very negligent of those in charge of her to leave her in their boat as they did. It is by no means clear to my mind that she might not have been kept afloat by her own pumps. When she was left half an hour after the collision the water had not found its way into the engine-room, and when it did find its way in a great deal might have been done to keep it under. In that state of things I am not persuaded that she might not have been kept afloat till daylight, and until assistance could have been given her. Even apart from that, she surely could have been beached. A pilot who was on board a vessel anchored near the Tom John Taylor, says if she had had the use of her engines, which she had, he could have beached her. It is, however, said, as against that, that it is one thing for a pilot to know it, but another thing for the master of a ship. But the master of this ship knew that this pilot was on a vessel within 300 or 400 yards of him. He knew that this pilot would of all people be best able to judge what ought to be done, but he never communicated with him. It was only after her master and crew had left her that the pilot went on board, and then on his own account. It was a very negligent act indeed to leave this ship altogether without taking advantage of this assistance which was at hand and available. I cannot say positively on the evidence that this vessel would have been kept afloat by the aid of her own pumps. I do not know what, if any, less amount of damage she would have sustained if she had been beached. The only thing clear to me is this, that it would not have been necessary to incur the expense of raising her, and therefore I am of opinion, on the whole, that justice will be done by directing the registrar, in assessing the damages sustained by this vessel and her cargo, to deduct from the amount allowed all the expenditure incurred in raising her.

From this decision the defendants appealed and by their notice of appeal asked the court "to vary or alter the said judgment by directing that the plaintiffs are only entitled to recover from the defendants such damages as would have been occasioned by the collision if the plaintiffs or their agents had not improperly abandoned the said vessel Tom John Taylor after the said collision."

April 26.—The appeal came on for hearing, when by agreement a consent order was taken as prayed, upon the terms that the appellants were to pay the costs of the appeal if at the reference the only damages disallowed were the costs of raising the vessel.

THE CITY OF DELHI. (a)

Collision — Tug and tow — Gravesend Reach — Anchorage ground—Position of anchor—Rules and Bye-laws for the Navigation of the River Thames 1872, arts. 15, 19, and 20.

Where a vessel, intending either to moor at one of the buoys or anchor in the anchorage ground in Gravesend Reach, moves from buoy to buoy to select one, and, finding them all occupied, anchors a short distance above the last of the buoys, she does not navigate within the anchorage ground in contravention of art. 15 of the Rules and Bye-laws for the Navigation of the River Thames 1872.

Where a vessel, intending either to moor at one of the buoys or anchor in the anchorage ground in Gravesend Reach, finds all the buoys occupied, and, on passing the last buoy, gets her anchor a-cockbill for the purpose of bringing herself to anchor on finding a suitable place, and, after she has got a short distance above the buoys, a collision occurs and damage is done by the anchor, such anchor is only a-cockbill during such time as is "absolutely necessary" for bringing her to anchor within the meaning of art. 19 of the Rules and Bye-laws for the Navigation of the River Thames 1872.

THIS was a collision action in rem instituted by the owners of the steamship Sir Robert Peel against the owners of the tug Challenge and the owners of the ship City of Delhi.

The plaintiffs claimed damages in respect of a collision between their ship and the Challenge and the City of Delhi in the river Thames, on the 20th Nov. 1887.

The facts alleged by the plaintiffs were as follows: Shortly before 5.50 a.m. on the 20th Nov., the Sir Robert Peel, a steamship of 376 tons register, bound on a voyage from London to Dunkirk, was proceeding down Gravesend Reach within the space of white light shown from the beacon at Northfleet. Her engines were stopped in order to land the Custom House officer on board of her, and she was going with the ebb tide about three and a half knots an hour over the ground. In these circumstances those on board of her observed the two masthead lights and red light of the tug Challenge, which was towing the City of Delhi, distant about a mile, and bearing about half a point on the port bow. Shortly after the Challenge opened her green light, and shut in her red. Thereupon the helm of the Sir Robert Peel was ordered to be starboarded, but before it had any effect the Challenge opened her red and shut in her green light. The helm of the Sir Robert Peel was thereupon steadied with the red light of the tug on her port bow. Shortly after the tug opened her green light on the port bow of the Sir Robert Peel, and, although the engines of the Sir Robert Peel were immediately put full speed astern, the Challenge shut in her red light and with her stem struck the port bow of the Sir Robert Peel; and the City of Delhi, coming on, with her port bow and anchor struck the port quarter of the Sir Robert Peel.

The plaintiffs (inter alia) charged the defendants, the owners of the City of Delhi, with breach of arts. 19 and 20 of the Rules and Bye-laws for the Navigation of the River Thames.

The facts alleged by the defendants were as follows: Shortly before 5.45 a.m. on the 20th Nov., the City of Delhi, a ship of 1168 tons register, on a voyage from Rangoon to London, was in tow of the tug Challenge, in Gravesend Reach, within the space of red light shown from the beacon at Northfleet. It had been the intention of those in charge of her to moor her at one of the buoys off Gravesend, and accordingly she had been towed along outside the line of buoys, but within the anchorage ground, for the purpose of selecting a suitable one. Finding them all occupied, she had slowly proceeded a little above the uppermost of the buoys for the purpose of coming to an anchor, when the masthead and red lights of the Sir Robert Peel were seen on the starboard bow distant about half a mile. As the Sir Robert Peel approached, the Challenge gave two blasts with her whistle, as she had been and was under a slight starboard helm in order to get the City of Delhi into her berth to drop her anchor, which had been ordered a-cockbill on clearing the last buoy. The Sir Robert Peel replied with one short blast, and soon afterwards shut in her red and opened her green light. The Sir Robert Peel continued to approach, and, when within about two ships' lengths, she shut in her green and opened her red light, and, although the engines of the Challenge were put full speed astern, the Sir Robert Peel with her port bow struck the stem of the Challenge, and with her port quarter struck the port bow and anchor of the City of Delhi.

The defendants (inter alia) charged the plaintiffs with breach of art. 15 of the Rules and Bye-laws for the Navigation of the River Thames 1872.

The Rules and Bye-laws for the Navigation of the River Thames 1872:

Art. 15. All vessels navigating Gravesend Reach are to keep to the northward of a line defined by a skeleton beacon erected upon the India Arms Wharf on with the high chimney with the Cement Works at Northfleet; and all vessels intending to anchor in the reach are to bring up to the southward of that line. A lantern is placed on the above beacon which shows (at night) a bright light to the northward of the same line, and a red light to the southward of it over the anchorage ground. All vessels so anchoring and remaining beyond a period of twenty-four hours are to be moored.

Art. 19. No vessel shall navigate or lie in the river with its anchor or anchors a-cockbill except while fishing such anchor or anchors, or during such time as may be absolutely necessary for getting such vessel under way or for bringing it to anchor.

Art. 20. No vessel shall be navigated or lie in the river with its anchor or anchors hanging by the cable perpendicularly from the hawse unless the stock shall be awash, except during such time as shall be absolutely necessary for catting or fishing the said anchor or anchors, or during such time as may be absolutely necessary for getting such vessel under way.

Sir Walter Phillimore and Barnes for the plaintiffs.—The collision occurred outside the anchorage ground, and was solely due to the negligence of the tug and tow. If it occurred within the anchorage ground, then the defendants are to blame for breach of art. 15 of the Thames Rules. They were admittedly navigating within the anchorage ground. They were in motion along the whole line of buoys, and for some distance beyond. The City of Delhi is also to blame for breach of art. 19. She was only entitled to have her anchor a-cockbill for such time as was "absolutely necessary" for bringing her to anchor. In other words, her duty was not to get her anchor a-cockbill until she had selected the place where she intended to anchor. But, as a matter of fact, the anchor had been a-cockbill for several minutes before the collision.

Myburgh, Q.C. and Nelson for the defendants the owners of the tug.—The plaintiffs are solely to blame. The collision occurred within the anchorage ground. The plaintiffs were unlawfully there. The defendants were lawfully there, and were not "navigating" there within the meaning of the word as used in the rule. They were there for the purpose of coming to an anchor, and were therefore justified in moving slowly along to find a suitable place.

Hall, Q.C. and Kennedy, Q.C. (with them Pyke) for the owners of the City of Delhi.—The plaintiffs are solely to blame. The anchor was only a-cockbill during such time as was absolutely necessary to bring the ship to anchor. Persons in charge of a ship are justified in getting the anchor a-cockbill within a reasonable time of the ship being brought to anchor. A reasonable time was not exceeded in this case.

Sir Walter Phillimore in reply.

BUTT, J.—These are cross claims for damages arising out of collisions between the steamer Sir Robert Peel, on the one hand, and the tug Challenge and the City of Delhi, which was in tow of her, on the other. The Sir Robert Peel first of all came into collision with the tug, and then with the tow. The collision happened at a time when the vessels had to manœuvre by lights. The Sir Robert Peel was going down the river with an ebb tide of two to two and a half knots an hour. She had come down the Northfleet Hope and got into Gravesend Reach, and very soon after she eased, and then stopped her engines. She had on board one or more Custom House officers, who would in ordinary course go ashore somewhere off Gravesend, and there was therefore every reason why she should go down at a very moderate speed, and I have no doubt her story in that respect is true. With regard to the other vessels, it appears that they had stopped off the Custom House for the purpose of the ship getting her clearances. Having got them, it was intended to moor her at one of the six buoys which are placed off Gravesend for that purpose, and, if that was not possible, to anchor her in the anchorage ground. Therefore it was not the intention of those in charge of the tug and tow to have gone much further up, and it is not to be expected, consequently, that they would have proceeded up at anything but a very moderate speed. It is not very material to fix the exact part of the shore opposite to which the collision occurred. But what is material is to determine whether it was on one side or the other of the line referred to in art. 15 of the Thames Rules. The rule says that vessels navigating Gravesend Reach are to keep to the northward of the line defined by a beacon at Northfleet, and that all vessels intending to anchor in the reach are to bring up to the southward of that line. A lantern is placed on the beacon which shows at night a bright light to the northward, and a red light to the southward of it over the anchorage ground. The question is, whether the collision occurred to the northward or southward of that line, and there has been a great conflict of evidence on the point. I am of opinion that the collision occurred in the red or to the southward of the line. There are many reasons, apart from the evidence, which tend to that conclusion. What reason was there for the tug and tow to have been to the northward of that line? The fact is clear that it was the intention of the pilot to moor her at any one of the buoys at which he found room. Accordingly the master of the steam tug towed the City of Delhi along outside the line of buoys, examining each to see if there was room to moor the ship, but found them all occupied. He says that if he had gone to the northward of the line indicated in art. 15 he could not have ascertained whether there was room at the buoys or not. It has been said that this was a breach of the rule; but, assuming that she was going from buoy to buoy intending to bring up at the first one that was vacant, I am not persuaded that it was a breach of any of the Thames Rules. The City of Delhi at the time of the collision was manifestly just going to anchor, and therefore the pilot was right in being within—and, as we think, considerably within—the line of the anchorage ground at the time of the collision. I have said that the Sir Robert Peel was coming down slowly, probably with a two knots or two and a half knots tide, and some little way of her own. In that state of things she comes into the anchorage ground and runs first into the tug and then into the tow, as they were just holding their own with the view of the tow's anchor being let go. In other words, she infringed art. 15, and must be held to blame.

The further question is, whether any blame is attributable to those navigating the tug and the tow. We do not think that in the circumstances they could have done anything to avoid the collision. It is a fact that the anchor of the City of Delhi knocked a hole in the port quarter of the Sir Robert Peel, that water came in, and that they were obliged to beach her. Was there any impropriety with regard to the position of the anchor? It had been clear some hour or two before the collision. It had been got ready for lowering—that is to say, it was in a position for cockbilling—and the evidence is that as soon as the ship passed the last buoy the pilot gave the orders to cockbill it. Was that a contravention of art. 19, which says that no vessel shall have its anchor a-cockbill except while fishing such anchor, or during such time as may be absolutely necessary for getting such vessel under way or bringing it to anchor. It seems to me that as this anchor was got ready just before the ship was about to anchor, it was a-cockbill not before it was absolutely necessary. We think those in charge of the City of Delhi were quite right in getting the anchor a-cockbill at the time they did. We think, therefore, no blame attaches to the City of Delhi with reference to the damage done by the anchor. The result is that I pronounce the Sir Robert Peel alone to blame.

THE PALINURUS. (a)

Collision—Stern light—Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, arts. 2, 11.

The range of the stern light prescribed by art. 11 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea ought never to overlap that of the side lights, and if it is carried in any way other than is necessary to warn overtaking vessels it is an infringement of the regulations.

Quære, Is it legal to carry a fixed stern light?

THIS was a collision action in rem instituted by the owners of the ship E. F. Sawyer against the steamship Palinurus, to recover damages occasioned by a collision between the two vessels.

The collision occurred on the 22nd Nov. 1887, in the English Channel.

The facts alleged by the plaintiffs were as follows: Shortly before 5.45 a.m. on the 22nd Nov., the E. F. Sawyer, an American ship of 1897 tons register, while proceeding on a voyage from San Francisco to Hull, laden with a cargo of grain, was in the English Channel, heading about south, and making about two knots. The wind was about E.S.E., and the ship was close-hauled on the port tack. In these circumstances those on board the E. F. Sawyer observed the masthead light of the s.s. Palinurus, about three points on the starboard bow, and distant about four miles. In about ten minutes the red light came into view, and shortly afterwards the green light was seen, and the red disappeared. Then the red opened, and the green disappeared; and again the green opened and the red was shut in, and afterwards both lights became visible, and continued so till the collision. The steamship continued to approach, and, instead of going clear, she with her stem and port bow struck the E. F. Sawyer on her starboard side, and caused her to sink. In addition to the regulation side lights carried by the E. F. Sawyer, she was carrying a fixed white stern light, which was fixed to a bracket over the stern under the taffrail. The plaintiffs' witnesses admitted that this stern light showed from half to three-quarters of a point forward of the stern.

The facts alleged by the defendants were as follows: Shortly before 6.5 a.m. on the 22nd Nov., the Palinurus, a steamship of 1536 tons register, whilst on a voyage from Port Said to London with cargo and passengers, was in the English Channel off Folkestone. She was heading N.E. by E. ½ E., making from six to seven knots an hour. In these circumstances those on board of her observed a white light about a mile off, and bearing about a quarter point on the port bow. Shortly after the helm of the Palinurus was ported, and her engines put to slow. The white light gradually came broader on the port bow, when the loom of a sailing vessel, which proved to be the E. F. Sawyer, carrying the white light, was seen ahead and close to. Immediately after a dim green light was seen slightly on the port bow, and, although the helm of the Palinurus was put hard-a-port, and her engines reversed full speed astern, the vessels collided, the starboard side of the E. F. Sawyer, near the forerigging, being struck by the stem of the Palinurus.

The defendants charged the plaintiffs with carrying a defective green light, and also with infringing the regulations as to the stern light.

The Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea:

Art. 2. The lights mentioned in the following articles numbered 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, and 11, and no others, shall be carried in all weathers from sunset to sunrise.

Art. 11. A ship which is being overtaken by another shall show from her stern to such last-mentioned ship a white light, or a flare-up light.

Sir Walter Phillimore (with him Bucknill, Q.C. and Pickford) for the plaintiffs.—The E. F. Sawyer was carrying a good and proper green light, which ought to have been seen sooner by those on board the Palinurus. The E. F. Sawyer was not infringing the regulations in carrying a fixed stern light. Art. 11 by its terms does not prohibit it, and it answers the purpose for which the article was intended. [Sir James Hannen.—Was not the light in art. 11 intended for signalling? If so, is it permissible to carry it?] To carry a fixed light is merely taking precautions in excess of those required by the article. In this particular case it was of assistance to those in charge of the Palinurus, and did not mislead them.

Sir Richard Webster, Q.C., A.-G. (with him Kennedy, Q.C. and J. P. Aspinall), for the defendants, contra.—The green light of the E. F. Sawyer was deficient, and was not capable of being seen by those on the Palinurus till immediately before the collision. The stern light was also misleading, and was a breach of arts. 2 and 11 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea. The language of art. 11 precludes the idea of a fixed stern light. Moreover, this light was visible over the area of the side lights, and was therefore not only calculated to mislead other vessels, but also to diminish the visibility of the side lights:

The Main, 55 L. T. Rep. N. S. 15; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 37; 11 P. Div. 132.

Sir Walter Phillimore in reply.

Cur. adv. vult.

Dec. 19.—Sir James Hannen (after finding that there was a good look-out on the Palinurus, and that the green light of the E. F. Sawyer was defective, and the cause of the collision) proceeded as follows:—A question has been discussed in this case which, in the view I take of the facts, it is not necessary to determine, but in regard to which I think it well to give my opinion if only by way of warning for the future. It was contended by the defendants that it is contrary to the regulations to carry a fixed stern light; on the other hand, it was urged by the plaintiffs that it is not unlawful to do so. I abstain from saying that it is unlawful, but it is to be remembered that the object of the stern light is to assist overtaking vessels, and if it is carried in any other way than is necessary to give such assistance it appears to me that it is an infringement of the regulations. If, for instance, the stern light is above the taffrail, so that it is visible all round, it is then misleading and illegal. Again, though it be below the taffrail, if it is visible over a greater area than is necessary for the guidance of overtaking vessels, I am of opinion that it is illegal. The range ought never to overlap that of the side lights, and if it is fixed it ought to be so secured as to prevent the areas overlapping. In the present case I have no doubt that the stern light of the E. F. Sawyer was visible over a portion of the area of the green, and this was calculated to deceive and mislead the Palinurus. The white light can always be seen at a greater distance than the green, and so before the green becomes visible an approaching vessel which sees a white stern light may be led to suppose it is overtaking another vessel and act accordingly, when in fact it is approaching at a right angle. On this ground, also, I hold that the E. F. Sawyer was to blame for the collision.

The Blanche. (a)

Mortgage — Right to possession — Charter-party — Equities — Release of ship.

Where the registered mortgagees of a ship instituted an action in rem as mortgagees for possession, and the ship was arrested therein before the mortgage money became due, and without any default on the part of the mortgagor, the Court, being of opinion upon the facts that the ship was not being dealt with so as to impair the mortgagees' security, ordered her release.

This was a motion by the owners of the steamship Blanche for her release from arrest in an action for possession instituted by the mortgagees.

The indorsement upon the writ was as follows: "The plaintiffs' claim is, as mortgagees having taken possession of the s.s. Blanche, her tackle, apparel, and furniture, for possession of the said vessel which they have been wrongfully dispossessed of by the owners thereof."

By a mortgage, dated the 3rd Nov. 1887, in the form prescribed by the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, the Blanche was mortgaged by her registered owner, John McDowall, to the plaintiffs, Joseph Weatherley and John Mead, as security for a loan of 1000*l.* to McDowall, to be repaid on the 5th Feb. 1888. This mortgage was duly registered on the 7th Nov. 1887.

By a charter-party, dated the 17th Nov., between McDowall and the South Coast Steamship Company Limited, the Blanche was chartered to the South Coast Steamship Company for six months for general coasting trade, the charterers to have the right of employing their own crew.

The mortgagees objected to this charter, and threatened to take possession. Thereupon McDowall entered into an arrangement with the mortgagees, undertaking to get the charter cancelled, and to obtain a new charter which should not be prejudicial to the mortgagees' interests.

Subsequently to this arrangement, McDowall sold the ship to the secretary of the chartering company subject to the mortgage, and gave notice thereof to the mortgagees. In consequence of inquiries, the mortgagees learnt that the original charter was still in existence, and thereupon, on the 30th Nov. they took possession in the port of London, under their mortgage, by putting a man on board, notice being given to the registered owner and to the master.

On the 2nd Dec. the mortgagees' man in possession was forcibly put off the ship, which was immediately taken down the Thames on her way to Poole.

The mortgagees thereupon instituted the present action, and the ship was arrested therein.

The defendants now moved "for an order that the steamship Blanche be released from arrest, and that the plaintiffs, their agents and servants, be restrained from interfering with the said vessel and preventing her charter-party, dated the 17th Nov. 1887, being cancelled."

J. G. Barnes, for the defendants, in support of the motion.—The plaintiffs are not entitled to take possession. The money secured by the mortgage is not yet due, and the interest has been paid: (The Cathcart, 16 L. T. Rep. N. S. 211; L. Rep. 1 A. & E. 314; 2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 500.) The ship is under charter, and should be released to enable her to perform it. Although I must admit that she has really been bought on behalf of the charterers, she ought to be released so as to enable her to perform her engagements, which will not in any way prejudice the plaintiffs' security. [He was stopped.]

J. P. Aspinall, for the plaintiffs, contra.—The plaintiffs are entitled at any time to enter into possession of the mortgaged property. They are the owners of the security, and as such have the right of possession, although no default has been made by the mortgagor. This principle is always recognised and acted upon in the case of other mortgages, and there is no reason why any distinction should be made where the security is a ship. If so, the mortgage of a ship is subject to all the principles laid down at law and in equity relative to the mortgage of other chattels:

Keith v. Burrows, 35 L. T. Rep. N. S. 508; L. Rep. 1 C. P. Div. 722; 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 280;
Bradley v. Copley, 1 C. B. 685;
Wheeler v. Montefiore, 2 Q. B. 133;
Fisher on Mortgages, 4th edit., pp. 408, 423, 430.

[BUTT, J.—In this case there are equities which prevent you taking possession.] The mortgagees are willing to carry out any engagements which the ship is bound to fulfil, and the enforcement of their right to possession as against the mortgagor will not prejudice the rights of third parties. [BUTT, J.—By sect. 7 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 the mortgagee is not to be deemed owner.] That was merely a provision for the benefit of the mortgagee, so as to relieve him from liability for debts with which he had nothing to do. To release the ship will be to deprive the court of being able to give the plaintiffs an effective remedy should they at the trial prove their right to possession. They are claiming for possession, and their right thereto cannot be determined till the hearing of the action. It is also contended on the facts that the mortgagees' security is being impaired. By the charter the ship is to be worked by a crew appointed by the charterers, and the charter is not at an end till after the time when the loan becomes due.

Barnes in reply.

BUTT, J.—I am prepared to hold that the mortgagee was not entitled to take possession before the money secured by the mortgage is due. True the property in the ship is his, but the equities interfere and prevent his taking possession. If, however, I saw any attempt to impair the security, so that it would not be available, I should say he was justified in doing what he has done. My only doubt has been whether the sale of the ship by the mortgagor is not some evidence of impairing the security. I shall order the release of the ship. I am quite satisfied that, unless there was some attempt to impair the security, the plaintiff had no right to take possession. Taking into consideration all the facts of this case, I order the ship to be released.

THE PRINZ HEINRICH. (a)

Salvage—Ship and cargo—Primary liability of shipowner—Agreement for fixed sum.

An agreement made by the master of a vessel in distress to pay salvors a fixed sum is an agreement made on behalf of, and pledging the credit of, the shipowners, so as to make them liable to the salvors for the whole amount so agreed upon, and not merely for such proportion of such amount as the value of the ship and freight bears to the value of the cargo.

The Raisby (53 L. T. Rep. N. S. 56; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 473; 10 P. Div. 114) distinguished.

Where the master of the s.s. P. H., which was in a position of serious danger ashore on rocks, entered into a written agreement with the master of the s.s. F., whereby he agreed to pay 200*l. a day for every day the F. stood by and assisted, by towing, to remove the P. H., and "in the event of the P. H. being got off or coming off the rocks during the continuance of the agreement" to pay* 2000*l. beyond the daily pay of* 200*l., and the same day the P. H. came off, either owing to the jettison of her cargo or the towing of the F:*

The Court held that the service was a valuable one, that the agreement was reasonable, and that the salvors were entitled to recover 2200*l. from the shipowners.*

THIS was a salvage action in personam by the owners of the s.s. Fei Lung against the owners of the s.s. Prinz Heinrich, and Alfred Edwards and Arthur Holland.

The plaintiffs claimed 2200*l.* under an alleged salvage agreement; in the alternative such an amount of salvage as to the court should seem just; and a declaration against all the defendants, and that the plaintiffs were entitled to the sum of 2200*l.* deposited in the joint names of the defendants Alfred Edwards and Arthur Holland, or to such part thereof as the court might award.

The facts alleged by the plaintiffs were as follows:

At about noon on the 29th June 1886, the Fei Lung, a British steamship of 1180 tons register, whilst on a voyage from Nicolaviesk to Shanghai, with a valuable cargo, was passing Darras Point near Castraes Bay, in the Gulf of Tartary, when the steamship Prinz Heinrich was sighted. The Prinz Heinrich was ashore exhibiting a signal of distress. The Fei Lung bore down upon the Prinz Heinrich, when it was found that she was hard and fast on the rocks, and that her bottom had large holes in it, through which the water was entering rapidly. The Prinz Heinrich was a German steamer of 1267 tons register, and was on a voyage from Europe to Nicolaviesk, laden with a general cargo, of which a portion had been jettisoned. The master of the Prinz Heinrich having come on board the Fei Lung the following written agreement was come to between the masters:

S.S. Fei Lung, Darras Point, June 29, 1888.—Memo. of agreement entered into this day between Robert Crawford, master of s.s. Fei Lung on the one part and Harmann Reinman, master of the German steamer Prince Henerique on the other part. Whereas the said Robert Crawford, master of the s.s. Fei Lung, agrees to stand by and assist, by towing, to remove the said steamer Prince Henerique from her present position, for which services duly performed Harmann Reinmann, master of the Geman steamer Prince Henerique, agrees to pay Robert Crawford, master of the s.s. Fei Lung, or his order, the sum of 200*l.* (two hundred pounds sterling) per day of twenty-four hours, dating from noon June 29th, 1886, and for every day or part of a day the s.s. Fei Lung is engaged in attendance, or, if necessary, absent obtaining stores or fuel to enable her to carry on the contract until the vessel is got off, or has given twenty-four hours notice that the services of the s.s. Fei Lung will no longer be required. And in the event of the stranded steamer Prince Henerique being got off or coming off the rocks during the continuance of this agreement, the sum of 2000*l.* sterling (two thousand pounds sterling) over and above the aforesaid daily pay of 200*l.* sterling (two hundred pounds sterling) to be paid to Robert Crawford, master of s.s. Fei Lung in same manner and at same time as daily pay. And it is further agreed by the master of the German steamer Prince Henerique that the s.s. Fei Lung shall at no time be required by him to expend either food or fuel that would leave less than three days of twenty-four hours supply of such on board.—ROBERT CRAWFORD (Master) s.s. Fei Lung; HERMANN REINMANN, Captain. Witnesses (signed), James Price, mate of s.s. Fei Lung; Clifton Allison, chief engineer s.s. Fei Lung.

The Fei Lung accordingly stood by the Prinz Heinrich, and at about 7.30 p.m. the Fei Lung was made fast ahead, but after she had been towing for a short time the hawser parted.

The Fei Lung then anchored for the night, and on the following day, at about six a.m., made fast again, and after towing for some time the Prinz Heinrich came off, and was towed to a place of safety. The master of the Prinz Heinrich then wrote and signed the following document:

Castrus Bay, June 30, 1886.—I hereby certify that Capt. Robert Crawford, s.s. Fei Lung, has finished this agreement to my entire satisfaction. — HERMANN REINMANN, Captain s.s. Prinz Heinrich.

At the same time the master of the Prinz Heinrich gave to the master of the Fei Lung the following order for 2200*l.* on the Anglia Steam Navigation Company, the owners of the Prinz Heinrich.

Castrus Bay, June 30th, 1886.—To the Directors Anglia Steam Navigation Company, Hamburgh. Gentlemen,—Please pay to Capt. Robert Crawford, s.s. Fei Lung, or his order, 2200*l.* sterling (two thousand two hundred pounds sterling) for services rendered in getting the German steamer Prinz Heinrich off the rocks as per agreement.—HERMANN REINMANN, s.s. Prinz Heinrich, Captain.

This order was indorsed by the master of the Fei Lung to the plaintiffs, and presented by them to the defendants, but was dishonoured. The defendants took a bond or deposit from the owners of cargo on the Prinz Heinrich to secure their share of the 2200*l.*, and in consideration that the plaintiffs would not arrest the Prinz Heinrich, her cargo, and freight, it was agreed between the plaintiffs and the defendants, acting for ship, freight, and cargo, that the plaintiffs' claim of 2200*l.* should be settled in London by arbitration, and that such sum should be deposited by the defendants with the manager of the Hong Kong and Shanghai Banking Corporation in London, pending the arbitrator's decision. In pursuance of the agreement the defendants remitted the sum of 2200*l.* to the manager of such bank, with instructions to hold it to the disposal of the arbitrators, and they appointed the defendant Alfred Edwards, and the plaintiffs appointed the defendant, Arthur Holland, the arbitrators. The 2200*l.* was thereupon deposited in their names, but the defendant company refused to proceed with the arbitration.

The facts alleged by the defendants were as follows: On the 26th June 1886, the Prinz Heinrich struck some rocks about two miles south of Castraes Bay. It was then found that the rocks had pierced her bottom, and that water was getting into No. 1 hold. The pumps were then set to work and part of the cargo was jettisoned, but the ship still remained fast. On the 29th June the Fei Lung came up, and the agreement above mentioned was then entered into. The Fei Lung thereupon attempted to tow the Prinz Heinrich off, but failed to do so. On the 30th June, sufficient cargo having been jettisoned by the defendants' servants, the Prinz Heinrich suddenly floated without any assistance by towing or otherwise from the Fei Lung. The Prinz Heinrich then steamed with her own engines astern, and was then brought to anchor. The defendants denied that their property was in danger of total loss, or that the Fei Lung had rendered any assistance in floating the Prinz Heinrich. They also gave evidence that their master, who had died subsequently to the salvage services, was in such a weak state of mind from ill-health and excessive use of stimulants as to be incapable of understanding the effect of the agreement, and that advantage was taken of his position to force him into signing the agreement. It was alleged that the arbitration was not proceeded with owing to the parties not being able to agree to the terms of the arbitration. The defence further alleged:

8. As to paragraphs 5, 6, and 7 of the statement of claim the said defendants say that when the Fei Lung came to the Prinz Heinrich, as before stated, negotiations took place between the masters of the said vessels as to the rendering of assistance and the price to be paid for the same, and the master of the Fei Lung refused to render assistance except upon the terms of the agreement set out in paragraph 5 of the statement of claim, and the master of the Prinz Heinrich was forced to acquiesce in the demand of the master of the Fei Lung, and to sign the said agreement.

9. The said defendants further say as to the said paragraph that the master of the Prinz Heinrich at the time of the signing of the said agreement and signing the certificate and order in paragraph 6 of the statement of claim set out was so ill from illhealth and excessive use of stimulants as not to be capable of understanding fully the purport and effect of the same.

10. The sums provided to be paid by the said agent were not reasonable for the services to be rendered by the Fei Lung, but were exorbitantly excessive amounts for such service, and if and so far as the said agreement provides for the payment of the sum of 2000*l.* to be made to the Fei Lung upon the Prinz Heinrich coming off, whether with or without the assistance of the Fei Lung, the said agreement is wholly unreasonable and inequitable, and the master of the Fei Lung in procuring the master of the Prinz Heinrich to sign the said agreement took undue advantage of the position and condition of the master of the Prinz Heinrich and his said ship, and the said defendants further say that the said master had not any authority to enter into the said agreement on behalf of the said defendants, and that the said agreement is wholly unjust and inequitable, and is not binding on the said defendants.

11. The said defendants further say as to paragraphs 5, 6, 7 and 8 of the statement of claim that the plaintiffs are seeking to recover against the defendants in respect of services rendered to ship, cargo, and freight, whereas the said defendants are liable in respect of ship and freight only. The said defendants are ready and willing to pay to the plaintiffs in respect of ship and freight such reasonable amount as the court may think just.

J. P. Aspinall (with him Myburgh, Q.C.), for the defendants, was called upon.—The defendants are not bound by this agreement, as it is one which the master had no authority to make. His authority is limited to making any agreements necessary for enabling him to carry out the voyage:

Anderson, Tritton, and Co. v. Ocean Steamship Company, 52 L. T. Rep. N. S. 441; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 401; 10 App. Cas. 107.

This is not such an agreement, as by it the master purports to bind the defendants to pay money in any event, viz., whether the salvage be successful or not. An essential element of salvage is success or services contributing to ultimate success. The terms of the agreement are so unreasonable as not to make it binding on the defendants. The Prinz Heinrich came off solely owing to her cargo being jettisoned, and yet the plaintiffs, for standing by one day, are asking to be paid 2200*l*. It is also contended that the master was not in a fit state to enter into or understand the effect of the agreement. In any event the defendants are only liable for their proportion of the award. The agreement was entered into by the master, as agent for all the interests in his charge, viz., ship, freight, and cargo. The defendants are therefore under no liability to pay salvage in respect of the cargo:

The Raisby, 53 L. T. Rep. N. S. 56; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 473; 10 P. Div. 114;
The Renpor, 48 L. T. Rep. N. S. 887; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 98; 8 P. Div. 115;

Cohen, Q.C. (with him Barnes) for the plaintiffs.—Having regard to the circumstances of the case the defendants are liable for the whole of the salvage:

The Raisby (ubi sup.);
The Cumbrian, 57 L. T. Rep. N. S. 205; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 151.

The agreement was a perfectly reasonable one and the services of great value. The defendants have not established the incapacity of the master.

BUTT, J.—This is a suit to recover remuneration for salvage services rendered by the s.s. Fei Lung of 780 tons register to the s.s. Prinz Heinrich of over 1200 tons burthen. The Prinz Heinrich was found on the rocks on the 29th June 1886. She had been three days there, and an agreement was made between the masters of the two vessels by which the defendants' master agreed to pay 200*l*. a day as long as the Fei Lung stood by, and 2000*l*. in case the Prinz Heinrich came off. The services were rendered, and the Prinz Heinrich came off and was saved, but in such a damaged condition that she was subsequently sold for 3500*l*. She had a valuable cargo on board, consisting largely of sugar, of which a considerable portion was jettisoned. In dealing with this case I must not leave out of consideration the fact that at the time this agreement was made the value of the defendants' property was considerably greater. The first question I have to decide is, whether this agreement is so unreasonable and inequitable that it cannot stand. The sum absolutely secured by the agreement is only 200*l*. It might be increased by circumstances, but it appears to me clear that if, on the evening of the 29th June, when the services began, the Prinz Heinrich had filled with water so that she could not have been moved or had slipped off and sunk, the whole extent of remuneration the salvors could have recovered would have been 200*l*. What, again, was the position of this ship? She had been on the rocks for three days. Two or three large pieces of rock had pierced her bottom and were projecting some three feet into her. I understand that there was a water ballast tank which in effect formed a second bottom to that part of the ship, but it appears that the top of this tank had been forced up. Probably one of the rocks had projected high enough to do this. The result was that the water flowed into the forehold, and rose to the level of the surrounding water. In those circumstances there was some strain from the weight of water as well as the working of the ship. There must have been a strain on the bulkhead, and if that had given way and the next compartment had filled, it was not only possible, but very probable, that the ship herself would have filled. From the entries in the log it is clear that she was bumping on the rocks, which means severe straining and serious danger. The coast, too, was a barbarous and thinly inhabited one, and few, if any, ships would be likely to pass. There is evidence that the only ship that came in sight was one of the same nationality as the Prinz Heinrich, and that she had either not seen the signals or had disregarded them. In these circumstances the position of this ship was not hopeful when the Fei Lung, in answer to her signals, came up.

The question is, in that condition of things, is the agreement so inequitable and improper that I should set it aside, apart from the mental capacity of the master when he signed it. I have asked the opinion of the Elder Brethren, and they say that the danger to the salved ship was very serious and pressing indeed, and that, had they been in the position of her master, they would not have hesitated to enter into this agreement. I have, therefore, no hesitation in holding that this agreement is neither so inequitable nor so improper as to entitle me to set it aside. Then it is said that the master was incompetent, because at the time he signed the agreement he was so ill from the effects of illness and the excessive use of stimulants as to be incapable of understanding its purport and effect. I take that to mean that he did not know what he was about, and was an irresponsible person. It is urged, in another place, that the master of the Fei Lung took undue advantage of his position to get the agreement signed. I do not think there is any evidence of that, and I do not understand fraud to be relied upon. I do not doubt that this man had been drinking before the voyage, and that after getting on the rocks he did so again to some extent. I have watched the evidence on this point very closely. His wife did not say he was drunk at the time. She said he was reduced and weak, and did not care what he did, and that he said he must have some drink to keep himself steady. One or two officers of the Prinz Heinrich have said he was drunk, but the evidence of the officers of the other ship was directly to the contrary. I have also looked at his signature to the agreement, and it is so good and so bold that I can hardly conceive that it was signed by a man who was hopelessly drunk. When one has already decided that the agreement is not unreasonable, it seems almost futile to pursue the inquiry further as to whether it was made by a man who was drunk. There has been a great deal of discussion as to whether the Prinz Heinrich floated off the rocks in consequence of the jettisoning of the cargo, or was towed off by the Fei Lung. I really do not think it is a very material question, because the agreement is that the sum of 2000*l.* should be paid, not in the event of the Fei Lung getting the Prinz Heinrich off, but in the event of the Prinz Heinrich being got off or coming off the rocks. It is not easy to say which is the true version, but, on the whole, I confess I lean to the belief that she was towed off. In any case, I cannot help thinking it was a valuable service.

It is said that the owners of the ship are not liable to pay the whole of this amount, because it is one agreed upon for the whole of the salvage, and that the shipowners have only to bear the proportion that 3500*l.*, the value of their ship, bears to 14,000*l.*, the value of the cargo. That is a proposition to which under no circumstances I could assent. Even if my opinion were different, I think that the owners of the Prinz Heinrich have so conducted themselves as to make themselves liable. I refer to the negotiations, the appointment of arbitrators, and the deposit of money in a bank, all of which circumstances would tend to make the defendants liable for the whole sum, even if they were not so originally. The result has been to put the plaintiffs to sleep in this matter, to lead them to imagine that their claim was secured, and then, some eighteen months or two years afterwards, to tell them to get the greater part of their claim by arresting such portions of the cargo as they might chance to find after this lapse of time. But, apart from that, I am of opinion that where the captain of a ship reasonably and properly enters into such an agreement for the salvage of his ship for a particular sum, he binds the shipowners to pay the agreed amount. The cargo is on board, and the shipowners need not part with it till they have obtained security for any payments which they have to make or have made in respect of it. As a matter of fact, in this very case the shipowners took a bond from the owners of the cargo for the payment of this salvage. It is said that the case of The Raisby (ubi sup.) is opposed to this view, but I am of opinion that it is not applicable to the facts of the present case. I entirely agree with every word Sir James Hannen there says, and as he points out, "The so-called agreement, however, does not purport to extend the liability of the shipowners, or indeed to fix any liability on anyone, except in so far as such liability may be created by the acknowledgment which it contains, that the captain of the Raisby had requested the captain of the Gironde to tow his ship to St. Nazaire. This part of the document in no way alters the position of the matter from what it would have been if the captain of the Raisby had simply accepted the services of the Gironde, in which case it has not been contended that a claim could have been maintained against the ship or its owners for salvage of the cargo." That points the whole difference and distinction between an agreement generally to tow or salve a ship and one for towage or salvage for a particular sum. I do not know whether the decision is, but certainly the dicta in the case of Anderson and Co. v. The Ocean Steamship Company (ubi sup.) are in favour of the view I am now expressing. I therefore hold that this ground of defence fails, and I give judgment for the amount stipulated in the agreement with costs.

THE ESSEQUIBO. (a)

Collision—Overtaking vessel—Flare-up light—Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea (art. 11).

Where the lights of an overtaking vessel are sighted about two miles off, and a flare-up light is exhibited for a short time from the vessel which is being overtaken, and a collision occurs about ten minutes after the extinction of the flare-up, without any further light being exhibited, art. 11 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea is infringed, as it is the duty of a vessel which is being overtaken to exhibit a white or flare-up light at reasonable intervals so long as the other vessel continues to be overtaking.

THIS was a collision action in rem, brought by the owners of cargo on board the barque Hoffnung against the owners of the steamship Essequibo. The plaintiffs claimed for loss of their cargo, owing to the Hoffnung sinking shortly after the collision.

The collision occurred in the English Channel, off the Start Point, on Oct. 8th, 1888.

The facts alleged by the plaintiffs were as follows: At about 9 p.m. on Oct. 8th, the Hoffnung, a barque of 516 tons register, laden with a cargo of salt, on a voyage from Liverpool to Dantzic, was in the English Channel, about twenty-three miles S.S.E. of Start Point. The Hoffnung was on the starboard tack, heading about E. by N., and was making about a knot an hour. The wind was a light air from the S.S.E., and the weather was overcast, but clear, and not very dark. In these circumstances those on board the Hoffnung saw the masthead and green lights of the steamer Essequibo about two to two and a half miles off, and about two points on the port quarter. The barque was kept on her course, and as the Essequibo was seen to be overtaking her a flare-up light was shown over the stern once for a short time. The Essequibo overhauled and got about abeam of the

(a) Reported by J. P. ASPINALL and BUTLER ASPINALL, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

Hoffnung, as if intending to pass on her port side, but she was then seen to be closing in towards the Hoffnung, as if under a port helm; and although the barque's bell was rung and the steamer loudly hailed, she came and with her stem struck the port side of the barque, doing her so much damage that she shortly afterwards sank.

The defendants called no witnesses. From their defence it appeared that at the time of the collision the Essequibo, a steamer of 1,341 tons register, was on a voyage from Porto Rico to London with a general cargo. On the night in question she was in the English Channel, about twenty-seven miles S.S.E. of the Start, heading S. 80 deg. E., and making about eight and a half knots. In these circumstances those on board of her saw for a moment a faint white light, about two points on the starboard bow, from a quarter to half a mile off. Immediately afterwards a red light came into view at about the same bearing. Although the helm was immediately put hard-a-port and engines reversed full speed, the Essequibo with her stem struck the port side of the Hoffnung.

The defendants charged the Hoffnung (inter alia) with breach of art. 11. of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, which is as follows:

> A ship which is being overtaken by another shall show from her stern to such last-mentioned ship a white light or a flare-up light.

From the evidence of the plaintiffs' witnesses it appeared that shortly after the lights of the Essequibo were seen about two miles distant on the port quarter of the Hoffnung, a flare-up light was shown once, for a short time. The exhibition of this light did not exceed two minutes. No other light was shown to the Essequibo. Between the exhibition of the flare-up and the collision an interval of ten minutes elapsed. The plaintiffs also alleged that the night was such that the Hoffnung could have been seen from the Essequibo in sufficient time to have avoided a collision, even if no light was exhibited.

Sir Walter Phillimore (with him Dr. Stubbs) for the plaintiffs.—The cause of this collision was bad look-out on the Essequibo. The plaintiffs have strictly complied with the requirements of art. 11. The article does not speak of a light being shown from time to time, but confines itself to requiring an overtaken ship to show "a white light or a flare-up light." The Hoffnung did this, and also kept her course in obedience to art. 22, and is therefore free from blame. As a matter of fact, the Essequibo had ample indication of the Hoffnung, and had she been keeping a good look-out the collision would never have occurred.

Bucknill, Q.C. (with him J. G. Barnes) for the defendants.—The Hoffnung was being overtaken by the Essequibo:

> The Main, 55 L. T. Rep. N. S. 15; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 37; L. Rep. 11 Prob. Div. 132.

Therefore it became her duty to give effect to the provisions of art. 11. This she has not done. An exhibition of a light ten minutes before the collision, and when the vessels are two miles apart, is not a sufficient compliance with the article. It is the duty of a vessel which is being overtaken to continue to show a stern light from time to time, so long as the overtaking vessel cannot see her side lights. If not, the article is useless, and an overtaking vessel would have no means of knowing how to manœuvre. The Hoffnung is therefore solely to blame for this collision.

Sir JAMES HANNEN.—As no witnesses have been called for the defendant vessel, the statements which have been made by those who have been called by the plaintiffs must be accepted, and I take it that they do in fact establish that a flare-up light of some description was exhibited some nine or ten minutes before the collision. It may be open to doubt whether or not it was an effective flare-up, as it does not appear to have been actually used for six or seven months previously. It is said that it was all right before the ship left Liverpool. But it must depend, I should imagine, on the extent to which the waste cotton had been calcined by previous use—whether it would absorb much turpentine, and therefore whether it would burn vigorously and long. It appears that the whole exhibition of the light was begun and completed in two minutes, and that it took place some nine or ten minutes before the collision. Now, during the whole of that time, the Essequibo was an overtaking vessel. So far as The Main (ubi sup.) has any bearing on the case, it simply amounts to this: I took what the Court of Appeal considered to be a mistaken view. In my definition of an overtaking vessel I thought that, if the aftermost vessel was broadening so as to indicate she was on another course from that of the overtaken vessel, she could not be considered to be an overtaking vessel. But the Court of Appeal, I think perhaps fortunately for the safety of those navigating the seas, found that that was not a correct view, but that it was rather a practical question, if one vessel was behind the other, either on a parallel or a slightly divergent course, whether she was an overtaking vessel, and whether she stood in need of that assistance which this rule was intended to give.

Apart from that decision, it is plain that this was an overtaking vessel, and I assume, as I have said, that a flare-up was shown to her ten minutes before the collision; and the simple question which now remains for my determination, and a very important practical question it is, is whether or not, in those circumstances, the exhibition of this light discharges the overtaken vessel, once and for all, from the duty of exhibiting it again. We are clearly of opinion that it is for the safety of vessels that the one exhibition should not be depended upon, but that the light should be exhibited from time to time, so long as the vessel continues to be an overtaken vessel. It is perfectly true that there may be a want of proper look-out on the overtaking vessel; but it is to guard against the defects not merely of men's sight, but of their minds and attention, that these rules are framed. It might well be that through negligence the flare-up was not seen, and I think there ought to have been a better look-out on the Hoffnung. That must be guarded against, and the flare-up must be exhibited again from time to time to guard against inattention on the part of the overtaking ship. It is not necessary to define an interval. That must be a practical question depending on the speed at which the vessel appears to be approaching. But it is not sufficient to rest content with the one exhibition. There might be a great want of care on board the steamer, but, as I have already said, it is necessary to guard against those defects. I think, however, there is no doubt on the evidence that the Essequibo is to blame for not keeping a good look-out, and I also pronounce the barque to blame.

THE ARGENTINO. (a)

Collision—Loss of employment — Charter-party— Measure of damages.

Where it is verbally agreed between a ship's managing owner and certain shipbrokers that on the ship's return to London, where she was expected within a few days, the brokers would provide her with cargo for carriage to foreign ports, and in consequence of a collision with another vessel for which the other vessel was solely to blame, she is unable to fulfil the engagement, and her place is taken by another vessel, the owners are entitled to recover from the owners of the wrong-doing vessel damages for loss of the engagement, and in estimating such damages the registrar should take into consideration the difference between the freight she would have earned and the freight she earned on another voyage when repaired, and the fact that the number of days occupied in loading her on the substituted voyage exceeded the number of days that would have been occupied in loading her under the engagement she was unable to fulfil.

THIS was an objection by the defendants in a collision action in rem to the registrar's report therein.

The collision took place in the Thames on the 20th Feb. 1887, between the plaintiffs' steamship the Gracie and the defendants' steamship the Argentino. An action was thereupon instituted in which it was agreed that both vessels should be deemed to blame, and the damages were referred to the registrar and merchants.

In consequence of the collision the Argentino was under repairs for some days, and was unable to fulfil an engagement with Messrs. Westcott and Laurance to take a cargo from Antwerp to Batoum. Messrs. Westcott and Laurance thereupon engaged a smaller vessel, the Beta, in lieu of the Argentino. After the Argentino had been repaired she was employed by Westcott and Laurance to carry a cargo from Antwerp and London to Odessa.

At the reference the owners of the Argentino claimed (inter alia) 785*l.* 13*s.* 4*d.*, which was made up as follows: (1) 455*l.*, the difference between the gross freight earned by the Beta and that earned by the Argentino; (2) 93*l.*, the freight which the Argentino, being a larger vessel than the Beta, would have earned in excess of that earned by the Beta, had she been able to perform the voyage; (3) 237*l.* 13*s.* 4*d.*, demurrage for eight days, the number of days which it took to load the Argentino in excess of the days occupied in loading the Beta.

These items the registrar disallowed. His report was as follows:

The collision in this case between the Argentino and the Gracie took place in the Thames on the 20th Feb. 1887. It was agreed between the parties that both ships were to blame, and that the damages sustained by each respectively should be investigated by the registrar and merchants.

No difficulty exists in respect of the damage sustained by the Gracie, but the owners of the Argentino advance a claim for special damages under the following circumstances:

Messrs. Westcott and Laurance are shipbrokers in London, who collect cargo at Antwerp and London for conveyance to the Black Sea by two different routes, and the vessels employed for each voyage call at different specified ports on the way, one route or round ending at Batoum, the other at Odessa.

About a week or ten days previous to the collision above mentioned, when the Argentino was at sea on a voyage from Sebastopol, with a cargo of wheat for London, Mr. Westcott, a partner in the above-named firm, called at the office of Mr. Porteous, the managing owner of the Argentino, and inquired if he had a boat to load for the Batoum route, and, being informed of the expected arrival of the Argentino, it was verbally arranged that the Argentino, as soon as she arrived, discharged her cargo, and could be ready, should proceed to Antwerp to load for a Batoum route. Later on, after the Argentino had arrived in the Thames, and had collided with the Gracie, and in consequence needed repairs, which would take some considerable time, it was arranged between Mr. Westcott and Mr. Porteous that Mr. Westcott should engage another vessel in lieu of the Argentino for the contemplated voyage to Batoum, and accordingly Mr. Westcott engaged the ship Beta, which loaded at Antwerp and in London, and made the same round to Batoum which it was intended the Argentino should make.

The Beta commenced this round by leaving London for Antwerp on the 7th March, and, after loading some cargo there, returned to London for further cargo, and finally sailed from the Thames about the 20th March.

The repairs to the Argentino were finished on the 18th March, and a few days before that date Mr. Westcott proposed to Mr. Porteous to load the Argentino for the Odessa route, an offer which Mr. Porteous accepted, and accordingly on the 19th or 20th March the ship left London for Antwerp, where she loaded about 300 tons, sailed thence to London on the 27th, where she loaded 1000 tons more, and finally sailed from London on the Odessa round on the 10th April.

The result of the voyages of the Beta and Argentino respectively seems to be this: The Beta earned a gross freight on the Batoum round of 1536*l.*, the Argentino a gross freight on the Odessa round of 1081*l.*, showing a difference of 455*l.*, which sum is claimed as a loss or damage arising from the collision. It is further said that, had the Argentino made the same round the Beta did, she would have loaded a full cargo, and, being a larger vessel, would have consequently earned a larger gross freight than the Beta by 93*l.*, which is claimed as a further loss resulting from the collision.

Then again, in consequence of the Argentino being eight days longer loading than the Beta, which is attributed to her cargo not being equally ready for shipment as the Beta's, eight days demurrage of the ship is claimed at the extravagant rate of 29*l.* 14*s.* 2*d.* per day, equal to 237*l.* 13*s.* 4*d.*, thus making a total claim for consequential damages under this head of 785*l.* 13*s.* 4*d.* I am of opinion that the claim is too remote, and cannot be sustained. It seems to me there is a broad distinction between this case and that of The Star of India (35 L. T. Rep. N. S. 407; 1 Prob. Div. 466; 3 Asp. Mar. Law. Cas. 261), where the late judge of the Admiralty Court held that, in estimating damages arising from a collision, the loss of a beneficial charter-party under which the ship would have earned a specific amount of freight must be considered. The circumstances of that case were very different from those of the present. In this case there was a mere verbal arrangement to allow the Argentino to load for the Batoum route in the usual way without any promise of a full cargo, or guarantee as to the rate of freight. The shipowner had to take these risks. The arrangement had not the force and effect of a definite charter-party, under which a specific amount of gross freight is contracted for. Then the substituted arrangement under which the Argentino went on the Odessa round was voluntarily made on the expectation, which both parties entertained, that it would prove as favourable in its results as the first arrangement for the Batoum round.

Mr. Porteous admitted that he took his chance as to the quantity of cargo the ship would get, and as to the rate of freight, and that he accepted the second offer because Mr. Westcott led him to think the ship would do as well with it. There is no evidence before us that the Argentino could not have got employment as profitable as the Beta's from other brokers or in other directions if it had been sought or inquired for, and it appears to me that, because in the result the employment the owner accepted for his ship accidentally proved to be less favourable than he was led to anticipate, and probably less favourable than if she had sailed on the Batoum route as originally intended, he is not thereby entitled to claim compensation for his disappointed expectations as if they were the necessary result of the collision.

From a printed advertisement put in at the reference the Argentino was advertised by Westcott and Laurance to follow the s.s. Rome, which was to sail on the 17th Jan.

Sir Walter Phillimore and Boyd, for the defendants, in objection to the report.—The registrar was wrong in disallowing the defendants' claim in respect of the loss of employment of the Argentino. There was a binding agreement between the defendants and Westcott and Laurance that she should be employed for a certain voyage. Owing to the collision she was not so employed, and her owners have thereby sustained a loss. If so, the defendants are entitled to recover that loss:

The Star of India, 35 L. T. Rep. N. S. 407; 1 P. Div. 466; 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 261;
The Consett, 5 P. Div. 229; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 34, n.

In estimating that loss the defendants have properly claimed the difference between the two voyages, the extra freight which the Argentino would have earned and the demurrage for delay in loading. Those items are the natural consequences of the collision, and are therefore recoverable.

Finlay, Q.C. and Nelson, for the plaintiffs, contra.—The registrar was right in disallowing this claim. No such loss has ever been allowed before, and to allow it would be to act contrary to the principles upon which the courts have acted in assessing damages:

The Parana, 36 L. T. Rep. N. S. 388; 2 P. Div. 118; 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 399;
The Notting Hill, 51 L. T. Rep. N. S. 66; 9 P. Div. 105; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 241.

In the first place there was no binding engagement, and even if there was, the loss is too remote. All manner of contingencies might have happened to prevent the Argentino carrying out this engagement. The case of The Star of India (ubi sup.) is not in point, because there the ship was fixed by a definite charter-party for a certain cargo, a certain voyage, and a certain freight. Here everything is in uncertainty, and there were no materials before the registrar to enable him to estimate the amount of this alleged loss.

Sir Walter Phillimore in reply.

Cur. adv. vult.

Feb. 14.—Sir JAMES HANNEN.—In this case the facts are very clearly stated in the registrar's report, and it will not be necessary for me to state them. The Argentino came into collision with a vessel called the Gracie, and it was agreed that both vessels should be deemed to blame. No question arose as to the damages which the Gracie was entitled to recover, but a question arises as to those claimed by the Argentino. It appears that shortly before the collision an arrangement—I purposely use the expression—was come to between the owners of the Argentino and the firm of Messrs. Westcott and Laurence, shipbrokers of London, that the Argentino should take its place on a line of vessels which Messrs. Westcott and Laurence were in the habit of employing for the purpose of carrying cargo to ports in the Black Sea. The Argentino, in consequence of the collision, was under repair for a considerable time, and was unable to take her place in that line and earn the freight which she would have carried if she had gone on the voyage. When it was seen that it was impossible that she could take her turn, Messrs. Westcott and Laurence engaged another ship, called the Beta, which accordingly collected freight in London and in Antwerp, and proceeded on the voyage which the Argentino would have taken but for the accident, or unless other events had intervened. It was claimed on the part of the Argentino that she was entitled to compensation for the loss of the advantages which she would have derived from the arrangement made with Messrs. Westcott and Laurence. The learned registrar, assisted by merchants, has found that the Argentino was not entitled to make that claim, it being considered that the damage was too remote. The registrar says, with regard to what I have called an arrangement, that "it was verbally arranged that the Argentino, as soon as she arrived, discharged her cargo and could be ready, should proceed to Antwerp to load for a Batoum route;" and later on he says, "In this case there was a mere verbal arrangement to allow the Argentino to load for the Batoum route in the usual way." Now it was argued that the learned registrar seemed to base his judgment upon the fact that there was a mere verbal arrangement as distinguished from a written agreement. I doubt whether that was in his mind. I think it is more probable that he insisted on its being verbal in this sense, viz., that it did not lead him to the conclusion that it was a binding arrangement. If I agreed with him in that, which I take to be his finding, I should have nothing to say to his report. But I am of opinion that that is not a true view of the facts which occurred between Mr. Porteous, the managing owner of the Argentino, and Messrs. Westcott and Laurence. It appears that Messrs. Westcott and Laurence are in the habit of collecting from their customers freight which they send to the Black Sea, and that they have certain rates of freight which they charge, their profit being obtained by a commission upon these freights. This course of business was perfectly well known to both parties, for it appears that the Argentino herself had been employed on this line, and I also think other vessels owned by Mr. Porteous. The course of business was known, and the expectation which was held out of remunerative employment was present to the minds of the parties when they entered into this arrangement, which I take to be an agreement. In formal language it might have been stated thus: In consideration that Mr. Porteous agrees to supply his vessel, the Argentino, for the purpose of carrying a cargo to be supplied by Messrs. Westcott and Laurence in its turn, Messrs. Westcott and Laurence agree to allow that vessel to collect that cargo and go on that voyage. I am of opinion that that would have been a perfectly binding agreement. If, for instance, the Argentino had not been ready, and Messrs. Westcott and Laurence had been obliged to engage another vessel, they would have had a ground of action against the owners of the Argentino for any loss they had sustained. What leads me strongly to the opinion that this was not mere vague talk is the fact that the Argentino was, to the knowledge of the owners, advertised to take its turn after the Rome, which was advertised to start on Jan. 17th. In the advertisement I have before me the Argentino is stated as the vessel to follow. I am therefore perfectly satisfied of the bona fides of the statement made by both parties that they had entered into an agreement. I am of opinion that there was a binding agreement, by which the Argentino was assured, as far as anything in business transactions can be assured—for in this world nothing is certain, and if a ship is not run down by one vessel she may be by another, or be burned or otherwise be lost—I say she was reasonably assured that she would obtain the advantage of this contract which had been entered into.

The learned registrar says he was referred to the case of The Star of India (ubi sup.), in which the loss sustained by the inability to fulfil a charter-party was allowed by the late judge of the Admiralty Court to be taken into consideration in estimating the amount of damages resulting from a collision. But the learned registrar distinguishes that case in this manner. He says this was a mere verbal arrangement to allow the Argentino to load, without any promise of a full cargo or a guaranteed rate of freight. The arrangement, he says, had not taken the form of a charter-party, and therefore had not the force of a definite charter-party under which a specific rate of freight is payable. On that I differ with him. There is no magic in the fact that the advantage is to be derived from a definite charter-party. It would be sufficient if there was something which, as I have said, leads to a reasonable assurance that advantage will be derived, whether it be by charter-party or by verbal contract. The case of The Star of India (ubi sup.) was followed in the case of The Consett (ubi sup.) in which Sir Robert Phillimore allowed loss from inability to fulfil a charter-party. I also find an earlier case in which the principle upon which the court proceeds is clearly laid down. I allude to the case of The Clarence (3 W. Rob. 283). There the damage claimed was not allowed, but the court, in giving judgment, explained the principle upon which it proceeds in these cases in the following words: "It does not follow as a matter of necessity that anything is due for the detention of a vessel whilst under repair. Under some circumstances undoubtedly such a consequence will follow, as for example where a fishing voyage is lost or where the vessel would have been beneficially employed. The onus of proving her loss rests with the plaintiff, and this onus has not been discharged upon the present occasion. Had the owners of the Clarence proved that the vessel would have earned freight, and that such freight was lost by the collision, the case would have fallen within the principle to which I have last adverted. I therefore pronounce against the objection, and confirm the report with costs." In this case, for the reasons I have given, I am of opinion that the owners of the Argentino have shown that their vessel would have earned freight, and that such freight was lost by the collision. The nature of the advantage which she has lost is not as exactly defined as it would have been under a charter-party. But its nature was clear, although the amount to which it might attain was uncertain. The Argentino was entitled to take her turn, and to receive for carriage such cargo as had been collected by Messrs. Westcott and Laurence. The rate of freight was ascertained. The only thing that remained in uncertainty was whether there would be a full cargo. A full cargo was got for the Beta.

I am of opinion that on these facts it can be said that a definite advantage which would have been derived from the agreement with Messrs. Westcott and Laurence was prevented being attained by reason of the collision, and that therefore it was necessary to take that loss into account. It was sought in argument to liken this to the case of the Parana (ubi sup.), where it was held that the loss of market could not be allowed, but that was for a reason very clearly expressed by Mellish, L.J. The reason is that the loss of market is purely speculative. But I think there is nothing speculative about this claim. Its nature was clearly defined, and the amount of loss was easily ascertainable. For this reason I am of opinion that the amount allowed is not sufficient, and that it is necessary to take into account what the Argentino has really lost. It does not follow that damages for the detention of the vessel would necessarily be allowed, because it is conceivable that the circumstances would be such as to show that the vessel would not have obtained employment. But it is usually assumed that a vessel will find employment. Primâ facie the Argentino lost all the profit she would have gained if she had been able to take her turn. But she is not on that account entitled to remain idle, and she will only be allowed such damages as would result from her being obliged to be employed in some less remunerative way than she would have been employed in if the original contract had been fulfilled. It is said by the registrar that there is no evidence that the Argentino could not have got employment as profitable as the Beta's from brokers in other directions if it had been sought and inquired for. Now, if the registrar and merchants with their great experience on this subject had been able to say, either from the evidence before them or from their own knowledge derived from their own general experience, that the Argentino was not properly employed in going on another route, viz., to Odessa instead of to Batoum, I should have had nothing to say against it. But I think it is a misapprehension to say that the owners of the Argentino were bound to show that she could not have got employment as profitable as the Beta's from other brokers. The question is, whether there was anything to show that this substituted voyage, which I cannot doubt was entered into in good faith, was not the best thing to do under the circumstances. If it was, then the difference between the advantage derived from the two voyages must be taken as the natural result of the impossibility of fulfilling the contract. It appears to me, therefore, that this case must go back to the registrar for the purpose of ascertaining the amount of loss which the owners of the Argentino have suffered from being unable to fulfil the contract. In this particular case there was another voyage, which lasted somewhere about the same time as the voyage to Batoum would occupy, and therefore it naturally and easily presents itself as a subject of comparison. Great difficulties might have arisen if the Argentino had been employed on a totally different route and under different circumstances on a voyage which might have lasted a very much shorter or longer time. Fortunately this element of difficulty does not exist in this case, and I think there is an easy means of forming an opinion as to the real loss suffered by the owners of the Argentino.

There is another point to consider in connection with this. It is said that the cargo was in fact laden more expeditiously on the Beta than on the Argentino by eight days. That is asked as a specific amount of damage; but I am of opinion that it cannot be so treated, although it is a matter which must be taken into consideration. It will depend whether in the employment of a vessel in the ordinary way eight days' demurrage is something extraordinary. If the owners of the Argentino took a contract which enabled them to be detained for an unreasonable number of days, that is not a loss which should fall on the other vessel. But if eight days is the amount of demurrage which is properly understood in obtaining a cargo for a vessel of this sort, then that must be taken into consideration. As to the capacity of the Argentino, I am of opinion that it was greater than that of the Beta, and, if she could have obtained a full cargo, it would have been larger than that carried by the Beta. That also would be part of the loss which her owners have sustained, and must be taken into consideration. For these reasons I am of opinion that the report cannot be affirmed, and must go back for reconsideration on the principles I have laid down.

THE RIVER LAGAN. (a)

Collision—Tug and tow—Costs—Tort—Breach of contract.

Where the owners of a barge in tow of a tug having been damaged by collision with a steamship, instituted an action against the owners of both tug and steamer to recover damages, and the steamer, which alleged that the collision was due to the negligence of the tug, was found alone to blame, the Court ordered the owners of the steamer to pay the costs of the plaintiffs and of the successful defendants.

(a) Reported by J. P. ASPINALL and BUTLER ASPINALL, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

THIS was an action by the owners of the barge Emily against the owners of the steamship River Lagan, and the owners of the tug Scorpion, to recover damages for collision between the barge and the River Lagan.

Shortly before the collision the barge was proceeding down the river Thames in tow of the steam-tug Scorpion, when the steamship River Lagan was seen on the port bow of the barge to be coming away from the north side of the river, with her head angling towards the south shore. The Scorpion kept on at full speed, and shortly afterwards the River Lagan struck the barge on her side amidships, and caused her to sink.

The plaintiffs alleged that the collision was due to the improper navigation both of the River Lagan and of the Scorpion. They alternatively claimed damages from the Scorpion for breach of contract.

The owners of the River Lagan alleged that the collision was solely due to the negligence of the tug Scorpion, whereas the Scorpion alleged that it was occasioned by the negligence of the River Lagan, and was contributed to by the man in charge of the barge failing to cast her loose when he saw a collision was imminent.

The action was tried on the 23rd and 24th Jan. by Sir James Hannen, assisted by Trinity Masters, when the River Lagan was found alone to blame, whereupon Bucknill, Q.C. (with him Pyke), for the plaintiffs, asked that the owners of the River Lagan should be ordered to pay all the costs, both of the plaintiffs and of the owners of the Scorpion. The plaintiffs acted reasonably in suing both defendants. The improper navigation of the River Lagan has been the cause of this litigation. Moreover, the owners of the River Lagan have throughout improperly maintained that the negligence of the Scorpion was the cause of the collision:

The Honduras Inter-Oceanic Railway Company v. Lefevre and Tucker, 36 L. T. Rep. N. S. 46; 46 L. J. 391, Ex.; L. Rep. 2 Ex. Div. 301.

J. G. Barnes (with him Finlay, Q.C.), for the owners of the River Lagan, contrà.—My client ought not to be made to bear the costs of the owners of the tug. The event shows that the tug ought never to have been sued at all. If so, the plaintiffs ought to pay the tug's costs. The plaintiffs for their own convenience sued both vessels in this action, and thereby avoided the possibility of having to bring a second action, which would have been the case had they unsuccessfully sued only one of the two vessels in the first instance.

J. P. Aspinall (with him Hall, Q.C.), for the owners of the Scorpion, referred to the case of Green v. Goodyear (a), which was an

(Before HAWKINS, J. and a Special Jury.)

GREEN AND BURLEIGH v. GOODYEAR AND THE GENERAL STEAM NAVIGATION COMPANY.

THIS was an action to recover damages occasioned by the steamship Valencia, owned by the defendant Goodyear, coming into collision with certain piles and works owned by the plaintiffs.

At the time of the accident the plaintiffs were engaged in repairing and adding to a steamboat pier in the river Thames, and for that purpose had put down certain piles. On Dec. 22, 1882, Goodyear's steamship Valencia action by the owners of a pier against the owners of the steamships Valencia and Alford, for damage done to the pier by the Valencia. The Valencia admitted coming into contact with the pier, but alleged she was forced to do so by the negligent navigation of the Alford. The case was tried by Hawkins, J. and a special jury, who found that the damage was due to the negligence of the Alford, whose owners Hawkins, J. ordered to pay the costs of the plaintiffs and of the owners of the Valencia.

The PRESIDENT (Sir James Hannen).—I think it right that the owners of the River Lagan should pay all the costs, i.e., those of their co-defendants and of the plaintiffs. Mr. Barnes has insisted all throughout that the tug was alone to blame, and the question which I have had to determine was, whether the tug or the steamer was in fault. I have found the River Lagan alone to blame. If the River Lagan had not attempted to throw the blame on the tug, things might have been different, but, as I have said, the real contention in the case was, whether the tug or the River Lagan was to blame. I think the plaintiffs, being in doubt as to which of these vessels was in fault, acted reasonably in joining them both as defendants. I shall therefore order the owners of the River Lagan to pay both sets of costs.

collided with the piles, doing them damage, and thereby delaying the repairs and alterations.

The plaintiffs sued jointly Goodyear and the General Steam Navigation Company, the owners of the steamship Alford, alleging that the collision was caused by the negligent and careless navigation of the Valencia, or alternatively that the Valencia was driven into the piles in consequence of the negligence of the General Steam Navigation Company by their servants in and about the steering and navigation of the Alford.

Goodyear by his defence denied the negligent navigation of the Valencia, alleging that so far as she was concerned the collision was occasioned by inevitable accident, and alternatively pleaded as follows:

"Alternatively, if and so far as any damage was done to the piles and works mentioned in the statement of claim by and through the Valencia coming in contact with the same, the defendant alleges that such damages were caused by and through the mere careless, negligent, and improper navigation of the steamship Alford, belonging to the General Steam Navigation Company, and not otherwise."

The General Steam Navigation Company denied that the collision was in any way occasioned by the negligent navigation of the Alford, and alleged that it was solely due to the negligent navigation of the Valencia.

The action was tried before Hawkins, J. and a special jury, on the 31st March, and the 1st, 2nd, and 3rd April, when the jury found that the Valencia was in no way to blame, and that the Alford was solely to blame; i.e., a verdict for the plaintiff against the General Steam Navigation Company, and for the defendant Goodyear against the plaintiff.

The Judge thereupon gave judgment for the plaintiffs with costs against the General Steam Navigation Company, but reserved the question whether judgment was to be entered for Goodyear with or without cost.

April 7.—Goodyear moved for judgment with costs.

Myburgh, Q.C. and J. P. Aspinall for Goodyear.—Goodyear is entitled to judgment, and also to costs either as against the plaintiffs or the General Steam Navigation Company: (Rudow v. Great Britain Life Insurance Society, 44 L. T. Rep. N. S. 688; 17 Ch. Div. 600; Wilson v. Thomson, L. Rep. 20 Eq. Cas. 459.)

Kemp, Q.C. (with him Brenner and Stokes) for the plaintiffs.—The General Steam Navigation Company ought to pay Goodyear's costs. The whole litigation has been occasioned by their negligence, and in the circumstances the plaintiffs were justified in suing both the defendants.

Hall, Q.C. and Barnes for the General Steam Navigation Company.—The plaintiffs have failed as against Goodyear, and therefore ought to pay his costs. The event shows that he ought never to have been made a party to the action.

HAWKINS, J. gave judgment for Goodyear, and ordered the General Steam Navigation Company to pay his costs.

THE HARRINGTON. (a)

Collision—Wreck—Thames Conservancy Act 1857 (20 & 21 Vict. c. cxlvii.), s. 86.

The "charges and expenses" of raising wrecks to which the Thames Conservators are entitled under the Thames Conservancy Act 1857, must be reasonable charges and expenses.

In estimating such charges and expenses the Conservators are entitled to take into account the interest on the capital invested in the plant used in raising the wreck in question, repairs to and depreciation in, and insurance on plant; but they are only entitled to make such charges in each particular case in relation to the amount of plant used therein, and to the time for which it is actually used.

THIS was an action originally brought in the Queen's Bench Division by the Conservators of the River Thames against the owners of the steamship Harrington to recover 1570*l.* 18*s.* 2*d.*, the balance of an account for raising the wreck of the Harrington.

The action was subsequently transferred to the Admiralty Division, and the defendants having admitted liability the plaintiffs' claim was referred to the registrar and merchants to assess the same.

The Harrington had been sunk in the Thames on the 9th Nov. 1886, owing to a collision with the steamship Caroline, and the Thames Conservators under the provisions of the Thames Conservancy Act 1857, thereupon proceeded to raise the wreck. Having succeeded in doing so, the vessel was sold, and realised 1124*l.* 0*s.* 4*d.*, for which sum credit was given to the defendants, thereby reducing the plaintiffs' claim from 2694*l.* 18*s.* 6*d.* to 1570*l.* 18*s.* 2*d.* Of this the registrar allowed 1055*l.* 18*s.* 2*d.*, for reasons which are stated in the following report:

In this case the action was originally brought in the Court of Queen's Bench on behalf of the Conservators of the River Thames against R. Gordon and Co., the owners of the steamship Harrington, to recover 1570*l.* 18*s.* 2*d.*, the balance of an account for raising the wreck of that ship which had been ran into and sunk in the river Thames by the s.s. Caroline, on the 9th Nov. 1886. The action was subsequently transferred to this division, and thereafter the defendants admitted their liability, and consented to an order referring the claim to the registrar and merchants. The account for raising the wreck amounted to 2694*l.* 18*s.* 6*d.* The net proceeds of the sale of the wreck amounted to 1124*l.* 0*s.* 4*d.*, which was received by the plaintiffs, leaving the balance now claimed of 1570*l.* 18*s.* 2*d.* The defendants have objected to the account as excessive, and that some of the charges are made on an erroneous principle, namely, that they secure a profit on the work done, and not a mere return of the "charges and expenses" incurred in weighing and raising the ship, which is all the plaintiffs are entitled to claim and recover under the Thames Conservancy Act 1857, sect. 86. Those words certainly create a difficulty. It is not denied by the plaintiffs that they exclude the idea of the conservancy being entitled to make a profit, whilst the defendants contend that they only include actual payments out of pocket. I consider, however, that I must view them as justifying in each instance such demands as will suffice to protect the plaintiffs from incurring financial loss by their operations in raising a wreck. No difficulty perhaps would arise if the conservancy on each occasion hired the necessary plant for raising a wreck, though it may be doubtful if such a plan would be more economical, or whether the plant to be hired would be equally efficient. But, as a matter of fact, the Thames Conservancy have provided their own plant for raising wrecks, occasionally supplementing it by the hire of tugs and lighters. The main question now is what charges in addition to the actual expenses or payments are the conservators entitled to make in this case? They have adopted a fixed scale, which provides a stated rate of charge per diem for the use of each lighter or tug employed, and it falls to us to consider whether in our opinion the application of that scale in this case does not make the amount demanded of the owners of the Harrington excessive. The scale was adopted in Jan. 1884 on the report and recommendation of their chief engineer, but we have no evidence of the calculations on which, or of the reasons for which, it was adopted. It has already been said that the plaintiffs' account for raising this wreck amounts to 2694*l.* 18*s.* 6*d.*, and it may be divided under the following heads:

A. Expenses:
Labour paid	742	9	9
Superintendence	116	17	9
Hire of tugs, hulks, &c.	327	10	0
Sundries	3	6	0	1190	3	6
B. Charges:
For use of plaintiffs' lighters	708	10	0
Diving dress	14	10	0

A. Expenses paid 1190*l.* 3*s.* 6*d.* As regards these expenses satisfactory evidence has been produced to show that they were actually incurred, and that the accounts have been accurately kept in regard to them. Nor, considering the season of the year, and the great difficulty of the operations consequent on the position of the wreck and the depth of water over it, do we see any reason for objecting to this portion of the claim, except possibly to the high rate paid for the hire of the hulk Hamburg, and the length of time for which it was hired, which may be attributable to the fact that other wrecks more urgently needing the attention of the conservancy delayed or postponed operations on the Harrington. Possibly this additional expense and others arising from the same cause might in equity be charged to those wrecks, but I have not thought it necessary in this case to enter upon and decide such an issue as that. Neither have I sufficient materials for the purpose. I have therefore allowed 1190*l.* 3*s.* 6*d.* as expenses paid.

B. Charges, &c., 1504*l.* 15*s.* These charges appear to us disproportionate to the services rendered. They amount to 127 per cent. of the total expenditure. They may be subdivided under three heads, viz., charges of 938*l.* 5*s.* for the use of plaintiffs' lighters, tug, watch boat, and diving dress, apart from any payments or expenses; a charge of 400*l.* for the use, involving wear and tear of ropes, &c.; and a charge of 166*l.* 10*s.* for insurance. First, as regards the 938*l.* 5*s.* On examining the scale we observe that for the use of lighter No. 4, which is twenty years old, and of the value as estimated by the superintendent of 1000*l.*, 2*l.* per diem is charged, which would amount to 730*l.* per annum, or 73 per cent. per annum on her value. In the case of lighter No. 8, also valued at 1000*l.*, 4*l.* per diem is charged, equal to 1460*l.* per annum, or nearly 150 per cent. on her value. For the use of lighters 9 and 10, three years old, and which are said to have cost when new 6000*l.* each, 10*l.* per diem for each is charged, equal to rather more than 60 per cent. per annum. We have not the means of testing in this way all the rates charged in the scale, but looking at the scale as a whole, we find that the authorised charge for the use of the lighters, tug, and diving dress therein set forth amounts to 49*l.* 10*s.* per day, or close upon 18,000*l.* per annum. In the engineer's report of Dec. 1883, the value of the craft and machinery afloat for the purpose of raising wrecks belonging to the conservancy was estimated at 27,000*l.* We do not know exactly what was included in that estimate, but we are satisfied that 24,000*l.* would be a full value for the tug, lighters, and diving dress set out in the scale, and consequently the authorised charges for their use, if they were used daily for twelve months, would be equivalent to 75 per cent. on that value. Such a scale we consider has all the appearance of being excessive. It has already been stated that the Harrington was sunk on the 9th Nov. 1886. The conservancy took charge of the wreck forthwith, but being engaged in raising another wreck, the Minerva, did not take any active steps towards lifting the Harrington until the 5th Dec., and the first attempt to lift her was made on the 15th Dec., when she was raised and removed to Northfleet, a distance of about two miles. On the 18th she was further lifted, and moved a few feet into shallower water. On the 31st she was again lifted, and moved about fifty feet, but slipped back into deeper water. On the 11th Jan. 1887 the wreck was again moved, but again slipped back. On the 21st she was put into a more upright position. On the 26th she was moved a little into shallow water; and on the 31st she was again and for the last time moved into less water. During this time the superintendent was repeatedly called to several other wrecks in the river besides the Minerva, viz., the Sultan, the Widgeon, the Western, the Martha, the Trader, the Fortunatus; and it was admitted that after the Harrington had been placed on the bank at Northfleet, on Dec. 15, further operations upon her were considerably delayed by the operations in connection with the other wrecks named, as well as by the necessity for waiting for suitable tides. After taking all these circumstances into consideration, and also that subsequently to the 31st Jan. the conservancy had to watch the wreck until it was sold, for which about 50*l.* is charged, we have come to the conclusion that the charge of 938*l.* 5*s.*, which has been made for the mere use of such portions of the plant as were employed in raising and watching the Harrington, in addition to all expenses incurred, is excessive, and without pretending to fix an alternative rate for each lighter or boat used, we think that the above charge should be reduced to 650*l.* I have therefore disallowed 285*l.* 5*s.* under this head, a disallowance which includes an admitted error or overcharge of 8*l.* for the use of lighters Nos. 1 and 2. As regards the charge for ropes, &c., of 400*l.*, it now appears by a statement very recently supplied and subsequent to the reference, that it is made up as follows:

Ropes, &c., said to have been used up and destroyed	124	1	7
Use and loss of tools	5	0	0
20 per cent. on value of wire ropes, chains, and appliances used in lifting the wreck	270	18	5

The first of these three items requires to be reduced to 101*l.* 15*s.*, as we find that the wire rope charged at 57*l.* 6*s.* 8*d.* by mistake for 42*l.* 6*s.* 8*d.* could be obtained new for 35*l.* With regard to the third item, the cost of new wire rope and their fittings is stated at 1160*l.*, and on that sum the charge of 20 per cent. is calculated, but we find that such ropes, &c., could be obtained for 950*l.* instead of 1160*l.*, and inasmuch as the first cost of one of those iron ropes is included in the first item, the 20 per cent. should be calculated on 915*l.* only, equal to 183*l*. On the remainder of the articles, consisting of chains, shackles, &c., estimated at 476*l*., being of a more durable nature, we consider 10 per cent. instead of 20 per cent. an ample allowance for their use, or say 50*l*. In lieu, therefore, of 400*l*., the sums we consider should be allowed stand thus:

Loss of tools	5	0	0
Percentages for use of other articles as above	233	0	0

Being a reduction of 60*l*. 5*s*.

As regards the insurance charge of 166*l*. 10*s*., which is a charge of 3*s*. per ton on the gross tonnage of the ship, we consider it untenable. It does not in our judgment come within the meaning of the words "charges and expenses of weighing and raising the vessel," which alone the plaintiffs can recover under sect. 86 of the Thames Conservancy Act 1857, and we think, moreover, that the amounts otherwise allowed fairly cover such charges and expenses. We consider also that such an insurance charge is objectionable in principle, and works unfairly, as it would obviously produce an insignificant sum in the case of a small laden vessel so injured and sunk in such a position as to make the operation of weighing and raising her one of great difficulty and expense, whilst it would produce a very large sum on a large unladen ship, which, after collision, might be run on the bank of the river to save her from sinking in deep water, and then might be temporarily patched, pumped out, and so weighed in a short time without requiring the use of any of the conservancy lighters.

The scale upon which the plaintiffs based their claim was arrived at on Jan. 7, 1884, by a resolution of the conservators.

The plaintiffs now moved to vary the above report.

Sect. 86 of the Thames Conservancy Act 1857 is as follows:

When and so often as any vessel shall be sunk or stranded in the river, it shall be lawful for the conservators, and they are hereby required in case the master of such vessel shall refuse or neglect to weigh and raise the same, after notice in writing requiring him so to do, and within the time to be mentioned in such notice to cause any such vessel to be weighed and raised, or if it shall be found impracticable to weigh and raise the same (of which impracticability the conservators shall be the sole judges), to cause such vessel to be blown up or otherwise destroyed, so as to clear the river therefrom; and in case such vessel shall be weighed and raised, to cause the same and the furniture tackle and apparel thereof or of any part thereof respectively, and also all or any part of the goods, wares, merchandise, chattels, and effects, which may be found on board the same, to be sold by public auction or otherwise, and by and out of the proceeds of such sale to pay the charges and expenses of weighing and raising such vessel, or the blowing up or otherwise destroying the same and clearing the said river therefrom, and also the charges and expences of such sale, rendering any overplus to the owner or other person who by law shall be entitled to the same; and in case the proceeds of such sale shall be insufficient to defray the charges and expenses of weighing and raising such vessel, or of the blowing up or otherwise destroying the same, and clearing the river thereof, the deficiency shall be paid to the conservators by the master or owner of such vessel upon demand, and in default of payment may be recovered in the same manner as any penalty imposed by this Act is directed to be recovered.

Sir Walter Phillimore and Bankes for the plaintiffs.—The registrar was wrong in reducing the plaintiffs claim. Under the Act of Parliament (20 & 21 Vict. c. cxlvii.) the plaintiffs are entitled to recover the "charges and expenses" of raising wrecks. The present claim is based upon a scale fixed by the conservators, and therefore the registrar was bound to accept the scale. Quite apart from the claim being based upon a scale fixed by the conservators, the charges and expenses are in themselves reasonable. In addition to out-of-pocket expenses incurred in raising any particular wreck, the conservators are entitled to claim in respect of insurance on plant, depreciation fund, and interest upon the capital invested in the plant.

Barnes and Holman, for the defendants, contrà.—The registrar was not bound by the scale of charges fixed by the conservators. The plaintiffs are only entitled to recover such charges and expenses as are reasonable. The registrar has rightly come to the conclusion that their claim includes charges which were not reasonable, and the court should uphold him in that finding:

The Clyde, Swa. 23.

Feb. 14.—Sir JAMES HANNEN.—This is a claim by the Thames Conservators against the owners of a wreck for the cost of raising her. The claim is preferred under the provisions of the Thames Conservancy Act 1857, sect. 86, by which the conservators are not only authorised, but required to raise wrecks, and to defray the charges and expenses thereof. The question is in what way these charges and expenses are to be estimated. It is clear that the commissioners may, if they thought fit, employ other persons to raise a wreck, and if they do so the charges and expenses they would have paid for raising the wreck or getting it out of the way would be recoverable against the owners, if the proceeds of the wreck were not sufficient to defray such expenses. But the conservators having the duty of ridding the river of obstruction by wrecks have not adopted the plan of employing other persons. They have provided themselves with very expensive and no doubt very efficient apparatus of various kinds for raising and getting rid of wrecks, and they by so doing have destroyed, as it were, the market, if there were a market, for such apparatus belonging to other people. They say, and say rightly, that the interest paid on the capital invested in providing this apparatus is to be taken into account in estimating their expenses and charges in raising a particular vessel. They further rightly say that the cost of repairs to that apparatus must be taken into account; that a depreciation fund must be provided; and that the insurance of their apparatus against the risks likely to arise in doing their work must be provided for. As to the insurance fund, they have charged at the rate of 3*s*. on the tonnage of the wrecks. The registrar has rejected that mode of computation, and I think rightly done so, for this reason: There is really no true relation between the tonnage of the wreck and the value of the plant engaged in raising it. The danger to the plant depends upon an infinite variety of circumstances wholly independent of the tonnage of the wreck. For instance, no risk may be run in the case of a very large vessel, and a great risk may be run in the case of a very small one. I think, therefore, the registrar has quite rightly rejected that method of computation. I am of opinion that the item of insurance should be included in the charge which is made for the use of the particular apparatus. With regard to that charge the registrar says that the amount which he has allowed has been estimated upon the assumption that it includes the cost of insurance. The registrar says, and I have read the evidence which entirely bears out his statement, that no definite principle upon which the charge for the use of this apparatus is based was laid before him. Some sort of excuse was put forward for this, in that the engineer of the conservators was away, and therefore was not available as a witness. An attempt was made in the argument before me to supply what had been omitted in the inquiry before the registrar and the published accounts of three years, which had apparently not been used for that purpose before the registrar, were presented to me. One only had been touched upon. The other two had only been brought in, as it were accidentally. They were brought before me for the purpose of showing that during these three years the cost of raising wrecks had exceeded the amounts which had been recovered from the owners of the wrecks for raising them. But that, in addition to the fact that it was only brought before me and not before the registrar, is wholly insufficient to enable me to say that these rates have been fixed upon a solid and reasonable basis. Three years is not enough for the purpose. That is strongly illustrated by the fact that one of these expensive lighters had been in existence over twenty years. There has been no necessity to renew that vessel in twenty years. It may be, as regards the others, that there may be no necessity to renew them for twenty years. The proper estimate would have to be made upon a consideration of the operations over a much more extended period than three years. Therefore it still remains as before the registrar that there has been no statement of the principles upon which the several rates now charged have been arrived at. It is to be observed that this is really a most onerous charge upon the owners of wrecks. Of course it is contrary to my duty to make any adverse remarks upon that which has been done by the Legislature, but I may fairly point out the consequences. It is a very onerous charge indeed when a man has lost his property by the negligence of another, that he should be obliged to bear the whole expense of getting rid of the wreck, which would cause damage to shipowners generally. I must not make that burden greater than it naturally is. I think it would be most unfair that I should send this case back to be reconsidered upon the suggestion that the conservators might have made out a better case if their engineer had been there. I do not feel disposed to send it back to enable the conservators to amend their case, and I proceed therefore to consider whether on the evidence before them the registrar and merchants were right. It is to be remembered that this is a tribunal of experts thoroughly acquainted with such matters.

Having regard to all the circumstances I think these rates are excessive. I do not think that the registrar and merchants have proceeded upon any wrong principle, and, as to the amount allowed, I am not able to say that that which they have deducted is excessive. On the contrary it seems to me that a very considerable and handsome sum has been allowed, and I see no reason for altering their decision. I have already intimated and repeat that the conservators are entitled to make fair and reasonable charges under the several heads I have mentioned, viz., interest on capital invested, ordinary repairs, depreciation fund, and insurance. But these are to be considered in relation to each particular case. For instance, if very expensive apparatus is used, yet if the work could have been done with less expensive apparatus, then the charges should be based on the less expensive rate. In this particular case the apparatus was taken away for a time and used for the purpose of raising other wrecks which occasioned a delay in raising this wreck. That was rightly taken into account by the registrar and merchants in diminishing the amount which has been charged. I should further observe that the losses which may arise to the conservators by not being able to obtain payment from the owners of some wrecks is not to be taken into account, because if it were the effect would be that the owner of a particular wreck would not pay merely for the raising of his own vessel, but would also pay in part for the raising of other vessels. On the whole I come to the conclusion that there is no ground for disturbing the registrar's report, and I therefore affirm it. There remains the question of costs. It was argued before me that in this court there was some rule of proportion which determined the question of costs. The registrar has directed that each party should bear his own costs. I do not think there is any rule on the subject. The question is one of discretion. I was anxious to know on what principle the registrar proceeded in this case, and he has with great candour told me that on reconsideration he does not think each party should bear their own costs. He says so substantial a sum was recovered by the conservators that he does not think, if the matter were again before him, he would come to the conclusion he did. I at once act on his present view, and I think the report must be varied to this extent, that the defendants pay the costs of the conservators. Each party should, I think, pay the costs of the argument before me.

THE PATROCLUS. (a)

Collision—Overtaking ship—Flare-up light—Binnacle light—Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, art. 11.

Although the exhibition of an ordinary binnacle light may in some circumstances be a compliance with art. 11 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, such a light, owing to its peculiar construction and form, is not calculated to give the warning required by the article, and ought not to be used for the purpose.

THIS was a collision action in rem instituted by the owners of the sailing ship Cromartyshire, against the owners of the steamship Patroclus, to recover damages for a collision between the two vessels.

The collision occurred at about 11 p.m. on the 14th Jan. The defendants counter-claimed.

The facts alleged by the plaintiffs were as follows: Shortly before 11 p.m. on the 14th Jan. the Cromartyshire, a full-rigged ship of 1461 tons register, was about ten miles N.W. by N. ½ N. of the Longships, whilst in the prosecution of a voyage, in ballast, from Boston in Lincolnshire to Cardiff. The wind was blowing a fresh breeze from the east, and the Cromartyshire was heading about N.N.E. and making about two knots an hour. In these circumstances those on board the Cromartyshire observed the masthead light of the Patroclus about three points on the port quarter, and distant about three miles, and about five minutes after the red light came into view. Thereupon those on the Cromartyshire exhibited the binnacle light over the stern, and continued to do so for ten minutes, when, notwithstanding the exhibition of this light and loud hailing, the Patroclus, instead of keeping out of the way, with the bluff of her starboard bow struck the port quarter of the Cromartyshire, and did her considerable damage.

The facts alleged by the defendants were as follows: Shortly before 11 p.m. on the 14th Jan. the Patroclus, a steamship of 1386 tons register, was, whilst on a voyage from London to Liverpool, off the Land's End, heading N.E., and making about ten knots an hour. In these circumstances those on board the Patroclus saw within a ship's length, and about half a point on their starboard bow, a bright light, which had not been previously visible, suddenly appear. It was then seen that it was a light being shown from the stern of a ship (which proved to be the Cromartyshire) with no other lights visible. Although the helm of the Patroclus was instantly hard-a-starboarded, and her engines put full speed astern, she with her starboard bow and stem struck the port quarter of the Cromartyshire.

After the collision experiments were tried to test the efficiency of the binnacle light, for the purpose of showing it to be a light capable of giving the warning required by art. 11 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea. For this purpose the light was taken out to sea on a tug and held towards the land, when it was found that the light was visible at a distance of three-quarters of a mile. On the part of the defendants it was alleged that, to make the light burn brightly in that position, it would be necessary to keep the glass open in order to admit more air, and that the effect of keeping it closed was to cause the glass to become covered with smoke.

The defendants charged the plaintiffs with breach of art. 11 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, which is as follows:

> A ship which is being overtaken by another shall show from her stern to such last-mentioned ship a white light or a flare-up light.

Hall, Q.C. (with him Abel Thomas) for the plaintiffs.—The Patroclus is to blame for a bad look-out and failure to keep out of the way of the Cromartyshire. The Cromartyshire discharged her duty by keeping her course and showing a white light, as required by art. 11. That article does not prescribe any particular light, and the article is complied with if the light sufficient for the purpose.

J. P. Aspinall (with him Sir Walter Phillimore) or the defendants.—The exhibition of a binnacle light is not a compliance with art. 11. Such a light is not suitable for the purpose of warning an overtaking vessel. Moreover, the light was not exhibited to the Patroclus until the last moment.

Sir JAMES HANNEN.—I agree with Mr. Hall's contention that art. 11 of the Regulations does not prescribe that any particular light is to be shown by the overtaken to the overtaking vessel. It only requires that the vessel which is being overtaken shall show from her stern to the overtaking vessel a white light or flare-up light. Of course it is obvious that, though the rule does not define what sort of a light it is to be, it must be a sufficient light for the purpose for which the rule was made, viz., to serve as a guide to the overtaking vessel of the position of the overtaken vessel. With regard to the light in this particular case I have already intimated that the lantern is one which is capable of being made to give a light which I should imagine would be sufficient, if all the circumstances favourably concurred. But I may say that the Trinity Brethren are very decidedly of opinion that this is not a proper light for the purpose, and that opinion commends itself to my judgment. In the first place, it is a light made for a totally different purpose. It is expressly made for the purpose of throwing the light down, and not for throwing it forward, which is the object for which it would be used in complying with art. 11. In addition to that it is made to hang up in a particular way, and is not made to be held in the hand except for the purpose of being carried to the place where it is used. If anybody takes it in his hand he will feel that the natural tendency of the lamp is to throw itself forward and downwards. The weight is forward and the tendency therefore would be for it, when in the hands of anyone not alive to the necessity of guarding against that tendency, to point downwards instead of upwards. If so, it may very well be that the light might not be seen at all except for a few yards distance. If, on the other hand, it is held upwards so as to make the light show, then there is a tendency for the chimney to be out of the perpendicular, and the glass to get smoked. It is also to be remembered that at best the scope of light is very small.

In this case I have to start with the very decided opinion of the Trinity Brethren that this is not a proper lamp for the purpose, although I am inclined to think that under favourable circumstances it might be capable of burning brightly. I have to consider whether on the present occasion it was a sufficient light to give the warning required of it. On the part of the Cromartyshire it is said that the plaintiffs were exhibiting this light for as long as ten minutes. On the part of the Patroclus it is said that this light, such as it was, was not seen until just before the collision. I have to decide whether that was due to a bad look-out, or by reason of its not being shown sooner and being a bad light. In my opinion the defendants' evidence has not been shaken under cross-examination. It is not in dispute that the light of a steamer was seen on the starboard bow of the Patroclus, and that she acted for that steamer by porting her helm. It appears that the Cromartyshire would be in about the same line as that steamer. That being so, why should not the light of the Cromartyshire, if it were being shown, have been seen by those who were plainly alive to their duties on the Patroclus? It is suggested that the attention of those on the Patroclus was engaged in watching this steamer; but, on the evidence, I am of opinion that there is nothing to show that the look-out on the Patroclus was not sufficient. Mr. Aspinall, on behalf of the defendants, has contended that this light was only shown at a very late stage in the proceedings. There is the evidence of the apprentice from the Cromartyshire, who says that after seeing all three lights of the Patroclus the mate got the light from the binnacle. It seems to me in the highest degree probable that it was not until the three lights came into view that those on the Cromartyshire awoke to a sense of danger, and it was then that the mate took up the first light which he could lay his hands upon, which was the binnacle light. I am strengthened in this conclusion by the fact that there was a proper globe lamp hanging up in the companion, and yet the man, instead of going for it, immediately seized this binnacle lamp, which it would be obvious to anyone would not have been such a good lamp as the globe lantern. I think that fact therefore indicates hurry and confusion on the part of those on the Cromartyshire. I come to the conclusion that this light was only exhibited at the last moment, and that it was seen by those on board the Patroclus as soon as it could be. I also find that as regards the light, it was inefficient, and that if it should be sufficient as a stern light it would only be so by accident. I therefore hold the Cromartyshire alone to blame.

THE SAILING SHIP ALLERTON COMPANY LIMITED v. FALK.(a)

Charter-party—Excepted perils—Lay days—Demurrage.

Where it was agreed by charter-party that the charterer should not be liable for delay in loading caused by neaps and stoppage of navigation and the lay days were exceeded in consequence of the lighters which were bringing the cargo (one of salt) down the rivers Weaver and Mersey to Birkenhead, the place of loading, being delayed by neaps of exceptional lowness at the junction of the Mersey and Weaver, and it was proved that it is the invariable practice for all salt intended for foreign exportation to be brought to Birkenhead from the Weaver by water; that there are no storehouses for salt at Birkenhead; and that it is never kept there to await the arrival of vessels, the charterer was held to be relieved from liability under the above exceptions, upon the ground that they must be taken to apply to bringing the cargo to Birkenhead for loading purposes.

Grant v. Coverdale (51 L. T. Rep. N. S. 472; L. Rep. 9 App. Cas. 470; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 353) distinguished.

THIS was an action by the Sailing Ship Allerton Company Limited against H. E. Falk to recover two days' demurrage of the ship Allerton, amounting to 67*l.* 12*s.* By a charter-party, dated the 18th Jan. 1888, it was agreed between the plaintiffs, the owners of the Allerton, and Falk that Falk should load the Allerton at Birkenhead with a full and complete cargo of salt in ten working days, or pay demurrage for each day beyond the said ten working days at the rate of 4*d.* per ton, the defendant not to be liable for delay in loading caused by the act of God, fogs, neaps, foul weather, stoppage of navigation, and all and every other dangers and accidents of the sea, rivers, and navigation. The defendant detained the ship two days beyond the ten working days, but pleaded that the delay was caused by perils excepted in the charter-party—viz., neaps and stoppage of navigation. The case was tried at the Liverpool Assizes by Charles, J. without a jury, when, in addition to the above, the following facts were proved: All salt shipped at Liverpool or Birkenhead for exportation comes either from Winsford or Northwich. The salt in question came from Winsford, which is situated on the river Weaver, which is a branch of the Mersey. The salt was stored at the defendant's storehouses at Winsford. There are no storehouses for salt at Birkenhead, and salt is never kept there to await the arrival of vessels. It is the invariable practice for salt shipped at Birkenhead or Liverpool to be brought down the Weaver and Mersey in lighters. Birkenhead is connected with Winsford by rail, but the rate for salt is prohibitory from a mercantile point of view. In consequence of neaps of exceptional lowness at the junction of the Weaver with the Mersey, one or more of the lighters was prevented bringing the salt down in sufficient time to complete the loading in ten days.

Cur. adv. vult.

May 9.—CHARLES, J.—In this case the owners of the sailing ship Allerton seek to recover from the defendant a sum of 67*l.* 12*s.* in respect of two days' detention of the ship Allerton, at 4*d.* per ton per day. It is not disputed that the vessel in question was detained two days over and above the time during which she ought to have loaded her cargo. Therefore, if it were not for an exception in the charter-party relied upon by the defendant, the plaintiffs would clearly be entitled to recover this sum of 67*l.* 12*s.* The defendant, however, contends that this exception covers the case, but before dealing with it I will very shortly state what the facts are. The vessel commenced loading on the 11th Feb., and ought to have finished on the 22nd, but, as a matter of fact, did not do so till the 24th. The reason of the delay was this: During the period of loading there were exceptionally low neap tides, the result of which was to delay one or more of the flats in which the cargo, which was one of salt, was being brought down to Birkenhead, where the vessel lay, from Winsford, in Cheshire, where the salt was stored, and so prevent at least one of the flats reaching Birkenhead in time to load on or before the 22nd Feb. Now the salt, as I have said, was stored by the defendant at Winsford, and his contention is that the exceptions as to loading in the charter-party covered the flat's voyage from Winsford down the river Weaver and into the Mersey, and so exonerated him from all responsibility. Now, the material clauses of the charter-party are these: It is agreed between the owners and Mr. Falk that "the ship shall proceed to such dock and crane in Liverpool or Birkenhead as ordered by the owners"—Birkenhead was selected by the owners—"and there, after being made ready, load in the usual and customary manner a full and complete cargo of salt, to be loaded in ten working days or demurrage to be paid as below," the demurrage being at the rate of 4*d.* per ton register. Then come these exceptions in favour of the shipper: "The act of God, the Queen's enemies, pirates, fire, fogs, floods, neaps, foul weather, stoppage of navigation, strikes of workmen, and accidents to machinery, and all and every other dangers and accidents of the sea, rivers, and navigation always mutually excepted." Those, I think, may be called the shipper's exceptions. The shipowners' exceptions are in some respects the same, and are as follows: "The act of God, the Queen's enemies, loss or damage from fire on board, in hulk or craft, or on shore; collisions; any act, neglect, or default whatsoever of pilots, master, or crew in the navigation of the ship in the ordinary course of the voyage; and all and every the dangers and accidents of the seas and rivers and of navigation of whatever nature or kind."

The question in these circumstances is, does a neap tide, which in fact did amount to a stoppage in navigation, at the place where the river Weaver flows into the Mersey—does a neap occurring there, and not at Birkenhead, exonerate the defendant from responsibility for delay. In considering that question I must look at the terms of the charter and the circumstances of the trade with reference to which the charter was made. The evidence is that the defendant's salt works are at Winsford, in Cheshire, and all the salt that is shipped by him at Liverpool or Birkenhead comes from Winsford. It is also proved that all salt shipped by anybody at Liverpool or Birkenhead for exportation comes either from Winsford or Northwich, a place in the neighbourhood of Winsford, and is brought down the Weaver into the Mersey by lighters to Liverpool or Birkenhead, as the case may be. Without exception, the practice is to bring the salt down the Weaver and the Mersey to Liverpool and Birkenhead from the storage place on the Weaver. It is true that it is physically possible to bring the salt by train, but I may say that to do so would be commercially preposterous. The evidence of the traffic manager of the London and North-Western Railway Company, who, by the way, was a witness called on behalf of the plaintiffs, is this: He says that, whilst it is quite true that salt can be brought by train, it is one of the heaviest of rough products; that over a million tons of it are in the year brought to Liverpool, and that the invariable custom is for salt to come by river. He further said—and this, I think, is a very material circumstance—that there is no storage place for salt at Birkenhead. He added that in the opinion of the salt trade the rate by rail was prohibitive. Of course there are warehouses where salt could be stored, but there are no special provisions for storing it. The state of things, therefore, is, that the charter-party is made with reference to an article of trade which is to be shipped at Birkenhead, and this article is by the invariable practice of the trade brought to Birkenhead by water. In these circumstances it is said that these exceptions are applicable, and that to read them as applying only to neaps or stoppages of navigation in the process of loading at Birkenhead would not be a reasonable construction. It is argued that, although it is perfectly true that the charter-party provides for the loading of salt simpliciter, without saying salt from Winsford, from Northwich, or any other place, yet still, in construing its provisions, I must look to what the trade is with reference to which it is made, and that in this case it is a trade with reference to the export of salt from Winsford by a ship loading at Birkenhead. On the other side, it is said that the exception must be construed as applicable only to events which happen during the process of loading, and are not antecedent to the arrival of the cargo at the loading place.

Reliance was placed by Mr. Collins, on behalf of the plaintiffs, on the case of Grant v. Coverdale (51 L. T. Rep. N. S. 472; L. Rep. 9 App. Cas. 470; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 353). There the ship was to proceed to East Bute Dock, and was to "load always afloat in the customary manner from the agents of the freighters a full and complete cargo of about 1800 tons of bar or bundle iron. . . . Cargo to be supplied as fast as steamer can receive. . . . Time to commence from the vessel being ready to load and unload, and ten days on demurrage over and above the said lay days at 40*l.* per day (except in case of hands striking work, or frosts, or floods, or any other unavoidable accidents preventing the loading or unloading)." The ship arrived at the East Bute Dock and began to load her cargo. A frost then set in, and made a canal which communicated with the dock impassable, so that the remainder of the cargo, which was ready at a wharf on the canal, could not be brought in lighters to the dock. It was there argued that those circumstances were within the exceptions. But the House of Lords held otherwise, and said that the exception "frost" could not be applied to frost which prevented the cargo reaching the place of loading from some other place where it was stored. But the difference between that case and this is, as it seems to me, that in dealing with the facts of that case the House of Lords drew the inference that the cargo was one which might have been supplied from anywhere else besides from the places where in point of fact it was stored. Lord Watson, in giving his judgment, says at p. 478: "The exception which he (the defendant) pleads is an exception in his favour, upon the obligation thus incumbent upon him, and it is for him to show that it extends to the case which he now maintains. I am of opinion that it cannot be so extended. I think that in this case 'loading' means loading in the East Bute Dock, and I am not prepared to assent to a construction of this charter-party which would imply that the word 'loading' had as many different meaning as there were merchants or manufacturers of iron at Cardiff, who happened to select different localties in order to store their iron for the purpose of shipment." Lord Selborne, at p. 477, after referring to the case of Hudson v. Ede (18 L. T. Rep. N. S. 764: L. Rep. 3 Q. B. 412; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 114), to which I will allude directly, said: "I understand that case as proceeding upon the same principles, but as containing an admission of this distinction, that where there is in a proved state of facts an inevitable necessity that something should be done in order that there should be a loading at the place agreed upon, as, for instance, that the goods should be brought down part of a river from the only place from which they can be brought, even though that place is a considerable distance off, yet it being practically, according to known mercantile usage, the only place from which they can be brought to be loaded, the parties must be held to have contemplated that the goods should be loaded from that place in the usual manner unless there was an unavoidable impediment. And if the facts had been so about this particular wharf on the Glamorganshire Canal, if that had been the only possible place from which goods could be brought to be loaded at the East Bute Dock, that authority might have applied. But not only was that not the case, but in point of fact cargo not only could be, but actually had been brought up by carts to the East Bute Dock and put on board ship; and I infer from the finding of the referee that the whole might have been done by carting, though I agree that it would have been at an expense which was preposterous and unreasonable if you were to look at the interest of the charterer." Now, Lord Selborne there speaks of "inevitable necessity," and I was very much pressed by Mr. Collins as to these words. He said that this case of Grant v. Coverdale (ubi sup.) governed the present case unless I could say that there was an inevitable necessity that the salt should be brought down the rivers Weaver and Mersey from Winsford. But, on referring to the whole passage, I find that Lord Selborne is contemplating a case where practically, according to known mercantile usage, the only place from which the cargo could be brought to be loaded in such a place as Winsford in the present case is. He says, with reference to Hudson v. Ede (ubi sup.): "It being practically, according to known mercantile usage, the only place from which they can be brought to be loaded, the parties must be held to have contemplated that the goods should be loaded from that place in the usual manner unless there was an unavoidable impediment." Now, in this case it seems to me that, according to known mercantile usage, as proved by witnesses on both sides, the only place from which a cargo of salt is brought to be loaded at Liverpool or Birkenhead is from the storehouses on the river Weaver, and that being so, the case of Hudson v. Ede (ubi sup.) applies. In that case the port of loading was Sulina. Thirty running days were to be allowed for loading and unloading, and ten days on demurrage over and above the lay days; detention by ice or quarantine not to be reckoned as laying days. The vessel proceeded to the port of Sulina, on the river Danube. On the seventh day of the lay days, and for a long time afterwards, from Sulina up as far as Galatz (a distance of 110 miles), from which port the grain was to be brought to be put on board the vessel, the river was frozen over, and so blocked with ice as to be impassable for lighters. According to the judgment in that case: "It appears upon the case as stated that Galatz is the nearest place to Sulina of the storing places on the Danube from which grain is brought for shipment there, and that there exists at Sulina no other storehouses or other places for keeping or storing grain, and that grain is never kept at Sulina to await the arrival of a vessel, except sometimes by the Greek and Oriental Steam Navigation Company for their own steamers. In those circumstances, we are of opinion that this was a detention by ice within the meaning of the charter-party. The conveyance by the river between Galatz and the ship at Sulina may be considered as a part of the act of loading, and, as there were no storehouses for grain at Sulina, the case seems to be the same as if the ice lay between the shore from which of necessity the grain must be brought and the vessel in which it was to be loaded, and so that the parties must have contemplated that portion of the river as a part of the waters through which the cargo was to be conveyed between the shore and the ship, and in which detention by ice was to be provided against and excepted in the charter-party. It was well known to persons in the grain trade that grain to be shipped at Sulina is brought down the river from Galatz or other places in lighters, and that such lighters, on their arrival at Sulina, are discharged directly into the ship intended to export the grain; and that when there is ice in the Danube between Galatz and Sulina the navigation in the river by these lighters is often rendered impossible; that this, therefore, although, as it happened, unknown to the plaintiff or his broker, having been well known to persons engaged in the grain trade between ports in the Lower Danube and Sulina, must be taken to have been the basis of the contract, and supports the construction of this exception in the charter-party contended for by the defendant."

Now, apply that case to this one. The vessel in question proceeded to the port of Birkenhead to take in a cargo of salt. After a certain number of lay days had elapsed the river Mersey at its junction with the river Weaver, the river on which the port was where the salt was stored to be put on board the vessel, was obstructed, and became impassable for lighters owing to neaps of exceptional lowness. The facts, as they appear to me in this case, are that Winsford is one of the chief storing places on the river from which salt is brought down for shipment at Birkenhead; that no storehouses or other places for storing or keeping salt exist at Birkenhead; and that salt is never kept at Birkenhead to await the arrival of a vessel. That is simply reading in the judgment in Hudson v. Ede (ubi sup.) with a view to the facts of this case, altering nothing in the legal principles upon which that case was decided, and simply substituting the facts proved before me. Under those circumstances, it seems to me that the conveyance by these lighters down the river to the ship at Birkenhead must be considered part of the act of loading, inasmuch as there was no storehouse for salt at Birkenhead, and the case is really the same as if the obstruction had occurred at Birkenhead itself. Under these circumstances, I think the case of Hudson v. Ede (ubi sup.), and not that of Grant v. Coverdale (ubi sup.) governs the present case, and, for the reasons I have given, my judgment is for the defendant.

COURT OF APPEAL

Feb. 11 and 13, 1888.

(Before Lord ESHER, M.R., FRY and LOPES, L.JJ.)

LEDUC AND Co. v. WARD AND OTHERS. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION.

Bill of lading — Contract as to voyage — Parol evidence to vary voyage described in bill of lading—Deviation—Loss by excepted perils of the sea—Liability of shipowner.

The contract between the indorsee of a bill of lading and the shipowner is contained in the bill of lading.

A bill of lading stated that goods were shipped upon the steamship A., now lying in the port of F., and bound for D., with liberty to call at any port in any order and to deviate for the purpose of saving life or property, to be delivered at the port of D. to order or assigns, perils of the sea, &c., being excepted.

Held, that this was a contract to carry the goods from F. to D. by the ordinary sea track between those places, calling at any ports that were substantially on the line of that voyage in any order; that the conveying goods from F. to a port considerably out of the course between F. and D. before proceeding to D., was an unauthorised deviation; and that shipowners were liable to indorsees of the bill of lading for a loss occurring through perils of the sea during such deviation, notwithstanding the exception.

THIS was an appeal by the defendants (except Headley) from the judgment of Denman, J., at the trial before him without a jury.

The action was brought by the indorsees of a bill of lading against shipowners for non-delivery of goods. The defence alleged that the loss occurred owing to perils of the sea, which were excepted by the bill of lading. Reply, that the loss occurred during an unauthorised deviation.

The bill of lading in question commenced as follows:

Shipped in apparent good order and condition by Fruman Filiale de ingurischen Landesbank, in and upon the good steamship Austria, now lying in the port of Fiume, and bound for Dunkirk, with liberty to call at any ports in any order . . . and to deviate for the purpose of saving life or property 3123 bags of rape seed, being marked and numbered as per margin, and to be delivered in the like good order and condition at the aforesaid port of Dunkirk unto order or assigns, &c.

The Austria, which was a general ship, had goods on board for Glasgow, and went there before going to Dunkirk; and during this deviation the plaintiffs' goods were lost by perils of the sea. At the trial evidence was given for the purpose of showing that the shippers knew and assented to the Austria going to Glasgow before going to Dunkirk.

(a) Reported by ADAM H. BITTLESTON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The learned judge held that the evidence did not prove any agreement on the shippers' part that the ship should proceed viâ Glasgow, and doubted whether it was admissible at all. He therefore gave judgment for the plaintiffs.

The defendants appealed.

Gainsford Bruce, Q.C. and Lawson Walton (Finlay, Q.C. with them) for the defendants.—The bill of lading is not to be construed as if it was a charter-party. A bill of lading is not a contract at all; it is only a receipt for the goods. If it is a contract, it is not a contract as to what the voyage is to be. Supposing it to be the contract as to the voyage, it in terms gives liberty to call at any ports. There is nothing unreasonable in construing that to mean, not any ports in a direct line between Fiume and Dunkirk, but any ports in the course of the adventure. [Lord ESHER, M.R.—You must go to this extent that a ship from London to Liverpool might go across the Pacific.] That would be unreasonable; but it is not unreasonable to provide for such deviation as is necessary for the delivery of the cargo that the vessel has on board. It is reasonable when a man is shipping goods that he should inquire what cargo the ship has on board, where it is bound for, and what the adventure is. If he puts his goods on board a general shid, he must be content to take the course of the adventure. If he desires to make particular stipulations as to the voyage, he can take a smaller ship and put the stipulations in the charter-party. The bill of lading in this case is not a contract that the goods shall be conveyed in a direct course from Fiume to Dunkirk. If the parties to a bill of lading contract at all, they contract simply as to the carriage of the goods, not as to the course of the voyage. [LOPES, L.J.—In The Chartered Mercantile Bank of India v. The Netherlands India Steam Navigation Company (46 L. T. Rep. N. S. 530; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 65; 10 Q. B. Div. 521) the present Master of the Rolls says: "The contract, no doubt, is a contract of carriage, but the contract has been by the consent of the parties reduced into the form of a bill of lading, and, therefore, the whole of the contract is contained in that bill of lading, and no terms of the contract outside of the bill of lading, can be looked at."] The evidence shows that the true contract in this case between the shipper and ship-owner was, that the ship should go to Glasgow before going to Dunkirk; and the bill of lading is not inconsistent with such a contract. Sir Charles Russell, Q.C. and Gorell Barnes, Q.C., for the plaintiffs.—The contract of carriage is contained in this bill of lading, and it is to carry from Fiume to Dunkirk. Liberty to call at any port must mean ports within that voyage. The argument on the other side, founded upon this being a general ship, is completely answered by the case of Davis v. Garrett (6 Bing. 716). [Lord ESHER, M.R.—We agree with what was said, but not acted upon, by Denman, J. at the trial, that none of the evidence for the defendants was admissible. We think that the bill of lading contained the terms of the contract between the parties, and that one of those terms is that the voyage was to be from Fiume to Dunkirk by the usual and ordinary course.] They also cited

Finlay, Q.C. in reply.

Lord Esher, M.R.—In this case the plaintiffs were owners of goods shipped on board the defendants' ship; and they bring an action against the defendants, because they say that they were parties to a bill of lading, and put their goods on board the defendants' ship on the terms of the bill of lading, and were entitled by those terms to have their goods delivered to them at Dunkirk. The answer of the shipowners is, that the goods were lost by perils of the sea. The answer to that is that the goods were not lost by any perils of the sea that the shipowners are entitled to rely on; that they were lost while the shipowners were committing a breach of their contract; that they were lost in a place to which the exception of perils of the sea did not apply; that the shipowners are therefore liable. The case was tried before my brother Denman. It is clear that the plaintiffs were assignees of the bill of lading, and the persons to whom the contracts had passed strictly within the terms of the Bills of Lading Act. That Act passes the contract, and puts the assignee in a better position than the original shipper in some respects. The question in this case is, what is the contract contained in the bill of lading? It was suggested that a bill of lading is in all circumstances nothing but a receipt for the goods, and contains no contract, except that the goods have been received by the shipowners and are to be delivered by them at the place named. This is an instrument which has received one construction from the mercantile world and the courts for more than a hundred years. When a bill of lading is signed and given, where there is a charter-party and in contemplation of a charter-party, the bill of lading is only a receipt for the goods; because all the terms of the contract of carriage, as between the shipowner and the charterer, are contained in the charter-party, and the bill of lading is only given to enable the charterer to deal with the goods during transmission. But even where there is a charter-party, although the bill of lading is only a receipt as between the charterer and the shipowner, it is more than a receipt as between the indorsee and the shipowner; it contains the contract between them.

Then let us consider what a bill of lading is when it is to be regarded as a receipt for goods. It is not then a contract at all, nor is it conclusive as a receipt for the goods; treating it as a receipt, it can be contradicted by evidence. The question whether a bill of lading can be anything more than a receipt for goods depends upon whether the captain has received the goods, because the captain has no authority from the owner to make a contract of carriage except for goods put on board. If the bill of lading is wrong as to the goods put on board, its effect is destroyed for any other purpose. But if the goods have been received on board, the bill of lading is more than a receipt, it is a contract of carriage. The captain has authority not only to make a contract of carriage, but to reduce it into writing. The bill of lading is, between him and the shipper, the contract for the carriage of the goods reduced into writing. Whenever a contract is reduced into writing, that writing is the only evidence of the contract. It can only be varied by showing a usage so general that it must be taken to be imported into the contract. That is the only evidence that can be given outside the written contract. To show that the parties have agreed to some other terms outside the contract is to seek to vary the terms of a written contract, and that is not allowed with regard to a bill of lading any more than it is with regard to any other contract which has been reduced into writing as the evidence of the contract. It is startling to be told that this is new law. The law was certainly so stated by Blackburn, J., in Fraser v. Telegraph Construction Company (29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 373; 1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 421; L. Rep. 7 Q. B. 566). He said: "The bill of lading, notwithstanding some case that Mr. Cohen referred to in the Common Pleas, must be taken to be the contract under which goods are shipped, and until I am told different by a court of error, I shall so hold." In the case of Chartered Mercantile Bank of India v. Netherlands India Steam Navigation Company (ubi sup.), I expressed the same view of the nature of a bill of lading as I had always expressed, and as I am now expressing. In the case of Glyn, Mills, and Co. v. East and West India Dock Company (47 L. T. Rep. N. S. 309; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas 580; 7 App. Cas. 591) Lord Selborne said in the House of Lords: "Everyone claiming as assignee under a bill of lading must be bound by its terms, and by the contract between the shipper of the goods and the shipowner therein expressed. The primary office and purpose of a bill of lading, although by mercantile law and usage it is a symbol of the right of property in the goods, is to express the terms of the contract between the shipper and the shipowner." To say, therefore, except in the case I have before stated of its being given to a charterer who has also a charter-party, that a bill of lading is only a receipt for the goods is to maintain a proposition which cannot be supported. It seems to me impossible to say that the bill of lading does not contain the terms of the contract of carriage.

Then the next question is whether, assuming the bill of lading to contain the contract of carriage, it is part of that contract that the goods shall be carried on the particular voyage described. Now the bill of lading in the present case is in the ordinary terms that have been used in bills of lading since they were first established, and one might therefore expect that they had by this time received some construction. It is argued on the part of the defendants that the course of the voyage is no part of the contract; but it is not said why, if that is so, the voyage is put into the bill of lading at all. Consider the effect upon business, if that contention was right. Goods are bought by some one at the place where they are to send to some other place. The purchaser buys them at one place for the purpose of selling them at another. He does not want to buy things in the air. The goods are to be sold again at some particular market. If the purchaser does not know at all when the goods will be delivered, he will not buy them, because he cannot judge as to whether he can make a profit by them or carry out a contract he may have entered into. Business could not be carried on upon those terms. Again, with regard to the insurance of the goods, what underwriters would insure a voyage, nominally from one port to another, but which might be all round the world? It would be impossible ever to insure under such circumstances. To suppose, therefore, that the voyage is no part of the contract, is to disregard the whole course of mercantile business. The voyage is a very important part of the contract of carriage. The contract is not simply to carry from one place to another, but to carry from the one place to the other by the ordinary and usual course. That is one part, and a very important part of the contract of carriage. If the ship is to go to other places besides the port of destination, that is provided for in the bill of lading, and that is put into the bill of lading as part of the contract of carriage. The bill of lading states that the goods are shipped on a named ship lying in the port of shipment and bound for the port of destination. That being the universal mode of describing the voyage in the bill of lading, what is the construction that has always been put on that form of words? That form has received one universal construction, both from merchants and courts of law. That is the ordinary description of a voyage from one point to another upon the ordinary sea track from the one place to the other on such a voyage. That course may vary with the winds, or according to circumstances; the ordinary sea track is not a direct line that is always the same. It is the ordinary track of the voyage according to a reasonable construction of the term. If that is the meaning of the bill of lading, how can the exception apply to the facts of the present case? The perils of a voyage from Rotterdam to Marseilles are not the same perils as the perils of a voyage from Liverpool to New York. This is a voyage from Fiume to Dunkirk by the ordinary sea track "with liberty to call at any ports in any order." It is argued that that means that there is liberty to call at any port in the world. Here, again, it is a question of what is the mercantile meaning of the words used. The meaning obviously is, liberty to call at any ports on the voyage. The ship may call at those ports for any purpose; in that respect she is not confined at all. Moreover, the meaning must be that she is at liberty, not only to call, but to stop for a time; otherwise it would be useless to allow her to call. Without such a provision, to stop at a port, even though the ship is in her course, would be a deviation within the meaning of a policy of insurance. Then, if a ship is allowed simply to call at any ports, that has been invariably held to mean in their geographical order: so a further power is given by adding the words "in any order." Those words give the power of going back to any port that has been passed. Therefore, the persons to whom the shipper gave this bill of lading would know that the ship was to go from Fiume to Dunkirk, calling at any ports substantially on the line of that voyage in any order. To go to any port beyond that line was to commit a deviation and a breach of contract. The defendants' ship went to Glasgow; a port not on the course of the voyage from Fiume to Dunkirk. Thereupon the exception in the bill of lading did not apply to relieve them. They have failed to deliver the goods at Dunkirk, and are not within any exception which excuses that failure. The principles I have stated seem to me to be plain and business-like. It is said that there is an American case in which it was held that, where the voyage is described in terms in the bill of lading, the shipowner may be allowed to show that the person to whom he gave the bill of lading knew that the ship was going on another voyage. If that was said at all, which I doubt, it was said in a case where it was not wanted for the decision, as there appears to have been proof of a custom to deviate. I am inclined to think that that case has been misreported. There are two other American cases in which the principles are laid down exactly as they have always been upon this subject in England. But I rest my judgment on what I think to be clear and recognised authority in the English courts.

FRY, L.J.—In my view a very large portion of the argument which we have heard in this case is concluded by the provisions of the Bills of Lading Act. The plaintiffs entered into a contract with merchants abroad for the purchase of goods to be shipped from a foreign port. The substance of that contract was, that the vendors were to deliver shipping documents to the purchasers, and that the purchasers were to pay the price in exchange for the documents. The Bills of Lading Act provides (sect. 1), that "Every indorsee of a bill of lading to whom the property in the goods therein mentioned shall pass upon, or by reason of the indorsement, shall have transferred to and vested in him all rights of suit, and be subject to the same liabilities in respect of such goods as if the contract contained in the bill of lading had been made with himself." Those words appear to me to be applicable to the present case. The plaintiffs are indorsees of a bill of lading to whom the property in the goods therein mentioned has passed upon or by reason of the indorsement. The Legislature have declared that there is a contract in the bill of lading, and that the benefit of that contract is vested in the indorsees. It seems to me to be impossible in the face of that section for the court to say that a bill of lading contains no contract. The Master of the Rolls has referred to the cases of Fraser v. Telegraph Construction Company (ubi sup.), Chartered Mercantile Bank of India v. Netherlands India Steam Navigation Company (ubi sup.) and the language used by Lord Selborne in Glyn, Mills, and Co. v. East and West India Dock Company (ubi sup.). Lord Selborne says: "Everyone claiming as assignee under a bill of lading must be bound by its terms, and by the contract between the shipper of the goods and the shipowner therein expressed. The primary office and purpose of a bill of lading, although by mercantile law and usage it is a symbol of the right of property in the goods, is to express the terms of the contract between the shipper and the shipowner." The contract therefore is to be sought for in the terms of the bill of lading itself, and I cannot bring myself to think that such an important term as the description of the voyage is no part of the contract.

The question, therefore, simply becomes one of the construction of this contract. The contract says: "Shipped in apparent good order and condition on the steamship Austria, now lying in the port of Fiume and bound for Dunkirk, with liberty to call at any ports in any order, and to deviate for the purpose of saving life or property." It appears to me that the only right of deviation is that described in those words; a right to deviate for the purpose of calling at any ports in any order, and for the purpose of saving life or property. Then, is Glasgow, which is hundreds of miles out of the course from Fiume to Dunkirk, a port within that provision? The answer is that which the Master of Rolls has given—viz., that it is not, and that the ports referred to are ports on the course of the voyage. But it is said that it has been laid down in an American case that notice to the shipper of the route by which the ship is going to sail will rebut the implied term in the contract that it shall proceed to the port of destination by the direct route. Now, in the first place, it is to be observed that this was a mere obiter dictum not necessary for the decision of the case. Apart from that, however, it is impossible to say that any effect can be given to a notice to the shipper of something affecting the contract, which contract can by statute be passed on to another person. The power to deviate contained in the written contract repels the possibility of the existence of any other power to deviate. And, lastly, I may say that I agree with the learned judge who tried the case, that the evidence falls short of showing that there was any understanding between the shippers and the shipowners that the vessel was to go to Glasgow before going to Dunkirk. I do not think it necessary to rely upon that, because, as I have said, where a statute has made the benefit of a contract assignable to a third party, it is inconsistent with the policy of the statute to allow anything which took place between the parties to the contract, but which is not embodied in it, to affect the contract. For these reasons I think the appeal should be dismissed.

Lopes, L.J.—I can add nothing to the exhaustive judgment of the Master of the Rolls, except to say that I think this bill of lading is clear and distinct, not only as to the place to which the goods were to be conveyed, but also as to the voyage; and I therefore think that the evidence which was given was inadmissible. The judgment of Denman, J. was right, and the appeal must be dismissed.

The Cella. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM THE PROBATE, DIVORCE, AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION (ADMIRALTY).

Necessaries—Ship company—Liquidation—Action in rem—Admiralty Court Act 1861 (24 Vict. c. 10), ss. 4, 35.

The right to sue in rem under the Admiralty Court Act 1861, where there is no maritime lien, gives the plaintiff a charge upon the res from the date of the arrest, and from that time he is a secured creditor in respect of his claim.

This was an appeal from a decision of Sir James Hannen in an action instituted under sect. 4 of the Admiralty Court Act 1861.

In Feb. 1885 the British steamship Cella, the property of the Cella Steamship Company Limited, having put into Halifax, Nova Scotia, in a damaged condition, the plaintiff W. Roche effected certain repairs and supplied equipments to the Cella. The plaintiff's account amounted to 963*l.*, and for that sum and interest the master of the Cella drew a bill dated 14th Feb. 1885 upon the Cella Steamship Company in favour of the plaintiff. The bill was accepted but was dishonoured at maturity.

The plaintiff thereupon sued the company in the Queen's Bench Division upon the bill, and on 13th Aug. 1885 judgment was signed against the Company for the bill and interest amounting together to 974*l.* 11*s.* 2*d.* and cost. The company were unable to satisfy this judgment, and on the 8th Aug. the company was ordered to be wound-up.

In May 1885 the plaintiff commenced an action in the Queen's Bench Division against the master of the Cella as drawer of the bill, but proceedings therein were suspended in consequence of the master having determined to institute an action in rem in the Admiralty Division for his wages and disbursements, and having arranged with the plaintiff to include his account amongst his claim for disbursements or liabilities. Accordingly on the 28th May 1885 the master instituted his action in the Admiralty Division and the ship was arrested.

On the 8th June 1885 the plaintiff brought the present action in rem against the Cella to recover his claim for repairs and equipment. On the 5th June, James Marke Wood, the mortgagee of the Cella, intervened in the master's action and in the plaintiff's action, and a few days later the master's action was abandoned in consequence of Wood paying him 120*l.* in full discharge of his claim, and giving him an indemnity against any claim by the plaintiff. The plaintiff thereupon proceeded with his action in the Queen's Bench Division against the master, and on the 28th Oct. 1885 obtained a judgment for 984*l.* 17*s.* 1*d.* with costs. On this judgment execution was issued but only 75*l.* 12*s.* 2*d.* was recovered by the plaintiff.

The company had not appeared in the plaintiff's action, and in June 1885 an agreement was come to between the plaintiff and the mortgagee as to the release of the ship, which was embodied in an order of court, dated the 29th June 1885. The order of court was as follows:—"Upon agreement of counsel on both sides, and James Marke Wood, the intervener, having by counsel undertaken to pay the plaintiff whatever plaintiff could if arrest continued recover from the ship after satisfying all prior incumbrances, it is ordered that the ship Cella be forthwith released."

The mortgagee thereupon entered into possession of the ship and ultimately sold her.

After some lapse of time the plaintiff, having reason to believe that the mortgagee had realised by the sale of the ship more than was due to him under his mortgage, applied to the court for an order that the mortgagee should account for the proceeds of sale. After considerable opposition by the mortgagee, based upon the ground that the plaintiff had not proved his claim, the judge directed the mortgagee to file an account of the sale, and to refer such account to the registrar to report thereon. Some time after this an account was filed purporting to show that the mortgagee had received less than the amount due under his mortgage, but at the reference to the registrar and merchants it appeared that the amount shown to have been received by such account was the amount of cash received, and that the mortgagee had omitted to give credit for a bill which he had taken from the purchaser in addition to such cash, such bill having been subsequently dishonoured.

In Nov. 1887 the registrar reported that the ship at the time the mortgagee took possession of her was of such a value that after satisfying all prior incumbrances the mortgagee had in hand a balance of 932*l.* 0*s.* 2*d.*, and that for this sum he must give credit. On the application of the plaintiff the court confirmed this report, and by order dated the 20th Jan. 1888 directed the 932*l.* 0*s.* 2*d.* to be paid into court.

This having been done the judge ordered the plaintiff's claim to be referred to the registrar without pleading for assessment.

Meanwhile the official liquidator of the company had appeared in the action on the 17th Dec. 1887, and unsuccessfully applied for a stay of proceedings. The liquidator then applied to Chitty, J., who had control of the liquidation proceedings, to transfer the action to the Chancery Division, but this application was dismissed with costs.

The plaintiff's claim came before the registrar for assessment on the 8th Feb. 1888, when it was found that he was entitled to the sum of 819*l.* 8*s.* 10*d.* and interest. The report stated that in the opinion of the registrar the plaintiff was entitled to costs. The intervener attended this reference, but the official liquidator declined to be present after due notice given him.

Feb. 21.—The plaintiff now moved to confirm the registrar's report finding him entitled to 819*l.* 8*s.* 10*d.* and interest, and to have the money in court paid out to him.

Sir Walter Phillimore (with him J. P. Aspinall), for the plaintiff, in support of the motion.

Hall, Q.C. (with him Stokes) for the official liquidator. — The liquidator is entitled to the money in court, and not the plaintiff. The plaintiff has already recovered judgment in the Queen's Bench Division in respect of the same debt, and cannot therefore bring this second action:

Cambefort and Co. v. Chapman, 57 L. T. Rep. N S. 625; 19 Q. B. Div. 229; 56 L. J. 639, Q. B.

The proceeds of the sale of the ship are the assets of the company. There is no maritime lien in respect of the plaintiff's claim:

The Two Ellens, 26 L. T. Rep. N. S. 1; L. Rep. 4 P. C. 161; 1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 208;

He therefore obtains no right against the money in court until judgment, and if so his claim is postponed to that of the liquidator. By sect. 87 of the Companies Act 1862, after an order has been made for winding-up a company no action shall be commenced or proceeded with against the company except by leave of the Court of Chancery. No such leave has been obtained in this case, and therefore the plaintiff's proceedings are irregular. It is also to be observed that wherever a plaintiff has been allowed to sue in this court after he has obtained judgment in personam elsewhere a maritime lien has existed in respect of his claim.

Sir Walter Phillimore (with him J. P. Aspinall), for the plaintiff, contra.—The unsatisfied judgment in the Queen's Bench Division is no bar to the present proceeding in rem:

The rule of law acted upon in Cambefort v. Chapman (ubi sup.) and Rendall v. Hamilton (41 L. T. Rep. N. S. 418; 4 App. Cas. 504) only applies to cases of co-contractors. It is also contended that as this is an action in rem the plaintiff from the arrest of the ship becomes a secured creditor in respect of his claim, and the proceeding in rem gives him a right to the proceeds as against the owner. And inasmuch as the rights of the liquidator are merely the rights of the company, the plaintiff is clearly entitled to priority:

The Companies Act, s. 87, has no application, as these proceedings were begun before an order for winding-up was made.

Myburgh, Q.C. and Roscoe for the mortgagee, contended that Wood, the mortgagee, ought not to pay the costs as recommended by the report.

Cur. adv. vult.

March 13.—Sir James Hannen.—This case arises out of a claim for repairs and necessaries supplied by the plaintiff at Halifax, Nova Scotia, to the ship Cella, as long ago as Jan. 1885. The master of the ship gave a bill for the amount of the claim for 963*l.* upon the Cella Company, the owners, which was accepted by them, but dishonoured. An action was brought on this bill against the owners, and judgment was recovered on the 13th Aug. 1885, for 974*l.* 11*s.* 2*d.* and costs. Nothing has been paid on this judgment. An action was afterwards brought against the master as drawer of the bill, and judgment was obtained in Oct. 1885 for 984*l.* 17*s.* 1*d.* with costs. On this judgment 75*l.* 12*s.* 2*d.* only was recovered. On the 8th June 1885, while the ship was under arrest in an action by the master for wages and disbursements, the plaintiff commenced an action under sect. 4 of the Admiralty Court Act of 1861. Mr. Wood, the mortgagee of the ship, intervened in this action on the 15th June, and soon after the following agreement was come to, and was embodied in an Order of Court: "Upon agreement of counsel on both sides, and James Marke Wood, the intervener, having by counsel undertaken to pay the plaintiff whatever plaintiff could, if arrest continued, recover from the ship, after satisfying all prior incumbrances, it is ordered that the ship Cella be forthwith released."

The ship was accordingly released. Wood, the mortgagee, thus became liable on his undertaking, and if the ship had been totally lost the next day that undertaking would still have been binding. It is not necessary for the present purposes to follow the mortgagee in his subsequent dealings with the ship, which are fully set forth in the registrar's report of the 21st Dec. 1887. But upon an order, or rather repeated orders, of this court, the mortgagee at length filed his accounts which were referred to the registrar, upon which it was found that after giving credit for all prior claims and incumbrances, including his mortgage and interest, he had in his hands the sum of 937*l.* 0*s.* 2*d.*, the balance of the value of the ship as ascertained by the registrar, at the time when she was released to the mortgagee in pursuance of his undertaking, and I ordered him to pay this amount into court pending an inquiry as to the exact amount of the plaintiff's claim. This was done, and the plaintiff's claim has been ascertained to amount to 819*l.* 8*s.* 10*d.*, and I find that sum with interest thereon as due from the defendant Wood to the plaintiff upon his undertaking. Upon application that this sum be paid out of court to the plaintiff, the liquidator of the Cella Company intervened and claimed to be entitled to the whole fund in court. It appears that the Cella Company was ordered to be wound-up on the 8th Aug. 1885, two months after the vessel had been released by the plaintiff, and a liquidator was appointed in Oct. 1885. I am of opinion that the liquidator is not entitled to oppose the payment of the plaintiff's claim out of the money paid into court by the defendant Wood. That payment, so far as it is applicable to the discharge of the plaintiff's claim, was made in fulfilment of Wood's undertaking, with which neither the liquidator nor the insolvent company had anything to do. At the time that undertaking was given, the plaintiff had a lien on the ship by virtue of the proceedings he had instituted against it. It was not indeed a maritime lien, which arises at the moment the claim comes into existence, but it was a lien accruing on the commencement of the action in rem. This distinction appears to me to be fully recognised in the judgment in the cases of The Two Ellens (4 P. C. App. 168), The Pieve Superiore (5 P. C. 491), and The Heinrich Bjorn (10 Prob. Div. 62). The rights of the plaintiff as against Wood must be determined by the rights which the plaintiff had against the ship at the time she was released, and the subsequent history of the ship and of the owners is irrelevant for the purposes of this inquiry. It was further contended for the liquidator that the judgments recovered against the company and the master on the actions on the bill of exchange precluded the present claim. But if this were an action against the ship an unsatisfied judgment in personam is no bar to proceedings in rem: (The Bengal, Sw. 468.) But the order which I am asked to make is not in an action against the ship or against the company, but against Wood. The same answer applies to the argument that no action can be brought against this company without leave of the court. I order, therefore, that the amount of the plaintiff's claim, with interest, be paid out to him as prayed; and I condemn the defendant Wood in the costs. I also condemn the liquidator in the costs occasioned by his intervention.

H. Stokes.—I am instructed to ask your Lordships for a stay of execution.

The President.—No, I think not. I think the plaintiff has been most shamefully ill-treated, and it really is a scandal to the administration of justice that he should have been kept out of his money so long. You will get no assistance from me.

March 19.—The official liquidator and mortgagee appealed from this decision.

Stokes, with him Barnes, Q.C., in support of the appeal.—The plaintiff's proceedings are irregular by reason of his non-compliance with sect. 87 of the Companies Act 1862. A mere proceding in rem apart from a maritime lien does not make a plaintiff a secured creditor till after he has obtained judgment. No case has decided that, although there may be obiter dicta which at first sight support the plaintiff's contention:

The Two Ellens (ubi sup.);
The Pieve Superiore (ubi sup.);
The Heinrich Bjorn (ubi sup.).

The right to sue in rem is only a question of procedure and does not affect the rights of the parties. This was expressly laid down by this court and the House of Lords in The Heinrich Bjorn (ubi sup.). If so, the arrest which is merely for the purpose of founding jurisdiction gives the plaintiff no better rights than he would have in an action in personam.

J. P. Aspinall for the plaintiff, contra.—The practice of the Admiralty Court in a proceeding in rem has always been to hold the res as security for the plaintiff's claim. The warrant of arrest is only issued upon the filing of an affidavit to the effect that the plaintiff has a good cause of action and is therefore in effect an order of the court for the arrest of the ship. It has been decided by this court that where money is paid into court to abide the event of the action, such money is held as security for the plaintiff's claim, even as against the trustee in bankruptcy:

[He was then stopped.]

Stokes in reply.

Lord Esher, M.R.—It seems to me that this case is decided by authority. The question is, what is the construction and effect of the Admiralty Court Act 1861? The facts are that repairs were done to this ship by the plaintiff, and that when she came within the jurisdiction she was seized by the Admiralty Court. After her arrest and before judgment the company owning her went into liquidation, and we have now to determine whether the plaintiff by virtue of his judgment is entitled to have the proceeds of the ship paid out to him. It is true that in respect of these repairs there is no maritime lien, according to the decisions which have somewhat strictly, in my opinion, construed the statutes on this subject. But the Admiralty Division nevertheless has jurisdiction over such a claim as this, and by sect. 35 of the Admiralty Court Act 1861 that jurisdiction may be exercised by proceedings in rem, as was done in this case. Now a maritime lien differs from a common law lien in this, that the common law lien does not attach until the person claiming the lien has actual possession, whereas the Admiralty Court gives a claimant the benefit of a maritime lien, although the ship is not in his possession. As regards a maritime lien, the Admiralty Court and now the Admiralty Division of the High Court enforces it by seizing the ship; and it does so in order to enable the person who alleges he has a right against the ship to realise that right. How is this statutory jurisdiction to be construed? It is to be exercised by a proceeding in rem, and it gives the power to the Admiralty Division, upon the production of a proper affidavit, to issue a warrant of arrest, by virtue of which the marshal seizes the ship and the court adjudicates upon it. The commencement of the action and the taking into possession by the Admiralty Court are practically coincident. The warrant is served by the marshal nailing it on the mast. What is the ship taken possesion of for? In order that she may be sold, and the plaintiff's rights satisfied out of the proceeds. Those rights must exist before the ship is seized, for the court adjudicates upon the ship upon the ground that it had jurisdiction to seize her and realise her for the plaintiff on acccunt of something which happened before the seizure, which in this case was repairing her. She is in fact seized by the court in order that out of her and by her the plaintiff may get his rights. Even apart from the cases which have been cited by Mr. Aspinall, I should have thought from what I have said that whatever the judgment be it must take effect from the time of the writ. The function of the judge is to enforce the writ and to determine the rights of the parties at the time the writ was served. That is so it seems to me in every action. But, of course, in every action bankruptcy and I know not what may intervene, so that when judgment is given it cannot be effectually carried out. But in the case of the money being in court or the res under arrest, the court can give effect to its judgment as if it had been delivered the moment after it got possession of the res. It seems to me to be contrary to the principles of these cases that the rights of the parties are to depend not upon an act of theirs, but upon the other business that the court has to do, which may in consequence delay the judgment. That would be rank injustice, and therefore I hold that the judgment in regard to a thing or money in the hands of the court must be taken to have been delivered the moment the thing or the money came into the possession of the court.

The two cases to which we have been referred are very strong on this point. There are also the Admiralty cases of The Two Ellens (ubi sup.), The Pieve Superiore (ubi sup.), and The Heinrich Bjorn (ubi sup.), which are undoubtedly based upon the same rule as the above two cases, and which show that though there is no maritime lien, yet the moment the arrest takes place the ship is held by the court as security for whatever may be adjudged to be due to the plaintiff. Further, it is to be remembered that in the Admiralty Division in an action in rem the effect of the judgment is greater than in any other division in which money is paid into court. In the latter the judgment is only between the parties, whereas in the other the judgment is between the parties and binds all the world and cannot be disputed. I am therefore of opinion that according to the true meaning of the statute, and the true meaning and effect of arrest, that from the moment of arrest the ship is a security for the judgment of the court, and that nothing happening after the ship has come into the hands of the court can have any effect upon the judgment of the court. I think, therefore, that this appeal must be dismissed.

Fry, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. We have to inquire what are the rights of the parties under the Admiralty Court Act 1861. It appears to me that Dr. Lushington in The Volant (1 W. Rob. 383) explained the principle upon which the court proceeds when he said that "an arrest offers the greatest security for obtaining substantial justice in obtaining a security for prompt and immediate payment." The arrest enables the court to keep the property as security to answer the judgment, and unaffected by chance events which may happen between the arrest and the judgment. That is Dr. Lushington's decision and I think it is a right one. When the Legislature came to deal with the matter in 1861 there is no sign of dissent from the explanation previously given by Dr. Lushington. Recent decisions are also in accordance with his view. The cases of The Two Ellens (ubi sup.), The Pieve Superiore (ubi sup.) and The Heinrich Bjorn (ubi sup.) are decisions which are accurate, according to Dr. Lushington's judgment, but inaccurate if the appellant's contention is correct. It is also clear that the decision of the President in this case is in accordance with the decisions of other courts. Lastly, it is in conformity with what has been the uniform practice of the Admiralty Court, viz., that the effect of the arrest is to provide security for the plaintiff for the sum which he claims.

Lopes, L.J.—From the moment of the arrest the ship is held by the court to abide the result of the action and the rights of the parties must be determined by the state of things at the time of the institution of the action. The two cases cited by Mr. Aspinall appear to me to be very analogous to this case, and they and this are in entire accord with The Two Ellens (ubi sup.) and other cases that have been cited.

Brooking v. Maudslay. (a)

Marine insurance—Policy—Insurance on freight—Unseaworthiness of ship—"Innocent shippers"—Action by underwriters to restrain proceedings on policy.

The owner of the steamship E. agreed with the defendants to carry certain machinery by that ship from L. to P. The E. made one journey, carrying part of the machinery safely, but whilst carrying the remainder she was lost with all on board. An inquiry took place before the Wreck Commissioner, who found that the E. was sent to sea in an unseaworthy condition and that her owner was alone responsible for this. The plaintiff and others who had underwritten a policy of insurance on the machinery carried on the second voyage disputed their liability to pay, and brought an action for a declaration that the policy was void, and that it might be delivered up to be cancelled, or alternatively that it was not binding on them, and for an injunction restraining the defendants from taking any action on it. The defendants denied that they had intended to deal with the policy as a valid existing policy, or that they had threatened legal proceedings; but they alleged that, according to the universal practice of Lloyd's, underwriters, where a ship is unseaworthy, pay "innocent shippers."

Held, that a court of equity will not restrain parties to a contract from bringing an action on the contract if the other parties to the contract would have a good legal defence to an action brought, and that the practice at Lloyd's of paying innocent shippers, even if a moral obligation, is not a legal obligation, and could not be raised and tried in a court of law, and that consequently the plaintiffs' action must be dismissed with costs.

THE defendants are engineers, carrying on business at Lambeth. In Jan. 1884, they were desirous of procuring certain machinery, which they had made for one of Her Majesty's ships, to be conveyed from London to Portsmouth; and for this purpose they entered into a charter-party, dated the 8th Jan. 1884, with one Scott, the owner of the steamship Elephant, whereby it was agreed that the machinery in question, which weighed about 867 tons, should be carried by that vessel from Millwall Dock to Portsmouth Dockyard, in consideration of a lump sum, as freight. The machinery was to be loaded, stowed, and discharged by the defendants, and was to be carried in two voyages if the vessel could take all, the owner having the option of making a third voyage or supplying another vessel to take the balance, if any.

The vessel, loaded with 422 tons of the machinery, left Millwall Dock on the 28th of Jan. 1884, and reach Portsmouth in safety on the 3rd Feb.

On the 14th of the same month she again set sail from Millwall Dock, carrying the rest of the machinery, but on this occasion was lost with all hands on board.

On the 25th Jan. the defendants, through their insurance broker, procured an insurance to be effected on the machinery which constituted the cargo on the second voyage to the amount of 30,000*l.*, and on the 13th Feb. the amount was increased to 40,000*l.*; and a slip was initialled by the underwriters on these days. The policy in question was dated the 15th Feb., and included the whole 40,000*l.* and was made out in accorddance with the slip. The risk included "risk of barges, lighters, &c., from assured premises, and while waiting shipment on land or water."

Upon the occurrence of the loss some of the underwriters paid, but a large majority, of whom the plaintiff was one, disputed their liability.

An inquiry into the circumstances attending the loss of the vessel took place in the Wreck Commissioner's Court, and the judgment on that inquiry was given on the 14th May.

The Commissioner found that the Elephant had been sent to sea in an unseaworthy condition, and that Scott, the owner, and he alone, was responsible for the manner in which the ship went to sea.

The defendants, upon this, applied to the underwriters to pay, and a few did so, but a large majority still refused to do so; and on the 23rd May the present action was commenced by Marmaduke Hart Brooking on behalf of himself and the other underwriters of the policy.

The original statement of claim was delivered on the 24th May, and alleged that, by reason of the weight of the machinery, the mode of stowage, the weight intended to be carried on the deck, and the fact that part of the machinery would be carried in the hatchway, rendering it impossible to put on the hatches, the risk was of a special and dangerous character, as the defendants and their agents well knew, or ought to have known, that they failed to communicate these facts to the plaintiffs; and (paragragh 4) that the vessel with the machinery on board set sail "in a grossly unseaworthy state;" and they claimed a declaration that the policy was void, and that it might be delivered up to be cancelled. The defendants, in the first instance, met this by an application to strike out paragraph 4, relating to unseaworthiness, and upon this application an order was made giving the plaintiffs liberty to amend. The plaintiffs accordingly amended by alleging that the policy was void, "or the underwriters discharged from liability thereunder," retaining their former allegation that "the defendants nevertheless claim and intend to make use of the same, and treat it as a valid and existing contract on the part of the plaintiff, and those on whose behalf he sues," and adding a claim for a declaration that the policy was not binding on the plaintiff and those on whose behalf he sued, and that they were discharged from all liability for loss by the voyage, and for an injunction restraining the defendants from taking any action on the policy.

To this amended statement of claim the defendants put in a defence in which (as also amended) they admitted that the ship was unseaworthy, but stated that the unseaworthiness was owing to her being overladen, which was not known to them until after the ship had been lost, and they wholly denied the allegations of concealment and non-communication of facts. And they further alleged that the overloading did not take place until after the slip for the policy of insurance was initialed, so that the question of overloading did not arise until after the contract was entered into, and they asserted that the policy was valid and had not been avoided; and, further, that, although the vessel was unseaworthy, yet, according to the universal practice that has hitherto prevailed with all the leading underwriters at Lloyd's, the plaintiff and the other underwriters of the policy were bound in honour, though not in law, to pay; but the defendants denied that they had claimed or intended to deal with or make use of the policy as a valid existing policy, or that they had even threatened legal proceedings.

The plaintiff then put in a reply in which he joined issue generally, but stated that he "did not proceed further in this action with the charges in the statement of claim as to concealment and non-communication by the defendants of material facts." The defendants objected to this pleading, and upon their motion, in July 1886, Kay, J. ordered that all allegations of concealment or non-communication of material facts should be struck out as scandalous and embarrassing. The plaintiff's claim was accordingly again amended, and the action now came on for trial.

Sir Henry James, Q.C. and Graham Hastings, Q.C. (Gorell Barnes, Q.C. and Hurst with them) for the plaintiff.—The plaintiff is entitled to a declaration that he and those on whose behalf he sues are under no liability with respect to the policy. It is not enough for the defendants to say that they do not intend to sue upon the policy; they may assign it, and if they do so the assignee will be able to sue in his own name and the plaintiff will be put to great disadvantage, and will have to begin de novo and prove the unseaworthiness which was admitted by the defendants. An undertaking on the part of the defendants not to sue upon or assign the policy would have been sufficient; but this they refused to give, except upon terms which could not be accepted. In a case like this a court of equity will order the policy to be delivered up and cancelled, it being an instrument which, though originally valid, has become by subsequent events functus officio, and yet its existence may subject the plaintiff to the danger of future litigation when the facts are no longer capable of complete proof through lapse of time. The Attorney-General (Byrne, Q.C. and Bray with him) for the defendants.—This action is unfounded and absolutely without precedent. We do not deny that under the old law, where there was an instrument in respect of which some claim might possibly be made, the person liable to such claim was entitled to come and ask for some such relief as is sought in this case. But where there is no threat of legal proceedings or any possibility of a legal claim being made, a plaintiff is not entitled to bring such an action as this. This action, moreover, has not been instituted for the purpose of preventing any legal claim the defendants may have against the plaintiff, but for the purpose of bettering the plaintiff's position with regard to the moral claim the defendants have against him. Duncan v. Worrall (ubi sup.) and Thornton v. Knight (ubi sup.), cited by the Attorney-General, are distinguishable because there there was an action pending. There is a veiled intention of keeping the policy in reserve with a view to taking action:

Bromley v. Holland (ubi sup.).

As to a representative action, see

Peruvian Guano case, 48 L. T. Rep. N. S. 7; 23 Ch. Div. 225.

STIRLING, J. (after stating the facts of the case and reading the whole of the pleadings) said:—On these pleadings the action has been brought to trial. At the trial it was admitted by counsel for the plaintiff that the policy was not void, and that judgment for cancellation cannot be given. But they insisted that they were entitled to relief in accordance with the alternative prayer in the statement of claim. The defendants, on the other hand, admit that the unseaworthiness of the Elephant constitutes a good defence to the action at law on the policy; but they deny the right of the plaintiff to the relief claimed, or any other relief. This question formed the main subject of argument before me. A correspondence between the legal advisers of the plaintiff and defendants was, however, put in evidence, from which it appears that the real issue between the underwriters and the defendants is one which is not and cannot be raised in this action. It is of this nature: It is the practice of underwriters, who may have a good defence to an action on a policy founded on the unseaworthiness of a vessel, to pay insurers who are "innocent shippers." Whatever may have been the case at first, it is not now asserted by the underwriters that the members of the defendants' firm are personally to blame for the condition in which the vessel left for sea; but it appears to be alleged that, through their servants or agents, they are in some way implicated in the unseaworthiness, and the real question between them is, whether Messrs. Maudslay are innocent shippers and entitled to the benefit of the practice to which I have referred. This issue cannot be tried in this action, nor, indeed, so far as I can see, by any legal tribunal whatever. It must be decided, if at all, by some court of honour, to be selected by the parties interested. Most certainly it cannot be affected one way or the other by the judgment I am about to pronounce. My decision depends upon the dry and technical, though not unimportant, question whether—regard being had to the rules which govern the procedure of the court—the plaintiffs are entitled to the relief for which they ask at the bar. The case stands thus: The defendants are entitled to the benefit of a policy of insurance on which they may sue at law. The plaintiff alleges, and the defendants admit by the pleadings, that the plaintiff has a valid defence to any action which may be brought at law on the policy. The defendants say that they have not threatened legal proceedings, but they have declined to give an undertaking not to take any, and they abstain from stating whether it is their intention to take proceedings or not.

Under these circumstances, can the underwriters bring the defendants before a court of equity and obtain a declaration and injunction according to the second alternative of the statement of claim? If the policy were liable to be completely avoided—if, for example, it had been obtained by misrepresentation—a court of equity would have jurisdiction to direct the delivery up and cancellation of the instrument. This is clearly shown by Duncan v. Worrall (ubi sup.). On the other hand, where the policy cannot be avoided, but there is a good legal defence to an action upon it (as, for example, unseaworthiness or deviation), a court of equity cannot make a decree for cancellation: (Thornton v. Knight, ubi sup., where the Vice-Chancellor, in a few words, draws the distinction between the two classes of cases). He says: "If the policy, though good on the face of it, had been proved to be void on the ground that the representation made by the insurers when they effected it as to the seaworthiness of the ship was false, I could have interfered, for then a case of fraud would have been made out against the insurers. But I cannot interfere on the mere ground of deviation, unless this court has a concurrent jurisdiction with a court of law in all cases in which relief is sought against instruments like the one in question. That, however, is not so, and therefore I shall dismiss the bill with costs." In that case, however, an action at law had been brought, and the decision does not cover the question before me—viz., whether the court can make a declaration that the underwriters are not liable on the policy, and grant an injunction against future proceedings at law. Prior to the Judicature Acts a plaintiff coming into equity to restrain proceedings at law was bound to show some equitable ground for relief. He had not, as a rule, a right to come into a court of equity to restrain proceedings in a court of law if he had a good defence at law. If authority for this is wanted I may refer to Hardinge v. Webster (1 Dr. & Sm. 101) and Kemp v. Tucker (28 L. T. Rep. N. S. 458; L. Rep. 8 Ch. App. 369). The present plaintiffs come before the court without alleging any case for equity jurisdiction, either exclusive or concurrent with the courts of law. The sole ground on which they claim the relief is that, although there is a good legal defence to any claim by the defendants against them, that defence depends on extrinsic facts, the evidence of which may not be forthcoming at all times and under all circumstances. The existence of such evidence is not alleged in the statement of claim nor proved at the trial; if it had been it would seem to me the appropriate remedy would be found in an action for the perpetuation of testimony rather than in proceedings such as the present. Upon this I may refer to two authorities. In Angell v. Angell (1 Sim. & St. 83), Sir John Leach lays down the law as to the cases in which the jurisdiction of courts of equity to perpetuate testimony is exercised. He says (p. 89): "If it be possible that the matter in question can, by the party who files the bill, be made the subject of immediate judicial investigation no such suit is entertained. But if the party who files the bill can by no means bring the matter into present judicial investigation . . . there courts of equity will entertain such a suit, for otherwise the only testimony which could support the plaintiff's title might be lost by the death of his witnesses. Where he is himself in possession the adverse party might purposely delay his claim with a view to that event." Obviously it did not occur to Sir John Leach that a person in possession of real estate, and threatened with an action of ejectment to which he had a good legal defence, might file a bill in Chancery to establish that defence, and obtain an injunction to restrain proceedings at law.

The other case is Earl Spencer v. Peek (L. Rep. 3 Eq. 415), where Lord Romilly decided that the pendency of an action in which the issue could be tried was an answer to a bill to perpetuate testimony. It could not, therefore, have been his opinion that a person threatened with proceedings at law to which he had a good legal defence could bring a suit in equity to restrain them on the ground that his evidence in support of his case might be lost. On principle it is difficult to see why the defendants, having a claim which they might assert in a court of law at any time within the period fixed by the Statute of Limitations, should be compelled to try the issue on which the validity of that claim depends in a court of equity, and at another time than that which they may select as the most convenient for themselves. The authorities mainly relied on by the plaintiffs were the judgment of Lord Eldon in Bromley v. Holland (7 Ves. 3), and certain paragraphs in the judgment of Lord Cottenham in Simpson v. Lord Howden (3 My. & Cr. at p. 102), and of Lord Selborne in Hoare v. Bembridge (ubi sup., at p. 26.) These authorities are no doubt of great value, but they relate to the cancellation of void instruments (as is shown by the case of Thornton v. Knight, already cited), and do not necessarily apply to cases where, as here, the instrument is not void or voidable, and relief by way of cancellation cannot be given. In Cooper v. Joel (ubi sup.) the defendants claimed the benefit of a guarantee which was held by Lord Romilly, M.R. to be invalid, although the invalidity did not appear on the face of it. This appears to be an authority in favour of the plaintiffs. The case, however, was brought on appeal before the Lord Chancellor (Lord Campbell) (1 De G. F. & J. 240), and his judgment appears to me to amount to a reversal of the decision of the Master of the Rolls, so far as it is based upon any principle applicable to the present case, and that, too, although cancellation, and not an injunction, was the remedy sought. If in the present case the argument on behalf of the plaintiff is well founded, it appears to me that any person liable to have a claim made against him at law, and having a good defence to it, may bring the matter before a court of equity in the same way as the present plaintiff does; and, indeed, the case was put as high as this by the learned counsel of the plaintiff in the course of his reply. Such a right appears to be negatived by the words used by Lord Campbell in Cooper v. Joel. He said, p. 245 of the report: "If that was the rule, hardly any dispute could arise upon a contract"—or, indeed, as to any legal right—"which might not be drawn into a court of equity." In my opinion, no such rule exists. In my judgment, therefore, the claim of the plaintiffs are not warranted by principle or supported by authority. I think that this action is in the nature of an experiment, and as the experiment fails I see no reason why the costs should not follow the event.

THE NIOBE. (a)

Collision—Tug and tow—Sea towage—Duty of tow—Master and servant.

It is the duty of those in charge of a tow, which is being towed under an ordinary towage contract by night at sea, to control and superintend the navigation of tug and tow, and her owners are liable for damage occasioned by the negligence of the tug, unless it is the result of a sudden manœuvre which it is impossible for the tow to control.

The fact that a tow does not come into contact with, or do damage to, a vessel with which the tug collides will not release the owners of the tow from liability if the damage is occasioned by the negligence of the tow.

Whilst the ship N. was being towed under an ordinary towage contract by night at sea with a long scope of hawser, both she and her tug collided with the sailing ship V. The owners of the tug admitted liability. It was proved that there was a bad look-out on the tow, and that if those on board her had seen the approaching vessel and given the tug orders in due time, the collision might have been avoided.

Held, that the tug was under the control of the tow, and that the owners of the tow were liable for the damage.

The Stormcock (53 L. T. Rep. N. S. 53; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 470) explained.

THIS was a collision action in rem instituted by the owners of the sailing ship Valetta, her cargo and freight, against the owners of the tug Flying Serpent and the ship Niobe.

The collision occurred about 11.40 p.m. on the 23rd March 1887 in St. George's Channel, the Niobe at the time being in tow of the Flying Serpent.

The Valetta first collided with the Flying Serpent and then with the Niobe. The owners of the Flying Serpent admitted liability.

The facts alleged on behalf of the plaintiffs were as follows:

At about 11.30 p.m. on the 23rd March 1887 the Valetta, a sailing ship of 498 tons gross, whilst bound on a voyage from Point de Galle to Garston with a general cargo, was off the Lucifer Shoals Lightship in St. George's Channel. The night was fine, clear, and starlight, and the wind a moderate breeze from N.W. The Valetta was on a course N.E. by E., making about 7½ knots. In these circumstances those on board of her sighted the two masthead lights of the tug Flying Serpent, which had the ship Niobe in tow, distant about three miles, and bearing about three points on the port bow. Soon afterwards the green lights of these vessels came into view. The Valetta kept her course, but the Flying Serpent and the Niobe, instead of keeping out of the way, continued to approach, and, when a collision appeared inevitable, the helm of the Valetta was put hard-a-port to lessen the force of the blow, but the Flying Serpent with her stem and starboard bow struck the port bow of the Valetta, and the port quarter of the Niobe struck the port quarter of the Valetta, and did the Valetta so much damage that she shortly afterwards sank.

The defendants, the owners of the Niobe, pleaded that the collision was solely due to the negligence of the tug, for which they were not responsible, and alleged the following facts:

Shortly before 11.40 p.m. on the 23rd March 1887 the Niobe, a sailing ship of 1469 tons register, was on a voyage from Greenock to Cardiff, in ballast, in tow of the steam tug Flying Serpent. The scope of hawser between the two vessels was from 90 to 100 fathoms. The Flying Serpent and Niobe were in St. George's Channel off South Tuskar Light on a course S.W. by S. ½ S., and were making about 2½ to 3 knots an hour. In these circumstances those on board the Niobe observed a glimmer of bright light, apparently distant about half a mile, and bearing about three points on the starboard bow of the Niobe. Shortly afterwards the red light of a vessel, which proved to be the Valetta, came into view on the starboard bow of the Niobe. When the red light was seen, the helm of the Niobe was put hard-a-port. The Flying Serpent neglected to keep out of the way of the Valetta, and the Flying Serpent collided with the Valetta, striking her about 10 feet forward of the fore-rigging on the port side, and doing her so much damage that the Valetta afterwards sank. The Niobe, under a hard-a-port helm, almost cleared the Valetta, but the port quarter of the Niobe slightly touched the port quarter of the Valetta. The Valetta sustained no damage from the contact between her and the Niobe, and the damage to, and loss of, the Valetta, her cargo and freight, were solely due to the collision between the Valetta and the Flying Serpent.

The defendants (inter alia) pleaded as follows:

The defendants specifically deny that those on board the Flying Serpent were the servants of the Niobe, and were subject to the control and orders of those on board the Niobe, and say that those on board the Niobe could not exercise any control, or give any orders to those on board the Flying Serpent, and the defendants say that there was no negligence whatever on the part of the Niobe, or of those on board her, and they allege and submit that they are in no way liable for the negligence of the Flying Serpent, or those on board her, who were not their servants, but were independent contractors and over whom they had no control.

Myburgh, Q.C. (with him Hollams) for the plaintiffs.—The owners of the tow are liable. She had control of the navigation of the tug, and her owners are therefore liable for the negligence of the tug. This has been established by a long line of authorities:

The Christina, 3 W. Rob. 27;

Spaight v. Tedcastle, 44 L. T. Rep. N. S. 589; L. Rep. 6 App. Cas. 217; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 406.

In this case the collision was caused by the negligent navigation of the tug and the tow. On the evidence it is clear that there was a bad look-out on the tow, and that this caused or contributed to the collision.

Sir Walter Phillimore (with him Barnes), for the defendants, contra.—It is admitted that there are circumstances under which it would be the duty of a tow to give the tug warning of an approaching vessel, but that is not so in this case. It is to be remembered that this was a sea towage by night, with a long scope of hawser between the tug and tow. In such circumstances it was decided in The Stormcock (53 L. T. Rep. N. S. 53; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 470) that it is not the duty of the tow to direct the movements of the tug. So in this case no duty was cast upon the Niobe to direct the navigation of the tug. In other words, those on board the tug were not the servants nor under the control of the Niobe, and were, in fact, in the position of independent contractors:

The Bernina, 56 L. T. Rep. N. S. 258; 12 P. Div 61; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 75;

Reedie v. London and North-Western Railway Company, 4 Ex. 244;
Jones v. Corporation of Liverpool, 14 Q. B. Div. 890.

The Niobe was entitled to assume the tug would do right. The result of a constant interference on the part of a tow would be to hamper the navigation and perhaps bring about a collision:

The Duke of Sussex, 1 W. Rob. 27; 1 Notes of Cases, 161;
The Druid, 1 W. Rob. 391.

Myburgh, Q.C. in reply.—If the navigation in these cases is to be under the control of the tug, the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Acts, as to the qualifications of persons in charge of ships, would be contravened.

Cur. adv. vult.

Feb. 21.—Sir JAMES HANNEN.—The collision which was the subject of inquiry in this case occurred on the night of the 23rd March 1887, between the sailing vessel Valetta and the tug Flying Serpent, while the latter was engaged in towing the Niobe from Greenock to Cardiff. The Valetta was sailing on a course N.E. by E., with a N.W. wind, at a rate of 7½ knots, and her side lights were burning brightly, when the look-out man saw the two masthead lights of the tug Flying Serpent at a distance, estimated at three miles, and about three points on the Valetta's port bow. The green light of the tug and her tow soon after came into view. The Valetta kept her course, but the Flying Serpent continued to approach the Valetta until with her stem and starboard bow she struck the Valetta's port bow, doing her such damage that the Valetta shortly afterwards sank, and two of her crew were drowned.

On behalf of the Niobe it was contended that the collision was solely caused by the negligence of the Flying Serpent, and that she (the Niobe) is not responsible for the misconduct of the tug. I shall first consider whether there was any negligence on the part of the Niobe; and, secondly, whether that negligence, if it existed, contributed to the collision. The Flying Serpent and her tow were on a S.S.W. course, and had the Valetta on their starboard bow, while the Valetta, sailing a converging course of N.E. by E., had the tug and tow on her port bow. There can be no doubt that there was a bad look-out on the Flying Serpent, and that consequently she took no steps to get out of the way of the Valetta. Let us see what was the state of things on board the Niobe. The Flying Serpent was towing the Niobe with a scope of hawser of about 100 fathoms. The look-out man on the Niobe says that he first saw a dim bright light on the Valetta, two points on the starboard bow, at about four ships' lengths off. This, then, must have been when the Flying Serpent was close to the Valetta. This white light which the look-out saw was, as the captain of the Niobe conjectures, probably a companion or binnacle light. The look-out man reported this light, and immediately afterwards saw the loom of the Valetta's sails and then the red light, but before he had time to report it he heard the crash of the collision, which he says took place immediately after he saw the sails. Later on he stated that he only saw the red light after he heard the crash, and finally he said he almost "saw the lot at once." This evidence seems to show very clearly that there was a bad look-out on the Niobe. The evidence of the captain of the Niobe does not materially alter that of the look-out. The captain was below when he heard the report of a light. He immediately came on deck and saw a white light two or three points on the starboard bow, at a distance which he cannot estimate. He immediately ordered the helm hard-a-port. He did not hear the crash or know when the tow rope was cast off, but he thinks seven or eight minutes elapsed from giving the order hard-a-port till the Niobe struck the Valetta. Seven or eight minutes is probably more time than passed between the order hard-a-port and the collision of the Niobe with the Valetta; but this question of time is not material, as I think that all that could be done was done when the light of the Valetta was seen, but I consider it ought to have been seen sooner.

The next question is, whether this negligence of the Niobe contributed to the collision between the Flying Serpent and the Valetta. On this I think the evidence of the captain of the Niobe is decisive. He says that if he saw his tug taking a wrong course he certainly should endeavour to control her. If he saw her taking a direction leading to danger, he should apprise her of it by altering his own course, and this would be an effectual mode of warning her. He also said that if he had seen the red light of the Valetta sooner, he would have ported sooner, but that he would let the tug get within a mile, or about a mile, before he should think it necessary to port, and that, as it was, his porting was so late that the tug could not take the hint. If he had seen the red light about half a mile off, he could have girted the tug—that is, he could have checked her by sheering to the right under a port helm. "Girting" a tug, he says, is a common manœuvre. I have put the question to the Trinity Brethren, whether, if the red light of the Valetta had been sooner seen by those on board the Niobe, she could, by porting her helm, have checked the course of the tug and could have prevented a collision between the tug and the Valetta. I am advised that she could, and that that would have been the proper and seamanlike thing to have done in the circumstances. And, as I find as a fact that there was nothing to prevent the red light of the Valetta being seen at the regulation distance, it follows that the bad look-out of the Niobe contributed to the collision. I am further advised that, if the Valetta had been seen sooner, the Niobe ought to have signalled by lights to the tug that she was rushing into danger. To the objection that this might have distracted the attention of the tug from looking ahead, the answer is that the Niobe would not have any right to assume that there would not be a sufficient look-out on the tug to look forward as well as astern. Taking this view of the facts, I doubt whether the questions of law which have been discussed before me arise in this case, but I will shortly state my opinion on the points raised. It was contended that the relation of the tug owner to the tow owner was that of an independent contractor, and that therefore the principle of Quarman v. Burnett is applicable, and that the tow owner and his vessel are not responsible for the negligence of the tug owner and his servants. The basis of the decision in Quarman v. Burnett is that the hirer of horses with a driver from a jobmaster has not, in ordinary circumstances, the management of the horses; but Parke, B. says: "It is undoubtedly true that there may be special circumstances which may render the hirer of job horses and servants responsible for the neglect of a servant, though not liable by virtue of the general relation of master and servant. He may become so by his own conduct, as by taking the actual management of the horses, or ordering the servant to drive in a particular manner which occasions the damage complained of, or to absent himself at one particular moment and the like." But it appears to me that the authorities clearly establish that the tow has, under the ordinary contract of towage, control over the tug. The tug and tow are engaged in a common undertaking, of which the general management and command belong to the tow, and, in order that she should efficiently carry out this command, it is necessary that she should have a good look-out, and should not allow herself to be drawn, or the tug to go, on a course which will cause damage to another vessel. As Dr. Lushington has pointed out, it is essential to the safety of vessels being towed, that there should not be a divided command, and convenience has established that the undivided authority shall belong to the tow. The pilot, if there be one, takes his station on the tow, and the officers of the tow are usually, as in the present case, of a higher class and better able to direct the navigation than those of the tug. The practice which experience has dictated has received the sanction of many legal decisions, and has been recognised in the House of Lords in Spaight v. Tedcastle (ubi sup.), where Lord Blackburn says that it is the duty of the tug to carry out the directions received from the ship, and in the Privy Council in The American and The Syria (L. Rep. 6 P. C. 127; 2 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 350). Although in this latter case it was held, from the special circumstances, that the command belonged to the tug and not to the tow, I may observe that it is clear from the evidence in this case that it was perfectly well understood by the captains of the tug and tow that the latter had the control of their movements, and that it was the duty of those navigating the tow to keep a good look-out and check the tug if it were going wrong.

But it was argued that, whatever the relation of tug and tow may generally be, they were reversed in this case by special circumstances—first, by the contract of towage between the parties, but there is nothing in the contract but a bare agreement to tow; secondly, by the fact that the towage was at sea with a long scope of hawser, and that this gives rise to different duties on the part of the two vessels to those which exist in river towage with a shorter scope of hawser. I agree that in a towage at sea with a long scope it is more difficult for the tow to communicate with the tug, and if it had been shown that the Flying Serpent had by some sudden manœuvre, which those on board the Niobe could not control, brought about the collision, I should have held the Niobe blameless. Thus in The Stormcock (ubi sup.) I held the tug to be responsible, because the tug, which was originally steering a safe course, so suddenly departed from it that the tow could not check her or follow without striking another vessel. I think that the same result would follow in a river towage in like circumstances. But in the present case the action of the Flying Serpent was not sudden, and might have been prevented by those on board the Niobe if they had done their duty. Lastly, it was contended that the Niobe was not liable because the mischief was not done by contact with her. I am of opinion that this is immaterial where, as I find in this case to be the fact, the collision between the tug and the complaining vessel might have been avoided but for the contributory negligence of the tow.

THE LONGNEWTON. (a)

Collision—River Thames—Barge and steamship—Rules and Bye-laws for the Navigation of the River Thames, Art, 21.

Where a steamship navigating the River Thames is in such a position, through no fault of those in charge of her, that it is unsafe or impracticable for her to keep out of the way of a sailing vessel, it is the duty of the sailing vessel under art. 21 of the Rules and Bye-laws for the Navigation of the River Thames, on hearing the steamer's whistle sounded as therein provided, to keep out of the way of the steamer.

Quære: Is a sailing vessel, on hearing such a signal, bound to keep out of the way of a steamer without knowing that it is in fact unsafe or impracticable for the steamer to keep out of her way?

THIS was a collision action in rem instituted by the owners of the sailing barge Russell against the owners of the s.s. Longnewton to recover damages occasioned by a collision between these two vessels in the river Thames.

(a) Reported by J. P. ASPINALL and BUTLER ASPINALL, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

The facts alleged on behalf of the plaintiffs were as follows: Shortly before 1.30 a.m. on Dec. 20 1887, the Russell, a sailing barge of 47 tons register, laden with a cargo of bricks, was proceeding up the river Thames on a voyage from Murston to Westminster. There was a light air from the N.W.; the weather was clear and starlight but dark, and the tide was flood of the force of about 3½ knots. The Russell was just below Tripcock Point, standing over from the south to the north shore close-hauled on the port tack. In these circumstances those on board the Russell observed the green and masthead lights of the s.s. Longnewton coming down the river a little to the north of mid-channel, slightly before the port beam of the Russell, and distant about 200 or 300 yards. The Russell kept her course, and the green light of the Longnewton was shut in and her red light opened, about abeam of the Russell. Shortly after the green light again came into view, and the steamer was seen to be approaching, with all three of her lights open, so as to render a collision imminent. Although the Longnewton was loudly hailed to port she came on, and with her stem struck the Russell on her port side, doing her so much damage that she shortly afterwards sank.

The facts alleged by the defendants were as follows: Shortly before 1.30 a.m. the Longnewton, a screw steamship of 1206 tons register, was in charge of a pilot, proceeding down the Thames on a voyage from Beckton gas works to Sunderland. Owing to a number of barges coming up the river, the Longnewton was kept on the north side of midstream, and was making about 1½ knots over the ground. In these circumstances those on board the Longnewton, after many lights, red and green, of barges beating up had been seen in the vicinity, observed the red light of a barge, which proved to be the Russell, about two to three ships, lengths off and bearing about three to four points on her starboard bow. It then being unsafe and impracticable for the Longnewton to keep out of the way of the Russell owing to a vessel at anchor on the port side of the Longnewton, and a number of barges on her starboard side, her engines were stopped and her steam whistle was sounded five or six times in rapid succession as a signal to the Russell to go about, in accordance with article 18 of the Rules and Bye-Laws for the Navigation of the River Thames. But immediately afterwards, as the Russell kept on, the engines of the Longnewton were reversed full speed, a manœuvre which caused great risk of fouling her with other craft; the Russell, however, kept on and with her port side struck the Longnewton's stem.

The defendants (inter alia) charged the plaintiffs with breach of arts. 2 and 21 of the Bye-Laws for the Navigation of the River Thames, which are as follows:

Art. 2. Nothing in the following rules shall exonerate any vessel, or the owner, or master, or crew thereof from the consequences of any neglect to carry lights or signals, or of any neglect to keep a proper look-out, or of the neglect of any precaution which may be required by the ordinary practice of seamen, or by the special circumstances of the case.

Art. 21. If a sailing vessel and a steam-vessel are proceeding in such a direction as to involve risk of collision, the steam vessel shall keep out of the way of the sailing vessel. If, owing to causes beyond the control of those navigating the steam-vessel, it is unsafe or impracticable for the steam-vessel to keep out of the way of the sailing vessel, she shall signify the same to the sailing vessel by four or more blasts of the steam-whistle in rapid succession, as mentioned in rule 18; the sailing vessel shall then keep out of the way.

Myburgh, Q.C. (with him Dr. Raikes), for the plaintiffs.—The steamship is solely to blame for this collision. It was her duty to keep out of the way of the barge, and that she failed to do. Moreover, if in fact the steamer was in such a position as to be incapable of getting out of the way of the barge, those in charge of her were wrong in bringing her into such a position. Art. 21 was never intended to allow steamers to bring themselves into positions of danger and then cast upon sailing vessels the duty of keeping out of the way.

Sir Walter Phillimore (with him J. P. Aspinall) for the defendants.—The position in which the steamship found herself was brought about by no negligence of those in charge of her. If so, the circumstances were clearly within art. 21, and it therefore was the duty of the barge to keep out of the way. Even assuming the steamer not to have been justified in getting into the position in which she was, the barge did wrong in not giving way after she knew the difficulty the steamer was in.

Myburgh, Q.C. in reply.

Sir JAMES HANNEN.—There can be no doubt that the ultimate cause of this collision was, that the signal given by the Longnewton was not heard and acted upon by those in charge of the barge Russell. I entertain no doubt whatever that the signal was given. That was deposed to by various witnesses of whose trustworthiness I have no doubt. I was especially influenced by the evidence of the man who was on the following barge, who says he heard the signal and acted upon it. Unfortunately it was not heard by those on board the Russell, or at any rate it was not acted upon. That gives rise to this question, whether or not the Longnewton had been brought into the position in which she was when she gave that signal by causes beyond the control of those navigating her, so as to make the 21st article of the Rules and Bye-Laws for the Navigation of the River Thames applicable. Of course she must not be brought into such a position merely by the act and will of those navigating her without justification. The question is, whether they were justified in bringing her into the position in which she was. I confess I have entertained some doubts upon the point, but even if they were stronger than they are I should not feel justified in setting them up against the opinion of my assessors. The question I have put to them is, whether the Longnewton was justified in coming out from behind the steamers in such a way as to bring herself into the position in which she was when she gave this signal. They are of opinion that she was. Their view of the matter appears to be this. They say that this steamer seems to have been properly and carefully navigated, and that she had below her a great number of vessels tacking across the river. I thought at first there was some exaggeration as to the number of these vessels, but the Trinity Brethren tell me that they are not at all surprised at the number. But they say that, having to encounter a number of craft under these circumstances is no reason why a steamer should not go down slowly and under such command that she can stop and reverse if exigencies require it. They further tell me that they see no reason to think that there was anything to prevent that course being taken here. They say that it could not be foreseen that the steamer would be brought into dangerous proximity to this barge just at such a dangerous conjecture of circumstances as would make it difficult or impossible for the steamer to extricate herself from the embarrassment the barges might present; and also that it could not be foreseen that the Russell would take so long to tack towards the north shore as to bring about a dangerous proximity, and that she might, in fact, have gone about, as the barge following her did, at a point much further from the shore. They therefore come to the conclusion that the Longnewton was not to blame for bringing herself into the position in which she was when the signal was given.

The next question is, what could the Longnewton do which was safe and practicable for the purpose of keeping out of the way of the barge? She did stop and reverse, the effect of which was to lessen her way and so diminish the damage which would otherwise have been occasioned. She could not starboard, as that would have caused risk of her running into a vessel at anchor. It is indeed possible that she might have ported, and by so doing might have avoided the collision with the barge Russell, but such a manœuvre would have been attended with other danger. Her head would probably have been taken by the flood tide, and she would have got athwart the river, which would be a dangerous and unsafe position for a vessel of her size to be put into. Besides, if after porting she had remained under a port helm, there would have been danger of collision with either the following barge or one of the other barges. The Trinity Brethren therefore think that the circumstances were those contemplated by the rule, and that this steamer, finding herself in a position in which any steps to get out of the way of the barge would have been attended with an absence of safety and risk of damage, she was justified in calling upon the barge to alter her tack. The man on board the barge has said that if he had heard the signal he should have gone about. It was because he did not hear the signal that he did not do so. In these circumstances, the question of law which was discussed before me does not arise. All I now say upon it is, that when a sailing vessel hears a signal to keep out of the way, as in this case by altering her tack, it is a prudent course to adopt if it can be done, because it is impossible for a sailing vessel to form an opinion of what the circumstances are which have brought the steamer into the position in which she gives that signal. The prudent course, therefore, is to at once act upon it as the other barge did. On another point in the case I am of opinion that had I thought the Longnewton to blame, I should have considered her responsible for the whole of the damage, because I am advised that it was not an unnatural, and therefore not an improper thing, that the men on the barge when she was struck should get into their boat for safety. These questions, however, are not necessary to the determination of the case. I pronounce the barge alone to blame.

THE ROSE OF ENGLAND. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM THE CITY OF LONDON COURT (ADMIRALTY JURISDICTION).

Collision—River Thames—Fog—Sailing and dumb barges—Rules and Bye-laws for the Navigation of the River Thames, No. 20.

Dumb barges in the Thames do not carry anchors, and have no means of bringing themselves up except by going ashore or fastening on to anything they may come in contact with, and hence a dumb barge starting on her voyage in clear weather and getting into a fog, is not guilty of negligence if she comes into contact with a vessel moored in the river, and if that vessel in breach of the Rules and Bye-laws for the Navigation of the River Thames has her anchor not stock-a-wash, and the barge is thereby injured, the vessel so moored is solely responsible for such damage.

THIS was an appeal from a decision of the judge of the City of London Court in a collision action in rem. The action was brought by the owners of the dumb barge Edith and of the cargo laden on board of her against the owners of the sailing barge Rose of England to recover damages for a collision between the two barges in the river Thames on the 25th Aug. 1887.

The facts alleged by the plaintiffs were as follows: At about 1 a.m. on the 25th Aug. the dumb barge Edith, laden with a cargo of coals, left Charlton to proceed up the river. At this time the weather was clear, but when the barge was off Blackwall Stairs the weather had become so thick that it was impossible to see the shore lights. Her oars were then taken in, and she was allowed to drift up on the flood tide. Shortly afterwards the riding light of a barge, which proved to be the Rose of England was seen about a barge's length ahead, and before anything could be done the starboard side forward of the Edith struck the port side of the Rose of England. The Rose of England was made fast to the barge Ada, which was at anchor, and, according to the plaintiffs' evidence, the anchor stock of the Rose of England was out of the water, the consequence of which was that the fluke was driven into the Edith and she subsequently sank. The Edith was not provided with an anchor or any other means of bringing herself up. According to the evidence dumb barges in the Thames are not usually provided with anchors, and have no appliances for raising them.

The defendants' witnesses alleged that their barge was made fast to the barge Ada, and that their anchor at the time of the collision was stock-a-wash.

Art. No. 20 of the Rules and Bye-laws for the Navigation of the River Thames, provides:

> No vessel shall be navigated or lie in the river with its anchor or anchors hanging by the cable perpendicularly from the hawse, unless the stock shall be awash, except during such time as shall be absolutely necessary for catting or fishing the said anchor or anchors, or during such time as may be absolutely necessary for getting such vessel underway.

The learned Commissioner having found that the anchor of the Rose of England was not stock-a-wash, and having pronounced her to blame, proceeded as follows: "The only question that remains is whether there was negligence on the part of the plaintiff's witness in navigating this barge in the fog in the position he represented himself to be. He could not anchor because he had not an anchor. Nor would his not having an anchor amount to negligence. It would be a very strong thing to hold that, because an ordinary dumb barge has no anchor. Then the man seems to have navigated his barge with as much care as the circumstances permitted. Of course he cannot be made responsible for the fog coming on and leaving him in the position in which he found himself. Therefore, as I indicated before, I cannot consider there is any negligence on the part of the plaintiff which would disentitle him to recover."

From this decision the defendants now appealed.

Dr. Raikes, for the defendants, in support of the appeal.—The Edith was solely to blame for the collision. On the evidence the court should find that the anchor of the Rose of England was stock-a-wash, and, if so, she is free from blame. The Edith was improperly allowed to drift up the river in a fog, without any means of bringing herself up or taking her clear of any craft be they in motion or at anchor. The only means she had of keeping herself clear of the Rose of England were by using her oars, and these had improperly been taken in some time before the collision. A dumb barge has no right to be under way in a thick fog. It is negligence on the part of her owners in not providing her with an anchor, and so giving herself the means of bringing up when the weather becomes so thick as to make navigation dangerous. The fact that it is the practice not to provide these barges with anchors does not relieve barge owners from liability when, owing to the want of anchors, accidents happen.

Hall, Q.C. (with him Gaskell), for the plaintiff, was not called upon.

Sir JAMES HANNEN.—On the question of fact, the learned commissioner has had the advantage of hearing and seeing the witnesses, which we have not. We are not, therefore, in a position to say he was wrong, and although Dr. Raikes has put forward various suggestions to account for the way in which the damage was caused, I think they are wholly untenable. I therefore come to the conclusion that the anchor of the sailing barge was not stock-a-wash, and that the damage was thereby caused.

There then remains the further question, whether there was negligence on the part of the dumb barge. That is undoubtedly an important question, and it may well be that there ought to be some regulations as to the navigation of that class of craft. But we have to dealwith this case as things are at present. We have inquired of the Trinity Masters, and they tell us that it is the practice, and always has been the practice for dumb barges in the Thames to be without an anchor, and that they are provided with no means of getting up an anchor if they had one. In argument it was suggested that they ought to stop. But how are they to do that? There are only two ways. The first is to go ashore, the result of which, at some states of the tide, would be to simply wreck themselves, or tilt them up on one side. The second is to go on until they come in contact with something to which they can make themselves fast. That was just what was done here. This barge was being navigated in the usual recognised way, and we cannot impute any negligence to her. The result is that the appeal must be dismissed.

BUTT, J. concurred.

Appeal dismissed.

THE TASMANIA. (a)

Collision—Tug and tow—Maritime lien—Action in rem—Liability of ship.

A ship is not liable to be proceeded against in rem for damage unless her owners at the time of the accident are personally liable, and could be proceeded against in personam for the damage.

Hence, where a tug company contract to tow upon terms exempting them from liability for damage caused by negligence, and they engage by charter a tug belonging to a third person to perform the towage, and the tug is by the charter placed under the charge of a servant of the company by whose negligence damage is done to a tow, the tug company by reason of the contract not being liable, and the owner of the tug not being personally liable, there is no liability in rem on the part of the tug for the damage done.

THIS was a collision action in rem, by William Harrison, the owner of the trawling smack the Striver, against William Watkins, the owner of the screw-tug the Tasmania.

