in respect of her son's death was abandoned. The first action came on for trial on the 7th March 1884, when it was arranged that the evidence taken in that action should be received as evidence in the second action also. The defendants, amongst other matters, relied on the plea of compulsory pilotage. The court decided that the collision was caused by the negligence of those on board the Vera Cruz, and that such negligence was not the negligence of the pilot alone. It also held both vessels to blame in conformity with the cases prescribing the effect to be given to sect. 17 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1873, namely, that, if the infringement of the regulation might by possibility have caused or contributed to the collision, the ship by which they are infringed shall be deemed to be in fault. The question now under consideration is whether the defendants are liable in the second action to any, and, if so, to what extent, for the damage occasioned by the loss of the said William Seward. I find, as a fact, that the death of the said William Seward was occasioned by the negligence of the defendants' servants. As a question of contributory negligence on the part of the said William Seward arises, it should be stated that he was on the deck of the Agnes when her riding lights were hoisted, and that he saw the position in which they were placed.

The defendants contend, in the first place that no action in rem will lie under Lord Campbell's Act. This question was not argued before me, it being admitted by the defendants' counsel that for the purposes of to-day this matter is concluded by authority, and that such authority is against them: (The Franconia, The Guldfaxe, The Explorer.) Secondly, the defendants contend that this action cannot be maintained, because the Board of Trade has neither instituted nor refused to institute the inquiry mentioned in sect. 512 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854. If this section applies to the present case it is clear that the action must fail. But I am of opinion that it has no application to cases of loss of life caused by a foreign ship. It seems clear that none of the sections of the Act of 1854, from sect. 502 to sect. 512 inclusive, had originally any application to foreign vessels. But it was contended on behalf of the defendants that the joint effect of sects. 1 and 54 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1862 makes sect. 512 applicable to such cases as the present. There is, no doubt, some foundation for this contention. But I am informed that the Board of Trade, almost from the outset, abandoned all notion of instituting the proceedings contemplated by the 507th and following sections of the Act of 1854, even in the case of British ships, and I do not believe that when the Act of 1862 was passed it was intended to make any such proceedings applicable to foreign ships. At all events I do not think there are words which compel me to hold that this has been done, and I therefore decline to dismiss the suit on such grounds.

The next question I have to consider is, whether a defence to the whole or any part of the plaintiff's claim on the ground of contributory negligence on the part of the deceased William Seward has been established. Both sides have argued that the old common law rule, as opposed to the Admiralty Court rule in cases of damage to ships, is applicable to this case, counsel for the defendant asserting that there was contributory negligence on the part of William Seward, which bars the plaintiff's right to recover at all, and counsel for the plaintiff maintaining that the facts of the case do not support such a defence, and that the plaintiff is therefore entitled to recover full damages. It is urged that, inasmuch as one of the statutory rules was infringed, I must, by virtue of sect. 17 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1873, hold contributory negligence to have been proved, and dismiss the suit. On the other hand, it is said that, even if negligence must by virtue of the statute be imputed to the husband of the present plaintiff, yet inasmuch as by the exercise of ordinary care the defendants' servants might have avoided the collision, the plaintiff is, by the old common law rule at all events entitled to recover full damages. The judgment of the House of Lords in Radley v. The London and North-Western Railway Company was cited as an authority for that proposition. No doubt there is a passage in Lord Penzance's judgment in that case which favours such a contention. The passage is as follows: "But there is another proposition equally well established, and it is a qualification upon the first, viz., that though the plaintiff may have been guilty of negligence, and although that negligence may in fact have contributed to the accident, yet if the defendant could, in the result, by the exercise of ordinary care and diligence, have avoided the mischief which happened, the plaintiff's negligence will not excuse him." I think this passage, if it is to be understood in the sense for which the plaintiff in the present case contends, which I doubt, went beyond what the House of Lords intended. A decision to that effect would have put an end to the doctrine of contributory negligence altogether. Defendants are not liable in an action of this nature unless they or their servants have been guilty of negligence, or, in other words, have failed to exercise "ordinary care and diligence." What becomes of the doctrine of contributory negligence on the part of a plaintiff if a mere want of "ordinary care and diligence" on the part of a defendant is an answer to it when in all cases, where the question of contributory negligence arises, there is ex hypothesi a want of such ordinary care and diligence on the part of the defendant? In the passage of the report immediately following that which I have quoted, Lord Penzance goes on to say: "This proposition, as one of law, cannot be questioned. It was decided in the case of Davies v. Mann, supported in that of Tuff v. Warman and other cases, and has been universally applied in cases of this character without question." Now the case of Davies v. Mann certainly does not support such a proposition, neither, so far as I am aware, do any of the other cases, with the exception, perhaps, of Tuff v. Warman. The judgment of the court delivered by Wightman, J. in that case contains the following passage: "It appears to us that the proper question for the jury in this case, and, indeed, in all others of the like kind, is, whether the damage was occasioned entirely by the negligence or improper conduct of the defendant, or whether the plaintiff himself so far contributed to the misfortune, by his own negligence or want of ordinary and common care and caution, that, but for such negligence or want of ordinary care and caution on his part, the misfortune would not have happened. In the first place the plaintiff would be entitled to recover, in the latter not, as, but for his own fault, the misfortune would not have happened. Mere negligence or want of ordinary care or caution would not, however, disentitle him to recover unless it were such, that, but for that negligence or want of ordinary care and caution, the misfortune could not have happened, nor if the defendant might, by the exercise of care on his part, have avoided the consequences of the neglect or carelessness of the plaintiff. This appears to be the result deducible from the opinion of the judges in Butterfield v. Forrester (11 East, 60); Bridge v. The Grand Junction Railway Company (3 M. & W. 246); Davies v. Mann (10 M. & W. 548); and Dowell v. The General Steam Navigation Company (5 Ell. & B. 206)." I have looked at the cases there cited, but they contain nothing to support the last part of the proposition. What those cases really decide is, that, although there may have been negligence on the part of the plaintiff, yet, unless he, the plaintiff, might, by the exercise of ordinary care, have avoided the consequences of the defendant's negligence, he is entitled to recover. If, by ordinary care, he might have avoided them, he is the author of his wrong: (cf. the judgment of Parke, B. in Davies v. Mann.) This doctrine, it will be seen, is a different thing from that for which the plaintiff is here contending, and I think, therefore, that her contention on that head cannot be maintained.