The collision occurred about 9 a.m. on Oct. 25, 1887, at the entrance to Yarmouth Harbour.

At the time of the collision the Striver was in tow of the Tasmania, which was under charter to the Great Yarmouth Steamtug Company Limited, and was in charge of one of their servants, a man of the name of Offord. The Striver had fallen in with the Tasmania off the entrance to Yarmouth Harbour, and her rope having been hauled on board the Tasmania, the Tasmania commenced to tow her towards the harbour. In these circumstances a brig in tow of the tug Gleaner was seen entering the harbour ahead of the Tasmania. The Tasmania and the Striver were proceeding in a direction as if to pass to the northward of the brig, and for this purpose the Tasmania ran in between the brig and the north pier and then suddenly stopped. The helm of the Striver was put hard-a-starboard, but with her stem she struck the port quarter of the Tasmania, thereby sustaining such damage that she shortly afterwards sank.

The plaintiff charged the Tasmania with improperly and without warning stopping ahead of the Striver.

The defendant alleged that the collision was solely caused by the negligent navigation of the Striver, and charged her with improperly neglecting to take in canvas, with overrunning her tow-rope, and with neglecting to starboard her helm to keep clear of the Tasmania.

They also alternatively pleaded as follows:

9. On the 18th Oct. 1887 an agreement in writing was made between Mr. William Watkins, of 121, Fenchurch-street, London, who was then the registered owner of the Tasmania, and the Great Yarmouth Steamtug Company Limited, who at that time and since owned a fleet of tugs used for towing purposes, in the following terms:

"121, Fenchurch-street, London, E.C., Oct. 18, 1887.—Tasmania hire at 30*l.* per week, payable in advance. Owners finding a crew of five and stores (four men and a boy). Charterers finding a pilot as captain, coals, and port expenses. All damages to be for charterer's account. Salvage and derelicts to be mutually shared. Vessels to be employed towing fishing boats in and out of Great Yarmouth Harbour. Hire to commence and end in London. Charterers to have option of purchasing the vessel at any time during continuance of this charter at 2850*l.*—Signed W. WATKINS; G. W. OWENS, for and on behalf of the Great Yarmouth Steamtug Company Limited."

10. Pursuant to the said agreement the Tasmania on the 21st Oct. 1887 arrived at Great Yarmouth, and was placed by the said company under the control and management of George Offord, a servant of the said company, and so remained down to and on the said 25th Oct. 1887, and was employed and used by the said company under the control and management of the said George Offord, as one of the company's fleet of tugs for the towage of vessels in and out of Great Yarmouth Harbour.

11. Before and on the said 18th Oct., and thence down to and on the said 25th Oct., the plaintiff William Harrison was a director of the said company, and was present at the meetings of the said company, at which resolutions for the hire of the Tasmania were passed, and was a party to the making of the said agreement of the said 18th Oct., and to the use and employment of the Tasmania as one of the company's fleet of tugs, and to the appointment of the said George Offord to the control and management of her.

12. For some time previously to the 25th Oct. the plaintiff William Harrison had employed the tugs of the said company when available for the towage of his vessels in and out of Great Yarmouth Harbour, and no other tugs, and the master of the Striver was before and on the said 25th Oct. under orders from the plaintiff to employ the tugs of the said company when so available, and no others, for such towage purposes; and the master did in obedience to such orders hire the Tasmania as and being one of the said company's tugs for the purpose of towing the Striver into the harbour.

13. For many years previously to the said 25th Oct. public notice had been given by the said company that they would tow vessels on the following conditions only: "That they are not to be answerable or accountable for any loss or damage whatever which may happen to or be occasioned by any vessel, boat, or craft, or any of the cargoes on board the same, while such vessel, boat, or craft is in tow of either of the steamtugs in the river or at sea, and whether arising from or occasioned by any supposed negligence or default of them or their servants, or defects or imperfections in the same steamtugs or either of them, or the machinery or any other part of the same, or any delay, stoppage, or slackness of the speed of the same however occasioned, or for what purpose wheresoever taking place, and that the owner or persons interested in the vessels, boats, or crafts, or of the cargoes on board the same so towing, undertake, bear, satisfy, and indemnify the said tug owners against the same."

14. The plaintiff, as such director as aforesaid, and also as regularly employing the tugs of the said company, had notice and knowledge of such special contract, and the Tasmania was engaged to stow the Striver on the terms of the said special contract; and the towage service was performed by the Tasmania upon the terms of the said special contract, and not otherwise. The master and crew of the Striver had also notice and knowledge of the said terms before and at the time when they were engaged for the Striver.

15. If there was any negligent navigation of the Tasmania, which is denied, the same was negligence within the meaning of the said special contract, and was covered by the terms thereof.

It appeared that at the head of the notice referred to in paragraph 13 of the defence were certain named vessels of which the Tasmania was not one. The further facts of the case appear in the judgment.

March 9 and 11.—The action was heard by the President, assisted by Nautical Assessors, when it was found that the cause of the collision was the negligence of Offord, the servant of the tug company.

It was then arranged that the question of law should be argued on a subsequent date.

March 23.—The question of law came on for argument.

Cohen, Q.C. (with him Witt and J. P. Aspinall) for the defendants.—No action can be maintained by the plaintiff against the tug company by reason of the terms of the contract, and therefore no action can be maintained in personam against Watkins, whether the negligence complained of was that of his servant or the company's servant, because the benefit of the contract enures to the benefit of the defendant, and protects him from liabilities. Hence it follows that no action in rem will lie. The plaintiff being a director of the tug company, and having full knowledge of the terms upon which the Tasmania was engaged, and upon which she performed towage services, can have no right of action in contract against the tug company. The fact that the services of the Tasmania were engaged by the master of the Striver, and not by Harrison, makes no difference as to the liability of the tug company in contract. The knowledge of the principal is the knowledge of the agent:

Mayhew v. Eames, 3 B. & Cress. 601; 1 C. & P. 550; Lindley on Partnership, p. 287.

The plaintiff could maintain no action against the tug company in tort:

The United Service, 49 L. T. Rep. N. S. 701; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 171; 9 P. Div. 3;
Symonds v. Pain, 30 L. J. 256, Ex.;
The Chartered Mercantile Bank of India v. The Netherlands India Steam Navigation Company, 48 L. T. Rep. N. S. 546; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 65; 10 Q. B. Div. 521.

It further follows that, as the cause of the collision was the negligence of a person who was not the servant of Watkins, no action will lie in personam against Watkins. In this particular case this would be so even if Offord were held to be the servant of Watkins. Watkins, as to this contract, is either a principal or a sub-contractor, and a sub-contractor is entitled to the protection of the contract under which the service is rendered or act done, even where the action is brought in tort:

Hall v. North-Eastern Railway Company, 33 L. T. Rep. N. S. 306; L. Rep. 10 Q. B. 437; 44 L. J. 164, Q. B.

If no action in personam lies, then no action in rem lies:

Sir Walter Phillimore (with him Baden-Powell and Fraser Macleod for the plaintiff), contrà.—The defendant cannot rely upon the notice exempting from liability, as the Tasmania is not one of the named tugs. [Sir JAMES HANNEN.—The contract has to be collected from all the circumstances of the case.] The plaintiff has a maritime lien, and is therefore entitled to be indemnified out of the proceeds of the wrongdoing res. The owner gives up the possession of his ship to charterers for the purpose of earning freight, and still remains liable:

Cur. adv. vult.

April 11.—Sir JAMES HANNEN.—The plaintiff Harrison is the owner of several fishing-smacks. These smacks from time to time engage the services of various tugs, and amongst others the tugs of the Great Yarmouth Steamtug Company Limited. The plaintiff is a director of this tug company, and gives his smack-masters general directions to employ the tugs of the company when available in preference to others. The course of business for several years between the tug company and Harrison has been for the tug company to send in quarterly accounts on which is printed the following notice: "The Great Yarmouth Tug Company Limited, owners of the steamtugs Victoria, United Service, Express, Meteor, Sailor, Star, Pilot, and Yare, respectfully give notice that they will tow vessels, boats, or other crafts by the above-named steamtugs on the following conditions only: That they are not to be answerable or accountable for any loss or damage whatever which may happen to or be occasioned by any vessel, boat, or craft, or any of the cargoes on board the same, while such vessel, boat, or craft is in tow of either of the steamtugs in the river or at sea, and whether arising from or occasioned by any supposed negligence or default of them or their servants, or defects or imperfections in the said steamtugs or either of them, or the machinery or any other part of the same, or any delay, stoppage, or slackness of the speed of the same, however occasioned, or for what purposes wheresoever taking place; and that the owner or persons interested in the vessels, boats, or crafts, or of the cargoes on board the same so towing, undertake, bear, satisfy, and indemnify the said tug-owners against the same." In the month of Oct. 1887 the directors of the tug company determined to engage on hire an additional tug for the purpose of rendering on their behalf similar services to those in which their own tugs were employed, and on the 18th Oct. they entered into the following agreement with the owner of the tug Tasmania: "Tasmania hire at 30*l*. per week, payable weekly in advance; owner finding a crew of five and stores; charterers finding a captain as pilot, coals and port expenses. All damages to be for charterers' account. Salvages and derelicts to be mutually shared. Vessel to be employed towing fishing boats in and out of Great Yarmouth Harbour. Hire to commence and end in London. Charterers to have option of purchasing the vessel at any time during continuance of this charter at 2850*l*.—W. Watkins; G. W. Owens." On the 21st Oct. the Tasmania arrived at Great Yarmouth, and in pursuance of the terms of the agreement that the charterers should find a captain as pilot, the tug company appointed in that capacity George Offord, a servant of theirs, who on their behalf had charge of the Tasmania, and had the control and management of it for the same purposes and to be employed on the same terms as the tugs owned by the company. In this character Offord steered and had command of the Tasmania at the time of the casualty which has occasioned this litigation. The plaintiff Harrison, as director of the tug company, was present at the meetings of the company at which resolutions for the hire of the Tasmania were passed, and was a party to the making of the agreement of Oct. 18, and to the appointment of Offord to the control and management of her, and to the employment of the Tasmania to render towage services on the same terms as the tugs of the company had rendered them. The company made the same charges for the services of the Tasmania as for its own tugs, the charge for towing a fishing-smack into Yarmouth Harbour being 7*s*. 6*d*. On the 25th Oct. the Striver, a fishing-smack belonging to the plaintiff, arrived off Yarmouth, and the master seeing the Tasmania headed the Striver towards her for the purpose of being towed in. This manœuvre was sufficient to indicate his wishes, and without a word passing on either side a line was thrown from the Tasmania, the Striver's hawser was hauled on board the tug, and she at once proceeded to tow the smack into Yarmouth. In the course of this towage Offord was at the wheel of the Tasmania, and ordered her movements, and by his sole negligence a collision was brought about between the Tasmania and the Striver, from which the Striver received such injuries that she foundered shortly afterwards.

The question is, whether in these circumstances the plaintiff Harrison is entitled to recover in respect of the loss of his smack the Striver. It is contended for him that the clause exempting the tug company from liability does not apply to negligence of the company's servants in the navigation of the Tasmania as distinguished from the tugs belonging to the company; secondly, that this being an action in rem the plaintiff is entitled to recover against the ship, and through the ship against Watkins, the owner of the tug, notwithstanding the chartering of the tug to the tug company, and the plaintiff's dealings with that company; thirdly, that there was contributory negligence on the part of Watkins' servants. This last is a question of fact which I find against the plaintiff, as I consider Offord solely to blame for the collision. With regard to the first point, that the clause exempting the tug company does not apply to the Tasmania, if the plaintiff had not been a director of the tug company, and had not had previous dealings with it, it would have been necessary for the tug company, in order to free itself from liability for the negligence of its servants in the execution of a contract of towage, to show that the plaintiff had notice of the special terms on which the company did its business. But the plaintiff, both as a director and customer of the company, knew those terms. Suppose that, instead of the Tasmania, one of the tugs named in the printed notice had rendered the services, and the plaintiff, being on board his smack, had thrown the rope to the tug, which, from darkness or other cause, he did not recognise as one of the company's fleet, he could not in that case have been heard to say, on discovering that the tug he had employed belonged to the company, that he was not bound by the exempting clause because he did not know at the time that it was one of the company's tugs. His course of dealing created an agreement with the company that the company should not be liable for damage to his vessels while in tow of the company's tugs, and this would be incorporated into any contract of towage not specially excluding it which the plaintiff or his servants might enter into with the company. As to the Tasmania, the plaintiff knew of and sanctioned its employment by the tug company to render services to any vessel needing them on the same terms as its own tugs were authorised to render them. The plaintiff did not say, when he joined with his co-directors in sending out the Tasmania to tender its services generally on these terms, that he would not be bound by them; nor, if that would have been of no avail, could he have had any mental reservation to that effect, for it was as much to his interest to employ the Tasmania as the company's own tugs, and he stated—I do not doubt, truthfully—that he intended his smack-masters to give the same preference to the Tasmania which he had directed them to give to the company's own tugs over other people's. I come to the conclusion that the plaintiff implicitly agreed with the tug company that, in the event of his employing the Tasmania, it was to be on the same terms as those on which he had previously employed the company's tugs, and therefore that the clause exempting the company from liability was, in the circumstances of the case, binding on the plaintiff with reference to the Tasmania as well as the tugs specifically named in the printed notice.

The second question is, whether the plaintiff is entitled to recover against the tug, notwithstanding the chartering of it to the tug company and the plaintiff's dealings with that company. It was held in The Bold Buccleugh (7 Moo. P. C. 267) that where a maritime lien attaches to a ship by reason of collision with another, that lien continues valid against the ship though she may afterwards pass into the possession of a bonâ fide purchaser. But that decision does not define the cases in which the maritime lien arises. It is not an absolute lien on the ship which has caused the damage, irrespective of all other considerations. For instance, if a wrongdoer takes possession of a vessel, and negligently or wilfully brings her into collision with another, the owner is neither personally liable nor liable through his ship. In The Druid (ubi sup.) the master of a tug, in order to extract payment of a sum of money he demanded, recklessly towed a vessel into collision and damaged her, and it was there held that the tug could not be made responsible for the damage. Dr. Lushington, in an elaborate and learned judgment, stated his view of the law very emphatically: "In all causes of action which may arise from circumstances occurring during the ownership of the persons whose ship is proceeded against, I apprehend that no suit could ever be maintained against a ship where the owners were not themselves personally liable, or where their personal liability had not been given up, as in bottomry bonds, by taking a lien on the vessel. The liability of the ship and the responsibility of the owners in such cases are convertible terms. The ship is not liable if the owners are not responsible, and, vice versâ, no responsibility can attach upon the owners if the ship is exempt and not liable to be proceeded against." With the addition of a definition, supplied by subsequent cases, of the persons who are to be regarded as the owners, I think that this passage from Dr. Lushington's judgment contains a correct statement of the law at this time. In The Orient (3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 321; 21 L. T. Rep. N. S. 761) a similar conclusion was arrived at under somewhat different circumstances. The result of these decisions is, that though a ship is commonly spoken of metaphorically as if it had a personality of its own, it is not to be treated as if it were itself capable of doing a wrong. It is an instrument in the hands of its navigators, and its liability will depend on whether those navigators can be identified with the owners or their agents. This was very clearly laid down in the judgment of the Privy Council in the case of The Halley, where Selwyn, L.J. says: "In cases like the present, where damages are claimed for tortious collisions, a chattel such as a ship or carriage may be, and frequently is, figuratively spoken of as the wrongdoer; but it is obvious that although redress may sometimes be obtained by means of the seizure and sale of the ship or carriage, the chattel itself is only the instrument by the improper use of which the injury is inflicted by the real wrongdoer." In The Ticonderoga (Swa. 215) Dr. Lushington had to deal with the case of a vessel under charter-party, by which the charterers had the exclusive control of the vessel, and he held that the vessel might be proceeded against in rem for damage done by the charterers' servants. He says: "Supposing a vessel is chartered so that the owners have divested themselves for a pecuniary consideration of all power, right, and authority over the vessel for a given time, and have left to the charterers the appointment of the master and crew; and suppose in that case the vessel had done damage and was proceeded against in this court. I will admit, for the purpose of argument, that the charterers, and not the owners, would be responsible elsewhere, although I give no opinion on that point; but still I should have to say to the parties who had received the damage that they had, by the maritime law of nations, a remedy against the ship itself." And he adds that compulsory pilotage is the only exception that he is aware of. There is nothing in this judgment which leads to the conclusion that Dr. Lushington intended to retract what he had said in The Druid (ubi sup.). It amounts only to this, that he thought that, whatever might be the case at common law, by the maritime law of nations charterers to whom the government of the ship is voluntarily handed over represent the owners so as to bind the ship in cases of collision, and the generality of his remarks must be controlled by the particular circumstances of the case before him. The Ticonderoga (ubi sup.) was followed by Sir Robert Phillimore in The Leamington (2 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. N. S. 475; 32 L. T. Rep. N. S. 69); and he rests his decision on the ground that "a vessel placed by its owners wholly in the control of charterers or hirers, and employed by the latter for the lawful purposes of the hiring, is held by the charterers as pro hac vice owners. Damage wrongfully done by the vessel whilst in possession of the charterers is, therefore, damage done by owners or their servants, although those owners may be only temporary. Vessels suffering damage from a chartered ship are entitled primâ facie to a maritime lien upon that ship and to look to the res as security for restitution." This, so far from supporting the theory that the liability of the chartered ship is absolute, without reference to any limitation of the rights of the owners of the injured ship resulting from a collision, tends absolutely in the opposite direction, for, if the charterers are to be regarded as the owners pro hac vice, they may by contract limit their liability and that of the ship. The question of common law on which Dr. Lushington abstained from expressing an opinion had, in fact, been determined in the same way that he decided it by the maritime law. In Fletcher v. Braddick (ubi sup.) Sir James Mansfield held that the owners of a ship chartered to the Government were liable for injury done by the misconduct of those on board, though done by order of a Government officer in command. Sir James Mansfield dwells much on the difficulty of the injured person knowing in whose charge a ship is. "No person," he says, "can be supposed to know of any private agreement between the owners and the commissioners." If anything does, indeed, turn on the knowledge of the parties, the present case differs from Fletcher v. Braddick (ubi sup.) in this, that the plaintiff here was fully aware of the terms of the charter to the tug company. It is unnecessary for me to express an opinion whether the law as laid down in Fletcher v. Braddick (ubi sup.) is modified by Quarman v. Burnett (ubi sup.) and the cases which have followed that decision. The case of Hodgkinson v. Fernie (2 C. B. N. S. 415), cited in argument, seems rather to turn on the delay of those under charter to the Government in a common warlike undertaking to obey the orders of the Government officer.

The result of the authorities cited appears to me to be this, that the maritime lien resulting from collision is not absolute. It is a primâ facie liability of the ship which may be rebutted by showing that the injury was done by the act of someone navigating the ship not deriving his authority from the owners, and that by the maritime law charterers in whom the control of the ship has been vested by the owners are deemed to have derived their authority from the owners so as to make the ship liable for the negligence of the charterers, who are pro hac vice owners. These propositions do not lead to the conclusion that where, as between the charterers and the persons injured, the charterers are not liable, the ship remains liable nevertheless. On the contrary, I draw from these premises that whatever is a good defence of the charterers against the claim of the injured person is a good defence for the ship, as it would have been if the same defence had arisen between the owners and the injured person. Let me now shortly recall the facts of this case. The plaintiff agreed that the tug company should not be answerable for damage happening to his smack when being towed by any of the company's tugs. It is, of course, not suggested that he would, notwithstanding this agreement, be entitled to proceed against one of the company's tugs employed by him for damage done by the tug. For the reasons I have stated, I hold that the plaintiff in effect agreed that, if he employed the Tasmania, it should be on the same terms as applied to the company's tugs. One of the implied terms is that the tugs themselves shall not be liable any more than the company, and this will also apply to the Tasmania. If not, this result will follow—that the plaintiff will recover against the Tasmania, and through it against Watkins, the owner; but Watkins, under his agreement with the tug company, will be entitled to be indemnified by the tug company, and so the loss will fall on the tug company. Thus the very object of the printed notice given by the company, and accepted by the plaintiff as the basis of his contract with them, would be defeated. The result will be but little more absurd if, as I understand the concluding words of the printed notice, the plaintiff in his turn would be bound to indemnify the tug company against the claim of Watkins. The plaintiff's action therefore fails, but he will be entitled to the costs of the issues of fact upon which he succeeded.

THE ORWELL. (a)

Collision—Loss of life—Assessment of damages — Registrar and Merchants — Jury — Lord Campbell's Act (9 & 10 Vict. c. 93) — R. S. C., Order XXVII., r. 4.

Where, in an action for loss of life by collision under Lord Campbell's Act instituted in the Admiralty Division, the defendant makes default in pleading, the plaintiffs are entitled, under Order XXVII., r. 4, to enter interlocutory judgment, and to have the damages assessed and apportioned by a jury, and a writ of inquiry will be issued accordingly.

THIS was a summons in an action under Lord Campbell's Act, referred by the registrar to the judge, and by him adjourned into court.

The action was instituted on behalf of May Ann Hughes, widow, and her four children, against the owners of the Orwell, to recover compensation in respect of the death of her husband and the children's father in a collision between the Orwell and the schooner Margaret Lewis.

(a) Reported by J. P. ASPINALL and BUTLER ASPINALL, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

The defendants appeared, but delivered no defence, and paid 600*l.* into court.

On Dec. 7, 1887, the Orwell was found solely to blame for the collision in an action in rem by the owners of the Margaret Lewis.

The plaintiffs now took out a summons calling upon the defendants to show cause why they should not be at liberty to enter up interlocutory judgment for damages to be assessed, and why such damages should not be assessed on a writ of inquiry directed to the sheriff of Middlesex.

By sect. 2 of Lord Campbell's Act 1846, an action under that Act Shall be for the benefit of the wife, husband, parent, and child, of the person whose death shall have been so caused, and shall be brought by and in the name of the executor or administrator of the person deceased; and in every such action the jury may give such damages as they think proportioned to the injury resulting from such death to the parties respectively for whom and for whose benefit such action shall be brought; and the amount so recovered, after deducting the costs not recovered from the defendant, shall be divided amongst the before-mentioned parties in such shares as the jury by their verdict shall find and direct.

By Order XXVII., r. 4, of the Rules of the Supreme Court:

If the plaintiff's claim be for detention of goods and pecuniary damages, or either of them, and the defendant, or all the defendants if more than one, make default as mentioned in rule 2, the plaintiff may enter an interlocutory judgment against the defendant or defendants, and a writ of inquiry shall issue to assess the value of the goods and the damages, or the damages only as the case may be. But the court or a judge may order that instead of a writ of inquiry the value and amount of damages, or either of them, shall be ascertained in any way which the court or judge may direct.

Barnes, Q.C., for the plaintiffs, in support of the summons.—Order XXVII., r. 4, gives power to this division, as to any other, to refer the assessment of damages to a jury. Lord Campbell's Act prescribes a jury as the proper tribunal to assess and apportion the damages, and if therefore it is a matter in the discretion of the court its discretion should be guided by such statutory provision.

Raikes, for the defendants, contra. — The plaintiffs having selected this division, should be bound by its procedure. The regular tribunal for the assessment of damages is the Registrar and Merchants, and therefore the plaintiffs' claim ought to be assessed by them:

The Baron Aberdare, 57 L. T. Rep. N. S. 884; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 225; 12 P. Div. 204;
The Gertrude, 57 L. T. Rep. N. S. 882; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 224; 12 P. Div. 204; 56 L. J. 106, P. D. & A.

In former days the Court of Chancery used, in limitation of liability actions, to assess and apportion damages in claims like the present one, and, as this court has now got that jurisdiction, there is no reason why it should not do the same.

Barnes, Q.C. in reply.

Sir JAMES HANNEN.—I am of opinion that this application should be granted. It is now established that these actions under Lord Campbell's Act were not at the time of the passing of the Act within the jurisdiction of the Admiralty Court, but they have now been brought within the jurisdiction of the Admiralty Division by reason of the statutory provision that any action may be instituted in any division of the High Court. If it is not part of the business assigned to that division it may be transferred to a more appropriate division. Here an action under Lord Campbell's Act has been begun in this division, which the defendants have not asked to have transferred to the Queen's Bench Division. Therefore I am entitled to entertain this application, although the action does not properly fall within the special business of this division. The question now arises, how am I to deal with this application? My decision in The Gertrude (ubi sup.) has been pressed upon me, but I do not feel in the least shackled by that decision. I there held that, if the parties agreed to come into this division, it must be assumed that they agreed to have the action tried according to the law and practice administered in this division. If I found that this assumption was wrong I should certainly not allow the transfer of actions to this division, or should transfer them if brought here unless the parties agreed to abide by the practice of the division. In The Gertrude (ubi sup.) the sole question was how the damages were to be assessed. In that case the Registrar and Merchants were not fettered by any Act of Parliament, and I thought they were right in giving the plaintiffs damages upon the principle acted upon in this division as distinguished from the principle in force in the Queen's Bench Division. Here, however, I am not left free. I am exercising the jurisdiction arising under Lord Campbell's Act, and am as much bound by its terms as the Queen's Bench Division. On referring to the Act I find that it was contemplated that the damages should be found and apportioned by a jury. Neither is there in this case any assent on the part of all parties to the case being governed by the special practice of this division. I am therefore bound to send the damages to a jury, unless there is such consent. With regard to the practice in limitation of liability actions to which reference has been made, it is sufficient to say that what was there done was done under the special provision of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854. I therefore give the interlocutory judgment as prayed, and I direct a writ of inquiry to issue for the assessment of the damages.

THE ROSETTA. (a)

Collision—Fog—Speed—Steam-whistle.

Where an officer in charge of a steamship in a dense fog hears a whistle apparently two to three points on the bow, but cannot be sure of the bearing within a point or two, and does not know the heading of the vessel whistling, it is his duty to diminish the speed of his vessel to the utmost to give him time to ascertain the manœuvres of the other vessel, and for that purpose he must either reduce the speed until the engines are only just moving, or he must stop them, but he need not necessarily continue to keep them stopped, but only sufficiently to diminish his way, and when he is beginning to lose steerage way, then and only then, may put them on again, but as slowly as is possible.

The fact of a steam-whistle alleged to have been blown in a fog not being heard by those on an approaching ship is not necessarily proof that there was a bad look-out on the approaching ship, as the direction in which and the distance from which the sound would be heard is uncertain.

THIS was a collision action instituted by the owners of the steamship Arago against the owners of the steamship Rosetta.

The collision occurred in the English Channel on the 20th May 1888.

The facts alleged on behalf of the plaintiffs were as follows:—Shortly before 2.45 p.m., on the 20th May, the Arago, a steamship of 1061 tons net, laden with a general cargo, was in the English Channel a little below Dungeness, on a voyage from London to the river Plate. The wind was a light breeze from the W.S.W., and there was a thick fog. The Arago was heading W. by ½ S. magnetic, making about three knots an hour, with her engines working slow, and her steam-whistle was being duly sounded. In these circumstances the whistle of a steamship, which proved to be the Rosetta, was heard on the port bow apparently at a considerable distance, and was answered by the whistle of the Arago. After an interval during which the whistle of the Arago was again sounded, the whistle of the Rosetta was heard again apparently in about the same direction, but nearer than before. The engines of the Arago were thereupon stopped, and her whistle blown in answer. After the engines had been stopped for some little time the whistle of the Rosetta was again heard on about the same bearing, but much closer. The engines of the Arago were at once set full speed astern, her whistle was sounded three short blasts to signify that she was going astern, and her helm was put hard-a-port. Just as she was gathering sternway the Rosetta came on at great speed, and with her stem struck the port bow of the Arago, doing her great harm.

The facts alleged on behalf of the defendants were as follows:—Shortly before 2.45 p.m. on the 20th May, the Rosetta, a steamship of 814 tons register, was in the English Channel between eight and ten miles S.W. by S. of Dungeness, on a voyage in ballast from Rouen to Hull. There was a dense fog, and the Rosetta with her engines going dead slow, and her steam-whistle being duly sounded, was heading N.N.E. In these circumstances those on board of her heard the faint whistle of a steamship, which proved to be the Arago, on their starboard bow. The engines were at once stopped. About two minutes afterwards the Arago was seen two to three ship's lengths off, and five to six points on the starboard bow, approaching very fast. The engines of the Rosetta were at once put full speed astern, her helm hard-a-ported, and her steam-whistle blown three blasts, but the Arago came on without slackening her speed, and with the bluff of her port bow struck the starboard side of the stem of the Rosetta, and thereby did her great damage.

The master of the Arago said that he heard the first whistle of the Rosetta two or three points on his port bow, that in a fog it is difficult to tell to a point or two how a whistle in fact bears, that there is no certainty, and that the first whistle of the Rosetta gave him no idea where she was going.

Barnes, Q.C. and H. Stokes for the plaintiffs.—The Rosetta was proceeding at an immoderate rate of speed, and never reversed her engines. The Arago was entitled to hold on till she heard the second whistle. She was going at a moderate speed, and in such circumstances it has never been held that a vessel is bound to stop on hearing one whistle some distance off. The fact that our earlier whistles were heard is evidence of bad look-out.

Hall, Q.C. (with him Pike) for the defendants.—It was the duty of the Arago, on hearing our first whistle, to either stop or reduce her speed to as slow as possible. She in fact did nothing till she heard the second whistle.

Stokes in reply.

Sir JAMES HANNEN.—In this case those on the complaining vessel, the Arago, allege that she was off Dungeness on a course W. by S. ½ S. when the fog came on; that her speed was reduced to slow, which gave her about three knots an hour: and that in those circumstances they heard a whistle on her port bow. One question is, how broad on the port bow was it heard. They further allege that she answered that whistle, which proved to be the whistle of the Rosetta; that the Rosetta was then heard to be whistling nearer; that on the second whistle the Arago's engines were stopped; that on the Rosetta being heard again for the third time the Arago was put full speed astern, and her whistle blown three short blasts to show what she was doing; and that immediately afterwards the Rosetta was seen at one to two ship's lengths off bearing two to three points on the port bow, and that then the collision took place. The first question is, to what speed had the Arago reduced her engines in consequence of the weather setting in thick? It is clearly proved that no other order was given than that the engines should go slow, whatever that may mean. Two witnesses have given different statements as to what her real speed was, one speaking to twelve to fourteen revolutions, and the other fourteen or fifteen. It is evident that this is a mere estimate, or there would not be this discrepancy between them. But we have this fact, that slow may mean anything from twelve revolutions, which is the minimum which has been given, up to twenty-five, which is the maximum that has been given. We therefore have no assurance that in obedience to the order to slow the speed would be any slower than twenty-five revolutions would give her. Therefore I have no assurance of what was the exact speed at which the Arago was going. In this state of things a whistle is heard on her port bow. Her captain, in examination in chief, says he heard it two to three points on his port bow, but in cross-examination he puts it at four points. I however take it that his first statement is the one which is to be relied upon. We must now look to what his state of mind was in considering whether he did what he ought to have done. He says: "It is very hard to tell to a point or two how a whistle bears. We soon know if it is right ahead. I can tell when it is three or four points. There is no certainty. You can tell within two

It appears to me that the very simple question I have to determine is, what is the duty of a man in a fog who hears a whistle which he takes to be two or three points on his bow, but which he cannot be sure of within a point or two and can only guess, and when he has no idea where the vessel whistling is going, and when it does not appear to him that the very thing may occur which did occur, viz., that the vessel was coming straight to him. It is his duty to diminish the speed of his vessel to the utmost, in order that he may wait till his mind is better informed, and he has an idea where the other vessel is coming from, and where she is going to. There are two ways of doing that. He may reduce his speed until his engines are only just moving, or he may stop them. He need not continue to keep them stopped, but stop them sufficiently to diminish his way, and when he is beginning to lose steerage way, then and only then, put them on again, but as slowly as it is possible to do so. I therefore am clearly of opinion that in this state of things it was the duty of the master of the Arago when he heard this whistle at the angles which he describes—two or three points on his port bow, and not knowing where it was going—it was his duty then to diminish his speed to the utmost in one or the other of the ways I have mentioned. As a matter of fact he did neither till he heard the second whistle. I am therefore clearly of opinion that the Arago was to blame in that respect. [The learned Judge then found that the Rosetta was properly and carefully navigated.]

There remains only this further question which has been discussed at considerable length, viz., whether it is to be assumed that the Rosetta is to blame because those on board her did not hear any whistle from the Arago before the one for which she stopped. I desire to say emphatically that it is impossible to infer from the fact that a whistle is not heard in a fog, that therefore there is an inefficient look-out on the vessel which does not hear it. It depends on other circumstances. It is not to be inferred that, because from a particular distance at which in clear weather a signal could be heard it is not heard at that distance in a fog, there is a bad look-out. I have specially consulted the Trinity Brethren on this subject. They have given me the benefit of their large knowledge and experience, and they say that what may be called the vagaries of sound in a fog are of a most astonishing character. They tell me that sometimes where a signal has been given which it was expected would be heard at a distance of four or five miles, it is not heard at a distance beyond a couple of cable's lengths. I have heard illustrations given by men of the highest eminence in science of a more extraordinary character even than that. It cannot therefore be taken that, because a fog signal is not heard at the particular distance it is expected to be heard, there is a bad look-out. There is nothing in this case but the fact that those on board the Rosetta stopped her at the first signal they heard, from which I am asked to infer that they ought to have heard some signals which were given sooner. I utterly refuse to draw any such inference. There is nothing which would justify me in doing so. The result is, that I come to the conclusion that the Arago is alone to blame.

THE ZEUS. (a)

Jurisdiction—"Use or hire of any ship"—Demurrage — Loading agreement — County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Amendment Act 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 51), s. 2.

A loading agreement between a colliery company and the charterers of a ship, by which the colliery company undertake to load the ship in a certain time, and pay demurrage if that time is exceeded, is not an "agreement made in relation to the use or hire" of a ship within the meaning of sect. 2 of the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Amendment Act 1869, and hence the County Court has no jurisdiction on the Admiralty side to entertain a claim for demurrage against the colliery company.

THIS was an appeal by the plaintiffs from a decision of the County Court judge of Northumberland sitting in Admiralty.

The plaintiffs were the owners of the s.s. Zeus, and sued the defendants to recover 54*l.* 3*s.* 4*d.* as demurrage for detention of the said steamship.

The defendants were William Milburn and Co., the charterers of the Zeus, and the Ashington Coal Company, who had entered into an agreement with the charterers to load the Zeus with coal.

The charter was made between the plaintiffs and William Milburn and Co., and after providing that the Zeus should proceed to Blyth, and there load a cargo of coals for Cronstadt, contained the following clauses:

The vessel to be loaded in forty-eight hours, and discharged as fast as steamer can deliver (Sundays and close holidays excepted), the loading to be on conditions of colliery guarantee herewith, which owner agrees to accept and settle with the colliery agent for payment of any demurrage that may be due. The time for discharging to count from the vessel's being reported at the Custom House, and ready to deliver, and if the steamer is not despatched within the stipulated time, she is to lay five days on demurrage at and after the rate of 16*s.* 8*d.* per hour.

On the 19th Aug. 1887 the charterers entered into the following agreement with the Ashington Coal Company:

Bothal West Hartley Fitting Office, Newcastle, Aug. 19, 1887.—Messrs. William Milburn and Co.—We undertake to load the Zeus s.s. 1100 tons with Bothal West Hartley Best Coals in (48) forty-eight hours (Sundays, pay Saturdays, cavilling days, and colliery holidays excepted), after the said steamer is wholly unballasted and ready in Blyth to receive her entire cargo—strikes of pitmen or workmen, frosts and storms, and delays at spout caused by stormy weather, and any accidents stopping the working, loading, or shipping of the said cargo, always excepted. Time to count from 6 a.m. after berthed following the receipt of notice (in writing) of readiness by our staithman if the steamer is actually ready as above stipulated, and not before. Any time occupied in the shipment of bunker coals not to count. Any extra time consumed in loading cargo caused by the shipment of bunker coals to be allowed for in reckoning the time for cargo. In case the steamer is not ready to complete her loading when she has once begun, any time thus occupied in partial loading not to count. A telegram to be sent from the last port of sailing as soon as the steamer leaves; the same to be handed to the Fitting Office on its receipt. Despatch money per hour. Demurrage for each hour exceeded—usual. The date of loading to be 24th inst., and if the steamer is not ready within forty-eight hours thereafter twenty-four hours extra loading time to be allowed, and for every twenty-four hours the steamer is delayed beyond the forty-eight, six hours additional to be added to the time allowed for loading. Should any of the cargo be shipped during the above excepted periods, only the time actually occupied in shipping coals to be reckoned in computing the steamer's time of loading.—For the Ashington Coal Company, RICHARD LATIMER.

In these circumstances the Ashington Coal Company moved the County Court judge to dismiss them from the suit upon an affidavit setting out the above facts, and also stating in paragraph 4 as follows:

The only connection my said company had with the said steamship Zeus, in the month of Aug. 1887, was that they in furtherance of a contract between them and Messrs. William Milburn and Co., one of the above-named defendants, for the sale of 20,000 tons of coal, undertook to load the Zeus as a vessel nominated by the said William Milburn and Co.

The County Court judge thereupon dismissed the Ashington Coal Company from the suit on the ground that the County Court had no jurisdiction, the loading agreement not being an agreement made in "relation to the use or hire" of a ship within the meaning of the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Amendment Act 1869, and the claim for demurrage, which as against the Ashington Coal Company was founded on the loading agreement, not being a claim arising out of any agreement made in relation to the use or hire of any ship, or in relation to the carriage of goods in any ship.

The County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Amendment Act 1869, sect. 2:

Any County Court appointed or to be appointed to have Admiralty jurisdiction shall have jurisdiction and all powers and authorities relating thereto to try and determine the following causes: (1) As to any claim arising out of any agreement made in relation to the use or hire of any ship, or in relation to the carriage of goods in any ship, and also as to any claim in respect of goods carried in any ship, provided the amount claimed does not exceed 300*l*.

The plaintiffs now appealed from the above decision.

Sims Williams, for the plaintiffs, in support of the appeal.—The loading agreement was an agreement to pay demurrage, and is therefore an "agreement made in relation to the use or hire" of a ship within the meaning of sect. 2 of the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Amendment Act 1869. The words of the section are "in relation to the use or hire," and not "for the use and hire," and inasmuch as this was a statute to confer jurisdiction the words are to be given a wide and liberal interpretation. In the case of The Glendevon (not reported), the Divisional Court recently held that an agreement to pay demurrage was an agreement made in relation to the use or hire of a ship:

Gunnstad v. Price, 32 L. T. Rep. N. S. 499; L. Rep. 10 Ex. 69; 2 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 543;
The Alina, 42 L. T. Rep. N. S. 517; 5 Ex. Div. 227; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 257;
The Swan, 23 L. T. Rep. N. S. 633; L. Rep. 3 A. & Ec. 314.

J. P. Aspinall, for the Ashington Coal Company, was not called upon.

Sir JAMES HANNEN.—The question before us arises out of an agreement to deliver on board a ship a certain quantity of coals, and we have to say whether or no that agreement is one in "relation to the use or hire" of the ship. I think it would be a violent distortion to the natural meaning of the words of the statute to say that it has relation to the use or hire of the ship. It is merely an engagement to deliver coals at a particular place. But then reliance is placed upon the fact that it provides for the payment of demurrage. But we must look at what are the real facts, and also remember that demurrage is a word of different meanings. For instance, it is a word which has been transferred from carriage by ships to carriage by railway trucks, and a charge is made for their detention under that name. What it means here is, that it is a penalty to be paid if the contract is not performed within a limited time. But unless it can be established that the agreement is one in "relation to the use or hire" of the ship, the fact that the word demurrage is used has no bearing upon it. It is clear to my mind that, in the case which has been referred to, the facts were different from these. There there was a charter-party which did not relate to the use or hire of the ship, and the claim arose out of an agreement made in relation to that contract for the use or hire of the ship. Therefore it was an agreement made in relation to the use or hire of a ship. For these reasons I think this appeal must be dismissed.

BUTT, J.—I am of the same opinion. I do not think that these defendants were in any sense either the hirers or users of this ship.

THE PINNAS. (a)

Salvage—Work and labour done—Misconduct—Costs.

Where salvors have brought a damaged vessel into a position of safety they are bound, on demand by the owners, to deliver up possession of the salved property, and have no right to retain it for the alleged purpose of completing the repairs.

Semble, if the vessel is at the time of the demand in such a critical position that there may be risk of loss or damage to her unless the salvors are allowed to complete their operations, the salvors may be entitled to retain possession pending their performance.

THIS was a salvage action in personam by the Strand Slipway Company, shipbuilders at Sunderland, against the owners of the s.s. Pinnas, to recover salvage for services rendered to the Pinnas at Sunderland.

The facts alleged by the plaintiffs were as follows:—At about 2.15 a.m. on the 8th Feb. 1888, John Crown, the managing partner of the plaintiff firm, was informed that the s.s. Pinnas had shortly before stranded off the harbour of Sunderland. Crown at once proceeded to the pier, and then learnt that the Pinnas, a German steamship, of 1047 tons gross, had, whilst attempting to enter the harbour, struck and lay upon the s.s. Saltburn, which had stranded two days previously, close to the harbour entrance. The Pinnas was thereby holed in several places, and although she had been got clear, and towed further in towards the harbour, she had filled and sunk about 100 yards outside the entrance. Crown, having boarded the Pinnas, returned ashore and gave information of the casualty to Lorenzen, the English agent of the owners of the Pinnas. At about 8 a.m. Crown again went off to the Pinnas, and was then, with the concurrence of Lloyds' representative, employed by the master to salve her. He at once engaged the services of the steam-tug Rescue which was alongside, put a large number of men on board the Pinnas to make preparations for shipping pumps and rigging derricks to lift the pumps on board, and took the necessary steps to obtain steam-pumps and other salvage gear. Divers were also employed to fix pads on the places where the Pinnas was worst holed. Shortly after Crown had commenced to take the necessary steps to salve the Pinnas, Lorenzen, the defendants' agent, came on board and acquiesced in what was being done. On the pumps being got to the ship they were set going, and on the 10th the water was so reduced that the tugs Rescue, Hetton, and Pilot (which had been engaged by the plaintiff) succeeded in towing the Pinnas inside the harbour to the Polka Hole, where it became necessary to moor and beach her, as the water in the after hold was rapidly gaining on the pumps. The pumps were kept constantly working during the day, and the plaintiffs were engaged in stopping leaks. By 3.30 a.m. on the 11th the water in the vessel had been sufficiently reduced to enable the tugs Rescue and Snowdrop to tow her some fifty or sixty feet higher up on the beach, when further repairs were effected to the ship's bottom, and at high water on the same day she was towed from the Polka Hole into the South Dock Basin, and there delivered to the defendants' agent.

The plaintiffs alleged that they had necessarily incurred expenses in rendering the services, which amounted to 655*l.* 12*s.* 8*d.*

The defendants admitted that the plaintiffs performed certain work on and about the Pinnas, but alleged that the work was not of a nature or done under such circumstances as to entitle the plaintiffs to salvage reward. They also alleged that the work done by the plaintiffs was done contrary to their wishes and without their authority, and that the expenses incurred in performing the work were unreasonable and unnecessary.

It appeared that on the 10th, when the Pinnas had been towed into the Polka Hole, the defendants wished to take possession of her, in order that any further necessary repairs might be effected by workmen whom they had engaged for the purpose. The plaintiffs, however, refused to give up possession or to allow the defendants' workmen on board. On the 11th the defendants again sent workmen to the vessel, but the plaintiffs refused to allow them on board, and insisted on doing the necessary work.

On the 13th possession was given up to the owners of the ship upon their undertaking to be responsible for the pumps and other gear which had been hired by the plaintiff Crown, and in respect of which he had been obliged to give a guarantee for their safe return to their owners.

The value of the Pinnas was 3000*l.*

Barnes, Q.C. and J. P. Aspinall for the plaintiffs.

Sir Walter Phillimore and Dr. Raikes for the defendants.

Sir JAMES HANNEN.—I have already intimated my opinion in this case that the defendants have not succeeded in establishing that the work done upon the Pinnas was done without authority, and gives rise to no claim upon them. I think that position might, in the first instance, have been taken up by Mr. Lorenzen, the defendants' Sunderland agent, but that for prudential reasons probably he abstained from asserting what I think were his rights. I have no doubt that he did not authorise Mr. Crown, the plaintiffs' managing partner, to do anything for him. I have no doubt that what Mr. Lorenzen says is true, that he only intimated that he should be down there as soon as possible, and it is evident from what Mr. Lorenzen did that he intended to employ somebody else than Mr. Crown, viz., Mr. Simey. But when Mr. Lorenzen appeared on the scene, as he found that Mr. Crown was already in possession of the job, he did not assert his rights and allowed the operations to go on without objection. Therefore he must be taken to have acquiesced in Mr. Crown, on behalf of the Slipway Company, doing what was necessary to get the vessel into a place of safety. I think that what was done up to the time of the vessel being brought into Polka Hole was a valuable service, and was salvage. No doubt Mr. Lorenzen could have got the work done as well by anybody else, and as ordinary tradesman's work instead of as salvage. However, it was acquiesced in, and it must be treated as salvage until the time when the ship was brought into the Hole. I am advised that the vessel was then removed from immediate danger. It is, of course, conceivable that a state of things might have happened which would have exposed it to danger, but I am advised that there was nothing to show that that was probable. The vessel was no loner exposed to the violence of the sea, and it was in a protected place where it was subject to the rise and fall of the tide, but not to the violence of the waves. It was then seen that Mr. Simey's workmen could be employed to do all that remained to be done. Men were accordingly sent to take up the work that was necessary to bring her into dock, but Mr. Crown thought he had a right to exclude the owner from his own vessel, and insisted on doing what he thought necessary to be done up to the time of getting the vessel into dock. I have no hesitation in saying that I am of opinion that he had no such right. I can conceive the possibility of such circumstances that would morally excuse a man for saying, "You must not interfere; it is a critical moment, and if you interfere in the way you propose we shall lose the ship." Circumstances of that kind might arise, but in this case it was simply an assertion by Mr. Crown of his assumed right to complete the job, and on salvage terms and not on ordinary tradesman terms. I must add that I am greatly struck by the most improper manner in which Mr. Crown asserted his assumed rights. He not only refused on one occasion to allow the men to go on board and pump, but on another occasion he admits that he shook the ladder by which the men proposed to climb to the vessel. There being only four men he thought himself in a position to use violence which he says he hesitated to do on the previous occasion because there were then thirty men. I have already pointed out that such conduct would be first of all at the risk of a breach of the peace, and also would cause risk of loss of life. One of these men might have been shaken into the water, and there might have been no means of saving him. It was therefore a most outrageous proceeding on Mr. Crown's part. But, as I have said, I must deal with the case on the footing of his having up to this time rendered salvage services.

In order to render those services considerable expense no doubt had to be gone to, but the means adopted were of the most incautious kind, such as no reasonable man would have had recourse to if he had only his own interests at heart. But this was treated, as I am afraid salvage cases very frequently are, as an opportunity of extracting as much money as possible from the pockets of the owners and underwriters. Consequently we have such a specimen of charges as the item of 120*l.* paid for a diver. I am advised that there was nothing particular in what he did, and yet for it he brings in a bill of 250*l.* It is true it was cut down to 120*l.*, but even then it was regarded as a salvage service. In my view it was not a salvage service at all. The diver was only employed to do his ordinary business, and he had no right to make this charge. I therefore dismiss from my consideration the greater part of the charge for the diver, which I think was improperly paid. There are several other items that I need not go through in detail, because I must remind the learned counsel that though it has been held that items of expenditure by salvors may be given in evidence, they are not to be the subjects of discussion in the same way as if the action were for work and labour done. They may be dealt with generally by the court, but this case has been fought as if the claim were for work and labour done, which is not the case. The expenses in this case are items which are to be taken into account in considering what amount of salvage ought to be awarded, and from that point of view I am of opinion that a very considerable number of them cannot be supported. I have accordingly reduced them, in my mind, to a particular figure, and then considered what should be awarded for salvage services up to the time when Simey's men were refused permission to do the work they were sent to do. On the whole, I come to the conclusion, with the advice of the Trinity Brethren, that 700*l.* is the amount which should be allowed for the whole of the services, and as the defendants have paid into court the sum of 655*l.* 12*s.* 8*d.*, a balance of less than 50*l.* remains due. Having regard to the misconduct of Mr. Crown, I shall not allow the plaintiffs any costs.

Supreme Court of Judicature.

COURT OF APPEAL.

March 15, 17, and 26, 1888.

(Before Lord ESHER, M.R., FRY and LOPES, L.JJ.)

THE GERTRUDE.

THE BARON ABERDARE. (a)

Practice—Carriage of goods—Damage—Admiralty Division — Measure of damages — Interest — Judicature Act 1873, s. 24, sub-sect. 6.

Where an action is transferred to the Admiralty Division by consent of the parties for the assessment of damages, the registrar and merchants are entitled, in accordance with the practice of the Admiralty Division, to give interest in addition to the actual damages, even where such interest would not be given in the division from whence the action is transferred.

Where an action was brought in the Admiralty Division to recover unliquidated damages, which prior to the Judicature Act could not have been brought in the Admiralty Court, and the defendants made no attempt to have it transferred, the plaintiffs were held to be entitled, in accordance with the practice of the Admiralty Division, to interest on the amount recovered from the date of the loss.

Per Fry, L.J.: Semble, common law actions transferred without the consent of the parties from the Queen's Bench Division to another division are, under sect. 24, sub-sect. 6, of the Judicature Act 1873, to be determined by the same common law principles as would have been applicable to them in the Queen's Bench Division.

THESE were appeals by the defendants from two decisions of Sir James Hannen, confirming two reports of the registrar and merchants (57 L. T. Rep. N. S. 883, 884; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 224, 225; 12 P. Div. 204).

THE BARON ABERDARE.

March 15.—This was an action instituted in the Queen's Bench Division by the owners of the barque Baron Aberdare against the London and St. Katharine Dock Company, to recover damages occasioned by the negligence of the defendants in so mooring the Baron Aberdare in their dock that she broke loose, and came into collision with other vessels and barges, thereby doing them and herself damage.

The action was tried before a special jury, who gave a verdict for the plaintiffs, which was upheld by the Divisional Court and Court of Appeal.

The action was then by consent of parties transferred, under Order XLIX., r. 3, to the Admiralty Division for the assessment of damages by the registrar and merchants. The parties subsequently came to an agreement that 7500*l.* should be deemed to be the plaintiffs' damages without prejudice to the question whether interest was recoverable in addition to such damages. The registrar, having considered the question, reported that the plaintiffs, in accordance with the practice in the Admiralty Registry, were entitled to interest at the rate of 4 per cent. from the date of the loss to the time of payment.

The defendants thereupon appealed to the court to have the report varied by disallowing the interest. The Court upheld the report, and from that decision the defendants now appealed.

Hurst (with him Barnes, Q.C.), for the defendants, in support of the appeal.—This is an ordinary common law action in which the liability of the defendants has been determined by a common law court. The only matter done outside the Queen's Bench Division has been the assessment of damages. The measure of damages is therefore regulated by the practice of the Queen's Bench Division. The registrar of the Admiralty Division was in the circumstances of this case practically an arbitrator, and has therefore no power to give the plaintiffs more than they are entitled to by the practice of the courts in which the action was tried and determined. It is further submitted that the practice of allowing interest in the Admiralty Registry is unjust and unreasonable, and that this court being a court of appeal should overrule it. It is very desirable that there should be uniformity of practice in the different divisions with regard to the amount of damages recoverable by a successful plaintiff.

Hollams for the respondents.—An arbitrator may award interest; and, if so, why should not the registrar have the same power? The practice is a just and reasonable one, and only affords the plaintiff a restitutio in integrum:

The Northumbria, 21 L. T. Rep. N. S. 681; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 314; L. Rep. 3 A. & E. 6;
Smith v. Kirby, 1 Q. B. Div. 131.

The Court stated that they would give judgment after the case of the Gertrude had been argued.

The Gertrude.

March 17.—This was an action instituted in personam in the Admiralty Division, by the owners of a cargo of corn laden on the s.s. Gertrude, against Messrs. Gordon and Stamp, the owners of the said steamship, who were residents in England.

In the course of the voyage from New Orleans to Copenhagen the Gertrude and her cargo were lost, and the plaintiffs thereupon claimed damages from the defendants for breach of the contract of carriage.

The defendants delivered a defence, but ultimately admitted liability, the amount of the damages being referred to the registrar and merchants.

At the reference the plaintiffs claimed the invoice value of the cargo, merchants' profits, and interest at 4 per cent. per annum from the date on which the bills given by them in payment for the cargo were met. Upon this basis the registrar allowed 9800*l.* for value of cargo and merchants' profit, with interest as claimed.

The defendants thereupon moved the court to vary the registrar's report by disallowing the interest. Sir James Hannen upheld the report, and from his decision the defendants now appealed.

Barnes, Q.C. and Hurst, for the defendants, in support of the appeal.—The plaintiffs are not entitled to interest as allowed. This is a purely common law action, which prior to the Judicature Acts could not have been brought in the Admiralty Division. It is therefore governed by the practice of the common law courts, and not by that of the Admiralty Court. Inasmuch as the Admiralty Division now refuses to transfer this class of action to the Queen's Bench, a plaintiff has only to institute his action in the Admiralty Division to ensure his recovering more than he would be entitled to by instituting the action in the Queen's Bench Division to which it properly belongs. The Judicature Act was meant to affect procedure, and not the rights of parties, and therefore, if owing to the various divisions having concurrent jurisdiction a plaintiff brings a common law action in the Admiralty Division, the defendant ought not to be burdened with liabilities greater than would attach in the common law courts. It is also contended that the Admiralty Court practice of allowing interest is confined to pure Admiralty cases (The Northumbria, 21 L. T. Rep. N. S. 681; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 314; L. Rep. 3 A. & E. 6), and that the Admiralty Court ought to follow the common law rules in cases which are governed by common law principles:

The St. Cloud, Br. & L. 4.

There can be no Admiralty practice applicable to the present class of action, because it is only since the Judicature Act that the Admiralty Division has had jurisdiction to entertain them. Even assuming the practice applicable to this action, it is then submitted that it should be overruled as being unjust and unreasonable.

Stubbs (with him Sir Walter Phillimore), for the respondents, contrà.—The fact that this is a class of action more commonly instituted in the Queen's Bench Division does not make the Admiralty practice less applicable. The defendants took no steps to remove it, and are therefore bound by the practice of the division; even if it had been tried in the Admiralty Division by a judge and jury, the damages would have been referred to the registrar and merchants. [Fry, L.J.—What do you say as to sect. 24, sub-sect. 6, of the Judicature Act 1873? Might it not be argued that the result of that provision is that the Admiralty Division is bound to deal with the liability of the defendants in the same way as it would be dealt with by the Queen's Bench Division?] The Queen's Bench Division itself has acted upon the Admiralty practice in fitting cases, and allowed interest as in the present case:

The British Columbia Saw Mills Company v. Nettleship, 18 L. T. Rep. N. S. 604; L. Rep. 3 C. P. 499; 37 L. J. 235, Ch.; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 65.

Barnes, Q.C. in reply.

Cur. adv. vult.

March 26.—Lord Esher, M.R.—In the first of these cases the action might have been brought in the Admiralty Division, but in fact was tried in the Queen's Bench Division, and then after judgment there was a consent order transferring the case to the Admiralty Division for the assessment of damages. The registrar assessed the damages according to the practice of the Admiralty Court, by which practice interest is always given from the time when the loss takes place. In the other case, that of the Gertrude, the action was originally instituted in the Admiralty Division, though prior to the Judicature Act it could not have been instituted there, and the matter of damages was referred in the usual way to the registrar and merchants for assessment. In both cases objection has been taken to the Admiralty practice of giving interest in the way I have mentioned. It is admitted that this practice has prevailed in the Admiralty Court for many years, but it has been argued that it is a wrong practice, and that we, as a court of appeal, ought to overrule it. In the case of the Baron Aberdare one objection is, that as the action was tried in the Queen's Bench Division, the rule applicable at common law to the assessment of damages should be followed. In the case of the Gertrude it was said that, as it was a case which prior to the Judicature Act could only have been tried in one of the common law courts, it was tried in the Admiralty Division as a branch of the High Court of Justice, and by the Admiralty judge as a judge of the High Court, and that therefore the practice which belonged to the peculiar jurisdiction of the old Court of Admiralty was not applicable, and that the common law rule ought to be followed. The argument therefore is, that as in both cases damages by way of interest could not eo nomine be given in the Queen's Bench Division, the plaintiffs ought not to have recovered them in the Admiralty Division.

It has been also urged, as I have said, that this practice of the Admiralty Division should be overruled, and assimilated to that which exists in the Queen's Bench Division. That is an argument to which we cannot accede. There is nothing unjust in the mode in which the Admiralty Court has always assessed damages. I believe it is the mode of assessing damages that is followed in all Admiralty courts. So far from thinking it unjust, I am inclined to think it more just than the common law rule. It is a matter which was discussed by Lord Selborne in the case of The Khedive (7 App. Cas. p. 803), and to my mind he does not seem in any way to disapprove of this mode of assessing the damages. The question, however, does not really arise, for in the case of The Baron Aberdare, I have communicated with the President of the division, and he states that the case was transferred to and undertaken by the Admiralty Division on the assumption that the parties had agreed that it should go before the registrar and merchants to be dealt with according to their rule. It seems to me to be obvious that that was so, and that the parties instead of having the damages assessed by an arbitrator or an official referee, as would have been the case had they proceeded in the Queen's Bench Division, took advantage of the special knowledge of the registrar and merchants to get a cheap and satisfactory arbitration. That being so, one of the parties now turns round and says he will not agree to what has happened. That seems to me to be a breach of faith, and we would be allowing him to commit it if we permitted him to turn round and object to the mode in which the damages have been assessed. In the case of The Gertrude it was stated to us that the President and Butt, J. had made it known that they would not transfer such cases to the Queen's Bench Division, even if application were made to them to do so. It is said that for that reason the defendant did not object to the case being tried in the Admiralty Division, because he knew it would be tried there whatever he might do. But the President tells me that it never entered into his mind to say anything of the sort, and he is certain he never did, and he says on the contrary that, if either of the parties had taken objection, and had pointed out to him that the difference between the practice of the two divisions would lead to the assessment of the damages in a different way, he would have taken the matter into consideration with a view to the transfer of the case. The fact is, that the plaintiff brought the action in the Admiralty Division, and the defendant made no objection because both parties thought that an advantage would be gained by the consideration of the nautical questions being undertaken by the judge of the Admiralty Division, assisted by assessors instead of the case coming before a jury. Therefore I take it that both parties consented to have the case tried in the Admiralty Division according to the Admiralty practice, and it is not now open to one of the parties to object to that practice. I therefore think both appeals must be dismissed.

Fry, L.J.—These actions would properly have been tried in the Queen's Bench Division, and under sect. 24 of the Judicature Act 1873, if tried in another division without the consent of the parties, they should have been determined in that division in the same manner as they would have been determined in the Queen's Bench Division, that is, on common law principles. Had these actions been tried out in the Queen's Bench Division I have great doubts whether these judgments, so far as relates to the interest, could have been given in that division. But in both cases the parties have really proceeded by convention. They really intended in proceeding in the Admiralty Division to have their cases determined by Admiralty rules. In both cases the matter was argued in the Admiralty Court in a way which leads me to the conclusion that the parties were proceeding in that court by convention so as to avail themselves of its practice and procedure.

Lopes, L.J.—I am of opinion that the parties proceeded on the understanding that the Admiralty practice was to apply.

Appeal dismissed.

The Memnon. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE PROBATE, DIVORCE, AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION.

Collision—Crossing ships—Risk of collision—Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, arts. 18, 22, 23.

Where two steamships are approaching so as to involve risk of collision, and it is the duty of one to keep out of the way and of the other to keep her course, the latter is bound to comply with art. 18 of the Regulations as to slackening her speed or stopping and reversing, notwithstanding the fact that by continuing her speed may be the best and most seamanlike manœuvre for the purpose of avoiding a collision.

The steamship M. sighted the masthead and green light of the steamship S., distant about three miles, and bearing about two and a half points on the port bow. When the S. got within three ship's lengths of the M., still showing her masthead and green lights at a bearing of four points on the port bow, she suddenly starboarded, and although the M. immediately stopped her engines, a collision occurred. The Court, having held that the S. was to blame, further found that the respective courses of the vessels were such that had the S. kept her course and not starboarded she would have passed one and a half ship's lengths astern of the M., and that the best and most seamanlike manœuvre for the M. was to continue her speed as she did, but that there was in fact risk of collision before the S. starboarded, and that the M. was to blame for breach of art. 18 in not stopping sooner.

This was an appeal by the defendants in a collision action in rem from a decision of Butt, J. finding both ships to blame.

The collision occurred off the coast of Brazil at night, on the 20th Aug. 1885, between the plaintiffs' paddle-wheel steamer the San Salvador and the defendants' screw steamship the Memnon.

At the time of the collision the San Salvador was on a voyage from Estancia to Bahia, laden with a general cargo, and was heading about S.W. The Memnon was on a voyage from Bahia to New York with a cargo of coffee, and was heading about E. by N. ½ N. In these circumstances those on the Memnon sighted the masthead and green lights of the San Salvador, distant about three miles, and bearing about two and a half points on her port bow. It being the duty of the San Salvador, under art. 16 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, to keep out of the way, the Memnon kept her course. When the San Salvador got within three ship's lengths of the Memnon, still showing her masthead and green light, on a bearing of four points on the port bow, she suddenly starboarded, and, although the engines of the Memnon were immediately stopped, the San Salvador with her stem struck the port quarter of the Memnon.

Butt, J. found that the San Salvador was to blame for not keeping out of the way of the Memnon, and also held the Memnon to blame for infringement of art. 18 in not acting with her engines until the San Salvador starboarded.

The material parts of his judgment are as follows:

"Now, it is a fact that no relaxation of the speed of the Memnon occurred until she was within about three lengths of the San Salvador. The officer in charge of the Memnon, who gave his evidence very intelligibly, and who I have no doubt is a very competent seaman, and whose skill, ability, and reputation I hope will not be affected by the judgment I am about to give, says that having seen the masthead and green lights of the San Salvador at a considerable distance, about two and a half points on his port bow, he took her bearing by a compass which was at hand, and watched her carefully, and that as the vessels approached one another the bearing of the San Salvador altered, and broadened on his port bow till it got about four points on the bow, and it was about at that bearing on his port bow when within about three ship's lengths of him. He says that he judged by the broadening of the bearing of that vessel's lights that she would go under his stern, even if she did not port her helm, although it would have been rather a near thing, and he says, forming, as he did, that opinion, he thought it right to keep, not only his course, as the rule enjoined him, but that when the San Salvador got to the bearing and distance I have described on his port bow, he observed her starboarding, and he at once ordered his helm hard-a-port and gave an order to stop the engines. . . . That being the state of the case, I have thought it best to put to the Elder Brethren the question which the Court of Appeal in The Beryl (51 L. T. Rep. N. S. 554; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 321; 9 P. Div. 137) put to its assessors, and in doing so I have been careful to point out to them what I consider a distinction between the facts in The Beryl (ubi sup.) and the facts in this case—I mean the fact pointed out by Sir Walter Phillimore in his argument that, whereas it would have been a very difficult matter when the vessels approached in the case of The Beryl (ubi sup.) for the other vessel, the Abeona, to have kept out of the way, it would have been a comparatively easy matter, when the San Salvador and the Memnon got within a similar distance, for the San Salvador to have kept out of the way by a very slight touch of port helm. Pointing out that difference, and telling the Elder Brethren that they must make that allowance in favour of the officer of the Memnon, I put this question to them, 'Was the officer in charge of the Memnon justified as a sailor in supposing until he was three ship's lengths from the San Salvador that the San Salvador would keep out of the way, and could do so without difficulty?' They advise me that he was not so justified. As I do not dissent from that opinion, I shall, of course, act upon it, and I must, although with great reluctance, pronounce the Memnon also to blame."

The Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea:

Art. 16. If two ships under steam are crossing so as to involve risk of collision, the one which has the other on her own starboard side shall keep out of the way of the other.

Art. 18. Every steamship when approaching another ship so as to involve risk of collision shall slacken her speed, or stop and reverse if necessary.

Art. 23. In obeying and construing these rules due regard shall be had to all dangers of navigation and to any special circumstances which may render a departure from the above rules necessary in order to avoid immediate danger.

Sir Walter Phillimore and J. P. Aspinall, for the defendants, in support of the appeal.—Risk of collision never existed until the San Salvador starboarded when within a short distance of the Memnon, and, as the Memnon then stopped, there has been no infringement of art. 18. The courses were such that but for the alteration by the San Salvador at the last moment she must have gone under the stern of the Memnon. So long as that state of affairs continued there could be no risk of collision. [Lord Esher.—You must take into account the possibility that a ship so approaching you may do wrong.] True, in The Beryl (ubi sup.) this court decided that the article is applicable from the time when the circumstances are such that it is probable that risk of collision may be involved. But in that case it was seen for an appreciable time that the ship whose duty it was to keep out of the way was neglecting to do so. Here the San Salvador had a right to take any effectual steps she liked to keep out of the way, and until she starboarded her manœuvres were such as would have taken her clear. There was no duty upon the officer in charge of the Memnon to assume that the San Salvador would suddenly do wrong. As a matter of fact, had the San Salvador kept her course, to have stopped would have been to bring about collision. It is therefore clear that the action of the Memnon in keeping on was in the circumstances the best and most seamanlike manœuvre. If so, the Memnon was relieved from obedience to art. 18 by the terms of art. 23:

Myburgh, Q.C. and Raikes, for the respondents, were not called upon.

Lord Esher, M.R.—If we were not bound by the Act of Parliament, we are advised, and entirely agree, that, as a matter of simple navigation, the best thing for this officer to have done was what he did. But the Act of Parliament has tied the hands of sailors and has tied the hands of the court, and has said: "You must not do what a sailor would say is the best thing; you must do what the Act of Parliament tells you to do." It has been carried so far in the House of Lords as to say that, whatever may be the consequence, you must do what the Act of Parliament tells you to do. We must obey the House of Lords, and they have put that interpretation upon the statute. Then the question is, was there a time when this officer was not justified in supposing that there was any risk of collision? Was there not a time before he did what he did when he ought to have supposed that there would be, not a collision, but a risk of collision? These vessels were approaching one another in a very awkward position. I take it to be the most awkward position in which two vessels can approach, and which I still think, and which I shall probably always think, is a position which those who drew this Act of Parliament had not foreseen and provided for. The San Salvador was approaching the Memnon on the Memnon's port side, showing her green light on that port side, which I take to be about as awkward a position as can be. We have asked the gentlemen who assist us this question: "Supposing there were no Act of Parliament, was it safe and seamanlike navigation for the San Salvador to approach the Memnon, seeing her red light on such a course as to show to the Memnon her green light?" Their answer is what one might anticipate: It was not safe and seamanlike navigation for the San Salvador to keep on the course she did. She ought, if she had exercised proper seamanship, to have ported so as to show her red light, and to have gone astern of the Memnon.

It is true that the wording of the Act of Parliament is such that she may go ahead if she pleases. The Act of Parliament merely says that she is bound under the circumstances to keep out of the way. But, unless you have plenty of time to go ahead, you ought to go astern. But again, the Act of Parliament says you are not liable for trying to go ahead if you escape. If you ought to go astern to escape, you ought not to cut the thing as fine as you can. There may be circumstances which do not give you room, but surely if there is plenty of room you ought to go clear astern. The materiality of these observations in this case is, that the officer in charge of the Memnon, seeing how the San Salvador was behaving, knew that she was exercising her legal rights if she escaped him, but must also have known that she was being managed by a seaman who was acting towards him in a very risky manner. He knew the ship was not being navigated carefully, even if she was being navigated legally. We are advised that, if the San Salvador had kept the course which she was keeping without porting or starboarding, she would have gone a length and a half astern of the Memnon; that is, there would have been no collision. But is a sailor justified, when he sees another man navigating his ship in a hazardous manner, and though not illegally, yet in an unsafe way—is he justified in supposing that that man will only go to the extent he is then going in doing that which is risky and hazardous? He sees the man is doing wrong as a sailor. Is he justified in supposing that he will do wrong only so far as he is doing at that moment? The gentlemen who assist us agree that an officer is not justified in supposing that. If you see a cabman coming down Piccadilly letting his horse go from one side of the road to the other, you are not justified in supposing that he will not come nearer to you. You must suppose that something is wrong, and that he may run into you. So, if you see a sailor doing that which as a matter of navigation is wrong, but doing it so that he may only come within a length and a half of your stern, are you justified in assuming that he will in fact come no nearer to you? At that moment in our view there is risk of collision, and therefore we are obliged to agree with Butt, J., and say that, however hard it is upon this officer, and however clear it is that as a sailor he did no wrong, yet as a subject bound to obey the Act of Parliament he did not obey it, and therefore most unhappily his owners must take the consequences. The result is, that we must hold both ships to blame, and the appeal is dismissed.

Lindley, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. This is an illustration of the effect of attempting to navigate ships by Act of Parliament, the effect being to saddle a man, who has done nothing wrong in point of seamanship, with damages for a collision which, but for the Act of Parliament, could not be said to have been brought about by his act. I think it is pretty obvious that Butt, J. exonerated the officer from all blame as a seaman, but felt himself bound by these rules.

Bowen, L.J.—The question is, whether the officer in charge of the Memnon ought not, at some time prior to the time when he did stop, to have come to the conclusion that there was risk of collision, the San Salvador being so manœuvred as to show any reasonable man that there was risk of collision? Had the officer in charge of the Memnon any right to assume that from and after that moment the San Salvador would do what was right? It seems to me contrary to common sense to maintain that, when you are watching a person who is doing something that is wrong and unseamanlike, you have a right to assume that at some given moment he will cease that course of conduct and adopt another. If there is a reasonable chance of his not being right at the last, which is suggested to your mind by the observations of what he is doing, then there is a reasonable chance of danger.

Appeal dismissed.

HIGH COURT OF JUSTICE.

QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION.

Jan. 30, 31, Feb. 4, and Aug. 11 1888.

(Before Lord Coleridge, C.J. without a Jury.)

The Mogul Steamship Company Limited v. McGregor, Gow, and Co. and others. (a) Conspiracy — Combination of shipowners — Restraint of trade—Unlawful object—Illegal means —Public policy.

The defendant shipping companies and owners had combined together and formed a "conference" or "ring," and their agents in China had issued circulars to shippers there to the effect that exporters in China who confined their shipments of goods to vessels owned by members of the "conference," should be allowed a certain rebate, payable half-yearly, on the freight charged. Any shipment, at any port in China, by an outside steamer, to exclude the shipper of such shipment from participating in the return during the whole six-monthly period within which such shipment should have been made. The plaintiffs, who were owners of vessels in the same trade, had thereby suffered damage.

Held, that such combination of the defendants was not in restraint of trade; that the object of the combination was not to effect an unlawful end, and that the means used by the defendants to attain such end were not unlawful; and that, although the motive of the defendants was to exclude the plaintiffs from the trade if they could, and to do so without any consideration for the results of such exclusion to the plaintiffs, that was not enough to render the combination wrongful or malicious. Therefore, under the above circumstances, an action for wrongful combination or conspiracy to prevent the plaintiffs carrying on their trade would not lie.

Action tried by Lord Coleridge, L.J. without a jury.

The plaintiffs were a shipping company, incorporated in 1883, owning shares in certain steamships, viz., the Sikh, Afghan, Pathan, and Ghazee, trading between Chinese and Australian ports and London, and the defendants, McGregor, Gow, and Co., T. Skinner and Co., D. J. Jenkins and Co., the Peninsular and Oriental Steam Navigation Company, William Thomson and Co., and others, were shipping companies and owners trading in the same seas.

The facts appear sufficiently from the pleadings, which were substantially as follows:—

The plaintiffs, in their statement of claim, alleged that they had suffered damage by reason of the defendants, as and being owners of numerous steamers trading between ports in the Yangtse-Kiang river and London, conspiring together to prevent the plaintiffs from obtaining cargoes for steamers owned by the plaintiffs, from shippers, to be carried from ports in the said river to London, for reward to the plaintiffs in that behalf. That the said conspiracy consisted of a combination and agreement by and amongst the defendants, as and being owners of steamers trading as aforesaid, and having, by reason of such combination and agreement, control of the homeward shipping trade, pursuant to which shippers were bribed, coerced, and induced to agree to forbear, and to forbear, from shipping cargoes by the steamers of the plaintiffs. It was alleged, in the alternative, that the said conspiracy consisted of a combination and agreement by and amongst the defendants, as and being owners of steamers as aforesaid, pursuant to which the defendants, with the intent to injure the plaintiffs, and to prevent them from obtaining cargoes for their steamers trading between the said ports, agreed to refuse, and refused, to accept cargoes from shippers, except upon the terms that the said shippers should not ship any cargoes by the steamers of the plaintiffs, and by threats of stopping the shipment of homeward cargoes altogether, which threats they had the power and intended to carry into effect, did prevent shippers from shipping cargoes by the plaintiffs' steamers, and threatened and intended to continue so to do. The plaintiffs claimed damages, and an injunction to restrain the defendants from continuing the wrongful acts above mentioned.

In particulars delivered by the plaintiffs, they stated that the combination and agreement consisted of a combination and agreement by and amongst the defendants, as being a number of wealthy shipowners and shipping companies, formed and entered into for the purpose of creating a "conference" or "ring," and thereby acquiring the control of the shipping trade between China and England, and for the purpose of compelling their agents in China and Hong Kong not to load any cargoes on the plaintiffs' vessels, and for the purpose of preventing shippers and merchants from shipping by the plaintiffs' vessels, by imposing penalties on those who did so, by granting a rebate of 5 per cent. on the freight charged to such shippers as had not made any shipments for certain six-monthly periods by the plaintiffs' vessels, and generally for the purpose of boycotting and ruining the plaintiffs as shipowners, and of driving them out of the trade, thus preventing the plaintiff company from carrying on their lawful business as shipowners and carriers in the said trade. With this object the defendants had widely distributed among the China merchants circulars to the following effect:

Shanghai, 10th May 1884.

To those exporters who confine their shipments of tea and general cargo from China to Europe (not including the Mediterranean and Black Sea ports) to the P. and O. Steam Navigation Company, Messagerie Maritime Company, Ocean Steamship Company, McGregor, Gow, and Co., Glen, Castle, Shire, and Ben Lines, and to the steamships Copack and Ningchow, we shall be happy to allow a rebate of 5 per cent. on the freight charged.

Exporters claiming the returns will be required to sign a declaration that they have not made or been interested in any shipments of tea or general cargo to Europe (excepting the ports above named) by any other than the said lines.

Shipments by the steamships Afghan, Pathan, and Ghazee, on their present voyages from Hankow, will not prejudice claims for returns.

Each line to be responsible for its own returns only, which will be payable half-yearly, commencing the 30th Oct. next.

Shipments by an outside steamer at any of the ports in China or Hong Kong will exclude the firm making such shipments from participation in the return during the whole six-monthly period within which they have been made, even although its other branches may have given entire support to the above lines.

The foregoing agreement on our part to be in force from the present date till the 30th April 1885.

In May 1885 the defendants caused to be issued to the shippers and merchants in China another circular, as follows:

Shanghai, 11th May 1885.

Referring to our circular, dated the 10th May 1884, we beg to remind you that shipments for London by the steamships Pathan, Afghan, and Aberdeen, or by other non-conference steamers at any of the ports in China, or at Hong Kong, will exclude the firm making such shipments from participation in the return during the whole six-monthly period in which they have been made, even although the firm elsewhere may have given exclusive support to the conference lines.

In consequence of these circulars and the conduct of the defendants, the plaintiff company complained that they had been unable to obtain freights for their ships, and had been virtually driven out of the China trade.

The defendants, in their defence, contended that, as matter of law, the statement of claim disclosed no cause of action against the defendants, and they denied any conspiracy, as alleged, or that shippers were bribed, coerced, or induced to abstain from shipping cargoes by the plaintiffs' steamers; and they alleged the real facts of the case to be that, in the year 1884, an agreement or conference was entered into by the defendants, for working the homeward carrying trade in steam-vessels sailing from China by regular departures of such vessels during the years 1884 and 1885, and so affording inducements to merchants and shippers in and from China to support such vessels, and, in order further to induce such support, to give to such merchants and shippers as should ship only by the conference vessels a return or rebate of 5 per cent. of all freights paid by such shippers by such vessels; and that the vessels Pathan and Ghazee, belonging to the plaintiffs, were actually admitted to the benefit of this agreement for one voyage each in the tea season of 1884 from Hankow to London; but that the plaintiffs, in breach of their agreement, prior to the Hankow tea season of 1885, threatened the defendants that, unless their vessels were admitted to the privileges of the conference for the tea season of 1885, they would oppose and enter into competition with the conference vessels, and cut down and smash the rates of freight to such a low rate as would cause great loss to all the conference vessels; and that the defendants, declining to accede to the plaintiffs' demands, the plaintiffs did carry out their threat and so cut down the rates of freight that the defendants were compelled to accept rates of freight largely below the then prevailing rates.

The evidence, so far as is material to the decision, appears sufficiently in the judgment.

Sir Henry James, Q.C. and Crump, Q.C. (J. Gorell Barnes, Q.C., and Sims Williams with them) for the plaintiffs.—It is submitted that it is clear from the evidence that the defendants, acting in common, combined for the purpose of preventing the plaintiffs and others trading from China to Europe, and from and to ports in China, and that such combination inflicted direct loss on the plaintiffs, who were thereby prevented from earning money in the course of their trade, and from doing lawful acts. The action of the defendants amounts to restraint of trade, whereby the plaintiffs have been injured, and such action, if it had been committed by each of the defendants alone, would have rendered them severally liable to the plaintiffs. It is submitted, first of all, that a combination to do an unlawful act is an indictable conspiracy; secondly, that a combination to effect any result by unlawful means is a conspiracy also; and, thirdly, that an action lies under the name of conspiracy, but which is really what was formerly an action on the case, although those acts which constitute the cause of action may not be ground for an indictment. The word "unlawful" in this sense does not mean a criminal act, but it includes injury to an individual, such as inflicting upon him money losses, or preventing him from exercising a legal right, such as pursuing his trade; and also, under this word "unlawful," acts are included which produce results which are injurious to the public, as, for instance, acts in restraint of trade. In Hawkins Pleas of the Crown, vol. 1, p. 446, it is said that "there can be no doubt but that all confederacies whatsoever, wrongfully to prejudice a third person, are highly criminal at common law." "A conspiracy of any kind is illegal, although the matter about which they conspired might have been lawful for them, or any of them, to do, if they had not conspired to do it, as appears in the case of The Tubwomen v. The Brewers of London:"

Rex v. Journeymen Tailors of Cambridge, 8 Mod. Rep. 11, 12.

Lord Mansfield said, in the case of Rex v. Eccles (1 Leach Cr. Cas. 274): "The illegal combination is the gist of the offence; persons in possession of any articles of trade may sell them at such prices as they individually may please, but if they confederate and agree not to sell them under certain prices, it is conspiracy." The case of Rex v. Turner (13 East, 228) is certainly against this contention, but that decision has been frequently in later cases unfavourably commented on; for instance, in Reg. v. Rowlands (17 Q. B. Rep. 671), where Lord Campbell said that he had no doubt that it was wrongly decided. In a note to Clifford v. Brandon (2 Camp. at p. 372), Lord Campbell, the reporter, refers to Macklin's case, and Sir James Mansfield, C.J., in giving judgment, said: "If any body of men were to go to the theatre with the settled intention of hissing an actor, or even of damning a piece, there can be no doubt but that such a deliberate and preconcerted scheme would amount to a conspiracy, and that the persons concerned in it might be brought to punishment." Conspiring to do a thing is an offence, although the act itself, when done by one person, may be a lawful act:

Rex v. Mawbey, 6 Term Rep. 619;
Vertue v. Lord Clive, 4 Burr. 2476.

In Reg. v. Warburton (L. Rep. 1 Cr. Cas. Res. 274) Cockburn, C.J. said: "It is not necessary, in order to constitute a conspiracy, that the acts agreed to be done should be acts which, if done, would be criminal. It is enough if the acts agreed to be done, although not criminal, are wrongful, that is, amount to a civil wrong." A dictum of Erle, J. in Reg. v. Duffield (5 Cox Crim. Cas. 404, 429) is also to the same effect. The bonus given by the defendants in this case for not dealing with the plaintiffs is the overt act to prove that the object and intention of the defendants was to cause shippers to abstain from dealing with the plaintiffs. What the defendants have in fact done has been to impose a penalty upon persons dealing with the plaintiffs. Their object was to damage the plaintiffs, and that is a wrong:

Carrington v. Taylor, 11 East, n., at p. 574;
Keble v. Hickringill, 11 Mod. Rep. 75.

An action in respect of such conduct would lie by the plaintiffs as against each and every one of the defendants, apart from the combination:

Bowen v. Hall, 44 L. T. Rep. N. S. 75; 6 Q. B. Div. 333;
Lumley v. Gye, 2 El. & Bl. 216; 22 L. J. 463, Q. B.

This crime of conspiracy has been defined as consisting in "an agreement of two persons or more to commit a crime, or fraudulently or maliciously to injure or prejudice the public or any individual person:" (7th Report of the Criminal Law Commissioners 1848, p. 275.) The words "fraudulently or maliciously" in that definition are, it is submitted, unnecessary. A confederacy of two or more persons to accomplish some unlawful purpose, or a lawful purpose by some unlawful means, is indictable:

O'Connell v. The Queen, 11 Cl. & Fin. 155;
The State v. Buchanan, 5 Maryland Rep. 317;
Rex v. Cope and others, 1 Str. 144;
Rex v. Berenger, 3 Man. & Sel. 67;
Reg. v. Druitt, 16 L. T. Rep. N. S. 855; 10 Cox Crim. Cas. 593.

Moreover, apart from actual damage to the plaintiffs, the effect of the combination is to operate in restraint of trade, and so is opposed to public policy. For these reasons it is submitted that the plaintiffs are entitled to judgment.

Sir Charles Russell, Q.C. and Sir Horace Davey, Q.C. (Finlay, Q.C. and Pollard with them) for the defendants.—The cases referred to on the other side were cases of indictments for conspiracy, and not civil actions in the nature of conspiracy. It is submitted that there is no such proceeding at law as an action for conspiracy as such; in other words, conspiracy as such is not a cause of action. It is necessary, for such an action to lie, to show that a tort has been committed—a legal wrong resulting in legal damage. Conspiracy may be a ground for aggravation of damages, and may be evidence of malice where evidence of malice is necessary, but the gist of the act is in the legal damage resulting from a legal wrong. It is clear that the combination which is alleged against the defendants in the present action would not amount to an indictable conspiracy. In the cases of Rex v. Eccles (2 Leach's Cr. Cas. 274) and Macklin's case (2 Camp. 372) the indictments contain words such as "fraudulently, maliciously, and unlawfully confederated and conspired to injure the prosecutor in his business," and the gist of the offence was that the acts complained of were done maliciously; that is to say, done not for the legitimate protection of the defendants themselves, but "with the primary purpose of injuring the plaintiffs in their business." A sufficiently accurate expression of what the law is with regard to combinations is contained in the case of Reg. v. Rowlands (17 Q. B. Rep. 671). It appears from that case that Lord Campbell thought that Lord Ellenborough wrongly applied the law in the case of Rex v. Turner (13 East, 228), but not that the principle laid down by him was wrong. In Reg. v. Rowlands (17 Q. B. Rep. 671), Erle, J., in summing up, said: "I consider the law to be clear so far only as while the purpose of the combination is to obtain a benefit for the parties who combine—a benefit which by law they can claim. I make that remark because a combination for the purpose of injuring another is a combination of a different nature, directed personally against the party to be injured; and the law allowing them to combine for the purpose of obtaining a lawful benefit to themselves gives no sanction to combinations which have for their immediate purpose the hurt of another." When once the primary object of the combination is ascertained to have been for the purpose of obtaining a lawful benefit, that combination is not the subject of an indictment, although it may have the effect of obstructing or inflicting some damnum or loss upon the plaintiffs, and it cannot be said that the combination alleged to have been entered into by the present defendants would have been an indictable conspiracy. The case of Reg. v. Druitt (16 L. T. Rep. N. S. 855; 10 Cox Crim. Cas. 593) does not affect the broad proposition of the defendants, which is that, apart from fraud or misrepresentation, or physical interference, or intimidation, or molestation, the defendants can take any means which they think fit to secure to themselves the trade in any port or place. The combination of the defendants was for the purpose of protecting their legitimate interests, and was not for the primary purpose of injuring the plaintiffs, although indirectly it may have had the effect of consequent loss to the plaintiffs. The question to be decided in the present case is, whether the combination or agreement between the defendants is the proper subject of a civil action. It is submitted that no action will lie on the pleadings and evidence before the court, first, because no legal wrong has been inflicted upon the plaintiffs; and secondly, because whatever be the character of the acts of the defendants, they have occasioned the plaintiffs no legal damage. What is sometimes inaccurately called an action of conspiracy is really an action on the case against joint tort feasors, in which a legal wrong, resulting in legal damage, must be shown:

Savile v. Roberts, 1 Raymond's Rep. 374;
Skinner v. Gunton, 1 Saunders' Rep. 269;
Barber v. Lessiter, 7 C. B. N. S. 175.

In the case of Gregory v. The Duke of Brunswick (6 M. & G. 953) the court were of opinion that in point of law the conspiracy was material only as evidence of malice, but that in point of fact there was no other such evidence, and therefore the jury were directed that without proof of it the plaintiffs' case must fail. There is no case in which the allegation of conspiracy has ever been treated as anything more than aggravation or evidence of malice. The legal wrong, and not the conspiracy, is the cause of action:

Hutchins v. Hutchins, 7 Hill's Reps. of the Supreme Court of New York, 104.

The forfeiture of the rebate, promised by the defendants to shippers upon certain conditions, if such conditions are not carried out, is in no sense a penalty. The shipper is not entitled to the rebate, according to the contract, unless a certain condition is fulfilled, and so he is not deprived of the benefit of any contract which he would otherwise be entitled to have the benefit of. The case of Bowen v. Hall (44 L. T. Rep. N. S. 75; 6 Q. B. Div. 333) is a limitation of Lumley v. Gye (2 El. & Bl. 216; 22 L. J. 463, Q. B.) The latter of these cases broadly decided that, if a person is persuaded to break a contract of service, an action lies for the damage sustained by the loss of that person's services. Bowen v. Hall qualified that doctrine by adding that, in order to make an action maintainable, the persuasion must have been with a view to injuring the plaintiff and with a view to benefiting the defendant himself. The principle of those cases would not apply where there was no contract, and therefore they are not applicable to the present action, which is not an action for inducing persons to break their contract with the plaintiffs. The complaint of the plaintiffs really amounts to this: that, owing to the competition of the defendants, and owing to the terms offered by the defendants, they did not get as good a freight as they hoped to get for their cargoes. There can be no complaint that the plaintiffs were not allowed to load; no evidence has been given of any illegitimate acts or coercion by the defendants. It is therefore submitted that this action ought to be dismissed, and judgment entered for the defendants.

Sir Henry James, Q.C. in reply.—The circulars issued by the defendants establish that the combination of the defendants was, as a fact, to deprive the plaintiffs of their legal right of trading. The means used by the defendants were illegal. The circulars of May 1885 imposed a penalty or offered a bribe, and the rebate is not money paid by way of fair consideration. The object of the defendants was primarily to drive off all competition, and then to take the whole trade in their own hands, and so to take away the benefit of general trade from the public. The plaintiffs have a complete cause of action: the combination of the defendants is criminal; the means used are unlawful, and the damage to the plaintiffs is admitted. The combination is criminal, because it is in restraint of trade. The following cases were cited:

Reg. v. Duffield, 5 Cox C. C. 405;
Reg. v. Parnell, 14 Cox C. C. 508;
Ashley v. Harrison, 1 Esp. 47.

Cur. adv. vult.

Aug. 11.—Lord Coleridge, C.J.—This case has stood over, from causes not under my control, for much longer than I could have desired; but at last I am able to give my opinion on it. The plaintiffs are a company of shipowners, trading, or desirous of trading, between Australia and this country, taking China by the way, and desirous, in particular, of sharing in the transport of what has been called the "tea harvest," the time of which is in the late spring and early summer months, and the places for loading which, as far as this case is concerned, are Shanghai, at the mouth of the Yangtse-Kiang, and Hankow, a place about 600 miles up the stream of that great river. The defendants are a number of great shipowners, companies, and private partnerships, trading, for the most part, from this country to China, and from China to this country direct, and who, being desirous to keep this very valuable trade in their own hands, and to prevent, if they can, the lowering of freights—the ruinous lowering, as they contend—which must follow, as they say, from absolutely unrestricted competition, entered into what they called a "conference" for the purpose of working the homeward trade, by offering a rebate of 5 per cent. upon all freights paid by the shippers to the conference vessels, such rebate not to be paid to any shipper who shipped any tea at Shanghai or Hankow (the rebate was not confined to these ports, but I think that an immaterial circumstance) in any vessels but those belonging to the conference. The agreement between the members of the conference was entered into in April 1884, and during that year the now plaintiffs were admitted to share in its benefits. They were excluded in 1885. They refused to acquiesce in the exclusion, and a commercial conflict was the result, in which, as I understand, both sides suffered heavily; and it is for the loss which the plaintiffs say they suffered by the proceedings of the conference who, they allege, "bribed, coerced, and induced" shippers to forbear from shipping cargoes in the plaintiffs' vessels, that this action is brought. The question is, will the action lie? If I hold that it will, the damages are to be inquired into and settled elsewhere. It may, perhaps, be material—at all events, I desire to show that I have not forgotten—that there is, from the defendants' point of view, some moral and sensible defence for their conduct, whatever legal view may at last be taken of it. They run—or at the time of the conference they did run—steamers regularly all the year round from England to China, and back again, conferring, as they say, thereby a considerable benefit on the mercantile community of both countries. Further, they allege—and I think upon the evidence before me truly allege—that they could not do this at a profit, and that they would therefore probably cease to do it at all, unless they can practically monopolise the carrying trade of the tea at Shanghai and Hankow during the Chinese tea harvest. It is the large profit they make by keeping up the rate of tea freights—so to call them—which enables them to give a regular line of communication during the other months of the year. They contend, therefore, that what they did by the rules of the conference was not purely selfish, though, of course, self-interest guided them, but that there were real and large public benefits accruing to the inhabitants of China and England from the course which they pursued. I think there is ground for this contention, and it should be kept in mind. The complaint then is this, that the defendants unlawfully combined or conspired to prevent the plaintiffs from carrying on their trade, that they did prevent them by the use of unlawful means in furtherance of such unlawful combination or conspiracy, and that from such unlawful combination or conspiracy therefore damage has resulted to the plaintiffs. The defendants answer that neither was their combination unlawful in itself nor were any unlawful means used in furtherance of it, but the damage, if any, to the plaintiffs was the necessary and inevitable result of the defendants carrying on their lawful trade in a lawful manner. These are the contentions on the two sides. Is there anything in the law applicable to this subject in which they are agreed? In the statement of the law, as might be expected from the counsel who argued the case, there was often a close apparent agreement; but when it came to the application of it, the same words were evidently not always used on both sides in the same sense. I have carefully read over again and considered the arguments, and it seems to me it will be better that I should endeavour to state what I conceive to be the law upon the matter in dispute, and then apply it to the facts before me, which, as most of them depended upon written documents, can hardly be said to have been much disputed.

It cannot be, nor indeed was it, denied that, in order to found this action, there must be an element of unlawfulness in the combination on which it is founded, and that this element of unlawfulness must exist alike whether the combination is the subject of an indictment or the subject of an action. But whereas in an indictment it suffices if the combination exists and is unlawful, because it is the combination itself which is mischievous and which gives the public an interest to interfere by indictment, nothing need be actually done in furtherance of it. In the Bridgwater case, in which I was counsel, nothing was done in fact; yet a gentleman was convicted because he had entered into an unlawful combination from which, almost on the spot, he withdrew, and withdrew altogether. No one was harmed; but the public offence was complete. This is in accordance with the express words of Bayley, J., giving judgment in Rex v. Berenger (3 Mau. & Sel. 67). It is otherwise in a civil action. It is the damage which results from the unlawful combination, and not the unlawful combination itself, with which the civil action is concerned. It is not every combination which is unlawful, and if the combination is lawful—that is to say, for a lawful end pursued by lawful means—or, being unlawful, there is no damage from it to the plaintiff, the action will not lie. In these last sentences, "damage" means legal injury; mere loss or disadvantage will not sustain the action. Once more, to state the proposition somewhat differently with a view to some of the arguments addressed to me, the law may be put thus: If the combination is unlawful, then the parties to it commit a misdemeanour, and are offenders against the State; and if, as the result of such unlawful combination and misdemeanour, a private person receives a private injury, that gives such person a right of private action. It is, therefore, no doubt necessary to consider the object of the combination as well as the means employed to effect the object, in order to determine the legality or illegality of the combination; and in this case it is clear that, if the object were unlawful, or if the object were lawful but the means employed to effect it were unlawful, or if there were a combination either to effect the unlawful object or to use the unlawful means, then the combination was unlawful, then those who formed it were misdemeanants, and a person injured by their misdemeanour has an action in respect of his injury. If this statement of the law, clear, as I hope, be also accurate, as I believe, there is no need to enter into the historical inquiry as to how the action on the case in the nature of a conspiracy grew out of the old, and for many years disused, writ of conspiracy, which was very limited in its operation, and the judgment in which was followed by very terrible consequences. Those who desire to follow out an interesting but otiose inquiry may find all the materials for it in Fitzherbert, "De Natura Brevium," p. 260 (edit. of 1730, enriched with Lord Hale's notes), and in the judgment of Lord Holt in Savile v. Roberts, reported in various books, but best and most fully in 1 Raymond, 374, and very well in Carthew, 416, where especially the distinction between the ordinary judgment in an action on the case and a villanous judgment as explained in Jacobs' and Tomline's dictionaries is pointed out and insisted on. The whole law on this subject may be found in a most convenient form in the notes to Hutchins v. Hutchins, a case decided in the Supreme Court of the State of New York in 1845, and published by Mr. Melville Bigelow in his very valuable collection of Leading Cases on the Law of Torts, p. 207. (I cite from the Boston edition of 1875.) The first paragraph of the judgment of Nelson, C.J. in that case contains an admirable statement of the law; and Buller's Nisi Prius, 13*a* and 14, and Selwyn's Nisi Prius, 1062, may also be usefully referred to, as also the note to Skinner v. Gunton (1 Wms. Saund. 269, 6th edit. 1845), and "Termes de la Ley," title Conspiracy.

It will appear from the statement which I have given of what I believe to be the law that I cannot assent without some qualification to the propositions which were pressed upon me by the learned counsel for the contending parties in this case. For the same reason I do not propose to enter into a detailed examination of the many cases which were cited in argument. I believe that, fairly considered and rightly looked at, every case, including the much-canvassed Rex v. Turner (13 East, 228), will be found to be consistent with those principles, although there are isolated dicta of very great judges, probably in their very terms (if the terms are rightly reported) going beyond the law, certainly quite irreconcilable with each other. On one side are extreme cases such as Keble v. Hickringill, in which at first, in the 11 Modern, p. 75, Lord Holt doubted, but finally, at p. 131 of the same volume, gave judgment for the plaintiff; and Reg. v. Druitt (10 Cox Crim. Cas. 593), in which, unless he is misreported, Bramwell, B. said he thought a combination to treat a man with "black looks" was an indictable misdemeanour (a decision, if it be one, which might assuredly land us in unexpected and singular results), and the very broad dictum of Pratt, C.J. in Rex v. Journeymen Tailors of Cambridge (8 Mod. Rep. 11), that a conspiracy of any kind is illegal, though the matter they conspired about might have been quite lawful for them to do.

These are, perhaps, as extreme as can be found on one side. On the other is the questioned and possibly overruled case of Rex v. Turner (13 East, 228), decided by Lord Ellenborough, and Grose, Le Blanc, and Bayley, JJ. The view which Lord Ellenborough took of the facts of that case appears rather from his interlocutory observation at p. 230, than from his judgment on the page following. It is difficult not to acquiesce in the good sense of Lord Ellenborough's observations; and speaking, as I wish, and indeed ought to speak, with grateful respect of Lord Campbell, I do not feel so sure that Lord Ellenborough was wrong simply because Lord Campbell in Reg. v. Rowlands (17 Q. B. 686) says he has no doubt he was so. Be that as it may, and if it were that Lord Ellenborough and the court did wrongly apply the principles of law in Rex v. Turner (ubi sup.), those principles are clearly and forcibly stated, in accordance with what I have endeavoured to express, by Lord Ellenborough himself. The case of Rex v. Eccles before Lord Mansfield and Willes and Buller, JJ., and reported in 1 Leach Cr. Cas. 274, turned upon pleading; the motion was in arrest of judgment. The decision was, that after verdict the indictment was good; and the case itself is expressly commented on, explained, and distinguished by Lord Ellenborough in Rex v. Turner (ubi sup.). There were a number of cases, of which Wensmore v. Greenbank (Willes, 577), Lumley v. Gye (2 E. & B. 216), and Bowen v. Hall (6 Q. B. Div. 333), are examples, in which the question of conspiracy did not arise; but they were cited to show what cases of interference, with what sort of contracts, had been held actionable by the courts at the suit of one individual against another.

Now, all these cases bind me sitting here, and I neither question nor desire to evade their authority. But they do not help me much. I do not doubt that the acts done by the defendants here, if done wrongfully and maliciously, or if done in furtherance of a wrongful and malicious combination, would be ground for an action on the case at the suit of one who suffered injury from them. The question comes at last to this: What was the character of these acts, and what was the motive of the defendants in doing them? The defendants are traders with enormous sums of money embarked in their adventures, and, naturally and allowably, desirous to reap a profit from their trade. They have a right to push their lawful trade by all lawful means. They have a right to endeavour by lawful means to keep their trade in their own hands, and by the same means to exclude others from its benefits if they can. Amongst lawful means is certainly included the inducing, by profitable offers, customers to deal with them rather than with their rivals. It follows that they may, if they think fit, endeavour to induce customers to deal with them exclusively by giving notice that only to exclusive customers will they give the advantage of their profitable offers. I do not think it matters that the withdrawal of the advantages is, as it is no doubt, out of all proportion to the injury inflicted. It is a bargain which persons in the position of the defendants here had a right to make, and those who are parties to the bargain must take it or leave it as a whole. Of coercion, of bribery, I see no evidence. Of inducing in the sense in which that word is used in the class of cases to which Lumley v. Gye (ubi sup.) belongs, I see none either. One word in passing only on the contention that this combination of the defendants was unlawful, because it was in restraint of trade. It seems to me it was no more in restraint of trade, as that phrase is used for the purpose of avoiding contracts, than if two tailors in a village agreed to give their customers 5 per cent. off their bills at Christmas, on condition of those customers dealing with them, and with them only. Restraint of trade, with deference, has in its legal sense nothing to do with this question. But it is said that the motive of these acts was to ruin the plaintiffs, and that such a motive, it has been held, will render the combination itself wrongful and malicious, and that if damage has resulted to the plaintiffs an action will lie. I concede at once, and in the fullest way, that if the premises are established the conclusion inevitably follows. It is too late to dispute, if I desired it, as I do not, that a wrongful and malicious combination to ruin a man in his trade may be ground for such an action as this. Was, then, this combination such? The answer to this question has given me much trouble, and I will own to the weakness of having long doubted and hesitated before I could make up my mind upon it. There can be no doubt that the defendants were determined, if they could, to exclude the plaintiffs from this trade. Strong expressions were drawn from some of them in cross-examination, and the telegrams and letters showed the importance they attached to the matter, and their resolute purpose to exclude the plaintiffs, if they could, and to do so without any consideration for the results to the plaintiffs if they were successfully excluded. This, I think, is made out, and I think no more is made out than this. Is this enough? It must be remembered that all trade is, and must be, in a sense selfish. Trade not being infinite—nay, the trade of a particular place or district being possibly very limited—what one man gains another loses. In the hand-to-hand war of commerce, as in the conflicts of public life, whether at the bar, in Parliament, in medicine, in engineering, men fight on without much thought of others, except a desire to excel or to defeat them. Very lofty minds, like Sir Philip Sidney with his cup of water, will not stoop to take an advantage if they think another wants it more. Our age, in spite of high authority to the contrary, is not without its Philip Sidneys, but these are counsels of perfection which it would be silly indeed to make the measure of the rough business of the world as pursued by ordinary men of business. The line is difficult to draw, but I cannot see that these defendants have passed the line which separates the reasonable and legitimate selfishness of traders from wrong and malice. In 1884 they admitted the plaintiffs to their conference; in 1885 they excluded them, and they were determined, no doubt, if they could, to make the exclusion complete and effective, not from any personal malice or ill-will to the plaintiffs as individuals, but because they were determined, if they could, to keep the trade to themselves; and if they permitted persons in the position of the plaintiffs to come and share it, they thought, and honestly, and, as it turns out, correctly thought, that for a time at least there would be an end of their gains. The plaintiffs' conduct cannot affect their right of action if they have it, but it is impossible not to observe that they were as reckless of consequences in regard to the defendants as they accuse the defendants of being in regard to themselves, that they were as determined to break in as the defendants were determined to shut out, and that they made their threats of smashing freights and injuring the defendants a mode of rather forcible suasion to the defendants to let them into the conference. If they have their right of action, why, they have it; if they have it not, their own conduct disentitles them to much sympathy. On the whole, I come to the conclusion that the combination was not wrongful and malicious, and that the defendants were not guilty of a misdemeanour. I think that the acts done in pursuance of the combination were not unlawful, not wrongful, not malicious, and that, therefore, the defendants are entitled to my judgment.

Marine insurance—Concealment of material fact—Principal and agent—Concealment by agent from broker through whom policy effected.

The plaintiffs instructed a firm of brokers to re-insure an overdue ship. Whilst acting for the plaintiffs one of the firm of brokers received information material to the risk. The brokers did not inform the plaintiffs of the news, but communicated by telegraph with their own London agents in the plaintiffs' own name for the purpose of effecting the re-insurance. The London agents communicated with another London broker, who effected a re-insurance for the plaintiffs on the overdue ship. The plaintiffs' brokers did not charge any commission, as the negotiations for the re-insurance were not completed by them. The overdue ship had, in fact, been lost some days before the plaintiffs tried to re-insure, but neither the plaintiffs nor the London agents, nor the broker who actually effected the re-insurance, knew of such loss.

Held, that the policy of re-insurance was effected through the agency of the original brokers and was void on the ground of concealment of a material fact by the agents of the assured.

Blackburn, Low, and Co. v. Vigors (57 L. T. Rep. N. S. 730, 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 216; 12 App. Cas. 531) distinguished.

This was a motion by the plaintiffs in the action to set aside the verdict and judgment for the defendant, and to enter judgment for the plaintiffs, or for a new trial on the ground of misdirection, and that the verdict was against the weight of evidence.

The action was upon a policy on the hull and machinery of the ship State of Florida, underwritten by the defendant for 800*l.*, which was tried before Day, J. and a special jury, in which the jury gave a verdict for the defendant, and Day, J. entered judgment for him.

The facts were shortly as follows: The plaintiffs, who were underwriters and insurance brokers at Glasgow, insured the steamer State of Florida for 1500*l.*, from New York to Glasgow. She left New York on the 11th April 1884, and was due at Glasgow about the 25th April. Upon the 1st May the plaintiffs sought to cover their liability, and instructed Messrs. Rose, Murison, and Thomson, another firm of insurance brokers at Glasgow, to effect a re-insurance on the steamer for 1500*l.* Acting upon those instructions, the Glasgow firm telegraphed at 11.29 a.m. to their London agents, Rose, Thomson, Young, and Co., to effect the re-insurance; the latter sent back a message, reaching Glasgow at 1 p.m., that 20 guineas was the premium asked. Up to midday nothing was known either by the plaintiffs or the other Glasgow firm of the ship, except that she was overdue. At 12.30 p.m. on that day, Mr. Murison, a partner of the said firm, was informed in confidence, as it was stated, that a vessel had been reported to have been spoken having on board some of the shipwrecked crew of the State of Florida. On receiving the telegram at 1 p.m., the Glasgow brokers notified its contents to the plaintiffs, who said they would pay the 20 guineas; and at 1.19 p.m. Murison telegraphed in the name of the plaintiffs to his London agents to pay that amount. Other telegrams were received, showing that the London market price had gone up to 25 and 30 guineas, and the plaintiffs sent off a telegram to the London brokers to effect the insurance at 25 guineas, which was done through the agency of another firm of brokers to the amount of 800*l.* The Glasgow brokers did not charge any commission for effecting this re-insurance, as it had not been completed by them. The defendant, with whom the re-insurance was effected, on learning the above facts declined to pay.

Day, J. at the trial left two questions to the jury. First, were Rose, Murison, and Thomson, the Glasgow brokers, employed to effect an insurance? Next, was the insurance, the subject-matter of the action, effected through their agency? The jury answered both questions in the affirmative, and Day, J. directed that a verdict and judgment should be entered for the defendant.

Sir Charles Russell, Q.C., Cohen, Q.C., and Hollams, for the plaintiffs.—The plaintiffs are entitled to judgment on the facts of this case. The summing-up of the learned judge was faulty and ambiguous. This case cannot in principle be distinguished from that of Blackburn, Low, and Co. v. Vigors (57 L. T. Rep. N. S. 730; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 216; 12 App. Cas. 553). The distinction, no doubt, on which the defendant relies is that in the former case the firm of Rose, Murison, and Thomson, of Glasgow, one of whom possessed the concealed information, did not place the plaintiffs in communication with Roxburgh, Currie, and Co., through whom the re-insurance was effected, whereas in the present that same Glasgow firm did by a telegram, though sent in the name of the plaintiffs, bring the plaintiffs into communication with Rose, Thomson, Young, and Co., of (a) Reported by W. P. Eversley, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

London, through whom the present re-insurance was effected. The Glasgow firm and the London firm were independent firms, and neither the plaintiffs nor the London firm had any knowledge of the concealed facts. The last act of the Glasgow firm which brought the plaintiffs and the London firm into direct communication was a telegram conveying the plaintiffs' authority to re-insure at 20 guineas premium. This authority was never acted upon. Now, there is no pretence for saying that the Glasgow firm had any general authority to effect re-insurance on behalf of the plaintiffs. The latter, without any intervention of the Glasgow firm, gave the London firm a different and independent authority —namely, to re-insure at a premium of 25 guineas. It was under this authority only that the present policy was effected; and the court cannot look beyond the information possessed by the plaintiffs and the London firm—the plaintiffs' agents to effect the policy. The preceding employment of the Glasgow firm is immaterial. There was never any means of communication between the Glasgow firm and the defendant. An insurance agent cannot conceal facts from an underwriter whom he does not know. The case is the same as if the London firm, in reply to the telegram sent by the Glasgow firm in the plaintiffs' name, had telegraphed that they were unable to effect the reinsurance in London, and the plaintiffs had then gone up to London and set about the re-insurance on their own account. The proper question for the jury was, who effected this re-insurance? The only answer was, the London firm. The reasoning of the House of Lords in Vigors' case applies equally to this case. None of the learned lords in that case, nor Day, J. in this, thought there was any legal obligation on Mr. Murison to communicate his knowledge to the plaintiffs. Indeed, Lord Macnaghten points out the danger of extending the doctrine of constructive notice so as to affect the plaintiffs in such circumstances with knowledge of the concealed information.

Sir R. E. Webster, Q.C. (A.-G.) and Gorell Barnes, Q.C., for the defendant.—It is submitted that the finding was right, and the direction correct. The material difference between the present case and that of Blackburn, Low, and Co. v. Vigors (ubi sup.) is, that here the reinsurance was effected through the Glasgow firm, which possessed, in the person of Mr. Murison, the concealed information, while in Vigors' case it was effected through a totally different firm and without the intervention of the Glasgow firm. This difference was insisted on on behalf of the plaintiffs in Blackburn, Low, and Co. v. Vigors (ubi sup.). Here the re-insurance was effected by the Glasgow firm of Rose, Murison, and Thomson. As the risk was intended by the plaintiffs to be covered in London, and they were in Glasgow, the firm of Rose, Murison, and Thomson employed as their sub-agents the London firm of Rose, Thomson, Young, and Co., who, in their turn, employed the insurance broker in London, who actually effected the policy. The telegram in the plaintiff's name was a mere stratagem of Mr. Murison, of the Glasgow firm, in order to save the policy about to be obtained from being void at law; and the negotiation which followed only contained the original negotiation. Day, J. rightly asked the jury the question whether the subsequent negotiation was a new contract, or whether it was one built on the old negotiation. The instruction by the plaintiffs to the London firm could not be a new and independent instruction, unless the plaintiffs knew that Rose, Murison, and Thomson were retiring from the negotiations, which they could not know. The alteration in the rate of premium to be offered did not constitute a fresh and independent contract; and, apart from this alteration, there could be no pretence for treating the whole negotiation which led to the effecting the policy sued upon as being anything but one transaction.

Sir C. Russell, Q.C. in reply.

Cur. adv. vult.

June 4.—The judgment of the court was delivered by

POLLOCK, B.—This is an action upon a policy on the hull and machinery of the ship State of Florida, underwritten by the defendant for 800*l*. At the trial, which took place before Day, J. and a special jury of London, it was proved that Messrs. Blackburn, Low, and Co., who were underwriters and insurance brokers at Glasgow, insured the steamer State of Florida for 1500*l*., from New York to Glasgow. She left New York on the 11th April 1884 and was due at Glasgow about the 25th April. Upon the 1st May Messrs. Blackburn, Low, and Co. being desirous of covering their liability instructed Messrs. Rose, Murison, and Thomson, another firm of insurance brokers at Glasgow, to effect a re-insurance upon the State of Florida for 1500*l*. Acting upon these instructions Messrs. Rose, Murison, and Thomson, at 11.29 a.m., telegraphed to their agents Messrs. Rose, Thomson, Young, and Co., who were insurance brokers in London, as follows: "Blackburn, Low wish to reduce Florida lines, cover for them 1500*l*. at 15 guineas net." In reply to this they received a telegram sent at 12.35, and received at 1 p.m., from Messrs. Thomson, Young, and Co.: "State Florida 20 guineas, paying freely and market very stiff, likely to advance more before day is out." Up to midday nothing was known either by Blackburn, Low, and Co. or Rose, Murison, and Thomson, of the State of Florida, except that she was overdue. About 12.30, Mr. Murison, a partner in the firm of Rose, Murison, and Thomson had an interview with the manager of the State Line Company, who owned the State of Florida, and he informed Mr. Murison in confidence that his directors in London had received intelligence that the City of Rome steamer on her way to Liverpool had seen a vessel having on board some of the shipwrecked crew of the State of Florida. Upon receiving the last telegram at 1 p.m., Messrs. Rose and Co. communicated its contents to Messrs. Blackburn, Low, and Co., who said they might pay 20 guineas. Mr. Murison considered that as he had received the intelligence about the shipwrecked crew in confidence he was not entitled to communicate it to Messrs. Blackburn, Low, and Co., but afterwards, at 1.19, he telegraphed in Blackburn, Low, and Co.'s name to Rose, Thomson, Young, and Co.: "Florida, pay 20 guineas." In reply to this the latter firm at 2.14 telegraphed direct to Blackburn, Low, and Co., "State Florida, market now worked out at 20 guineas; no chance under 25 guineas and for to-day only." This was received by Blackburn, Low, and Co., at 2.29, and at 3.2 they replied "State Florida, if you cannot do better pay 25 guineas and wire instanter." To this Messrs. Rose, Thomson, Young, and Co. replied at 4.37: "State Florida done, 800, 25 guineas, no chance more to-day under 30 guineas." As the negotiations for this insurance were not completed by Messrs. Rose, Murison, and Thomson, they did not charge any commission to the plaintiffs. After the receipt of the last telegram, Messrs. Rose, Thomson, Young, and Co. communicated with another London broker, who effected the insurance in question with the defendants, and they, upon becoming acquainted with the above facts, declined to pay.

At the conclusion of the case, Day, J., after calling the attention of the jury to the material facts, directed them as follows: "Now, the question I leave to you is, first of all, were Rose and Co. employed to effect an insurance? I do not mean whether their authority was limited to the insurance of 15 guineas, the first telegram, because they were afterwards, as we know, authorised to go to 20 guineas, but were they generally authorised to act on behalf of the plaintiff? The next question is, was this insurance effected through their agency? I think it will make it abundantly clear if I substitute for "their" the word "that," and relieve it of all possible ambiguity. Was this particular insurance effected through that agency? Who introduced the London firm? Rose and Co., it is true, are the people who go and see the underwriters in London, it may be still acting as the correspondents or agents of Rose and Co. of Glasgow. Was it effected through that agency? Did Rose and Co. of Glasgow put the matter in the hands of Rose and Co. of London for the purpose of carrying out the insurance effected through their agency? Was it all one negotiation, or was it really taken out of the hands of Rose and Co. of Glasgow and put into the hands of the plaintiffs, irrespective of Rose and Co. of Glasgow? Was it taken out of their hands and, as it were, a new negotiation commenced, or was the policy effected in pursuance of the original agency? Was it all one transaction or not? That is what I substantially mean by the question I put to you. In the second place, was the insurance effected through that agency?" The jury found a verdict in the affirmative as to both questions, and the learned judge thereupon directed that a verdict and judgment should be entered for the defendant with costs. The plaintiffs moved that the verdict and judgment should be set aside, and that judgment might be entered for the plaintiffs or a new trial had, on the ground that the verdict was against the weight of evidence, and that the learned judge at the trial ought to have directed the jury that Rose, Murison, and Thomson were not the agents of the plaintiffs to effect the insurance in question, and that the non-communication of material information within the knowledge of Rose, Murison, and Thompson, but not known to the plaintiffs or their brokers, was not a concealment which would affect the policy, and ought to have directed judgment to be entered for the plaintiffs upon the facts proved or admitted at the trial. These questions are so closely connected that the better mode of dealing with them will be to consider whether taken as a whole the true conclusion of law and fact has been arrived at. For this purpose it will be convenient to follow the events in order of time. Starting with the telegram of the 1st May, 11.29 a.m., there can be no doubt that when that was sent Messrs. Rose, Murison, and Thomson were agents for Messrs. Blackburn, Low, and Co. to effect the insurance proposed thereby, and that any knowledge by them of facts material to the risk would be equivalent to a knowledge by their principals, and would vitiate any insurance based upon such proposal. Up to this time, however, both principals and agents were ignorant of any such facts. Before any further step was taken Rose, Murison, and Co. became aware of the report brought by the City of Rome. They thereupon determined to go no further with the matter in their own names, but having received the intelligence in confidence they did not communicate it to Messrs. Blackburn, Low, and Co. What they did was this. Having previously obtained the authority of Blackburn, Low, and Co. to go as far as 20 guineas, they telegraphed in Blackburn, Low, and Co.'s own name to the London brokers, who answered direct to Blackburn, Low, and Co. that there was no chance under 25 guineas, upon which Blackburn, Low, and Co. telegraphed back "Pay 25 guineas," and upon this the policy in question was effected by the London brokers through the agency of another firm of brokers. Under these circumstances it is clear that up to the time when Messrs. Rose, Murison, and Co. received the last telegram addressed to themselves they were the agents for the plaintiffs to effect not merely a re-insurance but the particular re-insurance which the plaintiffs had ordered, namely, upon the ship State of Florida for 1500*l*., and that any knowledge possessed by them which was material to the risk would be equivalent to a knowledge by the plaintiffs themselves. It seems to be equally clear that the agents, being incapacitated from continuing the negotiation, in the sense that no valid policy could be founded upon it, they could not put themselves in a better position by telegraphing in the name of their principals instead of their own name. Having so telegraphed, and the answer having been sent to the principals, what is the position of the latter? That they might have effected a valid policy by a fresh and independent negotiation, carried on through another agent, is established by the decision of the House of Lords in the case of Blackburn, Low, and Co. v. Vigors (ubi sup.). And for the purposes of this case it may be further conceded that the principals might themselves have opened a new and independent negotiation with the brokers in London by giving a fresh order for the policy. This, however, was not done. Messrs. Blackburn, Low, and Co. merely telegraphed to Rose, Thomson, Young, and Co.: "State of Florida, if you cannot do better pay 25 guineas." And upon the basis of this telegram the negotiation continues. The offer is put forward at the increased premium; this is accepted, and the policy in question is signed.

Upon this state of facts the question arises, was the original negotiation given up and a new and distinct negotiation entered upon, or was it a mere handing over by the agents to their principals of an existing negotiation, in order that the principals might take it up at the point where the agents left off, and continue it until it resulted in a contract? This is practically the question which was left by Day, J. to the jury, and they have found that the latter is the true view of what occurred. In considering this finding it is important to remember that the only instructions as to the name of the ship and the amount to be insured were those contained in the first telegram from the Glasgow agents to the London agents. Without these no proposals could have been forwarded. They are never mentioned again by the plaintiffs, and the effect is the same as if such telegram had reiterated all that had gone before. This also affords an answer to one of the arguments pressed on behalf of the plaintiffs. A merchant, it was said, who sends his agent into a market on Monday with a limited authority as to price is not prohibited from going into the same market on Tuesday and bidding higher by reason of his agent having acquired some information, such as that the goods were stolen, which would prevent any bargain which he might make resulting in a valid contract. But the reason of this is that the principal in the proposed case only employed the agent pro hâc vice on the Monday, and when he himself went into the market on Tuesday he commenced independent operations, in no way based upon the earlier exertions of his agent. In the present case the name of the vessel, the amount to be insured, and the whole object of the bargaining were the same, and the only change was in the advanced premium, so that the plaintiffs not merely continued a negotiation begun by their agents, but they availed themselves of it by using and adopting what they had done up to a certain point. It is truly said, no doubt, that when once the agents ceased to negotiate their authority was at an end; but this leaves untouched the position that the negotiation was handed over to the principals to complete and that the London brokers were entitled to treat the matter as one entire transaction. It was also urged that the negotiation was not vitiated by the fact that the principal made use of the information as to the name of the ship and the amount of the policy. As this was done merely by way of reference, had there been no question of agency this would be true. If all that the plaintiffs had done had been to telegraph to the London agents: "Effect for me the same insurance that you have effected for A. B.," with whom the plaintiffs had had no dealings, the reference to A. B. would not vitiate the ultimate policy, because A. B. improperly withheld information which he ought to have communicated. The distinction, however, between this and adopting the previous acts of an agent and carrying out a contract in part based upon them is obvious, as was said by Lord Watson in Blackburn, Low, and Co. v. Vigors (12 App. Cas. p. 541): "When an agent to insure is brought into contact with an insurer the latter transacts on the footing that the agent has disclosed every material circumstance within his personal knowledge, whether it be known to his principal or not." When the matter was taken up by the plaintiffs themselves, and the further negotiations were carried on in their own name, the right of the London agents, founded upon the negotiation as a whole, to act upon the assumption referred to does not seem to have been displaced. Another argument much urged by the plaintiffs' counsel was rested upon the assertion that all that passed before the first telegram by the plaintiffs amounted merely to offers and negotiation, and that, in considering the right of the defendant, the only question which should have been submitted to the jury was, What ought the London brokers to have communicated to the defendant or to the intermediate broker by whom the policy was ultimately procured? The answer to this is, that, if the negotiation by the plaintiffs and the Glasgow brokers was one and the same—as the jury have found it to be—the argument fails, because in all cases where a policy has been held to be avoided by reason of concealment the concealment occurs some time before the actual policy is signed. It is the negotiation that is tainted, and the contract is void because it is founded upon the negotiation; and through however many hands the offers of an insurance may pass, if there be a concealment by the assured or his agents, the policy is voided. If this view which we have taken of the facts and of the law which arises out of them be the true view, this judgment in no way conflicts with the decision in Blackburn, Low, and Co. v. Vigors (ubi sup.) in the House of Lords. Although the opinion was expressed in that case that it was not the duty of the agents to communicate to their principals the information which they had received, we take that opinion as applying to the particular facts before the House, which showed that before the negotiation for the policy sued upon had commenced all connection of the plaintiffs with their former brokers had ceased, and we cannot suppose it would be intended to apply to the facts proved in the present case, which showed that so far from the connection with the principals and their brokers ceasing, the brokers used the names of the principals to continue the negotiations, and the principals adopted this act and themselves continued and carried out what their brokers had commenced. It is not for us to enter upon the question whether Messrs. Rose, Murison, and Thomson acted contrary to the rule of morality in failing to communicate to Messrs. Blackburn, Low, and Co. the information which they had received. Whatever may have been their moral duty, the fact that the information was given in confidence could not affect or lessen the legal rights of the defendant, and could not justify Messrs. Rose, Murison, and Thomson in continuing the negotiation in the plaintiffs' name, and enabling the plaintiffs themselves to continue it in innocence of that information. To hold otherwise would be to afford a great temptation to all brokers who may be placed in the same or a similar position, and would cut down to an important extent the rule as to good faith which has hitherto been applied by our courts and by commercial usage to the contract of insurance. We think that the summing-up and verdict were correct; therefore, the verdict and judgment for the defendant must stand, and the motion must be dismissed with costs.

County Court—Admiralty jurisdiction—"Damage by collision"—Damage to machine on land by mainsail gear of sailing barge—Whether such damage is "damage by collision"—County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 71), s. 3, sub-sect. 3—County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Amendment Act 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 51), s. 4.

Sect. 3, sub-sect. 3, of the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868, gives a County Court, having Admiralty jurisdiction, jurisdiction to try and determine: "As to any claim for damage to cargo or damage by collision—any cause in which the amount claimed does not exceed three hundred pounds"; and by the 4th section of the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Amendment Act 1869, this jurisdiction is extended to "all claims for damage to ships, whether by collision or otherwise, when the amount claimed does not exceed three hundred pounds." A claim was made in a County Court having Admiralty jurisdiction, in respect of an injury to a pile-driving machine, used at a wharf on the bank of the river, which had been fouled and injured by the mainsail gear of a sailing barge, while the barge was sailing in the river Thames near Blackwall.

Held, that the damage in question was not "damage by collision" within the meaning of sect. 3, sub-sect. 3. of the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868, and that the County Court had no jurisdiction.

APPLICATION under the 43rd section of the County Courts Act 1856 (19 & 20 Vict. c. 108), for a rule calling upon the judge of the City of London Court to show cause why he should not entertain a cause for "damage by collision," within sect. 3, sub-sect. 3, of the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 71).

The affidavit in support of the application stated that the claim was made in respect of an injury to a pile-driving machine, the property of the plaintiff, which was being used at a wharf on the bank, and which had been fouled and injured by the mainsail gear of the sailing barge Kate, of which the defendant was the owner, while the barge was sailing in the Blackwall Reach of the Thames.

The learned judge of the City of London Court held that the alleged injury was not "damage by collision" within the meaning of the Act, and that therefore he had no jurisdiction to entertain the claim.

By the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 71), s. 3, sub-sect. 3, it is provided:

Any County Court having Admiralty jurisdiction shall have jurisdiction, and all powers and authorities relating thereto, to try and determine, subject and according to the provisions of the Act, the following causes (in the Act referred to as Admiralty causes), amongst others: "As to any claim for damage to cargo, or damage by collision—any cause in which the amount claimed does not exceed 300*l*."

And by sect. 4 of the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Amendment Act 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 51), it is provided:

The 3rd section of the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868 shall extend and apply to all claims for damage to ships, whether by collision or otherwise, when the amount claimed does not exceed 300*l*.

Edward Pollock in support of the application.—I submit that this case comes within the Admiralty jurisdiction of the County Courts. The facts set out in the affidavit show that there was damage, and that that damage was the result of "collision." The injury to a pier or other object on shore by a vessel in the water constitutes a "damage by collision" within the meaning of sect. 3, sub-sect. 3, of the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868. This is extended, by the 4th section of the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Amendment Act 1869, "to all claims for damage to ships, whether by collision or otherwise." As this section extends the jurisdiction to damage to ships, it may fairly be assumed that the former Act applies to any damage caused by ships, and that the Legislature intended that, as the earlier Act applied to damage, that is to any damage, caused by ships, this liability should be extended by the later Act to any damage to ships. In the case of The Malvina (8 L. T. Rep. N. S. 403; 9 Jur. N. S. 527; 11 W. R. 576; 1 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 218, 341; Lush. 493) the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council held that the Court of Admiralty had jurisdiction (under the 7th section of the 24 Vict. c. 10), in cases of damage by collision between a barge and a seagoing vessel, and they condemned the Malvina for sinking a barge in the Thames near Blackwall.

WILLS, J.—I am of opinion that this rule should be refused. The jurisdiction that has been conferred on certain County Courts by the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868 is essentially an Admiralty jurisdiction, limited as regards amount. We need not now define the word "collision." The words "damage by collision," used in this Act, the object of which was to give an Admiralty jurisdiction to the County Courts, cannot be held to include damage which has been caused on land outside the limits of the ebb and flow of the tide, a damage which would not have fallen within the original jurisdiction of the Court of Admiralty in respect of collision. It seems to me that these statutes do not extend, either in express terms or by inference, the jurisdiction of the County Court to the particular damage of which the applicant here complains. I think, therefore, that this application must be refused.

GRANTHAM, J.—I am of the same opinion. In the case of Everard v. Kendall (22 L. T. Rep. N. S. 408; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 391; L. Rep. 5 C. P. 428) it was held that the 31 & 32 Vict. c. 71 and 32 & 33 Vict. c. 51, do not give the County Court, which has an Admiralty jurisdiction under those Acts, jurisdiction to try cases of damage by collision between vessels of a different class from those over which a Court of Admiralty has jurisdiction, and therefore a County Court is not empowered by those Acts to try a question of collision between barges propelled by oars only. In that case Montague Smith, J. said: "What is the meaning of 'damage by collision?' We have nothing to guide us as to what damage by collision is within the Act, except the general scope and object of the Act. In common understanding, and as understood in the Court of Admiralty, damage by collision is damage sustained by a ship from another ship coming into contact with it." It seems to me that this explanation is well founded, and I think that the preceding words "damage to cargo," that is, damage to cargo while on board ship, shows that the intention of the Legislature was to confine this jurisdiction to cases of collision between ships.

Measure of damages—Warranty of authority—Breach of such warranty—Liability of agent.

The plaintiff was the holder of a policy of marine insurance for 1000*l. on a certain ship, effected with an insurance company in San Francisco, called the "Sun." The policy provided for payment thus: "Loss, if any, hereunder payable by the Anglo-Californian Bank in London, three days after sight of the certificate of loss approved by E. E. Wendt of London, or Richard Lowndes of Liverpool." A loss occurred, and the company having repudiated liability, an action was commenced in England, and judgment by default was signed for* 1000*l.*

An offer of 300*l. was then made to the plaintiff by the defendants as representing the company. This offer the plaintiff at first refused, but afterwards accepted. The defendants then telegraphed to America, and received an answer which they supposed authorised them to accept the terms on behalf of the "Sun." This telegram had not in fact been sent with the authority of the "Sun." The defendants then wrote to the plaintiff: "We have heard from our clients in San Francisco, who are prepared to abide by the offer made some time ago. Will you please send up the policies, and we can then doubtless arrange for an early settlement. Our clients insist that the judgment you obtained must be cancelled in a formal manner." The plaintiff then executed and sent a release of the judgment to the defendants, who thereupon wrote that the plaintiff could obtain payment at the bank. Payment was however refused by the bank, acting on instructions from the "Sun." Correspondence took place and the mistake was explained, and it was admitted that the defendants had acted bonâ fide in the matter. The plaintiff then notified to the defendants, that he held them liable for the* 300*l. and expenses thrown away, for which the present action was brought. The defendants paid into court a sum for expenses, and denied further liability.*

Held (following Re National Coffee Palace Company; Ex parte Panmure, 50 L. T. Rep. N. S. 38; 24 Ch. Div. 367), that the plaintiff was entitled to the full sum of 300*l. in addition to the sum paid into court, as the measure of damages in such a case was what the plaintiff had lost by losing the particular contract which was to have been made by the alleged principal, if the defendants had had the authority they professed to have, and the expenses thrown away.*

ACTION tried at Liverpool, on the 10th May 1888, by Charles, J., without a jury, in which the plaintiff sought to recover damages from the defendants for breach of a warranty of authority.

The facts of the case are sufficiently set out in the judgment.

June 4.—CHARLES, J. delivered the following written judgment:—In this case, which was tried before me without a jury at Liverpool on the 10th May, the plaintiff sought to recover damages from the defendants for breach of a warranty of authority under the following circumstances: The plaintiff was, in 1887, the holder of two policies of insurance on the ship Mindora effected with two insurance companies in San Francisco, called the "Union" and the "Sun." Each policy was for 1000*l.*, and provided thus for payment of any loss: "Loss, if any, hereunder payable by Messrs. the Anglo-Californian Bank in London, three days after sight of the certificate of loss approved by E. E. Wendt, of London, or Richard Lowndes, of Liverpool, accompanied by this policy." A loss having occurred, and the companies having repudiated liability, an action was commenced in England against each company, and proceedings were duly taken for service of the writs out of the jurisdiction. The defendant companies did not appear, and judgment by default was signed for 1000*l.* against each company. Negotiations for a settlement thereupon took place between the plaintiff and the defendants, Messrs. Wendt and Co., of London, who represented the two companies in this country. A sum of 300*l.* was, in the early part of 1887, offered by each company, but was refused. In August, however, the plaintiff expressed his willingness to accept that sum, and on the 26th the defendants wrote to the plaintiff's solicitors, Messrs. Simpson and North, as follows: "As a long time has now elapsed since the offer of our clients was first made, we cannot go further with the matter just now, but have at once written to San Francisco for instructions." On the 13th Sept. the Union Company wrote to the defendants stating that they would adhere to their offer, but no answer was received from the Sun. The defendants thereupon telegraphed on the 30th Sept. to San Francisco, and received an answer on the 1st Oct., which they supposed authorised them to accept the plaintiff's offer. The telegram of the 1st Oct. had not in fact been sent with the authority of the Sun. On receipt of this telegram the defendants wrote to the plaintiff's solicitors in these terms: "We have now heard from our clients in San Francisco, and the Union and Sun Insurance Companies are prepared to abide by the offer they have made some time ago, although the same was not accepted at the time. Will you please send us up the policies, and we can then doubtless arrange for an early settlement. Our clients insist that the judgments you obtained against them must be cancelled in a formal manner." The policies and judgments were forwarded on the 3rd Oct. On the 7th the defendants' solicitors sent the judgments to the plaintiff's solicitors, with releases indorsed for the plaintiff's execution. The plaintiff executed them, and they were returned on the 8th. On the 10th the defendants' solicitors wrote to the plaintiff's solicitors: "We have received the judgments with the releases indorsed thereon, and now forward you the policies with the certificates, and on presentation at the bank, the Anglo-Californian Bank in London, you will obtain payment. We should say you will be able to present the policies through your own bankers. The bankers have already had notified to them that the certificates have been granted." Payment in respect of the Sun policy certificate was refused to the plaintiff by the Anglo-Californian Bank, on instructions from the Sun company cabled from America. Some correspondence between the solicitors of the plaintiff and the defendants took place in November and December, and the mistake under which the defendants had acted was fully explained. It was in no way disputed that the defendants had throughout acted bonâ fide in the matter. On the 18th Jan. the plaintiff's solicitors wrote to the defendants: "Since the Sun Company repudiate your action in settling this matter, Mr. Meek instructs me to apply to you for the amount agreed to be paid to him as the consideration for releasing the judgment against the company." In reply, the defendants' solicitors returned the release, as Messrs. Wendt and Co. had never parted with it, and pointed out that Mr. Meek could cancel it, and remain with his remedy under his judgment for 1000*l.* The plaintiff's solicitors returned the release, notifying that Mr. Meek held the defendants liable for the sum of 300*l.*, to recover which and certain expenses thrown away this action was brought.

At the trial it was not seriously contested that the defendants had, in their letter dated the 1st Oct., innocently represented themselves as having the authority of the Sun Company to settle the claims of the plaintiff for 300*l.*, and the question principally discussed was as to the proper measure of damages for the defendants' false representation of authority. The plaintiff contended that he was entitled to the full sum of 300*l.*, and the expenses he had incurred in negotiating the compromise. The defendants paid into court a sum sufficient to meet such expenses as had been incurred subsequent to Oct. 1, but denied any further liability. The matter therefore to be decided is, whether the plaintiff is entitled to any, and what, additional damages. Now he is entitled to all the damage which is the natural and proximate consequence of the false assertion of authority. "The measure of damages," says Lord Esher, M.R., in Re National Coffee Palace Company (50 L. T. Rep. N. S. 38; 24 Ch. Div., at p. 371), "in actions for breach of warranty is always the same in every case. I will not consider what theoretically it ought to be, but I say we must decide it according to the rule which has been followed for a series of years. Spedding v. Newell (L. Rep. 4 C. P. 212; 38 L. J. 133, C. P.) and Godwin v. Francis (22 L. T. Rep. N. S. 338; L. Rep. 5 C. P. 295; 39 L. J. 121, C. P.) are cases in which the plaintiff was the intended purchaser; and Simons v. Patchett (29 L. T. 88; 7 E. & B. 568; 26 L. J. 165, Q. B.; 3 Jur. N. S. 742) was a case in which the plaintiff was the intended vendor, and in all these cases the Court laid down that the measure of damages was what the plaintiff actually lost by losing the particular contract which was to have been made by the alleged principal, if the defendant had had the authority he professed to have; in other words, what the plaintiff would have gained by the contract which the defendant warranted should be made." Applying this rule to the present case, the plaintiff, by losing the particular contract which was to have been made, has primâ facie lost the expenses thrown away, and the sum of 300*l.*, which I have no doubt he would have obtained without delay or difficulty in London from the Anglo-Californian Bank, within three days after sight of the approved certificates. But then it is contended by the defendants that the plaintiff is in a position to enforce all his original rights against the company on the judgment and on the policy, and that these are worth at least as much as 300*l.*, so that the plaintiff has in truth lost nothing beyond the expenses thrown away. But with regard to the judgment, it was not disputed that the law as to enforcing foreign judgments is the same in the courts of the United States as in our own, and according to our law the judgment could not be effectively put in suit in the courts of the United States, inasmuch as the defendant company were not English subjects, or resident in England, either when the policy was issued or the suit commenced. This seems clear from the case of Schibsby v. Westenholz (24 L. T. Rep. N. S. 93; L. Rep. 6 Q. B. 155, per Blackburn, J., at p. 160). And in this country the judgment has no present value, inasmuch as the defendant company have no property here available for execution. With regard to the claim on the policy, no doubt the plaintiff has a claim which he may or may not be able successfully to enforce at San Francisco; a claim however which has been wholly repudiated, and will be strenuously resisted. I cannot fix any pecuniary value on this claim, and I do not think that its existence ought to affect the amount which is primâ facie the proper amount to be awarded to the plaintiff for the loss of the particular contract which was to have been made by the alleged principal. I therefore give judgment for the plaintiff for 300*l.*, in addition to the money paid into court.

Where a ship has two decks, and carries barley in bulk from a Mediterranean port, the duty imposed by the Merchant Shipping (Carriage of Grain) Act 1880, and the Board of Trade Regu- lations made thereunder, is to have bulkhead or shifting boards not merely in the 'tween decks, but in the lower hold also.

The Board of Trade Regulations 1881, 4 (b), requiring feeders to "be fitted to feed the grain carried in the 'tween decks, such feeders to contain not less than 2 per cent. of the compartments they feed," requires the feeders to contain 2 per cent. of the grain in the 'tween decks, and in the holds below the 'tween decks, and is not limited to the grain in the 'tween decks.

THIS was a rehearing of an investigation into the circumstances attending the abandonment of the British steamship Rothbury.

The investigation was held at Middlesbrough by the stipendiary magistrate, assisted by assessors, and was now ordered to be reheard by the Board of Trade "as to a certain part thereof, that is to say, whether the said vessel was loaded in accordance with the provisions of the Merchant Shipping (Carriage of Grain) Act 1880, as modified by the regulations made by the Board of Trade thereunder."

The Rothbury was an iron screw-steamship belonging to the port of South Shields, she had two decks, was 604 tons net, and at the time of her abandonment was on a voyage from Oran to Dunkirk, laden with a cargo of barley. The barley was stowed in bulk in the 'tween decks and lower holds.

During the voyage the Rothbury experienced bad weather, and whilst in the Bay of Biscay her cargo shifted in the fore and main holds, and on the 4th Sept. 1887 she was abandoned about sixty-six miles to the westward of Brest.

The space in the 'tween decks was divided by longitudinal shifting boards extending from deck to deck, but there were no shifting boards in the holds below the 'tween decks or in the hatches. The lower deck hatches were not put on, and there were some openings made through the deck in the wings for the purpose of feeding the cargo in the lower holds from the 'tween decks.

The hatches of the upper deck, which were used as feeders for the 'tween decks, contained less than 2 per cent of the grain in the 'tween decks and in the holds.

The Board of Trade alleged that, under the Merchant Shipping (Carriage of Grain) Act 1880, and the regulations made thereunder, the Rothbury should have been provided with shifting boards in the lower holds as well as in the 'tween decks, and that the feeders for the 'tween decks should contain at the least 2 per cent. of the grain carried both in the 'tween decks and in the lower holds conjointly.

Merchant Shipping (Carriage of Grain) Act 1880:

Sect. 4. Where a British ship laden with a grain cargo at any port in the Mediterranean or Black Sea is bound to ports outside the Straits of Gibraltar, the following particulars to prevent the cargo from shifting shall be adopted; that is to say, (a) there shall not be carried between the decks, or, if the ship has more than two decks, between the main and upper decks, any grain in bulk, except such as may be necessary for feeding the cargo in the hold, and is carried in properly constructed feeders; (c) where grain is carried in the hold or between the decks, whether in bags or bulk, the hold or the space between the decks shall be divided by a longitudinal bulkhead, or by sufficient shifting boards which extend from deck to deck, or from the deck to the keelson and are properly secured, and if the grain is in bulk are fitted grain-tight with proper fittings between the beams.

Sect. 5. The precautions required by this Act to be adopted by ships laden with a grain cargo at a port in the Mediterranean or Black Sea, or on the coast of North America, shall not apply to ships loaded in accordance with regulations for the time being approved by the Board of Trade, nor to any ship constructed and loaded in accordance with any plan approved by the Board of Trade.

Board of Trade Regulations 1881:

2. In the case of ships having two decks and loading a grain cargo at a port in the Mediterranean or Black Sea, barley may be carried in bulk in the 'tween decks, provided that

The between deck hatches shall not at any time be put on; and (b) that strakes of the deck be lifted, or if the deck is an iron deck, sufficient openings be made through the deck in the wings, which with the open hatches shall admit of the cargo in the between decks feeding the lower hold.

4 (a). There shall be longitudinal grain-tight shifting boards in accordance with sub-sect. (c) of sect. 4 of the said Act, and the grain shall be properly stowed, trimmed, and secured, as required by sub-sect. (d) of the said sect. 4. (b) Feeders shall be fitted to feed the grain carried in the between decks, such feeders to contain not less than 2 per cent. of the compartments they feed.

Cur. adv. vult.

June 19.—BUTT, J.—This is the rehearing of an investigation into the circumstances attending the abandonment of the s.s. Rothbury, held at Middlesbrough, by the stipendiary magistrate assisted by two nautical assessors, the question for my determination being whether the vessel was loaded in accordance with the provisions of the Merchant Shipping (Carriage of Grain) Act 1880, and the regulations made by the Board of Trade thereunder. The Rothbury, which was a screw-steamship of 604 tons net and 950 tons gross register, left the port of Oran for Dunkirk, on the 23rd Aug. 1887, with a cargo of 1080 tons of barley. In the course of her voyage the ship met with bad weather, the cargo shifted, and she was abandoned by her crew in the Bay of Biscay on the 4th Sept. The grain was stowed in bulk in the 'tween decks on the lower holds. The space in the 'tween decks was divided by longitudinal shifting boards extending from deck to deck, but there were no shifting boards in the hatches, the top of the shifting boards ceasing on a level with the deck. There were no shifting boards at all below the 'tween decks. The lower deck hatches were not put on. There were some openings made through the decks in the wings for the purpose of feeding the cargo in the lower holds, but the evidence goes to show that those openings were deficient in number and in size. The carriage of grain in bulk in the 'tween decks, except such grain as may be necessary for feeding the cargo in the hold, and which is carried in properly constructed feeders, is prohibited by sect. 4, sub-sect. (a) of the Act of 1880, unless it is loaded in accordance with the regulations for the time being approved by the Board of Trade as provided by sect. 5.

The question then arises, was this ship loaded in accordance with the Board of Trade regulations? In Aug. 1881 the Board of Trade issued certain regulations still in force, among which the following apply in this case: "Ships having two decks. 2. In the case of ships having two decks, and loading a grain cargo at a port in the Mediterranean or Black Sea, barley may be carried in bulk in the 'tween decks provided—3 (a). That the between deck hatches shall not at any time be put on; and (b) that strakes of the deck be lifted, or if the deck is an iron deck, sufficient openings be made through the deck in the wings which with the open hatches shall admit of the cargo in the between decks feeding the lower hold. 4 (a). There shall be longitudinal grain-tight shifting boards in accordance with sub-sect. (c) of sect. 4 of the said Act, and the grain shall be properly stowed, trimmed, and secured, as required by sub-sect. (d) of the said sect. 4 (b). Feeders shall be fitted to feed the grain carried in the between decks, such feeders to contain not less than 2 per cent. of the compartments they feed." It is therefore clear that the above regulations are not complied with unless shifting boards prescribed by sect. 4, sub-sect. (c) of the Act of 1880, are provided. Sub-sect. (c) is as follows: "Where grain is carried in the hold or between the decks, whether in bags or bulk, the hold or the space between the decks shall be divided by a longitudinal bulkhead, or by sufficient shifting boards which extend from deck to deck, or from the deck to the keelson, and are properly secured, and if the grain is in bulk are fitted grain-tight with proper fittings between the beams." It is contended by the Board of Trade that this cargo was improperly stowed, because, although there were shifting boards in the 'tween decks, there were none in the hold below. On the other hand, the shipowner says that sub-sect. (c) does not require shifting boards in the holds where grain is carried in bulk in the 'tween decks, if provision is made for feeding the cargo in the holds in the manner prescribed by the regulations above set forth, that such provision for feeding the lower holds renders shifting boards in those holds unnecessary, and that all that the statute requires is the use of the shifting boards from deck to deck in the case of a vessel having two decks, or from deck to keelson in vessels that have only one deck. I do not agree with this latter view of sub-sect. (c). I think the true interpretation of it is this. It is an enactment dealing separately with the spaces in the ship, whether 'tween decks or holds, in which grain is carried. Its meaning is, that in each of the spaces in which grain is carried there shall be shifting boards provided. That appears to me to be the natural meaning of the words, and unless there are some considerations pointing to a different construction, I must give them that effect. But it is said that such considerations do exist; that if proper provisions be made for keeping the lower holds full by feeding them from above, the grain in those holds cannot shift. No doubt, if by such means the lower holds can be kept absolutely full, little or no shifting of the cargo will take place, but I very much doubt whether anything of the sort can be done. Having the advantage of the Elder Brethren to assist me, I have asked them this question: "Are shifting boards in the hold of any use in a two-decked ship carrying barley in bulk in the 'tween decks and the holds, when sub-sect. a and b of article 3 of the Board of Trade Regulations are complied with?" Their answer is, "We consider that they still continue to be desirable." The facts of the present case seem to bear out this view, for the holds were not kept full, and the cargo did shift. I hold, therefore, that this vessel was improperly loaded, inasmuch as she had no shifting boards in her lower holds.

There is another respect in which I find that the statutory requirements have not been complied with. One of the regulations set out above prescribes that the feeders used in feeding the grain in the 'tween decks shall contain not less than 2 per cent. of the compartments they feed. It appears by the evidence that two of the hatches of the upper deck used as feeders were not capable of containing 2 per cent. of the grain in the compartment of the 'tween decks which they were respectively meant to feed, and that the other 'tween deck hatches were not capable of containing 2 per cent. of the grain in the compartment of the 'tween decks which they were designed to feed, and of the grain in the holds below such compartments respectively. It was contended by the shipowners that the true construction of the regulation in question is that the feeder used need only contain 2 per cent. of the grain in the compartment of the 'tween decks into which it leads, and not 2 per cent. of the grain in such compartment, and of the grain in the hold below which is fed by such compartment. I think that this is a construction opposed to what those who framed the regulations must have intended to express, and I cannot say that I think it is properly the meaning of the words used. Again, the evidence before the stipendiary magistrate showed the forehold was not full, the grain being trimmed on a slant under the bulkhead, and spare gear placed on top of the cargo. This was obviously improper stowing. For the above reasons I decide that the Rothbury was improperly loaded.

THE ERATO. (a).

Salvage—Amount of award.

Where three steamships rendered valuable salvage service to a stranded vessel, and one of them sustained very considerable damage in rendering the services, the court on a value of 3750*l. awarded* 2000*l.*

THIS was a salvage action in which the owners, masters, and crews of the steamships Pheasant, Midge, and Somali claimed salvage remuneration for services rendered to the steamship Erato, in the Red Sea.

The Erato, a steamship of 1137 tons net register, whilst on a voyage from Calcutta to London, laden with a cargo of wheat, stranded on the 21st Aug. 1887, on the Parkin Rock, in the Red Sea.

On the 25th Aug. the Somali, a steamship of 383 tons register, belonging to Liverpool, sighted the Erato, and at once proceeded to her. On coming up with her a band of Arab wreckers, who were proceeding to pillage the ship, were forced to leave. The Somali then proceeded to Aden for a gang of labourers and salvage appliances. On returning, the Somali was taken alongside the Erato, and her crew proceeded to jettison the cargo.

Later in the same day the Midge, a steam-tug of 35 tons gross and 19 tons net register, belonging to Aden, came up, and, having taken part of the Erato's cargo on board, proceeded with it to Perim, and on the 28th returned with forty coolies and a donkey pump.

On the 29th Aug. the Pheasant, a steamship of 253 tons net and 400 tons gross register, trading in the Red Sea, arrived with pumps and 136 labourers, who at once proceeded to jettison the cargo and make the necessary preparations for getting the vessel off. On the 6th Sept., by which time a considerable quantity of water had been pumped out of the Erato, an attempt was made to move her, but it proved unsuccessful. During the attempt the Pheasant, which was lashed alongside, was forced on to a rock, and at once settled down till the water was level with her deck. Later on the same day the Erato, with the assistance of a kedge anchor which had been laid out by the Midge, came off under her own steam.

Meanwhile the Somali, after giving general assistance in salving the ship and cargo, had left laden with sound cargo for Aden. The Pheasant did not come off till the 16th Sept., and, in consequence of her stranding, had to pay a considerable sum to the Midge and the steamship Tuna, for their assistance. The cost of her repairs amounted to 4700*l*.

The value of the Erato was fixed at 3750*l*. The defendants tendered and paid into court the sum of 1500*l*.

Sir Walter Phillimore (with him J. P. Aspinall) for the owners of the Pheasant.

Joseph Walton for the owners of the Midge.

Kennedy, Q.C. for the owners of the Somali.

Barnes, Q.C. (with him Raikes) for the defendants.

BUTT, J.—In this case we are clearly of opinion that a salvage service of great merit has been rendered by each one of these respective claimants. But I regret that, from the want of an adequate fund, I am unable to make the award which I should like to do. I have to deal only with the salved ship, for, though some cargo has been saved, the chief salvor, the Pheasant, had nothing to do with it, and her owners cannot proceed against it. The salvage was commenced by the Somali, and no doubt her salvage was a very valuable one. But it was rendered principally to the cargo which she carried away and saved. But there is no doubt that at the time she came up, or just preceding it, the Arabs had been in possession of the Erato, and they would not have left her if the Somali had not then arrived. Having to deal with a fund amounting to no more than 3750*l*., the question arises, how much of it should I award to the salvors? It is said by the defendants that 1500*l*., the amount which they have tendered, is sufficient, because it is considerably more than a third of the value of the salved property. That is very true, and I must not forget in dealing with these matters that the court must not, so to speak, confiscate the whole of the salved property. On the other hand, I hold that there is no hard-and-fast rule as to the proportion of the salved property which ought to be awarded to the salvors. I have considered what portion of the fund I should give to the salvors, not as an adequate remuneration, but as the lowest amount which in justice they ought to receive, and we think that we cannot award them less than 2000*l*. As regards the apportionment of that sum, the first of the salvors in point of time was the Somali. Her services, as I have said, were meritorious, but her efforts were principally directed to saving the cargo, though no doubt they had some effect in the saving of the ship. But her owners are in this advantageous position, that they have a lien on nearly 500 tons of cargo, and will no doubt receive a handsome award out of it in which the others cannot share, excepting the owners of the Midge, which may get a very small proportion. Therefore, in apportioning the amount due to the Somali, I do so having in view the award she will get elsewhere, and under the conviction that in the result she will be the best off of the salvors; I shall therefore award her 150*l*. Now, with regard to the Midge, she is small, but was engaged a long time, and her pump played a very important part in rendering these services. I shall award her 500*l*. That leaves 1150*l*. for the Pheasant, which was undoubtedly the great salvor. It is a matter of great regret that in rendering her valuable services she sustained injuries amounting to several thousand pounds. The question of her insurance has been brought before me, but that is a matter into which I decline to go.

THE VICTORIA.(a)

Limitation of liability—Loss of life—Damage to goods—Priority of claims—Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 63), s. 54.

Where in an action for limitation of liability the plaintiffs' liability is fixed at 15*l. per ton in respect of life and cargo claims, and the life claims exceed* 7*l. a ton, and the cargo claims* 8*l. a ton,* 7*l. per ton is to be applied exclusively towards the payment of the life claims, and the balance of such claims and the cargo claims are to rank pari passu against the balance of the* 15*l. per ton.*

THIS was a summons by the life claimants in a limitation of liability action to confirm the registrar's report therein.

The report was as follows:

On the 13th April 1887 the steamship Victoria, whilst proceeding from Newhaven to Dieppe, stranded on rocks off the French coast, and became a total wreck. Several passengers and two of her crew lost their lives, and the goods, merchandise, and other things on board were lost, destroyed, or damaged. On the 18th May 1887 proceedings were commenced in this division of the High Court of Justice by the owners of the steamer for the purpose of limiting their liability according to the provisions of the Act passed in that behalf. And on the 25th Oct. the court was pleased by its decree or order to pronounce the owners of the said steamship Victoria to be answerable in damages in respect of loss of life, personal injury, loss or damage to goods, merchandise, or other things, caused by reason of the improper navigation of the said steamship on the occasion of the aforesaid stranding, to an amount not exceeding 7696*l.* 4*s.*, exclusive of interest, being at the rate of 15*l.* per ton on the registered tonnage of the Victoria, without deduction on account of engine-room. Accordingly, on the 29th Oct. 1887, a sum of 7862*l.* 0*s.* 10*d.* was paid into court by the owners of the steamship Victoria, being the amount of their statutory liability, inclusive of interest. And whereas all claims filed, or to be filed in this action, are by order of the court duly referred to the registrar assisted by merchants to assess the amount thereof:

Now I do humbly report that I have, with the assistance of Messrs. Sidney Young, and Montagu C. Wilkinson, of London, merchants, carefully examined the various claims filed in this action, together with all accounts and vouchers, and the papers and proceedings produced and brought in, and having on the 23rd, 25th, and 27th days of April 1888 heard evidence of witnesses, and also what was urged by counsel and solicitors, I find that claims have been established as under, viz.:

For loss of goods, merchandise, and other things.....	7678	1	4

In this case the sums allowed for claims for loss of life and personal injury exceed the amount equal to 7*l.* per ton on the tonnage of the Victoria which in the terms of the Act is appropriated exclusively to such claims. And further, the sums allowed for loss of goods, &c., exceed the further amount equal to 8*l.* per ton which is applicable, but not exclusively, to payment of such claims. I am therefore of opinion that the balance of the claims for loss of life and for personal injury, which the amount equal to 7*l.* per ton is insufficient to cover, must be entitled to rank pari passu with the claims for loss of goods, merchandise, &c., against the further amount equal to 8*l.* per ton.

The Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act 1862:

Sect. 54. The owners of any ship, whether British or foreign, shall not, in cases where all or any of the following events occur without their actual fault or privity, that is to say, (1) where any loss of life or personal injury is caused to any person being carried in such ship; (2) where any damage or loss is caused to any goods, merchandise, or other things whatsoever, on board any such ship; (3) where any loss of life or personal injury is by reason of the improper navigation of such ship as aforesaid caused to any person carried in any such ship or boat; (4) Where any loss or damage is by reason of the improper navigation of such ship as aforesaid caused to any other ship or boat, or to any goods, merchandise, or other things whatsoever, on board any other ship or boat, be answerable in damages in respect of loss of life, or personal injury either alone or together, with loss or damage to ships, boats, goods, merchandise, or other things, to an aggregate amount exceeding 15*l.* for each ton of their ship's tonnage, nor in respect of loss or damage to ships, goods, merchandise, or other things, whether there be in addition loss of life, or personal injury or not, to an aggregate amount exceeding 8*l.* for each ton of the ship's tonnage.

July 3.—The summons was adjourned into court.

To save expense it was agreed that the question whether the registrar had rightly distributed the fund in court as between the claimants should be raised in opposition to the summons without more formal proceedings.

J. P. Aspinall for the goods claimants.—The report is erroneous, and ought not to be confirmed. It is first submitted that the goods claimants are entitled to the whole 8*l.* per ton. The words of the Act point to this specific sum as being appropriated to the goods claimants. All the Act does is to limit a shipowner's liability, and say what shall be the corpus against which claims shall rank; and inasmuch as the goods claimants have a maritime lien, and the life claimants have not, there seems no reason why the rights of the goods claimants should be interfered with by the life claimants. In the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, sect. 510, there is an express provision that the life claims shall be a first charge upon the fund, and inasmuch as there is no such provision in the present Act, it is submitted that the Legislature intended to take away that right:

Leycester v. Logan, 26 L. J. 306, Ch.;
Nixon v. Roberts, 30 L. J. 844, Ch.; 1 J. & H. 739.

Assuming the above contention to be incorrect, it is then submitted that the 15*l.* per ton should be divided rateably among both sets of claimants, care being taken that the goods claimants do not get more than 8*l.* per ton. The section makes no distinction between the two classes of claimants, and therefore at least they should have equal rights, and the only limit upon the goods owners is that they cannot get more than 8*l.* per ton.

Pyke for the life claimants.—The object of the Act was to favour life claimants. There is nothing in the Act limiting the life claims to 7*l.* a ton. All the Act says is that the shipowner shall not be liable in respect of goods claims to an amount exceeding 8*l.* per ton. It does not say that goods claimants are to have 8*l.* a ton:

Glaholm v. Barker, 13 L. T. Rep. N. S. 653; 1 Ch. App. 223; 2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 298;
Burrell v. Simpson, 4 Ct. Sess. Cas. 4th series, 177.

Aspinall in reply.

BUTT, J.—This case raises a question of some nicety as to the interpretation of the limitation of liability clauses in the Merchant Shipping Acts of 1854 and 1862. The question arises in this way: On the 13th April the steamship Victoria stranded on the French coast, and several of her passengers and some of her crew were lost, and her cargo was lost or damaged. Proceedings were thereupon instituted in this court, and ultimately a decree for limitation of liability was granted. In pursuance of that decree the sum of 7862*l.* 0*s.* 10*d.* was paid into court. At the reference the registrar found that there was due in respect of loss of life the sum of 8975*l.*, and in respect of loss of goods the sum of 7678*l.* 1*s.* 4*d.*, making in all a sum nearly double that paid into court. Now 8*l.* a ton is insufficient to pay the goods claims, and 7*l.* a ton is insufficient to pay the loss of life claims. In these circumstances what the registrar has done is this: he has applied the 7*l.* a ton as far as it goes to the loss of life claims, but inasmuch as that sum is insufficient to cover the whole of those claims, he has said they must come in and rank with the goods claims against the 8*l.* per ton. That seems to me to be a rational and equitable proceeding. If the court has power to marshal these assets, then I think the registrar has done right; but the cargo owners say that that apportionment is wrong, and that the court has no right to apply any part of the 8*l.* per ton to the life claims until the goods owners' claims have been satisfied. In other words, they claim priority to the life claimants upon this amount.

The question is, does the Act of Parliament give them any such right? It seems to me that such a construction is doing violence to the words of the Act. The Act confers no rights on the claimants either in respect of loss of goods or of life. It simply says that, where claimants have certain rights against the shipowner, the court can limit the amount they shall recover. What is there in the Act which says that the life claims are to be cut down to 7*l.* per ton? I can see nothing which does so. Mr. Aspinall says the concluding words of the section do. They certainly do not say so expressly, and I refuse to think that they have the effect of entitling the goods owner to take the whole 8*l.* per ton. I therefore think it would be doing violence to the language of the section to hold in a case like the present, where the life claims exceed 7*l.* per ton, that they are not to rank against the 8*l.* per ton. The statute does not say that goods owners are to recover the whole of the 8*l.* per ton, but only that the amount of their claim to be allowed shall not exceed that sum. I am unable to accede to the argument that goods owners are entitled in priority to the 8*l.* per ton. I confirm the report, and direct the costs of this summons to be costs in the cause.

THE AGLAIA. (a)

Salvage — Pilotage — Fishing smack—Right to reward.

Where a ship, otherwise uninjured, is short of provisions, and some of her crew are disabled by exposure to bad weather, and her master, being anxious to get to the nearest port, engages out of pilotage waters the services of a fisherman to pilot him to the nearest port, the services of the fisherman are to be rewarded as salvage, and not as mere pilotage.

THIS was an appeal by the plaintiffs in a salvage action from the decision of the judge of the County Court of Norfolk.

The action was instituted in rem by the owner, master, and crew of the fishing smack Mizpah against the owners of the barque Aglaia, her cargo and freight, to recover salvage for services rendered to her in the North Sea.

At the hearing of the action before the judge and assessors, the following facts were alleged by the plaintiffs:—On the 20th March 1888 the Mizpah, a dandy trawler of 51 tons, manned by a crew of five hands all told, was about forty miles E.S.E. of Lowestoft, when those on board of her sighted the barque Aglaia flying a Union Jack in her mizzen rigging. The weather was very rough, and the wind about E.N.E. The master of the Mizpah, having brought her within speaking distance of the Aglaia, asked her master what he wanted? The master of the Aglaia said he wanted a pilot to take him to the nearest port. The master of Mizpah replied that he could take him to Yarmouth, to which he assented. The master of the Aglaia also asked the master of the Mizpah to bring some fish on board, as they were starving. The Mizpah's boat was thereupon launched, and her master went on board the Aglaia, taking with him some biscuits and about 1 cwt. of fish. He was then informed that the Aglaia was on a voyage from Australia to Hamburg; that having met with adverse winds when off Terschilling Light, she had put back for the Downs; and that she had run short of provisions, each man having only had ½lb. of biscuit per meal per day for the last six weeks. It also appeared that nine out of a crew of nineteen were ill from frost bites and want of provisions, and the rest were so weak that they could do little or no work. The Aglaia was also short of oil. The master of the Mizpah remained on board the Aglaia to steer and help to navigate her, and the Mizpah, having sailed ahead on a course for Yarmouth, the Aglaia followed her, and at about 11 p.m. came to an anchor in Yarmouth Roads. The smack then provided the Aglaia with two gallons of oil, some coals, and beef.

At the close of the plaintiffs' case the learned County judge dismissed the suit on the ground that the services were not salvage.

From this decision the plaintiff appealed.

Sir Walter Phillimore for the plaintiffs in support of the appeal.—The facts of this case entitle the plaintiffs to salvage. The Aglaia undoubtedly was in distress when the smack fell in with her, and was, by the plaintiff's assistance, brought into a place of safety.

The Hedwig, 1 Spinks, 19;
The Rosehaugh, 1 Spinks, 267.

J. P. Aspinall, for the defendants, contra.—The only distress the Aglaia was in was shortness of provisions, of which there were enough for two days. She was perfectly seaworthy, and had a fair wind for the Downs. The plaintiffs merely supplied her with local knowledge which her master did not possess:

Akerbloon v. Price, 44 L. T. Rep. N. S. 837; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 441; 7 Q. B. Div. 129.

Sir JAMES HANNEN.—We are of opinion that the learned judge of the County Court has not given sufficient weight to the evidence as to the condition of this vessel at the time when the services were rendered. Undoubtedly, to lay the foundations to a claim for salvage there must be distress on the part of the salved vessel, and the danger which may be anticipated as a possible consequence of that distress must be an element in considering the amount of award to be given. It appears to us that this vessel was in distress. A large number of the crew were suffering from frost bites, and were actually ill from that ailment. The man at the wheel was disabled in one of his arms by frost bite, and was actually steering with one hand. It is inconceivable that that would have been allowed if the crew had not been reduced to some straits by their previous hardships, and it is beyond doubt that their condition was such that they were glad to have such provisions as the smack could provide them with. I think that lays the foundation for a salvage claim. It is said by the defendants that the Aglaia was then bound for the Downs, which she would in all probability have reached, and there got all she wanted. But we must not forget the condition of those on board of her. They did not think it all plain sailing. On falling in with the smack, they express a desire to be taken anywhere, to the nearest port, wherever it might be, and this at a time when they were out of pilotage waters. It has been said by Mr. Aspinall that the result shows that she could have navigated into Yarmouth. But if so, why did she, as she was not in pilotage waters, want pilotage assistance? It looks very much as though they were not so secure of their position as they might have been, and that they availed themselves of the opportunity which they saw of saving themselves from a position of difficulty and danger.

Now, with regard to the Union Jack, it is plain that it was not a signal for a pilot. It was an ambiguous signal, meaning that assistance of some kind was wanted, and, I think, we must look to the facts, as has been said by Dr. Lushington, to see what an ambiguous signal means. What was it the Aglaia was in need of? To be relieved, as I have already said, from her position of difficulty and danger, that she might not become more disabled, and might not, before she reached the Downs incur greater distress. No doubt the chief advantage which she derived from the assistance of the smack was the guidance into Yarmouth; but it is not worth while to discuss whether this comes more accurately under the description of pilotage or salvage. It was pilotage, not of a pilot, under extraordinary circumstances. It appears to me to be pilotage of that character which entitles the plaintiffs to salvage, whatever you call it. The guidance of a vessel under extraordinary circumstances rises to the rank of salvage, and I am of opinion that those conditions existed here.

BUTT, J. concurred.

After the hearing in the court below the defendants had obtained leave to examine their witnesses before an Admiralty examiner, so that, in the event of the Divisional Court overruling the decision, such evidence might be available, and the witnesses were examined accordingly; but before such evidence was gone into, it was agreed by the parties that the plaintiffs should have 50*l.* and costs, including the costs of the appeal.

MERSEY DOCKS AND HARBOUR BOARD v. HENDERSON. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF APPEAL IN ENGLAND.

Dock tonnage rates — Mersey Dock Acts Consolidation Act 1858 (21 & 22 Vict. c. xcii.), s. 230.

The respondents were owners of a line of steamships trading from Glasgow to Bombay, and their practice was to begin loading at Glasgow; the ship then sailed to Liverpool partly laden, entered the appellants' docks, and there completed its loading, discharging no cargo at Liverpool. It then sailed to Bombay, there discharged, and loaded a complete cargo; thence sailed to Liverpool, entered the docks and discharged cargo, and then proceeded with the remainder of the cargo, or in ballast, to Glasgow.

Held (reversing the judgment of the court below), that under sect. 230 of the Mersey Dock Acts Consolidation Act 1858 (21 & 22 Vict. c. cxii.) the appellants were entitled to charge on the outward voyage dock tonnage rates as on a vessel trading outwards to India, not only as on a vessel trading inwards from Glasgow, and on the return voyage rates as on a vessel trading inwards from India.

THIS was an appeal from a judgment of the Court of Appeal (Bowen and Fry, L.JJ., Lord Esher, M.R. dissenting), who had affirmed, with a variation, the judgment of Mathew, J. at the trial, in favour of the respondents, the plaintiffs below.

The case is reported in 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 156; 57 L. T. Rep. N. S. 173, and 19 Q. B. Div. 123.

The question was what dock tonnage rates the appellants, the Mersey Docks and Harbour Board, were entitled to charge the respondents, shipowners, in respect of steamers starting from and partly loading at Glasgow and entering the docks at Liverpool to complete their loading and to take in coal before starting on their voyage to India, and also what tonnage rates were to be paid on such vessels on the return voyage when they called at Liverpool to discharge a portion of their cargo before proceeding to Glasgow.

By the 230th section of the Mersey Docks Consolidation Act 1858 (21 & 22 Vict. c. xcii.) it is enacted that

> All vessels entering into or leaving the docks shall be liable according to the tonnage burden thereof to pay to the board the rates hereinafter called dock tonnage rates, mentioned in schedule B. to this Act annexed, according to the several and respective classes of voyages described in such schedule; that is to say, to or from the port of Liverpool from or to any ports or places in such schedule mentioned, and such rates shall be paid to the board by the masters or owners of such vessels, and shall be charged as follows:—
>
> Vessels trading inwards shall be liable to the rates payable in respect of the most distant of all the ports from which such vessel shall have traded to Liverpool.
>
> Vessels arriving in ballast, but trading outwards, and also vessels built within the port of Liverpool or trading outwards, shall be liable to the rates payable in respect of the most distant of all the ports to which they shall trade outwards; and vessels built within the said port on first trading outwards shall be liable to one moiety only of such rates, but shall thereafter pay full rates.

Vessels arriving in ballast and departing in ballast from the said port shall be liable to one moiety only of the rates payable to the most distant of all the ports for which such vessels shall clear out or depart.

One arrival with one departure of a vessel shall be considered as one voyage, whether such vessel shall have traded both inwards and outwards or arrived or departed in ballast, and without regard to any intermediate ports between which she may have traded whilst absent from Liverpool; but such vessel shall be liable to the rates payable in respect of the most distant of all the ports to which such vessel shall have traded. Vessels arriving in ballast and trading outwards, and vessels built in the port of Liverpool and trading outwards, and having paid the rates payable on such trading outwards, shall afterwards, on trading inwards, be liable to the rates payable on vessels trading inwards.

The appellants contended that they were entitled to charge in respect of the respondents' vessels the following dock tonnage rates:—(1) As upon a voyage from Glasgow to Liverpool, and from Liverpool outwards, the rate payable in respect of the most distant of the ports to which the vessel traded outwards — that is to say, 1*s.* 5*d.* per ton under sched. B, class 7; and (2) upon the homeward voyage from the Indian port to Liverpool and thence to Glasgow, the rate payable in respect of the most distant port from which the vessel had traded to Liverpool, that is to say, a second rate of 1*s.* 5*d.* per ton under the same class of sched. B.

The respondents, on the other hand, contended that at the most the appellants were entitled to charge—(1) in respect of the voyage from Glasgow to Liverpool and from Liverpool to the Indian port, the coastwise rate of 4½*d.* per ton; and (2) in respect of the voyage from the Indian port to Liverpool and from Liverpool to Glasgow, the foreign rate of 1*s.* 5*d.* per ton. The respondents in 1886 brought this action against the appellants to recover the sum of 24,381*l.*, being the amount which they alleged they had under protest overpaid the latter and had been wrongfully charged and received by the appellants. The case was tried before Mathew, J. without a jury, when the learned judge held that the dues which the appellants were entitled to charge were the coastwise dues in respect of the voyage from Liverpool to Glasgow and back, and the foreign dues in respect of the outward voyage to the foreign port and back, and that the excess paid by the respondents should be returned to them by the appellants.

The appellants appealed to the Court of Appeal, when Bowen and Fry, L.JJ. (the Master of the Rolls dissenting) ordered that the judgment should be varied by declaring that the appellants were entitled to charge in respect of every ship of the respondents arriving at Liverpool from Glasgow and sailing for India the dock tonnage rates as on a ship trading inwards from Glasgow, and in respect of every ship of the respondents arriving at Liverpool from India and sailing for Glasgow the dock tonnage rates as on a ship trading inwards from India.

Sir H. James, Q.C., Finlay, Q.C., French, Q.C., and Squarey appeared for the appellants.

The Attorney-General (Sir R. Webster, Q.C.), Cohen, Q.C., and J. Walton for the respondents.

The arguments, which turned entirely upon the wording of the sections of the Act, appear sufficiently from the judgments of their Lordships.

At the conclusion of the arguments their Lordships took time to consider their judgment.

July 23.—Their Lordships gave judgment as follows:—

The LORD CHANCELLOR (Halsbury).—My Lords: The decision of the question before your Lordships is important, not only to the dock company and the shipowner, but to the trade of Liverpool. I do not think anyone can reasonably complain that a question so important has been raised, since three different views have been entertained by the four judges before whom the question has come. It certainly was most reasonable in Messrs. Henderson to show if they could that charges were being imposed upon them greater than the law allowed. It was equally reasonable in the dock company to show if they could that they were acting strictly within their rights. I think there is nothing in the conduct of either of the parties to this litigation which calls for or justifies complaint. The question turns on the true construction of the 230th section of the Act of 21 & 22 Vict. c. xcii. The respondents, who own vessels which start from Glasgow, send their vessels to Liverpool to take in goods in addition to what they have already loaded in Glasgow, and for the purpose of this loading in Liverpool they enter the appellants' docks, but unload no part of the cargo. The first question which arises is, whether a vessel arriving in Liverpool under such circumstances is a vessel trading inwards. I confess, even without the assistance to be derived from a class of statutes which I will mention presently, I should not be able to place upon the words the sense which the majority of the Court of Appeal have attached to them. It certainly is not a satisfactory mode of arriving at the meaning of a compound phrase to sever it into its several parts, and to construe it by the separate meaning of each of such parts when severed. Many examples will occur to the mind where such a process would lead to absurdity; but in truth, when one considers what is the matter with which the statute under construction is conversant, the phrase is, as it appears to me, free from all doubt. The statute is imposing rates for the use of the docks, and is undoubtedly dealing with the export and import of goods. Now, in this, as in most countries, export and import are regulated by law in their mode of administration. No vessel can bring cargo to this country or take it away, or even carry it by sea from one port in this country to another, without being submitted to a whole system of supervision which has been imposed by law. The statutes which created the machinery and regulated the trade and commerce of this country in respect of export and import are those from which the Legislature would naturally adopt the phraseology when imposing dock rates in respect of trade conducted by vessels bringing goods to a port or taking goods away. I quote, for convenience, the Customs Consolidation Statute of 1876 (39 & 40 Vict. c. 36), but the nomenclature upon which I rely is to be found in Customs statutes long before 1858 (21 Vict. c, 12.)

Upon a review of the statutes, of which the Act of 1876 is a consolidation, it is apparent that all sea traffic is exhaustively divided into import, export, and coasting trade, and the phraseology of the Dock Act becomes perfectly intelligible. I will take only one section, though many might be quoted. That section is sect. 101 of the Act of 1876, and is as follows: "The master of every ship in which any goods are to be exported from the United Kingdom to ports beyond the seas (or his agent) shall, before any goods be taken on board (except as is hereafter provided) deliver to the collector a certificate from the proper officer of the due clearance inwards or coastwise of such ship of her last voyage," containing certain particulars. It then provides that if the vessel shall have commenced her lading at some other port the master must deliver to the proper officer the clearance, and enacts a penalty of 100*l.* upon any master who shall take on board any goods unless the vessel shall have first entered outwards. Then there is an exception in favour of ships with what is called a "a stiffening order," which appears to be an order permitting a vessel to take on board heavy goods to steady the ship in lieu of ballast, which, when necessary, appears to be given without a regular entry outwards. Then there is a permission to allow a vessel to be "entered outwards" before the whole of the goods imported in such ship shall have been discharged therefrom, the complete separation of such goods from the inward cargo being effected to the satisfaction of the proper officer. Here we have inward clearance, inward cargo, and by the light of such a system, as well as by the use of the particular words, I cannot doubt that "trading inwards" does not mean "a trading vessel going into a port," but means that not only the vessel is to be going in, but the trading and not the vessel is to be inwards, a trading inwards by way of import as contra-distinguished from trading outwards by way of export. Without, therefore, the aid of the 10th section of 51 Geo. 3, c. 143, I come to the conclusion that these vessels, under the circumstances stated, are not trading inwards. It will be observed that in the section I have already quoted the vessel is described as entering outwards, which has already partly laden at another port, and, as the Master of the Rolls points out, these vessels, in accordance with the system described, enter outwards at Glasgow for India vid Liverpool, and would not be permitted to load on board a single bale of goods, unless they produced that outward clearance from Glasgow.

Having arrived at the conclusion that these vessels are not trading inwards at Liverpool, the next question arises whether they are vessels in ballast, and I think they are not. The statute says nothing about cargo used as ballast, or about vessels so laden as to be stiff enough to be moved as if they were vessels in ballast. The words are perfectly intelligible used in their natural and proper sense, and therefore I cannot give them an artificial and non-natural sense in order to effect what I may consider a more just rule than the statute has enacted. It is admitted by the respondents that if these vessels are not in ballast, and are not trading inwards, there is, according to their construction of the statute, no provision made for them at all—a sufficiently startling supposition in respect of a practice that the evidence in this case proves to exist, and which the Customs statute I have quoted shows to have been known to the Legislature. But the 5th and 7th sections of 51 Geo. 3, c. 143 impose duties on all vessels coming into or going out of the docks, and the argument to show that the Legislature omitted to consider the particular case in question only arises when provisions against a vessel being called upon to pay both for going in and coming out in the prosecution of the same voyage are being considered. I agree with Fry and Bowen, L.JJ., though I think the argument leads to a different result from that at which the Lords Justices arrived, that "no casus omissus can be admitted where the section declares that all vessels" entering or leaving the docks are charged. I have suggested the last word instead of those actually used since the sense requires it, and I think that is what their Lordships meant. I believe that no case can be found to authorise the construction of the majority of the Court of Appeal altering a word so as to produce a casus omissus. The statute is admittedly enumerating the classes of vessels which are to pay various rates according to circumstances enumerated in the statute, and it is part of the argument that this is being done so as to arrange for the class of rates which are to be applied to all vessels coming in or going out of the docks. Vessels trading inwards are to pay one rate; vessels trading outwards which have arrived in ballast—and now I quote the exact words of the statute—"Vessels arriving in ballast, but trading outwards, and also vessels built within the port of Liverpool or trading outwards, shall be liable to the rates payable in respect of the most distant of all the ports to which they shall trade outwards, and vessels built within the said port on first trading outwards shall be liable to one moiety only of such rates, but shall thereafter pay full rates; vessels arriving in ballast at and departing in ballast from the said port shall be liable to one moiety only of the rates payable to the most distant of all the ports for which such vessels shall clear." According to the natural meaning of the language, the statute enumerates vessels arriving in ballast but trading outwards, vessels built in Liverpool (which therefore must and can only trade outwards on their first voyage), vessels trading outwards without specifying how they got to Liverpool, and within that class would come the vessels in question unless the judgment of the Court of Appeal is right; but that judgment turns "or" into "and," and absorbs the classes into one. In the first place, I know no authority for such a proceeding unless the context makes the necessary meaning of "or" "and," as in some instances it does; but I believe it is wholly unexampled so to read it when doing so will upon one construction entirely alter the meaning of the sentence unless some other part of the same statute or the clear intention of it requires that to be done, as in the case of Fowler v. Padgett (7 T. Rep. 509), where the Act of James 1, c. 15, made it an act of bankruptcy for a trader to leave his dwelling-house to the intent or whereby his creditors might be defeated or delayed. These words if construed literally would have made every trader commit an act of bankruptcy if he casually left his dwelling-house and some creditor called for payment during his absence. It may indeed be doubted whether some of the cases of turning "or" into "and" and vice versâ have not gone to the extreme limit of interpretation, but I think none of them would cover this case. Here not only is "or" changed into "and," but the whole sentence is practically struck out, since the construction insisted on reads it thus (leaving out the words altogether): "Vessels arriving in ballast, but trading outwards, and also vessels built within the port of Liverpool, shall be liable to the rates payable in respect of the most distant of all the ports to which they shall trade outwards." It may be said that the words "but trading outwards," as above given, are unnecessary also; but though I will not say that in very strict construction they would not be implied, yet they form a natural antithesis to vessels arriving in ballast and departing in ballast. If, however, I am right in saying that these vessels are trading inwards or in ballast, then the change of "or" into "and," or the striking out of the whole sentence, actually produces a casus omissus which seems to me, as it did to the two Lords Justices, entirely inadmissible. With respect to the unity of the voyage, and the judgment of Mathew, J., I only wish to say that in no proper technical sense are the goods from Glasgow to Liverpool carried coastwise, and that they might have been so carried is nothing to the purpose, nor if they had been would it have affected the question since the voyage of the vessel would have been what the Master of the Rolls has decribed. For these reasons I am of opinion that the appellants have charged no more than they were entitled to charge, and I move your Lordships that the order appealed from be reversed, and that the respondents do pay to the appellants the costs both here and in the courts below.

Lord FITZGERALD.—My Lords: The plaintiffs in the action are the representatives of an extensive steamship company, proprietors of a line of steamers commonly known as "The Anchor Line." The defendants (appellants) are a body of trustees controlling under statutable powers in one public trust the port of Liverpool and the Mersey Docks. The question relates to the dock tonnage rates paid under exceptional circumstances possibly not actually contemplated in 1858, when the Mersey Docks Act (Consolidation) was passed (21 & 22 Vict. c. xcii.) The plaintiffs claim a return of alleged overpayments. There is no fact in dispute. The question is one of law arising wholly on the proper construction of sect. 230 of that Act, but on that question your Lordships may derive some assistance by reference to the language of some sections in the repealed Act of 1811. The code, portions of which have been amended and consolidated in the Act of 1858, extends over a period of 179 years, commencing so far back as 1709. The undisputed circumstances may be taken from the appellants' case: "The defendants' steamers commence loading goods at Glasgow, where they take in a portion only of their cargo, the amount so loaded at Glasgow varying from time to time according to circumstances; never being a full cargo, but ordinarily sufficient to enable them to proceed to Liverpool without other ballast. All the goods so loaded at Glasgow are shipped under a bill of lading in which the vessel is stated to be 'lying in the port of Glasgow and bound for Bombay viâ Liverpool,' and the ship is cleared from Glasgow "for Bombay viâ Liverpool.' The said goods so loaded at Glasgow are intended to be and are in fact carried to and discharged at Bombay, and are not taken out of the said ship after leaving Glasgow until her arrival at Bombay. Upon leaving Glasgow the said steamer proceeds to the port of Liverpool, where she enters one of the appellants' docks. The steamer is not cleared or entered at the Custom House at Liverpool as a vessel trading inwards. She does not discharge at Liverpool any of the cargo taken on board at Glasgow, nor do the appellants receive rates of any kind in respect of that cargo. In one of the appellants' docks the steamer loads for Bombay such cargo as may be ready for her, and then leaves the dock, clears at the Customs House as a vessel trading outwards and departs from Liverpool to Bombay. At Bombay she discharges the whole of the goods so carried from Glasgow and Liverpool respectively, and then loads homeward cargo." It is, however, to be borne in mind that as the plaintiffs' vessel would be under no obligation to return to Liverpool, and frequently brings her return cargo to some other port and does not come to Liverpool, she might thus evade the Liverpool Dock tonnage rates altogether if she did not pay at Liverpool on the outward voyage. The terms of the 230th section of the statute of 1858, and the questions for the decision of your Lordships which arise on it, have been stated by the Lord Chancellor. The 11th part of the statute applies in the first instance to "dock tonnage rates," commencing in sect. 230, the rating clause, and declares that "All vessels entering into or leaving the docks shall be liable to pay dock tonnage rates;" that is to say, "to or from the port of Liverpool, from or to any ports or places mentioned in the schedule, and such rates shall be paid, &c." The schedule is referred to only for the purpose of fixing the scale. The obligation is imposed in language as clear as could be used for the purpose. There can be no doubt that the plaintiffs' vessel comes within the charge as a vessel entering into the docks, unless there is to be found in the statute some provision which makes her liable to the $4\frac{1}{2}d.$ rate as a vessel trading inwards to Liverpool, or unless the statute has omitted to provide for the exceptional circumstances. Sect. 230 then declares that "such rates shall be paid by the masters or owners, and shall be charged as follows: It deals with, "First, vessels trading inwards." The respondents (plaintiffs) contended that their ship, which had left Glasgow with part of her cargo, and cleared from Glasgow for Bombay, viâ Liverpool, became on her arrival at Liverpool a vessel "trading inwards," although she carried no cargo for Liverpool—discharged no goods there—made no entry "inwards" as of a ship trading inwards, and called at the port of Liverpool solely for the purpose of taking in cargo already provided for her to be carried to Bombay, the port of her final destination. I am of opinion that the appellants' vessel was not under the circumstances stated a vessel "trading inwards" within the meaning of the statute.

We have received in the course of the argument abundant assistance from reference to other sections of the particular statute, and also in the Customs Act. I may supply an additional example. In the Mersey Act, s. 166, provision is made for "landing and depositing the inward cargo," and several other sections have been referred to which clearly to my mind show what is meant by "trading inwards," and indicate that the appellants' ship did not come within that description. Mathew, J., dealing with the contention of the appellants that the plaintiffs' vessel arriving at Liverpool with part of her cargo for Bombay on board ought not to be considered to be a vessel "trading inwards," says, "The position seems to me altogether untenable," and disposes of the case on the basis that she was a vessel trading inwards. Fry, L.J. in dealing with the same question puts it thus: "The words 'trading inwards' would, we think, most naturally and therefore primarily apply to the case of a vessel entering the docks for the purpose of discharging her cargo; but we think that the words may without violence describe also any vessel laden with goods in the course of trade entering the docks for the purposes of her trade, whether loading or unloading, and thus include one of the plaintiffs' vessels arriving from Glasgow; for she is a vessel on a trading voyage; she is a trader, and she enters inwards." I am unable to follow Mathew, J., and whilst I accept the interpretation which the Lord Justice describes as "most naturally, and therefore primarily" to be adopted, I cannot accept the interpretation which he says may be "applied without violence," as descriptive of the plaintiffs' vessel. If not "violent," it would seem to be forced and contrary to the ordinary grammatical and statutable interpretation of "trading inwards." Sect. 230 next deals with vessels "trading outwards" thus: First, "vessels arriving in ballast, but trading outwards." It was contended for the appellants, but rather feebly, that the respondents' ship was a ship that arrived in ballast. None of the judges gave any countenance to this suggestion; and it seems to me that, according to the ordinary signification of the words, she could not be deemed to be a vessel arriving at the port of Liverpool in ballast. Secondly, "also vessels built within the port of Liverpool." The respondents' vessel was not such. Thirdly, "or trading outwards." She was a vessel trading outwards, but the respondents contend that "or" must be read "and," and the provision would run thus: "and also vessels built within the port of Liverpool, and trading outwards," so that the respondents' vessel would not come within this portion of the charging definition of the section. But the word is "or," and has a sensible meaning in its position, and why should we take the great liberty of blotting it out and substituting another word, the result of which might be to create a casus omissus? We ought not to create a casus omissus by interpretation, save in some case of strong necessity. The appellants contended that it was necessary to take this strong step in order to prevent a contradiction with a similar passage to be found subsequently in the same section, where the word used is "and," but I have been unable to discover the contradiction or the repugnancy. The passage alluded to is at the conclusion of the section, thus: "Vessels arriving in ballast and trading outwards, and vessels building in the port of Liverpool and trading outwards, and having paid the rates payable on such trading outwards, shall afterwards on trading inwards, be liable to the rates payable on vessels trading inwards." But, in this passage, the words "and trading outwards" are essential to provide for the eventuality and give it proper effect, and are not in the least in contradiction with the words "or trading outwards," or the provision in the earlier part of the section.

The appellants' vessel then not having been a vessel "trading inwards," nor "arriving in ballast," nor built in Liverpool, we should probably have been obliged to consider it a casus omissus, as to which Fry, L.J. properly says: "No casus omissus can be admitted," or I should rather observe ought to be created. We find other words which, without any strain, are applicable, and may have been introduced as an amendment to meet an exceptional case. If it was a casus omissus, it would seem to follow that, on the outward voyage from Glasgow to Bombay, viâ Liverpool, the respondents' vessel would not be within the charge for any dock tonnage rates at Liverpool, although she entered the docks and used them whilst taking on board a substantial portion of her cargo for her outward voyage. The words in the earlier part of the section, "or trading outwards," seem to me to meet the case that has arisen, and to be applicable. The respondents' vessel entering the docks, and trading outwards, was as such liable on that outward voyage to the outward dock rates charged on her. The 230th section declares that "one arrival with one departure shall be considered as one voyage." The plaintiffs' vessel was a vessel arriving at Liverpool, though not in ballast, nor trading inwards, and she departed thence to Bombay. That arrival and departure constituted one voyage, in respect of which she became liable to dock tonnage rates. She took on board at Bombay a fresh cargo, and left bound for Liverpool and Glasgow. She arrived at Liverpool, discharged part of her cargo, and departed from Liverpool for Glasgow. That arrival and departure constituted a second voyage in respect of which the respondents' became equally liable to dock tonnage rates. The Attorney-General stated that the real contest was a fight against what he called the double payment. I am of opinion that this real question should be ruled against the respondents, and their action dismissed.