But then comes the question, am I bound to hold that there was, under the circumstances, contributory negligence on the part of the deceased, William Seward? Apart from the statute, contributory negligence would mean negligence actually conducing to the collision. Now, as a matter of fact, there is no evidence to show, neither is there reason to believe, that such an alteration of the relative position of the lights of the schooner as would have been a compliance with the rule would have avoided the collision. Unless, therefore, by force of the statute, I am bound to impute contributory negligence to the deceased, the plaintiff is entitled to recover the whole amount of damage she has sustained by the loss of her husband. Has sect. 17 such effect? I have already given that effect to it in the first of these actions—that between the owners of the Agnes and the present defendant. It is said that the enactment is in its nature penal and that I ought not to apply it unless its words are clear and distinct; that by its terms the ship, or at most the shipowner, is to be deemed to be in fault, and that, therefore, no similar inference is to be drawn against the captain. So to decide in the present case would be to hold the owner responsible for the negligent acts of their servant, the captain, and in the same breath to exempt him from the consequences of his negligence. This I cannot do. I therefore decide that the loss of the life of William Seward was occasioned by the negligence of the defendants, and that there was contributory negligence on his part, contributory negligence conducing to the result.

What consequences are to follow? Am I to apply the old common law rule and dismiss the suit, or am I, in conformity with another contention of counsel, to decree for the plaintiff half the damage sustained by her by the loss of her husband, to be paid by the defendants? In the judgment of the Privy Council in the case of The Laconia there is the following passage: "The judge found both parties to blame, and he ordered that the damage sustained by each should be added together, and each party pay one-half. The effect on the present occasion would be a loss to the Laconia of about 20,000*l*. But it is not to the effect we must look; we must direct our attention to other considerations. Had the rule prevailing at common law been adopted, each party would have had to bear his own loss. Opinions may differ, and indeed do differ, as to what course is most consonant to justice. This question we are not called upon to decide; but what we have to decide is, when the proceeding is in rem, what ought to be the rule—what was the intention of the authority which sanctioned and made legal the exercise of the jurisdiction in rem. Could it be intended to constitute a jurisdiction in rem with a common law remedy? We think that no such anomaly could be intended, and therefore concur in the view of the Consular Court." The course there indicated is that which I shall take. True it is that the exact mode of assessing the damages contemplated in that case cannot be followed in the present action, because, as between the present plaintiff and the defendant, the damage is all on one side. But I think that the case of The Milan is in principle sufficiently analogous to allow of my following the judgment of Dr. Lushington in that suit, and decreeing that the plaintiff do recover a moiety of the damage she has sustained, and I refer it to the registrar and merchants to ascertain the amount.

(Before Sir JAMES HANNEN and FIELD, J., assisted by TRINITY MASTERS.)

THE RONA. (a)

Damage to cargo—Stranding—Duty of master to repair—Negligence in not repairing—Caulking decks.

If a vessel after she has started on her voyage receive damage, the master, in considering what steps he shall take in regard to carrying on the cargo or first repairing the ship, is bound to consider not one individual interest, but the interests of all concerned, and to do that which a prudent master would do under the circumstances, whether it be to return to his port of loading and repair, or repair at the nearest possible place before proceeding, or go on without repairing; but if it be in his power to effect the repairs without any great delay or expense to the interests intrusted to his charge it is his duty to repair before proceeding.

The R., a wooden vessel under a charter-party from the port of New York to London with a cargo of grain and flour, left her moorings and was towed down the New York river, and on her way stranded on the Craven Shoal, which is about ten miles below New York.

A tug towed at her for an hour and three-quarters before she was got off, during that time her decks and waterways were much strained, and she was then found to be making five inches of water per hour; but the master did not examine her or cause any repairs or caulking to be done, but proceeded on her voyage and encountered very severe weather.

On her arrival in London the flour of the plaintiff, which was immediately beneath the deck, was found to have been damaged by the sea water making its way through the deck, the grain at the bottom of the ship being uninjured.

Held, that the master was negligent in not repairing; that is, in not caulking the deck before he proceeded on his voyage, that the ship was more liable thereby to sustain damage and to injure the cargo, and that the defendants were liable for the damage occasioned thereby.

Cohn v. Davidson (36 L. T. Rep. N. S. 244; 2 Q.B. Div. 455; 46 L.J. 305, Q.C.; 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 374) distinguished.

THIS was an appeal from the City of London Court by the defendants, judgment having been given against them.

The action was originally brought by the plaintiffs, the holders of a bill of lading on a cargo of flour, against the Rona for damages to the said cargo alleged to have been caused by the negligence of the shipowner, and first came on for hearing in the City of London Court on the 28th April 1881.

After the examination of the plaintiffs' witnesses the defendants raised two objections: First, that the plaintiffs were not entitled to sue; and, secondly, that the court had no jurisdiction to try the action. The first objection was not then disposed of, the plaintiffs applying for leave to amend by adding a plaintiff, but on the second objection the learned judge decided that he had no jurisdiction to try the case, and therefore refused to proceed any further with it.

From this decision the plaintiffs appealed to the Admiralty Division of the High Court of Justice, and the appeal was allowed by deciding that the court below had jurisdiction to try the action, and the action was then remitted for trial: (see 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 520; 7 P. Div. 241.)

On the 15th May 1882 the action came on for hearing the second time in the City of London Court, and judgment was given for the plaintiffs with a reference to the registrar to assess the amount of damage, the consignee Strange having been added as a plaintiff with his consent.

From this judgment the defendants now appealed.

The facts of the case were shortly as follows: The Rona, a wooden vessel, shipped at New York for London a general cargo, partly consisting of grain and flour, for which bills of lading (of which the plaintiffs were holders) were given, and thereby the goods were to be delivered to the shippers' order or assigns, "dangers by sea and fire only excepted." She left her moorings in New York on the 27th Dec. 1879, and was towed down the New York river by a tug, and proceeded in safety until she came to the Craven Shoal within the entrance to the river, and there she got aground and stuck fast. From the log of the Rona (kept by the mate) it appeared that, previous to the ship leaving New York she was making no water, even after she had shipped her cargo; that when she struck the shoal there was a considerable swell on; that the ship rolled about and strained; that the tug towed at her for one hour and three-quarters, during which time a nine-inch hawser was broken up; and that when the tide flowed, with the assistance of the tug, she was got off the shoal. She proceeded on her voyage, but on sounding the pumps it was found that the ship was making more water than before, that she was apparently strained about the waterways and decks, and at 7 p.m. she was found to be making five inches of water per hour. On the 29th she began to encounter heavy weather, which increased in violence, doing the vessel considerable damage, and shipping such quantities of water that the pumps had to be kept constantly going. The weather continued till the 12th Jan. 1880, when it somewhat abated, and she eventually arrived in safety at her destination. Upon her arrival it was found that the ship and cargo had sustained considerable damage. A survey was held on the ship by Lloyd's surveyor, and he found that a few sheets of metal had been torn off the bottom, and that the decks were strained and leaky throughout. A survey was also held on the flour cargo, and, from the evidence of this surveyor, it appeared that he had found the decks and waterways much strained, and the decks saturated with sea water, and gave it as his opinion that the damage to the flour was occasioned by sea water coming through the deck where the caulking had become defective and opened the decks, and that such straining and defects could not have arisen from the bad weather alone. On the part of the defendants it was admitted that the goods were shipped in good order and condition, that on arrival at their destination they were found to have been damaged with sea water, but they maintained that the damage was caused by perils of the sea due to the violence of the weather encountered in crossing the Atlantic, and within the exceptions in the bill of lading.

The master stated that in his opinion the fact of her making five inches of water per hour was not of itself sufficient to necessitate his doing anything to the ship, because she had already been making three inches in harbour, and that he never saw that the decks and waterways were strained. The statement as to the water in harbour was contradictory to the entries in the ship's log, the master himself having signed the protest containing the same words as the log, as to straining.

Upon the close of the evidence three questions were put by the learned judge to the assessors, namely: (1) Was there negligence in going to sea without repairing? (2) Did it contribute to the damage sustained by the cargo? Both of these the assessors answered in the affirmative. And (3) Would the cargo have been equally damaged if the ship had not stranded in the river? To this they answered "Not so much." The learned Commissioner in giving judgment said that he differed from the assessors as to this last point, in that he considered that if she had gone on without touching on the Craven Shoal, she still would have done the damage. But the nautical assessors having more experience in such matters than himself, he should, on the finding of the facts by the assessors, give judgment in accordance therewith for the plaintiffs. From this the defendants now appealed.

Myburgh, Q.C. and Kennedy for the appellants. —Mr Strange is not the proper person to sue; he became the consignee of the goods after they had been delivered. Under such circumstances he is not the "consignee" or "indorsee" within the meaning of these words in the Bills of Lading Act (18 & 19 Vict. c. 111), s. 1. Indorsement after delivery makes the bill of lading a mere chose in action. [FIELD, J.—I think the authorities are against you on that point: Meyerstein v. Barber (2 Mar. Law Cas. O.S. 518; 16 L. T. Rep. N. S. 569; L. Rep. 2 C. P. 38, 661); Burdick v. Sewell (10 Q. B. Div. 363). Sir J. HANNEN. —It is obvious that the judge below intended to add the name of any plaintiff who was entitled to sue, and, if the right parties have not been added, we shall certainly add them. Is it worth while to press that point?] Then, on the other point, the damage sustained by the flour was caused by perils of the seas. This appears from the survey of Lloyd's surveyor. The bottom of the vessel was in reality not damaged at all. The vessel was making nearly as much water before she touched the shoal as she was making afterwards. If the master had honestly but unnecessarily put back for the purpose of repairing the damage, and there had been no actual danger, there would have been no general average. As to the question of seaworthiness, the warrant applies only to the time when the voyage commences, and as soon as the voyage has commenced the warranty is at an end:

Cohn v. Davidson, 2 Q. B. Div. 455; 36 L. T. Rep. N. S. 244; 3 Asp. Mar Law. Cas. 374; 46 L. J. 305; Q. B.;
Steel v. State Line Steamship Company, 37 L.T. Rep. N. S. 333; 3 App. Cas. 72; 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 516.