Lord MACNAGHTEN.—My Lords: If I were compelled to determine this case solely on consideration of the arguments presented to and accepted by the learned judges of the Court of Appeal, I should still have some difficulty in agreeing with their decision. I cannot see any reason for substituting the word "and" for "or" in the 2nd sub-section of sect. 230 of the Act of 1858. And I am rather disposed to think that, according to the true construction of the Act, a vessel is not within the description of vessels "trading inwards" or "trading to Liverpool," unless she comes to Liverpool with cargo for the purpose of dealing with it there in the way of trade. But this question is one I think of some difficulty, and it may not be unimportant to observe that the Act which originally imposed tonnage dues at Liverpool (8 Anne, c. 12, s. 3) uses the expression "trading or coming into or out of the said port with any goods or merchandise," and it imposed the dues on vessels "so trading" to and from the said port. Nor can I accept the proposition advanced by the learned counsel for the appellants, that a vessel coming to Liverpool with nothing but cargo destined for some other port is to be deemed a vessel "arriving in ballast." It seems to me, however, that these questions one and all are rather beside the point. It cannot indeed be denied after the course which this action has taken that there is some apparent difficulty in sect. 230. But the solution of the difficulty, if difficulty there be, is, I think, to be found in sub-sect. 4, not in sub-sects. 1 and 2. Apart from the rules contained in its sub-sections, sect. 230 is perfectly clear. All vessels entering into the docks and all vessels leaving the docks are made liable according to their tonnage to pay dock tonnage rates. The rates are specified in a schedule which classifies all possible voyages. The rates vary with the class of the voyage in which the vessel is engaged, and they are to be paid to the dock board by the master or owner of the vessel liable. Nothing more, it will be observed, could be required to complete the imposition of these rates. But the section goes on to say that such rates "shall be charged as follows," and then follow four sub-sections or rules. These rules impose no further duties. They merely explain and limit charges already imposed. Rule 1 provides that "vessels trading inwards" (whatever that expression means; "shall be liable to the rates payable in respect of the most distant of all the ports from which such vessels shall have traded to Liverpool." That is the whole of rule 1. Your Lordships will observe that so far there is nothing whatever to exempt a vessel trading inwards, which pays according to this rule, from the liability imposed by the earlier part of the section on vessels "leaving the docks." A vessel paying on entering the docks would, if there were nothing more, have to pay again on leaving. Rule 2 applies the same method of reckoning voyages (1) to the case of "vessels arriving in ballast but trading outwards;" (2) to the case of "vessels built within the port of Liverpool" (in which two cases there is no "trading inwards" at all); and (3) as a general provision to the case of all vessels "trading outwards." Again, it will be observed that there is nothing in rule 2 to exempt a vessel which pays according to that rule from the liability imposed by the earlier part of the section on all vessels "entering into the docks." It was argued that the word "or" in rule 2 must be read "and." The Court of Appeal so held. One is tempted to ask, why? The change is not required by any rule of grammar, or by the sense of the particular passage, or, with all deference to the Court of Appeal, by "the general drift" of the section, or "the general scheme of the enactment" on which two of the learned judges rely. The most singular thing about this controversy is that the proposed change would not make the very slightest difference in the effect of the section. Still, I can hardly doubt that the words "or trading outwards" must have been introduced purposely. They do not occur in the Act of 1811, in sect. 6, which corresponds with the first three rules of sect. 230. It is obvious that one and the same method of reckoning ought to be applied to all voyages inwards or outwards. If the most distant point is taken as the terminus in the one case it ought also to be taken as the terminus in the other. Probably the framers of the Consolidation Act were struck by the apparent omission in clause 6 of the earlier Act, and inserted the words in question in rule 2 without observing that they were not required, because a general provision to the same effect was to be found in clause 7, which they have reproduced as rule 4 in sect. 230 of the Act of 1858.

I may pass over rule 3. It applies to the case of vessels arriving in ballast and departing in ballast—a case where there is no trading voyage at all. Rule 4 is the most important of all the rules. It declares that "one arrival with one departure of a vessel shall be considered as one voyage, whether such vessel shall have traded both inwards and outwards, or arrived or departed in ballast." The place where the voyage is to be taken into consideration is Liverpool, where the rates are collected. But it will be observed that the expression "shall have traded" is not accurate as applied to a vessel in Liverpool which has traded inwards and is about to trade outwards. The framers of the Act, treating the inward voyage and the outward voyage as one, seem to contemplate the voyage as completed. Now if a vessel coming from Glasgow to Liverpool to fill up for Bombay is a vessel which has traded inwards we have precisely the case mentioned first in rule 4. We have a vessel at Liverpool which has traded inwards and is about to trade outwards, and the voyage from Glasgow to Liverpool and thence to Bombay is to be considered as one voyage. To what rates then is such vessel liable? The rule itself answers the question in the plainest terms, "Such vessel shall be liable to the rates payable in respect of the most distant of all the ports to which such vessel shall have traded." Again we have the same expression, "shall have traded." It must have the same meaning there as it had in the earlier part of the same sentence. It must mean "has traded or is about to trade;" and I agree that the word "to" must be read "from or to." It does not mean you are to take the outward voyage only—you are to take the furthest, whether it be the inward or the outward voyage. The consequence, is that as Bombay is the more distant port from Liverpool the vessel must pay the Indian rate. The result is precisely the same if the voyage from Glasgow to Liverpool is not a "trading inwards," though the case would not in that view fall within any of the cases specially mentioned in rule 4. The rule is perfectly clear—"one arrival with one departure of a vessel shall be considered as one voyage," and "such vessel shall be liable to the rates payable in respect of the most distant of all the ports to which such vessel shall have traded." Bombay would be the most distant port, though it is the only port to which the vessel trades. And so the Indian rate is payable. I cannot agree with the majority of the Court of Appeal that "the inward rates are to be paid preferentially" in the sense that an inward rate, however small, clears the outward rate on the same voyage, however large. It is true that the rates are collected on arrival. For obvious reasons that must be the more convenient course. The practice apparently had varied before the Act of 1811, and it was settled by that Act on the ground of expediency (51 Geo. 3, c. 143, s. 11). But the mode of collection cannot nullify the plain directions of rule 4 as to the amount to be collected. The result is that in my opinion the dock board are entitled to the charges which they claim the right to make, though they may have defended those charges on wrong grounds. I think therefore that the appeal must be allowed and the action dismissed with costs.

Order appealed from reversed, and judgment entered for the appellants (defendants in the action); the respondents to pay the appellants their costs both in this House and below. Cause remitted to the Queen's Bench Division.

Collision—Lights—Right to sue—Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea—Merchant Shipping Act 1873 (36 & 37 Vict. c. 85), s. 17.

An infringement of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, which by no possibility could have anything to do with the collision, will not render a ship liable.

It is not an infringement of art. 3 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, to carry side lights in the rigging.

Where plaintiffs in an action for loss of cargo by collision prove that the cargo was shipped to their order, and that the bill of lading is indorsed to a bank to secure advances, they retain sufficient interest in the cargo to entitle them to sue.

THESE were two consolidated appeals from the judgments of the Supreme Court for China and Japan at Shanghai, dated the 10th April 1886, and the 31st May 1886, affirming judgments of Her Britannic Majesty's Court for Japan, dated the 12th Oct. 1885 and the 20th Oct. 1885, in two suits instituted in the said court by the owners of the American ship Clarissa B. Carver and S. D. Warren and Co. respectively, against the owners of the British steamship Glamorganshire, the present appellants.

The actions arose out of a collision between the two ships in the Gulf of Osaka about 10.45. p.m. on June 7, 1885. In the first the owners of the Clarissa B. Carver sought to recover damages for the loss of their vessel; and in the second Warren and Co. sought to recover damages for the loss of their cargo laden on board the Clarissa B. Carver.

The facts alleged by the plaintiffs were as follows:—At about 10.30. p.m. on June 7, 1885, the Clarissa B. Carver, a steamship of 1100 tons register, bound on a voyage from Yokohama to Kobe, and laden with a cargo of rags, was off the harbour of Kobe some four or five miles from Wada Point. The wind was E.N.E., the tide was flood, and there was a whole-sail breeze. The ship was on the port tack, heading S.E., and making a speed of from six to seven knots an hour, the regulation lights were duly exhibited and burning brightly, and a good look-out was being kept on board of her. In these circumstances, those on board the Clarissa B. Carver saw the masthead light of a steamer which proved to be the Glamorganshire distant about four or five miles and bearing about four points on the starboard bow. Shortly afterwards her red light came into view. The Glamorganshire continued to approach, and instead of keeping out of the way of the Clarissa B. Carver collided with her, crushing in her bow and causing her shortly afterwards to sink.

The facts alleged by the defendants were as follows:— At about 10.45. p.m. on June 7 the steamship Glamorganshire was in the Gulf of Osaka heading N.E. by N. ½ N., and was making about eleven knots an hour. In these circumstances, those on board of her saw the dim green light of a sailing ship which proved to be the Clarissa B. Carver at about two to three ship's lengths off and about three points on the port bow. The helm was immediately ported as the only means of avoiding a collision, but nevertheless the Clarissa B. Carver's jib-boom caught in the Glamorganshire's main rigging, and then her stem struck the steamer on her port side.

The further material facts are set out in the judgment.

The actions were tried together in the court of Japan, which gave judgment for the plaintiffs, a decision which was affirmed by the Supreme Court for China and Japan.

At the trial a clerk in the employ of Messrs. Heinemann and Co., was called on behalf of Warren and Co., and proved the following facts: that Heinemann and Co. by order of Warren and Co. shipped on the Clarissa B. Carver a cargo of rags which had been purchased by Warren and Co.; that 22,000 dollars were advanced against the rags; that they were deliverable to Baring Brothers, and that the bill of lading was indorsed to the Hong Kong Bank.

Having regard to the above evidence the Supreme Court directed "that the money which may be awarded under the reference herein be not paid to the plaintiffs (Warren and Co.) until it shall have been satisfactorily established that the payment will release the owners of the steamship Glamorganshire from all claims on behalf of any consignees or indorsees of the bills of lading."

The plaintiffs submitted that the decision of the Supreme Court for China and Japan was wrong for the following among other reasons:

1. Because a good look-out was being kept on board the Glamorganshire.
2. Because the fact that the green light of the Clarissa B. Carver was not seen earlier was not, in the circumstances, proof of negligence on the part of those on board the Glamorganshire.
3. Because the lights of the Clarissa B. Carver did not comply with the regulations.
4. Because the green light of the Clarissa B. Carver was not burning brightly.
5. Because the green light of the Clarissa B. Carver was obscured.
6. Because the green light of the Clarissa B. Carver was improperly placed.

(a) Reported by J. P. ASPINALL and BUTLER ASPINALL, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

7. Because the Clarissa B. Carver took no steps to avoid the collision or to diminish the force of the collision.

8. Because it was not proved that S. D. Warren and Co. had any title to the goods in respect of which they sued, and on the contrary it appeared that they had no title to them.

9. Because the court of Japan was not an Admiralty court, and even supposing that in an Admiralty court the plaintiffs might have been allowed to postpone the proof of their title till the reference as to damages (which supposition the appellants dispute), no such course could be taken in the court for Japan.

10. Because in any event S. D. Warren and Co. ought only to be allowed to recover for the loss actually sustained by them.

The respondents the owners of the Clarissa B. Carver by their case submitted that the decree appealed from should be affirmed for the following among other reasons:

1. That the collision and consequent damage were solely due to the negligence of those on board the Glamorganshire.

2. That a good look-out was not kept on board the Glamorganshire.

3. That the Glamorganshire did not keep out of the way of the Clarissa B. Carver.

4. That the Glamorganshire did not slacken her speed nor stop, nor reverse her engines prior to the collision.

The respondents Warren and Co. by their case submitted that the decree appealed from should be affirmed for the following among other reasons:

1. That the evidence shows a primâ facie title to sue to be in the said respondents.

2. That the evidence did not show that there was any title to sue in any person other than Warren and Co., who were the shippers of the cargo.

3. That the said decree is legal and valid.

4. That under the circumstances the said Supreme Court was justified in making the said decree in the form thereof.

The judgment was delivered by Lord HOBHOUSE.—In this case two actions have been brought in Her Majesty's Court of Japan, sitting as an Admiralty court, against the steamship Glamorganshire or her owners. One is by the owners of the American sailing ship Clarissa B. Carver, for damage done to that ship; and the other by S. D. Warren and Co., who say that they are owners of the cargo on board the Clarissa B. Carver, for damage done to the cargo. The contention is, that the Glamorganshire is solely in fault for a collision that took place between the two ships. The Glamorganshire contends either that she was not in fault, or that the Clarissa B. Carver contributed to the collision. By arrangement between the parties the evidence has been taken in both actions together, and though there are separate judgments given in the actions they were in effect tried together. The same arrangement has been pursued before their Lordships. The appeals have been consolidated, the same counsel appeared for the respondents in the two cases, and their Lordships are dealing with the cases uno flatu. The Court of Japan decided both actions in favour of the plaintiffs The defendants, the owners of the Glamorganshire, appealed to the Supreme Court for China and Japan, and that court affirmed both the decrees, the decree in the ship case absolutely, and the decree in the cargo case with a modification which will be mentioned presently.

To take first the ship case. There are many questions raised in the actions as to the conduct and handling of the ships, which have been settled by the concurrent decisions of the two courts in a way which the counsel for the Glamorganshire have felt that they could not dispute, having regard to the rule which prevails in this tribunal respecting the effect of concurrent decisions on pure questions of fact. But there is one question left on which it is argued that this tribunal should review the decisions of the courts below, though they are in effect concurrent. It is said that there was some variation of the ground taken by the courts below, and that the matter is open to their Lordships now. The contention amounts to this: that the ship Clarissa B. Carver committed a breach of the maritime regulations, and, having committed that breach, her case falls within the principle which was laid down in the case of The Fanny M. Carvill (ubi sup.), that where there was a breach, the presumption of culpability on the part of the vessel committing it can only be met by proof that the disaster in question could not by any possibility be attributed to the breach. But then, in order to attract that principle, and to get the benefit of it, there must first be shown that there was in fact a breach of the regulations, and that must be proved like any other fact in the case. It is not sufficient to say that from the facts proved there might possibly have been some breach of the regulations. Proof must be given leading up to the conclusion that there was a breach, and then, if that breach could possibly have led to the disaster, the ship must be held to blame on the principle laid down in The Fanny M. Carvill. Now the regulation which is said to be infringed is art. 3 (b). It provides that a steamship shall carry "on the starboard side a green light so constructed as to show an uniform and unbroken light over an arc of the horizon of ten points of the compass; so fixed as to throw the light from right ahead to two points abaft the beam on the starboard side; and of such a character as to be visible on a dark night with a clear atmosphere at a distance of at least two miles." By art. 5 that regulation is extended to sailing vessels. It is said that that regulation has been infringed in two particulars. First, it is said that the light was too dim; that it was not "of such a character as to be visible on a dark night with a clear atmosphere at a distance of at least two miles." Upon that point both courts have elaborately examined the evidence, and they have come to the conclusion that the witnesses on board the Clarissa B. Carver, who all spoke one way, and who gave clear testimony that there was a bright light which they calculated would be visible at three miles, were to be believed, and that there was no infringement of the regulation upon that point. Their Lordships think it necessary to say nothing further upon that point, excepting that, as the evidence has been brought before them, they consider that the courts came to a right conclusion. But then another point was made. It is said that the light was fixed in the rigging, and that that is an improper place to fix the light. The answer is, that the regulation does not say it shall not be fixed in the rigging; and not only is it not contrary to the regulation; it is a common practice; and in American ships appears to be a very common practice—it would seem almost to be the common practice. The naval officers who have assisted their Lordships in this case concur with the evidence given on this point. Then it is alleged that the light was so fixed that the foresail or some portion of the foresail would interfere so as to prevent the lamp showing a uniform and unbroken light over an arc of the horizon of ten points of the compass. [After hearing the evidence, their Lordships came to the conclusion that, even if it could be held that an occasional obscuration of the light by sail under exceptional circumstances was a breach of the regulation, the evidence in this case is to the effect that there never could be any interference at all by the sail with the lamp; that therefore there was no breach of the regulation, and continued:] The Clarissa B. Carver is not to be held to blame in any way, and the judgment appealed from is a right judgment.

Now with respect to the cargo action. The objection there is, that the plaintiffs have not proved their title to maintain the action. The evidence given of their title was that of Galtzow, who was the clerk or in the employ of Messrs. Paul Heinemann and Co. His evidence is that the cargo was shipped by Messrs. Paul Heinemann and Co., and shipped by the order of the plaintiffs; that it was deliverable to Barings; that 22,000 dollars had been borrowed—he does not say by whom, probably by Heinemann and Co.—of the Hong Kong bank, and that the bill of lading was indorsed over to the bank. No doubt that does not show a clear title to the money in the plaintiffs, but it does show that they had an interest in the cargo, and their Lordships hold that that interest is sufficient to enable them to maintain the suit. The judge of the court of Japan passed a decree that the plaintiffs do recover from the defendants damages to be ascertained on the usual reference to the registrar. At the same time he offered to the defendants a modification of that decree to the effect that the money should not be paid until the various claims against it were ascertained. Apparently they refused that modification, and they appealed to the Supreme Court to get the decree reversed. The Supreme Court affirmed the decree on the merits, but at the request of the appellants appended this modification: "That the money which may be awarded under the reference herein be not paid to the plaintiffs until it shall have been satisfactorily established that the payment will release the owners of the steamship Glamorganshire from all claims on behalf of any consignees or indorsees of the bills of lading." That seems to their Lordships to meet exactly the justice of the case. They think that the plaintiffs have an interest to maintain the suit to recover the money for the benefit of those persons who on the inquiry are proved to be entitled to it, and under circumstances in which the money will not be paid out till the owners of the Glamorganshire are completely freed from all claims. The result is that, in their Lordships' opinion, the appeals fail and should be dismissed and the respective decrees affirmed, and they will humbly advise Her Majesty to that effect. The appellants must pay the costs of the appeals.

COURT OF APPEAL

Thursday, March 15, 1888.

(Before Lord ESHER, M.R., FRY and LOPES, L.JJ.)

BETHELL AND CO. v. CLARK AND CO. (a)

Sale of goods—Goods for shipment abroad—Stoppage in transitu—Delivery on board ship—End of transit.

The purchasers of goods directed the vendor, who carried on business at Wolverhampton, to consign the goods to a vessel then loading in the East India Docks for Melbourne. The vendor accordingly delivered the goods to a railway company as carriers to be forwarded and shipped. Subsequently the vendor, hearing of the insolvency of the purchasers, gave notice to the carriers to stop the goods, but too late to prevent shipment, and the vessel left the port for Melbourne with the goods on board. Before her arrival the vendors claimed the goods from the shipowners as their property.

Held (affirming the judgment of the Queen's Bench Division), that the transit was not at an end till the goods reached Melbourne, and that the vendors were, till then, entitled to stop them in transitu.

THIS was an appeal from a judgment of the Queen's Bench Division (Mathew and Cave, JJ.), reported at 57 L. T. Rep. N. S. 627; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 194; 19 Q. B. Div. 553.

The special case, stated under Order LVII., r. 9, is fully set out in the report in the court below, and shortly the facts were as follows:

On the 1st June 1885 Messrs. Tickle and Co., of London, ordered from Messrs. Clark and Co., of Wolverhampton, ten hogsheads of hollow ware, and on the 28th June 1885 wrote to the vendors asking them to consign the goods "to the Darling Downs to Melbourne, loading in the East India Docks here." The vendors delivered the goods to the North-Western Railway Company to be forwarded to the ship, and the railway company carried them to Poplar and forwarded them thence by a lighterage company as their agents to the vessel, receiving and forwarding to the purchasers the mate's receipt on shipment.

The vendors, being informed that the purchasers were insolvent, gave notice to the railway company to stop the shipment, but the notice was too late, the goods being already on board the vessel. The Darling Downs sailed to Melbourne with the goods on board, but before her arrival the vendors wrote to Messrs. Bethell and Co., her owners, claiming the goods in question as their property. The goods being also claimed by the trustee of the estate of the purchasers, Messrs. Bethell and Co. interpleaded, and the question for the court was, whether the trustee or the vendors were entitled to the possession of or property in the goods.

The Divisional Court (Mathew and Cave, JJ.) gave judgment in favour of the vendors (57 L. T. Rep. N. S. 627; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 194; 19 Q. B. Div. 553).

The trustee appealed.

Willis, Q.C. and Lyon for the trustee.—All right of the vendors to stop in transitu was determined as soon as the goods were put on board the vessel. They were then delivered to the purchasers, and were at their orders. The words "to Melbourne" in the letter of the 28th June must not be read as providing for a consignment to Melbourne, but merely as describing the vessel to which they were to be consigned. They cited

Kendall v. Marshall, Stevens, and Co., 48 L. T. Rep. N. S. 951; 11 Q. B. Div. 356;
Valpy v. Gibson, 4 C. B. 837;
Ex parte Miles, 15 Q. B. Div. 39;
Ex parte Watson, 36 L. T. Rep. N. S. 75; 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 396; 5 Ch. Div. 35;
Dixon v. Baldwen, 5 East, 175.

R. T. Reid, Q.C. and Plumptre, for the vendors, were not called on.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—In this case, purchasers having become insolvent, the unpaid vendors had, according to the law merchant, a right to stop the goods in transitu, even though the property in them might have passed to the purchasers. The rule as to stoppage in transitu has been often stated, and the doctrine has always been liberally construed in favour of the unpaid vendor. When the goods have not been delivered to the purchaser himself, nor to any agent of his to hold for him otherwise than as a carrier, but still remain in the hands of the carrier as such for the purposes of the transit, then the goods are still in transitu, and may be stopped, even though the carrier was the agent of the purchaser to accept delivery so as to pass the property in the goods. The difficulty that has arisen in some cases has been that a question has arisen whether the original transit had ended and a fresh transit begun, and that difficulty has been dealt with in this way: where the transit still exists which was caused either by the terms of the contract or by the orders of the purchasers to the vendor, then the right of stoppage in transitu still exists; but if that transit is over, and the goods are in the hands of the carrier in consequence of fresh directions given by the purchasers for a fresh transit, then the right to stop in transitu has gone. Similarly, if the purchaser orders goods to be sent to a particular place, there to be kept till he gives fresh orders respecting them to another carrier, the original transit ends when they reach that place, and any further transit is new and independent.

Now, in the case before us the contract does not determine the destination of the goods; but it is argued on behalf of the vendors that the purchasers directed that the goods were to be forwarded to Melbourne, so that while they were in the hands of any of the carriers who would forward them to Melbourne, and until they arrived there, they were still in transit, and the right to stop them existed. The question turns on the true construction of the letter of the purchasers of the 28th June, which is as follows: "Please deliver the ten hogsheads of hollow ware to the Darling Downs, to Melbourne, loading in the East India Docks here." The argument on the part of the purchasers was, that those directions were directions to deliver on board a particular ship and nothing more; but that argument amounts to saying that the goods were to be delivered on board the ship, there to be kept as in a warehouse, subject to further orders from the purchaser as to further carriage or discharge. Surely that cannot be the business meaning of the transaction. The ship is loading for Melbourne, goods are to be received on board for carriage to Melbourne, the captain would have no authority to receive them on board as a warehouseman, and the meaning is that these goods were to be delivered on board to be carried to Melbourne. A mate's receipt was given, and a bill of lading was signed which showed that the goods were received for carriage to Melbourne, and therefore what was actually done bears out my construction of the document. It therefore follows, in my opinion, that these goods were in the hands of carriers as such, and in the course of their original transit from Wolverhampton until they reached Melbourne. I think the letter of June 28 gave all the necessary directions, and that the case does not fall within that class of cases where a fresh transit begins in consequence of fresh directions by the purchasers as to a further transit. I need not refer to all the cases cited. Mr. Willis's argument is directly met by the judgment of Bowen, L.J. in Kendall v. Marshall, Stevens, and Co. (ubi sup.), where he says: "Where goods are bought to be afterwards despatched as the vendee shall direct, and it is not part of the bargain that the goods shall be sent to any particular place, in that case the transit only ends when the goods reach the place ultimately named by the vendee as their destination. In Cootes v. Railton (6 B. & C. 422) several cases were cited by Bayley, J. in the course of his judgment, and the principle to be deduced from them is, that where goods are sold to be sent to a particular destination, the transitus is not at an end until the goods have reached the place named by the vendee to the vendor as their destination." In Ex parte Miles (ubi sup.) I cited the test laid down by Lord Ellenborough in Dixon v. Baldwen (ubi sup.), where he says, "The goods had so far gotten to the end of their journey that they waited for new orders from the purchaser to put them again in motion, to communicate to them another substantive destination, and that without such orders they would continue stationary." I applied that rule to the case then before me, and held that in that case the goods had arrived at their destination when they got to Southampton. Such is not the case here, no fresh orders would be necessary in this case until they arrived at Melbourne. I therefore think that the vendors rightly exercised their right to stop in transitu, and that this appeal must be dismissed.

Fry, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The trustee of the purchasers relies on a constructive delivery, that is, a delivery to an agent of the vendees, as terminating the transit. No doubt the transit is at an end when delivery is made to an agent to hold for the vendee, or to await further instructions for the despatch, but when the sole duty of the agent is to transmit, then nothing can be clearer than that the transitus continues whilst the goods are in the hands of such transmitting agents, however many they may be. I will refer to only one authority on the subject. In Berndtson v. Strang (16 L. T. Rep. N. S. 583; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 154; L. Rep. 4 Eq. 481) Lord Hatherley says: "In the ordinary case of chartering it appears to me that the captain or master is a person interposed between vendor and purchaser in such a way that the transitus is not at an end, and the goods will not be parted with, and the consignee will not receive them into his possession until the voyage is terminated, and the freight paid according to the arrangement in the charter-party." I can only come to the conclusion in this case that the railway company, the lightermen, and the shipowners, were all agents to receive the goods for the purpose of carrying them to Melbourne, and that the transit was not at an end until they reached that place.

Lopes, L.J.—I think that the law applicable to this case is to be found in the words of Lord Ellenborough in Dixon v. Baldwen (ubi sup.). Applying that law to this case, the only direction given by the vendees was contained in the letter of the 28th June, and the case really depends on the true construction of that letter. I can only read it as meaning that the goods are to be sent to the shipowners to be forwarded to Melbourne. If so, no fresh orders were required until they reached that place, and the transitus continued until that time. I think the decision of the court below was right, and must be affirmed.

Appeal dismissed.

The Argentino. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM THE PROBATE, DIVORCE, AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION (ADMIRALTY).

Collision—Charter-party—Loss of employment—Measure of damages.

Where it is verbally agreed between a ship's managing owner and certain shipbrokers that on the ship's return to London, where she is expected in a few days, the brokers will provide her with cargo for carriage to foreign ports, and in consequence of a collision with another vessel, for which the other vessel is to blame, she is unable to fulfil the engagement, and her place is taken by another vessel, in estimating her owners' damages evidence of the profits made by the other vessel is inadmissible, and their legal damage is such a sum as represents what a vessel like theirs might ordinarily and fairly be expected to earn having regard to the fact that she is under contract for employment at the time of the collision.

This was an appeal by the plaintiffs in a collision action in rem from a decision of Sir James Hannen, on an objection by the defendants to the registrar's report (58 L. T. Rep. N. S. 643; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 278; 13 P. Div. 61).

The collision took place in the Thames on the 20th Feb. 1887, between the plaintiff's steamship the Gracie and the defendant's steamship the Argentino. It was subsequently agreed between the parties that both vessels should be deemed to be to blame, and the damages were referred to the registrar and merchants.

In consequence of the collision the Argentino was under repairs for some days, and was unable to fulfil an engagement with Messrs. Westcott and Laurance to take a cargo from Antwerp to Batoum.

Messrs. Westcott and Laurance therefore engaged a smaller vessel, the Beta, in the place of the Argentino. After the Argentino had been repaired she was employed by Westcott and Laurance to carry a cargo from Antwerp and London to Odessa.

At the reference the defendants, the owners of the Argentino, claimed (inter alia) 785*l.* 13*s.* 4*d.*, which was made up as follows; (1) 455*l.*, the difference between the gross freight earned by the Beta and that earned by the Argentino; (2) 93*l.*, the freight which the Argentino, being a larger vessel than the Beta, would have earned in excess of that earned by the Beta had she been able to perform the voyage; (3) 237*l.* 13*s.* 4*d.*, being demurrage for eight days, the number of days which it took to load the Argentino in excess of the days occupied in loading the Beta.

The registrar disallowed these items of claim. His report, so far as is material, was as follows:

Messrs. Westcott and Laurance are shipbrokers in London, who collect cargo at Antwerp and London for conveyance to the Black Sea by two different routes, and the vessels employed for each voyage call at different specified ports on the way, one route or round ending at Batoum, the other at Odessa.

About a week or ten days previous to the collision above mentioned, when the Argentino was at sea on a voyage from Sebastopol with a cargo of wheat for London, Mr. Westcott, a partner in the above-named firm, called at the office of Mr. Porteous, the managing owner of the Argentino, and inquired if he had a boat to load for the Batoum route, and, being informed of the expected arrival of the Argentino, it was verbally arranged that the Argentino, as soon as she arrived, discharged her cargo, and could be ready, should proceed to Antwerp to load for a Batoum route. Later on, after the Argentino had arrived in the Thames and had collided with the Gracie, and in consequence needed repairs which would take some considerable time, it was arranged between Mr. Westcott and Mr. Porteous that Mr. Westcott should engage another vessel in lieu of the Argentino for the contemplated voyage to Batoum, and, accordingly, Mr. Westcott engaged the ship Beta, which loaded at Antwerp and in London, and made the same round to Batoum which it was intended the Argentino should make.

The Beta commenced this round by leaving London for Antwerp on the 7th March, and after loading some cargo there returned to London for further cargo, and finally sailed from the Thames about the 20th March.

(a) Reported by J. P. Aspinall and Butler Aspinall, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

The repairs to the Argentino were finished on the 18th March, and a few days before that date Mr. Westcott proposed to Mr. Porteous to load the Argentino for the Odessa route, an offer which Mr. Porteous accepted; and, accordingly, on the 19th or 20th March the ship left London for Antwerp, where she loaded about 300 tons, sailed thence to London on the 27th, where she loaded 1000 tons more, and finally sailed from London on the Odessa round on the 10th April.

The result of the voyages of the Beta and Argentino respectively seems to be this: The Beta earned a gross freight on the Batoum round of 1536*l.*, the Argentino a gross freight on the Odessa round of 1081*l.*, showing a difference of 455*l.*, which sum is claimed as a loss or damage arising from the collision. It is further said that had the Argentino made the same round the Beta did, she would have loaded a full cargo, and, being a larger vessel, would have consequently earned a larger gross freight than the Beta by 93*l.*, which is claimed as a further loss resulting from the collision. Then, again, in consequence of the Argentino being eight days longer loading than the Beta, which is attributed to her cargo not being equally ready for shipment as the Beta's, eight days' demurrage of the ship is claimed at the extravagant rate of 29*l.* 14*s.* 2*d.* per day, equal to 237*l.* 13*s.* 4*d.*, thus making a total claim for consequential damages under this head of 785*l.* 13*s.* 4*d.* I am of opinion that the claim is too remote, and cannot be sustained.

The defendants having objected to this report, the learned President upheld the objection, and sent the report back.

From that decision the plaintiffs now appealed.

May 17 and 29.—Nelson and Meager (Finlay, Q.C. with them), for the plaintiffs, in support of the appeal.—The registrar was right in disallowing this claim. In the first place it is contended that there was no binding engagement between the parties; and secondly, assuming there was the loss is too remote. The claim is for freight which is to be earned on a subsequent voyage, a claim which has never been allowed before. In the cases of The Star of India (35 L. T. Rep. N. S. 407; 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 261; 1 P. Div. 466), and The Consett (5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 34 n.; 5 P. Div. 229) the voyage had begun in respect of which the freight was claimed, and the ship in each case was fixed by a definite charter-party for a certain cargo, a certain voyage, and a certain freight. In the present case all manner of contingencies might have happened to prevent the Argentino carrying out this alleged engagement, and therefore the damage is too remote to be allowed. Where a vessel is sunk instead of being only injured her owners are not entitled to recover demurrage:

The Columbus, 3 W. Rob. 158;
The Clarence, 3 W. Rob. 283;
The Betsy Caines, 2 Hagg. 28;
Hadley v. Baxendale, 9 Ex. 341.

The doctrine that a plaintiff is entitled to a restitutio in integrum does not apply where the loss claimed is too remote, even if the alleged loss be caused by a tort as in the present case:

The Notting Hill, 51 L. T. Rep. N. S. 66; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 241; 9 P. Div. 105;
The Parana, 36 L. T. Rep. N. S. 388; 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 399; 2 P. Div. 118;
Sharp v. Powell, 26 L. T. Rep. N. S. 436; L. Rep. 7 C. P. 253;
Horne v. Midland Railway Company, 28 L. T. Rep. N. S. 312; L. Rep. 8 C. P. 131; Jebsen v. East and West India Dock Company, 32 L. T. Rep. N. S. 321; L. Rep. 10 C. P. 300; 2 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 505.

Sir Walter Phillimore and Boyd, for the defendants, contrà.—The President was right in allowing this claim. There was in fact a binding engagement that the Argentino should be employed on a certain voyage. The loss is the result of the collision, and ought to be allowed. This is not a case of breach of contract, but of tort, and the claimant is entitled to a restitutio in integrum:

Hadley v. Baxendale (ubi sup.);
France v. Gaudet, L. Rep. 6 Q. B. 199;
The Gazelle, 2 W. Rob. 279;
Bodley v. Reynolds, 8 Q. B. 779;
Wood v. Bell, 5 E. & B. 772.

This class of claim has long been recognised in the Admiralty Court, and is in consonance with justice and equity:

The Clarence (ubi sup.);
H.M.S. Inflexible, Swa. 200;
The Gleaner, 38 L. T. Rep. N. S. 650; 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 582;
The Risoluto, 48 L. T. Rep. N. S. 909; 8 P. Div. 109; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 93;
The Yorkshireman, 2 Hagg. 30, n.

This is a stronger case than a claim for demurrage, inasmuch as demurrage is always problematical, whereas this is a claim for a certain profit.

Nelson in reply.

Cur. adv. vult.

Aug. 9.—Lord Esher, M.R.—In this case the question is, whether certain damages ought to be allowed against the owners of the Gracie. It must be taken on the decision of facts by the President of the Admiralty Division, that, at the time of the collision caused, for the purpose of this inquiry, by the fault of the Gracie, the owners of the Argentino had an existing profitable contract with certain parties for the hire of their ship for a future voyage, and that by reason of the collison they lost the advantages of that contract. But it is also apparent that at the time of the collision the Argentino was not sailing under that contract at all; that the voyage on which she was sailing at the time of the collision was under a wholly different and independent contract. The question is, whether any loss in respect of the future contract can be allowed as damage consequent upon the collision. It is argued on behalf of the Gracie that such damage is too remote. It is argued on behalf of the Argentino that she is entitled to a restitutio in integrum.

The first point raised is, whether there is or is not upon these propositions a different rule in the Admiralty from that in the common law courts. The second point is, what is the true meaning of the phrase restitutio in integrum? The third point is, what is the true definition of the phrase that the damages must not be too remote? The fourth question is, whether the damages under consideration are or are not too remote? As to the first point, it would be deplorable if there were any difference, but I am of opinion that there is not. In the case of The Gazelle (ubi sup.), Dr. Lushington, speaking of damages claimed under the rule of restitutio in integrum, says: "And if I find that in the courts of common law the principle has been applied to any case ex delicto in the manner to which I have referred, it will be my duty to adopt and apply the same principle in this and future cases of the like kind, more especially as I do not find that in the practice of this court there has been any such consistent and uniform course of practice as would militate against its introduction." And Dr. Lushington then examines and adopts a ruling of Cresswell J. in the then Court of Common Pleas. And in the case of The Columbus (ubi sup.) he says, again treating of the rule as to damages, "And not only in this court, but in all other courts, the general rule of law is;" and again, "but, although this is the general principle of law, all courts have found it necessary to adopt certain rules for the application of it." Again, in the case of H.M.S. Inflexible (ubi sup.), the same learned judge, on the same matter, says, "Such, I apprehend, are the general principles which a judge at Nisi Prius would lay down for the direction of a jury in a case in which it was their duty to assess the damage." As to the second point, it is often argued as if this rule and the rule as to remoteness were two co-ordinate and inconsistent rules, but, in truth, this is a rule subordinate to the rule as to remoteness. It is a rule as to the measure of damage which is allowed; it does not deal with a damage which cannot be allowed. This rule does not come into play with regard to any claimed head of damage until it has been determined by the rule as to remoteness whether that head of damage can be brought into consideration at all. This is the true effect of what is laid down by Dr. Lushington in The Columbus (ubi sup.). "Under this assumption," he says, "what is the ground upon which he rests his claim for more than the full value of his vessel in the present instance? It has been argued on his behalf that the principle upon which the court proceeds in all matters of this kind is a restitutio in integrum; in other words, the principle of replacing the party who has received the damage in the same position in which he would have been provided the collision had not occurred. As a general proposition, undoubtedly the principle in question is correctly stated, and not only in this court, but in all other courts, I apprehend the general rule of law is that where an injury is committed by one individual to another, the party receiving the injury is entitled to an indemnity for the same; but although this is the general principle of law, all courts have found it necessary to adopt certain rules for the application of it, and it is utterly impossible in all the various cases that may arise that the remedy which the law may give should always be to the precise amount of the loss or injury sustained." Anyone who considers the subsequent part of that judgment will see that the certain rules to which Dr. Lushington refers include the rule as to the remoteness of damage. The rule as to remoteness of damage does no doubt limit the literal application of the rule as to restitutio in integrum, yet in my view the two rules are independent, and the first matter for consideration in any particular case is whether the damage claimed is or is not too remote. This brings me to the third question. As to this it seems to me, as was said in Hammond and Co. v. Bussey (20 Q. B. Div. 79), that it is useless to go further back than to Hadley v. Baxendale (ubi sup.). That case states the rules which have been always since recognised as applicable both to cases of contract and tort. This is the view of the author of Mayne on Damages, and he deduces (p. 44, 4th edit.) the rule as follows: "Having examined the principles by which the assessment of damages is governed, we have next to inquire what ground of damage will in no case be admissible. These grounds may be classed under the general head of remoteness. Damage is said to be remote when, although arising out of the cause of action, it does not so immediately and necessarily flow from it as that the offending party can be made responsible for it." This rule is further explained thus (p. 45): "The first and in fact the only inquiry in all these cases is whether the damage complained of is the natural and reasonable result of the defendant's act; it will assume this character if it can be shown to be such a consequence as in the ordinary course of things would flow from the act, or in cases of contract if it appears to have been contemplated by both parties. Where neither of these elements exists, the damage is said to be too remote." In Sedgwick on Damages there are several phrases used to express the idea. In chapter 2 "the law refuses to take into consideration any damages consequentially or remotely resulting from the act complained of . . . This general principle pervades the civil as well as the common law, and applies equally to cases of breach of contract and of violation of duty; to all cases in short where no complaint is made of any deliberate intention to injure." Citing a French commentator on the French code he says: "The code does not require that the non-performance of the contract should be the immediate and direct cause of the damage, but only that the damage should be the immediate and direct result of its violation, which is a very different thing." He afterwards approves of the definition of Mr. Greenleaf: "The damage to be recovered must always be the natural and proximate consequence of the act complained of." He afterwards points out that the damage relied on must be an actual damage proved in the particular case. It must beside that be the reasonable natural consequential result of the act complained of; but, even though it be in some sense all these, it must moreover be the necessary direct immediate proximate result of the act complained of. A great many of these words seem to be almost, if not quite, synonymous; "reasonable" and "natural" seem to be so, "immediate" and "proximate" seem to be so. The damage then must be an actual damage proved to have occurred in the particular case. It must be the reasonable and natural result of the act complained of. If it can be shown that the result which has occurred is such as would be the consequence of the act in the ordinary course of things, this requirement is satisfied. If the result is such as would not be the consequence of the act in the ordinary course of things, there must be some special circumstances which make it the reasonable and natural result in the particular case. If the result in the particular case fails to satisfy all these conditions, the case fails; the damage cannot be recovered. If the result satisfies these conditions, it must still further be the direct and immediate or proximate result of the act complained of. And it is not so if it is only brought to be the result of the act complained of by reason of some intermediate act or circumstance, which might or might not have happened between the act complained of and the result relied on.

The fourth question is, whether in this case the requisite conditions are satisfied. The act complained of is the wrongful collision. The result relied on is the failure of the agreement as to the future hire of the ship. Is the existence during a voyage of an agreement as to a future independent hiring of a ship, or an existing charter as to a future independent voyage, an ordinary occurrence in shipping business? And more, is it an ordinary consequence of a damaging collision occurring on a voyage that an existing agreement or charter as to a future independent voyage should be frustrated? Neither proposition can be answered in the affirmative. Knowledge of business tells one so; but more conclusive, perhaps, is the fact that there is no trace of damage so resulting being allowed either in the Admiralty or at common law. There are no special circumstances as to this point in the present case. The claim in this case therefore fails to satisfy the necessary condition as to the result being an ordinary result, and cannot be allowed; and also the existence of the agreement as to the future voyage is a circumstance which might or might not happen, as joining the damage relied on to the act complained of, so that the condition as to the damage being the direct and immediate result of the act complained of is not fulfilled. This decision does not conflict with the authorities which have allowed the loss of freight to be earned on the voyage on which the ship is at the time of the collision. A damage preventing the earning of such freight necessarily and in ordinary course leads directly to the result that such freight is lost. This decision therefore does not conflict with the decision in The Star of India (ubi sup.). In that case the Cheviot was heaving short to proceed on the chartered voyage, and the learned judge relied on that fact, reading the evidence of the captain, that "we were actually heaving short on board the Cheviot, for the purpose of getting under weigh for the purpose of proceeding to the said port of Gopalpore." The learned judge then continues: "So the voyage may therefore be said to have begun." So, in the case of The Consett (ubi sup.), the ship was sailing on the chartered voyage. The case of The Risoluto (ubi sup.) is really to the same effect the ship there being injured whilst fishing. The cases of The Parana (ubi sup.) and of The Notting Hill (ubi sup.) are not to the exact point raised in the present case, though useful samples of the application of the rule as to the remoteness of damages. I cannot gather that the point elaborately argued before us was presented in the same way to the President of the Admiralty Division. The main points argued before him were on questions as to the facts on which we have adopted his decision. I am of opinion that the existence of a head of damage which is found to be too remote ought not to be regarded at all. It ought to be treated as not existing. I am of opinion that the appeal must be allowed, so far as the judgment of the learned President directs an inquiry as to any allowance in respect of the loss of the agreement for the future hiring of the vessel.

Bowen, L.J.—In the judgment which I am about to read Lindley, L.J. concurs. I regret not to be able to agree with the judgment of the Master of the Rolls, though I feel considerable diffidence in differing from any view of his. At the time of the collision in question the Argentino, according to the finding of the learned President (which I adopt), was under an engagement with Messrs. Westcott and Laurance, a firm of shipbrokers in London, to call at Antwerp to collect cargo for a Batoum route, and to take a turn for that purpose as one of a line of steamers actually advertised. In consequence of the collision she was necessarily put under repair, and was obliged to abandon her engagement, the Beta, another vessel belonging to other owners, taking her place and earning the profit for the ship she would have received. The learned President has held that the case must be referred to the registrar to ascertain the amount of loss which the owners of the Argentino have sustained by their vessel not being able to fulfil their contract, and has intimated that his calculation is to be made from the profit actually earned on the same voyage by the Beta, after allowing for the difference of capacity, &c., between the two vessels. The owners of the Gracie have appealed from the President's decision, and the question before us is as to the principle on which the damages for this collision should be assessed.

The damages recoverable from a wrongdoer in cases of collision at sea must be measured according to the ordinary principles of the common law. Courts of Admiralty have no power to give more, they ought not to award less. Speaking generally as to all wrongful acts whatever arising out of tort or breach of contract, the English law only adopts the principle of restitutio in integrum subject to the qualification or restriction that the damages must not be too remote; that they must be, in other words, such damages as flow directly and in the usual course of things from the wrongful act. To these the law superadds in the case of a breach of contract (or, so to speak, according to the view taken by some jurists, the law includes, under the head of these very damages, where the case is one of breach of contract), such damages as may reasonably be supposed to have been in the contemplation of both parties at the time they made the contract as the probable result of its breach. With this single modification or exception, which is one that applies only to cases of breach of contract, the English law only permits the recovery of such damages as are produced immediately and naturally by the act complained of. A collision at sea, caused by the negligence of an offending vessel, is a mere tort, and we have only therefore to consider what has been in the particular case its direct and natural consequence. This consequence (in the case of an innocent ship which is disabled by an accident) is that its owner loses for a time the use which he otherwise would have had of his vessel. There is no difference in principle between such a loss and the loss which the owner of a serviceable threshing machine suffers from an injury which incapacitates the machine, or the loss which a workman suffers who is prevented from saving money by the wrongful detention of plant which cannot at once be replaced. A ship is a thing by the use of which money may be ordinarily earned, and the only question in case of a collision seems to me to be, what is the use which the shipowner would, but for the accident, have had of his ship, and what (excluding the element of uncertain and speculative and special profits) the ship-owner, but for the accident, would have earned by the use of her? It is on this principle alone that it is habitual to allow, in ordinary cases, damages for the time during which the vessel is laid up under repair, in addition to the cost of the repairs themselves. But this is merely an application of the general principle, and is not the measure in all cases of the loss. It might conceivably, upon the one hand, be the fact that the damaged ship would not and could not have earned anything at all while laid up for repairs, though such a case must necessarily be exceptional. In such circumstances, nothing ought to be allowed for demurrage. Upon the other hand, the direct consequence of the accident might be that the injured vessel was necessarily thrown out of her employment, not merely during the period of repair, but for a longer period still. In such a case the loss could not properly be measured by the time taken in repairs alone. The questions, therefore, to be inquired into are two. The first, to what extent (if any) the vessel has been thrown out of employment by the accident; the second, what would have been the fair earnings of a vessel such as the Argentino advertised to sail, as was the Argentino, on Messrs. Westcott and Laurance's line to Batoum, excluding, as I have said, everything in the nature of uncertain and speculative profits? When a ship, at the time of collision, is under a charter-party that is lost in consequence of the collision, the existence of the charter-party is admissible and material to show (what otherwise might have been a matter of doubt) that the ship has been thrown out of employment; but I cannot see that for the purpose of such proof the existence of an actual charter-party is essential, since other evidence may be equally cogent to establish the loss of employment. A whaling vessel which loses her season is thrown out of employment just as surely as if she had been a cargo-carrying vessel under a charter that has to be abandoned.

In the present case the Argentino was under an engagement to take her turn at Antwerp to collect cargo. The existence of such an engagement is evidence to show that, but for the accident, she would not have remained idle, but would have been employed, and she must be treated for the purposes of damages, in my opinion, as if she were a ship about to trade on Messrs. Westcott and Laurance's line, and advertised to sail from Antwerp for that purpose, and the extent to which such profitable employment has been lost must be a question of fact, to be decided by the tribunal whose duty it is to assess the damages. It remains, however, still to be considered what is the value at which this loss of employment is to be calculated in the case of a vessel which but for the accident would have been serviceably used by her owner in a particular manner. This is a difficult matter to calculate, but the difficulty is only, after all, one of fact. Where there is an actual charter-party such difficulty is reduced to a minimum. Where there is no charter-party, but merely a reasonable certainty of employment, the matter is left more at large. Probably the most accurate mode of proof would be the opinion of persons acquainted with the trade and with the capacity and condition of the ship, who ought to be able to say what, under the circumstances, would be the ordinary earnings of such a vessel engaged to sail upon, and about in a short time to sail upon such an adventure as distinguished from all uncertain and all special profits which might or might not be reaped in a particular speculation. I do not think that the loss of such average and ordinary earnings in respect of a vessel which was advertised to sail, as the Argentino was, would be other than the direct and natural consequence of the collision. The question is not what would have been the damage that might have been anticipated in the case of other ordinary ships, but what was the direct and actual damage done in the case of the Argentino. We have not to consider, in other words, whether seagoing ships ordinarily have such engagements as the Argentino had at the time of the collision, but what was the direct and natural consequence of a collision to a ship, which in fact enjoyed such prospects of employment. The above reasoning appears to me to be correct on principle, and conformable to authority. In Heard v. Holman (19 C. B. N. S. 1) Erle, C.J. says, "Loss by collision is, amongst other things, loss of the freight which the ship would have earned if she had not been crippled by the collision." See also per Lord Cairns, in The Trent and Humber Company; Ex parte Cambrian Steamship Company (20 L. T. Rep. N. S. 301; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 119; L. Rep. 4 Ch. App. 112) and Wilson v. General Iron Screw Colliery Company (47 L. J. 239, Q. B.). It is as it appears to me on the above grounds, and no other, that loss of a beneficial charter-party has been allowed in the Admiralty Court. See The Star of India (ubi sup.); The Consett (ubi sup.); The Steamboat Narragansett (Olcott's Ad. Rep. 388); and The Stromless (1 Lowell, 153). On these grounds loss of a fishing adventure was allowed in The Risoluto (ubi sup.). In the case of The Clarence (ubi sup.) Dr. Lushington says as follows: "It does not follow as a matter of necessity that anything is due for the detention of a vessel while under repair. Under some circumstances undoubtedly such a consequence will follow, as, for example, where a fishing voyage is lost or where the vessel would have been beneficially employed. Had the owners of the Clarence proved that the vessel would have earned freight, and that freight was lost by the collision, the case would have fallen under the principle to which I have last adverted." So, in the Black Prince (Lush. 568) the measure of the length of demurrage caused by a collision was held to be the length of time during which, by reason of the collision, the vessel had been thrown out of employment. I agree, therefore, generally with the view taken by the learned President below, to the effect that the loss of the future adventure on which the Argentino was advertised to sail must be taken into account. The point at which I part from him is in that part of his judgment in which he considers that the profits earned by the Beta might be given in evidence as a mode of arriving (after due allowance for the differences of the two ships) at the value of the loss by the Argentino of her intended adventure. I cannot help thinking, with all deference to the judgment of so experienced a judge, that this evidence as to the profits of the Beta is, strictly speaking, inadmissible, though, probably, the difference between our two views is important in theory only. I do not think there is any authority for the reception of such evidence, and on principle I am of opinion it is not strictly receivable. What profits the Beta made is really res inter alios acta, and special instances of profits made by other ships cannot be given, I think, in examination in chief any more than in an inquiry into the value of land it would be permissible to offer in examination in chief special instances of the sale of other such land in the vicinity. I propose to vary the direction of the learned President in this respect only, and to direct that the matter go back to the registrar to allow such damages in respect of the collision as would represent the ordinary and fair earnings of such a ship as the Argentino, having regard to the fact that she was put up as one of Westcott and Laurance's line of steamers trading to the Black Sea, and advertised to sail as such. There ought to be no costs of this appeal; the costs of the reference and the costs in the court below ought to be reserved and dealt with by the court below.

HIGH COURT OF JUSTICE.

QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION.

Tuesday, Jan. 15, 1889.

(Before HUDDLESTON, B. and WILLS, J.)

ARMSTRONG AND Co. v. GASELEE AND OTHERS. (a)

Practice—Damage by collision—Action by tow against tug — Preliminary acts — Rules of Supreme Court 1883, Order XIX., r. 28.

The plaintiffs, the owners of the barge H. and of her cargo, employed the defendants' tug W. to tow the H. from one place to another in the Thames. While being so towed the H. was brought into collision with another vessel, and was lost together with her cargo. In an action for damages for negligence against the owners of the tug:

Held, that an order that preliminary acts should be filed under Order XIX., r. 28, was properly refused.

ACTION brought by the owners of the barge Hesperus and of her cargo against the owners of the tug Wasp. The plaintiffs employed the Wasp to tow the Hesperus to a point on the Thames. While being so towed the Hesperus was brought into collision with another vessel with the result that the barge and her cargo were lost.

The indorsement on the writ of summons was as follows:

The plaintiffs claim damages to their barge Hesperus, and the cargo of seed thereon, caused by the negligence of the defendants or their servants whilst such barge and cargo were in their custody or under their control.

The master having refused to order that preliminary acts should be filed under Order XIX., r. 28, the defendants appealed, and Denman, J. referred the application to the court.

Order XIX., r. 28, provides that,

In actions in any division for damage by collision between vessels, unless the court or a judge shall otherwise order, the solicitor for the plaintiff shall within seven days after the commencement of the action, and the solicitor for the defendant shall within seven days after appearance, and before any pleading is delivered, file with the registrar . . . a document, to be called a preliminary act, which shall be sealed up, and shall not be opened until ordered by the court or a judge, and which shall contain a statement of certain particulars.

J. P. Aspinall for the defendants.—The object of requiring preliminary acts to be filed is to prevent one party from shaping his case to meet the case put forward by the other party:

The Inflexible, Swa. 32;
The Vortigern, Ib. 518; 1 L. T. Rep. N. S. 307.

The present case is clearly within the words of Order XIX., r. 28, and there is nothing in the circumstances to take it out of the rule.

Joseph Walton for the plaintiffs.—The present is in substance an action for damages for breach of contract, and is therefore not within the rule at all. The words "damage by collision between vessels" do not apply to a case of this description. The rule only applies as between colliding vessels:

The John Boyne, 36 L. T. Rep. N. S. 29; 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 341.

The object of the preliminary act is that each of the colliding vessels should describe the position of the other. Several of the particulars to be given in the preliminary act can only be applicable to colliding vessels.

J. P. Aspinall replied.

HUDDLESTON, B.—The circumstances of this case render it a difficult one. The plaintiffs' vessel was a barge, and the defendants' tug so towed the barge that it came into collision with another vessel. No doubt it may often be very useful to file a preliminary act. That was said by Dr. Lushington in The Inflexible, and afterwards in The Vortigern. In the latter case he said: "Preliminary acts were instituted for two reasons—to get a statement from the parties of the circumstances recenti facto, and to prevent tha defendant from shaping his case to meet the case put forward by the plaintiff. In practice they have been found very useful, and neither party is allowed to depart from the case he has set up in his preliminary act. Some of the facts stated in the preliminary act are facts absolutely within the knowledge of the party making the statement, some are matters of opinion only. The court will expect correctness where correctness is in the power of the party." That view of Dr. Lushington is carried out by Order XIX., r. 28. In the case of The John Boyne, Sir Robert Phillimore pointed out that, unless there is a mutuality between the plaintiff and the defendant in regard to the information they are able to furnish, preliminary acts should not be ordered to be filed.

The present case is an action in which the plaintiffs sue for damages from the owners of a vessel which did not collide with the plaintiffs' vessel. It is, I think, obvious that what is required in preliminary acts is the view of each of the colliding parties as to what brought about the collision. Can the rule apply then to the present case? Some of the statements required to be made in the preliminary act might present no difficulty; but the statement, for example, as to the course and speed of the vessel when the other was first seen must have reference to the colliding vessel. The vessel in tow cannot know anything about the speed. Then again, the statement as to the lights carried must refer in the present case to those of the tug. Then the tow cannot state what measures were taken to avoid the collision, though the tug can. It is obvious that the statements were intended to be made by the two colliding vessels, and that the rule applies only to them, and not to a case where one of the vessels is forced to collide with a third. The present, therefore, is not a case in which we can order preliminary acts to be filed.

WILLS, J.—I am of the same opinion. One cannot, I think, help seeing that Order XIX., r. 28, applies only to a question arising between two colliding vessels. It is true that the words of the rule are large, but it was necessary to use comprehensive language in order to cover claims by cargo-owners as well as those by shipowners. I should be sorry to say that there might not be cases of this description in which the court could properly order preliminary acts to be filed; but at all events this is not a case in which such an order ought to be made. Either, therefore, the rule does not apply at all to the present case, or, if it does, the court has a discretionary power, and should refuse the order.

Order refused.

ADMIRALTY BUSINESS.

Tuesday, June 26, 1888.

(Before Sir JAMES HANNEN, assisted by TRINITY MASTERS.)

THE CARGO EX ULYSSES. (a)

Salvage—Queen's ship—Duties of—Right to salvage.

Where a British ship is wrecked with cargo in the Red Sea and one of H.M. ships is employed to protect the ship and cargo from plunder by the Arabs, and the commander and crew also assist in saving the cargo by getting it out of the hold and carrying it a considerable distance to lighters, although it may be that the commander and crew are not entitled to salvage in respect of the protection which they give to the ship and cargo by their presence, they are entitled to salvage in respect of anything done outside the ordinary scope of their duties, which would include the placing of sentinels and carrying the cargo.

In a salvage action against cargo, where the ship and cargo had been wrecked in the Red Sea, it appeared that the cargo was carried under a bill of lading exempting the shipowner from liability for loss caused by negligence of the master and crew. The shipowners claimed salvage for services to the cargo and brought in a claim for demurrage of certain of their ships which had rendered services.

The Court referred these matters to the registrar to report how much was due to the salving of the ship and how much to the cargo.

THESE were two salvage actions, tried together, in which the plaintiffs, the commander, officers, and crew of H.M.S. Falcon, and the Ocean Steamship Company, sought to recover salvage for services rendered to the cargo laden on board the steamship Ulysses.

The services were rendered in the Red Sea in Aug. and Sept. 1887 under the following circumstances:

The steamship Ulysses, of 1300 tons net register, whilst bound on a voyage from London to Port Said and Chinese ports, and laden with a cargo of quicksilver and general merchandise, ran on a coral reef, north of the island of Jubal Sereea, in the Red Sea, on Aug. 17. The cargo was being carried under bills of lading which exempted the owners of the Ulysses from liability for loss or damage caused by stranding or wreck however caused, misfeasance, negligence, or default of master and crew. Being unable to get the vessel off it was determined to jettison part of the cargo in shallow water. During these operations a number of armed Arabs appeared upon the scene and began plundering the jettisoned cargo.

On the 19th two lighters and labourers arrived from Suez, and H.M.S. Falcon came up and lent some of her crew to assist in getting the cargo out of the ship's hold. Part of the Falcon's crew were also landed to guard the jettisoned cargo and prevent it from being looted by the Arabs. On subsequent days other steamships belonging to the plaintiffs, the Ocean Steamship Company, came up and gave assistance in attempting to tow the Ulysses off and otherwise. The plaintiffs, in order to save the jettisoned cargo, had to haul it a considerable distance over the coral reef before it could be put into the boats. It was also necessary to keep a number of sentries from the Falcon on guard, by day and night, to protect the cargo from the Arabs.

As to the Ocean Steamship Company the defendants denied that they were entitled to any salvage, on the ground that they were bound to take due care of the cargo after the stranding; and that the alleged services were principally for the purpose of saving the s.s. Ulysses.

As to the Falcon claim the defendants admitted that some services had been rendered by the plaintiffs, but alleged in paragraph 3 of the defence as follows:

> The services rendered by the plaintiffs in guarding and patrolling in the neighbourhood of the wreck are not such services as can or ought to be treated as salvage services. The said services were rendered by the plaintiffs in the course of their ordinary duties as the officers and crew of one of Her Majesty's ships of war towards British subjects and property which were in peril of attack from hostile tribes, and from robbers and pirates.

Sir Walter Phillimore and Nelson for the officers and crew of H.M.S. Falcon.—The officers and crew of the Queen's ship are entitled to salvage. Their services were very valuable, and clearly outside the scope of their duty:

Sir Walter Phillimore in reply.

Sir JAMES HANNEN.—I regret to say that I can scarcely be said to be about to give my judgment in this case, because I am not in a position to give a final judgment in the matter. There is, however, one part of the claim as to which I think it desirable that I should give my decision promptly; I mean the claim on behalf of the officers and crew of H.M.S. Falcon. But the observations I shall have to make on the other claim, that of the Ocean Steamship Company, will show that I am in a great state of uncertainty as to what is the true amount of the salvage which I have to deal with. Therefore I feel that I am to some extent taking a leap in the dark, even with regard to the Falcon claim. If, notwithstanding this, it is desired that I should dispose of the Falcon claim at once, I will do so, because I think I have arrived at a conclusion which is satisfactory to my own mind, and which I hope will be satisfactory to those whose claims I shall have to deal with. [Counsel having assented to the course proposed, the learned President continued:] I must shortly state sufficient of the facts to make my observations intelligible. The Ulysses, a large steamship belonging to the Ocean Steamship Company and having on board a valuable cargo, estimated to be worth 60,000*l*., ran on a reef fringing an uninhabited island in the Red Sea on Aug. 17. The Arabs and some Maltese swarmed on to the island, seeing that there was a ship in danger, and there undoubtedly was great danger that the cargo would be looted. Assistance was at once sent for, and on the 19th the agent of the company at Suez arrived with a lighter and a tug. On the same day H.M.S. Falcon was requested to give assistance in protecting the cargo, and also in doing what was necessary to save it. There can be no doubt that the services rendered by the Falcon were of a very valuable kind. There was not merely the protection afforded by the presence of one of Her Majesty's ships, but also by the posting of sentinels on shore, to prevent the Arabs taking possession of the cargo. In addition to that, the men of the Falcon were engaged on board the Falcon in getting the goods out of the hold, which was full of water which had been fouled to an extraordinary extent. The foulness of the water was not only a source of great annoyance to those engaged in getting out the cargo, but possibly a source of danger, and as the cargo got down lower the men had to stand up to their armpits in this water, and occasionally put their heads under it. Then again, as the cargo was jettisoned in shallow water, there was the labour of getting it from the water to the shore, and then of transporting it about one-third of a mile to the place where it was put into the lighters—very troublesome work when one bears in mind the heat of that season of the year in the Red Sea. The Falcon ceased work at the end of August, but did not leave till the 6th Sept., and then took a large portion of the cargo with her.

With regard to the value of the cargo I am still in very great uncertainty. It seems to have been carried under bills of lading which exempted the Ocean Steamship Company from liability under any possible circumstances. I do not know what the circumstances were that brought about the stranding, but the result now is, that the Ocean Steamship Company treat the matter as though they were strangers who had rendered a salvage service to the whole venture, including their own ship and the whole of the cargo on board. They bring in a claim for the general work which they did during a period from the 17th Aug. to some time in November. They go so far as to bring in as part of that claim a sum of 4000*l*. as demurrage for those vessels which were stopped from time to time in their transit through the Red Sea, in order to assist in getting the Ulysses off. It appears to me to be clear that they have themselves admitted that the whole of these claims are not to be debited to the cargo. The materials for dissecting their claim were furnished very late in the hearing before me. They were subjected to criticism, and it was shown to my satisfaction that many things were charged against the cargo which ought not properly to be charged against it. I was in hopes that by patience I should have been able to unravel the difficulties, but I now propose to refer the matter to the registrar, suggesting that he should divide the account into three parts: First, which of these charges are clearly attributable to the cargo alone? Secondly, which of them are clearly attributable to the ship alone? And thirdly, which of them are attributable to ship and cargo? These seem to me to be broadly the heads of account which have to be determined, and when I know these figures I shall be able to say how much should be assigned to the Ocean Steamship Company for what they did in respect of the cargo. Therefore, as regards that part of the case, I direct it to go to the registrar.

With regard to the Falcon I will now deal with it as best I can. The claim is put forward on behalf of the captain and crew by the authority of the Admiralty. It is to be observed that it is not a claim by the Admiralty which would involve a claim for the use of the ship, but simply a claim by the captain and crew. They are therefore not entitled to bring into consideration the value of the Falcon, as is usually the case in salvage actions. Now arises the question, in what way are the services of the captain and crew to be estimated? It appears to me that there is a certain amount of protection which is so clearly within the duty of one of Her Majesty's ships that it would not give any claim for salvage services. I do not think the Admiralty has sanctioned a claim which is based simply upon the protection offered by the presence of one of Her Majesty's ships against piracy or land robbers. The case is altered when the officers and crew are called upon to do something which is not within the ordinary scope of their duties. That remark applies to the posting of sentinels on this island for the purpose of protecting the cargo, exposed as it was to very great risk. But that alone would not, in my judgment, give rise to a high standard of service. It would be but a reward rather in the spirit in which a generous master gives a gratuity to servants who have been called upon to do something a little outside the scope of their ordinary function. But the getting out of the cargo, and the rescuing of it from the shallow water into which it was first thrown, appears to me to lie entirely outside the scope of Her Majesty's ships, and to entitle those engaged to a substantial reward. I come to the conclusion that 1000*l.* should be awarded to the crew of the Falcon. I do not think the usual course should be followed of giving so large a proportion to the captain, but, as I am told that there are Admiralty regulations upon the subject, I will say no more about it.

The amount of salvage to be paid to the Ocean Steamship Company was ultimately arranged by the parties out of court.

THE APOLLO. (a)

Damage—Dock—Grounding of vessel—Harbour master.

The plaintiffs' vessel having fouled her propeller whilst entering the port and harbour of Port Talbot, was with the authority of the foreman docksman of the defendants (the owners of the dock) placed in a lock leading into the dock for the purpose of being put upon the ground for repairs. On the vessel taking the ground she sustained damage to her bottom by sitting upon the sill of the old lock gates, which had not been removed when the lock was lengthened. In an action by the shipowners against the dock authority:

Held, that there was no duty on the defendants to have the bottom of the lock in the same condition as that of a dry dock; that the user of it for such purpose was an extraordinary user; that the docksman had no authority to allow such user; and that the master of the ship was guilty of negligence in allowing his vessel to be placed in the lock without informing himself of its condition, as he might have done.

THIS was an action in personam by the owners of the steamship Apollo against the Port Talbot Company to recover damages for injury occasioned to the Apollo as hereinafter stated.

The defendants were incorporated by Act of Parliament (4 Will. 4, cxliii., and 4 Will. 4 c. xcviii.) for the purpose (inter alia) of making and maintaining the harbour of Port Talbot, and of making and maintaining docks, locks, and other works at the said port. The defendants were also authorised to and did demand and receive dues in respect of vessels entering and using their docks.

On the 24th Dec. 1887 the Apollo, laden with a cargo of railway iron and tin plates, entered the said dock, and in getting to her berth her propeller fouled a rope stretched across the dock, and was damaged.

For the purpose of repairing the injured propeller the Apollo was placed in the lock leading from the sea to the dock, and the water was let out so that it might be used as a dry dock. The lock had since its original construction been lengthened, and the gates and sill of the old lock gates had never been removed. When the water was drawn off the Apollo rested on this sill, and sustained the damage complained of.

The plaintiffs alleged that a man named Johns, whom they said occupied the position of deputy harbour master, had placed the Apollo in the lock, and represented that its bottom was safe for the vessel to lie upon.

The defendants denied that Johns was deputy harbour master, or that he had made any representation to the plaintiffs as to the lock being a proper place for the Apollo to lie in. Johns was in fact foreman docksman at a weekly salary. It also appeared that at the time in question the harbour master was confined to his bed by an attack of gout, but it was alleged that, as his house was on the quay, the master of the Apollo might have asked his opinion as to whether the Apollo should be allowed to use the lock for the purpose of repairing her propeller.

Johns was called, and the effect of his evidence appears in the judgment.

Barnes, Q.C. (with him Synnott) for the plaintiffs.—The defendants are liable for the injury to the Apollo. It was their duty to see that their docks and locks were in a condition fit for the purposes for which they were used, and the plaintiffs had a right to expect that they would be informed if any hidden danger existed, as was the case here:

Indermaur v. Dames, 16 L. T. Rep. N. S. 293; L. Rep. 2 C. P. 311.

Instead of being told, the defendants' servants represented that this lock was a safe place for the Apollo to lie in. The placing of the Apollo was a matter within the authority of Johns, who in the absence of the harbour master was in charge of the dock, and was therefore held out by the defendants as clothed with authority to control the movements of vessels using it.

Bucknill, Q.C. (with him Moulton, Q.C. and Macrae) for the defendants.—The user of the lock as a dry dock was never authorised by the defendants or their servants. If Johns purported to do so, he was acting beyond the limits of his authority. As a matter of fact he never did represent that it was a safe place for the Apollo to lie in. Moreover her master was guilty of negligence in allowing her to sit on the bottom without first finding out whether there was a sill.

Barnes, Q.C. in reply.

BUTT, J.—In this case the plaintiffs, the owners of the steamship Apollo, sue the Port Talbot Dock Company for damages occasioned to their vessel by reason of her grounding in the lock at the entrance to the harbour of Port Talbot. The claim of the plaintiffs is formulated in several different ways, and they have endeavoured to make use of several strings to their bow. The substance of their case is this: They allege that the Port Talbot Company is authorised by Act of Parliament to carry out certain works, and in consideration of the execution of those works is entitled to charge certain dues. Stopping there, I quite agree with the proposition that when a dock or harbour board is authorised to make works and to levy tolls or dues, it is bound so to construct the works that they shall not cause danger to shipping using them in the ordinary way, but I do not agree with the proposition as a general proposition that the board is bound to make provision for the safety of ships making an extraordinary use of their premises. For instance, I do not for a moment agree with such a proposition as this, that is the duty of a harbour board or dock authority to have the bottom of its lock through which vessels are floated into the docks in the same perfect state as they would have it if it was a dry dock. I say so for this reason: a lock is meant for a vessel to pass through, not to remain in. I therefore hold clearly that there was no duty or obligation whatever on the part of these defendants to have the bottom of this lock perfectly smooth, or to have removed the sill which existed half way along it. The use made by this vessel of the lock at the time she sustained the damage was altogether an extraordinary use, and the question is, the damage having been done in the course of that user of the lock, are the defendants liable?

That question turns first of all upon the consideration as to whether Johns either was or was not held out by the defendants to be a person having authority to allow such user of the lock; and, secondly, upon the consideration of what actually occurred between Johns and the captain of the ship. It is said that Johns was at the time in question the locum tenens of the harbour master, Captain Fitzmaurice, who was laid up with an attack of gout. Now I very much doubt whether, as a matter of law, if Captain Fitzmaurice himself had told the captain of this ship all that Johns is said to have told him whether the defendant company would be liable; and I say so because I think that Captain Fitzmaurice would, in so doing, have been acting entirely beyond the scope of his duty in taking upon himself to put upon his employers the serious responsibility involved in such an operation as that performed on this ship. I certainly should have been prepared to hold that view of the law. But was Johns in the same position as Captain Fitzmaurice, that is to say, had third parties like the captain of this ship a right to assume that Johns was acting there clothed with all the authority of the harbour master? He was in fact not harbour master; he was not deputy harbour master. He was really foreman dockman, paid as such not a salary, but weekly wages. It may be that a servant may be held out by an employer to the world at large as a person occupying a position, and clothed with an authority which he really does not possess, and if the employer so holds him out, the law says he shall be liable for his acts. But on consideration of the evidence in this case I do not think it shows at all that Johns was held out in any way as a person having the same authority as Captain Fitzmaurice, the harbour master. Therefore, I find that Johns did not represent for all purposes, or for anything like all purposes, the harbour master of this port. It is true that Captain Fitzmaurice was ill at this time, but his house is on the quay, and he says he was during the illness consulted frequently by Johns and his clerk about the business of the harbour, and there can be no doubt that if the captain of this ship had chosen to ask Captain Fitzmaurice's opinion as to whether it was safe and advisable to permit this ship loaded as she was to be placed in the lock, he might have had that opinion. But he does not choose to take it, and prefers to rely on Johns, assuming that he has all the necessary authority. I hold, therefore, on this part of the case, without any hesitation, that, assuming Johns said and did all the captain of the ship has asserted, there is no liability on the defendants. Further than that, I do not believe that Johns did say and do anything like as much as the captain of the ship asserts he did.

Now, on another part of the case I am of opinion that there was contributory negligence on the part of the captain of the vessel. I have consulted the Elder Brethren on the point, and they agree with me in thinking that it was negligence on the part of the captain to allow his ship to go into the lock. He knew that she must take the ground, and that the weight of the ship and cargo must practically rest upon the ship's keel. Halfway along this lock are gates which were originally the outside gates of the lock, and I should have thought that any competent master would, before he put his ship across this place, have made careful inquiries as to whether there was a sill or not. But the real truth is this, the captain admitted that he never saw the gates were there, and he took this steamer, loaded with 400 tons of cargo, into the lock, trusting entirely to what he was told by the man who he says was acting as harbour master, and never taking the trouble before his ship went in to walk round and inspect the lock she was going into. I think that was very gross contributory negligence, and it was negligence which contributed directly to this damage. The captain says in his evidence that if he had noticed the middle lock gates he would have suspected a sill, and made inquiries before letting his vessel go in. For all these reasons I have no hesitation in coming to the conclusion that the case against the defendants fails, and that the suit must be dismissed with costs. (a)

THE MOORCOCK. (b)

Damage—Bed of river—Grounding of vessel—Liability of wharfinger.

Where an agreement is entered into between shipowners and wharfingers that a ship shall proceed to a wharf in the Thames for the purpose of discharging and loading cargo, and it is necessary that she should take the ground when the tide ebbs, there is an implied representation by the wharfingers that they have taken reasonable care to ascertain that the bottom of the river at the wharf is in such a condition as not to injure the ship on her taking the ground; and if by reason of the uneven nature of the bed of the river she is injured, the wharfingers are liable.

THIS was an action in personam, by Robert

(a) See The Moorcock, (supra); and The Calliope, p. 359.

(b) Reported by J. P. ASPINALL and BUTLER ASPINALL, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

Thomson, the owner of the steamship Moorcock, against Middleton, Son, and Co. Limited, wharfingers, to recover damages for injury to the Moorcock, caused as hereinafter stated.

The defendants were the owners of a wharf and pier abutting on the River Thames, known as St. Bride's Wharf. In Nov. 1887 it was agreed between the plaintiff and the defendants that the Moorcock should be discharged and loaded at St. Bride's Wharf. Prior to this agreement there was some conversation between the plaintiff and the managing director of the defendant company as to the suitability or safety of the place for the Moorcock to take the ground when the tide ebbed, and on one occasion at high water the plaintiff had seen the place himself. The plaintiff alleged that the defendants had expressly represented that the place was safe. The defendants denied this. The effect of the evidence on this point is stated in the judgment.

On the 14th Dec. the Moorcock was accordingly moored alongside the said wharf by the direction of the defendants for the purpose of discharging her cargo; but as the tide fell and she ceased to be waterborne she took the ground, and in consequence of its uneven nature she sustained the damage complained of.

The bed of the river at the place where the Moorcock took the ground was vested in the Conservators, and the defendants had no control over it.

Barnes, Q.C. and Robson for the plaintiff.—It is contended that the defendants must be taken to have warranted that the bed of the river alongside the wharf was in a reasonably fit and proper condition for the Moorcock to take the ground, whereas the event shows it was not. It is further contended that the evidence shows there was an express representation to the like effect; and, lastly, it is submitted that there was a duty on the defendants to the plaintiff to keep the ground in a proper state, or at any rate to ascertain its condition before allowing the plaintiff's vessel to ground upon it:

White v. Phillips, 15 C. B. N. S. 245; 33 L. J. 33, C. P.

Finlay, Q.C. and Hollams for the defendants, contra.—There was no warranty or representation that the place was safe. The ground was vested in the Thames Conservators, who alone had control over it. The plaintiff might and ought to have ascertained for himself whether the place was safe before mooring his vessel at the wharf. The defendants did all that reasonable men could do, and have been guilty of no breach of duty to the plaintiff.

BUTT, J.—This is a case not free from difficulty, the facts of which, shortly stated, are these: The plaintiff, the owner of the steamship Moorcock, whilst casting about for suitable conveniences for discharging the cargoes which his vessel was in the habit of bringing from Antwerp to London, came to the conclusion that for many purposes St. Bride's Wharf, in the city of London, belonging to the defendants, was a good and convenient place for his purpose, and he accordingly put himself in communication with the defendants, and the result was a negotiation between the parties as to the discharge and loading of this vessel at St. Bride's Jetty. No doubt the arrangement come to was one intended for the mutual benefit of the two parties to it, and therefore whatever the promises or engagements on the one side or the other were, there was good consideration for them. The vessel arrived at the jetty on the 14th Dec. 1887, and was moored apparently properly alongside. She had a cargo of considerable weight on board, and as the tide ebbed she settled down on the ground, becoming less and less waterborne. A strain was put on her from the uneven nature of the ground, a crack or a loud noise was heard, and it turned out that if she had not broken her back she had injured herself in some similar way. In these circumstances the plaintiff says he is entitled to recover these damages from the defendants, and he puts his case in several ways. He says, in the first place, there was a warranty that the place was safe and suitable for his vessel to be in. I do not agree with that. I do not think that there was any such warranty. Certainly there was no express warranty, neither do I think any such warranty was implied. Then he says there was an express representation by the managing director of the defendant company that the place was a suitable place, and therefore a safe place for the vessel to take the ground. Upon this there has been a conflict of evidence, the result of which is that I am by no means satisfied that there was a representation the place was safe or suitable. I think, so far as representation went, it came pretty much to this: "Is the place a good one?" Perhaps the word "suitable" was used. Answer: "Well, there is a vessel of the same size as yours, or thereabouts, lying there now—come and see," and they went and saw a vessel of very nearly the same size, fully the same length, although not quite the same dimensions in other respects. In my opinion, both on the alleged warranty and express representation of the suitability of the place, the plaintiff fails. But now comes a question which, to my mind, is much more difficult. It is clear that the plaintiff could not use these premises without mooring his vessel alongside the jetty, and without her taking the ground at the ebb, and it seems, therefore, to me that the defendants must by implication be taken to have represented at least this much, viz., that they had taken reasonable care to ascertain that the bottom of the river at the wharf was in such a condition as not to injure a vessel using the wharf in the ordinary way. This they have not done, and must therefore pay the penalty. I therefore hold the defendants liable, and refer the damages to the registrar for assessment. (a)

THE CALLIOPE. (a)

Damage — Wharfingers — Representation — Warranty.

The plaintiff's ship the C. was ordered by the defendant company, the consignees of the C.'s cargo, to proceed to the defendants' wharf to discharge. On her arrival the defendants' traffic foreman wrote to her master saying he could bring the C. to the wharf at a certain time, and stating the then depth of the water, and asking him to inform the pilot thereof. On the C. proceeding to the wharf, but before she got into her berth, she grounded on a ridge of mud which had been formed between the berth next the quay and another outside it, and sustained the damage in respect of which her owners now sued the wharfingers.

Held, that the wharfingers were not liable, the representation in the letter being true, and there being no warranty or representation as to the condition of the approaches to the wharf; and that the cause of the damage was the default of the pilot in approaching the wharf when there was not sufficient water, and further that even if there had been any misrepresentation the traffic foreman had no authority to make it.

THIS was an action in personam by the owners of the steamship Calliope against the Tredegar Iron and Coal Company Limited, to recover compensation for damage occasioned to the Calliope as hereinafter stated.

The defendants were the consignees of the cargo laden on board the Calliope, and also the owners of a wharf called the Tredegar Wharf, in the River Usk, at the port of Newport. By the terms of a charter-party dated the 24th March, 1886, the Calliope, after having loaded a cargo of iron ore at Dicido, was to proceed therewith to Newport, and deliver the same where and as directed by the consignees or their agents.

The Calliope arrived off the Alexandra Dock, in the Usk, on Saturday, the 29th May, 1886, with a pilot on board for the purpose of berthing her at the defendants' wharf, where she had been ordered to go.

On the same day one Griffiths, the traffic foreman of the defendant company, wrote the following letter to the captain of the Calliope:

Captain Tucker. Dear Sir,—You can bring your steamer to the Tredegar Wharf Monday morning's tide. You can tell the pilot that we have two feet more water at Tredegar Wharf than at Bathurst Basin.

According to the published tables, assuming the height of water as given at Bathurst Basin to have been correct, there ought to have been enough water to have enabled the Calliope to get alongside the wharf on the day in question.

Accordingly, on Monday preparations were made for berthing the Calliope at the defendants' wharf, but just before reaching the berth she took the ground, and received the injury complained of.

The plaintiffs alleged that Griffiths, the traffic foreman, took upon himself the duty of berthing the vessel, and gave the necessary orders as to the operations to be performed. The defendants denied that Griffiths had given any orders. The effect of this evidence is set out in the judgment.

It was proved by the defendants that there was a notice to pilots, that they were to take upon themselves the responsibility of putting vessels alongside wharfs. It appeared that there were two berths off the defendants' wharf, one immediately alongside it, and another outside the inner berth. Between the two was a ridge, and it was upon this that the Calliope grounded.

Barnes, Q.C. (with him Robson and Holman) for the plaintiffs.—The damage complained of was solely occasioned by the wrongful conduct of the defendants or their servants. The plaintiffs had a right to expect that there would be sufficient water to enable the Calliope to get alongside, and also that the bed of the river would not be in such a condition as to injure the vessel. The defendants in fact warranted the fitness of the berth and its immediate approaches for such purpose. It is also submitted that the defendants expressly represented that the berth was a fit place. Their servant Griffiths, in express terms, represented that there was sufficient water. Moreover Griffiths took upon himself the responsibility of berthing this vessel, and it was through his negligence that the accident happened:

White v. Phillips, 33 L. J. 33, C. P.:
The Moorcock, 13 P. Div. 157.

Finlay, Q.C., Walton, McLaren, and Carvell, for the defendants, contra.—The plaintiffs are not entitled to recover. The berth was in fact a fit one for the purpose. The cause of the accident was the negligence of the pilot in attempting to berth the vessel at a time when there was not sufficient water. If Griffiths made any representations as to the depth of the water, or took upon himself the responsibility of berthing this vessel, he did so in excess of his authority. He was the traffic manager, not a berthing master:

Peek v. Derry, 37 Ch. Div. 541.

It was the duty of the pilot to have ascertained the depth of water before attempting to bring his ship alongside.

BUTT, J.—In this case the shipowner sues the defendant company for injury caused to his ship by the negligence or other improper conduct of the defendants or those in their employ. I have no doubt whatever that this ship was injured, and at the place where she took the ground in the immediate neighbourhood of the defendants' wharf. The damage appears to have been caused in this way: There were two berths off this wharf, one immediately alongside it and another outside, so that if there were two vessels there one would be lying between the outer berth and the wharf. And as is always the case where vessels are in the habit of lying alongside each other, there must be more or less of a ridge between the two, and there is no doubt that such a ridge existed in this case. What was its height there is no evidence to show. All we know is that in the then depth of the water there was not enough of it to enable this vessel to pass over. The result was that in endeavouring to get to the inner berth, when her head was pointing into the wharf and her stern out, she took the ground and lay across the ridge. In these circumstances when the tide receded she was strained and injured, and for that injury the plaintiffs claim to make the defendants liable.

First of all, as I read the plaintiffs' pleadings, they say that there was a warranty as to the fitness of the wharf or berth for the purpose for which it was used. There is no proof whatever that either of these two berths was not in a fit and proper condition for receiving this vessel, and no evidence whatever that if she had been safely got into either of these berths she would have suffered any damage. Therefore even if there were a warranty I do not think there has been a breach of it. The real truth of the matter is that they attempted to take this vessel in when there was not sufficient water for her. Passing from the question of warranty, which I do not think has been established, the next point I deal with is this: The plaintiffs say that there was negligence on the part of the defendants through their servant Griffiths, who played an important part in this matter, and had authority as they say from the defendants to do what it is alleged he did, viz., arrange the time at which the vessel was to come into the berth, practically take upon himself the responsibility of bringing her into the berth, give orders as to the ropes and so on, and thus bring about the accident which happened. In the first place, there is a conflict between the witnesses as to what Griffiths did. The captain and pilot and other witnesses called by the plaintiffs say that he practically took charge of the vessel and gave orders as to how the ropes were to be fixed, as to how the engines were to be moved, and as to how the vessel was to be brought in. Griffiths absolutely denies anything of the sort, and says he never gave any orders. The conclusion to which I have come is that the truth of the matter lies somewhere between the two stories. That Griffiths very likely did interfere to some extent with advice and suggestions, possibly assertions about the depth of water, I know not, but that he did it to anything like the extent the pilot and captain would have us believe I do not accept for a moment, because I do not think it would be within the scope of his ordinary duties to do so. But on this point I am very clear, that whether he took charge of the vessel or not he had no authority from his employers to do so. In the first place, wharfingers would be very ill advised to put a weekly servant into the position to take charge of a vessel out of the hands of her pilot. That consideration leads to the question whether it is likely that a captain or a pilot would depute the charge of his vessel to a servant in the position of Griffiths. The fact is that the pilot was to blame and very much to blame, and that being so he tells a story which he thinks will shift the responsibility on to other shoulders. There is a distinct notice to pilots that they are to take upon themselves the responsibility of putting vessels alongside wharves, and to take his own evidence he acted in contravention of that notice. I do not understand what business he had to let Griffiths interfere, and on his own showing he took the vessel there when he did not believe there was water enough. Then it is said that there was misrepresentation by the defendants through Griffiths of the actual facts existing, and which might be expected to exist at the wharf when this vessel went alongside. This contention is based on a letter written by Griffiths in answer to one from the captain of the ship. The letter dated May 29th is this: "Captain Tucker. Dear Sir,—You can bring your steamer to the Tredegar Wharf, Monday morning's tide. You can tell the pilot that we have two feet more water at our wharf than at Bathurst Basin." What is the effect of that? To my mind it is no more than a representation that there generally was or would be two feet more water at Tredegar Wharf than at Bathurst Basin. I think that is true. Certainly there is no evidence which convinces me that it is not true. Therefore it is not a misrepresentation. But apart from that there comes the old question of authority, and on that I do not think that Griffiths was authorised to make a representation as to when it was safe or otherwise to bring a vessel alongside the wharf. As I have already said, the real cause of this accident was that the pilot chose to try to take this vessel to her berth when there was not enough water for her to get there, and at a time when upon his own evidence he himself doubted whether there was enough. In these circumstances I must hold that the defendants are not liable, and must dismiss the suit with costs. (a)

THE BENLARIG (b)

Salvage—Unsuccessful efforts—Agreement—Right to remuneration.

In a salvage action the plaintiffs were obliged by stress of weather to leave the defendants' vessel in a worse position than that in which they found her. In the statement of claim it was alleged, and admitted in the defence, that there was an agreement between the masters that the salving ship should attempt to tow the defendants' ship to a port of safety. The defendants' ship was ultimately saved by another vessel.

Held, that the plaintiffs were not entitled to salvage in the proper sense of the term, but that, as they had performed the agreement to attempt to save the ship, they were entitled to adequate remuneration for what they had done.

THESE were two salvage actions in rem, in which the owners, masters, and crews of the steamships Vesta and Admiral Rooke respectively sought to recover salvage for services rendered to the steamship Benlarig, her cargo and freight.

At the time of the services the Benlarig, a steamship of 1482 tons register, had broken down off the coast of Spain, and was in need of assistance. In these circumstances the Vesta, a steamship of 647 tons register, while on a voyage from Fiume to Bordeaux, fell in with the Benlarig on the 25th Dec.

According to paragraph 7 of the statement of claim, "the master of the Benlarig requested the master of the Vesta to tow the Benlarig to (a) See The Moorcock, p. 357; and The Apollo, p. 356.

(b) Reported by J. P. ASPINALL and BUTLER ASPINALL, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

Gibraltar, which the latter agreed to attempt to do."

The Vesta thereupon made fast ahead of the Benlarig, and began towing her in the direction of Gibraltar. On the 27th Dec., when the vessels were off Trafalgar Light, the Vesta, in consequence of stress of weather, was obliged to leave the Benlarig. The Vesta thereupon proceeded to Gibraltar alone, where she gave information of the Benlarig, which was subsequently towed into Gibraltar by the steamship Admiral Rooke.

The Vesta towed the Benlarig about 130 miles in very bad weather. The plaintiffs in their statement of claim claimed "such an amount of salvage as may be just."

The defence of the Benlarig in the Vesta's action, so far as is material, was as follows:—

1. The defendants admit that paragraphs 2 to 14 inclusive are substantially correct, except that the damage spoken to in paragraph 8 is greatly exaggerated. At the time the vessels came together as there alleged the sea was calm, and the contact between the vessels very slight.

2. The defendants say that when the Vesta proceeded to Gibraltar as alleged in the 15th and 16th paragraphs of the statement of claim, she abandoned all attempts at salving the Benlarig, and proceeded to Gibraltar for her own safety and for her own purposes, and that she left the Benlarig in a position of the greatest and most imminent danger close to the Mecca Shoal, over which the Benlarig soon after they left beat, and in a far worse position than that in which she was when the Vesta came up and took her in tow, and from which she was preserved by her own anchors and cables, four of which were used holding her after she had been beaten over the said Mecca Shoal.

6. The defendants say that by reason of the precedents that which was done by the Vesta did not constitute a salvage service, and that the plaintiffs are not entitled to salvage reward in respect thereof,

The value of the Benlarig, her cargo and freight, was 78,000*l*.

Kennedy, Q.C. and Barnes, Q.C. for the owners, master, and crew of the Vesta.—The plaintiffs are entitled to a substantial salvage reward. The Benlarig was in fact saved in consequence of the services of the Vesta. She was towed 130 miles on her way to Gibraltar, and the Vesta gave information in Gibraltar of her whereabouts. The fact that the Vesta was obliged to leave her by stress of weather does not deprive her of a right to salvage;

The Jonge Bastiaan, 5 C. Rob. 322;
The E. U., 1 Spinks, 63.

Even assuming the position in which the Benlarig was left by the Vesta to be as bad as, or even worse than, that in which she was found, nevertheless in other respects the Vesta rendered her salvage services for which she is entitled to remuneration:

The Melpomene, 29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 405; L. Rep. 4 A. & E. 129; 2 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 122.

Alternatively it is contended that there was an agreement between the masters that the Vesta should do her best to tow the Benlarig to Gibraltar. This she has done, and is therefore entitled to be paid for it. This agreement is alleged in paragraph 7 of the statement of claim, and is admitted by the defence:

The Aztecs, 21 L. T. Rep. N. S. 797; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 326;
The Cargo ex Schiller, 33 L. T. Rep. N. S. 714; 2 P. Div. 145; 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 439.

Sir Walter Phillimore and Barnes, Q.C., for the owners, master, and crew of the Admiral Rooke, contended that they had rendered valuable services.

Myburgh, Q.C. and Dr. Raikes for the defendants.—The Vesta is not entitled to salvage. She in fact left the Benlarig in a worse position than that in which she found her:

The Cheerful, 54 L. T. Rep. N. S. 56; 11 P. Div. 3; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 525;
The Edward Hawkins, Lush. 515.

The alleged agreement which is alternatively relied upon is merely the usual salvage agreement, and was never meant to confer any right to remuneration in the event of the Vesta being unsuccessful.

Kennedy, Q.C. in reply.

BUTT, J.—This is a case in which two claims are brought for salvage. I will deal with the case of the Vesta first. The Vesta, when on a voyage from Fiume to Bordeaux, fell in with the Benlarig, and was asked by her to render assistance. She accordingly took her in tow, and towed her for some miles. She then left her through stress of weather and proceeded to Gibraltar, and indirectly was the means of sending out the Admiral Rooke to the Benlarig. On the first occasion when the Admiral Rooke went out she did not succeed in finding the Benlarig, but on the second occasion she was successful, and brought her into Gibraltar. Now it is contended on behalf of the defendants that, although the Vesta did what she could and towed the Benlarig 130 miles on the way to Gibraltar, where the captain was anxious to be taken, yet leaving when and where she did she left her in really a worse position than when she fell in with her; that is to say, in a more dangerous position. Whether we consider the position of the Benlarig when the Vesta's tow rope parted, or one rope parted, and she was obliged to cut the other adrift, or her position when she had drifted over the Mecca reef, and at the time when the Vesta started for Gibraltar, the position of the Benlarig was more dangerous than the one from which she had been taken by the Vesta. That has been my view throughout the evidence in this case, and I find it is entirely in accord with the opinion of the Elder Brethren. It is said, and rightly said, that if that is the state of the case the Vesta cannot recover salvage in the ordinary acceptation of the word. So I have held in another case which I consider to be a binding authority on me, and so I must hold again.

But then arises another question. It is said that, apart from mere salvage remuneration which this court awards to successful services, there is here an express contract between the parties, and that that contract has been performed. Let us see how that matter stands. In paragraph 7 of the Vesta's statement of claim it is alleged that "the master of the Benlarig requested the master of the Vesta to tow the Benlarig to Gibraltar, which the latter agreed to attempt to do." The first paragraph of the defence is in these words: "The defendants admit that paragraphs 2 to 14 inclusive are substantially correct, except that the damage spoken of in paragraph 8 is greatly exaggerated." Therefore they admit the allegation, which I regard as an averment of a contract made between the two parties, not a contract merely to render salvage services, and certainly not a contract to take the vessel into Gibraltar; but a contract between the two masters that the master of the Vesta would attempt to do so. The master of the Vesta writing to his owners says: "The captain wanted to be towed to Gibraltar. I promised to do my best for him; terms to be settled by owners and underwriters." Now did the master of the Vesta attempt to tow this vessel to Gibraltar? I think he did, and he has therefore performed the contract mentioned in the pleadings. The question is, what remuneration should be given for this work. The plaintiffs in this action are clearly not entitled, as I have already said, to the rate of salvage remuneration which salvors receive who take their chance of saving a vessel; but still they are entitled to remuneration for hard and dangerous work properly if not effectively done. I am prepared to hold that they are entitled to some payment, and I am glad to be able to so hold, because I think, on grounds of public policy, it would be very unfortunate to discourage vessels from rendering assistance to other vessels in distress. In this, as in some recent cases, I am sorry to see a decreasing tendency to aid vessels that are broken down. Before fixing the amount of salvage the Vesta is to get, I will deal with the case of the Admiral Rooke. [The learned Judge having dealt with the services of the Admiral Rooke, and awarded her 3500*l*, then proceeded:] As regards the Vesta I assess the sum to which she is entitled at 400*l*. I would again point out that the Benlarig was not saved by the Vesta, and that this sum is awarded for fulfilling her contract. The interests of the plaintiffs were so antagonistic that I shall allow costs to both sets.

THE INDIAN CHIEF. (a)

Collision — Lights — Sailing barge — Dredging — Rules and Bye-laws for the Navigation of the River Thames, arts. 6 and 7.

A sailing barge at night dredging down the Thames stern first on the ebb tide with her anchor touching the ground, and her mast lowered, is neither a "sailing vessel under way," nor a vessel at anchor within the meaning of arts. 6 and 7 of the Rules and Bye-laws for the Navigation of the River Thames, and is therefore neither bound to carry side lights nor anchor light, and if she shows a white globe light she does all that prudence requires.

THIS was a collision action in rem, instituted by the owners of the sailing barge Marian against the owners of the steam-tug Indian Chief to recover damages for a collision between the Marian and a barge in tow of the tug.

The collision occurred on the evening of the 17th Nov. 1887, in the Thames, near the Albert Bridge.

(a) Reported by J. P. ASPINALL and BUTLER ASPINALL, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

The facts alleged by the plaintiffs were as follows:—Between 5 and 6 p.m. on the 17th Nov. the sailing barge Marian was dredging down river stern first, with her anchor touching the ground. Her mast was down, and had been down for some time. She carried a white globe light on the mast casing, which was four feet from the deck. The weather was dark and hazy, and the tide was first-quarter ebb. In these circumstances those on board the barge saw the steam-tug Indian Chief coming down the river ahead of her, and distant about 300 yards. The white light was thereupon waved to her, but the tug, instead of keeping out of the way, came on and with the stem of the first starboard barge in tow of her struck the port bow of the Marian.

The facts alleged by the defendants were as follows:—At about 5.30 p.m. on the 17th Nov. the tug Indian Chief was coming down the river with barges in tow, at a speed of about four knots. In these circumstances, as the tug neared the Albert Bridge, the barge Marian was seen 200 feet off showing no light, with her head falling off to the northward. The tug's helm was at once starboarded, but before anything could be done the collision occurred.

Sir Walter Phillimore and Gaskell for the plaintiffs.—The Indian Chief is solely to blame. It was her duty to keep out of the way of the barge, and she failed to do so. There was no duty upon the barge Marian to carry any other light than the light in question. Art. 6 of the Rules and Bye-laws for the Navigation of the River Thames says that, "a sailing vessel under way" shall carry side lights. But she was not a sailing vessel under way. Her mast was lowered, and had been lowered for some time, and she was merely dredging down the river. Neither can she be called a vessel at anchor within the meaning of art. 7. Her case is therefore not covered by the rules, and in exhibiting the white light she did all that reasonable prudence required.

Bucknill, Q.C. (with him Pyke) for the defendants.—The Marian was a sailing vessel, and was moving over the ground. She was therefore a "sailing vessel under way," and ought to have carried side lights. According to the repealed rule, viz., No. 1 of the Rules of 1875, "all vessels under sail" were to carry side lights. The words of the present rule are much more comprehensive, and clearly cover the present case. It is unlikely that such a case as the present, which is constantly happening in the Thames, should not be covered by any of the rules:

The George Arkle, Lush. 382;
The Smyrna, Lush. 385.

To release a vessel under these circumstances from the obligation to carry side lights would be very misleading to other vessels, and would be productive of collisions.

BUTT, J.—The first question in this case is, whether this barge had any lights exhibited at all. Now I have seen and heard the witnesses, and I have not the slightest hesitation in saying that she was carrying the light we have heard of. Then the next question is, was it right or wrong to exhibit a white light and not side lights? If the barge Marian was at the time of the collision "a sailing vessel under way" within the meaning of art. 6 of the Rules and Bye-laws for the Navigation of the River Thames, then undoubtedly the white light was not a right light for her to carry; but I am very clearly of opinion that she was not a sailing vessel under way. She had lowered her mast for the purpose of coming down the river through the bridges, and in the ordinary course of things she would not have raised that mast until she had got below London Bridge. She had started from Wandsworth, and was coming down the river as I have described. In such circumstances I do not think this barge was a sailing vessel under way within the meaning of the rule. It has been said by Mr. Bucknill on behalf of the defendants that it may lead to great inconvenience, and be misleading, if a barge in such circumstances exhibits only a white light. I do not think so. Take the case of a dumb barge. So far as I know there is nothing wrong in her doing so. But whatever amount of inconvenience there may be, I ask myself, what would be the amount of inconvenience if a barge dredging down stern first were to carry side lights? Why the practical result would be that all vessels approaching her from ahead would be under the impression that she was a sailing vessel under way coming towards them. Whereas they would have in fact to deal with practically a dumb barge going away from them. I am therefore of opinion that this barge was not within art. 6.

Now, was she a vessel at anchor, and therefore within art. 7? I do not think she was. I do not think it would have been right for her to carry the light of a vessel at anchor. Therefore she is not within the rules, and that being so, the Elder Brethren tell me that the best thing was for her to carry such a light as she did; that is to say, as a matter of prudence, she ought to have carried the light she did. As to whether she ought to have ported her helm or not, I think nothing of that. If there had been a good look-out on board that tug, he would have seen that barge's light sufficiently soon to have enabled the tug to keep out of the way. I therefore give judgment for the plaintiffs.

THE RESOLUTION. (a)

Collision—Fog—Speed — Helm — Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, art. 13.

If a steamer in a fog cannot reduce her speed sufficiently to comply with art. 13 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, without occasionally stopping her engines, it is the duty of those in charge of her to stop them.

Where those in charge of a steamship in a dense fog hear the whistle of another steamship on either bow, but not so broad that they may reasonably infer that she will clear their vessel, they ought not to manœuvre with the helm before seeing the other vessel.

(a) Reported by J. P. ASPINALL and BUTLER ASPINALL, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

THIS was a collision action in rem instituted by the owners of the steamship Sesostris against the owners of the steamship Resolution. The defendants counter-claimed.

The facts alleged by the plaintiffs were as follows:—Shortly before 8.30 p.m., the Sesostris, a steamship of 1562 tons register, was in the Straits of Gibraltar, laden with a general cargo, on a voyage from Gibraltar to Liverpool. There was a thick fog, and a strong current setting to the eastward at the rate of between three and four knots. The Sesostris was between Carnero Point and Tarifa Point, heading W.N.W. with her engines working slow, and she was making about 3½ knots through the water. In these circumstances those on board heard the whistle of a steamship, which proved to be the Resolution, apparently a little on the port bow. The helm of the Sesostris was thereupon ported and her whistle blown one short blast. Shortly after, the masthead light and immediately afterwards the green light of the Resolution were sighted about two points on the port bow, and distant from one to two cables' lengths. The engines of the Sesostris were thereupon stopped and reversed full speed astern, and the helm put hard-a-port, but the Resolution, coming on at great speed, with her starboard bow struck the port bow of the Sesostris, doing her great damage.

The facts alleged by the defendants were as follows:—Shortly before 8.30 p.m. on the 1st July the Resolution, a steamship of 1269 tons register, was in the Straits of Gibraltar, laden with a cargo of wheat. She was putting back to Gibraltar, having met with an accident, and was between Tarifa and Europa Point, heading about E. There was a dense fog, and she was making about 2 to 2½ knots an hour, with her engines working dead slow. In these circumstances those on board heard a steamer's whistle well on the starboard bow, whereupon the whistle of the Resolution was blown one short blast, and her helm starboarded a little and then steadied. Shortly afterwards the whistle was heard broader on the starboard bow, and almost immediately after the masthead light of a steamship, which proved to be the Sesostris, was seen about three points on the starboard bow, and distant from two to three ships' lengths. The engines of the Resolution were at once stopped and reversed full speed astern, but the Sesostris came on at great speed, and with her stem struck the starboard bow of the Resolution, doing her damage.

Barnes, Q.C. and Joseph Walton for the plaintiffs.

Sir Walter Phillimore and J. P. Aspinall for the defendants.

BUTT, J.—This is a case of collision between two steamers on the early morning of the 1st July in the neighbourhood of Gibraltar. It is common cause that the collision occurred during a dense fog, so dense as to prevent the vessels sighting each other until they had got to very close quarters. The ships were in a general way on opposite but, at the same time crossing, courses. It is clear that the Sesostris was going through the water at the rate of at least five knots an hour, and probably more. I know it is said that there was a strong current against her, and that therefore she could not otherwise hold her own and keep proper steerage way on her. That is a proposition with which I do not agree. I could not agree with it even if the current had been nearer four knots, as it was stated, than it really was. But, taking it at 2½ knots, I am clear that it does not justify her speed. But, whether the speed in itself is justifiable or not, it is perfectly clear, to my mind, that, going at five knots an hour through the water, she ought immediately in the fog to have reduced that speed. She could have reduced it and still had steerage way. I know it is said, and nearly always said in these cases, that large steamers cannot go below a certain rate, because, apart from the question of steerage way, the revolutions would be so slow that the engines would stop on the centre. It is not now suggested that this was the case with the Sesostris, because, according to her engineer's evidence, he could have worked the engines two or three revolutions per minute slower than he did. But if a vessel cannot reduce her speed sufficiently with the continuous action of her engines, and therefore cannot go at what would be a reasonable speed in a fog without occasionally stopping her engines, it is her duty to occasionally stop them. Masters can always carry out the manœuvre in that way, and I will not yield to what I know is the strong disinclination of the masters of these large vessels to stop their engines. They hate and abhor the very idea, but it is, to my mind, their duty to do so, if they cannot otherwise reduce their speed sufficiently. I therefore think the Sesostris was going considerably too fast, and that that had a very material effect in bringing about this collision. For that she must be held to blame. But there is a further question. The master of the Sesostris having as he thought, and thinks still, the whistle of the Resolution on his port bow, he ported his helm. The extent of that porting has been warmly contested, but, whether continuous or not, I think it was wrong. Therefore, on both these grounds, the Sesostris must be held to blame.

Now comes the question whether the Resolution was to blame. I think the evidence establishes that the Resolution, when the whistle of the Sesostris was first heard, was going at a moderate speed—a speed of about 2½ miles an hour. In these circumstances she hears the whistle of the Sesostris on her starboard bow. The witnesses say it was broad, 2½ points on the bow, and her helm is starboarded. I think that was wrong. I have more than once given my reasons why I think that a wrong action. I do not think it possible to tell to a nicety the bearing of a ship whose whistle is heard in a fog, and if you cannot tell to a nicety and alter your helm, you are acting in the dark. I think in any case that would have been wrong. But it was more wrong on the part of the Resolution, for this reason: she was not steering a course straight through the Straits of Gibraltar; she was putting back to Gibraltar, and had to get to the northward of what would be the ordinary course. As a matter of fact we know now that the courses were crossing courses. Her master must have known, or ought to have considered that, in the position in which and the course on which he was, that unless a vessel whose whistle he heard was so broad on his starboard bow as to put them in the position of what is called passed ships, she was a crossing ship, and that the action of his starboard helm would be dangerous. Further, we have some doubt as to whether the Resolution really did not starboard more than she admits. But she is in this further difficulty: she ought to have known that in all probability she was crossing the course of other vessels. That being so, the Elder Brethren advise me that she ought to have stopped as soon as she heard the first whistle. We therefore think that upon both points she was to blame, and therefore hold both vessels in fault.

THE EARL WEMYSS. (a)

Collision — Sailing ships—Close-hauled ship—Luffing—Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, arts. 14, 22.

The decisions holding that a vessel close-hauled, with her yards braced sharp up, may luff close to the wind, does not justify a vessel close-hauled, but rather off the wind, in luffing to the extent of 2½ points when approaching a vessel whose duty it is to get out of her way.

THIS was a collision action in rem instituted by the owners of the sailing ship Ardencaple against the owners of the sailing ship Earl Wemyss. The defendants counter-claimed.

The collision occurred about 8 p.m. on the 8th Sept. 1888 in the South Atlantic.

The facts alleged on behalf of the plaintiffs were as follows:—Shortly before 8.10 p.m. on the 8th Sept., the Ardencaple, a sailing ship of 1737 tons register, whilst laden with a cargo of salt, on a voyage from Liverpool to Calcutta, was in latitude 2° 56′ S. and longitude 27° 27′ W. There was a moderate S.E. wind true (or S.E. southerly magnetic.) The Ardencaple was on the port tack, sailing by the wind with all sail set, the sails lifting. She was heading S.W. by S. ½ S. true (or S.W. ¼ W. magnetic), and was making from six to seven knots. In these circumstances those on board the Ardencaple observed at a distance of about two miles, and bearing about a point on the port bow the green light of a vessel, which proved to be the Earl Wemyss. The Ardencaple kept her course, but when the Earl Wemyss was right ahead and crossing the bows of the Ardencaple, so as to pass starboard to starboard, the Ardencaple luffed a little to check her way. Very shortly afterwards, when the Earl Wemyss was on the starboard bow of the Ardencaple, she shut in her green light and opened her red light, rendering a collision inevitable. As the only chance of avoiding a collision, the helm of the Ardencaple was at once put hard-up, and the weather cross-jack braces and the mizzen halyards were let go to assist her in paying off, but the two vessels immediately came into collision, the stem of the Ardencaple striking the port side of the Earl Wemyss between the main and mizzen masts.

The facts alleged by the defendants were as follows:—At about 8 p.m. the Earl Wemyss, an iron sailing ship of 1411 tons register, whilst on a voyage from San Francisco to Queenstown or Falmouth, laden with a cargo of wheat, was in latitude 2° S., longitude 27° W. The wind was a fresh S.E. trade, and the Earl Wemyss was under all sail, making about 7½ knots on the starboard tack, and heading N. by E. true. In these circumstances those on board the Earl Wemyss observed the red light of a vessel, which proved to be the Ardencaple, distant about two miles, and about 1½ to 2 points on the starboard bow. From the position of the ships the light was assumed, as the fact was, to be that of a vessel close-hauled on the port tack, and the helm of the Earl Wemyss was at once ported. But as the Earl Wemyss was answering her port helm, and after she had brought the Ardencaple ahead, the latter suddenly opened her green and shut in her red light. The Earl Wemyss was rapidly coming up to the wind under her port helm, and the helm was kept to port and hard-a-port as the only possible way of avoiding a collision or lessening its effects. And as the Ardencaple approached the bell of the Earl Wemyss was loudly rung, but the Ardencaple came on, still showing her green light, until the vessels were in very close proximity, when her red light again opened to those forward, and shortly afterwards the bowsprit of the Ardencaple struck the mizzenmast of the Earl Wemyss, and immediately afterwards her stem struck the Earl Wemyss on her port quarter.

The defendants charged the plaintiffs with neglecting to keep a good look-out and to keep their course.

The following Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea were referred to:

Art. 14. When two sailing ships are approaching one another so as to involve risk of collision, one of them shall keep out of the way of the other as follows, viz.: (a) A ship which is running free shall keep out of the way of a ship which is close-hauled.

Art. 22. Where by the above rules one of two ships is to keep out of the way, the other shall keep her course.

It was proved at the trial that there was half a point westerly deviation on the steering compass of the Ardencaple, and 19° westerly variation. The course she was actually steering was in dispute, and the fact is found by the learned judge in the judgment.

Sir Walter Phillimore, Barnes, Q.C., and Leck, for the plaintiffs.—The Earl Wemyss is solely to blame. It was her duty to keep out of the way of the Ardencaple, and this she has not done. The Ardencaple was justified in luffing, and by so doing she does not infringe art. 22 as to keeping her course:

The Aimo, 29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 118; 2 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 96;
The Marmion, 27 L. T. Rep. N. S. 255; 1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 412.

Myburgh, Q.C. and Raikes for the defendants, contra.—The collision was solely caused by the improper luffing of the Ardencaple. The measures taken by the Earl Wemyss were sufficient to have taken her clear of the Ardencaple had they not been counteracted by the luffing of the Ardencaple. The Ardencaple was not sailing absolutely close-hauled, and luffed more than two points—an alteration which is not justified by any previous decisions.

Sir Walter Phillimore in reply.

BUTT, J.—This is a case of a collision of a very serious character between two large sailing ships on the night of the 10th Sept. last in the South Atlantic. The vessels at the time in question were both sailing at considerable speed; the wind was somewhere about S.E.; the Ardencaple was on the port tack, and her magnetic course seems to have been about S.W. by W. ¾ W. The course of the Earl Wemyss, which was steering a compass course, was, I think, N.E. by N. ½ N. magnetic. The commanders of both ships seem to agree upon what were their relative duties. The Ardencaple, being what is called close-hauled in these latitudes and in the trade winds, was bound to keep her course. The Earl Wemyss, having the wind quite free, was bound to keep out of the way of the Ardencaple. There is no doubt that, acting on that view of his duty, the master of the Earl Wemyss determined to pass the other vessel on her port side; that is to say, he ported, and intended to bring the vessels port to port, instead of crossing the Ardencaple's bows. For that purpose he ported and hard-a-ported, and there is no doubt that he had ported a considerable number of points by the time the collision occurred. Now, the officer of the watch and the master of the Ardencaple have given evidence that an order was given to luff on board the Ardencaple. The main question is therefore this: Was the collision brought about by the starboarding or the luffing of the Ardencaple, or was it brought about by the fact that the Ardencaple was not seen by the Earl Wemyss at a proper distance, and that the porting of the Earl Wemyss was too late? There are certain facts practically beyond dispute. The first is that the Ardencaple luffed. Whether she merely luffed so as to bring herself a little closer to the wind, or whether she did something more than that, is perhaps not very clear. But it is rather curious that the officer of the Ardencaple gave an order not to luff merely, but to starboard. The helmsman says he did not hear that order. The captain says he was standing by and said, "Don't starboard; luff;" and says he countermanded the order to starboard. Now, how much did the Ardencaple come to under that order, whatever it may have been? I cannot help thinking that there is strong reason to believe that she came to more, and considerably more, than the point which her master and officers are willing to admit. Her helmsman gives a very different account of the matter. He says that his compass course being S.W. by W. ¼ W., he luffed to S.W. by S.—that is to say, he luffed up 2¼ points. Then he says the sails on her mizzenmast were aback. There is perhaps an attempt on his part to discount his own evidence by saying, "I saw by compass she was heading S.W. by S., but whether the compass was steady or not, I cannot say." The Elder Brethren, however, tell me that they see no reason to believe that the compass would be so unsteady in the weather as it then was as to have misled the man. Therefore it is clear that the Ardencaple luffed, and at a time when the green light of the Earl Wemyss was open on her port bow, and after the Earl Wemyss ported. That is the result of the evidence given by the defendants, and is strongly corroborated by the look-out of the Ardencaple.

If that evidence is true, it seems to me clear that the helm of the Earl Wemyss was ported in sufficient time to have avoided this collision, had not the other ship luffed up under a starboard helm. It is said, and authorities have been cited in support of the contention, that a vessel close-hauled, approaching another whose duty it is to give way to her, does not contravene the statutory rules if she luffs up without losing her way. But those are cases of vessels really close-hauled by the wind — actually and positively close-hauled—with their yards practically as sharp as they can get them, and sailing within about six points of the wind. The Ardencaple was doing nothing of the sort—she was sailing close-hauled, as they call it, no doubt in the trade winds, but really going a point or two free, and therefore she would be able to come up $2\frac{1}{4}$ points under a starboard helm without getting her sails aback. As to the Earl Wemyss, I have some doubts whether her look-out was what it ought to be. It also occurred to me whether, if the Earl Wemyss had ported and hard-a-ported at anything like the distance which her captain says — nearly two miles—she must not have got a good deal more up in the wind and had all her sails flat aback, and been practically head to wind at the time of the collision. Her master's explanation was that she came up slowly at first, then faster under a hard-a-port helm, till she got to about the heading in which the collision occurred, and then hung in the wind. On that the Elder Brethren tell me that there is no difficulty in believing it to have been the state of affairs. Under all the circumstances, I have, with the advice of the Elder Brethren, come to the tolerably clear conclusion that steps for keeping out of the way were taken by the Earl Wemyss in sufficient time and at a sufficient distance, and that really the collision was brought about by the starboarding of the Ardencaple. I therefore pronounce the Ardencaple alone to blame.

COURT OF APPEAL.

Jan. 16 and 17, 1889.

(Before Lord Esher, M.R., Bowen and Fry, L.JJ.)

The Reinbeck. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM THE PROBATE, DIVORCE, AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION (ADMIRALTY).

Lis alibi pendens—Action in rem—Bail—Election.

The owners of the British ship R. and the owners of her cargo sued the German steamship R. in the German Consular Court at Constantinople for damages for injury to the cargo caused by collision between the two vessels. An order was made therein for the arrest of the R., or for bail, subject to the plaintiffs giving security for a certain sum. The action was proceeded with, but the plaintiffs never gave the required security, and consequently the R. was never arrested. The R. left Constantinople during the pendency of the action and came to England, where she was arrested in the present action in rem instituted by the owners of cargo in respect of the same cause of action. Previously to the institution of the present action the defendants had given bail in the action at Constantinople, to which port the R. was a constant trader, although the plaintiffs in that action had never given the required security. The limit of the defendants' liability in the German Consular Court was the value of the R., a sum considerably less than the limit of their liability in this country. Upon motion by the defendants to release the R. without giving bail, or to stay the action:

Held (affirming Butt, J.), that bail having been given without the plaintiffs having deposited the required security, was given voluntarily and not under compulsion, and that the plaintiffs were not proceeding vexatiously in instituting a second action in this country, and that the ship ought not to be released.

Semble (per Butt, J.), that the master of a ship carrying cargo where his ship and cargo have been damaged by collision in or near a foreign port, has authority to institute an action in rem in the foreign port against the offending ship on behalf of both ship and cargo, and the owners of the cargo cannot, so long as that suit is pending in their names, be allowed to deny his authority.

This was an appeal by the defendants in an action in rem from a decision of Butt, J., refusing to release their ship without bail, and stay all further proceedings in the action.

The action was instituted by the owners of cargo lately laden on board the British steamship Red Jacket, against the owners of the German steamship Reinbeck, to recover compensation for damage occasioned to the cargo by reason of a collision between the two vessels.

The collision occurred on the 5th Aug. 1888 in the Bosphorus, and a few days subsequently the owers of the Red Jacket and her cargo formally submitted themselves to the jurisdiction of the Imperial German Consular Court, and instituted an action therein against the Reinbeck.

An application was made therein by the plaintiffs to arrest the Reinbeck, and on the 21st Aug. her arrest was decreed by the German Consular Court under a document, the following being a translation of the material parts thereof:

In behalf of the pretended claim of 25,000*l*. (literally, twenty-five thousand livres sterling), belonging to the plaintiff, against the defendant, on subject of the damage caused to the British steamer Red Jacket by the steamer Reinbeck, the real arrest of the German steamer Reinbeck, mark of distinction L. C. M. Q., now being in the circuit of the German General Consulate of Constantinople, shall be ordered to the amount of its value, and previously for three months, provided that the plaintiff, on account of the damage impending to the defendant in consequence of the arrest, furnishes a security of 55,000*l*. (literally, fifty-five thousand) marks. At the expiration of the three months, if circumstances are unchanged, the arrest will be further ordered on the plaintiff's motion provided that the plaintiff furnishes further security at the rate of 18,000 marks (literally, eighteen thousand marks) a month. After this arrest having been ordered, the execution of it shall be suspended by deposition of 180,000 marks (literally, hundred eighty thousand marks), and the debtor shall be enrightened to make a motion for taking the arrest.

The action was then proceeded with, but the plaintiffs took no steps to deposit the required security, and consequently never were in a position to arrest the Reinbeck, and in October she left Constantinople.

On the 25th Oct. the plaintiffs gave notice to the defendants that they intended to abandon all further proceedings in the Constantinople suit. The defendants at once repudiated their right to do so, and it appeared by affidavit that according to German law the plaintiffs could not do so without the consent of the defendants.

On the 7th Nov. the case again came on for hearing in Constantinople, when the plaintiffs attended and took part in the proceedings.

On the 12th Dec., although the plaintiffs had not given the required security, the defendants put in bail in the Constantinople suit for 180,000 marks, which was the appraised value of the Reinbeck, and according to German law the limit of the defendants' liability.

In the same month the Reinbeck arrived in England, and was then arrested by the owners of cargo on the Red Jacket in the present action.

In an affidavit filed on behalf of the plaintiffs it was alleged that the suit in Constantinople was not instituted with their authority on their behalf; that no security was given in the German Consular Court to entitle the plaintiffs therein to arrest the Reinbeck; that the bail given at Constantinople was not given for the purpose of releasing the Reinbeck, or in pursuance of any order of court; and that the appraised value of the Reinbeck was several thousand pounds below the statutory liability of the defendants according to English law.

In these circumstances the defendants in the English action moved the court to release the Reinbeck, and stay all further proceedings.

Dec. 21.—The motion came on before Butt, J.

J. P. Aspinall, for the defendants, in support of the motion.

Sir Walter Phillimore, for the plaintiffs, contra.

Butt, J.—In this case I am asked to discharge the vessel from arrest, and to stay all further proceedings in this action on the ground that there is another suit pending in the German Consular Court at Constantinople between the same parties, so far as a suit in rem can be said to be a suit between the parties. Now, the first question is, have the plaintiffs in this action, who are the owners of the cargo on board the Red Jacket, instituted a suit in Constantinople against the steamship Reinbeck? I have heard the affidavit of one of the members of the firm, who I think are owners or consignees of the cargo, read, and that has produced no impression on my mind at all to the effect that they have not instituted an action there. They have intrusted their goods to the captain of the ship, they have made him bailee of them, and such a bailee as that is clothed with their authority to institute a suit for a collision happening in this way; and I hold, without hesitation upon the evidence, that the suit at Constantinople is a suit instituted by these owners of cargo, and therefore I think the difficulty about the identity of the parties does not exist. If this had been an action in personam in which there were no means of compelling bail, and in which no bail had been given in the suit at Constantinople, I should not think of stopping it in a summary way upon these affidavits. The question is, it being an action in rem, and bail having been given, ought I to stop it? My view is this that, if the plaintiffs had really compelled the defendants to give bail at Constantinople, and if they had done so under pressure and not voluntarily, with a view of avoiding giving bail here, then I think the defendants would have been entitled to the major part of their motion. But it appears to me the state of things is this: they may have made an offer to give bail at Constantinople, but they did not do so until after their ship had left, and then under a fear that she would be arrested here, and with a view to obviating that they give bail at Constantinople. They have chosen to give bail, and having so chosen, I do not think they are entitled to call upon me in a summary way to release their ship in this suit, and I decline to do so. I say nothing more than that at present; I leave the matter open. Of course they may plead lis alibi pendens, or take any course they think fit, but upon these affidavits I decline to release the ship.

From this decision the defendants now appealed.

Jan. 16, 17.—Bucknill, Q.C. and J. P. Aspinall, for the defendants, in support of the appeal.—The circumstances of this case make it vexatious for the plaintiffs to proceed with their suit in this country. Bail has been given in both suits, and although the ship was never arrested in the foreign suit the defendants were practically obliged to give bail therein. So long as that suit is pending, the plaintiffs might upon giving the required security arrest the ship, were she to come within the jurisdiction of the German Consular Court. The ship is a constant trader to Constantinople, and therefore the defendants, in order to protect their ship from potential arrest, were obliged to give bail. The fact that the plaintiffs might recover more in this country is immaterial, inasmuch as they by instituting their suit there have elected to be bound by its procedure; and, moreover, on bail being given in the foreign suit, the maritime lien on the ship is extinguished, and she is released from all liabilities in respect of that lien:

The Christiansborg, 53 L. T. Rep. N. S. 612; 10 P. Div. 141; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 491;
McHenry v. Lewis, 47 L. T. Rep. N. S. 549; 22 Ch. Div. 397.

Barnes, Q.C. (with him Walton), for the respondents, was not called upon.

Lord Esher, M.R.—In this case an action was instituted in the German Consular Court at Constantinople, against this ship. The ship was not in fact arrested there. Something happened there; that is to say, in my opinion the owners of the ship paid into court the value of the ship without being compelled to do so. In that suit the court had made an order that, if the plaintiff fulfilled certain conditions, the ship might be arrested. Now, in the Admiralty, when a ship is arrested it comes to this, that she must either remain under arrest, or bail must be given. But the plaintiffs in Constantinople could not unless they fulfilled the condition arrest the ship, and could not therefore enforce any obligation on the owners of the ship. They were never in a position which would have enabled them to do so. What the defendants did therefore in Constantinople was to voluntarily make a payment into court of the value of the ship. The ship comes to England, and if what the plaintiffs say is true they have a maritime lien on her. Therefore the English court could enforce that lien when she came within the jurisdiction. It is said that the English court has no jurisdiction to enforce this maritime lien, because the plaintiff by instituting his suit in Constantinople has elected to enforce it there. Now, is there anything which says that in the case of an action in rem, the commencement of a suit in a foreign court is to oust the jurisdiction of an English court which would otherwise have jurisdiction, and prevent it adjudicating? I know of no distinction in that respect between an action in rem and any other action. The general rule is, that the commencement of an action abroad does not prevent the plaintiff suing in an English court for the same cause of action. He is not prevented from suing on the ground that the English court has no jurisdiction, and I know of no difference in that respect in the case of an action in rem.

Now, the English courts have always exercised another jurisdiction, which they could not exercise unless they had jurisdiction to entertain the case, viz., that, if the bringing of the action is in their opinion contrary to good faith or vexatious, then they will stop the proceedings in their court although they have jurisdiction to go on with it. That raises the question whether the proceedings of the plaintiffs here were contrary to good faith or vexatious. There is no allegation in the affidavits that they are contrary to good faith. The plaintiffs never engaged with the defendants at Constantinople that they would not sue in England, and so did not mislead them. Now, where a ship is arrested in a foreign court, and bail is actually taken, and the plaintiffs for the same cause of action arrest the ship in England while bail is standing in the foreign court, if there are no other circumstances, I should say that primâ facie the taking of the same bail twice over is vexations, because it puts the defendant into this position, that in two different places he has to find bail, that is twice over. Primâ facie at all events it would be vexatious. But even then I am not all prepared to say that there might not be other circumstances which would entitle the court to say it was not vexatious. It seems to me that the plaintiffs might prevent it from being vexatious by doing what I have suggested before, by withdrawing their action in the foreign court, and by paying all the costs and expenses incidental to it. Even though they had compelled bail in a foreign court—a course which, so long as the ship was there, was the only proper remedy they had—and the ship was afterwards to come to England where they could compel bail to a larger amount, I am not prepared to hold that the court would necessarily say that the proceedings in England were vexatious. The plaintiffs would have a good business motive for so acting, inasmuch as they would be able to get a more effective remedy here than in the foreign court. But this is a weaker case than either of those I have suggested. Here, the plaintiffs did not compel the defendants to give bail at Constantinople, and could not do so because they never put themselves into a position to demand it. The payment was therefore a voluntary payment. This was in fact a fair stand-up fight between the plaintiffs and the defendants as to whether the defendants by paying money into court at Constantinople, or the plaintiffs by enforcing their maritime lien in England, could get the greater relief. There was no vexation on either side. Both parties have merely acted like business men, and must take the consequences of the law. I am therefore of opinion that this appeal must be dismissed.

Bowen, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The pendency of a foreign action, according to ordinary law, does not oust the jurisdiction of the English courts to try the same cause of action between the same parties. It may well be that in actions in rem there may be circumstances which make it an abuse of the process of the court to proceed with the case, but it is material in each case to see whether it is in fact an abuse of the process of the court or contrary to good faith. That is the law laid down in McHenry v. Lewis (ubi sup.), which has always been followed. I therefore agree with the Master of the Rolls in hesitating to say that wherever bail is given abroad there must necessarily be vexation in suing in this country. I think the judgment in the case of The Christiansborg (ubi sup.) expressed the same view. For instance Fry, L.J. said: "Therefore, without saying that it is impossible that a second action should be allowed where such a release has been obtained, I think that the existence of such a release is the most cogent circumstance against allowing the prosecution of a second action." It is a matter which requires to be explained, and in some cases the plaintiff may give a satisfactory explanation which shows that it is no hardship at all. Here there has been no arrest of the ship, and the bail was given designedly, without compulsion, and voluntarily, and it is obvious that the one object of the defendants was to force the plaintiffs to litigate in the foreign court. How can it be said that these circumstances make it vexatious to sue in this country? I am therefore of opinion that the decision of Butt, J. was right.

Fry, L.J.—I entirely agree. The order which was made for the arrest of the ship was to be in force for three months, and "at the expiration of the three months if circumstances are unchanged the arrest will be further ordered on the plaintiff's motion, provided that the plaintiff furnishes further security at the rate of 18,000 marks a month." At the time when the ship was arrested in England this order had ceased to be operative, which is a further reason for making me think the decision of Butt, J. was right.

Appeal dismissed.

Hart v. Standard Marine Insurance Company Limited. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION.

Insurance, marine — Policy on ship — Warranty against iron cargoes—Cargo of steel—Onus of proof—Evidence.

A policy of insurance upon a ship contained the following clause: "Warranted no iron, or ore, or phosphate cargoes exceeding net register tonnage across the Atlantic." In an action upon the policy, the defendants contended that they were relieved from liability, as the ship at the time of the loss was carrying a cargo of steel blooms, exceeding in weight the tonnage of the ship across the Atlantic.

Held, that the word "iron" being capable of including steel in its meaning, the onus lay upon the plaintiff to show that the commercial meaning of the word "iron," when used in the particular warranty amongst persons engaged in the business of insurance, did not include steel; and that evidence to show that the use of the word "iron" in other commercial documents would not be understood by men of business to include steel was insufficient.

Judgment of Mathew, J. affirmed.

THIS was an appeal by the plaintiff from the judgment of Mathew, J. in favour of the defendants, at the trial of the action before him without a jury in Middlesex.

The action was brought upon a policy of insurance on a ship. The policy contained the following clause: "Warranted no iron or ore, or phosphate cargoes exceeding net registered tonnage across the Atlantic."

During a voyage across the Atlantic the ship in question suffered a partial loss. She was at that time carrying steel blooms, the weight of which exceeded her net registered tonnage.

The learned judge at the trial held that the plaintiff could not recover, as the carrying of steel blooms was a breach of the warranty not to carry iron.

The plaintiff appealed.

Bigham, Q.C. and J. Gorell Barnes, Q.C. for the plaintiff.—The warranty is express, and must be so construed:

Marshall on Marine Insurance, 4th edit. p. 280;
Arnould's Marine Insurance, 6th edit. p. 605.

In business iron and steel have different meanings:

Scott v. Bourdillion, 2 B. & P. (N. R.) 213);
Blacket v. Royal Exchange Assurance Company, 2 C. & J. 244;
Moody v. Surridge, 2 Esp. 633.

Kennedy, Q.C. and Joseph Walton for the defendants.—Iron is a generic word, and includes steel. The purpose of the warranty is as much applicable to steel as iron.

LORD ESHER, M.R.—I do not regret at all the lengthened discussion that has taken place in this case, of which perhaps I was the cause. I have always great hesitation in deciding insurance cases. It is a branch of the law as much considered and applied in America as here; and our decisions with regard to it have to be criticised by lawyers in that country as well as in this. I was at first afraid that we were going to be hurried into the doctrine that descriptive words in a policy of insurance must necessarily have their exact scientific meaning. If I had been asked to say that, because among men of science iron means steel, therefore it must necessarily have that meaning in a policy of insurance, I should have said that the one thing had nothing to do with the other. What is the rule of construction in the case of a warranty of this sort in a policy? There is no rule of construction in the case of a policy of insurance different from the rule in the case of any other written document. The rule is laid down in the works of Marshall, of Arnould, and of Phillips, on marine insurance. The rule laid down by Arnould (6th edit. p. 605) is word for word the same as that laid down by Marshall (4th edit. p. 280): "A warranty is construed according to the understanding of merchants, and does not bind beyond the commercial import of the words." The same rule is laid down by Phillips (3rd edit. sect. 766): "Though a strict compliance with a warranty is required, yet the construction of the language is determined, as in other cases, by usage and common acceptation." That is to say, the meaning of the words is to be determined, not by the sense in which they would be used amongst men of science, but by usage and common acceptation among people engaged in the particular class of business. Usage may enlarge or narrow the ordinary meaning of the words used.

The first question is, therefore, what is the ordinary meaning in which these words, as used in such a context, would be read by men engaged in insurance business. If the words are capable of two constructions you may look to the object with which they are inserted in order to see in which of those senses men engaged in that business would use them. The case of Moody v. Surridge (2 Esp. 633) is a decision to that effect. That was a case in which the policy of insurance contained a clause that "corn" was to be free from particular average. It was contended that malt did not come within the meaning of the term "corn" in the policy. Lord Kenyon said that the usual clause in policies of insurance to be free from average losses was that underwriters should not be subjected to trifling losses in the case of articles insured which were of a perishable nature; corn was of that description; but that it more strongly applied to the case of malt, which was certainly corn, though in a manufactured state, but which was of a still more perishable nature. He was therefore of opinion that this loss came within the exception of the policy, and that the defendant was discharged. The report goes on to say that the jury were of the same opinion, and found a verdict for the defendant. Therefore Lord Kenyon must have left to the jury the question whether "corn" would amongst business men include such a thing as malt. He clearly held that he had a right to consider the purpose of the warranty. Applying that to the warranty in this case, I think that it is possible for the word "iron" in the warranty to include steel. I do not think that it does as used in ordinary life. But I am not prepared to say that in business "iron" is not capable of including steel. If so, the judge who tried this case without a jury has found that steel is within the primary meaning of the word "iron." There was evidence in support of that finding that could not have been withdrawn from a jury. I think that it was not sufficient for the plaintiff to show that in business of a different kind iron and steel had a distinct meaning, whether that business was buying and selling, or whether it was carrying, nor even that they would have a distinct meaning in the body of the policy. The learned judge finding that the primary meaning of iron was one that would include steel, to displace that there must be a usage with regard to warranties of the same kind. It would have to be shown that, in such a warranty, there had come to be an acknowledged and almost invariable usage that the words "iron" and "steel" should have distinct senses. I do not think that the questions were put to the witnesses at the trial so closely to the point as that the answers are sufficient to enable us to differ from the learned judge, who thinks that there was no evidence of any such usage. If the witnesses had been asked whether this particular warranty had become common and usual in the business, I expect that the answer would have been that it had not. If so, there could have been no usage. If they said that it had, then they would have to be asked whether the word "iron" had acquired a distinct meaning in such a warranty. I do not think that they would have said that it had, and certainly they have not said so. The appeal must, therefore, be dismissed.

Bowen, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. I have no doubt that Mathew, J. was right. The rules of construction are the same in construing these policies of insurance as in the case of any other instruments. That is laid down in Robertson v. French (4 East, 130), where Lord Ellenborough says: "In the course of the argument it seems to have been assumed that some peculiar rules of construction apply to the terms of a policy of assurance which are not equally applicable to the terms of other instruments and in all other cases: it is therefore proper to state upon this head, that the same rule of construction which applies to all other instruments applies equally to this instrument of a policy of insurance, viz., that it is to be construed according to its sense and meaning, as collected in the first place from the terms used in it, which terms are themselves to be understood in their plain, ordinary, and popular sense, unless they have generally in respect to the subject-matter, as by the known usage of trade, or the like, acquired a peculiar sense distinct from the popular sense of the same words; or unless the context evidently points out that they must in the particular instance, and in order to effectuate the immediate intention of the parties to that contract, be understood in some other special and peculiar sense." It is to be remembered that this is a commercial document used for a peculiar purpose among merchants, and therefore to that extent to be construed in a particular way. We have not in this case to construe a clause that defines the subject-matter to be carried in the ship; but a warranty which excludes a certain class of cargo which would be dangerous to the ship. The warranty is "warranted no iron or ore, or phosphate cargoes exceeding net registered tonnage across the Atlantic." I should think that there was no business man who did not know that steel is iron in a certain condition of its manufacture.

A good deal of evidence was given at the trial to show that in transactions of sale and the like, and in such documents as bills of lading and charter-parties, business men would not describe steel as iron. That seems to me to follow. It is natural enough that in describing individual matters of commercial contract such matters should be described specifically, and if for the purpose of insurance it is necessary to describe steel specifically, the term "iron" would be inappropriate. But this is a clause that is not intended for the purpose of identification, but for the purpose of excluding certain classes of goods, the weight of which makes them undesirable as cargo. It would naturally therefore be not a specific, but a general description. The description of the other two kinds of cargo mentioned, "ore or phosphate," seems to bear out that view. What are the authorities? In the American case of Coit v. Commercial Insurance Company (7 Johns, 385), evidence was admitted to show that by mercantile usage the meaning of the word "roots" in the memorandum of a policy was confined to roots perishable in their nature, and did not include sarsaparilla, which, although a root, was not perishable. That case shows that evidence is admissible to establish a usage modifying the ordinary use of words found in a memorandum. To the same effect are Scott v. Bourdillion (2 Bos. & P. N. R. 213), Moody v. Surridge (2 Esp. 633), and Mason v. Skurray (1 Park on Ins., 7th edit. 179), all of which cases are collected in 1 Parsons on Insurance, p. 627, note. Therefore the plaintiff was possibly entitled to give evidence to show that iron and steel are used in different senses in mercantile documents. That evidence, however, comes to nothing if the plaintiff cannot show that in a particular warranty, such as this, iron and steel are used in a distinct sense. That was where this case broke down. This being a new form of warranty, it was almost impossible that there could be any usage as to the meaning of the words in it.

Fry, L.J.—In this case a time policy on a ship contains a warranty in the following terms: "No iron or ore, or phosphate cargoes exceeding net registered tonnage across the Atlantic." What is the meaning of the word "iron" in the English language as used by ordinary persons? To my mind it is matter of common knowledge that iron includes steel. That being so, the burden is thrown on those who say that, as used here, the word "iron" has a more limited signification. Now there is an undoubted difference between the use of words for the purpose of describing specific things that are to be dealt with, and the use of words for the purpose of excluding a class of things that are not identified. A specific parrot would naturally be described as a parrot. But if you were desirous of excluding parrots generally from the scope of a contract, you would be more likely to say, "No birds." The evidence at the trial appears to me not to be sufficiently applicable to this precise warranty to discharge the burden of proof that was upon the plaintiff. I think that there is no evidence which cuts down the ordinary meaning of this word and shows that it ought not to have its ordinary effect in this warranty. I do not think that you may look at the purposes of the warranty in order to enlarge the meaning of the words used in it; but I think that you may look at the purposes of the warranty in order to exclude a limitation sought to be put upon the ordinary meaning of those words. It is obvious that in this case the purpose of the warranty applies as much to steel as to any other form of iron. Lastly, the other words used in the warranty—ore and phosphates—are general words, which goes very strongly to show that iron was intended to be used in its general sense. For these reasons I am of opinion that this appeal must be dismissed.

The Longford. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE PROBATE, DIVORCE, AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION (ADMIRALTY).

Collision—Action in rem—Notice of action—City of Dublin Steam Packet Company—6 & 7 Will. 4, c. c., s. 8.

The 8*th section of* 6 & 7 Will. 4 (local and personal), c. 100, which requires notice to be given one calendar month before bringing any "action in any of His Majesty's Courts of law" against the city of Dublin Steam Packet Company, does not apply to collision actions in rem against the company's vessels, and in such cases no notice is necessary.

This was an action in rem, instituted by the owners of the steamship Dublin, her cargo and freight, against the owners of the steamship Longford, to recover damages occasioned by a collision between the two vessels.

The collision occurred in Liverpool Bay on the 26th Oct. 1888.

The defendants were the City of Dublin Steam Packet Company, and by sect. 8 of 6 & 7 Will. 4 (local and personal) c. c.:

No action in any of His Majesty's Courts of law to which the said company (the City of Dublin Steam Packet Company) shall be liable in respect of any damage, injury, or trespass, alleged to be done, committed, or occasioned to or against any ship, lighter, barge, craft, wherry, or any kind of vessel on the high seas, or in any river, port, or harbour, or to or against any passenger on board any steam vessel of the said company, or the owner, shipper, or consignee of any goods, merchandises, or baggage shipped on board thereof, or to or against any person or persons, property, goods, or effects, whatsoever shall be brought, commenced, or prosecuted against the said company, unless one calendar month's previous notice in writing shall have been given by the party or parties commencing such action to the said company, such notice to be given or left at the head or principal office of the said company, nor unless such action shall be brought or commenced within twelve calendar months next after the cause or causes of action shall have arisen in respect of which such action shall be brought or commenced.

The defendants appeared, and by their defence pleaded that the plaintiffs had given them no notice of action (as was the fact) in compliance with the provisions of the above section, and also that on the merits the plaintiffs' vessel was solely to blame for the collision.

Jan. 29.—The point of law raised in the defence now came on for hearing.

Sir Walter Phillimore and Carson for the defendants.

Barnes, Q.C. and Hurst for the plaintiffs.

Butt, J.—This is an action in rem, for damages arising out of a collision occurring on the high seas. The defendants have in substance pleaded that by this Act of Parliament no action shall be brought in any of Her Majesty's Courts of law in which the said company shall be liable in respect of certain injuries of which this charged in the present claim is one, "unless one calendar month's previous notice in writing shall have been given by the party or parties commencing such action to the said company." The section then describes how the notice may be given, and it is not denied that no such notice has been given in the present case. The first question that arises is, is this action against the company within the act? Now in the first place it is not in name an action against the company, neither the company nor any individual shareholder in the company is named in the writ by which this action is commenced; therefore not being a suit against the company in name, primâ facie it is not within the words of the section. But it is not in substance an action against the company for the damage proceeded for, because it is perfectly clear that whatever may be the fact in this particular action, in such actions as this the claim against the res may practically result in a judgment for a much smaller amount than the amount which might be recovered from the owners of the res. For instance, if the damage proceeded for by the plaintiff amounts to 1000*l.* and the value of the res is only 500*l.* it is perfectly clear that in an action in rem, such as this, the utmost amount which the plaintiff could recover would be 500*l.*, or only one-half of the damages for which he proceeded, which he would be entitled to recover in an action against the owners. Therefore, I say in substance this is not an action against the owners, because in an action of this sort it by no means follows that the remedy against the res is co-extensive with what the remedy against the owners would be.

Now in my view, without discussing the policy of the Legislature, this is a section which ought to be construed strictly. I have pointed out that by the mere words this is not an action against the company. But did the Legislature intend that this month's notice should precede an action in rem? It would take a great deal to convince me it did so intend, because the moment that by the wrongful act of those on board a vessel an injury is inflicted on another ship on the high seas there arises what is called a maritime lien on the property which serves as a security to the injured person for the recovery of the damage he has received. Now just consider what would be the effect of holding that this section delayed the institution of the action for one month at least. Why the effect would be in many cases to deprive a plaintiff of the whole of his security. Ships are constantly coming and going, and if the meaning of the Act is what the defendants contend for, the security of the res would be lost in many ways. The ship would in all probability be sent to sea, where she might be salved or collide with another ship, or be lost in various ways, and so the injured party might be deprived of his remedy. I do not think that the Legislature could have intended that the security which the law gives in such cases should be withheld for an indefinite period. There is nothing to prevent this company sending the ship to sea for a voyage for twelve months.

(a) Reported by J. P. Aspinall and Butler Aspinall, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

It may be beyond their statutory powers, but they can do it if they please. Therefore I am not prepared to hold that this Act of Parliament deprives the plaintiffs of their security in this way. It is said that the case of The Parlement Belge (4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 235; 42 L. T. Rep. N. S. 273; 5 P. Div. 197) concludes this question. The utmost that case decides is that the owners of a ship may be said to be indirectly impleaded in a suit in rem. I do not think it concludes the present case at all. I therefore hold that this is not a case in which the company can avail themselves of this section, and give judgment for the plaintiff on this point of law.

From this decision the defendants appealed.

Feb. 6.—Sir Walter Phillimore and Carson, for the defendants, in support of the appeal.—The defendants are entitled to a month's notice under the Act of Parliament. The words are general, and not restricted to actions in personam. It has now been decided that an action in rem impleading the ship impleads the owners:

The Parlement Belge, 42 L. T. Rep. N. S. 273; 5 P. Div. 197; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 235;
The Newbattle, 52 L. T. Rep. N. S. 15; 10 P. Div. 33; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 356.

In the writ the owners of the Longford are named as defendants, and since the Judicature Act the procedure in actions in rem has in many respects been assimilated to the procedure in actions in personam. The plaintiffs by their claim ask for judgment against the defendants. As no notice of action has been given the owners are not responsible, but it is said the ship is, which is negatived by the decision of Dr. Lushington in The Druid (1 Wm. Rob. 399). The very words of the section point to collisions on the high seas which are essentially the subject of an action in rem. The case of The Mullingar (1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 252) is wrong, and not binding on this court.

Barnes, Q.C. and Hurst, for the plaintiffs, were not called upon.

Lord Esher, M.R.—In this case the question is whether an action in rem at the present moment is an action in one of Her Majesty's courts of law to which this company is liable within the meaning of this section of the Act of Parliament. Now in construing a section one must not cut it up into little bits, but you must take it as a whole. The section is not "no action in any of His Majesty's courts of law shall be commenced without a month's notice." It is "no action in any of His Majesty's courts of law to which the said company shall be liable." The Act is to be construed as though we had to construe it the day after it passed. A great many rules of the Judicature Act have been cited. It is said that we are to deal with the case under the Judicature rules It is also said that they are evidence of what the law was before the Judicature rules passed. Now it is obvious in construing this Act of Parliament we have to construe it first, and then see how the Judicature rules are applicable to it. It is not correct to say that the Judicature Act affords evidence of what the law was before the Act. It deals only with procedure; it alters procedure, and was passed for that purpose. An Act which alters procedure is not evidence of what the procedure was before the Act. Therefore we have to deal with this matter wholly irrespective of the Judicature Act. Is it true to say that an action in rem in the Admiralty Court is an action "to which the said company shall be liable." The case of The Parlement Belge (ubi sup.) has been cited to us. Now if there is anything to be collected from that decision which can be applicable to the present case it is that an action in rem against a ship in the Admiralty is not an action in personam, but that it indirectly affects the owners or persons interested in the ship. When you say that it indirectly affects them, that is equivalent to saying that it does not directly affect them. The Parlement Belge (ubi sup.) is really not in point, and if it were, it is against the appellant's argument, and not in favour of it.

On looking at the section, I first of all find it speaks of "actions." That word was not applicable at the passing of the Act to procedure in the Admiralty Court. In the Admiralty actions were called "suits" or "causes" at that time. That in itself perhaps does not settle the matter. But, in the second place, the Admiralty Court was never called one of "His Majesty's courts of law." Nobody ever called it so. It is not one of the courts of law in the ordinary sense. In its beginning it took its jurisdiction from the Lord High Admiral as distinguished from the Sovereign. But I do not lay much stress on these considerations. It may be that it would not be wrong to call the Admiralty Court one of Her Majesty's courts of law in some Act of Parliament; but the question is, whether it is so called in this Act of Parliament. I have endeavoured to show in The Parlement Belge (ubi sup.) that an action in rem is not an action in personam; that it is not that and something else; that it is a different thing from an action in personam. The effects are wholly different. In an action in rem the plaintiff does not necessarily recover that which he has lost; he can only recover that which he has lost to the extent of the value of the property over which he has a maritime lien. If the value of the property is not so large as his damages, he does not recover all his damages. There are numerous other circumstances which show that an action in rem is different from an action in personam. On looking at the section to see to what cases it is applicable, there may be one or more which could have been brought in the Admiralty Court, but most of them could not have been brought in that court at all. Now when we look to the effect, as Butt and Townshend, JJ. did, of what we are asked to do, it is this: to render futile any action in the Admiralty Court at all. If the plaintiffs are to give a month's notice before seizing a ship, and before commencing an action, it is clear they never might be able to seize her at all. She might at once be sent out of the jurisdiction. It is said that the month's notice would enable the defendants to pay the money into court, but the plaintiffs have no means of knowing that what is paid into court is sufficient. The defendants are only liable to the value of their ship. Assume her to be out of the way, then the plaintiffs would have no means of valuing her, and so deciding whether the money paid into court is sufficient. All the circumstances go to show that an action in rem was not within the contemplation of the Act; and if it was not then, it is not now. The action in rem is precisely the same as it was before, except in matters of procedure which have been slightly altered. I am perfectly clear that the judgment of the Irish judge was right, and that Butt, J.'s judgment is right, and that the section does not apply to an action in rem against any of the ships of this company.

Bowen, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The question is whether at the time the Act was passed the section intended to include within its scope actions in rem as well as actions in personam. If we were to hold that this section prescribes that notice of action is to be given one month before any suit in rem is brought in the Admiralty Court, two consequences would follow. In the first place, we should have to hold that a number of words in the section, which are perfectly intelligible in their ordinary sense, are used in a distorted and unusual sense. The words are "no action in any of His Majesty's courts of law to which the said company shall be liable." We should have to apply the word "action" to a suit in the Admiralty Court. We should have to hold that the Admiralty Court, the proper title of which was the High Court of Admiralty, was one of His Majesty's courts, and not only that, but one of "His Majesty's courts of law" within the meaning of the section, although it is not a court of common law at all. We should futher have to hold that an action in rem, which really begins by proceedings against the ship, but which no doubt has the result of citing before the court the shipowner in person, is an action in the ordinary meaning of the words which could be prosecuted against the company. In the first place, therefore, we should have to do violence to the language of the Act of Parliament. The second consequence would be, that we should involve the parties who are injured by a collision with the ships of this company in this strange misfortune, that they would never be able to institute a suit in rem in the Admiralty Court unless they gave a month's notice beforehand; that is to say, unless the ship was in one of the ports a month after the notice was given that would practically make all actions in rem against this company useless if not impossible. For these reasons, were we to construe the Act as contended for, we should have to do more or less violence to language, and the result would be to work manifest injustice to persons. It seems to me we ought not to adopt the argument of the appellants as to the construction of the Act at the time it passed and the present time. It has been said that the Judicature Act makes a difference. How? Has it made an action in rem the same thing as an action in personam? Nothing of the sort. All that it has done has been to amend and modify certain formalities with which an action in rem now commences, but in all other respects in essential matters it differs entirely from an action in personam. Therefore the Judicature Act has made no difference.

The Moorcock. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM THE PROBATE, DIVORCE, AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION (ADMIRALTY).

Damage — Bed of river — Grounding of vessel — Liability of wharfinger.

Where an agreement is entered into between shipowners and wharfingers that a ship shall proceed to a wharf in the river Thames for the purpose of discharging and loading cargo, and it is known to the parties that she must take the ground at low water, there is an implied representation by the wharfingers, even though the bed of the river is not under their control, that it is in such a condition as not to injure the ship on her taking the ground, and if, by reason of the uneven condition of the bed of the river, she is injured, the wharfingers are liable for the damages caused to her.

This was an appeal by the defendants from a decision of Butt, J., holding them liable for injuries occasioned to the steamship Moorcock.

The action was in personam by the owners of the Moorcock against the defendants, who were wharfingers, to recover damages for injury to the Moorcock caused as hereinafter stated.

The defendants were the proprietors of a wharf and jetty abutting on the Thames and known as St. Bride's Wharf. In Nov. 1887 it was agreed between the plaintiffs and the defendants that the Moorcock should be discharged and loaded at St. Bride's Wharf. Accordingly on the 14th Dec. the Moorcock was moored alongside the wharf for the purpose of discharging her cargo; but as the tide fell and she ceased to be waterborne she took the ground, and in consequence of some inequalities in the bed of the river she sustained the damage complained of.

It was known to the plaintiffs and defendants that on the tide ebbing the Moorcock would take the ground.

The bed of the river at the place where the Moorcock took the ground was vested in the Thames Conservators, and the defendants had no control over it.

The defendants made no charge for vessels lying at the wharf, but charged for the use of cranes, and also rates for all goods landed, shipped, or stored.

The further facts of the case appear in the report below (59 L.T. Rep. N. S. 872; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 357; 13 P. Div. 157).

Finlay, Q.C. and Hollams, for the defendants, in support of the appeal.—The learned judge was wrong in fixing the defendants with liability. No case has yet gone so far as to decide that parties are liable for the condition of a river over which they have no control:

Reg. v. Williams, 51 L. T. Rep. N. S. 546; 9 App. Cas. 418;
Mersey Docks Trustees v. Gibbs, 14 L. T. Rep. N. S. 677; L. Rep. 1 H. of L. Cas 93; Heaven v. Pender, 49 L. T. Rep. N. S. 357; 11 Q. B. Div. 503;

It was known to the shipowners that the soil of the Thames is vested in the conservators. It was, therefore, as much within the plaintiff's power as within the defendants' to inform themselves of the condition of the bed of the river. The defendants were in fact ignorant of the danger. The utmost extent of their obligation to the plaintiffs would be to warn them of dangers within their knowledge.

Barnes, Q.C. and Hurst (with them Robson) for the plaintiffs.—There was an implied representation that the berth and bed of the river were fit for the purpose for which they were to be used. It was within the knowledge of both parties that the ship would take the ground at low water. The defendants had the means of informing themselves of the condition of the bed of the river, and it was their duty to ascertain whether it was safe or not. In the circumstances of the present case, shipowners have a right to expect that wharfingers have taken reasonable steps to ascertain the state of the bed of the river:

White v. Phillips, 33 L. J. 33, C. P.; 15 C. B. N. S. 245;
Curling v. Wood, 16 M. & W. 628;
Winch v. Conservators of the Thames, 31 L. T. Rep. N. S. 128; L. Rep. 9 C. P. 378;
Indermaur v. Dames, 14 L. T. Rep. N. S. 484; L. Rep. 1 C. P. 274.

Finlay, Q.C. in reply.

Lord Esher, M.R.—There can be no doubt that the two facts by themselves, of owning this jetty in the river and of there being an uneven bottom to the river in front of the jetty, impose no liability on the owner of the jetty with regard to the public in general. Of that there can be no doubt. The question is, what is the proper implication where the owners of the jetty are in the position in which these defendants are, and have made such a contract as has been made in this case? The question is, not what is their duty to the general public, but what is the implication from the contract into which they have entered with these plaintiffs—what is the contract which they have made with them? Now, I cannot doubt that what the defendants did was to make an agreement with the plaintiffs, to enable them to use their wharf by using the river which is adjacent to the front of the wharf. I agree with Butt, J. that it is most certain, and beyond doubt, that the use of the defendants' premises by vessels such as the Moorcock cannot be had without mooring the vessel alongside the jetty, and without her taking the ground at the jetty. They do not charge directly for the use of their wharf, but they cannot charge anybody anything until the Moorcock is moored to their jetty. I say they cannot earn anything for the use of the wharf until that happens, for this reason: they allow a vessel to be moored alongside their jetty in order that it may be used for loading and unloading goods, and they get paid in that way for the use of their wharf. Therefore they earn nothing without persuading a vessel to moor alongside the jetty. That is a necessary and immediate step to their earning profit by the use of the wharf.

Now, a vessel like the Moorcock cannot be moored to this wharf without being obliged to take the ground at low water on every tide. That is a necessary part of the transaction. Therefore, we have got this: that, in order that the defendants' wharf may be used so that they may earn profit, a vessel like the Moorcock must be moored to their wharf under such circumstances that she must take the ground at every tide. Now, the wharfingers are always on the spot, and if anything happens in front of their wharf they know or have the means of finding out. They in making such agreements as they made with the Moorcock may be doing so with foreign vessels, or with British vessels coming from abroad or other parts of the United Kingdom. A ship's officers have no reasonable means of discovering what the bottom of the river is until they are moored at the wharf and their ship has taken the ground. Now, what is the reasonable implication from such a contract for such a purpose among people of this class? In my opinion, honest business could not be carried on between people in the position of the plaintiffs and the defendants unless you imply that the defendants have undertaken some duty to the plaintiffs with regard to the bottom of the river at this place. If that is so, what is the least onerous duty one can imply? In this case we are not bound to say what is the whole of the duty. All we have to say is, whether there is not at least the duty which the learned judge has held does lie on the defendants. That the defendants can find out the state of the bottom of the river close to the front of their wharf without the smallest difficulty is perfectly obvious to anybody who understands anything about rivers at all. For instance, they can sound the bottom with a pole, or ascertain its condition in a variety of other ways which are perfectly easy. It is the business of persons conversant with rivers, especially when they are on the spot at every tide, to find out the state of the bottom in some way or another. Whether they can see the actual bottom of the river or not at low water is not, to my mind, the least material. Supposing at low water there were two feet of water always over the mud; it makes no difference that they cannot see the bottom. They can feel for the bottom by sounding, or in some similar way, and find out its condition with as much accuracy—nay, with a great deal more accuracy—than if they could see it with their own eyes. When it is so perfectly easy to do this, and when, in order to earn money, business requires a ship to be brought alongside their wharf, in my opinion honesty of business requires, and we are bound to imply it, that the wharfingers have undertaken to see that the bottom of the river is reasonably fit for the purpose, or that they ought, at all events, take reasonable care to find out whether the bottom of the river is reasonably fit for the purpose for which they agree that their jetty should be used; and then, if not, either procure it to be made reasonably fit for the purpose, or inform the persons with whom they have contracted that it is not so. That, I think, is the least that can be implied as the defendants' duty, and that is what I understand the learned judge has implied. He then goes on to say that, as a matter of fact, they did not take such reasonable measures in this case. I myself have not the least doubt in making this implication as part of the contract. I therefore have no doubt that the defendants broke the contract, and they are therefore liable to the plaintiffs for the injury which the vessel sustained.

Bowen, L.J.—The defendants in this case are the owners of a wharf and jetty attached in the river Thames, and the only use to which it is put is holding out to ships facilities for loading and unloading alongside of it. There is only one berth where the ships can lie, and that is close alongside the jetty. The question which arises in this case is whether, when a contract is made to let the use of this jetty to a ship which can only use it, as is known to both parties, by her taking the ground, there is any implied warranty on the part of the wharfingers, and if so what is the extent of that warranty. Now an implied warranty, or as it is called a covenant in law, as distinguished from an express contract or express warranty, really is in every instance founded on the presumed intention of the parties and upon reason. It is the implication which the law draws from what must obviously have been the intention of the parties, an implication which the law draws with the object of giving efficacy to the transaction and preventing such a failure of consideration as cannot have been within the contemplation of either of the parties. I believe that if one were to take all the instances—which are many—of implied warranties and covenants in law which occur in the earlier cases which deal with real property, passing through the instances which relate to the warranties of title and of quality, and the cases of executory contracts of sale and other classes of implied warranties like the implied authority of an agent to make contracts, it will be seen that in all these cases the law is raising an implication from the presumed intention of the parties with the object of giving to the transaction such efficacy as both parties must have intended it shou ld have. Now, if that is so, the reasonable implication which the law draws must differ according to the circumstances of the various transactions, and in business transactions what the law desires to effect by the implication is to give such business efficacy to the transaction as must have been intended by both parties; not to impose on one side all the perils of the transaction, or to emancipate one side from all the burdens, but to make each party promise in law as much, at all events, as it must have been in the contemplation of both parties that he should be responsible for.

Now, what did each party in the present case know? because, if we are examining into their presumed intention, we must examine into their minds as to what the transaction was. Both parties knew that the jetty was let for the purpose of profit, and knew that it could only be used by the ship taking the ground and lying on the ground. They must have known that it was by grounding that she would use the jetty. They must have known, both of them, that unless the ground was safe the ship would be simply buying an opportunity of danger and buying no convenince at all, and that all consideration would fail unless the ground was safe. In fact, the business of the jetty could not be carried on unless—I do not say the ground was safe—it was supposed to be safe. Now, the master and crew of the ship could know nothing, whereas the defendants or their servants might, by exercising reasonable care, know everything. The owners of the jetty or their servants were on the spot at high and low tide, morning and evening. They must know what had happened to the ships that had used the jetty before, and with the slightest trouble they could satisfy themselves in case of doubt as to whether the berth was or not safe. The ship's officers, on the other hand, had no means of verifying the state of the berth, because, for aught I know, it might be occupied by another ship at the time the Moorcock got there. Now, the question is, how much of the peril or the safety of this berth is it necessary to assume in order to get the minimum of efficacy to the business consideration of the transaction which the ship consented to bear, and which the defendants took upon themselves. Supposing that the berth had been actually under the control of the defendants, they could, of course, have repaired it and made it fit for the purpose of loading and unloading. It seems to me that the case of Mersey Docks Trustees v. Gibbs (ubi sup.) shows that those who own a jetty, who take money for its use, and who have under their control the locus in quo, are bound to take all reasonable care to prevent danger to those using the jetty, either to make the berth good or else not to invite ships to go to the jetty, i.e. either to make it safe or to advise ships not to go there. But there is a distinction between that case and the present. The berth here was not under the actual control of the defendants. The berth is in the bed of the river, and it may be said that those owning the jetty have no duty cast upon them by statute or common law to repair the bed of the river, and that they have no power to interfere with it except with the licence of the conservators. Now it does make a difference where the entire control of the locus in quo, be it canal, or dock or river, is in the persons taking toll for the user, and therefore we must modify, to a certain extent, our view of the necessary implication which the law would make in the present case as to the duties of the defendants. We must do so for the reason laid down by Holt, C.J. in his famous judgment in Coggs v. Bernard (2 Ld. Raym. 909) where he says "it would be unreasonable to charge persons with a trust further than the nature of the thing puts it in their power to perform." Applying that modification, which is a reasonable modification, to this case, it may well be said that the law will not imply that the defendants, who had not control of the place, ought to have taken reasonable care to make the berth good, but it does not follow that they are relieved from all responsibility—a responsibility which depends not merely on the control of the place, which is one element as to which the law implies a duty, but on other circumstances. The defendants are on the spot. They must know the jetty cannot be safely used unless reasonable care is taken. No one can tell whether reasonable safety has been secured except themselves, and I think if they let out their jetty for use they at all events imply that they have taken reasonable care to see that the berth, which is the essential part of the use of the jetty, is safe, and if it is not safe, and if they have not taken such reasonable care, it is their duty to warn persons with whom they have dealings that they have not done so. Remember that this is a business transaction as to which the parties may at any moment make any bargain they please. We have to consider that. The question is what inference is to be drawn where the parties are dealing with each other on the assumption that the negotiations are to have some fruit, and where they say nothing about the covenant which the law ought to imply. So far as I am concerned, I do not wish it to be understood that I at all consider this is a case of a duty on the part of the defendants to see that the access to the jetty is kept clear. The difference between access to the jetty and the use of the jetty seems to me, as Mr. Finlay argued, only a question of degree, but when you are dealing with implications which the law prescribes, you cannot afford to neglect questions of degree, and it is just that difference of degree which brings one case on the line and prevents another from approaching it. I confess that on the broad view of this case I think that business could not be carried on unless there was an implication of the nature I have indicated, at all events, in a case where the jetty is to be used as it was in the present case. Therefore, although this case is a novel one, I do not feel any difficulty in drawing the inference that it comes within the line, and that the defendants are liable.

Fry, L.J.—I have come to the same conclusion, and I shall add nothing except this; that the facts that the conservators were under no obligation to remove the saddleback or shingle, or stone which did the damage, and that the defendants had the means of examining the bottom of the river and neglected to do so, are considerations which weigh much with me in coming to the conclusion that there was the implication which the learned judge has relied on.

Lord Esher, M.R.—We ought to have said that we do not think any of the cases cited are authorities binding on the present one. We have gone a step beyond any of them.

The Vindobala. (a)

Co-ownership action — Charter-party—Managing owner—Authority—Honorary engagements.

The managing owner of the ship V., with the authority of his co-owners, entered into negotiations abroad with the view of chartering the ship. These negotiations were carried on by an agent abroad. On the 17th July 1884 a form of charter, signed by the managing owner, was offered to the proposed charterers. They objected to certain provisions in it, to which objections the agent, with the managing owner's authority, assented. On the 19th July the charterers signed the charter, having previously introduced into it certain further alterations which had never been suggested to the managing owner's agent. On the same day certain of the co-owners gave notice to the managing owner that they refused to be bound by any charter. The managing owner, considering himself bound to sign the charter-party, signed it on the 22nd July. The execution of the charter-party was prevented by the arrest of the V. by the dissentient owners, and damages resulted therefrom.

Held (reversing the decision of Butt J.), in a co-ownership action, that there was no binding contract until the managing owner signed the charter on the 22nd July, and that up to the signing of the same any of the owners could revoke the managing owner's authority, and that, as the dissenting owners had revoked their authority on the 19th July, they were not bound by the charter.

The mere fact of an agent being bound in honour to complete a contract which he is negotiating for his principal, where he, the agent, is under no legal liability if he refuses to complete, does not prevent the principal withdrawing his authority any time before the agreement is completed.

Per Lord Esher, M.R.: The managing owner of a ship is the agent of each co-owner separately, and each co-owner may retract his authority to the managing owner without consulting the other co-owners.

The Talca (42 L. T. Rep. N. S. 61; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 226; 5 P. Div. 169) doubted.

This was an appeal from a decision of Butt, J. by certain of the defendants (known as the Bell defendants) in an action instituted by the executors of one Robert Dickinson, deceased, to recover contributions from all the defendants as part owners of the s.s. Vindobala, in respect of expenses incurred by Dickinson and the plaintiffs as managing owners in relation to the management of the vessel.

The facts were presented to the court in the form of a special case, and on the 6th Aug. 1886 the claim was referred to the registrar and merchants to report on the accounts upon the facts stated in the special case.

The registrar accordingly investigated the accounts, and made a report to which both plaintiffs and defendants objected, and they applied to the court to vary the same. At the hearing of the petitions in objection to the report, Butt, J. confirmed the report: (58 L. T. Rep. N. S. 353; L. Rep. 13 P. Div. 42; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 250.) (a)

The facts, so far as are material to the appeal, were as follows:—

For some time prior to the 11th July 1884, Robert Dickinson, one of the plaintiffs, namely, E. J. Walker, and the defendants were the registered owners of the s.s. Vindobala. Robert Dickinson had been appointed managing owner of the ship at a meeting of the owners, held on the 18th April 1882, and continued to be so till his death in Sept. 1884. Shortly after the death of Robert Dickinson, his acting executors, the plaintiffs, became the registered owners of his shares.

As it was expected in July 1884 that the Vindobala would shortly arrive in Rotterdam, negotiations began on the 11th July in reference to chartering her by merchants in Amsterdam. On that day Messrs. Brown, Son, and Co., the London agents of Messrs. Wilson and Armstrong, who were Dickinson's brokers at Newcastle, wrote to Wilson and Armstrong suggesting that they, Brown, Son, and Co., should get a charter for the Vindobala, to which proposal Wilson and Armstrong on the 12th July assented by letter and telegram. Accordingly, on the same day, Brown, Son, and Co. wrote to one Heeres, of Amsterdam, a letter, of which the following is a copy, omitting formal parts:

(a) Reported by J. P. Aspinall and Butler Aspinall, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law

(a) In the report of the proceedings in the court below it is stated that the charter was signed by the managing owner before it was signed by the charterer. This is incorrect, as appears from the present report. The inaccuracy was due to the fact that it was so stated by Butt, J. in his judgment.—Ed.

We have your favour of yesterday, and confirm our wire of date offering the s.s. Vindobala, 1134 nett 19ft. draught; Riga, Amsterdam, Westzaan, or Zaandarm, and trust to hear on Monday first thing that the business is in order, as owner will then be in town. In any case let us know how matters stand.

In this letter was inclosed a charter-party for the Vindobala signed by Brown, Son, and Co. as agents, and dated July 12th.

On the same day, the 12th July, Brown, Son, and Co. wrote to Wilson and Armstrong, telling them of the negotiations with Heeres, and inclosing a copy of the charter in the same terms as that sent to Heeres, and telling them that this was the charter on which they had offered the ship to Heeres. On the 14th July, Brown, Son, and Co. wrote to Wilson and Armstrong a letter, of which the following is a copy, omitting formal and other parts not relating to the ship:

Heeres wired to-day; "Vindobala fixed particulars letter." We are afraid this means some alterations, but trust they are not important. However, in deciding, it is necessary to take into account Baltic freight; 19*s.* has been done from Cronstadt, and 20*s.* is now rate quoted. So it will be necessary to take position of affairs into consideration before declining the Riga business, because terms are not just such as wanted.

On the same day, the 14th July, Brown, Son, and Co. wrote to Heeres a letter of which the following, omitting formal parts, is a copy:

We note your telegram announcing steamer fixed, particulars later, from which we presume there are some alterations, but trust they are not important, otherwise owner will not confirm we fear.

On the same day, the 14th July, Heeres wrote to Brown, Son, and Co. acknowledging receipt of letter of the 12th inclosing charter, and saying that the proposed charterer declined to guarantee the ship free of lighterage at Riga, and asking that his (Heeres') brokerage should be increased.

Brown, Son, and Co. subsequently assented to the brokerage being increased, but instructed Heeres to if possible come to satisfactory terms about the lighterage, and ultimately, on the 17th, telegraphed to Heeres as follows: "Vindobala's charter confirmed; insert if possible, proceed Riga or usual loading-place."

On the 18th July Brown, Son, and Co. wrote to Wilson and Armstrong a letter, saying that they had seen Mr. Wilson (a clerk in Dickinson's office), and had explained the Riga fixture to him, but that as yet they had not received charter copies from abroad. On the same day Heeres wrote to Brown, Son, and Co. saying he had not got the charter signed yet, as the charterer was out of town.

On the 19th July certain of the defendants, called the Bell defendants, gave notice through their solicitors to Dickinson that they declined to continue sailing the Vindobala, or to be in any way bound by any new charter-party, and asked for a bond for the safe return of the vessel.

On the 20th July Heeres wrote to Brown, Son, and Co. inclosing a signed charter-party, which was dated the 17th July.

On the 21st July Brown, Son, and Co. wrote to Heeres, pointing out, as was the fact, that the charter-party signed by the charterer differed from the original form of charter in the following respects, viz., that whereas in the original form the ship was to be cleared free of commission, and the owner and master to have an absolute right of lien on the cargo for all freight, dead freight, and demurrage, and all other charges whatsoever, these provisions were not in the charter-party of the 17th. It also appeared that to the excepted peril clause the words "strikes of workmen, or any other unavoidable accidents over which the charterers have no control," were added to the charter of the 17th. However, notwithstanding these alterations, Dickinson signed the charter-party on the 22nd.

By the terms of this charter-party the Vindobala was to proceed from Rotterdam to the Baltic, and there load a cargo of timber. Accordingly Dickinson, with the object of preventing the outward voyage to the Baltic being unprofitable, entered into a charter-party, dated the 28th July, for the carriage of coals from the Tyne to the Baltic.

On the 3rd Aug. the Vindobala arrived in the Tyne from Rotterdam, and commenced to load a cargo of coals under the charter-party of July 28.

On the 5th Aug. the Bell defendants issued a writ against the Vindobala in an action of restraint, and she was arrested on the same day, when about to put to sea. On the 9th Sept. Dickinson died.

On the 18th Sept. the charter-party of the 17th July was cancelled by agreement between the parties.

On the 21st Oct. E. J. Walker, one of the plaintiffs, was appointed managing owner.

On the 26th Oct. the coals on board the Vindobala took fire, and had to be discharged, and in respect of this the shipowners had to pay damages.

On the 19th Dec. bail was given in the action of restraint, when the ship was released.

In addition to the Bell defendants were other defendants, known as the Craven defendants, who objected to the registrar's report for reasons which appear in the report in the court below, but who were not appealing from the decision of Butt, J.

The plaintiffs claimed contributions from the owners in respect of the coal charter of the 28th July, and the expenses of the ship while under arrest.

Butt, J. held that the Bell defendants were bound by the charters of the 17th and 28th July, and that they were liable for all expenses consequent on the arrest, and that the damage to the coal was to be borne rateably by all the co-owners.

Barnes, Q.C. (with him Balloch) for the Bell defendants, in support of the appeal.—The appellants gave notice to the managing owner that they would not be bound by any new charter before the charter of the 17th July was concluded. They were therefore not bound by that charter, and are not liable to any losses incidental to it. The authority of the managing owner's agent was either to conclude a charter in terms similar to the original form of charter of the 12th, or, in the event of any substantial alterations being proposed by the charter, to refer them to the managing owner for acceptance. Heeres was never bound in honour to conclude a charter containing the terms of the second charter, and even if he was, the court will not take notice of honorary engagements:

Warwick v. Slade, 3 Camp. 127;
Heyman v. Neale, 2 Camp. 337;
Farmer v. Robinson, 2 Camp. 338, n.

In the event of the managing owner instructing his agent not to conclude the charter, the agent was under no legal liability to the charterer for breaking off the negotiations:

Perry v. Barnett, 53 L. T. Rep. N. S. 585; 15 Q. B. Div. 388;
Seymour v. Bridge, 14 Q. B. Div. 460;
Read v. Anderson, 51 L. T. Rep. N. S. 55; 13 Q. B. Div. 779.

Moreover, the Bell defendants were under the circumstances entitled to arrest the Vindobala, even assuming they were bound by the charter:

The Talca, 42 L. T. Rep. N. S. 61; 5 P. Div. 169; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 226;
The England, 56 L. T. Rep. N. S. 896; 12 P. Div. 32; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 140;
The Apollo, 1 Hagg. 306.

John Mansfield, for the plaintiffs, contra.—The charter of the 17th July was in substance concluded before the Bell defendants gave notice of objection. The precise form of charter had not then been finally agreed upon, but the ship was in fact fixed for a certain voyage at a certain rate of freight. These negotiations had gone so far that each co-owner had impliedly contracted that he would not then withdraw his authority, when to do so would be not only a breach of honour, but also a violation of the ordinary principles of business:

Cory v. Patton, 30 L. T. Rep. N. S. 758: 26 L. T. Rep. N. S. 161; L. Rep. 9 Q. B. 577; L. Rep. 7 Q. B. 309; Ionides v. Pender, 30 L. T. Rep. N. S. 547; L. Rep. 9 Q. B. 531.

The arrest of the Vindobala by the Bell defendants cannot be supported in this court on the authority of The Talca (ubi sup.). [Lord Esher, M.R.—I do not know whether it will be necessary to consider the question of arrest, but I am far from saying that this court will necessarily concur in that decision.]

Joseph Walton for the Craven defendants.—The Bell defendants were not in a position to retract their authority. Co-owners constitute a partnership at will, and individual co-owners cannot by themselves, without consulting the interests of other co-owners, withdraw their authority to negotiations which have been entered upon on their behalf.

Barnes, Q.C. in reply.

Lord Esher, M.R.—In this case the plaintiff, the managing owner of the Vindobala, acting for himself and other co-owners, sues two sets of defendants, also co-owners, for contributions. One is a contribution in respect of damages which the managing owner, acting on behalf of those for whom he was authorised to act, was bound to pay to certain coal owners who had shipped coals on board the ship. The second is for a contribution to the expenses attaching to the ship while she was lying at Newcastle under arrest in the Admiralty Court. The defendants' defence is that they were not bound by any charter-party under which the coals were put on board the ship, and their defence with regard to the contribution to the expenses of the ship while she was under arrest is that they rightfully arrested her, and that therefore they cannot be bound to pay a contribution towards the expenses occasioned by that arrest. It seems clear to me that neither set of defendants can be made liable in respect of damages to the coal-shippers under the charter-party unless they were bound by that charter-party. Therefore, the question is whether they were bound by that charter-party. Again, it cannot be said that the arrest they made was a wrongful one unless they were bound by the charter under which the ship was going to sea. Therefore both points depend upon this, viz., whether they were bound by a charter-party under which the coals were shipped, and under which the ship was about to go to sea. The coals were shipped under a subsidiary charter, which the shipowners were entitled to enter into by the terms of the charter-party made with the Amsterdam charterer. By that charter the ship was to take out coals on the outward voyage; she was to proceed from Newcastle to Riga with coals, and then under the other charter ship a cargo of timber there and bring it home. It seems to me to follow from that that the coals, although not shipped under the Amsterdam charter-party, were shipped as between the shipper of the coals and the shipowners, under a subsidiary charter, which was the outcome of the Amsterdam charter. Therefore, the Bell defendants cannot be made liable unless they were parties to the Amsterdam charter. If they were not they certainly were not parties to the subsidiary charter-party. It has been suggested that there were two contracts of charter-party in this case; that there was one on the 17th July binding the Bell defendants, and afterwards another on the 22nd under which the ship sailed. It seems to me, however, impossible and absurd to suppose that there were two charter-parties with regard to the same voyage to go to the same place for the same freight. The question is whether they were bound by that charter-party under which the ship was going to sail, and, in point of fact, afterwards did sail. That is a charter-party which was signed by the managing owner on the 22nd July. Now, what would make them liable under that charter-party? I think that if persons acting under their authority had made a binding agreement with the charterer in Amsterdam, that the managing owner, on their behalf, would sign a formal charter upon terms already agreed to before they retracted, then they could not have retracted their authority, and would have been bound by the formal charter which was signed after they attempted or pretended to retract their authority.

That brings us to this question, was there a contract fixing the terms of the charter-party agreed to by the agent who was acting for the managing owner, that is, was there a contract binding as to the terms which the agent or the managing owner would sign. Now, when we look, so far as we can upon the information before us, into what took place at Amsterdam, the question comes to be this. Did the Amsterdam broker, who was acting for the managing owner, come to a binding contract with the charterer as to the terms which are in the charter-party which was eventually signed; or did he only agree to the terms in that charter-party, subject to their being confirmed by the managing owner? Which did he do? Did he agree to any terms with the charterer except subject to their being approved by the managing owner? If he did, had he any authority to bind the managing owner to terms without first referring them to the managing owner. I am of opinion that he did not agree to any terms that were binding, and if he did he exceeded his authority; when you look closely into the correspondence it seems to me to show what he really meant to do. He had the charter-party dated the 12th July sent out to him signed by the managing owner, who gave instructions which, to my mind, come to this, that if the proposed charterer in Amsterdam would agree to those terms, he was to sign the charter-party. The managing owner practically said this: "I have signed it, do you the charterer sign it, and then it will bind both," and if the charterer had agreed to that and signed it, the transaction would have been perfectly clear. But it is obvious that the proposed charterer refused to sign the contract in its original form. Now, it is suggested that he might perfectly well have signed it, subject to this, that he would still ask the shipowners to add a term to it. But he did not do that, and it is clear, to my mind, that he refused to agree to the terms of that charter-party and insisted upon other terms being put into it. Now, did the managing owner's broker at Amsterdam ever come to any final agreement as to what should be the terms of the charter-party to which they would both agree? It seems to me that they never did so agree, and that the broker at Amsterdam, acting for the shipowner, did not undertake to agree to the final terms. Finding that the charterer insisted on more terms than were in the charter of the 12th, he tried to come to an arrangement about them, and throughout the negotiations the charterer kept on suggesting fresh terms, as undoubtedly he had a right to do until there was a binding agreement. It seems to me to be pretty clear that the broker at Amsterdam took the charter-party which was signed by the managing owner as a proposed form of charter to which he (the broker) was to ask the charterer to assent. He takes it as a proposal for a charter, and accordingly writes home, after negotiations have been pending as to the form of the charter, words to this effect: "Do if you possibly can agree to these terms, for he is a calumnious man, and if you do not take the terms he will go off." The word "calumnious" no doubt means "contentious." It is clear, to my mind, that he did not assume to have bound the managing owner. But assume he did, then I think he had no authority for so doing. It seems to me that the managing owner's position is this: "I send you the charter-party of the 12th in this form. If he will take that, let him sign it. If not, negotiate terms." But the power of negotiating for terms did not give him authority to bind the managing owner. In the ordinary course of business there is easy communication between Amsterdam and London. The managing owner practically says this: "If he wants other terms than those, say what he wants, and I will see whether I accept them." It is not like the case of a charter which is being negotiated by an agent in a foreign port, because there the agent invariably has authority to sign the charter-party. The ordinary course of business would be in such a case for the agent to sign. It is perfectly obvious here that the broker in Amsterdam was not to sign so as to bind the managing owner, and that the charter was to be sent back to the managing owner to be signed. That makes it almost conclusive that all the authority the Amsterdam broker had was to negotiate terms, and then refer them to the managing owner for consideration and adoption, unless of course the charterer had agreed to sign the original form of charter.

Now, did the charter-party which was eventually entered into bind the Bell defendants, or had they cancelled the authority they had previously given? It is suggested by Mr. Walton that they could not do that. He says these co-owners were partners, and they could not cancel their authority without the consent, as I understand him, of the other co-owners. But then it is put to him: "How long do you say they are partners? Do you only rely on the fact that they had employed a managing owner on the terms that he should be employed for a year? How can you say that that is sufficient to make these men partners?" He talks of the most astounding partnership that I have ever heard of, viz., that these people are partners at will. What does he mean by that? Why this: that any one of them may withdraw from it at any moment. I am certain that, even if it were possible, there never was such a partnership, and that such an idea never crossed the brains of these people. Then Mr. Walton argued that as co-owners they had no right at some period, which he was not able to fix, to retract their authority. Now, the ship's husband is generally one of the co-owners, and what is his relation to his brother co-owners? Nothing more or less than this: that he is the agent of each of them who has authorised him to act. He is the agent of each of them individually. Each co-owner, although he is a co-owner in the property of the ship, has a perfectly independent property. He is as independent as any stranger could be of the others. Therefore you must get authority from him to the person who is said to be his agent. He is not to consult his other co-owners whether he will make a person his agent, but he has the right to make the ship's husband his agent. What he can do in regard to the employment of the ship is another thing. I suppose the majority may insist on the ship being employed in a particular way, subject to this: that if a minority of one does not choose to have it employed in that way, he can, by the Admiralty law, object to the ship sailing unless they indemnify him. Therefore the question must be, whether the Bell defendants retracted their authority. If there was no binding charter-party which bound them before the time they did retract, they had a perfect liberty to retract, and I think they did so before a binding contract was made.

Then it is put that they did not retract until after the managing owner or his agent had bound himself in honour to the charterer to get this charter finally signed. First of all, I think there was no binding in honour or in any other way. The charterer had had a charter-party offered to him. He had declined it, and made a counter-offer, and there is nothing to show that the agent either bound himself or the managing owner in honour to accept the terms which the charterer was making by way of counter-offer. But even if he was bound in honour, that is not a matter to be recognised in a court of law, and I quite agree with Lord Ellenborough in the case which has been cited, where he says: "I cannot take notice of honorary engagements." A court of law is not a court of morals, and all you can say of a person who is bound in honour is that there is nothing to bind him in a court of law. The Stock Exchange case and the betting case are not in point. They are explained on this ground: that the persons had an authority from the principal to bind themselves by an honorary engagement. In other words, there was a contract between the principal and the agent that if the agent made an honorary engagement the principal would indemnify him if he kept the honorary engagement. But they are not authority in the present case, even if there was an honorary obligation, as it is called, by the managing owner or his agent and the charterer to get this charter-party signed. I put it distinctly, that even if there was an honorary obligation it is a thing which cannot be noticed in a court of law, and has therefore no binding validity. Now, with regard to the Craven defendants, are they bound by this charter-party? They had given the managing owner authority to make charter-parties, and unless they retracted that authority he was entitled to make any reasonable charter-party on their behalf. It is not suggested that this charter-party which was made is unreasonable. Therefore the managing owner entered into this charter under authority from them. Then it was urged that the Bell defendants were bound to give notice of the cancellation of their authority to all the co-owners. I know of no such law. They are perfectly independent of their co-owners, and their authority is wholly an independent one. But, even if there was anything in the point, it is obvious that the Craven defendants knew before this charter-party was signed that the Bell defendants were objecting to it. Therefore the point does not arise. On the whole, after hearing this complicated case so laboriously and so ably argued, I have come to the conclusion that we cannot agree with the decision of the learned judge, and think that this appeal must be allowed. I have communicated with the learned judge, and he tells me that he thought the agent was bound by an honourable obligation. I am of opinion that he did not bind himself in this way, and assuming that he did, I am equally clear that the law cannot, under such circumstances as these, take notice of honorary obligations.

Bowen, L.J.—In this case the real question upon which the rights of the parties depend seems to be whether, on the 19th July, the revocation which was intimated on that day by the Bell defendants to the managing owner was in time or not. What was the effect in law of that revocation? The difficulty of the case which I acknowledge seems to me to be a difficulty of fact and not of law. As men of business and honour, the parties I suppose did not wish to put each other to the expense of commissions and taking evidence abroad; and they have left us to gather the facts from the correspondence, which, to make matters worse, is partly that of a man who understands English imperfectly. Therefore, we have to do the best we can to arrive at the true facts upon these materials. We begin by considering what is the extent of the authority of Heeres, because that lies at the root of the whole matter. I cannot but think that the true authority is that conferred in the first instance by the letter and charter-party of the 12th July. We must forget the previous telegram. We have not got it, and we have no materials for knowing the way in which Heeres would understand it. We must therefore go to the letter of the 12th July which contained the charter. It seems to me that the managing owner by that letter conferred authority on Heeres to conclude an arrangement if he could obtain a charter in conformity with the charter which he sent out, and authorised him if he could not to negotiate for any other terms he might think desirable. Such was the original authority of Heeres. What did he do? His account of the negotiations is this: It appears that there was an objection taken as to two points in the original form of charter, and that on the 17th July Heeres received a telegram from Brown, Son and Co., saying "Vindobala charter confirmed" subject to these two alterations. We have been asked by Mr. Mansfield and by Mr. Walton to hold that on the 17th he did conclude a binding contract with the charterers to that effect. There are two difficulties. The first is, that it is not clear that upon the 17th the charterer bound himself to that extent. It is equally consistent with the correspondence that when the telegram was received from England he was still in the position of a person who could withdraw. I doubt very much whether there was anything at all on the 17th which bound the charterer. There was, it seems to me, at the most, an authority to Heeres to conclude if he could on the terms submitted on that date, and authority to offer fresh terms and negotiate if those terms were not accepted. That seems to me to show that there was no binding contract on that date. Heeres does not say so, and he seems to assume that if the altered terms were not sent to England there was nothing to bind the charterer at all. On that ground it seems to me that, if there was no binding contract on the 17th, then the binding contract was signed on the 22nd. That came to England as a fresh offer from the charterer, which was to be accepted or rejected, and before it could have been the revocation intervened. But I will assume, for the purpose of argument, that on the 17th there was something which bound the charterers, though I think it would be more guess work than a sound inference of fact. But even so, it still remains that Heeres signed the charter which was supposed to be drawn in conformity with the authority conferred on the 12th, but he got back from the charterer a different charter. What was his position? If he took the different charter, it seems to me that he waived the original obligation. He would take it in discharge of the obligation of the first charter dated the 12th July. But by the time the second charter dated the 17th July came to England to be accepted by the managing owner, and when the managing owner accepted it, thereby discharging the original obligation, it seems to me that it was too late. The charter-party which was accepted and on which the ship sailed, was the charter of the 22nd, and by that the case must stand. The truth is, that Heeres' authority breaks down. He had no authority to conclude the ultimate charter. He only had authority to negotiate another charter-party and refer it home for ratification and acceptance, and before it was accepted the revocation came.

Mr. Mansfield and Mr. Walton endeavoured to escape from the difficulty in this way. They said there was authority here by which Heeres had power to pledge himself in honour, and that if he was bound in honour it was too late afterwards for those who had intrusted him with that authority to back out of the transaction. In the first place, there seems to be no evidence at all of binding Heeres in honour. Further, I think it is contrary to notions of business that an agent employed to make a binding contract should have further authority to bind himself, not according to law but according to honour. In the betting case which has been alluded to it is clear that the agent was employed in transacting business outside the ordinary law, and outside the ordinary contracts which the law recognises. The suggestion that there was an implied contract here not to retract till the consent of the other co-owners was obtained also breaks down. Where is there any evidence in the case to justify the view that the Bell defendants had promised the managing owner that when he had once begun his negotiations they would not retract their authority? With regard to the Craven defendants, I take exactly the same view as Butt, J. did. On the whole, I think the appeal ought to be allowed.

Fry, L.J.—The main question is undoubtedly one of fact, and that question has been presented to us in a manner which renders it exceedingly difficult of solution. We have to infer it from the correspondence of Heeres, who writes English with considerable imperfection. The main question is, whether this contract was made before the Bell defendants retracted their authority. To my mind, the true result of the correspondence is that there was no concluded bargain between the parties until the signature of the charter-party on the 22nd. It is true that the terms of the charter-party of the 12th had been accepted with two exceptions, one on the question of brokerage, the other of lighterage, and that, on the 17th, Brown, Son, and Co. sent a telegram to Heeres, saying, "Vindobala's charter confirmed." But there is no evidence that that was communicated to the charterers, and the true inference of fact is that they never were bound till they signed the second charter. It is impossible to guess with certainty what took place, but, if I am to guess, I guess that the whole thing was open till the charter was signed. Then it is said that there was authority given by the Bell defendants to bind them in honour. I entirely agree that that is not the law. It is an extension of the law brought forward for the first time. I also entirely concur that there was in fact no honorary engagement. It may well have been that after what had taken place it would not have been honourable on the part of Heeres or the managing owner to withdraw the ship from the proposed charterers, if they had been willing to accept the terms of the charter-party of the 12th July; but if they, as in point of fact they did, insisted on new terms, there is nothing whatever that called on the managing owner to consider himself bound in honour. It has been argued that there was a partnership, but I confess that I cannot see any evidence of it. Considering how common co-ownership is in the law of England, the absence of any authority in favour of the contention is significant. For these and other reasons, I think that we are bound to allow this appeal.

The Tasmania. (a)

Collision—Sailing ships—Keeping course—Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, arts. 14, 22, and 23.

Where one of two sailing ships whose duty it is to keep out of the way of the other causes risk of collision by a wrongful manœuvre, and persists in such manœuvre in such a way that the officer in charge of the other ship ought to see that unless he acts with his helm a collision will be inevitable, it is the duty of such officer, under art. 23 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, to port or starboard as circumstances may require.

The sailing ships C. and T. were approaching one another red light to red light. The C. was running free, the T. was close-hauled on the port tack. When the ships were about four ship's lengths from each other, the C. opened her green light about two points on the port bow of the T. and continued to keep it open. The T. kept her course till the last moment, when her helm was starboarded, but the vessels came into collision, the T. striking with her stem the starboard side of the C. The Court of Appeal was advised by its assessors that, at the time when the master of the T. ought to have seen that the C. was determined to cross his bows under a starboard helm, a collision was not inevitable. At the trial below the C. was found alone to blame. On appeal:

Held that the T. was also to blame for not altering her course by starboarding when her master saw, or ought to have seen, that the C. was persisting in crossing his bows.

This was an appeal by the plaintiffs in a collision action in rem from a decision of Butt, J., holding them alone to blame.

The collision occurred on the 8th March 1888 in the English Channel between the plaintiffs' ship City of Corinth and the defendants' ship Tasmania.

The City of Corinth was sunk and only two of her crew were saved, the chief officer and an able seaman, who were called on deck before the collision but after the Tasmania had come in sight.

The facts alleged on behalf of the plaintiffs were as follows:—Shortly before 7 p.m. on the 8th March the City of Corinth, a full-rigged ship of 1220 tons register, manned by a crew of thirty hands all told, was in the English Channel eighteen to twenty miles S.S.W. of St. Catherine's Light, Isle of Wight, in the course of a voyage from Pisagua to Hamburg. The weather was misty and dark, with occasional thick showers of small rain. The wind was a fresh breeze from S.W. by S. magnetic. The City of Corinth was heading E. by N. magnetic under all plain sail, and was making about six knots an hour. Her regulation lights were duly exhibited and burning brightly, her foghorn was being sounded at intervals when necessary, and a good look-out was being kept. In these circumstances the second mate, who was in charge, reported to the captain, who was examining a chart in the cabin, a vessel which proved to be the Tasmania close to, showing a red light. Thereupon the captain of the City of Corinth and the chief mate went on deck, when the said red light was seen almost abeam on the City of Corinth's starboard side and from fifty to one hundred yards distant. At that time the helm of the City of Corinth had been put hard up and the cross-jack yard was being squared, and the chief mate let go the port main braces to help the vessel pay off. The Tasmania, however, continued to approach at a considerable speed, and came into collision with the City of Corinth, the stem of the former striking the latter about the main hatch just before the main-mast with such tremendous violence that the City of Corinth sank immediately.

The facts alleged by the defendants were as follows:—The Tasmania was a four-masted square-rigged ship of 2175 tons register, and at the time of the collision was on a voyage from London to San Francisco laden with a general cargo. Shortly after 7 p.m. on the 8th March the Tasmania was about twenty miles off St. Catherine's Point, bearing about N.-½-E. She was making about three to four knots. She was sailing close-hauled (steering full and by) on the port tack heading about N.W. by W.-½-W. magnetic, the wind being a strong breeze from about S.W. magnetic. Her regulation lights were duly exhibited and burning brightly, and a good look-out was being kept on board of her. In these circumstances, those on board the Tasmania observed the red light of a sailing vessel which proved to be the City of Corinth about two points on the port bow, and distant about a mile. The Tasmania was kept on her course, her cross-jack course was clewed up, and the City of Corinth was carefully watched. When the City of Corinth was about a quarter of a mile off and nearly on the same bearing the red light was shut in and the green light came into view. The master of the Tasmania then sent a man forward to see if his own lights were burning brightly, and then called the second mate on to the poop to ask his opinion as to what the City of Corinth meant to do. The green light continued open, and when about two ships' lengths off the helm of the Tasmania was put hard down and her topsail and main top-gallant halyards were let go, but the City of Corinth came on, and with her starboard side about amidships struck the jibboom and stem of the Tasmania.

Butt, J. accepted the story told by the defendants and disbelieved the story of the plaintiffs. He found that the City of Corinth was running free, and that the Tasmania was close-hauled, and held the City of Corinth alone to blame on the ground that the vessels were approaching red light to red light, and that the collision was caused by the City of Corinth starboarding across the bows of the Tasmania.

The only material part of the judgment, so far as the appeal is concerned, was as follows: "The result is, that we find that the Tasmania was close-hauled at the time of the collision, that practically she had not deviated from the heading which she held at the outset, and that therefore she is not to blame. The real cause of the collision is, that the City of Corinth failed to keep out of the way as required by the regulations. I therefore pronounce the City of Corinth alone to blame."

The following Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea are material to the decision:

Art. 14. When two sailing ships are approaching one another so as to involve risk of collision, one of them shall keep out of the way of the other as follows, viz.: (a) A ship which is running free shall keep out of the way of a ship which is close-hauled.

Art. 22. Where by the above rules one of two ships is to keep out of the way, the other shall keep her course.

Art. 23. In obeying and construing these rules due regard shall be had to all dangers of navigation and to any special circumstances which may render a departure from the above rules necessary in order avoid immediate danger.

Sir Richard Webster, Q.C. (A.-G.), C. Hall, Q.C., Sir Walter Phillimore, and Pyke, for the plaintiffs, in support of the appeal.—The Tasmania was solely to blame. Even assuming the City of Corinth to blame, the Tasmania is also to blame. When her master saw that the City of Corinth was persisting in crossing his bows, he ought to have acted with his helm. Had he done so at an early period the collision would have been avoided. There were special circumstances within the meaning of art. 23 requiring him to depart from art. 22.

Barnes, Q.C., Raikes, and A. Russell, for the defendants, contra.—It was the duty of the Tasmania to keep her course, as she in fact did until the collision was inevitable. To hold her to blame would be to throw upon her the duty of keeping out of the way of the other vessel. The other vessel may at any moment counteract her wrong manœuvre and so avoid the close-hauled ship, provided she keeps her course.

Lord Esher, M.R.—Whilst I agree that it was a misfortune for the City of Corinth that all her crew except two should be drowned, that is no reason why we should imagine things were or were not, simply because there are no witnesses to prove what really occurred. But, upon the facts before the learned judge, it is impossible to say that the City of Corinth was not in the wrong. I think it is clear that for some reason or other she put her helm hard a-starboard in order to cross the bows of the Tasmania. Now comes this consideration. As long as there was any doubt about what the City of Corinth was doing, the Tasmania was bound to keep her course. Therefore it is quite true to say that, if those on the Tasmania had seen the other vessel's green light under such circumstances that her master would have a right to suppose that it was a mere accident and that the other vessel would luff back, he ought still to have kept his course.

But the question is, whether what was done was not sufficient to show the master of the Tasmania that the opening of the green light was no accident, but to show to him as an officer of ordinary skill that the City of Corinth had made up her mind to go across the bows of the Tasmania, and was so showing her green light. The moment he ought to have seen that, that very moment he ought to have acted, because the manœuvre of the City of Corinth was putting the ships into such a position that it was no longer safe for him to obey the rule as to keeping his course. The moment he saw that the other ship had made up her mind to cross his bows at the distance the ships were then from each other, it must have been obvious to any captain of ordinary skill that it was wrong for him then to keep his course, and if he kept his course after the other ship had made up her mind to cross his bows he must increase the danger. We have inquired of the gentlemen who assist us, and they agree with the view I have taken myself, that the action of the City of Corinth was so determined and so clear that almost immediately after the captain of the Tasmania saw her green light he must have known, or ought to have known, that she had made up her mind to cross his bows at that distance, and therefore, almost immediately after he saw her green light, he ought to have acted. But did he act almost at once? It is useless to talk of seconds and minutes. The only satisfactory way to judge is to consider the account of what was in fact done, and not what is said about time and distance. What was done? The Tasmania was a long ship, and the lights were on the forecastle or on the edge of the forecastle. The captain was on the poop. What does he do? He sends a man forward the whole length of the ship to see whether the lights are burning or not. A more useless thing there could not be under the circumstances. He had seen the other vessel's lights, and must have seen from the way the green light was approaching him that she had determined to go ahead of him. It looks as if he was getting evidence to show that he was not in the wrong. It was mere waste of time. And then after that man had come back, and the other vessel is still coming round under a hard-a-starboard helm, showing clearly what she was doing, he delays still. He calls the mate, who in his deposition says, like all the witnesses, that the collision was not the captain's fault and that it was inevitable; he calls the mate to stand by and see what the light of the other vessel is doing. In the opinion of those who assist us, he ought to have seen before for himself, and ought not to have wanted assistance. Therefore we have it, that he first sends a man forward, and then calls the mate up on the poop before he gives any order. Then I have no doubt he gave the order to put the helm hard down. I will not inquire as to whether the mate interfered with that order. I have a strong impression that he did, and that there was some hesitation in carrying it out. But it is not necessary to go into that. The captain ought not to have inquired about his lights and consulted the mate as he did. If he had preserved his his presence of mind he ought to have acted on his own view without consultation. Therefore he did not act as soon as he ought, under circumstances which showed him that he ought to have departed from the rule as to keeping his course sooner than he did. The only right thing for him to do was to put his helm hard down and come up into the wind. Therefore he acted too late. That puts him in the wrong, unless it can be shown that what he did wrong could not have any effect upon the collision. If the collision at the time he ought to have acted was inevitable, his not doing what he ought to have done would become of no consequence. But we are advised that at that time the collision was not inevitable. Under those circumstances the master of the Tasmania did not act with the presence of mind which it is the duty of a captain under difficult circumstances to possess. I therefore think that the Tasmania is to blame, and that the decision of the learned judge must be varied by holding both vessels to blame. I am sorry the learned judge in his judgment does not seem to have touched upon this part of the case. I do not know whether it was pressed upon him or not, but the rights of parties cannot be affected by that.

Fry, L.J.—I entirely agree that the City of Corinth is to blame. As to the Tasmania, did her master, or did he not, delay altering her course when departure from it was necessary to avoid collision? I feel very strongly what has been urged at the bar as to the importance of not allowing trifling circumstances to justify a departure from the rules; but in this case it appears to me that the master has himself stated circumstances which show that he ought to have altered his course earlier than he did. He has explained the series of transactions which took place after the green light was open to him. It appears to me that his mind ought to have been applied to what he ought to do on seeing that green light. Instead of so applying his mind, he seems to have applied it to obtain evidence. What happened was this. He sends a man to look at his own light, calls the mate, consults with him, and then does the right thing, but does it too late. That at any rate is the opinion of our assessors, and I cannot venture to differ from any conclusion which they arrive at.

The Monkseaton. (a)

Collision—Inevitable accident—Costs.

In cases of collision caused by inevitable accident costs, as a general rule, will follow the event, notwithstanding the former practice in the Admiralty Court to make no order as to costs in such cases.

This was an appeal from a decision of the President of the Admiralty Division finding the steamship Monkseaton to blame for a collision with the steamship Spearman.

The collision occurred in the river Tagus on the 9th Feb. 1888.

At the time of the collision the Spearman was lying at anchor off Lisbon laden with a general cargo. The Monkseaton, which had put into the Tagus to repair her propeller, had been moored to a buoy two or three lengths above the Spearman. She was moored by a chain, which, as well as the buoy, were the property of the defendants' agents at Lisbon, but which had been laid down by them with the sanction and under the superintendence of the harbour authorities.

On the morning of the 9th Feb. the Monkseaton parted from her moorings, and drifted into collision with the Spearman, doing her the damage complained of.

The cause of the Monkseaton parting from her mooring was the breaking of a shackle in the chain attaching her to the buoy.

The defendants pleaded inevitable accident.

The President of the Admiralty Division pronounced the defendants liable, on the ground that the excessive shearing of the Monkseaton necessitated extra precaution, which had not been taken.

The Court of Appeal reversed this decision, holding that there were no circumstances requiring the defendants to take extra precaution, and that the collision was an inevitable accident, caused by a flaw in the shackle.

Myburgh, Q.C. (with him L. Batten), for the respondents, thereupon applied for costs.—Having regard to the facts of this case, the plaintiffs were justified in bringing the action, and therefore the defendants ought to pay their costs. At any rate, the plaintiffs ought not to be ordered to pay the defendants' costs. It is the rule in the Admiralty Court that, where a collision is the result of an inevitable accident, each party bears his own costs:

The Marpesia, 26 L. T. Rep. N. S. 333; L. Rep. 4 P. C. 212; 1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 261.

The Court of Appeal in The Swansea (4 P. Div. 115; 40 L. T. Rep. N. S. 442; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 115) seem to indicate a departure from the rule, but it was subsequently followed in The Buckhurst (6 P. Div. 152; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 484; 46 L. T. Rep. N. S. 108). Assuming the court should adopt the rule in force in other branches of the High Court, there are special circumstances in this case which entitle the plaintiffs to their costs.

Barnes, Q.C. (with him Sir Walter Phillimore and Baden-Powell), for the defendants, contra.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—We think that the Court of Appeal in the case of The Swansea (ubi sup.) laid down the right rule as to costs. There had been a rule in the Admiralty Court of not giving costs on either side in cases of inevitable accident, a rule which the Privy Council in the case of The Marpesia (ubi sup.) thought a bad one, but to which they adhered. Then came the Judicature Act, making the Court of Admiralty a division of the High Court, and subsequently to that the Court of Appeal, in the case of The Swansea (ubi sup.), thought that the same rule as to costs ought to exist in all divisions of the High Court. In other branches of the High Court than the Admiralty the rule is perfectly clear that where a plaintiff brings an action and fails he pays the costs. In the present case there are no special circumstances requiring a departure from the general rule, and we think the plaintiffs must pay the costs both here and below.

HIGH COURT OF JUSTICE.

QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION.

Dec. 17 and 18, 1888.

(Before HUDDLESTON, B., by consent sitting as a Divisional Court.)

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA v. HEWITT AND CO. LIMITED. (a)

Practice—Preliminary act—Damage to cargo by collision — Action brought by owner of cargo against owner of colliding vessel—Action brought not in Admiralty Division but in Queen's Bench Division—Liability of plaintiff to file preliminary act—Order XIX., r. 28.

The principle of filing a preliminary act, under Order XIX., r. 28, applies to every division of the High Court, and is not confined exclusively to actions in the Admiralty Division.

The plaintiff had a quantity of goods on board a barge. This barge was sunk by a vessel belonging to the defendants, and the plaintiff's goods were damaged. Cross-actions were brought by the owners of the barge and vessel respectively, but these actions were dismissed, as both parties were to blame. Afterwards an action was brought in the Queen's Bench Division by the plaintiff, the owner of the goods, against the owners of the vessel, for the damage to his goods. The defendants required the plaintiff to file a preliminary act under Order XIX., r. 28.

Held, that the damage sued for was "damage by collision" within the meaning of the rule, and that the plaintiff must file a preliminary act. (b)

(a) Reported by HENRY LEIGH, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

(b) In the case of Armstrong and Co. v. Gaselee and others (6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 353; 59 L. T. Rep. N. S. 891; 22 Q. B. Div. 250) the Divisional Court exercised its discretion by refusing to order the plaintiffs to file a preliminary act. In that case the plaintiffs were the owners of a barge and her cargo, who employed the defendants' tug to tow the barge. During the towage the barge was towed into collision with another vessel and sank in consequence thereof. Consequently, in the subsequent case of The Alexandra (not reported), which was an action in personam in the Admiralty Division, by a barge-owner against a tug-owner, for towing his barge into collision with another vessel, the parties refrained from filing preliminary acts. On the action coming on for trial Butt, J. complained in strong terms of the absence of preliminary acts, and intimated that in future it was desirable they should be filed in such cases. Whilst no doubt the decision in Armstrong and Co. v. Gaselee and others (ubi sup.) is binding upon the judge of the Admiralty Division, it is to be remembered that that decision is dealing with an action in the Queen's Bench Division, whereas, in the Admiralty Court and Division, it has been the almost universal practice in all cases arising out of collision to file preliminary acts. The case of The John Boyne (3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 341; 36 L. T. Rep. N. S. 29), which is sometimes cited as an authority to the contrary, was really only a decision founded upon the particular facts of the case, and the language of the judgment lays down no general proposition. Although Wills, J., in the case of Armstrong v. Gaselee, seems to indicate that Order XIX., r. 28, applies only to questions arising between two colliding vessels, he does not say so in express terms, and later on he goes on to state that he "should be sorry to say that there might not be cases of this description in which the court could properly order preliminary acts to be filed." Butt, J., in The Alexandra, was clearly of opinion that cases of this description were within the comprehensive language of the rule, and if so, parties can only dispense with preliminary acts in those cases where the judge in his discretion thinks fit—a discretion which Butt, J. has clearly intimated he Appeal by the plaintiff from an order by Charles J., at chambers, affirming an order of Master Kaye, ordering the plaintiff, the Secretary of State for India, to file a preliminary act, under Order XIX., r. 28, in an action brought in the Queen's Bench Division of the High Court, for damage to cargo by a vessel belonging to the defendants.

In Nov. 1886 the plaintiff had caused to be shipped on board a barge, called the Sultan, a large quantity of ammunition, and whilst this barge was in the river Thames it was sunk by a vessel called the Hallett, belonging to the defendants. The ammunition was damaged to the extent, it was alleged, of 3000*l.*, and for this damage the present action was brought, not in the Admiralty Division but in the Queen's Bench Division. In Aug. 1887 an action was brought by the owners of the barge against the owners of the vessel, and a cross-action was brought by the owners of the vessel. In these actions the court found both parties to blame, and their actions were dismissed. Subsequently, the present action was brought by the Secretary of State for India, for damage to the ammunition, against the owners of the Hallett, as since the case of The Bernina (Mills v. Armstrong, 58 L. T. Rep. N. S. 423; 13 App. Cas. 1), the owner of the cargo was not so identified with the barge in which the cargo was stored as to be precluded from bringing an action against the colliding vessel.

The learned judge at chambers was of opinion that the action was an action for "damage by collision," within Order XIX., r. 28, and he ordered the plaintiff to file a preliminary act.

Order XIX., r. 28, provides that,

> In actions in any division for damage by collision between vessels, unless the court or a judge shall otherwise order, the solicitor for the plaintiff shall, within seven days after the commencement of the action, and the solicitor for the defendant shall, within seven days after appearance, and before any pleading is delivered, file with the registrar, master, or other proper officer, as the case may be, a document to be called a preliminary act, which shall be sealed up, and shall not be opened until ordered by the court or a judge, and which shall contain a statement of the following particulars.

The "particulars" to be stated in the "preliminary act" are then set forth, under thirteen different heads, at foot of the Order.

Cohen, Q.C. and C. C. Macrae for the appellant.—The learned judge did not exercise his discretion in the case, as he thought he was bound by a decision of Butt, J. at chambers, in the case Webster v. The Manchester, Sheffield, and Lincolnshire Railway Company (5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 256, n.; W. N. 1884, p. 1), a case altogether different from the present. Our first point is, that the rule only applies to actions brought by the owner of one ship against the owner of another ship, and it has no application in a case of this kind. I shall, if necessary, contend that this is not "damage by collision," but "damage arising out of a collision," within sub-sect. 9 of sect. 25 of the Judicature Act 1873. In Order XIX., r. 28, the words are "damage by collision," and there is a difference between those words and "damage arising out of a collision." [Huddleston, B.—Put this case: a bale of goods is on deck, the bale is cut through by the colliding vessel: is that not damage by collision?] Yes, but the present case is different, as here the goods do not come in contact with the colliding vessel. Preliminary acts were considered by Dr. Lushington, in the cases of The Inflexible (Swabey, 32), and The Vortigern (Swabey, 518). In the latter case Dr. Lushington said: "Preliminary acts were instituted for two reasons—to get a statement from the parties of the circumstances recenti facto, and to prevent the defendant from shaping his case to meet the case put forward by the plaintiff." These reasons do not apply in the present case, as none of the facts are within the knowledge of the plaintiff. Again, this is not an Admiralty action, but a common law action, and the rule does not apply to such actions, but if the rule does apply to such actions it is not absolute in its terms, but gives a discretion, as it says "unless a court or judge shall otherwise order."

Dr. Raikes, for the defendants, was not heard.

Huddleston, B.—It seems to me that I ought to act upon the words of the rule. Mr. Macrae has pointed out that this is not an action in the Admiralty Court, but that it is an action in the High Court. That is provided for by the rules, because Order XIX., r. 28, says, "In actions in any division for damages." Therefore, the principle of the preliminary act applies in every case in the High Court, and not merely exclusively to the Admiralty Division. The words seem to me to be certainly imperative: "In actions in any division for damage by collision between the vessels, unless the court or a judge shall otherwise order," the preliminary act is to be filed, and filed within a certain time. That is a very salutary rule. The object of it is what was pointed out by Dr. Lushington in the case of The Vortigern (ubi sup.), that the preliminary acts were instituted for two reasons—to get a statement from the parties of the circumstances recenti facto, and to prevent the defendant from shaping his case to meet the case put forward by the plaintiff. Now, no doubt there may be cases in which it is impossible to file a preliminary act, and in all probability, if the persons in this case were persons who were outside, as it were, the collision—that is to say, not being representatives of either ship—it might be very difficult indeed that this rule should be complied with. I can quite understand the plaintiff in this particular case saying, "Well, but we are the Secretary of State for India, and we really do not know anything about these circumstances, because we put our goods on board one vessel, and they have been destroyed; therefore, we know nothing of the circumstances." If that had been put upon affidavit, and it had been shown to me that they could not have done that, I can quite understand that then my brother Charles and myself might have exercised our discretion, and said, "Well, these are circumstances under which it is impossible to give a preliminary act." But that is not the case here.

will not exercise. A point which seems to press upon the common law judges of the difficulty of correctly answering all the questions is really of no weight. The court is not unreasonable, and only requires the best answers that can be given in the circumstances of the case. In many ordinary collision actions between ship and ship there may be circumstances which prevent the parties correctly answering some of the questions, and yet they are required to file the best preliminary acts they can under the circumstances.

First of all, I have no affidavit at all; and in the next place, it seems to me to be perfectly clear that there would be no difficulty in complying with this rule, because the whole of these points have been raised in the former trial between the two vessels, in which the preliminary acts were filed between the two vessels, as provided for by the section of the Act, and there would be no difficulty at all on the part of the plaintiff, in ascertaining what the preliminary act was, which was filed in the former trial, and in giving that as his preliminary act. No doubt it would not have the effect of recenti facto, but still it would have the effect of preventing the defendants from shaping a different case; as is pointed out by Dr. Lushington, it is to prevent the defendants from shaping their case to meet the case put forward by the plaintiff. Therefore, if I were to hold that the plaintiff was not to file a preliminary act, I should also dispense with the necessity of the defendants filing a preliminary act, and one of the main objects of filing preliminary acts would be entirely defeated. The cases of The Vortigern (ubi sup.) and The Inflexible (ubi sup.) do not at all militate against what I have said, and the authority referred to of my brother Butt I do not think applies to this case, because, what I think he decided there was that, whether the action was for injury to the person, or whether it was an action for injury to goods, the necessity applied equally for a preliminary act. However, that does not arise here. I think that my brother Charles exercised a proper discretion, and therefore I think that this appeal must be dismissed, and with costs.

Appeal dismissed with costs.

HEDGES (app.) v. HOOKER (resp.). (a)

Merchant Shipping Act 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104), ss. 303, 317, 318—Passenger—Passenger steamship—Steamship not having certificate carrying persons other than crew.

The respondents were charged that they, being the owners of the British steamship Era, did ply on the river O. with certain passengers on board without having one of the duplicates of a certificate issued by the Board of Trade put up in some conspicuous part of the ship so as to be visible to all persons on board the same. More than twelve persons were taken on board the steamer for an excursion from I. down the river O. to F. and back. No charge was made by the respondents for the use of the steamer, but a gratuity was given to the master and crew. The justices dismissed the case.

Held, that the justices were right, as the steamship was not a passenger steamship within the meaning of sects. 303 and 318 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854.

THIS was a case stated by the justices for the borough of Ipswich, and was in the following terms:—

1. At a court of summary jurisdiction, holden at the Town Hall, Ipswich, in and for the borough of Ipswich, on the 26th Nov. 1888, an information and complaint preferred by William Hedges, of Ipswich, in the county of Suffolk, superintendent of Customs (hereinafter called the appellant) against Alfred Hooker and Joseph Hooker, of Vernon-street, Ipswich (hereinafter called the respondents), under sect. 318 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, and charging that the British steamship Era, of which the respondents were the owners, did, on the 1st Aug. 1888 ply on the river Orwell with certain passengers on board, without having one of the duplicates of a certificate issued by the Board of Trade, put up (as required by sect. 317 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854) in some conspicuous part of the said ship, so as to be visible to all persons on board the same, contrary to sect. 318 of the said Act, came on to be heard.

2. It not having been proved that the summons issued upon the above information had come to the knowledge of the said Alfred Hooker, the case was heard only as against Joseph Hooker.

3. Upon the hearing of the said information and complaint, the defendant Joseph Hooker appeared, and was represented by his solicitor, and the following facts were proved:

The said steamship Era was a British steamship.

The said Alfred Hooker and Joseph Hooker were the registered owners on the 1st Aug. 1888.

No duplicate of the certificate mentioned in sect. 318 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 had been on the said 1st Aug. 1888 put up in any part whatsoever of the ship as required by sect. 317 of the said Act, and no such certificate was in force for the said ship on the 1st Aug. 1888, or had indeed ever been issued to such ship.

On the 1st Aug. 1888 the said steamship proceeded from Ipswich, having on board twenty-one or more persons, who were passengers within the meaning of sects. 303 and 318 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854. The said passengers were members of a Wesleyan choir and their friends. The vessel left the landing-place at Ipswich about 9.30 a.m. and proceeded down the river Orwell with such passengers on board to Felixstowe pier in Harwich harbour and in the mouth of the Orwell and Stour, opposite Harwich, where four more passengers were taken on board. She then rounded at Beach End Bell Buoy outside of the seaward entrance to Harwich harbour, and then proceeded a short distance up the river Stour.

The party was landed at Felixstowe and had tea upon the beach, having also been supplied with fruit on the vessel. The steamship returned to Ipswich on the evening of that day with the party on board.

The sum of 1*s.* 6*d.* was paid by each of the passengers to the leader of the choir for the day's outing. This included the tea before referred to and fruit during the day.

No charge was made by the owners, they having refused payment, but a gratuity of 1*l.* 10*s.* was given to Joseph Hooker by the leader of the choir, 10*s.* for the crew, and 1*l.* for himself and for coals.

4. On these facts we were of opinion that there was no evidence before us of the offence charged in the information against the 318th section of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, and that there was no evidence of the said vessel having plied on the occasion in question within the meaning of the said section, and we consequently dismissed the case.

5. The appellant being dissatisfied with our decision, on the 1st Dec. 1888 made written application to us, in the manner and form required by the statutes in that behalf, to state a special case for the opinion of this honourable court, and subsequently entered into a recognisance to prosecute his appeal as required by the statute.

6. The question for the opinion of this honourable court is, whether our determination, which is stated in the fourth paragraph of this case, was right in point of law.

Danckwerts for the appellant.—The respondent was summoned for contravening the provisions of Part 4 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104). That part is headed "Safety and prevention of accidents," and sect. 291 provides that it shall apply to all British ships. It is provided by sect. 303 that the word "passengers" shall be held to include any persons carried in a steamship other than the master and crew and the owner, his family, and servants; and the expression "passenger steamer" shall be held to include every British steamship carrying passengers to, from, or between any place or places in the United Kingdom, excepting steam ferry boats working in chains, commonly called steam bridges. Then sect. 309 enacts that the owners shall have surveys made by shipwrights and engineers, who shall make declarations as to the efficiency of the ship; and by sect. 312, upon the receipt of such declarations, the Board of Trade shall, if satisfied that the provisions of the fourth part of this Act have been complied with, cause a certificate in duplicate to be prepared and issued. By sect. 317 it is directed that one of the duplicates of the certificate shall be put up in some conspicuous part of the ship so as to be visible to all persons on board. By the latter part of sect. 318 it is provided that, if any passenger steamer attempts to ply or go to ea without such production (of such certificate), ny such officer (of customs) may detain her until uch certificate is produced; and if any passenger teamer plies or goes to sea with any passengers on board, without having one of the duplicates of such certificate as aforesaid so put up as aforesaid in some conspicuous part of the ship, the owner thereof shall for such offence incur a penalty not exceeding 100*l.*, and the master of such ship shall also incur a further penalty not exceeding 20*l.* By the Merchant Shipping Act 1876 (39 & 40 Vict. c. 80), sect. 16, it is enacted that any steamship may carry passengers not exceeding twelve in number, although she has not been surveyed by the Board of Trade as a passenger steamer, and does not carry a Board of Trade certificate as provided by the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 with respect to passenger steamers. The justices held that there was no evidence of the vessel having "plied." The word "ply" does not necessarily mean ply for hire, though perhaps that is the sense in which the word is now generally used. It refers to inland navigation as opposed to "going to sea." The above sections were passed with a view to secure the safety of, and to prevent accidents to passengers; there is no reason why a person should not be protected merely because he does not pay.

Morton Smith for the respondent.—There is nothing in the Act to warrant the suggestion that the word "ply" refers to inland navigation only. The whole of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 applies to vessels going to sea. The vessel in this case never went to sea. "Plying" means being at a certain quay or pier for the purpose of receiving passengers in the usual way to carry them from place to place.

Danckwerts in reply.—It is the user of this vessel on the particular occasion which gives her the character of a passenger steamship.

Lord COLERIDGE, C.J.—I am of opinion that the justices were right in this case. There has not been enough proved to put it on the respondents to prove their case. The case does not state that the Era was a passenger steamer, but that it was a British steamer with passengers on board. The justices set out all the facts, and then say that these persons were passengers within the meaning of sect. 303 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, but they held that no breach of sect. 318 had been committed because the steamer was not plying within the meaning of that section. It is impossible to define exactly what constitutes a passenger steamer. Each case must stand on its own circumstances. For instance, take the case where a gentleman takes a party on his steam yacht up and down a river. I should say that such a case was too clear for argument. In the present case the respondents are the owners of a steamer on which they take a number of boys and girls who form a choir down the river for a trip and bring them back again, and they charge nothing for the use of the steamer. The question in the case is, whether the vessel was a passenger steamer, and these persons who were on board were passengers within the meaning of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, s. 303, which says that "the word 'passengers' shall be held to include any persons carried in a steamship other than the master and crew, and the owner, his family and servants; and the expression 'passenger steamer' shall be held to include every British steamship carrying passengers to, from, or between any place or places in the United Kingdom, excepting steam ferry boats working in chains, commonly called steam bridges." I think the sort of thing done here was not pointed at by the Act of Parliament, and that it would be straining the Act to include it. These people were not passengers within the reasonable meaning of the word. It is further provided by sect. 318 of the same Act, that if any passenger steamer attempts to ply or go to sea without producing the certificate of the Board of Trade any officer of Customs may detain her until such certificate is produced. This vessel did not proceed to sea, and I do not think she can be said to have plied. The word "ply," as defined in Johnson's Dictionary would not include this case. No doubt the ordinary meaning of the word contains the notion of plying for hire, and I agree that it is the first and natural meaning of the word, but it does not exhaust it. In the case of Reg. v. The Divisional Justices of Dublin (15 C. C. C. 379) it was held that the justices were wrong in not convicting the owner of a tug boat who took the managing owner, his wife, the Dublin staff, and some friends and their wives who had been invited by the Dublin manager for a pleasure trip, to see the fireworks at Kingstown, there being, as in the present case, no duplicate of the Board of Trade certificate put up in some conspicuous part of the ship. But that was not an unanimous decision of the court. O'Brien, J. dissented, and the latter part of his judgment I wish to rely upon and adopt as my own. He came to the conclusion that the justices were right in not convicting the owner of the vessel, and I should have agreed with him on the facts of that case that it did not come within the meaning of sects. 303 and 318. But the facts of that case and the present case are not the same. In that case, as I understand, the vessel did proceed to sea. I am of opinion in the present case that the justices were right, and the appeal must be dismissed.

Hawkins, J.—I am of the same opinion. The information must set forth the offence with which the accused is charged. It is not alleged in this case that this was a passenger steamer, whereas sect. 318 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, under which the respondent was charged, says: "If any passenger steamer plies or goes to sea with any passengers on board without having one of the duplicates of such certificate so put up as aforesaid in some conspicuous part of the ship, the owner thereof shall for such offence incur a penalty not exceeding 100*l*." But, even assuming that it was a passenger steamer, and that persons were on it, and going down the Orwell could it be said to be "plying" within the meaning of the Act? The justices came to the conclusion that there was no evidence that it was plying, and I cannot think that having persons on board for the purpose of this pleasure trip was "plying." The justices have found that there was no evidence to support the charge, and I see no sufficient reason for disturbing their decision.

Appeal dismissed.

The Canada Shipping Company Limited v. The British Shipowners' Mutual Protection Association Limited. (a)

Insurance (marine)—Mutual insurance association—Rules—Damage to cargo—"Improper navigation"—"Improper stowage."

By the rules of a mutual protection association members were protected against loss of, or damage to, goods on board any ship entered for protection under the rules when such loss or damage had been caused by the improper navigation of the ship; no member could claim for any damage to, or loss of cargo, where the same should have been caused by improper stowage.

A cargo, consisting of iron, coal, coke, and seventy casks of patent coating composition, was carried from M. to A. on board a vessel belonging to the plaintiffs, who were members of the defendant association, and whose ship was entered for protection under the rules. It was found, on the cargo being discharged at the end of the voyage, that some of the casks had leaked, and a quantity of the composition, which smelt strongly of creosote, had saturated the dunnage and the ceiling and limber boards of the vessel. When the vessel was empty the ceiling and limber boards were scraped; she was then loaded with a cargo of wheat, and a quantity of the dunnage wood which had been in contact with the composition was used to stow the cargo. The wheat on being discharged smelt strongly of creosote, and some of it was discoloured. The plaintiffs bought the cargo from the owners at the price of undamaged wheat, and, having resold it again at a considerable loss, claimed to recover that loss from the defendants on the ground that it was loss or damage to goods caused by the "improper navigation" of the ship within the meaning of the rules of the defendant association.

Held, that the act of putting cargo into a hold so saturated with a tarry substance that the whole cargo was tainted, was bad management of the vessel as a receptacle or warehouse for the goods, but did not affect her qualities as a ship, and did not come within the term "improper navigation."

Held further, that this was a case of "improper stowage" within the meaning of the rules of the defendant association, and that on both these grounds the defendants were protected from liability.

Carmichael v. Liverpool Sailing Shipowners' Mutual Indemnity Association (57 L. T. Rep. N. S. 550; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 130) distinguished.

The plaintiffs were the owners of the ship Lake Ontario, which was duly entered for protection under the rules of the defendant association.

The rules of the defendants, so far as they are material to this case, were as follows:

4. The risks, events, and occurrences in respect of which members shall be entitled to protection under these rules are: Loss of or damage to any goods or merchandise or other property or things on board or in charge of any ship entered for protection under these rules (not being the ship herself, or her tackle, apparel, furniture, or stores), when such loss or damage has been caused by the improper navigation of such ship, or by collision with any substance other than water, provided she is entered for protection under these rules at the time of such loss or damage happening. Damage to or loss of goods or things on any pier or jetty, or like structure, caused by like improper navigation, shall be deemed covered by this clause.

12. No member shall have any claim under these rules for costs or charges of repairing any ship entered for protection under these rules, nor for any damage to or loss of cargo, or other things, where the same shall have been caused by improper stowage.

15. No member or other person shall be entitled to protection under these rules for any accident caused by his own negligence.

In Feb. 1885 the Lake Ontario sailed from Middlesbrough for Adelaide, with a cargo on board which consisted of pig iron, coal, coke, and seventy casks of patent coating composition, together with machinery castings, bricks, and other goods. She arrived at Adelaide in May 1885, and on the cargo being discharged it was found that the casks containing the composition had leaked, and the dunnage wood and the ceiling and limber boards were soaked with the composition, which smelt strongly of creosote. After the hold had been cleaned out and the ceiling scraped, dunnage wood, which consisted in part of the dunnage used for stowing the casks of composition, was placed upon the ceiling, and upon the dunnage wood some sacking was laid. A cargo of wheat in bags was then loaded on the ship, which sailed to Queenstown for orders, and there received orders for Dublin. On the arrival of the ship in Dublin the discharge of the cargo commenced, and it was shortly afterwards found that the cargo smelt strongly of creosote, and that some of the bags and their contents were discoloured. In consequence of this the consignee of the cargo made a claim upon the plaintiffs, which was settled by the plaintiffs paying the value of the cargo as if undamaged, and themselves taking over and realising the damaged wheat. By this arrangement the plaintiffs paid 12,507*l.* 13*s.* for the cargo, and they realised from it 10,109*l.* 3*s.*, after deducting expenses and freight at 5*s.* per ton for bringing the cargo from Dublin to Liverpool.

The plaintiffs sought to recover from the defendants the loss which they had thus incurred, on the ground that, owing to the neglect of the master and crew, the Lake Ontario, when she received her cargo and sailed therewith, was in such a condition that she could not carry the cargo safely on the voyage, and in consequence the cargo during the voyage was damaged. They further alleged that the cargo was properly stowed, and that the damage thereto did not arise from improper stowage. The defendants denied that the cargo was damaged through the improper navigation of the ship, and contended that the damage had arisen from improper stowage, and that they were therefore not liable to indemnify the plaintiffs.

Barnes, Q.C. and Carver for the plaintiffs.

Cohen, Q.C. and Joseph Walton for the defendants.

The arguments appear fully from the judgment.

May 4.—CHARLES, J. delivered the following judgment:—The plaintiffs in this case were the owners of a ship called the Lake Ontario, which was entered on the books of the defendants, an association of shipowners, for protection for the whole amount of her tonnage. Among the risks, events, and occurences in respect of which, according to the defendants' rules, the plaintiffs were by reason of such entry entitled to protection were the following: "Loss of or damage to any goods or merchandise or other property or things on board or in charge of any ship entered for protection, where such loss or damage has been caused by the improper navigation of such ship, or by collision with any substance other than water . . . Damage to or loss of goods or things on any pier or jetty, or like structure, caused by like improper navigation, shall be deemed covered by this clause." The rules also provided that no claim should be made for any damage to or loss of cargo or other things where the same should have been caused by improper stowage. It was proved at the trial that in Nov. 1884 the Lake Ontario carried a general cargo from Middlesbrough to Adelaide, consisting of pig iron, coal, and coke, and seventy casks of patent liquid coating composition, to be used as paint for machine castings. These casks were stowed on dunnage wood between the foremast and the main hatch. On the 27th May 1885 the ship arrived at Adelaide, and a few days later began to be discharged. The iron, coal, and coke were taken out first, and then the casks, some of which it was found had been leaking. A quantity of composition had escaped into the hold, and had saturated a portion of the dunnage and the ceiling and limber boards of the ship. The whole ship was pervaded with a strong smell of creosote or paraffin. Whilst she was empty the ceiling and limber boards were scraped in the usual way, but no special measures were adopted to get rid of the smell. In June 1885 she was loaded with a cargo of wheat, to be carried to Dublin. Dunnage wood, including the portion which had been in contact with the composition, was first laid on the ceiling. On the dunnage was a layer of sacking, and on the sacking the wheat was placed in bags. The ship arrived at Dublin on the 20th Nov., and after a few bags had been discharged a complaint was made by the consignee that they smelt of paraffin. The discharge was stopped in consequence, and the plaintiffs bought in the cargo at the market price of undamaged wheat. The bags which had been taken out were replaced, and the cargo was carried to Liverpool, where a careful examination of it was made, and the whole of it was found more or less tainted with the smell of paraffin, and the wheat in some of the bags packed nearest to the ceiling and dunnage was discoloured. The plaintiffs sold the cargo in this condition for the best price they could get, and were losers to the extent of 2400*l.* This sum they sought in this action to recover from the defendants. The main point of controversy at the trial was as to the cause of the damage, the plaintiffs contending that it arose entirely, or almost entirely, from the saturated condition of the ceiling and limber boards; the defendants, on the other hand, insisting that it was attributable to the condition of the dunnage wood. It is not necessary for me to examine the evidence in detail on the one side and the other upon this point. It left in the result no doubt on my mind that the state of the dunnage had little or nothing to do with the state of the cargo. The damage, in my opinion, was attributable to the state of the ceiling and limber boards. They had not been properly cleansed, and the tarry stuff with which they were impregnated tainted the whole cargo. Two questions now arise for my determination—first, did this damage arise from improper navigation? and, secondly, if it did, was it also damage caused by improper stowage? First, then, I must consider whether it was caused by improper navigation. Now, it was caused by the act of the plaintiffs in putting the goods into a ship which had not been effectually cleaned. She was, when loaded, unfit to receive a cargo of wheat, and, as might have been anticipated, the wheat was spoiled. That this was improper management can scarcely be disputed; but was it "improper navigation?" It was contended that it was, chiefly upon the authority of Carmichael v. Liverpool Sailing Shipowners' Mutual Indemnity Association (6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 130; 19 Q. B. Div. 242). There, during the loading of a cargo of wheat, a port in the ship's side was insufficiently secured, so that during the voyage water leaked in and damaged the wheat in the lower hold. The leak did not impede the navigation of the ship. It was held, nevertheless, in the Divisional Court and the Court of Appeal that there had been "improper navigation" with regard to the safety of the cargo. Much reliance was placed by the plaintiffs on the language of the learned judges in that case. Thus Wills, J., at p. 246, says: "Improper navigation is not confined to the voyage; it embraces acts done anterior to the voyage which render the ship unfit to carry the cargo." Fry, L.J. says, at p. 249: "Without attempting to define all the cases which may come within the words 'improper navigation,' I think those words, as used in this rule, do include every case where something is omitted to be done which ought to be done before the departure of the ship in order to enable the ship to carry the cargo safely from the port of departure to the port of arrival, and where that omission leads to the cargo not being safely and securely carried;" and Lopes, L.J., at p. 251, says: "In my opinion, improper navigation means the improper management of a ship in respect of the cargo (and this was a cargo-carrying ship) during the voyage. . . . It appears to me that any negligence before the commencement of the voyage which results in bad management of the ship in respect of the cargo during the voyage is improper navigation within this rule, although the course of the vessel is in no way impeded or hindered." These observations, however, must, I think, be construed with regard to the facts of the case and the arguments presented, and not as laying down as a rule that all improper management of whatever kind of a ship whereby a cargo is damaged is necessarily improper navigation with reference to that cargo. The illustrations given by Fry, L.J. of a captain having put to sea without a compass, whereby the ship loses her way on the ocean and ship and cargo are lost, or, again, of bad stowage before the commencement of the voyage affecting the sailing of the ship, point to some limitation imposed by the use of the word "navigation;" and on reference to the judgment of Lord Esher, M.R., I think it clear what the limitation is. Improper navigation includes, according to him, something wrongly done or omitted before the navigation commenced which has an effect on the ship's navigation whilst she is being navigated, and which affects her safe sailing as a ship with regard to the safety of the goods on board. In Carmichael v. Liverpool Sailing Shipowners' Mutual Indemnity Association (6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 130; 19 Q. B. Div. 242), the safe sailing of the ship was directly affected, as regarded the safety of the goods, owing to the inefficient closing of the porthole before the navigation began. The partly-closed opening rendered her unsafe as a ship for the cargo, just as she would have been unsafe had she gone to sea with her hatches open, so that sea-water could reach her hold. That being so, the defendants' pleas, first, that the wrong act was done before the navigation commenced, and, secondly, that the ship herself had not been endangered, were held unavailing. So, again, in The Warkworth (5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 326; 9 P. Div. 145), the plaintiffs' ship, owing to a defect in her steering gear, which had been carelessly mended before the navigation commenced, steered so badly that she came into collision with another vessel. It was held that she had been improperly navigated within the meaning of 25 & 26 Vict. c. 63, s. 54, sub-sect. 4. She had been sent to sea in a state which rendered it dangerous to sail her, and it is with reference to the fact that she was not in a condition to be employed as a ship at all that the observation of Bowen, L.J. must, I think, be read. "A person," he says, at p. 148, "who uses his ship which is not in a condition to be so employed does in reality improperly navigate her." By that I understand him to refer to the employment of a ship as a ship. Now, in the present case the act of improper navigation relied on was putting the cargo into a hold, the bottom of which was so saturated with a tarry substance that the whole cargo was tainted. But this act had no effect whatever on the safe sailing of the ship as a ship, with regard to the safety of the goods. It was bad management of her as a receptacle or warehouse for the goods, but did not at all affect her qualities as a ship, and that being so does not appear to me to come within the term "improper navigation." This disposes of the case; but I think I ought to express my opinion on the further contention raised by the defendants. Assuming the case to be one of "improper navigation," was it one of "improper stowage?" I have felt considerable doubt on this point, but, after consideration, I have come to the conclusion that the case was one of "improper stowage." it was urged that "improper stowage" meant Improper collocation of the parts of the cargo. But I do not see why the term is to be so limited. It seems to me to apply as well to the placing of the whole cargo in an unsuitable place as to the unskilful disposition of its parts. Suppose, for example, that the cargo had been tainted by the dunnage, I should certainly have thought the case to be one of "improper stowage," and I see no reason why the disposition of the cargo in a dirty and unsuitable hold is not equally "improper stowage." Whichever view, therefore, be adopted as to the meaning of the phrase "improper navigation," the defendants are, in my judgment, protected from liability. If the case was not one of "improper navigation" they are free, because the first rule which I have cited does not apply. If the case is one of "improper navigation" they are protected by the second rule, which exempts them from liability in case of "improper stowage." My judgment is accordingly for the defendants with costs.

Judgment for the defendants.

THE AGUADILLANA. (a)

Collision—Fog — Anchorage ground — Rules and Bye-laws for the Navigation of the River Thames 1872, arts. 10 and 12.

Although a vessel may be justified in anchoring in the fairway of the Thames through being overtaken by a dense fog, such a place is not a proper anchorage ground under arts. 10 and 12 of the Thames Rules and Bye-laws 1872, and the duty lies on those in charge of her to move her as soon as they reasonably can, and if a collision occurs whilst she is so anchored, the question will be, whether between the time of her anchoring and the collision the weather was such that she could reasonably have been removed.

A steamship bound up the Thames on a flood tide ought not to leave a wharf and get under way in a dense fog, and, semble, if a vessel is overtaken by a dense fog in such circumstances, the proper mode for her to go up is dredging up stern first with her anchor down, so that she can be brought up at any moment.

THIS was a collision action in rem instituted by the owners of the steamship Alford against the owners of the steamship Aguadillana. The defendants counter-claimed.

The collision occurred in Greenwich Reach of the river Thames, on the 7th Jan. 1889.

The facts alleged by the plaintiffs were as follows: Shortly before 4.45 a.m. on the 7th Jan. the Alford, a steamship of 638 tons register, laden with a general cargo, was in Greenwich Reach, bound up the river. She had just previously left the cattle wharf at Deptford. The weather, which had been foggy when she left the cattle wharf, had just set in a dense fog, and the tide was the last quarter flood, of the force of about two knots. She was proceeding up about mid-stream, with an angle to the north shore, and making about a knot through the water, with her engines working easy ahead. Her regulation lights were duly exhibited and burning brightly, her whistle was being duly sounded, and a good look-out was being kept on board of her. In these circumstances those on board the Alford (which had previously stopped her engines on account of the fog, and then, in order to clear a steamer under way on the port bow, had set them easy ahead, and put her helm aport) suddenly observed the white light and loom of a vessel at anchor, which proved to be the Aguadillana, distant about half to one ship's length, and bearing about three points on the port bow, and although the engines of the Alford were at once put full speed astern, and her helm hard-a-ported, she fouled the chain cable of the Aguadillana with her port side, which brought her up, and then with her port side struck the stem of the Aguadillana, thereby sustaining great damage.

The facts alleged by the defendants were as follows: At about 4.45 a.m. on the 7th Jan. the Aguadillana, a Spanish steamship of 848 tons register, left the Surrey Commercial Docks on a voyage to Bremerhaven, laden with a general cargo. The Aguadillana proceeded down the river for about an hour, when the weather, which had been hazy, became very thick with fog, and, as it was unsafe to continue under way, the Aguadillana was brought to anchor off the Victualling Yard, Deptford, about half a ship's length from the Deptford buoys, where she remained until the collision with the Alford. About 4.30 p.m. the Aguadillana was lying to her anchor head down the river, the tide being three-quarter flood, running about two knots an hour. There was still a thick fog, and no wind. The Aguadillana had her regulation riding light duly hoisted on the forestay, and a white light also hung from aft, above the taffrail, and both were burning brightly. A good look-out was being kept on board of her, and her bell was being duly sounded. In these circumstances those on board the Aguadillana observed about one to two ships' lengths off, and about two points on the starboard bow of the Aguadillana, the loom of a steamship, which was the Alford under way, and angling towards the stem of the Aguadillana. The bell of the Aguadillana was kept loudly ringing, but the Alford, showing her red light, came on across the bows of the Aguadillana, and with her port side struck the stem of the Aguadillana, doing her considerable damage.

The plaintiffs (inter alia) charged the Aguadillana with anchoring and remaining anchored at an improper place, in breach of arts. 10 and 12 of the Rules and Bye-laws of the river Thames 1872.

The defendants (inter alia) charged the Alford with improperly being under way, having regard to the thick fog which there was at, and had been before, the time of the collision.

C. Hall, Q.C. (with him J. P. Aspinall) for the plaintiffs.

Sir Walter Phillimore (with him Stubbs) for the defendants.

BUTT, J.—The Aguadillana had, in consequence of a dense fog, dropped her anchor somewhere near the middle of the river. I very much doubt whether she was as near mid-river as is alleged, having regard to the evidence as to the proximity of one of the buoys to her. But I do not think it is very material, because I think, and the Elder Brethren agree with me, that it was owing to the fog that she dropped her anchor where she did. She was not anchored in a proper anchorage ground, and a duty, therefore, lay on those in charge of her to move her as soon as they reasonably could. Therefore, the question is, Was the state of the weather during that day such as would have offered the pilot of the Aguadillana a reasonable opportunity of shifting his berth? There is one matter which has weighed considerably with myself and the Elder Brethren, and it is this: the mate and pilot of the Aguadillana, the captain being on shore, actually consulted together whether it was safe and prudent to move the ship, and came to the conclusion that it was not. No doubt there is considerable conflict and contradiction as to the density of the fog, and as to its varying nature during the day. But, on the whole, I must say I think the evidence establishes that there was a dense fog prevailing without intermission throughout the day. There are some witnesses called on behalf of the Aguadillana with reference to whom I will say that their acts, rather than their opinions, weigh very strongly upon my mind. I refer especially to the witnesses Sinclair and Jones. Sinclair was the pilot of a vessel at anchor very near to the place of collision. He was in such a position opposite to the entrance to the dock that he desired to move, and says that if the weather had permitted he would have moved. He said he did not consider it prudent in the then state of the weather to do so, and added that he never saw across the river, nor half across, all day. I do not forget in connection with this that Mr. Hall has pointed out that this man was not on board his ship until two in the afternoon. But then we have the evidence of Jones, who was chief boatman on board the little steam launch Mary, belonging to the Thames Conservancy Board. There was a board meeting that day. The Mary started from Greenwich, but had to stop at Limehouse about 10 a.m., because the fog was so dense that her master was afraid to take even this little craft further up the river. He accordingly went on by train, and instructed Jones to come on up the river if the fog would allow, and if not by a certain time then to go back to Greenwich. Now, as a matter of fact, this little launch waited till 1.30 p.m. in the afternoon. During all that time, in the judgment of the man in command, he was not justified in taking her up the river. He then got under way at Limehouse Pier, and did not reach Greenwich till 3.30 p.m. Taking a little steam launch like this down from Limehouse Pier to Greenwich against the flood tide is a different thing to taking a vessel of the size of the Aguadillana up from the cattle wharf at Deptford to the premises of the General Steam Navigation Company with the tide. On the whole, the conclusion to which I have come, and in which the Elder Brethren agree, is that although we are not disposed lightly to justify a man who drops his anchor in or near mid-river, and remains there when he could reasonably move his ship to a proper berth, we think the circumstances are such in this case that those in charge of the Aguadillana had no reasonable opportunity of moving her, and that, therefore, they are not to blame for remaining where they did.

With regard to the Alford, I do not believe it is accurate to say, as her witnesses have said, that they saw the lights on shore on the other side of the river. I do not think it necessarily follows that they are wilfully stating that which they knew to be untrue, because I dare say there were lights on the other side of the river which they might have mistaken for shore lights. The conclusion to which I have come is, that in the state of the weather which prevailed, the Alford ought not to have left the cattle wharf and attempted to go up the river as she did. We think that it was imprudent to go up the river at all. But the Elder Brethren advise me very strongly, and it is entirely in accord with my view, that she ought to have gone up stern first. Now, I know very well that there are objections with regard to lights to vessels dredging up the river stern first. But vessels do, as a rule, on a flood tide dredge up stern foremost. I know an instance, namely, in the Mersey, where there is a positive recommendation that vessels going up the Mersey on a flood tide shall turn and go up stern first. Moreover, in this case we have the fact that the Benbow, a vessel belonging to the same company as the Alford, did go up early on that afternoon from the same wharf, and that she went up stern first. The steamship Royal Dane performed the same manœuvre. Its advantages are obvious. A steamer dredging up with a flood tide, with her anchor on the ground, can immediately pay cable out and get a hold of the ground in case of emergency. It seems to me extremely probable that if the Alford had had her stern towards this vessel when she let go her anchor, there would have been no collision at all. We think, therefore, that the Alford was to blame in acting as she did at the time in question. There are one or two other facts which, to my mind, discredit the evidence of the Alford. I have no doubt whatever but that the Aguadillana and some other vessels were all ringing their bells at the time in question as hard as they could, and yet not a witness from the Alford has been willing to admit that they ever heard a bell. Either they were wilfully stopping their ears, or they were extremely negligent. On the whole, the conclusion to which I have come is that the Alford must be pronounced alone to blame.

THE IMBRO. (a)

Collision—Stern light—Overtaking ship—Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, arts. 2, 6, and 11.

It is a breach of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea to carry a fixed stern light the rays of which show within the area of the side lights.

Semble, it is a breach of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea to carry any fixed stern light, as the Regulations only contemplate a stern light being shown when there is a vessel overtaking.

Semble, a vessel carrying a fixed stern light, the rays of which show within the area of the side-lights, must be held to blame if a collision occurs, unless she can show that the carrying of such a light could not have contributed to the collision.

THIS was a collision action in rem by the owners of the ship Poseidon against the owners of the steamship Imbro and her freight. The defendants counter-claimed.

The collision occurred about 7 p.m. on the 25th Feb. 1889, in the English Channel off Dungeness. The facts alleged by the plaintiffs were as follows: Shortly before 7 p.m. on the 25th Feb., the Poseidon, an iron ship of 1708 tons register, whilst on a voyage from Chittagong to Dundee, laden with a cargo of jute, was in the Straits of Dover, about nine miles from Dungeness. She was becalmed, heading about N.N.W., and without steerage way. The weather was fine and clear, The regulation side lights of the Poseidon were duly exhibited and burning brightly. A white light was also hung over her stern, two feet above the level of the deck, for overtaking vessels. The stern of the Poseidon was elliptical in shape, and the light was in a globe lantern lashed outside the rail. The rail was an open rail, and closed in with canvas. In these circumstances those on board the Poseidon observed the green and masthead lights of a steamer (which proved to be the Imbro) bearing between two and three points abaft the beam on the port side of the Poseidon. She was distant about a mile, and her hull was visible about the same time. The lights of the Imbro gradually drew nearer to the Poseidon, and, when the Imbro was within about three ship's lengths of the Poseidon, she suddenly showed her red light and shut in her green light, thereby rendering a collision inevitable. Those on board the Poseidon then loudly hailed the Imbro to stop and reverse her engines, and waved the bright light which had been shown from the stern; but the Imbro came on at great speed, and with her stem and port bow struck the port quarter of the Poseidon.

The facts alleged by the defendants were as follows: Shortly before 7 p.m. on the 25th Feb., the Imbro, a screw steamship of 780 tons register, while on a voyage from Bilbao to Newcastle, laden with a cargo of iron ore, was in the English Channel off Dungeness. The Imbro was heading about E. by N. ¾ N., making eight knots an hour. Her regulation lights were duly exhibited and burning brightly, and a good look-out was being kept on board of her. Under these circumstances a white light, which proved to be on the Imbro, was seen half a point on the starboard bow and distant three and a half to four miles. This light was taken to be the masthead light of a steamship, and was watched in the expectation that the steamship would show one or both of her side lights, and the Imbro was kept on her course. Some time after a red side light was seen nearly right ahead, but a little on the port bow withal, and was taken to be the light of a sailing vessel. Both lights were carefully watched, and the Imbro was kept on her course, as it was believed that the red light could be easily cleared when the supposed steamship showing the white light had been made out and acted for; but suddenly the white and red lights before mentioned were made out to be on the same ship, viz., the Poseidon, and, although the helm of the Imbro was at once put hard-a-port and her engines reversed full speed, the Imbro with her stem and port bow struck the port quarter of the Poseidon.

The defendants (inter alia) charged the plaintiffs with breach of arts. 2, 6, and 11 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea in carrying a stern light so as to be visible continuously and within the area of the red light, and so as to mislead those on board the Imbro.

Myburgh, Q.C. and Bucknill, Q.C. for the plaintiffs.—The Imbro is alone to blame. The Poseidon was justified in carrying a fixed stern light, and did not by so doing act in contravention of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea. Inasmuch as the rail was covered with canvas, the light could not intersect the side lights, and could not therefore mislead those on the Poseidon. Art. 11 does not say that the light shall be screened; it merely says that the light shall be shown from the stern. If so, the plaintiffs complied with the letter of the article. It is also submitted that, for the purposes of the Regulations, "show" and "carry" are synonymous terms. For instance, in art. 10 (d.) the word used is "show," which from the context clearly means "carry." The remarks of Sir James Hannen in The Palinurus (6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 271; 58 L. T. Rep. N. S. 533; 13 P. Div. 14) are not applicable to the facts of this case, and are also obiter. As long as the Imbro was an overtaking vessel she was entitled to the assistance of a stern light, and it is immaterial how it was shown to her.

Sir Walter Phillimore (with him J. P. Aspinall), for the defendants, contra.—It is submitted that in fact the rays of the stern light intersected the rays of the side lights, and therefore the plaintiffs are guilty of a breach of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea. As soon as ever the Imbro came within the range of the red light of the Poseidon, she ceased to be an "overtaking ship" within the meaning of art. 11. The light contemplated by the Regulations is a flash light and not a fixed light, which is always liable to be mistaken for something other than a stern light. The language of Sir James Hannen in The Palinurus (ubi sup.) is exactly in point:

The Main, 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 37; 55 L. T. Rep. N. S. 15; 11 P. Div. 132;
The Franconia, 35 L. T. Rep. N. S. 721; 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 295; 2 P. Div. 8;
The Dunelm, 9 P. Div. 164; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 304; 51 L. T. Rep. N. S. 214.

If the Poseidon was heading N.N.W., and the Imbro E. by N. ¾ N., showing her green light to the Poseidon, she must have been within the area of the Poseidon's red light, and less than two points abaft her beam. Hence those on her saw both the red and stern lights at the same time, and therefore two lights were visible within the same area.

Cur. adv. vult.

May 7.—BUTT, J.—At 7 p.m. in the evening of the 25th Feb., a collision occurred between the ship Poseidon and the steamer Imbro. The Poseidon was bound on a voyage from Chittagong to Dundee, laden with a cargo of jute, and was lying becalmed off Dungeness. She was heading to the northward and westward without steerage way. The Imbro was on a voyage from Bilbao to Newcastle, laden with iron ore. She was steering E. by N. ¾ N., and was making eight knots an hour. Under the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, it was the duty of the officer in charge of the Imbro to keep out of the way of the Poseidon. In fact, she ran into the Poseidon at considerable speed, the stem and port bow of the steamer striking the port quarter of the Poseidon. The officer in charge of the Imbro endeavoured to excuse himself by saying that he was misled by the Poseidon exhibiting an improper light, and that this was the real cause of the collision. After stating the course and speed of the steamer, and that her regulation lights were duly exhibited, the defence in paragraph 3 alleges as follows: "In these circumstances those on board the Imbro observed a white light, which afterwards proved to be on the Poseidon, distant three and a half to four miles, and bearing about half a point on the starboard bow. This light was taken to be the masthead light of a steamship, and was watched in the expectation that she would show one or both of her side lights, and the Imbro was kept on her course. Some time afterwards a red light was seen nearly right ahead, but a little on the port bow withal, and was taken to be the light of a sailing vessel, the white light being still about the same bearing on the starboard bow. Both lights were carefully watched, and the Imbro was kept on her course, as it was believed that the red light could be easily cleared when the supposed steamship showing the white light had been made out and acted for; but suddenly the white and red lights before mentioned were (by the cabin lights of the Poseidon) made out to be on the same ship, and, although the helm of the Imbro was at once put hard-a-port and her engines reversed full speed, the Imbro with her stem and port bow struck the port quarter of the Poseidon, thereby sustaining damage." Par. 5. "Those on board the Poseidon improperly carried a stern light so as to be visible continuously and within the area of her red light, and so as to mislead those on board the Imbro." It is impossible to accept the evidence adduced in support of these allegations as entirely accurate and trustworthy. It is not, however, necessary now to deal with it in detail, because I am of opinion that, on his own showing, the officer in charge of the Imbro was to blame. He was approaching two lights—the one white, the other red—both nearly ahead of him, which he says he mistook for the lights of two different vessels, the one a steamship, the other a sailing vessel. Contrary to his expectation, the vessel which he says he mistook for a steamer failed to open either one or other of her coloured lights—a circumstance in itself embarrassing and suggestive of difficulty and danger, inasmuch as it prevented his judging the direction she was steering. Yet he kept on at full speed until he got so close to the Poseidon that it was impossible to avoid collision with her, lying as she was practically helpless and motionless on the water. The Elder Brethren agree with me in regarding this as reckless and negligent navigation and a breach of art. 18 of the Regulations. The Imbro must therefore be held to blame.

Then comes the question, was the Poseidon also to blame? Besides the regulation side lights she was carrying over her stern a white light in a globe lantern lashed to the rail. We were asked to believe that this light was so fixed that it could not be seen forward of a line drawn at the stern of the ship at right angles to the keel. The ship has an elliptical stern, and we have no doubt that the light in question would, and did in fact show considerably forward of such line; that its rays intersected the rays of the coloured lights at no great distance from the ship, and that both the red light and the stern light of the Poseidon were at one and the same time open, and were actually seen by those on board the Imbro. Is it a breach of the Regulations to carry a light so fixed? The following articles of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea are material. Art. 2: "The lights mentioned in the following articles and no others shall be carried in all weathers from sunset to sunrise." Art. 11: "A ship which is being overtaken by another shall show from her stern to such last mentioned ship a white light or a flare-up-light." It is an infringement of art. 2 to carry a stern light fixed as a permanent light, because when there is no vessel overtaking it it would be a light other than those prescribed. I am disposed to think that art. 11 contemplates only the holding up or flashing of a light to an overtaking ship. The words certainly do not authorise the carrying of such a light on board a ship when there is no vessel overtaking her in sight. I hold it to be contrary to the spirit as well as to the words of the articles for a vessel to exhibit such a fixed light to a vessel which is not overtaking her within the meaning of the rule; though it may be inevitable that a light, e.g., a flare, shown to an overtaking vessel shall be seen by another vessel not overtaking her. It becomes then material to determine what is an overtaking vessel within the meaning of art. 11. In my opinion a vessel approaching another from aft and being more than two points abaft the beam of the foremost ship—a position from which the coloured side lights of the foremost vessel would not be visible—is an overtaking vessel within the meaning of art. 11, and a vessel is not an overtaking vessel within the meaning of the article unless she is more than two points abaft the beam of the other vessel. In one sense no doubt a vessel may be overtaking another when she is less than two points abaft the beam of the other. I hold nevertheless that she is not then an overtaking vessel within the meaning of the word as used in art. 11, the whole object of the article being, in my judgment, to provide for a warning light being shown to a vessel approaching another from aft and in such a position from which the coloured lights of the foremost vessel would not be visible. This appears to me an interpretation which makes the several articles work in harmony, and which obviates the difficulty to which I referred in the case of The Seaton (ubi sup.). I mention that case for the purpose of saying here that I consider any expression which I may have used during the arguments of counsel, and which may conflict with my present decision, erroneous. Applying arts. 2 and 11 as I have interpreted them to the facts of this case, it is clear that those in charge of the Poseidon were guilty of a breach of the Regulations in carrying the stern light as they did. Whether that breach of the Regulations was one which would have misled an officer exercising ordinary care and intelligence, or whether it did in fact mislead the officer in charge of the Imbro, I am not concerned to inquire. The 17th section of 36 & 37 Vict. c. 87 provides as follows: "If in any case of collision it is proved to the court before which the case is tried that any regulation for preventing collisions contained in or made under the Merchant Shipping Acts 1854 to 1873 has been infringed, the ship by which such regulation has been infringed shall be deemed to be in fault, unless it is shown to the satisfaction of the court that the circumstances of the case made departure from the regulation necessary." It has been proved that one of the regulations referred to in that section has been infringed; it is not shown that the circumstances of the case made a departure from the regulation necessary; and it is, in my judgment, impossible to say that the infringement of the regulation in question may not have caused or contributed to the collision. I think that the interpretation of the regulations which I have expressed is covered by decisions of the Court of Appeal in the cases of The Franconia (ubi sup.) and The Main (ubi sup.), and of the President of this division in the case of The Palinurus (ubi sup.). If this decision goes to any extent beyond the authority of those cases the responsibility is mine. I pronounce both vessels to blame.

Salvage—Consolidated actions—Tender—Costs.

Where separate salvage actions against the same ship were consolidated, leave being given to the various plaintiffs to appear separately at the hearing as their interests were conflicting, and the defendants with their defence tendered and paid into court a sum of money as being sufficient to satisfy all claims, but did not apportion it to the separate plaintiffs, the Court having upheld the tender ordered all parties to pay their own costs incurred subsequently to the tender, the defendants paying the costs previous to the tender.

THESE were three consolidated salvage actions against the owners of the steamship Lee, her cargo and freight.

The plaintiffs delivered separate statements of claims, and the actions were subsequently consolidated.

The defendants paid into court the sum of 1750*l.* and in paragraph 14 of their defence alleged as follows: "The defendants have paid into court the sum of 1750*l.*, and say the same is sufficient to satisfy all claims which may be made in respect of the said services."

BUTT, J. upheld the tender, and, in dealing with the costs, said as follows:—Now, then, with regard to the question of costs. I am not disposed to make the salvors pay costs in this case. Although I think the sum of 1750*l.* was sufficient for the services, yet it is extremely difficult if not impossible for each one of the separate salvors to determine whether this tender should be accepted or not. Supposing one of the salvors was inclined to think that the award was enough for the whole of the services, how could he accept it without the consent of all the others? How could he know what portion of it was attributable to him? I do not think under these circumstances it would be reasonable to make them pay the costs. I therefore direct that each party shall pay his own costs.

THE STETTIN. (a)

Carriage of goods—Bill of lading—Delivery to the consignee—German law.

Where by a bill of lading goods are to be delivered to a named consignee or his assigns, and it is not assigned, the master is not justified either by English or German law in delivering to the consignee without his producing the bill of lading, and if he does so, and the consignee has no right to the possession of the goods, the shipowner is liable to the shipper for damages for wrongful delivery.

THIS was an action in rem by Sir Charles Price and Co. against the owners of the German steamship Stettin, to recover damages for wrongfully delivering a cargo of seed oil shipped by the plaintiffs on the said steamship.

The action was instituted in the City of London Court, and transferred to the High Court.

The plaintiffs were oil refiners carrying on business in the city of London, and on the 19th June 1888 they agreed with the defendants that the defendants should carry for them in the Stettin, on the terms contained in a bill of lading, fifty-seven barrels of seed oil belonging to the plaintiffs, from London to Stettin.

The material parts of the said bill of lading were as follows:

Shipped in good order and condition by Sir Charles Price and Co. on board the steamship or vessel called the Stettin . . . now lying in this port bound for Stettin . . . fifty-seven barrels of seed oil . . . to be delivered subject to the exceptions and conditions hereinafter mentioned, in the like good order and condition, from the ship's deck where the ship's responsibility shall cease, at the port of Stettin unto S. Mendelsohn or to his or their assigns, he or they paying freight for the said goods in London . . . the goods to be taken from the ship by the consignees as soon after arrival as the vessel is ready to discharge, or the same may be transhipped into lighters and (or) landed on the quays and (or) warehoused all at the expense and risk of the owners of such goods. . . . In witness whereof the master or agent of the said vessel hath affirmed to two bills of lading, exclusive of the master's copy, all of this tenor and date, one of which bills being accomplished the others to stand void.

The plaintiffs accordingly shipped the said goods and paid the defendants the freight in respect of their carriage.

On the ship's arrival at Stettin, the master having a copy of the bill of lading and being personally acquainted with Mendelsohn, the person named in the bill of lading, delivered the goods to him, without requiring him to produce the bill of lading.

Mendelsohn was the agent of a person to whom the plaintiffs had contracted to sell the goods, but the vendee having failed to comply with the terms of the contract of sale as to payment, the bill of lading was retained by the plaintiffs' agent at the port of discharge.

Mendelsohn on receipt of the goods delivered them to the vendee, and they and their value were thereby lost to the plaintiffs.

The plaintiffs called German advocates to prove that by German law the master could not deliver to the consignee named in the bill of lading without the production of the bill of lading. The defendants called German advocates to prove the contrary. The result of such evidence is stated in the judgment of Butt, J.

Cohen, Q.C. (with him Pike), for the plaintiffs, was not called upon.

Joseph Walton (with him Barnes, Q.C.) for the defendants.—Neither according to German nor English law was it necessary that the bill of lading should be produced before these goods were delivered to the consignee. The contract between the parties, as evidenced by the bill of lading, was that the shipowner should deliver to the named consignee, on his or the shippers' order. There was no order, and therefore the shipowners fulfilled the contract in delivering to the consignee. There is no authority for the plaintiffs' contention.

BUTT, J.—I have no doubt but that Mendelsohn was really the agent of the person with whom the plaintiffs had contracted in this case. I think the evidence clearly establishes that. With regard to the other question, which is the main one in the case, it is contended that by German law the shipowner is entitled to deliver to the consignee named in the bill of lading without production of either part of the bill of lading. Now we have had the evidence of skilled advocates on one side and the other, and their evidence is entitled to consideration. But they differ and differ very widely, and in that divergence of opinion I have come to the conclusion that the German law upon this subject does not differ in any essential respect from the English law. All I have to do therefore in the present case is to apply the English law upon the subject. I have no doubt whatever that, according to English law, a shipowner is not entitled to deliver goods to a person like Mendelsohn without either one part or the other of the bill of lading being produced. I shall therefore give judgment for the plaintiffs and refer the question of damages to the registrar if necessary.

THE CITY OF PEKING.

THE STEAMSHIP CITY OF PEKING v. THE COMPAGNIE DES MESSAGERIES MARITIMES (OWNERS OF THE S.S. SAGHALIEN) AND THE OWNERS OF CARGO ON BOARD. (a)

Collision—Evidence of negligence.

The fact of a vessel under steam colliding with a ship at her moorings in daylight is primâ facie evidence of fault; and her owners cannot escape liability except by proving that a competent officer could not have averted the collision by the exercise of ordinary care and skill.

Where a steamship under way collided with a vessel at her moorings in daylight in consequence of an exceptional current, known to be a possible though improbable occurrence, and it was proved that there was delay in dropping her anchor, and that the other anchor was not in readiness, she was found to have neglected ordinary precautions, and her owners were held liable.

THIS was an appeal from the judgment of the judge of the Vice-Admiralty Court of Hong Kong by the defendants, the owners of the s.s. City of Peking, in a collision action in rem.

The collision took place in the harbour of Hong Kong, on the 29th Nov. 1886, between the plaintiffs' steamship the Saghalien and the defendants' steamship the City of Peking.

(a) Reported by J. P. ASPINALL and BUTLER ASPINALL, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

The City of Peking was found solely to blame for the collision.

At the time of the collision the Saghalien was lying moored to a buoy in Hong Kong harbour, and was run into by the City of Peking as she was entering the harbour, solely owing (as was alleged by the defendants) to a sudden and unexpected current driving her to port, which made it impossible for those in charge of her to avoid the collision.

The material facts of the case appear in the judgment.

Nov. 8, 1888.—Sir Walter Phillimore and Joseph Walton for the appellants, the owners of the City of Peking.

Barnes, Q.C. and Dr. Raikes for the respondents, the owners of the Saghalien.

Dec. 1.—Judgment was delivered by Lord WATSON.—This is an appeal brought by the owners of the City of Peking against a judgment of the Vice-Admiralty Court of Hong Kong, condemning their ship and bail in the amount of damage occasioned to the steamship Saghalien, belonging to the Compagnie des Messageries Maritimes, and her cargo, by the collision of the two vessels, which occurred within the harbour of Hong Kong shortly after 2 p.m. on the 29th Nov. 1886. The northern fairway of the harbour, which is about two-fifths of a mile in breadth, runs westward from the south-western extremity of a promontory, jutting into the harbour from the north, which is known as Kowloon Point. At the time of the collision the Saghalien was lying opposite to Kowloon Point, her head being moored to a buoy on the southern side of the fairway, which left her free to swing with wind or tide. The City of Peking, which is a screw steamer of 5042 tons burthen, and 425 feet in length, entered the harbour from the east, against a half ebb tide, on her way to her own moorings, which are situated on the north edge of the fairway nearly a mile to the west of Kowloon Point. It is not matter of dispute that, after she came within the limits of the harbour, the City of Peking was steered straight for the Meeanee buoy, which lay between her and the Saghalien, until she reached a point about three-fifths of a mile to the east of the latter vessel; and that appears to be the usual and proper course. The account which is given, by her own witnesses, of the subsequent navigation of the City of Peking, from the point in question till the collision took place, is as follows. In ordinary circumstances, her helm at that point would have been ported, so as to bring her towards the centre of the fairway, and she would in that case, if she had continued to obey her helm, have passed the Saghalien at a considerable distance. But that course was obstructed by two large junks which were heading towards Kowloon Point. These junks were in reality anchored, but they were supposed to be under way, owing to the fact that their sails were set, and were filled by a light easterly wind, and that their hawsers were on their port side. In these circumstances the speed of the City of Peking was reduced from ten to between four-and-a-half and five knots an hour, and her helm was ported and steadied on a course nearer to the south side of the fairway, which, if maintained, would have carried her astern of the junks, and about 400 feet ahead of the Saghalien. When she was astern of the junks, and about ninety feet from them, but before she came abreast of the Saghalien, the witnesses for the City of Peking assert that her head was suddenly caught by a strong tidal current, running southwards from Kowloon Point at the rate of four to five knots an hour, which at once canted it round to port. The captain, who was himself in charge upon the forward bridge, then gave three consecutive orders, all of which were promptly obeyed. He first ordered the helm to be put hard-a-port, but that had no effect. At that moment his vessed was less that twice her own length from the Saghalien, and he at once saw that there was imminent danger of collision. In fact the two ships were so near to each other that, in his judgment, he could not have got clear of the Saghalien by going full speed ahead. He accordingly gave the order to stop and reverse, and at the same time directed the third officer to go to the chief engineer and tell him to back her as hard as possible. On the return of the third officer from that errand, but not till then, he gave the order to drop the starboard anchor, which was the only one ready to let go, the port anchor having been unshackled just before they came abreast of Kowloon Point. These proceedings failed to stop her way, and the stem of the City of Peking struck the Saghalien, which was then heading to the north, nearly amidships, causing damage both to hull and cargo. The learned judge of the Vice-Admiralty Court came to the conclusion, upon the evidence, that the statements made by the witnesses of the City of Peking as to the alteration of her helm at the distance of three-fifths of a mile from the Saghalien are erroneous, and that she was actually steered throughout upon a course which necessarily brought her at right angles on the Saghalien.

Except upon very clear testimony their Lordships would be unwilling to hold that a well-equipped vessel like the City of Peking, with her officers and crew at their posts and on the outlook, had deliberately run down a ship at anchor; but there appears to them to be no ground for that inference in the present case. The learned judge relied upon the evidence of Isuard and Delmas, the second captain and lieutenant of the Saghalien, and that of Captain Paul, of the Tanais, who all state that, when they saw the City of Peking, she was bearing straight for the Saghalien. Had these witnesses observed the whole course of the City of Peking, their evidence would have been material; but having regard to the time at which their observations were made, it does not conflict with the evidence for the City of Peking. Only one of the three, Delmas, saw her at some distance off, when she fired a gun on entering the harbour, at which period of time she was admittedly steered for the Meeanee buoy, which was nearly in a line with the Saghalien. He then went about his own business, and saw no more of her, until her crew were preparing to let go the starboard anchor. Isuard no doubt says that he never lost sight of her, and that she never changed her course; but it clearly appears from his evidence that he did not see her at all until just before she was observed for the second time by Delmas. Captain Paul's opportunities of observation were equally limited. He says, "It was perhaps a minute from the time I first saw her till the collision." Whilst their Lordships are prepared to acquit the City of Peking of having steered a straight course for the Saghalien, it does not necessarily follow that, in their opinion, she must be absolved of all blame in the matter. When a vessel under steam runs down a ship at her moorings in broad daylight, that fact is by itself primâ facie evidence of fault; and she cannot escape liability for the consequences of her act, except by proving that a competent seaman could not have averted or mitigated the disaster by the exercise of ordinary care and skill. The appellants attribute the collision wholly to the effect upon their vessel of the current which caught her head, to counteract which they maintain that every reasonable precaution was used which ordinary skill and prudence could suggest. It appears to be an undoubted fact that, in certain states of the weather, at half ebb, the tide setting eastwards sweeps down the western shore of the promontory of Kowloon, and is thereby deflected, and runs with considerable force in a southerly direction across the fairway. These currents are exceptional, but that they do occasionally, although at distant intervals, occur, is known to mariners who frequent the harbour, and was known to the captain of the City of Peking. The evidence on both sides establishes that it is impossible to lay down any rule in regard to the recurrence of these exceptional tides; they may occur at any time, even when least anticipated, and a cautious mariner is therefore bound always to beep in view the possibility of their being met with. There can be no reason to doubt the statement of the captain that he did not expect to meet with a current of the force of that which he encountered; but, however little expected, it was his duty to be prepared for such a contingency. The fact that he had been compelled, by the apparent position of the two junks, to keep to the southern edge of the fairway made that duty the more imperative. Their Lordships are not prepared to hold that, using all due precaution, he was not entitled to steer upon the course which he proposed to follow. The liability or non-liability of his ship appears to them to depend upon this consideration—whether, at the time when she was caught by the current, he was prepared to use, and did actually use, all ordinary and proper measures for averting the collision? There is a serious conflict of testimony as to the actual force of the current at the time of the collision, some witnesses estimating it at half a knot, and others at nearly five knots, an hour. Their Lordships do not think it necessary to decide between these conflicting views, or to determine the precise strength of the current on the occasion in question. It appears to them that, assuming his statement on that point to be correct, the evidence nevertheless establishes that the captain of the City of Peking failed, in two particulars, to take proper steps for checking the way of his ship.

In the first place, their Lordships have been advised by their nautical assessors, and they have no hesitation in holding, that the starboard anchor ought to have been dropped at the same time when the order to stop and reverse was given. That an appreciable interval of time must have elapsed between the giving of the second and third orders is made clear by the evidence of the captain and third officer; and the second captain of the Saghalien is probably not far wrong in his estimate of distance when he states that, at the time it was dropped, the two vessels were not more than 200 feet apart. Seeing that 60 fathoms or 180 feet of chain were payed out with the anchor, there must have been very little time for it to operate before the collision occurred. In the second place, their Lordships have been advised that, in the circumstances in which the City of Peking was placed, her port anchor ought also to have been in readiness, and ought to have been let go, so soon as the ship ceased to obey her helm in consequence of the current. In that opinion they entirely concur. In such circumstances, the keeping of both anchors in readiness is a safe and ordinary precaution, it being impossible to predict which of the two it may become necessary to drop or that both will not be required. That a second anchor, if dropped in time along with the first, would have had a material influence in averting the collision, or minimising its effects, can hardly be questioned by the appellants, whose third officer states in his evidence, "I dare say two anchors would have held her." The fact seems to have been that those in charge of the City of Peking, although they ought to have been aware of the possibility, thought there was no probability of danger from a current; and, acting on that speculation, they allowed the port anchor to be unshackled before the junks were reached. In other words, they took their chance, and the ship must bear the consequences. It is right to state that these views are in entire accordance with certain of the findings in the court below. Their Lordships will humbly advise Her Majesty that the judgment appealed from ought to be affirmed, and the appeal dismissed. The appellant must pay the costs of the appeal.

COURT OF APPEAL

Friday, Feb. 15, 1889.

The Great Britain 100 A 1 Steamship Insurance Association v. Wyllie and others. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION.

Insurance—Marine—Mutual Association—Policy, form of — Insurance by managing owner — Liability of other owners for contributions.

H. & G., the managing owners of a steamship, insured her in a mutual assurance association in their own names, and the policy was expressed to be "as well in his or their own names as for and in the name or names of all and every other person or persons to whom the same doth, may, or shall appertain, in part or in all, subject to the provisions hereinafter contained." The consideration stated in the policy was "the contributions to be paid from time to time by the assured for losses and averages on other steamships." Such contributions having become payable, the association sued the part owners other than H. and G. to recover the same.

Held, that these part owners were liable, because the policy was made on their behalf, and they were "assured" within the meaning of the policy, and were expressly bound by the consideration clause to pay these contributions.

Quære, whether they became members of the association.

The Ocean Iron Steamship Insurance Association v. Leslie (57 L. T. Rep. N. S. 722; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 226) approved.

United Kingdom Mutual Steamship Insurance Association v. Nevill (6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 226, n.; 19 Q. B. Div. 110) distinguished.

This was an appeal by the defendants Wyllie, Ellis, Bower, Dalzell, and Burnyeat from the judgment of Day, J. at the trial without a jury in Middlesex.

The plaintiffs, a mutual marine insurance association, sued the defendants, as part owners of the steamship Orchis, for calls made in respect of the insurance of that vessel, amounting to 63*l.* 12*s.* 7*d.* The Orchis was owned as to forty-eight shares by Messrs. Hornstedt and Garthorne, as to two shares by Wyllie, as to two shares by Bower, as to one share by Ellis, and as to four shares by Dalzell and Burnyeat. Messrs. Hornstedt and Garthorne were the managing owners of the Orchis, and they insured her with the plaintiff association. It was admitted that they had authority to insure in a mutual club. The policy of insurance was as follows:

Know all men that Hornsted and Garthorne as well in his or their own name or names as for and in the name or names of all and every other person or persons to whom the same doth, may, or shall appertain, in part or in all, subject to the provisions hereinafter contained, doth make assurance and cause himself or themselves and them and every of them to be insured . . . And so we, the assurers, are contented, and do hereby promise and bind ourselves to the assured, their executors, administrators, and assigns for the true performance of the premises; the consideration due unto us, the assurers, for the said insurance, being the contributions to be paid from time to time by the assured for losses and averages on other steamships mutually insured in the above-named association, and other costs, charges, and expenses of the association, at and after the rates per cent. to be determined by the committee thereof. And it is mutually agreed between the assured and assurers that all the rules of the said association, whether set out herein or indorsed hereupon, or otherwise, shall be as binding upon the assured and assurers, and that as fully and effectually to all intents and purposes, as if such rules were inserted in this policy, and formed part thereof.

The memorandum of association provided:

4. The objects for which the association is established are: (1) The insurance of steamships belonging to members of the association, or in which members of the association are interested or have a share or shares.

The articles of association, so far as are material in this case, were as follows:—

1. The association for the purposes of registration is declared to consist of one hundred members.

2. The committee may, whenever the business of the association requires it, register an increase of members.

3. Every person shall be deemed to have agreed to become a member of the association who insures any ship, or share or shares in a ship, in pursuance of the regulations hereinafter contained.

16. Every member shall have one vote (at general meetings) for each steamer entered by him or his firm.

32. All policies of insurance shall be issued or underwritten in the name of the association, and shall have a copy of the rules indorsed thereon.

(a) Reported by A. H. Bittleston, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

33. All claims in respect of insurances shall be made and enforced against the association, and not against any member or members thereof.

34. Every engagement or liability of a member of the association in respect of any insurance shall for all purposes relating to enforcing such engagement or liabilities be deemed to be an engagement or liability by or on the part of such member to the association, and not to any other member or members.

The rules indorsed upon the policy, so far as material, were as follows:—

1. The members of this club shall mutually insure each other's steamships or shares therein, in such manner and against such loss and damage as are hereinafter mentioned.

3. The insurance is against . . . the charges whereof the members having ships entered in this club shall bear in proportion to the sum insured in this club.

27. The committee shall meet at least once a month for the settlement of claims, and for such claims as they may pass, and for other contributions payable under these rules the managers shall draw on the members at one month, the members' respective proportion of such claims being calculated according to their several interests in this club at the time of such claims accruing.

33. A member shall be uninsured in respect of any ship or his share therein [upon certain events].

34. A member, provided he give due notice in writing, shall cease to be liable to contribution in respect of any ship for claims accruing [after certain events].

36. For ships ceasing to be insured the association may, but shall not be compelled to, relieve the member from future liability to contribution, on such terms as the managers may certify to be expedient.

The action came on for trial before Day, J. without a jury, in Middlesex, when he gave judgment for the plaintiffs for the amount claimed, as follows:

Day, J. — The plaintiffs in this action are one of those clubs which exist for the purpose of mutual insurance. Now, there is no doubt it is well settled that in the case of companies, as ordinarily understood there can neither be any liability on the part of cestuis que trust to the company, nor any right on their part as against the company. That is well settled law. Who are to be treated as members of the company is to be ascertained by the register. Companies of this description are creatures of statute law, which has made provisions regulating their existence and determining various details of their organisation. It is well settled law that no person can be liable as a shareholder, or be entitled to any benefit as a shareholder, who is not registered; that is to say, a person must be nominated a member of the company, and must be known as a member of the company, and persons cannot be held to be members of the company, whether for good or evil, who are not registered as members of the company. There can be no such thing as equitable interests in shares in a company as between the company and such persons. The company is not bound to take cognisance of trusts in any way. The company cannot take advantage of, or insist upon, rights as against persons who are not, in point of form, members of the company.

Now, that is clear and well-defined law, and is consistent with the statutes, and consistent with the necessities of the case. It would lead to inconvenience, which would be exceedingly great, if the law were otherwise. We are now dealing with that which is called a company, and is necessarily a company by reason of our law — namely, a mutual insurance club. It is, no doubt, laid down by the Lords Justices, that in cases of these insurance clubs there can be no trusts, and there can be no undisclosed principals, or undisclosed members; and, if I may say so, I concur in their view. This is necessarily an inconvenience arising from the law under which these clubs are constituted; it is an inconvenience that these policies must differ, and that the rights and liabilities must differ from the rights and liabilities of insurers who insure otherwise than on this mutual principle. This mutual principle has been exceedingly well explained by Mathew, J. in a case to which my attention has been called, which is reported in the Law Times—The Ocean Iron Steamship Association v. Leslie (supra). It is, no doubt, a modern practice, a most beneficial practice, and one based on thoroughly sound principles. At the same time the nature of these clubs differs very materially from that of ordinary companies. The members are necessarily a fluctuating body, and there are, consequently, fluctuating interests; and where the word "share" is used with reference to these clubs, it is used in a very different sense, or rather represents an entirely different thing, to that which is represented by the word "share" when it is used in reference to the interest of a person in an ordinary joint-stock company. I pointed out in the course of the argument the great difference between the word "share," as well understood and applied to interests of persons in joint-stock companies, and the word "share" as applicable, if it be applicable, to interests in these clubs. It is not a share at all in the ordinary sense of the word; in fact, it is in no sense a share. It is really a matter of proportionate liability, which is constantly varying according to the success or otherwise with which the club is conducted, or according to the extent of losses which may occur. It is a mere question of liability to make good the losses, and of the right to be paid for losses, as and when they occur. It is inconvenient to introduce the same word into two entirely different classes of cases, to which it is not similarly applicable. Now, in the present case the company, or rather the club —for I use that expression as more convenient— issued a policy. The membership of the club is defined by the articles of association. By art. 3 it is provided that "every person shall be deemed to have agreed to become a member of the association who insures any ship, or share or shares in a ship, in pursuance of the regulations hereinafter contained." Therefore, the membership is constantly fluctuating. A man becomes a member the instant he insures his ship. That constitutes membership. Having become a member he is interested, and the benefit he is to get is the payment of his insurance if his ship be lost. The liability he is under is the contribution he will have to make towards losses generally.

Now, in the present case a policy was issued in these terms: "Hornstedt and Garthorne as well in his or their own name or names as for and in the name and names of all and every other person or persons to whom the same doth, may, or shall appertain, in part or in all, subject to the provisions hereinafter contained, doth make assurance," and thereupon, as is admitted, Hornstedt and Garthorne became members. But it appears to me that not only did they become members, but that the other persons on whose behalf they professed there and then on the face of the policy to be acting, by the words "the name and names of all and every other person or persons to whom the same doth, may, or shall appertain," who were then the owners of the ship, also became members. It was not an insurance of any particular interest, or the interest of Hornstedt and Garthorne, but it was a policy effected on the whole ship, and upon all the interests in the ship, that then existed, and it was to be in the name or names of those persons. There can be no doubt that, if this had been an ordinary policy outside the club, no question would have arisen, but that every person then interested in the ship would have become insured, and the policy have enured to their benefit, and they would have become liable for the premiums. Now, what is the consideration for this policy? "The consideration due unto us, the assurers, for the said insurance, being the contributions to be paid from time to time by the assured." Now, who are the assured? The people who own the ship are, because they own the ship, and because Hornstedt and Garthorne, when they gave their own names, said that they also insured in the names of themselves and all other persons who were owners of the ship. The assured are Hornstedt and Garthorne and all other persons who are owners of the ship. They are the assured, not because they own the ship, but because Hornstedt and Garthorne told the association when they effected the policy that they were the persons on whose behalf the insurance was made. I cannot see any reason to doubt, looking at this policy, that they were the persons insured, and that they undertook by this policy to make good the contributions. It is conceded that, if it were not for the fact that the Great Britain 100 A 1 Steamship Insurance Association Limited happened to be a mutual club, there would be no doubt about it. I cannot see why the words should not mean the same thing when it is a club that is the assurer. If these persons are the assured, why are they not liable for these contributions? They have undertaken to pay them. They gave the authority to Hornstedt and Garthorne to insure in the club. Whatever has been done by Hornstedt and Garthorne has been done by their authority. The insurance has been effected by Hornstedt and Garthorne on their authority, and with authority to pledge their liability, and now it is said they are not liable because they are not members. I hold that they are members, because under the articles of association they are persons who have insured their ship, and became, by the act of insuring their ship, members of the association. Now, I have been pressed with the decision in The United Kingdom Mutual Steamship Insurance Association Limited v. Nevill (sup.), in the Court of Appeal, but that was a very different case. I need not go into the reasons assigned for the judgment, nor into the decision to which the Court of Appeal came. I am bound by that decision so far as it may be applicable; but I consider that case does not apply to the present. That was a very different case in many respects. The words there were entirely different. That policy, it would seem to me, excluded the notion of the co-owners being assured, because, remembering that the terms of the articles of association as to membership are similar to those found in the present case, I find that policy recites that Tully and Co. became members of the United Kingdom Mutual Association. Those words exclude the idea that the co-owners became members. The words are, "Whereas Tully having become a member," and they exclude the notion that the other people intended to become members. Tully therefore effected an insurance on the ship without any reference, as far as I can see, to any interest of any other persons. He did not purport to do it in the name of or on behalf of other persons. Therefore I am clearly of opinion that this case is distinguishable from the case in the Court of Appeal, and I give judgment for the plaintiffs with costs.

The defendants appealed.

Barnes, Q.C. and Joseph Walton for the appellants.—Though the managing owners had authority to insure the whole interest in this ship in the plaintiff association, they had no authority to insure in such a way as to make these defendants members of the association. When the form of the policy is looked at, together with the rules incorporated in it, and the articles of association, it is clear no persons became members except those whose names were given to the association and registered. Therefore these defendants did not become members, and no persons except members become liable to the association. This case is governed by the decision in The United Kingdom Mutual Steamship Assurance Association v. Nevill (19 Q. B. Div. 110; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 226, n.), which decided that only the person named in the policy became liable to the assurers. This case is distinguishable from The Ocean Iron Steamship Insurance Association v. Leslie (6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 226; 57 L. T. Rep. N. S. 722); the form of the policy is different, and there is no express contract by the assured to pay the premiums. This policy, if it is a contract with these defendants, is ultra vires inasmuch as this is a mutual association, and therefore cannot insure any persons who are not members.

Bucknill, Q.C. and Macrae, for the respondents, were not heard.

Lord Esher, M.R.—In this case an action was brought by the Great Britain 100 A 1 Steamship Insurance Association against the defendants, who were part owners of the steamship Orchis. The action is upon a policy of insurance, taken out by a firm named Hornstedt and Garthorne, and was brought to recover calls or contributions which were alleged to have become payable by these defendants in respect of the losses incurred by other persons, who were insured in the same association. The learned judge at the trial held that these defendants were liable, and they have appealed against that decision. The appeal has been supported upon several grounds: first, that Hornstedt and Garthorne had no authority to take out this particular form of policy; secondly, that even assuming there was authority to take out this policy, these defendants are not, by its terms, and according to the articles of association, liable to the plaintiffs; and thirdly, that if this policy binds these defendants, it is ultra vires of the association to grant such a policy. Now, as to the question of authority, it is admitted that Hornstedt and Garthorne had authority to make a policy of insurance on this steamship with mutual insurance clubs, and therefore, of course, they had authority to make it with this club.

Then arises the question whether they bound these defendants, and to what they bound them. The memorandum and articles of association of the plaintiffs show that they are a mutual insurance club for steamships, and it has been argued that they had only power to enter into policies of insurance with members of the association, and that these defendants never became members, not having been named in the policy. The policy itself is in the ordinary form of a Lloyd's policy, with the necessary modifications. It begins thus: "Know all men that Hornstedt and Garthorne as well in his or their own name or names as for and in the name and names of all and every other person or persons to whom the same doth, may, or shall appertain, in part or in all, subject to the provisions hereinafter contained, doth make assurance and cause himself or themselves and them and every of them to be insured." It is said on behalf of the appellants that the persons whose names are not given in the policy, but whose interests are insured, are merely undisclosed principals of Messrs. Hornstedt and Garthorne, and that such persons can only be sued as undisclosed principals. It has, however, been held for very many years, that in policies made in such form the agreement of insurance is made directly with all the persons on whose behalf such policy is made, exactly as if the names of all of them had been given and entered in the policy itself. Such a policy must therefore be construed as if the names of all such persons were given and entered in the policy, and such persons are the assured, and are included in the expression "the assured" in all parts of the policy. Then the policy, further down, proceeds thus: "And so we, the assurers, are contented, and do hereby promise and bind ourselves to the assured . . . for the true performance of the premises; the consideration due unto us, the assurers, for the said insurance being the contributions to be paid from time to time by the assured for losses and averages on other steamships mutually insured in the above-named association." The "assured" there means all those persons referred to at the beginning of the policy, as if they had been there named, and therefore there is an express contract by those persons to pay the contributions therein referred to, and consequently to pay the contribution sought to be recovered in this action.

The appellants contend that, by the rules, incorporated in the policy, such a policy can only be made with members of the association, and that they, not being named in the policy, or registered as members according to the Companies Act 1862, are not members, and that this policy could not be made with them. It is not, in my opinion, necessary to determine in this case whether these defendants are or are not members of the association. It is difficult to say that they are not, for some purposes, members, as, for instance, under the rules relating to the "assured." There are, however, other rules which seem to say that something more than being assured is necessary to make them members. It may be that they are members for the purposes of insurance, though not for the purpose of voting, of receiving notices, and so forth, and that they are not liable to contribute to the general expenses. I do not decide this question —it being unnecessary to do so here. Assuming that these defendants are not members at all, yet they are liable to pay these contributions, for they have expressly contracted to pay them, as is shown by the decision of Mathew, J. in The Ocean Iron Steamship Insurance Association v. Leslie (sup.). He there says: "The company, not content with the liability of the agent, as was the case in Nevill's case (sup.), stipulate that they shall be entitled to look to the principal; in other words, they emphatically contract that the principal shall be liable to them as well as the agent. It is clear that that contract is binding on the assured, not from their being parties who sign the contract, but as being the persons to whom the policy is issued, and who are to have the benefit of it." It is a necessary implication from the memorandum, the articles, and the rules of this association, that they have power to enter into contracts of mutual insurance with persons who may not be members, and to make such a contract as is contained in this policy with persons mutually insured, and therefore it is immaterial whether these persons were members or not, and this contract is not ultra vires. It has been urged that this case is governed by United Kingdom Mutual Steamship Assurance Association v. Nevill (sup.), but that case is not in point here. In his judgment in The Ocean Iron Steamship Insurance Association v. Leslie (sup.), Mathew, J. has so clearly shown this that it is difficult to say anything in addition. He has pointed out the difficulties which arose in the way of these mutual insurance clubs, and how they endeavoured to escape them, and how, in trying to avoid one difficulty they fell into another, as appears from United, &c., v. Nevill (sup.), by departing from the old form of Lloyd's policy in its introductory part, so that the only person who became liable on the policy was the person in whose name it was made, and, lastly, how they returned to Lloyd's policy and adapted it to the case of contributions. These defendants are therefore liable to pay these contributions, and the appeal must be dismissed.

Bowen, L.J.—In this case a mutual insurance association are suing these defendants, who are part owners of a steamship, upon a policy of insurance, for contributions in respect of the losses of other steamships insured in the association. The policy in question was made by certain part-owners, Messrs. Hornstedt and Garthorne, on behalf of themselves and the other part owners. The liability of these defendants depends upon the terms of that policy. It is said on behalf of the plaintiff association that there is in the policy an express contract by these defendants to pay these contributions. That is a question to be determined upon the construction of the policy. The policy is in the ordinary form of a Lloyd's policy, and that form would be a mere trap and snare if the construction put upon it by the plaintiff association were not the right construction. It begins thus: [Reads the first clause of the policy.] In a policy so framed, the term "the assured," wherever that expression occurs afterwards in the policy, means all those persons whose interests are protected by the policy according to the statement at the commencement of the policy. Then follows this essential clause: [Reads the clause commencing "and so we, the assurers, are contented."] In that clause the term "the assured" means, as I have before said, all the persons whose interests are insured, and those persons undertake to pay to the assurers contributions for losses and averages on other steamships mutually insured in the association, according to the only proper construction of the policy. The only thing which has been suggested to be inconsistent with that construction is the last clause, which provides that the rules are incorporated into the policy. These rules follow, and contain the provisions relating to members. Can it be said that the incorporation of those rules into the policy cuts down the previous clear words of the policy, which say that the assured are to pay contributions? I think not. The result would be either that the assured are not bound at all, or that all the contributions are to be paid by the persons actually named in the policy. There is, however, a clear and express contract by the assured to pay, and they are liable. It has been argued by the appellants that, by the articles and rules, it is ultra vires for the association to make insurances which cover the interests of co-owners, who do not become members of the association. That is not so, for their memorandum of association states their object to be: "The insurance of steamships belonging to members, or in which members of the association are interested, or have a share or shares." How, then, can it be said that the association acts ultra vires in making such an assurance as this? I doubt whether these defendants ever became members of the association, but it is unnecessary to decide that question, for they have bound themselves by an express contract to pay. The case of United Steamship Assurance Association v. Nevill (sup.) is no authority upon this case. The policy in that case is before us, and is quite different to the policy in this case. There Tully was throughout the policy treated as the sole and only person insured, and, looking at the terms of the document, it could not be said that there was any contract by anyone else to pay contributions. This policy is quite different, and is, in all essentials, like the policy in the case of The Ocean Iron Steamship Insurance Association v. Leslie (sup.). There is no valid distinction between that case and the present one, and I quite agree with the judgment of Mathew, J. in that case.

Fry, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. These defendants are liable to pay these contributions either as members of the plaintiff association, or upon an express contract to pay. I pass by the first alternative, only saying that I share the doubts, expressed by my brothers, whether these defendants were members, looking at the statute (Companies Act 1862) and the constitution of the association. The question, then is, was there an express contract by these defendants to pay contributions? If there was, then they are liable. Looking at the constitution of this association, it seems clear to me that the association contemplated the making of such contracts as this, as appears from clause 4 (1) of the memorandum of association, and the insurance of the entire interest in steamships by members who were not owners of the entire interest in them. That kind of business does not seem to be, strictly speaking, mutual insurance, and Mr. Walton endeavoured to cut down the meaning of this policy to something which would be strictly mutual insurance. But we should expect the association to in some way bind persons, such as these defendants, who were not members, to pay the consideration for the insurance of their interests in the vessel. That their interests were insured appears from the commencement of the policy, and we find that further on the assured are expressly bound to pay contributions. The defendants are therefore liable by express contract to pay, and this appeal must be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

The Apollo. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM THE PROBATE, DIVORCE, AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION (ADMIRALTY).

Damage—Dock—Grounding of vessel—Harbour master.

The plaintiffs' vessel having fouled her propeller whilst entering the port and harbour of Port Talbot, was, with the permission of the foreman docksman in the absence of the harbour master, placed in the sea lock leading into the dock, for the purpose of being put upon the ground and freeing her propeller. On the water being let out, the vessel took the ground, and sustained damage to her bottom by sitting upon an old sill, which had not been removed when the lock was lengthened. It appeared that the control of the management of the dock was in the hands of the harbour master, who at the time was ill, and that the foreman docksman was acting in his place. It also appeared that the foreman docksman did not know the condition of the bottom of the lock, and had so informed the master of the Apollo. In an action by the shipowners against the dock authority:

Held (Lord Esher, M.R. dissentiente), that the use of the lock for the purpose was an extraordinary use; that the master of the Apollo was a bare licensee; and that the foreman docksman had no authority to grant the use of the lock for such purpose so as to render the defendants liable for the damage ensuing.

This was an appeal by the plaintiffs in an action in personam against the Port Talbot Company from a decision of Butt, J. dismissing their action with costs: (60 L. T. Rep. N. S. 112; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 356.)

The action was instituted by the owners of the steamship Apollo to recover damages for injuries occasioned to her in the defendants' dock under the circumstances hereinafter stated.

The defendants were incorporated by Act of Parliament for the purpose (inter alia) of making and maintaining the harbour of Port Talbot, and of making and maintaining docks, locks, and other works at the said port. The defendants were also authorised to and did demand and receive dues in respect of vessels entering and using their docks.

On the 24th Dec. 1887 the Apollo, laden with a cargo of railway iron and tin plates, entered the said dock, and in getting to her berth her propeller fouled a rope stretched across the dock and was injured.

For the purpose of repairing the injured propeller the Apollo was placed in a lock leading from the sea to the dock, and the water was let out so that it might be used as a dry dock. The lock had since its original construction been lengthened, and the gates and sill of the old lock had never been removed. When the water was drawn off, the Apollo rested on this sill and sustained the damage complained of.

The plaintiffs alleged that a man named Johns, whom they said occupied the position of deputy harbour master, had given permission to the Apollo to go into the lock, and had placed her in it, and represented that its bottom was safe for the vessel to lie upon.

The defendants denied that Johns was deputy harbour master, or that he had made any representation to the plaintiffs as to the lock being a safe place for the Apollo to lie in, or that he had any authority to allow the lock to be used for the purpose.

They alleged that Johns' position was that of foreman docksman in receipt of weekly wages. It appeared that at the time in question the harbour master was confined to his bed by an attack of gout; but it was alleged that, as his house was on the quay, the master of the Apollo might have seen him and asked his permission to place her in the lock, and his opinion whether he thought the lock a safe and proper place for placing her in.

The remaining facts appear in the judgments.

Sir Henry James, Q.C., Barnes, Q.C., and Synnott, for the plaintiffs, in support of the appeal.—The plaintiffs are entitled to judgment. Johns was in fact the deputy harbour master, and the defendants are liable for his acts. The plaintiffs could know nothing of the condition of the bottom of this lock, whereas the defendants knew or ought to have known of its condition. Hence it was their duty to inform the plaintiffs of this hidden danger:

Indermaur v. Dames, 16 L. T. Rep. N. S. 293; L. Rep. 2 C. P. 311;
Southcote v. Stanley, 1 Hurl. & Norm. 247.

Bucknill, Q.C. and Macrae, for the defendants, contra.—The judgment appealed from is right. Johns had no authority to authorise the user of the lock for this extraordinary purpose. The fact is, that in order to oblige the captain of the Apollo he allowed her to be placed there, but did not thereby cast any liability upon his employers for any damage she might sustain. The captain of the Apollo was a bare licensee quâ the use of this lock, and there has been no actionable breach of duty on the part of the defendants:

Gautret v. Egerton, 16 L. T. Rep. N. S. 17; L. Rep. 2 C. P. 371; Ivay v. Hedges, 9 Q. B. Div. 80.

Lord Esher, M.R.—This is a case in which the plaintiffs bring an action against the Port Talbot Company for damage done to their ship in Port Talbot Docks by the alleged negligence of a servant of the dock authority for whose negligence it is contended that they are answerable. The ship in question was a steamship of considerable size, and at the time of the accident she had a cargo on board. As she went into the Port Talbot Dock a rope got entangled in her screw. Unsuccessful efforts were made to disentangle it. Thereupon a harbour official of the name of Johns advised that the ship should be put into the lock, which is the lock through which ships go in and out of the dock, and that the water should be let off so that she might take the ground. The ship was thereupon taken into the lock, and she did take the ground; but unfortunately the lock had since its original construction been altered. It had been lengthened, and the old gates were left and stood back against the sides of the lock. These gates when shut shut against a sill, which was also left when the alterations were made. Therefore in the middle of this lock was a sill which made the bottom of it uneven, and made it dangerous for a ship to take the ground upon it. When the water was let out of the lock the ship with her cargo in took the ground upon this sill and broke her back. Is anybody liable for that? It is contended on the one side that this man Johns had implied though not express authority from the defendants to act as dock or harbour master, and that the harbour master would have a right, when a ship was in distress within the dock, to direct where the ship was to be placed in order to have the necessary repairs executed; and hence it was said that a ship's captain who desired to repair his ship while in distress in the dock would be bound under penalties to obey the harbour master as to the place where he was to do the repairs, or else go to sea with his ship in a damaged condition. That it was said imposed a duty on the harbour master to take reasonable care in his selection of a place in which he directed a captain to put his ship, and if through his negligence in directing a captain to put her in an improper place she was damaged, it was urged that that was negligence for which the defendants would be liable. As I have already said, it was contended that Johns had the power of a harbour master. Now Johns was not in fact harbour master. Captain Fitzmaurice was harbour master; but it appears that Mr. Talbot, who is really the Port Talbot Company, never went near the docks, never was referred to about them, purposely abstained from giving any orders, and had in fact put the whole of his authority into the hands of the harbour master. If that is so, the owner of a business who does that has no right to suppose that his manager to whom he has given this vast authority will be always in a state to carry out his directions. It seems to me it is a necessary implication that if he gives his manager that extent of authority, he gives him authority to depute his authority in cases of illness or necessity to another person. For that reason I think it is right to say that, if Captain Fitzmaurice was ill, he had authority from Mr. Talbot to depute his authority.

Then the question is, did he depute his authority to Johns? The judge of the Admiralty Court seems to have disbelieved a quantity of evidence which I can see no reason to disbelieve. That is the evidence as to whether Fitzmaurice had delegated his authority to Johns or not. Johns was the man who if there was negligence was guilty of it, and he had a strong interest as to any evidence he might give. Having read his evidence, I confess I do not believe him. There are other witnesses who give the most distinct evidence that Johns, when Fitzmaurice was ill, was taken by everyone frequenting the docks to be the deputy harbour master, and that he acted as such. Was Johns authorised to give the same directions that the harbour master might give? To my mind, the evidence is clear, otherwise you must come to this conclusion: that all the men of business about the docks were mistaken, and were wrong in supposing that this man was authorised in doing what he was doing. I think he had the authority of the harbour master, and if so, was it negligence in him not to have known about this sill? If he did not know he ought to have known. It would have been negligence in the harbour master, and was therefore negligence in Johns. I therefore think that Mr. Talbot having deputed to his harbour master authority to depute his authority to Johns, Johns had authority and power to direct this captain where to put his ship to repair her damage, and that he did direct him to put her into the lock. There was no negligence in the captain in obeying such an order, and there was negligence in Johns in ordering the ship to be put into the lock. Therefore, there was negeligence on the part of Mr. Talbot through his servant, and none on the part of the captain. In my opinion, the appeal ought to be allowed.

Fry, L.J.—In this case I have the misfortune to differ from the Master of the Rolls, and to think that the decision of the court below was correct. In approaching this case I am not able to adopt the view of the Master of the Rolls as to the evidence. The learned judge below expressed his view as to the truthfulness of Captain Johns and his disbelief as to some of the statements made by the captain; and I feel bound to take the finding of the learned judge with regard to the credibility of respective witnesses. Again, with regard to the facts of the case, they present themselves to my mind in a different manner from that in which they present themselves to the Master of the Rolls. The facts as I understand them are shortly these: that early on the morning of the 24th Dec. 1887 the steamship Apollo entered from the tidal river into the lock which leads into the harbour of Port Talbot, and that when in the dock she fouled her screw. She did not enter as a vessel in distress but for business purposes, and the fouling took place after she had entered. Davis was a pilot, who brought the steamship into the dock, and about 10 a.m. in conference with the captain of the ship he suggested that it might be possible to obtain the use of the lock for the purpose of disentangling the rope from the screw. He knew that a similar thing had been done in one or two other cases, and he thought it would be a convenient course to pursue if permission could be obtained. Accordingly about 11 a.m. the pilot saw Jenkins, the broker of the ship, and shortly after Jenkins saw Johns, the person who occupied the position which has been so much in controversy, and a conversation took place between them, the true result of which is that Jenkins asked the licence or permission of Johns to use this lock in an extraordinary manner, viz., by letting the water out and placing the ship on the bottom of the lock for the purpose of freeing the screw. Again, a little later, Jenkins and Johns met, and a similar conversation ensued. In the meantime the captain had gone to Swansea for the purpose of getting a diver, and on his return Jenkins and Davis met him at the station and told him that Jenkins had obtained permission. The next thing was to see how it could be done, and accordingly Jenkins and Davis arranged that evening with Johns that the operation should take place early next morning if Johns could get the necessary men together. According to Johns' statement what took place was this, that he said he would.

The conclusion which I draw from this evidence, and which I think the judge below also drew, is this—not that Johns gave any direction to the captain that he should put his ship into this lock, but that as a matter of favour Jenkins obtained the leave or licence of Johns to use the lock in this particular manner. I cannot help observing that twice over Jenkins used the expression that permission had been obtained to do it, language which it seemed to me no ship's broker would ever have used if he meant to say that Johns in the exercise of his authority as harbour master had given directions as to what was to be done with the ship. I think that if the same conversation had taken place with Mr. Talbot himself it would simply have constituted the captain of the Apollo the bare licensee of the defendants to perform this operation in the defendants' lock. The next morning Johns got his men together, and the Apollo was brought into the lock. The water was let out, the vessel took the bottom, and in consequence of the sill, as to which I accept the statement of Johns that he did not know of its existence, she broke her back. Now why is Mr. Talbot to be made liable for this? As I have already said, according to my view of the facts what was granted as between the persons representing the ship and the persons representing the defendants was a mere licence to use the lock at the risk of the captain of the ship for an extraordinary purpose. The captain therefore was a bare licensee. It was proved before Butt, J. that Johns had never seen the bottom of the lock, and he told the captain so. The consequence is that the licensor who gave the licence is not responsible for the existence of a structure unknown to himself. No doubt, if he had laid a trap or had induced the plaintiff to enter into a position of risk which resulted in injury, knowing of the risk likely to produce that injury, the case would have been different; but that is not so. I regard the use of the lock for which permission was thus granted as an extraordinary use. The natural function of a lock is to carry floating vessels from the tidal river into the dock, or from the dock into the tidal river. Hence the use of it for the peculiar purpose mentioned in this case was an extraordinary use; and though it may well be that Captain Fitzmaurice the harbour master, or Johns acting as his deputy, may have had authority from Mr. Talbot to grant a bare licence for the use of it in this particular manner, there is nothing in my opinion to show that they had any authority to allow the use of it in this extraordinary manner in terms which would make the licensor responsible for damage accruing from the condition of the waterway. I think, therefore, that the decision of the learned judge below was right, and that the appeal must be dismissed with costs.

Lopes, L.J.—The facts of this case have been stated by Fry, L.J., and I agree with his statement. I also agree with Fry, L.J. as to the result of the evidence. I think it is this: that Johns permitted the lock to be used as it was at the risk of the person using it, and in order to accommodate and oblige that person. With regard to the question of contributory negligence, I do not agree with the learned judge below. I do not think that there was contributory negligence on the part of the captain. The result is that the appeal must be dismissed with costs.

The Westbourne.(a)

Salvage—Verbal agreement—Supervening circumstances—Amount of award.

Where the master of a ship has agreed to tow a ship which is in distress to a named port for a fixed sum, such agreement is binding on the parties to it, even though by reason of an increase in the weather the performance of the agreement becomes more onerous than was originally contemplated; but if supervening circumstances are such as to render the performance of the contract nautically impossible, the Court of Admiralty is entitled to treat the agreement as if it had never been made, and, if the vessel is taken to a place of safety, to award to the salvors such salvage as the merits of the case require; and this is so whether the original contract be a towage or salvage agreement.

This was an appeal by the defendants in a salvage action from a decision of Butt, J.

The services were rendered by the steamship Howick to the steamship Westbourne, her cargo and freight, in the Mediterranean under the circumstances hereinafter stated.

About 5.40 p.m. on the 2nd Nov. 1887 the Howick, a steamship of 1009 tons register, while on a voyage from Nikolaief to Gibraltar was about 250 miles east of Gibraltar, when she fell in with the steamship Westbourne, exhibiting signals of distress. The Westbourne had lost her propeller, and was in want of assistance. The master of the Howick offered to tow the Westbourne to Carthagena, but the master of the Westbourne declined to be towed to that port, and it was thereupon verbally agreed between the two masters that the Howick should tow the Westbourne to Gibraltar for 600*l.*, the Westbourne to find ropes and gear. The Howick accordingly made fast ahead with the Westbourne's hawsers, and commenced to tow towards Gibraltar, but during the night the weather became so bad that the hawsers parted several times. On the following morning, in consequence of a hawser parting, the mate of the Howick was severely injured. At this time the Westbourne had only one hawser left, and part of this had been carried away. The weather continued so bad that it was described in the log of the Westbourne as a complete hurricane, and the master of the Howick judged that it was impossible to tow the Westbourne to Gibraltar. Consequently he altered his course towards Carthagena. The towage towards Carthagena continued throughout Nov. 3, and at about 4 p.m., when the vessels were a few miles from Carthagena, the master of the Westbourne signalled to the Howick to proceed to Gibraltar, but the master of the Howick signalled in reply that it was impossible, and that he required medical assistance. The Howick accordingly continued to tow to Carthagena, and ultimately the Westbourne was brought up in safety in Carthagena harbour.

It was alleged by the master of the Howick that, as soon as he had determined it was impossible to tow to Gibraltar, he sent a message to that effect by the Westbourne's boat to the master of the Westbourne. The master of the Westbourne denied receiving this message.

The defendants by their defence, after alleging that at the time the agreement was made there were indications of bad weather, and that it never became impossible to tow to Gibraltar, proceeded as follows:

5. The agreement mentioned in paragraph 3 of the statement of claim is correctly stated, except that it was not agreed that the Westbourne should find all ropes and gear. The defendants say that the agreement was made having regard to all probabilities of bad weather and other accidents and perils of the sea, and having regard to the condition of the Westbourne; and that at the time the said agreement was made Gibraltar was about 250 miles distant, and Carthagena about fifty miles, and that the deviation to Carthagena was made against the will and notwithstanding the protest of the master of the Westbourne. The defendants further say that under and by virtue of the said agreement the Howick was bound to take the Westbourne to Gibraltar, and that if the Howick was compelled by stress of weather or other reasons which, however, the defendants deny, to put into Carthagena, she was bound thereafter, if required, to fully perform her service under the said agreement. But they admit that neither the master of the Westbourne nor the defendants required of the master of the Howick or of the plaintiffs any further performance of the agreement after the Westbourne had been brought to Carthagena.

6. The defendants have paid the said sum of 600*l.* int court, and say that the said sum is sufficient to satisfy any claim the plaintiffs may have against the defendants herein.

The agreed value of the Westbourne, her cargo and freight, was in all 24,500*l.*

It was proved as a fact that the verbal agreement was that the Westbourne should provide all ropes and gear.

At the trial Butt, J. held that, by reason of supervening circumstances not within the original contemplation of the parties, it became impossible to carry out the agreement, that it was therefore at an end and not binding on him, and he awarded 900*l.* for the plaintiffs' services.

Sir Walter Phillimore and Dr. Raikes for the appellants.—The plaintiffs are not entitled to more than 600*l.* They in fact towed us a less distance than the contract distance, and yet the learned judge has given them 300*l.* more than the sum for which they agreed to tow the contract distance. There have been many cases in which by reason of supervening circumstances towage has been converted into salvage. But this was salvage ab initio, and the parties were contracting on the basis of salvage, and therefore running the risk of not being able to perform the contract. The contract was in fact never at an end; it was merely delayed in performance by the weather, an element which is always present to the minds of parties to a salvage contract. Supervening circumstances made the contract more onerous. They might have made it less onerous than originally contemplated, and yet the defendants could not on that ground have given less than the 600*l.*:

Barnes, Q.C. and J. P. Aspinall, for the respondents, were not called upon.

Lord Esher, M.R.—I am of opinion that this was in one sense a towage agreement, but it was a towage agreement entered into whilst the ship was in danger, and in such exceptional danger that she required or might have required salvage assistance. Now I think that, where an agreement is made under such circumstances for a fixed sum, the fact of its performance makes it binding not only in every other court, but also in the Admiralty Court. But if, by circumstances over which those who now argue they are salvors have no control, the service is so far altered as to become a service of a wholly different class, then the Court of Admiralty has a right to deal with the services as if the original agreement had not been made. If the new circumstances have supervened after the original contract was made, and if those new circumstances have gone to the extent which I have stated, then the Court of Admiralty has authority and power to deal with the matter as salvage, entitling those who have thus become salvors to such a salvage award as the Court of Admiralty, taking all the circumstances of the case into consideration, shall think right. Now in this case, when the agreement was made there is no doubt that there had been bad weather to a serious extent, and at the time when the agreement was made there was still bad weather. But according to the evidence it was only called moderately bad. The ship's machinery, however, was so damaged that, although she could sail, she could not steer. She was in manifest danger, and could only be made safe by being towed. Therefore not in fine weather, but in moderately severe weather, the agreement was made that she should be towed to Gibraltar, she finding the tow ropes. Now that agreement, whether you take it to be a pure towage contract, or whether you take it to be a towage agreement partaking of the nature of salvage, is an agreement which contemplates her being towed from that place to Gibraltar. After the contract was made, whichever kind of contract you call it, circumstances supervened which were beyond the control of those who now claim to be salvors. The evidence, I think, clearly supports the findings of fact of the learned judge. After the Westbourne had been taken in tow, without any fault, without any negligence, and without, as is now admitted, any equivocal manœuvre on the part of the towing vessel, the towing ropes broke one after the other. What caused them to break in this way? Why the captains of both vessels say that the weather increased till it became most violent. The evidence of the mate is also most clear and distinct upon this point, and it is this, that the weather, which was comparatively moderate when the agreement was made, turned to nothing less than a hurricane. The cargo shifted, the vessel listed, and, as I have already said, rope after rope broke without any fault on the part of the Howick. This all indicates severity of weather. The increase in the weather altered the circumstances to this extent, that the ship, which had not been in immediate danger before, was put into that position. If the ship which now claims to be a salvor had left the Westbourne at that time, she probably would have been lost. By the contract the salving ship had put herself in such a position that she was bound to remain by the other ship if she could. But the nature of her service had so altered that instead of towing a helpless ship she was towing a ship in imminent danger. She had to tow the Westbourne with a single rope, and I am of opinion that, had she continued to tow towards Gibraltar, she would not only have exposed the Westbourne to serious danger, but she would have been in serious danger herself. It is a severe strain on a screw steamer in such circumstances to tow a vessel with only one rope.

Therefore the circumstances were so altered that from being the towing of a helpless vessel it was altered to a case of towing a ship in imminent danger, and putting herself in imminent danger likewise. Therefore those who now claim to be salvors could not in the circumstances tow the Westbourne upon the course originally agreed upon. They could not with safety attempt to tow her to Gibraltar. Therefore it had become practically impossible to carry out the original contract. The nature of the circumstances was wholly altered. Under these circumstances the Court of Admiralty has authority to deal with the question as though no contract had been made. If that is so, it is not suggested that the amount of the award is an exorbitant sum. In my opinion, therefore, the judgment must stand, and the appeal be dismissed.

Lindley, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The contract, which was a verbal one, was that the Howick should tow the Westbourne on the ordinary course to Gibraltar for 600*l.* She was not to go round the coast by Carthagena, but was to go direct to Gibraltar. The next point to consider is the finding of the learned judge under the advice of the Trinity Masters. He says that it became practically impossible to go to Gibraltar, and in that I entirely agree with the learned judge. That practically disposes of the case. I therefore think the appeal must be dismissed.

Bowen, L.J.—I also am of the same opinion. The first question is, what was the contract between these parties? Was it that the Westbourne was to be towed to Gibraltar any way the Howick chose to take her, or was it to be direct? I am of opinion that it meant that she was to be towed direct to Gibraltar, and not to Carthagena and then to Gibraltar. There was another term in the contract restricting it to be performed in a particular way, viz., the Westbourne to find ropes for the towage. Therefore the contract was for a particular service to be performed in a particular way. As soon as one sees that those were the terms of the contract the case is really at an end. No doubt the ship which was to be towed was in a position of danger, but if circumstances intervened which rendered the performance of the contract impossible there was an end of the contract. It would not be enough to prove intervening circumstances which rendered the performance of the contract more onerous than had been originally contemplated. But the learned judge has found that it became nautically impossible to perform the service in the way agreed, and in that view I agree. Once the contract was at an end, the case resolved itself into ordinary salvage services, and I think the decision appealed from is correct.

The Earl Wemys. (a.)

Collision — Sailing ships — Close-hauled ship — Luffing—Trade winds—Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, arts. 14 and 22.

The custom of sailors to treat sailing ships when in the trades as close-hauled ships when they are sailing a point or two from being as close-hauled as they can lie, does not affect the legal construction of the regulations, and the court will not exonerate vessels so sailing from duties applicapable to sailing ships in other latitudes.

Semble, a sailing ship is close-hauled within the meaning of art. 14 if she is sailing half a point free of the nearest she can lie to the wind, but not if she is two points off.

The sailing ship E. W. while sailing free in the trades saw the red light of the sailing vessel A. on her starboard bow. The A. was sailing close-hauled (as it is called in the trades), but was in fact not as close to the wind as she could lie. As the vessels approached the E. W. ported to keep out of the way of the A. At about the same time the A. not only luffed up as close as she could to the wind, but also went a little farther under a starboard helm, thus counteracting the porting of the E. W., and a collision occurred.

Held, that the A. altered her course in breach of art. 22, and was to blame for the collision.

This was an appeal by the plaintiffs in a collision action from a decision of Butt, J. holding their sailing ship the Ardencaple solely to blame for a collision with the defendants' sailing ship the Earl Wemys.

The collision occurred about 8 p.m. on the 8th Sept. 1888 in the South Atlantic Ocean in lat. 2 deg. S. and long. 27 deg. W.

The facts alleged by the plaintiffs were as follows: Shortly before 8.10 p.m. on the 8th Sept. the Ardencaple, a sailing ship of 1737 tons register, laden with a cargo of salt, and on a voyage from Liverpool to Calcutta, was in lat. 2 deg. 56 min. S. and long. 27 deg. 27 min. W. There was a moderate S.E. wind true (or S.E. southerly magnetic). The Ardencaple was on the port tack sailing by the wind with her sails lifting. She was heading S.W. by S. ½ true (or S.W. ¼ W. magnetic). In these circumstances those on the Ardencaple saw the green light of the Earl Wemys distant about two miles, and about a point on the port bow. The Ardencaple kept her course, but when the Earl Wemys was right ahead and crossing the bows of the Ardencaple, the Ardencaple luffed a little to check her way. Very shortly afterwards, when the Earl Wemys was on the starboard bow of the Ardencaple, she shut in her green light and opened her red, rendering a collision inevitable. As the only chance of avoiding a collision the helm of the Ardencaple was at once put hard-up and the weather cross-jack braces and mizzen halyards were let go to assist her in paying off, but nevertheless the stem of the Ardencaple struck the port side of the Earl Wemys between the main and mizzen masts.

The facts alleged by the defendants were as follows: At about 8 p.m. on the 8th Sept. the Earl Wemys, a sailing ship of 1411 tons register, laden with a cargo of wheat, and on a voyage from San Francisco to Queenstown, was in about lat. 2 deg. S. and long. 27 deg. W. The wind was a fresh S.E. trade, and the Earl Wemys was under all sail on the starboard tack, heading about N. by E. In these circumstances those on board the Earl Wemys observed the red light of a vessel, which proved to be the Ardencaple, distant about two miles, and bearing from one and a half to two points on the starboard bow. The Ardencaple was assumed to be close-hauled on the port tack, and the helm of the Earl Wemys was at once ported. When the Ardencaple had been brought ahead, she suddenly opened her green and shut in her red light. As the Earl Wemys was rapidly altering under her port helm, it was kept a-port and hard-a-port as the only chance of avoiding a collision. But the Ardencaple came on still showing her green light until close to, when her red light again opened, and with her bowsprit she struck the mizzen-mast of the Earl Wemys, and then with her stem struck the Earl Wemys on her port quarter.

The defendants charged the plaintiffs (inter alia) with altering their course.

The following Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea were referred to:

Art. 14. When two sailing ships are approaching one another so as to involve risk of collision, one of them shall keep out of the way of the other as follows, viz. (a) A ship which is running free shall keep out of the way of a ship which is close-hauled.

Art. 22. Where by the above rules one of two ships is to keep out of the way, the other shall keep her course.

It was proved and admitted at the trial that in the trades sailing vessels which are one to two points from being absolutely close-hauled are treated as close-hauled vessels.

Butt, J. found that the collision was caused by the luffing of the Ardencaple, she having come up from being about two points free to quite close-hauled: (60 L. T. Rep. N. S. 431; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 364.)

Sir Walter Phillimore, Barnes, Q.C., and Leck for the appellants in support of the appeal.—The Earl Wemys is solely to blame. The Ardencaple never deviated from her course. Assuming she did luff a little, she was justified in so doing so:

The Aimo, 29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 118; 2 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 96;

The Marmion, 27 L. T. Rep. N. S. 255; 1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 412.

(a) Reported by J. P. Aspinall and Butler Aspinall, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

Moreover, on the authority of The Tasmania (60 L. T. Rep. N. S. 692; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 381; 14 P.D. 53), the Ardencaple was bound to luff when she saw the Earl Wemys persisting in doing wrong. Assuming the Ardencaple to have done wrong, she is free from blame on the ground that the wrongful manœuvre of the Earl Wemys was at the last moment and gave the officer of the Ardencaple no time to judge what he ought to do:

The Bywell Castle, 4 P. Div. 219; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 207; 41 L. T. Rep. N. S. 747;
The Khedive, 5 App. Cas. 876; 43 L. T. Rep. N. S. 610; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 360.

Myburgh, Q.C. and Raikes, for the respondents. —The collision was solely caused by the excessive luffing of the Ardencaple. Assuming a vessel is justified in luffing a little, she does wrong in luffing as much as the Ardencaple did:

Chadwick v. City of Dublin Steam Packet Company, 6 Ell. & B. 771;
The Great Eastern, 2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 97; 11 L. T. Rep. N. S. 5; 3 Moo. P. C. C. 31;
The Singapore, L. Rep. 1 P. C. 378.

Sir Walter Phillimore in reply.

Lord Esher, M.R.—In this case we are advised and come to the conclusion that, if the Ardencaple had not luffed as much as she did, there would have been no collision. It follows therefore that, whether the Earl Wemys did that which she did in the best way or not, or whether she did in a way which if it were only a question of seamanship would be a very hazardous way, or whether she ought to have done it as a matter of seamanship sooner than she did, or not, according to the rule, she cannot be found fault with for what she did. She had a right to take a course which she thought would clear her of that vessel, and if she did clear the vessel, the rules do not allow us to find fault with her. She is to exercise her own discretion about the matter, and that discretion cannot be questioned if what she does will clear her of the other vessel: she is to clear her, and in any way that she thinks best. If we are advised that there would have been no collision unless the Ardencaple luffed up—that is, started it—that the collision was caused at all events by her luffing up, then the only question that remains is, was she entitled to luff up as much as she did? If she was, the other vessel must have been in the wrong because she did not escape her. If she luffed up more than she was entitled to, then the other would have escaped her if she had not luffed up so much, and the collision is the result of her luffing.

Now, three points suggest themselves to one: first of all, are these rules to be construed differently with regard to ships in the trades, as they are called—that is, the rules which are to govern the action of these ships with regard to each other when they are approaching so near that there may be danger of collision — are they to be construed differently in the trades from what they would be in any other place? About that my mind is clear that they are not. The rules are made to apply to the sailing of ships wherever they are. Then comes another question: if a vessel is within the meaning of rule 14, clause (a), a close-hauled vessel, what is the meaning of keeping her course in rule 22 as applied to that? A vessel may be close-hauled, that is, sailing on the wind with her yards not so pointed as they could be; that is to say, her yards not square, or not so placed as they would be if she was sailing free. She may be sailing on a wind, that is close-hauled, within the meaning of the first of those rules, although she is not as close-hauled as she can possibly be; that is, jammed close to the wind—I believe that is the nautical phrase for it. If she is sailing half a point off that, the cases seem to have said that she is nevertheless close-hauled within the meaning of the rule. The phrase close-hauled does not mean jammed close to the wind; it means more off than that. How far off could she be sailing and yet be said to be close-hauled, how far off being close jammed to the wind? Half a point off, I think everybody is clear that she would still be a close-hauled ship. I think we are told that she might be sailing a point off, and yet be considered within the first part of that rule a close-hauled ship. Whether that would be so if she were more than that, say a point and a half, I am not quite so certain; and it does not seem necessary to consider it in this case, as she was here two points off, two points or more. I should say she was no longer a close-hauled ship. It does not do to say that sailors call a ship in the trades a close-hauled ship when she is really a free ship. If they sail their ship free in the trades in order to get through the trades quicker they are a ship sailing free; they are not a ship sailing close-hauled. But this ship has been taken by everybody to be a close-hauled ship. I should suppose, therefore, that if she was a close-hauled ship you must not say that she was a free ship; you must say that she was still close-hauled although a point free, sailing so as not to be jammed close, and perhaps a little more—I will not say she was not. Now, it was said, if that is so, might she, when she is told to keep her course, come up from that point, or a little more up to jammed close; that is, might she come up a point? It is not necessary in the view that we have ultimately taken of this case to decide that now. It is a point of construction which, although not long to state, seems to me to be extremely difficult to answer. I am not prepared to say whether she might. It has been held by two courts at least that if she comes up only half a point, that is, if she was sailing half a point off being jammed close, and came up only half a point, it could not be said that she was not keeping her course. Nobody has yet said whether, if she was sailing a point off, and came up that whole point, she would be really altering her course. It is not necessary to decide it, because we have come to the conclusion that this vessel came up more than that, and that she not only came up so as to be what you call close-jammed, but that she went over that point, and that therefore she had deviated from her course more than coming up so as to be jammed to the wind; she had brought herself up until her sails were shaking; until, therefore, she had come over the point that I said, and to a point such as that she could not have sailed on it—she must have gone off again before she could have sailed—if so, she has done more than even on the extreme ruling which I have just stated she was entitled to do. She has, therefore, come up more than that, and if she came up more than that, we cannot doubt but that she altered her course from what it had been, and that alteration of her course caused the collision. Without her having done that there would have been no collision.

Therefore the other ship cannot have caused the collision; therefore she was solely to blame, and the judgment of the learned judge below is right.

THE ECLIPSE. (a)

Collision—County Court appeal—Application to adduce fresh evidence—Divisional Court—Judicature Act 1873, ss. 45 and 52; R. S. C., Order LIX., rr. 4, 17.

A judge of the Probate, Divorce, and Admiralty Division sitting alone can entertain an application for leave to adduce fresh evidence at the hearing of an Admiralty County Court appeal. (b)

THIS was a motion by the appellants in an appeal from the City of London Court for leave to adduce further evidence at the hearing of the appeal.

The action was a collision action in rem instituted by the owners of the steam tug Traveller against the steam tug Eclipse, and at the hearing thereof Mr. Commissioner Kerr gave judgment for the defendants.

The motion was made returnable before Butt, J., and, on its coming on for hearing, counsel for the respondents took the preliminary objection that the application could only be made to a divisional court.

The following enactments were referred to, and are material to the decision:—

The Judicature Act 1873:

Sect. 45. All appeals from petty or quarter sessions, from a County Court, or from any other inferior court which might before the passing of this Act have been brought to any court or judge whose jurisdiction is by this Act transferred to the High Court of Justice, may be heard and determined by divisional courts of the said High Court of Justice, consisting respectively of such of the judges thereof as may from time to time be assigned for that purpose, pursuant to the rules of court, or (subject to rules of court) as may be so assigned according to arrangements made for the purpose by the judges of the said High Court. The determination of such appeals respectively by such divisional courts shall be final unless special leave to appeal from the same to the Court of Appeal shall be given by the Divisional Court by which any such appeal from an inferior court shall have been heard.

Sect. 52. In any cause or matter pending before the Court of Appeal, any direction incidental thereto, not involving the decision of the appeal, may be given by a single judge of the Court of Appeal; and a single judge of the Court of Appeal may, at any time during vacation, make any interim order to prevent prejudice to the claims of any parties pending an appeal as he may think fit: but every such order made by a single judge may be discharged or varied by the Court of Appeal or a divisional court thereof.

Order LIX., r. 4. Every judge of the High Court of Justice for the time being shall be a judge to hear and determine appeals from inferior courts under sect. 45 of the principal Act. All such appeals (except Probate and Admiralty appeals from inferior courts and from justices which shall be to a divisional court of the Probate, Divorce, and Admiralty Division) shall be entered in one list by the officers of the Crown Office Department, and shall be heard by such divisional court of the Queen's Bench Division as the Lord Chief Justice of England shall from time to time direct.

Order LIX., r. 17. Subject to these rules, the rules for the time being in force with respect to appeals from the High Court to the Court of Appeal shall, so far as practicable, apply to and govern appeals from County Courts and other inferior courts of record of civil jurisdiction to the High Court.

Watson, for the respondents, in support of the objection.—A single judge has no jurisdiction to entertain this application. By sect. 45 of the Judicature Act 1873, and by Order LIX., r. 4, Admiralty appeals from County Courts are to be heard and determined by divisional courts of the Probate, Divorce, and Admiralty Division, and hence they alone have jurisdiction to entertain any application incidental thereto. Sect. 52 of the Judicature Act 1873 is dealing with jurisdiction, and is not made applicable to County Court appeals by Order LIX., r. 17, which is solely dealing with procedure.

Cohen, Q.C. (with him Butler Aspinall) for the appellants, contra.—Both the Judicature Act and the rules made thereunder deal with procedure, and hence Order LIX., r. 17, in express terms applies the provisions of sect. 52 of the Judicature Act 1873 to County Court appeals. The convenience of so holding is obvious, as otherwise special divisional courts would have to be held in this division for entertaining this class of application, whereas if a single judge can deal with it, it can be made and disposed of when occasion requires.

BUTT, J.—I think I have power to entertain this application, and shall do so.

The application was then heard and granted.

(b) The attention of the learned judge was not called to Order LIX., r. 9, which is as follows: "The following rules (10 to 17) of this order shall apply to appeals to the Queen's Bench Division from County Courts and other inferior courts of record of civil jurisdiction in all proceedings other than proceedings in bankruptcy." This would appear to exclude the application of rule 17 to appeals to any division but the Queen's Bench, and if these rules are to be taken as containing the only procedure applicable to appeals to the Admiralty Division, it would seem that the learned judge had no jurisdiction to entertain the application of The Two Brothers (3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 99; 1 P. Div. 52) and The Humber (9 P. Div. 12; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 181). —ED.

THE SCHWAN. (a)

Collision—River Thames—Vessels crossing river—Rules and Bye-laws for the Navigation of the River Thames, arts. 24 and 25.

Where a vessel lying at anchor in the river Thames head to tide gets under way for the purpose of proceeding up or down the river with the tide, and in turning round she has to work across the river, she is a steam-vessel "crossing from one side of the river towards the other side" within the meaning of art. 24 of the Rules and Bye-laws for the Navigation of the River Thames, and it is her duty to keep out of the way of vessels navigating up and down the river, and of the latter to keep their course, under art. 25.

THIS was a collision action in rem by the owners of the steamship Annie against the owners of the steamship Schwan. The defendants counter-claimed.

The collision occurred in Gravesend Reach at about 10 a.m. on the 16th Dec. 1888.

The facts alleged by the plaintiffs were as follows: Shortly before 10 a.m. on the 16th Dec. the Annie, a steamship of 785 tons register, was in Gravesend Reach in the course of a voyage from London to Newcastle-on-Tyne in ballast. The Annie was heading down Gravesend Reach well to the south of mid channel under a slight port helm, making about three knots an hour through the water. The tide was half flood running about two knots. In these circumstances those on board the Annie observed a steamship, which proved to be the Schwan, bearing about 2 to 3 points on the port bow and 500 yards lower down the river. The Schwan was lying with her head down river slightly angling to the south, apparently getting under way. The engines of the Annie were thereupon put dead slow, and a single blast was blown on her whistle to indicate that she was under a port helm. As the Annie approached her the Schwan was seen to be angling more athwart the river, and the engines of the Annie were thereupon stopped. Shortly afterwards, however, the Schwan was suddenly seen to come ahead as if to cross the bows of the Annie, causing risk of collision. Although the engines of the Annie were at once reversed full speed, the Schwan came on and with her starboard side struck the stem of the Annie, doing her damage.

The facts alleged by the defendants were as follows: At about 10.30 a.m. on the 16th Dec. the Schwan, a German steamship of 1011 tons register, was in Gravesend Reach on a voyage from Bremerhaven to London. She had a general cargo and carried passengers, and was in charge of a duly licensed Trinity House pilot. She had dropped her anchor a short time before on the north side of the river on account of craft in the reach, and at the time in question was getting her head up river and angling somewhere about W. S. W. Her speed was about one knot an hour, and her whistle was being duly sounded. In these circumstances those on board the Schwan observed the Annie about two cables lengths off and about four points on their starboard bow. The engines of the Schwan, which had been going ahead for the purpose of clearing a vessel at anchor, were stopped. Her helm was starboarded, and two blasts of her whistle were blown. The Annie, however, without answering the signal, came on and tried under a port helm to cross the bows of the Schwan. Two short blasts of the Schwan's whistle were again blown and her engines were set full speed astern. Three short blasts of her whistle were then given, but the Annie without slackening her speed struck the starboard side of the Schwan with her stem.

The defendants, besides denying that the Schwan was negligently navigated, set up the defence of compulsory pilotage.

The plaintiffs (inter alia) charged the defendants with breach of art. 24 of the Rules and Bye-laws for the Navigation of the River Thames, which is as follows:

Act 24. Steam-vessels crossing from one side of the river towards the other side shall keep out of the way of vessels navigating up and down the river.

Art. 25. Where by the above rules one of two vessels is to keep out of the way, the other shall keep her course.

Sir Walter Phillimore (with him J. P. Aspinall) for the plaintiffs.—The defendants are to blame for breach of art. 24 of the Rules and Bye-laws for the Navigation of the River Thames. The Schwan was "crossing from one side of the river towards the other side" within the meaning of that article, and hence it was her duty to keep out of the way of the Annie, which she admittedly neglected to do. The Annie was bound, in compliance with art. 25, to keep her course, and that she did, and therefore no blame can be attached to her.

Bucknill, Q.C. and Pyke, for the defendants, contra.—The Schwan was not within art. 24. She was merely turning in the river, and not crossing from one side of the river to the other. The article was never meant to apply to the circumstances of the present case. Those on the Annie saw the manœuvres of the Schwan, and yet, instead of waiting or going under the Schwan's stern, chose to come on, and so brought about the collision.

Sir Walter Phillimore in reply.

BUTT, J.—In this case the Annie was going down the reach at a moderate speed well outside the line of buoys. Although her captain described the collision as having occurred just inside the buoys, I think it clear that it was well outside. Now the Schwan was crossing the river, having been just before at anchor on the north shore. She was crossing the river, or, to quote the language of art. 24 of the Thames Bye-laws, she was "crossing from one side of the river towards the other side." The vessels were, as it seems to me, within the provisions of arts. 24 and 25. By art. 24 it was the duty of those in charge of the Schwan to keep her out of the way of the Annie. The relative duty of the Annie was to keep her course. The Annie did keep her course, and the Schwan also did something very like keeping her course, but it was a course which, instead of keeping her out of the way of the Annie, put her into it, and hence the collision, the Annie's stem striking the starboard side of the Schwan just before the forerigging.

The account given by the master and pilot of the Schwan is, that those on the Annie seeing them heading towards the south shore would starboard the helm and go under their stern. Reckoning on that, they chose to keep on heading across the river, and they gave moreover the two-blast signal; that is to say, they expected that the Annie to please them would commit a breach of art. 25. Seeing the persistency of the Schwan in attempting to cross her bows in violation of art. 24, which the Annie had no reason to expect, she stopped and reversed her engines. It is true that that was not done in time to avoid a collision.

Although from the photographs it does not appear to me to have been a very severe blow, it seems to be one which might well have been caused by the Schwan drifting up with a two-knot tide and with the Annie nearly stopped, although I do not believe the story that she was actually making sternway. It follows from what I have said that the Schwan was negligently navigated. Now comes the question, can her owners be held liable? [The learned Judge then dealt with the plea of compulsory pilotage, and having held that it was established dismissed the claim and counter-claim with no order as to costs on either side.]

Limitation of liability—Loss of life—Actions under Lord Campbell's Act — Stay of proceedings—Merchant Shipping Act 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104), s. 514.

In an action for limitation of liability in respect of a collision for which the plaintiffs had admitted liability, and in which loss of life had ensued, the Court granted a decree limiting the plaintiffs' liability to 15*l. per ton, upon payment into court of* 8*l. per ton and security being given for the balance, but refused to stay life actions which had been instituted in the Admiralty Division, the plaintiffs in such actions wishing to have their damages assessed by a jury.*

THIS was an action of limitation of liability by the owners of the steamship Nereid, to limit their liability in respect of a collision between the Nereid and the steamship Killochan.

The collision occurred on the 3rd Feb. 1889, and in consequence thereof several lives were lost.

Actions were subsequently instituted under Lord Campbell's Act, by the personal representatives of the deceased, against the Nereid, in the Admiralty Division.

The owners of the Nereid admitted their liability for the collision, and now asked for judgment in the limitation action.

J. P. Aspinall for the plaintiffs.—The plaintiffs ask for the usual decree, viz., to limit their liability to 15*l.* per ton, and for an order staying all pending actions.

H. Stokes for the plaintiffs in the life actions.—My clients object to having their actions stayed. They have a right to have their claims assessed by a jury.

BUTT, J.—The plaintiffs in the life actions are entitled to have their claims assessed by a jury. I shall therefore decline to stay them. The plaintiffs are entitled to a decree limiting their liability to 15*l.* per ton, and they must give security for the difference between 15*l.* and 8*l.* in respect of the life claims. The 8*l.* per ton they will pay into court.

THE DURHAM CITY. (a)

Master's disbursements — Charter-party — Coals —Liability of shipowners.

By a charter-party between the charterers and the owners of a steamer it was provided that the owners should maintain her in a thoroughly efficient state; that the charterers should provide and pay for all coals and fuel, port charges, pilotages, agencies, commissions, and all other charges whatsoever not appertaining to the working or efficiency of the steamer; and that if in consequence of the deficiency of men or stores, collision, want of repairs, breakdown, and other causes, she put into any port other than that to which she was bound, the port charges, pilotages, and other expenses at such port should be borne by the owners. The steamer put into a port to which she was not bound, for the alleged purpose of repairing the condenser, which was leaking. In consequence of such deviation the master had to buy extra coals, and now sought to make the shipowners liable for them.

Held, that, assuming the deviation was caused by the breakdown of the condenser, the price of the coals was not "port charges, pilotages, and other expenses," and that therefore the shipowners were not liable.

THIS was an action in rem for master's wages and disbursements against the owners of the steamship Durham City.

The plaintiff was the late master of the Durham City, and claimed the sum of 213*l.* 8*s.*

By his statement of claim the plaintiff alleged that while on a voyage from the River Plate to Liverpool it became necessary, owing to the condition of the ship's condenser, which was leaking badly, to put into Vigo to repair it. Whilst at Vigo he incurred liabilities for necessaries for the ship, including a further supply of coal, which had been rendered necessary in consequence of the deviation, which liabilities the defendants refused to meet.

The defence, so far as is material, was as follows:

The defendants say that:

2. They deny that at any time on the said voyage it was or it became necessary, owing to the condition of the said ship's condenser, to put into Vigo or any other port.

3. They do not admit that the plaintiff made any disbursements as alleged on behalf of the said ship and the defendants or either.

4. No balance or sum of money whatever is due from the defendants to the plaintiff, and the defendants do not admit that any of the said particulars are correctly set forth.

5. If the plaintiff acted as master of the said ship (which is not admitted) he was appointed by, and was in fact the servant of, Messrs. R. P. Houston and Co., to whom the said ship was chartered on the 14th Nov. 1888 for one round voyage to the River Plate and home; and if the plaintiff in fact incurred liabilities and made disbursements in the port of Vigo he did so as the servant of the said charterers, and not on account of or with the authority of the said ship or the defendants. The defendants crave leave to refer to the charter-party of the said ship on the voyage in question.

6. By the terms of the said charter-party the disbursements of the said ship in the port of Vigo were for the charterers' account, and are not payable by the defendants, and they are in no way liable for the same. If any sum of money or balance of any account or accounts is due to the plaintiff, it is a sum or balance of 23*l.* 1*s.* 2*d.*, which the defendants have paid into court.

The particulars of the plaintiff's claim included a sum of 182*l.* for coal at Vigo, and various other charges, such as clearance out, pilotage in and out, consular charges, stamps for manifest, provisions, &c.

The material provisions of the charter-party were as follows:

It is this day mutually agreed . . . The owners shall provide and pay for all oils, paints, and stores for the vessel, and for all provisions and wages of the captain, officers, engineers, firemen, and crew; shall pay for the insurance on the vessel, also for all engine room stores, and maintain her in a thoroughly efficient state in hull and machinery for the service. The charterers shall provide and pay for all the coals and fuel, port charges, pilotages, agencies, commissions, and all other charges whatsoever not appertaining to the working or efficiency of the steamer. . . . Charterers to appoint their own captain, who shall command steamer during tenure of this charter-party, owners paying him at the rate of 25*l.* per month. The master shall be under the orders and directions of the charterers as regards employment, agency or other arrangements. . . . If the charterers shall have reason to be dissatisfied with the conduct of the master, officers, or engineers, the owners shall, on receiving particulars of the complaint, investigate the same, and if necessary make a change in the appointments. . . . In the event of loss of time from the deficiency of men or stores, collision, want of repairs, breakdown of machinery, or other causes appertaining to the duties of the owners, preventing the working of the vessel for more than twenty-four working hours, the payment of hire shall cease until she be again in an efficient state to resume her service; and if in consequence of such deficiency, collision, want of repairs, breakdown, or other causes, the vessel puts into any port or ports other than those to which she is bound, por charges, pilotages, and other expenses at those ports shall be borne by the owners.

At the trial the plaintiff's witnesses swore that the ship put into Vigo in consequence of the condenser having broken down, and that it was necessary to go there to repair it.

It appeared that the plaintiff, when paying for the disbursements at Vigo, drew a draft upon Houston and Co., the charterers, which they refused to accept. The plaintiff was subsequently sued by the holders of the draft, who recovered judgment against him. The defendant's witnesses alleged that the sole reason for putting into Vigo was that the master had started on the voyage with an insufficient supply of coal, and that the repairs to the condenser might have been effected at sea.

Sir Walter Phillimore (with him Carver and Mansfield) for the plaintiff.—All the expenses at Vigo were the necessary consequence of the breakdown of the condenser, and are therefore by the terms of the charter-party to be paid for by the shipowners. The coals come within the words "other expenses at those ports." [BUTT, J.—The fact of the master drawing upon the charterers would seem to show that he was looking to them for indemnity.] He is not a lawyer, and his acts cannot affect the legal rights of the case. It seems only reasonable that the shipowners should pay these expenses, inasmuch as they were incurred in consequence of a defect in their ship.

Barnes, Q.C., for the defendants, contra.—On the facts it is contended that the cause of putting into Vigo was not the breakdown, but shortness of coal. Assuming it to be otherwise, there is no liability on the owners in respect of coal:

The Beeswing, 53 L. T. Rep. N. S. 554; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 484.

There is a special provision in the charter that the charterers shall pay for all coals. The words "port charges, pilotages, and other expenses" do not include coals.

Sir Walter Phillimore in reply.—If the deviation was occasioned by the breakdown, the necessity for supplying further coals was caused by the defendant's breach of contract in neglecting to maintain the ship "in a thoroughly efficient state in hull and machinery," as provided by the charter. Therefore if the charterers are liable in the first instance to the master for the coal, they have a right to recover over against the shipowners, and hence to avoid circuity of action the plaintiff ought to recover it in this action.

BUTT, J.—In this case the plaintiff, who was the master of the steamship Durham City, sues the owners of that ship to recover the sum of 213*l.* 8*s.* which he alleges is the balance due to him in respect of wages and disbursements made on behalf of the ship. The question for me turns upon the disbursements, as the wages are not now in dispute. The struggle is, whether the shipowners or the charterers are to pay for the disbursements. I understand it to be the fact that both charterers and shipowners are solvent people, and by either one or other of them these disbursements have to be paid.

The main item in dispute is a charge of 182*l.* for coal, put on board at Vigo. With reference to that item there is a question of law to be considered, as well as a question of fact. In my opinion, this item is a matter which may be disposed of without dealing with the question of the cause for putting into Vigo, because I think that, even assuming the plaintiff established by evidence that by reason of the condition of the ship's condenser it was necessary to put into Vigo, I am still of opinion that it is the charterer and not the shipowner who is liable to pay for the coal. I think there was no authority whatever for the master to order coals on behalf of the shipowner, or to pledge his credit for them. The material portions of the charter-party under consideration are these: "The charterers shall provide and pay for all the coals and fuel, port charges, pilotages, agencies, commissions, and all other charges whatsoever not appertaining to the working or efficiency of the steamer . . . In the event of loss of time from the deficiency of men or stores, collision, want of repairs, breakdown of machinery, or other causes appertaining to the duties of the owners, preventing the working of the vessel for more than twenty-four working hours, the payment of hire shall cease until she be again in an efficient state to resume her service; and if in consequence of such deficiency, collision, want of repairs, breakdown, or other causes, the vessel puts into any port or ports other than those to which she is bound, port charges, pilotages, and other expenses shall be borne by the owners." Now, this ship put into Vigo, a port to which she was not bound. Assuming that she put in for repairs owing to the leakage of this condenser and for no other purpose, I think there is no liability whatever in respect of these coals. The expenses which are to be borne by the shipowners are ejusdem generis with the specified charges within which coals do not come. Therefore I am of opinion that, taking the second paragraph of the statement of claim to be proved, the plaintiff is not entitled to recover the 182*l.*

in respect of the coal. If the defendants had paid into court a small sum more than they have the question would end there, because they would then have covered the whole of the plaintiff's claim, less 182*l.* But I do not think that the amount paid in is quite sufficient. Therefore I must determine the question of fact, whether this vessel put into Vigo because the condenser was leaking. I think that the real cause for putting into Vigo was want of coal and not leakage in the condenser; and, having come to that conclusion, I must give judgment for the defendants, and order the plaintiffs to pay the costs of the action.

THIS was an appeal from a judgment of the Court of Appeal (Lord Esher, M.R., Lindley and Lopes, L.JJ.) reported in 57 L. T. Rep. N. S. 328; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 163; and 12 P. Div. 158, who had affirmed a judgment of Butt, J.

The action was brought in the Admiralty Division in rem by the respondent as plaintiff, against the owners of the steamship Sara as defendants, to recover the sum of 183*l.* 13*s.* 10*d.* and interest from May 10, 1885, at 5 per cent. per annum, being the amount of a bill of exchange drawn by the respondent as master of the steamship Sara upon her managing owners in respect of coals and necessary port charges supplied to and incurred by the vessel at St. Vincent. The appellants, William Hamilton and John Hamilton, intervened in the action as mortgagees of the vessel, and by their defence alleged that, on the 23rd April 1884, the vessel was mortgaged to them, and that they entered into possession on the 16th May 1885, and they denied the right of the respondent to claim the amount sued for against the vessel.

The circumstances which gave rise to the action were as follows:—The respondent was a master mariner, and the steamship Sara belonged to a limited company, and was managed on the company's behalf by Messrs. J. F. Cohen and Co., the managers and directors of the company. In the early part of the year 1885 the respondent was engaged by Messrs. J. F. Cohen and Co. to act as master of the vessel on a voyage from England to the River Plate and back to Antwerp, calling at St. Vincent in the Cape de Verde Islands on the return voyage for coals. The respondent was instructed by the managers to apply at St. Vincent to a firm of Miller and Nephew, for the supply of the necessary coals, and to draw upon the managers in payment for the coals and necessary port charges. In the month of March 1885 the vessel on her return voyage had to put into St. Vincent for coals to enable her to complete her voyage to Antwerp, and in accordance with his instructions the respondent applied to Messrs. Miller and Nephew for the necessary coals, which were supplied by them, and signed a bill of exchange for 182*l.* 19*s.* 4*d.* drawn upon Messrs. J. F. Cohen and Co. The amount of the bill was for the necessary coals and port charges supplied to and incurred by the vessel. The vessel afterwards proceeded on her voyage and arrived at Antwerp, and afterwards went, viâ Middlesbrough, on to Marseilles. The bill of exchange was dishonoured by Messrs. J. F. Cohen and Co., and due notice of dishonour was given to the respondent. The appellants, who had taken a mortgage on the vessel on the 23rd April 1884, had taken no steps to enter into possession, and did not enter into possession until the 16th May 1835, after arrival of the ship at Marseilles, when one of them went out and took possession, and discharged the respondent. The respondent then asked the appellants to indemnify him against his liability on the bill of exchange, but they declined to do so. The amount of the bill of exchange having been claimed by the holders, Messrs. George Miller and Co., the representatives in Bristol of the firm of Miller and Nephew, the respondent commenced this action to recover the amount of the bill and expenses.

The action came on for trial on the 14th Feb. 1887 before Butt J. At the close of the case the learned judge held that the respondent, the master, had a maritime lien for the disbursements in question in priority to the appellants, the mortgagees, and gave judgment in his favour, on the authority of The Mary Ann (13 L. T. Rep. N. S. 384; 2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 294; L. Rep. 1 A. & E. 8) and The Ringdove (55 L. T. Rep. N. S. 552; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 28; 11 P. Div. 120), and his judgment was affirmed on appeal, as above mentioned.

Finlay, Q.C. and Nelson appeared for the appellants, and argued that the question in the case, namely, whether the master has a maritime lien for necessary disbursements, depended upon the true construction of the Admiralty Court Act

(a) Reported by C. E. MALDEN, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

(b) Since the decision in this action the Merchant Shipping Act has been amended so as to give a master a maritime lien for his disbursements: cf. 52 & 53 Vict. c. 46, s. 1, which provides that "Every master of a ship and every person lawfully acting as master of a ship by reason of the decease or incapacity from illness of the master of the ship shall, so far as the case permits, have the same rights, liens, and remedies for the recovery of disbursements properly made by him on account of the ship and for liabilities properly incurred by him on account of the ship as a master of a ship now has for the recovery of his wages."—ED.

1840 (3 & 4 Vict. c. 65), s. 6, and the Admiralty Court Act 1861 (24 Vict. c. 10), s. 10. The master is not the servant of the mortgagees, but in practice no doubt such claims have been recognised. But the lien, if any, can only be for actual disbursements, not for a liability on a bill, such as this. See

The stricter rule provides a valuable check on the master. The argument of the respondent rests upon The Mary Ann (13 L. T. Rep. N. S. 384; 2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 294; L. Rep. 1 A. & E. 8), and that case rested on The Caledonia (Swa. 17) and The Glentanner (Swa. 415), which were wrongly decided. No doubt the courts of first instance have held that there is a maritime lien, following The Mary Ann: see

On principle we contend that this is not a "disbursement" at all, but a mere liability of the master; that, by giving the Court of Admiralty jurisdiction in such cases the Legislature did not necessarily mean to make a maritime lien. There has been no such communis error as to prevent the House from interfering to overrule the erroneous decisions on which the respondent's case rests.

Sir W. Phillimore and Barnes, Q.C., for the respondent, contended that there was a maritime lien in the master's favour for disbursements, and that this liability was in fact a "disbursement." Mortgagees must be in the same position as the owner, and disbursements would be set off as against him in an account with the master. The case is of great importance in the interests of commerce, and the construction of the Acts for which we contend has prevailed for a long period. Bonds in this form are now the rule; the facilities of telegraphic communication have practically put an end to bottomry bonds. If the disbursements have been properly incurred the master should have priority over the mortgagees, and when the master has given his bill he has in fact paid the amount. [Lord HALSBURY, L.C. referred to Bristow v. Whitmore, 9 H. of L. C. 391.] The Act of 1861 was intended to extend maritime liens, and since the decision of The Mary Ann (ubi sup.) in 1865 it has never been doubted that such lien existed in these cases. In addition to the cases referred to by the appellants they cited

Nelson in reply.—The increased facilities of communication make it the less necessary to give to the master a power which is liable to be abused.

At the conclusion of the arguments, their Lordships took time to consider their judgment.

May 27.—Their Lordships gave judgment as follows:—

The LORD CHANCELLOR (Halsbury).—My Lords: In this case the plaintiff, William Baker, brought an action in rem against the owners of the steamship Sara as defendants. The plaintiff claimed for disbursements, which had been supplied upon his order as master of the steamship Sara at St. Vincent in March 1885. The appellants intervened in the action, and their case was that they had taken a mortgage of the vessel on the 23rd April 1884, and, stripped of the other questions which have been disposed of by the evidence, the only real question is whether, under the circumstances I have stated, the plaintiff, Baker, had a maritime lien for his disbursements. I believe the question might be even more compendiously stated by saying that the question is whether the decision of Dr. Lushington in the case of The Mary Ann (13 L. T. Rep. N. S. 384; 2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 294; L. Rep. 1 A. & E. 8) can be supported by your Lordships' House. Now, two propositions are absolutely certain; one is that before 1854 no such lien could be claimed, and that neither the Act of 1854 nor the Act of 1861 created such a lien in express terms. The arguments addressed to your Lordships, singularly enough, are in some of their aspects very effectively answered by some of the passages in the very judgment relied on. It is not true to say that the mere enacting by the Admiralty Court Act that the High Court of Admiralty shall have jurisdiction purports to confer a maritime lien. Dr. Lushington himself says that the same enactment provides that the proceedings in that court may be either in rem or in personam. Further, he says that there is a clear distinction between a maritime lien and a claim the payment of which the court has power to enforce from the ship and freight. The whole of the learned judge's reasoning, upon which his judgment ultimately turned, was this; he says: "Supposing before this Act this court had jurisdiction to deal with any subject-matter in certain cases, and those only, and that in those cases the court was bound to recognise the existence of a maritime lien, and supposing that by this Act the Legislature extended the jurisdiction so as to enable the court to deal with the same subject-matter in other cases also, then I think that in such other cases, and with regard to the same subject-matter, the Legislature must be taken, notwithstanding the absence of any express words, to have intended to created a maritime lien." This is the whole of the reasoning upon which the judgment depends, and it is necessary to examine how it justifies the judgment when applied to the subject-matter with which we are dealing. Is it true that the court was bound to recognise a maritime lien for disbursements before the statute? Certainly not. The example given of the master here is certainly a very strange one, since it is in a sense expressly given by the combined operation of the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 112, and the 191st section of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854. The learned judge himself points out that the 10th section of the Act, which he was construing, cured the difficulty of forum in such a case by expressly giving the Admiralty jurisdiction to deal with any lien the master might have, and we have already seen that by the two former statutes the lien for the wages was actually and in terms created. But how does the providing the forum for the special lien already created lead to any inference that the giving jurisdiction does create a lien? It is true that where the contract was under seal, or where the terms were special and unusual, the Admiralty Court had no jurisdiction, because it was said that the sailors' ordinary contract wtth the master was presumed to be on the credit of the ship, whereas other contracts were said to be on the personal credit of the owners; but whatever may be said as to the practical abolition of the distinction between wages "carned on board the vessel" under a special contract or an ordinary contract, what relation has such a provision to the case of disbursements? Where the subject-matter, whether collision or seamen's wages, had, in its own nature, a maritime lien, I can well understand that the extension of the jurisdiction to a case where the nature of the subject-matter was the same—e.g., collisions within the body of the county—carried with it, as inherent in the nature of the thing itself, a maritime lien, and it may well be argued that the Legislature did not intend to alter the incidents of the subject-matter thus submitted to a new jurisdiction.

The learned judge's own reasoning seems to me to lead to a different conclusion from that at which he arrived. Nor does the power to enter into the whole account, given by the section already referred to, appear to me to carry the matter any further. The learned judge himself uses the most powerful argument against his own decision. A maritime lien, he says, springs into existence the moment the circumstances give birth to it, as damages, salvage, wages; and yet it is said here that whether there is a lien or not is to depend upon whether the owners set up, by way of set-off, counter-claims by them against the master. I share with many judges the difficulty of following the reasoning, and I am unable, therefore, to adopt the conclusions; but I do feel very strongly what has been forcibly expressed by Sir James Hannen in The Ringdove (55 L. T. Rep. N. S. 552; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 28; 11 P. Div. 120), and by the Master of the Rolls in the present case, the practical adoption in actual business of the decision in The Mary Ann, and I have striven to see whether it was possible to give effect to that practice; but I cannot omit to consider that we are construing comparatively modern statute law and not business documents merely. Your Lordships' House is asked to sanction a canon of construction that may extend more widely than the particular case now dealt with, and I am therefore constrained to move your Lordships that the judgment be reversed and this appeal allowed.

Lord WATSON.—My Lords: There is but one substantial question raised in this appeal. Has the master of a British ship a maritime lien enforceable in the Court of Admiralty for disbursements made by him on account of the ship in a foreign port? By the common law of England the master's claims, whether for wages or disbursements, did not carry with them any hypothecary interest in the ship; and, inasmuch as they rested upon contract alone, were not cognisable in the Admiralty Courts. The Merchant Shipping Act 1854 gave the master, in express terms, the same lien which other seamen had for recovery of their wages by law or custom; and also conferred upon the Admiralty Court a limited jurisdiction to entertain other claims at his instance. whilst the Admiralty Court Act 1861 extended its jurisdiction to any claim for disbursements made by him on account of the ship. Neither statute expressly attaches a lien to his claims for disbursements; but it is said that the effect of their provisions is to give him the right by implication. Sect. 191 of the Act of 1854, which creates a lien for the master's wages, concludes thus: "If, in any proceeding in any Court of Admiralty or Vice-Admiralty touching the claim of a master to wages, any right of set-off or counter-claim is set up, it shall be lawful for such court to enter into, and adjudicate upon, all questions, and to settle all accounts then arising or outstanding and unsettled between the parties to the proceeding, and to direct payment of any balance which is found to be due." I am willing to assume that the accounting which these provisions contemplate must be confined to items connected with the ship; and I do not doubt that a claim for disbursements is one which the master might competently prefer in answer to any set-off or counter-claim pleaded in defence to his suit for wages. But it does not appear to me to be a necessary or natural inference that the Legislature meant to attach a maritime lien to every demand which a master may competently make in the accounting, or to his claim for disbursements. When a variety of personal and unsecured claims are dealt with in a single clause, and it is expressly declared that one of them shall bear a lien, there arises a strong presumption that a similar privilege is not to attach to the rest; and that presumption cannot be overcome except by very plain implication. A proper right of lien constitutes a nexus upon the ship which suâ naturâ must exist and accompany the claim from its inception; and it is very improbable that the Legislature should have intended to create a maritime lien, which does not come into existence unless and until a plea of set-off is judicially stated in answer to a claim for wages. The strongest argument to the contrary is to be found in the suggestion that sect. 191 necessarily contemplates a decree in rem, which is said to imply the existence of a maritime lien. But the clause enacts that, in the event of the balance of accounts being against the master, the court is to direct payment, which cannot be effected by a decree in rem; and, so far as I am aware, there is no authority for the proposition that there must be a proper maritime lien for every claim which the Legislature has made enforceable against the ship.

The Act of 1861, which throughout its whole clauses deals with remedies and not with rights, provides (sect. 10) that the Admiralty Court shall have jurisdiction "over any claim by the master of a ship for wages earned by him on board the ship, and for disbursements made by him on account of the ship." But it also provides (sect. 35) that "the jurisdiction conferred by this Act on the High Court of Admiralty may be exercised either by proceedings in rem, or by proceedings in personam." In the face of that enactment it would be difficult to hold that the submission of a merely personal or contractual claim to the jurisdiction of the Court of Admiralty converted it into a real right against the ship from the time when it came into existence. In The Mary Ann, which was decided by Dr. Lushington in 1865 (13 L. T. Rep. N. S. 384; 2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 294; L. Rep. 1 A. & E. 8) that learned judge held that the master's claim for disbursements on account of ship does bear a proper maritime lien. In arriving at that result, I do not think that the learned judge relied solely upon the provisions of the Act of 1861, although there are observations in his judgment which might admit of that construction. His reasoning leads me to infer that if, before the passing of the Act, claims for disbursements had been wholly excluded from the jurisdiction of his court, and had been unaccompanied by a lien, Dr. Lushington would have held that the provisions of the Act were, per se, insufficient to create the right. He said: "There is a clear distinction between a maritime lien and a claim, the payment of which the court has power to enforce against the ship and freight. A maritime lien springs into existence the moment the circumstances give birth to it, as damages, salvage, and wages. But it does not follow that because a claim may, by Act of Parliament, be enforceable against the res, that therefore it creates a maritime lien." The law had already been laid down to the same effect by the learned judge in the case of The Pacific (Br. & L. 243), which related to the claim of a material man. He there pointed out that, in cases where statute gives to the creditor in an unsecured personal debt a real action against the ship, and does not clearly prescribe that his claim shall override that of a mortgagee, such creditor in no case "obtains the ship as a security until he institutes his suit in this court." His right in that case is subject to any registered mortgage, and he must "arrest the ship, and then acquires the res as a security." So far I agree with the reasoning of the learned judge. The real grounds of Dr. Lushington's decision in The Mary Ann are to be found in the fact that, before the Act of 1861, his court had a limited jurisdiction over claims for disbursements; and in the assumption that in such cases the master had a maritime lien. Upon these premises the learned judge argues, with considerable force, that it must have been the intention of the Legislature that under the enlarged jurisdiction conferred by sect. 10 of the later Act the master's claim for disbursements should have the same privileges which were attached to it under the limited jurisdiction established by the Act of 1854. Referring to sect. 191, and the effect which he attributed to it as creating a lien, pro tanto, for disbursements, Dr. Lushington says: "If this be so, then under this Act—i.e., the Act of 1861—the master claiming his disbursements is to be preferred to the mortgagee, because before the Act his claim for disbursements was entitled to a similar preference in the only case where the court could take cognisance of such disbursements—namely, in the case of a set-off." In my opinion, the ratio of the judgment in The Mary Ann fails, because I am unable to hold that the enactments of sect. 191 of the Merchant Shipping Act can be interpreted as creating a maritime lien for disbursements; and the enactments of the statute of 1861, even when tested by Dr. Lushington's own principles, are in themselves insufficient to create such a right. In The Feronia (17 L. T. Rep. N. S. 619; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 54; L. Rep. 2 A. & E. 65) the authority of The Mary Ann was followed by Sir Robert Phillimore, who refers to and adopts the views of his predecessor. It was again followed in the case of The Ringdove (55 L. T. Rep. N. S. 552; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 28; 11 P. Div. 120) by Sir James Hannen, who stated that the reasoning of Dr. Lushington was not satisfactory to his mind. In the present case Butt, J. considered himself bound by these precedents; but intimated that, apart from their authority, he would have had considerable difficulty in holding that there is any maritime lien for masters' disbursements. None of these judgments in the Admiralty Court were brought under review; but in Re Rio Grande Do Sul Steamship Company (36 L. T. Rep. N. S. 603; 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 424; 5 Ch. Div. 282) the Court of Appeal in a liquidation gave incidental effect to a lien for disbursements. An observation is attributed to James, L.J. in that case which, if it had been made causâ cognitâ, would have been entitled to great weight; but the report shows that the lien was conceded, and that the point which your Lordships have now to decide was neither raised nor discussed. It was strongly urged by the respondent's counsel that your Lordships are now precluded, by a series rerum judicatarum, from denying effect to the principle laid down in The Mary Ann and The Feronia. But I do not think that these authorities, which have been followed but not approved in the most recent cases, are of sufficient weight to establish a latent security of an exceptional character against purchasers and mortgagees.

Lord MACNAGHTEN.—My Lords: The main question argued in this case, and the only question upon which it is necessary to pronounce an opinion, is reduced to a narrow point. It is clear that at the time of the passing of the Admiralty Court Act 1861 disbursements made by the master of a ship in the ordinary course of his employment did not create any lien in his favour. It is equally clear that neither the Act of 1861 nor any subsequent Act has in terms conferred a maritime lien for the master's disbursements. Sect. 10 of the Act of 1861 declares that "The Court of Admiralty shall have jurisdiction over any claim by the master of any ship for disbursements made by him on account of the ship." That section gave the court jurisdiction to entertain suits falling within its scope, and of itself it did nothing more. The jurisdiction, as the Act declared, might be exercised either by proceedings in rem or by proceedings in personam. It thus became competent for the Court of Admiralty, on the master preferring his claim for disbursements, to arrest the ship on account of which the disbursements were made. But in the absence of a maritime lien the arrest could not affect a subsisting mortgage or any other valid charge upon the ship. So far the matter seems clear, and if the question depended solely upon the general law before the Act of 1861, and upon the language of that Act, there would be no ground for the contention put forward on behalf of the master in the present case. It cannot, however, be disputed that ever since the year 1865 it has uniformly been held that the claim of a master for his disbursements is to be preferred to the claim of a mortgagee. Dr. Lushington arrived at the conclusion without any hesitation in the case of The Mary Ann (ubi sup.). His view was adopted and approved of by Sir R. Phillimore in The Feronia (ubi sup.). It was accepted by the Court of Appeal in the case of Re Rio Grande Do Sul Company (ubi sup.), and it has been followed in The Ringdove (ubi sup.) by Sir James Hannen, who observed that he did not feel at liberty to disregard the authority of The Mary Ann, though he could not say that Dr. Lushington's reasoning was altogether satisfactory to his mind. The appellants challenged the decision in The Mary Ann and the course of practice which has followed it. The respondent contends that the decision was right. But whether it was right or not he says that it is too late now even for this House to interfere. I am sensible of the inconvenience of disturbing a course of practice which has continued unchallenged for such a length of time, and has been sanctioned by such high authority. But if it is really founded upon an erroneous construction of an Act of Parliament, there is no principle which precludes your Lordships from correcting the error. To hold that the matter is not open to review would be to give the effect of legislation to a decision contrary to the intention of the Legislature merely because it has happened, for some reason or other, to remain unchallenged for a certain length of time.

I propose, therefore, as briefly as I can to examine the decision in The Mary Ann, and the circumstances under which it was pronounced. Originally the master had no right to resort to the Court of Admiralty for his wages, or for anything due to him from the owners. The first alteration in this respect was made by the Merchant Seamen Act of 1844 (7 & 8 Vict. c. 112, s. 16), which gave the master, for the recovery of his wages, all the rights, liens, and remedies of an ordinary seaman, but only in the case of the bankruptcy of the owner. As, however, an ordinary seaman had no right to come to the Admiralty Court when his wages were due under a special contract, this provision did not much improve the master's position. Then came the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, which, in sect. 191, re-enacted the provision in the Act of 1844 as regards the master's wages, omitting all reference to the bankruptcy of the owner, and then went on to enact that "if in any proceeding in any Court of Admiralty . . . touching the claim of a master to wages any right of set-off or counter-claim is set up, it shall be lawful for such court to enter into and adjudicate upon all questions, and to settle all accounts then arising, or outstanding and unsettled, between the parties to the proceeding, and to direct payment of any balance which is found to be due." The first case of importance under this section was The Caledonia (Swa. 17), decided in 1855. There the master preferred a claim for wages, and arrested the ship for a sum sufficient to cover his disbursements as well. The mortgagees intervened. They declared that they had no intention of setting up any right of set-off or counter-claim, but they tendered a sum less than the amount claimed in respect of wages, on the ground that payments had been made on account of wages both by themselves and by the owners. Dr. Lushington held that under the Act of 1854, if the owners chose to avail themselves of any advances, or anything in the nature of a "set-off," the whole account between the owners and the master was opened, and he thought that the mortgagees could be in no better position than the owners. There the general account between the master and the owners was not taken as against the mortgagees, apparently because they disclaimed any intention of setting up a right of set-off. But, as the general account was not opened, they did not get the benefit of payments made by the owners on account of wages. They were only liable through the master's lien; but they had to pay more than the lien covered. In the case of The Glentanner, which was decided in 1859 (Swa. 415), the mortgagees were less discreet or less fortunate. They declared that they would set up a right of set-off or counter-claim. The master was then directed to bring in his accounts. The mortgagees did not file a counter-claim or set-off, but they objected to all the items in the master's account except those relating to the payment of wages. Dr. Lushington, in giving judgment, stated that he adhered to every word he said in The Caledonia. He thought that the general account, if opened at all, must be gone through and a balance made. He was of opinion that the accounts spoken of in the Merchant Shipping Act meant "the accounts between the master and the ship, exclusive of any private account between the master and her owners for merely extraneous purposes," and that a mortgagee taking possession of the ship and claiming the benefit of items in the account against the master's claim for wages thereby made himself a party to the whole account. Why, he asked, should the master be prejudiced by the sale or mortgage of the ship? He was of opinion that, as the mortgagees had declared to set up a counter-claim and had opened the account, an item of 400*l.* claimed for disbursements belonged to "the account arising, and outstanding and unsettled, between them and the master," who were, he said, "the parties to the proceeding." It is to be observed that the learned judge does not in terms say that the master had a maritime lien for his disbursements. His argument, if I understand his judgment aright, rather seems to be that a mortgagee intervening and setting up a right of set-off or counter-claim took upon himself the personal liability of the owner for debts due in connection with the ship.

Then followed in order of date the Admiralty

Jurisdiction Act 1861, which gives the Court of Admiralty jurisdiction over any claim by the master for wages, whether due under a special contract or not, and for disbursements made by him on account of the ship. Soon afterwards the question arose as to the effect of that Act on the master's claim for disbursements as between the master and a mortgagee. The point was raised directly in The Mary Ann, in which Dr. Lushington gave judgment on the 7th Nov. 1865. In that case, dealing with the language of the Act, the learned judge expressed the view which has since been established in the Privy Council and in this House. He thought that the words "the High Court of Admiralty shall have jurisdiction" meant only what they purport to say—neither more nor less—that is, that the court shall take cognisance of the cases provided for. But he considered that, in determining whether in these cases of extended jurisdiction it was meant to create a maritime lien, or what was the intention of the Legislature, the court would look to the law as it stood before the late Act; and he came to the conclusion that under the Act of 1861 the master claiming for disbursements was to be preferred to the mortgagee, "because before the Act his claim for his disbursements was entitled to a similar preference in the only case where the court could take cognisance of such disbursements — namely, in the case of a set-off." I may observe that in that case also the learned judge, while holding that the claim of the master was to be preferred to that of the mortgagee, does not say in terms that the effect of the Act was to give the master a maritime lien for his disbursements. However, in The Feronia, which was decided in 1868 (17 L. T. Rep. N. S. 619; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 54; L. Rep. 2 A. & E. 65), Sir Robert Phillimore expressly stated that in the case of The Mary Ann it was decided that under the Act of 1861 the master has a maritime lien both for his wages and disbursements, and that upon this ground his claim was preferable to that of a mortgagee. No doubt that was the practical result of the decision, and it has been so treated ever since.

Under these circumstances the question whether the decision in The Mary Ann and the practice of the Admiralty Court which rests upon it can be supported depends, I think, on the answer to be given to one or both of these further questions: (1) whether the decision in The Glentanner was right, and, if so, (2) whether the existence of the rule there laid down justified Dr. Lushington's inference as to the intention and effect of the Act of 1861. It is not, I think, necessary, to go into the latter question, because I am of opinion that the decision of The Glentanner was based on a construction of the Act of 1854 which is plainly erroneous. Did the Act of 1854, as against a mortgagee or purchaser, give the master of a vessel a maritime lien for his disbursements in the event of his instituting a suit in the Admiralty Court for wages (which at that time he could only do in the absence of a special contract), and in the event of the mortgagee or purchaser thereupon setting up a right of set-off or counter-claim? The question, I think, answers itself. "A maritime lien," as was observed in The Two Ellens (26 L. T. Rep. N. S. 1; 1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 208; L. Rep. 4 P. C. 161), "must be something which adheres to the ship from the time that the facts happen which gave the maritime lien, and then continues binding on the ship until it is discharged. It commences, and there it continues binding on the ship until it comes to an end." A lien or preference which is supposed to have its origin in a certain transaction, and yet has no binding force or effect unless and until two things happen, neither of which has any connection with the original transaction, is certainly not a maritime lien in the ordinary sense of the term. But then, did Parliament intend to create this anomalous preference or privilege—whatever it may be called — in the particular case of the concurrence of the two events contemplated by sect. 191 of the Act of 1854? It would be strange if it did. The Act gave the master a maritime lien for wages; that is, I suppose, for the amount of his wages for the time being due and owing. Now, a man is bound to pay his own debts, and he is also bound to discharge a preferential claim on property upon which he has a security if he means to make his security available. But even an honest man, without any disparagement to his honesty, may object to pay another man's debt, and may wish to investigate the amount of a preferential claim on property belonging to him as purchaser or mortgagee. Is it conceivable that it could have been the intention of Parliament that if the master brought a suit for wages for which the statute gave him a maritime lien, a mortgagee or purchaser, intervening for the protection of his own property, should not be at liberty to investigate the extent of the lien—to see both sides of the special account with which he is concerned—except at the risk of having to pay a claim which up to that time was neither a debt of his nor a charge upon his property? I cannot imagine that even in hard cases—and these are all cases of hardship — Parliament meant to encourage excessive claims by masters or to set a trap for unwary mortgagees. Is there anything in the language of the Act of 1854 to countenance such a notion? I do not think there is. The Act speaks of accounts "outstanding and unsettled between the parties to the proceeding." When a mortgagee intervened "the parties to the proceeding," as Dr. Lushington said in The Glentanner, were the master on the one hand and the mortgagee on the other; the master's claim for disbursements did not enter into the account between the mortgagee and the master. The claim for wages might properly come in, because it was a preferential claim on property belonging to the mortgagee. If Parliament had intended by the Act of 1854 to give the master a maritime lien or a preferential claim for his disbursements, nothing would have been easier than to have said so. And it is to be observed that in the very section in question a lien is given in plain terms for the master's wages.

In the result, therefore, I am of opinion that the Act of 1854 did not in any event give the master a maritime lien or preferential claim for his disbursements. It follows that, in my judgment, the decision in The Glentanner proceeded on an erroneous construction of the Act, and that the decision in The Mary Ann, and the practice of the Admiralty which rests upon it, cannot be supported. Your Lordships, on the one hand, were warned of the disastrous consequences of disturbing the practice of the Admiralty Court. On the other hand it was urged that the disadvantages resulting from allowing such a lien more than counterbalance any possible advantage, and it was said that the facilities of communication which exist nowadays between all parts of the world make it unnecessary to give the master a power which certainly may be abused. Between these conflicting views I do not venture to express any opinion. I have only to state what, in my judgment, the law really is. It is for the Legislature to alter the law, if Parliament in its wisdom thinks an alteration desirable. I think the appeal ought to be allowed.

STRANG STEEL AND CO. v. SCOTT AND CO. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF THE RECORDER OF RANGOON.

Jettison — General average — Loss through negligence of master.

There are two exceptions to the right to claim general average: First, a wrongdoer through whose default the peril has happened which gives rise to the sacrifice cannot claim; secondly, owners of deck cargo are not entitled to general average except where such cargo is carried on deck in accordance with the custom of the trade, or where the other cargo-owners have consented to the carriage of the goods on deck. Owners of jettisoned cargo subject to the above exceptions are entitled to recover for general average, even where the peril which necessitated the jettison has been brought about by the negligence of the master.