There is no case which decides that when a vessel has incurred damage at sea, and the master proceeds on his voyage acting honestly, that such action on his part amounts to negligence. [FIELD, J. cited Worms v. Storey, 11 Ex. 430; 25 L.J. 1, Ex.] That case was decided on demurrer. In Cohn v. Davidson, Lush, J., in summing up to the jury, told them that it was not the duty of a master to go back if he then honestly although erroneously believed that he could accomplish the voyage; and, that, if the master acted honestly, the shipowners were not liable for negligence, and in the judgment of the court they appear distinctly to have approved that direction. Whatever might be the duty of a master, if he were close to his point of departure, he cannot be justified in putting back where he has several interests intrusted to his charge and such putting back would be detrimental to those interests as a whole, though possibly beneficial to one.

J. P. Aspinall and Raikes for the respondent. —The ship not having left the port of New York, the voyage had not commenced and the warranty of seaworthiness was not complied with. [Sir J. HANNEN.—Can it be contended that the voyage does not commence when the ship first starts from her mooring berth? I shall certainly so hold until I am convinced to the contrary.] Secondly, even assuming that the master had only the alternative of proceeding on his voyage or of returning to port, and so incurring heavy general average charges, he has no right to proceed if he thereby incurs a risk of damage which will fall on even one portion of the cargo alone. He must do the best for each individual interest. By this bill of lading he undertakes to deliver unless prevented by perils of the sea. If he puts to sea in a damaged condition, whereby the cargo receives injury which it would not have sustained if his ship was sound, the injury is not occasioned by perils of the sea, but by the act or default of the master, provided that he had the opportunity of repairing. If he has such opportunity he is bound to repair:

Notara v. Henderson, 1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 278; L. Rep. 7 Q. B. 225.

Here the master might have put back to New York, or even he could have remained at anchor where he was, and could have caulked his ship. Cohn v. Davidson was a Nisi Prius decision only on the point above mentioned, and it does not appear that it was approved by the Court. A carrier is bound to do his utmost to protect goods committed to his charge from loss or damage, and if he fails to do so he is liable:

The shipowner cannot excuse himself from liability for damage caused by his negligence by showing that some damage could have happened through perils of the sea if no act of negligence had been committed:

Myburgh, Q.C. in reply.

Sir J. HANNEN.—It is obvious that it lies upon those who impeach the judgment of the learned commissioner to establish that it is wrong. Some observations have been made upon expressions that fell from him indicating that he did not entirely agree with the assessors who assisted him, but that cannot affect our judgment. We put ourselves in his position, and upon these facts, with the assistance we have derived from the Trinity Brethren who are with us, we have to say whether we can see that his judgment is wrong. A preliminary point was taken, but has apparently been abandoned, and I think very properly, by Mr. Myburgh, with regard to the title to sue. It is obvious that the learned commissioner intended to make any amendment that would be necessary in order to get the right parties on the record, and Mr. Strange (I think is the name) appears to have been mentioned as consignee, and no question was raised at the time and we do not consider that this is a point which is now open to the appellants to take. It has been passed by, and I see no reason to doubt that Mr. Strange is the right person to sue.

Now, with regard to the facts of the case. We have already intimated our opinion that this voyage must be considered to have commenced from the time when the ship started from whatever were her moorings, with her cargo on board, for the purpose of proceeding down the New York harbour and out to sea, and that therefore the warranty of seaworthiness had been fulfilled. But, as to the facts which followed, the first question which arises is whether the vessel had been making any water before she struck on the shoal; and I must say, speaking for myself, that I greatly doubt the veracity of the captain's statement that she was making three inches of water before that time. I am very much inclined to think that that was stated by him to lead up to the five inches; but the reason why I reject his statement is that I find in the log a distinct statement that she was making no water; but however that may be, whether she was making three inches of water or none immediately after she struck on this shoal, she is recorded to have made five inches of water. Suggestions have been thrown out that the log had been tampered with and made up in a different ink, and so on, for which I really see no foundation whatever. It is quite certain that the master has never repudiated this log; he has adopted it. He has made statements in the protest upon the basis of it, and I, for my part, entertain no doubt that he did know perfectly well that the mate had recorded that the vessel was making five inches of water after she touched; and, more than that, the log shows that a certain damage done to the vessel was apparent, viz., that the waterways and decks were strained. This being the condition of things, the first question which was put to the assessors in the court below and which we have thought it right to put to the Trinity Brethren who assist us is, whether that indicated such an amount of damage to the vessel, as made it necessary for the master to consider whether he should put back or what other steps he should take for the purpose of remedying the mischief that had been done, or mitigating its consequences, and I may say at once that the Trinity Brethren who assist us here, and who very properly have been appealed to so often in the course of this discussion as those who would give us advice and who would be able to correct the assessors below, entirely agree with the assessors below.