Semble, that the right to general average arises not as a matter of contract but as a positive right in consequence of a common danger requiring that all should contribute to indemnify for the loss of property which has been sacrificed to save the whole adventure, and this right of contribution is similar to the right upon which claims for salvage services are founded.

THIS was an appeal from a judgment of the Recorder of Rangoon (F. Agnew, Esq.) in an action brought by the respondents, as owners of cargo shipped on board the steamship Abington, against the appellants, as representing the owners of the ship, under circumstances which appear fully from the judgment of their Lordships.

Finlay, Q.C. and Barnes, Q.C. appeared for the appellants, and contended that a claim for general average contribution arose in this case, though the mishap which rendered the jettison necessary was due to the negligence of those in charge of the vessel. The shipowner has a lien on the goods for the amount of the general average contribution payable by them, and his duty was to collect it before parting with them, as he is the agent for all parties interested. This right of lien is not affected by the negligence of the master and crew which led to the jettison. See

Further, there is an exception in the bills of lading which exempts the owners from all liability in respect of the negligence of the master in the management or navigation of the ship:

Hallett v. Bousfield, 18 Ves. 187.

The claim for general average rests on general law, and the exception in the bill of lading shows that no cross-action is maintainable. They also referred to Bigham, Q.C. and Fitzgerald, for the respondents, argued that, under the circumstances, this was not a general average loss at all. The sacrifice was for the benefit of the owners, not of the whole adventure:

Barnes, Q.C. was heard in reply.

At the conclusion of the arguments their Lordships took time to consider their judgment.

Aug. 2.—Their Lordships' judgment was delivered by Lord WATSON.—The steamship Abington, on her way from London to Rangoon, with a general cargo, ran aground on the Baragua Flats in the Gulf of Martaban. Part of the cargo was thrown overboard in order to lighten the vessel, which was got off by that means, and was enabled to reach her destination in safety on the 19th Oct. 1886. On the day of her arrival in the port of Rangoon, the appellants, Strang Steel and Co., local agents for the ship, intimated to the respondents, A. Scott and Co., and other con-signees of the cargo then on board, that a deposit of one per cent. upon the value of their goods would be required before delivery "against probable average claim;" and on the following day they made a further intimation that the amount of deposit required would be five per cent. A correspondence ensued, in the course of which the respondents made various tenders, all of which were declined; and on the 25th Oct., six days after the arrival of the Abington, they paid the required deposit, amounting to Rs.1592. 11, under protest, and obtained delivery of their goods. The respondents, on the 27th Oct. 1886, instituted the present suit in the Court of the Recorder of Rangoon for recovery of their deposit, and for damages on account of the detention of their goods, upon the allegation that they had before payment made a tender entitling them to delivery. Upon the same day on which their plaint was filed the respondents applied to the court, under sect. 492 of the Civil Code, for an injunction to restrain the appellants, Strang Steel and Co., from remitting to England, or removing from the jurisdiction of the court, the deposit paid to them on the 25th Oct. These appellants judicially undertook to retain the amount claimed in their own possession, subject to the orders of the court, without the issue of a formal injunction, and no further proceedings have been taken in that application. On the 5th Feb. 1887 the respondents were allowed to add to their original ground of action an allegation, to the effect that they were not liable to contribute for general average on account of either ship or cargo, because the grounding of the Abington, and the consequent jettison of part of the cargo, were due to the default, negligence, and misconduct of her master. Upon the pleadings thus amended, the case was twice tried before the Recorder, who ultimately, on the 15th Aug. 1887, gave the respondents decree for Rs.1592. 11, and for Rs.200, in name of damages, with costs of suit. The learned judge found, as matter of fact, that the stranding of the ship upon the Baragua Flats was occasioned by the negligent navigation of the master; and he held, as matter of law, that no claim for general average arises to the owners of cargo jettisoned when the peril which necessitated jettison is induced by the fault of the ship. Whilst resting his decision upon that ground, the learned judge indicated that, in his opinion, the respondents had made a tender entitling them to demand immediate delivery of their goods, before they paid the deposit to the appellants.

In the course of the argument upon this appeal, three separate points were raised and fully discussed. The appellants argued, (1) that innocent owners of cargo sacrificed for the common good are not disabled from recovering a general contribution by the circumstance that the necessity for the sacrifice was brought about by the shipmaster's fault; (2) that in respect the bills of lading for the cargo of the Abington specially excepted "any act, neglect, or default whatsoever of pilots, master, or crew in the management or navigation of the ship," the owners of cargo saved are not, so far as concerns any question of contribution, in a position to plead the fault of the master; and (3) that the respondents did not, before the 25th Oct. 1886, make a sufficient legal tender. The parties were not agreed as to the facts upon which the second of these contentions is based; but there was no controversy as to the facts upon which the first and third of them depend. It was conceded by the appellants that the Abington was stranded through the negligence of her master; and, on the other hand, the respondents admitted that the effect of her stranding was to place both ship and cargo in a position of such imminent danger as to make it prudent and necessary to sacrifice part of the cargo in order to preserve the remainder of it and the ship. The question whether the respondents made a legal tender depends upon the construction of the correspondence which passed between the parties in Oct. 1886.

The first question raised is one of general importance, and, so far as their Lordships are aware, has never been made matter of direct decision in this country. It may be convenient in dealing with it to consider first of all the rights and remedies which the owners of cargo thrown overboard have in a proper case of jettison. Some of the qualities of their right, and of the remedies by which it may be enforced, have been authoritatively defined. Each owner of jettisoned goods becomes a creditor of ship and cargo saved, and has a direct claim against each of the owners of ship and cargo, for a pro ratâ contribution towards his indemnity, which he can enforce by a direct action. In Dobson v. Wilson (3 Camp. 480) Lord Tenterden said: "If a shipper of goods which are sacrificed for the salvation of the rest of the cargo is entitled to receive a contribution from another shipper whose goods are saved, I know not how I can say that this may not be recovered by an action at law. This is a legal right, and must be accompanied with a legal remedy." Again, it is settled law that, in the case of a general ship, the owner of goods sacrificed for the common benefit has a lien upon each parcel of goods salved belonging to a separate consignee for a due proportion of his individual claim. The cargo not being in his possession or subject to his control, his right of lien can only be enforced through the shipmaster, whom the law of England, following the principles of the Lex Rhodia, regards as his agent for that purpose. The duty being imposed by law upon the master, he is answerable for its neglect. In the course of the argument, his liability in that respect was questioned upon the authority of certain dicta of Lord Eldon's in Hallett v. Bousfield (18 Ves. 187). The circumstances of that case were very special. One of a number of persons alleging a right to contribution applied for an injunction to restrain the master from delivering the cargo without taking security, the bulk of them having consented to his so doing. Lord Eldon expressed a doubt whether it was the right of every owner of part of the jettisoned cargo to compel the captain to call on every owner of cargo saved to give security; but he dismissed the application on the ground that there was no instance of such an equitable remedy having been granted. Courts of equity are chary of granting injunctions which may lead to inconvenient results; and it does not follow from Hallett v. Bousfield that a master might not be restrained from making delivery of the cargo, at the instance of all or most of those entitled to contribution, without taking security for their claims. But their Lordships see no reason to doubt that, assuming the applicant's claim for contribution in that case to have been well founded, he would have had his remedy at law. In Crooks and Co. v. Allan (41 L. T. Rep. N. S. 800; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 216; 5 Q. B. Div. 38), Lord Justice (then Mr. Justice) Lush held that a master or shipowner is bound to exercise the power he is invested with when a general loss has arisen, and to use the means in his power for adjusting the average claims and liabilities and securing their payment, and he accordingly ordained the defendants, who had neglected to perform that duty, to pay to the plaintiffs the whole amount of contribution to which they were entitled. The learned Judge observed, that "the right to detain for contribution is derived from the civil law, which also imposes on the master of the ship the duty of having the contribution settled and of collecting the amount, and the usage has always been substantially in accordance with that law, and has become part of the common law of England." The rule of contribution in cases of jettison has its origin in the maritime law of Rhodes, of which the text, as preserved by Paulus (Dig. L. 14, tit. 2), is, "Si levandæ navis gratiâ jactus mercium factus est, omnium contributione sarciatur, quod pro omnibus datum est." The principle of the rule has been the frequent subject of judicial comment. Lord Bramwell, in Wright v. Marwood (45 L. T. Rep. N. S. 297; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 451; 7 Q. B. Div. 62), said that, to judge from the way in which contribution is claimed in England, "it would seem to arise from an implied contract inter se to contribute by those interested." Brett, M.R., in Burton v. English (49 L. T. Rep. N. S. 768; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 187; 12 Q. B. Div. 218), disputed that view, and stated his opinion to be that the right to contribution "does not arise from any contract at all, but from the old Rhodian laws, and has been incorporated into the law of England as the law of the ocean. It is not as a matter of contract, but in consequence of a common danger, when natural justice requires that all should contribute to indemnify for the loss of property which is sacrificed by one, in order that the whole adventure may be saved." Whether the rule ought to be regarded as matter of implied contract, or as a canon of positive law resting upon the dictates of natural justice, is a question which their Lordships do not consider it necessary to determine. The principle upon which contribution becomes due does not appear to them to differ from that upon which claims of recompence for salvage services are founded. But, in any aspect of it, the rule of contribution has its foundation in the plainest equity. In jettison, the rights of those entitled to contribution, and the corresponding obligations of the contributors, have their origin in the fact of a common danger which threatens to destroy the property of them all; and these rights and obligations are mutually perfected whenever the goods of some of the shippers have been advisedly sacrificed, and the property of the others has been thereby preserved. There are two well-established exceptions to the rule of contribution for general average, which it is necessary to notice. When a person who would otherwise have been entitled to claim contribution has, by his own fault, occasioned the peril which immediately gave rise to the claim, it would be manifestly unjust to permit him to recover from those whose goods are saved, although they may be said, in a certain sense, to have benefited by the sacrifice of his property. In any question with them he is a wrongdoer, and, as such, under an obligation to use every means within his power to ward off or repair the natural consequences of his wrongful act. He cannot be permitted to claim either recompence for services rendered, or indemnity for losses sustained by him, in the endeavour to rescue property which was imperilled by his own tortious act, and which it was his duty to save. Schloss v. Heriot (8 L. T. Rep. N. S. 246; 1 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 335; 14 C. B. N. S. 59) is a leading English authority upon the point. In that case, which was an action by the shipowner against the owners of cargo for contribution in an average loss, a plea stated in defence, to the effect that the ship was unseaworthy at the commencement of the voyage, and that the average loss was occasioned by such unseaworthiness, was held to be a good answer to the claim by Erle, C.J., and Willes and Keating, JJ. The second exception is in the case of deck cargo. The reason why relief by general contribution is denied to the owners of goods stowed on deck, when these are thrown overboard in order to save the cargo under hatches, is obvious. According to the rules of maritime law, the placing of goods upon the deck of a sea-going ship is improper stowage, because they are hindrances to the safe navigation of the vessel; and their jettison is therefore regarded, in a question with the other shippers of cargo, as a justifiable riddance of incumbrances which ought never to have been there, and not as a sacrifice for the common safety. But the owner of deck goods jettisoned, though not entitled to general contribution, may nevertheless have a good claim for indemnity against the master and owners who received his goods for carriage upon deck; and the exception does not apply, either (1) in those cases where, according to the established custom of navigation, such cargoes are permitted, or (2) in any case where the other owners of cargo have consented that the goods jettisoned should be carried on the deck of the ship.

It appears from the proceedings in this suit that the average claims at the instance of cargo owners exceed $30,000, and that there is a small claim on account of ship. The fault of the master being matter of admission, it seems clear, upon authority, that no contribution can be recovered by the owners of the Abington unless the conditions ordinarily existing between parties standing in that relation have been varied by special contract between them and their shippers. But the negligent navigation of the master cannot, in the opinion of their Lordships, afford any pretext for depriving those shippers whose goods were jettisoned of their claim to a general contribution. They were not privy to the master's fault, and were under no duty, legal or moral, to make a gratuitous sacrifice of their goods, for the sake of others, in order to avert the consequences of his fault. The Rhodian law, which in that respect is the law of England, bases the right of contribution not upon the causes of the danger to the ship and cargo, but upon its actual presence; and such exceptions as that recognised in Schloss v. Heriot are in truth limitations on the rules, which have been introduced, from equitable considerations, in the case of actual wrongdoers, or of those who are legally responsible for them. The owners of goods thrown overboard having been innocent of exposing the Abington and her cargo to the sea peril which necessitated jettison, their equitable claim to be indemnified for the loss of their goods is just as strong as if the peril had been wholly due to the action of the winds and waves. In support of the legal proposition which they induced the learned Recorder to accept, the respondents relied upon a passage which is to be found in the original text of Lord Tenterden's work on Shipping (edit. 1881, p. 499). It is in these terms: "The goods must be thrown overboard for the sake of all, not because the ship is too heavily laden to prosecute an ordinary course through a tranquil sea, which would be the fault of those who had shipped or received the goods, but because at a moment of distress and danger their weight, or their presence, prevents the extraordinary exertions required for the general safety." It appears to their Lordships that, if Lord Tenterden had really meant to lay down the rule that there can be no contribution for jettison in the case of a ship overladen through the fault of those who received and put her cargo on board, he would have done so in plain terms. What he does say is, that there can be no proper jettison from an overladen ship so long as ship and cargo are exposed to no peril whatever from the action of the sea, but are merely exposed to the inconvenience of being unable to reach their destination in the ordinary course of time. The authority upon which the respondents placed their chief reliance was that of Mr. Parsons, who, in his treatise on the Law of Insurance (vol. 2., p. 285), and also in his Law of Shipping (vol. 1, p. 211), states that "when a jettison is justified by the circumstances in which it takes place, and these circumstances are occasioned by the fault of the master, or his want of care or skill, the jettison would give no claim for contribution; but the owners of the ship would be liable to the owners of the goods jettisoned for the damages caused by the wrongdoing of the master." In both works, the proposition is laid down in precisely the same terms, and the same cases are referred to. These treatises are justly regarded as of great authority in questions of maritime law; but their Lordships are constrained to say that, in their opinion, the text above cited is inaccurate, in so far as it bears that no claim of contribution will arise to the owners of jettisoned cargo in the case supposed, and is unsupported by the decisions upon which it is founded, which, all of them, relate to one or other of the exceptions already noticed.

Upon the question of legal tender, their Lordships are unable to concur in the opinion expressed by the learned Recorder. The correspondence which passed, before the deposit was paid, appears to them to show that both of the parties were exceedingly unaccommodating, and somewhat unreasonable, and that neither of them was altogether in the right. Their Lordships, even if it had been desirable to decide the second point urged for the appellants, are not in a position to do so, because there is no proof and no admission to the effect that, as alleged by them in argument, all the bills of lading for goods shipped in the Abington contained the same exception with those produced, of the master's act, neglect, or default in navigating the ship. But this is not a suit for recovery of contribution; and the appellants, if it be necessary, will not be precluded from substantiating their averments in the adjustment of average claims. The result is, that their Lordships will humbly advise Her Majesty to reverse the judgment appealed from, and to dismiss the respondent's action, with costs in the court below. The respondents must also pay the costs of this appeal.

COURT OF APPEAL.

Tuesday, July 30, 1889.

THE CANADA SHIPPING COMPANY LIMITED v. THE BRITISH SHIPOWNERS MUTUAL PROTECTION ASSOCIATION LIMITED. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION.

Marine insurance—Mutual insurance association—Rules—Damage to cargo—"Improper navigation."

Under the rules of the defendants, a mutual insurance association, the plaintiffs were entitled to protection in respect of damage to goods on board their ship if "caused by the improper navigation" of the ship. A cargo of wheat in the hold of the vessel was damaged during a voyage through the ceiling of the ship and the dunnage being saturated with creosote which had leaked from casks which formed part of the cargo on the outward voyage.

Held (affirming the decision of Charles, J., 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 388; 22 Q. B. Div. 727; 60 L. T. Rep. N. S. 863), that the damage was not caused by the improper navigation of the ship.

THIS was an appeal from a decision of Charles, J., reported 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 388; 60 L. T. Rep. N. S. 863, where the facts are fully stated. The point in issue was shortly this: whether the plaintiffs, owners of a ship insured with the defendant association, were entitled to compensation for damage to a cargo of wheat which was caused by the dunnage and the ceiling and timber boards of the vessel being tainted with creosote which had leaked from some casks of patent coating composition which had formed part of the cargo carried on the outward voyage. The rule of the defendant association, under which the plaintiff claimed, gave protection when the "loss or damage has been caused by the improper navigation" of the ship. There was also a rule, No. 12, that no member should have any claim under the rules where the damage had been "caused by improper stowage."

Charles, J. gave judgment for the defendants.

The plaintiffs appealed.

Barnes, Q.C., and Carver, for the plaintiffs, admitted that no question arose under rule 12, if the point as to improper navigation was decided against them. This case is governed by

> Carmichael and Co. v. Liverpool Sailing Ship Owners Mutual Indemnity Association, 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 130; 57 L. Rep. N. S. 550; 19 Q. B. Div. 242, in which an unnatural meaning has been given to "navigation," and applying the meaning there given to the word "navigation" in this rule the plaintiffs are entitled to indemnity for their loss. The safe sailing of the ship in that case was not affected any more than it was in this. They also cited

> Stanton v. Richardson, 30 L. T. Rep. N. S. 643; 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 23; L. Rep. 9 C. P. 390;
> Good v. London Steamship Owners, L. Rep. 6 C. P. 563.

Cohen, Q.C. and Joseph Walton for the defendants.

Lord Esher, M.R.—I do not agree that in Carmichael v. Liverpool Sailing Ship Owners Mutual Indemnity Association (ubi sup.) the court held that "navigation" was there used in anything but the ordinary sense of the word; if the court had held so, the decision would be a very bad one. In that case the court was merely paraphrasing the ordinary meaning of the word "navigation," and I think that not only was that case rightly decided, but also that the phraseology made use of in it was unusually accurate and explanatory. At page 248 of the report of Carmichael's case, in Law Reports (19 Q. B. Div.) I used these words: "If there be negligence before the navigation of the ship commences—negligence of the owner or his servants—which has the effect of causing the ship to be unsafely navigated during the navigation with regard to the safety of the goods, that makes the navigation under those circumstances improper navigation by the shipowner or those for whom he is liable. Here there was negligence before navigation commenced. I purposely say navigation instead of voyage, because there might be navigation without any voyage at all. Here the negligence commenced before the navigation of the ship commenced, but it was the negligence of the shipowner and of those for whom he was responsible, and it had the effect that it rendered it impossible, unless the matter was found out and put right, to navigate that ship, after her navigation had begun, safely with regard to the safety of the goods." That is not exhaustive, but I think it is a right definition with regard to a ship carrying a cargo. Well, if that is the meaning of "navigation," can it be said that the case now before us comes within it? I think it cannot. Here the ship, as to her sailing with regard to the safety of the goods, was in perfect order. The whole mischief happened from what was wholly inside her, and it would not affect her sailing. I am of opinion that Charles, J. was right in his construing of this policy, and for the reasons he gave. Having given this decision on the meaning of "improper navigation," there is no occasion to consider the meaning of "improper stowage" in rule 12.

Lindley, L.J.—If the rules are construed literally, it is impossible to say that a ship smelling of creosote was "improper navigation;" she might be unfitted by it for some cargoes perhaps, but not all. Carmichael's case (ubi sup.) was, in my opinion, quite rightly decided, but it is a different case to this.

Bowen, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. I should have thought it quite clear that loss or damage cannot be caused by "improper navigation" unless caused by navigation, and navigation means the sailing of the ship. It has been contended that the decision in Carmichael's case was to the effect that that which was not damage caused by navigation was damage caused by improper navigation. If this was the meaning of the decision, it was a wrong one; but I think it was correctly decided, and that the language of the Master of the Rolls was absolutely correct. The language used by the other members of the court is possibly capable of misconstruction by not taking into consideration the facts and the current of thought running through the arguments. That case really decides this, that navigation is not less improper because its badness is caused by something which happened before the voyage commenced.

Appeal dismissed.

Re The Missouri Steamship Company Limited; Monroe's Claim. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE CHANCERY DIVISION.

Contract of affreightment — Conflict of laws — Charter-party—Bill of lading—Special exemption.

A claim was made by an American citizen in the winding-up of a British steamship company for damages for the loss of his cattle arising through the negligence of the master and crew. The ship in which the cattle were carried was a British ship trading between Boston and Liverpool. The charter-party contained express stipulations exempting the company from liability for loss caused by the negligence of the master and crew. The cattle were shipped at Boston, and bills of lading were given there, in conformity with the contract. The ship stranded on the coast of North Wales owing, as was admitted, to the negligence of the master and crew. According to the law of the United States the stipulations exempting the owners from liability through negligent navigation were void; but according to English law such stipulations were good, and were usually inserted in English bills of lading.

Held, that from the special provisions of the contract itself it appeared that the parties were contracting with a view to the law of England, and that, consequently, the shipowner was exempt.

Decision of Chitty, J. (58 L. T. Rep. N. S. 377; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 264) affirmed.

(a) Reported by W. C. Biss, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The Missouri Steamship Company was a limited company registered in England, and owned the steamship Missouri, which was one of a line of steamers trading between United States ports and Liverpool, known as the "Warren Line."

The managers of the line were George Warren and Co. Their agents in America were Warren and Co., who did the business of the steamers there.

The s.s. Missouri was registered at the Custom house at Liverpool, and sailed under the British flag.

On the 4th Jan. 1883 a contract was entered into between Albert N. Monroe, of Boston, a citizen of the United States of America, and Warren and Co., on behalf of the company, for the carriage by the s.s. Missouri of 400 sheep from Boston to Liverpool. The contract was signed at Boston, and contained the following clause:

When the animals are shipped bills of lading will be issued for them, and said bills of lading will contain stipulations to the following effect, to which the shipper hereby agrees, viz.: Ship not accountable for the acts of God, the Queen's enemies, pirates, robbers, or thieves, barratry of master, or mariners, restraints of princes, rulers, or people, loss or damage, mortality or injury resulting from any of the following perils, whether arising from the negligence, default, or error in judgment of the master, mariners, engineers, or others of the crew or otherwise howsoever—namely, accidents to fittings, disease, stress of weather, want of space, air, or water, accidents to condensing apparatus, tanks, or machinery, diminishing or injuring the supply of water or air, risk of craft, explosion, or fire, in port or at sea, in craft or on shore, before lading or after unlading, accidents from steam machinery or boilers, or any damage or injury thereto, however caused, nor for collision, stranding, or any other accident or peril of the seas, rivers, and steam navigation, of whatever nature or kind soever, howsoever such collision, stranding, or other accident or peril may be caused. Liberty is reserved to the ship, her agents, officers, and owners, in the event of the said ship's putting back to Boston, or into any port, or otherwise being prevented from any cause from proceeding in the ordinary course of her voyage, to tranship the animals by any other steamer, and liberty is also reserved to sail with or without pilots, to call at any intermediate port or ports, and to tow and assist vessels in all situations.

The contract was a printed one. The form of it was prepared in England, and had been in use by the s.s. Missouri, and other steamships of the Warren line, for a number of years prior to 1883. It was the only form of contract adopted by the Warren line in carrying cattle.

The bills of lading for the 400 sheep shipped by A. N. Monroe on board the s.s. Missouri at Boston to be carried to Liverpool was signed on the 7th March 1883, and it contained the clause as to exceptions mentioned in the contract and set out above.

On the 8th March 1883 the s.s. Missouri sailed from Boston, and whilst on her voyage to Liverpool rendered certain salvage services.

Owing to the deviation and consequent delay caused by so doing, the sheep were exposed to much additional wear and tear and knocking about upon the voyage, and in consequence eleven sheep died and the remainder were seriously damaged and reduced in value.

On the 6th Feb. a contract was made between J. A. Hathaway, who was an American citizen resident at Boston, and Warren and Co., on behalf of the company, for the carriage by the s.s. Missouri of cattle from Boston to Liverpool. The contract was exactly similar in form to the previous one.

A part of the space taken under such contract was sublet to Mr. A. N. Monroe, and an indorsement to that effect was made on the contract.

Under that contract A. N. Monroe, on the 17th Feb. 1886, shipped 264 fat cattle on board the s.s. Missouri at Boston to be carried to Liverpool. The bills of lading for the cattle were signed on the 17th Feb. 1886, and were exactly similar in form to the previous bills of lading.

The s.s. Missouri sailed from Boston on the 17th Feb. 1886, and in course of her voyage ran ashore on the coast of North Wales and became a total wreck. All the cattle went into the sea and were lost in consequence of such stranding. A Board of Trade inquiry was afterwards held at Liverpool to inquire into the cause of the stranding. The court found that it was due to negligent and careless navigation on the part of those on board and in charge of the vessel on behalf of her owners.

The company then went into voluntary liquidation, and the usual advertisements for claims were issued. The only one sent in was that of A. N. Monroe, who claimed 6751*l.* 17*s.* 3*d.* damages for the loss and deterioration of the sheep and the loss of the cattle. He alleged that the damage to the sheep was "caused by those in charge of the said steamship on behalf of the said company by wrongfully and in breach of the said contract deviating from and delaying upon the said voyage, and exposing the said sheep to improper hardships and risks," and that "the cattle were destroyed by those in charge of the said steamship on behalf of the said company by wrongfully navigating the said steamship in a negligent and reckless manner."

A summons, under sect. 138 of the Companies Act 1862, was taken out, on behalf of the liquidators, asking that it might be determined whether the claim against the company by A. N. Monroe ought, or ought not, to be allowed by the liquidators.

The summons was heard by Chitty, J., and in support of Mr. Monroe's claim an affidavit was produced, made by an attorney of Boston, stating that, according to the law of the United States, the company was liable to A. N. Monroe for the claim which he had put forward. The reason for his opinion was stated to be that, according to decided cases in American law, a common carrier could not lawfully stipulate by special contract for exemption from responsibility for the negligence of the carrier, or his servants.

The liquidators, on the other hand, obtained affidavits from attorneys at New York giving a résumé of the American decisions bearing on the point; also affidavits from several other attorneys in America. The result of them appeared to be that the American law applicable to the circumstances of the present case had never been finally settled; but that the point was being raised in the case of The Montana, which was at present under appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States.

The liquidators' answer to A. N. Monroe's claim was, that it should be decided according to English law, and not according to the law of the United States; and that, according to the former law, the claimant would be bound by the terms of the contracts and bills of lading, by which the owners of the s.s. Missouri had liberty to tow vessels and were exempted from the consequences of the negligence of their servants.

Chitty, J. held that the stipulations in the bill of lading were valid (1) because the contract was governed by the law of the flag, and (2) because from the contract itself it appeared that the parties were contracting with a view to the law of England.

From this decision Mr. Monroe appealed.

The appeal came on for hearing on the 20th June 1888, but was ordered to stand over until the judgment of the Supreme Court of the United States in the Montana case was delivered.

On the 5th March 1889 that court affirmed the decrees of the circuit court, and held that such stipulations excepting the shipowner from liability were "unreasonable, contrary to public policy, and therefore void."

The appeal of Mr. Monroe now came on for hearing.

Lord Halsbury, L.C.—In this case, from the peculiar mode in which the question arises, and from the fact that there are no pleadings, but simply a claim fortified by an affidavit, the question has been somewhat obscured by reason of the absence of definiteness which such a form of procedure necessarily involves. But in substance it is an action on a contract entered into between certain persons. I say "persons" advisedly, though one of them is an incorporated company. The question is, whether upon familiar principles a contract entered into at Boston, in the United States, for the carriage of cattle to England, and subject to certain stipulations, is one that, when the English courts are applied to, will be enforced according to the law of England or whether the English courts will decline to enforce it, because, if the question had arisen in the United States, the courts of the United States would have declined to give effect to one of the stipulations in the contract. I confess I have been somewhat surprised at the lengthy elaboration of principles which I should have thought by this time had been so far accepted as part of the English law that it was not necessary to enter into so elaborate a consideration of them. That one country will under some circumstances enforce contracts made in another, is a proposition I should have thought not requiring authority; and it lies at the foundation of the whole of this argument that when a contract is made between two persons in one country to be performed in another, one of the considerations which according to all writers is to be regarded is, what the contract itself contemplated as the law which was to regulate the contract. Sir Walter Phillimore's argument pushed to its extremity appears to me to come to this—that no such question ever ought to have arisen, and that each country should have refused to enforce a contract made in another country unless the laws of both countries were identical. For a proposition so absurd in its terms Sir Walter Phillimore of course would not contend. It seems to me that it is impossible to approach this question without recognising the fact that there may be stipulations which one country will enforce and which another country will not enforce, and that, in order to determine whether they are enforceable or not, you must have regard to the law of the contract, by which I mean the law which the contract itself imports is to be the law governing the contract. I put aside, as Sir Walter Phillimore candidly put aside, questions in which the positive law of the country forbids certain contracts to be made. Where a contract is void on the ground of immorality, or is contrary to such positive law as would prohibit the making of such a contract at all, then the contract would be void all over the world, and no civilised country would enforce it. But Sir Walter Phillimore does not contend that the contract now in dispute is a contract coming within that category.

But, assuming for the moment that the law which the parties contemplated as the law of the contract is one which can prevail (and for that not only is there a very considerable body of English authority, but the judgment in the Montana case, which is invoked here as the judgment to which we are to bow, recognises the fact that the validity of this contract may be affected by the intention of the parties as seen through the contract, as to whether it is to be governed by the English law or not), it would seem that the only question to be determined is what was the law which the parties contemplated as being the law governing this contract. Now, this is a contract for the conveyance of cattle from Boston to England by sea on board a British ship, by a British company, whose domicile is in England. Those circumstances, though very strong, perhaps would not be conclusive. But when I look at the contract itself, and find the ordinary exceptions to the bill of lading are the "Queen's enemies," and so on, it is absolutely impossible to resist the conclusion that the parties did contemplate being governed by English law in their contractual relations. If I am to assume that the law of the United States is, that this particular stipulation now in dispute is of no validity in the United States, and cannot be enforced: when I find that both the parties to the contract make this stipulation a part of the contract into which they enter—that stipulation being valid and capable of being enforced in England, and invalid and incapable of being enforced in the United States—it seems to me to follow irresistibly that the contractual relations into which the parties entered were such that they intended them to be governed and regulated by English law; and if that is so, the question is free from doubt. I do not propose to enter into the question whether or not the judgment of the American court in the Montana case is in all respects satisfactory. It is enough for me to say, that whatever be the American law, assuming always that it is outside the category to which I have before referred, the law which the parties have elected as the law of their contract makes this stipulation valid. It is not necessary to advert to the principle that the plaintiff here is endeavouring to enforce a contract in this country, and seeking to enforce in this country the jurisprudence of another country by which the parties did not intend to be bound, and to have recognised in the courts of this country a system of jurisprudence different from its own. I confess I have not been able during the very long and elaborate argument of this case to entertain the least doubt on the question which has been the subject of so much discussion. I am of opinion the judgment of Chitty, J. ought to be affirmed, and the appeal dismissed with costs.

COTTON, L.J.—I entirely agree, and I should hardly have added anything to what the Lord Chancellor has said, but for the fact that the case has been discussed on behalf of the appellant with great learning and elaboration, and at great length. This is a claim made against this company for loss of cattle which were shipped in the United States under and in consequence of a contract entered into between the shipper and a steamship company, which company is now being wound-up. That contract contained a clause which, if it is to be relied on and can be relied on, exempts the company from all liability in respect of the loss for which the appellant claims. It has been decided by English law, for reasons which I think are satisfactory, that such a stipulation is good, and exempts the company from liability in a case like this. Then, what is relied on in contradiction to this? The American law. We have to consider, first of all, what law is to be considered in dealing with this contract. A vast number of cases were referred to by the appellant to show that here we could not rely on any law except the law of America, or, rather, of the place, Boston, where this contract was entered into. In my opinion, that is not what the American judgment in the Montana case, which has been referred to, nor what the cases which we ought to consider authorities—namely, English decisions—have laid down. What they have laid down is this, that primâ facie the law of the country where the contract is made will govern the contract, decide what its incidents are, decide what its true construction is and its validity, but that the court must look at the circumstances of the case, and from various circumstances may come to the conclusion that the contract is to be governed by the law of some other country; and all the cases come to this, that you cannot lay down any distinct, positive rule what will be the governing circumstance, but you must consider, having regard to the nature of the contract entered into and the other circumstances of the case, what law is this contract to be considered as being governed by. I will not repeat what the Lord Chancellor has said as to the reasons for the opinion we have formed that this contract must be considered as one to be dealt with according to the law of England.

That being so, the only question is this, whether there is anything in the American law which prevents us giving effect to this contract as it stands. The case referred to was the case of The Montana—a decision of the Supreme Court of America; and that decision comes to this, not that the contract is void, but that this particular clause in the contract is one which they consider contrary to public policy, and they will disregard it when they enforce the contract; that is to say, they will enforce the contract without giving any effect to the clause, which in this case, if the clause had been valid, would have protected the company from liability. That, I think, is very clear from various passages in the judgment. In one place in that judgment the court says: "We are then brought to the consideration of the principal question in the case—namely, the validity and effect of that clause in each bill of lading by which the appellant undertook to exempt himself from all responsibility for loss or damage by perils of the sea arising from negligence of the master and crew of the ship." That is the only question they consider, and they come ultimately to the conclusion that it is contrary to public policy that that stipulation should be enforced, and they say in winding-up that part of the case: "This review of the principal cases demonstrates that, according to the great preponderance, if not the uniform concurrence, of authority, the general rule that the nature, the obligation, and the interpretation of a contract are to be governed by the law of the country where it is made, unless the parties at the time of making it have some other law in view, requires a contract of affreightment made in one country between citizens or residents thereof, and the performance of which begins there, to be governed by the law of that country, unless the parties when entering into the contract clearly manifest a mutual intention that it shall be governed by the law of some other country." There is evidence here to show that the appellant intended to enter into the contract in this form, and intended to take advantage of what he knew was the American law that this stipulation would be disregarded. I must say, with great respect to the American courts, that I doubt whether public policy would justify the non-recognition of this clause in favour of the person who was guilty of dishonesty, according to his own statement, by intending to take the benefit of this contract, but, if the question of this clause and its validity arose, intended to take advantage of the American law in order to defeat the rights of the person with whom he contracted. I refer to this simply as showing that what they are considering is this, that this clause was contrary to public policy, not that there was anything in the law of the United States which would prohibit a carrier from entering into such contracts, or make it a criminal offence to do so, but simply that it was contrary to public policy, the result of which would be that the American courts would not enforce it. As the Lord Chancellor has said, I do not enter into the question what will be the result where parties have made in America a contract which they intend to be governed by English law, when, according to the American law, such a contract would be itself illegal. In my opinion, no such question arises here. The result of the decision in the Montana case is simply this, that for the purposes of public policy adopted in the United States they consider that this clause ought not to be enforced. In my opinion, we are not bound when a contract is entered into with reference to English law to abstain from acting on that contract simply because in the case I have mentioned the American courts, when the contract was entered into in the United States, would not enforce it, considering, though we do not so consider, that the course they take is in accordance with public policy. I may state that, in my opinion, that judgment, as regards the rejection of this clause because it is contrary to public policy, does not apply to a contract where the court comes to the conclusion as a matter of fact that the law to be applied, and which the parties must be considered to have known would be applied, is the law not of the United States but of another country. In my opinion, the judgment of Chitty, J. was right, and the appeal fails.

Fry, L.J.—The principles on which this case has to be decided have been familiar to the courts at any rate since the time of Lord Mansfield, who, in the case of Robinson v. Bland (ubi sup.), expounded those principles of law, and they have been clearly stated since in many cases, among others in the well-known case of Lloyd v. Guibert, where the learned judge who delivered the judgment of the Exchequer Chamber said (13 L. T. Rep. N. S. 604; L. Rep. 1 Q. B. 122): "It is, however, generally agreed that the law of the place where the contract is made is primâ facie that which the parties intended, or ought to be presumed to have adopted as the footing upon which they dealt, and that such law ought therefore to prevail in the absence of circumstances indicating a different intention, as for instance"—and he goes on to enumerate instances from which the courts have gleaned a different intention. That view of the law was fully adopted in the case of Jacobs v. The Crédit Lyonnais (ubi sup.) in this court. I think, therefore, the general principle on which we have to proceed is one which admits of no doubt, and the inquiry, therefore, is this: Looking at the subject-matter of this contract, the place where it was made, the contracting parties and the things to be done, what ought to be presumed to have been the intention of the contracting parties, with regard to the law which was to govern this contract? By that I mean, to determine its validity and its interpretation. Now, in the first place, the ship was an English ship; the owner was an English company; England was the place to which the goods were to be brought, and the place at which the final completion of the contract was to take place; and, what is still more important, the forms of the contract and the bill of lading were English forms. According to the law of England, the contract would be good in the terms in which it stood; whereas, according to the law of the United States, the important terms of the contract would be excluded from it. That is, to my mind, a very cogent consideration to show that what must be presumed to have been the intention of the parties was this, that the law which would make the contract valid in all particulars was the law to regulate the conduct of the parties. Looking at all the circumstances of the case, I have no doubt as to the conclusion we ought to arrive at as to the presumption of the intention.

In coming to that conclusion, and in stating those principles, I am glad to find I am in entire accordance with the law laid down in the American courts. It appears to me the passages cited from Story, J. are strong in favour of the principle to which I have referred, and in the case of The Montana that rule was adopted in express terms by the Supreme Court of the United States. Cotton, L.J. has read one passage from that judgment, and I will read another: "This court has not heretofore had occasion to consider by what law contracts like those now before us should be expounded. But it has often affirmed and acted on the general rule that contracts are to be governed, as to their nature, their validity, and their interpretation, by the law of the place where they were made, unless the contracting parties clearly appear to have had some other law in view;" and in that very case, in accordance with the principle so laid down, the Supreme Court proceeded to inquire whether there were any circumstances from which they ought to presume any other law than that of the place of making the contract was contemplated by the parties. Therefore it is obvious, in adopting the principles which I have stated, we are proceeding not only according to the English law, but also according to the law of America; and it is very desirable, if possible, the law relating to the interchange of comity between nations should be the same. There was only one other argument put forward to which I need refer, and it seemed to me to be a little halting between two statements. Sir Walter Phillimore laid down a proposition to this effect, that whenever the law of the place where the contract is made prohibits a particular stipulation in a contract, no other country can treat that stipulation as valid. If by the word "prohibit" he means that the law of the United States has in terms prohibited this stipulation, or has rendered illegal or criminal the introduction of the stipulation, it appears to me the decision in The Montana shows that that is not the law of the United States. That decision I think, when fairly read, shows what one would expect to be the case, namely—that the courts have held that the stipulation which is obnoxious to their public policy is void, not illegal; exactly in the same way as in this country we hold that stipulations which are in restraint of trade are not illegal, and the entering into them does not constitute an illegal conspiracy, but they are void. If, on the other hand, it be argued that where the law of the place of the contract refuses to enforce a stipulation then no other country will enforce that stipulation, we have a proposition which, on the face of it, appears to me to be untenable. Therefore, whichever is the alternative of the proposition which Sir Walter Phillimore adopts, neither of them will support his case. I think, therefore, the decision of Chitty, J. was correct, and that this appeal fails.

QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION.

April 4, May 24, and July 1, 1889.

(Before CAVE, J.)

THE RESTITUTION STEAMSHIP COMPANY v. SIR JOHN PIRIE AND CO. (a)

Charter-party — Colliery guarantee — Incorporation — Construction — Demurrage — Detention in the nature of demurrage—Cesser clause—Clean bill of lading.

A "cesser clause" in a charter-party applies not merely to liability for demurrage, but to liability incurred through detention in the nature of demurrage.

A clean bill of lading is a bill of lading which contains nothing in the margin qualifying the words in the bill of lading itself.

It was agreed by charter-party between the plaintiffs, the owners of a steamship, and the defendants, the charterers, that the ship should proceed to C. and there "load in the usual and customary manner a cargo of coals," and proceed to T. "The vessel to be loaded as customary, but subject in all respects to the colliery guarantee, in 108 colliery working hours." The cargo was to be unloaded at a specified rate per day, "or charterers to pay demurrage at the rate of 30s. per hour." The master was to sign "clean bills of lading without alteration as presented by charterers." "The charterers' liability under this charter-party to cease on the cargo being loaded and the advance freight paid, the owners having a lien on the cargo for the balance of the freight and demurrage."

By a colliery guarantee, the proprietors of a colliery undertook to load the ship for the defendants in 108 hours. "Demurrage, if any, to be at the rate of 20s. per hour." The vessel was not loaded in 108 colliery working hours.

In an action brought by the plaintiffs against the defendants for damages for demurrage, or in the alternative for detaining the vessel an unreasonable time at the port of loading:

Held, that the defendants were not liable, as the "cesser clause" in the charter-party covered the claim made by the plaintiffs.

Semble, that the owners of the ship have no right of action against the charterers under the colliery guarantee unless the guarantee is incorporated with the charter-party; but that the right of action under such guarantee, if the shipowners have any such right at all, would be against the colliery proprietors.

THIS was an action to recover damages for demurrage, and for detention of a ship at the port of loading.

By a charter-party it was mutually agreed between the plaintiffs, who were the owners of a steamship called the Restitution, and the defendants, the charterers of the ship, that the ship should proceed to Cardiff, and "there load in the usual and customary manner" a cargo of coals, which the charterers bound themselves to ship and proceed with to Singapore. An advance freight was to be paid "eight days from final sailing from the last port in the United Kingdom and from the date of masters' signing clean bills of lading without alteration as presented by charterers," and the remainder on delivery.

The vessel to be loaded as customary, but subject in all respects to the colliery guarantee, in 108 colliery working hours. The cargo to be unloaded at the average rate of not less than 200 tons per working day, . . or charterers to pay demurrage at the rate of 30*s* er hour. The charterers' liability under this charter-p ty to cease on the cargo being loaded and the adva ce freight paid, the owners having a lien on the cargo for the balance of the freight and demurrage.

By a colliery guarantee the proprietors of a colliery undertook to load the ship for the defendants subject to the following condition:

The said steamer shall load in Roath Basin, Cardiff, and after being completely discharged and unballasted, and written notice thereof given to us within our usual office hours, we shall be allowed, for shipping a cargo of Ferndale steam coal, to be received by the vessel at the usual tip or tips, 108 hours, during which she shall be available and ready for loading. Demurrage, if any, to be at the rate of 20*s*. per hour.

The vessel was not loaded within the stipulated time, and the plaintiffs now brought an action against the defendants for demurrage, or in the alternative for damages for detaining the vessel for an unreasonable time at the port of loading.

Clement Higgins, Q.C. and Benson for the plaintiffs.—We are entitled to sue the defendants either under the charter-party or the colliery guarantee. They are distinct contracts, and are not incorporated with each other:

The Zeus, 59 L. T. Rep. N. S. 344; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 312; 13 P. Div. 188.

With regard to the loading the colliery guarantee is the dominant contract, and, if necessary, will override the provisions of the charter-party:

Gullischen v. Stewart Brothers, 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 200; 50 L. T. Rep. N. S. 47; 11 Q. B. Div. 186.

That being so, if we elect to claim under the guarantee, the cesser clause in the charter-party does not affect the unqualified agreement to pay demurrage in the guarantee. The contract of the plaintiffs under the guarantee was with the defendants as principals, and not with the colliery proprietors, who were only acting as agents to load on behalf of the defendants. But if it is said that our claim is under the charter-party, the "cesser clause" is none the less inoperative. The charter-party contains no provision for demurrage or delay at the port of loading, and therefore, if we are under the charter-party, our claim resolves itself into one for detention in the nature of demurrage, to which the cesser clause has no application:

Lockhart v. Falk, 33 L. T. Rep. N. S. 96; 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 8; L. Rep. 10 Ex. 132.

Again, under the particular circumstances of this case, the cesser clause could not apply. The charterers' liability under the charter-party is personal, and only ceases when the lien arises.

(a) Reported by R. M. MINTON-SENHOUSE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

This liability is by the terms of the charter-party on the cargo being loaded, and the advance freight paid, and clean bills of lading signed. Now, clean bills of lading means bills of lading whereby the consignee is to receive the entire consignment free from any deduction, e.g., demurrage; and, if it is held that this charter-party provides for payment of demurrage at the port of loading, no clean bills of lading were signed, and therefore our lien never arose. The lien not having arisen the cesser clause is inoperative, and is no defence to the action.

Abel Thomas for the defendants.—These two instruments must either be read together, or treated separately. If the plaintiffs are suing under the colliery guarantee as distinct from the charter-party, then we say that the plaintiffs were not parties to the guarantee, and cannot sue us under it. And if they are incorporated, then the cesser clause bars the plaintiffs' claim. It has been held that a cesser clause applies not only to demurrage itself, but to detention in the nature of demurrage:

Sanguinetti v. Pacific Steam Navigation Company, 35 L. T. Rep. N. S. 658; 2 Q. B. Div. 238; 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 300;
Harris v. Jacobs, 15 Q. B. Div. 247;
Kish v. Cory, 2 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 593; 32 L. T. Rep. N. S. 670; L. Rep. 10 Q. B. 553;
Nelson v. Dahl, 41 L. T. Rep. N. S. 365; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 392; 12 Ch. Div. 568; 6 App. Cas. 38.

[Cave, J.—What is the meaning of a "clean bill of lading?"] It means that the consignment is to be delivered in bulk and condition as described in the bill of lading.

Clement Higgins, Q.C. in reply.—The meaning we have assigned to clean bills of lading is correct, and is recognised among shippers. If it were not so, bills of lading would cease to be negotiable, because no one would take a bill of lading subject to unknown deductions. It is submitted that the language used in Kish v. Cory (ubi sup.) with reference to the applicability of a cesser clause to detention in the nature of demurrage only amounts to dicta, and that the decision in Lockhart v. Falk (ubi sup.) is good law.

Cave, J.—This was an action by which the plaintiffs sought to obtain from the defendants damages for the detention of the ship Restitution at Cardiff. The Restitution came to Cardiff under a charter-party which was entered into on the 28th April 1887, and which provided that the ship, after being in a loading berth as ordered, wholly unballasted and ready to load, subject to warranty, shall there load in the usual and customary manner a full and complete cargo of Ferndale steam coals as ordered by charterers; and then it goes on in another part of the charter-party to say, "The vessel to be loaded as customary, but subject in all respects to the colliery guarantee in (blank) colliery working hours." Now the colliery guarantee purported to be signed by D. Davis and Sons, proprietors of the Ferndale Colliery, and they thereby undertook to load the Restitution with a cargo of the above coal for Messrs. Pirie and Co., on terms arranged between them subject to the following conditions: "The steamer shall load in Roath Basin, in Cardiff, and after being completely discharged or unballasted, and written notice thereof given to us within our usual office hours, we shall be allowed, for shipping a cargo of Ferndale steam coal, to be received by the vessel at the usual tip or tips, 108 hours, during which she shall be available and ready for loading." I need not read the part as to the days which are not to count. "Demurrage, if any, to be at the rate of 20*s.* per hour." The charter-party then contains a clause to this effect: "The charterers' liability under this charter-party to cease on the cargo being loaded and the advance freight paid, the owners having a lien on the cargo for the balance of the freight and demurrage." Now, that being so, it was contended on behalf of the defendants that their liability upon the charter-party was disposed of and discharged by the cesser clause, it being admitted that a cargo was loaded and the advance freight paid under the charter-party. On the part of the plaintiffs it was contended that their claim was not under the charter-party, but under the colliery guarantee, a claim which it was extremely difficult to understand. It is said that my brother Field has held that the colliery guarantee is a distinct contract from the charter-party, and I see no ground to suppose that that is incorrect, although no case was actually produced. The charter-party is a contract entered into between the Restitution Steamship Company and Sir John Pirie and Co., that is to say, between the plaintiffs and defendants. The colliery guarantee, taken by itself, purports to be signed by Davis and Sons, and appears to be a sort of general undertaking, which by the custom of the trade no doubt the owners of the steamship Restitution would be entitled to take advantage of. But then, if the owners of the steamship Restitution sue upon the colliery guarantee alone, they must sue Davis and Sons. They cannot sue Sir John Pirie on the colliery guarantee unless the colliery guarantee is introduced into and made part of the charter-party. Moreover it is very difficult to see that the detention in question was any breach of the colliery guarantee. It is not necessary, however, to enter into that question, because, whether it was a breach of the language of the colliery guarantee, or whether it was a breach of the charter-party, the defendants in this action could only be made liable under the colliery guarantee as forming part of the charter-party. Therefore, under those circumstances, primâ facie the case would come within the cesser clause.

There was, however, another point taken with reference to the cesser clause, which is somewhat difficult to reconcile with the point taken about the colliery guarantee. That, however, is not very material; a party may be entitled to succeed upon one ground, although it is adverse to the contention which has formed the main basis of his argument. What was said was this. It was said: Take it that the claim is under the charter-party, and not under the colliery guarantee as introduced into the charter-party. There is nothing fixed with regard to demurrage or delay in loading except the 20*s.* per hour fixed in the colliery guarantee, and that consequently cannot extend beyond a breach of the guarantee, and if there is a breach of the charter-party, there is no demurrage fixed for that; and consequently the only right would be to recover for detention in the nature of demurrage. And the cesser clause applies to demurrage only, and not to detention in the nature of demurrage. I think, however, after the decisions which have taken place upon this point, that contention cannot be successfully maintained. There are several cases in which the question has arisen, although I do not exactly know that it has ever been actually disposed of. In Kish v. Cory (ubi sup.), for instance, before the Court of Exchequer Chamber, a very strong opinion was expressed by one or two of the members of the court, and particularly by Brett, J., as he then was, that the charterer on loading was discharged from liability for demurrage at the port of loading under such a cesser clause as this, and that he is so discharged, whether the claim is in respect of demurrage properly so called, or in respect of damages for detention. So again in Sanguinetti v. Pacific Steam Navigation Company (ubi sup.) the present Master of the Rolls again expressed his opinion that the word demurrage has a very elastic meaning, and extended not only to demurrage properly so called, but also to damages for detention in the nature of demurrage; and this opinion he again expressed very strongly in Harris v. Jacobs (ubi sup.), and the other members of the Court of Appeal appear to have agreed with him upon that subject. At all events they expressed no dissent. Now, that authority is abundantly sufficient in warranting me in holding that the cesser clause of this charter-party applies to the demurrage claimed by the plaintiffs in this action, whether it is a claim for demurrage proper, or a claim for damages for detention in the nature of demurrage.

One other point remains, and that is, that under the charter-party the master is to sign clean bills of lading without alteration as presented by the charterers or their agent, and it was suggested that a clean bill of lading meant a bill of lading which purported to entitle the consignee to the delivery of the goods without paying for any demurrage. Now I have had some little difficulty in finding out what is meant by a clean bill of lading. There does not seem to be any case which has ever pressed much on the subject, but there is a very clear statement as to the meaning of the phrase "clean bill of lading" to be found in Pollock and Bruce's Law of Merchant Shipping, and there it is said that a clean bill of lading is a bill of lading which contains nothing in the margin qualifying the words in the bill of lading itself, "Shipped in good order and well-conditioned; goods of a certain character, or a certain weight or quality or what not." But where, for instance, you insert in the margin of the bill of lading the weight or quantity or quality unknown, that is not a clean bill of lading, because that contains a qualification. Where, on the other hand, there is no such qualification inserted in the margin, there the bill of lading is a clean one. Looked at according to that definition this bill of lading is a clean one. Therefore it does not seem to me that the condition that the master is to sign a clean bill of lading at all affects the question I have now to dispose of. The simple point is this: in my judgment the cesser clause does cover any claim which can be made by the plaintiffs for the detention of this ship in the Roath Basin, and consequently my judgment must be for the defendants with costs.

ADMIRALTY BUSINESS.

Saturday, June 1, 1889.

(Before Butt, J., assisted by Trinity Masters.)

THE TWEEDSDALE. (a)

Collision—Steam trawler and sailing ship—Lights—Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, arts. 3, 6, 17, and 23.

Where a steam trawler with her trawl down is going so slowly that there would be difficulty in getting out of the way of other vessels it is her duty to carry the extraordinary lights prescribed by the schedule, Part I. of the Order in Council, dated the 30*th Dec.* 1884, and made in pursuance of the Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act 1862, and not the ordinary lights of a steamship under way; and if she is carrying the former lights she is relieved from the duty prescribed by art. 17 of getting out of the way of sailing ships.

This was a collision action in rem by the owners of the steam trawler City of Gloucester against the owners of the sailing ship Tweedsdale.

The collision occurred in the Bristol Channel on the 5th June 1888.

The facts alleged by the plaintiffs were as follows: At about 1.30 a.m. on the 5th June 1888 the steam trawler City of Gloucester was trawling about fifteen miles W.N.W. of Lundy Island. The wind was about N.E. blowing from a fresh to a strong breeze, and the weather was clear. The City of Gloucester was steaming at about one knot an hour with her trawl down, and heading about E. by S. She was carrying a lantern in front of the foremast head, showing a white, green, and red light, and about six or seven feet below it another white light. In these circumstances the side lights of a sailing ship, which proved to be the Tweedsdale, were seen about two miles off, about a point on her port bow, and apparently steering about W. The Tweedsdale continued to approach, and when about a mile off a flare-up was shown from the City of Gloucester, and shortly after another flare was shown. Immediately after the second flare the Tweedsdale shut in her green light, and then starboarded and attempted to cross the bows of the City of Gloucester. Although the engines of the City of Gloucester were at once stopped, and the Tweedsdale loudly hailed, she came on and struck the stem and port bow of the City of Gloucester, causing her to sink.

The plaintiffs (inter alia) charged the Tweedsdale with neglecting to keep out of the way of the City of Gloucester.

The facts alleged by the defendants were as follows: Shortly before 2.15 a.m. on the 5th June the Tweedsdale, a sailing ship of 1403 tons register, was in the Bristol Channel, on a voyage from Cardiff to Valparaiso, laden with a cargo of coals. She was heading W.N.W., and making about seven knots an hour. In these circumstances a white light, which afterwards proved to be exhibited on board the City of Gloucester, was seen about one and a half miles off, and from one to two points on the starboard bow. The Tweedsdale was kept on her course, but the City of Gloucester, instead of keeping out of the way, held on and rendered a collision inevitable. The helm of the Tweedsdale was then put hard-a-port, but before she could answer it her jibboom struck the mast of the City of Gloucester, and then her stem struck the port bow of the City of Gloucester.

The defendants (inter alia) charged the City of Gloucester with neglecting to keep out of the way of the Tweedsdale.

The following Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea are material to the decision:

Art. 3. A sea-going steamship when under way shall carry:

(a) On or in front of the foremast at a height above the hull of not less than twenty feet, and if the breadth of the ship exceeds twenty feet then at a height above the hull not less than such breadth, a bright white light, so constructed as to show an uniform and unbroken light over an arc of the horizon of twenty points of the compass, so fixed as to throw the light ten points on each side of the ship, viz., from right ahead to two points abaft the beam on either side, and of such a character as to be visible on a dark night with a clear atmosphere at a distance of at least five miles.

(b) On the starboard side a green light so constructed as to show an uniform and unbroken light over an arc of the horizon of ten points of the compass, so fixed as to throw the light from right ahead to two points abaft the beam on the starboard side, and of such a character as to be visible on a dark night with a clear atmosphere at a distance of at least two miles.

(c) On the port side a red light so constructed as to show an uniform and unbroken light over an arc of the horizon of ten points of the compass, so fixed as to throw the light from right ahead to two points abaft the beam on the port side, and of such a character as to be visible on a dark night with a clear atmosphere at a distance of at least two miles.

Art. 6. A sailing ship under way or being towed shall carry the same lights as are provided by art. 3 for a steamship under way, with the exception of the white light, which she shall never carry.

Art. 17. If two ships, one of which is a sailing ship and the other a steamship, are proceeding in such directions as to involve risk of collision, the steamship shall keep out of the way of the sailing ship.

Art. 23. In obeying and construing these rules due regard shall be had to all dangers of navigation, and to any special circumstances which may render a departure from the above rules necessary in order to avoid immediate danger.

By an Order in Council made in pursuance of the Merchant Shipping Act (Amendment) Act 1862, and dated the 30th Dec. 1884, it was ordered:

As regards steam-vessels engaged in trawling, when under steam such vessels if of twenty tons gross register or upwards, and having their trawls in the water, and not being stationary in consequence of their gear getting fast to a rock or other obstruction, shall between sunset and sunrise either carry and show the lights required by the said recited art. 3 of the Regulations aforesaid, or shall carry and show in lieu thereof and in substitution therefore, but not in addition thereto, other lights of the description set forth in Part I. of the schedule hereto:

As regards sailing vessels engaged in trawling such vessels if of twenty tons net register tonnage or upwards, and having their trawls in the water, and not being stationary in consequence of their gear getting fast to a rock or other obstruction shall between sunset and sunrise either carry and show the lights required by the said recited art. 6 of the Regulations aforesaid, or shall carry and show in lieu thereof and in substitution therefore but not in addition thereto, other lights of the description set forth in Part II. of the schedule hereto.

SCHEDULE.

Part I.—Steam-vessels.

(1) On or in front of the foremast head and in the same position as the white light which other steamships are required to carry, a lanthorn, showing a white light ahead, a green light on the starboard side, and a red light on the port side; such lanthorn shall be so constructed, fitted, and arranged as to show an uniform and unbroken white light over an arc of the horizon of four points of the compass, an uniform and unbroken green light over an arc of the horizon of ten points of the compass, and an uniform and unbroken red light over an arc of the horizon of ten points of the compass, and it shall be so fixed as to show the white light from right ahead to two points on each side of the ship, the green light from two points on the starboard bow to four points abaft the beam on the starboard side, and the red light from two points on the port bow to four points abaft the beam on the port side: and (2) a white light in a globular lanthorn of not less than eight inches in diameter, and so constructed as to show a clear, uniform, and unbroken light all round the horizon; the lanthorn containing such white light shall be carried lower than the lanthorn showing the green, white, and red lights as aforesaid, so, however, that the vertical distance between them shall not be less than six feet nor more than twelve feet.

Part II.—Sailing Vessels.

(1.) On or in front of the foremast head a lanthorn having a green glass on the starboard side, and a red glass on the port side so constructed, fitted, and arranged that the red and green do not converge, and so as to show an uniform and unbroken green light over an arc of the horizon of twelve points of the compass, and an uniform and unbroken red light over an arc of the horizon of twelve points of the compass, and it shall be so fixed as to show the green light from right ahead to four points abaft the beam on the starboard side, and the red light from right ahead to four points abaft the beam on the port side: and (2) a white light in a globular lanthorn of not less than eight inches in diameter, and so constructed as to show a clear, uniform, and unbroken light all round the horizon; the lanthorn containing such white light shall be carried lower than the lanthorn showing the green and red lights aforesaid, so, however, that the vertical distance between them shall not be less than six feet and not more than twelve feet.

It was admitted that the City of Gloucester was carrying proper lights; the question between the parties was, whether it was the duty of the steam trawler to get out of the way of the sailing vessel, or the duty of the sailing vessel to get out of the way of the trawler in the circumstances stated.

Barnes, Q.C. and Robson for the plaintiffs.—The Tweedsdale is alone to blame, as it was her duty in the circumstances to keep out of the way of the City of Gloucester. The City of Gloucester had only sufficient way on to keep herself under command, and was not in a position to keep out of the way of other vessels:

The Dunelm, 51 L. T. Rep. N. S. 214; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 304; 9 P. Div. 164.

The City of Gloucester was practically stationary, and therefore was not "proceeding" within the meaning of art. 17. The circumstances of the case bring her within art. 23. The fact that steam trawlers are allowed an option as to which lights they are to carry, and may carry those of a steamer under way, shows that when they are carrying the other lights they are not to be treated as steamships.

Sir Walter Phillimore and H. Stokes for the defendants.—Had the regulations intended to relieve steam trawlers from the duties of steamships they would have said so in express terms. A steam trawler with her trawl down is no more incapable of manœuvring for other vessels than a tug towing another vessel, and yet the duties of a steamship are applicable to a tug in such circumstances:

The American and The Syria, 31 L. T. Rep. N. S. 42; L. Rep. 4 A. & E. 226; 2 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 350;

The Arthur Gordon and The Independence, Lush. 270; 4 L. T. Rep. N. S. 563; 1 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 88.

The argument based upon the option of carrying different lights will not hold good in the case of day collisions. The fact that steam trawlers are to carry lights different from those carried by sailing trawlers shows that they are to be treated as ordinary steamers.

Barnes, Q.C. in reply.

BUTT, J.—This is a case of a collision between the steam trawler City of Gloucester and the sailing vessel Tweedsdale. It occurred somewhere about fifteen or twenty miles from Lundy Island, on the early morning of the 5th June last. The City of Gloucester is a paddle steam trawler, and was at the time fishing with her trawl down. She was making, according to the evidence of her master, about one knot an hour, and in all probability she was going at from about that to one and a half knots an hour. The Tweedsdale is a large four-masted barque of 1403 tons register. At the time in question she was bound on a voyage from Cardiff to Valparaiso with a cargo of coals. There was a tolerably fresh breeze, the weather was fine but dark, and the City of Gloucester was heading somewhere about E. by S. The Tweedsdale was heading W.N.W., and was making about seven knots an hour through the water. The Tweedsdale was seen at a considerable distance by those on board the City of Gloucester, and as she approached the City of Gloucester those on board that vessel burnt several flares. Neither the flares nor the lights of the City of Gloucester appear to have been seen by anyone on the Tweedsdale, and, until the collision had actually occurred, the crew of the Tweedsdale appear to have been in ignorance of the fact that there was a ship in their neighbourhood. Moreover, it is clear from the evidence given by those on board the trawler that the Tweedsdale, running as she was before the wind, was in a position in which she would naturally yaw, and we think she was negligently navigated in being allowed to yaw too much, so as to mislead those in charge of the trawler. For that she is to blame. On that part of the case neither I nor the Elder Brethren have any doubt.

Then arises a very much more difficult question, viz., whether the trawler was also in fault. She had her trawl down, and was being approached by a sailing vessel. It is said that she is to blame for not having stopped her engines. I do not know whether reversing is suggested, though there would be a difficulty in doing that, having regard to the fact that her trawl was down. A charge against her is that she committed a breach of art. 18 of the Regulations. Now, she was going at a very slow rate, and had actually stopped before the collision. Therefore no blame attaches to her for that. Then it is said that she infringed art. 17. The plaintiffs contend that under the circumstances the article is not applicable to her. In the first place, they say that these vessels were not till the last moment within art. 17. Even regarding the trawler as an unincumbered vessel, they say the vessels were not approaching in such directions as to involve risk of collision. But I am not able to take that view. I think it is clear that these vessels were for a considerable time and distance approaching one another so as to involve risk of collision. Therefore, if the steam trawler is to be regarded as an unincumbered vessel inasmuch as she took no steps to get out of the way of the sailing vessel, she would be to blame for breach of art. 17. Then comes the question, taking her to be a steamer incumbered with her trawl, was she bound to obey art. 17? The evidence is, that having her trawl on the ground she was moving at about one knot, and was carrying the following lights: a lantern on her foremast head, showing a white light ahead and red and green lights on either side, and a white light in a globular lantern six or seven feet below it. Those were proper lights for her to carry in compliance with the new regulations. She was, therefore, not carrying the ordinary lights for a steamer as prescribed by art. 3. Assuming, as I think is the case, that the Tweedsdale was approaching her in such a direction that she could see these lights, that ought to have apprised those on board her that the other was a fishing vessel with her trawl down. In that state of things I think that art. 23 prevents the application of art. 17, and relieves the trawler from the duty of keeping out of the way, and casts the duty on the other vessel. In arriving at this conclusion, although I do not say that the case of The Dunelm (ubi sup.) is an authority on the point, nevertheless the observations of the learned judges who decided that case have been of great assistance to me. The regulation in question was not in force when the case of The Dunelm (ubi sup.) was decided. The present regulation says that steam-vessels engaged in trawling when under steam and of twenty tons gross register or upwards shall between sunset and sunrise carry the lights prescribed by art. 3, or those referred to in the schedule. The schedule specifies the lights to be carried, and the manner in which they are to be carried. It is to be observed that this regulation gives an option. Trawlers are either to carry the lights this trawler was carrying, or in lieu thereof the lights prescribed by art. 3—i.e., the ordinary lights of a steamer. I think the option must be exercised with discretion, and in this way: If a trawler has not only sufficient way on her to keep herself in command, but also sufficient way to enable her to act with effect in altering her course for other ships, then I think the ordinary regulation lights should be carried, and those in charge of her should act as the Regulations require those in charge of an unincumbered vessel to act. But if she has so little way on her that there would be difficulty in keeping out of the way of other vessels, she should then carry what I may call the extraordinary lights—viz., the lights prescribed by the schedule. The City of Gloucester was, as I have said, going only at such a rate as to give her bare steerage way. She was carrying the lights prescribed by the schedule, and I therefore hold her free from blame for this collision. This is the best construction I can put on rules not easy of interpretation; but I fear that it is almost impossible to put any construction on them which will not be open to some objection. The conclusion is, that I hold the Tweedsdale alone to blame.

THE RECEPTA. (a)

Collision—Limitation of liability—Ship's register—Admissibility of evidence—Merchant Shipping Act 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104), s. 26—Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 63), s. 54.

In an action for limitation of liability the defendants may, if they have raised the question by their defence, call evidence to show that the ship's tonnage as shown by her register is not correct, and that it has been erroneously computed.

THIS was an action by the owners of the steamship Recepta to limit their liability in respect of a collision between the Recepta and the steamship Hawk.

In paragraph 3 of the statement of claim it was alleged as follows:

The gross tonnage of the Recepta, without deduction on account of engine-room space, after due allowance in respect of space solely occupied by and appropriated to the use of the crew, ascertained according to the provisions of the several Merchant Shipping Acts in that behalf, is 930·29 tons, and no more.

In paragraph 1 of the defence it was alleged as follows:

The defendants deny that the gross tonnage of the Recepta is as alleged in paragraph 3 of the statement of claim, and that the sum of 8*l.* per ton on the gross register tonnage is as alleged in paragraph 11 of the statement of claim, and say that, if the tonnage was computed or ascertained as alleged, it was erroneously computed, and such tonnage has since been determined and registered, in accordance with the rules in the said Acts contained, at 956·37 tons, and which last-mentioned tonnage is in fact the gross tonnage of the Recepta without deduction of engine-room space, and after due allowance of crew's space, and the sum of 8*l.* per ton tonnage, is 7650*l.* 19*s.*

The allegations in the statement of claim were supported by an affidavit and the Recepta's register.

The Merchant Shipping Act 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104), s. 26, is material to the decision, and is as follows:

Whenever the tonnage of any ship has been ascertained and registered in accordance with the provisions of this Act, the same shall thenceforth be deemed to be the tonnage of such ship, and be repeated in every subsequent registry thereof, unless any alteration is made in the form and capacity of such ship, or unless it is discovered that the tonnage of such ship has been erroneously computed; and in either of such cases such ship shall be remeasured and her tonnage determined and registered according to the rules hereinbefore contained in that behalf.

F. Laing, for the plaintiffs, having read the affidavit, and put in the ship's register, asked for a decree in the form of the claim.

J. P. Aspinall, for the defendants, tendered evidence to show that the register did not represent the actual tonnage of the ship.

F. Laing objected to the reception of such evidence on the ground that the ship's register was conclusive.

J. P. Aspinall contended that, under 17 & 18 Vict. c. 104, s. 26, he was entitled to show that it had been discovered that the tonnage of the ship had been erroneously computed, and that she had in fact been remeasured, and that her tonnage was not as alleged by the plaintiffs.

BUTT, J. held, that the evidence was admissible, and a Board of Trade surveyor was thereupon called in support of their case,

It was subsequently agreed between the parties that the amount of the plaintiffs' liability was to be based upon the tonnage alleged by the defendants in their defence, and proved by them by the evidence called.

THE ARGENTINO.

ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF APPEAL IN ENGLAND.

Collision—Damages—Remoteness—Loss of employment—Demurrage.

A ship was damaged by a collison with another, for which both were to blame. While prosecuting the voyage in the course of which the collision occurred, she had secured an engagement for a new voyage, but in consequence of the damage caused by the collision she was unable to fulfil it.

Held (affirming the judgment of the court below), that the loss of the fair and ordinary earnings of such a vessel, on such a voyage as she was engaged for, was the direct and natural consequence of the collision, and could be recovered as damages; but that demurrage for the time during which she was under repair could not be recovered in addition.

THIS was an appeal from a judgment of the Court of Appeal (Lindley and Bowen, L.JJ., Lord Esher, M.R. dissenting), reported in 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 348; 59 L. T. Rep. N. S. 914, and 13 P. Div. 191, who had affirmed with a variation a judgment of Sir James Hannen, reported in 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 278; 58 L. T. Rep. N. S. 643, and 13 P. Div. 61.

The question arose out of a collision which took place in the river Thames, on the 20th Feb. 1887, between the steamships Gracie and Argentino. It was agreed between the parties that both ships should be deemed to be to blame, and the damages were referred to the registrar and merchants.

The claim sent in by the owners of the Argentino contained the following item of special damage:

16. Loss of profit in succeeding voyage which had been contracted for, but which defendants were unable to carry out, and for which another steamer was substituted, including eight days time lost in loading cargo upon next voyage beyond the time which would have been consumed in loading the cargo originally contracted for, 785*l.* 16*s.* 5*d.*

The Registrar disallowed this claim on the ground that the damages sought were too remote.

(a) Reported by C. E. MALDEN, Esq., Barrister-at-Law

Sir James Hannen, by his order of the 14th Feb. 1888, "referred back the report to the registrar and merchants for further consideration as regards item No. 16."

The Court of Appeal, by their order of the 9th Aug. 1888, "referred back the report to the registrar assisted by merchants for further consideration, with directions that such damages should be allowed in respect of this collision as would represent the loss of ordinary and fair earnings of such a ship as the Argentino, having regard to the fact that she was for the time on Westcott's line of steamers, trading to Alexandria and to the Black Sea, and advertised to sail as such."

There was also a claim for demurrage.

Finlay, Q.C. and Nelson appeared for the appellants, and contended that a ship was not entitled to recover compensation for speculative profits which might have been earned, but only demurrage for the time during which she is under repair. The effect of the detention might have been to give her a chance of a more profitable engagement than the one she lost. The measure of damages is the cost of the repairs, and compensation for loss of time. See Phillips v. London and South-Western Railway Company, 42 L. T. Rep. N. S. 6; 5 C. P. Div. 280.

The loss of the voyage might have been for her benefit, and damages based on the comparative profits of different voyages are too speculative. [Lord HERSCHELL referred to Fletcher v. Tayleur, 17 C. B. 21.] See Div. 105) seem to vary the rule to some extent; but we submit that on the whole the rule is that, in the case of a partial loss, in addition to the repairs, compensation can only be allowed for loss of time, or at most for a change in the market rate of freight, of which there is no evidence here, where the claim is of a very special nature. If the use of a chattel is taken away only the market value of its use can be recovered. The claim is wrong in form, and exaggerated in amount.

Sir W. Phillimore and H. F. Boyd, for the respondents, argued that the claim was for what would have been made on the voyage for which the ship was engaged, less what was actually made on another voyage, and was not too remote. By claiming demurrage the respondents are not claiming the same thing twice over. The cases cited on the other side, rightly understood, are in our favour. The Star of India (ubi sup.) is exactly this case, and the rule was followed in The Consett (ubi sup.). The common law authorities are to the same effect. See Demurrage is only a rough-and-ready way of calculating damages, the more accurate way is to look at the actual engagements of the ship.

Nelson was heard in reply.

At the conclusion of the arguments their Lordships took time to consider their judgment.

Aug. 9.—Their Lordships gave judgment as follows:—

Lord HERSCHELL.—My Lords: The steamships Argentino and Gracie having been both declared to blame in cross-actions for damages sustained by a collision between the two vessels, the damages were referred in the usual way to the registrar and merchants. The claim sent in by the Argentino contained the following items: 16. Loss of profit on succeeding voyage which had been contracted for, but which the defendants were unable to carry out, and for which another steamer was substituted, including eight days time lost in loading cargo upon next voyage beyond the time which would have been consumed in loading the cargo originally contracted for, 785*l.* 16*s.* 5*d.* 17. Demurrage of the s.s. Argentino 1407 tons gross, for nineteen days at 5*d.* per ton per day, 564*l.* 17*s.* 1*d.*" The registrar disallowed the item 16 altogether, and allowed 232*l.* in respect of item 17. The learned President of the Admiralty Division referred the case back to the registrar to ascertain the amount of loss which the owners of the Argentino has sustained by that vessel not being able to fulfil an engagement entered into prior to the collision. His decision was affirmed by the majority of the Court of Appeal, with a variation in the direction given to the registrar. The facts are not in dispute. The collision took place in the Thames on the 20th Feb. 1887. Ten days prior to the collision, whilst the Argentino was at sea on a voyage from Sebastopol, it was arranged between Messrs. Westcott and Lawrence, shipbrokers, who collect cargo at London and Antwerp for conveyance to the Black Sea, and the managing owner of the Argentino, that as soon as that vessel had arrived and discharged her cargo, she should proceed to Antwerp and load for the Batoum route. In consequence of the collision the Argentino could not keep her engagement, and Westcott and Lawrence had to procure another vessel. Immediately after the repairs of the Argentino were completed, she left for Antwerp, having been engaged some days before that date to proceed to Odessa viâ Antwerp and London. The question raised by this appeal is, whether the damages claimed by the Argentino in respect of the loss of the profits which would have been earned from the employment of the vessel which had been arranged for prior to the collision, are in point of law recoverable. It is admitted that there is no special rule of the Admiralty Court governing the question, and that the law there administered in relation to such a matter is the same as prevails at common law. Your Lordships have therefore to consider whether, if this were an action brought in the courts of common law and tried by a jury, the judge ought to have directed the jury that these damages could not be recovered on the ground that they were too remote. That damages, though undoubtedly traceable to the wrong in respect of which the action is brought, may nevertheless be too remote and therefore not recoverable, is beyond dispute. I do not think there has been much difference of opinion as to what constitutes remoteness of damage. The definitions which have been given, though varying in their mode of expression, appear to me to be substantially the same. They have generally taken a negative form, indicating what damage is not regarded as too remote, and leaving all else as properly falling within that description. I think that damages which flow directly and naturally, or in the ordinary course of things, from the wrongful act cannot be regarded as too remote. The loss of the use of a vessel and of the profit which would ordinarily be derived from its use during the time it is under repair, and therefore not available for trading purposes, is certainly damage which directly and naturally flows from a collision. But further than this I agree with the court below that such damage is not necessarily limited to the money which could have been earned during the time the vessel was actually under repair. That a steamship, whilst prosecuting her voyage, should have secured employment for another adventure does not appear to me to be out of the ordinary course of things. And if at the time of a collision the damaged vessel had obtained such an engagement for an ordinary maritime adventure, the loss of the fair and ordinary earnings of such a vessel on such an adventure would appear to me to be the direct and natural consequence of the collision.

I observe that no mention was made in the judgments of the learned judges in the courts below of the claim for demurrage and the allowance of the registrar in respect of it. The matter was pointedly brought before your Lordships in the arguments at the bar on behalf of the appellants, and it was urged that, if the judgment of the court below were affirmed, the respondent would get the damages twice over. I think it right, therefore, to state how this matter ought, in my opinion, to be dealt with. Where no claim is made in respect of loss of profits owing to the owner having been deprived of the earnings of a voyage which was in contemplation and the engagement for which had been secured, it would be right, and is no doubt the usual course, to award damages under the name of demurrage in respect of the loss of profit which it must reasonably have been anticipated the ship would earn during the time of detention. But where such a claim is made as in the present case, the owner cannot, I think, claim to have allowed, in addition as a separate item, demurrage in respect of the time the vessel was under repair. If he obtains as damages the loss which he has sustained owing to the loss of the employment he had secured, he is put in the same position as if there had been no detention. There would of course have to be taken into account, however, that, if the shipowner lost the contemplated voyage, he had the use of the vessel as soon as the repairs were completed for any other purpose, and what he earned, or rather what he could have earned, whilst upon any other adventure during the time he would otherwise have been engaged upon the contemplated vogage, must of course be set against the sum allowed him in respect of the loss of that voyage. It must be borne in mind, of course, that the set-off or deduction ought only to be in respect of what might have been earned in that part of the time covered by the lost voyage during which the owner had the use of his ship. It is, I think, only in this way that in a case like the present the length of time during which the ship was laid up for repairs can be taken into account. It is one of the circumstances to be considered in assessing the damages. For the reasons I have given I think the judgment of the Court of Appeal should be affirmed.

Lord FITZGERALD.—My Lords: In this case I concur in all that my noble and learned friend has just stated, and in the result at which he has arrived. It is to be regarded in the light of a common law action brought by the owners of the Argentino against the vessel in collision; and upon the main question as to whether the damages resulting to the owners of the Argentino from that collision were too remote or not I never from the beginning entertained any doubt. It is not alone that they are not remote, but they are the proximate result of the collision. I therefore adopt entirely the joint judgment of Bowen and Lindley, L.JJ. in the Court of Appeal.

Lord MACNAGHTEN.—My Lords: I concur.

PRICE AND CO. v. THE "A 1" SHIPS' SMALL DAMAGE INSURANCE COMPANY. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION.

Insurance, marine—"Warranted free from average under 3 per cent., unless general"—Particular and general average loss, together over 3 per cent., separately under 3 per cent.

A particular average loss under 3 per cent. is not recoverable under a policy of insurance containing the clause, "warranted free from average under 3 per cent., unless general," although there has been at the same time a general average loss which, if added to the particular average loss, would make the total loss more than 3 per cent. Consequently the underwriters of a policy of insurance covering all losses not recoverable under a policy containing such a clause are liable for such a particular average loss.

Judgment of Cave, J. affirmed.

This was an appeal from the judgment of Cave, J., upon further consideration.

The action was brought by shipowners upon a policy of marine insurance, which was against "all losses which cannot be recovered under an ordinary Lloyd's or a similar policy of insurance by reason of the insertion therein of the clause, warranted free from average under three pounds per cent., unless general, or the ship be stranded, sunk, or burnt." The ship in question, during the time covered by the policy, was on a voyage from Calcutta to London, when she encountered a storm, which did her damage to the amount of 385*l.* 17*s.* 6*d.* The captain was also obliged, for the general safety of the ship and cargo, to cut away rigging, &c., to the value of 128*l.* 6*s.* 11*d.* It was admitted that this was a general average loss. Upon the average adjustment, the ship's contribution to the general average loss was 43*l.* 0*s.* 7*d.* The value of the ship was 30,000*l.*

The plaintiffs claimed to recover upon the policy in respect of the particular average loss to the ship of 385*l.* 17*s.* 6*d.*, as being under 3 per cent. of the value.

Cave, J. gave judgment for the plaintiffs for the amount claimed.

The defendants appealed.

French, Q.C. and Carver for the defendants.—It is submitted that the whole of the 167*l.*, that is to say, both the general average loss and the particular average loss, constitute one entire partial loss, and, such loss amounting to more than 3 per cent. of the value of the ship, the particular average loss could be recovered under an ordinary Lloyd's policy, and consequently cannot be recovered from the defendants. Cur. adv. vult.

March 18.—Lord Esher, M.R.—In this case an action has been brought against the insurers on a policy which is expressed to be against all losses which cannot be recovered under an ordinary Lloyd's, or a similar policy of insurance, by reason of the insertion therein of the clause, "Warranted free from average under three pounds per cent., unless general, or the ship be stranded, sunk, or burnt." There has been a loss; but the underwriters say that it is not a loss under the policy, because they say that it is a loss that might have been recovered under a Lloyd's policy with the above clause in it. It is true to say that it is not a loss within this policy if it is a loss within an ordinary Lloyd's policy. The question is therefore whether it is a loss within an ordinary Lloyd's policy. The facts as to the loss are as follows. Particular damage occurred to the ship by reason of bad weather. In consequence of that damage, and for the common good of ship and cargo, the ship put into a port of refuge. The first loss was obviously an average loss on the ship. Expenses in putting into a port of distress, on the other hand, are a general average loss. It is an admitted fact that, if the particular average loss in this case is taken by itself, it is below 3 per cent. But if you can add the general average loss on the same ship and goods to the particular average loss, the total loss exceeds 3 per cent. The question is, therefore, whether you can add a general average loss on ship and goods to a particular average loss on the ship in order to see whether the loss exceeds or falls short of the percentage specified in the policy. That depends upon the true construction of the clause containing the memorandum warranty. To say that the language of these Lloyd's policies can be construed according to strict grammar is impossible. They are in a form utterly regardless of grammar, but commonly understood by shipowners and insurers. One must, however, have some regard to the ordinary rules of grammar in construing these policies, and consequently may adopt the grammatical meaning of the words used when they have acquired no other meaning. The usual form of this clause in a Lloyd's policy upon goods is as follows: "Corn, fish, salt, fruit, flour, and seed are warranted free from average unless general, or the ship be stranded; sugar, tobacco, hemp, flax, hides, and skins are warranted free from average under five pounds per cent., unless general, or the ship be stranded." One must read that, as nearly as one can, grammatically. What is the meaning of the words "free from average?" "Average" is not an ordinary English word at all. "Average" is a technical mercantile expression; and it is well established that it means a partial loss as distinguished from a total loss. The warranty that we have to construe is only concerned with an average loss, that is, a partial loss. If there is a total loss of any of the things specified, the warranty does not apply. If there is a partial loss of any of these things, it does apply. Then we have the words "unless general." Where the partial loss has been a voluntary loss on the part of some of the parties for the benefit of all, the clause is not to apply. When one considers that the things mentioned are things of a very different kind and species, and that this clause is a common form, it seems to follow that the clause is meant to apply whether all the different kinds of goods mentioned are on board or not. Indeed, it is absurd to suppose that they would all be on board. Therefore, looking at this clause, as nearly as one can grammatically, but still more in its ordinary business sense, one must construe it as if each one of the things mentioned might be on board by itself. As a matter of business I should read the words as if each thing was mentioned by itself in a separate clause. It is said by mercantile lawyers that this clause was introduced for the purpose of discounting disputes about small losses. It is also said to have been introduced on account of the difficulty, in the case of the loss of perishable goods, of discovering whether the loss is due to their own nature or to sea damage. Whether either of those is the reason for the insertion of this clause or not, it seems to me that it would be unbusinesslike and foolish to say that the losses upon all the goods were to be added together in order to ascertain the percentage for the purposes of the clause. Each of the things specified must be read as if it stood alone in a separate clause. Thus you must read: "Sugar is warranted free from average under five pounds per cent., unless general, or the ship be stranded." Then you must read the clause in a policy upon ship: "Ship warranted free from average under three pounds per cent. unless general, or the ship be stranded, sunk, or burnt." As I have said, that is equivalent to "warranted free from partial loss under 3 per cent. unless that loss is a general average loss." Upon the construction of this clause, therefore, I should come to the conclusion that, if a ship suffers a partial loss under 3 per cent., which is not a general average loss, such loss cannot be recovered under a policy containing the clause. If there be a general average loss, that can be recovered, although under 3 per cent. But the particular average loss and the general average loss cannot be added together.

It is, however, useless for us to consider what our decision would be upon the construction of the words of the policy, if there is authority on the subject. There is not so much authority on this subject as I could wish. I gather from the chapter on the memorandum or warranty "Free from Average" in Arnould's Marine Insurance that the view of that writer was that particular and general average cannot be added together for this purpose, but he does not appear to me to have dealt very fully with the point. In Stevens on Average (5th edit.) — Stevens, as we know, was not a lawyer, but is nevertheless an authority and an accurate writer on this subject—at p. 224, it is said, that, if several be insured together, and the average be claimed on the whole, the claim should be analysed to find if each be damaged 5 per cent.; e.g., if a claim be made of 100*l.* on flax and hemp valued at 1000*l.*, i.e., 10 per cent., unless each of them separately amount to 5 per cent., the claim can only be substantiated on one of them. That is exactly the conclusion I should myself have come to. He goes on to say, at p. 232, that general and particular average cannot be added together to make the underwriters liable if they jointly amount to the requisite percentage. Then I come to the book which I always rely on most in these cases, Phillips on Insurance. The writer says (vol. 2., 5th edit., p. 449, par. 1779), that "Under the general exception of losses under 3, 5, or any other rate per cent., not specifying any kind of loss, the question occurs, what damage or loss is to be included in making up the amount of the loss? And, first, can general and particular average losses be added together to make up the rate? The practice appears to have been not to add together the general and particular average to make an amount exceeding the excepted rate. And this practice has been ratified in jurisprudence so far as it has come under judicial cognisance." There is the exact matter which we have to decide dealt with, with that accuracy with which, to my mind, Mr. Phillips always expresses the propositions he lays down. He says there that the practice has judicial authority. In America, at all events, I think that it has. I think that the case of Padelford v. Boardman (4 Mass. 548) is exactly in point, and is a judicial decision that supports what Mr. Phillips says. In that case there was a policy of insurance containing a clause which exempted the insurers from liability for partial loss under 5 per cent., unless the damage happened by stranding or bilging, excepting in all cases general average. That is not precisely in the words of our English policies, but it is to the same effect. The facts in that case were, that the ship being damaged in a storm put into a port of refuge for the benefit of ship and cargo. The damage done to the sails and rigging was repaired, and the cost of that was a particular average loss on the ship. That was less than 5 per cent. The expenses of putting in to a port of refuge, and other similar expenses, were a general average loss. If it was allowable to join the general average loss to the particular average loss, the total loss was more than 5 per cent. Therefore, the question was raised in that case as clearly and distinctly as it could be. In the judgment in that case it is said: "In the case at bar, the partial loss or damage sustained by the vessel, and the contribution to which the same property became liable by the expenses voluntarily incurred in seeking a port to refit were occasioned, in the first instance, by the same accident." It is immaterial, therefore, that the whole loss was occasioned by the same storm. "The cases are distinguished, however, by the terms of the policy, and in the nature of the thing. The damage sustained by the vessel is the partial loss, but the contribution is a charge to which the property saved is made liable by the marine law; for the former being under 5 per cent., the underwriter is not liable by an express exception which is not extended to the latter. And that these are not to be blended by any constructive inference appears in the several adjudged cases that have been mentioned. And this opinion is conformable to the usage of merchants and insurers, as it has been understood on inquiry." Nothing can be more distinct than that decision; and the passage I have quoted from Phillips is equally clear.

I am therefore of opinion that a general average loss and a particular average loss are not to be added together for the purpose of calculating whether the loss is under 3 per cent. As to the general average loss, it does not matter whether it is under 3 per cent. or not; it is to be paid for by the insurers, however small the amount. As to the particular average loss, it cannot be recovered upon a policy containing the clause under consideration, if that loss, taken by itself, is under 3 per cent. The only other case that ought to be mentioned is one which was cited in the course of the argument, Stewart v. Merchants' Marine Insurance Company (16 Q. B. Div. 619). To my mind that case has nothing to do with the matter in dispute here. The decision in that case seems to show that, in the case of a policy upon goods, if there have been successive losses on the same voyage, those losses may be added together for the purposes of the memorandum. I think that the decision goes also to show that, in the case of a policy on ship, the same thing may be done. It was also held that, in the case of a time policy, successive losses happening on different voyages could not be added together, although they all occurred within the time limited by the policy, on the ground that the long established maritime view was to divide the voyage and treat each voyage as a separate matter. The question whether general and particular average losses can be added together for the purposes of the memorandum is a very different one from the question whether successive losses on the same voyage can be so added together. I therefore consider that case not to be in point. For these reasons I am of opinion that the decision of Cave, J. should be affirmed.

Fry, L.J.—This case turns upon the construction of the memorandum in an ordinary Lloyd's policy. I think that the words in the memorandum, "Warranted free from average under three pound per cent., unless general," may be paraphrased by saying "Warranted free from particular average under three pounds per cent." The facts in this case are that the ship sustained damage in a storm to the extent of three or four hundred pounds. That was a particular average loss, or, in other words, a partial loss. But the captain caused part of the rigging to be cut away with a view to the preservation of ship and cargo. That was a sacrifice for the benefit of all, and was therefore a general average loss, giving rise to a general average contributon. That was a loss to the extent of 1200*l.* It is admitted that, unless the general loss can be added to the ship's particular loss, the 3 per cent. mentioned in the memorandum is not reached. In my opinion the two cannot be added together. They are essentially different things. The one loss consists of damage done by the sea to the ship; the other loss consists of a sacrifice voluntarily made for the benefit of the common undertaking. And, although both are called "average" losses, they are essentially different. It is said that the whole loss to the ship, both that from the damage done by the sea and that from the cutting away of the sails, amounted to 1674*l.*, and was an average loss amounting to more than 3 per cent., which might have been recovered by the plaintiffs from the underwriters on the Lloyd's policies at the time that the loss happened, without waiting to see whether the vessel arrived safely and a claim to contribution arose. But, in my opinion, that argument is not a tenable one. It may be that the plaintiffs could have sued the underwriters on the Lloyd's policies for the two sums of 1288*l.* and 385*l.*; but, if so, they could only do it by subrogating the underwriters to their own rights to contribution, and the two losses would still remain essentially distinct. I agree with the Master of the Rolls, that, according to the well-established practice of underwriters, the two things can never be added together in the manner suggested. I think that it is clear, both from the authorities cited in the court below by Cave, J., and from those cited in this court by the Master of the Rolls, that the two kinds of loss can never be added together to make up the 3 per cent. mentioned in the memorandum. The two things are essentially different in their origin and in their character.

Bowen, L.J.—I have very little to add. The guarantee in question is, "Warranted free from average under three pounds per cent., unless general, or the ship be stranded, sunk, or burnt." Whatever the exact history of the clause in its present shape may be, I think that everyone agrees in this, that its object is to prevent small claims against underwriters in respect of small average losses. The first case that gave the meaning which it has ever since had to the form in which this clause is drawn was doubtless that of Wilson v. Smith (3 Bur. 1550), which was a decision of Lord Mansfield, to the effect that the words "unless general" were to be read as an exception, and not as a condition, with this consequence, that the occurrence of a general average loss was held not to entitle the assured to recover for a particular average loss. The determination of the question which we have to deal with in this case is a further development of the construction of the clause, that question being whether you can add the general to the particular average loss in order to ascertain whether the average is under three pounds per cent., within the terms of the warranty. It seems to me that the authorities are all in one direction. I think that the American case of Padelford v. Boardman (4 Mass. 548) is directly in point. And I think that there is shown to be an established practice on the part of those who have had to deal with this clause that the two losses should not be added together for the purpose of ascertaining whether there has been an average loss under 3 per cent. In principle there is no reason that I can suggest why they should be so added, and I think that we should not depart from the general practice. The appeal should therefore be dismissed.

The Vindomora. (a)

Collision—Fog—Alteration of helm.

There is no rule of navigation that where those in charge of a vessel in a dense fog hear a whistle or foghorn in their vicinity they are under no circumstances justified in manœuvring with their helm before seeing the other vessel. The propriety of manœuvring with the helm depends upon the circumstances of each case.

Where those in charge of a steamship in a dense fog heard a steam-whistle about three and a half points on their starboard bow, distant about half a mile, and starboarded, the Court held that in the circumstances it was a proper manœuvre.

This was an appeal by the plaintiffs in a collision action in rem from a decision of Butt, J. holding both vessels to blame

The collision occurred on the 21st Sept. 1888 in a fog in the North Sea between the plaintiffs' steamship the Haswell and the defendants' steamship the Vindomora.

The facts alleged on behalf of the plaintiffs were as follows: At about 6.50 p.m. on the 21st Sept the Haswell, a steamship of 454 tons register, laden with a cargo of coals, was in the North Sea in the course of a voyage from Sunderland to London The weather, which had been fine and clear, had come on a dense fog. The course of the Haswell was S.E. by S.-½-S., and her engines, which had been going full speed, were put at dead slow. A good look-out was being kept, her steam whistle was being duly sounded, and her regulation lights were duly exhibited and burning brightly. At about 7 p.m. those on the Haswell heard the whistle of a steamer, which proved to be the Vindomora, about three points on the Haswell's starboard bow, and apparently about half a mile to a mile off. The engines of the Haswell were immediately stopped and her whistle blown two short blasts. No answer was returned to this signal by the Vindomora, and the whistle of the Haswell was again sounded two short blasts three times at short intervals. A blast of the whistle from the Vindomora was then heard from the direction of the Haswell's starboard beam, and at the same time the masthead light of the Vindomora was seen about a ship's length off a little abaft the starboard beam of the Haswell, and coming towards her. A collision being apparently inevitable, the engines of the Haswell were at once put full speed ahead, and her helm hard-a-starboard, as the only chance of avoiding it, but the Vindomora, coming on under a port helm, cut into the starboard quarter of the Haswell with her stem and port bow, causing the Haswell to sink.

The facts alleged on behalf of the defendants were as follows: Between 6.45 p.m. and 7 p.m., on the 21st Sept., the Vindomora, a screw-steamship of 1080 tons gross, while on a voyage from London to Sunderland, was in the North Sea. The weather was a thick fog. The Vindomora was on a north magnetic course, making about two to two and a half knots an hour, with her engines going dead slow. Her regulation lights were duly exhibited, and burning brightly, her steam-whistle was being sounded, and a good look-out was being kept. In these circumstances the whistle of a steamship, which proved to be the Haswell, was heard on the port bow of the Vindomora, a considerable distance off. The whistle of the Vindomora was sounded in reply, and the helm of the Vindomora was ported, and soon afterwards, the whistle having been again heard nearer the engines of the Vindomora were stopped. But very soon afterwards the masthead and green lights of the Haswell were seen about two lengths off, and bearing from one to two points on the port bow, rapidly approaching. The engines of the Vindomora were immediately reversed full speed, and her helm kept hard-a-port, but the Haswell came on, and with her starboard quarter struck the Vindomora's stern and her port bow.

At the trial Butt, J. disbelieved the defendants' witnesses as to speed, and found the Vindomora to blame for improperly porting her helm and going at an immoderate rate of speed.

He also found the Haswell to blame for starboarding, and concluded his judgment as follows: "Upon the whole, the conclusion to which we have come is, that both of these vessels acted with their helms, the one with the port the other with the starboard helm, at a time when neither could have known or judged by mere sound the exact position of the other. They were therefore both wrongly manœuvred, and this collision is the result. I must therefore pronounce both of these vessels to blame."

From this decision the plaintiff now appealed.

Hall, Q.C. and Pyke, for the plaintiffs, in support of the appeal.—The learned judge was wrong in holding that the Haswell improperly starboarded. It is contended that the Haswell never starboarded till the collision was inevitable. Assuming she did starboard, she was entitled to do so. Under art. 16 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea it was her duty to keep out of the way of the Vindomora, and that she was entitled to do by any manœuvre she pleased. As a matter of fact, starboarding was the best manœuvre. There is no article which says vessels are not to manœuvre with their helms in a fog, and in the circumstances of the present case the Haswell was entitled to manœuvre as she did. [He was stopped.]

Sir Walter Phillimore and J. P. Aspinall, for the respondents, contra.—The judges in the Admiralty Court have always condemned vessels for acting with their helms in dense fogs. It is impossible to conjecture with any accuracy in a fog the bearing or distance of another vessel from the sound of her whistle, and hence the danger of manœuvring in the dark. That principle of navigation was applicable to the Haswell, and for violating it she has been rightly held to blame:

The Resolution, 60 L. T. Rep. N. S. 430; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 363;
The Frankland, 27 L. T. Rep. N. S. 633; L. Rep. 4 P. C. 529; 1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 489;
The Kirby Hall, 48 L. T. Rep. N. S. 797; 8 P. Div. 71; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 90;
The Dordogne, 51 L. T. Rep. N. S. 650; 10 P. Div. 6; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 328.

Lord Esher, M.R.—It seems to me that, unless we are to say that in all circumstances and under all conditions it is a rule of navigation that in a fog neither vessel is to alter her helm, we cannot uphold the decision of the learned judge. I am of opinion that there is no such rule, and I do not think that in any one of the cases which have been cited there is laid down any such hard-and-fast rule. I extremely doubt, too, notwithstanding the recollection of the opinion which Sir Walter Phillimore has stated to us, that it has been over and over again laid down in the Admiralty that there is the hard-and-fast rule for which he contends. I think he must be mistaken. There has been no case cited to us which states anything of the kind. Each case must be decided by its own circumstances—the position of the vessels at particular times; their distance from one another, and a variety of other considerations. The first point to be noticed in this case is, that it cannot be said that because we did not see the witnesses in the court below we ought not to differ from the learned judge. He has given a character to the witnesses from the Vindomora which satisfies me that he would not rely upon their evidence. I therefore do not believe what they say about altering the course of their vessel to the north, and in this the gentlemen who assist us agree.

Now, suppose the Haswell did starboard her helm after she heard the first whistle, in judging of her conduct we must first take into account her speed, which was almost as slow as could be. Assume she did starboard, was she wrong in so doing? That depends upon where the whistle was heard. On looking at the evidence from the Haswell as to its bearing, while of course agreeing that the witnesses cannot give it with exactness, we find they all say it was three and a half to four points on the starboard bow. While I do not say it was so exactly, it seems very much as if it was in that position. Looking at the way in which the evidence was dealt with in cross-examination, it appears to my mind that it was as good as accepted as true. Seeing there is no contradiction, unless it be the almost preposterous evidence that the Haswell was on the Vindomora's port bow, I have asked this question: Supposing the whistle of the Vindomora was heard three and a half points on the starboard bow of the Haswell, was there anything wrong in the Haswell starboarding? The gentlemen who assist us say, No; and I think if pressed they would go further, and say it was the right thing to do. If so, how are we to hold the Haswell to be in the wrong in such circumstances as these? I have asked our assessors another question, which is this: Did the starboarding of the Haswell conduce to the collision? They have answered, No; not at all. From these answers, and the view I myself take, it is clear that the starboarding could not have been a wrong manœuvre, and could not in any way have conduced to the collision, unless the vessels were in the position spoken to by the witnesses from the Vindomora, which position I do not believe or accept, seeing the view the learned judge took of their evidence. I cannot see that there was anything wrong in what the Haswell did, and I also think that it could not have brought about the collision. I must therefore differ from the learned judge, and hold the Vindomora alone to blame.

Cotton, L.J.—I agree. I only wish to express my concurrence with what the Master of the Rolls has said as to the cited cases laying down no definite rule as to what you can or cannot do in a fog. Each case must be judged by its own circumstances.

Lindley, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. I cannot see there was anything wrong in what the Haswell did, even assuming she did everything that was attributed to her.

The Calliope. (a)

Damage—Wharfinger—Bed of river—Negligence.

By charter-party and bill of lading the plaintiffs' ship the C. was to deliver her cargo as directed by the consignees, and she was accordingly ordered by the defendant company, the consignees of the cargo, to proceed to the defendants' wharf to discharge.

There were two berths at the wharf, one alongside it and another outside the first berth. Between the two a ridge of mud from time to time accumulated, and the defendants, who were lessees of a part of the bed of the river, frequently scraped it away. On the C.'s arrival in the river, the defendants' traffic foreman wrote to her master saying he could bring the C. to the wharf at a certain time, and stating the then depth of the water, and asking him to inform the pilot thereof. While approaching the wharf the C. struck on the ridge and was damaged. The master of the C. did not know of the existence of the ridge.

Held, that it was the duty of the wharfingers to keep the space between the berths in a fit state, or warn vessels coming to the wharf of its condition, and that their neglect so to do was the cause of the accident, and that they were liable.

This was an appeal by the plaintiffs in an action in personam by the owners of the steamship Calliope against the Tredegar Iron and Coal Company Limited from a judgment of Butt, J. (ante, p. 359; 59 L. T. Rep. N. S. 901).

The action was brought to recover compensation for damage occasioned to the Calliope.

The defendants were the consignees of the Calliope's cargo, and also the owners of a wharf in the river Usk, called the Tredegar Wharf, and lessees of a part of the bed of the river fronting the wharf.

The Calliope was chartered by the Decido Iron Ore Company to load a cargo of iron ore, and proceed therewith to Newport, Monmouthshire, and deliver the same as directed by the consignees or their agents.

By the bill of lading, which incorporated the conditions in the charter-party, the cargo was made deliverable to the Decido Iron Ore Company or their assigns. The bill of lading was indorsed to the defendants.

Accordingly the Calliope, with her cargo on board, arrived off the Alexandra Dock in the Usk on Saturday the 29th May 1886, with a pilot on board, for the purpose of berthing her at the defendants' wharf, where she had been ordered to go. In consequence of there not being then sufficient water to enable the Calliope to get alongside, she anchored in the roads. On the same day one Griffiths, the traffic foreman at the wharf, wrote the following letter to the captain of the Calliope: "You can bring your steamer to the Tredegar Wharf Monday morning's tide. You can tell the pilot we have two feet more water at our wharf than Bathurst Basin."

There were two berths off the wharf, one immediately alongside it and another farther out in the river, and between the two a ridge was formed, which the defendants scraped away from time to time.

On Monday, the 31st May, the Calliope, in charge of a pilot, attempted to get to the wharf, but in doing so she grounded on the ridge between the berths, and sustained the injury complained of.

Neither the master nor pilot knew of the existence of this ridge.

Barnes, Q.C. and Robson, for the plaintiffs, in support of the appeal.—The defendants had a duty to the plaintiffs either to keep the frontage of the wharf reasonably safe, or to warn vessels using it of the existence of this ridge:

The Moorcock, 60 L. T. Rep. N. S. 654; 14 P. Div. 64; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 373.

The plaintiffs could not know of the existence of this ridge without being told of it, and yet by the terms of the charter-party they were bound to go to the defendants' wharf. The ridge which caused the damage was formed from the way in which the defendants used the frontage of the wharf, and they were in the habit of occasionally scraping it away. They therefore knew of its existence, and ought to have warned the plaintiffs.

Finlay, Q.C. and Joseph Walton, for the defendants, contrâ.—The defendants are not answerable for the approaches to their wharf. If the plaintiffs' contention is good, how far out into the river is the defendants' responsibility to extend? In The Moorcock (ubi sup.) the cause of the damage was the condition of the berth, and not the approach to it. The defendants could not know the draught of every ship that came to their wharf. It was the pilot's business to bring the ship alongside, and it was his negligence which caused the accident.

Lord Esher, M.R.—I do not think this case is to be decided as an action of deceit. It is an action of negligence, and is not one for misrepresentation by a person for whom the defendants are responsible. There must be some duty on the part of the defendants, and some breach of it by them, to enable the plaintiffs to succeed. The case is this: The defendants are the assignees of a bill of lading, and by it they had power to direct this ship to go to any place at Newport which they might point out. They ordered her, not to a place over which they had no control, but to a quay of their own, and then directed her to discharge her cargo. Had they ordered her to a place to which she could not get they would have been liable to pay demurrage. But, in fact, they ordered her to their own quay, which was fronting a tidal river, and in some way which is not told to us, and it signifies not, they were not only owners of the quay, but they were also leaseholders of the frontage of the quay; that is, of a considerable portion of the soil of the river in front of the quay. Of what does a quay consist? It is not merely a piece of land. It is not a quay unless it faces the water. Therefore it must have a water front. What is a quay used for? For the embarkation or disembarkation of goods coming to it or going from it by water. Therefore a quay is nothing without a water frontage. The fact that with the fall of the tide ships will take the ground makes no difference. That does not prevent it being a quay. Why? Because the vessels can lie there, even if they take the ground. Of what does the frontage consist? Not to the distance of half a mile from the wharf. It is impossible to define exactly the number of feet which make the frontage of a wharf. That must depend upon a variety of circumstances. But practically it is that portion of the frontage through which vessels must come before they can lie at the wharf, and of course of the frontage in which they must lie. Now, in this case what was the frontage of the wharf? There was a berth close to the wharf, so that a vessel lying in that berth would be made fast to the wharf, and there was another berth outside it, in which, if a vessel were to lie, she would be made fast to the other vessel, or by ropes taken across the other vessel to the quay. Both berths in which vessels lie for the purpose of using the quay form part of the frontage of the wharf. If so, how can it be said that the part between them was not also part of the frontage? It is obvious it would be.

Then the question arises, has the owner of the wharf or the person in possession of the wharf who allows others to use it, any duty in regard to the frontage of the wharf? Is he to be allowed to leave the frontage, which is a necessary part of the wharf, for the purpose of using it in any state he pleases, and to allow vessels which are coming to the wharf for his benefit to find out for themselves whether they can get there in safety or not? In the case of The Moorcock (ubi sup.) we held that that was not so, and that there was some duty. It was alleged in that case that there was an absolute warranty that the front of the wharf should be safe. Whether, if at any time it becomes necessary to decide that question, it will be held that there is such a warranty it is not necessary now to say. But we did hold in that case that a wharfinger must take reasonable care that the front of his wharf is in a state of safety, or, if it is not, to warn persons who are going to use it. That was a case where the shipowner had a right to send his ship there or not just as he pleased. But here the case is stronger, because the ship here was bound to go to the defendants' wharf by contract, whereas in The Moorcock (ubi sup.) the ship could use the wharf or not as she pleased. It has been argued that the pilots at Newport would know what was the state of the river, and therefore that the wharfinger had no duty towards the shipowner. Even if that were true, would he have no duty to the captain, who may or may not take a pilot? Therefore that argument cannot be good. Where wharfingers day after day have every means of knowing what the bottom of the river is, and do in fact know it, is it to be said that they have no duty in regard to the frontage in relation to the captain of a ship, who does not know what the bottom of the river is, but is bound to go to their wharf. I cannot think that honest business could be carried on if that were the law. He must have some duty towards captains using his wharf? It is said that he had no duty to the captain of this ship, because the pilot knew the condition of the frontage. How can that be? He was not bound to have a pilot? What is this duty? Is the duty confined to the place close to the wharf, or is the wharf-owner liable for damage done to a ship by her grounding upon a place which is in a dangerous state, and over which she must necessarily go to get into the berth at the wharf? Is that to be left in a state of danger, and is there to be no duty on the wharfinger to have it in a reasonable state of safety? In my opinion the duty of the wharfinger extends to that part of the frontage as well as to the actual spot where the ship will finally lie, and his duty is to keep it reasonably safe, or to tell those coming to his wharf that it is not safe. What was the state of this frontage? It has been urged that there is no evidence that the ridge was higher than the ordinary normal bottom of the river, and all that happened was that there were two berths or depressions, and between the two there was nothing which raised the bottom of the river above its normal level. Is that true? When you carefully examine into the matter, it seems to me to be demonstrated that it is not true, and that the ridge between the two berths was higher than the normal bottom of the river. Therefore there was a ridge on the day in question at the bottom of the river directly in front of the quay, and higher than the normal level. Of course, if there was this ridge, there was not the same quantity of water there as elsewhere, and that was why the ship went on the ground. Anything more dangerous than this ridge can hardly be imagined, and the almost inevitable result of it was what, in fact, occurred, viz., that the ship broke her back. How came that ridge to be there? Why it came from the way in which these wharfingers use their wharf and frontage for their own benefit. It comes from their having two berths, one outside the other, and hence when both berths are occupied there is an accumulation of mud between them and the ridge is formed. Therefore it was the use of the wharf and its frontage by the defendants which brought about this inequality, and caused there to be a less depth of water than there would have been if this ridge had not existed.

What was their duty under such circumstances? They ought not to have allowed the ridge to have accumulated to the extent they did. We do know that it was there on the morning when this accident happened. Therefore there was a neglect of duty on their part. It is, however, correct to say that, if the defendants' breach of duty was not the cause of the accident, and if it was caused by a want of care on the part of those in charge of the ship, the defendants would not be liable. Was there any reasonable want of care? The captain was responsible, because the pilot was only a servant, and if he ordered the pilot to go in he was bound to go in. It seems to me to be opposed to all notions of business to think that these pilots would be in the habit of going over this frontage merely because ships using this particular wharf would be there. The pilots would not go over it unless they were going to the wharf. If by reason of the way in which a wharf-owner uses his wharf the bottom of the river is from time to time altered, I cannot bring myself to say that all the pilots must know the condition of the bottom. Let us see what really occurred. The manager of the wharf made a statement in order that it might be acted upon by the master of the ship. He is the manager of those people who have ordered this ship to go to a particular wharf, and he makes a statement which comes to this: "You had better not come in to-day, but on Monday morning you can come in." That is said by a man who is the manager of the wharf, and has an opportunity of knowing the state of the river bed. I do not say it is a warranty nor even a statement of fact, but it is a statement on which a captain may reasonably act, he naturally supposing that this official would know the condition of the bottom of the river opposite his own wharf, to which his principals had ordered the ship to come. With regard to Griffiths, it is said that his duties were confined to managing the trucks. That I do not believe. It is useless to contend that Griffiths was not sent to help to bring this ship in and make her fast to the quay. When a man appears on the wharf as an official, and tells the captain of a ship something with regard to the frontage of the wharf, the state of which frontage depends upon the wharfinger, is it want of care on the part of the captain to accept what that man says? Therefore what these men said to the captain is sufficient to enable us to say that there was no want of reasonable care in what he did in attempting to take the ship to the berth. I am therefore of opinion that the defendants are liable for the damage sustained by this vessel, and that the appeal must be allowed.

Cotton, L.J.—I am of the same opinion, and think that the defendants are liable. The defendants were the lessees of a wharf in question, and the Calliope grounded on a ridge between two berths outside it. This ridge was formed by the defendants mooring for their own purposes vessels opposite their wharf in such a way that there was an accumulation of mud, which gradually grew higher and harder, between the two berths. I agree with the Master of the Rolls that this part of the bed of the river must be treated as a portion of the frontage of the wharf, because it is between the two berths at which vessels usually lie at the wharf. In my opinion the defendants are responsible for what happened in this place, and they had a duty towards persons whose ships came there; or, at the least, they were bound to warn persons so as to prevent them putting their ships in danger. I am therefore of opinion that it was a breach of duty on the defendants' part which caused the accident. But that does not necessarily conclude the case. There remains the question whether the plaintiffs were guilty of contributory negligence. On that I entirely agree with what the Master of the Rolls has said, the result being that the defendants are liable.

Lindley, L.J.—I am entirely of the same opinion. The learned judge in the court below failed to attribute sufficient weight to the fact that the ship was injured by grounding on the ground of the defendants. The defendants took the precaution from time to time of removing this ridge, but on the day in question the ground was uneven, a fact which the defendants knew was likely to occur. It appears that the Calliope grounded because there was not sufficient water to enable her to cross this ridge, which it was the defendants' duty to remove. Now, this is not an action of deceit, but of negligence. Why did the ship go to this wharf? She went there because she was bound to go by the terms of the charter-party, and upon the assumption that there would be enough water. Did those in charge of her fail to take any reasonable care? I cannot see that they did. In my opinion the ship grounded without negligence on the part of her master and crew, and I think the defendants are liable.

WESTRUP v. THE GREAT YARMOUTH STEAM CARRYING COMPANY LIMITED. (a)

*Towage services—Maritime lien—*3 & 4 Vict. c. 65.

In the liquidation of a steam-carrying company, and in a debenture-holder's action, a summons was taken out by the owners of steam-tugs asking that they might be declared entitled to a lien on the vessels of the company in respect of services rendered by the tugs in towing such vessels into and out of harbour.

Held, that towage services were not the subject of maritime lien; and that, therefore, the application must be refused.

THE above-named company was incorporated in Feb. 1884 under the Companies Acts 1862 to 1880 as a company limited by shares.

In pursuance of powers in that behalf conferred by its memorandum and articles of association the company borrowed for its purposes 40,000*l.* by the issue of mortgage debenture bonds.

On the 11th March 1889 this action was commenced against the company by Robert John Westrup (on behalf of himself and all others the holders of first mortgage debenture bonds of the company) to enforce the plaintiffs' securities, the company being insolvent and not having paid certain arrears of interest on the mortgage debenture bonds.

On the 12th March 1889 a receiver was duly appointed in this action.

On the 23rd March 1889 the company was ordered to be wound-up compulsorily by the court upon a petition presented by certain creditors of the company on the 9th March 1889.

On the 15th June 1889 the receiver in this action was duly appointed official liquidator in the winding-up.

On the 8th May 1889 it was ordered that the freehold and leasehold property of the company, and also the five steamers and thirty-two smacks and hulks, and other the property, assets, and effects of the company, except book-debts, should be sold with the approbation of the judge; and that the proceeds of such sale should be paid into court.

On the 12th July 1889 an interlocutory order was made in chambers for the usual accounts and inquiries in this action, which order, after stating that the judge did not require any further trial of the action other than such hearing, reserved the further consideration of the action.

A summons was subsequently taken out on behalf of George Nicholson and others, who were the joint owners of certain steam-tugs, for a declaration that they were entitled to a lien for towage services upon the vessels of the company to which they had rendered towage services, and for an order that they might be paid such claims in full, and the costs of and occasioned by the application, out of the proceeds of the sale of the company's vessels.

It appeared that during the five years that the company had carried on business the applicants' steam-tugs had continually performed towage services to the company's fishing vessels. Such towage services were all paid for up to the 2nd Oct. 1888, but had not been paid for since that date.

The towage services in question were in respect of towages in and out of Yarmouth harbour, and were therefore performed within the county, and not on the high seas.

The summons was adjourned into court, and now came on to be heard.

KAY, J.—This is simply a question whether there is any authority for the proposition that there exists a maritime lien for services rendered to a ship not in the nature of salvage, but in simply towing the ship. Of course, if it were towing for the purpose of salvage of the ship, nobody would hesitate to say that it must come within the principle applicable to salvage. But here it is admitted that there has been no salvage of that kind, but merely towage for the purpose of accelerating the speed of the ship either leaving or returning to the port. Now, the authority bearing upon the subject is as follows: In the case of The Henrich Björn (55 L. T. Rep. N. S. 66; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 1; 11 App. Cas. 270) Lord Bramwell discusses the meaning of sect. 6 of the statute 3 & 4 Vict. c. 65, which enacts "that the High Court of Admiralty shall have jurisdiction to decide all claims or demands whatsoever in the nature of salvage for services rendered to, or damage received by, any ship or seagoing vessel, or in the nature of towage, or for necessaries supplied to any foreign ship or seagoing vessel, and to enforce the payment thereof, whether such ship or vessel may have been within the body of a county, or upon the high seas, at the time when the services were rendered or damage received, or necessaries furnished, in respect of which such claim is made." That case was one in which necessaries were supplied, and the argument seems to have been that, because the Act I have just mentioned gave the High Court of Admiralty jurisdiction with respect to necessaries, therefore necessaries became the subject of maritime lien. Lord Bramwell, in answering that argument, said this: "Jurisdiction is by the section given in cases of towage, and it cannot be pretended that there was any maritime lien as to that when it occurs on the high seas. It was indeed said it was a sort of salvage; but it certainly is not. And the Admiralty Court, I take it, would have under the statute jurisdiction in a case of towage where the ship had been let and the owner was not liable." Then later on he said, "Jurisdiction as to towage was not created by the statute. It existed before with no maritime lien." Now that case came first before Sir James Hannen (49 L. T. Rep. N. S. 405; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 145; 8 Prob. Div. 151), and went on appeal to the Court of Appeal, by whom his decision was reversed (52 L. T. Rep. N. S. 560; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 391; 10 Prob. Div. 48). The judgment in the Court of Appeal, constituted of Lord Esher, M.R. and Bowen and Fry, L.JJ., was delivered by Fry, L.J. But in the part which I am about to read it was the judgment of them all, because, as has been pointed out, the Lord Justice begins by saying: "This judgment is that of the Master of the Rolls, Bowen L.J., and myself; but I should state that in that portion of it which decides that the agreement, which I shall presently read, is not a bottomry bond, the Master of the Rolls concurs with difficulty. But he unhesitatingly agrees with the remainder of the judgment." Now, these are the words used by the whole court, still commenting on the same 6th section of 3 & 4 Vict. c. 65: "It has been suggested that the way in which necessaries are associated with salvage and damage implies an intention to give in respect of necessaries the same lien as existed in respect of salvage; but the argument is not satisfactory, especially when it is observed that necessaries are more closely associated with towage, which gave no lien, than with salvage or damage." Therefore I have the considered opinion of Lord Esher and Bowen and Fry, L.JJ., confirmed by Lord Bramwell in the House of Lords, that towage on the high seas does not give a maritime lien.

Now, it has been argued, and I agree with the argument, that that statement of the law is not altogether extra-judicial, because it was a link in the argument on which the judgments were founded. The argument was this: "The statute does not give a maritime lien for necessaries in respect of which there was admittedly no maritime lien before the statute. It is said that it does give such a lien because the word 'necessaries' is coupled with the word 'salvage.' But it is also coupled with the word 'towage,' in respect of which likewise there is no maritime lien." I quite agree that it is a legitimate argument that that was an essential part of the ratio decidendi, and therefore those observations are rather more than extra-judicial dicta. Then what authority is there on the other side? No case has been cited in which the neat point has been argued and decided whether towage did give a maritime lien either on the high seas before the Act, or within the body of a county since the Act; but three cases have been cited in which towage has no doubt been treated as if it gave a maritime lien. They are The Isabella (3 Hagg. 427), La Constancia (4 Notes of Cases, 512), and the St. Lawrance (5 Prob. Div. 250). But in not one of those cases was the point argued. Towage was treated as though there was a maritime lien in respect of it when coupled with other things, as to which, in some of the cases, there was undoubtedly a maritime lien. That may have been because it was not worth while to insist upon the distinction (except in the case of The Isabella, ubi sup.) that the towage in question was towage in the nature of salvage. In the case of The Isabella it certainly was found that the towage was not in the nature of salvage; but there, again, I cannot find that there was any distinct argument or distinct decision on the point that towage differed from necessaries supplied to a ship in respect that it was the subject of maritime lien. Accordingly, I am bound to say that the weight of authority is against this application, and that it must be refused, and with costs.

QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION.

Oct. 24 and 25, 1889.

(Before HUDDLESTON, B. and MATHEW, J.)

Re AN ARBITRATION BETWEEN PYMAN BROTHERS AND DREYFUS BROTHERS. (a)

Charter-party — Lay days, commencement of — Demurrage—Arrival of ship.

By the terms of a charter-party the ship was to proceed to Odessa, or so near thereunto as she might safely get, and there load, from the factors of the freighters, a complete cargo of wheat. Twelve running days (Sundays excepted) were to be allowed the freighters for loading and unloading, and ten days on demurrage over and above the said lay days. The ship arrived in Odessa outer harbour on the 23rd Dec. 1888, but was not allowed to go alongside a quay loading berth, as the docks were full. The cargo was ready to be loaded on the 22nd Dec. 1888, and the charterers were ready and willing to load the same if and so soon as the vessel got a loading berth alongside a quay in the inner harbour at Odessa, where the cargo was stored, but not before. It was possible to load vessels at Odessa at a quay berth either in the inner or outer harbour, but in no other way. The ship was ordered to a quay loading berth in the inner harbour on the 8th Jan. 1889, and the charterers commenced the loading on the 10th Jan., which they completed on the 15th Jan. In arbitration proceedings between the shipowners and charterers the arbitrator found that the lay days expired on the 5th Jan. and that the charterers were liable for demurrage and detention.

Held (on motion to set aside the award), that the arbitrator was right, as the voyage was completed and the lay days commenced to run as soon as the ship had arrived in the outer harbour at Odessa and as near as she could get to a quay loading berth.

THIS was a motion to set aside an award.

By a charter-party dated the 3rd Oct. 1888 Messrs. Pyman Brothers, as owners of the steamship Lizzie English, agreed with Messrs. Dreyfus Brothers (inter alia) that the steamship Lizzie English should proceed to Constantinople, and as there ordered, within six running hours of arrival (or lay days to count) to Odessa or Sevastopol, or Theodosia, or so near thereunto as she might safely get, and there load (always afloat) from the factors of the said freighters a complete cargo of wheat $\frac{\text{and}}{\text{or}}$ seed $\frac{\text{and}}{\text{or}}$ grain at the option of the freighters, and being so loaded should proceed to a safe port in the United Kingdom, or a safe port on the Continent between Havre and Hamburg, twelve running days (Sunday excepted) to be allowed the said freighters (if the said steamer were not sooner despatched) for loading and unloading, and ten days on demurrage over and above the said lay days at fourpence per ton on the steamer's gross register tonnage per running day. The shipowners alleged that the Lizzie English was not loaded or discharged within the time limited by the charter-party, and was detained on demurrage for a long time at Odessa. The freighters denied the claim of the shipowners for demurrage, and it was agreed between the parties that the matter should be referred to arbitration.

The arbitrator found, as facts, that the Lizzie English reached Odessa outer harbour, and as near as she could get to a loading berth, on the 22nd Dec. 1888; that Messrs. Dreyfus Brothers received notice on that day from the captain that the steamship was ready to receive cargo; that the cargo was then ready to be loaded on the said steamship; that Messrs. Dreyfus Brothers were then ready and willing to load the same if, and so soon, as the said steamship got a loading berth alongside a quay in the inner harbour at Odessa, where the cargo was stored, but not before; that there were no practicable means of loading the said steamship at Odessa, except at, or alongside, a quay-berth either in the inner or outer harbour; that the harbour master at Odessa refused to allow the said steamship to go to a loading quay berth, either in the outer or the inner harbour at Odessa, until her regular turn came after the ships which had arrived at Odessa before her; that there was not at that time a custom at the port of Odessa that steamships under charter were not considered ready to receive cargo until after being moored alongside the quay; that the Lizzie English was ordered in her turn by the harbour master to a quay loading berth on the 8th Jan. 1889; that Messrs. Dreyfus Brothers began to load her on the 10th Jan.; and that her loading was completed on the 15th Jan. The arbitrator further found that the laying days of the Lizzie English expired on the 5th Jan., and that eleven days were occupied in loading and discharging her. Upon the above findings the arbitrator awarded that Messrs. Pyman Brothers were entitled to receive from Messrs. Dreyfus Brothers for demurrage and detention of the Lizzie English the sum of 456*l.* 16*s.*

Messrs. Dreyfus Brothers now moved that this award should be set aside or referred back to the arbitrator, on the ground that, as a matter of law on the facts as stated in the award, such award ought to have been in their favour.

Barnes, Q.C. and English Harrison in support of the motion.—The award is bad upon the face of it. This vessel could not be looked upon as an arrived ship until she had reached a place where the freighters could reasonably be expected to load. The lay days commenced to run from the time the Lizzie English reached a place of loading, not from the time when she entered the port of Odessa. The cases in support of this view are collected in Carver's "Carriage by Sea" (ed. 1885), p. 622. We rely particularly on

Brown v. Johnson, 11 L. J. 373, Ex.; 10 M. & W. 331; and Tapscott and others v. Balfour and others, 1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 501; 27 L. T. Rep. N. S. 710; L. Rep. 8 C. P. 46.

Cohen, Q.C. and J. G. Witt, in support of the award.—The decision of the arbitrator is correct on the facts which he has stated in his award. The number of days to be occupied in loading and discharging the Lizzie English were specified by the charter-party, and the freighter must bear the burden of any occurrence which may delay the loading or discharging of the vessel when she has arrived within the ambit of the place mentioned in the charter-party so long as that occurrence is not due to the fault of the master or owners:

Randall v. Lynch, 2 Camp. 352.

Here the Lizzie English was to proceed to Odessa, and the arbitrator has found that she might have been loaded alongside a quay berth in the outer harbour. The lay days commenced to run, as the arbitrator has found, from the time when she arrived as near as she could get to a quay berth in the outer harbour. In Nelson v. Dahl (41 L. T. Rep. N. S. 365; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 172; 12 Ch. Div. 568), the cases on this point are all reviewed in the judgment of the present Master of the Rolls. In that case the Court of Appeal and the House of Lords held that a contract to proceed to London, Surrey Commercial Docks, or so near thereunto as she could safely get, was not satisfied by the arrival of the vessel outside the docks, but was satisfied by her fulfilling the alternative of getting as near as she could to a discharging berth. In the present case the Lizzie English duly arrived in the harbour to which it had been agreed she should proceed, and where she might have been loaded. Evidence was admissible to prove that there is a custom at the port of Odessa that the lay days should not commence until a ship has arrived within a more limited space. The charterers tried in this case to establish such a custom, but failed, as the arbitrator found that there is no custom at Odessa by which the shipowner is bound to take his vessel alongside a quay loading berth, as was allowed to be proved in the case of the Norden Steamship Company v. Dempsey (1 C. P. Div. 654). In the case of Murphy v. Coffin and Co. (5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 531, n.; 12 Q. B. Div. 87) the vessel was bound by the terms of the charter-party to go alongside a particular wharf if so ordered, but there was no such provision here. In Tapscott and others v. Balfour and others (27 L. T. Rep. N. S. 710; 1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 501; L. Rep. 8 C. P. 46) some time elapsed after the entry of the vessel into the dock selected by the charterers before she was allowed to go to the usual place of loading; but, as it was shown that she could have been loaded from lighters in the dock, it was held that the lay days commenced to run from the time she entered the dock. The following cases were also cited:

Brereton v. Chapman, 7 Bing. 559;

Ford and others v. Cotesworth and another, 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 190, 468; 23 L. T. Rep. N. S. 165; L. Rep. 5 Q. B. 544;

Harris v. Jacobs, 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 530; 54 L. T. Rep. N. S. 61; 15 Q. B. Div. 247.

Barnes, Q.C. in reply.

Huddleston, B.—I am of opinion that in this case the decision of the arbitrator is correct and the shipowners must succeed. The arbitrator has stated certain facts on the face of his award for the purpose of enabling the parties to obtain the decision of the court as to the correctness of his view of the law bearing upon these facts. By the terms of the charter-party the vessel was to proceed to Constantinople, and then to proceed as there ordered to one of three places, of which one was Odessa, or as near thereunto as she might safely get, and there load, twelve running days (Sunday excepted) to be allowed the freighters for loading and unloading, and ten days on demurrage over and above the said lay days. From the facts, as stated in the award, the owner of the vessel appears to have fulfilled his contract. It appears to be clear that the ship might have been loaded in the outer harbour, for the arbitrator finds that there were no practicable means of loading her at Odessa, except at or alongside a quay berth either in the inner or outer harbour. He has also found that there was at that time no custom at Odessa that steamships under charter were only considered ready to receive cargo when moored alongside the quays. The real reason why she was not loaded sooner appears to be that the harbour was full, and the harbour master would not allow her to go to a quay-loading berth until her turn arrived. Over that proceeding neither the shipowners nor the charterers had any control. It seems quite clear that the freighters were not prepared to put their cargo on board in the outer harbour.

Mr. Cohen has very properly conceded that they had a right to occupy some of the stipulated lay days in requiring the ship to go to any place where it would be most convenient to them to load her. The question is, when the lay days commenced to run, so as to ascertain when demurrage became payable. The whole of the argument is therefore narrowed down to this—whether, according to the terms of the charter-party, the lay days commenced to run from the time the vessel arrived within the outer harbour, or from the time she reached a practicable berth for the purpose of loading. Mr. Cohen has referred us to the case of Nelson v. Dahl (41 L. T. Rep. N. S. 365; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 172; 12 Ch. Div. 568), where I find that Brett, L.J. says: "'The place so named'—i.e., in the charter-party—" may give a description of a larger space, in several parts of which a ship may load, as a port or dock; or it may be the description of a limited space in which the ship must be in order to load, as a particular quay, or a particular quay-berth, or a particular part of a port or dock. If, when the charter is made, the ship is already in the place named, the shipowner may place the ship at the disposition of the charterer as soon as the ship is ready, so far as she is concerned, to load, by giving notice thereof to the charterer. If the place named be of the larger description, as a port or dock, the notice may be given, though the ship is not then in the particular part of the port or dock in which the particular cargo is to be loaded; but, if the place named is of the more limited description, the notice cannot be given until the ship is at the named place, though the ship is in the port or dock in which the named place is situated." Now, in the present case, the contract which was entered into by the parties, was not that the ship should go to Odessa, and there load in the inner harbour, but that it should go to Odessa and there load. It seems to me that the shipowner satisfied the requirements of this contract as soon as the vessel had entered the outer harbour, and notice had been given to the charterers of her readiness to receive cargo; and that from that period the lay days commenced. In the case of Murphy v. Coffin and Co. (5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 531, n.; 12 Q. B. Div. 87), which has been cited to us, the charterers had taken the precaution to provide by the charter-party that the vessel should proceed to the port of discharge and deliver the cargo alongside the consignee's, or railway, wharf, or into lighters, or any vessel, or wharf, where she might safety deliver it, as ordered. There was no such provision in the charter-party in this case. I accede to the principle of law laid down in the authorities which have been cited to us. I think that the arbitrator was right, and that this motion must be refused.

Mathew, J.—I am of the same opinion. The case of Nelson v. Dahl (41 L. T. Rep. N. S. 365; 12 Ch. Div. 568) contains a most accurate guide to all the previous authorities on this subject, and therefore it does not seem to me to be necessary to go through all the cases which have been referred to. Now, it appears that the port to which the vessel, about which the present question arises, was to proceed, is provided with various loading quays in the outer and the inner harbour. Mr. Cohen seems to me to have placed the proper construction on the contract, when he said that under it the charterers were entitled, when the vessel arrived at Odessa, to require the captain to take her to a convenient loading berth, provided he did not occupy more than the stipulated lay days in so doing. If the contract had contained no stipulation as to the time within which the loading was to take place, the shipowner might have been subject to the risk of any delay occasioned by the ship being taken to any particular wharf. Perhaps the time has not yet arrived for laying down any clear rule applicable to all contracts of this sort, or for unearthing the principle which underlies all the authorities on this subject; but I think that where a port to which a vessel has been chartered to go, has within it several places for loading or discharge, and the contract contains a time within which the vessel must be loaded or discharged, the particular place at which the vessel is to be loaded or discharged remains at the option of the merchant, subject to the condition that the obligation of loading and discharging within the stipulated time must be borne by him, and if from any circumstances, not the fault of the shipowner, the ship cannot be loaded within that time, the responsibility for the delay must be borne by the merchant. In the present case, the place chosen by the merchant for loading was one at which the vessel could not load upon her arrival at the place named in the charter-party, and she was obliged to wait for a considerable period before she was able to do so. For that delay I consider that the merchant is liable under his contract.

CARNEGIE v. CONNOR AND CO. (a)

Charter-party — Construction — Guarantee as to ship's capacity.

A charter-party provided that the ship should load a cargo of creosoted sleepers and timber and therewith immediately proceed to Smyrna. The charterer to have the option of shipping 200 tons of general cargo. The charter-party contained the following words: "owners guarantee ship to carry at least about 90,000 cubic feet, or 1500 tons dead weight." A lump sum of 1000l. was payable as freight. The ship was, in fact, able to load only 65,000 cubic feet, equivalent to 1120 tons dead weight, of the cargo specified in the charter-party, and the master refused to receive 8000 creosoted sleepers which had been sent alongside by the charterer. In an action brought by the charterer to recover damages against the owners.

Held, that the words in the charter-party did not amount to a guarantee that the ship would carry the named quantity of the cargo mentioned in the charter-party, and that evidence to show that she would carry such quantity of dead-weight cargo was admissible, and that such evidence having been rejected there must be a new trial.

THIS was an appeal from the Mayor's Court.

The action, which was tried before the Recorder of London and a special jury, was brought to recover damages for breach of stipulations in a charter-party, alleged by the plaintiff to amount to a guarantee of the carrying capacity of the steamship Dotterell. The charter-party provided that the Dotterell should be Placed at the charterer's usual loading berth in the Victoria Dock and there load a cargo of creosoted sleepers and timbers. Charterer has option of shipping 100 to 200 tons of general cargo. Any piece exceeding two tons in weight to be put in at charterer's expense, the remainder of the cargo to be taken in with ship's steam cranes or winches. The necessary wood for stowage to be provided by the ship. Owners guarantee ship to carry at least about 90,000 cubic feet, or 1500 tons dead weight of cargo, and charterer to have the full range of ship's hold and usual stowing places for the stowage of such cargo; and being so loaded shall therewith immediately proceed on her voyage to Smyrna and deliver the same always afloat. . . . The freight to be as follows: one thousand pounds lump sum, £500 payable on sailing, and remainder within fourteen days less freight payable abroad. . . . Timber may consist of teak scantlings in cases about 23 feet long or otherwise, always provided steamer can reasonably stow the same. The owners to employ their own stevedores at ports of loading and discharge.

(a) Reported by ALFRED H. LEFROY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Stevedores employed by the owners loaded the vessel with a full cargo, which consisted of 17,108 creosoted sleepers, 110 iron joists, 400 pieces of timber, 1015 cases of teak, 24 barrels of oil, and a small quantity of other articles. This cargo occupied 64,400 cubic feet, and amounted to 1120 tons dead weight. After the vessel was full, more than 8000 creosoted sleepers were sent alongside by the charterer, but were refused by the master, and were sent on by the charterer, in another vessel. The plaintiff sought to recover from the defendants the sum of 488l., which was the amount of freight paid by him in respect of the sleepers so rejected, at the rate of 15*s.* 3*d.* per ton. The learned Recorder directed the jury that the words in the charter-party, "owners guarantee ship to carry at least about 90,000 cubic feet or 1500 tons dead weight of cargo," amounted to an absolute guarantee that the steamship Dotterell could and should carry at least 1500 tons dead weight, or 90,000 cubic feet of the kind of cargo described in the charter-party and tendered by the plaintiff, and refused to admit evidence which was tendered on behalf of the defendants to show that the vessel had a carrying capacity of 90,000 cubic feet with reference to an ordinary cargo. On this direction the jury found a verdict for the plaintiff for the full amount of his claim.

The defendants accordingly moved that judgment should be entered for them, or that a new trial should be granted on the ground that the learned recorder was wrong in law in holding that the charter-party amounted to an absolute guarantee that the Dotterel could and should carry at least 1500 tons dead weight or 90,000 cubic feet of the kind of cargo described in the charter-party.

Bucknill, Q.C. (W. E. Hume Williams with him) for the defendants. — The recorder would not allow us to show that the ship could carry 90,000 cubic feet of ordinary cargo. The words in the charter-party only mean that she is capable of carrying so much part measurement and part dead weight of an ordinary cargo. They are words of expectation only.

Wheeler, Q.C. (Palmer with him) for the plaintiff.—The charter-party distinctly mentioned the goods to be carried and the guarantee related to a cargo of that description. The words in the charter-party are words of contract, as in Morris v. Levison (34 L. T. Rep. N. S. 576; 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 171; 11 C. P. Div. 155), and not words of expectation.

HUDDLESTON, B.—It seems to be quite clear that there has been a miscarriage in this case, and therefore it must go down for a new trial. The verdict appears to have proceeded on the decision of the learned recorder that the words in the charter-party, "90,000 cubic feet or 1500 tons dead weight," was a guarantee that the ship would carry that quantity of the cargo provided by the charter-party. The inference sought to be arrived at by the plaintiff is that there was a guarantee that the ship would carry 90,000 cubic feet of creosoted sleepers and timber; but then it must be borne in mind that the charterers were to have the option of shipping from 100 to 200 tons of general cargo. That is the contract, and then it goes on to show what the vessel will carry, viz., 90,000 cubic feet or 1500 tons. The case of Morris v. Levison (34 L. T. Rep. N. S. 576; 1 C. P. Div. 155), which has been quoted, is altogether different to this case, because there the contract was to carry a full and com plete cargo. and 1100 tons were described as what would be a full and complete cargo. Here the contract is merely to carry creosoted sleepers and timber, and then the provision is that the vessel will contain and carry 90,000 cubic feet or 1500 tons. We do not think that is a guarantee that she will carry that quantity of this particular cargo, therefore the view taken by the learned recorder was, in our opinion, wrong, and under these circumstances there will be a new trial.

MATHEW, J.—I am of the same opinion. I do not think there is any indication in this charter-party of an intention to guarantee that this ship should carry the cargo specified in the charter-party to the extent mentioned. The evidence which was proposed to be given by Mr. Bucknill, that this ship could carry 90,000 cubic feet or 1500 tons of dead-weight cargo, and which was objected to, appears to me to have been perfectly relevant to the issue, and I think that it ought to have been received. The learned recorder excluded that evidence, and informed the jury that the ship was bound to carry 250 tons more than she could possibly carry. It appears to me that the learned recorder was wrong, and that the jury ought not to have been so directed.

Order for a new trial.

STEAMSHIP COUNTY OF LANCASTER v. SHARPE AND CO. (a)

Demurrage—Consignee acting as agent—Liability of—Bill of lading incorporating charter-party.

Consignees under a bill of lading making the goods deliverable to them "paying freight and all other conditions as per charter-party," are not liable to pay demurrage stipulated for by the charter-party and incurred at the port of loading, though they have taken delivery of the goods, provided they are, and are known to the shipowners to be, acting as agents, and have refused to accept delivery in the terms of the bill of lading, and have repudiated all liability for demurrage before accepting delivery.

Wegener v. Smith (24 L. J. 25, C. P.; 15 C. B. 285) distinguished.

THIS was a motion by way of appeal from a decision of the County Court judge of Liverpool.

The facts of the case were as follows:—The plaintiffs were the owners of the steamship County of Lancaster. The defendants were the consignees named in a bill of lading, by virtue of which they claimed delivery of the cargo conveyed by the County of Lancaster from Fowey to Liverpool. The charter-party, which the defendants signed as agents for the charterers, contained a clause to the following effect, viz., that the cargo was to be loaded, as customary, at Fowey, if longer detained, demurrage at 9*l.* a day. The bill of lading referred to the charter-party in the following terms: "The consignees paying freight and all other conditions as per charter-party." The County of Lancaster was detained three days at Fowey, the port of loading, and on her arrival at Liverpool the plaintiffs claimed from the defendants 27*l.* for demurrage, under the terms of the charter-party.

The defendants repudiated their liability, and demanded delivery of the goods on payment of the freight, offering at the same time to obtain the bond of their principals for the payment of any amount which might be due for demurrage. Ultimately, a portion of the cargo was delivered by the master of the ship to the defendants, the remainder being retained by the plaintiffs under their lien.

The plaintiffs brought an action against the defendants in the County Court to recover the sum of 27*l.*, the amount of their claim for demurrage. The County Court judge before whom the action was tried nonsuited the plaintiffs, who appealed.

Joseph Walton for the plaintiffs.—The County Court judge was wrong in nonsuiting the plaintiffs. The bill of lading contained the words, "and all other conditions as per charter-party," and the fact that the defendants claimed and took delivery of the goods under the bill of lading is strong, if not conclusive, evidence that they accepted the duty of paying the claim for demurrage. In the case of Allen v. Coltart (48 L. T. Rep. N. S. 944; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 104; 11 Q. B. Div. 782), Cave, J. says: "It appears to me, however, that the plaintiffs are entitled to maintain this action quite independently of 18 & 19 Vict. c. 3. As far back as 1811 it was held, in Cock v. Taylor (13 East, 399), that, where the master of the ship had contracted by bill of lading with the shippers to deliver goods to certain persons, or their assigns, he or they paying freight for the same, the demanding and taking of such goods from the master by a purchaser and assignee of the bill of lading without the freight having been paid was evidence of a new agreement by him, as the ultimate appointee of the shippers, for the purpose of delivery, to pay the freight due for the carriage of such goods, the delivery of which was only stipulated to be made to the consignees named in the bill or their assigns, he or they paying freight for the said goods. It is true that that decision only extends to the payment of freight, but that is because that was the only condition of delivery in the bill of lading there under consideration. The ground of the decision is, that where goods are deliverable to the holder of a bill of lading on certain conditions being complied with, the act of demanding delivery is evidence of an offer on his part to comply with those conditions, and the delivery accordingly by the master is evidence of his acceptance of that offer. . . . Thus, in Wegener v. Smith (24 L. J. 25, C. P.; 15 C. B. 285) it was held that the acceptance of a cargo by the indorsee of the bill of lading, whereby the goods were deliverable to order 'against payment of the agreed freight, and other conditions as per charter-party,' was a circumstance from which the jury might imply a contract on his part to pay demurrage, stipulated for by the charter-party, notwithstanding his refusal at the time of receiving the goods to pay the demurrage." The facts in this case are precisely similar to those in Wegener v. Smith (ubi sup.), as the consignees here claim the goods only under the bill of lading, and yet protest against the validity of the plaintiff's claim for demurrage. [MATHEW, J.—In the case of Wegener v. Smith (ubi sup.) the repudiation was after the acceptance of the goods, and the defendants there were not agents.] The case of Gray v. Carr and another (25 L. T. Rep. N. S. 215; 1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 115; L. Rep. 6 Q. B. 522) was also cited.

T. G. Carver for the defendants.—The County Court judge was sitting without a jury, and found as a fact that the defendants did not accept this liability, and that there was no contract on his part to pay the demurrage claimed. The expression "nonsuit" in his note amounts to no more than that. The defendants were merely agents to pay freight and take delivery, but not to pay demurrage. The acceptance of goods under a bill of lading which incorporates the charter-party may be some evidence of an implied contract to pay demurrage, but it is by no means conclusive. In this case the defendants refused to take the cargo if the plaintiffs insisted on their paying demurrage. If any promise to pay demurrage can be implied from the evidence, it was merely a promise by the defendants acting as agents on behalf of their principals:

Amos v. Temperley, 8 M. & W. 798;
Moller v. Young, 25 L. J. 94, Q. B.

The liability of the consignee only arises when the loading is at an end:

Gullischen v. Stewart Brothers, 50 L. T. Rep. N. S. 47; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 200; 13 Q. B. Div. 317.

The case of Gray v. Carr (25 L. T. Rep. N. S. 215; 1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 115; L. Rep. 6 Q. B. 522) is a decision upon the question as to the shipowners' right to lien.

Joseph Walton in reply.—In the case of Jesson v. Solly (4 Taunt. 52), Heath, J. says: "It is clear that the plaintiff is entitled to demurrage either from the consignor or consignee. Demurrage is only an extended freight, and the consignee by adopting this bill of lading, makes himself liable to demurrage as well as to freight." In the same case Chambre, J. says: "It would be monstrous if the consignee, accepting the contract with knowledge of the terms, should not be bound by it, and could send the captain back to the consignor for demurrage." The principle to be deduced from this case is that acceptance of goods by a consignee is evidence of his accepting the terms of the bill of lading.

HUDDLESTON, B.—The County Court judge decided this case on the evidence which was before him, though he appears to have said that he nonsuited the plaintiffs. I think that, acting as judge and jury, he arrived at the conclusion that the plaintiffs had not made out their case. Now, the claim of the plaintiffs is for demurrage. On the arrival of the vessel at Liverpool, on the 29th March, a discussion arose as to delivery. The defendants at once repudiated all liability for demurrage, but expressed their willingness to pay freight, and take delivery of the goods. It is not denied that the defendants were acting merely as agents, and that that fact was known to the plaintiffs is obvious from the evidence, for in the charter-party the defendants are described as agents for the charterers. There is this further noticeable fact, that they offered to procure the bond of their principals to meet the claim for demurrage. The plaintiffs, therefore, had full notice of the defendants' objection to satisfy their demand, and, notwithstanding this, they proceeded to deliver a portion of the cargo to them, at the same time retaining in their possession a sufficient portion to cover demurrage. Mr. Walton contended that the action of the defendants in claiming and taking delivery of a portion of the goods under the bill of lading which contains the clause, "all conditions as per charter-party," one condition therein being the payment of all claims for demurrage, imported a contract on the part of the defendants to pay demurrage. It is not suggested that they have incurred any liability under the Bills of Lading Act (18 & 19 Vict. c. 111). The County Court judge was correct in holding that there was not enough evidence to support the plaintiffs' contention that the defendants had incurred any liability in respect of demurrage. The case of Wegener v. Smith (24 L. J. 25, C. P.; 15 C. B. 285) was relied upon by Mr. Walton, but, as my brother Mathew has pointed out, in that case the defendants were not agents, and it appears to be clear that the repudiation of liability took place subsequent to the delivery of the goods, whereas in this case the defendants repudiated their liability prior to the delivery of the goods, and as soon as the question was raised. Under these circumstances the County Court judge was right in coming to the conclusion that there was no contract, or if there was evidence of a contract there was not sufficient evidence to render the defendants liable. This appeal must be dismissed.

MATHEW, J.—I am of the same opinion. There can be no doubt that if the evidence showed that any part of the cargo had been received by the defendants under the terms of the bill of lading it was evidence that they undertook to pay the claim for demurrage. Mr. Walton was unable to show that any part of the cargo had been so received. The defendants appear to have only taken the goods on the terms that they would not be liable for demurrage incurred. The case of Wegener v. Smith (24 L. J. 25, C. P.; 15 C. B. 285) has been relied on, but that case is not conclusive. There the defendants repudiated the claim for demurrage after they had received delivery of the goods under their bill of lading. That view of the case is confirmed by the words of Jervis, C.J. in Smith v. Sieveking (5 E. & B. 589), where he says that the demurrage for which the consignee was held liable accrued "from his own delay at the port of discharge," and not at the port of loading. The liability was due to his own misconduct after the arrival of the vessel. Doubtless repudiation of such a liability after acceptance of the goods would amount to nothing, as Maule, J. said in that case.

Appeal dismissed.

Jones v. The Bangor Mutual Shipping Insurance Society Limited. (a)

Insurance—Marine— Mutual insurance society—Rules—Double insurance — Mortgage on ship, notice of by member—Waiver.

By one of the rules of a mutual marine insurance society, it was provided that vessels of a certain class should not be insured for more than three-fourths of their value, and that "if any member insure or attempt to insure elsewhere any ship share or shares in any ship already insured in this society, he shall be liable to immediate expulsion and to forfeiture of any claim or demand he may have against the society." By another rule it was provided as follows: "If it comes to the notice of any member that any vessel or share of a vessel insured by the society is mortgaged, he shall immediately give notice in writing of the name and address of the mortgagee. The board of directors may then require the mortgagee to give such security as they deem necessary for the payment to them of all sums which are or may become due on account of such insurance. If such notice is not given, or if the mortgagee refuse to give such security as the society requires, the member in whose name the insurance is registered shall during the existence of such mortgage forfeit all claims upon the society in respect of such vessel or share to the extent of such mortgage thereon."

P. on behalf of the owner of the ship "Bolina" insured her in the defendants' society for 600l. P. was entered in the society's books as the policy-holder, and the policy was issued to him. The "Bolina" was at the time when the insurance was effected insured in another society for 300l., of which insurance the defendants had knowledge, and the sum of 300l. together with the 600l. above-mentioned amounted to more than three-fourths, but less than the whole amount at which the directors of the defendant society valued her. During the subsistence of the policy P. became aware that the "Bolina" had been mortgaged by the owner for 300l., but no notice of the mortgage was ever given to the society. In an action by the representatives of the owner:

Held, that the society after issuing the policy of insurance on the "Bolina," with knowledge that she was insured elsewhere, were estopped from relying on the rule as to double insurance; but that as P., who was a member of the society, had not given notice of the mortgage of which he had knowledge, the amount of that mortgage must be deducted from the sum payable under the policy.

Special case stated by an arbitrator under an order of Mathew, J., dated the 29th June 1889. The facts of the case were, so far as material, as follows:

The action was commenced on the 24th March 1888 by the plaintiff, who, as administratrix of Robert Jones deceased, claimed 600*l.* as the amount of insurance money due under a policy of marine insurance on the ship Bolina dated the 18th Jan. 1887.

The ship Bolina was a vessel of 98 tons registered tonnage, and was built in the year 1867. From the register it appeared that forty-eight shares stood in the name of Robert Jones the deceased, and four shares in the name of Robert Pritchard, and the remainder in the names of three other persons. Robert Jones died on the 26th Sept. 1886. On the 9th Feb. 1882 the said forty-eight shares belonging to Robert Jones were mortgaged by him to W. Jones, and they continued so mortgaged till the loss of the vessel. The first application to insure the Bolina was made by Robert Jones, and the entrance fees were paid by him. The defendants sent to R. A. Pritchard, appointed by Robert Jones as the ship's husband, a proposal form for insurance, which was duly filled up by him. In this proposal form it was stated that the Bolina was already insured to the extent of 300*l.* at Nevin. The ship, classed A 1 at Lloyd's, was valued at 1200*l.*, and the sum for which she was to be insured was set down at 600*l.* The proposal was accepted by the defendants, and a policy of insurance in the sum of 600*l.* was issued by the defendants in accordance therewith. The said policy was as follows:

Whereas Mr. R. A. Pritchard, shipbuilder, Pwllheli, has become a member of the Bangor Mutual Ship Insurance Society Limited, and in respect of the ship afternamed entitled to this policy. Now this policy of insurance witnesseth that, in consideration of the premises and of the observance by the assured of the provisions of the articles of association of the said society, the said society hereby agrees with the insured to pay and make good all such losses and damages as according to the same it shall be liable for in respect of the sum of 600*l.* hereby insured, which insurance is hereby declared to be upon the ship called the Bolina, valued at 1200*l.*, whereof Robert Jones is at present master, or whoever else shall go for master of the said ship, lost or not lost. And the said association promises and agrees that the insurance aforesaid shall commence upon the said ship at and from noon of the 1st day of Jan. 1886 until noon of the 1st day of Jan. 1887.

The name of the policy-holder was entered in the society's register as R. A. Pritchard, shipbuilder, Pwllheli. R. A. Pritchard carried on the business and performed all the duties of his father, Robert Pritchard, who appeared from the ship's register to be the managing owner, and in whose name stood four shares in the vessel. R. A. Pritchard never held any shares in the ship. The Bolina was insured in the Carnarvon and Nevin Mutual Marine Insurance Company for a sum of 300*l.* on the 1st Jan. 1886, in the name of R. A. Pritchard, to whom the policy was forwarded, and this fact was known to the defendants at the time of the issue of the above policy. The Bolina was, in Nov. 1886, valued by the directors of the defendant society at 1050*l.*, and notice of the reduction was forwarded to R. A. Pritchard. On the 1st Jan. 1887 the insurance of the Bolina for 300*l.* in the Carnarvon and Nevin Mutual Insurance Company was renewed, and in the policy then issued the vessel was valued at 1000*l.* On the 18th Jan. 1887 a new policy in the same form as the first was issued by the defendants and forwarded to R. A. Pritchard, in which the amount of insurance was continued at 600*l.*, but the valuation was reduced to 1050*l.* On the 12th Jan. 1887 the Bolina became a total loss off the Scilly Isles, and the sum of 300*l.*, for which she was insured in the Carnarvon and Nevin Mutual Insurance Company, was duly paid to the plaintiff by the company. Notice of the loss was at once telegraphed to the defendants. The defendants, after a claim had been made by

(a) Reported by Alfred H. Lefroy, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

R. A. Pritchard for payment of the insurance moneys, raised the objection that the ship had been insured for more than three-fourths of her value, and that they were not liable, under the rules of the society, to pay the full amount of 600*l.* for which she was insured with them. A notice was sent to R. A. Pritchard on the 3rd Sept. 1887 of a call in respect of the insurance on the Bolina. No notice of the existence of any mortgage upon the vessel was given to the defendants at any time, nor had they any knowledge of the mortgage above referred to until some time during the year 1889. R. A. Pritchard was first informed of the existence of the said mortgage soon after the death of Robert Jones in Sept. 1886. No notice to terminate the insurance effected with the defendants in 1886 was given by them at any time.

The rules of the society, which formed part of the case, were as follows:—

By rule 43 it was provided that:

The value of every vessel or share of a vessel offered to the society for insurance shall be fixed by the board of directors. Vessels A 1 at Lloyd's will be placed in the first class; all other vessels will be placed in the second class. First-class vessels shall not be insured beyond three-fourths of the value, and second-class vessels shall not be insured beyond two-thirds of the value fixed by the board. Immediately after any vessel has been surveyed and valued by the board, they will give notice in writing to the person proposing the insurance, of the amount of risk the society are willing to accept on the share or shares in the ship proposed for insurance. If any member insure or attempt to insure elsewhere, any ship, share, or shares in any ship already insured in this society, he or she shall be liable to immediate expulsion, and to forfeiture of any claim or demand he or she may have against the society, but shall nevertheless remain liable in every respect to any claim the society may have against her or him.

The marginal note to the latter part of the rule was, "Duplicate Insurance not allowed."

By rule 51 it was provided as follows:

If it comes to the notice of any member that any vessel or share of a vessel insured by the society is mortgaged, he shall immediately give notice in writing of the name and address of the mortgagee. The board of directors may then require the mortgagee to give such security as they deem necessary for the payment to them of all sums which are or may become due on account of such insurance. If such notice is not given, or if the mortgagee refuse to give such security as the society requires, the member in whose name the insurance is registered shall, during the existence of such mortgage, forfeit all claim upon the society in respect of such vessel or share to the extent of such mortgage thereon, but shall nevertheless continue liable for any payments due to the society, in like manner as if such mortgage had not been made, and such member were the absolute owner of such vessel or share.

The defendants appeared before the arbitrator and gave evidence, but protested that there having been no arbitration, as provided by one of the society's rules, the plaintiff had no right of action. They further contended that the value of the Bolina having been fixed by the defendants' board of directors at 1050*l.*, and notice thereof having been duly given to the person proposing the insurance, the ship was only entitled to be insured under rule 43, to the extent of three-fourths of that value, viz., 787*l.* 10*s.* less the insurance effected with the Carnarvon and Nevin Company, or a net sum of 487*l.* 10*s.*; and that that rule having been infringed, the plaintiff was not entitled to maintain the action at all, or alternatively that she was only entitled to recover the said sum of 487*l.* 10*s.* from the defendants, less certain deductions for expenses of surveying the wreck, &c. They also contended that Robert Jones or R. A. Pritchard, or one of them, was a member of the defendants' society, and that they having notice of the mortgage above referred to, and neither of them having given notice to the defendants, as required by rule 51, the defendants were further entitled to deduct the amount of such mortgage from the amount which would have been otherwise due under the policy.

For the plaintiff it was contended (inter alia) that rule 43 only applied to insurances in the defendants' society, irrespective of any insurances that might be effected elsewhere; that the defendants, having issued the policy of the 18th Jan. 1887, with knowledge that the vessel was then insured in the Carvarvon and Nevin Company for 300*l.*, and with knowledge of the loss of the vessel, having given a notice of call on the 3rd Sept. 1887 in respect of the loss of the Bolina, they had waived the requirements of the rule. It was further contended for the plaintiff that neither Robert Jones nor R. A. Pritchard was a member of the society, and that the object of rule 51 was only to secure payment of calls, and also that the mortgage came to an end when the vessel became a total loss.

The questions for the opinion of the Court were:

1. Whether the Bolina was entitled to be insured in the defendants' society for 600*l.* or for 487*l.* 10*s.* only, and whether the plaintiff was entitled to maintain the action at all.

2. Whether Robert Jones or R. A. Pritchard was a member of the society within the meaning of the rules, and if either of them was such a member, as no notice was given by them or either of them to the defendants of the existence of the mortgage referred to in paragraph 2, whether the amount of that mortgage was to be deducted by the defendants from the amount, if any, found to be due from them to the plaintiff.

Maclachlan for the plaintiff.—The order of Mathew, J. was right, and was confirmed by the Court of Appeal. [Crump, Q.C. for the defendants, withdrew the objection taken before the arbitrator as to the plaintiffs' right of action.] The Bolina had been already insured when she was valued and accepted by the directors of the defendant society. She was not over insured, and not even insured for her full value. The rule was never intended to prevent insurance by the members of the society of the risk which the society would not take. As to the rule dealing with mortgages, Pritchard cannot be considered as a member of the society; and, secondly, the mortgage came to an end with the destruction of the subject-matter, and the 300*l.* for which the vessel was mortgaged is a mere personal debt.

Crump, Q.C. and Douglas for the defendants.—The owner of this vessel was not entitled under rule 43 to insure for more than three-fourths of 1050*l.* It was intended by these rules that every member should be his own underwriter to the extent of one-fourth of the value of his ship. The effect of rule 51 is to prevent the plaintiff from recovering the amount for which the vessel was mortgaged, notice not having been given to the society by Pritchard, who, without doubt, was a member. They cited

Turnbull v. Woolfe, 11 W. R. 55; and
Alexander v. Campbell, 27 L. T. Rep. N. S. 462.

Maclachlan in reply.—The object of rule 51 is merely to secure that the society shall obtain payment of all calls that may be made.

Mathew, J.—In this case the purely technical point that the proceedings should have been by arbitration has been very properly abandoned. If it had been necessary to interpret the order of the Court of Appeal, I should have considered that the intention of that court was that the case should come before us as if it had been stated by an arbitrator appointed under the rules. The first point made against the plaintiff is, that the action should have been brought by R. A. Pritchard. I think that there is no force in that objection, for though by the terms of the rules Pritchard is a member of the association, it does not follow that because he could sue he would be the real plaintiff. In an action on such a policy of insurance interest must be averred, and it must be stated in whom the interest is and for whom the policy has been effected. The person for whom the policy has been effected, and in whom the interest is, becomes the real plaintiff, and bears all the obligations and liabilities of the action. Secondly, it was said that rule 43 was an answer to this action. That rule was framed to prevent double insurance, but as counsel pointed out to us, the terms of the rule go beyond that. No member is allowed to insure more than three-quarters of the value of his ship, and if any member attempts to insure elsewhere, he is liable to expulsion and forfeiture. Mr. Crump said that the object of the rule was to compel every member to remain his own underwriter to the extent of at least one-fourth of the value of his ship. But I am not satisfied that that contention is well founded. I do not think that the rule is a bar to insurance elsewhere. But it is not necessary to decide that point. The defendants in this case have not brought themselves within the terms of the rule. They knew from the first that there was another insurance on the ship, and it is obvious from their conduct that they did not intend that this rule should destroy the value of policies on the ship, so long as they did not exceed her insurable value. The total amount for which the policies were effected was below that value. The directors of the society, therefore, knowing that another policy had been effected, and having taken the premiums on the policy granted by themselves, are estopped by their conduct from relying on rule 43 as a defence to this action. Their proper course was to have expelled the member and forfeited the insurance at once, and then the owner of the vessel might have insured elsewhere.

With regard to the last point made by the defendants—namely, that rule 51 debars the plaintiff from recovering to the extent of the mortgage, I regret that it must prevail. The real object of the rule was to secure that there should be a proper person to provide for the payment of all calls to be made by the society. It is clear that Pritchard was a member of the society, and had notice of the mortgage soon after the death of Jones, and some time therefore before the loss of the ship, though his attention was not called to the rule. He did not give the defendants notice of the mortgage, and we cannot evade the clear words of the rule which in terms apply to the case. It was contended, on behalf of the plaintiff, that the mortgage ceased at the date of the destruction of the ship. No doubt it was at an end so far as the security was concerned, but the other obligations under the mortgage subsisted, and we must hold that the plaintiff forfeited her claim on the society to the extent of the mortgage. She must have interest at the rate of 5 per cent. on the remainder of the sum for which the vessel was insured, to be computed from six months after the date of the loss.

Wills, J.—I am of the same opinion. These rules are only the terms of a contract between the parties, and rule 43 cannot be treated as one of the terms of this particular contract. Every member of the association knew that the insurance with the Carnarvon and Nevin Society was in existence, and it must have been understood by the parties to this insurance policy that that rule as to double insurance was not to apply, but was to be omitted from the contract.

The London Steamship Insurance Association v. The Grampian Steamship Company. (a)

Marine insurance—Mutual insurance for protection—Ordinary running-down clause—Collision—Assured's ship in equal fault—Non-liability of insurers.

The defendants insured their ship in the "protecting" class of the plaintiff association, a limited mutual marine insurance association, to indemnify them against any loss or damage to any other vessel not covered by the usual Lloyd's policy with the running-down clause attached. The defendants' ship came into collision with another ship, and caused and suffered damage; both ships were to blame. The defendants' ship was fully insured by policies in the usual form of Lloyd's policy with the running-down clause attached. It was admitted that the damage suffered by the defendants' ship exceeded that inflicted by her on the other ship, and that the owners of the other ship paid to the defendants a sum equal to the difference between half of the amount of the damage sustained by their ship and half of the damage sustained by the defendants' ship. The plaintiffs brought their action to recover a sum of money which was in the hands of the defendants in respect of a different transaction. This sum the defendants claimed to be entitled to retain as an indemnity in respect of the proportion of the damage to the colliding ship which had been taken into account in adjusting the amount to be paid by the other ship, and which proportional sum was not covered by the ordinary running-down clause in their policies.

Held, that the true principle for adjusting the loss from collision in such a case was that of a single liability, and not cross-liabilities, and that, as the defendants had not been called upon to contribute anything in respect of the damage done to the other vessel, they were not entitled to call upon the plaintiffs to indemnify them in respect of a loss or damage which they had not sustained.

This was an action to recover money had and received by the defendants for the use of the plaintiffs, and was commenced on the 14th May 1889 by writ of summons, but the parties concurred in stating the question of law arising herein for the opinion of the court in the following Case.

1. The plaintiffs were a limited mutual marine insurance association, composed of several different classes or clubs. By Class I., "The London," the plaintiffs insured against the ordinary marine risks the hulls of the ships of the members of that class; and by Class V., "The Protecting," they undertook to indemnify the members of that class against (inter alia) "loss or damage to any other vessel . . . so far as such loss or damage was not covered by the usual form of Lloyd's policies with the clause commonly known as the "Running-down Clause" attached. (a)

2. The defendant company was at all material times the owner of the s.s. Balnacraig.

3. On the 10th Dec. 1886 the said s.s. Balnacraig was insured in the said Class I., "The London," for 1000*l.*, and was also entered in the said Class V., "The Protecting," of the plaintiff association in respect of a portion of her tonnage; and the defendant company was duly registered as a member of the plaintiff association in respect of such entries.

4. The following is the clause commonly known as the "Running-down Clause" referred to in rule 6, sub-sect. (b) of the rules of the said Class V., "The Protecting":

> And it is further agreed that if the ship hereby insured shall come into collision with any other ship or vessel, and the assured shall in consequence thereof become liable to pay and shall pay any sum or sums not exceeding the value of the said vessel hereby insured, we the assurers will severally pay the assured such proportion of three-fourths of the sum so paid as our respective subscriptions thereto bear to the value of the said ship.

5. The Balnacraig was at all material times fully insured by policies in the usual form of Lloyd's policy with the said running-down clause attached.

6. On the 10th Dec. 1886, and while the said s.s. Balnacraig was entered as aforesaid in the said Class V., "The Protecting," and was also insured as aforesaid, she came into collision with the s.s. Karo, whereby both ships received damage, but the damage sustained by the Balnacraig largely exceeded that sustained by the Karo.

7. Both ships were to blame for the said collision, and if there had been cross-actions or claim and counter-claim by the owners of the respective vessels, the decree which would have been pronounced by the Admiralty Division of the High Court of Justice on a finding or admission that both vessels were to blame, would in the usual form have adjudged that the damage arising from the said collision ought to be borne equally by the owners of both ships, and would have condemned the owners of the Karo in half the damage sustained by the Balnacraig, and the owners of the Balnacraig in half the damage sustained by the Karo. As a matter of fact, the owners of the Karo paid to the defendants as owners of the Balnacraig a sum equal to the difference between half of the amount of the damage sustained by the Karo and half the amount of the damage sustained by the Balnacraig, that being the sum for which the defendants as owners of the Balnacraig would have been entitled to issue a monition if a decree of the Admiralty Division had been obtained as aforesaid.

8. The defendants had in their hands 51*l.*, being moneys which they had received for the use of the plaintiffs. (a) Before action brought the plaintiffs applied to the defendants to pay the said sum, which the defendants declined to do, alleging that they were entitled to set off against the said sum a like sum of 51*l.* claimed to be due to the defendants from the plaintiffs in respect of the entry of the Balnacraig in the said Class V., "The Protecting," as the proportion of the damage done to the Karo in the said collision, for which the defendants were liable, and which, as the defendants contended, was not covered by the policies on the Balnacraig with running-down clause attached. The said sum of 51*l.* so sought to be set off by the defendants was arrived at on the footing that the defendants became liable to pay half the damage of the Karo, and did pay that amount by deduction from half the amount of their own damage; that three-fourths of the sum so alleged to have been paid was recoverable by the defendants under the running-down clause in their policies on ship, and that the remaining fourth was therefore recoverable from the plaintiffs under the indemnity provided by rule 6, sub-sect. (b) of the said Clause V., "The Protecting." If this was the correct view of the rights of the parties, the plaintiffs admit that 51*l.* was the correct measure of their liability to the defendants under the said indemnity, and that that sum was properly set off against the like sum belonging to the plaintiffs in the defendants' hands.

9. The plaintiffs, however, contended that, inasmuch as the damage done to the Balnacraig in the said collision exceeded the damage done to the Karo, the defendants, as owners of the Balnacraig, were not liable to pay, and did not pay, anything to the owners of the Karo, and that the only liability arising out of the said collision was a liability on the part of the owners of the Karo to pay to the defendants, as owners of the Balnacraig, one half of the difference between the amounts of the damage sustained by the two ships respectively, and that consequently the plaintiffs were not liable to sue defendants under

(a) A copy of the rules of the plaintiff association, including the rules of Class I., "The London," and Class V., "The Protecting," accompanied and formed part of this case. The foregoing quotation was from rule 6, sub-sect. (b) of the rules of Class V., "The Protecting."

(a) This 51*l.* was in the defendants' hands in respect of a different transaction. In consequence of the plaintiffs refusing to pay what the defendants contended was their contribution of the liability incurred to the Karo, and which amounted to 51*l.*, the defendants, who had moneys in their hands belonging to the plaintiffs, retained out of such moneys the said sum of 51*l.*, and it was to recover this sum of money that this action was brought.—Ed.

the indemnity provided by the rules of the said Class V., "The Protecting."

10. The question for the opinion of the court was: In the events which had happened were the plaintiffs liable, under the indemnity provided by rule 6, sub-sect. (b) of the rules of the said Class V. of the plaintiff association, to pay to the defendants any sum in respect of the damage to the Karo sustained in the said collision?

If the court should be of opinion that the plaintiffs were so liable, then judgment was to be entered for the defendants with costs. If the court should be of opinion that the plaintiffs were not so liable, then judgment was to be entered for the plaintiffs for 51*l.*, with costs.

Cohen, Q.C. appeared for the plaintiffs.

Barnes, Q.C. appeared for the defendants.

The arguments appear sufficiently in the judgment. The following cases were cited:

Cur. adv. vult.

Nov. 11.—Mathew, J.—This special case was so stated as to make it difficult to discover what the parties were disputing about; but it appeared upon the argument that what was really in controversy was the mode of dealing correctly with a loss due to a collision of two ships, as between two sets of underwriters, viz., the members of a mutual insurance association on the one hand, and underwriters at Lloyd's on the other. As the difference arose out of a transaction of ordinary occurrence, the case is one of some general importance. We are indebted to the learned counsel on each side, who argued with equal ability, and apparently with equal confidence. The action was brought to recover a sum of 51*l.*, for which it was admitted the defendants were liable. The question in the case was, whether a cross-claim for the same amount made by the defendants could be maintained. The defendants were the owners of a steamship called the Balnacraig, which they had insured at Lloyd's under a policy in the ordinary form with a collision clause annexed in the following terms: [His Lordship here read it.] The liability to contribute one-fourth under this clause was insured by the defendants with the plaintiff association under the following rule: "The risks, events, and occurrences under which members shall be entitled to protection are (inter alia) loss of or damage to any other vessel . . . or to any property on board such other vessel, so far as such loss or damage is not covered by the usual form of Lloyd's policy with the clause commonly known as the running-down clause attached." The Balnacraig, while covered by these insurances, came into collision with the steamship Karo. Both vessels were to blame, and the loss, which in each case was for damage to ship only, had to be borne equally. The Balnacraig was damaged more than the Karo, and the loss was equalised between the two vessels in the usual way by the payment of a sum of money to the owners of the Balnacraig by the owners of the Karo. The case for the plaintiffs was, that the defendants had not become liable to pay any sum in respect of the collision, and therefore had no claim for an indemnity under their insurance with the plaintiffs. The defendants, on the other hand, contended that they had become liable to contribute a sum of 51*l.* to the loss occasioned by the collision, and that the plaintiffs were bound to indemnify them to that amount. Now, it is quite clear that without the collision clause the underwriters on the ship would not have been liable under any circumstances to bear any portion of the damage payable by the assured in consequence of a collision. This was settled by the case of De Vaux v. Salvador (4 Ad. & El. 420). The clause came into existence in consequence of that decision. With such a clause, where the ship insured is solely to blame, the owner is entitled to call on his underwriters, not merely to pay the cost of repairs, but also to bear three-fourths of his liability to the other ship. When the insured ship is free from blame, the owner is entitled to call upon his underwriters to repair, but the whole amount received for the damage done to the insured ship passes to them by subrogation. It was contended for the plaintiffs that the same principle must apply where both vessels are in fault, and where a balance to equalise the loss is paid to the assured. He is entitled, it was said, to call on his underwriters to repair the damage done his ship, and must surrender to them any part of the balance paid him which may be applicable to the repairs of the vessel insured. But there is no need in such a case, where the assured receives and does not pay, to have recourse to the collision clause, and neither the insurers nor the insured become liable to pay, or in fact pay anything. Again, if in order to balance the loss the assured had made a payment to the other shipowner, he would upon this principle be entitled in addition to the cost of repairs to call on his underwriters to pay three-fourths of that amount and no more. Accordingly the plaintiffs contended that in this case the defendants were under no liability to make any payment under their Lloyd's policy, and that they therefore had no claim under their insurance with the plaintiffs. The loss from the collision should be dealt with on the footing of what was called in the agreement a "single liability," viz., the liability for any balance which the assured had to pay. But the defendants, on the other hand, acting as they were entitled if not bound to do in the interests of the underwriters on ship, insisted that they had become liable to contribute under the collision clause, and were therefore entitled to an indemnity from the plaintiffs. In other words, the defendants contended that a proper adjustment of the loss required a contribution from the plaintiff association to the defendants' underwriters at Lloyd's. It was stated in support of this view that some average adjusters dealt with a loss like this upon the theory, as it was described, of "cross-liabilities," and it was argued that this was the true principle. The claim against the insured ship was treated, according to this system, as if it were actually paid by her owner to the owner of the other vessel; and to that payment his underwriters under the collision clause thus became liable to contribute three-fourths, while the owner was bound to contribute one-fourth. The sum that the assured received from the other ship passed by subrogation, it was said, to his underwriters on ship. As the underwriters on ship and under the collision clause were the same persons, they in the result remained liable to pay three-fourths of the claim of the other ship for the collision, while the owner, or his underwriters, paid the other one-fourth. Thus, suppose each ship to be damaged to the extent of 1000*l.*, the underwriters under the collision clause would pay 750*l.* and the owner 250*l.*, while in respect of the damage to ship the underwriters on ship would receive by subrogation as much as they had to pay. If this were correct, the underwriters at Lloyd's in cases like this would cast a part of the loss which they must have borne if there had been no collision clause on the assured or his underwriters. As against this practice of settlement by the theory of "cross-liabilities," it must be admitted that its application assumes that a payment is made which is not made in point of fact. It is not correct to say that the owner of the assured ship pays the damage done the owner of the other ship. He only does so on the condition that he is paid his claim by the other shipowner. Neither in fact nor in law is the owner of the assured ship liable to pay or entitled to receive more than the balance which equalises the loss: (see The Khedive, 47 L. T. Rep. N. S. 198; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 567; 7 App. Cas. 795.) This balance would therefore seem to be the assessment upon which the collision clause was intended to operate, and it can only operate according to its terms in those cases where the assured has had to pay. To construe the collision clause to apply to anything else would be to substitute a far-fetched theory for plain fact. The form of the clause seems to forbid any such construction. The words "become liable to pay and shall pay" point to a real and not to some imaginary outlay.

But the supposed principle of adjustment by cross-liabilities was sought to be supported by the argument that a settlement upon the footing contended for by the plaintiffs might in some cases lead to results which would be unjust and contrary to the true principles of insurance law. Cases were put where the damage to the ship insured was made up of claims for detention, repairs, or loss of freight, or damage to cargo. It was said that the underwriters on ship ought not to receive by subrogation a balance arrived at after the allowance in account of such claims. This is quite clear, and was not disputed by the counsel for the plaintiffs. But it does not follow that the adjustment in this case as contended for by the plaintiffs is wrong, or that the theory of cross-liabilities should be adopted in every case of collision. There is, however, a view of the matter which seems to us to demonstrate that the plaintiffs are right in this case, and that the theory of adjustment by cross-liabilities is fallacious. The contention of the defendants seems to lead inevitably to the conclusion that the assured with a collision clause in his policy might incur a greater liability than if he had none. The clause was annexed to the ordinary policy not to diminish but to increase the protection afforded the assured, and any construction which made the assured liable for a loss which otherwise would have fallen on his underwriters would defeat the object with which the insurance in this form is effected. Let us suppose a case where the damage to each ship is the same amount—say 1000*l.* Where the policy contains no collision clause the underwriters on each ship would pay the cost of repairs, viz., 1000*l.* Now, suppose the policy to contain a collision clause, and the claims to be adjusted on the footing of cross-liabilities, the underwriters under the collision clause would have to pay three-fourths of 1000*l.*, viz., 750*l.*, and the owner or his underwriter one-fourth, viz., 250*l.* The underwriters on ship would have to pay 1000*l.* for repairs of the assured ship, and they would receive by subrogation 1000*l.* from the other ship. In the result the owner would be liable for 250*l.*, and to that extent worse off than if there was no collision clause in his policy. Our judgment is, that the defendants have not become liable to pay any sum in consequence of the collision within the meaning of the collision clause, and therefore that their defence cannot be maintained. We give judgment for the plaintiffs.

COURT OF APPEAL.

March 5 and July 13, 1889.

The Mogul Steamship Company Limited v. McGregor, Gow, and Co., and others (a).

Conspiracy—Combination of shipowners—Restraint of trade—Exclusion of rival traders.

The defendant shipping companies and owners had combined together and formed a "conference" or "ring," and their agents in China had issued circulars to shippers there to the effect that exporters in China who confined their shipments of goods to vessels owned by members of the "conference" should be allowed a certain rebate, payable half-yearly, on the freight charged. Any shipment at any port in China by an outside steamer to exclude the shipper of such shipment from participating in the return during the whole six monthly period within which such shipment should have been made. The plaintiffs, who were owners of vessels in the same trade, had thereby suffered damage.

Held (by Bowen and Fry, L.JJ., Lord Esher, M.R. dissenting), affirming the judgment of Lord Coleridge, C.J., that the "conference," being formed by the defendants with the view of keeping the trade in their own hands, and not with the view of ruining the trade of the plaintiffs, or through any personal malice or ill-will towards them, was not unlawful, and that no action for conspiracy was maintainable.

This was an appeal from a judgment of Lord Coleridge, C.J. in an action tried without a jury, reported at 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 320; 21 Q. B. Div. 544; 59 L. T. Rep. N. S. 514.

The plaintiffs were a shipping company incorporated in 1883, owning shares in certain steamships, viz., the Sikh, Afghan, Pathan, and Ghazee, trading between Chinese and Australian ports and London, and the defendants, McGregor, Gow, and Co., T. Skinner and Co., D. J. Jenkins and Co., the Peninsular and Oriental Steam Navigation Company, William Thomson and Co., and others, were shipping companies and owners trading in the same seas.

(a) Reported by A. A. Hopkins, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The facts appear sufficiently from the pleadings, which are substantially as follows:

The plaintiffs in their statement of claim alleged that they had suffered damage by reason of the defendants, as and being owners of numerous steamers trading between ports in the Yangtse-Kiang River and London, conspiring together to prevent the plaintiffs from obtaining cargoes for steamers owned by the plaintiffs from shippers to be carried from ports in the said river to London, for reward to the plaintiffs in that behalf. That the said conspiracy consisted of a combination and agreement by and amongst the defendants, as and being owners of steamers trading as aforesaid, and having by reason of such combination and agreement control of the homeward shipping trade, pursuant to which shippers were bribed, coerced, and induced to agree to forbear, and to forbear from shipping cargoes by the steamers of the plaintiffs. It was alleged, in the alternative, that the said conspiracy consisted of a combination and agreement by and amongst the defendants, as and being owners of steamers as aforesaid, pursuant to which the defendants, with the intent to injure the plaintiffs, and to prevent them from obtaining cargoes for their steamers trading between the said ports, agreed to refuse, and refused to accept cargoes from shippers, except upon the terms that the said shippers should not ship any cargoes by the steamers of the plaintiffs, and by threats of stopping the shipment of homeward cargoes altogether, which threats they had the power and intended to carry into effect, did prevent shippers from shipping cargoes by the plaintiffs' steamers, and threatened and intended to continue to do so. The plaintiffs claimed damages, and an injunction to restrain the defendants from continuing the wrongful acts above mentioned.

In particulars delivered by the plaintiffs, they stated that the combination and agreement consisted of a combination and agreement by and amongst the defendants, as being a number of wealthy shipowners and shipping companies, formed and entered into for the purpose of creating a "conference" or "ring," and thereby acquiring the control of the shipping trade between China and England, and for the purpose of compelling their agents in China and Hong Kong not to load any cargoes on the plaintiffs' vessels, and for the purpose of preventing shippers and merchants from shipping by the plaintiffs' vessels by imposing penalties on those who did so by granting a rebate of 5 per cent. on the freight charged to such shippers as had not made any shipments for certain six-monthly periods by the plaintiffs' vessels, and generally for the purpose of boycotting and ruining the plaintiffs as shipowners, and of driving them out of the trade, thus preventing the plaintiff company from carrying on their lawful business as shipowners and carriers in the said trade. With this object the defendants had widely distributed among the China merchants circulars to the following effect:

Shanghai, 10th May 1884.

To those exporters who confine their shipments of tea and general cargo from China to Europe (not including the Mediterranean and Black Sea ports) to the P. and O. Steam Navigation Company, Messagerie Maritime Company, Ocean Steamship Company, McGregor, Gow, and Co., Glen, Castle, Shire, and Ben Lines, and to the steamships Copack and Ningchow, we shall be happy to allow a rebate of 5 per cent. on the freight charged. Exporters claiming the returns will be required to sign a declaration that they have not made or been interested in any shipment of tea or general cargo to Europe by any other than the said lines.

Shipments by the steamships Afghan, Pathan, and Ghazee, on their present voyage from Hankow, will not prejudice claims for returns.

Each line to be responsible for its own returns only, which will be payable half-yearly, commencing the 30th Oct. next.

Shipments by an outside steamer at any of the ports in China or Hong Kong will exclude the firm making such shipments from participation in the returns during the whole six-monthly period within which they have been made, even although its other branches may have given entire support to the above lines.

The foregoing agreement on our part to be in force from the present date till the 30th April 1885.

In May 1885 the defendants caused to be issued to the shippers and merchants in China another circular as follows:

Shanghai, 11th May 1885.

Referring to our circular dated the 10th May 1884, we beg to remind you that shipments for London by the steamships Pathan, Afghan, and Aberdeen, or by other non-conference steamers at any of the ports in China or at Hong Kong, will exclude the firm making such shipments from participation in the return during the whole six-monthly period in which they have been made, even although the firm elsewhere may have given exclusive support to the conference lines.

In consequence of the circulars and the conduct of the defendants, the plaintiff company complained that they had been unable to obtain freights for their ships, and had been virtually driven out of the China trade.

The defendants, in their defence, contended that, as a matter of law, the statement of claim disclosed no cause of action against the defendants, and they denied any conspiracy as alleged, or that shippers were bribed, coerced, or induced to abstain from shipping cargoes by the plaintiffs' steamers; and they alleged the real facts of the case to be that, in the year 1884 an agreement or conference was entered into by the defendants, for working the homeward carrying trade in steam-vessels sailing from China by regular departures of such vessels during the year 1884 and 1885, and so affording inducements to merchants and shippers in and from China to support such vessels, and, in order further to induce such support, to give to such merchants and shippers as should ship only by the conference vessels a return or rebate of five per cent. off all freights paid by such shippers by such vessels; and that the vessels Pathan and Ghazee belonging to the plaintiffs were actually admitted to the benefit of this agreement for one voyage each in the tea season of 1884 from Hankhow to London; but that the plaintiffs in breach of their agreement prior to the Hankow tea season of 1885 threatened the defendants that, unless their vessels were admitted to the privileges of the conference for the tea season of 1885 they would oppose and enter into competition with the conference vessels, and cut down and smash the rates of freight to such a low rate as would cause great loss to all conference vessels; and that the defendants, declining to accede to the plaintiffs' demands, the plaintiffs did carry out their threat and so cut down the rates of freight that the defendants were compelled to accept rates of freight largely below the then prevailing rates.

Lord Coleridge, C.J. gave judgment in favour of the defendants (59 L. T. Rep. N. S. 514; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 320; 21 Q. B. Div. 544).

The plaintiffs appealed.

July 13.—Lord Esher, M.R.—In this case the evidence is voluminous and complicated. On carefully dissecting it, it seems to prove the following facts: At some time before an agreement, which will hereafter be referred to, was entered into between the defendants, it appeared to the defendants that if more than a certain number of ships loaded tea at Hankow or Shanghai for England the freights before charged could not be maintained. This is shown by "suggestions to be considered as strictly confidential between the managers of the P. and O., the Glen, and the Ocean Steamship Companies." It begins, "So long as there is a glut of tonnage at Hankow, whether 'conference' or not, it is impossible to maintain freights." The defendants therefore resolved upon a plan by which the number of vessels loading at those places should be limited. The plan was that a certain number of shipowners' firms — namely, the defendant firms — should enter into an agreement with each other that each of them should send an agreed number of ships to Hankow in the season, and that they should not admit more than a certain number of firms to be parties to the agreement, and that they should do certain things then agreed upon, and certain other things which should be afterwards agreed upon if thought necessary, in order to prevent any of those whom they did not admit to be parties to the agreement from being able to load tea at Hankow with any profit. Thus they would after a time drive any of such parties out of the carrying trade from Hankow or Shanghai to England, and then they, the confederated firms, could maintain the high freights which a free competition would inevitably lower. The means of prevention first agreed upon were an agreement that any shipping agent or shipping principal who agreed to ship and who shipped only on conference steamers throughout a season should receive a rebate of 5 per cent. on the agreed rate of freight of each shipment; but if any such agent, though directed by his principal to do so, or if any principal should ship any one cargo in a named period on board a non-conference steamer, he should not receive any rebate in respect of any cargo he should, either before the shipment on a non-conference ship or after it, during the period have shipped on board a conference ship. The means afterwards agreed upon and added were that if any non-conference steamer should proceed to Hankow to load independently, any necessary number of conference steamers should be sent at the same time to Hankow in order to underbid for the freight which the independent steamer might offer without any regard to whether the freight they should thus bid would be remunerative or not. The plan was reduced into a written agreement signed by the defendants, dated originally the 7th April 1884, and renewed or enlarged by verbal agreement before May 1885. This agreement stipulated that it was to bind each defendant until he should give a particular notice—namely to all the principals at home. The agreement having been entered into by the defendants, they, in May 1885, refused to admit the plaintiffs to be parties to it. The plaintiffs thereupon resolved to send, and did send two of their steamers, the Pathan and the Afghan to Hankow in order to obtain freights independently. The defendants issued circulars on the 11th May 1885:—"That shipments by the steamships Pathan, Afghan, and Aberdeen, or by other non-conference steamers at any of the ports in China or at Hongkong, will exclude the firm making such shipments from participation in the return during the whole six-monthly period in which they have been made, even although the firm may have given exclusive support elsewhere to the conference lines." Besides this the defendants agreed to send, and did send, as many vessels as their agents thought necessary for the purpose to Hankow for the express purpose of obtaining the carriage of all tea at any freight, however small, which might underbid and so oust the Pathan, the Afghan, or any other vessel of the plaintiffs' from the carrying trade. The ultimate objects of the defendants was no doubt to benefit themselves; but the immediate purpose was to drive out the plaintiffs. (See letters May 1, 1885, May 8, 1885, and May 8, 1885.) By the means agreed upon by the action directed by the defendants the freight from Hankow to England was lowered from 50*s.* and upwards to 25*s.*, which was a wholly unremunerative freight, which could not be called an ordinary business freight, and which was an artificial freight produced by the action of the defendants, in order to carry out their immediate purpose of driving out the plaintiffs. The plaintiffs carried at the 25*s.* freight on that occasion rather than sail their ships, which were already there, home empty. But it is obvious that, if the contest were to be continued, the plaintiffs could not send their ships again to Hankow; they must be effectively driven out of the Hankow carrying trades, just as certainly and effectively as if their ships were physically stopped from going there. The plaintiffs being by the acts of the defendants driven from the trade, the defendants would resume their old rates of freight, freights fixed without competition. The plaintiffs on the season of 1885 would have earned a higher freight than 25*s.* In respect of subsequent years they were prevented from attempting to earn, according to circumstances and their own judgment, any freight from Hankow to England.