The question then arises, what should be done under such circumstances? Now, I must say that I am not prepared to hold, according to the argument put forward by Mr. Aspinall, that the instant it becomes clear that by going on some mischief will be done to some portion of the cargo, that it becomes the duty of the captain to go back, and perhaps put all concerned to a very enormous expense; neither, on the other hand, can I assent to the proposition that the liability of the owner depends upon the honesty of the belief of the captain that what he proposes to do is the right thing, and so far as I know, and so far as the argument before us to-day has informed my mind, I am not aware of any authority for the proposition, except the supposed authority of Cohn v. Davidson. I think it perfectly clear from the context (my learned brother who will deliver judgment will probably know more than I of the facts), and I infer from the judgment, that so far from the court in that case not adopting the language of Lush, L.J., that what they were seeking to do was to show that the parties had not been prejudiced by a hasty expression of Lush, L.J., and to show that the facts corrected that, and that the rest of his summing up prevented the jury being under any misconception. But, passing from that, I must say that I am inclined to think that the argument which has been so forcibly put by Mr. Kennedy is correct, that the master is entitled to take into consideration the whole venture. He must not consider only the question of the ship, he must consider the question of the whole venture. Well, you can no doubt introduce a very large number of elements for his consideration, and the question what would be right for him to do would of course depend on the distance he has gone from the port. I put an extreme case by way of testing it. It seems to me, what it would be plainly a man's duty to do, if he was only half a mile or a mile from the port, would be something very different if the ship had gone twenty miles, or any other distance you might suppose; but the question in every case, in my judgment, which has to be considered is this, whether or not, taking all the circumstances into consideration the master has been guilty of negligence. Of course, that must be judged by the opinion of the tribunal which has to determine upon it. We cannot take the uncertainty of his mere judgment as a test; we have to consider whether a properly constituted captain in that position would have done what this captain has done. Upon this point we have taken the opinion of those who are with us, and they are of opinion that this captain did not do all he ought to have done, and that he has been guilty of negligence in one manifest respect. Before mentioning what he might have done, I may say it appears to me in this case that the captain did not exercise any judgment at all. He did not take into account what he was to do, but he blindly and promptly went on his way without considering what should be done under the circumstances which had arisen, and his excuse now is one which I do not believe, namely, that he was not conscious that he was in any exceptional position; that he thought he might go on and might treat the result of getting on the shoal, and the fact that he was drawing five inches of water in an hour, as of no importance. We are advised that one obvious thing which he might have done was this, that when he saw, as I am assuming that he did, that the vessel had been so strained and had received such a shock that her waterways and decks were strained, and that in some way or other she was making five inches of water per hour, that ought to have indicated that he should, at least, have taken the precaution of having the waterways and the decks caulked for the purpose of preventing the water getting through, as it was able to do, if she encountered any bad weather such as she did encounter at that season of the year.

There is, therefore, in the judgment of those who assist us, one plain element of negligence which would, if it had not been committed, from the precaution which has been mentioned, have had a tendency to prevent the saturation of the deck with water and the penetration of water into the hold. "But," says Mr. Myburgh, "there being no damage shown to have been done to the bottom, therefore that shows that this damage cannot have resulted from the negligence that is imputed." I really have not been able to follow that. It is obvious that if she made more water after she touched on the shoal than she did before—if we draw the inference that the touching on the shoal was the cause of her making more water—then, if there was no damage to her bottom, it is plain that something was done which caused her to take in water, and which may have equally had the effect of rendering her waterways and her decks less capable of resisting the water which she shipped afterwards in the course of her voyage. There being some negligence established, it lies upon the shipowner to distinguish, if he can, what portion of the damage which has arisen did not arise from the negligence which has been established against him—that is, against the person who has been guilty of negligence; and, if it is a sufficient cause for the injury which has resulted, then it lies upon the person accused to show that it did not, in fact, arise from this sufficient cause, but arose from some other sufficient cause. We are of opinion that the negligence of not caulking has, in itself, contributed largely to the damage which has resulted, and that, therefore, there is sufficient basis upon which this judgment can be maintained.

FIELD, J.—I quite agree with the President in coming to the conclusion that the judgment of the court below ought not to be disturbed. This is a form of action I am not accustomed to, but still the principles are the same in this court as in those courts in which I have the honour to preside. I understand this to be an action for damage to cargo brought by the owner and consignee of goods received under a bill of lading, and by which it became the duty of the defendants to carry the goods to the port of discharge, and there deliver them "in the like good order" as when received, perils of the sea excepted. It is admitted that the goods were put on board in good condition. It is admitted that they arrived at their port of discharge in bad condition and damaged. It is admitted that the damage was caused by sea water; that, therefore, the damage must have occurred some time or other whilst the goods were under the charge of the master. Then it is said that, although, no doubt the proximate cause of the damage to the goods was sea water caused by shipping seas in very bad weather, that the deck of the ship, which ought to have protected the cargo against the shipping of the seas, was in such a defective condition as that it permitted the seas to pass through; and that that defective condition (although in itself originally also due to perils of the seas) was one which it was the duty of the master to have known of and ascertained, and that he ought not to have proceeded on his primary duty, of going to the port of discharge, without taking steps to ascertain whether his cargo would receive damage, or whether there was anything which could, and might, and ought to have been done to prevent that. That is the shape the case assumes. Now, then, it is certain, therefore, that the goods were received sea-damaged. It is clearly admitted also now that she started seaworthy, and, if anything had happened at all to her, Mr. Aspinall could not have been here supporting the judgment. But what did happen to her? When she was at a good distance from New York, from where she had started, she ran on a shoal, and she appears to have got on stem foremost, and, without going through it at length, it is obvious there was a great deal of tugging and pulling at her. A hawser was broken; they were an hour and three-quarters trying to get her off; and no man who has been at sea will doubt that such an operation will have a tendency to strain a heavy ship with a heavy cargo of grain and flour on board. And not only would that have called the attention of a prudent master, but we find that the man on board next in charge of the ship—the mate—actually saw the condition of the deck. He describes how the ship was strained, and the master says so too in the protest—and a most careful master, because he takes uncommon care not to put anything into the protest which his owner would not like, because he writes to him and asks him whether it should be put into the protest or not. The mate is a most careful man; he saw the ship was strained, saw the waterways, and that was the place where the deck was strained and where it was injured, and where the water would be likely to get through. What does that show? Surely that, at least, it ought to put on the master the duty of ascertaining and considering and examining. He did nothing whatever. He says he did not notice the deck; but his mate did, and he must have seen the log, when the mate made up the log. Under these circumstances, what was it his duty to do? Mr. Myburgh says it was his duty to proceed; so it was, primarily, but also to proceed with care, and not to proceed if dangerous. He would not have to proceed if he knew that a hostile fleet were in front of him, and that there was danger of war. It was his duty to take care of his ship and cargo, and to see that his ship was never in such a position as would be likely to damage his cargo, and if she was, to see if anything might be done, so that he might safely proceed in the direction he required. What had he before him? A North Atlantic voyage in midwinter. I should like to know where the master is to be found who would not know what quantities of sea he would have to ship in the course of such a voyage as that. If so, what was it his duty to do? His first duty would have been to have called up the carpenter, and he might have said that they had no tow on board, and could not proceed in that weather.

All that might have been done, but nothing of the kind was done, and it seems to me therefore that the captain does not come within the protection—if there is a protection—which there is said to be from the summing up of Lush, L.J. in the case of Cohn v. Davidson. For myself I may say, I know of no authority for saying that the master of a ship, or anyone else who has a duty under contract to exercise due care and skill, may excuse himself by saying, "I did not exercise care and skill, but I honestly thought I did." I know of no such case. There are, no doubt, many cases in which if a wrongdoer puts you into a position of danger, so that you are called upon hastily to take some steps, and you do happen then to take the wrong course, that there you are excused as against the wrongdoer. In the well-known case of the railway passenger, who being carried on, believing honestly and fairly that she was being carried on beyond her station, and thereupon got down hastily, and contributed probably by her mode of getting down to the injury, it was held that there the company were still responsible, though she might have done a wiser thing, namely, to have stopped in the carriage and gone on to the next station and come back again by the next train. But these are very different cases from this. I myself do not believe that Lush, L.J. intended to lay down any such doctrine, that a passenger whose duty it is to use due care and skill, may be excused for a breach of that duty simply if he honestly exercises a judgment in doing it. That certainly was not the view which the court (of which I had the honour of being a member) took of that; but we considered in that case, although the question itself was made a strong point by the Solicitor-General, that it might possibly, taken by itself, have misled the jury; yet, when accompanied by the observations of the Lord Justice in summing-up to the jury, it showed that no such damage was sustained. That was the true effect of Cohn v. Davidson in my opinion. I cannot see that in the present case the master brings himself within that protection, because he took no means and exercised no judgment whatever.

I agree with many of the arguments very ably put by Mr. Myburgh and Mr. Kennedy. I should not, perhaps, rely very much on the five inches per hour, because the damage did not arise from that, but it was an index of things to look at and consider. If she had made no water, or even three inches of water originally, and after such a shock as this made five, it is an element to be taken into consideration that she had received a strain. If the captain had known that, and looked at the waterways, he would have seen it. Did this damage arise from the waterways? Mr. Dent clearly establishes that it did (and there is no evidence to the contrary), because he says the damage was through the constant trickling of water down the ship's side, so that the timbers had become sodden with the water; that is not due to the water rushing through a ventilator hole or sweeping the deck-house down; it is due to the constant trickling day after day, for eleven days, of water going through the seams which a little caulking might unquestionably have stopped. I think, therefore, it is impossible to say that the judgment was wrong. We have the advantage of the learned assessors here, who concur fully with the judgment of the assessors below.

Judgment affirmed, and a reference to the registrar and merchants ordered to assess the amount of the damage.

THE PACIFIC. (a)

Collision—Regulations for Preventing Collisions 1880, art. 11—Infringement—Lights—Fishing smack—Overtaking ship.

The bright white light carried by a trawling fishing smack when attached to her nets in pursuance of the provisions of art. 9 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions 1863, although visible astern, is not a white light shown from the stern to an overtaking ship within the meaning of art. 11 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions 1880.

Where it is the duty of a vessel to carry or show lights, and those lights are not carried where they are visible, or are not shown, the court will not be extremely nice in finding another vessel to blame because those on board her fail to see the first-mentioned vessel within a few yards of the distance when such vessel ought first to have been seen.

THIS was a damage action in rem, instituted by the owners of the fishing smack Speculator against the owners of the steamship Pacific, to recover damages for the loss of the smack, occasioned by a collision between the two vessels on the 24th March 1884 in the North Sea. The defendants counter-claimed.