The question is whether what the defendants did and its consequences to the plaintiffs gave the latter any legal cause of action. It seems to me well to consider first what view the law takes of the agreement of the 7th of April 1884, renewed or enlarged in 1885. In Hilton v. Eckersley (6 E. & B. 47) a bond was executed by certain masters by which they agreed to be bound to each other in a penalty, nominally payable to one of them, if any one of them should carry on his works in regard to amount of wages to be paid to persons employed therein and as to the times or periods of the engagement of workpeople and the hours of work otherwise than in conformity with the resolution of the majority of the said masters. The defendant, one of the signing masters, carried on his works contrary to a resolution of the others, whereupon he was sued on the bond for the penalty. Crompton, J. said: "I am of opinion that the bond is void as being against public policy. I think that combinations like that disclosed in the pleadings in this case were illegal and indictable at common law, as tending directly to impede and interfere with the free course of trade and manufacture." "One of the most objectionable parts of this bond is that it takes away the freedom of action of the individual to carry on the trade and to open and close his works according, as it may be, for his interest or that of the public." He held that the bond was void as between the parties to it, because it was illegal as being in restraint of trade. Lord Campbell doubted whether the bond was illegal to the extent of rendering the parties to it indictable, but agreed that it was illegal as between the parties and was therefore void. In the Court of Exchequer Chamber Alderson, B. gave the judgment. "The question," he said, "is whether this is a bond in restraint of trade: and we think it is so. Primâ facie it is the privilege of a trader in a free country, in all matters not contrary to law, to regulate his own mode of carrying it on according to his own discretion and choice." Speaking of the regulations, he said: "All these are surely regulations restraining each man's power of carrying on his trade according to his discretion for his own best advantage, and therefore are restraints on trade, not capable of being legally enforced." "We do not say that they are illegal in the sense of being punishable and criminal. The case does not require us; and we think we ought not to express any opinion on that point." He then goes on to say that the fact of the combination of masters being formed to counteract a combination of workmen cannot render the masters' combination legal. "The maxim Injuria non excusat injuriam is a sound one both in common sense and at common law." Hornby v. Close (15 L. T. Rep. N. S. 563; L. Rep. 2 Q. B. 153) is to the same effect. These cases decide that there is still according to law a restraint of trade which is contrary to law. They decide that an agreement whereby traders bind themselves not to carry on their trade according to their own judgment, but according to the judgment of others, is an agreement in restraint of trade. They decide that if such an agreement is made out, it is not made legal because it is entered into as a counter move against another similar agreement. Applying these propositions to the agreement of 1885, the defendants by it agree to carry on their trade of shipowners, not each according to his own judgment as circumstances may arise, but according to an agreed rule arrived at by the consent of others, not to be departed from without the consent of all. Unless the law holds this agreement to be void, the defendants have bound themselves to it by mutual agreement, which would be a sufficient consideration to bind each of them. They have bound themselves not to depart from the agreement without a particular kind of notice. The agreement in accordance with the cited cases must be held to be in restraint of trade, and therefore void as between the parties to it. The only reason why it can be held void is because it is illegal; a legal agreement voluntarily come to cannot be held by law to be void. The cited cases leave open the question whether such an agreement amounts to an indictable conspiracy. They do not hold that it is not. But before considering that point, it must be observed that the agreements held to be illegal, because in restraint of trade, must have been so held, not because there was any wrong done to the traders who agreed, for they all agreed to what was to be done, but because there was a wrong to the public. The restraining themselves from a free course of trade was held to be a wrong to the public. If that be so when parties agree to restrain themselves, it must be much more so when they agree to do acts which will restrain and are intended to restrain another trader from a free course of trade. That restraint is equally a wrong to the public. The present agreement is therefore illegal and void as in restraint of trade on that ground also.

The cases cited do not determine whether an agreement which is void as between the parties to it because it is in restraint of trade is or is not an indictable offence. But if such an agreement is illegal because it is a wrong to the public, it seems to me impossible to say that it is not indictable. An illegal act which is a wrong against the public welfare seems to have the necessary elements of a crime. If, however, all agreements in restraint of trade are not necessarily indictable offences, yet some may be. And if the agreement is one intended to interfere with the free course of trade of a trader who is not a party to the agreement, and can, if carried out, have that effect, then if such an interference is an illegal act as against that trader, it seems clear that the act of agreement is a wrongful act, both as against an individual and as against the public welfare, and then I am of opinion it must be an indictable conspiracy. "There seems," says Sir William Erle, in the most admirable essay styled "The Law relating to Trade Unions," a book more full of careful and accurate law than is to be found in many judgments, "to be authority for saying that a combination to violate a private right, in which the public has a sufficient interest, is a crime, such a violation being an actionable wrong" (page 32). Unless the public has an interest in traders being left to their own judgment and to a free course of trade there is no foundation for the law as to agreements in restraint of trade being illegal. The public, therefore, has an interest which such agreement injures. It follows that if the agreement be an agreement to violate the right of an independent trader by restraining his trade, there is a sufficient public interest which is also injured, and the agreement is an indictable conspiracy.

It becomes necessary now to consider what interference with an independent trader will be a violation of his private rights. Now, a long line of cases has determined that every trader in the Queen's dominions has, by law, a legal right to carry on his trade in ordinary course of trade according to his own will and judgment; and the law has decided that for some kinds of interference with that right the trader interfered with has a right of action. Alderson, B., in the Exchequer Chamber, in Hilton v. Eckersley, says: "Primâ facie it is the privilege of a trader in a free country, in all matters not contrary to law, to regulate his own mode of carrying it on according to his own discretion and choice." Turning again to the careful analysis of law in Sir W. Erle's book, I agree with him (page 13), that "this proposition assumes that a person has a right to do as he chooses with his own, whether labour or capital, within the limits set by law; that a right involves a prohibition against the infringement thereof; and that a prohibition involves a remedy for the violation thereof." The particular right of a trader which we are considering is his right to carry on his trade according to a free course of trade. The plaintiff had that right on his side; but so also had the defendants on their side. The next question is what will amount as between rival traders to an encroachment by the one on this right of the other. Each has a right to carry on his trade in a free course of trade, according to his own free will and judgment. So long as the one so carries on his trade, the other cannot, without infringing on the rights of his rival, effectively complain. So long as each so carries on his trade, though such carrying on produces the utmost extent of competition and consequent lowering of gain, neither can validly complain. Each is exercising the free course of trade. But if one goes beyond the exercise of the course of trade, and does an act beyond what is the course of trade in order—that is to say, with intent—to molest the other's free course of trade, and which does molest the other's free course of trade, he is not exercising his own freedom of a course of trade, he is not acting in but beyond the course of trade, and then it follows that his act is an unlawful obstruction of the other's right to a free course of trade, and if such obstruction causes damage to the other he is entitled to maintain an action for the wrong. "At common law," says Sir W. Erle (page 6), "every person has individually, and the public also have collectively, a right to require that the course of trade should be kept free from unreasonable obstruction." "Every person has a right, under the law as between him and his fellow subjects, to full freedom in disposing of his own labour or his own capital according to his own will. It follows that every other person is subject to the correlative duty arising therefrom, and is prohibited from any obstruction to the fullest exercise of this right which can be made compatible with the exercise of similar rights by others. Every act causing an obstruction to another in the exercise of the right comprised within this description, done, not in the exercise of the actor's own right, but for the purpose of obstruction, would, if damage should be caused thereby to the party obstructed, be a violation of this prohibition, and the violation of this prohibition by a single person is a wrong to be remedied either by action or indictment as the case may be. It is equally wrong whether it be done by one or by many, subject to this observation—that a combination of many to do a wrong in a matter where the public has an interest is a substantive offence of conspiracy:" (page 12.) The limitation of the competing rights, then, is that the act which has, in fact, obstructed the full right of the one must, in order to be actionable, be an act done by the other beyond the exercise of the actor's own right, and for the purpose of obstruction. In Lumley v. Gye (2 E. & B. 216; 22 L. J. 463, Q. B.) and in Bowen v. Hall (44 L. T. Rep. N. S. 75; 6 Q. B. Div. 333) the act done which obstructed the plaintiff's right was the persuading a person employed by the plaintiff under contract to break that contract. Such persuasion is not in ordinary course of trade. The ordinary competition of trade is a fair competition, not a secret persuasion of others to do wrong. The next question in those cases was whether what was done was intended to obstruct the plaintiff. With regard to that point, it is laid down in Bowen v. Hall: "The act of the defendants which is complained of must be an act wrongful in law and in fact. Merely to persuade a person to break his contract may not be wrongful in law or fact. But if the persuasion be used for the indirect purpose of injuring the plaintiff, or of benefiting the defendant at the expense of the plaintiff, it is a malicious act, which is in law and in fact a wrong act, and therefore a wrongful act, and therefore an actionable act if injury ensues from it." The law there is laid down that a malicious motive in the defendants may make an act which would not be wrongful without the malice, a wrongful act when done with malice. It was thought that the judgment in Lumley v. Gye was founded on the view that there was malice in the defendant. And that view was adopted and approved in Bowen v. Hall. The word "malice" is satisfied by the thing being done with knowledge of the plaintiff's right, and with intent to interfere with it "maliciously," or, which is the same thing, "with notice" (per Crompton, J. in Lumley v. Gye). This effect of malice is adopted by Sir W. Erle, and so long ago as by Lord Holt in Keeble v. Hickeringhill (11 East, note, page 574). "Suppose," he says, "the defendant had shot in his own ground; if he had occasion to shoot it would have been one thing: but to shoot on purpose to damage the plaintiff is another thing and a wrong." In truth, I have never known this rule doubted.

The propositions applicable to the present case, which are to be deduced from the above considerations, are the following (1) That the head of law which we are considering applies only to trade and to traders; (2) that the law has a peculiar care for the preservation of a free course of trade as between traders, because such freedom is for the benefit of the public; (3) that the principal formula of law for the purpose of enforcing this peculiar care is that every trader has a legal right to a free course of trade, meaning thereby a legal right to be left free to exercise his trade according to his own will and judgment; (4) that if any one by an act wrongful as against that right interferes with it to the injury of a trader, an action lies against such person by such trader; (5) that any act of fair trade competition, though it injure a rival trader even to the destruction of his trade, is not a wrongful act as against such rival trader's rights, but is only the exercise of the first-mentioned trader's equal rights, and is therefore not actionable; (6) but any act, though of the nature of competition in trade, but which is an act beyond the limits of fair trade competition, and which is therefore not an act of any real course of trade at all, and the immediate and necessary effect of which is such an interference with a rival trader's right to a free course of trade as prevents him from exercising his full right to a free course of trade, leads to an almost irresistible inference of an indirect motive, and is, therefore, unless, as may be possible, the motive is negatived, a wrongful act as against his right and is actionable if injury ensue; (7) an act of competition, otherwise unobjectionable, done not for the purpose of competition, but with intent to injure a rival trader in his trade, is not an act done in an ordinary course of trade, and therefore is actionable if injury ensues; (8) an agreement among two or more traders, who are not and do not intend to be partners, but where each is to carry on his trade according to his own will, except as regards the agreed act, that agreed act being one to be done for the purpose of interfering—i.e., with intent to interfere with the trade of another—is a thing done not in the due course of trade and is therefore an act wrongful against that other trader, and is also wrongful against the right of the public to have free competition among traders, and is therefore a wrongful act against such trader, and, if it is carried out and injury ensues, is actionable; (9) and such an agreement being a public wrong is also of itself an illegal conspiracy, and is indictable. It follows that in the present case the agreement of 1885 was within the rules 8 and 9 an indictable conspiracy, and that when it was carried out to its immediate and intended effect, which was an injury to the plaintiff's right to a free course of trade, the plaintiff had a good cause of action against the defendants. It follows that the act of the defendants in lowering their freights far beyond a lowering for any purpose of trade—that is to say, so low that if they continued it they themselves could not carry on trade—was not an act done in the exercise of their own free right of trade, but was an act done evidently for the purpose of interfering with—i.e., with intent to interfere with—the plaintiff's right to a free course of trade, and was therefore a wrongful act as against the plaintiff's right, and, as injury ensued to the plaintiff, he had also in respect of such act a right of action against the defendants. The plaintiff in respect of that act would have had a right of action if it had been done by one defendant only; he has it still more clearly when that act was done by several defendants combined for that purpose. For these reasons I come to the conclusion that the plaintiffs were entitled to judgment. The damages, if that be the correct conclusion as to the right of action, are to be ascertained. They are, in my opinion, the difference between the freight of 25*s.*, which the plaintiff was to accept, and the freight he would have obtained without other interference than a legal, fair competition in 1885, and damages at large for being prevented from endeavouring to earn freights from Hankow to England in subsequent years, after taking into account the probability of using his ship in some other trade. I am of opinion that the appeal should be allowed.

Bowen, L.J.—We are presented in this case with an apparent conflict or antinomy between two rights that are equally regarded by the law—the right of the plaintiffs to be protected in the legitimate exercise of their trade, and the right of the defendants to carry on their business as seems best to them, provided they commit no wrong to others. The plaintiffs complain that the defendants have crossed the line which the common law permits, and, inasmuch as for the purposes of the present case we are to assume some possible damage to the plaintiffs, the real question to be decided is whether on such an assumption the defendants in the conduct of their commercial affairs have done anything that is unjustifiable in law. The defendants are a number of shipowners who formed themselves into a league or conference for the purpose of ultimately keeping in their own hands the control of the tea carriage from certain Chinese ports, and for the purpose of driving the plaintiffs and other competitors from the field. In order to succeed in this object and to discourage the plaintiffs' vessels from resorting to those ports the defendants during the "tea harvest" of 1885 combined to offer to the local shippers very low freights, with a view of generally reducing or "smashing" rates, and thus rendering it unprofitable for the plaintiffs to send their ships thither. They offered, moreover, a rebate of 5 per cent. to all local shippers and agents who would deal exclusively with vessels belonging to the conference, and any agent who broke the condition was to forfeit the entire rebate on all shipments made on behalf of any and every one of his principals during the whole year—a forfeiture of rebate or allowance which was denominated as "penal" by the plaintiffs' counsel. It must, however, be taken as established that the rebate was one which the defendants need never have allowed at all to their customers. It must also be taken that the defendants had no personal ill-will to the plaintiffs, nor any desire to harm them except such as is involved in the wish and intention to discourage by such measures the plaintiffs from sending rival vessels to such ports. The acts of which the plaintiffs particularly complained were as follows: (1) A circular of the 10th May 1885, by which the defendants offered to the local shippers and their agents a benefit by way of rebate if they would not deal with the plaintiffs, which was to be lost if this condition was not fulfilled; (2) the sending of special ships to Hankow in order by competition to deprive the plaintiffs' vessels of profitable freight; (3) the offer at Hankow of freights at a level which would not repay a shipowner for his adventure, in order to "smash" freights and frighten the plaintiffs from the field; (4) pressure put on the defendants' own agents to induce them to ship only by the defendants' vessels and not by those of the plaintiffs. It is to be observed with regard to all these acts of which complaint is made that they were acts that in themselves could not be said to be illegal, unless made so by the object with which or the combination in the course of which they were done; and that in reality what is complained of is the pursuing of trade competition to a length which the plaintiffs consider oppressive and prejudicial to themselves. We were invited by the plaintiffs' counsel to accept the position from which their argument started—that an action will lie if a man maliciously and wrongfully conducts himself so as to injure another in that other's trade. Obscurity resides in the language used to state this proposition.

The terms "maliciously," "wrongfully," and "injure" are words all of which have accurate meanings well known to the law, but which also have a popular and less precise signification into which it is necessary to see that the argument does not imperceptibly slide. An intent to "injure" in strictness means more than an intent to harm. It connotes an intent to do wrongful harm. "Maliciously," in like manner, means and implies an intention to do an act which is wrongful, to the detriment of another. The term "wrongful" imports in its turn the infringement of some right. The ambiguous proposition to which we were invited by the plaintiffs' counsel still therefore leaves unsolved the question of what, as between the plaintiffs and the defendants, are the rights of trade. For the purpose of clearness I desire as far as possible to avoid terms in their popular use so slippery, and to translate them into less fallacious language wherever I shall employ them. The English law, which in its earlier stages began with but an imperfect line of demarcation between torts and breaches of contract, presents us with no scientific analysis of the degree to which the intent to harm, or, in the language of the civil law, the animus vicino nocendi may enter into or affect the conception of a personal wrong: (see Chasemore v. Richards, 7 H. of L. Cas. 349, at p. 388.) All personal wrong means the infringement of some personal right. It is essential to an action of tort, say the Privy Council, in Rogers v. Rajendro Dutt (13 Moore P. C. 209), "that the acts complained of should be, under the circumstances, legally wrongful as regards the party complaining—i.e., they must prejudicially affect another in some legal right. Merely that it will, however directly, do a man harm in his interests, is not enough."

What, then, were the rights of the plaintiffs as traders as against the defendants? The plaintiffs had a right to be protected against certain kind of conduct, and we have to consider what conduct would pass this legal line or boundary. Now, intentionally to do that which is calculated in the ordinary course of events to damage, and which does in fact damage, another in that other person's property or trade is actionable if done without just cause or excuse. Such intentional action, when done without just cause or excuse, is what the law calls a malicious wrong: (see Bromage v. Prosser, 4 B. & C. 247; Capital and Counties Bank v. Henty, 47 L. T. Rep. N. S. 662; 7 App. Cas. 772, per Lord Blackburn.) The acts of the defendants which are complained of here were intentional, and were also calculated, no doubt, to do the plaintiffs damage in their trade. But, in order to see whether they were wrongful, we have still to discuss the question whether they were done without any just cause or excuse. Such just cause or excuse the defendants on their side assert to be found in their own positive right (subject to certain limitations) to carry on their own trade freely, in the mode and manner that best suits them, and which they think best calculated to secure their own advantage. What, then, are the limitations which the law imposes on a trader in the conduct of his business as between himself and other traders? There seem to be no burdens or restrictions in law upon a trader which arise merely from the fact that he is a trader, and which are not equally laid on all other subjects of the Crown. His right to trade freely is a right which the law recognises and encourages, but it is one which places him at no special disadvantage as compared with others. No man, whether trader or not, can, however, justify damaging another in his commercial business by fraud or misrepresentation. Intimidation, obstruction, and molestation are forbidden; so is the intentional procurement of a violation of individual rights, contractual or other, assuming always that there is no just cause for it. The intentional driving away of customers by show of violence (Tarleton v. M'Gawley, Peak N.P.C. 270), the obstruction of actors on the stage by preconcerted hissing (Clifford v. Brandon, 2 Camp. 358; Gregory v. Brunswick, 6 M. & G. 205), the disturbance of wildfowl in decoys by the firing of guns (Carrington v. Taylor, 11 East, 571; and Keeble v. Hickergill, 11 East, 574, n.), the impeding or threatening servants or workmen (Garret v. Taylor Cro. Jac. 567), the inducing persons under personal contracts to break their contracts (Bowen v. Hall, 6 Q. B. Div. 333; Lumley v. Gye, 2 E. & B. 216), all are instances of such forbidden acts. But the defendants have been guilty of none of these acts. They have done nothing more against the plaintiffs than pursue to the bitter end a war of competition waged in the interests of their own trade. To the argument that a competition so pursued ceases to have a "just cause or excuse," when there is ill will or a personal intention to harm, it is sufficient to reply (as I have already pointed out) that there was here no personal intention to do any other or greater harm to the plaintiffs than such as was necessarily involved in the desire to attract to the defendants' ships the entire tea freights of the ports, a portion of which would otherwise have fallen to the plaintiffs' share. I can find no authority for the doctrine that such a commercial motive deprives of "just cause or excuse" acts done in the course of trade which would, but for such a motive, be justifiable. So to hold would be to convert into an illegal motive the instinct of self-advancement and self-protection, which is the very incentive to all trade. To say that a man is to trade freely, but that he is to stop short at any act which is calculated to harm other tradesmen, and which is designed to attract their business to his own shop, would be a strange and impossible counsel of perfection. But we were told that competition ceases to be the lawful exercise of trade, and so to be a lawful excuse for what will harm another, if carried to a length which is not "fair or reasonable." The offering of reduced rates by the defendants in the present case is said to have been "unfair." This seems to assume that, apart from fraud, intimidation, molestation, or obstruction of some other personal right in rem or in personam, there is some natural standard of "fairness" or "reasonableness" to be determined by the internal consciousness of judges and juries beyond which competition ought not in law to go. There seems to be no authority, and I think, with submission, that there is no sufficient reason for such a proposition. It would impose a novel fetter upon trade. The defendants, we are told by the plaintiffs' counsel, might lawfully lower rates, provided they did not lower them beyond a "fair freight"—whatever that may mean. But where is it established that there is any such restriction upon commerce, and what is to be the definition of a "fair freight?" It is said that it ought to be a "normal" rate of freight, such as is reasonably remunerative to the shipowner. But over what period of time is the average of this reasonable remunerativeness to be calculated? All commercial men with capital are acquainted with the ordinary expedient of sowing one year a crop of apparently unfruitful prices in order by driving competition away to reap a fuller harvest of profit in the future, and until the present argument at the bar it may be doubted whether shipowners or merchants were ever deemed to be bound by law to conform to some imaginary "normal" standard of freights or prices, or that law courts had a right to say to them in respect of their competitive tariffs—"Thus far shall they go and no further." To attempt to limit English competition in this way would probably be as hopeless an endeavour as the experiment of King Canute. But on ordinary principles of law no such fetter on freedom of trade can, in my opinion, be warranted. A man is bound not to use his property so as to infringe upon another's rights—Sic utere tuo ut alienum non lædas. If engaged in actions which may involve danger to others, he ought, speaking generally, to take reasonable care to avoid endangering them. But there is surely no doctrine of law which compels him to use his property in a way that judges and juries may consider "reasonable:" (see Chasemore v. Richards, 7 H. of L. C. 349.) If there is no such fetter upon the use of property known to the English law, why should there be any such a fetter upon trade?

It is urged, however, on the part of the plaintiffs, that even if the acts complained of would not be wrongful had they been committed by a single individual, they become actionable when they are the result of concerted action among several. In other words, the plaintiffs, it is contended, have been injured by an illegal conspiracy. Of the general proposition that certain kinds of conduct not criminal in any one individual may become criminal if done by combination among several there can be no doubt. The distinction is based on sound reason, for a combination may make oppressive or dangerous that which, if it proceeded only from a single person, would be otherwise, and the very fact of the combination may show that the object is simply to do harm, and not to exercise one's own just rights. In the application of this undoubted principle it is necessary to be very careful not to press the doctrine of illegal conspiracy beyond that which is necessary for the protection of individuals or of the public; and it may be observed in passing that as a rule it is the damage wrongfully done, and not the conspiracy, that is the gist of actions on the case for conspiracy: (see Skinner v. Gunton, 1 Wm. Saund. 229; Hutchins v. Hutchins, 7 Hill's N. Y. Cas. 104; Bigelow's Leading Cases on Torts, 207.) But what is the definition of an illegal combination? It is an agreement by one or more to do an unlawful act or to do a lawful act by unlawful means: (Reg. v. O'Connell, 11 Cl. & F. 155; Reg. v. Parnell, 14 Cox C. C. 508.) And the question to be solved is whether there has been any such agreement here. Have the defendants combined to do an unlawful act? Have they combined to to do a lawful act by unlawful means? A moment's consideration will be sufficient to show that this new inquiry only drives us back to the circle of definitions and legal propositions which I have already traversed in the previous part of this judgment. The unlawful act agreed to, if any, between the defendants, must have been the intentional doing of some act to the detriment of the plaintiffs' business without just cause or excuse. Whether there was any such justification or excuse for the defendants is the old question over again, which, so far as regards an individual trader, has been already solved. The only differentia that can exist must arise, if at all, out of the fact that the acts done are the joint acts of several capitalists, and not of one capitalist only. The next point is whether the means adopted were unlawful. The means adopted were competition carried to a bitter end. Whether such means were unlawful is in like manner nothing but the old discussion which I have gone through, and which is now revived under a second head of inquiry; except so far as a combination of capitalists differentiates the case of acts jointly done by them from similar acts done by a single man of capital. But I find it impossible myself to acquiesce in the view that the English law places any such restriction on the combination of capital as would be involved in the recognition of such a distinction. If so, one rich capitalist may innocently carry competition to a length which would become unlawful in the case of a syndicate with a joint capital no larger than his own; and one individual merchant may lawfully do that which a firm or a partnership may not. What limits on such a theory would be imposed by law on the competitive action of a joint-stock company (limited) is a problem which might well puzzle a casuist. The truth is, that the combination of capital for purposes of trade and competition is a very different thing from such a combination of several persons against one with a view to harm him as falls under the head of an indictable conspiracy. There is no just cause or excuse in the latter class of cases. There is such a just cause or excuse in the former. There are cases in which the very fact of a combination is evidence of a design to do that which is hurtful without just cause—is evidence, to use a technical expression, of malice. But it is perfectly legitimate, as it seems to me, to combine capital for all the mere purposes of trade for which capital may, apart from combination, be legitimately used in trade. To limit combinations of capital when used for purposes of competition in the manner proposed by the argument of the plaintiffs would in the present day be impossible—would be only another method of attempting to set boundaries to the tides. Legal puzzles which might well distract a theorist may easily be conceived of imaginary conflicts between the selfishness of a group of individuals and the obvious well-being of other members of the community. Would it be an indictable conspiracy to agree to drink up all the water from a common spring in a time of drought, to buy up by preconcerted action all the provisions in a market or a district in times of scarcity (see R. v. Waddington, 1 East, 143), to combine to purchase all the shares of a company against a coming settling day, or to agree to give away articles of trade gratis in order to withdraw custom from a trader? May two itinerant match vendors combine to sell matches below their value in order, by competition, to drive a third match vendor from the street? In cases like these where the element of intimidation, molestation, or the other kinds of illegality to which I have alluded are not present, the question must be decided by the application of the test I have indicated. Assume that what is done is intentional and that it is calculated to do harm to others. Then comes the question—Was it done with or without "just cause or excuse?" If it was bonâ fide done in the use of a man's own property, in the exercise of a man's own trade, such legal justification would, I think, exist not the less because what was done might seem to others to be selfish or unreasonable: (see the summing up of Erle, J. and the judgment of the Queen's Bench in R. v. Rowlands, 17 Q. B. 671.) But such legal justification would not exist when the act was merely done with the intention of causing temporal harm, without reference to one's own lawful gain, or the lawful enjoyment of one's own rights. The good sense of the tribunal which had to decide would have to analyse the circumstances and to discover on which side of the line each case fell. But if the real object were to enjoy what was one's own or to acquire for one's self some advantage in one's property or trade, and what was done was done honestly, peaceably, and without any of the illegal acts above referred to, it could not, in my opinion, properly be said that it was done without just cause or excuse. One may with advantage borrow for the benefit of traders what was said by Erle, J. in R. v. Rowlands (17 Q. B. at p. 687) of workmen and of masters: "The intention of the law is to allow them to follow the dictates of their own will with respect to their own actions and their own property; and either, I believe, has a right to study to promote his own advantage, or to combine with others to promote their mutual advantage."

Lastly, we are asked to hold the plaintiffs' conference or association illegal as being in restraint of trade. The term "illegal" here is a misleading one. Contracts, as they are called, in restraint of trade are not, in my opinion, illegal in any sense except that the law will not enforce them. It does not prohibit the making of such contracts—it merely declines after they have been made to recognise their validity. The law considers the disadvantage so imposed upon the contract a sufficient shelter to the public. The language of Compton, J. in Hilton v. Eckersley (6 E. & B. 47) is I think not to be supported. No action at common law will lie or ever has lain against any individual or individuals for entering into a contract merely because it is in restraint of trade. Lord Eldon's equity decision in Cousins v. Smith (13 Ves. 542) is not very intelligible even if it be not open to the somewhat personal criticism passed on it by Lord Campbell in his "Lives of the Chancellors." If indeed it could be plainly proved that the mere formation of "conferences," "trusts," or "associations" such as these was always necessarily injurious to the public—a view which involves perhaps the disputable assumption that, in a country of free trade and one which is not under the iron régime of statutory monopolies, such confederations can ever be really successful—and if the evil of them were not sufficiently dealt with by the common law rule, which held such agreements to be void as distinct from holding them to be criminal, there might be some reason for thinking that the common law ought to discover within its arsenal of sound common-sense principles some further remedy commensurate with the mischief. Neither of these assumptions are to my mind at all evident, nor is it the province of judges to mould and stretch the law of conspiracy in order to keep pace with the calculations of political economy. If peaceable and honest combinations of capital for purposes of trade competition are to be struck at, it must, I think, be by legislation, for I do not see that they are under the ban of the common law. In the result I agree with Lord Coleridge, C.J. and differ with regret from the Master of the Rolls. The substance of my view is this, that competition, however severe and egotistical, if unattended by circumstances of dishonesty, intimidation, molestation, or such illegalities as I have above referred to, gives rise to no cause of action at common law. I myself should deem it to be a misfortune if we were to attempt to prescribe to the business world how honest and peaceable trade was to be carried on in a case where no such illegal elements as I have mentioned exist, or were to adopt some standard of judicial "reasonableness," or of "normal" prices, or "fair freights" to which commercial adventurers, otherwise innocent, were bound to conform. In my opinion, accordingly, this appeal ought to be dismissed with costs.

Fry, L.J.—The plaintiffs and defendants in this case are owners of steamships, and the plaintiffs allege in substance that the defendants have unlawfully conspired together and done certain acts in pursuance of their conspiracy whereby the plaintiffs have sustained both damage and injury. Both plaintiffs and defendants were concerned in the trade with China, and their steamships visited amongst other ports Shanghai, at the mouth of the Yangstze, and Hankow, which is 600 miles up that great river. The defendants' ships were more regularly employed in the China trade than those of the plaintiffs, which appear only to have visited Hankow at the height of the season for shipping tea—that is, in the months of May and June. In 1884 the defendants had formed a combination substantially like the one which I shall presently mention in detail, but it was part of the arrangement of 1884 that the employment of certain ships of the plaintiffs should not entail on the shippers the loss of rebate. In 1885 the defendants again formed amongst themselves an arrangement which they call a conference, and which the plaintiffs call a conspiracy. The terms of that arrangement are embodied in a written agreement dated the 7th April 1885. This agreement regulated as between the defendants themselves the trade with China and Japan; it provided for a certain division of cargoes and for the determination of the rates of freight. But with regard to Hankow, not only did these general stipulations apply to it, but certain special stipulations were come to, having clearly for their object the prevention of competition for freights at Hankow by any of the class of ships described as outsiders—i.e., vessels not belonging to any member of the conference. This object was to be accomplished in three ways: (1) It was stipulated that if outsiders should start for Hankow, they were to be met by conference steamers and encountered with "effective opposition," the determination of what conference ships should be employed for this purpose being left to the agents at Shanghai of the defendants' firms; (2) it was stipulated that the agents of the conference ships should be "prohibited," and here, again, I use the words of the agreement, from being interested directly or indirectly in outsiders—i.e., they were to be removed from the agency of the defendants' ships if they took any part in the business of non-conference steamers; (3) the agreement provided for a rebate of 5 per cent. being made to firms which shipped exclusively by conference ships, a benefit which was to be denied if a single shipment were made by an outsider, except in case of there not being a conference steamer in port or named for despatch within a week with available cargo space, in which event shipments by an outsider would not work a loss of the rebate. The only other provision of the agreement to which it is necessary to refer is that each of the parties to it was at liberty to withdraw from the agreement on notice. Upon this document I pause to make certain observations. In the first place, I am of opinion that it discloses the real bargain between the defendants, and that its purport is not substantially altered by any evidence in this case. In the next place, I conclude that at the date of the agreement the plaintiffs were probably in the contemplation of the defendants as persons who might possibly send ships to compete, but that with that exception the plaintiffs were not objects in the minds of the defendants when they entered into the agreement, and that the defendants were actuated by no personal ill-feeling or malice in fact towards the plaintiffs. Thirdly, in my judgment, the real object of the agreement was the acquisition of gain by the defendants, and the means by which they sought to accomplish this end was a competition on the part of the united shipowners against all the world so vigorous as to drive outsiders from the field and thus to prevent competition in the future. This was the direct scope of the provisions as to meeting outsiders and as to rebate, and the stipulation as to agents I regard as incidental to it, for the members of the conference might well desire that in such a conflict they should be represented by men entirely devoted to their plans and interests and not by agents acting for shipowners engaged on both sides in the struggle. Fourthly, I am of opinion that competition was in substance the only weapon which the defendants intended to use against their rivals in trade. No thought of using violence, molestation, intimidation, fraud, or misrepresentation was entertained by the defendants. Briefly speaking, therefore, the scheme of the conference was by means of competition in the near future to prevent competition in the remoter future. On the 22nd April interviews took place between Mr. Gellatly, the managing director of the plaintiff company, and the defendants, Swire, Macgregor, Holt, and Sutherland, which have been insisted on as important by both sides in argument before us. Mr. Gellatly tried to persuade the defendants to allow him to have a place in their arrangements, and, failing this, threatened, to use his own language, "to smash rates" at Hankow. What then passed between the parties does not seem to me very material. Shortly after the agreement was entered into copies of it were transmitted by most or all of the defendant firms to their agents in Shanghai in order that they might act upon it. On the 1st May it was known to the defendants' agents at Shanghai that the Pathan, one of the plaintiffs' steamships, was going up the river to Hankow to look for a cargo of tea at the height of the season; and she was to be followed by the Afghan, another of the plaintiffs' fleet. On the 8th May three of the conference vessels were sent up the river to add to the conference vessels already at Hankow, and to take part in competing against the outsiders for homeward freight; and three days afterwards a circular was issued by the conference agents at Shanghai to shippers at Hankow, referring by name to the Pathan and Afghan, and warning shippers that the rebate would be lost by shipment by these or any other outside ships. This circular was much insisted on by the plaintiffs' counsel as an act of hostility directed against the plaintiffs' vessels in particular, and as an act of malice towards the plaintiffs personally; and they further observed that it did not disclose to the shippers the provision of the agreement of the 7th April, by which in certain cases shipments might be made on board outsiders without loss of the right to rebate. In my opinion the circular was the natural result of the agreement of the 7th April, and does not carry the case of the plaintiffs further than as an overt act giving effect to that agreement. Considering that the Pathan and Afghan had in 1884 been allowed to receive cargo without its entailing a loss of the rebate on the shippers, I think that the reference to those ships by name was fair towards the shippers and does not show any personal malice against the plaintiffs. On the 14th May the conference agents met at Shanghai and determined on a general reduction of freights at Hankow as a means of depriving the Pathan and Afghan of the chance of a successful venture, and in the pious hope that they might go down the Yangtsze as they had come up—in ballast. Instructions were accordingly sent to Hankow, freights were reduced, and the plaintiffs' ships obtained freights, but at rates so low as to leave little or no profit, rates which, on the evidence, I conclude were brought down by the action of the defendants, and were lower than would have been obtained if there had been open competition and no combination amongst the defendant firms. On the 29th May, whilst the Pathan was full at Hankow and on the point of sailing, and whilst the Afghan was rapidly taking her cargo on board this action was brought. The parties having agreed to leave the question of damages, if any, to reference or arbitration, I shall assume that the plaintiffs may show that in point of fact they have sustained damage from the defendants' acts. The plaintiffs allege that the conference was an unlawful conspiracy; that the agreement then entered into was carried into execution by the sending up of the three ships expressly to compete with the plaintiffs' vessels, by the circular, and the reduction of freights; that these acts were wrongful and have caused damage to them, and consequently were actionable. I cannot doubt that whenever persons enter into an agreement which constitutes at law an indictable conspiracy, and that agreement is carried into execution by the conspirators by means of an unlawful act or acts which produce private injury to some person, that person has a cause of action against the conspirators.

Was the agreement in the present case an unlawful conspiracy? "The crime of conspiracy," said Tindal, C.J., speaking for the judges attending the House of Lords in O'Connell's case (11 Cl. & Fin. 233)—"the crime of conspiracy is complete if two or more than two should agree to do an illegal thing—i.e., to effect something in itself unlawful, or to effect by unlawful means something which in itself may be indifferent or even lawful." "A conspiracy," said Willes, J., "consists in the agreement of two or more to do an unlawful act, or to do a lawful act by unlawful means." In all cases, therefore, a conspiracy is an agreement to do an unlawful act. It is immaterial whether that act be (a) the principal object and end of the agreement, as an agreement to kill, or (b) a subordinate act towards the principal object, as in an agreement to support a true title by forged deeds or suborned witnesses. Again, the act may be unlawful (a) because it would be unlawful in each of the agreeing parties even if he did it alone; or (b) because though lawful in one it is unlawful in two or more. The first inquiry then which arises is this — was the principal object and end of the agreement illegal? I answer that that object and end was the acquisition of gain by the defendants. That is lawful, and I suppose even commendable according to the law of this country, provided the means used be lawful. What, then, were the means intended to be used? They were, as I have already said, the exclusion of competition in the remoter future by severe competition in the near future. Was that lawful or unlawful? It is not necessary to consider whether competition directed by one man or by a combination of men against another man, if instigated and put in motion from mere malice and ill-will towards him, as a means of doing him ill-service and for no benefit to the doer would or would not be unlawful or actionable. There is in the present case no evidence of express malice or of any activity of the defendants against the plaintiffs except as rival and competing shipowners. The defendants did not aim at any general injury of the plaintiffs' trade, or any reduction of them to poverty or insolvency; they only desired to drive them from particular parts where the defendants conceived that the plaintiffs' presence interfered with their own gain; the damage to be inflicted on the plaintiffs was to be strictly limited by the gain which the defendants desired to win for themselves. In the observations I am about to make I shall therefore lay out of consideration the case of competition used as a mere engine of malice even where I do not in terms repeat the exception. I will only add on this part of the case that the charge of Erle, J. in the case of Reg. v. Rowlands (17 Q. B. 687, n.) draws the same distinction which I have taken between combinations to promote the interests of those who combine and combinations of which the hurt of another is the immediate purpose. We have then to inquire whether mere competition directed by one man against another is ever unlawful. It was argued that the plaintiffs have a legal right to carry on their trade, and that to deprive them of that right by any means is a wrong. But the right of the plaintiffs to trade is not an absolute but a qualified right—a right conditioned by the like right in the defendants and all Her Majesty's subjects, and a right therefore to trade subject to competition. Now, I know no limits to the right of competition in the defendants; I mean no limits in law; I am not speaking of morals or good manners. To draw a line between fair and unfair competition, between what is reasonable and unreasonable, passes the power of the courts. Competition exists when two or more persons seek to possess or to enjoy the same thing; it follows that the success of one must be the failure of another, and no principle of law enables us to interfere with or to moderate that success or that failure so long as it is due to mere competition; I say mere competition for I do not doubt that it is unlawful and actionable for one man to interfere with another's trade by fraud or misrepresentation, or by molesting his customers or those who would be his customers whether by physical obstruction or moral intimidation. The cases of Garratt v. Taylor (Cro. Jac. 567); Tarleton v. M'Gawley (Peake, N. P. 270); Keble v. Hetheringill (11 East, 574); Carrington v. Taylor (11 East, 571) are all cases of interference by physical acts, driving away either the birds or the customers from the plaintiffs' places of business. Other cases were cited in which one man has persuaded another who is under some contract of service to a third to break that contract to the damage of such third person, and the persuasion has been held actionable. But no case has been or I believe can be cited where the only means used by the defendant to injure the plaintiff has been competition pure and simple. I think that if we were now to hold interference by mere competition unlawful we should be laying down law both novel and at variance with that which modern legislation has shown to be the present policy of the State. But if one man may by competition strive to drive his rivals out of the field, is it lawful or unlawful for several persons to combine together to drive from the field their competitor in trade? It is said that such an agreement is in restraint of trade and therefore illegal. Be it so. But in what sense is the word "illegal" used in such a proposition? In my opinion it means that the agreement is one upon which no action can be sustained, and no relief obtained at law or in equity, but it does not mean that the entering into the agreement is either indictable or actionable. The authorities on this point are, I think, with a single exception, uniform. In Mitchell v. Reynolds (1 Sm. L. C. 430, 9th edit.) Parker, C.J., in discussing contracts in restraint of trade, says: "It is not a reason against them that they are against law, I mean in a proper sense, for in an improper sense they are." In Price v. Green (16 M. & W. 346) Patteson, J., in delivering the judgment of the Exchequer Chamber upon a covenant held void as in restraint of trade, said expressly that it was "void only, not illegal." In Hilton v. Eckersley (6 E. & B. 47) the bond was addressed, not as in Mitchell v. Reynolds, only to negative acts, such as not trading, but to positive acts, such as carrying on works under particular directions and closing the works at the dictation of a majority of the combining owners. In this case all the judges both in the Courts of Queen's Bench and the Exchequer Chamber held that the bond could not be enforced, but Crompton, J. alone thought it created an indictable offence, Lord Campbell, C.J. and Erle, J. expressing an opposite opinion, and the Court of Exchequer Chamber carefully abstaining from expressing any opinion on the point. The language of all the judges in the cases of Hornby v. Close (L. Rep. 2 Q. B. 153) and Farrer v. Close (L. Rep. 4 Q. B. 602) is consonant with that of Lord Campbell and Erle, J. in Hilton v. Eckersley; and Crompton, J. is, I believe, the only judge who has ever hitherto held such contracts illegal as well as void. If every agreement in restraint of trade were not only void but unlawful in the stricter sense of the word, it would follow that, as every agreement must be at least between two persons, every such agreement would constitute an indictable offence, and yet not a single case has been cited of a conspiracy constituted by a mere agreement between two persons in undue restraint of the trade of one of the contractors. This silence of the books is very significant.

It was forcibly urged upon us that combinations like the present are in their nature calculated to interfere with the course of trade, and that they are therefore so directly opposed to the interest which the State has in freedom of trade and in that competition which is said to be the life of trade, that they must be indictable. It is plain that the intention and object of the combination before us is to check competition; but the means it uses is competition, and it is difficult, if not impossible, to weigh against one another the probabilities of the employment of competition on the one hand and its suppression on the other; nor is it easy to say how far the success of the combination would arouse in others the desire to share in its benefits and by competition to force a way into the magic circle. In Wickens v. Evans (3 Y. & J. 318) it was suggested that the brewers or distillers of London might enter into an agreement to divide the metropolis into districts, the effect of which might be to supply the public with an inferior commodity at a higher price. This argument was met by Hullock, B. by this observation: "If the brewers or distillers of London were to come to the agreement suggested, many other persons would soon be found to prevent the result anticipated, and the consequence would perhaps be that the public would obtain the articles they deal in at a cheaper rate." A similar observation may be made in the present instance and corroborated by what has actually happened. For the case before us strikingly illustrates the difficulty of foretelling the probable results of such a combination in the public interest. In fact, the competition between the plaintiffs and defendants in May and June 1885 brought down the freights from Hankow to the benefit, it must be supposed, of the consumer in England. The conference came to an end in Aug. 1885, and in the summer of 1886 the rate of freight from Hankow was determined by free competition in an open market, in which the defendants were competing with one another. But I do not rest my conclusion on any speculations as to the probable effect of such agreements as the one before us, but on this—that the combination, if in restraint of trade, is primâ facie void only and not illegal; that no statute in force makes such competition criminal; and that the policy of our law, as at present declared by the Legislature, is against all fetters on combination and competition unaccompanied by violence or fraud or other like injurious acts. The ancient common law of this country and the statutes with reference to the acts known as badgering, forestalling, regrating, and engrossing indicated the mind of the Legislature and of the judges that certain large operations in goods which interfered with the more ordinary course of trade were injurious to the public; they were held criminal accordingly. But early in the reign of George III. the mind of the Legislature showed symptoms of change in this matter and the penal statutes were repealed (12 Geo. 3, c. 71), and the common law was left to its unaided operation. This repealing statute contains in the preamble the statement that it had been found by experience that the restraint laid by several statutes upon the dealing in corn, meal, flour, cattle, and sundry other sorts of victuals, by preventing a free trade in the said commodities, had a tendency to discourage the growth and to enhance the price of the same. This statement is very noteworthy. It contains a confession of failure in the past, the indication of a new policy for the future. And this new policy has been more clearly declared and acted upon in the present reign, for the Legislature has by 7 & 8 Vict. c. 24, altered the common law by utterly abolishing the several offences of badgering, engrossing, forestalling, and regrating. At the same time this repeal was accompanied by a proviso that nothing in the Act contained should apply to the offence of knowingly and fraudulently spreading, or conspiring to spread, any false rumour with intent to enhance or decry the price of any goods or merchandise, or to the offence of preventing, or endeavouring to prevent, by force or threats, any goods, wares, or merchandise being brought to any fair or market, but that every such offence might be punished as if this Act had not been made. The comparison of the operative part of the statute with this proviso goes far to draw the line between lawful and unlawful interference with the ordinary course of trade or of the market.

A consideration of the statutes relative to trade unions leads me to a similar conclusion. It is not necessary to consider in detail the provisions of the statutes of 1871 and 1876 (34 & 35 Vict. c. 31—39 & 40 Vict. c. 22); but one of their principal results was to enlarge the power of combination between workmen and workmen, and between masters and masters, for the purpose of maintaining and enforcing their respective interests, and to remove the objection of being in restraint of trade to which some of such combinations had been obnoxious. But whilst the Legislature thus set masters and men respectively free to combine, they reasserted the illegality of using violence, threats, molestation, obstruction, or coercion; and here, again, the contrast between the two pieces of legislation which stand side by side in the statute-book, the one declaring mere combinations lawful, and the other declaring violence and other like acts unlawful, helps to draw the line in the same direction as does the legislation in respect of trade combinations: (cf. the statutes 34 & 35 Vict. c. 31 and c. 32.) Thus the stream of modern legislation runs strongly in favour of allowing great combinations of persons interested in trade and intended to govern or regulate the proceedings of large bodies of men, and thus necessarily to interfere with what would have been the course of trade if unaffected by such combinations. I therefore conclude that the combination in the present case cannot be held illegal as opposed to the policy of the law.

It remains to inquire whether the authorities assist in the decision of the question before us. As regards an individual, I have already pointed out that for one man to interfere with the lawful trade or business of another by molestation or any physical interference, or by fraud or misrepresentation, may be an actionable wrong. But no authority appears to show that for one man to injure the business of another by mere competition, even though it may be successfully directed to driving the rival out of the town where he dwells, or out of the business which he carries on, is actionable. And the silence of the books is strong evidence that such acts are not actionable. With regard to like acts done by a combination of persons, the authorities are not very numerous. There are certain general statements in text-books, of which the passage in Hawkins' Pleas of the Crown, vol. 1, p. 446, may be taken as a fair specimen. "There can be no doubt," he says, "but that all confederacies whatsoever, wrongfully to prejudice a third person, are highly criminal at common law, as where divers persons confederate together by indirect means to impoverish a third person." For this proposition Hawkins cites authorities relative to two cases: First, Rex v. Kimberly (1 Lev. 62), which was a conspiracy to indict the prosecutor for having begotten a bastard child on the body of one of the conspirators—a case, therefore, which has nothing to do with the question now in hand. Secondly, Rex v. Stirling (1 Lev. 126), in which the indictment charged certain brewers of London with a conspiracy to refuse to sell small beer, with a view to impoverish the excisemen, and with intent to move the common people to pull down the Excise house, and to bring the excisemen into hatred of the people, and to impoverish and disable them from paying their rent to the King. The defendants were found guilty of counselling and assembling to impoverish the excisemen, and not guilty of the residue; and thereupon ultimately judgment went for the Crown. The real ground of the decision was, as stated by Holt, C.J. in Reg. v. Daniell (6 Mod. 99), that the offence of the defendant was of a public nature, and levelled at the Government, and it is therefore no authority in respect of a combination which has no such object or effect. But one argument as it appears in Siderfin is important. It was urged for the defendants that it was not an offence punishable by our law for one man to depauperate another, with a view to enrich himself, by selling commodities at cheaper rates. The court did not deny this proposition, but drew a distinction based upon the allegations of the information, which were supported by the verdict, that the Excise was parcel of the revenue of the King, and that to impoverish the excisemen was to render them incapable of paying these revenues to the King. So far, therefore, as the case goes, it is an authority rather for the defendants than for the plaintiffs in this case. The next case that seems relevant is Rex v. Eccles (1 Lea C. C. 274), before Lord Mansfield and the Court of King's Bench. The defendant and six other persons had been convicted on two counts, charging that the defendants and others, devising unlawfully and by indirect means to impoverish one Booth, and to hinder him from exercising the trade of a tailor, conspired by wrongful and indirect means to impoverish him, and to hinder him from exercising his said business; and the defendants, according to their said conspiracy, did so hinder him. It was moved, in arrest of judgment, that the means by which the mischief was to be effected ought to have been set out, but the indictment was held sufficient. The nature of the acts done by the defendants does not appear, nor is it easy to learn precisely on what principles the court proceeded. Lord Ellenborough in Rex v. Turner (13 East, 228) said that the case seemed to have been determined on the ground of restraint of trade, in which case it would probably be no authority since the legislation of this reign with reference to trade unions. If regarded as an authority merely on the sufficiency of the indictments, it appears open to some question. In any event, it throws no clear light on the matter now for decision. The case of Cousins v. Smith (13 Ves. 542) is probably not applicable, since it proceeded on the view of a court of equity of forestalling and regrating, and those practices are not now unlawful. The equitable shadow of these crimes must, I think, have disappeared from the crimes themselves. These are, so far as I am aware, all the relevant authorities, and none of them appears to me to support the proposition that mere competition of one set of men against another man, carried on for the purpose of gain, and not out of actual malice, is actionable, even though intended to drive the rival in trade away from his place of business, and though that intention be actually carried into effect. For these reasons, I hold that the judgment of the Lord Chief Justice was right, and that the appeal should be dismissed with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

The River Derwent. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM THE PROBATE, DIVORCE, AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION (ADMIRALTY).

Collision—River Thames—Vessel crossing river—Rules and Bye-laws for the Navigation of the River Thames, arts. 24, 25.

A steamship ceases to be "crossing from one side of the river towards the other side" within the meaning of art. 24 of the Rules and Bye-laws for the Navigation of the River Thames when her stem has got so far across that it can go no further, although she is still athwart the stream; but where a vessel is swinging for the purpose of turning in the river with her anchor down but not holding, she is not a crossed ship if she is still moving towards the shore, although she may have got more than athwart, and although her stern may be swinging to the tide.

The steamship A., having come up the Thames as far as Bugsby's Reach on the flood tide, was about to turn head down, and, having whistled, her helm was ported and anchor let go so that it might dredge, and she began to swing round. Meanwhile the steamship R. D., which had been coming up the river astern of the A., instead of taking any steps to keep out of the way of the A., although she saw that the A. was doing nothing to keep out of her way in obedience to art. 24 of the Thames Rules and Bye-laws, came on and collided with the A.

Held, that both vessels were to blame, the A. because, being a crossing ship, she neglected to keep out of the way of the R. D., and the R. D. because, after she saw that the A. was neglecting her duty to keep out of the way, she failed to take any steps in sufficient time to avoid the collision.

This was an appeal by the defendants in a collision action in rem from a decision of Butt, J. finding their vessel, the River Derwent, solely to blame.

The collision occurred between the plaintiffs' steamship the Allendale and the defendants' steamship the River Derwent in the river Thames on the 19th Dec. 1888.

The facts alleged by the plaintiffs were as follows:—Shortly before 10.20 a.m. on the 19th Dec. the Allendale, a steamship of 569 tons register, laden with a cargo of coals, was, whilst on a voyage from Newcastle-on-Tyne to London, in Bugsby's Reach in the river Thames. The Allendale, which had been on the south side of mid-channel, had received orders from the coal derricks to bring up, and accordingly her whistle was blown three blasts, her engines were moved easy ahead, and her helm was ported, and when she had got across mid-channel and her stem was eighty feet from the north shore, her engines were stopped and her anchor was let go to swing her round head down stream. Before the Allendale had finished swinging and was still heading towards the north shore, the steamship River Derwent (which had been previously seen from a half to three-quarters of a mile lower down the river) was observed six or seven ship's lengths off on the starboard quarter, and coming up the river at considerable speed. Instead of going under the stern of the Allendale, the River Derwent was suddenly seen to come to starboard, and, although the engines of the Allendale were at once reversed full speed, the River Derwent came on and with her stem struck the Allendale on the starboard side just before the engine room.

The facts alleged by the defendants were as follows:—Shortly after 10 a.m. on the 19th Dec. the River Derwent, a screw steamship of 504 tons register, laden with a general cargo, was in the river Thames, in the course of a voyage from Terneuzen to London. The weather was fine and clear, and the tide was first quarter flood. The River Derwent was at the top of Woolwich Reach, on the north side of mid-channel. She was making about two knots through the water, following nearly in the wake of a steamship called the James Sothern, and being followed by another steamship. In these circumstances those on board the River Derwent observed the Allendale, which had previously passed the River Derwent, distant about a quarter of a mile, about two to three points on the port bow of the River Derwent, and lying well over on the south shore apparently stationary. At about this time the James Sothern was observed to begin to swing with her head to the north shore, and the engines of the River Derwent were stopped and her helm starboarded so as to pass under her stern. When the River Derwent had answered her helm about a point, the helm was steadied and the engines set ahead dead slow. The River Derwent was then in a position to pass astern of the James Sothern and well clear of the Allendale, when the latter was observed to be coming rapidly ahead across the river, and across the course of the River Derwent. The engines of the River Derwent were at once reversed full speed, her helm was starboarded, and her whistle was blown three short blasts. The Allendale and the steamer following the River Derwent were hailed to go astern, but the Allendale was now seen to have her anchor down, and, instead of doing anything to keep out of the way of the River Derwent, she came on and with her starboard side struck the stem of the River Derwent.

It appeared that the Allendale's anchor was not let go for the purpose of holding, but merely in order to check her round by its dredging over the ground.

The main allegation against the River Derwent was, that she came up the river without keeping a good look-out, and that, instead of acting with her engines, they were only stopped about two minutes before the collision. It appeared from her own engineer's log that her engines were stopped and reversed only two minutes before the collision, and that previously to that they had been going ahead for seven minutes.

The main allegation against the Allendale was, that she had broken art. 24 of the Rules and Bye-laws for the Navigation of the River Thames in neglecting to keep out of the way of the River Derwent, whose duty it was, under art. 25, to keep her course. The defendants alleged that the Allendale began to turn and cross the river when she was only one and a half ship's lengths above the River Derwent, and that she was still moving across the river at the time of the collision. The plaintiffs alleged that she had begun to turn some four to six minutes before the collision, and had got over as far as she could to the north shore, and had ceased to be moving towards the shore for some appreciable time before the collision.

Butt, J., having taken time to consider, gave judgment in favour of the plaintiffs, stating that the Elder Brethren differed as to the time it would take the Allendale to turn in the river. He found that at the time of the collision the Allendale had begun to tail up the river; that she had begun to turn about five or six minutes before the collision; that the River Derwent was a considerable distance below the Allendale when she turned; that the Allendale had in fact crossed the river before the River Derwent was so close as to involve any risk of collision; and that in the circumstances the River Derwent was alone to blame.

The following Rules and Bye-laws for the Navigation of the River Thames were referred to and are material to the decision:

Art. 24. Steam vessels crossing from one side of the river towards the other side shall keep out of the way of vessels navigating up and down the river.

Art. 25. Where by the above rules one of two vessels is to keep out of the way, the other shall keep her course.

Sir Walter Phillimore and Dr. Raikes, for the defendants, in support of the appeal.—The Allendale was alone to blame for the collision. She was crossing from one side of the river towards the other, and it was therefore her duty to keep out of the way of the River Derwent. The duty of the River Derwent was to keep her course, and the Allendale did wrong in putting herself in the way of the course of the River Derwent. The mere fact that the Allendale had stopped her engines and was being checked round did not entitle her to treat herself as outside art. 24.

Barnes, Q.C. and J. P. Aspinall for the respondents, contra.—The words of art. 24 cast a duty upon a vessel to keep out of the way only when she is "crossing from one side of the river towards the other side." The Allendale had ceased to be doing this. She had got as far across the river as she wished, and was at the material time straightening down the river, not crossing towards the north shore. Assuming her to have been in motion at the time of the collision, it was only the motion incidental to straightening in the river. In fact, her engines were stopped, and she had already begun to swing with the assistance of her anchor.

Lord Esher, M.R.—The decision in this case depends mainly upon the true construction of arts. 24 and 25 of the Rules and Bye-laws for the Navigation of the River Thames, whether they are applicable, and if so what is their applicability to the facts of this case. The first thing to be observed about these two rules is that their applicability in conterminous; they must both begin to apply to a given case at the same moment, and they must both cease to apply at the same moment. Art. 25 is applicable to a case while art. 24 is, and neither of them is applicable unless both are. Therefore the question in this case is, were these two articles applicable at any time, and if they were did their applicability end before the collision took place? Now we are advised that from the time when the Allendale finally made up her mind to cross until the time she and the River Derwent were in the position in which they were when the collision took place would be about four minutes; and of course more than four minutes would have elapsed before the Allendale would have got head on tide. Therefore four minutes passed from the time when the Allendale finally made up her mind to cross to the time of collision. During those four minutes the River Derwent was coming up the river at a moderate speed. It seems to me to follow as an irresistible inference that from the moment when the Allendale began to cross, that if she continued doing so and the River Derwent continued coming up the river there must have been danger of collision. Now what is the governing principle as to the time when the navigation rules are to begin to apply? It is at the moment when if both vessels continue to do what they are doing there will be danger of collision. That is the time when these rules invariably begin to apply. Rule 24 is, "steam vessels crossing from one side of the river towards the other side shall keep out of the way of vessels navigating up and down the river." That rule fixes the duty of a steam vessel which is crossing from one side of the river towards the other side. The reciprocal rule which takes immediate effect and lasts just as long as the other says, "where by the above rules one of two vessels is to keep out of the way the other shall keep her course." That rule fixes the duty of the River Derwent.

But, now, when is the application of these rules ended? That depends upon the true construction of art. 24. There is no difficulty about the construction of art. 25. The question is when does art. 24 end, because immediately it ends art. 25 ends. The words are "steam vessels crossing from one side of the river towards the other side," that is the time when the rule is to apply. One question to consider is whether the word "crossing" as used in the rule is to have a nautical meaning, different from its ordinary meaning. In my view it has not; I think it is an ordinary English phrase of crossing a given space, and that it ought to be construed so as to have its ordinary meaning. But we are not all agreed upon that point, and therefore we have asked this question of our nautical advisers: "In nautical language, is a ship which is crossing the river still a crossing ship when her head has got as far across the river as it can go, while her stern is still athwart the river?" They tell us in nautical language in their opinion under such circumstances she would be a crossed ship. I must, however, give vent to my own view much as I respect theirs, and I think that is a wrong and most dangerous interpretation of the rule. I should have thought that, as long as a ship is in the course of performing the manœuvre of crossing, as long as she is in motion performing the manœuvre, she is still a crossing ship. Take this example: when a ship lets go an anchor for the purpose of checking herself round she is still in motion, and when she is still bodily moving towards the north side, as in the present case, I should have thought that she continued to be a crossing ship until the whole of her was at the place across the river where she intended to be. I myself think that if you fall short of that, that if you say that whilst her stern is athwart the river, as in the case of a long ship it may be up to mid-channel, she may be regarded as a crossed ship, such interpretation will be very dangerous. I know that my learned brothers differ from me, and think that when a vessel's head has got as far across the river as it can go she is a crossed ship although her stern is still athwart the river. But I do not think either of them would say this, that if a ship stops while crossing at a place short of that, for any purpose you please, but intending to go on further, she is to be regarded as a crossed ship. Therefore, assume the interpretation of the rule to be as they suggest, the question is, has this ship fulfilled that condition so as to be a crossed ship? Of course on my interpretation there can be no doubt that she was not a crossed ship. If you adopt my brothers' view it comes to be a question of fact whether she was a crossed ship. If she was not, the rule was still in force, and it was her duty to keep out of the way. She is also bound not to put herself in such a position that she cannot keep out of the way. Now, was she in such a position that the rule did not apply? Before I state the result of the evidence, let me say this, that we are not bound down to say that one set of witnesses has told the exact truth, and that the other has told the contrary of the truth. We are bound to consider, taking all the evidence together, what we think is the true state of the facts. When the Allendale put her anchor down, had she determined not to go nearer towards the north shore, or was she still, in fact, going towards that shore? She had put her anchor down, not for the purpose of coming to anchor, but in order to check herself round. When she put her anchor down to do that she was not stopped in the water. She was still going on. We are all agreed as to that. Now, if she was still going on, she was going on towards the north shore, though, no doubt, at the same time trying to get round. She was making a circle as it were, and we are told that for the purpose of performing the manœuvre of turning it would be to her advantage to get near to the north shore. The nearer she got to the north shore the less the difficulty in bringing her head to tide, because the flood tide would not have so much power on her starboard bow to prevent her coming round. Therefore, she was in fact still moving towards the shore, in a circle if not in a straight line. I know her engines had been stopped, but that does not at once stop the way of the ship, and was not intended to stop the way of this ship. It was not intended that she should then be still in the water. She was checking herself round by her anchor, which was moving on the ground. It was not intended to hold. Had it been a great deal more chain would have been paid out. Therefore, if the Allendale was still moving towards the shore she does not bring herself within the meaning of a crossed ship, because her head had not got as far across as it could go, not even so far across as it was intended to go. Therefore art. 24 was still applicable. If the rule was applicable her duty was to keep out of the way. In my opinion, she has not done so. She had got into such a position that she could not get out of the way, a thing which she had no right to do. If she had taken proper notice of the River Derwent she ought to have seen that if she, the Allendale, persisted in going across she would certainly bring about a collison unless the River Derwent stopped. But she had no right to act so as to throw the obligation on the River Derwent to stop. She ought to have got out of the way, but she did nothing to do so. She persisted in doing what she wished to do.

It has been said that if she did not do that, grave mercantile inconvenience would result —viz., that she would have to go up the river a very considerable distance before she could turn. In my opinion that signifies nothing. This regulation is not made with regard to mercantile convenience. It is made for the safety of lives and property on the river Thames, and if it were true that a ship would have to go a mile up the river before she could turn in safety, in my opinion she would be bound to go that distance. But I do not believe it to be a fact that she would have had to go up a considerable distance. On the whole, therefore, I think she broke art. 24, but she also broke another rule in not giving the proper whistle signal. I abjure absolutely and entirely what has been urged on that point in her defence, that though a rule existed she is to be excused for not obeying it on the ground that she did not know it. Were that so it would make these rules a farce. Therefore she broke that rule, but inasmuch as the collision happened in daylight, and those on the River Derwent had an opportunity of seeing what the Allendale was doing, her disobedience to that rule is immaterial. The River Derwent had all the notice, all the knowledge that she would have had even if the Allendale had given the signal.

With regard to the River Derwent, there is a governing rule of navigation applicable to all vessels which come into close proximity with one another. It is a rule of navigation which does not require any statutory force. Those who have command of a ship have intrusted to them the property of another, and the lives of those on board the ship. Therefore they must not do that which is unreasonable; that is to say, that which is unskilful and negligent, which will put in jeopardy the property and lives intrusted to them. They also owe this duty to other ships navigating near them. Did the River Derwent obey that rule? She was coming up the river, she saw that the Allendale was crossing the river, and, in my opinion, she must have seen that the Allendale intended to continue crossing the river, and that she did not intend to take any steps to keep out of her way. I think there had come a time when she must have seen that the Allendale had gone so far that she could not get out of the way. The officer in charge of the River Derwent ought to have seen that if he kept on there would be the greatest danger of collision. I am of opinion that he showed a want of due care and skill in not stopping his way, and perhaps also in not starboarding sooner. I think, therefore, that we must hold both these vessels to blame, with the usual consequences as to costs, both in the court below and here.

Lindley, L.J.—With respect to the want of care on the part of the River Derwent, it is unnecessary to say much. I do not think anybody who takes the trouble to master the evidence is likely to come to the conclusion that the River Derwent was not to blame. Therefore it is not necessary to enlarge upon that point. But the other question is a much more difficult matter—I mean the question whether the Allendale is to blame. That depends on the construction of art. 24, as applied to the two vessels in this case. Up to a certain point, anyone can understand what is meant by a crossing ship; but there is or may be a point of time when it is extremely difficult to say whether a ship which had been crossing has ceased to cross. I for one had very grave doubt about it, and we have consulted the gentlemen who assist us as to whether a ship which has got so far across the river that her stem cannot get further across with safety can still be considered a crossing ship because her hull projects athwart the stream. It struck me that the true construction of the rule, apart from scientific evidence, is that, in such circumstances, a vessel ought not to be considered as a crossing vessel. That is my opinion, and I am glad to say that that opinion is confirmed by the gentlemen who assist us; that is to say, men skilled in navigation and seafaring life are of opinion that a vessel in such circumstances would not be a crossing vessel. Therefore, if the Allendale had got into that position, I should have said that her crossing had ceased, and that she was no longer a crossing vessel. But I do not think that she had got into anything like that position. If she had got her head up or down the river, then of course her crossing had ceased. But it appears to me that a vessel which is short of that, and was actually coming round as this was, is not so near the other side as to incur the benefit of the construction I have referred to, so as to be no longer a crossing vessel within the meaning of the rule. I think that from first to last she was a crossing vessel, and neglected the duty cast upon her as such. I therefore think that both these vessels are to blame.

Lopes, L.J.—This case depends upon the construction of art. 24, and how far it is applicable to the circumstances proved by the evidence. I throughout have entertained a strong opinion as to what the true interpretation of the rule is; I was not able to interpret it in its nautical meaning, if it had a nautical meaning, but I was prepared to interpret it according to the ordinary meaning of the language used. We have had advice from the assessors as to the nautical meaning of the rule, and it is satisfactory to find that it agrees with my view. Giving an ordinary meaning to the language used, I think that a ship crossing has crossed when she approaches the other side as near as she safely can, though she be angling to the bank and athwart the stream. Applying the rule so interpreted to the present case, how does it stand? At the time of the collision the Allendale had not approached the other side as near as she could. Indeed, we are told by the assessors that, having regard to the purpose for which she had gone towards the north shore, she might with advantage have approached nearer. At the time of the collision she was, in my opinion, still nearing the northern side of the river. If that is so, the article was applicable to this case, and the Allendale at the time of the collision was still a crossing ship. Under these circumstances I am of opinion that the judgment of the learned judge below must be varied by holding both ships to blame.

Collision—Lights—Obscuration—Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, art. 6—Merchant Shipping Act 1873 (36 & 37 Vict. c. 85), s. 17.

In a collision action where either party has infringed the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, he is deemed to be in fault unless he can establish that the infringement could not possibly have caused or contributed to the collision; and it is the duty of the judge to determine upon the evidence whether or not the party committing the breach has satisfied the burden of proof that the breach could not possibly have occasioned or contributed to the collision.

The steamship A. collided with the sailing ship B., striking her on the port bow with her stern. The red light of the sailing ship was obscured by the foresail to a vessel substantially right ahead. The steamship approached the sailing ship on a bearing never less than one point to two and a half points on the port bow, and the red light of the sailing ship was in fact always open to the steamship.

Held, that, on the proper construction of sect. 17 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1873, although the sailing ship had infringed the regulations as to lights, the court was bound to consider the evidence as to whether such infringement could in fact have contributed to the collision, and that, as in the circumstances the infringement could not possibly have contributed to the collision, the owners of the sailing ship were not to blame.

This was an appeal by the plaintiffs in a collision action from a decision of Butt, J. holding both ships to blame.

The collision occurred in the English Channel on the 7th March 1889 between the plaintiffs' full-rigged sailing ship the Vandalia and the defendants' steamship the Duke of Buccleuch, when the Duke of Buccleuch was lost with all hands.

The facts alleged by the plaintiffs were as follows: At about 10.45 a.m. on the 7th March 1889 the Vandalia, a full-rigged sailing ship of 1422 tons register, was on a voyage from New York to London, laden with a cargo of petroleum. She was in the English Channel, the Owers lightship bearing about N. by W., distant thirteen miles, sailing close-hauled on the starboard tack, heading about E. ¾ S. magnetic, under three whole topsails, courses, foretopmast staysail, and two jibs. Her regulation lights were duly exhibited and burning brightly, and a good look-out was being kept on board of her. In these circumstances those on board her saw a bright light, which proved to be the masthead light of the Duke of Buccleuch, about one and a half points on the port bow, and distant about four or five miles. Soon afterwards the green light of the Duke of Buccleuch came into view on about the same bearing. The Vandalia was kept on her course close by the wind. The Duke of Buccleuch rapidly approached, still on the same bearing, and, although loudly hailed, she came on apparently under a starboard helm, and with her stem struck the port bow of the Vandalia.

In consequence of the Duke of Buccleuch having been lost with all hands, the defendants gave no evidence as to the circumstances of the collision. They proved that the Duke of Buccleuch was a screw steamship of 2023 tons net register, and that at the time of the collision she was on a voyage from Antwerp to India, laden with a general cargo. They also gave evidence, from measurements taken subsequently to the collision, to show that the port side light of the Vandalia was obscured by the foresail, and contended that therefore the Vandalia was to blame for a breach of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea.

At the close of the case Butt, J. stated that he had determined to send his assessors to inspect the Vandalia, giving liberty to the parties to be represented at such inspection by one surveyor each. This was accordingly done, and the effect of the inspection appears in the judgment.

The judgment of Butt, J., so far as is material, was as follows:—Coming now to this case, I have had the advantage of a consultation with the Elder Brethren, who have been down and inspected this ship, and I will state the result of their observations. They tell me that their observations have convinced them of this: that with the yards absolutely sharp-braced, and without allowing for any bellying of the sails, the line of light shows outside the foresail, but that the line of light is above the bottom of the foresail; that is, the horizontal line of light. They also tell me this: that if the yards, instead of being sharp-braced, were checked, or, still more, if they were square, the line of light parallel with the keel of the vessel would be considerably inside the outer edge of the sail, and would also be above the bottom of the sail. In other words, it would be seriously obscured from forward. I have now to consider what the result of that information must be. Now, assuming that the yards were absolutely sharp-braced, I am advised that, apart from the bellying of the sail, there would be no obscuration of the lights even right ahead; but that it is impossible to say with a little bellying the obscuration might not happen. Are the owners of the Vandalia to be held to blame by virtue of the 17th section of the Merchant Shipping Act 1873? That section is as follows: "If in any case of collision it is proved to the court before which the case is tried that any of the regulations for preventing collisions contained in or made under the Merchant Shipping Acts 1854 to 1873 has been infringed, the ship by which such regulation has been infringed shall be deemed to be in fault, unless it is shown to the satisfaction of the court that the circumstances of the case made departure from the regulations necessary." Now, it follows from what I have stated that, in consequence of this ship's lights being placed where they were, she was guilty of a breach of the regulations. Whether the infringement of the regulation operated at the time in question is another matter; but I cannot hesitate to say, upon the advice I have received, and the evidence, that these side lights were improperly placed. How am I to apply the Act of Parliament? It may be that, if the yards were braced absolutely sharp up at the time, the lights would not have been obscured by the sail from ahead. Here let me state what I had forgotten to do before—that the Elder Brethren satisfied themselves that with the foresail carried as a mainsail, that sail on the mainyard would cause no obscuration. It is the foresail proper of which I have been speaking, and with which I have been dealing. Am I to take it that this vessel had her yards absolutely sharp-braced? I do not think I can. I think the Act of Parliament was passed to prevent me going into those nice questions of fact, and I think that the decisions upon this section have gone upon that view. That being so, I must hold that there was an infringement of art. 6 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, which "might possibly"—I am using the words which I think were used in the Privy Council and also in the Court of Appeal—"have contributed to or caused this collision." That being so, I must hold the Vandalia to blame. The next question I have to consider is totally different—viz., whether the violation of the regulation did, as a matter of fact, cause the collision. I think it clear that, if the evidence from the Vandalia is to be accepted as accurate, there would have been no obscuration at all to the Duke of Buccleuch approaching as she was, because the evidence is that the witnesses saw the Duke of Buccleuch at a bearing which they describe as a point to a point and a half on their bow. At that breadth of bearing there would be no obscuration. I am not quite certain that I am safe in taking that bearing—I doubt whether I ought to take it; but the Elder Brethren tell me this—that, even from right ahead, in the existing state of the weather, the lights of the Vandalia must certainly have been visible as she rose and fell in the seaway. Therefore a vigilant look-out on the Duke of Buccleuch would have informed her, long before she came into close proximity, of the approach of the Vandalia. I therefore hold that there was an infringement of art. 6 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, for which I must under sect. 17 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1873, hold the Vandalia to blame. On the other hand, I think it impossible to acquit the Duke of Buccleuch from blame, inasmuch as, upon any view, we think they ought—at intervals, at all events—to have seen the side light of the Vandalia. In the result, I pronounce both vessels to blame.

From this decision the plaintiffs now appealed.

The Merchant Shipping Act 1873 (36 & 37 Vict. c. 85), s. 17:

> If in any case of collision it is proved to the court before which the case is tried that any of the regulations for preventing collisions contained in or made under the Merchant Shipping Acts 1854 to 1873, have been infringed, the ship by which such regulation has been infringed shall be deemed to be in fault, unless it is shown to the satisfaction of the court that the circumstances of the case made a departure from the regulations necessary.

Cohen, Q.C. and Myburgh, Q.C. (with them Dr. Raikes) for the appellants.—The breach of the regulations did not in fact contribute to the collision. It is also submitted that it could not possibly have done so. The obscuration of the light was only to a vessel right ahead, whereas the Duke of Buccleuch was always one or two points on the bow of the Vandalia. The learned judge was wrong in refusing to inquire into those facts. His finding is confined to the fact that the obscuration of the light was only to a vessel right ahead. The evidence showed that the Duke of Buccleuch was always from one to two points on the bow of the Vandalia. It is submitted that the learned judge ought to have inquired into the truth of this alleged fact, and also whether the light would be obscured to a vessel approaching on such a bearing. If it would not in fact have been obscured to the Duke of Buccleuch, then the infringement could not possibly have contributed to the collision, and therefore sect. 17 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1873 is not applicable to this case:

Sir Walter Phillimore, Barnes, Q.C., and F. Laing, for the respondents, contra.—The decision of Butt, J. is right. The Act of Parliament was meant to cast liability upon parties infringing the regulations unless upon the undisputed facts it is clear that the infringement could not possibly have caused or contributed to the collision. It was never intended that the court should inquire into nice questions of fact, about which it might come to an erroneous conclusion, as to whether it was possible that the infringement could have contributed to the collision:

Lord Esher, M.R. — The law applicable to this case is that which was laid down in The Fanny M. Carvill (ubi sup.). It has been suggested that the case has not, as to the point for which it has been used before us, been approved by the House of Lords. I think it has been approved as to the very point by the House of Lords. I think that tribunal has expressed approval of it as a whole; but, whether that is so or not, I am of opinion that I should, even without the authority of the House of Lords, adopt the judgment in The Fanny M. Carvill (ubi sup.). I think the decision was a right and wholesome one, and one to which the judges who decided the case must inevitably have come. They could not construe this stringent Act of Parliament literally, for, if they did, it would lead to manifest absurdities. I think their rule of construction was right. They in effect say: "We must construe it literally as nearly as possible; we must construe it as strictly as is possible, but so as not to lead to the various absurdities which have in argument been pointed out to us; short of that we must construe it to its full extent." On referring to the judgment, I find they say this: "Their Lordships are so far from dissenting from this finding, that they are prepared to go beyond what is directly expressed by it, and to hold on the evidence before them, and for the reasons next to be stated, that, in the circumstances in which these vessels were placed, the green light of the Peru could not by any possibility have been seen by those on board the Fanny M. Carvill." Later on they say: "They conceive that the Legislature intended at least to obviate the necessity for the determination of this question of fact—often a very nice one—upon conflicting evidence." They again say: "The presumption of culpability may be met by proof that the infringement could not by any possibility have contributed to the collision." They then lay down the rule in these words: "It gives effect to the statute by excluding proof that an infringement which might have contributed to the collision did not in fact do so; and by throwing on the party guilty of the infringement the burden of showing that it could not possibly have done so." I take it that that case decides this: that if it can be shown that a vessel —I will confine my remarks to lights—has not complied with the regulations as to lights, she must be held to blame, unless she can prove that the defect as to her light or lights could not by any possibility have contributed to the collision. The whole burden of proof lies upon her; but the court must try the question of fact, whether the defect could by any possibility have contributed to the collision. That may sometimes be a very easy matter to decide. For instance, if an approaching vessel is always broad on the port side of a vessel which has a defect in her starboard light, it does not take a moment's consideration to see that the defect in the green light could not by any possibility have contributed to a collision with this vessel which approached on the port side. Another example of the absurd consequences of construing the section strictly would be this: Assume a ship which has a defective foghorn on board collides in clear weather with another ship. Must the breach of the regulation as to the foghorn force the court to hold her in fault? Those are simple cases. Let us consider a less simple one. Assume a defect in a light the effect of which is to obscure it to another ship approaching end on, or nearly so, but not to do so to a vessel approaching about abeam. If that is proved, it is as clear as in the first two cases that the defect in the light could not by any possibility affect a collision with a vessel coming up on the beam. It may not be so easy to prove, but that is immaterial.

Assume that state of things to be alleged, what must the court do? There may be a dispute of evidence as to the quarter from which the other ship approached, and if at the end of the case the evidence leaves the court in doubt whether the other ship was coming up on the beam or not, then the vessel which has infringed the regulations has failed in the burden of proof which the law casts upon her. She has not shown that the defect in her light could not by any possibility have affected the collision, because, if there is any doubt whether the other vessel was coming towards her from nearly ahead, there is still a doubt whether the defective light may not have affected the collision. Therefore, if the evidence leaves in doubt the position of the ships, the burden of proof is not satisfied. But if, there being a conflict of evidence, the court in the result is of opinion that the approaching vessel was coming towards the other on the beam, and that the light would only be obscured to a vessel approaching one or two points on the bow, the burden of proof is satisfied, because the vessel on whom the burden lies has proved beyond all reasonable doubt that the defective light could not have had any effect on the collision. That is a broad case; but the principle is applicable to any other analogous case. If there is a dispute as to how a vessel is approaching, the evidence on one side showing that the defect could not possibly have any effect on the collision, and the evidence on the other side showing that it might, then the court must try the question of fact of how the ship was approaching. If, as I said before, the court is left in any doubt at all, the ship which has infringed the regulation fails in the burden of proof. But, though there is a conflict of evidence, if the court, after having heard it, comes to a clear conclusion that the vessels were so approaching one another that the defect in the light could not possibly affect the collision, the court must say so, and the defect then becomes immaterial. Therefore I say that the burden of proof lies on the ship whose lights are shown to be defective, and she must satisfy the court clearly of this, but if she leaves it in doubt she has failed in the burden of proof.

Let us see how that will apply to the present case. There is a defect in the Vandalia's light. If there had been any doubt as to the extent of that defect, we must have taken the worst view of it as against her. If it had been in doubt whether the obscuration was ½ point or 2½ points, we must have taken it as being 2½ points. But in this case we have had not merely the evidence of witnesses, but also the result of an inspection of the vessel by two Trinity Masters, who had an opportunity of judging exactly of the nature and extent of the obscuration—what did they report to the learned judge? I have seen him personally, and he has told me exactly what his assessors reported to him. After the most careful examination, they came to the conclusion that, if the sails of this vessel were braced absolutely sharp, there would be no obscuration of the lights, even to a ship straight ahead; but that if they were not braced absolutely sharp, there was—not a continuous obscuration—a casual and occasional obscuration of lights to a ship coming end on, or nearly end on, and this obscuration would only take place if the ship was pitching, and then only for a short time. But a vessel approaching end on has a right to have the full extent of the lights open to her continuously during the time she is called upon to act. If, therefore, a vessel were approaching her end on or nearly end on, the question would not be whether the partial and momentary obscuration of the light prevented her from seeing the Vandalia. The question would be whether it might not prevent her seeing the Vandalia during any part of the time during which she might have to act, and so affect her conduct. If that were so, the Vandalia would fail, because the court could not say that by no possibility could the obscuration have any effect on the conduct of the other vessel. I may say that the gentlemen who assist us have made calculations from the measurements, and, from the drawing they have made, I at first thought that they were going to tell us that this light was never obscured at all. The obscuration is as fine as that. But, as a matter of fact, they agree with the report of the Trinity Masters, and give us the same advice as was given to the learned judge. If that is so, the question is, are we satisfied that these vessels were approaching each other so that such an obscuration could not possibly have affected the conduct of the steamer in the then existing circumstances? That depends on how the steamer was approaching the Vandalia. We are satisfied on the evidence that the Vandalia was kept close-hauled on the starboard tack, heading as nearly as possible east by her compass. Now, how was the steamer approaching her? We know pretty well where the Vandalia was with regard to the Channel and the coast, and we know that the steamer was coming out from the land towards her, and showing the green light to her. It is argued that those on the Vandalia might see the steamer's green light nearly ahead at a distance of two miles and yet come into collision with her. That I think impossible; if that bearing and distance were true the steamer must have crossed. Therefore I do not think she was ahead of the Vandalia at a distance of two miles, or at any time. On the whole, I have come to the conclusion that it is satisfactorily proved that the steamer never was ahead of the Vandalia—when I say ahead, I do not limit myself to a quarter or half a point. I say she never could have been within 1½ points of being ahead of her. Now, the steamer was approaching showing her green light, the bearing of which gradually diminished to 1½ points. Therefore we have got these facts: The light is only obscured to a vessel approaching ahead or nearly ahead, and cannot have any effect on a vessel which is approaching on a bearing of 1½ points, and the steamer is never less than 1½ points on the bow. What is the conclusion? It is that the obscuration of this light could not possibly have been apparent to this steamer, as she was in fact approaching her. If that is so, the decision in The Fanny M. Carvill (ubi sup.) applies. Those on whom the burden of proof rested have made out all that they need establish. Therefore I think that the defect in this light ought not to have the result of making me declare the Vandalia to be in fault, being perfectly convinced that in point of truth it never had any effect on the collision. Where I venture to differ from Butt, J. is, that I think he narrowed the case too much from The Fanny M. Carvill (ubi sup.). He came to the conclusion that he ought not to inquire into the position of the vessels. I think he was bound to inquire, and, had he done so, I think he would have come to the same conclusion as we have done. Therefore the point of law on which I differ from him is this: He said he ought not to inquire into the position of these two vessels. I think he ought. I have endeavoured to show that the whole burden of proof rests on the vessel whose lights were defective, and that she must show that that defect could not have any effect on the collision. I think the Vandalia has satisfied that burden, and that therefore she is not to blame. If the defect as to her light could not have obscured it from the steamer, nobody can have any doubt but that the steamer was solely to blame. The judgment of the Admiralty Court must be varied, and the finding must be that the steamer was solely to blame.

Lindley, L.J.—There are, as I understand, three questions in this case—two of fact, and one of law. The first is, whether the rule relating to the red light has been infringed. That depends upon the wording of the rule, and the evidence relating to the red light. It must be taken from the report of the assessors in the court below that in certain circumstances the red light would be, or might be, obscured by the sails in the ordinary course of navigation. If that is true, then it appears to me to follow that the rule as to the red light has been infringed. Unless the rule has been infringed, there is no ground for applying sect. 17 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1873. But when you get it as a fact that the red light was not what it ought to be—was not so constructed as to give the unbroken range of light required by the regulations—then arises the question, what must be the legal consequences of that infringement? That question of law appears to me to be satisfactorily and rationally settled in the case of The Fanny M. Carvill (ubi sup.). We are not to construe the Act of Parliament so as to reduce it to absurdity. We are not to attribute to general language used by the Legislature a meaning that would not only not carry out its object, but produce consequences which to the ordinary intelligence are absurd. We must give it such a meaning as will carry out its object. The construction put on this section by the Privy Council is, in my opinion, based on the soundest principles.

We must next consider the question of fact. Could this departure from the requisites of the rule as to lights have any effect in this case upon the collision? It is for the infringing ship to prove that it could not—a very difficult burden sometimes, and at other times a very easy burden to discharge, as in the cases put by the Master of the Rolls. In some cases the burden becomes impossible. In this case it is not impossible. To investigate the question of fact, we must ascertain where the ships were, what they were doing, and what the surrounding circumstances were. Now, having regard to the fact that all the evidence comes from one side, it is necessary to be very cautious, and therefore we must look at it with care. It appears to me to be established that this steamer was at least a point or a point and a half on the port bow of the sailing vessel. I do not believe that she could have been less, for if she had I am satisfied that she would have crossed. The steamer was never narrower on the sailing ship's bow than I have said. It therefore follows that the obscuration of the light could not possibly have had any effect on the collision. Under these circumstances it appears to me that the plaintiffs' appeal is successful, and that the steamer is alone to blame.

LOPES, L.J.—The Merchant Shipping Act 1873 (36 & 37 Vict. c. 85), s. 17, provides: "If in any case of collision it is proved to the court before which the case is tried that any of the regulations for preventing collisions contained in or made under the Merchant Shipping Acts 1854 to 1873 have been infringed, the ship by which such regulation has been infringed shall be deemed to be in fault unless it is shown to the satisfaction of the court that the circumstances of the case made a departure from the regulations necessary." The object of the statute is to enforce the observance of the regulations; but if the infringement is one which has no possible connection with the collision, and could not by any possibility have contributed to it, then the section does not apply. That, as I understand, is the decision in The Fanny M. Carvill (ubi sup.). I entirely agree with that decision and the law laid down. I think it is sound, reasonable, and right. Now, apply that decision to the present case. In the first place, there are certain facts to be determined in order that we may apply it, and we have to inquire into the facts in such cases and consider the surrounding circumstances. In the present case the court has specially to consider and inquire into the relative positions of these vessels. Now, I am of opinion, and we are so advised, that the green light of the steamer was at least a point or a point and a half on the port bow of the Vandalia, and if so, it appears to me that by no possibility could there have been any obscuration of light to the steamer In these circumstances, therefore, I agree with the rest of the court that the steamer was alone to blame.

Appeal allowed.

THE CITY OF LINCOLN. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM THE PROBATE, DIVORCE, AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION (ADMIRALTY).

Collision — Stranding — Consequential damage— Remoteness.

In an action for damages by collision, a claim for consequential loss, caused by a mistake of the master of the injured vessel after the collision, is recoverable from the wrongdoer in the absence of negligence or want of ordinarg skill on the part of the master, provided such mistake was one which might reasonably have been made in consequence of the damaged condition of the vessel.

A collision between the Swedish barque A. and the steamship C., about 6 p.m. on the 7th Nov., about twelve miles N. of the Hinder Lightship, was solely caused by the negligent navigation of the steamship. In consequence of the collision the barque's starboard quarter was cut off, and her steering compass, log glass, and gear for rudder and wheel were lost. The steering compass having been replaced by a spare compass and tackles having been rigged on to the rudder, the master of the A., with a view to saving the vessel, sailed up the Thames, but between three and four p.m. next day the A. went ashore in consequence of her master mistaking the Tongue Lightship for the Kentish Knock. The owners of the barque (inter alia) claimed for the loss occasioned by the stranding:

Held, that the stranding was due to the master of the barque being deprived by the collision of the ordinary means of navigation, and that in the circumstances the owners of the steamship were liable.

THIS was an appeal by the plaintiffs from a decision of Butt, J. in a collision action.

The collision occurred on the 7th Nov. 1888 between the plaintiffs' barque the Albatross and the defendants' steamship the City of Lincoln.

The defendants having admitted liability, the assessment of damages was referred to the registrar and merchants. At the reference the plaintiffs claimed (inter alia) for the loss of their barque subsequently to the collision, when she was making for a port of safety in a damaged condition.

The registrar allowed this claim. His report was as follows:

On the 29th Oct. 1888 the Swedish barque Albatross of 483 tons left Sundswall for Cardiff with a cargo of battens, and with a crew of ten hands all told. On the 7th Nov., at about 6 p.m., the defendants' steamship City of Lincoln of 2103 tons, bound to Bremerhaven collided with her about twelve miles north of the North Hinder Light, cutting off her starboard quarter and doing other damage. The mate of the City of Lincoln came on board her and remained whilst the steamship proceeded on her voyage. With the view of saving the barque, she was taken, though difficult to manage, towards the English coast, and between 3 and 4 p.m. a lightship was discerned, which those on board the barque, as well as the mate of the City of Lincoln, supposed to be the Kentish Knock, and thereupon, after sounding, the barque's course was altered to the north, and the vessel almost immediately grounded on what proved to be the Long Sand, and it became necessary for those on board to abandon the vessel, and to make for the lightship, which turned out to be the Tongue Lightship instead of the Kentish Knock. On the following morning they were landed at Gravesend, while the barque was found by salvors and taken into Harwich. Under these circumstances, which it is not necessary I should state more fully, counsel on both sides have requested me to report at this stage solely on the question whether the grounding of this vessel under the circumstances stated in the evidence is to be considered as damages consequential on the collision, and for which the defendants, the owners of the wrong-doing ship, are liable. Having heard counsel on this point, I am of opinion, and the merchant assessor concurs in it, that the grounding of the barque was not due to any culpable negligence or want of skill of those on board her, and that the defendants are liable for all additional damages which may have resulted from such grounding.

(a) Reported by J. P. ASPINALL and BUTLER ASPINALL, Esqrs., Barristers-at Law

The defendants appealed from this finding.

Barnes, Q.C., H. Stokes, and Dr. Stubbs for the plaintiffs.

Sir Walter Phillimore and J. P. Aspinall for the defendants.

Butt, J.—A question of more or less nicety has been discussed in this case, and authorities as to what damages are recoverable and what are too remote have been cited. I do not think it is necessary to go into that, because, if the view I take of this case, under the advice of the Elder Brethren, is right in point of fact, no nice questions of law arise. I have asked the Elder Brethren this question: "Was the stranding of the Albatross, having regard to the condition in which she was, the result of accident alone, or was it brought about by want of ordinary care and skill on the part of those in charge?" They advise me that there are several respects in which those in charge of the barque were wanting in the exercise of ordinary care and skill; a cast of the lead would have shown them that the lightship they saw could not have been the Kentish Knock, and the neglect to take that precaution in itself was want of ordinary care. Again, they had set their course from the position indicated to them as the position in which they were by the officer of the City of Lincoln, and were steering with a compass which, I believe, they got up from the hold, and was in fact a make-shift compass. That in itself was a matter which ought to have induced rather more than ordinary care. They set a course, and on that course they ought to have known that they should pass close by the Galloper lightship, and the fact of their not making that lightship ought to have told them that they were not in the position they imagined they were. The Elder Brethren advise me that all these matters amount to want of ordinary care and skill, and so far as I am able to form an opinion upon such a subject I entirely agree with them. Therefore the conclusion to which I have come is, that the damages arising out of the stranding of the Albatross are not the direct consequences or result of the collision. That being so, the plaintiffs are not entitled to recover in respect of the stranding.

The plaintiffs appealed.

From the evidence given before the registrar it appeared that the Albatross had her starboard quarter cut off in the collision, that she was making a considerable quantity of water, that she lost her steering compass, log, glass, and gear for rudder and wheel. After the collision the steering compass was replaced by a spare one from below, and tackles were rigged on to the rudder.

Barnes, Q.C., H. Stokes, and Dr. Stubbs for the plaintiffs in support of the appeal.—The learned judge was wrong in finding that the stranding was occasioned by the negligence of those in charge of the Albatross. Assuming them not to have been negligent, then these damages are recoverable:

The Pensher, Swab. 213;
The Countess of Durham, 9 Monthly Law Magazine, 279;
The Notting Hill, 51 L. T. Rep. N. S. 66; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 241; 9 P. Div. 105;
Hadley v. Baxendale, 9 Ex. 341; 23 L. J. 179, Ex.;
Wilson v. Newport Dock Company, 14 L. T. Rep. N. S. 230; L. Rep. 1 Ex. 177.

Sir Walter Phillimore and J. P. Aspinall, for the defendants, contra.—The judge was right in finding that the stranding was occasioned by the negligence of those in charge of the barque. Assuming them to have been guilty of no negligence, the plaintiffs are not entitled to recover these damages. There is no connection between the collision and the stranding. The stranding is the result of a mistake by the master of the barque:

The Flying Fish, Br. & L. 436.

The true test is, that wherever the act of man comes in the chain of consequence is broken, so as to relieve the original wrongdoer from subsequent liability, unless the claimant has no time to deliberate, and in consequence of the position in which he has been placed by the wrongdoer he has to act on a sudden emergency. [Lopes, L.J. referred to Jones v. Boyce, 1 Stark. 493.] That case refers only to a sudden emergency, and not to a case like the present where there was ample time for deliberation. The distinction between the case of Jones v. Boyce (ubi sup.) and the present is pointed out in Adams v. Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Company (L. Rep. 4 C. P. 742). In The Argentino (59 L. T. Rep. N. S. 914; 13 P. Div. 198; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 348), the Master of the Rolls said that if the damage "is only brought to be the result of the act complained of by reason of some intermediate act or circumstance which might or might not have happened between the act complained of and the result relied on," then the damage is not recoverable. Those words are applicable to the present case. The master mistook the lightship and so brought about an accident, and this is an accident which might have happened to a ship in perfect condition just as well as to this ship, and the condition of the ship has no connection with its loss. Consequently the cause is not the collision but something else, to wit, the mistake of the master, and this is an intermediate act which might or might not have happened between the act complained of, the collision, and the result relied on, the stranding.

Barnes, Q.C. in reply.

Lord Esher, M.R.—In this case it seems to us, after having carefully considered all the evidence, that the wrongful act of the defendants did not merely damage the barque, but had this further effect, that it deprived the captain of his best charts, of his best compass, and his best log line. It was very difficult for him to know where he was. In these circumstances he resolved, and it is not contended wrongly, to make for the Thames. But he had to make for the Thames not exactly knowing his place of departure, without having the usual means of marking off his course on a proper chart, and without having the usual means of calculating his speed. We are advised by the gentlemen who assist us that in those circumstances he was not guilty of any want of skill in not knowing whereabouts on the sea he was. It almost necessarily follows from that that he was not guilty of any want of skill in not knowing what the light was which he saw; i.e, in other words in concluding that the light was the Kentish Knock when, in fact, it was not. Now, if that be true, then comes this question: If he was not wrong in assuming the light to be the Kentish Knock, did he, upon that assumption, do anything which was wrong? Was he wrong in not going up close to the lightship to see its name, as it is suggested he ought to have done? It is the first time I ever heard such a suggestion advanced. Whether it may be right in some circumstances, although to me it seems a strange thing, is immaterial for the present purpose. In this case his omission to do so was not a want of care and skill. Taking into account the various assumptions I have referred to, there next comes the question whether the master of the barque was wrong, when he sounded and got five fathoms, to port his helm for the purpose, as he thought, of going round these sands? We are advised that he was not wrong in so doing. The result is, that he was guilty of no want of ordinary care and skill, unless it is established that he ought to have sounded as the barque sailed along. Considering how and where the barque was sailing, I doubt whether, until she came near the lightship, her master could be said to be guilty of any want of care or skill in not sounding as she came along. There is this much to be said, that if he had sounded it would have told him nothing. He did sound when he saw the light, and that was at a time when, assuming it to be the Kentish Knock, it was a proper thing to do. On the whole, the result is that we have come to the conclusion, assisted by advice from our assessors, that this captain was not guilty of any want of care and skill. I do not think that the mere fact of a master being put into the position this master was by the wrongful act of the defendants, and his not acting negligently necessarily concludes such a case as this, and necessarily makes the defendants liable for all the damage which occurred after their wrongful act. I agree that there may be intermediate circumstances which prevent the ultimate damage being regarded as the result of the wrongful act of the defendants so as to make them liable. But in this case it seems to me to be the inevitable conclusion that the ultimate loss of the ship was caused by her master being deprived of the means of calculating where he was, such deprivation being the direct result of defendants' wrongful act. Where defendants do a wrongful act which deprives the plaintiff or those for whom he is responsible of the means of averting that which ultimately happens, I think it follows, as a matter of course, that that which ultimately happens is the result solely of the wrongful act of the defendants. Therefore, without considering cases in which the damage may be too remote, I think that in this case it is clear that the ultimate damage is not too remote. Under those circumstances, I think the registrar and merchants must assess the damages upon the principle we have indicated. I do not think that any of the cases cited are contrary to what I have said.

Lindley, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. As regards the evidence of the officer from the City of Lincoln, who was on board the sailing vessel, it is obvious that it was given with a view to minimise the loss to his owners. I think that the view of the facts taken by the registrar who saw the witnesses was correct, and having regard to what the Master of the Rolls has said, it will not be necessary for me to go over them again. We are advised that there was nothing negligent or unseamanlike in the conduct of the master of the Albatross. We cannot therefore accept the view that it was his negligence or want of skill which led to the ultimate loss of this ship. On that point we differ from Butt, J. But that does not dispose of the case, because assuming there was no negligence on the part of the master of the Albatross, the question arises whether her ultimate loss is not too remote a consequence of the collision to render the defendant liable for it. That depends on the application to this particular case of the general rule applicable to damages, and for that I refer to Mayne on Damages. He says: "Damage is said to be too remote when, although arising out of the cause of action, it does not so immediately and necessarily follow from it as that the offending party can be made responsible for it." Later on he says: "The first and in fact the only inquiry in all these cases is, whether the damage complained of is the natural and reasonable result of the defendants' act. It will assume this character if it can be shown to be such a consequence as in the ordinary course of things would flow from the act." That is a general method of stating the rule which as I understand was applied by Lord Herschell in the case of The Argentino (ubi sup.), and without criticising it, I take it to be sufficiently accurate for the purpose. What we have to consider is, what is meant by "the ordinary course of things." Sir Walter Phillimore has asked us to exclude from the "ordinary course of things" all human conduct. I cannot do anything of the kind. I take it that reasonable human conduct is part of the "ordinary course of things." So far as I can see, the ordinary course of things, so far from excluding human conduct, includes the reasonable conduct of those who, having sustained damage, seek to save themselves from further loss. Let us see what are the facts. What was the real cause of the mischief? It seems to me that it was the deprivation of the barque's master of the means of ascertaining his position, and properly navigating his ship. He was deprived of his compass, his logline, and his charts, and his vessel was practically waterlogged. I do not say that the barque was utterly unmanageable, for she was, as we know, navigated a considerable distance, but in any event I do not think that her master was to blame for making the mistake he did. In these circumstances it appears to me that this case is one of those in which the ultimate loss was within the rule I have stated as to the "ordinary course of things," and that therefore the defendants must pay for the damages incidental to the stranding of the barque.

Lopes, L.J.—We have been advised that, having regard to the condition of the Albatross, her loss was not caused by a want of proper care or skill on the part of those in charge of her. That being so, it appears to me that the case may be stated thus: By the misconduct of the defendants the plaintiffs' ship was placed in a position of the utmost peril. The plaintiffs, to save their ship and minimise as far as possible the loss to the defendants, endeavoured to reach a place of safety. Whilst so endeavouring, without any negligence on the part of those in charge of her or any want of skill, and without any intervening independent cause, the Albatross ran ashore. In those circumstance are the defendants liable for the stranding? In my opinion they are. The original fault being the defendants', they are broadly speaking responsible for what follows. They are responsible for all the natural consequences occasioned by their original misconduct; when I say original misconduct, I mean not only the collision but also the deprivation of the Albatross of the usual means of navigation. If those consequences were caused by any want of skill on the part of those in charge of the Albatross, no liability would attach to the defendants. If the consequential loss had been brought about by the independent act of a third party no liability would attach. If the consequential loss had been caused by anything which those on board the Albatross by the exercise of proper skill and care could have prevented, no liability would attach. But in this case we are advised that there was no want of skill on the part of those on board the Albatross, and it is not suggested that there was any interposition or act of a third party. In these circumstances I am clearly of opinion that what happened to the Albatross subsequently to the collision was the natural result of the wrongful act of the defendants, and I think, therefore, that the decision of the learned judge should be reversed.

Collision—Sailing ships—Fog—Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, art. 12.

Where a sailing vessel is tacking in a fog, she is not relieved during the manœuvre from giving the signals prescribed by art. 12 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, and it is her duty until she gets the wind on to the side other than that on which she has had it to treat herself as still on the tack on which she was when she began to go about and to make the prescribed signal, and only to change that signal when she gets the wind on the other side.

This was a collision action in rem by the owners of the schooner Iona against the owners of the Norwegian barque Constantia.

The collision occurred in the Bristol Channel about 5.30 a.m. on the 29th March 1889.

The facts alleged by the plaintiffs were as follows: Shortly before 5.30 a.m. on the 29th March the Iona, a schooner of ninety-nine tons register, manned by a crew of five hands all told, and laden with a cargo of coals, was in the Bristol Channel in the course of a voyage from Newport to Portugal. She was about ten miles N.N.E. of Lundy Island. The wind was a moderate breeze from the N.W. and the weather was thick. The Iona was on the starboard tack heading about W.S.W., and making about three knots an hour under all plain sail. Her lights were duly exhibited and burning brightly, her foghorn was being duly sounded, and a good look-out was being kept on board of her. In these circumstances those on board the Iona saw the green light and sail of a vessel which proved to be the Constantia distant about half a mile, and bearing about three points on the port bow. The Iona was kept close to the wind and her foghorn blown, and as the Constantia approached she was loudly hailed, but she nevertheless came on at great speed, and with her stem struck the bowsprit of the Iona, and afterwards with her starboard anchor struck the port bow of the Iona and did her great damage.

The plaintiffs (inter alia) charged the defendants with failing to give proper or any indication of their position and the course they were on.

The facts alleged by the defendants were as follows: Shortly before 5.30 a.m. on the 29th March the Constantia, a foreign barque of 427 tons register, manned by a crew of eleven hands all told, and laden with a cargo of coals, was in the Bristol Channel in the course of a voyage from Cardiff to Africa. There was a light breeze from W.N.W., and the weather was a thick fog. The Constantia, which had been on the starboard tack, was put into stays for the purpose of being put on to the port tack, and in consequence of the wind being light she hung a little, and was in the wind for eight minutes before she began to fill on the port tack. The foghorn had been duly sounded when she was on the starboard tack, and was sounded two blasts as soon as she got on the port tack. At this time those on the Constantia saw the red light of a ship which proved to be the Iona distant about a ship's length, and about two to three points on the starboard bow. The helm of the Constantia was immediately put hard-a-port and the mizzen sheet slacked, but having little or no headway she did not pay off, and with her stem struck the Iona on her bowsprit and port bow.

Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea:

Art. 12. A steamship shall be provided with a steam-whistle or other efficient sound signal so placed that the sound may not be intercepted by any obstructions, and with an efficient foghorn, to be sounded by a bellows or other mechanical means, and also with an efficient bell. A sailing ship shall be provided with a similar foghorn and bell. In fog, mist, or falling snow, whether by day or night the signals described in this article shall be used as follows, that is to say—(a) A steamship under way shall make with her steam whistle or other steam sound signal at intervals of not more than two minutes, a prolonged blast. (b) A sailing ship under way shall make with her foghorn, at intervals of not more than two minutes, when on the starboard tack one blast, when on the port tack two blasts in succession, and when with the wind abaft the beam three blasts in succession. (c) A steamship and a sailing ship when not under way shall at intervals of not more than two minutes ring the bell.

Barnes, Q.C. and Raikes for the plaintiffs.—The Constantia is alone to blame for want of look-out and breach of art. 12 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea. She neglected for eight minutes to give the signal prescribed by the article. The mere fact that she was in stays did not relieve her from the duty of giving an indication of her presence. The words of the article are not that the vessel is to give a certain signal when she is close-hauled on any particular tack, but merely when she is on the port or starboard tack. So long as the Constantia had the wind on the starboard side, her duty was to blow one blast, and as soon as she got the wind on the port side, she ought to have blown two blasts.

Sir Walter Phillimore and J. P. Aspinall, for the defendants, contrà.—The Iona is alone to blame. There is no duty on a sailing vessel to blow her foghorn while she is coming round from one tack to the other. To do so would be misleading, as she is in fact at that time on neither one tack nor the other. A vessel in stays is under no obligation to get out of the way of another.

Barnes, Q.C. in reply.

BUTT, J.—One question in this case is, what was the density of the fog? Was it so thick that those on board the Constantia could only see the schooner about a ship's length off; or was it such weather as would have enabled the Constantia with a proper look-out to have seen the schooner at a greater distance than she did, and so have avoided the collision? It has been contended that the density of the fog has been overstated by the defendants, but we do not think it likely that a vessel's lights could be seen so far as the plaintiffs make out. But, apart from the question of the fog's density, I think that the Constantia was most improperly and negligently navigated. Whilst she was going about from the starboard to the port tack, instead of calling up men from below to help, the look-out man, whose duty it was also to blow the foghorn, is called away to help at the braces, and is absent from his post for some ten minutes. Therefore on that view the Constantia is to blame. But I also think that it is quite unjustifiable for a vessel while going about to lie in a dense fog like this without giving any signal whatever. Various difficulties have been suggested which will arise whatever interpretation I put on the rule, but I think the real interpretation is, that so long as the wind is on the starboard side, the ship for the purposes of the rule must be taken to be on that tack and blow one blast, and as soon as she gets the wind on the other side she must blow two blasts. Therefore, for various reasons, I think that the Constantia was to blame.

OWNERS OF THE LEBANON v. OWNERS OF THE CETO; THE CETO. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF APPEAL IN ENGLAND.

Collision—Fog—Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, art. 18.

If a steamship is approaching another in a dense fog, without the means of ascertaining, except by fog signals, the course which the other is pursuing, unless there are indications to convey to a seaman of reasonable skill that they are in such a position as to pass well clear of each other, it is her duty to stop and reverse, under art. 18 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions, and (in the absence of other circumstances making it dangerous to do so) she will be held to blame if she does not, and a collision takes place.

Judgment of the Court of Appeal reversed, the Earl of Selborne and Lord Fitzgerald dissenting.

THIS was an appeal from a judgment of the Court of Appeal (Lord Esher, M.R., Bowen and Fry, L.JJ.) affirming a judgment of Sir James Hannen.

The action arose out of a collision between two steamships, the Lebanon of 595 tons and the Ceto of 612 tons, which took place in a dense fog off Whitby on the 20th Aug. 1886. By reason of the collision the Ceto and her cargo were totally lost. The courts below, who were both assisted by nautical assessors, held that the Lebanon was solely to blame for the collision, and the fact that she was to blame was not disputed on the appeal; the only question raised was whether the Ceto was also to blame.

The facts and arguments are set out fully in the judgments of their Lordships, especially so in Lord Watson's.

May 14 and 15, 1888.—The case came on for argument before the Lord Chancellor (Halsbury), the Earl of Selborne, Lords Watson, Fitzgerald, and Macnaghten.

Their Lordships requiring further argument, the case was re-argued on April 1st and 2nd, 1889, before the same noble and learned Lords, with the addition of Lords Bramwell and Herschell.

The Attorney-General (Sir R. Webster, Q.C.) (J. P. Aspinall with him) appeared for the appellants.

Finlay, Q.C. (Bucknill, Q.C. and Nelson with him) for the respondents.

At the conclusion of the arguments their Lordships took time to consider their judgment.

The LORD CHANCELLOR (Halsbury).—My Lords: If this were a question of nautical skill or of the credit due to particular witnesses, I should be very reluctant to interfere with a judgment arrived at upon the advice of skilled persons, or differ from a court which had had the advantage of hearing and seeing the witnesses whose credit was in question. I am unable to acquiesce in the view that the matter which your Lordships are called upon to decide is either a question of nautical skill or of the credit to be attributed to the witnesses. So far as the accuracy of the witnesses is involved, I principally rely upon the evidence of those called in support of the case against which I feel called upon to decide. As to the question of nautical skill, I must deal with it more at large presently. Now, the question, shortly stated, is whether two vessels approaching each other, and knowing that they were approaching each other, in a dense fog, through which it was impossible to see lights or signals, or any part of the vessels by either of them, were not both to blame for not stopping and reversing until they had ascertained more distinctly their respective courses. I quite agree that the solution of that question must depend not upon the state of facts afterwards ascertained, unless there was enough to tell both parties at the time what the condition of facts was. The rule which is supposed to govern the decision of this case, though I am not quite certain that the existence or non-existence of that rule would necessarily be decisive, is that "a steamship when approaching another ship so as to involve risk of collision shall slacken her speed, or stop and reverse, if necessary." As I have said, each of these vessels knew that they were approaching another ship. Each of them was aware, or ought to have been aware, that their approach did involve risk of collision, and the question is whether the facts were such in the knowledge of each that as prudent and reasonable persons those responsible for the navigation of the ship should have stopped and reversed. As to the facts giving rise to the question, there is, in my judgment, very little conflict. The preliminary acts of the parties seems to me to show that there is very little room for contradiction between the witnesses, and the difference, so far as there is a difference, is limited to questions of time and bearing. I do not mean to say that the facts that there was a fog and that the vessels were approaching so as to involve risk of collision are necessarily conclusive. But the fog was of such a character that it is admitted that, apart from the sound, no conclusion could be arrived at as to the course of either vessel by the other, and, so far as those facts raise a question of skill, it seems to me that no more nautical skill is involved, nothing upon which nautical men would be better able to judge, than would occur if two carts were approaching each other on an ordinary highway, and the sole method of judgment were the sounds of the cart wheels. This is indeed understating the case, since on the open sea there is no road, the general direction of which might be a guide. Not the slightest indication of what course either vessel was on could be derived from the sounds, which were ultimately proved to have been made by the fog signals. That the Lebanon did wrong is certain, and that the Ceto in the first instance did right is also certain. But it seems to me that the master of the Ceto admits facts which to a seaman must have shown that the Lebanon had starboarded her helm. I confess I cannot doubt that a reasonably prudent master, in order to avoid risk of collision, should have stopped and reversed when to his mind at the time it must have been clear that, notwithstanding his persistent porting of the helm of his own vessel, the approaching vessel remained steadily four points on his bow—which condition of facts was only reconcilable with what he admits he observed, and what we now know to be the fact, that the Lebanon was improperly starboarding her own helm. It is admitted on all sides that when the vessels came within sight of each other it was too late to do anything but what was in fact done to avoid or diminish the effect of the collision.

I do not understand the judgment of the Master of the Rolls to be based upon a comparison of the witnesses of either side as to their credit or accuracy, but almost, if not altogether, entirely upon the inferences which he draws from the fracture of the Lebanon upon the starboard side of her stem and the appearance of that fracture as indicated by the photographs. I do not think that inferences of that character can properly be described as questions of nautical skill at all. They are rather questions which should be addressed to mechanical engineers; but, in order to place much reliance on them, I should think myself that they ought to have been submitted to some person who had with accuracy and minuteness examined the fracture and had been capable of stating to the proper tribunal both the inferences he derived from the appearances which he observed and the reason for such inferences; subject, of course, to the ordinary test of cross-examination, in which event probably the rival theories presented in argument to your Lordships at the bar might have been minutely discussed, and each hypothesis, namely, the blow from the starboard side, or the dragging of the stem itself after the vessels were in actual contact, might have been considered. But in truth no such question ever was discussed at the trial. So far as I can see, the Master of the Rolls was the first to point out the nature of the blow as indicated by the photograph, which he regarded as sufficient to decide the case without reference to the witnesses called on the one side or on the other.

Under these circumstances it appears to me to reduce itself to this: Two vessels approaching each other in a dense fog, without the means of ascertaining the course which either ship is pursuing, continue to approach each other, and when one of them which has pursued a correct course finds that the other is pursuing a wrong one, which must almost inevitably lead to a collision, she still continues a course which was originally right, but which on these facts it appears to me threw upon her the duty of stopping and reversing. And, inasmuch as she did not pursue that course, I think she was to blame. In the result, I move your Lordships that the judgment of the court below, so far as it acquitted the Ceto from blame, be reversed, and both ships be declared to be in fault.

The EARL of SELBORNE.—My Lords: At the end of the first argument in this case, the impression left on my mind was, that sufficient ground had not been shown for a reversal of the concurrent judgments of both the courts below, which held the Lebanon solely to blame for the collision which took place on the 20th Aug. 1886, by which the Ceto was wholly lost (with her cargo), and the Lebanon slightly injured. The effect of the second argument has been to confirm me in that impression; and I think it due to the learned judges below that I should state the reasons for my opinion, though I cannot feel that confidence in them which I should feel if they were shared by the majority of your Lordships. The question is, whether, under the circumstances appearing by the evidence, the 18th sailing rule of 1884 made it the duty of the Ceto to stop and reverse? It appears to me that, under the terms of that rule, the burden of proof was upon the Lebanon. The Judicial Committee so held in the case of The Rhondda (49 L. T. Rep. N. S. 210; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 114; 8 App. Cas. 549). The judgment of the Court of Appeal, in the case of The Beryl (51 L. T. Rep. N. S. 554; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 321; 9 P. Div. 137), laid it down, I think correctly, that "the application of the rule by the officer in charge of a ship depends on whether the circumstances were such that he should, as a prudent and reasonable officer, have come to the conclusion that, in order to avoid risk of collision, he should stop and reverse." That is matter, not for presumption, but for proof. The rule is: "Every steamship when approaching another ship so as to involve risk of collision shall slacken her speed, or stop and reverse, if necessary." There is no obligation to stop and reverse unless it is "necessary" to do so in order to avoid the risk of collision; and this is a question of fact, which must in every case depend upon the whole circumstances, and is not solved by the 17th section of the Merchant Shipping Act of 1873 (36 & 37 Vict. c. 85). The Ceto, in the present case, was going as slow as she possibly could; she complied, therefore, with the rule, unless the circumstances were such as to make it "necessary" for her to stop and reverse. If it has not been settled by any binding authority that a fog (such as existed in this case) always creates such a necessity when ships on opposite courses are approaching each other, as these ships did, I should not infer it from the terms of the sailing rules, or from the reason of the thing. The 18th sailing rule does not refer to fog more than to any other state of weather, and in those rules which expressly apply to the case of fog, there is nothing about stopping and reversing. The 13th rule, which is that most nearly in point, only says "that every ship, whether a sailing ship or steamship, shall in a fog, mist, or falling snow, go at a moderate speed." And to stop and reverse blindly in a fog (unless the other ship did the same thing at the same time) might, as it seems to me, be quite as likely sometimes to cause as to avoid risk of collision. To establish contributory negligence against a ship whose course would have been right if the other ship had not done what was wrong, it ought, in my opinion, to be made out that she had sufficient knowledge of the wrong course which the other ship was taking, within sufficient time, to enable her officer or officers in charge to perceive that they ought to alter or stop their own course in order to avoid the risk of collision, and that by doing so that risk would certainly be diminished and might perhaps be avoided.

The Lebanon was approaching the Ceto on her port bow, nearly "end on;" and, as she did so, sounded her whistle from time to time. The Ceto ported her helm, and kept porting it more, from time to time, as she heard the Lebanon's whistle. If the Lebanon had not improperly starboarded her helm, this would have kept her clear, and made a collision impossible. So far the Ceto was right, and the Lebanon wrong. When the helm signal from the Lebanon, indicating that she was starboarding, was heard by the Ceto, the evidence appears to me very clearly to show that the ships were already so close to each other as to make it impossible for the Ceto to avoid or diminish the risk of collision in any other way than by remaining under her port helm, and going "full speed ahead," as she did, and as the people on board the Lebanon had called out to her to do. It is not alleged that she could then have done anything better. The only question is, whether, before that time, she ought to have stopped and reversed. The appellants' contention is, that there were earlier indications of the approach of the Lebanon under a starboard helm, which a prudent and reasonable officer ought to have understood, and that these made it "necessary" for the Ceto to stop and reverse, within the meaning of the 18th rule. So far as the testimony of the witnesses for the Lebanon went, they endeavoured to make out a quite different case against the Ceto, in which they failed, namely, that she misled the Lebanon by signalling that she was starboarding when she was porting. I do not say that this ought necessarily to prejudice the argument on this appeal from the statements of the Ceto's witnesses, but, at least, it does not help the appellants' present case. The statements elicited in cross-examination from Captain Gibson, the master of the Ceto (on which the appellants' reliance was mainly placed), were to the effect that, having ported his helm when the whistle of the Lebanon was first heard on the Ceto's port bow (the effect of which would naturally be to "bring the whistle of the Lebanon still broader on the port side"), the next whistle seemed to be at the same distance as the first—viz., four points on their bow, and that, instead of the distance of the sounds afterwards diminishing, they came nearer, and kept coming nearer, in spite of the Ceto's porting. This evidence was compared with that which in the case of The John M'Intyre (51 L. T. Rep. N. S. 185; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 278; 9 P. Div. 135), under circumstances in many respects similar was held by Butt, J., and by Brett, M.R. and Bowen and Fry, L.JJ. in the Court of Appeal, to establish the necessity of stopping and reversing, under the 18th rule; and other fog cases were also cited (The Dordogne, 51 L. T.

Rep. N. S. 650; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 328; 10 P. Div. 6; and The Ebor, 54 L. T. Rep. N. S. 200; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 560; 11 P. Div. 25), in the first of which Butt, J., and in the second Sir James Hannen, and in both the Court of Appeal, arrived at a like conclusion. Of the Khedive (43 L. T. Rep. N. S. 610; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 360; 5 App. Cas. 876) and Lutetia (9 App. Cas. 640), both cases of clear weather, I do not think it necessary to speak. There is danger, I think, in taking one particular part of a witness's evidence without its qualifications, and treating such authorities as these as laying down an inflexible rule for every case in which similar evidence (however qualified) is found. I am the more impressed with that danger because those three judges in the Court of Appeal who decided the present case in the Ceto's favour were the same who held, in the case of the John M'Intyre, that there was contributory negligence; and Sir James Hannen, who in the case of the Ebor came to a like conclusion, was the judge of first instance who in the present case decided for the Ceto. In both courts these learned judges were assisted by competent nautical assessors. I have spoken of the danger of separating from its context one particular portion of the evidence given on cross-examination by the witnesses for the Ceto. The context to which I refer, in the evidence of the witness Gibson, is to the effect that, as the sound of the Lebanon's whistle came nearer, he said—"Port, and give him plenty of room; he is well on our port side;" that he did not stop and reverse "because he thought by the sound of his whistle" that the Lebanon was "well clear of him." The sound "appeared to get broader, it might be a point, as it went amidships." He "could not tell that the vessel must be coming towards him if it did not get broader than that." "He could not tell that he" (i.e., the master of the Lebanon) "must be starboarding." He "never thought about such a thing as the man starboarding when he was on a ship's port side." That it would not have been right to stop and reverse at the last moment was, as I understood the argument, conceded. To stop and reverse earlier (when there was no indication that the Lebanon was also stopping or reversing) might (as far as I can judge) have been reasonably thought dangerous rather than conducive to safety. If it might reasonably be thought safer to attempt to get out of the way than to lie in the way of the approaching vessel like a log upon the water, the 18th rule would not, in my judgment be broken; and it appears to me as it did to the Master of the Rolls (though I am better satisfied to look for that purpose to the fracture of the Lebanon just on the starboard side of her stem than to the mere displacement of her stem itself), that the impact took place in such a way as would not have been possible without some extraordinary deviation by the Lebanon from her proper course very soon before. Of the whole effect of this evidence, the nautical assessors who assisted Sir James Hannen, and saw and heard the witnesses, were much more capable judges than I can pretend to be. They cannot have thought it, taken altogether, sufficient to show that the circumstances made it necessary for the Ceto to stop and reverse under the 18th rule. The question was one of degree and of time. The Lebanon was moving much faster than the Ceto. The ships did not see each other until it was too late to stop and reverse. The Ceto by porting and continuing to port took in the meantime a proper course, and one which "a prudent and reasonable officer" might well believe to be the best course for safety. If the distance between the ships, as indicated by the sounds of the Lebanon's whistle, appeared nevertheless to diminish rather than increase (except by about a point as it "went amidships"), I am not convinced that this was enough to prove the Ceto in the wrong, as long as a prudent and reasonable officer might judge that he was at a safe distance. I think it easy to lay too much stress upon impressions of this sort derived from sound only when the ships were approaching, and could not see each other. To some extent the distance might naturally diminish under conditions of safety, as the courses of the two ships came nearer before they passed each other. In order to get rid of the weight of the decision of Sir James Hannen, and his assessors, it was assumed that the question raised by the present appeal was overlooked, and not urged before that learned judge. But it arose directly out of the evidence then as much as now; the cross-examination had been directed to that very point; and, if it was not then raised by the appellants, I cannot but infer that the appellants' own counsel did not at that time take the same view of its importance as that on which the appellants now insist. If that is the explanation, I must confess that it seems to me of bad example, that a party should succeed in your Lordships' House upon such a point when it was not taken before the court of first instance, and has not been held to be established by the Court of Appeal. Upon the whole, I am unable upon this question (which I regard as one not of law but of fact, and of nautical skill and judgment) to give my voice for reversing the order appealed from.

Lord WATSON.—My Lords: On the 20th Aug. 1886, between 2.30 and 3 a.m., two steamships, the Lebanon, of 595, and the Ceto, of 612 tons register, came into collision, in the open sea, off the Yorkshire coast. A dense fog had prevailed for some time, and the Lebanon had reduced her speed to "easy," whilst the Ceto, which had already been crippled by another collision in the same fog, was going "dead slow;" and both vessels kept repeating, at intervals, the signals required by the 12th article of the regulations. From first to last both ships had abundance of sea room, no signals having been heard by either of them except their own. At the time when the vessels came within such a distance of each other that their fog signals could be mutually heard, the course of the Lebanon, according to the evidence of the chief mate, who was in charge of her navigation, was south-by-east half east. On hearing the first whistle from the Ceto, about two points on his starboard bow, he starboarded two points, and then steadied his helm on a south-east course. The course of the Ceto is stated by her master to have been north-by-west. When he first heard the whistle of the Lebanon it appeared to him to come from a distance, which he judged to be not less than a mile, and from a direction which seemed to be four points upon his port-bow. The helm of the Ceto was thereupon ported, and she was gradually edged off to starboard, in order to keep her clear of what was conjectured to be the course of the Lebanon; but, owing to the slowness of her speed, the only effect of the port-helm was to bring her head round about two points to starboard before the Lebanon was sighted. Up to that time, notwithstanding the Ceto's change of helm, the sound of the Lebanon's whistle steadily continued to draw nearer; and it still appeared to bear, as when first heard, four points on the port-bow of the Ceto. When the two vessels, though still invisible, were very close, the Lebanon starboarded, and also gave the signal that she was starboarding, and in a few seconds they came into sight of each other. As stated in the preliminary acts, the Ceto, as observed at that moment from the Lebanon, was two or three points on the starboard bow, distant about a ship's length; and the Lebanon, as seen from the Ceto, bore three or four points on the port-bow, distant about sixty yards. The master of the Ceto says that he then observed the white light of the Lebanon just in front of his port-beam, when he at once put his helm hard-a-port; but the order was scarcely given before the engines of the Ceto were turned full speed ahead, in obedience to a hail from the Lebanon. At the same instant the engines of the Lebanon were stopped and reversed; but, having still way on her, she struck the port side of the Ceto, thirty feet from the taffrail, cutting her down below the water and sinking her. The Lebanon sustained no injury from the collision except that her metal stem was crushed aside in the direction of the port-bow.

At the trial before the Admiralty Court, the appellants endeavoured to cast the whole blame of the collision upon the Ceto in respect of her having, as they alleged, misled the Lebanon by a false signal into the belief that she was starboarding, when, in point of fact, she was porting. They did not press their alternative case that the Ceto ought to have stopped and reversed; probably because that line of argument would necessarily have involved the Lebanon in fault for not doing the same. The result was that the President negatived the allegation that the Ceto signalled she was going to starboard, and found the Lebanon alone to blame on the ground that she ought, like the Ceto, to have reduced her speed to dead slow. In the Court of Appeal, the learned judges were also of opinion that the Lebanon's rate of speed was not "moderate" within the meaning of rule 13; but the point chiefly discussed before them was the duty of the Ceto to stop and reverse, and they all came to the conclusion that no such duty was incumbent upon her. The Master of the Rolls and Bowen, L.J. were of opinion, upon the evidence, that the Lebanon was well abeam of the Ceto, on the port side; that there was no danger of collision until the Lebanon starboarded; and that the effect of her manœuvre was to bring her right round in the water, so that she struck the stern quarter of the Ceto with her starboard side of her bow. Their opinion appears to be mainly, if not wholly, rested upon the condition of the Lebanon's stem, as shown in a photograph taken after the vessel was docked. Fry, L.J. expresses doubt as to their inference from that exhibit; but states his own opinion to be "that the whistling of the Lebanon was broad on the port side of the Ceto, and, that being the state of things, it was not an imprudent course for the Ceto to advance in the direction in which she was advancing." If I could agree with the conclusions of the learned judges as to the facts of the case, I should have no hesitation in exonerating the Ceto. But the view which they take appears to me to be irreconcilable, not only with the evidence, but with the case made by both parties in their pleadings. According to their preliminary acts, when the vessels first saw each other the Lebanon was ahead and not abeam of the Ceto, the Lebanon's bearing being not more than three or four points upon the Ceto's port bow, and the Ceto's two points on the Lebanon's starboard bow. No witness from the Ceto places the Lebanon at any time broad upon their vessel's port side. The master, to whose evidence I shall have to refer hereafter, places the Lebanon throughout "about" four points upon his port bow. Wynpenny, the look-out of the Ceto, says that when she first whistled the Lebanon was two points upon their port bow, and that her bearing had changed to about three points when her masthead light became visible; and he also says that between these two periods of time the Lebanon's whistle "gradually drew a little more aft, and seemed to be getting nearer." The difference between the master and his look-out as to the bearings of the Lebanon when first heard is no doubt due to the circumstance that, whilst both agreed she was on their port bow, the number of points was matter of estimate, or rather of conjecture. In delivering judgment, the Master of the Rolls is reported to have said: "You can never try an Admiralty case so as to get at the truth, unless you look with great scepticism on the evidence on both sides." Unfortunately that observation is too frequently justified by the conflict of testimony which occurs in such cases. But I am not prepared on that account, and without very strong cause, to question the credibility of nautical witnesses when their testimony relates to facts which it was their special duty to observe, and is not only free from contradiction, but in strict accordance with the particulars given by the parties to the suit. I am unable to derive from the photograph, so much relied on by the respondents, any good reason for disbelieving the witnesses, rejecting the preliminary acts, and accepting the theory which found favour with the majority of the Appeal Court. The condition of the Lebanon's stem after the collision is, to say the least, a very uncertain guide to the truth, in the absence of precise information as to the force of her impact upon the Ceto, or as to the time during which the two vessels were engaged. The engines of the Lebanon were at that time reversed, and the Ceto was getting into full speed across her bows from starboard to port. Assuming that the stem of the Lebanon was started, as it well might be, by the first force of the blow, it might naturally be crushed over to her port side if the vessels remained for an appreciable time in contact, as they possibly, if not probably, did. In the circumstances I am constrained to believe that, as the witnesses state, the Lebanon struck the Ceto at nearly right angles, and that before the collision the relative bearings of the two ships continued to be as they allege.

Your Lordships were not asked to disturb the finding of both courts below, to the effect that the Lebanon was to blame, but the appellants maintain that the Ceto was also in fault. They admit that after the vessels were within sight, the Ceto did not transgress the rules by going full speed ahead instead of stopping and reversing. They could hardly escape from the concession, because the Ceto was invited to take that course by the officer of the Lebanon; but it does not follow that the Ceto was free from blame in getting into a position which necessitated the manœuvre. The appellants argued that it was the duty of both vessels to stop and reverse before they came in sight, and that the Ceto, having failed in that duty, must be deemed to have been in fault. The point thus argued by the appellants is raised upon the pleadings as well as upon the evidence, and was fully discussed in the Court of Appeal. That being so, I think we are bound to consider it upon its merits. Rule 18 requires that every steamship, when approaching another ship so as to involve risk of collision, "shall slacken speed or stop and reverse, if necessary." There is this distinction between the two alternatives which the rule enjoins, that the first is imperative, whereas the second is only required where there is necessity for it. But as Lord Bramwell observed in the course of the argument, the necessity to which the rule refers is that of avoiding, not collision, but the risk of collision. In consequence of the shape in which the case was presented to the Admiralty Court, and the view which was taken of the facts in the Court of Appeal, there is no expression of opinion by their respective assessors upon the facts of the case as they appear to some of your Lordships and to myself to be established in evidence. That is a circumstance to be regretted, and great stress was naturally laid upon it in the able argument of the respondents' counsel. At the same time I do not think that circumstance ought to interfere with our disposal of the case, because I agree with those of your Lordships who think that the question which arises upon the facts as we are prepared to find them depends very much upon the construction of rule 18, and involves considerations as much of common prudence as of nautical skill. Whether it was, in a reasonable sense, necessary for the master of the Ceto to stop and reverse his engines before the Lebanon hove in sight is a question not of law but of fact. His duty in that respect must depend, not upon the result of the whole facts now disclosed in evidence, but upon his own observations of the Lebanon's fog signals, and the indications of the position and course of the Lebanon relatively to his own vessel, which these observations ought to have conveyed to a prudent seaman of ordinary skill. I shall therefore limit my consideration of the evidence to such parts of it as relate to what was heard and done by the officer who was navigating the Ceto. When the master first heard the signals of the Lebanon he seems to have come to the conclusion that the vessels were approaching each other, and also to have formed the surmise that they might possibly be approaching so as to involve risk of collision. Having only heard a single whistle he had at that moment no data from which a trustworthy inference could be drawn as to the course which the Lebanon was pursuing; but he assumed that she would pass on the port side of his vessel, and he accordingly ported a little in order to give her room. As the two ships advanced he heard several signals from the Lebanon, each successive whistle sounding nearer than the preceding one. As the sounds grew closer, still assuming that the course of the Lebanon would carry her to port of the Ceto, he gave a second order to his steersman. According to his own evidence, he said—"Port, and give him plenty of room; he is coming well upon our port side." I have already noticed the fact that the effect of her port helm was to bring the head of the Ceto two points to starboard before the collision. What appears to me to be the most important part of the evidence of the master is his distinct statement, more than once repeated, that both before and after his second order to port was given, or, in other words, from the time when the signal of the Lebanon was first observed until she was just coming into sight, the sound of her whistle whenever it was heard continued to bear steadily about four points on the port bow of the Ceto. He does, indeed, attempt to say that at one time (he does not say when) it appeared to broaden a little, and on his being pressed to say how much, his reply was, "It might be a point." The circumstances in which he was placed, as detailed by the master of the Ceto appear to me to involve considerations of general importance, touching the application of the second alternative of the 18th rule. In broad daylight, or in the night time so long as ships' lights are discernible at a moderate distance, I do not think that it is within the meaning of the rule "necessary" for two approaching steamers to stop and reverse until it becomes apparent that if they continue to approach they will in all likelihood either shave close or collide. When the approaching vessels are enveloped in fog, and cannot see each other, the rule must, in my opinion, apply with greater stringency. Their respective officers are, in that case, guided solely by their sense of hearing, which may enable each of them to speculate with more or less accuracy as to the position of the other vessel at the time when its fog whistle is heard. But the direction from which the whistle comes can afford no indication of the course of the approaching vessel unless the sound is repeated, and its bearing is, on each repetition, carefully observed. Even then the bearing of the vessel and its course are more or less matters of speculation, and cannot be ascertained with the same certainty as if her hull or lights were in view. When two steamships, invisible to each other by reason of a thick fog, find themselves gradually drawing nearer, until they are within a few ship's lengths, they are, in my opinion, within the second direction of rule 18, and each of them ought at once to stop and reverse, unless the fog signals of the other vessel have distinctly and unequivocally indicated that she is steered on a relatively safe course, and will pass clear, without involving risk of collision. In the absence of such indications, it appears to me that to negative the necessity for stopping and reversing when the vessels are near to each other, though still unseen, would be to thwart the very purpose for which the rule was enacted. I do not think that the effect which, in my opinion, ought to be given to the second branch of the rule, when approaching ships are enveloped in a fog, is at variance with the judicial construction which it has already received. In the case of The Frankland and The Kestrel, the opinion of the Privy Council with respect to The Frankland was thus stated by Sir Robert Collier (27 L. T.

Rep. N. S. 633; 1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 489; L. Rep. 4 P C. 529): "That she was navigating in a fog at a moderate speed, that she heard a whistle sounded many times, indicating that a steamer was approaching her, and had come very near to her—so near, indeed, that if the vessels had stopped they would have been within hailing distance; that at that point of time it was necessary for the captain of the Frankland, under the terms of the rule, not only to stop the motion of the engines, but to reverse them so as to stop the motion of his vessel, and that he ought not to have waited until the vessels sighted each other." Sir Robert Phillimore, in The Kirby Hall (48 L. T. Rep. N. S. 797; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 90; 8 P. Div. 71), explained the rule in terms even broader than I should consider necessary for the purposes of this case. The doctrine laid down by the Privy Council in The Frankland has been recognised by the Court of Appeal in The John McIntyre (51 L. T. Rep. N. S. 185; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 278; 9 P. Div. 135). The Dordogne (51 L. T. Rep. N. S. 650; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 328; 10 P. Div. 6), and The Ebor (54 L. T. Rep. N. S. 200; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 560; 11 P. Div. 25), all of which were cases of collision in dense fog. In the first of these cases, the present Master of the Rolls said: "It may be laid down as a general rule of conduct that it is necessary to stop and reverse, not indeed every time that a steamer hears a whistle or fog horn in a dense fog, but when in such a fog it is heard on either bow and approaching, and is in the vicinity, because there must be a risk of collision." To the proposition so stated I entirely assent. When the approaching vessel is nearly ahead, the duty to stop and reverse is obvious; but it appears to me to be equally imperative when the other vessel is drawing near upon either bow. It matters not whether the bearings of the approaching ship be one point or four; either position is fraught with danger of collision if it continues to advance without change of bearing. The reason which the master of the Ceto assigns for not stopping and reversing when the Lebanon came near is this: "Because I thought by the sound of his whistle that he was well clear of me." I regret to say that I am unable to find in his evidence a single circumstance which could justify the conclusion that the Lebanon was going clear of him. I need hardly say that if the Lebanon's course had been such as would carry her clear of his ship on the port side, the sound of her whistle as the vessels drew nearer would have gradually broadened until it was a-beam of the Ceto. The fact, which he did observe, that, notwithstanding their mutual advance and his own change of helm, the Lebanon still continued to approach upon his port bow with unaltered bearing, indicated that the two vessels were sailing on intersecting lines, and that, unless there was a change in the bearing of the Lebanon, they would, as a matter of mathematical certainty, meet at the point of intersection. In these circumstances, I am of opinion that his continuing to advance when he knew that, in spite of his port helm, the Lebanon was coming nearer without any appreciable change of bearing, was a violation of the second part of the 18th rule; and I am of opinion that the Lebanon was equally within the rule, and was also to blame for not stopping and reversing. I have for these reasons come to the conclusion that the orders appealed from ought to be reversed, and that it ought to be declared that both vessels were in fault.

Lord BRAMWELL.—My Lords: I am fully sensible of the strength of Mr. Finlay's remark, viz., that we are called upon by the Lebanon to overrule the judgments of two courts assisted by nautical advisers, and that without having ourselves the benefit of such experts. The latter is a very weighty consideration. One may hope with care and attention to come to a right conclusion on matters of ordinary everyday life; but this is not such a case. We are not (at least, I am not) familiar with nautical matters, and may go wrong from sheer ignorance. I do not feel the want of such advice in the present case, for reasons which I will mention hereafter. The two vessels were approaching each other, and that there was a risk of collision is certain, for there was a collision. But, as Mr. Finlay says, the question is, Did the Ceto know that? Now, the captain of the Ceto says he knew that the Lebanon was getting nearer. Then, was it necessary for him to stop and reverse? That word "necessary" does not mean that the situation was such that, without stopping and reversing, a collision would take place; it means rather "prudent or expedient." The answer seems to me to be this: That he did not know where the other vessel was, nor what she was doing; that he thought something; that he speculated; and that he acted on his opinion, instead of making sure by stopping and reversing. There was no reason why he should not; it was a calm, and no other vessel was near. The captain does not give the reason of the second officer for not doing so—viz., that he would have been run into amidships; and that reason is a bad one, for the reversing and going astern should have taken place in time to prevent the collision at any part. I think, therefore, that the Ceto was to blame. I should think so if there were no statutory rule. I cannot see what Mr. Finlay says is the question that was put to the nautical assessors. Therefore I cannot think I am differing from them. I refrain from going into the nice questions of where the Ceto might reasonably judge the Lebanon to be; I purposely abstain. The Ceto should not have judged, but have made sure. To discuss the probabilities is to do what I think the Ceto should not have done. I may, however, say that I think that the Ceto might well have judged without imputing too much stupidity to the Lebanon (as was suggested in the argument), that it was nearing her. These are the grounds of my opinion. They are short, and I am unable to say more.

Lord FITZGERALD.—My Lords: I concur in the reasoning and in the conclusion of the Earl of Selborne, and, as my opinion has not been changed by the re-argument, I will read the judgment I prepared immediately after the first argument. The question is resolved into one substantially of fact, and is thus put in the appellants' case: "On the appeal the only question is, whether the Ceto was to blame for not slackening speed, and stopping and reversing." The Ceto did slacken speed; the order had been given in due time that she should go as slowly as she possibly could; that order was acted on, and she had for some time before the collision been going as slowly as she could.

That matter of fact is stated in all the judgments below, and was not controverted here. The 18th article of the Orders in Council, on which the decision turns, points out that when approaching another ship so as to involve risk of collision a steamship "(1) shall slacken her speed; (2) or stop and reverse if necessary." The question, then, is narrowed to this: Were the circumstances such as to render it necessary for the Ceto to stop and reverse? or, as put in the appellants' case, Had it become the duty of those in charge of the Ceto to do so? "Necessary," as here used, is a word of flexible meaning, to be interpreted according to the surrounding circumstances. Were, then, the circumstances such as to convey to the mind of a skilled mariner that the risk of collision was so imminent as to make it indispensable to stop and reverse? The action was instituted by the Lebanon against the Ceto alleging that (1) a good look-out was not kept on board the Ceto; (2) the helm of the Ceto was improperly ported; (3) the Ceto improperly neglected to comply with articles 12, 13, 18, 19, 22, and 24 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea. In these allegations the plaintiffs failed in the courts below, and fail here unless your Lordships should be satisfied that there was a breach of duty on the part of the Ceto within the concluding sentence of rule 18. The case came before the President of the Admiralty Division, aided by two naval captains, and on reading the evidence there given it cannot be affirmed that the question on which the appellants now rely was brought under the notice of the court, and it is quite certain that no decision was asked on it; on the contrary, the allegations appear to have been that the Ceto had improperly ported, had not slackened her speed, and had misled the Lebanon by an erroneous signal. The result has been that your Lordships have lost, on the very question now before the House, the aid of that skilled tribunal. That court does determine, "We are of opinion that the Lebanon was alone to blame." The appeal did not question the judgment, save on the word "alone," and alleged that both vessels were to blame. On this head the Master of the Rolls observes: "Then the question arises whether the Ceto broke the second rule. That the Lebanon was in the wrong for breaking the first rule is clear. If she broke the first rule, and kept breaking it up to the moment of the collision, she not only broke the first rule, but she broke the second also. Therefore her case is hopeless. In that case the question is whether the Ceto, who obeyed the first rule, broke the second rule." The Court of Appeal was also assisted by its nautical assessors, by whose opinion on a question expressly put to them they were aided. That question was, whether it was necessary (in a nautical sense) for the Ceto to have stopped absolutely dead on the water, to which the assessors answered "No." That court was unanimous, "that the Ceto did nothing to break the rule, because there was nothing to show her that it was necessary to stop and reverse." She was ignorant of the false manœuvre of the Lebanon in starboarding. The noble Earl quoted a sentence taken from the judgment of the Master of the Rolls in the case of The Beryl (51 L. T. Rep. N. S. 554; 9 P. Div. 137). I recall attention to it because it has received the sanction of this House in Baker v. The Owners of the Theodore H. Rand (56 L. T. Rep. N. S. 343; 12 App. Cas. 247). Lord Herschell there gives the quotations more at large, and includes this passage: "But when you speak of rules which are to regulate the conduct of people, those rules can only apply to circumstances which must or ought to be known to the parties at the time. You cannot regulate the conduct of parties as to unknown circumstances." Lord Herschell adds: "I entirely concur in the view thus expressed, and adopt the language of the learned judge." The noble Earl now gives his approval of the judgment in The Beryl case, so far as it has been quoted. We have to consider this narrow question of fact, and under circumstances not favourable to the Lebanon. There is a finding not now contested that she was to blame, and there can be no doubt that her erroneous manœuvres and breaches of the rules to prevent collision led directly to the calamity which otherwise would not have happened. But for the error of the Lebanon in starboarding both ships would have passed each other in safety. The Lebanon undertakes to establish that the Ceto was also to blame, and seeks the protection of the Admiralty rule in such cases. The onus lies on the Lebanon on the maxim Qui dicit non qui negat. The Lebanon undertakes to establish affirmatively from the evidence that the circumstances in proof were such as ought to have conveyed to the mind of the master of the Ceto at a time before the collision became inevitable that it had become his duty to "stop and reverse." From the preliminary acts it appears that the parties stated that the time was 2.30 a.m. or about 3.0, weather calm, dense fog. The fog was so dense, that when each ship saw the masthead and side light of the other, and "almost similtaneously," they were not more than a ship's length asunder. The fog was so dense that "to see," in the sense of being guided by sight, was impracticable. The master of the Ceto had nothing to guide him but his sense of hearing, and that sense certainly or probably rendered less acute, less to be relied on, by the fog. The evidence on which we have to act comes from Gauntlett on the part of the Lebanon and Gibson for the Ceto. The former scarcely touches the question, and seems to be mainly directed to establish a false manœuvre by the "porting" of the Ceto, and that the Lebanon was misled by her signals. At the close of Gauntlett's direct evidence he says he spoke to the captain of the Ceto when he got aboard the Lebanon and asked him "why he blew two blasts of his whistle and ported." "When he ported, why he gave the starboard signal for the port helm." That was then substantially his case, and that case entirely failed. Gibson, on the other hand, seems completely to meet and negative that case; he heard the whistle of the Lebanon apparently about a mile and a half off, and the Ceto was then fairly "dead slow, just merely turning over to keep the ship steering," and gave the signal "to indicate that I was going on my regular course and keeping to port." I have to confess that I am ignorant on the subject of navigation, but I gather from this appeal that to stop a ship dead, to take all the way off her so that she would cease to be under command and be as a log on the water, is a manœuvre that might often lead directly to calamity, and could only be excused by the existence of actual necessity. That is really what article 18 points out. If the Ceto had actually stopped and a collision taken place notwithstanding, an event by no means improbable, it would lay her open to the imputation that the calamity arose from her stopping without necessity. It seems to me, on the fullest consideration, that the position was not such as to show to a skilled seaman that there was then that imminent risk of collision which would create a necessity for stopping and reversing. There was no such risk of collision until the starboarding of the Lebanon, that manœuvre could not have been foreseen, and could not have been known to the master of the Ceto until the Lebanon actually hove in view, and all parties agree that then the Ceto took the only step that might by possibility avert the danger, but it was too late. If there was an error on the part of the officers of the Ceto it does not appear to have arisen from negligence or want of skill. If an error was committed it was an error of judgment under circumstances of embarrassment and difficulty.

Lord HERSCHELL.—My Lords: I have been somewhat embarrassed as to the course which your Lordships ought to take in this case. The sole question is, whether the Ceto should be held to blame in respect of having disobeyed the requirements of art. 18, which provides that every steamship when approaching another ship so as to involve risk of collision shall, if necessary, stop and reverse. This resolves itself into the further question whether under the circumstances, in a dense fog and with the indications which the master of the Ceto had of the position of the other vessel, he ought by the exercise of reasonable care and prudence to have known that it was necessary to stop. For I agree that the necessity must not be such as to become manifest only when all the facts are ascertained; but must be such as would be apparent to a seaman of ordinary skill and prudence with the knowledge which he possesses at the time. This may properly be said to be a question of navigation; and if in such a case the four nautical assessors by whom the courts below were assisted had concurred in thinking that in abstaining from taking the course suggested as the proper one, the master had exercised reasonable care and prudence, and the same view had been adopted by the courts, I think your Lordships ought to have held the matter concluded, unless you saw that there had been some erroneous interpretation of the law. Your Lordships have no nautical assistance. I have in a previous case expressed my opinion that this is to be regretted, so long as the law permits such questions to be submitted for your Lordships' consideration. But, being without this assistance, I think that in such circumstances as I have indicated it would be better and safer that your Lordships should hold yourselves bound by the concurrent findings thus arrived at upon a question of navigation, than that you should act upon the impression produced on your own minds by the evidence. In the present case, however, you have not these concurrent findings. The question whether the Ceto ought to have stopped is not touched upon in the judgment of the President of the Admiralty Division, who says: "Having come to the conclusion that she was going at as slow a pace as she possibly could, there was at the time when she came in sight nothing else for her to do than what she did on the spur of the moment at the instigation of those on board the Lebanon—viz., to go full speed ahead. I am advised that that was the best thing that she could do under the circumstances, and, therefore, that she is not to blame." It is evident that neither the President nor his assessors dealt with the question whether the Ceto ought to have stopped. It has been explained to your Lordships that this arose from the point not having been distinctly taken before that tribunal. In the Court of Appeal, however, it was definitely put forward by the present appellants, and the opinion of that court was pronounced upon it. It has been said that there was nothing to prevent this course being pursued—that any question arising upon the pleadings and evidence was open in the Court of Appeal, even though not taken in the court below. This is, no doubt, true as a general rule. I do not think it necessarily applies where, if the point had been distinctly taken, it might have suggested, either to counsel or to the court, questions to the witnesses which were not put. The matter, however, was entertained by the Court of Appeal, without objection, apparently, on the part of the respondents. That court, assisted by its nautical advisers, adopted a view adverse to the appellants. Under all the circumstances, I should have felt well satisfied if your Lordships could have seen your way to leave the judgment pronounced undisturbed. As, however, I understand that a majority of your Lordships have come to the conclusion that the judgment ought to be reversed, I feel bound to state the reasons why I am by no means prepared to dissent from the view taken of the evidence by those of your Lordships who have arrived at that conclusion. I think that when a steamship is approaching another vessel, in a dense fog, she ought to stop, unless there be such indications as to convey to a seaman of reasonable skill that the two vessels are so approaching that they will pass well clear of one another. I, of course, except a case where there is some other circumstance existing which renders it more prudent not to stop. In the present case no such circumstance was suggested. The weather was calm, and there was nothing to indicate the presence of more than one vessel in the neighbourhood. We have, therefore, only to consider whether the circumstances might properly convey to the mind of the master of the Ceto that the course of the other vessel was such that they would pass clear of each other. This is the test put by the Master of the Rolls in the court below. He thought the Ceto was bound to stop, unless the sound of the whistle showed that the Lebanon was broadening on her port bow. He intimated the opinion that a point or two would not suffice; but that, to absolve her from the obligation, the other vessel must have got broad off as she approached. Now, what is the evidence? The master states that he first heard the whistle about five points on his port bow. He ported a little to give her more room. When he next heard the whistle it was still four points on the port bow. He continued porting, and altered his course under a port helm about two points. The utmost change in the bearing of the whistle of the other vessel to which he speaks is, that he thought it might get a point broader. None of the other witnesses put the case more favourably for the Ceto. I quite agree with the Master of the Rolls that rigorous accurary is not to be expected in the evidence of seamen in cases of this description. It would be a mistake to tie them down too rigidly to the letter of their evidence as to the exact number of points that are mentioned, either in relation to the bearing of the other vessel, or to the alteration of their course. I think we must treat the matter somewhat broadly. But, allowing all this, I fail to see what justification the master had for supposing that the vessels were approaching on such courses that they would pass clear. When the second whistle was heard there was no broadening, and, notwithstanding the fact that the Ceto had been porting, the broadening never became substantial. In taking this view of the evidence, I do not think I differ from the Master of the Rolls. But he thought that the direction and force of the blow conclusively showed that the Lebanon only starboarded at a very late period; that she must have got very broad off the port side of the Ceto, and that the whistles must have been heard by the master broader and broader on his port bow, so as to intimate to him that she was getting broader and broader. I think it is a serious matter thus to set aside the evidence of the witnesses, and to assume in favour of the ship that the facts were not as they represent them, and to find the master justified on the ground that something was observed by him very different from that which he tells us he did observe. Nevertheless, if such a fact were conclusively proved, I agree that it might be sufficient to determine the case. I frankly admit that I have approached this point with every desire to take the same view of it as the Master of the Rolls, and to support the judgment of the court below. But I have found myself unable to see that the circumstances relating to the blow, its position, force, and direction, do afford the conclusive proof which has been attributed to them, and to justify the view which has been taken of the whole of the evidence.

Lord MACNAGHTEN.—My Lords: I agree in the result at which the majority of your Lordships have arrived. After the first hearing, I had the advantage of considering the opinion of Lord Watson, and concurring in it, as I do entirely, I have not thought it necessary to trouble your Lordships with any further observations in this case.

THE MEMNON. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF APPEAL IN ENGLAND.

Collision — Crossing ships — Risk of collision— Regulations for Preventing Collisions at sea, arts. 16, 18, 23.

When two steamships are approaching so as to involve risk of collision, and it is the duty of one to keep out of the way, and of the other to keep her course, the latter is bound to comply with art. 18 of the Regulations as to slackening her speed or stopping and reversing if necessary, and if she does not do so the onus lies upon her to show that to continue her speed was in fact the best and most seamanlike manœuvre under the circumstances.

Semble, that if it is shown by a ship not complying with art. 18 of the Regulations that, taking into consideration all the circumstances of the case, compliance with the regulation would have increased the risk, such non-compliance will not cause the ship to be held in fault.

THIS was an appeal from a judgment of the Court of Appeal (Lord Esher, M.R., Lindley and Bowen, L.JJ.), reported in 59 L. T. Rep. N. S. 289; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 317, who had affirmed a judgment of Butt, J.

The case arose out of a collision between the British steamship Memnon and the Brazilian steamship San Salvador, which took place on the 20th Aug. 1885 off the coast of Brazil. The court below held that both ships were to blame.

The owners of the Memnon appealed.

Sir W. Phillimore and J. P. Aspinall appeared for the appellants.

Myburgh, Q.C. and Raikes, who appeared for the respondents, were not called upon to address the House.

At the conclusion of the arguments for the appellants their Lordships gave judgment as follows:—

The LORD CHANCELLOR (Halsbury).—My Lords: In this case I am anxious not to be supposed to be placing any particular construction on the rules, such as they are, which have been quoted as applicable to circumstances not identical with those which your Lordships have now under review. I do not believe that mere words, necessarily in relation to a set of facts to be ascertained at the time, can ever be so precisely construed or expounded as to be applicable to all cases alike. Therefore, when we are dealing with such a rule as that when two ships "are approaching so as to involve risk of collision," it shall be the duty of one of them, I do not say which at the moment, to "slacken speed or stop and reverse if necessary," however those words may be construed, whether distributively, that is to say that the words "if necessary" are to be applied to each of them in turn, or collectively, that is to all of them in combination—whatever is the true construction of it, it is impossible to lay it down as applicable to all cases and all circumstances that that rule is to be so obeyed as, with all submission, the Court of Appeal seem to have assumed, without reference to the necessity which is raised by the circumstances under which the rule is to be obeyed. If therefore in this particular case it could be suggested that, as a matter of seamanship, or as a matter of ordinary common sense, it could be ascertained that the stopping, or the reversing, or the slackening would itself produce or increase the danger of collision which would be incurred by the approach of the two ships to each other, I should think myself that it would be impossible to say that, upon the true construction of the words in that rule "if necessary," such facts would show that in the particular case which I have supposed it was necessary to do either the one or the other of those things which, upon the supposition I have made, would either create or increase the danger of collision. I cannot understand how any court could suppose that those words "if necessary" should be so construed as to apply to a case where upon the hypothesis it is not only not necessary but injurious; and if in the whole of this case I could find out either from the evidence or from the argument that that case had been made and put before the court, so that we could review it, I myself should certainly preserve an independent judgment as to what the decision of the court should be. But I have looked with some care at the evidence, and I cannot find that that question, though ably and powerfully urged at your Lordships' bar, was ever really the subject of discussion in the court below. It may have been argued in the court below—that I cannot say; but so far as the evidence is concerned I cannot find a trace of it. What was argued apparently was this, that the captain of the San Salvador had so acted as to mislead the Memnon, and to place her in a considerable difficulty as to what course she should pursue; and I think it was established that the San Salvador had exhibited bad and reckless seamanship. Then, there being no doubt that the San Salvador was to blame, the question which appears to have been debated was, whether the Memnon had been so misled, and had so acted in pursuance of her duty to keep on her course, that she was entirely blameless; and that which was argued, and that which the nautical assessors appear to have affirmed, is this, that she did observe the bad seamanship of the San Salvador at such a time and under such circumstances that she must have known that, if she kept on her course, if there would not be actual collision there was so serious a risk of collision that the rule became immediately applicable, and that she ought to have slackened her speed, and if necessary stoped and reversed. Well, now, it cannot be said as an abstract proposition that that must necessarily either create or increase the risk of collision. That must depend upon circumstances, and what the nautical assessors have found as a matter of nautical skill (and certainly without evidence on the other side I should feel myself bound by it) is, that the captain of the Memnon was not justified in supposing that if he went on as he was going he would not incur risk of collision. To put it as the Master of the Rolls himself puts it: there is plenty of sea room, you are on the open sea, and if you see that an approaching vessel is not skilfully navigated, and is being navigated in such a way that you may anticipate that a slight deviation from what she is doing may involve the risk of collision, you are not justified in supposing that she will be so exact in her irregularity that you can calculate upon it that the vessel will go under your stern at a distance of a length and a half, when she may by a decrease or variation of her irregularity come within half a length, and if so no one can doubt, says the Master of the Rolls, that that will involve a risk of collision. Therefore, the Court of Appeal and Butt, J. all find the Memnon guilty of disobedience to the rule in such a way as that they think that her master did not take that course which the Act of Parliament prescribed when the facts were to his mind such that if he did not obey that course there must be risk of collision. So far, in that condition of things, I assent to the judgment at which they have arrived.

Mr. Aspinall has made a very powerful attack upon the reasoning of some parts of the judgments of the Court of Appeal. It appears to me that it is very difficult to say, if that is right, that it is also right to say that the person who was responsible for the navigation of the Memnon did no wrong, and was not guilty of anything which a seaman ought not to have been guilty of. One can understand, no doubt, the sympathy which Butt, J. and the learned judges in the Court of Appeal feel for a sailor who has been placed in a very difficult position by the misconduct of another, that other representing a rival ship which comes into collision with his, and being certainly, if one might take degrees in this matter, very much more to blame than himself. But the question which we have to consider is, whether both vessels were to blame, and not to apportion the degree of blame which is to be attached to each; and though I confess myself that I have great difficulty in following the initial portion of the judgment of the Master of the Rolls and reconciling it with the conclusion and any part of the judgment of Lindley, L.J., yet with the result I am content, namely, that they affirm the judgment of Butt, J., in which they have the assent of both sets of nautical assessors. I am not quite able to see what the question put to the nautical assessors in the Court of Appeal was, but I gather that, if the question which was put was not in the terms which I think the Master of the Rolls uses, namely, "that the best thing as a matter of simple navigation for this officer to have done was what he did do," it was something like it; but whether or not, notwithstanding that, apart from the Act of Parliament, his conduct as a sailor could not be complained of, yet considering that the rule had informed him of the course which he was to pursue, namely to slacken speed, or stop and reverse, he disobeyed that rule, and having disobeyed it, and the Act of Parliament having provided that in such a case that rule is to be obeyed, the nautical assessors take that as part of a sailor's duty, and therefore they agree that under those circumstances the facts were sufficiently present to his mind to make that rule operative upon him, and that he disobeyed it. I am not quite certain that even that is a very satisfactory explanation of what the Master of the Rolls does mean; but, as I say, it is enough for me that both sets of nautical assessors assent to the blame being cast upon the Memnon, and under these circumstances, entirely disclaiming any notion of laying down any abstract application of this rule to facts which are not before me, I am content with the judgment of Butt, J., and think that this appeal ought to be dismissed with costs, and I so move your Lordships.

Lord FITZGERALD concurred.

Lord HERSCHELL.—My Lords: I am of the same opinion. The main question—indeed, I think the only question—is, whether the Memnon has been properly held to have been to blame on the ground of disobedience to a statutory rule, which provides "that every steamship, when approaching another ship so as to involve risk of collision, shall slacken her speed or stop and reverse if necessary." Now it has been held, in the case of The Beryl (51 L. T. Rep. N. S. 554; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 321; 9 P. Div. 137), and the view taken there has been adopted by this House, (a) that the rule only becomes applicable where the circumstances are such as to bring to the mind of the master who is navigating a vessel that they involve risk of collision. Once it is proved that the circumstances were such as would show a seaman of reasonable skill that there was risk of collision owing to the course on which, and the circumstances under which, the vessels were approaching one another, then it is clear that it was imperative upon him to slacken speed or stop and reverse if necessary. Now, although I have said that it is imperative upon him to do so, yet it must be borne in mind that the statute only provides that his vessel, if it does not take that course, shall be deemed in fault unless it be shown to the satisfaction of the court that the circumstances of the case made departure from the regulation necessary; and there is also another regulation which provides that, in obeying and construing the rule, "due regard must be had to all the dangers of navigation and to any special circumstances which may exist in any particular case rendering a departure from the above rule necessary in order to avoid immediate danger." But it appears to me that, when once it is shown that it was brought home, or ought to have been brought home, to the mind of the master of a vessel that the courses upon which the ships were approaching, and the circumstances, involved risk of collision, the onus is thrown upon him of justifying his not doing that which the rule prescribes. If under those circumstances he does not slacken speed, and does not stop and reverse, he cannot be held to be excused, he cannot be held to be otherwise than to blame. The question whether a departure was necessary or not must no doubt be determined by the court; but it must be determined upon the point being raised, and upon some evidence being tendered to the court to show that to have followed the rule would either have created that very risk of collision which it was the purpose of the rule to avoid, or have increased instead of diminished the risk of collision. If either of those things were shown, then I cannot doubt that the courts would hold that the rule which applies to the course to be taken in order to avoid risk of collision could not justify holding a master to blame who had only omitted to do that which would of itself either have created or have increased the risk of collision. I can find no case in which the law has been differently laid down. But in the present the nautical assessors below, who assisted the court in both courts, have found that, as a matter of seamanship, the master of the Memnon ought to have seen that the vessels were so approaching as to involve risk of collision. That is the finding which is distinctly to be inferred in both courts, and the learned judge who presided in the Admiralty Division, and all the judges in the Court of Appeal, have adopted that view. Therefore I think it would be out of the question that your Lordships should take any other view here. We start with this, that the master of the Memnon ought to have known and seen that the vessels were so approaching as to involve risk of collision. That being so, we have it as an admitted fact that, at the time when he ought to have seen and known it, he did not do that which the rule prescribes, he neither slackened speed nor stopped. Primâ facie, therefore, he has broken the rule, and must be held to have been to blame.

Has he shown any reason for not taking that course? It is suggested that, if he had slackened speed, it would have increased and not diminished the risk of collision. I do not see the slightest evidence to support such a contention. No question upon that point was ever put to the master of the vessel, and it would be impossible, as it seems to me, for your Lordships, without any such evidence, to arrive at any such conclusion. As I have said, the circumstances throw the burden upon the master of excusing himself, and he has not given any evidence which supports any such excuse as has been suggested for him here to-day. Mr. Aspinall, on behalf of the appellants, has argued that if the master of the Memnon had slackened speed it would in one particular event, namely, in the case of one manœuvre being taken by the master of the San Salvador, have increased the risk of collision, namely, if the master of the San Salvador had ported. Well, supposing that to be true, supposing also that it had been made out that if the master of the San Salvador had continued his course there would have been some increase to the risk of collision by the master of the Memnon slackening speed, yet there was a third alternative, and it may be that, in spite of that, and looking at the circumstances altogether, the total risk would have been less by the master slackening, even if in the case of a particular manœuvre being taken by the San Salvador it would have caused some increase of the risk. What must be looked at is the risk as a whole. In order to excuse the master for his non-compliance with the rule you must show that under all the circumstances, and considering all the possibilities, the total risk would have been greater if he had slackened speed than it would have been if he had not complied with the rule Even if there be ground for the suggestion that in certain events there might have been an increase of risk, I do not see the shadow of a case for the suggestion that as a whole the risk of collision would have been increased rather than diminished by the master slackening speed,

THE ARRATOON APCAR. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM THE VICE-ADMIRALTY COURT OF THE STRAITS SETTLEMENTS (SETTLEMENT AT SINGAPORE).

Collision—Risk—Engines—Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, art. 18.

Where one of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea has been infringed by a vessel, the fact that the infringement is comparatively venial, and that the reckless navigation of the other vessel is the principal and primary cause of the collision, does not justify the court in absolving the vessel guilty of infringement from blame unless necessity for such infringement is established.

THIS was an appeal by the owners of the steamship Hebe from the decision of the judge of the Vice-Admiralty Court at Singapore in a damage action holding the Hebe alone to blame for a collision with the steamship Arratoon Apcar.

The collision occurred about 3.35 a.m. on the 22nd May 1888 in the Straits of Malacca.

The learned judge below accepted the evidence of the witnesses from the Arratoon Apcar and disbelieved the evidence of the witnesses from the Hebe.

The appellants admitted that the Hebe was to blame, but contended that, on the respondents' evidence, the Arratoon Apcar was also to blame for breach of article 18 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, which is as follows:

Every steamship when approaching another ship so as to involve risk of collision shall slacken her speed or stop and reverse if necessary.

The facts of the case are sufficiently stated in the judgment.

Cur. adv. vult.

Nov. 30.—Judgment was delivered by

Lord MACNAGHTEN.—The collision which led to this litigation took place in the Straits of Malacca on the 22nd May 1888, about 3.35 a.m., between the s.s. Hebe and the s.s. Arratoon Apcar. Both vessels were under steam alone. The wind was southerly and moderate. The weather was fine and the sky clear. The regulation lights of both vessels were in order and burning brightly. Both vessels were considerably damaged by the collision. Cross-actions were brought in the Vice-Admiralty Court of the Straits Settlements. Each vessel accused the other of being the sole cause of the disaster. The actions were consolidated, and tried together. Judgment was given on the 3rd Aug. 1888. The learned judge found the Hebe alone to blame. He accepted the account given by the witnesses for the Arratoon Apcar and came to the conclusion that the Hebe was navigated with reckless negligence, and that the persons in charge of her at the time of the collision were, one and all, ignorant and incompetent. From the decree founded on this judgment the owners of the Hebe appealed. At the hearing before their Lordships the learned counsel for the appellants did not deny that the Hebe was to blame; but they contended that the evidence of the respondents' own witnesses proved that the Arratoon Apcar was also in fault. The facts of the case as they may be gathered from the evidence on behalf of the Arratoon Apcar are in substance as follows: The Arratoon Apcar, steering S. 60 degrees E., sighted the masthead light and the red and green lights of the Hebe when the two vessels were about five miles apart, and apparently as nearly as possible on opposite courses. The Arratoon Apcar was going about ten knots an hour at the time. She ported one point, and in about two minutes lost the Hebe's green light, and then she steadied on that course. Shortly afterwards the green light of the Hebe appeared again about two points on her port bow. The Arratoon Apcar then ported another point and again lost the Hebe's green light, and kept on that course until the Hebe, being about two and a half points on the port bow, suddenly shut out her red light and showed her green light for the third time. It is impossible to determine the distance between the two vessels at this moment; but their Lordships think that the learned judge was probably right in supposing that it must have been a little more or a little less than half a mile. The officer in charge of the Arratoon Apcar at once saw his danger. He gave the order "hard-a-port," and went himself to the wheel-house to make sure that the order was carried out. He saw his vessel beginning to come round before he left the wheel. Then he went to the telegraph and stopped the engines. The collision took place almost immediately afterwards, the starboard bow of the Hebe which was still going full speed striking the port bow of the Arratoon Apcar at something less than a right angle. The engines of the Arratoon Apcar were not reversed until after the collision.

On this state of facts it was contended by the learned counsel for the appellants that the Arratoon Apcar infringed the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea in three particulars. They argued (1) that the Arratoon Apcar ought to have slackened speed before the green light of the Hebe came into view the third time; (2) that the engines of the Arratoon Apcar ought to have been stopped and reversed at the time when the officer in charge gave the order "hard-a-port"; and (3) that at any rate the engines of the Arratoon Apcar ought to have been reversed as well as stopped before the collision. The learned judge in the Vice-Admiralty Court, who does not seem to have had the assistance of nautical assessors, appears to have felt little or no difficulty upon any point of the case except upon the one question, whether it was the duty of the officer in charge of the Arratoon Apcar to reverse as well as to stop. The excuse put forward at the trial for not reversing was that the Arratoon Apcar had a left-handed screw, and that its action would have "deadened" the effect of the port helm if the engines had been reversed. With some hesitation the learned judge accepted this excuse, and exonerated the Arratoon Apcar from all blame. Their Lordships are however compelled to take a different view. They are advised by their nautical assessors that before the green light of the Hebe appeared the third time there were sufficient indications to the officer in charge of the Arratoon Apcar (supposing him to have been a person of ordinary skill, using reasonable care) to show that the two vessels were approaching so as to involve risk of collision. They are further advised that a prudent seaman in the position in which that officer was placed by the conduct of those on board the Hebe would have stopped, or at the least have slackened speed, until the course of the approaching vessel could be made out with something like certainty. Under any circumstances their Lordships would be slow to differ from their nautical assessors on a question of navigation. In the present case, thinking as they do that the risk of collision was not determined when the Arratoon Apcar ported the second time, they see no reason for not giving effect to the advice which they have received. They are therefore obliged to hold that the Arratoon Apcar was to blame for not slackening speed in good time, before the third appearance of the Hebe's green light.

The error on the part of the Arratoon Apcar may seem venial compared with the misconduct of those on board the Hebe. But their Lordships have no power to absolve a vessel which infringes the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea from the consequences prescribed by statute, unless a plea of necessity is made out. The view which their Lordships have taken under skilled advice renders it unnecessary to pronounce an opinion on the conduct of the officer in charge of the Arratoon Apcar after the Hebe's green light appeared the third time. It was probably too late then to prevent a collision. Their Lordships, however, think it right to say that they are not satisfied that the excuse for not reversing ought to have been accepted as sufficient, nor are they convinced that the officer in charge of the Arratoon Apcar after he saw the danger was justified in going to the wheel before giving orders to stop. Though the time lost was short, there was an appreciable delay in complying with the regulations. In the result their Lordships will humbly advise Her Majesty that the decree under appeal ought to be varied by pronouncing the Arratoon Apcar to blame as well as the Hebe, with the usual consequences, including a direction to assess the damages sustained by the Hebe, and by discharging the order as to costs. There will be no costs of the appeal.

DREYFUS AND CO. v. THE PERUVIAN GUANO COMPANY. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE CHANCERY DIVISION.

Inquiry—Damages—Wrongful detention of goods—Damages for being kept out of possession—Measure of damages—Lord Cairns' Act (21 & 22 Vict. c. 27), s. 2*—Jurisdiction—Damages—Threatened injury.*

The plaintiffs commenced an action against the defendants claiming delivery of certain cargoes of guano (then on their way to this country), and an injunction to restrain the defendants from dealing with such cargoes. The defendants denied the title of the plaintiffs to the cargoes.

An order was made by consent for the appointment of a receiver, and the defendants were allowed to receive the cargoes, without prejudice to any question, on an undertaking to keep accounts and to abide by any order the court might make. The statement of claim was subsequently amended by claiming damages for detention of the cargoes. At the trial of the action judgment was given in favour of the plaintiffs, declaring them to be entitled to the cargoes; and that the defendants were not entitled to be reimbursed certain expenses incurred by them in respect of the cargoes; and directing an inquiry what damages had been sustained by the plaintiffs by reason of the detention by the defendants of the cargoes.

The defendants appealed from this judgment, claiming to be reimbursed for expenses incurred by them in respect of the cargoes received under the consent order. The appeal was dismissed, but on appeal to the House of Lords the judgment was varied by allowing the claim to expenses, but no application was made to alter the terms of the inquiry. The chief clerk by his certificate awarded a sum as damages on the footing that there had been a wrongful detention of all cargoes commencing on their arrival in this country. The defendants applied to have the certificate varied, on the ground that the effect of the decision of the House of Lords was that there had been no wrongful detention, and that the plaintiffs were entitled to nominal damages only.

Held (Bowen, L.J. dissenting), that the inquiry directed affirmed that there had been an unlawful detention by the defendant company of the eleven cargoes in question which gave rise to damages; that the inquiry could not be satisfied by finding merely nominal damages; that it was not competent to the court in working out the inquiry, not reversed by any court, to deprive it of all meaning by reviewing the circumstances under which it was made; that the inquiry was not affected by the decision of the House of Lords, and the certificate was right.

Decision of Kay, J. (61 L. T. Rep. N. S. 180; 42 Ch. Div. 66) affirmed.

Per Bowen, L.J.: The effect of the decision of the House of Lords was, that the taking possession by the defendants of the cargoes under the consent order was not wrongful, and gave no right to damages; that the court had no jurisdiction to give damages where there was only a threat to do a wrongful act; that the terms of the inquiry did not prevent the chief clerk from finding that there were nominal damages only; that, as he had apparently proceeded on the ground that taking possession under the consent order was itself an act of detention which entitled the plaintiffs to damages, the certificate was wrong, and it ought to be referred back to him to state what were the wrongful acts of detention in respect of which he found damages, and what damages he found in respect of them.

The court has no jurisdiction under Lord Cairns' Act (a) to award damages where no wrongful act has been actually committed by the person against whom the injunction is claimed.

This was an appeal from a decision of Kay, J. (reported 61 L. T. Rep. N. S. 180; 42 Ch. Div. 66) refusing an application by the defendants to vary the certificate of the chief clerk, made in the action.

On the 7th June 1876 the Peruvian Government entered into a contract (known as the Raphael contract) with the defendant company to consign to them for sale eleven cargoes of guano, in respect of which the company were to receive 4*l.* 15*s.* a ton for freight and other expenses, and the rest of the proceeds were to be held on account of the Government, to whom the company were to make certain advances against the cargoes. The eleven cargoes were shipped at Lobos on the coast of Peru about Dec. 1879.

Disputes arose between the Government and the company as to whether the cargoes were within the contract; and the result of such disputes was, that the Government purported to determine the right of the company under the contract, and sent the bills of lading of the cargoes to the plaintiffs Messrs. Dreyfus. The company, however, claimed possession of the cargoes, and with regard to four of the ships gave directions at the port of call to the masters as to the ports at which they were to discharge.

On the 27th April 1880 the writ in this action was issued by Messrs. Dreyfus against the company and the masters of the ships, claiming delivery of the cargoes to the plaintiffs, and an injunction to prevent the company from receiving them. The plaintiffs moved for an injunction and receiver, and on the 30th April 1880 an order was made on that motion by which, the company consenting, the action was dismissed against the masters of the eleven ships without costs; and the company undertaking that the receipt by them of the cargoes should be without prejudice to any questions between the parties, and that they would keep separate accounts of expenditure and receipts in respect of these cargoes, and abide by any order the court might make as to them or the proceeds of them, it was ordered that the costs of the motion were to be costs in the action, and that the order was to be without prejudice to any question in the action. At the date of this order only two of the ships had arrived, and none of the cargoes had been actually received by the company.

On the 16th July 1880 the statement of claim was delivered, and was amended on the 10th March 1881. It claimed delivery to the plaintiffs of the cargoes, damages for their detention, and an injunction against the receipt of them by the company.

On the 9th Nov. 1880 the defence was put in, stating that the company had taken possession of the cargoes under the Raphael contract, denying that such possession was wrongful, and denying the plaintiffs' claim to the property in the cargoes, and claiming for the company the right to receive them.

By an order of the 16th Sept. 1880 the company was allowed to receive the cargo of one of the ships, without prejudice to any question.

On the 17th Dec. 1880 an order was made for the appointment of a receiver of all the eleven cargoes or the proceeds of any sold, and on the 23rd Feb. 1881 a receiver was appointed.

By an order of the 8th March 1881 the company were, nevertheless, permitted to sell the cargoes of two other ships, and to pay the gross proceeds to the receiver; and by another order of the 26th Feb. they were permitted to retain 6366*l.* 4*s.* received for cargo of another ship on account of expenses, which were to be paid to them without prejudice to any question.

On the 13th Jan. 1885 Bacon, V.C. gave judgment in the action declaring the plaintiffs entitled to the cargoes, and that the company were not entitled to be reimbursed any expenses incurred by them in respect of any of the cargoes except under the order of the 8th March 1881, and the judgment directed an inquiry "what damages have been sustained by the plaintiffs by reason of the detention by the defendant company of the cargoes of guano in question in the action."

The company appealed from this judgment, but at the hearing of the appeal abandoned it, except as to their claim to be paid 4*l.* 15*s.* per ton under the Raphael contract, or, in the alternative, to be allowed the freight and landing charges paid by them in respect of the cargoes which they had received under the order of the 30th April 1880. On the 12th Feb. 1886 the Court of Appeal affirmed the judgment of Bacon, V.C.

(a) Sect. 2 is as follows: In all cases in which the Court of Chancery has jurisdiction to entertain an application for an injunction against a breach of any covenant, contract, or agreement, or against the commission or continuance of any wrongful act, or for the specific performance of any covenant, contract, or agreement, it shall be lawful for the same court, if it shall think fit, to award damages to the party injured, either in addition to or in substitution for such injunction or specific performance, and such damages may be assessed in such manner as the court shall direct.—Ed.

The company appealed to the House of Lords, and on the 18th July 1887 the House of Lords varied the judgment by allowing to the company the freight and landing charges in respect of the cargoes received by them, "so far as the same have not been already repaid to them or allowed to them in account with the Peruvian Government." Lord Watson, who occupied the woolsack, stated that he thought under the circumstances the actual receipt by the company must at least be regarded as a neutral, and not an adverse, act of possession. The counsel for the parties were invited by their Lordships to make any suggestions for varying the terms of the judgment, but no such suggestions were made, and accordingly the inquiry directed by Bacon, V.C. remained as part of the judgment.

The inquiry resulted in a finding by the chief clerk of a large sum for damages for detention of cargoes in respect of diminution of gross proceeds owing to sale by the receiver instead of the plaintiffs themselves; increased expenses of sales under orders of court; and damages for loss of interest on those sums and on actual proceeds of the cargoes, computed at 5 per cent. till judgment, less interest gained in court or paid by receiver; and damages for nonpayment of these moneys at 4 per cent. from judgment to the date of the certificate, amounting in all to over 30,000*l.*

The company took out a summons asking that the certificate might be discharged, and the inquiry proceeded with on the footing that the plaintiffs were entitled to no damages, or that the certificates might be varied by finding that no detention took place, or that, if any detention took place, it occurred at Lobos; and lastly, by striking out the whole of the sum found, and by finding that the plaintiffs had sustained no damages.

Kay, J. refused the application, and the defendants appealed.

On the 21st Nov., previously to the hearing of the appeal, the defendants applied by motion to the Court of Appeal, for liberty to appeal from the portion of the judgment of Bacon, V.C. which directed the above inquiry, but the court refused the motion on the ground that after the proceedings in the House of Lords it was not competent to the court to accede to it.

The appeal from the decision of Kay, J. was then heard.

Cotton, L.J.—This is an appeal from the decision of Kay, J. refusing to vary the chief clerk's certificate. [His Lordship stated the nature of the proceedings, and continued:] Under these circumstances, the defendants have put us in the greatest difficulty. In my opinion we cannot inquire whether the portion of the judgment of Bacon, V.C. which is now in question—no longer his judgment, no longer our judgment, but the judgment of the House of Lords—is right or wrong. But, as there was no actual possession of these cargoes, and therefore detention, in that sense, before the order of the 30th April 1880, it is necessary to ascertain what this inquiry can refer to. I have not thought it right to go through the evidence in this case for the purpose of seeing whether the decision of the Vice-Chancellor was right or wrong, but that decision does assume, and in fact give directions founded only upon this, that there had been that which amounted to detention so as to justify the plaintiffs in asking for and the judge in awarding damages which had been sustained by reason of that detention. It is, however, right to look at the pleadings, because they show what was the case on which the Vice-Chancellor was deciding. [His Lordship referred to the pleadings, and continued:] Now, having regard to these pleadings, in my opinion what the Vice-Chancellor decided was that the defendant company had been guilty, not by setting up this claim in this action but by their action in the matter, of such conduct as amounted to detention, thus preventing the plaintiffs from getting as they would otherwise have done under their bills of lading possession of these cargoes. I do not at all enter into the question whether that was right or wrong. We are not at liberty, in my opinion, to discuss or enter into that question, because the defendants have prevented us from doing so. They contended at the hearing that they had taken possession; they stated how it was that they got possession, and whether they were right or wrong, whether their counsel was right or wrong, in that view or not, in my opinion we must take it that the view of the Vice-Chancellor was based upon that. And it must be remembered that this inquiry was directed after the judgment was delivered, and when the minutes, which as I gather from the shorthand-writer's notes had been prepared by the plaintiffs' counsel, had been handed up, and the Vice-Chancellor requested the counsel then present for the defendants to consider carefully whether the minutes were right and whether the order which he was going to pronounce was right or not, and not one single word was said against this inquiry being directed. Well, therefore, here is the inquiry which embodies in fact a declaration that there had been a detention. It is founded on a decision of the Vice-Chancellor that there was a detention of which the defendants had been guilty, which justified him in holding them liable to damages. In my opinion (it may be very unfortunate) we are not in a position to inquire into that. Whether the House of Lords will think that it can do so I give no opinion at all; but Fry, L.J. suggested that the appellants should go and see whether the House of Lords would think that was still open, having regard to what they had done when the appeal came before them; but the Attorney-General declined, and I think reasonably, to accept that offer and desired the appeal to continue. Then it is said that this finding as to damages is inconsistent altogether with the finding of the House of Lords when that appeal was before the House, and when it was decided that the defendants appealing were entitled to such payments as they had made in consequence of the order of the 30th April 1880. If it could be seen that in fact the decision of the House of Lords was at variance with any such finding we should be put into a great difficulty by the action of the defendants; but I do not think that is really the result of the decision. [His Lordship referred to the proceedings before the House of Lords, and continued:] I think we cannot say that this decision of Bacon, V.C., on which the certificate is founded, is at variance with the decision of the House of Lords. If it be so, the House of Lords, when the matter comes before them, will, if they think they have any power to do so, act upon it as justice may require.

Then the real argument against this certificate was, that there was nothing in fact done which would justify the court in granting to the plaintiffs any damages for anything which can be called detention on the part of the defendants. That is in fact to reverse the decision, and to strike out this inquiry, which the Vice-Chancellor has directed, because, although it was said that that might be done by giving nominal damages, yet, as I put it to Mr. Rigby, I cannot understand how, if no act has been done by the defendants which justifies any damages being given against them, even nominal damages could be given. If that course is taken, it is assumed that an act has been committed which justifies a claim for damages, but that the damages are so small that the court will not give substantial damages. Very likely juries in exercising their peculiar function do sometimes deal with a case in the way which has been mentioned; but it will not do for Kay, J., or for this court, to exercise that unknown equity which is sometimes exercised by juries; and, in my opinion, we cannot, unless there is some reasonable ground for differing from the finding of the chief clerk as to damages, in any way vary the certificate. It was said that here the chief clerk and Kay, J. have put all the cargoes upon the same footing, and that interest was calculated from the time when the cargoes were landed. That, I think, was on this footing that, if the defendants had not by their acts detained these cargoes, thus preventing the plaintiffs from getting them without recourse to a court of equity, then at that time the plaintiffs would have got possession of the cargoes; and from that time it is that the interest is calculated; that is to say, as from the time when, but for the detention of the defendants, the plaintiffs would have got possession of these cargoes. I cannot see therefore that we can interfere there. There was another point that was argued by Mr. Rigby, namely, that these cargoes could not all have been sold immediately. That really caused some doubt in my mind, whether the certificate was quite correct in fixing a date as if they could be sold immediately. But that point was never raised at all, either in chambers, so far as one can see, looking only to the evidence, or before Kay, J., nor was it really raised by the summons to vary. Therefore, in my opinion, we should be wrong, even if primâ facie it seemed to us that the matter might have been differently treated both by the chief clerk in chambers, and by Kay, J., when the matter was before him, when this point was not raised at all by the defendants, to allow them now to have the matter sent back on a point which they had not raised, and which has only occurred to them at the last moment. In my opinion the appeal fails. I should mention that Cooper v. Cooper (ubi sup.) was referred to by Mr. Rigby as a decision of the House of Lords which would enable us and require us to act according to his contention here as regards this inquiry as to damages. But that was a different case. There the matter was before the House of Lords, and, although there was a question whether the interlocutor of the Court of Session could be appealed from, yet the matter was before them, and they taking a different view as to the law which ought to govern the case, and having the matter before them, were at liberty to act, and did act upon that view so as to decide the case on the law really applicable to the case before them. But here we are in a very different position after the affirmation of the judgment of the Vice-Chancellor, both on appeal to this court and on appeal from this court to the House of Lords.

Bowen, L.J.—I regret that I am unable to take the same view as the Lord Justice. This unhappy case has got into a tangle, which my brother Cotton, L.J. thinks absolutely desperate, but which I think is capable, even at this eleventh hour, of still being remedied without there being applied to it so drastic a measure as that which destroyed the Gordian knot. To put it broadly, it seems to me that the conclusion at which the Lord Justice has arrived does not give adequate effect to the law as laid down in the judgment of the House of Lords, and I do not myself feel the same difficulty that he does in discovering a way in which due effect can be given to it. Now, the facts of this case I do not propose to discuss, except so far as they are uncontroverted. I will only mention a few of the uncontroverted facts, in order to make the remainder of my reasoning intelligible. Eleven cargoes of guano started from Lobos for England in ships which were chartered at the risk and on account of the Peruvian Government by the company, the defendants in this action. A quarrel took place on the other side of the seas, in consequence of which the Peruvian Government determined the right so far as they could, and in law I think they did determine the right of the guano company to take delivery of these cargoes as agents for the Peruvian Government or otherwise upon the remainder of the ships, and they further transferred the title to the guano which was in themselves, and the right accordingly to take delivery, to the plaintiffs in this action. The title of the plaintiffs accrued while the ships were sailing across the seas. The ships arrived at intervals. Two of them, I will assume, were taken possession of, and wrongfully taken possession of, by the defendants. I will assume that for the purposes of my judgment. The remainder were still on their way when a writ was issued to raise the real question between the parties, which was as to the right to take possession of the cargoes—a writ which, as regards the two ships which had already arrived, might be based upon a wrong already done and threatened to be continued, but which, with regard to the other ships which were still on the sea, for anything we know, was simply in the nature of a quia timet action to prevent a threat which had been expressed from being exercised. A few days after the writ an order was made in the action by consent, in which it was agreed, obviously in the interests of both parties as they thought—for it is unimportant to consider whether the order has worked out to the detriment of one more than the other—that the receipt of the cargoes of guano by the defendants should be without prejudice to any question between the parties, that they would keep separate accounts of expenditure and receipts in respect of the cargoes and abide by any order which the court should make with respect to the cargoes. Now, two things seem to me to be perfectly clear: the one, that eight or nine of the ships—I will call it nine for the purposes of my judgment without investigating the question as to the number—were upon the high seas at the time when that order was made, and the cargoes were taken possession of by the defendants under that order. The second thing that seems to me to be perfectly clear is, that the ratio decidendi of the House of Lords in the case which went before them was, that no wrongful act consisted in the taking possession of any cargoes under that order. It was necessary for the House of Lords so to decide. The point made was, that the reimbursement of the freight which the defendants claimed would be inequitable and unjust, as they were wrongdoers in respect of the taking of possession. The House of Lords said they were not wrongdoers in respect of the taking of possession, and that therefore the point made could not arise. I pause for one moment to observe that the House of Lords did not feel themselves hampered in coming to that conclusion as to the wrongful possession taken under the order by the mere fact that an order for an inquiry had been made in the action, which was not appealed against, and which seemed to assume the detention of all the cargoes. Now, these two things seem to me to be perfectly clear: first, the ratio decidendi of the House of Lords; and secondly, that, as regards nine of the ships, if no other act were done in respect of them—and, as far as we know, nothing was done, though it will be seen presently I do not conclude that question—than the mere taking possession under that order, that was not wrongful. Having said so much as to what seems to me to be clear, I proceed to state wherein the difficulty now arises, and in order to explain that I must review shortly the course which this action took. The action when launched, as I have said, was, for anything that appears to the contrary on the facts before us as regards several of the cargoes, a quia timet action. At the time when the action came to be tried, and I think at the time when the pleadings were delivered, the cargoes had been successively arriving. At the time when the action was tried they all had arrived, and had been taken possession of. In the pleadings after the order of the 30th April 1880, it was useless for the defendants to deny the mere fact of possession of the cargoes. They either had received them, or were going to receive them. The point they desired to make was, that they had a right to receive them and a title to the proceeds after the sale under a contract with the Peruvian Government. Now I do not myself see that the mere fact that on their pleadings, when the question was one of right, they allege that the possession which they had admitted they had of the cargoes was under a contract with the Peruvian Government in any way prevents them setting up the fact that the possession was rightful, if that particular point under which they sought to justify it should fail. I think it was an alternative allegation which does not prevent them showing that the court had decided the truth. If it did, it seems to me it ought to have been an answer on the appeal to the House of Lords that they had admitted a wrongful possession, and had claimed a possession only in virtue of a contract which could not avail them, and that therefore there was a wrongful act or a detention. At the time when the Vice-Chancellor tried the action it appears to me (I do not hesitate to say it, because one can say it without disrespect to the eminent counsel who have conducted the case) that by an error in judgment counsel did not address themselves to one of the real points in the action, which since has been seen, by the light of subsequent investigation to be important, namely, whether there was any wrongful act at all in respect of nine at least of the cargoes. They admitted the possession, justifying it only upon their title. The Vice-Chancellor found that they were in possession. It was not disputed. He said it was admitted, and he ordered an inquiry as to damages upon that footing. The matter came to this court, and though the order as to damages was in form appealed from, it was not in fact, because that portion of the appeal was abandoned during the argument. From this court they went to the House of Lords, and they still continued their policy of abandoning the appeal against that order for inquiry, and accordingly in the event the House of Lords did not disturb the portion of the judgment of Bacon, V.C., which they were not asked to disturb, and nobody perceiving the importance of the lapse, this strange result has followed, that the House of Lords have declared that there was no wrongful act done in taking possession under the order of the 30th April 1880, but have left undisturbed an order for an inquiry which proceeds upon the footing that there was detention of all the cargoes, an order the maintenance of which can only be explained in one of two ways, either that it was an oversight, or that there were other possible acts of detention in respect of all the cargoes over and above the mere taking possession under the order of the 30th April. But, as I said before, one thing is clear, that the House of Lords have declared that one class of acts done in respect of these ships was not a wrongful detention, namely, the taking possession under the order of the 30th April 1880.