The facts alleged on behalf of the plaintiffs were as follows:—About 3 a.m. on the 24th March 1884 the fishing smack Speculator, manned by a crew of five hands all told, was trawling on the Dogger Bank about 170 miles E.N.E. of the Spurn. The weather was fine and clear, with a light wind from about north, and the Speculator was on the port tack with all sail set except the mizen topsail, her mainsheet being slacked out. Her trawling gear was on the ground, and she was heading about E. by N. and making about one knot an hour and some leeway. A white light was exhibited from the crosstrees on her mainmast; such light was visible all round the horizon, and a good look-out was being kept. Under these circumstances the masthead light of the Pacific was seen from three to four miles distant, bearing about a point on the starboard quarter. Shortly after the red light came into view, and, although loudly hailed by those on board the Speculator, the Pacific came on with great speed and struck with her stem and port bow the starboard quarter of the Speculator, doing her so much damage that she shortly sank.

The facts alleged on behalf of the defendants were as follows:—The screw steamship Pacific, of 466 tons net, was shortly before 3.10 a.m. on the 24th March 1884 in the North Sea, on a voyage from Hull to Dantzic. The weather was fine, but dark and cloudy towards the horizon, and there was a fresh breeze from about north. The Pacific was proceeding under steam with her foretopsail and forestaysail set, heading E. by N. ¾ N., and making between eight and nine knots an hour. Her regulation lights were duly exhibited and burning brightly, and a good look-out was being kept on board of her. In these circumstances those on board the Pacific observed at the distance of about a ship's length from the Pacific and right ahead (if anything a little on the starboard bow) the boom of the smack Speculator under sail. No light on board the Speculator, until after the collision, ever became visible to those on board the Pacific. The engines of the Pacific were immediately stopped and her helm was ordered hard-a-starboard, but a collision between the two vessels took place almost immediately afterwards. The defendants (inter alia) charged the plaintiffs with breach of art. 11 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, in not exhibiting a white or flare-up light from the smack's stern.

Art. 11 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions 1880 is as follows:

A ship which is being overtaken by another shall show from her stern to such last-mentioned ship a white light or a flare-up light.

Art. 9 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea 1863, continued in force by Order in Council is as follows:

Fishing vessels and open boats, when at anchor or attached to their nets and stationary, shall exhibit a bright white light.

The evidence on behalf of the plaintiffs proved that the white light was carried in the weather crosstrees, that that was the usual place to carry it, and that it was visible astern. The witnesses on behalf of the defendants admitted that while it was possible, had their attention been directed to the smack, to have seen her at a distance of two ship's lengths, they did not see her until within the distance of one ship's length. They also stated that, having regard to the relative position of the two vessels, it was impossible for them to have seen the white light of the smack.

Dr. Phillimore (with him Bucknill) for the plaintiffs.—Assuming the smack's light not to have been visible all round the horizon, it was nevertheless carried in the place where it is the practice for fishing smacks to carry their light. Those on board the steamer, seeing that they were navigating across a fishing ground, should have taken extra precautions. It is, however, admitted that the steamer was making from eight to nine knots, and it is submitted that, under the circumstances, this was an excessive rate of speed. Assuming that the smack was bound by art. 11, we contend that there has been a compliance with it. The rule requires a white light or a flare-up light to be shown from the stern. Having regard to the fact that the smack's light was a white light on the crosstrees, and therefore visible astern, the duty to show a white light from the stern was complied with. [BUTT, J.—Surely the obvious intention of the Legislature in using the words "from her stern" is that the light is to be abaft everything that might possibly interfere with its being visible to an overtaking vessel. That is what I think the Legislature meant by the rule.] Assuming that to be so, the effect in the present case is the same. Whether the light had been exhibited from the stern or was hung on the crosstrees, it was yet visible to the overtaking ship, and therefore the breach of the rule cannot be said to have by any possibility contributed to the collision. According to The Reiher (4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 479; 45 L. T. Rep. N. S. 767) a vessel is not bound to show a white light or flare-up light to an overtaking vessel, unless there is ground for the apprehension of danger. Under the circumstances of this case, there was no ground for the apprehension of danger. The defendants have admitted that it was possible for them to have seen the smack at a distance of two ship's lengths, while they say that as a fact they did not see her until within a ship's length off. If so, they should be held to blame for having a bad look-out.

Hall, Q.C. (with him Kennedy) for the defendants.—It would be impossible for vessels coming from the southward in certain directions to see the smack's white light, which would necessarily be shut out by the mast and rigging. It is obvious that the plaintiffs have infringed art. 11 of the Regulations. The white light there alluded to must be shown at the stern, so that there may be nothing abaft it which may intercept its rays, and further to indicate to an overtaking vessel the exact position of the stern of the overtaken ship, and thus enable the overtaking ship to manœuvre accordingly. The fact that those on board the steamer did not see the smack herself quite so soon as was physically possible is no proof of negligence. As to the speed of the steamer, there is no rule of navigation which says that in the absence of fog a steamer shall not go full speed, provided she is carefully navigated.

Dr. Phillimore in reply.—A steamer is not justified in running at full speed on a dark night across a fishing ground:

The City of Brooklyn, 1 P. Div. 276; 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 230; 34 L. T. Rep. N. S. 932.