Now, the parties went back under this inquiry. The chief clerk in his certificate has, in my opinion, fallen into error. The vice of his certificate appears to me to be this, that, although it is evident that it was necessary to discriminate between the various acts done with respect to these cargoes, because as to one class of acts the House of Lords has declared nothing to be wrongful in that particular, the chief clerk has lumped all the ships together and assessed the damages upon a footing which leaves it open at all events to the view, and in my opinion necessitates the view, that he has as regards the whole of the ships treated as a wrongful act that very matter which the House of Lords said was not wrongful. The vice of the certificate is, that it lumps the ships together. Can that be set right? Sir Horace Davey, in the first place protesting that he was not bound to argue the facts of the case, assumed for the purpose of his argument that there had been no tortious act in law at all; nevertheless he said there was nothing wrong in giving damages, because Lord Cairns' Act clothed the Court of Chancery with the jurisdiction, where no wrong had been done in law at all, nevertheless on a threat of injury which would give rise to the jurisdiction for injunction, to give damages in substitution for such injunction. I speak with perfect consciousness that I am only a proselyte at the gate in matters of equity, and what I have learned about it has been learned from wiser people than myself who sit with me; but I am still giving my opinion as I am entitled and bound to do. I am of opinion that the 2nd section of 20 & 21 Vict. c. 27, commonly called Lord Cairns' Act, did not clothe the Court of Chancery with such a jurisdiction. It is true the section applies in all cases in which the Court of Chancery has jurisdiction to entertain an application for an injunction, but the only weapon with which the court is armed by virtue of the section is to award damages to a party injured, which must, I think, mean damages where damages have arisen, and in a case where no damages have arisen in the ordinary sense of the term as known to lawyers, I am of opinion the court has no power to give damages. I should be alarmed if that were my opinion only; but I believe I am justified in saying that my learned brother Cotton, L.J. agrees with me in that, and I will leave my other learned brother to say whether he differs from me or not. But this I may say, as it was asserted by Sir Horace Davey—at least Sir Horace Davey seemed to put it forward as a proposition—that the practice in the Courts of Chancery had been in favour of his view. I have consulted others who are familiar with the practice among my colleagues, and I am told they are not aware of any such practice. I am specially informed by one who certainly can speak with authority on the point, that the view which I am now taking on this subject is the view taken by the late Master of the Rolls. Sir Horace Davey, however, went further and put forward a moral justification of the view. He said that these plaintiffs had been kept out of their property for many years, and that they ought to be compensated. The term "kept out of their property," seems to me to beg the question. If all that has been done is to threaten, and in consequence of a threat they have come to an arrangement that the cargoes shall be placed in the hands of the defendants to do their best with them, that threat and that consent order, although it may have been detrimental to the interests of the plaintiffs, is not a keeping out of possession which may give rise to damages under Lord Cairns' Act. The truth is, that the expression begs the question. They were kept out of a great portion of their property by reason of entering into the order of the 30th April 1880; that is to say, they kept themselves out of it. I regret very much that they were driven by a wrongful threat into consenting to that order, but it does not enable anyone to strain the law and to find under the heads of damages any acts which, as far as I know, there is no authority for treating as a source from which damages can flow. But then, if Lord Cairns' Act does not apply, is there any wrongful act which can be assigned as an explanation of the Vice-Chancellor's judgment? Sir Horace Davey protested against being compelled to discuss that question, and I do not propose to decide it, because I do not consider that we have the materials on this appeal, or certainly they have not been brought to our attention in argument in a way that enables one to be quite certain on the point. One thing I do myself think, and that is, that Bacon, V.C. only proceeded, so far as I read his written judgment, upon the assumption that there had been a possession taken, and that that possession could not be justified, and he assumed that that made an act of detention—a view which is, as regards a certain number of the cargoes, invalidated in my mind in law by the judgment of the House of Lords. There was the carriage of the guano across the Atlantic. The title of the plaintiffs began after it arrived, and the defendants were merely charterers of the vessels. There were directions given at the ports of call. I can conceive directions given as to a port of discharge which might amount to acts of trespass; but we have not got the facts here before us to enable us to say what was done in respect of the indication at the port of discharge, if any thing was done which could by any human imagination be construed as amounting to a wrongful act or an act of trespass. But I do not investigate the question as to what was done with respect to it, because I do not know that I can do so effectively. There may have been, and I believe there was with regard to one cargo, a wrongful act even after the order of the 30th April was agreed to, and in respect of any wrongful sale after the order I am not prepared to say that that might not be a source of damages under Lord Cairns' Act done before the inquiry as to damages; and it might be that the extension—if it be an extension—of the principle laid down in the case of Williams v. Peel River Land and Mineral Company, and acted upon by brother Fry, L.J. in the case which was cited of Fritz v. Hobson, and subsequently embodied, I believe, in an order under the Judicature Act, would apply to such a case. I leave that open. Finally, there is the possession under the order of the 30th April 1880; but I will not assume for this purpose that even that order justifies everything that was done as regards all the cargoes. I should require, before I came to that conclusion, to know exactly what was done with respect to the two which had been already landed, and whether it was possible, notwithstanding the expression of opinion of the House of Lords, that for the purposes of freight all the cargoes were to be taken as being in the same boat, still to differentiate the case of these two cargoes in respect of the acts done before the order of the 30th April 1880. I leave that still open.

I come back to this, that although the history of these cargoes differs, that although as regards a large number of them it is obvious that the possession was taken under the consent order, and was not wrongful according to the view of the House of Lords, the chief clerk has made no distinction between any of those cargoes, has lumped them together, has possibly, I say probably or certainly, proceeded upon the view that the taking possession under the order was itself an act of detention from which damages would flow, and in that view to my mind his certificate is bad. His certificate states that he takes the damages from the arrival of the cargoes upon land. Now how far is it true that he was driven by this order of inquiry to go this length? That order of inquiry directs that there shall be an investigation as to what damages have flowed from the detention of the eleven ships. Sir Horace Davey suggested that, if there had been no possible damages at all, the words "if any" ought to have been introduced after "damages;" and that the order ought to have run for an investigation as to the damages, if any, which flowed from the detention of any of the eleven cargoes. I think that is so. I think the stage at which this order was made indicates that the court assumed that there would be damages in respect of these cargoes; but I draw the line there, and I protest that it does not follow from that that the court declared that substantial damages must be given. No authority can be found for that proposition. It is untrue as regards the form of rules of inquiry with which I am acquainted. I will mention, for example, the case of bonds and the inquiry directed by statute with regard to them, and also the form of a writ of inquiry under the Judicature Act when a judgment is given by default. The court to my mind does not find that there are substantial damages. What is true is, that the court finds that there has been a wrong and assumes that there may be substantial damages, not that there must be. It is for the chief clerk to inquire, it seems to me, and I cannot myself understand why a chief clerk would not be justified under such an order in finding there were nominal damages only in respect of one or more or all of these ships. Suppose for a moment the case of a single one of these ships; suppose it was clear to demonstration that one of these ships had been inserted in the order by a mere mistake, that there had been no detention at all of the ship, and that the ship, so far from being taken possession of by the defendants, had been taken possession of by the plaintiffs, had been sold by them, and they had appropriated the profits. Is the chief clerk positively bound to give more than nominal damages in such a case? He may be constrained by the form of the order to assume that there is a detention, but he may look to see what the detention is in order that he may know what damages flow from it. To my mind it would be extraordinary indeed if a chief clerk was bound to look to find damages without knowing what the acts of detention were in respect of which he found them. He must look to see what the detention is in order to know whether the damages are too remote, and I think that, if it was clear that there had been no possible act of detention as to any one or more of these ships, I should feel myself no hesitation (but then, as I said before, I am only a proselyte at the gate) in saying that, upon tender of nominal damages in such a case, and payment of nominal damages all further proceedings on the inquiry might be stayed. But this is not really necessary, from my point of view, to decide. As I said, I consider the vice of the chief clerk's certificate is that he has lumped all these ships together. I am ready to assume that there may be in the case of all the ships some other acts of detention than those which lie upon the surface in respect of what was done under the order of the 30th April 1880. There may have been something done in the indication at the port of discharge, and there may have been something done in respect of the ships taken possession of whose cargoes were landed, and there may have been something wrongfully done in respect of the cargoes that were landed under the order of the 30th April 1880. All that is for the chief clerk to state. As soon as it is seen that by lumping the ships together he has done injustice, he ought to be called upon to state, as he has acted upon this view hitherto, what are the acts of detention in respect of each of these ships on which he relies, and what are the damages which he assesses in respect of them. To my mind therefore the right way of dealing with this case is to declare, in accordance with the opinion of the House of Lords, that no act of possession merely taken under the order of the 30th April is a wrongful act or gives right to any damages at all; refer back to the chief clerk to state with regard to these eleven ships what are the wrongful act or acts of detention in respect of which he finds damages, and what damages he finds in respect of them. I ought to say that that form of reference, if it was followed by the court, would leave it open to the chief clerk, as I understand it and as I intend it, to rectify the error into which he seems to have fallen (for no argument was addressed to us by Sir Horace Davey to prove that he had not fallen into it) as to the calculation of the dates from which the interest should run. There is a difficulty about costs. The costs of the inquiry are reserved. I think the costs of the appeal in this case ought to be borne by the respondents. As to the costs in the court below, in consequence of the tangle in which the case has been involved I should make no order, but should leave either party to bear those.

Fry, L.J.—In my judgment, the course pursued by the appellants has placed the court in a cruel difficulty, and I have never felt myself so much embarrassed as I have in this case. It appears to me that, whatever course this court takes, there is a danger that we are acting in some way at variance with the decision of the House of Lords. If we take one course, we seem to me to be going counter to the expressed opinion of the learned Lords; if we take the other, we seem to me to be reversing a portion of the decree which the House of Lords has thought fit to affirm. I will consider the case in the first place independently of the recent decision of the House of Lords, and I shall imagine myself to be filling the chair filled by Kay, J. as successor to Bacon, V.C., and as working out the judgment which the Vice-Chancellor pronounced. Of course, when the same judge works out the decree which he himself has pronounced, he probably knows without difficulty the meaning of that decree; but, if I were the successor of the judge who made the decree, the first inquiry I should address to myself would be, What is the meaning of the inquiry under which I am now proceeding? and I should hold myself precluded from considering the propriety of that inquiry, or from in any way attempting to evacuate that inquiry of its true and real meaning, or from in any way reviewing or reversing the decision of the learned judge who directed the inquiry. Now, what is the inquiry in the present case? It is couched in these terms: "An inquiry what damages have been sustained by the plaintiffs by reason of the detention by the defendant company of the cargoes of guano in question in this action." We know that the cargoes in question in the action were the eleven cargoes, and the inquiry, therefore, seems to me to affirm and judicially to determine certain things. It determines that there has been a detention by the defendant company of the eleven cargoes in question. It determines that that detention has been unlawful because it gives rise to damages, and it determines that those damages were substantial, because, in order to sustain such an inquiry, it is requisite that the damages should be substantial. From any investigation of the rightness of that decision I should feel myself precluded when working it out, and the only question open would seem to me to be, what is the quantum of damages? But then, outside of that, I must know and inquire what is the meaning of the detention of the eleven cargoes by the defendant company, so affirmed by the Vice-Chancellor in his judgment, and endeavour to ascertain the meaning of these words so used in the judgment by a reference to the pleadings, and also, if necessary, to the evidence and the presentation of the cases of both sides before the Vice-Chancellor. [His Lordship referred to the pleadings, and continued:] It appears to me that the case made by the defendants was shortly this: "We are in possession of the eleven cargoes, and our possession is rightful under the contract and the bills of lading." The plaintiffs, on the other hand, say, "You are in possession, and your possession is wrongful, because the property is in us." And in that state of things it appears to me that the Vice-Chancellor—whether rightly or wrongly I do not feel myself at liberty to inquire—determined that there was a detention of the eleven cargoes by the defendants, and that that detention was not only wrongful, but gave rise to damages. No doubt it is quite true of several of the cargoes, that the greater portion of them was received after the order of the 30th April 1880; but the view which the Vice-Chancellor appears to me to have entertained with regard to that order was this, that the defendants, by their wrongful acts on the 22nd, 26th, and I think the 29th April, several of which preceded the commencement of the action, had driven the plaintiffs into equity, and that the order of the 30th April 1880 was the natural result of the wrongful acts of the defendants. That, I think, is the meaning of the Vice-Chancellor's affirmation of the detention of the eleven cargoes, which he says gave rise to a claim of damages on the part of the plaintiffs against the defendants. Now, if the matter had stood merely on the judgment of the Vice-Chancellor, and upon the affirmation of it by this court, I should have felt little or no difficulty in the matter. But the matter went to the House of Lords, not upon appeal against that part of the judgment, because that was abandoned in this court, but against the decision of this court on the main question in the action, and also with regard to the expenses incurred in the landing and freight, and in dealing with that latter question, namely, the freight and landing charges, the learned Lords expressed their opinions in a way which I confess seems to me to be not consistent with the view of the Vice-Chancellor, and therefore great embarrassment is caused in acting on that view.

But then what did the learned Lords do? It appears from the shorthand-writer's notes that the learned Lord who presided on that occasion wrote down the order of the House which he proposed that the House should pronounce, and that having dealt with the two specific matters before the House, namely, what I may call the general question of title and the question of the freight and landing charges, he then dealt with the rest of the order of the Vice-Chancellor, and, as to that, affirmed the order of the Vice-Chancellor. Now there was hardly anything left in the order except this inquiry as to damages. It was by far the most important of the residual portions of the order, and that inquiry as to damages involving the affirmation of the detention of the whole eleven cargoes and the damages resulting from it the House of Lords thought fit to affirm. Knowing the care with which the business of that House is conducted, and the care with which we see this particular case was conducted by the learned Lords—because not only did Lord Watson write down the order he proposed to make, not only did he read it, but he invited the attention of the learned counsel to it, and gave them an opportunity of making any observations upon it—I say, having regard to that, I cannot believe that the affirmation of that inquiry, involving all that it does, was made per incuriam by the House; and therefore I am driven to conclude that my own view that the opinion of the learned Lords tended to evacuate that inquiry and to deny the detention cannot be the accurate one. It appears to me, therefore, that, inasmuch as the House of Lords have reaffirmed the necessity of the inquiry, and that I can give no meaning to the detention if the view which is suggested to have been taken by the House of Lords is the true one, I am bound to follow out this inquiry in the spirit and meaning in which it was directed by the Vice-Chancellor. It does not appear to me that it is competent, in working out an inquiry of that description not reversed by any court, to deprive it of all meaning by reviewing the circumstances under which it was made. And therefore I am not able to follow the view taken by my brother Bowen, L.J., who reviewing all the circumstances comes to the conclusion that we ought to treat it as an idle inquiry, and to deprive it, as it seems to me, of any force and meaning. It is quite true that he has suggested that there may have been some detention ultra and beyond that which was in evidence before the Vice-Chancellor; but it appears to me that the history of these cargoes had been threshed out by the time this matter was before the House of Lords. It is impossible to conceive that anything more can be known about them. The whole case was before the House of Lords when they affirmed this inquiry, and therefore I do not see my way to suppose that it is possible that there was any other construction to be put upon it, or that the House of Lords thought the inquiry to relate to any other detention which was not in issue nor in evidence, and which was really not the subject of consideration. That being so, I think we are bound to proceed as if the matter was in the first instance before the Vice-Chancellor. Now, what do I find that the appeal before us is? It is not an appeal directed to any particular cargo. It is not an appeal directed to any particular part of the inquiry, but it goes to the whole matter, and seeks to deprive the whole inquiry of any value. [His Lordship referred to the terms of the summons to vary the certificate, and continued:] That being so, I do not feel myself at liberty to condescend upon the details of the particular detentions of the particular cargoes in the way in which my learned brother thinks it open to him to do. I abstain from doing so, because I confess I am greatly apprehensive of two things. I am apprehensive of there being no finality in litigation if upon an inquiry the whole matter is to be gone into again. And, further, I am apprehensive that, if we entertain objections of which due notice has not been given by the summons, we shall often be led per incuriam into doing what would seem to us to be justice, but would really be injustice. I therefore feel constrained, though extremely embarrassed as to what is the true course to take, to concur in the view of Cotton, L.J., and think that this appeal must fail with the usual results. I have only one other observation to add. I entirely agree with what has been said by Bowen, L.J. on the subject of Lord Cairns' Act. I am clear that the statute often enables the court where a wrong has been done to give damages upon a different scale from what was done by the courts of common law, because it may give them in substitution for an injunction; but where there has been no wrong done, it appears to me that Lord Cairns' Act confers no power to give damages.

Cotton, L.J.—I agree with what has been said by Fry, L.J. as regards Lord Cairns' Act. I did not advert to it because I did not think it a matter which arose, taking my view of the case before us.

The Batavier. (a)

Collision — Inevitable accident — Costs — Special circumstances.

As a general rule a defendant relying upon and succeeding upon the defence of inevitable accident in a case of collision is entitled to his costs, but there may be exceptions to this rule as where, in addition to such defence, the defendant alleges facts inconsistent therewith and fails in establishing their truth.

This was an appeal from a decision of Butt, J. finding the full-rigged ship the Batavier to blame for a collision with the steamship New Pelton.

The collision occurred in the river Tyne about 5.30 p.m. on the 20th March 1889. The defendants counter-claimed.

The facts alleged by the plaintiffs were as follows: Shortly before 5.30 p.m. on the 20th March 1889 the New Pelton, a screw-steamship of 525 tons register, laden with a cargo of coal and bound on a voyage from the Tyne to London, was coming down the river to the south of mid-channel. There were passing showers of sleet and rain, the wind was blowing a gale from the N.E., and the tide was just turned high water. In those circumstances those on board the New Pelton observed a ship, which proved to be the Batavier, lying athwart the stream with her head to the northward and distant about a mile, bearing about one or two points on the port bow of the New Pelton. The two topsails and foresail of the Batavier were partly clewed up, but loose. Shortly after seeing her, the speed of the New Pelton was eased, and then reduced to slow. The Batavier was seen to be still lying athwart stream with her head towards the lower tier of the Commissioners' buoys, apparently for the purpose or in the act of making fast to one of them. She had two tugs ahead of her, with long scopes of hawser out which were between the said buoys and the spouts, and she had two other tugs fast, one on her port and the other on her starboard side, all apparently engaged in keeping her in the aforesaid position. With the Batavier lying as she then was there was ample room and all was clear for the New Pelton to pass to the southward of her. The New Pelton was accordingly kept going ahead slow, making about two to three miles an hour. When the New Pelton had approached to within about a hundred feet of the Batavier the latter was observed by those on board the New Pelton to be suddenly coming astern with her sails aback. The helm of the New Pelton was at once hard-a-ported and her engines stopped and reversed full speed astern, and the tugs were loudly hailed to tow the Batavier ahead, but the Batavier continued to come astern fast and with the round of her stern struck the New Pelton abaft the port fore rigging, doing her much damage.

The facts alleged by the defendants were as follows: Shortly before 5.30 p.m. on the 20th March 1889 the Batavier, a Dutch full-rigged ship of 1616 tons register, laden with a cargo of sugar, was in the Tyne in charge of a duly licensed pilot, having put in from stress of weather while in the course of a voyage from Java to Leith. The wind was blowing a violent gale from N.N.E., the weather was clear with occasional showers of rain, and the tide was the first of the ebb. The Batavier had been driven by the force of the gale almost into the Tyne Dock entrance, and was proceeding thence to the Commissioners' buoys on the north side to make fast there. All her sails had been taken in and made fast as far as possible. She had two tugs ahead of her, and one on each side of her, and was athwart the river just moving ahead. In these circumstances a steamship which proved to be the New Pelton was seen coming down the river in mid-channel about three-quarters of a mile distant on the port beam of the Batavier, and the Batavier went over to the said buoys, and was being made fast to one of the buoys, being held there by her tugs, but the New Pelton, instead of keeping clear of the Batavier, came on, and with her port side abreast the forerigging struck the stern of the Batavier.

The defendants denied that the Batavier ever came astern, and alleged that the collision was wholly caused by the negligence of the New Pelton in not keeping clear of the Batavier.

In paragraph 11 of the defence, the defendants alleged as follows:

In the alternative the defendants say that if the Batavier did come astern as alleged which they deny as aforesaid, she did not come astern so as to cause or contribute to the said collision, but that if the said collision was caused or contributed to thereby (which they also deny) the said coming astern was solely caused by the weather then prevailing, and the said collision, so far as the Batavier was concerned, was an inevitable accident but they say that so far as the New Pelton was concerned the said collision was caused or contributed to by those in charge of her in manner hereinbefore alleged.

Butt, J. held the Batavier solely to blame, on the ground that, when the New Pelton was approaching, the two tugs alongside the Batavier were ordered to ease their speed, and hence the Batavier came astern and caused the collision.

The defendants appealed.

The Court of Appeal allowed the appeal, and while holding that the Batavier did come astern, and that her coming astern was the cause of the collision, found that it was solely occasioned by the severity of the weather, and not by the negligence of those in charge of the Batavier, and that therefore the Batavier was not to blame.

Sir Walter Phillimore (with him J. P. Aspinall), for the appellants, asked for costs.

Barnes, Q.C. (with him L. Pyke), for the respondents, contrâ.

Lord Esher, M.R.—It is time that it should be laid down once for all in all cases, unless there are special circumstances, the party who wins gets his costs, and the party who loses pays the costs. Here, therefore, if the defendants had not so complicated the case, but had set up the defence of inevitable accident alone, they would have got their costs. But I think there are special circumstances in this case. From first to last the witnesses from the Batavier told a story which was outrageously false, and consequently the same story is pleaded in the defence. I cannot help thinking that such a false defence, persisted in from the beginning, may have had great effect upon the conduct of the plaintiffs, and that when they found the defendants relied upon such an impossible and improbable story they may have naturally concluded that their own story was right. Therefore, on account of the untruthful story of the defendants persisted in from beginning to end, I think the circumstances are such that the plaintiffs ought not to pay all the costs of the defendants. Each party must pay their own costs in the court below, but the appellants are to have the costs of the appeal.

Lindley and Lopes, L.JJ. concurred.

The Orchis. (a)

Mortgage — Co-owners—Arrest of ship—Master's claim—Priorities—Compulsion of law—Bristol Dock Act 1881—Harbours, Docks, and Piers Clauses Act 1847.

The arrest of a ship in an action in rem for a claim legally due from the owners of the ship, although there be no maritime lien, is a sufficient compulsion of law to entitle mortgagees of part of the shares in the ship paying off the claim in order to get possession to recover from the owners of the remaining shares the amount so paid.

The owner of 44/64th shares in the steamship O. mortgaged them to the plaintiffs. Subsequently the O. was arrested in the Admiralty Court at the suit of her master for disbursements. The mortgagor being insolvent, and the plaintiffs wishing to realise their security, paid the master's claim and the ship was released. The plaintiffs then took possession of the O. on behalf of themselves and the other co-owners, and it was thereupon arranged between the plaintiffs and the co-owners that the O. should be sold on behalf of all parties and this was eventually done. Whilst the plaintiffs had possession of the O. she was lying in the Bristol Dock, and they paid the necessary dock dues. In the event of the dock dues not being paid, the O. was liable to seizure and sale by the dock authorities under the Bristol Dock Act 1881, and the Harbours, Docks, and Piers Clauses Act 1847. In an action against the co-owners to recover the payments made by the plaintiffs:

Held, that, in the circumstances, there was an implied promise in law by the co-owners to pay back the plaintiffs all the money paid by them to release the ship; and that the defendants were also liable to pay their proportion of the dock dues, the payment thereof by the plaintiffs being necessarily made on behalf of all the owners.

This was an appeal by the defendants from a decision of Butt, J. in an action by Smith, Brothers, and Co., the mortgagees of 44/64th shares in the steamship Orchis, against certain of the owners of the said steamship.

The plaintiffs had been mortgagees of 44/64th shares in the ship, belonging to one Hornstedt, who had been the managing owner up to May 1886.

The defendants were Hornstedt and the owners of 16/64th shares. The owners of the remaining shares were not proceeded against, as they were not in a position to pay in the event of the plaintiffs getting judgment against them.

In 1886 the plaintiffs took possession of the ship, and then incurred the expenses in respect of which they now sought contribution from the defendants in the circumstances hereinafter stated.

The statement of claim, so far as is, material was as follows:

5. The plaintiffs became and were at all times material hereto the duly registered mortgagees of the defendant Claude A. Hornstedt's 44/64th shares in the said steamship, under two mortgages dated respectively the 14th Oct. 1882 of 30/64ths, and the 12th June 1884 of 14/64ths.

6. On or about the 14th May 1886 the defendants were jointly and severally liable to Lewis Alexis Leslie, the master of the said steamship, for coals and other necessary disbursements incurred while the said steamship was prosecuting a voyage for the joint benefit of the defendants, and amounting to the sum of 422*l.* 15*s.* 7*d.*, and the said master instituted in the Admiralty Division of this court an action in rem against the said steamship to recover the same, and the said ship was duly arrested in the said action, and the plaintiffs after and during such arrest having sought to take possession of the said steamship under the said mortgages in order to obtain the release of the said steamship, were compelled to pay and did pay the said sum of 422*l.* 15*s.* 7*d.* together with a further sum of 18*l.* 9*s.* 3*d.* for costs due to the plaintiff in the said action in order to obtain the release of the said steamship, and upon payment thereof the plaintiffs did obtain possession of the said steamship under their said mortgage.

7. The defendant Claude A. Hornstedt was at the time of arrest of the said ship and the said payment by the plaintiffs, and still continues, insolvent, and has not paid and cannot pay any portion of the said sum so expended by the plaintiffs as aforesaid.

8. After the plaintiffs took possession of the said steamship, and until the plaintiffs sold the 44/64th shares in the said steamship of which they were mortgagees, on the 18th June 1887 the said ship was in a dock at Bristol, and the plaintiffs during that period incurred for the owners of the said ship certain necessary and reasonable expenses amounting to 67*2l.* 11*s.* 1*d.* in and about payments for dock dues and for watching and caring for the said steamship and for other charges in and about the inspection and repair of the said ship, full particulars whereof have been given by the plaintiffs to the defendants.

9. The defendants are jointly and severally liable to indemnify the plaintiffs as to the payments referred to in paragraph 6 hereof, and to contribute in respect of their shares to the payments referred to in the 8th paragraph.

10. In the alternative the plaintiffs say that they are entitled to contribution as to the payments referred to in the said 6th paragraph as well as to those in the said 8th paragraph.

The defendant Hornstedt admitted liability.

The defence, so far as is material, was as follows:

2. The defendants deny that they were or that any of them was on the 14th May, or at any other time, jointly or severally or at all liable to Lewis Alexis Leslie for the sum of 422*l.* 15*s.* 7*d.* or any other sum. The plaintiffs were not compelled to pay the said sum of 422*l.* 15*s.* 7*d.* or any other sum or sums. If they paid anything (which the defendants do not admit), they paid it voluntarily, and not for or at the request of these defendants, or any of them.

3. The defendants do not admit any of the allegations contained in paragraphs 6, 7, 8, 9, and 10 of the statement of claim.

4. The defendants deny that the plaintiffs have at any time incurred any expenses for the owners of the said ship. If the plaintiffs did spend the said sum of 67*2l.* 11*s.* 1*d.*, or any other sum (which is not admitted), they did so voluntarily, and not for or at the request of these defendants, or any of them. They deny that the said expenses were necessary or reasonable, and that they were incurred for the purposes alleged.

5. The plaintiffs have never paid any sum or sums whatever for or at the request of these defendants, or any of them.

6. The defendant Claude Andrew Hornstedt had in his hands at the time of the arrest of the said ship, and of the alleged payments, moneys of the defendants sufficient to pay the said sums, and upon the accounts as between him and the defendants it was his duty to pay the said sums, and the same were payable by him, and not by these defendants.

7. The defendants further say, that they have since the 14th May 1886 been compelled to pay large sums of money in respect of liabilities necessarily incurred for the maintenance and repair and insurance of the said vessel.

8. The defendants claim that an account be taken of the payments and transactions hereinbefore mentioned, and that they may be allowed to set off in this action such amounts as may, upon the taking of such account, be found chargeable against the plaintiffs.

By order of the judge the issues of fact raised in the pleadings were referred to the registrar, who found as follows:

First. That the plaintiffs in this action did pay the sum of 422*l.* 15*s.* 7*d.*, and also the sum of 18*l.* 9*s.* 3*d.* costs, as pleaded in paragraph 6 of the statement of claim.

Secondly. That the plaintiffs did pay the sum of 67*2l.* 11*s.* 1*d.*, as pleaded in paragraph 8 of the said statement of claim, and we are of opinion that such payment was reasonable and necessary.

Thirdly. That the defendants since the 14th May 1886, and prior to the 11th July 1888, have paid various sums of money, amounting to 2193*l.* 3*s.* 10*d.*, for the maintenance, repair, and insurance of the said vessel, as pleaded in paragraph 7 of the defence, and in addition thereto have in the month of March last paid the further sum of 111*l.* 5*s.* 4*d.* for the same purposes, making a total sum of 2304*l.* 9*s.* 2*d.* paid in respect of liability incurred before the 14th May 1886. Against that sum they have to give credit for 452*l.*, the value as estimated by us of four shares, formerly belonging to the defendant Claude A. Hornstedt, and mortgaged by him to Earle's Shipbuilding Company, as security for their account against the ship, and which shares were subsequently transferred by the said building company to the defendants on their account being settled, thus leaving a balance of 1852*l.* 9*s.* 2*d.* which the defendants are entitled to bring into account.

Fourthly. That at the time of the arrest of the vessel on the 14th May 1886 the said C. A. Hornstedt had not money in his hands to the amount of 1324*l.* 17*s.* 6*d.*, or any other sum, as pleaded in paragraph 6 of the said defence; but on a balance of accounts to that date the defendants were in debt to the said C. A. Hornstedt on the ship's account to the amount of 845*l.*

It appeared that, during the time the Orchis was in the dock at Bristol, negotiations were going on between the plaintiffs and the defendants as to the sale of the ship, which eventually took place. The dock in question was the property of the Bristol Corporation, and the payment of the dock dues and rates were regulated by the following Acts of Parliament:

The Bristol Dock Act 1881, sect. 2, incorporates the Harbours, Docks, and Piers Clauses Act 1847; sect. 6 prescribes the fees payable for using the docks.

The Harbours, Docks, and Piers Clauses Act 1847:

Sect. 3. The following words and expressions in both this and the special Act and any Act incorporated therewith, shall have the meanings hereby assigned to them, unless there be something in the subject or context repugnant to such construction; (that is to say) . . . The word "rate" shall mean any rate or duty or other payment in the nature thereof, payable under the special Act.

Sect. 44. If the master of any vessel in respect of which any rate is payable to the undertakers, refuse or neglect to pay the same, or any part thereof, the collector of rates may, with such assistance as he may deem necessary, go on board of such vessel, and demand such rates, and on nonpayment thereof, or of any part thereof, take, distrain, or arrest, of his own authority, such vessel, and the tackle, apparel, and furniture belonging thereto, or any part thereof, and detain the matters so distrained or arrested until the rates are paid; and in case any of the said rates shall remain unpaid for the space of seven days next after any distress or arrestment so made, the said collector may cause the matters so distrained or arrested to be appraised by two or more sworn appraisers, and afterwards cause the matters distrained or arrested, or any part thereof, to be sold, and with the proceeds of such sale may satisfy the rates so unpaid, and the expenses of taking, keeping, appraising, and selling the matters so distrained or arrested, rendering the overplus (if any) to the master of such vessel upon demand.

There was a long correspondence between the parties, setting out the negotiations in regard to the sale of the ship, and it was contended, on behalf of the plaintiffs, that this correspondence authorised them to incur on behalf of all parties the expenses at Bristol.

Barnes, Q.C. and J. P. Aspinall for the plaintiffs.—The defendants are liable to pay the whole money paid by the plaintiffs to release the ship. The plaintiffs were entitled to possession of their shares, and the only way they could get it was by paying off the master's claim. The defendants were clearly liable for the master's claim, and in the circumstances the law implies a promise that the defendants will pay to the plaintiffs the money they have paid on their behalf:

Johnson v. Royal Mail Steam Packet Company, 17 L. T. Rep. N. S. 445; L. Rep. 3 C. P. 38; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 21;
Lamplough v. Braithwaite, Smith's Leading Cases, 8th edit. 151;
Edmunds v. Wallingford, 52 L. T.Rep. N. S. 720; 14 Q. B. Div. 811.

The defendants are also liable to pay their contributions towards the dock expenses. At the time they were incurred the plaintiffs had possession of the ship on behalf of themselves and the defendants, and such expenses were incurred with the authority and knowledge of the defendants.

Joseph Walton (with him French, Q.C.) for the defendants.—Both payments were made voluntarily by the plaintiffs, and they cannot look to the defendants for repayment. The plaintiffs were under no compulsion to release the ship, and did so merely to benefit themselves. The case of Johnson v. Royal Mail Steam Packet Company (ubi sup.) is not in point. In the present case the plaintiffs were only mortgagees of a part of the ship, and hence there is no privity between them and the defendants. Since the arrest of the Orchis by her master, it has been decided that masters' disbursements do not give a maritime lien (The Sara, 61 L. T. Rep. N. S. 26; 14 App. Cas. 209; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 413); and hence the mortgagees had a prior right to the master, and could have protected their shares from sale by intervening in this action.

Butt, J.—This is a suit by Messrs. Smith Bros. and Co., who are mortgagees of forty-four sixty-fourth shares of the ship Orchis, which were mortgaged to them by one Hornstedt, who was managing owner, against the defendants, who are owners of sixteen sixty-fourths. It appears that before the mortgagees entered into possession one Leslie, the master of the ship, had incurred a debt for disbursements, which together with the costs of suing for recovery amounted to 444*l.* 4*s.* 10*d.* To recover that money the master instituted proceedings in rem against the ship, and arrested her in this court. There she lay properly arrested by the master in the enforcement of his claim by virtue of the Act of Parliament, which gave him a right to proceed in rem. At that time it was supposed, upon the authority of certain decided cases, that a ship's master had a maritime lien for disbursements. But, by a decision of the House of Lords, subsequently given, it appears that that was an erroneous view of the law, and that the master never had any maritime lien at all for his disbursements, but only a claim against the ship which he had a right to enforce in rem, or rather a claim against the owners which he had a right to enforce against the ship in rem. I shall of course follow the law as laid down by the House of Lords, and I may add that I always had a strong impression that that was what the law ought to be. The ship, as I have said, being under arrest in this court, and the plaintiffs wishing to get possession of that to which they were entitled, paid off the master's claim and so discharged the ship. They did so without any express authority from the defendants in this suit, and they do not base their claim to reimbursement by the defendants on any express promise to pay, but on the promise which they maintain the law implies under these circumstances, that they have been compelled to pay a sum which the defendants were legally compellable to pay. To deal with the last part of their contention first: it is quite clear that the defendants were legally compellable to pay the 444*l.* 4*s.* 10*d.*, because it was a joint liability of theirs for disbursements made by their servant in an adventure in which they were jointly interested. But it is said, admitting that the defendants were legally compellable to pay this sum of 444*l.* 4*s.* 10*d.*, it is not accurate to say that the plaintiffs have been compelled to pay it. What is the position? The plaintiffs could not get possession of their shares or of the ship except by paying this sum. It is perfectly clear on authority that if a man is entitled to possession of a chattel, and he can only get possession of it by paying a debt which another is legally compellable to pay, and he does pay it, the law will imply a promise on the part of the other to repay what he disburses. But it is said, taking that to be the law, the facts of this case do not warrant the implied promise from the defendants to recoup the plaintiffs, because it is said that the plaintiffs were the mortgagees of forty-four sixty-fourth shares in the ship, and were not entitled to possession of the whole ship; and it is also said that they could have protected the forty-four sixty-fourth shares mortgaged to them from sale under process of the court by intervening and showing that they as mortgagees had a superior right or lien or claim to that of Leslie, the master. It is true they might have done so, but it would not have given them possession of the ship or their shares in the ship. What really was their right with reference to this ship? It is quite correct, as has been contended, to say they were not entitled to all, but only to their shares; but they were entitled to possession, jointly, it is true, with the others, of the whole sixty-four sixty-fourth shares, and they could not get that joint possession without paying off this debt of Leslie's. Their intervention as mortgagees and proof to the court that they had a superior claim to Leslie would not have given them possession. There would still have been a lien attaching to the other shares, and the court would not have taken its hands off the ship merely on its being shown that the plaintiffs were mortgagees of forty-four sixty-fourths. Therefore, in order to get what they were entitled to, viz. joint possession with the holders of shares other than Hornstedt's shares, they really were compelled to pay this sum of money. The law implies a promise to repay on the part of those owners who are legally compellable to pay, and on that promise the plaintiffs rely, and I hold that they are entitled to recover. Then it was said that, even so, the plaintiffs here ought only to recover so much of the 444*l.* 4*s.* 10*d.* as the defendants other than Hornstedt would be liable to pay, and that in equity at all events the present plaintiffs ought to bear Hornstedt's proportion of that sum. I do not agree to that proposition at all. One of the principal objects of having a mortgage security on land or chattels is to secure the performance of the mortgagor's promise to pay, or, in other words, to secure the mortgagor's inability to pay—to secure the mortgagee against the insolvency of the mortgagor. That is what has been done here. Why are those who have advanced money on the mortgage of these shares, because the mortgagor has been unable to perform his liability to them and to the ship, why are they to forfeit part of their security? I fail to see it, and therefore I hold that the plaintiffs are entitled to recover the whole of the sum of 444*l.* 4*s.* 10*d.* from the defendants. There is only one other matter in dispute, and that relates to the sum of 672*l.* 11*s.* 1*d.* expenses which the plaintiffs have incurred for disbursements on behalf of this ship since they got possession of her jointly with the others. Their possession was a joint possession. They have paid dock dues and other disbursements during that possession. They allege that the possession which they held was not for themselves alone, but for themselves and the tenants in common in this ship. If tenants in common and holding possession in the joint interest of all, the presumption would be, unless it is rebutted, that payments made in the course of holding the joint possession would be made with the consent of the other tenants in common, and they would be liable to reimburse their share. But I do not base my decision on that, because I think from a perusal of the correspondence it appears that the owners of the shares in this ship other than the shares which were mortgaged to the plaintiffs agreed that if the plaintiffs would go on disbursing the ship they would contribute their quota. I hold that to be the result of the correspondence, and therefore I hold that the plaintiffs establish their claim to this item of 672*l.* 11*s.* 1*d.* Of course when I say establish their claim, I mean that they have established their claim to a contribution from the defendants, the owners of sixteen sixty-fourth shares, and are entitled to judgment for sixteen sixty-fourths of that sum.

From this decision the defendants appealed.

French, Q.C. and Joseph Walton, for the defendants, in support of the appeal.—The plaintiffs paid both sums of money voluntarily and cannot recover them from the defendants. They were under no legal compulsion to pay such moneys. As to the master's claim, it was not entitled to priority; there was no maritime lien for it: (The Sara (ubi sup.) If so, the court could not have sold the plaintiffs' shares to satisfy the master's claim. The master merely had a right in rem against the property of those persons who were personally liable to him. The plaintiffs' proper remedy was to have intervened in the master's action. [Lord Esher, M.R.—But the court would not have released the ship until the master's action had been tried and determined and until then the plaintiffs would have been kept out of possession of their shares.]

The Heinrich Bjorn, 55 L. T. Rep. N. S. 66; 11 App. Cas. 270; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 1;
The Cella, 59 L. T. Rep. N. S. 125; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 293; 14 P. Div. 82;
Dickinson v. Kitchen, 8 E. & B. 789;
Edmunds v. Wallingford (ubi sup.).

Assuming the plaintiffs are entitled to recover in respect of the master's claim, they are only entitled to a proportion of it. As to the second item of claim, it is submitted that the correspondence shows it was a voluntary payment by the plaintiffs.

Barnes, Q.C. (with him J. P. Aspinall), for the plaintiffs, was called upon only as to the dock expenses, but upon his stating that the dock company had a lien for the same under the Bristol Dock Act 1881 and the Harbour, Docks, and Piers Clauses Act 1847, the contention on this head was not further pressed by the other side.

Lord Coleridge, C.J.—This action, although tried in the Probate, Divorce, and Admiralty Division, is in all its incidents and character a common law action. It is an action by the mortgagees of the ship Orchis to recover two sums of money, one being 441*l.* 4*s.* 10*d.*, the other being 672*l.* 11*s.* 1*d.*, the rights as to which stand upon somewhat different grounds. The action was tried by Butt, J., who decided in favour of the plaintiffs as to both sums. Different points have been raised as to the two sums, and somewhat different arguments advanced. The sum of 441*l.* 4*s.* 10*d.* was money paid by the plaintiffs in an action to release the ship of which they were mortgagees from the hands of the Admiralty Court, which had seized the ship at the suit of her master who had brought an action against her owners for disbursements which he had made for necessaries for the ship. Under the practice of the Admiralty Court he had a right, in order to enforce the payment of his claim, to seize the ship and take proceedings against her in rem. That was done, and the seizure was according to the practice of the Admiralty Court a legal seizure. In those circumstance the mortgagees, the plaintiffs in the present action, wanted to get possession of the ship; but they could not do so as long as the hand of the Admiralty Court was upon it, and therefore they paid 441*l.* 4*s.* 10*d.* for the release of the ship, which was in consequence released. At the time when the mortgagees paid the sum of 441*l.* 4*s.* 10*d.* to release the ship there was that amount of pressure which the law requires in order to found a claim for and enforce a repayment of a sum of money paid by one person for the benefit, or partly for the benefit, of another. That principle of law was laid down in the case of Edmunds v. Wallingford (ubi sup.), which was decided by this court in 1885. The decision is directly in point. It was decided by Sir James Hannen, Lindley, L.J., and myself, the judgment of the court being delivered by Lindley, L.J. I will read so far as is material two or three sentences from the judgment. He says: "In order to bring the present case within the general principle alluded to above it is necessary that the goods seized shall have been lawfully seized; and it was contended before us that the son's goods were in this case wrongfully seized and that the defendant therefore was not bound to indemnify them. But when it is said that the goods must be lawfully seized, all that is meant is that, as between the owner of the goods and the person seizing them, the latter shall have been entitled to take them. It is plain that the principle has no application except where the owner of the goods is in a position to say to the debtor that the seizure ought not to have taken place; it is because as between them the wrong goods have been seized that any question arises." Then the learned judge goes on to show what application that principle had to the facts of that particular case. There is the principle clearly enough stated. The result is this: where there is a seizure rightfully as between the parties (rightfully I mean in point of law), then the person who claims for money paid in extricating property of his own from being subject to what is a lawful seizure, if in extricating that property he pays money for the benefit of somebody else, he has a remedy over to recover that from somebody else. The principle laid down in Edmunds v. Wallingford is directly applicable to the present case. The process of the Admiralty Court was properly applied to the seizure of the ship; the payment of the 441*l.* 4*s.* 10*d.* was necessary to obtain the release of the ship, and therefore it follows that those who paid it can recover it from the defendants.

The 672*l.* 11*s.* 1*d.* stands upon a somewhat different footing. It was argued by counsel for the defendants that there was no liability on their part to pay that sum, because they had never agreed to the ship being kept in the dock, and that the ship remained in the dock simply by the orders and on the responsibility of the plaintiffs. They argue that the plaintiffs must pay that sum of money, and that they have no remedy against the defendants, who had not been parties to the payments, and had not agreed to the course of conduct out of which the necessity for those payments arose. I confess I should have thought from the correspondence between the parties, quite apart from Mr. Barnes' argument, that there was great reason for holding the defendants liable. The substance of the transaction was this: Here is a ship which the plaintiffs are anxious to sell. The plaintiffs only own a portion of the whole shares. The defendants own sixteen sixty-fourth shares. The plaintiffs say, "We shall be glad to sell, but no doubt selling the whole ship will be a much better thing for all of us. We, unless you concur, can only sell our forty-four sixty-fourth shares. Will you agree to sell her as a whole?" The answer in substance is, "Yes, we will agree." I should have said that in those circumstances, without any more evidence, any man of business would know that it must take some time to carry the negotiations attending the sale into effect, and that the parties must be taken to have agreed to the incidental expenses. They were men of business, and knew perfectly well that the ship could not be sold without certain expenses being incurred. I quite admit that letters are not always clear; but assume they are not, and assume there was no specific and definite consent to the payment of the incidental expenses, Mr. Barnes has pointed out that by the Bristol Dock Act 1881, and the Harbours, Docks, and Piers Clauses Act incorporated therewith, the Bristol Dock owners had a lien upon this ship in respect of her use of their dock; and I understand Mr. Barnes to say that they had a right to sell the ship to pay themselves their dock dues. I should have said that the defendants, as men of business and co-owners in this ship, must have perfectly well known the state of affairs at Bristol, and what were the powers of the dock owners. They having that knowledge, and having arranged that the ship should lie there for the purpose of being sold, must be taken to have agreed to bear the incidental expenses which they knew would be incurred. More than that, they practically placed this ship in the dock, and did not take any steps to take her out. Therefore, the dock dues were the direct and immediate result of the act of their agent. I therefore think that this appeal must be dismissed, and the judgment of Butt, J. affirmed.

Lord Esher, M.R.—The first point is of some general importance, but the second point is a mere question of considering the correspondence and what passed between the parties. This is really a purely common law action, being an action for money paid by the plaintiffs on behalf of the defendants, there being an implied promise to repay it. Before the Judicature Act the action could not have been brought in the Admiralty Court, but must have been tried at common law. The only reason that it is necessary to consider Admiralty procedure is to see whether that pressure which must exist in order to found an implied promise to pay exists in this case. The plaintiffs were mortgagees of forty-four sixty-fourth shares in this ship, and the defendants owners of sixteen sixty-fourth shares. The captain was employed by all the owners, by those who had mortgaged their shares and those who had not. They were not merely co-owners, but also partners in the adventure. The mortgagees, the plaintiffs in this case, were not the employers of the captain. He was not their captain, and they were not liable to him. The captain made the disbursements for the benefit of the ship; he acted for the persons who employed him. What were his rights according to Admiralty law? They were, in the event of his not being paid for the disbursements, to have a warrant from the Admiralty Court to seize the ship. The effect of that, according to Admiralty law, is that the ship from the time of her arrest is held as security for the captain's claim in the event of his establishing it. The seizure of a ship by the Admiralty Court in an action in rem is a good seizure against all the world. Her seizure was, according to Admiralty law, good as against the mortgagees, although they owed the captain nothing. What in point of fact were the consequences of such a seizure by Admiralty law against these mortgagees? The mortgagees had acquired the right under their mortgage of a joint possession of the ship, but by reason of Admiralty law the Admiralty Court could step in and prevent the mortgagees exercising that right. They could not acquire joint possession of the ship without an order of the Admiralty Court, and that order could not be made, because the Admiralty Court would not take off its hand until the suit between the captain and those owners of the ship who had employed him was determined, and until his claim was paid. If his claim was paid or bail put in the ship would be released. But if the ship was released what would be the position of affairs? Why, the mortgagees and co-owners would be entitled to joint possession, and if either of them took possession, that would not only be for themselves but for others. Now the mortgagees desired to have possession; they desired to exercise that right which, but for the Admiralty Court, they would be entitled to do. They had good reasons for wishing to do so, and it was in many ways their interest to do so. How came the law to prevent them exercising their rights? Solely for the benefit of the defendants. They were liable, and the Admiralty Court had the right to seize the ship in consequence of their default. The debt was due from the defendants to the captain, and by reason of the defendants' default the law was put into effect. The law seized the property in which the plaintiffs had an interest, and to which in ordinary course they were entitled to immediate possession. In those circumstances, in order to get immediate possession, they pay according to the law. The case is within the decision of Edmunds v. Wallingford (ubi sup.). It is within the rule that, if by reason of the default of one person the property of another becomes subject to seizure by the law, and the person whose property is thus seized pays the debt, the law implies a promise from the one whose debt is paid to repay it to the person who paid it. A more just principle of law I cannot conceive. Were it not the law, what would be the consequence? Why this, that the debt of a debtor would be paid by another man not liable to pay it, and that the debtor would get the use of his property without paying a penny. I therefore have no hesitation in saying that I think the judge below was perfectly right upon this point.

As to the other point I agree with what has already been said. Having regard to the correspondence and the other evidence, I have no doubt but that the defendants, whether they expressly stated it or not, did agree with the plaintiffs that the ship should be kept so as to be sold partly for their own benefit and partly for the plaintiffs' benefit, and I therefore think that the defendants ought to pay their share of the expenses of the ship being kept in dock. I think the decision of Butt, J. was correct, and that this appeal should be dismissed.

Fry, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The pressure upon the plaintiffs arose from the right of the Admiralty Court to seize the entire vessel until the rights of the parties to the action before it were ascertained. It was argued that the shares of the plaintiffs in this vessel could not be made responsible to satisfy the master's claim. That may be so; but, inasmuch as according to the practice of the Admiralty Court the whole vessel was seized and would in ordinary course be detained till the rights of the parties were ascertained, the plaintiffs were put to that kind of inconvenience or pressure which they might reasonably try to escape by paying the claim against the vessel. As to the second point, I concur in the conclusion of the court upon the ground that the defendants were the principals of the plaintiffs, who were in the position of managing owners and as such had placed this vessel in the dock, and were therefore liable to pay the incidental expenses.

The London Steamship Insurance Association v. The Grampian Steamship Company. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION.

Marine insurance—Mutual insurance for protection—Ordinary running-down clause—Collision—Assured's ship in equal fault—Non-liability of insurers.

The defendants insured their ship in the "protecting class" of the plaintiff association, a limited mutual marine insurance association, to indemnify them against any loss or damage to any other vessel not covered by the usual Lloyd's policy, with the running-down clause attached. The defendants' ship came into collision with another ship, and caused and suffered damage; both ships were to blame. The defendants' ship was fully insured by policies in the usual form of Lloyd's policy with the running-down clause attached. It was admitted that the damage suffered by the defendants' ship exceeded that inflicted by her on the other ship, and that the owners of the other ship had paid the defendants a sum equal to the difference between half of the amount of the damage sustained by their ship and half of the damage sustained by the defendants' ship. The plaintiffs brought their action to recover a sum of money in the hands of the defendants, which sum the defendants claimed to be entitled to retain as an indemnity in respect of the proportion of the damage to the colliding ship which had been taken into account in adjusting the amount to be paid by the other ship, and which proportional sum was not covered by the ordinary running-down clause in their policies.

Held, that the true principle for adjusting the loss from collision in such a case was that of a single liability and not cross-liabilities, and that, as the defendants had not been called upon to contribute anything in respect of the damage done to the other vessel, they were not entitled to call upon the plaintiffs to indemnify them in respect of a loss or damage which they had not sustained.

This was an appeal from the judgment of the Queen's Bench Division (Mathew and Wills, JJ.) on a special case reported (61 L. T. Rep. N. S. 774; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 452; 24 Q. B. Div. 32).

(a) Reported by E. Manley Smith, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The special case is given at length in the report of the case in the court below, but more shortly the facts are as follows: The plaintiffs were a limited mutual marine insurance association composed of several different classes. The defendants were owners of a steamship called the Balnacraig, which they entered in class 5, called "The Protecting," of the plaintiff association. By rule 6, sub-sect. (b) of that class, the plaintiffs undertook to indemnify the owners against "loss or damage to any other vessel . . . so far as such loss or damage was not covered by the usual form of Lloyd's policies with the clause commonly known as the 'Running-down Clause' attached." That clause is "that if the ship hereby insured shall come into collision with any other ship or vessel, and the assured shall in consequence thereof become liable to pay and shall pay any sum or sums not exceeding the value of the said vessel hereby insured, we the assurers will severally pay the assured such proportion of three-fourths of the sum so paid as our respective subscriptions thereto bear to the value of the ship." By rule 7 of class 5, in case any member of the class should, under rule 6, "become liable for and be required to pay any claim or demand," such member should be entitled to recover, and the members should contribute to satisfy and make good the amount of such claim or demand. The Balnacraig came into collision with another ship the Karo, both ships being to blame; but the damage sustained by the Balnacraig largely exceeded that sustained by the Karo. The action was brought to recover a debt of 51*l*. due by the defendants to the plaintiffs, and the defendants desired to set off a like amount as due to them in respect of the damage suffered in the collision between the Balnacraig and the Karo. It was admitted that if there had been cross actions between the owners of the two ships, the decree which would have been pronounced by the Admiralty division would have been that the owners of each ship should pay half the damage suffered by the other ship, and as the Balnacraig suffered the greater damage the monition that would have issued from the Admiralty division would have been that the owners of the Karo should pay the defendants a sum equal to the difference between half the amount of the damage sustained by the Karo and half the amount of the damage sustained by the Balnacraig. The owners of the Karo had in fact paid this sum.

The Queen's Bench Division gave judgment for the plaintiffs.

The defendants appealed.

Gorell Barnes, Q.C. (Arthur Russell with him) for the defendants.—The question is whether the collision resulted in one liability of the owners of the Karo to the owners of the Balnacraig, or in two cross liabilities:

Chapman v. The Royal Netherlands Steam Navigation Company, 40 L. T. Rep. N. S. 433; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 107; 4 Prob. Div. 157.

The question here is between the owners and the insurers, not between the owners of the two colliding vessels which distinguishes this case from:

The Stoomvaart Maatschappy Nederland v. The Peninsular and Oriental Steam Navigation Company (The Khedive) 47 L. T. Rep. N. S. 198; 7 App. Cas. 795; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 567.

Cohen, Q.C. (B. A. Cohen with him) for the plaintiffs.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—The question in this case is as to the construction and meaning of the running-down clause of a policy. The case is decided by the decision of the House of Lords in The Khedive (ubi sup.), which it is true did not relate to a policy of insurance, but in which it was held that where two ships come into collision, both being to blame, there is, according to Admiralty law, only one liability, not two liabilities. If the damage to one ship is equal to the damage to the other, the liability is cancelled, and there is then none; but if the damage to one ship is less than the damage to the other, the owners of one ship will, under a monition from the Court of Admiralty, pay the owners of the other half the difference between the damages to the two ships. There is only one liability and one compulsory payment. It is the rule after discovering the amount of damage suffered by the two ships to divide the difference by a simple sum in arithmetic, and, as a result, to decide upon the amount of the one liability. That being so, it is plain that there is nothing here to which the words of the running-down clause can attach. The clause does not apply to damage done to the Balnacraig, but refers to the sums which the assured might become liable to pay, and should pay, to the owners of another ship with which their ship might have had a collission. The owners of the Balnacraig had not become liable to pay anything to the owners of the other ship, because the Balnacraig had suffered greater damage than the Karo. Therefore I think the judgment of the court below was correct, and this appeal should be dismissed.

FRY, L.J.—I agree. In this case it is suggested that the owners of the Balnacraig became liable to a claim or demand under rule 7. This contention is the very opposite of what was laid down in the case of The Khedive (ubi sup.), in which it was determined that in case of a collision, both ships being to blame, there was only one liability. The appellants are trying to make out that there were two liabilities in such a case, but they never became liable for any claim or demand. They cannot be entitled to recover in respect of their insurance with the plaintiffs. Therefore I think the appeal must be dismissed.

LOPES, L.J. concurred. Appeal dismissed.

Davies v. McVeagh (41 L. T. Rep. N. S. 308; 4 Ex. Div. 265; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 149) followed.

THIS was a claim by the owners of the steamship Carisbrook for demurrage against the consignees of a cargo of coals, who were the endorsees of the bill of lading of the cargo.

By the charter-party the Carisbrook was to load a cargo of coals at Glasgow, and proceed therewith to Odessa, and there deliver the said cargo, the time for loading and unloading to commence from the time the steamer was ready. On the ship's arrival at Odessa, notice was given that she would be ready to discharge next day, but, in consequence of her not being able to get her turn at the quay for some thirty-two hours after she was ready, her owners sued the holders of the bill of lading for demurrage in respect of such delay.

By agreement between the parties the following facts were agreed to for the trial:

1. That the s.s. Carisbrook was loaded by Messrs. Lietke and Co. at Glasgow with 1855 tons of coal, pursuant to a charter-party dated the 11th Oct., a copy of which is annexed hereto.

2. That the master by his agents signed a bill of lading for the said cargo of coals.

3. That the said bill of lading of the said cargo was duly indorsed to the defendants, to whom the property in the coals passed by reason of such indorsement..

4. That due notice of the vessel having passed Constantinople was despatched on the 14th Nov. 1888, and received by the defendants or their agents at Odessa in due course.

5. That the Carisbrook arrived at Odessa, laden with the said cargo, at 9.15 a.m. on Friday, the 16th Oct., and came to anchor within the Mole, but not in any usual discharging berth, and that at noon due notice of the ship's readiness to discharge cargo was given to the defendants.

6. That the ship was ordered by the defendants to proceed alongside the wharf or quay to discharge (where she afterwards did discharge). The said wharf or quay was the usual place for the discharge of coal cargoes at Odessa.

7. That at 11 a.m. on the 20th Nov. the Carisbrook got alongside the said quay. It was impossible to get there earlier, as she had to wait her turn before the harbour officials permitted her to go to the quay. That the defendants knew when they gave such orders that all the berths of the said quay were occupied, but there was no other place of discharge for coal cargoes at Odessa, and there were no lighters available.

8. That the cargo was all discharged at 3.30 p.m. on Sunday, the 25th Nov. 1888.

The charter-party, so far as is material, was as follows:

It is this day mutually agreed . . . that the said steamer . . . shall . . . proceed to a customary loading berth as ordered at Glasgow (General Terminus) and there load coals, . . . and being so loaded shall therewith proceed to Odessa, or so near thereunto as she may safely get, and deliver the same to the said freighters or assigns alongside any safe wharf, store, craft, steamer, depôt, ship, or arsenal, as ordered by receiver. . . . Cargo is to be discharged at the average rate of not less than 300 tons per working day, Sundays and holidays excepted, and ten days on demurrage over and above the said lay days at 16*s.* 8*d.* per hour, except in cases of strike, lock-outs, colliery holidays, strikes at mines where steamer is booked, detention by railway, stoppage of trains, accidents to machinery, or any other causes beyond the control of the charterers or receivers, or their respective agents, delaying the due loading and unloading. Time for loading and unloading to commence from the time the steamer is ready and intimation has been given in writing.

The bill of lading incorporated the conditions in the charter-party.

L. E. Pyke, for the defendants, was called on.—The defendants are not liable. By the terms of the charter-party the lay days were not to commence until the ship was alongside the quay. There was no default on the part of the defendants. They were not answerable for the fact that the Carisbrook had to wait before she could be discharged. Although the ship had arrived at Odessa, she was not an arrived ship within the meaning of the charter-party till she was alongside the quay in the usual discharging place:

The decision in Murphy v. Coffin (ubi sup.) is in point, and shows Davies v. McVeagh (ubi sup.) has no application to this case.

Robson, for the plaintiffs, was not called on.

BUTT, J.—I have no hesitation in this case in deciding that the charterer is liable for the demurrage claimed. The ship arrives at Odessa, and there is no doubt that she was ready to deliver her cargo, if not at the exact spot where she was, yet at any place where she might have properly been unloaded by lighters within the port of Odessa. The charterer instead of doing as he might have done, and arranging to unload the cargo into lighters, chooses to exercise the option which he has of ordering her to a quay which was crowded, and to which she consequently could not get. He has a perfect right to do so if he chooses, but under the terms of the charter-party he has to pay for exercising that option. I think the principle is correctly and properly laid down in Davies v. McVeagh (ubi sup.), first of all by the then Brett, J., and on appeal by several distinguished judges; and I must add that the authority of that case is, to my mind, quite in accord with previous decisions. I am asked on the authority of Murphy v. Coffin (ubi sup.), a decision of the Divisional Court, to treat the conclusions laid down in Davies v. McVeagh (ubi sup.) as of no value. The learned judges who decided the case of Murphy v. Coffin (ubi sup.) do not say that the case of Davies v. McVeagh (ubi sup.) does not apply; but they say boldly they think it is a wrong decision, because it is, they say, inconsistent with other cases, and because they think that some facts in the case were not properly brought before the attention of the Court of Appeal. With all deference to the Divisional Court, I should be bound to prefer the judgment of the Court of Appeal to theirs, even if I had no opinion in the matter; but I have a strong opinion that the Court of Appeal knew perfectly what it was about when it decided the case of Davies v. McVeagh. I give my judgment for the plaintiffs.

THE HERMOD. (a)

Collision—Lights—Ship at anchor—River Mersey—Merchant Shipping Act 1873 (36 & 37 Vict. c. 85), s. 17—Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 63), s. 32.

In considering whether a breach of the Regulations for preventing Collisions could possibly have contributed to a collision, the court must take into consideration the whole of the evidence even where there is a conflict, subject to the qualification that the onus of proof lies on those infringing the Regulations; and if upon such evidence the court comes to the conclusion that the breach could not possibly have contributed to the collision, the ship committing it is not to be deemed to blame in respect thereof

The steamship H. at night ran into the barque E. at anchor in the river Mersey. By Order in Council of the 5th Jan. 1881, every vessel when at anchor in the river Mersey shall carry two white lights, the after light being carried double the height of the foremost light. The E. exhibited two anchor lights both of which were about twenty feet above the deck. It was admitted by the defendants that they only saw the after light.

Held, that the H. was to blame for a bad look out, and the E. to blame for a breach of the regulation, it not being shown that in the circumstances of the case the breach could not have contributed to the collision.

The Duke of Buccleuch (6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 471; 15 P. Div. 86; 62 L. T. Rep. N. S. 94) considered.

THIS was an action in rem by the owners of the Norwegian barque Ebenezer and others against the owners of the Danish steamship Hermod, to recover damages occasioned by a collision between these two vessels.

The collision occurred in the river Mersey on the 13th Feb. 1890.

The facts alleged by the plaintiffs were as follows: Shortly before 4.45 a.m. on the 13th Feb. 1890 the Ebenezer, a barque of 577 tons register, manned with a crew of eleven hands all told, was, whilst on a voyage from Liverpool to Buenos Ayres, laden with a cargo of coals, at anchor in the Mersey to the westward of mid-river, off Laird's Yard. The wind was a moderate breeze from about S.S.E., and the weather was fine, clear, and moonlight. The Ebenezer was heading from S. to S.S.E., and she had the regulation lights for a vessel at anchor in the Mersey, duly exhibited and burning brightly. In these circumstances those on board the Ebenezer observed the masthead red and green lights of a steamship which proved to be the Hermod, from a quarter to half a mile distant, and bearing about seven points on the port bow. The Hermod came on, taking no measures to keep out of the way, and although loudly hailed by those on board the Ebenezer, she with her stem struck the port side of the Ebenezer, causing her shortly afterwards to sink.

The facts alleged by the defendants were as follows: Shortly before 4.55 a.m., on the 13th Feb., the Hermod, a steamship of 743 tons register, manned by a crew of twenty-two hands all told, and laden with a general cargo, was proceeding down the river Mersey, heading about N., in charge of a duly licensed pilot, in the course of a voyage from Liverpool to Gothenburg. In these circumstances those on board the Hermod observed the bright light of a vessel which afterwards proved to be the Ebenezer, distant from three to four ships lengths, and nearly ahead, but a little on the port bow, withal. As only a single bright light was visible at this time, the pilot of the Hermod, believing it to be the stern light of a vessel going down the river, hard-a-starboarded the helm of the Hermod. But immediately after a second bright light at about the same height as, or rather lower than the first bright light came into view, a little on the starboard bow of the Hermod. The engines of the Hermod were at once reversed full speed, but, before her headway could be stopped, she with her stem struck the port side of the Ebenezer about amidship.

The defendants charged the plaintiffs with having failed to carry their anchor lights as required by rule 4 of the Rules for Preventing Collisions in the river Mersey. They also alleged that at the time in question, the Hermod was in charge of a pilot by compulsion of law, and that if there was any negligence attributable to the navigation of the Hermod, such negligence was solely that of the pilot.

According to the evidence of a diver called on behalf of the defendants, the forward anchor light was twenty-two feet above the main deck, and the after light seventeen feet six inches from the poop deck, which was about three feet six inches above the main deck, the result of his evidence (which was accepted as true by the court) being that the lights were within about a foot exhibited at the same height.

It appeared that the light first seen by those on board the Hermod was the after light, and that they did not see the forward light either until the collision, or at a time when the collision was inevitable.

The regulation in question as to lights is as follows:

> Every vessel when at anchor in the river Mersey, shall carry two white lights in globular lanterns of not less than eight inches in diameter, and so constructed as to show a clear uniform and unbroken light visible all round the horizon for at least one mile; one of which lights shall be placed at a height not exceeding twenty feet above the hull on the forestay, or otherwise near the bow where it may best be seen, and the other at the main or mizen peak, or on the boom topping light, or other position near the stern, at double the height of the bow light before mentioned.

(a) Reported by J. P. ASPINALL and BUTLER ASPINALL, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

This regulation was made under sect. 32 of the Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 63).

Sir Walter Phillimore (with him J. P. Aspinall) for the plaintiffs.—The Hermod is alone to blame. The Ebenezer was exhibiting two anchor lights, which ought to have been seen in sufficient time by those on board the Hermod to have enabled them to avoid the Ebenezer. Even assuming the Ebenezer to have infringed the strict letter of the regulations as to lights, the infringement was not of such a character as to make her owners liable, under sect. 17 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1873. Those on the Hermod, in consequence of bad look-out, admittedly never saw the foremost light, and therefore the fact whether the after light was double the height, became immaterial. It is submitted that, in the circumstances of this case the infringement of the regulation could not possibly have contributed to the collision:

The Duke of Buccleuch, 62 L. T. Rep. N. S. 94; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 471; 15 P. Div 86;
The Fanny M. Carvill, 32 L. T. Rep. N. S. 646; 2 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 565; 13 App. Cas. 455, n.

Barnes, Q.C. (with him Joseph Walton) for the defendants.—The Ebenezer is alone to blame. She clearly committed a breach of the regulations which may have contributed to the collision, and therefore, on the proper construction of sect. 17 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1873, her owners are liable. The after light being carried only twenty feet above the deck must have been many feet less than double the height at which at its lowest the foremost light could be carried consistently with the regulation. To say that in the circumstances of this case the breach of the regulation could not possibly have contributed to the collision is to give no effect to the Act of Parliament at all, and render it practically nugatory.

Butt, J.—This action arises out of a night collision in the river Mersey between the barque Ebenezer and the steamship Hermod. The barque was at anchor, and had two anchor lights, one forward and the other aft, both of them burning brightly. It is perfectly clear that neither the pilot nor the look-out on the Hermod perceived the barque's lights till they were close upon her, and I think that the prime cause of this collision was the defective look-out on board the steamer. The defence of compulsory pilotage has been pleaded by the defendants, but it necessarily fails, inasmuch as the defective look-out was not the fault of the pilot alone, but was a fault shared by the officers and crew of the ship. The owners of the Hermod are therefore liable. Upon that part of the case we have no doubt.

But a far more difficult question arises as to whether the Ebenezer is also in fault. It is said that she must be held to blame for improperly placing her lights, or rather the after light. Now there were two lights as prescribed, one forward, the other aft, but it appears from the evidence that they were somewhere about twenty feet above the deck, and that at the outside there was not more than three or four feet difference between them, if there was so much. There has been some conflict of evidence on this point, but the clear conclusion to which I come as to the relative heights of these lights is that which I have stated. On this point I accept the evidence of Lawson the diver. His evidence is very precise. He found by measurement that the forward light was fixed twenty-two feet above the main deck, and the after light seventeen feet six inches from the poop deck which was about three feet six inches above the main deck. It has been suggested for various reasons that he may have been mistaken in his measurements. It appears to me that that man's evidence is trustworthy. I know there is evidence to the contrary, but there is considerable corroboration of the diver's evidence in the evidence called on behalf of the plaintiffs. I do not think a single witness has ventured to say that the after light was being carried at double the height of the forward light. I know certain witnesses have said that the after light was some few feet higher than the other, but no one has gone further than that. The evidence has brought me to the clear conclusion that there has been a manifest infringement of the regulations. It was suggested by Sir Walter Phillimore that inasmuch as those on board the steamer did not see the foremost light before the collision, it ought not to be taken that the after light should have been twice eighteen or twenty feet above the level of the deck. The suggestion is this: the Ebenezer was not bound to carry the foremost light so high as eighteen or twenty feet above the deck, and, therefore, the people on board the Hermod not having seen the foremost light, it is argued that there was no breach of the regulations. I have considered the suggestion, but I think it is clear that the after light, carried at the height it was, was fully ten feet less than double the height at which at its lowest the foremost light could have been carried consistently with the regulations. I therefore think there was a breach of the regulations, for a departure from which, to use the language of the Act of Parliament, there was no necessity. The regulation in question is as follows: "Instead of the light prescribed by art. 8 of the said regulations every vessel when at anchor in the river Mersey shall carry two white lights in globular lanterns of not less than eight inches in diameter, and so constructed as to show a clear, uniform, and unbroken light visible all round the horizon for at least one mile; one of which lights shall be placed at a height not exceeding twenty feet above the hull on the forestay, or otherwise near the bow, where it may best be seen; and the other at the main or mizen peak, or on the boom topping lift, or other position near the stern at double the height of the bow light before mentioned." The regulation is made under one of the Merchant Shipping Acts, and by sect. 17 of the Act of 1873, "If in any case of collision it is proved to the court before which the case is tried that any of the Regulations for Preventing collision, contained in or made under the Merchant Shipping Acts 1854 to 1873 has been infringed, the ship by which such regulation has been infringed shall be deemed to be in default, unless it is shown to the satisfaction of the court that the circumstances of the case made a departure from the regulation necessary." If the section is applicable in the circumstances of the present case, then the Ebenezer must be held to blame. The case of The Fanny M. Carvill (ubi sup.), decides that this enactment only applies where the infringement of the statutory regulation is one which, by possibility, might have contributed to the collision. The enactment in question is based on broad grounds of public policy, and ought therefore to be strictly enforced. Until lately I had considered that in cases of clear infringement of the regulations unless the facts—either admitted or established beyond the reach of controversy—show that the infringement could not possibly have conduced to the collision, the ship unnecessarily infringing it must be held to be in fault. In other words that the object of the enactment was to preclude the court from entering into the region of disputed facts, or of evidence of facts and circumstances, which, from the nature of the case would probably be changing each moment with the altered position of the ships coming into collision. I acted on that view in The Duke of Buccleugh (ubi sup.). The Court of Appeal, however, held that that was taking too narrow a view of the judgment of the Privy Council in the case of The Fanny M. Carvill (ubi sup.); that in such cases the court ought to go into the evidence, and, if satisfied on the balance of that evidence that the state of things was such that the infringement of the regulation could not have conduced to the collision, should hold that such infringement would not entail the consequences provided by the Act of Parliament. That is what I understand the judgment of the Court of Appeal in The Duke of Buccleugh (ubi sup.) to be. It is true that in that case there was no conflict of evidence as to the material facts. There could be no such conflict because the Duke of Buccleugh went down immediately after the collision, and every one on board her perished. The judgment of the Court of Appeal therefore was given in a case in which the evidence was all on one side; but as I understand it the Lords Justices held that even if there had been a conflict of evidence the court should have gone into the matter, and if satisfied on the whole that the state of things was such, that the infringement of the regulation could not possibly have contributed to that collision, should have declined to pronounce the ship infringing it to blame in the action. It is of course my duty to give effect to that judgment, and I have carefully considered the evidence in the case before me with the intention of so doing. Although, as I have said, I think I am bound to go into the evidence on the one side and the other, and to decide on the balance that must be taken with one qualification expressly stated by the Lords Justices, viz., that the onus of proof rests entirely on those by whom the regulation has been infringed, and that, before exonerating them from the somewhat penal provisions of the 17th section of the Act of 1873, the court must come to the clear conclusion that the facts were such that by no possibility could its infringement have conduced to the collision.

I have considered the matter in that light, and I have not been able to come to such a clear conclusion in the present case. The pilot and the first officer of the Hermod state that they did, as a matter of fact, mistake the aftermost light of the Ebenezer for the stern light of a vessel going down the river in front of them, and, although there is much in the facts of the case which makes me hesitate to accept their evidence as altogether trustworthy, I am not prepared to say that I am satisfied that the evidence establishes a state of things such that the breach of the regulation could not possibly have conduced to the collision. I do not forget that the pilot of the Hermod said in answer to me that he should have starboarded as he did even had he known that the light he saw was the light of a vessel at anchor. I think, however, he was somewhat confused, and failed to realise the situation when he gave the answer. The result is that I must hold the Ebenezer to have been in fault, and pronounce both vessels to blame.

THE ENDEAVOUR. (a)

Collision—Reference—Repairs to damaged ship—Bankruptcy.

Where in the registrar's report in a collision action it appears that the claimant claims (inter alia) as part of his damages the cost of repairing his ship, but has not paid the shipwright, and has since the repairs were effected become insolvent, and the registrar allows such item, the court has no power to do anything to ensure the money being paid over by the claimant to the shipwright, and will not retain the money in the registry until the claimant has given satisfactory evidence that he has paid the shipwright.

THIS was a collision action in rem by the owners of the s.s. Darenth against the owners of the s.s. Endeavour. The defendants counter-claimed.

At the trial the Darenth was found alone to blame, and the defendants' claim was referred to the registrar and merchants to assess the amount of damages due to them.

The registrar by his report allowed (inter alia) as part of such damages a sum of 464*l*., being the cost of the repairs effected to the Endeavour. These repairs were done by a shipwright named Jarvis, who intervened in the action.

It appeared that subsequently to the repairs being effected the defendants, who were a limited liability company, went into liquidation, and an official liquidator was appointed; and that Jarvis had not been paid anything in respect of the repairs, either by the defendants or the official liquidator.

At the reference Jarvis, having intervened, appeared by counsel, but took no part in the proceedings.

Subsequently to the report being made, Jarvis moved the court for an order that the amount allowed by the registrar and merchants in respect of the intervener's account for repairs executed by him to the defendants' steamship Endeavour might when assessed be paid to the intervener instead of to the defendants as owners of the said steamship Endeavour.

On the motion coming on for hearing, Butt, J. held that the intervener had no locus standi, but suggested that, in order to enable the question to be brought before the court, the plaintiffs should object to the report, and in their petition ask the court to vary the report by withholding payment of the amount for repairs until the defendants satisfied the registrar that they had paid the money to Jarvis, although the learned judge stated that in his opinion Jarvis had no remedy.

The plaintiffs accordingly filed a petition objecting to the report, in which they alleged, so far as is material, as follows:

5. Neither the defendant nor the official liquidator has paid the said Richard Jarvis anything in respect of the said repairs, and the said Richard Jarvis has not sent into the official liquidator any claim against the defendants' estate in respect of the said repairs.

5*a*. Further, since the date of the said report, the said Richard Jarvis formally and finally withdrew, gave up, and waived any right of proof or claim he had, or might have, against the owners of the Endeavour or the official liquidator in respect of the said repairs.

6. After the said repairs were finished, and since this action was begun, the official liquidator sold the Endeavour, repaired as aforesaid, for a sum of about 3500*l*.

7. By reason of the premises the defendants have had the Endeavour repaired without having paid, or being under any liability to pay, the said Richard Jarvis or any other person anything in respect of the said repairs.

8. In the alternative, the plaintiffs will object that the registrar's report should be varied by stating that the said item will only be allowed when vouchers for a satisfactory evidence of the payment thereof have been duly furnished to the registrar, or that so much only of the said item be allowed as the defendants produce vouchers for payment or satisfactory evidence of having paid.

The allegations in the answer to the petition in objection, so far as they are material, were as follows:

3. That the nonpayment of the account for the repairs to the Endeavour does not affect the right of the defendants to recover the amount of damages due for the injury sustained.

4. That the plaintiffs are not entitled to be heard to allege nonpayment of the account for the said repairs.

5. That the defendants, a limited liability company, are in fact liable to pay, so far as their assets will allow, the amount of the repairs, and the claim in respect thereof can only be made against the defendants in the liquidation proceedings.

6. That there is no jurisdiction to withhold payment of the amount found due, or any part thereof, on the ground stated in the said petition.

7. That, as to paragraph 5*a* of the petition, the defendants deny the allegations therein contained, and, further, that the facts alleged in the petition are wholly immaterial and irrelevant, and do not affect the right of the defendants to be paid the said sum of 464*l*.

L. E. Pyke, for the plaintiffs, in support of the objection to the report.—The defendants are only entitled to a restitutio in integrum: (The Clarence, 3 W. Rob. 286.) That they have had in having their ship repaired. If this report is confirmed, they get more than a restitutio in integrum, and the intervener, who has expended money and labour on the ship, practically gets nothing. In the circumstances the court ought in its equitable jurisdiction to refuse to order us to pay this money to the defendants until they have satisfied the registrar that they have paid the intervener. This has not unfrequently been done in other actions.

Sir W. Phillimore (with him J. P. Aspinall), for the defendants, in support of the report, was not called upon.

Sir JAMES HANNEN.—I think everyone must feel sympathy with Mr. Jarvis at his not securing the fruits of his labour. But this is just that sort of misfortune which so often happens where bankruptcy intervenes and causes the bankrupt's property to pass into the hands of his creditors. This application is based upon a fallacy. The Endeavour has been injured. Her owners are entitled to be paid the amount of such injuries. It has been ascertained that that amount is 464*l*. That is the measure of the defendants' damages, and is the amount they are entitled to recover. If somebody out of kindness were to repair the injury and make no charge for it, the wrongdoer would not be entitled to refuse to pay as part of the damages the cost of the repairs to the owner. It seems to me that the intervener's claim cannot be supported, and I must therefore confirm the report.

THE HIGHGATE. (a)

Collision—Steamship and sailing ship—Keeping course—Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, arts. 17, 22, and 23.

The fact that a steamship is neglecting to keep out of the way of a sailing ship does not make it the duty of the sailing ship to take measures to avoid a collision, except possibly in very exceptional circumstances, because it is possible for a steamship to act for a sailing ship up to almost the last moment, and any action on the part of the sailing ship might be liable to increase risk of collision.

The s.s. H. was approaching the sailing ship S. for several minutes, with her masthead and red lights open, on the starboard bow of the S. The S. kept her course till a collision was imminent, and then hard-a-ported, but the H. with her port side struck the stem and port bow of the S. The H. admitted that she was to blame, but contended that the S. was also to blame for breach of art. 23 of the Regulations in not manœuvring for the H. after she saw the H. persisting in doing nothing to keep out of her way.

Held, that the S. was not to blame, as the circumstances were not such as to require the S. to alter her course and manœuvre for the H.

The Tasmania (60 L. T. Rep. N. S. 692; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 381; 14 P. Div. 53) distinguished.

THIS was an action in rem instituted by the owners of the sailing ship Sovereign against the steamship Highgate to recover damages occasioned by a collision between the two vessels.

The collision occured on the 19th Feb. 1890, in the Bristol Channel.

The facts alleged by the plaintiffs were as follows:

Shortly before 1.30 a.m. on the 19th Feb. 1890, the Sovereign, a full-rigged sailing ship of 1192 tons register, laden with a cargo of coals, was about twelve miles N.N.E. of Lundy Island, on a voyage from Cardiff to Monte Video. The wind was a fresh breeze from about E. by S., and the Sovereign was steering about N.W. by W. ½ W., making from six to seven knots an hour. In these circumstances those on board her saw the masthead light of a steamship, which proved to be the Highgate, distant between two and three miles, and bearing from a point to a point and a half on the starboard bow. The Sovereign was kept on her course, and the Highgate approached, showing first both side lights, and then her red light only; but instead of keeping clear of the Sovereign, as she could and ought to have done, the Highgate came on, still showing her red light, and rendered a collision imminent, and, although the helm of the Sovereign was then put hard-a-port, the Highgate with her port side struck the stem and port bow of the Sovereign, doing her so much damage that she shortly afterwards sank.

The facts as pleaded by the defendants were as follows:

Shortly after 2.15 a.m. on the 19th Feb. the Highgate, a steamship of 889 tons register, was on a voyage in ballast from Mostyn to Cardiff. She was in the Bristol Channel, steering S.E. by S. magnetic, making about three and a half knots an hour. In these circumstances those on board her saw the green light and immediately afterwards the red light of the Sovereign, distant half a mile, and bearing about four points on the port bow. On the green light being seen, the helm of the Highgate was starboarded, but on the red light coming into view the helm was ported, and the vessels were brought red to red. Shortly afterwards the Sovereign again opened her green light and shut in her red, when about three or four ships' lengths off, causing imminent risk of collision. As the only chance of avoiding a collision, the Highgate's helm was put hard-a-port, and her engines full speed, but the Sovereign came on, and with her stem struck the port side of the Highgate.

At the trial the defendants, after having called their master, admitted that the Highgate was to blame, but contended that the Sovereign was also to blame for breach of art. 23 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions in not taking steps to keep clear of the Highgate. The defendants practically admitted the truth of the plaintiffs' story, and their master, in cross-examination, said that if he had reversed his engines at the time when he thought the Sovereign ought to have ported, these conjoint manœuvres would probably have brought about a collision.

Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea:

Art. 17. If two ships, one of which is a sailing ship and the other a steamship, are proceeding in such directions as to involve risk of collision, the steamship shall keep out of the way of the sailing ship.

Art. 22. Where by the above rules one of two ships is to keep out of the way, the other shall keep her course.

Art. 23. In obeying and construing these rules due regard shall be had to all dangers of navigation and to any special circumstances which may render a departure from the above rules necessary in order to avoid immediate danger.

Sir Walter Phillimore (with him J. P. Aspinall) for the plaintiffs.—The Sovereign is not to blame. It was her duty to keep her course in obedience to art. 22, and that she did. The Court of Appeal in The Tasmania (60 L. T. Rep. N. S. 692; 14 P. Div. 53; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 381) did not lay down any general principle, but merely decided that in the circumstances of that case the vessel whose primary duty was to have kept her course ought, from the indications which she had from the manœuvres of the other vessel, to have altered her course. This case is also distinguishable from that, because there both ships were sailing ships, whereas in the present case one is a steamer and the other a sailing ship. Hence different considerations arise. A steamship, in consequence of her form of motive power, need not manœuvre until very close to a sailing ship. Her duty is to keep out of the way of the sailing ship, and she may do it how she pleases. Were it to be laid down that a sailing vessel ought, because she see the red light of a steamer on her starboard bow for some few minutes, to manœuvre for her, the consequence would be to increase risk of collision. As a matter of fact, a sailing ship is bound to anticipate that a steamer will do her duty, and therefore she ought to keep her course till the last. There are no circumstances here calling on the Sovereign to depart from art. 22:

The Byfoged Christensen, 41 L. T. Rep. N. S. 535; 4 App. Cas. 669; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 201.

Myburgh, Q.C. (with him Dr. Raikes) for the defendants.—The Tasmania lays down the principle that, where a vessel whose primary duty it is to keep her course sees another vessel whose duty it is to keep out of the way persistently neglecting to do so, she is then bound under art. 23 to manœuvre in such way as circumstances require. [Sir JAMES HANNEN.—Does that case do more than say that the facts there brought the case within art. 23? In that case there was a clear necessity for departure from the rule as to keeping course. What I have to consider is whether in this case there was any necessity.] The Court of Appeal meant to lay down a principle applicable to all the analogous cases. There was every indication that the Highgate meant to do nothing to get out of the way, as the event showed, and hence it became the duty of the Sovereign to do something to avoid a collision which is inevitable unless she manœuvres. The same principle was acted upon by Dr. Lushington in the case of The Commerce (3 W. Rob. 287). Had the Sovereign ported, no collision would have taken place.

Sir JAMES HANNEN.—I need scarcely say that I should give every attention to any decision of the Court of Appeal if I thought that any principle had been laid down by that tribunal of which I could avail myself. But, as a matter of fact, no principle was laid down in The Tasmania (ubi sup.). It is, indeed, impossible to lay down any principle which must necessarily bring a particular case within art. 23 of the Regulations. In these cases the question must always be whether the "special circumstances" bring the case within rule 23. The circumstances vary infinitely, and it is almost impossible to find a case so completely on all-fours with the reported decisions as to make them binding in the particular case. In the present case the circumstances are very different from those in The Tasmania (ubi sup.), which was a case of two sailing vessels, whilst here the collision was between a sailing vessel and a steamer—a state of circumstances which gives rise to a totally different set of considerations. I need not comment on the manœuvring of the Highgate; it was obviously and strangely wrong. This steamer being so extremely uncertain in her manœuvres, the question arises, What were those on the Sovereign to do when they saw the Highgate approaching in this way? A clear rule that a sailing vessel is to keep her course has been laid down and enforced very strictly, it being thought necessary in the interest of life and property to do so. It is therefore only where a clear case of necessity for departing from the rule is made out that the captain of a vessel can excuse himself for not following the rule. In the case of The Tasmania (ubi sup.), where the circumstances were different from this case, the Court of Appeal, fortified by the advice of its assessors, held that there were reasons for departing from the rule. In this case the Elder Brethren who assist me are of opinion that there was no necessity for departing from the rule; in other words, that there were no circumstances justifying the sailing vessel in not keeping her course. A steamer is able to manœuvre so as to keep out of the way of another vessel even when very close to her. I have had occasion to comment on the practice with reprobation, as experience in this court teaches that steamers very often cut it exceedingly fine. How is a sailing vessel to know that a steamer is not going to cut it fine, or to know in what particular direction she will move at the last moment? The guide of the steamer's action is the presumption that the sailing vessel will keep her course. It has been suggested that if the steamer had stopped, as she might have done when she saw that she had got herself into a position of danger, the porting of the sailing vessel would have increased the danger of collision. That is admitted by the captain of the steamer. He says: "If I had stopped and reversed, and she had ported, a collision would have occurred." It is clear that it was impossible for the sailing vessel to know with certainty what the steamer was going to do, or to be certain that she would not stop at the last moment. Acting, therefore, upon the advice of the Trinity Brethren, in which I entirely concur, I think that there was no such case of necessity made out as called upon the captain of the sailing vessel to depart from this rule, which is always so stringently enforced against sailing vessels. I therefore pronounce the Highgate alone to blame.

THE CORIOLANUS. (a)

Salvage—Apportionment—Crew—Cattlemen.

Where a salving ship, trading between England and the United States, carried cattlemen, whose duties were to attend to a cargo of live cattle, they being paid a lump sum for the voyage by the owners of the cattle, the fact that they are on the ship's articles at a nominal rating, in order to satisfy the requirements of the American authorities, does not of itself make them part of the crew, so as to entitle them to share with the ship's crew in the award.

(a) Reported by J. P. ASPINALL and BUTLER ASPINALL, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

THIS was a salvage action instituted by the owners, master, and crew of the steamship Bostonian against the s.s. Coriolanus, her cargo and freight.

At the time of the said services, the Bostonian, a steamship of 2925 tons nett, was on a voyage from the United States to England, and was carrying 600 head of live cattle. The cattle were in charge of eighteen cattlemen, who, in order to comply with the requirements of the American authorities, were on the ship's articles, but as a matter of fact they took no part in the navigation of the ship, and were rated at the nominal sum of one shilling for the voyage. Their real remuneration was a lump sum for the voyage, paid them by the shippers of the cattle, their food being provided by the shipowners.

The services consisted in towing the disabled sailing ship Coriolanus into Queenstown. The value of the salved property was 13,000*l.* By reason of the services the voyage of the Bostonian was delayed one and a half days.

The cattlemen took no part in the services, but claimed to share in the award.

Sir Walter Phillimore (with him J. P. Aspinall) for the owners, master, and crew of the Bostonian.

Manisty for the cattlemen.—My clients are entitled to participate in the award. They are on the ship's articles, and legally form part of the crew. Moreover, the voyage was in fact delayed by reason of the services, and they therefore have lost time. Passengers have been given salvage, and therefore my clients ought to share in the award:

The Hope, 3 Hagg. 423.

Myburgh, Q.C. and Dr. Raikes for the defendants.

Sir Walter Phillimore (with him J. P. Aspinall) for the owners, master, and crew of the Bostonian.—The cattlemen took no effective part, directly or indirectly, in these salvage services, and therefore are not entitled to anything. Moreover, they are not really part of the ship's crew, and are only on the articles for nominal purposes. Passengers have only been given salvage where they have taken part in the services:

The Salacia, 2 Hagg. 269;
The Branston, 2 Hagg. 3, n.;
Bond v. The Brig Cora, 2 Washington, 80.

Sir JAMES HANNEN.—I thought the question raised by Mr. Manisty was of such importance, not only in this particular case, but in the very numerous cases in which it might arise, that it was advisable to consult Butt, J. upon it. I have done so, and he agrees with me that this is not a case in which anything should be allowed the cattlemen. It is not a case which calls for an allowance to them on the ground of their being salvors. They did absolutely nothing toward saving the salved property; they are only nominally on the rating of the ship, and if they were dealt with in the usual way of apportioning the amount, it would be a mockery to allow them to share in salvage at the rate of one shilling a voyage. One must look at the real facts of the case and see whether persons in the position of passengers, which practically these men were, have contributed in any way towards the saving of the salved property. They have not; all that has happened to them is that they have been delayed one and a half days. Now, in The Hope (ubi sup.), which has been referred to, the claim was put forward generally on behalf of the crew and passengers. We have not got the circumstances in that case before us, but it appears that all parties had joined in making the claim, and that the judge had therefore only to fix the amount to be awarded to the passengers who had been allowed by the crew to join in making a claim. No opposition was raised in that particular case to their being treated as salvors. Here opposition is raised. I do not think that decision is any authority in the present case. I come to the conclusion that no right to salvage has been shown in this case; and that that upon which a claim for salvage rests, viz., contributing to the actual saving of the property, has not been made out in the case of these men, and that therefore their claim must be rejected. [The learned Judge then dealt with the merits of the case, and awarded 5000*l.*]

THE CASHMERE. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM THE COUNTY COURT OF GLAMORGANSHIRE.

Practice — Collision—County Court—Costs—Witnesses—Interlocutory order — Appeal — County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 71), s. 26—County Courts Act 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 43), s. 120—County Court Rules 1889, Order L., r. 16.

A County Court judge cannot lay down a general practice that only the costs of such witnesses who have been called at the trial shall be allowed, and that if it be desired to have witnesses allowed who have not been called application is to be made to him, such practice being contrary to the provisions of Order L., r. 16, of the County Court Rules.

Under sect. 26 of the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868 leave to appeal from an interlocutory order in County Court actions on the Admiralty side must be obtained from the County Court judge, and this enactment is still applicable to such actions, notwithstanding the general provisions of sect. 120 of the County Courts Act 1888, and hence a party cannot appeal from such orders without leave.

THIS was an appeal by the plaintiffs in a County Court collision action in rem from a decision of the judge affirming the registrar's taxation of costs.

By arrangement between the parties the following statement of facts was agreed to for the purposes of the appeal:

1. The appellants, the plaintiffs, appeal against the decision of the judge of the above-named County Court upholding the decision of his registrar disallowing certain items in the plaintiffs' costs.

2. This was a suit for damage by collision. Judgment was given for the plaintiffs with costs. The plaintiffs' solicitors made no application to the judge of the County Court on the hearing of the action in respect of the witnesses' costs or allowance of their expenses.

3. The registrar, on taxing the plaintiffs' costs, disallowed the expenses of all the witnesses who were not actually put into the box and examined.

4. The registrar disallowed the expenses on the grounds as certified by him in the following words: "The practice in this court is by direction of his Honour to allow the costs of witnesses called; if it be desired to have witnesses allowed who have not been called, application should be made to the judge for their allowance."

5. The plaintiffs filed objections to the taxation.

6. The plaintiffs appealed against such disallowance of witnesses to the judge.

7. The judge dismissed the plaintiffs' appeal with costs on the ground that no application was made to him at the trial for the allowance of these witnesses' costs and expenses, and on the ground that it was agreed at the time of the hearing that only two witnesses should be called on each side.

From an affidavit filed by the plaintiffs' solicitors it appeared that the witnesses in respect of whom he claimed costs were in attendance in court at the trial, but that after the plaintiffs' first witness had been cross-examined, in consequence of a suggestion from the judge, it was arranged between the advocates that each side should limit themselves to two witnesses, and this was accordingly done.

The plaintiffs had not asked permission of the County Court judge to institute the present appeal.

The following Acts of Parliament were cited in the argument, and are material to the decision:—

County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 71):

Sect. 26. An appeal may be made to the High Court of Admiralty of England from a final decree or order of a County Court in an Admiralty cause, and by permission of the judge of the County Court from any interlocutory decree or order therein, on security for costs being first given, and subject to such other provisions as general orders shall direct.

County Courts Act 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 43):

Sect. 120. If any party in any action or matter shall be dissatisfied with the determination or direction of the judge in point of law or equity, or upon the admission or rejection of any evidence, the party aggrieved by the judgment, direction, decision, or order of the judge may appeal from the same to the High Court in such manner and subject to such conditions as may be for the time being provided by the rules of the Supreme Court regulating the procedure on appeals from inferior courts to the High Court.

Order L., r. 16, of the County Court Rules:

The costs of witnesses, whether they have been examined or not, may, unless otherwise ordered by the judge, be allowed, though they have not been summoned, and except in cases referred to in rule 18 of this order their allowance for attendance shall not exceed the highest rate of the allowances mentioned in the scale in the appendix.

L. E. Pyke, for the respondents, took the preliminary objection that the court could not hear the appeal. This is an appeal from an interlocutory decree or order, and by the provisions of sect. 26 of the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868 the permission of the judge of the County Court is a condition precedent to appealing. No leave has been obtained, and therefore the appeal cannot be heard.

Sir Walter Phillimore (with him A. E. Nelson), for the appellants, contrâ.—Sect. 120 of the County Courts Act 1888 is applicable to Admiralty appeals, and allows an appeal in any "action or matter" without requiring the appellant to obtain the judge's leave. This section is applicable to interlocutory orders, and therefore applies to the present case:

Carr v. Stringer, Ell. Bl. & Ell. 123;
Jacobs v. Dawkes, 56 L. J. 446, Q. B. Div.; 56 L. T. Rep. N. S. 919; Jonas v. Long, 58 L. T. Rep. N. S. 787; 20 Q. B. Div. 564.

The general provisions of the County Courts Act 1868, s. 120, repeal the specific provisions of the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868, sect. 26:

Garnett v. Bradley, 39 L. T. Rep. N. S. 261; 3 App. Cas. 944.

Pyke for the respondents.—The general enactment in the County Courts Act 1888 does not repeal the particular enactment in the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868. Had the Legislature intended to repeal sect. 26 of the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868 they would have done so in express terms:

Conservators of the River Thames v. Hall, 18 L. T. Rep. N. S. 361; L. Rep. 3 C. P. 415;
Mitchell v. Simpson, 23 Q. B. Div. 373.

[Sir J. HANNEN.—We reserve this point until we have heard the grounds of the appeal.]

Sir Walter Phillimore in support of the appeal.—The practice which the County Court judge has laid down and followed in this case is directly opposed to the provisions of Order L., r. 16, of the County Court Rules. Moreover, costs being in the discretion of the judge, he cannot fetter that discretion by any hard-and-fast rule:

The Friedeberg, 52 L. T. Rep. N. S. 837; 10 P. Div. 112; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 426.

The registrar ought to have considered the question of these costs on the merits.

Pyke, for the defendants, contrà.—Assuming the principle on which the registrar acted to be incorrect, nevertheless the judge who tried the case and knew the facts has exercised his discretion by refusing to allow these costs. This court ought not to overrule his discretion.

Sir Walter Phillimore in reply.

Sir JAMES HANNEN.—The main question in this case is of importance, whatever decision we may come to as to the preliminary objection, and therefore I think we ought to express our opinion so that in future the learned County Court judge may be influenced by it. It is for that reason, before we give judgment on the preliminary question, that I think it necessary to state our decision before deciding whether this appeal can be entertained. It appears that a practice has prevailed in this County Court which is directly opposed to a statutory rule which has been framed by a proper authority. It is obvious that the learned judge has no right to establish a local practice of this kind, and that it cannot prevail as against the County Court rule. It is plain that the registrar based his judgment solely upon the local practice, and in our opinion that was an insufficient reason. Then when the matter came before the judge he dismissed the plaintiff's appeal with costs on the ground that "no application was made to him at the trial for the allowance of these witnesses' costs and expenses." That is a re-assertion of his own local practice as against the general statutory rule by which he ought to have been governed. The other ground of his affirming the registrar is, that it was agreed at the time of the hearing that only two witnesses should be called on each side. But what has that to do with the question of what costs and what witnesses shall be allowed? The parties practically said, "We will not trouble the court with a great number of witnesses on the one side or the other, but will each be content with two." How does that show that the plaintiffs were not quite right in bringing down other witnesses than the two men whom they called? This last ground is no reason at all for disallowing the witnesses. It only says that the parties agreed to something which has no bearing on this question, for it is obvious that, although witnesses be not put into the box, yet it may be proper that they should be summoned. For these reasons, unless we are of opinion that we cannot entertain this appeal, we must allow it.

BUTT, J.—I am entirely of the same opinion. If witnesses are summoned to a County Court and their expenses are not allowed because they are not called, the result will be that a solicitor who has a number of witnesses in attendance will go on calling them all, even if his case is substantially proved, because he knows that if he does not he will not get their costs allowed. That would lead to a great waste of time, and is obviously objectionable. I think that on the main question this appeal should be allowed; but we will take time to consider the preliminary objection.

April 28.—BUTT, J. delivered the judgment of the court.—This is a case of an appeal from the decision of the Glamorganshire County Court on a question of costs. The registrar disallowed the costs of certain witnesses who were in attendance at the trial. From that there was an appeal to review the taxation, but the learned judge refused to allow the costs. Upon that an appeal was brought to us, and came on for hearing on the 10th March. We then came to the conclusion that the learned judge was wrong in refusing to allow the costs in question. As the question was one of principle, my Lord and I thought that we ought to state our opinion upon it, irrespective of how we decided a preliminary objection about which we have taken time to consider. The objection was, that this was an appeal against an interlocutory order of the County Court judge, and that as his leave had not been obtained no appeal could be brought. Sect. 26 of the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868 was relied on in support of the objection. That section is as follows: "An appeal may be made to the High Court of Admiralty of England from a final decree or order of a County Court in an Admiralty cause, and by permission of the judge of the County Court from an interlocutory decree or order therein, on security for costs being first given and such other provisions as general orders shall direct." If that section is read alone, it would seem clear that there is no appeal in such a matter as this without the judge's leave. But it is said that the County Courts Act 1888 alters that, and sect. 120 is relied upon. The material part of the section is as follows: "If a party in any action or matter shall be dissatisfied with the determination or direction of the judge in point of law or equity, or upon the admission or rejection of any evidence, the party aggrieved by the judgment, direction, decision, or order of the judge may appeal from the same to the High Court in such manner and subject to such conditions as may be for the time being provided by the rules of the Supreme Court." There are certain other provisions which it is not necessary to consider for the present purpose. I should have been inclined to think that the first of the two Acts of Parliament to which I have referred had reference to the Admiralty jurisdiction of the County Courts, and the latter being a general County Court Act—even if it gave a right of appeal from interlocutory orders without leave of the judge—would not repeal the provisions of the special Admiralty Act. But it seemed to me, on first reading the words of sect. 128 of the Act of 1888, that they applied to proceedings at the trial and to appeal from final judgment, and had no reference to interlocutory orders. I find that in the case of Carr v. Stringer (ubi sup.) the Court of Queen's Bench held that the words of sect. 14 of 13 & 14 Vict. c. 61, which are almost similar and very analogous to the language of the Act of 1888, only gave an appeal in cases of final judgment, and had no reference whatever to interlocutory orders of a judge. That would seem to me to be conclusive of the case. That is the view I have taken of these Acts of Parliament, and I am authorised to say that my Lord agrees in that view. Therefore our judgment is that the appeal must be dismissed; but, as the appellants ought to succeed on the merits, we think that there should be no costs.

THE OWNERS OF THE TASMANIA v. THE OWNERS OF THE CITY OF CORINTH.

THE TASMANIA. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF APPEAL IN ENGLAND.

Collision—Sailing ships—Practice—Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, arts. 14 (a), 22, 23.

Where a point which has not been taken in the court below is put forward by an appellant for the first time in a Court of Appeal, that court ought not to decide in his favour on such point unless it is satisfied beyond doubt, (1) that it has before it all the facts bearing upon the new contention as completely as if it had been raised in the court of first instance; (2) that no satisfactory explanation could have been given if it had been so raised.

Very great allowances should be made for an officer in charge of a ship suddenly placed in difficult circumstances by the wrongful act of another ship.

Judgment of the court below reversed upon the facts and evidence.

THIS was an appeal from a judgment of the Court of Appeal (Lord Esher, M.R., Fry and Lopes, L.JJ.), reported in 60 L. T. Rep. N. S. 692, 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 381, and 14 P. Div. 53, reversing a judgment of Butt, J., by which he pronounced the City of Corinth alone to blame for a collision which took place between that ship and the Tasmania under circumstances which are set out in the judgments of their Lordships.

Barnes, Q.C., Raikes, and A. Russell appeared for the appellants.

The Attorney-General (Sir R. Webster), Sir C. Hall, Q.C., and Pyke for the respondents.

At the conclusion of the arguments their Lordships took time to consider their judgments.

May 22.—Their Lordships gave judgment as follows:—

Lord HERSCHELL.—My Lords: This action was brought by the owners of the City of Corinth against the owners of the Tasmania, to recover the loss and damage sustained owing to a collision between the two vessels. The collision took place about 7 p.m. on the evening of the 8th March 1888, in the English Channel, about twenty miles S.S.W. of St. Catharine's Point. It is not in dispute that, when the vessels were approaching one another prior to the collision, the course of the Tasmania was about W.N.W., she being close-hauled to the wind on the port tack, and that the City of Corinth was running free. Her course is stated in the preliminary act, filed on behalf of the plaintiffs, to have been E. by N. when the other vessel was first seen, the wind being S.W. by S. It is clear that under these circumstances it was the duty of the City of Corinth, in obedience to the rules, to get out of the way of the Tasmania, whilst the latter vessel was bound to keep her course. That the City of Corinth starboarded, and so brought herself across the bows of the Tasmania, could not be contested; but it was attempted at the trial to justify this manœuvre on her part by the allegation that the Tasmania had luffed so as to show her green light to the other vessel. The learned judge who tried the action came to the conclusion that the City of Corinth had wholly failed to establish this case. He accordingly found that she was to blame for improperly starboarding, and so bringing herself across the course of the Tasmania instead of getting out of her way. The Court of Appeal took the same view, and it was not contended at your Lordships' bar that the finding that the City of Corinth was to blame ought to be disturbed. At the trial no other point was taken for the plaintiffs except that which I have mentioned. It was not argued, or suggested, that even if the City of Corinth was to blame for improperly starboarding, the Tasmania was also to blame. But in the Court of Appeal this point was for the first time raised. It was contended that the Tasmania had kept her course too long, and that she ought to have earlier taken the step which she ultimately did, viz., putting her helm down, and so coming up to the wind. I think that a point such as this, not taken at the trial, and presented for the first time in the Court of Appeal, ought to be most jealously scrutinised. The conduct of a cause at the trial is governed by, and the questions asked of the witnesses are directed to, the points then suggested; and it is obvious that no care is exercised in the elucidation of facts not material to them. It appears to me that under these circumstances a Court of Appeal ought only to decide in favour of an appellant on a ground there put forward for the first time, if it be satisfied beyond doubt, first, that it has before it all the facts bearing upon the new contention, as completely as would have been the case if the controversy had arisen at the trial; and next, that no satisfactory explanation could have been offered by those whose conduct is impugned if an an opportunity for explanation had been afforded them when in the witness-box. Although, having regard to the relative position of the two vessels, it was the duty of the Tasmania to keep her course, it is clear that she would not be justified in blindly persisting in that course if it were manifest that disaster must result from it. It is provided by rule 23 that, in obeying and construing the rules, due regard shall be had to any special circumstances which may render a departure from them necessary in order to avoid immediate danger. As soon then as it was, or ought to a master of reasonable skill and prudence to have been, obvious that to keep his course would involve immediate danger, it was no longer the duty of the master of the Tasmania to adhere to the 22nd rule. He was not only justified in departing from it, but bound to do so, and to exercise his best judgment to avoid the danger which threatened. But, in estimating the conduct of the master, it must be remembered that it was the gross negligence of the other vessel which placed him suddenly in the difficult position of having to judge when he was justified in departing from the rule, and what manœuvre he ought to adopt. In the case of The Bywell Castle (41 L. T. Rep. N. S. 747; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 207; 4 P. Div. 219), Brett, L. J. said: "I am clearly of opinion that when one ship, by her wrongful act, suddenly puts another ship into a difficulty of this kind, we cannot expect the same amount of skill as we should under other circumstances. Any court ought to make the very greatest allowance for a captain or pilot suddenly put into such difficult circumstances, and the court ought not, in fairness and justice to him, to require perfect nerve and presence of mind enabling him to do the best thing possible." With this I entirely agree, though of course the application of the principle laid down must vary according to the circumstances.

One other fact must be borne in mind. The occurrences we are considering happened at night, so that the only information either vessel had of the position or movements of the other was derived from the lights exhibited. If it had been daylight, so that the master of the Tasmania could have seen what the other vessel was, and how it was manœuvring, the obligation to act might have been more imperative and immediate. I do not think the master of the Tasmania was bound to alter his course directly he saw the green light of the other vessel. And this, I gather, was the view taken in the court below. It was said by Lord Esher, M.R., that his obligation to do so arose as soon as it was clear that the City of Corinth had made up her mind to go straight across the bows of the Tasmania, and that the action of the City of Corinth was so determined, so clear, that he must and ought to have known this almost immediately after he saw the green light. The first question that arises is, how long did he delay before he took action with his helm? I agree with the Master of the Rolls that in these cases it is not of much use talking of minutes or seconds, that time can only be judged by ascertaining what was done in the interval. It appears certain that but a short period must have elapsed between the time when the green light of the City of Corinth was first seen and the collision. That light was seen by the Tasmania about two points on her port bow. The City of Corinth was running before the wind, making six to seven knots; the speed of the Tasmania was only three to four knots, yet, without any substantial alteration of the course of the Tasmania, she struck the other vessel nearly amidships. The Master of the Rolls founded his conclusion that the captain of the Tasmania delayed too long to order his helm to be put hard down, upon the evidence as to what was done after the captain saw the green light, and before he gave this order. He says: "We have now the length of the ship—she is a long ship—and the lights are placed on the forecastle, or at the edge of the forecastle. The captain was on the poop; he sent an apprentice, or a man, along the length of the ship, and told that man to see whether his lights were burning or not. It must have taken time to go forward and come back again. After that man had gone forward and come back he delays still. He calls the mate upon the poop to be a witness that it was not his fault, and that the collision was inevitable. There is another delay; and it is not until after he has sent the man forward, and he has come back, and he has called the mate on the poop, and consulted with him, that he then gives an order." Now, I cannot feel satisfied that, if the point now taken had been taken at the trial, so that we had an exact narrative of the events and their sequence, the delay of the captain would have appeared to be anything like so considerable as is suggested. It must be remembered that these events were not material to any issue raised at the trial, and therefore not carefully inquired into. There can be no doubt that the master did hail the second mate, who, as we know, was occupied at the cross-jack, to send a man forward to see if the lights were burning brightly, and that the man sent forward reported that they were, though it does not follow that he came back for this purpose to where the captain was standing. He might well make his report without doing so. It is stated by the learned judges in the court below that it was not until after the man had returned with this report that the captain called the second mate on to the poop. In the absence of any questions upon the point at the trial, I do not think it is right to assume this. It is true that the master mentions the report received about the lights in connection with the order to look at them, and before he says anything about hailing the mate to come on the poop. The questions and answers run thus: "(Q.) Then you told us that you kept your course, and you sent a man forward to look at your lights, and he reported they were all right? (A.) Yes. (Q.) What order did you give? (A.) Then I hailed out to the second mate to come on to the poop and see what this light was going to do." But I think it is consistent with this that he called the mate on to the poop directly after he had hailed him to send a man forward. It would be quite natural for the master to complete the narrative as to the ship's lights by stating what was reported about them, even although the next order was given before that report was received. At all events, I cannot think that it is right to assume, as against the master, that he waited until the report came back before he ordered the mate on to the poop. The second mate, who was called as a witness, makes no mention in his evidence of the order to send a man forward. After stating that he got an order to haul the cross-jack up, after the red light was seen, he is asked: "(Q.) What was the next thing that you heard, after you got the order to haul the cross-jack up? (A.) The captain called me up on the poop and showed me a green light on the port bow." No question was put to him as to whether this was before or after the report as to the light. In his deposition before the Receiver of Wreck he mentions one of the apprentices having been sent forward, but it comes in his narrative after the mention of his having been called aft to see the green light, and after he had observed that the light was exhibited by a full-rigged ship. I do not think it possible to suppose that he has here narrated the events in their order.

Again, I can find no evidence that any appreciable delay was caused by the master consulting with the mate. The master says nothing of any conversation with the mate after he hailed him to come on the poop to see what the light was going to do, nor does the mate, whose evidence seems to me to suggest that the order to luff was almost immediately given. There is no allusion to any consultation in the deposition of the master, and all that the mate says in his deposition is, that "the master suddenly called him aft and pointed out a green light on the port bow, observing that the red light had disappeared." Naturally enough no question was asked of the master as to this statement, which was then regarded by both sides as quite immaterial. Lord Esher, M.R. comments with severity upon the act of the master in sending to see whether his lights were burning. "What did it signify," he asks, "whether his lights were burning or not? It looks to me as if he was getting evidence to show that he was not in the wrong. It was a mere waste of time." Now, I cannot help observing that the mater was never asked his reason for taking this step, and it seems to me hard that he should have had no opportunity of explaining his act. It was suggested in the argument at the bar that his conduct was not so unreasonable as it might at the first blush appear to be. Attention was called to the evidence of the master that he did not in the first instance suppose that the green light was borne by a ship, and that he, consequently, did not expect to see one. "(Q.) What was it you expected? (A.) A small cutter asking me to take a pilot ashore, or something like that; I did not think a ship would do such a thing as cross a ship's bows." He was not cross-examined with reference to this statement, and it does not appear to me to be unnatural that this should have been his first idea. If this was the state of his mind it might excuse some hesitation in arriving at the conclusion that it was his duty to alter his course. But, further, it is suggested that it might occur to him at the same moment to inquire whether his lights were burning, in order to learn whether the other vessel could be acting in ignorance of his presence. These suggestions do not seem to me so improbable that they ought to be summarily rejected. Upon a careful review of the whole of the evidence, I am not prepared to say that, if the question now in issue had been raised at the trial, it would not have appeared that the delay was less than has been supposed; nor is it clear to my mind that the captain could not have satisfactorily accounted for such delay as there was, and thus shown that he could not justly be held, in the difficult circumstances in which he was placed, to have exhibited a want of reasonable care and skill. On the contrary, I think it quite possible that a sufficient explanation might have been forthcoming, and I cannot feel that under these circumstances the very meagre and unsatisfactory evidence bearing upon the point now in controversy warrants a finding that the master was guilty of negligence on account of which the Tasmania should be held to blame. It may be that if the point had been raised at the trial, and the evidence touching it more fully taken and probed, it would have appeared that the master was in default. But, if so, the respondents must take the consequences of the course which they adopted. In my opinion it would be wrong, where a point has not been taken that might have been, to run any risk of doing injustice to the party against whom it is afterwards made by acting upon evidence which does not establish beyond doubt that the occurrences, if fully investigated, would have justified the conclusion at which the court is asked to arrive.

A subordinate point was urged on behalf of the respondents. It was said that after the master gave the order to put the helm down the mate interfered with that order, and told the man at the helm to put his helm up, so as not to get the sails aback. This point also is a new one, though there was some cross-examination with regard to it at the trial, the object being to support the contention that the Tasmania had luffed at an earlier period, and by showing her green light had deceived the City of Corinth. The respondents' case, on this point, rests upon the evidence of the man who was at the wheel at the time, and upon statements alleged to have been made by him after the collision. The mate denies that he gave such an order, and the captain, who is stated to have been close by, so that he could have heard what the mate said, denies that he heard any such order given, or gave it himself. I do not think the charge is made out. It seems to me extremely improbable that, on such an occasion, with a collision imminent, the mate should, immediately after the order had been given, take upon himself the responsibility of interfering with it. The witness was extremely ill after the shock of the collision, and had to be taken to hospital when he left the ship; and I think it would be unsafe to rely on his somewhat confused statements, as against the positive evidence of the mate, supported, as I think it is, by the probabilities of the case. For these reasons, I think the judgment of the Court of Appeal ought to be reversed, and the judgment of Butt, J. restored.

Lord MACNAGHTEN.—My Lords: On the evening of the 8th March 1888 the Tasmania, an iron sailing ship, of 2175 tons register, outward bound from London to San Francisco with a general cargo, was in the English Channel, off the Isle of Wight, about twenty miles S.S.W. of the St. Catharine's Light. There she came into collision with another iron sailing ship, the City of Corinth, of 1220 tons register, manned by a crew of thirty hands, on a voyage from South America to Hamburg, laden with a cargo of nitrate of soda. The City of Corinth sank immediately with all hands but two, who managed to clamber on board the Tasmania. The Tasmania was seriously injured, and had to put back for repairs. Butt, J. found the City of Corinth alone to blame for the disaster. The Court of Appeal held both ships in fault. The Tasmania was condemned, not for infringing any of the precise and positive rules laid down in the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, but because, in the opinion of the Court of Appeal, the officer in charge of the Tasmania ought to have acted sooner than he did, on the view that a departure from those rules was necessary in order to avoid immediate danger. The singular part of the case is, that the error attributed to the Tasmania does not seem to have been apparent to anyone until the parties came before the Court of Appeal. It was not noticed at the trial by the presiding judge; it was overlooked by his nautical assessors, and though a foundation for the charge has been discovered in the pleadings, it escaped, for the time, the attention of the learned counsel for the City of Corinth. [After going through the facts of the case, his Lordship continued:] On the facts, it cannot be disputed that, under the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, it was the duty of the City of Corinth to keep out of the way of the Tasmania, and the duty of the Tasmania to keep her course. It is clear, therefore, that up to the time when the green light of the City of Corinth was opened, the Tasmania was not in the slightest degree in fault. Further, it is not disputed that, when the City of Corinth loomed in sight, the captain of the Tasmania acted rightly in departing from the statutory rules. The time, therefore, to be accounted for is the interval between the appearance of the green light of the City of Corinth and the moment when the City of Corinth herself became visible. The interval was not long. The distance between the two ships when the green light first appeared is put at four ship's lengths, or 400 yards, the Tasmania being 278 feet long. It is put at 200 yards when the City of Corinth became visible. If those estimates are at all to be trusted, the time to be accounted for, having regard to the speed at which the ships were going, would be something over half a minute. The Court of Appeal held that the Tasmania ought to have altered her course immediately after the green light of the City of Corinth appeared, and that the captain wasted precious time, owing either to the want of presence of mind, or to a desire to secure evidence as to the state of his own vessel. Lord Esher, M.R. thought that it was an idle thing on the part of the captain to inquire about his own lights, and a mere waste of time. He also thought that the captain had no business to summon the mate on to the poop and hold a conversation with him. His view was, that if the captain had kept his presence of mind, he would have known that the City of Corinth had made up her mind to go straight across his bows, and he would have done at once, when he saw the green light, that which he did at the last moment, when it was too late. Whether any action on the part of the Tasmania, when the green light was first seen, could have prevented a collision is a matter on which no certain opinion is expressed. I am unable to agree with the view of the Court of Appeal. It must be borne in mind that, until the hull and sails of the City of Corinth came in view, the officer in charge of the Tasmania could know nothing of the approaching vessel or of its course, except what he could infer from the lights which he had seen. He knew that it was a sailing vessel; he knew that it had starboarded; but he could not know what sort of a sailing vessel it was. In his examination in chief, the captain of the Tasmania says, that when he first saw the green light he did not expect to see a ship; he expected to see a small cutter asking him to take a pilot ashore or something like that; he did not think a ship would do such a foolish thing—he did not expect a ship would do such a thing as cross his ship's bows. It was said in argument that this was an afterthought, a mere invention on the part of the captain; but it does not seem to be an improbable story. It seems to have been accepted as a rational explanation at the trial, and there was not a word of cross-examination about it.

Nor can I agree with the Master of the Rolls that it was an idle thing on the part of the captain to inquire whether his own lights were burning. If his lights were not burning there would be nothing to warn the approaching vessel of its danger; the only chance of escape would be for the captain of the Tasmania to alter his course at once, without regard to the regulations. On the other hand, if the Tasmania's lights were in order, it would be a most imprudent and dangerous thing to alter the Tasmania's course so long as there was any possibility of the approaching vessel avoiding collision by keeping out of the way of the Tasmania. For anything that the captain of the Tasmania could have known, it might have been the case that at the very moment when the green light opened the approaching vessel was in the act of altering her helm in order to pass the Tasmania on her port-side, trusting to the Tasmania keeping her course, as she was bound to do under the regulations. If that had been the case, and if the Tasmania had not kept her course, it would have been difficult indeed for the Tasmania to have justified her action in a court of law. She might have been held solely to blame. How could the captain of the Tasmania, having seen nothing but the lights of an approaching vessel, know what was passing in the mind of that vessel's captain? How could he tell that that vessel had determined at all hazards to cross his bows? In point of fact, judging from what appears in the evidence of the survivors of the City of Corinth, she had formed no determination whatever with reference to the Tasmania when she opened her green light; apparently she had not seen the lights of the Tasmania, and did not know that she was in the way. Nor, again, do I think that it ought to be assumed that the inquiry as to the lights took any appreciable time. Certainly there is no evidence that it did. There is evidence that there was a man whose duty it was to attend to the lights; there is evidence that the man on the look-out turned round the moment he saw the green light and ascertained that the Tasmania's lights were burning brightly, so that it would be a mere matter of hailing along the deck, and the answer might have been, and probably was, reported instantly. But it is to be observed that, whether the inquiry took any time or not, it is clear, if you accept the evidence of the captain, it did not delay his action for a single moment. He did not think he would be justified in departing from the regulations until he could see something of the approaching vessel. The moment he caught a glimpse of her he put his helm hard down. Further, I am unable to find any trace of anything like a consultation between the captain and the mate at the critical moment. It seems to me that there was nothing improper, nothing tending to show irresolution or hesitation on the part of the captain in his desiring to have the mate beside him when he was watching to see what the light would do and what sort of a vessel it was that was coming. Certainly it was an advantage to have the mate there, if it were only for the purpose of helping to carry out such orders as the exigency of the case might require. A suggestion was made that the captain's orders to the helmsman were interfered with by the second mate. I notice the suggestion merely for the purpose of saying that, in my opinion, it is not supported by the evidence. In the result, therefore, I am of opinion that the charge of negligence against the Tasmania has not been established. It is not without much consideration that I have come to the conclusion that the unanimous judgment of the Court of Appeal, supported as it is by the opinion of their nautical assessors, ought to be reversed. Speaking for myself, I could have much wished that in this case, and in all cases of this sort, your Lordships also could have the advantage of skilled advice. But I must say that I am disposed to mistrust a view of the facts of the case which did not present itself at the time to those who heard the story from the lips of the witnesses, and I cannot help adding that I think it would have been a matter of regret, and not perhaps of the best example, if your Lordships had been compelled to determine the case against the captain of the Tasmania, upon a ground that was not urged during the trial, and in reference to which he was asked no questions, and given no opportunity of explanation. I concur in the motion which has been proposed.

Lord Morris.—[After stating the facts, his Lordship continued:] My Lords: On the evidence I would incline to the opinion that the captain of the Tasmania acted as promptly as a reasonable, prudent man could, who was called on suddenly on seeing the green light of the City of Corinth within about four lengths of his vessel. He knew he was on his own right course, and it seems to me an awkward argument on the part of the respondents that the captain of the Tasmania was at once to arrive at a distinct and clear conclusion that the City of Corinth was pertinaciously to continue in the wrong course which she had taken since he had first sighted her. From the time he saw the green light of the City of Corinth, and thereby could for the first time at all know or anticipate anything of danger from the wrong course taken by the City of Corinth, until the collision actually took place, was a matter of seconds of time, not more certainly than a minute. He should consider the gravity of departing from his right course, and whether it would be justifiable to do so in consequence of the imminent danger. The policy of making rules is that they should be observed. In my opinion, large allowance should be made for sudden consideration whether directory rules should be disobeyed in order to avoid collision, and, when such collision is caused by the misconduct of the party complaining, there should, in my opinion, be very clear proof of contributory negligence. I cannot concur in the opinion that the inquiry by the captain of the Tasmania whether his own lights were properly burning, was a useless one. If his own lights were not right it might account for the strange course the City of Corinth had taken; while, if burning properly, he might expect that the City of Corinth would, at the last moment, alter her helm and pass the Tasmania. Nor do I consider it at all unreasonable that at such a supreme moment he should have called his mate beside him. In my opinion, the captain of the Tasmania did not act with irresolution, but gave his order to put his helm hard down, reasonably, promptly, and with decision. I should, however, have felt great, if not insuperable difficulty, acting on my own opinion, in reversing the order of the Court of Appeal in a case of this kind, except for this reason: the whole course of the trial before Butt, J. was on an entirely different contention on the part of the respondents. There is no trace of any contention that the captain of the Tasmania delayed improperly in changing his course when it became necessary to avoid imminent danger; on the contrary, the charge was that he had improperly altered his course, and thereby led to the collision. The evidence was addressed to that contention, and it would be most dangerous and unfair, in my opinion, to spell out conclusions on a new issue from answers in the evidence which were given to questions on a different and inconsistent issue. I confess I should have much wished for the assistance of skilled nautical assessors in dealing with such a case as the present; but, as I cannot find satisfactory evidence on which the Tasmania should be held to blame, I think the judgment of Butt, J. should be restored.

Order appealed from reversed. Decree of Butt, J. restored, with costs in this House and below.

Dec. 3, 4, 5, 6, 10, 1889, and April 30, 1890.

(Present: The Right Hons. the Lord Chancellor (Halsbury), Lord Bramwell, Sir Barnes Peacock, and Sir Richard Couch, with Nautical Assessors.)

The Shaw, Savill, and Albion Company v. The Timaru Harbour Board. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM THE SUPREME COURT OF NEW ZEALAND.

Pilot—Negligence—Liability of harbour board—New Zealand Harbours Act 1878, ss. 49, 75, 76, 215, 227.

(a) Reported by C. E. Malden, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

A harbour board was empowered by statute to license pilots for the purpose of acting within their district. Pilotage was not compulsory in the district, and the pilot made his own bargain with the shipowner. The harbour master, who was also a duly licensed pilot, was acting as pilot to a vessel, engaged by the owners themselves, when she was wholly lost, through his negligence and default.

Held, that the harbour board were not responsible, as they were only entitled under the statute by which they were constituted to issue licences, and were not liable for the negligence of those they licensed.

Judgment of the court below affirmed, upon different grounds, and with a variation.

THIS was an appeal by the Shaw, Savill, and Albion Company Limited from a judgment or order of the Court of Appeal of New Zealand, dated the 7th May 1888, whereby on motion by the present respondents for a nonsuit or a new trial in an action in the Supreme Court of New Zealand, Canterbury District, in which action the appellants were plaintiffs and the respondents defendants, it was adjudged that judgment should be entered for the defendants with costs 300*l.*, and disbursements exclusively attributable to the defence of want of notice of action, and that the plaintiffs should have all costs and disbursements of the proofs of all matters of fact in the case except the costs relative to proof of notice of action.

The appellants were a company, incorporated under the Companies Acts, having their head office in London, and an agent in New Zealand named Ritchie. They carried on business with New Zealand, and were on the 12th June 1886 the owners of a vessel called the Lyttelton, of 1110 tons register, then lying with a cargo of wool and merchandise on board in the port or harbour of Timaru, in New Zealand.

The respondents were the Timaru Harbour Board, a body corporate under the Timaru Harbour Act 1876 and the Harbours Act 1878, having jurisdiction over and within the port or harbour of Timaru.

The action was brought by the appellants to recover the sums of 15,500*l.*, the value of their vessel the Lyttelton, and 17,302*l.* 16*s.* 8*d.*, the value of the cargo on board her, as damages for the negligence and default of the respondents' servant Robert Storm, the deputy harbour master and pilot, who was in charge of the Lyttelton at the time of the loss and damage hereinafter mentioned, and by whose negligence it was alleged by the appellants the Lyttelton and her cargo were wholly lost.

The respondents in their amended defence by virtue of sect. 227 of the Harbours Act 1878 pleaded the general issue, denying all the allegations in the statement of claim, and in the second paragraph pleading:

That the alleged acts and defaults mentioned in the said amended statement of claim, as constituting the plaintiffs' alleged cause of action, took place after the passing of the above Act, and after it had come into operation, and no notice in writing signed by the plaintiff or his solicitor specifying the cause of such action was given to the defendant one month before such action was commenced, pursuant to the provisions of sect. 227 of the above Act;

and in the third paragraph of their defence,

That the alleged acts and defaults mentioned in the amended statement of claim, as constituting the plaintiffs' alleged cause of action, took place after the passing of the Harbours Act 1878, and after the said Act came into operation, but the said action was not commenced within three months after the commission of such alleged acts and defaults, or any of them, pursuant to the provisions of sect. 227 of the above Act.

The defendants in their defence further traversed the incorporation of the plaintiff company, the ownership of the Lyttelton and her cargo, and their respective values. They denied that the vessel was lawfully using the harbour; that she was under the care or control of the defendants, or their servants; that they had control of the navigation of the vessel in leaving the harbour; that the defendants caused Robert Storm to take charge of the vessel for any purpose; that Robert Storm, in what he was alleged to have done, was acting within the scope of his authority or duty; that there was any negligence on the part of Storm; and that the wreck of the Lyttelton was caused by any act or default on the part of the said Robert Storm, whether negligent or otherwise. They admitted that under the Harbours Act 1878, and certain bye-laws thereunder made, the defendant board had jurisdiction over and within the port or harbour of Timaru. They alleged that if Storm rendered any such services as alleged, he did so merely on behalf of the plaintiffs and not as the servant of the defendants; that no pilotage district had been created, and no pilotage rates were charged by the defendants, and that the services rendered by Storm were gratuitous; that the proximate cause of the loss was the negligence of the master and crew of the plaintiffs' vessel, or the negligence of the master of the steamship Grafton, in tow of which vessel (engaged by the plaintiffs' agents) the Lyttelton was, shortly before the accident causing her loss, and that after the sinking of the vessel she and her cargo might have been saved by the exercise of due care and skill on the part of the plaintiffs, their servants, or agents.

The action was tried at Wellington, in New Zealand, before Richmond, J. and a special jury, on March 1887.

The outline of the circumstances giving rise to the action and the facts as regards the notice of action and the commencement of the said action proved or admitted at the trial were as follows:—

The port of Timaru is on the eastern coast of Middle Island, New Zealand, and is a roadstead harbour facing north-easterly. A curved breakwater leading about N.E. and by N. protects the harbour to the southward and eastward. On the northern side of the breakwater is a wharf, opposite to and in a line with the seaward end of which are three—buoys a chequered buoy, distant about 60 fathoms from the end of the wharf; a red buoy, about 300 feet from the chequered buoy; and a buoy known as the wreck buoy, about 954 feet from the red.

The limits of the harbour were defined by Governor's warrant in the Gazette of 22nd Feb. 1883, and it was proved that the Lyttelton was at the time of the accident, and at the time at which she sank, within the limit so defined.

The respondent board had under sect. 49 of the Harbours Act 1878 power to appoint and employ a harbour master, pilots, and other officers and servants, the salaries to be paid out of the harbour fund, and one person being competent to hold two or more of such offices.

Under sect. 76 of the above Act, the board had power to appoint licensed pilots to act within a district attached to the harbour under their control, the limits of such district to be defined by the Governor under sect. 75, and the limits so defined to be gazetted. The board to fix the pilotage rates to be paid within such district.

Sects. 109 to 131 deal with the powers to charge dues. Sect. 171 of the Act of 1878 provided as to what the harbour fund should consist of, and sect. 172 as to how the fund should be disposed of. By sect. 8 of the Harbours Act 1878 Amendment Act 1886, sect. 172 of the Act of 1878 was repealed, and it was enacted that all moneys arising from any of the sources mentioned in the said Act shall . . . be paid into an account called the Harbour Fund Account . . . which by sect. 9 of the said amending Act shall be applied by the board in payment of all charges and expenses incurred in carrying the Harbours Act 1878 into execution, and in doing and performing all acts and things which the board are by the said Act . . . empowered or required to do, execute, and perform.

By sect. 215 of the Act of 1878, the harbour board was empowered to make bye-laws, pursuant to which power the following amongst other bye-laws had been made by the respondent board: On the 6th May 1880 a bye-law authorising the levying of certain port charges; on the 22nd Feb. 1881 a bye-law authorising the levying of harbour master's fees; on the 11th Sept. 1884 a bye-law fixing dues, tolls, and charges, and regulating the conduct of shipping in the harbour; on the 12th Oct. 1882 a bye-law to further regulate the mode and place of mooring and anchoring of ships within the limits of the harbour, their position and government whilst there, and their unmooring and removal out of the harbour, and giving certain powers to the harbour master or his deputy.

No pilotage district attached to the harbour over which the respondent board had control was ever defined by the Governor. Pilotage was not compulsory at Timaru, nor did the board license any pilot or pilots or charge any specific pilotage rate under sects. 75 and 76 of the Harbours Act 1878. Vessels coming into port were charged under the Acts and bye-laws amongst other things with certain port charges and harbour master's fees. The Lyttelton was charged with and paid these. The moneys so obtained formed the harbour fund, used for the general purposes of the harbour as by the above Acts provided, and out of that fund the salaries of the officers of the board were paid. The board employed a harbour master, Captain Webster, and one Robert Storm as deputy harbour master and pilot, whose duty it was to take charge and control of vessels entering or leaving the harbour, and to regulate the moorings whilst there, but he had no certificate or licence as a pilot.

The Lyttelton was loaded at Timaru with a cargo of wool, frozen mutton, and general merchandise, which was shipped on board for carriage to England, and of this the appellants were the bailees. The respondents' tug left Timaru for repairs about the 31st May and did not return until after the 12th June, on which date Captain Webster, the harbour master, who left Timaru on the 9th June, was also absent. It was arranged that the Grafton, a powerful twin-screw coasting steamer, should tow the Lyttelton out.

On the 11th the Lyttelton was ready for sea, and Storm, the deputy harbour master, informed the captain that early on the morning of the 12th he would unmoor her, and that although the tide would not be high until eleven, with the Grafton to tow her it would be all right.

On the morning of the 12th, Storm came on board the vessel and took charge, acting as pilot, and the Lyttelton was hauled out from the wharf under his orders, and made fast by his directions to the chequered buoy. She drew 17 feet 2 inches forward and 18 feet 8 inches aft, and was in good sailing trim. At 6 a.m. the pumps were sounded, and it was found that she was tight. The Grafton was at the red buoy, and her master was informed that the Lyttelton was ready and her hawser was sent on board the tug and made fast, and the captain of the Grafton proceeded to take steps to bring the Grafton ahead into position, but whilst so doing Storm cast off from the buoys, and directed the Grafton to tow to the shore side of the red buoy.

The Grafton accordingly commenced towing with 60 or 70 fathoms scope of hawser between the vessels, the Grafton then being broad-off on the port bow of the Lyttelton, and having the red buoy on her starboard side. The hawser then fouled the buoy, tightened, and brought the head of the Grafton about north. The helm of the Lyttelton was starboarded, her head brought to the north-west, the hawser cleared, and the vessels passed the red buoy. The Lyttelton kept her helm a-starboard until about her own length past the buoy, when Storm ordered the helm to be steadied. The Grafton was still endeavouring to get into position, the Lyttelton not being properly astern of her, and they thus passed the wreck buoy.

In these circumstances those on board the Lyttelton felt her twice touch slightly aft, and her helm was by Storm's orders immediately ported and she was brought head to sea with the Grafton abaft the beam, and as in the position in which the vessels then were it was useless to continue towing, the Grafton came astern, cast off, and prepared to come up on the starboard side, and take the rope again.

Before the Lyttelton had lost way Storm ordered her anchor to be let go in shallow water. The port anchor was then let go in obedience to Storm's orders, and the vessel was felt to strike twice heavily. It was shortly afterwards found that the vessel was making water fast forward; she settled down, and in about twenty minutes from the time the anchor was let go the vessel sank.

After the accident the harbour was dragged in order to discover the port anchor, and divers employed by various parties examined the wreck, with the result that in Sept. 1886 the port anchor was found by a diver, its stock bent, and the stock, shank, and one fluke through the bottom of the vessel forward of the step of the foremast.

The defendants' case as to the sinking of the vessel was, that she was making water when she started, and that this caused her to sink; but according to the finding of the jury the plaintiffs' case that the vessel was holed by her anchor being improperly let go by Storm's orders was clearly established.

By sect. 227 of the Harbours Act 1878 it is enacted that

> No plaintiff shall recover in any action commenced against any harbour board or person for anything done in pursuance of this Act unless such action be commenced within three months after the act committed, and unless notice has been given to the defendant one month before such action is commenced of such intended action, signed by the plaintiff or his solicitor, specifying the cause of such action.

The steps taken by the appellants to comply with the requirements of the above section were as follows: Mr J. M. Ritchie, of Dunedin, the agent of the appellant company, instructed Mr. Maude, a solicitor of the Supreme Court of New Zealand, to give the notice on behalf of the appellant company, claiming 41,500*l.* for ship and cargo, by written instructions, dated the 7th July 1886, and notice of action, signed by Mr. Maude, was duly given to the respondents on the 9th Aug. 1886. On the 9th Sept. 1886 a warrant to sue, authorising Mr. Maude to act on behalf of the appellants, was sealed in London, and on the 11th Sept. 1886 the action was commenced.

At the close of the plaintiffs' case on the sixth day of the trial, the Attorney-General asked for a nonsuit: the learned judge refused a nonsuit, but stated he would reserve all or any of the points. The defendants then called their evidence.

The jury found a verdict for the plaintiffs for 14,490*l.* the ship, and 17,302*l.* 16*s.* 8*d.* cargo.

Richmond, J. then gave judgment for the plaintiffs with costs according to scale, reserving leave to the defendants to move for a nonsuit, or to enter a verdict and judgment for defendants, or to reduce the damages by the value of the cargo.

On the 26th March 1887 the defendants (respondents) gave notice of motion in accordance with the leave reserved at the trial for a nonsuit or judgment for the defendants, or for a new trial.

On the 12th Sept. 1887 the defendants served the plaintiffs with notice of motion to enlarge the time for moving for a new trial, and for a new trial on the ground of the alleged discovery of evidence since the trial which it was alleged could not before the trial of the action have been foreseen or known.

By order of the Supreme Court of New Zealand, Canterbury District, dated the 12th Oct. 1887, the defendants' two motions were removed into the Court of Appeal.

The motions were heard before the Court of Appeal of New Zealand, consisting of Prendergast, C.J., Richmond and Gillies, JJ., in Nov. 1888. The Court, on the 5th June 1888 (Gillies, J. dissenting), directed judgment to be entered for the defendants (respondents), on the ground of want of proper notice of action, but found and decided against the defendants (respondents) on all the other points raised by the notices of motion.

The appellants moved the court for leave to appeal to Her Majesty in Council, which leave was granted, subject to the usual conditions.

On the 26th March 1889 the respondents presented a petition to Her Majesty in Council, praying for special leave to prefer and prosecute a cross-appeal. The appellants appeared by counsel at the hearing of this petition, and the following terms were arranged:—Respondents on this motion agreeing that in the event of the board on the principal appeal entering upon and disposing of the merits of the case apart from any question of want of notice, the respondents in principal appeal shall not be prejudiced as regards the matter of costs by reason of their not having presented a cross-appeal. No order, except that the question of costs of this application be reserved to the hearing of the principal appeal.

Finlay, Q.C., J. F. Clerk, and Batten appeared for the appellants.

Sir H. Davey, Q.C., Kennedy, Q.C., and Lush Wilson for the respondents.

A considerable part of the argument was taken up with the question whether sufficient notice of action under the local Act had been given, which, in the view taken by their Lordships, it is not necessary to report, and also with the questions of fact as to the loss of the ship. It was further argued for the respondents that Storm, in acting as pilot, was not acting as servant of the board so as to make them liable for his acts, and that the board was under no statutory duty or obligation to provide pilotage, and there could be no remedy against the funds in their hands, and that Storm was not acting within the scope of his duties as harbour master, and had no authority, except from the appellants themselves, to take charge of the ship. The board had no power to enter into pilotage contracts at all.

At the conclusion of the argument their Lordships took time to consider their judgment.

April 30.—Their Lordships' judgment was delivered by

The Lord Chancellor (Halsbury).—This is an appeal by a company carrying on business as shipowners against a judgment of the Court of Appeal of New Zealand, whereby judgment was entered for the defendants, the Timaru Harbour Board. The plaintiff company owned a vessel called the Lyttelton, and on the 12th June 1886, while under the conduct and management of a person named Storm, the Lyttelton was sunk, as was alleged, by want of due care by Storm, who was a licensed pilot, and also was the deputy harbour master of the harbour of Timaru. The cause was tried before Richmond, J. and a special jury, and a verdict was found for the plaintiffs both for the value of the ship (14,000*l.*) and for the value of the cargo (17,000*l.*). Leave was reserved at the trial to enter a verdict for the defendants in lieu thereof upon various points of law. The majority of the Court of Appeal, on the ground that no sufficient notice of action as required by a local statute had been given by the plaintiffs, entered judgment for the defendants, and this appeal is brought against that order of the New Zealand Court of Appeal.

With respect to the questions of fact involved in this appeal, their Lordships are of opinion that no ground has been shown for disturbing the verdict of the jury. They are of opinion that the loss of the vessel was due to the mismanagement and want of skill of the person then acting as pilot, and that the management of the tug did not in any material degree contribute to the catastrophe which happened. In this view of the facts they are confirmed by the opinion of the nautical assessors. The next question raised on the appeal is the validity of the notice of action, and this in turn depends upon the proof of agency in the person by whom, in fact, the notice of action was given. That question was a question of fact, and if no arrangement had been arrived at by the parties must have been submitted to the jury. By consent, that question was withdrawn from the consideration of the jury and left for the determination of the court. It is not necessary for their Lordships to express any opinion upon this part of the case, inasmuch as the serious and important ground upon which the case was argued depended on the competency, in point of law, of the Timaru Harbour Board as constituted by statute to enter into pilotage contracts, or in their corporate capacity to employ a person as pilot for the conduct and management of a particular vessel. Now, the ambit of the harbour board's powers is prescribed by statute. That for their own purposes they might employ a pilot for the purpose of moving vessels which neglected the orders of the harbour master in his capacity of administering the shipping in and about the harbour, may be true enough. But their sole duty, as constituted by statute, in respect of pilots was to license pilots between whom and themselves the only relation which the law contemplated as existing was that they should be under their supervision and under their jurisdiction for the purpose of being duly licensed; but once licensed the pilot had to make his own bargain with the shipowner, and would incur in that contract of pilotage only his own personal liability for the due performance of his duty. The statute and the rules made under it seem carefully worded so as to exclude the notion that the harbour board, in its corporate capacity, is acting as pilots for the vessels frequenting the harbour, and their Lordships are of opinion that what is not permitted to the harbour board under the statute is prohibited; they are not therefore authorised to pledge public funds for the purpose of entering into private engagements, and cannot be held responsible for the default of their harbour master, who in fact was acting as pilot for the vessel, not in the view their Lordships take of the facts as harbour master, but as pilot engaged by the parties themselves, and was only himself personally liable for acting in the capacity of pilot, though he happened to fill the character of deputy harbour master at the same time.

The facts of the case are peculiar in this respect, that the transaction in question was out of the ordinary course of duty in more aspects than one. It would be intelligible that the harbour board should with their own tug and harbour master aid vessels in entering or departing from the harbour, having taken care that both their harbour master and the appliances at his command were sufficient for the purpose of effecting the object desired. In this case the tug boat (by which the harbour board were in the habit of assisting vessels as they did) was out of repair; the parties, at their own risk, appear to have employed a steam-tug not the property of or habitually under the command of the harbour master. And, when it is remembered that the accident itself happened partly by reason of the inappropriateness of the steam-tug employed for the purpose, it is not an unimportant topic for consideration that even the ordinary practice of the harbour board, whether authorised or not by law, was not the practice in following which this accident happened, but the error of the pilot in attempting to conduct an operation by a vessel not used by the harbour board, and inappropriate for the purposes for which it was selected by the parties now complaining. Their Lordships, however, are of opinion that, even had the misfortune happened in the use of the steam tug according to the ordinary practice and by the person who, as a matter of fact, was the harbour master, the harbour board had no authority to enter into such a contract, as they were not entitled by statute themselves to become pilots, but only to license others for that vocation. Their Lordships will, therefore, humbly advise Her Majesty that this appeal should be dismissed, and that the judgment of the Court of Appeal of New Zealand should be varied by entering judgment for the defendants, and that the appellants pay the costs of the suit and of this appeal.

COURT OF APPEAL.

Thursday, May 15, 1890.

(Before Lord ESHER, M.R., FRY and LOPES, L.JJ., assisted by NAUTICAL ASSESSORS.)

THE ASSYRIAN. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM THE PROBATE, DIVORCE, AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION (ADMIRALTY).

Damage to cargo — Screw alley — Matters of nautical skill — Trinity Masters — Evidence — Practice.

In Admiralty actions, where the court is assisted by nautical assessors, evidence as to matters of nautical skill and knowledge is not admissible, and hence, where in a damage to cargo action the judge found on the advice of his assessors that all screw alleys, however well made, may emit smells which may damage sensitive cargo stowed in the vicinity, the Court of Appeal, being assisted by assessors, refused to allow the appellants, the shipowners, at the hearing of the appeal, to call evidence to show that the particular screw alley did not emit a smell, on the ground that it was a question of nautical skill about which evidence could not be given.

THIS was an appeal by the defendants from a decision of Butt, J. in a damage to cargo action.

(a) Reported by J. P. ASPINALL and BUTLER ASPINALL, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

The action was instituted by the owners of a cargo of flour against the owners of the steamship Assyrian, which carried the flour from America to Liverpool.

On delivery of the cargo to the plaintiffs, part of it was found to be tainted with a smell, and it was in respect of this damage that the action was brought.

It appeared that part of the cargo was stowed in the immediate neighbourhood of the ship's screw alley.

Butt, J. gave judgment for the plaintiffs, finding as a fact that the flour when shipped was in good order and condition, and was delivered damaged. In the course of his judgment the learned judge stated that, whilst he could not state the precise cause of the injury, he had been advised by his assessors that all screw alleys, however well made, may emit smells which may damage sensitive cargo stowed in the vicinity, and that that perhaps was the cause of the present damage.

The question of the damage being caused by the screw alley had not been raised at the trial by counsel, and no evidence had been directed to it.

Sir Walter Phillimore (with him Dr. Raikes), for the appellants, asked leave to call evidence to show that this particular screw alley did not emit any smell. The mind of the judge was influenced by this advice of the Elder Brethren. We could have given evidence to show that the Assyrian's screw alley was so constructed as to make it impossible to emit a smell. [ESHER, M.R. —This is a matter depending on a nautical knowledge of ships, and when the court has skilled advice you cannot give such evidence.] It may be that in most ships the screw alleys do emit smells, but I can show that in this particular case no smell could be emitted. The assessors have never seen this particular ship, and however valuable their advice, they cannot speak with certainty as to this ship.

Barnes, Q.C. (with him Joseph Walton), for the respondents, was not called on.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—It seems to us that this advice which was given by the Trinity Masters to Butt, J. was founded upon a nautical knowledge of ships. That is a matter about which evidence cannot be given at all, and therefore we cannot admit any evidence on this appeal.

FRY and LOPES, L.JJ. concurred.

The appeal was then heard, and dismissed with costs.

HIGH COURT OF JUSTICE.

QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION.

June 16 and July 1, 1890.

SERRAINO AND SONS v. CAMPBELL. (a)

Charter-party—Bill of lading—Incorporation of conditions of charter-party in bill of lading.

Where a bill of lading contains certain excepted perils, and after them the words "paying freight for the said coals and all other conditions as per charter-party," the latter words do not incorporate the excepted perils in the charter-party, but they only refer to the conditions in the charter-party ejusdem generis with the payment of freight.

The plaintiffs, the indorsees of a bill of lading, sued the defendants for damages for loss of goods shipped on board the defendants' vessel.

The goods were shipped by the charterer, the charter-party contained the following exceptions in print: "The act of God, the Queen's enemies, fire, and all and every other dangers and accidents of the seas, rivers, and navigation, of what nature and kind soever, during the said voyage," and in writing at the end: "Negligence clause as per Baltic Bill of Lading 1885."

The clause in the Baltic Bill of Lading 1885 excepted "Strandings, collisions, and all losses, even when occasioned by the negligence, default, or error of judgment of the pilot, master, mariners, or other servants of the shipowner."

The bill of lading provided that the goods were to be delivered, "the act of God, &c., excepted, unto order or to assigns, they paying freight for the said coals, and all other conditions as per charter-party with average accustomed."

Held, that the reference to the charter-party did not extend the exceptions contained in the bill of lading, and that, as the goods were lost through the negligence of the master of the vessel, the plaintiffs were entitled to judgment.

THE plaintiffs sought to recover the sum of 447*l.* 1*s.*, the amount which they alleged they had lost as indorsees of a bill of a lading for a cargo of coals shipped on board the defendants' vessel John Banfield. The vessel sailed from Newcastle-upon-Tyne upon the 20th Dec. 1887, for the port of Trapani, but was lost near Mazzara, on the coast of Sicily. A naval court of inquiry was held at Palermo, and it was found that the cause of the stranding of the vessel was the careless navigation of the master and mate of the vessel. The plaintiffs alleged that careless navigation was not one of the exceptions contained in the bill of lading, but the defendants contended that the bill of lading incorporated all the conditions of the charter-party which was subject to the negligence clause, as per Baltic Bill of Lading 1885, which excepted careless navigation, and that they were therefore not liable.

The charter-party was dated the 12th Dec. 1887, and was, so far as is material to the present case, in the following terms:

It is this day mutually agreed between Henry Campbell, of the good ship John Banfield, of the burden of 750 tons or thereabouts, now in the Tyne, and Fisher, Renwick, and Co., as agents for charterers, that the said ship being tight, staunch, and strong, and in every way fitted for the voyage, shall with all convenient speed proceed to a loading-place in the Tyne as ordered, and there load a full and complete cargo of large steam coals, &c., and being so loaded shall therewith proceed to Trapani and deliver the same according to the laws and customs of the port of discharge to the order of the said freighter or his or their assigns, on being paid freight at and after the rate of eleven shillings and threepence per ton of 20 cwts. delivered.

The freighter paying all customary dues and duties on the cargo and the ship all other charges. (The act of God, the Queen's enemies, fire, and all and every other dangers and accidents of the seas, rivers, and navigation, of what nature and kind soever, during the said voyage, always excepted.) . . .

Negligence clause as per Baltic Bill of Lading 1885.

(a) Reported by W. H. HORSFALL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The negligence clause in the Baltic Bill of Lading 1885 was as follows:

The act of God, perils of the sea, fire, barratry of the master and crew, enemies, pirates, and robbers, arrests and restraints of princes, rulers, and people, and other accidents of navigation excepted. Strandings and collisions, and all losses and damages caused thereby, are also excepted, even when occasioned by negligence, default, or error in judgment of the pilot, master, mariners, or other servants of the shipowners. . . .

The following was the form of the bill of lading given by the master of the John Banfield, and was dated the 20th Dec. 1887:

Shipped in good order and well condition by Fisher, Renwick, and Co., in and upon the good ship called the John Banfield, whereof is master for the present voyage, Anderson, and now lying in the river Tyne, and bound for Trapani, 752 tons, large Newcastle steam coals, and are to be delivered in the like good order and well conditioned at the aforesaid port of Trapani (the act of God, the Queen's enemies, fire, and all and every other the dangers and accidents of the seas, rivers, and navigation of whatever nature and kind soever excepted), unto order or to assigns, they paying freight for the said coals, and all other conditions, as per charter, with average accustomed. . . .

The question whether the vessel was lost through the negligence of the master was left by the learned judge to the jury, and they found that it was. The jury were then discharged, and it was agreed that the construction to be put upon the bill of lading, and the question whether Fisher, Renwick, and Co. were acting as agents for the plaintiffs when they entered into the charter-party, should be decided by the judge alone.

On behalf of the plaintiffs it was argued that they had bought the cargo of coals from Fisher, Renwick and Co., to be delivered at Trapani, and that Fisher, Renwick, and Co., although they described themselves in the charter-party as agents for the charterers, were really acting as principals in the matter.

Cur. adv. vult.

July 1.—HUDDLESTON, B. delivered the following written judgment: — This was an action brought by the plaintiffs, indorsees of the bill of lading and owners of goods intrusted to the defendants as owners of the vessel John Banfield, for delivery at Trapani, in the island of Sicily, shipped by Messrs. Fisher, Renwick, and Co., and lost by reason of the negligence and want of skill of the officers and crew in charge of the ship near Mazzara on the coast of Sicily. The vessel stranded at Mazzara, and the plaintiffs' goods were lost. Witnesses being called, the jury found that the loss was due to the negligence of the master. On that finding it was agreed that the jury should be discharged, and that the rest of the case should be decided by me alone. The charter-party, which was in the ordinary form, was described to be by Fisher, Renwick, aud Co., as "agents for the charterers." It contained in print the usual exceptions—"The act of God, the Queen's enemies, fire, and all and every other dangers and accidents of the seas, rivers, and navigation, of what nature and kind soever during the said voyage," and in writing at the end, "Negligence clause, as per Baltic Bill of Lading 1885." It was contended on the part of the defendants that the plaintiffs were parties to the charter-party, Fisher, Renwick, and Co. being their agents, and that therefore the plaintiffs, as principals, were bound by all the terms of the charter-party; that if not actual parties, as principals, to the charter-party, they were so to the bill of lading, which, it was argued, incorporated all the provisions of the charter-party, including the Baltic Bill of Lading clause of 1885. Apart from Fisher, Renwick, and Co. describing themselves as agents for the charterers, there was no evidence to show that they were so in fact. The contract between them and the plaintiffs was contained in letters and telegrams discussing the price, and concluded with a letter of Dec. 12, in which Fisher, Renwick, and Co. write: "Referring to telegrams exchanged between us, we confirm sale to your good selves of a cargo of large Newcastle steam coals at 19*s.* 6*d.* per ton c. i. f. Trapani." The invoice was made out by Fisher, Renwick, and Co. as vendors to the plaintiffs as vendees. I was clearly of opinion that the contract was one of sale, and not of agency, and that Fisher, Renwick, and Co. were principals in the charter-party, and that the plaintiffs were not parties directly bound by it.

It was, however, contended that the bill of lading incorporated all the provisions of the charter-party, and amongst those the Baltic clause. The bill of lading provided that the goods shipped in the John Banfield by Fisher, Renwick, and Co. were to be delivered at the port of Trapani, "the act of God, the Queen's enemies, fire, and all and every other dangers and accidents of the seas, rivers, and navigation, of what nature and kind soever, excepted, unto order or to assigns, they paying freight for the said coals, and all other conditions as per charter, with average accustomed." And it was argued that the word "all other conditions as per charter" imported into the bill of lading the Baltic clause. The Baltic clause provided that strandings and collisions and all losses and damages caused thereby were to be excepted, even when occasioned by the "negligence, default, or error of judgment of the pilot, master, mariners, or other servants of the shipowners." I am of opinion that "all other conditions" must be connected with the words "paying freight for coals," and include only such conditions as are ejusdem generis to paying freight, importing into the bill of lading so much of the charter-party as is referable to the subject-matter of the discharge and receipt of the cargo at the port of discharge, and do not include a clause which would add to the exceptions already recited, and very materially alter the contract on the face of the bill of lading. Russell v. Niemann (10 L. T. Rep. N. S. 786; 2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 72; 17 C. B. N. S. 163) is directly in point, and was referred to and approved in Taylor v. Perrin in the House of Lords, the shorthand-writer's judgment in which has been furnished to me as the case does not seem to have found its way into any of the regular reports. In that case Lord O'Hagan described Russell v. Niemann as a perfectly well-decided case. Lord Blackburn says: "I am very clearly of opinion that, on the true construction of the bill of lading, the reference to the charter-party does not extend the exceptions by adding those that are put in the charter-party. In the case which has been referred to, Russell v. Nie- mann, in which Willes, J. gave judgment, it was perfectly correctly decided, as it seems to me, that the reference to the charter-party is meant to bring in those conditions which would apply to the person who has taken the bill of lading and is taking the delivery of the cargo, such as the paying of demurrage, the paying of freight, the manner of paying, and so on, and by no means extends to incorporate all the conditions in the charter-party." It was said that Lord Fitzgerald appeared to dissent in the House of Lords, but I do not so read his judgment; he merely says that it is not necessary to discuss the point for the decision of the particular case before them. Mr. French argued that Gray v. Carr (25 L. T. Rep. N. S. 215; 1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 115; L. Rep. 6 Q. B. 522) and Porteus v. Watney (39 L. T. Rep. N. S. 195; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 34; 3 Q. B. Div. 534) must be considered to overrule Russell v. Niemann (ubi sup.), but in both those cases the conditions imported into the bill of lading were of the same character, ejusdem generis, as those contained in the charter-party. The other authorities Gullischen v. Stewart (50 L. T. Rep. N. S. 47; 11 Q. B. Div. 186; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 200; 13 Q. B. Div. 317), Gardner v. Trechman (53 L. T. Rep. N. S. 518; 15 Q. B. Div. 154), and Hamilton v. Mackie (Times L. Rep., vol. 5, p. 677) amount to this—that all the provisions of the charter-party with such words of reference in the bill of lading are to be considered as introduced into the bill of lading, and that if then any of those are contradictory to the terms of the bill of lading or insensible they may be rejected. In this case as the parties have agreed that there should be only certain exceptions mentioned in the bill of lading, the introduction of the Baltic clause altogether overrides those exceptions, and therefore is inconsistent with the provisions which in the bill of lading were agreed to by the parties. Under these circumstances I am of opinion that, the negligence having been proved, the defendants are not exempted from the consequences thereof, either by the terms of the bill of lading or the charter-party, and that therefore the plaintiffs are entitled to a verdict and judgment for the full amount claimed 447*l.* 0*s.* 1*d.*

NORMAN v. BINNINGTON AND CO. (a)

Bill of lading—Damage to cargo—Liability of shipowners—Exceptions—Negligence—"In navigating the ship or otherwise."

The exceptions in a bill of lading of "negligence or default of the pilot, master, mariner, engineers, or other persons in the service of the ship, whether in navigating the ship or otherwise," apply to damage done to goods whilst being stowed and before the voyage has commenced.

The above exceptions are to be read as meaning an absolute exemption from liability for damage caused, whether in negligently navigating the ship, or in negligently bringing about any other losses from which the shipowner has exempted himself in the bill of lading.

The plaintiff shipped in good order and condition on board the defendants' vessel at Galveston certain bags of cotton-seed cake, and, by the terms of the bill of lading, the defendants undertook to deliver them in like good order and condition at Liverpool.

Amongst other exceptions in the bill of lading it was provided that the defendants should not be liable for the "negligence or default of the pilot, master, mariner, engineers, or other persons in the service of the ship, whether in navigating the ship or otherwise."

Whilst the ship was loading other goods, there was a heavy storm of rain and the plaintiff's goods were damaged, either by the rain falling direct upon them through the open hatchways, or by bales of cotton, which had become wet through standing in the rain, being placed in contact with them.

The jury found that the defendants were guilty of negligence in the stowing of the cargo, and Charles, J., upon that finding, entered judgment for the plaintiff.

Held, that, under the above exception, the defendants were exempt from liability for injury caused to the plaintiff's goods, after they were shipped, by the negligence of the persons in the service of the ship, and that judgment must therefore be entered for the defendants.

THIS was a motion on behalf of the defendants for a new trial, or in the alternative that the judgment entered for the plaintiff at the trial should be set aside and judgment entered for the defendants.

The action was tried before Charles, J. and a common jury at the Liverpool Winter Assizes; the jury found that the defendants' servants had been guilty of negligence, and upon that finding the learned judge entered judgment for the plaintiff.

The plaintiff sought to recover damages for injury to 1280 bags of cotton-seed cake shipped in good order and condition on board the defendants' steamship Glenfield, and which, by the terms of the bill of lading given by the defendants, they undertook to deliver in like good order and condition.

The defendants denied that the bags were injured, and in the alternative said that if they were, the defendants were exempt from liability under the provisions of the bill of lading.

The bill of lading under which the goods were shipped described them as being shipped in good order and condition, and stated that they were to be delivered from the ship's deck when the ship's responsibility should cease, subject to certain undermentioned conditions, in the like good order and well condition at Liverpool. The exceptions were as follows: The act of God, Queen's enemies, pirates, robbers, thieves, vermin, jettison, barratry, misfeasance, error in judgment, negligence or default of pilot, master, mariners, engineers, or other persons in the service of the ship whether in navigating the ship or otherwise, restraints of princes, rulers or people, inaccuracies, obliteration or absence of marks, numbers, or address, loss or damage arising from insufficiency in strength of packages, from sweating, leakage, breakage, rain, spray, rust, decay from storage or contact with other goods, or from the boilers, steam or machinery, heat or fire on board, and all and every the dangers and accidents of the seas, land, and rivers, and of navigation, of whatever nature or kind being excepted, and the ship not being liable for any consequences of the causes herein excepted however caused or originated.

The plaintiffs' cotton-seed cake was loaded on board the Glenfield while the vessel was alongside the quay at Galveston, as was also some cotton in bales which did not belong to the plaintiff. The vessel then proceeded outside the bar and completed her loading from barges, the remainder of her cargo consisting of cotton in bales. While she was lying outside the bar there was very heavy rain, and it was suggested that the damage caused to the cotton-seed cake arose either from the rain falling down the hatchways on to the cake direct, or from the bales of cotton getting wet and then being placed upon the cake. Evidence was called at the trial on behalf of the plaintiff in support of this suggestion, and, no evidence having been called for the defendants, the jury found that the defendants were guilty of negligence in the stowing of the cargo. Upon this finding, as stated above, judgment was entered for the plaintiff.

Bigham, Q.C. and Joseph Walton for the defendants.—The jury at the trial found that the defendants had been guilty of negligence, and we rely upon that finding, and submit that the negligence of which the defendants have been found guilty is one of the exceptions specially mentioned in the bill of lading, and that the defendants are thereby freed from all liability in respect of the same. The case really turns upon the construction to be put upon the words "negligence or default of the master, mariners, engineers, or other persons in the service of the ship, whether in navigating the ship or otherwise." Charles, J., in the course of his judgment, said: "I think here that the words "or otherwise" must mean something in connection with the navigation of the ship as a ship." We submit that the construction to be put upon the words "or otherwise" is exactly the opposite, and that they refer to negligence which had nothing to do with navigating the ship. They referred to [SMITH, J.—The seed cake was shipped in good order and condition, and the bill of lading attaches as soon as that takes place. CAVE, J.—In the passage you have referred to the Lord Chancellor was dealing only with "perils of the seas."] These exceptions are put into the bill of lading by the shipowner for his own protection, and, if there is any ambiguity about the terms, they must be construed in favour of the shipper and against the shipowner:

The words "or otherwise" in the expression "in navigating the ship or otherwise" mean something akin to navigating. [CAVE, J.—What general word do you say would cover "or otherwise"? The defendants called no evidence to remove the doubt as to how the damage to the cargo was caused; the only evidence at the trial was what appeared in the log. They also referred to Bigham, Q.C., in reply. Cur. adv. vult.

July 10.—SMITH, J. delivered the following judgment of the court:—This is an action by a shipper of goods against shipowners upon a bill of lading for damage to goods after being loaded on board the defendants' ship. The facts are as follows: The plaintiff's goods (cotton-seed cake) were loaded in the hold of the defendants' ship at the port of Galveston, and certain cotton in bales (not the plaintiff's) was also there put on board. It thereupon became necessary to complete the loading of the ship outside of the bar in the outer roads, and for this purpose the ship, with the plaintiff's goods on board, proceeded outside, and there anchored. Other cargo, viz., cotton bales (not the plaintiff's), was then brought alongside in lighters, and loaded in the ship, and the jury have found that the plaintiff's cake was then damaged by rain-water, either by it falling directly through the open hatchway on to the cake, or by reason of wet bales of cotton being then placed upon it, and that there was negligence on the part of those on board the ship in allowing the plaintiff's cake to be so damaged.

Upon these facts the question arises whether the plaintiff can maintain an action against the defendants for damage to his goods, or whether the defendants are protected by the exemptions in the bill of lading upon which the action is founded. The bill of lading, so far as is material, is as follows: "Shipped in good order and condition to be delivered, subject to the undermentioned conditions, in like good order and well conditioned, the act of God, the Queen's enemies, misfeasance, error in judgment, negligence or default of pilot, master, mariners, engineers, or other persons in the service of the ship, whether in navigating the ship or otherwise . . . loss or damage arising from insufficiency in strength of packages, from sweating, leakage, breakage, rain, spray, rust, decay, from storage or contact with other goods, or from the boilers, steam, or machinery, or from the consequences of any damage or injury thereto . . . and all and every the dangers and accidents of the seas, land, and rivers, and of navigation of whatever kind, being excepted, and the ship not being liable for any consequences of the causes herein, excepted, however, caused or originated." Under the bill of lading the shipowner became bound to deliver the goods at the port of discharge in like good order and condition as when shipped unless absolved by any of the excepted exemptions. My brother Charles, who tried the case, was of opinion that, inasmuch as the jury had found that the rain, or the contact with other wet goods, which damaged the plaintiff's goods, was permitted by reason of the negligence of those for whose acts the defendants were responsible, the defendants were not exempted from liability by the terms of the bill of lading and gave judgment for the plaintiff. In my judgment there was ample evidence to support the finding of the jury that the damage was occasioned by the negligence of those for whom the defendants were responsible. It has been held that in construing a clause in a bill of lading exempting a shipowner from liability, which is ambiguous and of doubtful meaning, the construction most in favour of the shipper, and not such as is most in favour of the shipowner, for whose benefit the exemptions are framed, is to be applied. See per Lush, J. in Taylor v. Liverpool and Great Western Steam Company (30 L. T. Rep. N. S. 715; 2 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 275; L. Rep. 9 Q. B. 549); and per Bowen, L.J. in Burton v. English (49 L. T. Rep. N. S. at p. 769; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 187; 12 Q. B. Div., at p. 224). I do not understand this to mean that the true canon of construction is not to be applied, but that, when applied, if ambiguity or doubt still exists, the construction is to be in favour of the shipper rather than of the owner. In this bill of lading the shipowner has exempted himself from damage to the shipper's goods by reason of rain or of contact with other goods. This is not disputed, but the shipper contended that this exception did not apply, first, to damage done before the voyage had actually commenced, and secondly, that it did not apply when the damage was brought about by the negligence of those for whose acts the defendant was responsible. As regards this first point I do not agree with it. In my judgment, when once a shipowner has received a shipper's goods on board his ship, and has by his captain given a bill of lading in the ordinary form for them, he is bound to deliver them at the port of discharge in like good order and condition as when shipped, except he is exempted by exemptions therein, and it is immaterial when the voyage in fact commences. The case of Hayn v. Culliford (39 L. T. Rep. N. S. 288; 40 L. T. Rep. N. S. 536; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 48, 288; 3 C. P. Div. 410; 4 C. P. Div. 182) was cited to support this contention, but in my opinion it does nothing of the kind. In that case the bill of lading exempted the shipowner "from any act of neglect or default whatever of the pilot, master, or mariner in navigating the ship," and it was held in the Court of Appeal that this clause did not exempt the shipowner from the default of their other agents and servants, and consequently not from the acts and defaults of the stevedore: (see judgment of the Court of Appeal, per Bramwell, L.J., 40 L. T. Rep. N. S. 537; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 129; 4 C. P. Div. 185.) This is all that case decided in the Court of Appeal. I desire to point out the difference between the bill of lading in the present case, and that in Hayn v. Culliford (ubi sup.). In the present case the words "engineers or other persons in the service of the ship" after the words "pilot, master, or mariners" were added, as it seems to me, expressly to meet the point taken successfully by the shipper in that case, and it also appears to me that the phrase "whether in navigating the ship or otherwise" was inserted to meet a point also taken in that case, but left expressly undecided by the Court of Appeal, viz., whether damage to goods in stowing them was damage done in "navigating the ship," which Denman, J. in the court below had held not to be so. Moreover, upon the facts of this case, the whole of the damage done to the plaintiff's goods was after they had been safely stowed in the defendants' ship and not in the process of stowing, as in Hayn v. Culliford. In my judgment the shipowner, under this bill of lading, was primâ facie exempted from liability for damage by rain or by contact with other goods after the goods had been shipped, whether the ship had started on her voyage or not.

I now come to the other contention of the shipper, viz., that, if the defendants' servants have brought about the damage by rain or contact with other goods by their negligence, the simple exception of liability from damage by rain or by contact with other goods would not exempt them. In this I agree, but it is answered by the shipowner that he is exempt by reason of the further exception in this bill of lading, viz., "negligence or default of pilot, master, mariners, engineers, or other persons in the service of the ship whether in navigating the ship or otherwise always excepted." It is upon the construction of these words "whether in navigating the ship or otherwise" that the decision of this case really depends. Mr. Kennedy says that the words "or otherwise" may mean two things, either (a) something akin to navigating the ship, or (b) something dissimilar to it, and that being so, under the rule laid down in the cases above cited, he asserts that they must be construed in favour of the shipper, and consequently held to mean something akin to navigating the ship. He was unable, when pressed, to give any intelligible instance of what came under the terms "akin to navigating the ship" which was not covered by the words "in navigating the ship." To read the words "or otherwise," as meaning "akin to navigating the ship" is to give no meaning in my judgment to the preceding words "in navigating the ship." It should be noticed that they are not words enumerating a class with general words following to which the doctrine of limiting the general words to the class is ordinarily applied. To read the words "or otherwise" as including everything besides navigating the ship is to render the words "in navigating the ship" inoperative, but to read the words "whether in navigating the ship or otherwise" as meaning an absolution from liability for damage brought about whether in negligently navigating the ship or in negligently bringing about those other losses or damages from which the shipowner has exempted himself in the bill of lading, is in my judgment the true reading of the bill of lading. By this means the true canon of construction is followed. The natural meaning is given to the words. A meaning is given to every word, and no word is rendered inoperative. When this is done there is no ambiguity or doubtful meaning. The shipowner by the bill of lading contracts to carry and deliver the shipper's goods in like good order and condition as when shipped, excepting that he will not be liable for damage thereto brought about either by the negligent navigation of his ship or for any of the losses and damages excepted in the bill of lading, even though brought about by the negligence of those for whose acts he is responsible. It is unnecessary to determine in this case whether the damage accrued was to the plaintiff's goods whilst the ship was or was not being navigated.

Our attention was called to a decision given in Australia in the case of Ah Kang v. Australasian Steam Navigation Company (9 Victoria L. Rep. 171), in which it was held upon demurrer that the words in a bill of lading "or under any other circumstances" following the general words of "restraint of princes or rulers, accident, loss, or damage from any act, neglect, or default whatsoever of the pilot, master, or mariner, and other servants of the company, in navigating the ship," did not cover the confiscation of the plaintiffs' goods at a foreign port by reason of the omission of the master to insert an entry of them in the ship's manifest, as required by the law of the port, a matter wholly dissimilar from any of the exceptions in the bill of lading, and in no way excepted therein, as in the present case the damage by rain and contact is. In my opinion, this fact distinguishes that case from the present, and I see no reason to dispute its accuracy even if it were binding upon us, which it is not. In my judgment the defendants in this case are exempt, under the terms of the bill of lading, from the liability sought to be imposed upon them, and that judgment should be entered for the defendants, and with costs. My brother Cave and my brother Williams wish me to state that they agree with this judgment.

THE MAGNETA. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM THE COUNTY COURT OF YORKSHIRE HOLDEN AT KINGSTON-ON-HULL.

Collision—Lights—Vessel at anchor—Rules for the Navigation of the River Humber.

Art. 2 of the Rules for the Navigation of the River Humber requiring that vessels having two or more masts when at anchor shall exhibit two white lights, one near the bow the other near the stern, the latter of which shall be exhibited "at double the height of the bow light" does not require that the stern light shall be precisely double the height of the other; and therefore, where the lights were exhibited ten and twenty-five feet respectively from the deck, it was held that there was no breach of the regulation.

THIS was an appeal by the defendants in a collision action from a decision of the judge of the Hull County Court, holding both vessels to blame.

The plaintiffs were the trustees of the Aire and Calder Navigation, and sought to recover compensation for damage to certain of their fly-boats whilst in tow of a tug by collision with the steam-trawler Magneta. The collision occurred about 5 a.m. on the 6th Jan. 1889 in the river Humber.

The Magneta was at anchor, and carried two anchor lights. Her forward light was at the forestay, about ten feet from the deck. Her after light was hung by a rope from the mizen-mast at about twenty-five feet from the deck. The after light was immediately above the top of a funnel which led up alongside the mast, and the fire was lighted at the time of the collision.

The judge found the tug-boat in charge of the fly-boats to blame for navigating in the fog then prevailing, and found the Magneta to blame for a breach of art. 2 of the Humber Navigation Rules in carrying her after light at five feet more than double the height of the forward light.

Rules for the Navigation of the River Humber, art. 2:

All vessels as aforesaid, when at anchor in the river Humber, or in any part of the river Ouse below the North-Eastern Railway bridge crossing the river Ouse at or near Hook, or in any part of the river Trent at or below Gainsborough, shall, between sunset and sunrise, instead of the light prescribed by art. 8 of the said regulations (i.e., the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea), exhibit from the forestay or otherwise near the bow of the vessel where it can be best seen a white light in a globular lantern of eight inches in diameter, and so constructed as to show a clear, uniform, and unbroken light visible all round the horizon at a distance of at least one mile, and, in addition thereto, all vessels having two or more masts shall exhibit another white light at double the height of the bow light at the main or mizzen peak or the boomtopping lift or other position near the stern where it can best be seen.

Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, art. 8:

A ship, whether a steamship or a sailing ship, when at anchor shall carry, where it can best be seen, but at a height not exceeding twenty feet above the hull, a white light in a globular lantern of not less than eight inches in diameter, and so constructed as to show a clear, uniform, and unbroken light visible all round the horizon at a distance of at least one mile.

Sir Walter Phillimore (with him L. Pyke), for the defendants, in support of the appeal.—There has been no infringement of the Humber Navigation Rules by the defendants. The rule does not mean that the after light shall be double the bow light; all it requires is that it shall be at least double the height of the other. To fix it at exactly double the height is in practice impossible; and were that the meaning of the rule nice questions would arise in every case as to how much latitude was to be allowed:

The Vera Cruz, 51 L. T. Rep. N. S. 24; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 254; 9 P. Div. 88.

Moreover, the judge has assumed that the heights are to be measured from the deck. I contend that they are to be taken from the water. If this be so, there was no evidence to justify the court in holding that the provisions as to heights had not been complied with. The rule itself does not say from where the height is to be measured; and it is to be noticed that in the article of the Sea Regulations which this rule replaces, the words "from the hull" are to be found. Their absence in these rules suggests that the hull or deck is not to be taken as the datum line. Lights are meant to be an indication to those on another vessel at night. In such circumstances they do not know the distance of the deck from the water, as they cannot see the hull, and the fact that one light is double the height of another from a deck tells them nothing. On any construction of the rule the difference in this case is not sufficient to amount to an infringement.

J. P. Aspinall, for the plaintiff, contrâ.—The height must be taken from the deck. In all regulations dealing with lights their height is taken from the deck. If so, the excess of five feet clearly amounts to a breach of the rule. It is also contended that the rule was broken in two other respects. The light is to be exhibited near the stern. This light was immediately forward of the mizzenmast, and therefore not near the stern. The rule also requires it to be exhibited where it can best be seen. As a matter of fact it was hung above a funnel, which was emitting smoke, and therefore calculated to obscure its visibility. If so, it was not exhibited where it could best be seen.

Sir Walter Phillimore in reply.

Sir JAMES HANNEN.—Counsel for the respondents has raised a point before us which does not seem to have been brought to the attention of the County Court judge; at least I can find nothing to show that it was raised in the court below. The rule says that the light, whatever its height may be, is to be exhibited "where it can best be seen," but the mere fact that the light was near the funnel does not show that the light was obscured, and I do not think the fact has been established so as to justify Mr. Aspinall in raising this new point. It has therefore not been shown that the rule was broken in that respect. As regards the more important point, as to the construction of rule 2 of the Humber Navigation Rules, it is remarkable that the words differ from the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea in such a way as to leave in uncertainty the datum line as to height. In art. 8 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea the words "above the hull" fix the height of the light. I think a great deal might be said in favour of the water being the datum line, because that would enable the second light to be carried with approximate certainty at double the height of the other. But I do not think it necessary to express an opinion as to what ought to be the datum line, for reasons which I am about to state. The words of the rule may mean, as has been suggested, that the after light shall be at least double the height of the other; but to say that a few inches one way or the other would be an infringement is to my mind utterly unreasonable. Now, in this case, has there been a substantial compliance with the rule? The Elder Brethren tell us that in their opinion this difference of height would make no difference for practical purposes of navigation. As I said before, it could not even be suggested that the rule would be violated in consequence of a difference of a few inches. And although I recognise that there might be such an excess of height as to be a non-compliance with the rule, yet I think that is not the case here, and I am of opinion that the difference of height was not such as to amount to a breach of the rule. The appeal must therefore be allowed.

THE STAKESBY. (a)

Collision—Stern light—Overtaking ship—Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, arts. 2 and 11.

In crowded waters, where a vessel is being frequently overtaken by others, she does not contravene the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea by carrying a fixed stern light.

THIS was a collision action in rem, instituted by the owners of the barque Dilbhur against the owners of the steamship Stakesby.

The defendants counter-claimed.

The collision occurred in the North Sea, on the 2nd March 1890.

The facts as alleged by the plaintiffs were as follows: The Dilbhur, a barque, of 1280 tons register, was at about 9.45 p.m., on the 2nd March about eleven miles N. by E. of Whitby, in the course of a voyage from Middlesbrough to Monte Video, and was making about four to five knots an hour on a S.E. by S. course, in tow of the tug Cruiser. In addition to her regulation side light, she carried a fixed bright light over her stern. In these circumstances those on board the Dilbhur saw the masthead and green lights of the steamship Stakesby about two miles off on the port quarter. The Stakesby was overhauling the Dilbhur, and as she came nearer her red light came into sight. The Dilbhur was kept on her course, and the Stakesby was hailed, but instead of keeping out of the way she came on, and with her starboard bow struck the Dilbhur in the port fore-rigging, doing her considerable damage.

The facts alleged by the defendants were as follows: Shortly before 9.45 p.m., on the 2nd March 1890, the Stakesby, a steamship, of 919 tons register, bound on a voyage from South Shields to Malta, was in the North Sea, N. by E. of Whitby Light. She was steering S.S.E., making about seven and a half knots an hour. In these circumstances those on board her observed smoke ahead, which proved to come from the tug towing the Dilbhur. The engines of the Stakesby were at once stopped and her helm hard-a-starboarded. Immediately afterwards the loom of the Dilbhur was made out about two to three points on the starboard bow, and, although the engines of the Stakesby were at once reversed full speed, she struck the Dilbhur.

It appeared that at the time of and for some time before the collision, a considerable number of vessels were in the vicinity passing and overtaking the Dilbhur.

The Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea material to the decision are as follows:

Art. 2. The lights mentioned in the following articles numbered 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, and 11, and no other, shall be carried in all weathers from sunset to sunrise.

Art. 11. A ship which is being overtaken by another shall show from her stern to such last-mentioned ship a white light or a flare-up light.

Barnes, Q.C. (with him Dr. Raikes) for the plaintiff.—The Dilbhur was carrying a fixed stern light, and by so doing did not infringe the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea. She was navigating in crowded waters, and was being continuously overtaken by other vessels. It was therefore necessary for her to continuously show a stern light. The regulations do not in terms prohibit a fixed light:

The Imbro, 60 L. Rep. N. S. 926; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 392; 14 P. Div. 73;
The Palinurus, 58 L. T. Rep. N. S. 533; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 271; 13 P. Div. 14.

Sir Walter Phillimore (with him J. P. Aspinall) for the defendants.—It is contended that in fact the Dilbhur exhibited no stern light. But even if she did, it is submitted that to carry a fixed stern light is contrary to the regulations. In The Imbro (ubi sup.), Butt, J. said that the article contemplated only the holding up or flashing of a light. In practice a flash light is shown. Moreover where it has been deemed necessary to carry a fixed stern light, the regulation has always said so in express terms. To allow a vessel to carry a fixed stern light might in many case be misleading.

Sir JAMES HANNEN having found that the stern light was exhibited and burning brightly as alleged by the plaintiffs, and that the collision was due to a bad look-out on the Stakesby, proceeded as follows:—There has been raised this question, whether or not there has been an infringement of the article as to the exhibition of a stern light. I observe that Butt, J. in his judgment in The Imbro (ubi sup.) refers to my decision in The Palinurus (ubi sup.); but from my recollection of that case I do not think that the point in this case was present to my mind. I do not think that I have given any decision on the point. Two things occur to my mind. It cannot be that the mere fixing is an infringement of the rule, because that would lead to this conclusion, that the rule could only be complied with by a waving movement. There is nothing in the article pointing to anything of that sort. The question one has to consider is, whether or not in the state of navigation in this place where the collision occurred, it was a proper thing that there should be a permanent light exhibited to overtaking vessels. It appears that there were a great many vessels about, and I am advised by the Trinity Masters that it was a proper thing that there should be a permanent light to be a guide to the vessels which were going by, remembering also that several vessels had previously passed which would also need the assistance of a stern light. Their opinion is in accordance with my own views. I am therefore of opinion that there has not been an infringement of the regulations in carrying this fixed light during the time the barque was navigating this place where numbers of vessels were in fact overtaking her, and others might be likely to overtake her.

I should myself be inclined to construe the article thus—that the flashing-light which is a thing done on the sudden is sufficient; but I should not myself be inclined to draw the inference that, because the light was fixed, there was therefore an infringement of the regulations. The circumstances here justified the plaintiffs in doing something more than flashing a light, on account of the number of vessels which had been overtaking and which were likely to overtake her. Further than that, I am of opinion, that there was such a bad look-out on the steamer that it was not the difference between a flashing and a fixed light which prevented their seeing it. If there had been a good look-out I have no doubt that they would have seen the stern light and would have seen the tug's light at an earlier period than in fact it was seen. I come to the conclusion that there was a great want of vigilance on the part of the steamer, and that that being so it sufficiently accounts for what happened. I pronounce the steamer alone to blame.

THE GENERAL GORDON. (a)

Collision—Fishing smacks—Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, arts. 14, 22—Both ships to blame—Costs.

It is the duty of a sailing smack during the day to have more than one hand on deck, and where a collision occurs between her and another smack, the primary cause of which is the wrongful manœuvre of the other smack, she will also be held to blame if it appears that had she had two hands on deck they might have taken means to have obviated the other's wrongful manœuvre.

In a collision case where both ships are to blame, the plaintiff is entitled to his costs if in his statement of claim he admits that he is to blame.

THIS was a collision action by the owners of the sailing smack Almoner against the owners of the sailing smack General Gordon.

The collision occurred in the North Sea on the 7th Nov. 1889. The plaintiffs by their statement of claim admitted that the Almoner was to blame, but alleged that the General Gordon was also to blame.

The facts alleged by the plaintiffs were as follows: At about 2 p.m. on the 7th Nov. the Almoner, a dandy rigged smack of 78 tons register, was with the fishing fleet in the North Sea. There was a moderate breeze from the W. N. W., and the weather was fine and clear. The Almoner had not long before gone about on to the starboard tack, and to enable her foresheet to be hauled to the windward she was allowed to fall off from the wind, which gave her a speed of from four to five knots an hour. At the time she was allowed to fall off, the smack General Gordon was on the starboard tack, a little abaft the port beam of the Almoner, distant about 100 to 130 yards. The General Gordon's helm was lashed amidships, and although she was loudly hailed by those on board the Almoner, no steps were taken to avoid a collision, and the Almoner, with her port side amidships, struck the stem of the General Gordon, thereby sustaining damage.

The facts alleged by the defendants were as follows: The General Gordon, a fishing smack of 80 tons, manned by a crew of five hands, was on the afternoon of the 7th Nov. in the North Sea. The wind was W. N. W. and the General Gordon was laid to on the starboard tack, with the foresheet to windward, heading about W. S. W., and making from two to three knot an hour. Her helm was lashed amidships, and there was one hand on deck. The Almoner, which had been previously seen on the port tack on the lee bow, crossed ahead of the General Gordon, and went about on the starboard tack, a little forward of the starboard beam of the General Gordon, distant from 80 to 100 yards. The General Gordon continued laid to; but the Almoner suddenly came off the wind, and, coming on at considerable speed with her port side amidships, struck the General Gordon on her stem, doing her damage.

Sir Walter Phillimore (with him J. P. Aspinall) for the plaintiffs.—The General Gordon is to blame for neglecting to take steps to avoid a collision when the Almoner came off the wind. Had there been two hands on deck, they might have let go the foresail sheet and put the helm down. It is negligence for a smack to have only one hand on deck.

Barnes, Q.C. (with him H. Stokes), for the defendants, contrâ.—In daylight when the weather is clear there is no necessity to have more than one hand on deck. It was the duty of the Almoner to keep out of the way of the General Gordon, and therefore her duty to keep her course. For that purpose one hand was sufficient. Had there been two hands on deck, there was not time to do anything to avoid the collision.