BUTT, J.—This is a case where, on a fine night but perhaps rather dark and cloudy towards the horizon, the smack Speculator was run down and sunk by the steamship Pacific in the North Sea, somewhere in the neighbourhood of the Dogger Bank. The substantial questions in the case relate to the lights carried or shown by the smack. For reasons to which I have adverted in the course of the evidence and during counsel's speeches, it is not necessary to go into the questions raised under the Orders in Council, which deal with art. 9 of the old and art. 10 of the new Regulations for Preventing Collisions (a). It is clear from the evidence that the smack's light was so placed that it did not show all round the horizon. What exact number of points was obscured it is not easy to say, but that it did not show all round is clear. But I do not say that the smack is necessarily to blame for that. There is a difficulty in placing these lights, and it has yet to be decided whether it is possible to have a light which will show all round the horizon. However, in that state of things, it is certainly more important that the other regulations as to lights should be strictly observed. Now, it seems clear to myself and the Elder Brethren that the regulation which requires a light to be shown from the stern to an overtaking vessel was infringed. Even apart from the regulations, one would have thought that, under the circumstances of this case, it would only have been an ordinary precaution to have shown a light from the smack's stern. Some suggestion has been made on behalf of the plaintiffs that, assuming the white globular light fixed on the crosstrees was not hidden by the sails or spars of the smack, but was visible astern, there has been a substantial compliance with the regulation. I, however, do not think that contention can successfully be maintained. I think the view of the Legislature in laying down this regulation was something very different from a light carried in the forepart of the vessel, even assuming it to be visible astern.

(a) The question as to what lights are to be carried by a trawler when attached to her nets and stationary has been subsequently dealt with by the Court of Appeal in the case of The Dunelm, post.—ED.

It has then been said that the steamer is also to blame. As to those on the steamer not seeing the smack's light, I think that it was so obscured by the smack's sails as not to be visible to them. We are satisfied that there was a good look-out on the steamer. The light of another steamer had just previously been seen, and we think it impossible that the smack's light, which is admitted by those on board the steamer to have been a good light, should not have been seen had it been visible. There has been some discussion as to the way in which this light was carried. However, taking the view I do, it is not necessary to decide that. Wherever it was, I think that it was obscured from those on the steamer until the smack had been turned round by the force of the blow. Then arises a further question. Assuming that the smack's light was obscured, ought not those on the steamer to have seen the smack's sails at an earlier period and perhaps in time to have avoided the collision? I have considered that matter, and I must say that where it is the duty of a vessel to carry or shew lights, and those lights are not carried where they are visible or are not shown, I do not think the court ought to be extremely nice in finding another vessel to blame because she has failed to see her within a few yards of the distance when she ought first to have been seen. It is then said that the steamer in crossing a fishing ground at full speed was going at an improper rate. I, however, do not think that her speed under the circumstances was such a rate of speed as to constitute negligent navigation. On the whole, therefore, I come to the conclusion that the smack must be pronounced alone to blame for this collision. Judgment for the defendants.

THE BOWESFIELD. (a)

Collision—Loss of life—Action in rem—Lord Campbell's Act (9 & 10 Vict. c. 93)—Amendment of writ—Practice—Order XVI., r. 11.

Plaintiffs commenced an action in rem under Lord Campbell's Act on the 4th Jan. 1884 in respect of loss of life by collision at sea on the 10*th Jan.* 1888. After the 10*th Jan.* 1884, it having been decided in the interim by the Court of Appeal that the Admiralty Court had no jurisdiction in such actions, the plaintiffs applied to add as defendants the owners of the wrongdoing ship personally.

Application refused upon the ground that, under the provisions of Order XVI., r. 11, proceedings against the parties proposed to be added would only be deemed to have commenced from the date of the service upon them of the writ of summons, and hence the action would not have been commenced against them within the time provided by Lord Campbell's Act, and the court being of opinion that it had no power to add parties as defendants in personam in an action in rem, thought it ought not to make the order merely because the objection as to time was an objection which ought strictly to be taken at a later stage.

THIS was a motion by the plaintiffs in an action in rem under Lord Campbell's Act to amend their writ of summons by adding the names of the registered owners of the steamship Bowesfield as defendants in the action.

The collision, out of which the action arose, occurred between the schooner Laura and the British steamship Bowesfield, on the 10th Jan. 1883, in the Straits of Dover. By reason of the collision Carl Bjorn Pedersen and Axel Pedersen, two of the crew of the Laura, were alleged to have been drowned.

On the 4th Jan. 1884 the legal personal representatives of Carl Bjorn Pedersen and Axel Pederson brought an action in rem under Lord Campbell's Act against the owners of the Bowesfield to recover damages sustained by the deaths of the said Carl Bjorn Pedersen and Axel Pedersen.

The Bowesfield was never arrested, in consequence of her owners on the 17th Jan. 1884 undertaking to enter an appearance in the action.

Owing to the decision of the Court of Appeal in The Vera Cruz (51 L. T. Rep. N. S. 104; 9 P. Div. 96), that the Admiralty Division has no jurisdiction to entertain an action in rem under Lord Campbell's Act, the plaintiffs took out a summons on the 14th May 1883 before the registrar to amend the writ of summons by adding the names of the registered owners of the Bowesfield as defendants. On this summons coming on for hearing the registrar refused to make the order and condemned the plaintiffs in the costs of the summons. Thereupon the plaintiffs took out a similar summons before the judge in chambers, who upon it coming before him referred it into court.

Lord Campbell's Act (9 & 10 Vict. c. 93), s. 3, is as follows:

> Provided always and be it enacted, that not more than one action shall lie for and in respect of the same subject matter of complaint, and that every such action shall be commenced within twelve calendar months after the death of such deceased person.

T. T. Bucknill, on behalf of the plaintiffs, in support of the motion.—This application is made in consequence of the decision of the Court of Appeal in The Vera Cruz (ubi sup.), where it was held that no action in rem would lie under Lord Campbell's Act. The plaintiffs, therefore, wish to add the owners of the Bowesfield under the provi-