BUTT, J.—The Almoner is no doubt the chief offender in this collision. There was negligent navigation on her part, which was the primary cause of it; and in that state of circumstances I should be disposed to take as favourable a view as I could of the case of the General Gordon. But there are certain facts to which I must give effect. In the state of things which existed there ought to have been two hands on deck; and, according to the rules of an association of which these owners were members, smacks when under way are required to have two hands on deck. That requirement was not complied with. A further question has been raised as to the speed of this smack, and although I am not going to hold that she was sailing as fast as the plaintiffs' witnesses would have us believe, I think that she was going faster than her own witnesses have admitted. I think I must tie her at least to the two or three knots stated in her preliminary act. That is not mere pleading; it is an answer to a direct question of importance. On the whole the inference that I draw from the evidence is, that she was sailing faster than two or three knots an hour. But the Elder Brethren advise me that, whether that be so or not, knowing what they do of the capabilities of these smacks, that had there been two men on deck, one aft and one forward, who observed what was happening, they have no doubt that the foresail sheet, even if it was lashed to windward, might have been let go and the tiller unlashed and put down in time to bring the General Gordon far enough round to have avoided the collision. That being so, the want of a proper number of hands on deck really contributed to the collision; and though, as I have said, the plaintiffs are to blame, I must hold that there was negligence on the part of the General Gordon which directly contributed to the collision. I must therefore pronounce her to blame as well as the Almoner. As the plaintiffs have by their statement of claim admitted that they were to blame, and have only asked for a decree of both to blame, they are entitled to costs.

THE ISLE OF CYPRUS. (a)

Interrogatories—Collision—Preliminary act—Evidence.

In a collision action, where the plaintiffs' vessel was lost with all her crew who could give evidence as to the collision, the Court allowed the plaintiffs' before filing their statement of claim, to administer interrogatories to the defendants as to the circumstances of the collision, including information given in the preliminary act.

THIS was a motion by the plaintiffs in a collision action for an order directing the defendants to file further and better answers to the plaintiffs' interrogatories.

The collision occurred between the plaintiffs' steamship the Cleddy, and the defendants' steamship the Isle of Cyprus, in the English Channel, on the 29th Dec. 1889.

The Cleddy sank, and all her crew who were on deck and could give evidence as to the collision were drowned.

In these circumstances the plaintiffs, prior to delivering their statement of claim, administered the following interrogatories:

1. Is it not the fact that a collision occurred between the steamship Cleddy and the steamship Isle of Cyprus, about 0.30 a.m., or at some other and what time on the 20th Dec. 1889, in the English Channel, off the Isle of Wight?

2. Did not the said steamship Isle of Cyprus at the time of the said collision belong to you, or some of you, who were the managing owners of the said steamship?

3. Upon what course or courses was the Isle of Cyprus in the half hour preceding the said collision? If there were any changes of course during that period, what were such changes, and at what time or times did such changes respectively take place? If more than one change, what were such changes respectively, and how long before the collision did such changes respectively take place?

4. Was not one, and which, of the mates of the Isle of Cyprus in charge of the watch at the time of, and for some and what time before the collision? What number of hands had he on deck in his said watch, and where were they stationed respectively?

5. Was not the master of the Isle of Cyprus below until shortly before the said collision? How long before the said collision did he come on deck? What called his attention and brought him on deck? How long after he got on deck did the said collision occur? How far from the Isle of Cyprus was the Cleddy when he got on deck, and how did the Cleddy then bear from the Isle of Cyprus? How was the helm of the Isle of Cyprus, and how was the telegraph pointer standing; at what speed were her engines working when he got on deck? What orders did he give to the helm and engines after he so got on deck?

6. Was the helm of the Isle of Cyprus altered in any way and what way, and by whose and what orders, after the Cleddy's lights were sighted, and before the said master came on deck? If so altered once or more than once, how was the Isle of Cyprus heading by compass immediately before such alteration, or each of such alterations respectively, and to what extent did the heading of the Isle of Cyprus alter under each of such alterations of her helm? State how the Cleddy bore from the Isle of Cyprus just before each of such alterations—what light or lights of the Cleddy were seen from the Isle of Cyprus whilst the latter was on the said courses and each of them? When and at what distance did such lights and each of them come into view?

7. How was the Isle of Cyprus heading by compass at the time of the said collision? About how far from the stern was the Cleddy struck?

8. How were the engines of the Isle of Cyprus working at the time of the said collision, ahead or astern, and if astern, how many revolutions had they made astern before the collision from the last order astern?

9. What was the bearing and distance of St. Catherine's Light at the time of the collision?

10. After the said collision did the Isle of Cyprus make any water, and if so, how much, and where? How long did the Isle of Cyprus remain near the place of collision? Were any boats of the Isle of Cyprus put into the water to go to the assistance of the Cleddy, and if not, why not? How soon after the said collision was the Cleddy or the lights of the Cleddy lost sight of by those on board the Isle of Cyprus.

The defendants answered the first four interrogatories, but they refused to answer the remaining interrogatories upon the grounds "that the matters inquired into are not sufficiently material at the present stage of the proceedings; that the said interrogatories are exhibited unreasonably and vexatiously; and that they are oppressive and unnecessary, and are an attempt to obtain that part of the defendants' case which the defendants only know from information or documents which are privileged."

Barnes, Q.C., for the plaintiffs, in support of the motion.—This class of interrogatories has been allowed in this court before; and in the present case the circumstances are so special as to warrant the court in allowing them:

The Biola, 34 L. T. Rep. N. S. 185; 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 125;
The Radnorshire, 43 L. T. Rep. N. S. 319; 5 P. Div. 172; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 338.

Raikes, contrà.—This is an attempt to obtain information of facts set out in the preliminary act. The plaintiffs are seeking to know our case before they file their statement of claim.

BUTT, J.—These interrogatories must be answered. It is not usually the practice in this court to give in the answers the facts stated in the preliminary acts; but, as the plaintiffs desire to have the facts on oath, the interrogatories must be answered. There are special circumstances in this case which justify me in granting the motion.

THE ACCOMAC. (a)

Carriage of goods—Charter-party—Excepted perils—Negligence.

A provision in a charter-party exempting the owners from liability for loss of or damage to cargo caused by the "act, neglect, or default of the master or crew in the navigation of the said vessel in the ordinary course of the voyage," does not relieve them from liability for damage to cargo caused by the joint negligence of one of their crew and shore engineers employed by them to repair the ship's machinery.

By a charter-party the shipowners were exempted from liability for loss of or damage to cargo caused by the "act, neglect, or default of the master or crew in the navigation of the said vessel in the ordinary course of the said voyage." Whilst the cargo was being discharged in port parts of the main engine and donkey pump were taken ashore by shore engineers for repairs. To do this a cock connecting the forward bilge-pump with the pipes of the ballast tank had to be removed, and the ship's engineer thereupon gave orders to the shore engineers to plug the pipe where the cock had been removed. Subsequently the ship's engineer, believing this had been done, whereas in fact it had not been, opened the sea-valve to run up the ballast tanks in order to keep the ship steady. After the ballast tanks had been filled the water found its way into the disconnected pipe, and thence into the holds, causing damage to the cargo.

Held, that the shipowners were liable, as the damage was caused by the joint negligence on the part of the shore engineers and of the ship's engineer, and that the exception in the charter-party did not apply to joint negligence.

Semble, that the negligence of the ship's engineer was not in the navigation of the ship in the ordinary course of the voyage within the meaning of the said charter-party.

THIS was an action in personam by the owners of a cargo of rice against the owners of the steamship Accomac, to recover compensation for damage to the cargo.

The plaintiffs shipped the rice at Rangoon for carriage to London, and 3316 bags were delivered to them in a damaged condition.

By the terms of the charter-party and bill of lading it was provided (inter alia) that the shipowners should not be liable for "any act, neglect, or default whatsoever of pilots, masters, or crew in the navigation of the ship in the ordinary course of the voyage."

The Accomac arrived at Victoria Docks, in

(a) Reported by J. P. ASPINALL and BUTLER ASPINALL, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

London, on the 31st July 1889, and commenced discharging on the 2nd Aug. Subsequently to her arrival, and before all the cargo was discharged, it was found that her engines required certain repairs, and accordingly certain parts of the main engine and donkey pumps had to be taken ashore for repairs. The repairs were executed by a firm of engineers by name Rait and Gardiner, who in order to remove the machinery requiring the repairs had to take off a cock connecting the forward bilge-pump with the pipes of the ballast tanks. The result of the removal of this cock was to leave open the pipe from which it was taken.

It appeared that on the removal of the cock in question the ship's engineer had given orders to Rait and Gardiner's men to plug it. They, however, failed to do so, subsequently excusing themselves on the ground that they had not had time by 6 p.m., when they stopped work, and that the ship's engineer had not ordered them to work overtime in order to do the job.

The same evening the ship's engineer, thinking the pipe had been plugged, but without taking any steps to inform himself what the fact was, opened the sea-valve for the purpose of running up the ballast tanks to keep the ship steady. The sea-valve was left open all night, the result being that after the tanks were filled the water found its way into the pipe from which the cock had been removed, thence into the engine-room, and thence through the sluice valves into the hold, and so caused the damage complained of.

Finlay, Q.C. (with him Hollams) for the plaintiffs.—The defendants are not entitled to the protection of the excepted perils. The negligence was solely that of the shore engineers, and not of the ship's engineer. Moreover the negligence was not "in the navigation of the ship in the ordinary course of the voyage."

Joseph Walton (with him Barnes, Q.C.), for the defendants, contrà.—The negligence which caused the damage was that of the ship's engineer. But for his opening the sea-valve and leaving it open after the ballast tanks were filled, the damage would not have occurred. He ought before he opened the sea-valve to have ascertained whether the pipe in question had been plugged. The voyage was not at an end, and the engineer's act was an act in the ordinary course of the voyage:

Laurie v. Douglas, 15 M. & W. 746.

Finlay, Q.C., for the plaintiffs, was not called upon to reply.

BUTT, J.—This is a case in which the plaintiffs claim from the defendants damage caused by injury to rice carried from Rangoon in the defendants' steamship Accomac. She arrived in London on the 31st July of last year, and she appears to have brought her cargo, including the rice in question, home in good condition. The rice was delivered to the plaintiffs in a bad and damaged condition. The ship went into the Victoria Dock to discharge, and whilst there one of the bilge-pumps which had been found to be defective during the voyage home was removed by a firm of engineers called Rait and Gardiner for repairs. In order to get the bilge-pump out it was necessary to take off a certain cock which closed one of the pipes. This was connected with the tanks, and in such a way that although it was above the level of the tanks, nevertheless, if the sea-cock was left open after the tanks were filled, the water seeking to rise to the level of the water outside the ship would in doing so find its way into the pipe in question. The cock was taken off and not replaced, neither was the pipe stopped by a plug or by the bolting on of a blank flange. There was a change of the ship's engineer on the 6th Aug., and it appears that the outgoing chief engineer pointed out to his successor, one Douglas, who has given evidence, that the cock was off, and that if the sea-cock was opened and kept open after the tanks were filled, there would be a flow of water into the engine-room. It also appears that Douglas himself told Messrs. Rait and Gardiner's leading hand to put a blank flange on to the end of the pipe, intending that it should be done at once, and thinking it would be done before the men struck work that evening. As a matter of fact it was not done. Douglas, assuming it was done but without taking the trouble to ascertain the fact, opened the sea-cock for the purpose of filling the ballast tanks in order to stiffen the ship, out of which cargo had been taken. The sea-cock was left open all night. The water came in, filled the tanks, and during the night overflowed into the engine-room, and so into the holds of the ship, the sluices being up, and so damage was caused.

Now, unless the defendants can bring themselves within the exceptions in the charter-party or bill of lading, it is perfectly clear that they are liable for that damage. The question is therefore, do they bring themselves within the exceptions? Even assuming that the act, neglect, or default which caused this damage was that of Douglas alone, I doubt if the damage would be within the exceptions. I doubt whether it could be properly said to be caused in the navigation of the ship in the ordinary course of the voyage. The removal of the bilge-pump in question was not done for any purpose of the voyage or by the crew of the ship, but was done for the purpose of preparing the ship for a future voyage, and was done by engineers employed from the shore. But I do not decide the case upon that ground, because, having heard the evidence, I find as a fact that the damage was occasioned by the joint negligence of Rait and Gardiner, and Douglas, the chief engineer; and that being a joint default and not exclusively the fault of any member of the crew, the defendants are liable. I give judgment accordingly, and refer the amount to the registrar and merchants.

THE THAMES. (a)

Mortgage—Ship—Act of bankruptcy—Fraudulent preference—Bankruptcy Act 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), ss. 4, 43, 48, 49.

A mortgagor who conveys all his property with the main object of securing further advances, does not thereby commit an act of bankruptcy, even though the mortgage also secures a past debt due from the mortgagor to the mortgagee.

Where under a mortgage of a ship to secure further advances, an advance is made on the date of a receiving order against the mortgagor, who is subsequently adjudicated bankrupt in respect of acts of bankruptcy committed prior to the execution of the mortgage, the mortgagee is entitled, under sect. 49 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883 as against the trustee in bankruptcy, to recover such advance, where before the date of the receiving order there was an existing contract between mortgagor and mortgagee to make future advances and a positive promise by the mortgagee to make this specific advance.

A. mortgaged his shares in a ship to B., to secure further advances, and also a small past debt due from A. to B. Prior to the mortgage, A. had committed acts of bankruptcy in respect of which he was subsequently to the date of the mortgage adjudicated bankrupt. B. had no notice or knowledge of the acts of bankruptcy, and made advances to enable A. to carry on his business. On the date of the receiving order, B. made A. an advance of 250l. in consequence of a prior agreement between them to make future advances, and a positive promise to advance this specific sum. In an action by B. to establish the validity of his mortgage and recover against the respondent the amount of his loans:

Held, that the mortgage was valid, and that B. was entitled, as against the trustee in bankruptcy, to recover not only all advances prior to the date of the receiving order, but also the advance of 250l. made on the date of the receiving order, as it was made in consequence of the contract and promise made before the date of the receiving order.

THIS was a mortgage action by Barter and Co. Limited against the proceeds of forty-two sixty-fourth shares in the steamship Thames, asking the court to pronounce for the validity of the mortgage and payment to the plaintiffs of the amount due. The trustee in bankruptcy of the mortgagor intervened and put in a defence,

By the mortgage, which was dated 30th May 1889, one John Young, the owner of forty-two sixty-fourth shares in the Thames, mortgaged them to the plaintiffs to secure the repayment by the mortgagor to the plaintiffs of a balance of 55*l.* 11*s.* 2*d.*, together with interest thereon at the rate of 10 per cent., and any subsequent advances and interest which might be made by the plaintiffs to the mortgagor. The mortgage was in the form prescribed by the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, and was registered on the 5th June 1889.

On the 28th May 1889 a petition in bankruptcy was presented against the mortgagor. On the 13th June a receiving order was made, and on July 17th he was adjudicated bankrupt.

According to the evidence of the plaintiffs and the mortgagor it appeared that the plaintiffs had no knowledge of any act of bankruptcy by the mortgagor prior to the execution of the mortgage. It also appeared that, at the time of the making of the mortgage, there was a contract between the mortgagor and mortgagee that the latter should make advances to the mortgagor when he was in need of money, but the amount of such advances was not fixed. Advances were made by the mortgagee to the mortgagor subsequently to the execution of the mortgage, and amongst others was a sum of 250*l.* which was advanced on the 13th June. The receiving order was made on the same day, but at a later hour. As to this 250*l.*, the plaintiffs stated that there was a promise by them on June 12 to advance this sum.

It appeared that at about the date of the execution of the mortgage, the mortgagor had mortgaged his interest in two other steamships, the Mona and the Saga, to the plaintiffs. In these circumstances the trustee in bankruptcy alleged that the mortgages were a conveyance of the whole of the bankrupt's property. The plaintiffs denied this, and alleged at the time in question moneys amounting to a large amount were due from third parties to the bankrupt.

The Thames had been sold by the court in a collision action, and it was against the balance of the proceeds of such sale that the plaintiffs claimed.

The Bankruptcy Act 1883 was referred to, and the following sections are material to the decision:

Sect. 4 (1). A debtor commits an act of bankruptcy in each of the following cases: (b) If in England or elsewhere he makes a fraudulent conveyance, gift, delivery, or transfer of his property, or of any part thereof.

Sect. 43. The bankruptcy of a debtor, whether the same takes place on the debtor's own petition, or upon that of a creditor or creditors, shall be deemed to have relation back to, and to commence at, the time of the act of bankruptcy being committed on which a receiving order is made against him, or if the bankrupt is proved to have committed more acts of bankruptcy than one, to have relation back to, and to commence at, the time of the first of the acts of bankruptcy proved to have been committed by the bankrupt within the three months next preceding the date of the presentation of the bankruptcy petition; but no bankruptcy petition, receiving order, or adjudication, shall be rendered invalid by reason of any act of bankruptcy anterior to the debt of the petitioning creditor.

Sect. 48. Every conveyance or transfer of property, or charge thereon made, every payment made, every obligation incurred, and every judicial proceeding taken or suffered by any person unable to pay his debts as they become due from his own money in favour of any creditor, or any person in trust for any creditor, with a view of giving such creditor a preference over the other creditors, shall, if the person making, taking, paying, or suffering the same is adjudged bankrupt on a bankruptcy petition presented within three months of the date of making, taking, paying, or suffering the same, be deemed fraudulent and void as against the trustee in the bankruptcy.

Sect. 49. Subject to the foregoing provisions of this Act, with respect to the effect of bankruptcy on an execution or attachment, and with respect to the avoidance of certain settlements and preferences, nothing in this Act shall invalidate in the case of a bankruptcy: (a) Any payment by the bankrupt to any of his creditors; (b) any payment or delivery to the bankrupt; (c) any conveyance or assignment by the bankrupt for valuable consideration; (d) any contract, dealing, or transaction by or with the bankrupt for valuable consideration, provided that both the following conditions are complied with, namely: (1) The payment, delivery, conveyance, assignment, contract, dealing, or transaction, as the case may be, takes place before the date of the receiving order; and (2) the person (other than the debtor) to, by, or with whom the payment, delivery, conveyance, assignment, contract, dealing, or transaction was made, executed or entered into has not at the time of the payment, delivery, conveyance, assignment, contract, dealing, or transaction, notice of any available act of bankruptcy committed by the bankrupt before that time.

Cohen, Q.C. (with him L. Pyke) for the plaintiffs.—The mortgage transaction in respect of the three ships was not a transfer of all the bankrupt's property, but, even if it was, the transaction would be valid:

Ex parte Johnson; Re Chapman, 50 L. T. Rep. N. S. 214; 26 Ch. Div. 338;
Ex parte Fisher; Re Ash, 26 L. T. Rep. N. S. 931; 7 Ch. App. 636.

The mortgage was not a fraudulent preference. The advances were made in order to enable the debtor to carry on his business:

Ex parte Taylor, 18 Q. B. Div. 295;
Ex parte Griffiths, 48 L. T. Rep. N. S. 450; 23 Ch. Div. 69;
Ex parte Hill, 49 L. T. Rep. N. S. 278; 23 Ch. Div. 695;
Williams Bankruptcy Practice, 1886 edit., p. 205.

It is established as a fact that the mortgagee had no notice of any prior act of bankruptcy. If so the mortgage is protected by sect. 49, notwithstanding that these were acts of bankruptcy prior to the mortgage. As to the 250*l.*, although it was only advanced on the date of the receiving order, there was a binding agreement that it should be advanced before that date, and therefore the plaintiffs are entitled to recover it under the mortgage.

Jelf, Q.C. and Boyd for the trustee in bankruptcy,—The mortgage was a conveyance of all the bankrupt's property in order to secure a past debt, and was therefore a fraudulent conveyance within the meaning of sect. 4, sub-sect. (b) of the Bankruptcy Act 1883. If so, the mortgage is void, and cannot avail as against the trustee in bankruptcy:

Bevan v. Nunn, 9 Bing. 107;
Ex parte Johnson; Re Chapman (ubi sup.);
Smith v. Cannan, 22 L. J. 290. Q. B.;
Re Wood, 26 L. T. Rep. N. S. 113; 7 Ch. App. 302;
Ex parte Snowball, 26 L. T. Rep. N. S. 894; 7 Ch. App. 534;
Williams Bankruptcy Practice, edit. 1886, p. 7.

The mortgage was a fraudulent preference in favour of the mortgagee. If the mortgage was an act of bankruptcy, then sect. 49 does not protect the transaction against the operation of sect. 48, even assuming the conditions in sect. 49 are complied with. But, even assuming the mortgage not to be an act of bankruptcy, the transaction is not protected, because the mortgagee had, or ought to have had, notice of prior acts of bankruptcy:

Ex parte Snowball (ubi sup.);
Bird v. Bass, 6 M. & G. 143.

As to the advance of 250*l.*, which was made on the same day as the receiving order, it is submitted that it cannot be recovered, as, in order to be protected by sect. 49, it ought to have been made before the date of the receiving order, whereas it was made on the same date.

Cohen, Q.C. in reply.

BUTT, J.—This is a case in which the plaintiffs claim judgment pronouncing for the validity of a certain mortgage of shares in the steamship Thames, and for a reference, if necessary, to assess the amount due to them. Now, there is no doubt that the mortgage was duly made and executed on the 30th May 1889, but the defendants for several reasons attack the transaction and say the mortgage is invalid. They contend that this and the other two mortgages on the Mona and the Saga — the transactions really being one—constitute a conveyance of substantially the whole of the mortgagor's property to the plaintiffs, and if that is so they argue that the transaction was in itself an act of bankruptcy, and therefore void. They also argue that it is void as being a fraudulent preference and as being contrary to the provisions of the statute 13 Eliz. c. 5. Now, as I understand, it is a fact that charges by way of mortgage were given by Mr. Young, the debtor, on the three steamers, the Thames, the Mona, and the Saga, at about the same time, and for the same purpose, and to the same persons, viz., the plaintiffs in this action. I have to take into account the fact that these mortgages on these other two vessels existed, though the mortgage on the Thames is the only one which is actually before me. There has been a good deal of evidence both oral and documentary, and my conclusion is that these mortgages were executed in pursuance of an arrangement, the main object of which was to provide advances to enable Mr. Young to carry on his business as a shipowner, and that the main object was not to defeat or delay creditors, or to give one creditor a preference over others; in other words, that the main object was not to pay or secure past debts due to Messrs. Barter and Co., the plaintiffs, but to enable Mr. Young to carry on his business. And notwithstanding Mr. Young's difficulties, which were certainly serious at the time, yet, having regard to the real value of these three steamers, and to the fact that freights had begun to rise and that a better time had just commenced for shipowners, I have no hesitation in saying that I have come to the conclusion that the plaintiffs and the mortgagor, Mr. Young, expected that, if the advances contemplated by this arrangement were made, Mr. Young would be able to carry on his business at a profit and probably redeem his position, and that neither he nor the plaintiffs entered into this arrangement in contemplation of his bankruptcy. And I go further. I think they not only had that expectation, but I think it was a reasonable expectation. I think there was a reasonable prospect, had nothing intervened, of Mr. Young clearing the charges on these steamers and carrying on this business with a profit. The truth is, that the result of these bankruptcy proceedings was that these three steamers were practically sacrificed, all of them being sold by compulsory sale by the court at very inadequate prices. Added to this, when the proceeds were realised they were eaten up by a number of privileged claims which were made and allowed in amounts in excess of what they really ought to have been, and simply because they were allowed, so to speak, to go by default. Mr. Young was then a bankrupt. He had nothing to do with the matter. The trustee, whose business it was to defend these claims and see that no more than was due should be allowed, was unable to protect this estate because he had not the money to do it with. In other words, I believe that the bankruptcy had the effect of sacrificing what was an estate of considerable value, and hence the present state of circumstances.

Now, it is said that this mortgage transferred the whole, or practically the whole, of the debtor's property to the plaintiffs. I do not think it did. I think there was a substantial property beyond the mortgaged property; and I think the reason why the book-debts and other assets such as claims on insurance companies have not been realised is due to the bankruptcy and the inability of the trustee through want of funds to press these claims. But even assuming that substantially all the debtor's property was assigned by these mortgages, I should still have been prepared to hold that they were valid, and that the transaction did not constitute an act of bankruptcy. It is quite clear to my mind that, although there was a small past debt due from the mortgagor to the plaintiffs which it was the object of the mortgage to secure, that was by no means the principal object. The mortgagor's principal object was to get advances to enable him to carry on his business, and it was with a bonâ fide intention of that sort that he entered into this transaction. Moreover Messrs. Barter and Co. are shipbrokers; they therefore not only got handsome interest on their loans, but more than that, they had the business of chartering the ships and taking the profits incidental thereto.

I will now consider the effect of the Bankruptcy Act. The defendants say that this transaction was an act of bankruptcy under sect. 4, sub-sect. (b). The words are: "A debtor commits an act of bankruptcy in each of the following cases: (b) If in England or elsewhere he makes a fraudulent conveyance, gift, delivery, or transfer of his property or any part thereof." I think it is established beyond all doubt that where further advances are contemplated—even if the person assigns all his property — it is not fraudulent within the meaning of that section, and I shall so hold. Then it is said that under sect. 43 all the property of the bankrupt vested in the trustee at the time when the act on which Mr. Young was made a bankrupt was committed. That I think is true, and therefore primâ facie all property of the bankrupt, including these ships, would be vested in the trustee from some date prior to the mortgage, and, if that section stood alone, that to my mind would be conclusive against the plaintiffs' claim. But there is sect. 49, which is in these words: "Subject to the foregoing provisions of this Act with respect to the effect of bankruptcy on an execution or attachment and with respect to the avoidance of certain settlements and preferences, nothing in this Act shall invalidate in the case of a bankruptcy. (a) Any payment by the bankrupt to any of his creditors; (b) any payment or delivery to the bankrupt; (c) any conveyance or assignment by the bankrupt for valuable consideration; (d) any contract, dealing, or transaction by or with the bankrupt for valuable consideration, provided that both the following conditions are complied with, namely: (1) the payment, delivery, conveyance, assignment, contract, dealing, or transaction, as the case may be, takes place before the date of the receiving order; and (2) the person (other than the debtor) to, by, or with whom the payment, delivery, conveyance, assignment, contract, dealing, or transaction was made, executed, or entered into, has not at the time of the payment, delivery, conveyance, assignment, contract, dealing, or transaction, notice of any available act of bankruptcy committed by the bankrupt before that time." Now, as to the first condition, every transaction except the advance of 250*l.* took place before the date of the receiving order. As to the second condition, I think it is perfectly clear that the plaintiffs had no notice of any act of bankruptcy committed before the 30th May, or indeed before the 13th June. But it is said by Mr. Jelf that, however that may be, the very execution of these mortgages was in itself an act of bankruptcy, and that therefore would prevent the second condition of sect. 49 operating in favour of the creditor. But I have already held that it was not an act of bankruptcy, and therefore Mr. Jelf's contention on that point falls to the ground. But, even if it had been, I should still have been prepared to hold that it would not deprive the creditor of the benefit of this proviso, because the act of bankruptcy must have been committed before the time of the conveyance or transaction. I therefore hold that the property did not pass to the trustee under sect. 43, as it otherwise would have done. But it is said, even so the conveyance is void as a fraudulent preference. Notwithstanding the view I have already taken, it might very well have been so as a matter of fact; that is to say, it might have been a conveyance executed with a view of giving to these particular creditors, Messrs. Barter and Co., a preference over others. But, in order to be a fraudulent preference under sect. 48, the sole object, or at all events the principal object, must have been to give Messrs. Barter that preference. I have already found that I do not think that was anything like the principal object. The principal object was to secure future advances to enable Mr. Young to carry on his business. I therefore hold there was no fraudulent preference under sect. 48. As to the statute of Elizabeth, I assume Mr. Jelf did not rely upon it, as he never argued the point. For these various reasons I hold that this is a valid mortgage, and I pronounce for it, referring the amount, if necessary, to the registrar and merchants.

But I am asked to accompany my judgment with a direction as to the 250*l.* That was a payment made on the 13th June, which was the date of the receiving order. The material words of sect. 49 in connection with the 250*l.* are these: "Provided . . . the payment, delivery, conveyance, assignment, contract, dealing, or transaction, as the case may be, takes place before the date of the receiving order." There is to my mind some difficulty in saying what is the exact meaning of those words "before the date of the receiving order." But I am quite clear that there was a contract to make advances long before the date of the receiving order; and I also think that there was on the 12th June, the day before the date of the receiving order, a positive promise to advance this 250*l.* I therefore hold that the advance of 250*l.* is protected by sect. 49 in favour of the creditor, and I direct the registrar to allow it. I therefore pronounce for the validity of this mortgage with costs, and refer the assessment of the damages to the registrar.

THE MARK LANE. (a)

Salvage—Agreement—Unreasonableness—Costs.

A steamship in the Atlantic fell in with another which had lost her propellor and was leaking. It was agreed in writing between the masters that the owners of the ship in distress should pay the owners of the other 5000l. for being towed into Halifax, and if the towage had to be abandoned through stress of weather the salvors were to be paid for service rendered. The master of the vessel in distress had reasonable grounds for believing that, unless he consented to the above terms, the other ship would not assist him. The salvage was successfully accomplished without any special difficulty or danger. The distance towed was about 350 miles. The value of the salved property was about 23,000l. In a salvage action to recover the 5000l., or such sum as the court thought just, the Court held that in the circumstances the agreement was signed under compulsion, that 5000l. was exorbitant, and awarded 3000l. and costs.

THIS was a salvage action by the owners, master, and crew of the steamship Crete against the steamship Mark Lane, her cargo and freight, for services rendered in the Atlantic Ocean.

The facts alleged by the plaintiffs were as follows: At about 3.30 p.m. on the 13th April 1890 the Crete, a screw-steamship of 1725 tons gross, manned by a crew of twenty-two hands, and laden with a cargo of Indian corn, was in the Atlantic Ocean, in about latitude 39.55 N. and longitude 60.2 W., in the course of a voyage from Philadelphia to Denmark. The weather was fine and clear, and there was a slight wind from the S.E. and the sea was moderate. In these circumstances those on board the Crete sighted a steamship, which proved to be the Mark Lane. She had three black balls on her foremast, and on coming up with her it was learnt that she had lost her propellor blades and was leaking through the stern tube. The master of the Mark Lane boarded the Crete, and after some negotiations between him and the master of the Crete the following written agreement was entered into:

About lat. 40.0 N. long. 59.50 W., Sunday, 13th April 1890.—It is now agreed between Enoch James, master of the s.s. Crete, and John Pengelly, master of the s.s. Mark Lane, of London, that the master of the s.s. Crete will make the attempt to tow the s.s. Mark Lane to Halifax, Nova Scotia, for the sum of 5000*l.* British sterling. In case of failing in the attempt to reach Halifax, and obliged to abandon through stress of weather, the s.s. Crete to be paid for service rendered.—(Signed) ENOCH JAMES, master of s.s. Crete, JOHN PENGELLY, master of Mark Lane. JOSEPH HENDERSON, first mate s.s. Crete.

Tow ropes were then passed between the vessels and eventually made fast. This operation took from three to four hours. Towing then commenced and continued without interruption till between 1 and 2 a.m. on the 15th April, when a thick fog set in, and the engines of the Crete were reduced to half speed. The fog cleared at 11.30 a.m., when the wind began to blow strong and gradually increased to a strong gale from the westward with a high beam sea. The Mark Lane was rolling and steering badly, and on the 16th, in consequence of a heavy sheer, the mooring bitts of the Crete were broken and damaged and the hawsers strained. When the Crete got straight again towage was resumed, and shortly after the Mark Lane was safely brought up in Halifax harbour. The value of the salved property was about 23,000*l.* The value of the Crete, her cargo and freight, was 30,000*l.*

The defendants, while admitting that salvage services had been rendered, alleged that the plaintiffs had greatly exaggerated the particulars thereof, and denied that the Mark Lane was ever in any immediate danger. As to the agreement they alleged in paragraph 9 of the defence as follows:

The defendants say that the said agreement is not binding upon them on the grounds that it was unreasonable, and that the said sum of 5000*l.* was exorbitant, and that the master of the Mark Lane signed the same under duress and because he was led to believe by the master of the Crete that unless he signed it the Crete would not take the Mark Lane in tow.

The master of the Crete denied that he exercised any compulsion or said anything which justified the master of the Mark Lane in thinking that the Crete would leave him unless he signed the above agreement.

The plaintiffs claimed the agreed sum of 5000*l.*, or alternatively such sum as to the court should seem just.

Barnes, Q.C. and J. P. Aspinall for the plaintiffs.—The plaintiffs are entitled to the agreed sum of 5000*l.* The master of the Crete was under no duress, and was competent to make the agreement. The service was a valuable one, and 5000*l.* is a reasonable award:

The Cargo ex Woosung, 35 L. T. Rep. N. S. 8; 1 P. Div. 260; 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 230;
The Medina, 35 L. T. Rep. N. S. 779; 2 P. Div. 5; 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 305;
The Silesia, 43 L. T. Rep. N. S. 319; 5 P. Div. 177; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 338.

Sir Walter Phillimore and Joseph Walton for the defendants.—5000*l.* is an exorbitant sum to pay for these services. The master of the Mark Lane was practically forced to sign this agreement. Had he not done so, the master of the Crete led him to believe that he would give him no assistance. Not only would 5000*l.* be a large salvage award, but by the agreement the Crete was to get paid even if the salvage was not successful.

BUTT, J.—In this case the value of the salved property is in all somewhat under 30,000*l.*, and that of the salving property a little over 24,000*l.* The plaintiffs are not claiming for an amount to be awarded by the court, but are seeking to recover 5000*l.* as due to them on an agreement which is set out in the statement of claim. Now, I feel quite satisfied that for services such as these, rendered with no more risk, no more exertion, and no more loss of time, the Court of Admiralty has never given so large an award as 5000*l.* I think a claim for 5000*l.* for towing this ship in the state she was, and from the place in which she was found, to Halifax is an exorbitant claim. I think that would be so if it was simply a salvage agreement for 5000*l.*; but it is much more than that. The reason why salvage awards are so large is, that if there is a failure to complete the salvage, no matter at what risk and what labour the services may have been performed whilst in operation, the salvor gets nothing unless he succeeds; whereas by this agreement, in the event of the Mark Lane being lost during the services, the salvors were to be paid all the same; in other words, if successful the plaintiffs are to receive 5000*l.*; if unsuccessful they are to be paid for services rendered.

Now, I have already said that I consider the claim to be exorbitant. In some of the cases referred to —nay, in most of them—the word "inequitable" has been used. I cannot help thinking that what is at the root of this question is, that where it is found that a wholly unreasonable price has been insisted on, and eventually agreed to, the court looks not only to the unreasonableness of the agreed amount, but also to the position of the parties. Now, in this case, were the two parties to the agreement contracting on equal terms? It is perfectly clear that they were not. It is very true that that amount of duress which is an answer to an agreement at common law did not exist in this case; but in this court, and I believe in the courts of equity, the same amount of compulsion or duress is not necessary to induce the court to refuse to give effect to an agreement as would be necessary in a common law action. The captain of the Crete appears in effect, though not in so many words, to have said, "Mind, if you do not sign this agreement to pay 5000*l.*, I will go away and leave you." His manner and demeanour was such that it led the captain of the Mark Lane to believe that that was what he meant to do, and he has not, from first to last, until leaving the witness-box to-day, said he would have taken less or stayed by the Mark Lane. The fact is, the captain of the Mark Lane signed this agreement under compulsion. That is really the right way of putting it. I think he did so, and the amount being exorbitant, the agreement cannot be upheld, and I decline to give any effect to it.

Now comes the question, what are the salvors entitled to if the agreement is not upheld? I have talked that over with the Elder Brethren, and we have come to the conclusion, considering that the weather was fine during the greater part of the services, though there was fog at one time; and that there was very little risk to the salvors —no more than the usual risk incurred when a steamer of some size takes a larger steamer in tow—and that the towage was 350 miles or thereabouts; that a fair and a somewhat liberal award will be the sum of 3000*l.* As I am asked to apportion the amount, I direct that 2500*l.* shall be paid to the owners of the Crete, 150*l.* to the master, and 350*l.* to the officers and crew, according to their rating.

Sir Walter Phillimore for the defendants.—The plaintiffs are not entitled to costs. On previous occasions the court, in similar cases, has ordered that there should be no costs on either side:

The Medina, 35 L. T. Rep. N. S. 779; 2 P. Div. 5; 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 305;
The Silesia, 43 L. T. Rep. N. S. 319; 5 P. D. 177; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 338;
The Cargo ex Woosung, 35 L. T. Rep. N. S. 8; 1 P. Div. 260; 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 230.

J. P. Aspinall for the plaintiffs.—The plaintiffs are entitled to costs. They have been successful, and have recovered a substantial sum.

BUTT, J.—There has been no tender in this case, and the plaintiffs have recovered a large sum of money. The court is desirous of acting, so far as possible, in conformity with the practice in the other divisions of the High Court. The plaintiffs must have their costs.

THE SCOTIA. (a)

Collision—Steamship and barge—Both to blame—Consequential loss.

Whilst a barge was by night lying astern of a steamship in a dock the latter moved her propeller and cut a hole in the barge. It appeared that there was no one on board the barge at the time of the accident. In a collision action:

Held, that, although the steamer was to blame, the barge was also to blame for not having anyone on board of her, as, had there been, the collision might have been avoided, and in any event the barge might have been beached before she sank, and therefore the plaintiffs could only recover half their damages.

THIS was a collision action by the owners of the barge Blue Bell against the owners of the screw-steamship Scotia. The collision occurred in Tilbury Dock in the early morning of the 13th March 1890.

The Blue Bell, which was a dumb barge of seventy tons burthen, laden with a cargo of rice, was lying in the dock moored astern of the steamship Scotia. On the morning of the 13th March, whilst it was still dark, the Scotia cast off and proceeded to leave the dock, with the assistance of two tugs. For this purpose the plaintiffs alleged that the propellor was moved, and that whilst in motion it struck the port-quarter of the barge, cutting a hole in her, and thereby causing her to sink.

At the time in question there was no one on the barge, and the plaintiffs were not able to call a witness who saw the injury done. Their evidence went to show that only three steamers were under way in the dock that night, and that from the circumstances of the case the Scotia was the only one that could have done the damage.

The defendants by their defence denied that the Scotia had been in collision with the barge.

Sir Chas. Hall, Q.C. (with him J. P. Aspinall) for the plaintiffs.

Sir Walter Phillimore (with him Dr. Raikes) for the defendants.

BUTT, J.—This is a case in which the owners of the barge Blue Bell claim damages against the steamship Scotia for injury which caused the barge to sink in the dock at Tilbury. There was no one on board the barge at the time she sustained the injury. But there seems reason to believe that there was no one on board the barge or attending to it for a considerable time after she had received the injury. The nature of the injury she received scarcely seems to be contested. The question as to the way in which she sustained that injury is another matter. [The learned

(a) Reported by J. P. ASPINALL and BUTLER ASPINALL, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

Judge then dealt with the evidence, and found as a fact that the injury to the barge had been caused by the propeller of the Scotia whilst in motion.] I must therefore condemn the steamer.

Now comes the question, was the barge free from blame? It appears that a bargeman should in the ordinary course of things have been on board the Blue Bell. He was taken away by a man in the employment of his own owners to attend to some other barges at the entrance to the dock. I have asked the Elder Brethren whether they consider it negligence, whether it is proper to leave a barge for the night totally unattended in the dock. They tell me that unfortunately it is not at all an uncommon practice, but they do not think it justifiable. On the answer they have given me I hold that it was negligence to leave the barge unattended as it was. What do we know? We know that while the man is away the barge drifts down upon and rests upon the rudder of the steamer, a position she was never intended to lie in, having regard to the way in which they had moored her. If that man had been on board her at the time, it is very probable that the injury would not have occurred. Either by shouting to warn the steamer or by pushing his own barge out of the way, it is not improbable that the damage might have been avoided. But even if it could not, there would have been somebody on board the barge to take notice of the hole cut in her and to beach her, so as to prevent her sinking in the dock as she did. We think therefore it was negligence for the barge to be unattended, and that it was negligence which contributed to the collision, or at all events materially affected the amount of the injury done. We therefore think the barge is also in fault, the result being that her owners recover half their damage.

THE HERALD. (a)

Collision—High Court—County Court—Costs—County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 71), ss. 3 and 9.

Where successful plaintiffs in a collision action in the High Court recovered less than 300*l. they were allowed no costs, although they claimed more than the County Court limit.*

THIS was a motion by the plaintiffs in a collision action in rem, asking the court to confirm the registrar's report and to order the defendants to pay to the plaintiffs the costs of the action and reference.

The collision occurred on the 20th July 1889 at Clacton-on-Sea between the plaintiffs' steamship the Glenrosa and the defendants' steamship the Herald. The Glenrosa was discharging passengers at the pier when she was run into and damaged by the Herald.

The plaintiffs originally instituted an action in the City of London Court, but then abandoned it and instituted the present action in the High Court in the sum of 400*l.*

The defendants admitted liability subject to a reference.

At the reference the plaintiffs claimed 328*l.* 0*s.* 5*d.*, of which the registrar allowed 246*l.* 2*s.* 6*d.*

The reduction was chiefly made by the registrar disallowing 75*l.* off 200*l.* claimed for permanent repairs.

County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 71):

Sect. 3. Any County Court having Admiralty jurisdiction shall have jurisdiction, and all powers and authorities relating thereto, to try and determine, subject and according to the provisions of this Act, the following causes (in this Act referred to as Admiralty causes): (3) As to any claim for damage to cargo or damage by collision, any cause in which the amount claimed does not exceed three hundred pounds.

Sect. 9. If any person shall take in the High Court of Admiralty of England, or in any Superior Court, proceedings which he might without agreement have taken in a County Court, except by order of the judge of the High Court of Admiralty or of such Superior Court or of a County Court having Admiralty jurisdiction, and shall not recover a sum exceeding the amount to which the jurisdiction of the County Court in that Admiralty cause is limited by this Act, and also if any person without agreement shall, except by order as aforesaid, take proceedings as to salvage in the High Court of Admiralty or in any Superior Court, in respect of property saved, the value of which when saved does not exceed one thousand pounds, he shall not be entitled to costs, and shall be liable to be condemned in costs, unless the judge of the High Court of Admiralty or of a Superior Court before whom the cause is tried or heard shall certify that it was a proper Admiralty cause to be tried in the High Court of Admiralty of England or in a Superior Court.

L. E. Pyke, for the plaintiffs, in support of the motion, stated the facts.

Butler Aspinall, for the defendants, contrà.—The plaintiffs ought not to have instituted this action in the High Court. The circumstances of the case were of a simple character, and moreover they have only recovered 246*l.* In such circumstances they ought to be condemned in costs, or in any event they ought not to get costs. Although costs are now in the discretion of the court, yet sect. 9 of the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868 is a guide to that discretion. On the common law side, by sect. 116 of the County Courts Act 1888 there are stringent provisions adverse to a plaintiff who brings in the High Court an action which could have been commenced in the County Court.

L. E. Pyke, contrà.—The plaintiffs have recovered a substantial sum very near the County Court limit. Moreover they had reasonable anticipation to think their damages would exceed the limit. It is difficult to estimate with accuracy what are the consequential damages of a collision.

BUTT, J.—Plaintiffs have no right to bring actions in this court which could have been instituted in the County Court, and unless they can show there were special circumstances, they must bear the penalty. I accede to that part of the motion asking me to confirm the report, but make no order as to costs.

THE CARRON PARK. (a)

Damage to cargo—Charter-party—Excepted perils — Seaworthiness — Commencement of voyage— General average.

Where by the terms of a charter-party a ship described as being at A. is to proceed to B. and there load a cargo for delivery at C., the shipowner not to be liable (inter alia) for the negligence of the master or crew, or other servants, "during the said voyage," and after part of the cargo has been taken on board at B., and before the ship has started, such cargo is damaged by water which gets into the hold through a valve in the engine-room being left open by the negligence of one of the engineers, such damage is caused by the above excepted peril "during the said voyage," nor is the ship to be deemed to be unseaworthy, and therefore the shipowner is not liable.

Where general average expenses are incurred by a shipowner in consequence of damage caused to ship and cargo by the negligence of his crew, he is entitled to contribution from the cargo owner where by the terms of the contract of carriage he is not liable for the negligence of his master and crew.

THIS was an action for breach of charter-party instituted by J. V. Drake and Co. against the owners of the s.s. Carron Park, to recover damages for damage to the plaintiffs' cargo caused by water getting into the defendant's vessel. The defendants counter-claimed for general average contribution incurred in clearing the vessel of water and discharging and warehousing the cargo.

By agreement between the parties the action was tried upon the following admitted facts:

1. That the defendants by their authorised agents, by a charter-party dated the 9th Oct. 1889 (a true copy of which is hereto annexed), chartered to the plaintiffs the s.s. Carron Park upon the terms and conditions therein contained.

2. That the said vessel, in pursuance of the said charter-party, arrived in New Fairwater in ballast on the 13th Oct 1889, being at that time tight, staunch, and strong, and in every way fitted to receive and carry a cargo in accordance with the said charter-party.

3. That on the 14th Oct. the plaintiffs by their agents commenced to load the said vessel, in accordance with the said charter-party, with sugar, in bags, the property of the plaintiffs, and that the loading was continued until the evening of the 15th Oct., but was not then completed.

4. That on the morning of the 16th Oct., while the said vessel was still lying moored at her loading berth, when preparations were made to continue the loading of the said cargo, three feet of water or thereabouts was discovered in the after-hold, engine-room, and stoke-hole.

5. That the water was pumped out and cargo discharged, when it was found that the portion of the cargo in the after-hold, the property of the plaintiffs, was damaged and injured in consequence of the water getting into that hold.

6. That the water found its way into the vessel through a valve in the engine-room which had negligently been left open by one of the engineers of the vessel for some period between the time when work was left off on the evening of the 15th Oct. and the time when the water was first discovered in the hold.

7. That in all other respects the vessel was in good condition.

8. That in consequence of the aforesaid accident the plaintiffs' cargo has been damaged, and they have suffered loss, and have incurred divers expenses, and that other expenses have been incurred by the defendants in discharging and warehousing the said goods, and pumping the water out of the said vessel.

The charter-party, so far as is material, was as follows:

It is this day mutually agreed . . . that the good steamship or vessel called the Carron Park . . . now on passage Fraserburgh to Libau . . . being now tight, staunch, and strong, and every way fitted for the voyage, shall with all convenient speed sail and proceed to New Fairwater . . . and there load from the factors of the said affreighters a full and complete cargo of sugar, and being so loaded shall therewith proceed to Greenock . . . and there deliver the same . . . the act of God . . . any act, neglect, or default whatsoever of the pilot, master, crew, or other servants of the shipowners, and all and every other dangers and accidents of the seas, rivers, and steam navigation, of what nature and kind soever during the said voyage, always excepted.

L. Batten for the plaintiffs.—The Carron Park was rendered unseaworthy at the port of loading, and the defendants therefore are not entitled to the benefit of the exceptions:

The damage was not caused by negligence "during the voyage" within the meaning of the charter-party. The voyage of the ship and the cargo-carrying voyage are distinguishable. The latter commences "when she sets sail with her cargo on board for her port of destination:

The defendants are not entitled to general average contribution. The expenses were incurred by reason of the negligence of the shipowners' servants, for whom the plaintiffs are not liable. Cur. adv. vult.

Aug. 5.—Sir JAMES HANNEN.—The plaintiffs, Messrs. Drake and Co., sued the defendants, the owners of the Carron Park, for breach of charter-party, entered into on the 9th Oct. 1889, by which it was agreed that the Carron Park therein described as, "now on passage Fraserburgh to Libau," being "now tight, staunch and strong, and every way fitted for the voyage," should proceed to New Fairwater, and should there load a full and complete cargo of sugar in bags, and being so loaded, should therewith proceed to Greenock and there deliver the same, "the act of God, or any neglect or default whatsoever of the pilot, master, crew, or other servants of the shipowners during the said voyage always excepted." The Carron Park arrived in New Fairwater in ballast on the 13th Oct., being at the time tight, staunch, and strong, and in every way fitted to receive and carry a cargo in accordance with the charter-party. On the 14th Oct., the loading of the cargo was commenced and continued until the evening of the 15th Oct., but it was not then completed. On the morning of the 16th it was discovered that three feet of water had found its way into the vessel through a valve in the engine-room, which had negligently been left open by one of the engineers of the vessel during the night of the 15th. In all other respects the vessel was in good condition. In consequence of the water thus getting in, the plaintiffs' cargo was damaged, and the plaintiffs have incurred expenses. Other expenses were incurred by the defendants in discharging and warehousing the cargo and pumping the water out of the vessel. The plaintiffs claim for damages for the injury sustained by their cargo in the above circumstances. The defendants deny their liability, alleging that the injury was caused by the neglect or default of the engineers of the said vessel during the said voyage, and that therefore it is within the excepted perils enumerated in the charter-party. The defendants also counter-claim for general average contribution for expenses incurred by them in saving, discharging, and warehousing the plaintiffs' goods, and otherwise for the common safety of the ship and cargo.

There can be no doubt that the defendants would, unless exempted by the last clause of the charter-party, be liable for the damage caused to the plaintiffs' cargo by the admission of water to the hold of the vessel. It arose from the direct negligence of the defendants' servants, and was a breach of the obligation of the shipowner that his servants should not be negligent in and about the carrying of the goods. The question then arises, whether the shipowners have freed themselves from liability for this negligence by the terms of the charter-party, which stipulates that they shall not be responsible for any act, neglect, or default whatsoever, of their servants "during the said voyage." It was contended for the plaintiffs, that this only related to the voyage from New Fairwater to Greenock, and did not include the period of time during which the vessel was being loaded. For this contention, the case of Crow v. Falk (ubi sup.) was cited. There the Court of Queen's Bench held, that "during the voyage" could only apply to the time after the voyage commenced, and that the voyage could not begin before the ship's loading was completed. Willes, J., who was counsel for the successful party in Crow v. Falk (ubi sup.), stated in his judgment in the case of Baker v. McAndrew (34 L. J. 191, C. P.) that he did not concur in the judgment in Crow v. Falk. In Baker v. McAndrew it was decided that, where a ship was described as then at N., being tight and staunch, and was to proceed to the usual place of loading, and there load and proceed to A., with the usual exceptions "during the said voyage," that the voyage commenced from her starting from her then berth, and that the exception applied to the preliminary transit to the port of loading. In Bruce v. Nicopulo (ubi sup.) Pollock, C.B. stated that he could not subscribe to the case of Crow v. Falk, and held, with the other members of the court, that a preliminary voyage was to be considered part of the voyage contemplated by the contract. These cases appear to me to be conclusive in the present case, and to lead to a result consistent with the intention of the parties, for I cannot doubt that the exemption was intended to apply not only to the time after the vessel left the port of loading, but also to the whole time during which this vessel was engaged in performing the contract contained in the charter.

It was further argued that the leaving open of the valve rendered the ship unseaworthy, and that thus the defendants were liable for breach of warranty. It is admitted that the vessel was when the loading commenced fit to receive and carry the cargo, and that it was during an interval in the loading that the water was by the negligence of the engineer allowed to enter the ship and damage the cargo already there. Holding as I do that the exemption extends to a period anterior to the vessel leaving the port of New Fairwater, the negligent letting of the water into the vessel would be within the exemption. It did not render the vessel unseaworthy for the reception of this cargo which had already been loaded on board the vessel when in good condition. It is, for the purposes now under consideration, as though during the passage from New Fairwater the valve had been negligently opened; that is, as Lord Blackburn said, Steel v. The State Line Steamship Company (ubi sup.), like leaving a port-hole open at sea, negligence on the part of the crew, and not unseaworthiness of the ship.

With regard to the counter-claim for general average, I think the defendants are entitled to recover. The claim for contribution as general average cannot be maintained where it arises out of any negligence for which the shipowner is responsible; but negligence for which he is not responsible is as foreign to him as to the person who has suffered by it. The loss would not have fallen on the shipowner, and the expenditure or sacrifice made by him is not to avert loss from himself alone, but from the cargo-owner. This question was considered in the case of Strang, Steel, and Co. v. Scott and Co. (ubi sup.). That was a case of jettisoned cargo. Lord Watson, in delivering judgment, says: "The fault of the master being matter of admission, it seems clear upon authority that no contribution can be recovered by the owners of the ship unless the conditions ordinarily existing between parties standing in that relation have been varied by special contract between them and their shippers." Here it appears to me that the relation of the goods owner to the shipowner has been altered by the contract that the shipowner shall not be responsible for the negligence of his servants in the events which have happened. I therefore give judgment for the defendants on the claim and counter-claim with costs.

THE WARWICK. (a)

Collision—Fishing smack—Trawl warp—Arbitration—Smackowners Mutual Collision Club—Fog—Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, arts. 10 and 12—County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 71), s. 3, sub-sect. 3—County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Amendment Act 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 51), s. 4.

Where a fishing vessel becomes stationary in consequence of her gear getting fast to a rock or other obstruction it is her duty, under art. 10 (d) of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions, to make the fog-signal for a vessel at anchor, even though there be no fog, and if she fails to do so she is guilty of a breach of the Regulations.

A. and B. were members of a Smackowners Mutual Collision Club. By art. 52 of its articles of association the club was liable only up to 30*l. By art.* 56 it was provided that "in the event of a collision occurring between two vessels insured in this company, or their respective trawling gear, and damages being caused thereby to either or both of the said vessels, or their gear, the owners of such vessel shall immediately submit a statement of the whole circumstances of the collision, and the directors, after receiving such statement, shall have power to arbitrate on the matter, and their decision in the matter shall be final and conclusive."

A. gave notice to the club that the trawl warp of his fishing smack had been cut by B.'s fishing smack drawing her trawl across A.'s trawl.

A.'s master was subsequently taken by A.'s agent to a meeting of the directors, and there examined as to the alleged collision, and his evidence was reduced into writing by the secretary. The secretary then gave notice to B. of A.'s claim, and thereupon B.'s mate attended a meeting of the directors and gave evidence, the effect of which was that the damage had not been done by his ship or trawl gear. His evidence was also reduced into writing. At a subsequent meeting of the directors B.'s master was examined, the written statements of the two other witnesses were then read over, and the directors then passed a resolution that B.'s trawl had not been in collision with A.'s. The plaintiff was not present when either of the defendant's witnesses were examined, nor when his claim was adjudicated upon, and had no notice that the meetings were to take place. A. having sued B. in rem in the County Court, B. alleged that the decision of the directors was final.

Held, that the plaintiff had never submitted his claim against B. to the directors; that there had been no proper hearing of the case by the directors, and that the alleged arbitration was no defence to the action.

Semble, a County Court having Admiralty jurisdiction has jurisdiction, under the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868 and the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Amendment Act 1868, to entertain a cause of collision between the trawl gear of two fishing smacks.

THIS was an appeal by the plaintiff in a collision action in rem from a decision of the County Court of Kingston-upon-Hull.

The action was instituted by the owner of the fishing smack E. Birkbeck against the owner of the fishing smack Warwick, to recover compensation for damages to the plaintiff's trawl warp and gear.

The damage occurred on the 27th Jan. 1889 in the North Sea, and was occasioned by the Warwick sailing across the bows of the E. Birkbeck, and with her trawl warp cutting the warp of the E. Birkbeck.

The facts alleged by the plaintiff were as follows: On the night of the 27th Jan. the E. Birkbeck, a trawler of eighty-six tons, was fishing in the North Sea, in company with the fishing fleet. About 10 p.m. her fishing gear got fast to some obstruction, whereupon the stopper was let go and the vessel was brought head to wind and rode to her warp. When fishing the E. Birkbeck was exhibiting a masthead light, visible all round the horizon, and this she continued to show after she was brought up by her warp. She also showed flares. In these circumstances those on board the E. Birkbeck saw another trawler, which proved to be the Warwick, fishing away on the starboard bow. The Warwick was approaching the E. Birkbeck so as to cross her bows, and although the Warwick was loudly hailed she held on and came so close that with her warp she cut the warp of the E. Birkbeck, and did the damage complained of.

The defendant denied that the Warwick was ever sufficiently near to the E. Birkbeck to cut her warp, and said that, if her warp was cut as alleged, it was done by some other vessel's warp and not by the Warwick's.

The plaintiff and defendant were members of the Hull Smackowners Mutual Collision Club, of which club the following articles of association are material to this action:

52. The perils insured against are damages caused by collision only, up to a sum not exceeding 30*l.*, and are more particularly mentioned and specified in the articles following.

53. The owner of any vessel entered in this company shall immediately on her causing or incurring damage from collision communicate and give notice in writing to the secretary, and inform him of the damage sustained and of the whole of the circumstances of the collision, and shall call not less than three directors on board the vessel in respect of which the claim is made within forty-eight hours after her arrival at port, to survey any damage which such vessel may have sustained before any steps whatever are taken to repair such damage.

56. In the event of a collision occurring between two vessels insured in this company, or their respective trawling gear, and damages being caused thereby to either or both of the said vessels or their gear, the owners of such vessel shall immediately submit a statement of the whole circumstances of the collision as mentioned in art. 53, and the directors after receiving such statement shall have power to arbitrate on the matter, and their decision in the matter shall be final and conclusive. Under no circumstances whatever shall one member of the company be allowed to go to law with another, but in all cases he shall abide by the decision of the directors. In the event of any member declining to fulfil the conditions of this article he shall forfeit all claim upon the company in respect of the collision which is the subject-matter of the dispute.

It appeared that subsequently to the collision the plaintiff gave notice thereof to the club, and on the 18th Feb. his agent, one Cooke, who was a director, took the master of the E. Birkbeck to attend a meeting of the directors. The master was then examined as to the circumstances of the collision, and his evidence was taken down by the secretary of the club, and then signed by the witness.

The secretary then wrote to the defendant, and informed him of the plaintiff's claim, and a few days later the mate of the Warwick was examined before the directors, and his evidence also committed to writing. On the 20th March another meeting of the directors was held, when the master of the Warwick was examined, and the statements of the two previous witnesses were read over. The whole matter was then discussed, and a resolution was passed that the Warwick was not in collision with the E. Birkbeck on the date stated. The plaintiff was not present when either of the defendant's witnesses was examined, and received no notice that they were to be examined, or that his claim was to be adjudicated upon.

The following Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea are material to the decision:

Art. 10.—(a.) All fishing vessels and fishing boats of twenty tons net registered tonnage, or upwards, when under way, and when not required by the following regulations in this article to carry and show the lights therein named, shall carry and show the same lights as other vessels under way.

(d.) If a vessel when fishing becomes stationary in consequence of her gear getting fast to a rock or other obstruction, she shall show the light and make the fog-signal for a vessel at anchor.

(e.) Fishing vessels and open boats may at any time use a flare-up in addition to the lights which they are by this article required to carry and show. All flare-up lights exhibited by a vessel when trawling, dredging, or fishing with any kind of drag net shall be shown at the after part of the vessel, excepting that, if the vessel is hanging by the stern to her trawl, dredge or drag net, they shall be exhibited from the bow.

(f.) Every fishing vessel and every open boat when at anchor between sunset and sunrise shall exhibit a white light visible all round the horizon at a distance of at least one mile.

(g.) In fog, mist, or falling snow, a drift net vessel attached to her nets, and a vessel when trawling, dredging, or fishing with any kind of drag net, and a vessel employed in line fishing with their lines out, shall at intervals of not more than two minutes make a blast with her fog horn and ring her bell alternately.

Art. 12. In fog, mist, or falling snow, whether by day or night, the signals described in this article shall be used as follows; that is to say, (c.) A steamship and a sailing ship, when not under way, shall at intervals of not more than two minutes ring the bell.

The County Court judge gave judgment for the defendant on the ground that the plaintiff had submitted his claim to the arbitration of the club, whose decision was final. He also found as a fact, that the warp of the E. Birkbeck had been cut by the warp of the Warwick, that the Warwick was negligent, and therefore to blame; and also found the E. Birkbeck to blame for a breach of art. 10 (d.) of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, in not making a fog-signal for a vessel at anchor.

At the trial, counsel for the defendant had submitted that the court had no jurisdiction, as the collision being between warp and warp, and not between ship and ship, was not within the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Acts 1868 and 1869, and the County Court judge held that he had jurisdiction. The defendant did not take this point on appeal.

Bucknill, Q.C., for the plaintiff, in support of the appeal.—The plaintiff is not bound by the so-called award. He never submitted his claim against the defendant to arbitration, and even if he did, the proceedings were so irregular as to deprive them of any effect. He was not present, and had no opportunity of cross-examining the defendant's witnesses. It is also contended that the articles of association do not give the club power to decide whether there has been a collision or not, but only what the merits of a collision are, assuming there to have been one:

Edwards v. Aberayon Mutual Ship Insurance Society, 1 Q. B. Div. 563; 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 154; 34 L. T. Rep. N. S. 457.

The plaintiff did not commit a breach of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions. Art. 10 (d), which was applicable to this case, says, that a trawler when stationary in consequence of her gear getting fast to a rock, shall show the light and make the fog-signal for a vessel at anchor. That means, if it is dark, she shall show an anchor-light, and if there is fog she shall ring a bell. In this case there was no fog, and therefore no duty to ring a bell.

Sir Walter Phillimore and Butler Aspinall for the defendant, contra.—The plaintiff did not submit his claim to arbitration, and therefore the decision of the directors is final, unless it is set aside. If the arbitration was irregular, the plaintiff's remedy was to have moved to set it aside:

Cleworth v. Pickford, 7 M. & W. 321;
Thornburn v. Barnes, 2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 459; L. Rep. 2 C. P. 384; 16 L. T. Rep. N. S. 10;
Braddick v. Thompson, 8 East, 344;
Scot v. Avery, 5 H. of L. Cas. 852.

The judge was right in finding the E. Birkbeck to blame for a breach of the regulations. Art. 10 (d.) says that in the circumstances of this case a trawler shall make a fog-signal irrespective of whether there be a fog or not. Where the regulations are dealing with the case of an existent fog, the words "in fog, mist, or falling snow" are used. A trawler which is brought up by her trawl is differently situated from a vessel at anchor, and therefore it is probable that the Legislature intended that she should give indication of that fact by the abnormal signal of ringing a bell. [He was stopped on this point by the Court.]

Bucknill, Q.C. in reply. Cur. adv. vult.

Aug. 5.—The judgment of the court was delivered by

Butt, J.—On the argument of this appeal we intimated—in fact, there was no serious contest on the matter—that the learned judge of the court below was right in deciding that he had jurisdiction to try the case. We also think that the plaintiff must be held to blame for a breach of the statutory Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea. We also agree with the learned judge in holding that the evidence establishes a case of negligence against the Warwick, and that she must be pronounced in fault as well as the plaintiff's vessel, unless her owner can show that the matters in dispute have been determined by arbitration. It was on this point that we required time for consideration. At the hearing in the County Court the defendant contended that there had been a valid submission to arbitration of the whole of the plaintiff's claim, a proper hearing of the case by the arbitrators, and a binding award; and the learned judge, although his language intimates considerable doubt, must be taken to have so decided. We are unable to agree with that decision.

The first question arises on clause 56 of the articles of association of the Hull Smack-owners Mutual Collision Club Limited. It is worthy of remark that this clause only authorises the directors to act as arbitrators "in the event of a collision between two vessels insured in this company, or their respective trawling gear," words which seem to imply an agreement between the parties concerned as to the fact of a collision having happened as a condition precedent to the right of the directors to arbitrate. Construed literally the clause authorises the directors to adjudicate on the incidents of a collision which has occurred, and not to determine whether there has been a collision. The resolution of the board, relied upon by the defendants as an award, asserts that no such collision happened. It is not clear what clause 56, either alone or read and considered in conjunction with some of the other provisions of the articles of association, means, whether it contemplates a reference to the directors of the question of the rights and liabilities of the club and its members inter se, as mutual insurers to the extent of 30*l.* on each vessel, or of all the rights and liabilities of the owners of smacks that have come into collision, or of both these matters. One thing seems clear from the book of the society produced on the trial, viz., that it is not the practice of the directors, acting under clause 56 and in ordinary circumstances, to decide the whole matter including the quantum of damage done and suffered by the respective parties. In the only case in which they have done so, they procured an express authority from the parties in dispute over and above the prescriptions of clause 56. Now it is true that it may not be proper to invoke the practice of the directors in order to interpret the meaning of the clause; but the various clauses of the articles of association being contradictory and practically unintelligible, we think it open to us, when certain acts of the plaintiff or his agent are relied upon by the defendant as evidence of his intention to submit, and of his having in fact submitted his whole claim to arbitration, to inquire what the practice of the directors in these cases has been. On the best consideration that we have been able to give to the case we have come to the conclusion that the case does not establish the contention that the plaintiff ever intended to submit, or did in fact submit, the whole of his claim against the Warwick to the decision of the directors.

We moreover differ from the finding of the learned judge that there was a hearing—which must be taken to be a proper hearing—of the case by the directors. Clause 56 of the articles of association provides for arbitration by the directors, and not by a quorum of the directors of the company, and it is not perfectly clear that a hearing and decision by some of the directors, although sufficient in number to form a quorum in ordinary matters, would constitute a valid and binding award. However this may be, there certainly never has been a proper hearing of the case by the directors. It is clear from the evidence of the secretary of the association that the notice convening the meeting of the directors on the 20th March 1889, the day of the alleged hearing, contained no reference to this matter; that the plaintiff had no notice of such meeting; that neither he nor his agent was present; that, although the captain of the defendant vessel was then examined, no opportunity was afforded the plaintiff of testing his evidence by cross-examination, or of calling any witnesses on his own behalf. The plaintiff was in fact not heard. It was urged that this objection to the proceedings at the hearing could only be properly raised on a motion to set aside the award. However this may be—and the matter is not free from doubt—we have thought it right to state our opinion, because the learned judge in the court below says in his judgment, "I felt bound to hold that, whilst the so-called arbitration hardly deserved that name, still it was a hearing, and that the resolution was an award." On the whole, and while the case is not free from doubt, we have come to the conclusion that the defendant has failed to establish that part of his case which sets up a reference and award in answer to this action, and that the judgment of the court below must be altered by a decree holding both vessels to blame.

Seaman's wages — Recovery of — Maritime lien of mate for wages earned in port—No agreement—Ship in dock—Action in rem—County Court Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 71), s. 3, sub-sect. 2 — County Court Admiralty Jurisdiction Amendment Act 1869

(32 & 33 Vict. c. 51), s. 3 — Merchant Shipping Act 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104), s. 181.

Where, in an action in rem by the plaintiff, the chief mate of a ship, against the owners, for wages, the plaintiff having been paid off with the rest of the crew after the arrival of the ship in port, but by direction of the owners remaining on board at the same rate of wages as during the voyage; the judge of the City of London Court refused to hear the action, on the ground that the agreement between the plaintiff and defendant had ended on the arrival of the ship; no fresh articles having been signed, the plaintiff had no maritime lien, but only a common law right of action, and therefore dismissed the action for want of jurisdiction.

On an application for a mandamus requiring the judge of the City of London Court to hear and determine the action:

Held, that the County Court judge had jurisdiction to try the claim, and ordered the rule nisi for a mandamus directed to the judge of the City of London Court to hear and determine the action under its Admiralty jurisdiction, to be made absolute.

Application for a rule nisi for a writ of mandamus to issue to the judge of the City of London Court requiring him to hear and determine a certain action brought by the applicant against the owners of the steamship Michigan.

The applicant was the plaintiff in the action, and was chief mate of the steamship Michigan, which arrived in London early in Nov. 1889, when all the crew, including the plaintiff, were paid off in pursuance of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854.

The plaintiff, by direction of the owner, remained on board to superintend and assist in the loading of the vessel at the same rate of wages as he had received during the voyage, and his wages were paid to him up to the 30th Nov.

In an action in rem brought by the plaintiff against the owners of the Michigan, in the City of London Court, to recover the wages due to him from the 30th Nov. to the date of the action being brought, the judge of the City of London Court held that the applicant had no maritime lien for his wages, as the plaintiff's articles for the former voyage were at an end, and as he had not signed articles for another voyage he was not a seaman and was not serving on board ship as a seaman, but only had a common law right of action, and refused to try the action on the ground that he had no jurisdiction to do so.

By 31 & 32 Vict. c. 71, s. 3:

Any County Court having Admiralty jurisdiction shall have jurisdiction and all powers and authorities relating thereto to try and determine, subject and according to the provisions of this Act the following causes (in this Act referred to as Admiralty causes):

Sub-sect. (2) as to any claims for towage, necessaries, or wages. Any cause in which the amount claimed does not exceed 150*l*.

By 32 & 33 Vict. c. 51, s. 3:

The jurisdiction conferred by this Act and by the County Court Jurisdiction Act 1868 may be exercised by proceedings in rem or by proceedings in personam.

By 17 & 18 Vict. c. 104, s. 181:

A seaman's right to wages and provisions shall be taken to commence either at the time he commences work, or at the time specified in the agreement for his commencement of work, or presence on board, whichever first happens.

J. P. Aspinall, for the owners of the Michigan, showed cause against the rule being made absolute.—The learned judge of the City of London Court was right in holding that he had not jurisdiction in this case. The Admiralty jurisdiction of the County Court is limited to the jurisdiction which the High Court of Admiralty had at the passing of the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868:

That jurisdiction was limited to wages of seamen, and the plaintiff was during the time for which he claimed wages not a seaman within the true meaning of the word, but was merely a caretaker, his name was not on the ship's articles, he was not a seaman, and his claim was not for seaman's wages, within the Admiralty jurisdiction of the County Court; wages run from the signing of the ship's articles, according to the Merchant Shipping Act of 1854. In the cases of Wells v. Osman (2 Lord Raym. 1044); Re The Great Eastern Steamship Company (5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 511) the work done by the claimants was in anticipation of and preparation for a voyage. In the latter case they were about to sign the ship's articles, and were therefore held to be seamen; but the present case is different.

Nelson, contrà.—The judge of the City of London Court was wrong in holding he had no jurisdiction. Only the ordinary crew were paid off. The plaintiff remained on board doing ordinary duties as mate; his position was not altered. The case of the Great Eastern Steamship Company is in point. The mate is a seaman. In The Great Eastern case the men had not signed the articles. The plaintiff remained with the ship to superintend the discharge of the old cargo, and the loading of the cargo for the next voyage, and is entitled to sue in rem under the Admiralty jurisdiction of the County Court for his wages, and it is immaterial that the old articles had been signed and had come to an end. Wells v. Osman (2 Lord Raym. 1044) and Re The Great Eastern Steamship Company (5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 511; 53 L. T. Rep. N. S. 594) are exactly in point. Under the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 a "seaman" is defined as any person employed on board a ship in any capacity. Here the man was certainly a seaman, for he was mate, and certified as such, and he therefore had a right to resort by the maritime law to the lien against his ship. In The Jane and Matilda (1 Hagg. Adm. 187) a woman was allowed to sue in rem in the Admiralty Court for wages:

Cur. adv. vult.

June 11.—Coleridge, C.J.—Since hearing this case yesterday, I have taken the opportunity of consulting Butt, J., a judge of the Admiralty Division, and I defer to his authority (rather against what at first had been my own opinion), and I come to the conclusion that the judge of the City Court was wrong in holding he had no jurisdiction, and that he had jurisdiction in the action, and that he must hear and determine the case on the merits. It appears that, according to the practice of the Admiralty Court, persons in this position could maintain actions of this kind in that court. That determines the case, for the question depends upon what was the jurisdiction of the Admiralty which has been transferred by an Act of Parliament to the County Court.

WILLS, J.—I concur in this decision, not merely in deference to the authority of my brother Butt, but also on my own view, and upon consideration of the authorities I have independently come to the same conclusion. The case of The Jane and Matilda (1 Hagg. Adm. 187), where Lord Stowell held that a woman who had acted as caretaker was entitled to claim against the ship, seems to govern practically the present case; that decision appears to be entirely in accordance with the uniform current of authority. The right to proceed in rem for services rendered on board a ship apparently extended to every class of persons connected with the ship as a ship, and to services rendered by such persons in harbour as much as to services rendered by them at sea. I am of opinion that the services rendered by the plaintiff were maritime services, although the vessel was actually in harbour at the time.

BUDGETTS v. BINNINGTON. (a)

Charter-party — Bill of lading — Demurrage — Unloading grain cargo — Shipowner and consignee—Liability of latter for delay in unloading caused by a strike at the docks—Shipowner "ready and willing to deliver."

Plaintiffs, being the consignees under a bill of lading, incorporating a clause in the charter-party fixing the number of lay days for unloading, and allowing other days for demurrage, sought to recover from the defendants, who were the shipowners, a sum of money paid to them under protest in respect of a claim for demurrage. Neither the bill of lading nor charter-party said anything about dock strikes. By the custom of the port of Bristol cargoes were discharged by the joint act of the shipowner and consignees. There being a strike among the labourers employed by the ship as well as by the consignees during the lay days, so that the unloading was prevented and could not be continued until after the expiration of the lay-days:

Held, that the number of lay days having been fixed for discharging the ship, the consignees were liable for demurrage, notwithstanding the shipowners, owing to the strike, were prevented doing their part of the unloading.

THIS was a motion for judgment in an action tried before Cave, J. and a jury at the assizes held at Bristol.

The plaintiffs were the indorsees of a bill of lading of a cargo of barley, shipped on board a steamship named the Fairfield belonging to the defendants.

The plaintiffs sought to recover the sum of 147*l.* 15*s.* 11*d.*, which was paid by them to the defendants, under protest, in respect of a claim by the defendants for keeping the vessel on demurrage at the port of Bristol.

In the bill of lading it was stated that the cargo was shipped at Feisk, for delivery at a port as ordered to the shippers, or to their assigns, "they paying freight and demurrage if any, . . . all conditions as charter-party."

The charter-party stated, that the cargo was "to be brought and taken from alongside the steamer at freighter's expense and risk;" the crew, however, were "to render all customary assistance in hauling lighters alongside," and that "thirteen running days, Sundays excepted," were "to be allowed the freighters (if the steamer be not sooner despatched) for sending the cargo alongside and unloading; but in no case should more than seven running days, Sundays excepted, be allowed for unloading, and ten days on demurrage over and above the said lay days, at 4*d.* per ton on the steamer's gross register tonnage per running day," and that "the freighter's liability" was "to cease when the cargo was shipped, the owner or his agent having an absolute lien on the cargo for freight, dead freight, demurrage, lighterage at port of discharge, and average." At the port where the ship was loaded the lay days had been exhausted, so the defendants and the shipper agreed by letter to allow six additional running days, Sundays being excepted, for discharging the cargo.

The bill of lading was in the usual form, and contained the usual exceptions, but said nothing about strikes. Neither did the charter-party say anything about strikes.

After arriving at the Portishead Dock, at Bristol, the Fairfield began to unload her cargo. The lay days commenced on Monday the 25th, and ended on Saturday, the 30th Nov. 1889.

The custom of the port of Bristol is for grain cargoes in bulk from the Black Sea ports to be discharged by the joint efforts of shipowners and consignees.

During the present unloading the following was the system adopted: The plaintiffs' part of the discharge was performed by the Bristol Docks Committee, who employed a firm of master stevedores; the defendants' part was performed by another firm of master stevedores, but besides these there was a large number of dock labourers, on the part of both, but the number employed by the consignees was much larger than the number employed by the shipowners. First of all "bushellers" employed by the consignees go into the holds of the vessel and put the grain into sacks; the sacks are attached to a running noose, and then hoisted by "winchmen," these "winchmen" being employed by the shipowners. When the sacks are hoisted out of the hold on to the deck, they are put into scales by men who are called "bearers in;" these are employed by the shipowners. Then they are weighed by "weighers," who are employed by the consignees, and are then carried into trucks or into lighters, or into a warehouse, as required; this is done by men called "landers," and these are employed by the consignees. "Talleymen" are employed both by shipowners and consignees, but the "foreman" is employed by the shipowners.

On Monday the 25th, Tuesday the 26th, and Wednesday the 27th Nov., being the first three lay days, more than half the cargo was discharged. On Thursday, the 28th Nov., the dock labourers employed by both firms of stevedores struck, and on that day and on Friday the 29th Nov., Saturday the 30th Nov., Monday the 2nd Dec., and Tuesday the 3rd Dec., no cargo was discharged. On Wednesday the 4th Dec. the strike ended, and the discharge commenced again, and owing to the gangs working night and day it was completed on Thursday the 5th Dec. Under these circumstances demurrage for the days occupied in unloading after the 30th Nov. was claimed by the defendants, and they exercised their lien upon the cargo for the sum claimed in the action, which was paid under protest, and was now sought to be recovered back. For them it was contended that the plaintiffs were, under the contract, bound to pay demurrage, that the officers and men had remained on board after the steamer arrived in the dock, and that the master stevedores employed by the defendants were quite ready to do their part of the discharge, but owing to the strike they were unable to find dock labourers ready to work.

The following question was by the consent of the parties left by the judge to the jury:

"Were the shipowners ready and willing to do their part of that which it was customary for them to do?"

In answer to a question by one of the jurymen, the learned judge (Cave, J.) said that, if the shipowners were not able to do their part, they could not be said to be ready and willing to do it, and upon this the jury found the defendants were not ready and willing to perform their part of the discharge.

The learned judge left either party to move for judgment.

Bucknill, Q.C. and J. V. Austin, on behalf of the defendants, contended that they were entitled to judgment, and cited as an express authority Thiis v. Byers, 34 L. T. Rep. N. S. 526; 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 147; 1 Q. B. Div. 244.

There the same question arose upon a clause in the charter-party similar to the one in question. It was held that, as the clause prescribed the time for unloading, there was at once an absolute contract upon the charterer's part to unload within the prescribed time, although during a part of the time he had been prevented doing so because of the weather. In the present case, strikes are not excepted in the bill of lading or in the charter-party. The shipowner therefore in this case is in a similar position to the shipowners in the case of Thiis v. Byers, and the present consignees, the plaintiffs, are in the same position as the charterers in that case. The same rule has been similarly applied in the following cases:

Randall v. Lynch, 2 Camp. 352;
Lees v. Yates, 3 Taunt. 387;
Harper v. McCarthy, 2 B. & P. (N. R.) 258;
Brown v. Johnson, 10 M. & W. 331;
Porteous v. Watney, 39 L. T. Rep. N. S. 195; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 34; 3 Q. B. Div. 543; Postlethwaite v. Freeland, 42 L. T. Rep. N. S. 845; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 302; 5 App. Cas. 618.

Cohen, Q.C. and Pyke (E. U. Bullen with them), on behalf of the plaintiffs, contended that they were entitled to judgment, there being no case in which demurrage can be recovered where the detention of the ship is due partly to the fault of the shipowners. In the case cited, Thiis v. Byers, the shipowners were not in default; bad weather set in during the time they were actually performing their duty. Every decision presupposes readiness and willingness on the part of a shipowner to perform his part of his duty. In the case of Mackay v. Dick (6 App. Cas. 251) Lord Blackburn in his judgment says, on p. 263: "Where in a written contract it appears that both parties have agreed that something shall be done which cannot effectually be done unless both concur in doing it, the construction of the contract is that each agrees to do all that is necessary to be done on his part for the carrying out of that thing." In this case the defendants as shipowners ought to have had a sufficient number of dock labourers and appliances to do the work that ought to have been done by the ship, and this duty on the part of the defendants could not be affected by the number of lay days having been fixed. By this the plaintiffs undertook to discharge the steamer in a fixed time, and they would be liable for delay caused by their own default, but they could not be so liable, because the dock labourers employed by the defendants refused to do their duty. Had any accident happened to the ship itself, the lay days would not have run against the plaintiffs during the time it was taking to repair the ship. The following cases were cited:

Barret v. Dutton, 4 Camp. 333;

Bucknill, Q.C. in reply.

The judgment of the court (Denman, Charles, and Williams, JJ.) was delivered on the 28th June, and was read by WILLIAMS, J.—The question in this case is whether, under the circumstances of it, the shipowners are entitled to charge demurrage. The shipowners refused to give up the goods of the consignees unless the demurrage claimed was paid, and the consignees having paid under protest, seek to recover what they paid in this action. The facts of the case are these: The plaintiffs are indorsees of a bill of lading in respect of the cargo of the steamer Fairfield. Such bill of lading incorporates the terms of a charter-party wherein the plaintiffs were allowed thirteen running days (Sundays excepted) for sending the cargo alongside and unloading, but in no case should more than seven running days (Sundays excepted) be allowed for unloading, demurrage over and above the said lay days at 4*d.* per ton on the steamer's gross register tonnage per running day. By the charter-party the master undertook to deliver the cargo from alongside. By the custom of the port of Bristol the unloading of cargo is the joint act of the ship and the consignee. In the case of a grain cargo the first act done is, that the consignee sends on board men with shovels and bushels and sacks. Then the master nominally (but the stevedores in fact as his agents) raises the sacks from the hold and brings them to the bulwarks ready to deliver overside to the consignee or his agents, viz., in the port of Bristol, the stevedores employed by the dock company. The ship in question arrived on the 23rd Nov., and the unloading was began on Monday, the 25th; but in the midst of the unloading on the 28th the dockers and stevedore struck as well those employed by the dock company as those employed by the ship, and the result of this was that neither was the master in a position that he could deliver, nor the consignees that they could receive, or otherwise do their part of the unloading. The jury were by agreement of the parties asked the following question, viz., "Was the shipowner ready and willing to do his part of that which it was customary for him to do?" The answer of the jury was, "No." The learned judge, in the course of his summing up, in answer to a juror, said that if the master was not able to do his part he was not ready and willing.

The question is, for whom judgment ought to be entered under such circumstances. It is said by the plaintiff that readiness and willingness of the master to deliver the cargo to the consignees is a condition precedent, the non-existence of which, according to the finding of the jury, disentitles the master from claiming this demurrage; and it is further said that, even though readiness and willingness to deliver the cargo may not be a condition precedent, it is something which the master has to do on his part concurrently with the part which the consignee has to take in the loading of the ship, and that, therefore, on the well-known principle established by the cases cited in the notes to Peters v. Opie (2 Wms. Saunders, 346); Armitage v. Insole (14 Q. B. 728), and many other cases, the master cannot demand performance by the consignee of his part without averring readiness and willingness, if not a tender of performance of the conditions concurrent due from him, which for the purpose of effectively making his demand on the consignees, become conditions precedent. While approving of these contentions so far as relate to conditions precedent, we are of opinion that they are not applicable to the present case, and therefore afford no ground for holding that the master was not entitled to claim demurrage. The fact is, that the obligation of the consignees to pay demurrage "is absolute," as was decided in the case of This v. Byers. The readiness and willingness of the master to make delivery is not the consideration of or condition precedent to the undertaking to pay demurrage for the detention of the ship; and this being so, it is not sufficient to relieve the consignee of the obligation to pay demurrage that he should show that the master was unable to perform some obligation undertaken by him in the charter-party, but it must appear that the consignee was prevented from discharging the ship within the time allowed for unloading by the act of the master, or those for whom he was responsible. If this were not so, the master would not have been entitled to recover demurrage in the cases of This v. Byers, Porteous v. Watney, and Straker v. Kidd, for in each of these cases it is plain from the facts that the master was not ready and willing to make delivery, because he was prevented in the one case by the weather, and in the other two cases by the non-removal by third persons of the superincumbent cargo. It is quite true that in Straker v. Kidd Lush, J. speaks of "an implied condition that the shipowner shall be ready and willing to deliver;" but his meaning is made plain by the next sentence in his judgment where he says: "If he (the master) wrongfully refuses to give over his goods, or if by reason of any default of his, or of any obstacle for which he is responsible, the consignee is unable to get his goods, this would afford a good answer to the claim." And again, after stating that the contract is absolute and not conditional, the learned judge says: "The defendants are therefore liable unless they can show that some act or default of the owner, or of some one for whom he is responsible, prevented them from performing their contract." In the present case the plaintiffs were not prevented from performing their contract by any default of the shipowner or those for whom he was responsible. It was the action of the stevedores and dockers which alike prevented the plaintiffs and defendants from doing their part in the unloading. This in no way relieves the charterer or consignee from the absolute contract to pay demurrage for delay and detention of the ship during unloading. If the strike of the stevedores had resulted from unreasonable conduct of the master in refusing reasonable wages asked by the stevedores, the case might have been different; for then perhaps it might have been said that the shipowners prevented the charterers performing the contract, and that the act of the shipowners was the causa causans preventing the charterer; but even in such a case the charterer would, in our opinion, have to show that he was actually prevented by the default of the shipowner, i.e., that there was not available means of performing the contract, notwithstanding the default of the shipowner: (see Alston v. Herring, 11 Exch. 822.) If such means were available the charterer must avail himself of them to discharge the ship, and take his remedy by suing the shipowner for breach of contract, or he will be liable to demurrage. The result in the present case is, that judgment must be entered for the defendants, with costs of action and of this motion.

Sale of goods—Stoppage in transitu—Delivery to shipping agent for shipment abroad.

chaser, or to any agent of his, to hold for him otherwise than as a carrier, but are still in the hands of the carrier as such, and for the purposes of the transit, then, although such carrier was the purchaser's agent to accept delivery so as to pass the property, nevertheless the goods are in transitu, and may be stopped.

The right to stop under such circumstances is not affected by the facts (1) that the purchaser has handed to the shipping agents the shipowners' receipts for the goods received by him from the vendor, and has received from them in exchange a bill of lading; (2) that the purchaser is himself a passenger by the vessel on board which the goods are shipped as cargo for conveyance to their ultimate destination.

Bethell v. Clarke (59 L. T. Rep. N. S. 808; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 194; 20 Q. B. Div. 615) approved.

THIS was an appeal from a judgment of the Supreme Court of New South Wales (Windeyer and Foster, JJ., Innes, J. dissenting), making absolute a rule for a new trial in an action brought by the appellant against the respondents, on the ground that the verdict was against the weight of evidence, and for misdirection.

The action was brought by the appellant as official assignee of the estate and effects of one William Clare, who was insolvent, to recover certain goods from the respondents. The respondents pleaded a right to stop in transitu.

The facts and evidence appear from the judgment of their Lordships.

The case was tried before Darley, C.J. and a jury, and upon the findings of the jury, which are set out in the judgment of their Lordships, the learned Chief Justice directed a verdict for the plaintiff for 505*l*.

Barnes, Q.C. and Howard Smith appeared for the appellant, the plaintiff below.—In addition to the cases referred to in the judgment of their Lordships, they cited

Kendall v. Marshall, 48 L. T. Rep. N. S. 951; 11 Q. B. Div. 356;
Valpy v. Gibson, 4 C. B. 837;
Ex parte Miles, 15 Q. B. Div. 39;
Ex parte Watson, 36 L. T. Rep. N. S. 75; 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 396; 5 Ch. Div. 35;
Whitehead v. Anderson, 9 M. & W. 518.

Finlay, Q.C. and Pollard, who appeared for the respondents, were not called upon to address their Lordships.

At the conclusion of the argument for the appellant, their Lordships' judgment was delivered by Lord HERSCHELL.—The question raised in this action is, whether the respondents, who are merchants carrying on business in Sydney, were entitled to stop in transitu certain goods which were purchased of them by William Clare, the trustee under whose insolvency is the appellant on the present appeal, and was the plaintiff in the action below. At the trial evidence was given by William Clare that when he purchased the goods he gave instructions to Davis, who was acting on behalf of the vendors, to mark the packages $\frac{WC}{K}$, that is: William Clare, Kimberley, and that he told him to send the goods, when packed and marked, down to Howard Smith and Co.'s wharf in Sydney. He stated that he gave no other instructions, but on cross-examination he admitted that he had told Marks that the goods were going to Kimberley; that he was going to take the goods there; that they were going with him. The evidence given by Marks was, that a day or two before the purchase he saw Clare, who told him that he was going to Kimberley; that he wanted the goods he was purchasing to be shipped by the first boat, which was the Gambier; and evidence was also given by Davis that at the date of the purchase Clare had stated that he was undecided whether the goods were to go by the Gambier or some other vessel, but that he would let them know; and that he came two days later and told them the goods were to be shipped by the Gambier to Kimberley. Messrs. Howard Smith and Co., to whose wharf the goods were to be sent, are shipowners, and were known to both parties to be then loading vessels for the port of Kimberley, the earliest of their vessels to sail being the Gambier. The goods were sent by the respondents to Howard Smith and Co.'s wharf, and a document was sent with them which was initialed on behalf of Howard Smith and Co., by one of their employés, which was in these terms: "Wm. Howard Smith and Sons Limited, Sydney, 20/5/86. Steamer Gambier. For King's Sound. Shipper, S. Hoffnung and Co. Consignee, W. Clare. Goods, Kimberley." It appears that in respect of some of the goods, those apparently that were in bond, a more elaborate form of receipt was given by the shipowners, but in those receipts also Hoffnung and Co. were described as the shippers of the goods, Clare as the consignee, and the place of destination as Kimberley. At the trial before the Chief Justice several questions were put to the jury. The first three were in these terms: (1) "Did Clare instruct the defendants to deliver the goods to Clare at Howard Smith and Co.'s wharf, and did the defendants accept such instructions?—Yes. (2) If so, did the defendants in fact deliver the goods at Howard Smith and Co.'s wharf in accordance with such instructions?—Yes. (3) Did Clare instruct the defendants to ship the goods by the s.s. Gambier, and consign them to him at Kimberley?—No." The fourth is immaterial, and it was not answered by the jury. The fifth was in these terms: "After the goods were in fact delivered at Howard Smith and Co.'s wharf, was any contract entered into between Clare and Howard Smith and Co. to ship the goods to Kimberley on his account?—Yes." Upon those findings the Chief Justice entered the verdict for the plaintiff. A rule was afterwards obtained to set aside that verdict and for a new trial, on the ground that the findings of the jury were against the weight of evidence, and also on the ground that the learned Chief Justice had misdirected the jury on a point to which their Lordships will call attention hereafter. That rule came on for argument before three learned judges in the Supreme Court, and was made absolute for a new trial by a majority of those judges. The first question their Lordships have to consider is, whether the verdict can, as the appellant alleges, be supported as being right upon a true view of the facts proved at the trial, or at least as being one which might reasonably be found by the jury. The first two questions put to the jury appear to their Lordships to be possibly open to the charge of ambiguity. If the meaning of the language used: "Did Clare instruct the defendants to deliver the goods to Clare at Howard Smith and Co.'s wharf?" and "Did the defendants in fact deliver the goods at Howard Smith and Co.'s wharf in accordance with such instructions?" be: were the instructions to deliver them to Clare personally at Howard Smith and Co.'s wharf, and were those instructions obeyed?—it is obviously impossible to support the finding. But even if the meaning be, were the defendants to deliver the goods to Clare at Howard Smith and Co.'s wharf in this sense, that they were to be held by Howard Smith and Co. for Clare, not as carriers, but as his agent in some other capacity?—the verdict appears to their Lordships to be entirely against the weight of evidence, or indeed to have no evidence at all to support it. If all that was meant be: were the goods to be delivered to Clare at Howard Smith and Co.'s wharf in this sense, that the transaction of sale and delivery was to be then completed, so that the property should pass to Clare and he should become the owner of the goods?—the finding would be perfectly correct, but wholly immaterial upon the question whether the respondents had a right to stop the goods in transitu.

Reliance was placed by the appellant on the fact that the receipts which have been mentioned were handed over by the respondents to Clare, and that being in possession of these receipts, he obtained from Howard Smith and Co. a bill of lading. He stated that in that bill of lading he was named as consignee, but that the name of Hoffnung and Co. did not appear as shippers. Their Lordships think that some doubt may well be entertained whether he is accurate in that statement, having regard to the evidence as to the course of business, and indeed applying common knowledge as to the course which such a transaction would ordinarily take. But however that may be, and assuming it to be the fact that he did obtain such a bill of lading, in their Lordships' opinion the circumstance is wholly immaterial. The goods were undoubtedly carried by the vessel Gambier on a voyage to Kimberley, and were in transit upon that voyage at the time when, owing to the insolvency of Clare, the respondents stopped them. The arrangement for the freight at which the goods were carried appears to have been made in contemplation of this and other purchases by Clare before the date when those purchases were effected. The shipowners undertook, in consideration of the fact that he was about to have a considerable quantity of goods shipped, to carry them somewhat below the ordinary freight. As far as the evidence goes, no transaction with regard to the carriage of these goods took place between Clare and the shipowners after the date of the purchase, except the exchange of the receipts which have been mentioned for the bill of lading. Even assuming that the jury were entitled to disregard the oral evidence in the case except that given by Clare, and to act upon that evidence alone, in the opinion of their Lordships the decision ought to have been in favour of the defendants in the action. It appears to their Lordships that, upon the undisputed facts of the case, the right to stop in transitu under the circumstances proved at the trial was clear. The goods at the time of the purchase were undoubtedly intended by the purchaser to pass direct from the possession of the vendors into the possession of a carrier to be carried to a destination intimated by the purchaser to the vendors at the time of the sale; because, although the language used by Clare, according to his evidence, was that he was going to Kimberley, and going to take these goods with him, that language must be interpreted according to the ordinary course of business as it would be understood by business men; and it is obvious that Clare was not going to take these goods with him in any other sense than that he intended himself to be a passenger by the vessel on which they were to be shipped, and by which they were to be carried, his intention being that the goods should be shipped on board that vessel as cargo in the ordinary way, carried by carriers to their destination, and there delivered to him. These circumstances appear to their Lordships sufficient to indicate that the right to stop in transitu existed. The test laid down by Lord Ellenborough in the case of Dixon and others v. Baldwen and another (5 East, 175) appears clearly to cover such a case as this. Alluding to the case of Hunter v. Beale (cited in Ellis v. Hunt, 3 T. R. 464), in which it was said that "the goods must come to the corporal touch of the vendees, in order to oust the right of stopping in transitu," Lord Ellenborough says that this was "a figurative expression, rarely, if ever, strictly true. If it be predicated of the vendee's own actual touch, or of the touch of any other person, it comes in each instance to a question whether the party to whose touch it actually comes be an agent so far representing the principal as to make a delivery to him a full, effectual, and final delivery to the principal, as contradistinguished from a delivery to a person virtually acting as a carrier or mean of conveyance to or on the account of the principal in a mere course of transit towards him." Their Lordships think it cannot be doubted that, in the present case, putting the case most favourably for the appellant, the goods came into the hands of Howard Smith and Co. as carriers on Clare's account.

The law appears to their Lordships to be very clearly and accurately laid down by Lord Esher, M.R. in the case of Bethell v. Clarke (59 L. T. Rep. N. S. 808; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 194; 20 Q. B. Div. 615). He says: "When the goods have not been delivered to the purchaser or to any agent of his to hold for him otherwise than as a carrier, but are still in the hands of the carrier as such and for the purposes of the transit, then, although such carrier was the purchaser's agent to accept delivery so as to pass the property, nevertheless the goods are in transitu and may be stopped." The present case appears to fall distinctly within the terms there employed. The goods had not been delivered either to Clare or to any agent of his to hold for him otherwise than as a carrier, but were still in the hands of the carrier as such and for the purposes of the transit. There does not seem to be any pretence for the allegation that Howard Smith and Co. were ever intended to receive or hold, or ever did receive or hold, these goods except as carriers, to convey them to their destination, Kimberley. No arrangement other than an arrangement with reference to the terms of freight had been made by Clare before the goods were put into the possession of Howard Smith and Co. They were received by Howard Smith and Co. upon the terms—for they signed receipt notes to that effect—that they should be carried by them to Kimberley, by means of a particular vessel. Those receipts, showing the terms upon which the goods had been received, passed into the hands of Clare, and were acted upon by him without the slightest objection to their form. After he had obtained possession of the receipt notes, all that he did was to exchange them for a bill of lading, in order that they might, under that bill of lading, be carried to Kimberley, their destination. There does not therefore seem to be throughout the whole transaction the slightest evidence that Howard Smith and Co. ever held, or were intended to hold, these goods otherwise than as carriers to take them to their destination.

Under these circumstances it seems difficult to understand the contention that the right of stoppage in transitu did not exist. The learned Chief Justice, in summing up to the jury, appears to have told them that, if Clare made a new contract with Howard Smith and Co. in respect of the carriage of these goods after they came into their possession, that would be sufficient to constitute a delivery to Clare, which would put an end to any right to stop in transitu. Their Lordships gather this from the particular direction complained of, which formed one of the grounds on which the rule was granted. The ground was: That his Honour, it is submitted, erroneously told the jury that if Clare handed up to Howard Smith and Sons Limited the bills of lading, or shipping receipts, received by him from the defendant, and received from Howard Smith and Son Limited another bill of lading, it was of no moment whether the latter bill of lading contained the names of the defendants as shippers, because, if at that time they entered into a contract with Clare to carry these goods and were paid freight, then there would be a fresh contract with Clare, under which Howard Smith and Sons Limited became Clare's agents, and it would be equivalent to a delivery to Clare." No doubt it might be equivalent to a delivery to Clare, for the purpose of passing the property to Clare; but if his Honour intended to instruct the jury that such a contract entered into between Clare and the shipowners would be equivalent to the shipowners holding the goods for Clare otherwise than as carriers, and becoming his agents so as to create a new transaction, having its initiation only at that time, their Lordships are unable to agree with the law which appears to have been laid down. If the goods were received by Howard Smith and Co. to be carried to Kimberley, and this was indicated as the destination of the goods at the time when the vendors were instructed to deliver the goods to the carriers, then, in the view which their Lordships take, it is immaterial whether a fresh bill of lading was obtained by Clare or whether that bill of lading contained the name of Clare or of the defendants as shippers. The appellant relied upon several cases which were pressed by the learned counsel on their Lordships, in which it had been held that, although the vendor knew that some foreign destination was intended for the goods, yet if he delivered them to a shipping agent to be by him sent abroad, the transit, so far as the vendor was concerned, then came to an end, and that there was no right in the vendor to stop on the subsequent voyage. Their Lordships do not think that those cases are in any way applicable to the circumstances existing here. There the delivery was not a delivery by the vendor to the carrier to be carried to a destination indicated at the time of sale. A new transit commenced which had its origin in the action of the shipping or forwarding agent, as the case might be, which appears to be an altogether different case from that with which their Lordships have to deal, where the goods passed direct from the hands of the vendors into the hands of the carriers to be carried to the destination then contemplated by both parties. Their Lordships will therefore humbly advise Her Majesty that the judgment appealed from be affirmed. The appellant must pay the costs of the appeal.

PINK AND OTHERS v. FLEMING. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION.

Marine insurance — "Damage consequent on collision"—Proximate cause of loss.

The plaintiffs insured a cargo of fruit with the defendant by a marine policy against "damage consequent upon collision with any other ship." The vessel in which the cargo was shipped came into collision with another ship during the voyage, and was in consequence obliged to put into port for repairs. To enable the repairs to be made the fruit had to be discharged, and afterwards had to be reloaded. It was admitted that the discharge and reloading had been done with all reasonable care, but partly from this handling and partly from natural decay which arose during the delay in the voyage the fruit arrived damaged.

Held, that the collision was not the proximate cause of the loss, and that the plaintiffs could not recover.

THIS was an appeal from the judgment of Mathew, J. at the trial.

The action was brought on a policy of marine insurance on a cargo of oranges and lemons shipped from Messina in the steamship Dithmarschen. The policy was in the ordinary form of a Lloyd's policy, and contained the following clause:

Warranted free from particular average, unless the ship be stranded, sunk, or burnt, or unless damage be consequent on collision with any other ship.

(a) Reported by E. MANLEY SMITH, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The Dithmarschen came into collision with another ship during the voyage, and was obliged to put into port for repairs. To enable the repairs to be made the fruit had to be discharged into lighters, and was afterwards reloaded. When the Dithmarschen arrived at her port of discharge the fruit was found to be much damaged, and the evidence showed this damage to have been caused partly by the handling necessitated by the discharge and reshipment and partly by the decay which had naturally begun during the delay in the voyage.

Mathew, J. held that the collision was not the cause of the damage within the meaning of the policy, and gave judgment for the defendant.

The plaintiffs appealed.

J. G. Witt and Hurst for the plaintiffs.—The handling of the fruit was necessary in order to do the repairs, and the repairs were necessary because of the collision, therefore the collision was the cause of the handling. There was no other reason for the handling of the fruit; so that the collision was the proximate cause of the injury to the cargo. Taylor v. Dunbar (L. Rep. 4 C. P. 206) is distinguishable, because there the cargo suffered damage only indirectly on account of the storm. They referred also to Myburgh, Q.C. and J. A. Hamilton, for the defendant, were not called upon.

Lord Esher, M.R.—In the law of England there is on this point a clearly-settled distinction between marine insurance and liabilities arising on other matters. In cases of marine insurance, the liability of the underwriters depends only on the proximate cause of the loss; in other matters liability depends on the causa causans. The question, which is the causa proxima of a loss, can only arise where there has been a succession of causes. When a result has been brought about by two causes you must, in marine insurance law, look only to the nearest cause, although the result would, no doubt, not have happened without the remoter cause. Here, of course, the collision was a cause of the damage, without the collision the damage would not have taken place. But is it the natural result of a collision that a ship should have to put into port for repairs, that the cargo should have to be taken out in order to make the repairs, and that it should be damaged by the handling necessary in the unloading and reloading? A collision might happen without any of these consequences. The collision was a cause and an effective cause. If the collision had not caused the ship to be put into port for repairs, the removal of the goods would not have been necessary, nor would the damage to the fruit have occurred. But the proximate cause of the loss was the handling of the fruit, though, no doubt, the cause of the handling was the necessary repairs, and the cause of putting into port for repairs was the collision. There were three causes of the result; but, according to the English law of marine insurance, only the last of them is to be looked at for the purpose of determining the liability of the underwriters. The cause of the damage to the fruit here was the handling, and there is nothing in the policy to make the underwriters liable for that. For these reasons, I think that the judgment of Mathew, J. was right. The case of Taylor v. Dunbar (ubi sup.) was decided on this point of law, and is an authority for our decision. With regard to the American authorities, the American law on the subject seems to differ materially from our law, and therefore it is not necessary to consider them.

Lindley, L.J.—I think the judgment of Mathew, J. was correct. It has long been settled that, in questions of marine insurance liability, only the causa proxima of the loss is to be considered, and it is upon that rule that people contract. The case before us is governed by the decision in Taylor v. Dunbar (ubi sup.). The immediate cause of the injury to the fruit was the handling it underwent, and, on looking at the policy, I can find nothing in it applicable to such a cause of loss.

Bowen, L.J.—I am of the same opinion Whether we deal with the injury to the fruit as caused by the delay or by the handling, the same principle applies. The proximate cause of the loss was not the collision or any peril of the sea, but the perishable character of the cargo combined with the handling and the delay. I think the case is governed by Taylor v. Dunbar (ubi sup.), and that the appeal should be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

Re An Intended Arbitration between Smith and Service and James Nelson and Sons. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION.

Arbitration Act 1889 (52 & 53 Vict. c. 49), ss. 1, 5, 6—Agreement to refer to three arbitrators—Refusal of party to appoint arbitrator—Charter-party—Power of court to order appointment—Effect of making submission a rule of court prior to Act of 1889.

In the case of an agreement to refer disputes to three arbitrators, one to be nominated by each party, and the third by the other two, the court has no power to make an order calling upon one of the parties, who has been served with notice to appoint and neglects to do so, to appoint an arbitrator within seven days.

Sect. 1 of the Arbitration Act 1889 is only intended to give to all submissions to arbitration the same effect as, prior to the Act, those submissions had which were made rules of court.

This was an appeal by James Nelson and Sons from an order of the Divisional Court (Lord Coleridge, C.J. and Wills, J.) affirming an order made by Master Manley Smith and affirmed by Lawrance, J., sitting at chambers.

(a) Reported by Adam H. Bittleston, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The order appealed from required the appellants within seven days to appoint an arbitrator under the agreement to refer contained in a charter-party, dated the 28th Nov. 1889.

The facts were, that Nelson and Co. had chartered a vessel of Smith and Service, under a charter-party entered into on the 28th Nov. 1889, which stipulated that the vessel should arrive at a named port and be placed at the disposal of the charterers on a certain day, and which also contained a clause referring any dispute which might arise to three arbitrators, one to be appointed by each party, and the third by the two arbitrators so appointed.

Nelson and Co. subsequently refused to carry out their contract, on the ground that the vessel did not arrive at the port named until after the appointed day.

Smith and Service thereupon appointed an arbitrator under the reference clause in the charter-party, and served a notice upon Nelson and Co. to appoint another in accordance with the agreement.

Nelson and Co. not complying with this notice, Smith and Service took out a summons at chambers for an order that they should do so. An order was made accordingly, and, on appeal, was affirmed by the Divisional Court.

Nelson and Co. appealed.

French, Q.C. and C. A. Russell for the appellants—First, no dispute under the agreement to refer contained in the charter-party has arisen. It is a condition precedent that the ship should be ready to commence the voyage on the day named. The arbitration clause, therefore, does not apply at all here. But, secondly, assuming it to apply, there was no jurisdiction to make this order. This submission provides that the reference shall be to three arbitrators. Therefore it is not within sects. 5 or 6 of the Arbitration Act of 1889. The Divisional Court proceeded upon the supposition that sect. 1 of the Act gave them power to make this order. But it is submitted that, unless the court could before that Act have made the order in cases where the submission had been made a rule of court, sect. 1 gives no power to make it. Some little expense was necessarily incurred in making a submission a rule of court under the Common Law Procedure Act. The object of sect. 1 is to avoid that expense and formality by providing that every submission is to be dealt with as if it had been made a rule of court. The making a submission a rule of court never gave the court power to order one of the parties to appoint an arbitrator. The effect of making the submission a rule of court was to give the court power to enforce the award, and after the Act of Will. 4, to prevent either party revoking the authority of an arbitrator who had once been appointed.

Gorell Barnes, Q.C. and Leck for the respondents.—The making a submission to arbitration a rule of court caused the submission to be equivalent to an order by the court to proceed to arbitration. The refusal of one of the parties to appoint an arbitrator then becomes disobedience to the order of the court to submit to arbitration. The court could attach him for this disobedience, and it follows that they can make an order calling upon him to obey. [Lord Esher, M.R.—The Act of Will. 3 enabling parties to make their agreements to refer rules of court, was passed in 1697; and no one since that date; or, if you rely on the Act of Will. 4, which was passed in 1833, no one for fifty-six years has thought that the making a submission a rule of court had the effect that you suggest.] The reason that there is no reported case in point may be that parties never thought, generally speaking, of making their submissions to arbitration rules of court until they wanted to enforce the award.

The following cases were referred to in the course of the argument:

Gumm v. Hallett, 26 L. T. Rep. N. S. 468; L. Rep. 14 Eq. 555;
Re Rouse and Meier, 23 L. T. Rep. N. S. 865; L. Rep. 6 C. P. 212;
Davila v. Almanza, 1 Salk. 73.

Lord Esher, M.R.—In this case, in an ordinary mercantile agreement, a charter-party, there is, as is not unusual, an arbitration clause. The clause in question provides that the reference shall be to three arbitrators. It is not a reference to two arbitrators and an umpire; it is a reference to three arbitrators. The distinction is that, in the latter case, all three persons, when they have been named, are to go simultaneously into the inquiry, and all three are to come to a conclusion upon it. There being, then, this agreement to refer disputes to three arbitrators, one of the parties, alleging that differences have arisen to which the agreement to refer is applicable, has appointed an arbitrator and called upon the other party to appoint one. The other party has refused to nominate any arbitrator. Then an application is made at chambers for an order against the party so refusing, calling upon him to appoint an arbitrator within seven days. The order was made at chambers, and has been affirmed by the Divisional Court; and from that order an appeal is brought to this court. It is obvious that, if the court had no jurisdiction to order the party who refused to appoint an arbitrator to do so, it had no jurisdiction to order him to do so within seven days. Therefore, the whole question is, whether there is any jurisdiction in such an arbitration as this for the court to order either of the parties to appoint an arbitrator. The question depends on the construction to be placed on the Arbitration Act 1889. It is obvious, in my opinion, that this submission is not within sects. 5 or 6 of that Act, because it is a reference to three arbitrators; and I think that the contention that either of those sections applied was abandoned in the course of the argument. But it is said that the order that has been made is authorised by sect. 1 of the Act. Sect. 1 gives to the court, in every case of a submission to arbitration, the powers which the court had before the Act in cases where the submission had been made a rule of court. If the court had the power before the Act, when a submission had been made a rule of court, to order either of the parties to it to appoint an arbitrator, I think that sect. 1 now gives them that power in all cases. If the court had not that power before the Act, notwithstanding that the submission had been made a rule of court, I think that such a power is not given by sect. 1. The argument in support of the order that has been made amounts to this, that the court has had the power in question ever since the time of William III., but that it has never occurred to anyone that there was such a power until the counsel in the present case thought of it. That is a proposition which I do not accept. We have the fact that no court has ever made such an order. It seems to me impossible for us to say that this is a power which has been overlooked for 190 years. Even supposing that the words of the Act of Will. 3 could be so construed as to comprise such a power, I should not, after that lapse of time, be a party to inventing a new practice founded upon a new construction of the Act. Further, applications have from time to time been made to courts of equity to order specific performance of agreements to refer. Those applications must have been founded upon the statement that the common law courts could not make an order calling upon the other party to appoint an arbitrator; otherwise, they would have been at once dismissed upon that ground alone. A court of equity would only entertain such an application when there was no remedy at common law. They refused the application on the ground that, under the Act of Parliament, they had no power to grant them, just as the common law courts had no such power. Before the statute 9 & 10 Will. 3, c. 15, was passed, there was no power to make a submission to arbitration a rule of court, unless the submission was made in an action. Then came the Act of Parliament, which, by the preamble, is expressed to be "for promoting trade and rendering the awards of arbitrators the more effectual in all cases," &c. The object was to enable the parties to obtain the assistance of the court, after the award was made, in order to enforce it. For that purpose the Act provided that, whenever a submission to arbitration contained an agreement that it should be make a rule of court, such submission might be made a rule of court accordingly. But, for some time after the passing of that Act, any party to a submission could revoke it, even after it had been made a rule of court. That is totally inconsistent with the argument which we have heard as to what the effect was of making a submission a rule of court.

Then came the Act of Will. 4, which made the submission irrevocable if the parties had agreed that it should be made a rule of court, except by leave of the court. Before that Act, one of the parties could not revoke the agreement to refer; but he could revoke the authority of the particular arbitrator. After the Act, he could not revoke the submission to a particular arbitrator if it had been made a rule of court. If that was so up to the time of the passing of the Arbitration Act 1889, let us see if sect. 1 of that Act has made any alteration. By that section, "A submission, unless a contrary intention is expressed therein, shall be irrevocable, except by leave of the court or a judge." Pausing there, that could not have meant that the agreement to refer was to be irrevocable, because it always was so. It means that the authority of the particular arbitrator is to be irrevocable. Then it goes on, "and shall have the same effect in all respects as if it had been made an order of court." That is to say, it is to have the same effect in all respects as it would have had before this Act if it had been made a rule of court. The effect of making a submission a rule of court was, as I have said, to enable the assistance of the court to be obtained in carrying on the reference after arbitrators had been appointed, and to enable the award of the arbitrators to be enforced as if it had been a judgment of the court. That being the construction of sect. 1 of the Act of 1889, if there was no power to order the appointment of an arbitrator in such a case as the present prior to the Act, there is no power to make such an order now. It has been argued that the court had power to attach a party to a submission that had been made a rule of court for refusing to appoint an arbitrator. Even if the court had such a power, it would not necessarily show that there was power to order the party to appoint, as has been done in this case. But the court had no such power. The only remedy was to sue the party who refused to appoint for breach of agreement; and that is the only remedy in the present case. I do not think that Lord Coleridge or Wills, J. thought that this power existed before the Act of 1889, as has been argued before us; but I think that they gave to that Act an effect beyond what it was intended to have.

Lindley, L.J.—This is an appeal from an order that the appellants within seven days from the date of the order should appoint an arbitrator in the terms of the submission to arbitration contained in the charter-party dated the 28th Nov. 1889. The question is, whether the court had any jurisdiction to make such an order. It seems to me to be clear that there is no precedent for any such order up to the year 1889, when the last Arbitration Act was passed. It is said that, although no precedent can be cited, such an order as this could have been made whenever a submission was made a rule of court under the Act of Will. 3. The argument is put in this way: that by making the submission a rule of court, the agreement to refer becomes a rule or order of the court and can be enforced like any other order. If that argument was sound, the court could have done a number of things that it has always refused to do. In the first place, I cannot see why, in that case, such an order as the one appealed from should never have been made before. Nor can I see why an order for specific performance should have been always refused in such a case. The truth is that, however the Act of Will. 3. might have been construed, it has not in fact been construed in the way suggested. The consequence of making a submission a rule of court under the Act of Will. 3 was, that a party who disobeyed the award might be attached; but, so far as I know, no order was ever made to attach a man for not appointing an arbitrator. Then what is the effect of the Arbitration Act 1889? Sects. 5 and 6 of that Act are not applicable to the present case. The omission is no doubt a blot in the Act, but we cannot help that. Sect. 1 provides that a submission shall have the same effect as if it had been made an order of court. But the effect of making a submission an order of court before the Act was not to give power to make such an order as has been made here. The appeal must therefore be allowed.

Bowen, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. Sect. 1 of the Arbitration Act 1889 provides that: "A submission, unless a contrary intention is expressed therein, shall be irrevocable, except by leave of the court or a judge, and shall have the same effect in all respects as if it had been made an order of court." The word "submission" has been used with some inexactness in the cases and text-books, the same word having been used to express two different things. A general agreement to refer disputes to an arbitrator was always irrevocable. On the other hand, an agreement to refer a particular dispute to a particular arbitrator could be revoked by either of the parties before the Act of 3 & 4 Will. 4 was passed. The distinction between those two cases is pointed out by Mellish, L.J. in Randall and Co. v. Thompson (35 L. T. Rep. N. S. 193; 1 Q. B. Div. 748). After the Act of 3 & 4 Will. 4 a submission to the arbitration of a particular person was under some circumstances revocable, and under others not. The present Act makes such a submission not revocable under any circumstances, unless a contrary intention is expressed or the leave of the court is obtained; because, by the definition clause (sect. 27), "In this Act, unless the contrary intention appears, 'submission' means a written agreement to submit present or future differences to arbitration, whether an arbitrator is named therein or not." The Act of 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 42, s. 39, which, as I have said, first made a submission to a particular arbitrator irrevocable, in cases where there was a stipulation that the submission should be made a rule of court, recognises the distinction that I have referred to, because it directs that "the power and authority of any arbitrator . . . shall not be revocable" in such cases. The statute is dealing, not with the agreement to refer, which could never have been determined, but with the mandate to the particular arbitrator, which at that time could be determined in all cases, and it provides that for the future that mandate shall not be determinable if it has been made a rule of court.

Then the present Act provides that every submission is to have the same effect as if it had been made an order of court. It is argued that, by reason of that provision, a general agreement to refer disputes contained in a charter-party is to have the same effect as if it had been an order of the court. It seems to me that the emphatic word "made" cannot be left out of view in construing the section. It is an act of the parties which is referred to. But no act of the parties could ever give the court the power, upon the application of either of them, to make an order compelling the other to appoint an arbitrator. I can find no case in which a party has been held liable to attachment for non-performance of an agreement to nominate an arbitrator. The judgment of Willes, J. in Re Rouse and Meier (ubi sup.), which was referred to, shows only that one of the parties to a submission, who revokes it after it has been made a rule of court, is liable to attachment. The object of making a submission a rule of court was to give the court authority over the conduct of the arbitration after it has been entered upon, that is, after the arbitrators have been appointed. No case of specific performance has ever been heard of in the Court of Equity, and I do not think anyone ever heard of a man being attached for not appointing an arbitrator at common law.

Wright and Son v. Lethbridge and others. (a) Government dockyard—Damage—Barge moored at unsafe berth—Damage to barge—Respondeat superior—Invitation—Liability of Government officials in charge of dockyard.

A barge belonging to the plaintiffs was moored in Chatham Dockyard at a berth pointed out by the foreman, and the barge was there damaged. In an action to recover the amount of the damage from the Port Admiral, the Admiral Superintendent, and the Queen's Harbour Master of Chatham Dockyard, being the officials in charge of the dockyard, the jury found that the berth was unsafe, and gave a verdict for the plaintiffs.

Held, on further consideration, that there being no Act of Parliament and no Order in Council rendering the defendants liable, their liability must be decided on common law principles, and that the doctrine of respondeat superior does not apply in such a case, but the doctrine of invitation does apply, and as there was no evidence that the defendants invited the plaintiff to moor the barge where they did, the defendants were not liable, and judgment must be for them.

Further consideration, before Mathew, J.

The action was brought to recover damages for injuries to a barge belonging to the plaintiffs, the damage to the barge having occurred in Chatham Dockyard, where the barge was moored. The defendants in the action were the Admiral Superintendent, the Port Admiral, and the Queen's Harbour Master of Chatham Dockyard, and the Commander-in-Chief at Sheerness, these being the officers or officials in charge of the dockyard.

The case was tried before Mathew, J. and a jury, and, according to the evidence, the foreman, of the dockyard pointed out to the bargee, who was in charge of the barge, where he was to go and where the barge was to be moored; and the barge was moored at the berth pointed out by the foreman, though it did not appear that any of the defendants saw the barge.

At the trial of the action the jury found that the berth was unsafe, and they gave a verdict for the plaintiffs for the amount claimed, but the learned judge left the parties to move for judgment before him on further consideration.

Raikes, for the plaintiffs, now asked for judgment.—The jury have found here that the barge was injured, and that the injury arose from the barge being moored at an unsafe berth. They found expressly that the berth was unsafe, and that was the cause of the injury. The defendants are liable for the injury so caused, as it was their duty to point out to the plaintiffs the place where the barge was to be moored, and whether they acted in that respect by themselves, or by their own foreman, whom they had placed in authority for that purpose, is immaterial, as in either case they are liable. By the Dockyard Ports Regulation Act 1865 (28 & 29 Vict. c. 125), and by an Order in Council, dated the 29th June 1888, made in pursuance of that Act, it was the duty of the defendants, as officials in charge of the dockyard, to determine the place where the barge should be moored; and if an unsafe position be indicated and if damage result, the defendants are liable for such damage.

A. T. Lawrence for the defendants.—The defendants here are not liable. An officer is not responsible for the acts of a subordinate, as it is laid down in Story on Agency, par. 313: "No action will ordinarily lie against an agent for the misfeasance, or for the negligence of those whom he has retained for the service of his principal, by his consent or authority, any more than it will lie against a servant who hires labourers for his master, at his request, for their acts; unless, indeed, in either case, the particular acts which occasion the damage are done by the orders or directions of such agent or servant. The action, under other circumstances, must be brought either against the principal or against the immediate actors in the wrong." That is an undoubted principle. The only person responsible is the wrongdoer himself, if he be a wrongdoer. There was no negligence proved here on anybody's part. The jury no doubt found that the berth was unsafe, but there is no case in the books which shows that that would render the defendants liable. The furthest the cases go is this, that, if a man holds himself out as a wharfinger, he is bound to take reasonable care that his berths are safe. The wharfinger carries on his business for reward for himself, which is different from the present case. The strongest case against me is The Moorcock (60 L. T. Rep. N. S. 654; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 373; 14 P. Div. 64), and there it was found that there was a want of care on the part of the wharfinger.

Raikes, in reply, referred to

The Calliope, 61 L. T. Rep. N. S. 656; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 440; 14 P. Div. 138.

Mathew, J.—This case must be decided on common law principles. It has been said that the defendants are liable under an Act of Parliament and an Order in Council; but there is no such Act of Parliament and no such Order in Council which make the defendants liable in such a case as this. The case must therefore be decided on common law principles. It seems to me that the doctrine of respondeat superior does not apply in such a case as the present, but the case turns on the doctrine of invitation, and the plaintiffs are remitted to the doctrine of invitation to establish their case against the defendants, and, as it seems to me, there is no evidence of any such invitation, no evidence that the plaintiffs were invited by the defendants to place their barge where it was placed. [His Lordship then shortly stated the facts.] Upon these facts the defendants are not responsible; if they had invited the plaintiff to moor their barge at an unsafe place they would have been responsible, but no such invitation was offered here, and my judgment therefore must be for the defendants.

Judgment for the defendants.

The plaintiffs appealed.

Dec. 3.—Dr. Raikes for the plaintiffs.

A. T. Lawrence, for the defendants, was not called upon.

The Court of Appeal held that, upon the facts, there was no evidence that the man who pointed out to the plaintiffs the place where the barge was to be moored was the servant of any of the defendants.

HIGH COURT OF JUSTICE.

CHANCERY DIVISION.

Friday, Dec. 5, 1890.

(Before Kekewich, J.)

Williamson v. Hine Brothers. (a)

"Managing owner"—Duties of—Principal and agent—Secret profit—Commission—Brokerage—Charters—Freights.

A shipbroker, who is also managing owner of a ship and receiving a fixed sum as remuneration for his services as such, is not entitled to make an extra profit for himself by commission or brokerage for procuring charters and freights, it being one of the duties of a "managing owner" to procure charters and freights.

Adjourned summons.

The plaintiff James Williamson, a co-owner of certain ships, claimed by this action a declaration that the defendants Hine Brothers, who were a firm of ship and insurance brokers and the managing owners of the ships, were not entitled to retain for their own benefit certain secret profits alleged to have been made by them, consisting of brokerage on freights and charters, commissions on insurance, premiums, and other commissions.

The plaintiff's case was, that the ships' accounts had been purposely so framed as to bear on the face of them that the defendants, as agents for the owners, had made no other profits whatever, except the management expenses shown therein.

The plaintiff further claimed an account of the alleged secret profits and payment accordingly.

It appeared that the defendants received as their remuneration for management a fixed sum for each ship.

The question therefore was, whether the managing owners of ships, who were also shipbrokers and were in receipt of a fixed sum as remuneration for their services as managing owners, were entitled to retain for their own benefit, independently of that fixed remuneration, commission or brokerage for procuring charters and freights.

The action came on for trial in Dec. 1889, when Kekewich, J. delivered judgment, which was afterwards affirmed by the Court of Appeal, dismissing the greater part of the plaintiff's claim, but his Lordship directed an inquiry whether it was within the duties of the defendants, as managing owners of the ships, or otherwise as agents of the plaintiff and the other owners of the ships, to procure charters and freights for the ships; and, if so, an account of the sums received by the defendants, as such owners or agents, by way of commission, discounts, or returns of premiums, or brokerage in respect of such chartering or freightage.

That inquiry the chief clerk, by his certificate, dated the 13th Nov. 1890, answered in the affirmative.

The defendants thereupon took out a summons to vary the certificate by striking out that finding, and by answering the inquiry in the negative.

The plaintiff's evidence showed that managing owners who were also shipbrokers did generally, if not always, procure charters and freights either from their own houses, or from outside brokers.

The defendants' evidence did not throw much light upon the question whether it was part of the bargain that the managing owner should be remunerated for that particular work in addition to remuneration for work falling within his ordinary duties. On the other hand, there was evidence on behalf of the plaintiff that it was no part of the duty of a managing owner to make a charge for the performance of such duties as against the ship.

The summons was adjourned into court, and now came on to be heard.

KEKEWICH, J.—The principle upon which this inquiry is based is abundantly clear. A paid agent—I am not now concerned with an unpaid agent—is bound to discharge for a reasonable remuneration all those duties, multifarious or otherwise and onerous or otherwise, in his personal contemplation, which the terms of the agency cover. He must make his own bargain with his principal, and it is his duty to do all that that bargain entails, and to be content with his remuneration. If he is called upon to do anything outside the terms of his agency, he is entitled to make a special bargain, or he can decline to do it unless he is remunerated on a special footing, or he may do the work and, provided everything is fair and above board, he probably would be allowed some fair remuneration according to some known measurement of the value. But if he does anything within the terms of his agency, however uncompensated it may seem to him personally, he can neither charge for it in his account, nor can he secretly take any commission for it. That is reasonably obvious. Take such a case by way of illustration as that of an estate agent. An estate agent's duties might be extremely difficult to define. But, if the landowner requires him to see after the building of a cottage which involves the purchase of timber, it would be, I apprehend, the duty of the estate agent to purchase the timber on the best terms obtainable, and if he himself happens to be a timber merchant, he cannot supply the timber at a profit. If he deals with another timber merchant, who is disposed to give him a commission for the introduction of the business, he must either resign that commission, or, accepting it, give his employer, the landowner, the benefit of it. If, on the other hand, the landowner requires a carriage for his own use, and he asks the estate agent to get it for him, the estate agent certainly can employ himself, or somebody else, or, provided it is all fair and above board, he can, if he happens to be a carriage builder, sell a carriage to his employer. It must be, of course, fair and above board. That is outside the limits of his agency, and, as long as it is all done fairly, no one could complain of a man making a profit in his own trade which was not within the terms of his agency. I certainly had a strong impression at the trial that it was part of a managing owner's duty to procure charters and freights for the ship he managed. And that strong impression is confirmed by reference to some works, of more or less authority, but still works which I do not think I can regard as really binding on me. As the point was argued strongly the other day, I thought it right to direct this inquiry, and it was based on the principle that I have just named. Nobody ever doubted that managing owners were at liberty to employ brokers. That never came into question, although a deal of evidence is directed to prove that they can. Nor was it, so far as I remember or know, at all doubted, nor do I doubt now, that if the managing owner is also, as frequently happens, a shipbroker, he can so to speak employ himself, if it is fair and above board. But there must be no secret arrangement, and no secret profit. If he employs another broker of course he can pay, on behalf of the shipowner, the moneys necessary to pay that broker. If he employs himself, he, of course, can pay what is necessarily expended in making a bargain. But unless it is outside his duty as managing owner, he cannot make a profit if he employs himself; and he cannot receive a commission for his own benefit from the outside broker.

The evidence has gone a long way to prove what did not really require to be proved, that brokers must necessarily be employed. But, as I understand it, the evidence on both sides goes to show that managing owners, being also shipbrokers, do not only constantly but always procure charters and freights in one way or the other, that is, either through their own firm or from outside brokers. The defendants' evidence does not throw much light on the question which I wanted answered, whether really it is part of the bargain—what I may call the common law of the trade—that the managing owner is to be remunerated for that particular work, in addition to whatever other work falls within his ordinary duty. On the other hand, I have had a considerable amount of evidence on behalf of the plaintiff to show that it is not part of the duty of the managing owner to make any such charge as against the ship. The strength of the defendants' evidence is this, that it is generally done, not always, but so often as to lead one to assume that it is the prevailing custom, not in the legal sense of the word, but in common parlance. But I have nothing whatever before me to show that it is assented to in such a way that shipowners regard it really as part of the terms of the employment of managing owners. I have nothing to show that, when managing owners do charge, as they frequently do, this extra payment for procuring charters and freights, they do it with the assent of the particular shipowner, and exclusive of a special bargain. If you have a special bargain, then of course the custom fails. I have not before me satisfactory evidence that, in the absence of a special bargain, there is a right on the part of the managing owner to charge this extra payment against the ship. I think that that being so, I must adopt the evidence on the other side, which I think is more weighty, and hold that it is one of the duties of the managing owners to procure charters, and that it is such a duty as comes within the scope of their duties as managing owners, in respect of which they are not entitled to make a charge, and in respect of which they are not entitled to debit the ship with a commission. If they receive a commission, I think it belongs to the shipowner as the principal, and cannot properly be received by the managing owners for their own benefit. That being so, I think the chief clerk has come to a proper conclusion; and that the certificate must stand.

Bye-law 16 of the Thames Conservators, made under the powers of the Thames Conservancy Act 1857, provides that all barges, boats, lighters, and other craft navigating the river Thames shall when under way have at least one competent man constantly on board for the navigation and management thereof, and all such craft of above fifty tons burthen shall when under way have one man in addition on board to assist in the navigation of the same.

Held, that "one man in addition" in this bye-law means one competent and skilful man in addition, and that where the craft is above fifty tons burthen, the bye-law requires two competent men on board, and is not satisfied by having on board one competent man, being a licensed lighterman, and a boy about sixteen years of age.

Perkins v. Gingell (50 J. P. 277) followed.

CASE stated by the metropolitan police magistrate sitting at the Greenwich Police-court.

An information was laid before the magistrate by the respondent, a licensed lighterman, whereby the appellants were charged for that they, being the owners of a barge called Pimlico, of more than fifty tons burthen, did, on the 10th Oct. 1889, unlawfully permit or suffer the said barge to be navigated on the river Thames, not having two able and skilful persons on board, contrary to 22 & 23 Vict. c. cxxxiii., sect. 66, and bye-law 35, made in pursuance thereof, and the 16th bye-law of the Conservators of the River Thames.

On the hearing of this information the appellants were convicted under the said 16th bye-law, and were adjudged to pay a fine or penalty of 20*s.* and 2*s.* costs, such penalty being authorised by the 72nd bye-law of the Conservators of the River Thames, which imposes a penalty not exceeding 5*l.* for any breach of those bye-laws.

On the 10th Oct. 1889 the barge—which was over fifty tons burthen, and of which the appellants were the owners—was being navigated in Limehouse Reach, under the charge and control of one Edward Davies, who was then a lighterman licensed or qualified to take charge of craft, within the meaning of sect. 66 of 22 & 23 Vict. c. cxxxiii. Davies was at that time being assisted in the navigation or working of the barge by a boy, who was about sixteen years of age, and who was not a licensed lighterman or waterman, or an apprentice. The barge at the time was bound for Aldershot, and Davies was looking out for and expecting a tug, which had been engaged to tow the barge up the river as far as Teddington Lock.

By sect. 80 of the Thames Watermen's and Lightermen's Act, the Court of Master Wardens and assistants are empowered to make such bye-laws as they think proper for the government and regulation of lightermen and watermen, so that the same bye-laws be not inconsistent with the laws of the kingdom, or with this Act, or with any of the bye-laws, rules, orders, or regulations made or to be made by the Conservators of the River Thames, under the authority of the Thames Conservancy Act 1857, or of any Act for the time being in force relating to the conservancy of the river Thames, and provided that no such bye-laws shall be of any validity until approved by the Conservators of the River Thames.

By bye-law 35, made in pursuance of the above section of the Watermen's and Lightermen's Act, on the 2nd July 1860, and approved by the Conservators of the River Thames, it is provided:

> That in all cases in which it may be necessary or requisite under such Act or these bye-laws, or under the bye-laws of the Conservators of the River Thames, that for the benefit of the public using the river in boats, barges, or vessels, two able and skilful persons shall be employed in the management and navigation of passenger boats at Gravesend, and in vessels of more than fifty tons burthen navigated on the river, one waterman or lighterman licensed in manner provided by such Act and bye-laws, or an apprentice licensed to take the sole charge of craft, and an apprentice actually bound in manner provided by such Act, but not a person entered on liking for the purpose of being bound, shall be deemed and taken to be able and skilful persons within the meaning of such Act and bye-laws.

By bye-law 16 of the Conservators of the River Thames, made in pursuance of the Thames Conservancy Act 1857, and of the other Acts for the time being in force relating to the Conservators of the River Thames, it is provided as follows:

> All barges, boats, lighters, and other craft navigating the river shall when under way have at least one competent man constantly on board for the navigation and management thereof, and all such craft of above fifty tons burthen shall when under way have one man in addition on board to assist in the navigation and management of the same, with the following exceptions;

when being towed by a steam-vessel, or when being moved to and fro between any vessels or places a distance not exceeding two hundred yards. In case of non-compliance with this present bye-law the harbour master may take charge of and remove such craft to such place as to such harbour master may seem fit, and the amount of the charges and expenses of taking charge thereof under such removal shall be recoverable from the owner or owners or master thereof, to the use of the conservators, as provided by the Thames Conservancy Act 1857.

It was contended before the magistrate, on behalf of the appellants, that sect. 66 of 22 & 23 Vict. c. cxxxiii., the above-mentioned bye-law 35, and the 16th bye-law of the Conservators of the River Thames, did not create or contain any offence such as that which was charged or alleged against the appellants. It was also contended that there had been no violation or breach of sect. 66 of 22 & 23 Vict. c. cxxxiii., of bye-law 35, or of bye-law 16 of the Thames Conservators; that the appellants had discharged the duty imposed upon them by sect. 66 of 22 & 23 Vict. c. cxxxiii., by putting a licensed lighterman or qualified apprentice in charge of the barge; that bye-law 35 did not create any offence at all, or impose any duty upon the appellants for breach of which an information could be laid before a magistrate; that if bye-law 35 did create an offence, or impose any duty upon the appellants so as to extend the operation of sect 66 of 22 & 23 Vict. c. cxxxiii., the said bye-law was bad; that the bye-laws of the Conservators of the River Thames were not embodied in or incorporated with the bye-laws made under and in pursuance of 22 & 23 Vict. c. cxxxiii.; and that if the appellants had committed a breach of or an offence contrary to bye-law 16 of the Conservators of the River Thames, such as was alleged in the information, the only persons who could (if anybody could) lay an information in respect of such breach or offence were the Conservators of the River Thames, and that there was no jurisdiction in the magistrate in the present case to convict the appellants under the 16th bye-law. It was also contended that the barge, being on its way to and bound for Aldershot, was not being worked or navigated within the limits of the Act 22 & 23 Vict. c. cxxxiii. The magistrate held that the respondent was competent to lay the information; that bye-law 35 applied to the matter, and that the offence was committed within the limits of both the Thames Watermen's and Lightermen's Act and the Thames Conservancy Act, and he found that the barge when under way did not have on board two competent men as required by the said bye-law 16 (see Perkins v. Gingell, 50 J. P. 277), and he accordingly convicted the appellants.

The question for the opinion of the court was, whether the learned magistrate was right in point of law in so holding, and in convicting the appellants.

Gaskell for the appellants.

Bucknill, Q.C. for the respondent.

HUDDLESTON, B.—In this case the magistrate has convicted, as he says himself, under the 16th bye-law of the Thames Conservators, and adjudged the defendant to pay a fine or penalty, and the costs, and that he has decided this under the Thames Conservators' bye-laws is clear by his reference to the power under which he makes the conviction, namely, the 72nd bye-law, and that is what his decision is. The first Act in point of time is the Thames Conservancy Act, and under the 16th bye-law it is provided that all barges, boats, lighters, and other like craft navigating the river shall, when under way, have at least one competent man constantly on board for the navigation and management thereof, and all such craft above fifty tons burthen shall, when under way, have one man in addition. Now, what does that mean—in addition? It means one competent man in addition, and that is clear, from the case of Perkins v. Gingell (ubi sup.). What was there on board of this vessel? Clearly there were not two competent men. There was one man and a boy. There are circumstances under which a boy may be considered a competent man; and when we are referred to the Watermen's Act, which was passed after this Act, for this Act was passed, as I understand, in 1857, and the Watermen's Act in 1859, two years afterwards—there is a clause which explains what is required for persons navigating vessels and barges of this description. [Reads bye-law 35.] The 16th bye-law of the Thames Conservators requires that, where the burthen of the vessel is above fifty tons, there shall be two competent persons, one person and another person, which must mean a competent person. The Watermen's Act suggests that those two competent persons may be one, either a licensed waterman, or an apprentice licensed to take sole charge of the craft, or an apprentice actually bound. For the protection of the public it may be that the man duly qualified and the boy as an apprentice are equally as good as the competent men required by the Thames Conservancy Act. In that case, looking at bye-law 72 of the Thames Conservators, under which the magistrate says he convicted, the magistrate says in substance, This is an offence you have committed under the Thames Conservancy Act, and I inflict upon you the penalty mentioned. Now, we have been referred by Mr. Gaskell to the 66th section, but I really do not know what that has to do with this particular case. It says the vessel shall be in charge of a lighterman licensed in manner before mentioned, or an apprentice qualified as herein mentioned. It does not say with reference to what tonnage. That, however, does not seem to have anything whatever to do with the question which we are considering here, namely, whether there has been an offence under the Thames Conservancy Act, explained as it is by that bye-law to which I referred of the Watermen's Act. Mr. Gaskell further argued that this does not apply to this case, because the 16th bye-law applies; that in cases of non-compliance the harbour master may take charge of and remove such craft. He has no doubt that power, but that does not necessarily say that that abrogates the effect of the 72nd bye-law, which provides for a penalty when there has been an infringement of the bye-laws. Under these circumstances, fortified by the authority of Perkins v. Gingell (ubi sup.), I have no doubt that the conviction was a right one, and therefore this appeal must be dismissed, with costs.

ROLLES v. NEWELL. (a)

The Watermen's and Lightermen's Amendment Act 1859 (22 & 23 Vict. c. cxxxiii.)—Navigation of the River Thames.

Bye-law 59 made in pursuance of and for carrying into effect the Watermen's and Lightermen's Amendment Act 1859 (22 & 23 Vict. c. cxxxiii., s. 80), provides that no person in charge of or navigating any steamboat on the river shall tow craft exceeding six in number; the person so navigating shall incur a penalty.

Held, that pulling into a dock, barges which have been collected together for the purpose of being pulled in, from the river into the dock, and some or all of the barges being collected together within the ambit of the dock, near a dolphin that belongs to the dock, was not within the word "navigating."

THIS was a case stated by the deputy police magistrate for the borough of West Ham, under the statutes 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43, and 42 & 43 Vict. c. 49, for the purpose of obtaining the opinion of the court on certain questions of law, which arose before him, when the appellant was summoned for having unlawfully towed at the same time more than six barges, to wit, thirty-one barges exceeding ten tons each, between Vauxhall Bridge and the entrance to the Victoria Docks on the river Thames, contrary to bye-law 59, made under the provisions of the Watermen's and Lightermen's Amendment Act 1859 (22 & 23 Vict. c. cxxxiii.).

The facts of the case so far as material were as follows:

The appellant was master in charge of and navigating a steam-tug on the river Thames between Vauxhall Bridge and the entrance to the Victoria Docks, and at the same time had in tow thirty-one barges exceeding ten tons each attached to the steam-tug. For the purpose of taking the barges into the docks they were made up in lines, four abreast along the shore, extending from the upper dolphin, at the entrance to the Victoria Docks, for a distance of 250 or 300 yards up the river. The appellant afterwards with the steam-tug towed the whole thirty-one barges at the same time four abreast into the Victoria Docks. The towing was conducted under the direction of the pier-head foreman of the London and St. Katherine Docks Company, acting under the orders of the dock master of his company.

By sect. 80 of the Watermen's and Lightermen's Amendment Act 1859, the Court of the Company of Watermen and Lightermen of the River Thames is empowered to make bye-laws, and alter bye-laws by the company for carrying into effect the provisions of that Act, providing the said bye-laws are not inconsistent with that Act.

No. 59 of these bye-laws provides:

That if any person when in charge of and navigating any steamboat on the river between Vauxhall Bridge and the entrance to the Victoria Docks shall at the same time tow more than six barges, lighters, or other craft exceeding ten tons each attached thereto, or if such barges, lighters, or other craft, shall not be well and sufficiently attached and fastened to such steamboat and to each other so that the same or either of them shall go adrift, the owners thereof, or the persons in charge of or navigating the same, shall incur a penalty not exceeding forty shillings.

The Victoria Docks are regulated by the London and St. Katherine's Docks Act 1864 (27 & 28 Vict. c. clxxviii.) and the Acts incorporated therewith.

Among the provisions thereby incorporated is sect. 46 of the Victoria (London) Docks Act 1853 (16 & 17 Vict. c. cxxxi.), which prescribes the docks, works, and a distance of 100 yards into the river from the entrance gates of the dock as the limits within which the powers of the dock master shall be exercised; and sect. 52 of the Harbours, Docks, and Piers Clauses Act 1847 (10 & 11 Vict. c. 27), which provides that the "harbour master (which term also includes dock master) may give directions . . . for regulating . . . the manner in which any vessel shall enter into the dock."

The dolphin, from which the appellant commenced to tow the barges into the dock, is less than 100 yards from the said entrance gate of the Victoria Docks, and is situated between the entrance to the said dock and Vauxhall Bridge. The appellant was summoned for unlawfully towing more than six barges at the same time in breach of bye-law 59 of the bye-laws made under the Watermen's and Lightermen's Amendment Act 1859.

It was contended on behalf of the appellant that he was not, under the circumstances, navigating the steamboat on the river between Vauxhall Bridge and the entrance to the Victoria Docks within the meaning of the said bye-law, and that if he was the said bye-law was invalid and inconsistent with the Watermen's and Lightermen's Amendment Act 1859, and certain other Acts of Parliament.

It was contended on behalf of the respondent that the barges were navigated and towed in such a manner and for such a distance as to constitute an offence against the said bye-law. The deputy police magistrate decided that the said bye-law was a valid one, and that the appellant had towed more than six barges exceeding ten tons each at one time within the prescribed limit, and that such towing was navigating by the appellant with the said steamboat, and accordingly convicted the appellant.

The questions for the court were: (1) whether the appellant had, under the circumstances, committed a breach of the said bye-law; (2) whether the said bye-law was valid. If the questions are answered in the affirmative, the conviction is to stand; if either of the said questions are answered in the negative, the conviction is to be quashed.

Cohen, Q.C. and Avory for the appellant.—The conviction must be quashed. The appellant was not navigating a steamboat on the river between Vauxhall Bridge and the entrance to the Victoria Docks within the true meaning of the bye-law; but he caused the steamboat to tow four or five barges abreast, thirty-one in all, making them fast to a dummy barge alongside the upper dolphin of the Victoria Dock entrance, for the purpose of taking the barges into the dock; they were then made up in line four abreast along the shore extending from the upper dolphin at the entrance to the docks, and then were towed into the docks. If they had been made up in batches of six the whole could not have been got in, or else the barge owner would have had to employ several steam-tugs. The bye-law does not apply to that portion of the river over which the towing took place. By sect. 100 of the Watermen's and Lightermen's Act 1859 nothing in that Act is to lessen the rights and privileges of any company of proprietors of any docks within the limits of the Act, or any of their officers. with respect to the navigation of the said docks, or in anywise relating thereto. That section keeps alive the jurisdiction which is given by sect. 52 of the Harbours, Docks, and Piers Clauses Act 1847 to the dock masters of the Victoria Docks. During the whole period of the towing the tug was within the limits of the jurisdiction of the dock master. If the bye-law was intended to operate within these limits, it would be inconsistent with sect. 52, and consequently would be ultra vires.

C. E. Jones for the respondent.—The steam-tug was being navigated, and the barges were being towed, in such a manner as to constitute such an offence under bye-law 59; even though the steamboat and some of the barges might have been at the mouth of the docks, and within the distance mentioned by the Docks Acts, yet a great many of the barges, exceeding six in number, were beyond that distance, and therefore on that part of the river where they could be said to be navigating. The case of Elmore v. Hunter (3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 555; 38 L. T. Rep. N. S. 179; 3 C. P. Div. 116) is an authority that the act of applying motive power by means of a steamboat or tug, is itself navigation within the meaning of these bye-laws. Bye-law 61 draws a clear distinction between the application of motive power from shore and from the water. By excepting the former from the term "navigation" it impliedly includes all forms of the latter.

Lord COLERIDGE, C.J. — I have in this case to construe a bye-law, a very reasonable bye-law, and one which, properly construed and confined within reasonable limits and reasonably interpreted, I have no doubt is within the powers of the authorities who made it to make. The words are these: "That if any person when in charge of and navigating any steamboat on the river between Vauxhall Bridge and the entrance to the Victoria Docks, shall at the same time tow more than six barges, lighters, or other craft exceeding ten tons each, attached thereto, or if such barges, lighters, or other craft shall not be well and sufficiently attached and fastened to such steamboat, and to each other, so that the same or either of them shall go adrift, the owner thereof, or the person in charge of or navigating the same, shall incur a penalty not exceeding forty shillings." Now, what is the fair construction of that? What seemed to me yesterday, and still seems to me now, is the difficulty to bring the facts of this case within any reasonable construction of the word "navigating." I know very well that one cannot pronounce an opinion with any confidence on this matter, because, when you are construing an Act of Parliament, or interpreting a particular phrase, even the most powerful minds will occasionally differ. Therefore, speaking humbly for myself, I never feel confident in giving an interpretation of an Act of Parliament, or a bye-law made under it. I think I have had occasion more than once to say that the same view was taken by an illustrious and stronger mind also, for I know that the late Master of the Rolls always said the same thing. He gave the best opinion he could. When he was interpreting a phrase for the first time he always felt that another mind might take another view. We have no authority on the point, and we must do the best we can.

Now, in construing this bye-law, I look and see what was really the practical object of it. The object of it was to prevent those dangers which were pointed out in the very able judgment of my brother Grove in Elmore v. Hunter (ubi sup.); that is to say, that there should not be a very long tail of barges towed by one motive power a great way removed from the tail of them, having no power over the tail. In an ordinary river—a river subject like every other river to gusts of wind, and so forth, it would be quite reasonable that the towing power should have no control over the barges if more than six are towed behind. So far as the ordinary navigation of the river is concerned, it seems to me to be a very sensible and reasonable bye-law, and one which every court who had to construe it would desire to support. Now, what was done here? Here is a great dock called Victoria Dock; there is a large entrance to that dock, and about 300 yards I think it is, or rather more, further down, there is what is called a dolphin stuck out into the middle of the river, and alongside of and against this dolphin, and kept in, so to say, by this dolphin, a large number of lighters (more than six I agree, and it is not disputed that they were more than ten tons each, which if they had been going along the stream of the Thames would most undoubtedly have been within the terms of this bye-law) were collected together, and the question was how they were to be got into the Victoria Dock. The harbour master allowed eighty of them—a great many of them—a great many more than six—ten times more than six, to be tugged into the basin of the dock, that were brought out from this mooring place, so to say. The beginning of them was within 100 yards of the gate of the dock, and the tail of them may have been a few yards over 300 yards—I do not know, I am sure; it is not material to consider within a few yards—but I will assume for the purposes of argument that it was a few yards beyond 300 yards. Now, first of all, is that navigating? There are other questions, questions about the jurisdiction of the harbour master, upon which, as at present advised, I should be against Mr. Jones; but I will not decide on that, because I have not heard him on it, and it would not be right to do so. I have not heard him on the question, and he might persuade me to adopt his view of it. Therefore I am only saying, as at present advised, that I think the jurisdiction of the harbour extended thus far; but I cannot myself see, within any fair construction of the words, that the man who was in command of the steam-tug was navigating a steamboat on the river between Vauxhall Bridge and the entrance to the Victoria Docks. It seems to me, to do so would extend the term "navigating" far beyond what would be reasonable. It would be making a bye-law apply to cases for which there was no necessity for its applying. It would inflict a considerable—I do not say hardship, because that is not the question—but it would inflict a wholly unnecessary expense upon the owners of these lighters, and altogether it would render the bye-law (which in itself is an excellent and reasonable one in this particular case) a most unreasonable and a very oppressive one. Now that is a good reason, I should say, for permitting the construction. I agree, if you come to the strict construction of words, it is difficult to say, if these barges are on the Thames, and the steamboat is still on the Thames and not inside the dock, that one bit of the Thames is not like another bit of the Thames, and if this steamer is pulling a lot of barges behind it, it is then difficult to say in a strict sense, if it was an abstract question, whether the matter was one of academic discussion, that you could not apply the term "navigating" to it. I should have some little difficulty in saying you could not. I freely admit that, but that is not really the question of the construction of an Act of Parliament, or rather, I should say, of a bye-law which was made under the authority of an Act of Parliament. You must look no doubt at what is said, and at the words used, but you must look also at the words in the light of what it was intended in common sense and good judgment they should mean. You must look really at the common object of the thing to see what in a particular case a word of large significance does or does not mean. I quite admit that another mind might come to the conclusion that to pull a barge, or twenty or thirty barges, a few hundred yards out of the Thames into the dock where they are all collected together within the ambit, so to say, of a dock, by a dolphin that belongs to the dock, was within the word "navigating." I can conceive a man saying that, and I should use no disrespectful terms of a man who came to the conclusion that that was within the word "navigating." I do not come to that conclusion. It seems to me it is not "navigating;" that it is a very different thing, the pulling into the dock barges which have been collected together there for the purpose of being pulled in. Then as to the harbour master's authority, I will not decide which way it is; but I have a right to use it as an argument, I think, in this way: Either the harbour master's authority does extend over this 300 yards (and it being an authority given by Parliament it cannot be interfered with) or it does not. If it does not extend over this 300 yards, it leaves the question exactly where it was before; it leaves it to the fair construction of the bye-law itself. If the harbour master's power does extend over this 300 yards, then of course it is a strong argument to say, there being parliamentary power, it cannot be taken away by a bye-law. I do not decide that in this case.

There is only one matter which Mr. Jones very properly brought to our attention which is necessary to notice further; that is to say, I asked him yesterday this question: Supposing instead of this being a steamer it had been a steam-engine (as in many cases there is such a thing), and if instead of a hawser being attached to the tail of a steamer it had been attached to the revolving wheel of a steam-engine, and made to wind-up and to pull the barges in, could that be said to be "navigating." Mr. Jones says, "Well, perhaps not, but then that is provided for otherwise, and there is a separate mode of dealing with it." Well, that may be so; but it does not show that this nearly exactly equivalent of it is therefore navigating. Because a stationary engine and boats, or what not, are excluded from navigation, it does not show that this is within it—not at all, the argument is not complete. And although it is an argument that is fair to use for the purpose of showing that the particular instance as put by the court is not a crucial instance because it is otherwise provided for, yet it does not at all show that something which is exactly equivalent to that which is otherwise provided for is within the bye-law under discussion. I think therefore that Mr. Jones has failed to satisfy me. Mr. Jones has done all he can, and I do not say that the matter is entirely free from difficulty. I always like, as I say, in interpreting a particular phrase, to look at these matters in the light of good sense and apply one's judgment and experience to these things. I do not think that this bye-law was meant to include such a dragging of barges into a dock, as there was in this case, by the term "navigating the Thames." It does not seem to me to be reasonably within the words "navigating the Thames"—navigating a steamboat on the river. It does not seem to me to fall fairly within that, and for that reason I think the magistrate was wrong, and that his decision must be reversed.

WILLS, J.—I am of the same opinion, and entirely for the same reasons.

Charter-party — Advanced freight — Clause in charter-party "one-third freight, if required, to be advanced, less 3 per cent. for interest and insurance" — Requirement made after loss of vessel—Shipowner's right to recover advanced freight after loss of vessel.

A charter-party contained the clause, "one-third freight, if required, to be advanced, less 3 per cent. for interest and insurance." The vessel sailed in the morning, and about an hour afterwards took the ground, becoming a total wreck in the afternoon. Soon afterwards charterers' bills of lading were presented to the owners' agents for signature, and the advanced freight was demanded, but was refused on the ground that the vessel had become a total loss. On a previous occasion between the same parties bills of lading were presented and advanced freight demanded and paid after the vessel had sailed. In an action by the shipowners to recover the advanced freight:

Held, that, as advanced freight is a payment made for taking the goods on board, and for the undertaking to carry them, and not for the safe carriage of them, the shipowners were entitled to recover the same, although the requirement was not made until after the vessel had become a total loss.

FURTHER CONSIDERATION of a case tried before Charles, J., at the last Leeds Assizes in August.

The action was brought to recover a sum of 245*l.* for "advanced freight," alleged to be due from the defendants to the plaintiffs under the following circumstances:

The defendants had chartered the plaintiffs' vessel, the Gamma, to carry a cargo of coals from Hull to Odessa. The charter-party, which was in the usual form, was dated the 30th Nov. 1888, and contained the provisions that the freight was to be paid on unloading and right delivery of the cargo, in cash at current exchange; that the captain or owners should sign charterers' bills of lading, and at the end of the charter-party there was the following clause, which was the material clause in the present case, namely, "one-third of the freight, if required, to be advanced, less 3 per cent. for interest and insurance." The vessel left Hull on the morning of the 19th Dec., and at the time of so leaving bills of lading had neither been presented nor signed. Soon afterwards, on the same morning, the vessel grounded on the Middle Bank in the Humber, and a little before noon became a wreck. Late in the afternoon of the same day the defendants presented the bill of lading to the plaintiffs at their offices, and the plaintiffs then demanded the advanced freight, saying that the payment of advanced freight was in consideration of the goods being received on board, and had no reference to the results of the voyage, and that therefore such advanced freight was payable to the plaintiffs, whether the vessel was lost at the time they required it or not. It was proved in evidence that, on a previous occasion, in a transaction between the same parties, where the charter-party was the same as in the present case, bills of lading had been presented after the vessel had sailed, and advanced freight required and paid.

The question argued now was, whether the plaintiffs were entitled to advanced freight under the circumstances; or whether the right to advanced freight was gone because there was a total loss of the vessel, and such advanced freight was not demanded until after the loss.

Cyril Dodd, Q.C. (Montague Lush with him) for the plaintiffs.—The real legal consideration for the payment of advanced freight is the receipt of the goods on board, and it follows from that, that when the goods are placed on board, then the advanced freight is due and payable. When once advanced freight has been paid, it cannot be recovered back, whatever happens to the vessel; and when once it is agreed to be paid, you can recover it, although the vessel has become a loss. In Byrne v. Schiller (23 L. T. Rep. N. S. 741; L. Rep. 6 Ex. 20; affirmed on appeal, 25 L. T. Rep. N. S. 211; 1 Asp. Mar. Law. Cas. 111; L. Rep. 6 Ex. 319) the Court of Exchequer Chamber held, that payments made in advance on account of freight cannot be reovered back, although the vessel is lost; it follows, therefore, that the right to recover advanced freight is totally independent of the loss of the vessel, or the failure of the voyage. The principle is, that when once there is advanced freight to be paid, then, whatever happens to the ship, that freight has to be paid; as Cockburn, C.J. said in that case, "It is settled that by the law of England a payment made in advance on account of freight cannot be recovered back in the event of the goods being lost, and the freight therefore not becoming payable." In Andrew v. Moorhouse (5 Taunt. 435) no doubt it was held that advanced freight was not recoverable; but that case was decided upon the ground that there were facts which would show an intention of the parties that it should not be paid, so that that case is no authority against the payment in the present case. In Kirchner v. Venus (12 Moore's P. C. Cases, 361) it was held that advanced freight is a payment made in consideration of taking the goods on board; and Lord Kingsdown, in delivering the considered judgment of the Privy Council, said, at p. 390: "But a sum of money payable before the arrival of the ship at her port of discharge, and payable by the shippers of the goods at the port of shipment, does not acquire the legal character of freight because it is described under that name in a bill of lading, nor does it acquire the legal incidents of freight. It is in effect money to be paid for taking the goods on board, and undertaking to carry, and not for carrying them." So Lord Tenterden, C.J., in delivering the considered judgment of the Court in Winter v. Haldimand (2 B. & Ad., at p. 659), says, speaking of advanced freight, "Such a payment is not properly freight, but the price of the privilege of putting the goods on board the ship, in order to have the opportunity of their being conveyed to the place of her destination;" and in De Silvale v. Kendall (4 M. & S. 37), which was an action brought by the charterer to recover back money paid in advance, it was held that, when money had been paid in respect of advanced freight, it could not be recovered back. The whole question was very fully considered before the House of Lords in the case of Allison v. Bristol Marine Insurance Company (34 L. T. Rep. N. S. 809; 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 178; 1 App. Cas. 209), and there Brett, J. reviewed the whole of the cases, and pointed out the difference between advanced freight and ordinary freight, and the House of Lords there decided that the law is as I have already stated. Blackburn, J. said, at p. 229 (1 App. Cas.): "It" (that is advanced freight) "is in effect money to be paid for taking the goods on board and undertaking to carry and not for carrying them. This, which I have taken with a slight alteration from the judgment of Lord Kingsdown in Kirchner v. Venus (ubi sup.), in my opinion, is an accurate statement of the law." Up to this point the authorities are absolutely conclusive on the point in my favour. Then come the words in the charter-party, "if required." Now, how long have we got the option of "requiring" this payment? Until the proper time has come when we have to make our option; that is, when the documents are brought for signature in the ordinary course of business. We have got the option when the charterer brings up the documents and the bill of lading—probably so—certainly to the time when, according to commercial usage, this ought to have been done. The only difficulty in the case is as to the words "if required," but that does not make any real difference, as this advanced freight was required. This payment is not freight at all; the moment the agreement is made the payment ceases to be freight and ceases to be payable in consideration of carrying the goods; it is not freight, but a payment made in consideration of taking the goods on board. We have the fact that on the previous voyage a course similar to the present was pursued, and the payment made, and that was the course of business between the parties. On a true construction of this charter-party this advanced freight is payable independently of the loss of the vessel. He referred to Dufourcet v. Bishop, 56 L. T. Rep. N. S. 633; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 109; 18 Q. B. Div. 373.

Lawson Walton, Q.C. (Robson with him) for the defendants.—The short point here is whether, under the circumstances of this charter-party, advanced freight can be claimed after the loss of the vessel. I submit that there ought to be a further qualification read into the clause that advanced freight is to be paid if required, namely, that advanced freight cannot be required after the object of the voyage is frustrated, and the vessel disabled from earning freight. The reasonable construction of the clause itself requires that the option should be exercised within a reasonable time. The sinking of the ship makes it evident that no freight will ever be paid for carrying the goods, and that therefore no advanced freight can ever be paid or required. This charter-party is so framed as to leave the shipowner a choice whether he will require advanced freight or not, and he has the whole of the voyage to make up his mind; this shows that it is an obligation to pay it only while the voyage lasts; here the voyage was at an end before the demand was made. One conclusive test in the matter is this: the requirement cannot be made after we have lost the right to insure; the clause in the charter-party ends with the words "less interest and insurance." That shows that the demand for this advanced freight must be made while there is still time to effect an insurance, that is to say, before the loss of the vessel. The possibility of insuring the ship was at an end when the requirement was made. When the shipowners elected to demand this advanced freight our answer was that it was too late, that we were not in a position to insure the money, and that consequently our obligation was put an end to by the clause in the charter-party, and that the shipowners might have declined to go to sea until the bill of lading was signed and the advanced freight paid. [CHARLES, J.—Your argument as to insurance would apply to any of the cases cited.] No; in those cases the money was due before the ship sailed. The authorities establish this principle, that advanced freight in this country cannot be got back, and for this reason that there is an implied agreement that it shall not be got back; it cannot be got back even though the vessel is lost, because, if it could be got back, it would be a loan and therefore not insurable. This charter-party ought to be construed according to our construction, for the effect of deciding for the plaintiffs would be that they would be paid twice over for this sum, as they would get from the defendants the sum advanced, and also get from the underwriter the sum for which it was insured. The arrangement under this charter-party could not be carried out after the vessel was lost, and therefore on the face of the charter-party it is clear that the parties intended that the arrangement, if carried out at all, should be carried out before the loss of the vessel. This is an advance of freight, an advance in respect of freight, in respect of freight being earned, and therefore when no freight is earned there can be no advance in respect of it. The next point is, that the loss of the ship terminates the peril, and the enterprise is at an end, and the charterer is no longer bound to pay; that that is so is established by several authorities. In Jackson v. The Union Marine Insurance Company (31 L. T. Rep. N. S. 789; 2 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 435; L. Rep. 10 C. P. 125) the Court of Exchequer Chamber, affirming the decision of the Court of Common Pleas, held that, in circumstances somewhat similar to the present, there was a complete end of the voyage, entitling both parties to consider themselves released from their obligations under the charter-party. [CHARLES, J.—That must be too broadly stated, as, if the loss terminated the obligation to pay, that would be inconsistent with the cases which allow advanced freight even after the loss of the vessel.] No, as in those cases the obligation to pay the advanced freight had already accrued; it was already a chose in action. When the earning of freight is impossible, any advance in respect of it is a misdescription; on the ship going down the whole contract on both sides is at an end. In the case of The Kathleen (31 L. T. Rep. N. S. 204; 2 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 367; L. Rep. 4 A. & E. 269) Sir R. Phillimore held that, in the absence of any agreement to pay pro ratâ freight, the obligation to pay freight at all was put an end to by the loss of the ship. He also referred to

The Cito, 45 L. T. Rep. N. S. 663; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 468; 7 P. Div. 5.

CHARLES, J.—In this case the plaintiffs seek to recover from the defendants the sum of 245*l*., being one-third advanced freight on the screw-steamship Gamma, payable by defendants to plaintiffs under a charter-party dated 30th Nov. 1888, less 3 per cent. for interest and insurance. The facts were very short and they were not in dispute, but they raise a question of law on the true construction of the charter-party. The plaintiffs are the owners of this vessel, and she was chartered by the defendants to proceed from Hull to Odessa, with a cargo of coal; she was loaded with coal, and upon the 19th Dec. she sailed from Hull about half-past six in the morning. Three-quarters of an hour after she sailed she took the ground on some sands called the Middle Sands, and at four o'clock the same afternoon, if not earlier, she broke her back, and this was an end of the voyage so far as the carriage of the cargo was concerned. Certainly, after the voyage had come to an end, and the purpose of the voyage had been frustrated by the stranding of the Gamma and the injury which she sustained, charterers' bills of lading were brought to the owners' agents with the colliery invoices of the coal, and thereupon one-third freight in advance was asked for, and payment was refused, upon the ground that the vessel had become a wreck, and therefore the adventure having come to an end the whole commercial object of the speculation was frustrated, and no obligation rested on the charterers to pay the advanced freight.

Now, with regard to the language of the charter-party itself, the clause with reference to freight is in these words: "The freight to be paid on unloading and right delivery of the cargo, in cash at current exchange; one-third freight, if required, to be advanced, less 3 per cent. for interest and insurance." The practice of the previous voyage was proved before me, and, according to the practice of the previous voyage, and upon the previous voyage, the requirement was made upon the presentation of the bills of lading. That was what was done upon the prior occasion. An admission was made at the trial before me at Leeds, that on the previous voyage bills of lading were brought after the vessel had sailed, and the advanced freight was then required to be paid. Bills of lading were brought after the vessel had sailed. That is possible under this charter-party, because the charterers' bills of lading are to be signed by the captain or the owners, and therefore it is immaterial whether they are brought before or after the vessel sailed. It was also proved that in the present case the bills of lading were made out in the ordinary course without delay, and that the colliery invoices were also made out in the usual manner, and it seems to me that there was nothing abnormal in the period at which this requirement was made. The owner could scarcely make the requirement till the charterer told him the amount of the whole freight. It was possible for him to do it, because he himself probably had someone to check the cargo as it was being shipped; and further, it was admitted at the trial that at the docks a record was kept of the weight shipped, and that record would have enabled the plaintiffs no doubt to find out the amount and weight shipped if they had inquired at the docks, and they might have found that out on the morning of the 18th that is to say before the loss of the vessel had occurred. However, it was admitted at the trial that it was neither the usual nor ordinary course of business to make any such application at the docks. Therefore the matter really stands thus: that there was nothing unusual or abnormal in the mode in which this requirement was made. Quite the contrary; it was made in accordance with what had been done on the previous occasion, and I gather, not from the admission, but from the evidence in the case, that the usual course was adopted between the parties—the course which was usual at the port.

But now comes the difficulty. Undoubtedly at the time the requirement was made the vessel had become a wreck, and the whole voyage was frustrated, and it is contended, that being so, that the requirement cannot be lawfully made, and that argument was enforced by the terms of the advance freight clause—that advance freight, if required, was to be paid. The freight, if required, was to be advanced, less 3 per cent. for interest and insurance, indicating, as it was argued, that clearly the requirement must be made when the subject-matter of the insurance is still in existence. Now, in order to arrive at a solution of this question, it is necessary to ask oneself what advanced freight is. Freight of course is a payment made for the safe carriage of the goods. There is no doubt about that. But advance freight, although in one sense it is freight, being a portion of the money which is to be paid for that safe carriage, it has been decided over and over again is a payment made for taking the goods on board, and for the undertaking to carry, not for the safe carriage of them, and that being the nature of advance freight it has been held, first, that if it had been paid in advance it cannot be got back again, even although the vessel is lost; secondly, that if there had been an absolute obligation to pay it, in other words, an absolute agreement to pay advance freight, that agreement can be put in action, although before the action the vessel was lost. Now those two propositions of law really go a very long way, if not the whole way, to decide the case, and the only difficulty that I have felt about it is, that in the present case the charter-party does not impose upon the charterer an absolute obligation to pay advance freight, but only to pay advance freight if required. The argument is that, inasmuch as a deduction is to be made for interest and insurance, the requirement must be made before the loss. That certainly is a very ingenious way of putting the case, but I am unable upon reflection to assent to it. It seems to me that here there was at the time of the entry into this bargain this obligation to pay advance freight if required. What right have I, having regard to the nature of advance freight, and remembering that it is money paid not for safe carriage, but merely for the undertaking to carry, to read into that clause the words "if required before the loss of the vessel?" The only possible justification for my doing so is to be found in the clause as to deduction for insurance; but it seems to me upon reflection only to mean this: that, inasmuch as the owner, who primarily would be the person who would insure the whole freight, would not want to insure so much of that freight as he gets safely into his pocket, he is to make a deduction when he gets the money into his pocket of so much money as it would have cost him to insure it, and the deduction does not necessarily mean that, at the time the requirement is made, the subject-matter of the insurance is still to be in existence. All it means is this: the owner being relieved from the necessity of insuring the whole freight inasmuch as the one-third paid to him is no longer a risk, he is to make a deduction of an amount equivalent to the amount he would have had to spend himself had none of the freight been advanced to him. In other words, that it is in the nature of a discount which he makes in order to get safely home the advance freight which he demands. That appears to me to give full effect to the construction of the words "less 3 per cent. for interest and insurance," and if it does, then there is simply the clause to be read as it stands—"one-third freight, if required, to be advanced," and there is nothing to show that that requirement must be made before the loss of the vessel itself. The case therefore really appears to me to be covered by the authorities. It is clear that advance freight is not money which is paid in any respect for safe carriage, but only for the loading of the goods and the undertaking to carry, and it is clear that the advanced freight cannot be recovered if it be paid, although the ship is lost. It is also clear that unqualified obligation to pay advanced freight can be insisted upon, even although the vessel be lost before it is insisted upon; and so here I think that the claim may be made to pay the advanced freight, although the vessel be lost before the requirement in fact was made. That entitles the plaintiffs to my judgment for 245*l.*, and, as there is a counter-claim for 35*l.* 9*s.* 2*d.*, admitted by the reply, the judgment will be for the plaintiffs for 245*l.* and the costs of the claim, and judgment for the defendants, without costs, for 35*l.* 9*s.* 2*d.* on the counter-claim, and execution will issue for the balance.

THE VINDOMORA. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF APPEAL IN ENGLAND.

Collision—Fog—Alteration of helm.

Although where two vessels are approaching one another in a fog without sufficient indication to justify them in acting with their helm, neither vessel ought to alter her course, yet there is no hard-and-fast rule that a vessel hearing only a single whistle is never justified in manœuvring, and must be held to blame if she does so, but each case must be determined according to its own circumstances.

Those on board the H. in a dense fog heard the whistle of the V. about three and a half or four points on their starboard bow, distant apparently from half a mile to a mile, and thereupon starboarded their helm. A collision took place, the V. striking the H. on the starboard quarter.

Held, that the H. was not to blame for the collision.

Judgment of the court below affirmed.

THIS was an appeal from a judgment of the Court of Appeal (Lord Esher, M.R., Cotton and Lindley, L.JJ.), reported in 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 438; 61 L. T. Rep. N. S. 655; and 14 P. Div. 172, who had varied a judgment of Butt, J.

The action was brought by the respondents, the owners of the steamship Haswell, in respect of a collision which occurred between that vessel and the appellants' steamship the Vindomora in a dense fog off Whitby on the 21st Sept. 1888.

The facts appear from the reports in the court below, and from the judgment of Lord Herschell.

Butt, J. found both vessels to blame, but the Court of Appeal found the Vindomora alone to blame.

The owners of the Vindomora appealed.

Sir W. Phillimore and J. P. Aspinall appeared for the appellants.

The Attorney-General (Sir R. Webster, Q.C.), Sir C. Hall, Q.C., and Pyke, who appeared for the respondents, were not called upon to address the House.

At the conclusion of the arguments for the appellants, their Lordships gave judgment as follows:—

Lord HERSCHELL.—My Lords: This appeal arises in an action brought by the owners of the Haswell against the owners of the Vindomora to recover damages in respect of a collision between those two vessels which took place in the North Sea, off Whitby, on the evening of the 21st Sept. 1888. The result of the collision was that the Vindomora cut into the Haswell, and the Haswell sank, the Vindomora herself sustaining some slight damage. The learned judge who tried the case in the Admiralty Division came to the conclusion that beyond all question the Vindomora was to blame. He found that it was clear that she was wrongly navigated, that she ported in an unjustifiable and reckless manner, and that her speed had not been reduced in the manner which the rules of navigation demanded under the circumstances which existed in this case. From that judgment there was no appeal, and therefore before the Court of Appeal, as before your Lordships' House also, it must be taken as undisputed that the Vindomora was to blame. But then arose the question whether the Haswell was also to blame. The learned judge of the Admiralty Division held that the Haswell was to blame, upon the ground that she starboarded her helm at an earlier period than was admitted by her witnesses. The evidence of the witnesses called for the Haswell was that she had not starboarded until very shortly before the accident. It is admitted that at that time hard-a-starboarding was the proper manœuvre. If it were true that she had not so manœuvred at an early period, no blame could possibly be imputed to her. But it was said that the Haswell, although she had properly diminished her speed so as to be going dead slow, had in truth wrongly performed the manœuvre of starboarding. The evidence of the witnesses on board the Haswell, as I have said, was directly the contrary, but the conclusion reached by the judge of the Admiralty Division was derived from a consideration of the nature of the collision between the two vessels; that is to say, the position of the vessels respectively at the time of the collision; the view taken being that that was more probably accounted for by some starboarding on the part of the Haswell and porting on the part of the Vindomora than by the porting of the Vindomora alone. And the learned judge relied further upon the circumstance that indications were given by the whistle on board the Haswell, which tended to show that she must have been at the time under a starboard helm. The view taken by the learned judge of the Admiralty Division appears to have been this: that if there was any appreciable starboarding on the part of the Haswell at that earlier period, so that the collision, such as it was, resulted in part from that starboarding and in part from the porting of the Vindomora, then the Haswell must be held to blame; and upon that ground accordingly he found both the vessels to blame.

From that judgment the case went on appeal to the Court of Appeal, the only question being, was the Haswell to be held in any respect to blame. Now it was argued by Sir Walter Phillimore on behalf of the appellants that, if once the conclusion was reached that there was any appreciable starboarding on the part of the Haswell before those on board her knew the direction in which the Vindomora was going, the Haswell must be held to blame, because, he contended, there was a rule of practice always acted upon in the Admiralty Court, that where two vessels were approaching one another in a fog, neither vessel had a right to manœuvre in any way until she had a clear and unmistakable indication as to the course upon which the other vessel was proceeding or its relative position to her own. I do not think the cases which the learned counsel cited support the proposition that there is any such absolute hard-and-fast rule as that a vessel hearing only the indication of a single whistle from the other vessel is never justified in manœuvring, and must always be held to blame if she does manœuvre. I should be very sorry to say anything to indicate any dissent from the view that where two vessels are approaching one another in a fog without any sufficient indication to justify action, neither vessel would be justified in altering her course. I think the proper steps to be taken in such a case would be for each vessel to keep the course on which she was proceeding. But, although I entirely agree that that is a good general rule to lay down, yet that rule must nevertheless be interpreted in each case according to the circumstances of that case. It is impossible to lay down an abstract rule of that description which shall be applicable to all circumstances, to all parts of the seas, and to all positions of vessels. I do not understand the Court of Appeal to have thrown any doubt upon the suggestion that it is the general rule, and that in each particular case you must look to see what the circumstances were, and inquire in each particular case, were there circumstances existing which justified the manœuvre executed, or which prevented that manœuvre from being a wrong manœuvre. Now, when once you have reached the point that there is no arbitrary hard-and-fast rule, but that each case must be determined by a reference to the circumstances of the case, then we have to look and see at what conclusion the Court of Appeal arrived. The Court of Appeal, assisted by nautical assessors, arrived at the conclusion that, even assuming (they did not determine the point one way or the other) that there was some starboarding on the part of the Haswell at an earlier period than her witnesses admitted, yet nevertheless that manœuvre was not a wrong one. That question was distinctly put to the nautical assessors. They were asked this: "Taking the vessels to be in the part of the sea where they were, taking into account that which would be known as to the natural course of the vessels at that place, that which would be known as to the lay of the coast, and taking it that the whistle of the Vindomora was heard about as broad on the starboard bow as the witnesses of the Haswell allege, was there anything wrong in the Haswell starboarding?" To that question the nautical assessors answered, without hesitation, "Nothing." Now your Lordships are asked to disregard that finding and to overrule it. It is said, first, that the assumption upon which the question was founded was an assumption that ought not to have been made; and next, that the answer was wrong. I think your Lordships would hesitate much, unassisted as you are here by any nautical experience, before you arrived at the conclusion that the answer thus given by the nautical assessors upon a pure question of seamanship was an answer which you would pronounce to be erroneous; and therefore I for my part do not hesitate to say that it seems to me to be impossible for us, assuming the facts to have been properly put before them, to do other than follow the conclusion at which on a point of seamanship the nautical assessors arrived.

But then it is said that the question put to them was founded upon an assumption of facts which were not facts. No doubt, if that could be established, it would get rid of the importance and value of the nautical assessors' finding. That depends, and as I think from what I have heard solely depends, upon whether the Master of the Rolls was justified in coming to the conclusion, and assuming therefore in his question to the nautical assessors, that those on board the Haswell did hear the whistle of the Vindomora some three and a half to four points on the starboard bow. As regards that point the witnesses on board the Haswell state that they did so hear the whistle. Scarcely a question was put to them in cross-examination to throw a doubt upon the statement which they so made. It seems to me almost to have been accepted. There is certainly nothing in the findings in the court below by Butt, J. to justify the conclusion that he thought the statement on that point erroneous; on the contrary, he practically accepts as reasonable and consistent the whole of the story of the Haswell except as to the period of time at which she began to starboard. Then is there anything in the probabilities of the case to render it inconceivable that the witnesses on board the Haswell did hear the whistle of the Vindomora as they describe? I have listened with attention to the zealous and ingenious arguments which have been presented to your Lordships, but they have not infused into my mind any conviction that the story told is either an impossible or an improbable one. It seems to me that the suggested impossibility or improbability depends very much upon your accepting on certain points the story told by those on board the Vindomora; but, inasmuch as I am not disposed to place any reliance or to act in the least upon anything said by the witnesses on board the Vindomora after what the learned judge said in the court below as well as after the discussion of their evidence here, it seems to me that you cannot assume any of their statements to be facts for the purpose of showing that this story is inconceivable or improbable. Under these circumstances, I do not think it has been made out that the question put to the nautical assessors by the learned judge was founded upon any misconception of the evidence or upon any erroneous conclusion as to its effect. That being so, I am prepared to recommend to your Lordships to act upon that finding, and to come to the conclusion that it is not made out that the Haswell in this case acted wrongly. The Vindomora beyond all question broke the statutory rule. The utmost that can be said in the case of the Haswell is, that one has to consider whether there was an act or a neglect which would not have been done or omitted by a skilful and prudent seaman. It seems to me that that question is completely answered by the finding of the Court of Appeal, from which I am not disposed to differ.

Another question arises. Even assuming that there was some improper starboarding on the part of the Haswell, it is necessary for the Vindomora to establish that that contributed or conduced to the accident, which I understand to mean this, that but for the starboarding by those on board the Haswell the accident would not have taken place. If there would equally have been a collision between the two vessels although the Haswell had not starboarded, then, although the collision might not have been exactly in the same place or the two vessels might not have struck one another in the same way, it cannot be said that the case against the Haswell has been made out. I do not think this proposition was denied by the learned counsel for the appellants, except that it was attempted to shift the onus of showing that from the Vindomora to the Haswell. I will not enter into the question now upon whom the onus lay, whether it was for the Vindomora to show that it was the act of the Haswell and that the collision would not have occurred if the Haswell had not so manœuvred, or whether it was for the Haswell to excuse herself in that way; because what we have to deal with is a determination by the nautical gentlemen, or rather a determination of the court on the answer of the nautical gentlemen to the question, "Did the starboarding of the Haswell in your opinion conduce to this collision?" and their answer is, "No, not at all." If that be the case, it has not been established that the Haswell is to blame for this collision so that she is to be held jointly responsible for it with the Vindomora. Your Lordships have heard a good deal of discussion upon that point, but I have myself heard nothing which places me in a position to pronounce an opinion upon that point, which is a point at least closely connected with nautical knowledge and skill, and to say that that finding was wrong, and that there would have been no collision but for the Haswell's starboarding as and when she did. Under these circumstances I submit that the judgment of the Court of Appeal should be affirmed, and this appeal dismissed with costs, and I move your Lordships accordingly.

Lord WATSON.—My Lords: In agreeing with the judgment which has just been moved, I have no wish to cast any doubt upon the soundness of the rule that when a vessel at sea, overtaken by a fog, becomes aware that another vessel is in her neighbourhood, she ought, whilst complying with the regulations as to speed, to keep on her course unless she has some indication more or less trustworthy that it would be proper or at least safe to change it. What indications would be sufficient to warrant a change of course is a question of fact which must depend upon the circumstances of each case. In the present case the Court of Appeal have not thought it necessary to decide whether the Haswell starboarded on the first or on the last whistle heard from the Vindomora. Their Lordships assumed that she began the starboarding as soon as she heard the first of those signals, and on that assumption they put a specific question to the nautical assessors, who, in answer, advised their Lordships that, taking into account these three things, first the part of the sea in which the two vessels were, secondly the natural course of the two vessels and the lay of the coast, and thirdly that the Vindomora's whistle was heard at from three and a half to four points on her starboard bow, the Haswell did nothing wrong in starboarding. That finding, if accepted, appears to me to be absolutely conclusive in favour of the Haswell. We have been asked to reject it. I can only say that I am not disposed to treat lightly any finding of nautical assessors, and least of all when, as in the present instance, their finding is plain and unequivocal. Notwithstanding the very plausible argument to which we have listened from the bar, I have heard nothing from the learned counsel which leads me to doubt the soundness of the advice which was given by the assessors to the Court of Appeal. I think as little cause has been shown by the learned counsel against the second finding of the assessors, which of itself would entitle the Haswell to a judgment exempting her from blame, even if the first had been against her.

Lord BRAMWELL.—My Lords: I concur.

Lord MORRIS.—My Lords: Accepting the rule as laid down by Lord Herschell and Lord Watson, it appears to me to be a rule founded upon common sense as well as upon seamanship, that if two vessels are in a fog in the same neighbourhood, it is better for them to continue on the course they are on instead of groping about and probably thereby causing a collision which might not otherwise occur. At the same time it appears also to me to be a principle of common sense and good seamanship that, when two vessels are near together in a fog, and the one receives a sufficient indication of the position of the other, there is no rule and there could be no rule, that the vessel which receives such an indication, and thereby has good reason for changing her course, should not do so. Accordingly, in this case, as I understand, those acting for the Vindomora do not allege that, if the Haswell had waited until the second whistle had been heard from the Vindomora, there would not have been sufficient indication and sufficient good reason for the Haswell starboarding her helm. That is the case made, as a matter of fact, by the Haswell, and for myself I must say that I am not all satisfied that it is not a true case. It was the case that was proved by the evidence at all events upon the trial before Butt, J. He was disposed not to give credence to it, relying upon reasoning not arising from matters of fact proved directly upon the point, but reasoning arrived at from other admitted facts, such as that the master had made a deposition somewhat inconsistent with that statement, and from the nature of the collision, and from other circumstances referred to by him. I merely guard myself by saying that I am not at all satisfied that the case made by the Haswell was an untrue one, and that they did not wait until the second whistle from the Vindomora was heard before starboarding. But it appears to me, that there is no magic in waiting for a second whistle rather than acting upon the first whistle, if the first whistle showed sufficient indication and gave good reason for the Haswell altering her course. A question on that point has been submitted to the nautical assessors, and the accepted state of facts to a great extent was put to them, namely, that the Vindomora at the time of the first whistle being heard was some three and a half to four points on the starboard bow of the Haswell. That is deposed to by several witnesses, and it does not appear to have been to any material extent controverted at the trial before Butt, J. Upon that state of facts the nautical assessors say, that under the circumstances existing in this case upon the first whistle coming from a vessel that bore three and a-half to four points on the starboard bow of the Haswell, it would be a sufficient indication and a good reason for the Haswell's altering her course. Upon these grounds I entirely concur in the judgment which my noble and learned friend on the woolsack has moved.

Judgment appealed from affirmed, and appeal dismissed with costs.

JUDICIAL COMMITTEE OF THE PRIVY COUNCIL.

Saturday, July 12, 1890.

(Present: The Right Hons. Lords HOBHOUSE and MACNAGHTEN, Sir BARNES PEACOCK, and Sir R. COUCH.)

THE CITY OF PEKING. (a)

THE STEAMSHIP CITY OF PEKING v. COMPAGNIE DES MESSAGERIES MARITIMES.

Collision—Consequential damage — Demurrage—Restitutio in integrum—Loss of profits—Registrar and merchants.

To entitle a shipowner to recover demurrage he must show actual loss resulting from the detention of his ship, and give reasonable proof of its amount.

Where successful plaintiffs in a collision action claimed demurrage during the time their vessel was under repairs, and it appeared that the plaintiffs substituted another of their ships to do the work of the damaged ship, the expenses and loss incidental to this substitution being allowed against the defendants, and the plaintiffs failed to show that they had sustained any pecuniary loss by the detention of their ship, it was held that they were not entitled to recover demurrage; but that, if they could show an actual out-of-pocket expense usually included in the term demurrage, such as wages and maintenance of crew, they would be entitled to recover such sums.

Where, upon the hearing of an appeal to the Privy Council from a judgment upon the report of the registrar of a Vice-Admiralty Court the Privy Council is of opinion that the report must be referred back for the finding of other facts and figures, such reference will be to the Registrar of Her Majesty in Ecclesiastical and Maritime Appeals, if convenient and less expensive than a reference back to the Vice-Admiralty Court.

Semble, where an objection to a registrar's report is taken in general terms, as to the whole of an item allowed, it is open to the party objecting to seek to have part of the item disallowed.

THIS was an appeal by the defendants in a collision action in rem from a judgment of the Vice-Admiralty Court of Hong Kong, dated the 27th March 1888.

The action was instituted in respect of a collision which took place between the steamships City of Peking and the Saghalien in the harbour of Hong Kong, on the 29th Nov. 1886. The City of Peking was found alone to blame, and the plaintiffs' damages were referred for assessment to the registrar of the Vice-Admiralty Court, assisted by merchants.

The registrar reported that the several sums of 1491 francs 95 centimes for damage to cargo, 5819*l.* 0*s.* 9*d.* for demurrage and loss of time for another ship of plaintiffs substituted for the Saghalien and some small items for damage to cargo, and $66,068 for costs of repairs to the Saghalien and other expenses incurred in consequence of the collision, with interest at 8 per cent., were due to the plaintiffs.

The defendants objected to the item of 5819*l.* 0*s.* 9*d.* so far as it related to demurrage, and to the claim for loss of time for the substituted ship, upon the ground that the registrar had allowed the whole time that the Saghalien was in dock and rendered unserviceable to the company, viz., fifty-six days, and that the plaintiffs had no right to recover anything, because there was no loss of profit in the case of the Saghalien, and that, as regards the claim or loss of time for the substituted ship, they objected to it upon the ground that such loss did not arise out of the collision.

The judge of the Vice-Admiralty Court having heard the objection, referred the report back to the registrar, with a direction that the proper basis upon which the demurrage in the case of one of a line of steamers being detained should be calculated is the number of days between the time she would have sailed if no collision had taken place and the time she resumes her place on the line; but he affirmed the report so far as it related to loss of time of the substituted ship.

In pursuance of the said direction the registrar made a second report finding that fifty-six days' demurrage should be allowed.

The defendants objected to this further report, and contended before the judge that in the circumstances no demurrage should be allowed, but the judge affirmed the report.

From that decree the present appeal was brought asking the court to pronounce that no demurrage was due, or, in the alternative, that the demurrage allowed was for too many days and at too high a rate, and that the rate of interest was unreasonable.

The further facts sufficiently appear in the judgment.

Cur. adv. vult.

Dec. 14.—Judgment was delivered by the Right Hon. Sir BARNES PEACOCK.—This is an appeal from a decree or order of the Vice-Admiralty Court at Hong Kong of the 27th March 1888. The point determined was the amount of damages which the respondents the Compagnie des Messageries Maritimes were entitled to recover in a suit instituted by them against the appellant the steamship City of Peking in respect of a collision which took place on the 29th Nov. 1886 in the harbour of Hong Kong between the said steamship City of Peking and the steamship Saghalien, of which the company were the owners. In that suit the City of Peking, having been found to have been alone to blame, was condemned in damages and costs by a decree (subsequently affirmed by this board), by which it was referred to the registrar of the court to be assisted by merchants to ascertain the amount of damages and to report thereon. The company brought in their claim containing many items, amounting to 1491 francs and 95 centimes, 6035*l.* 12*s.* 11*d.*, and 66,133 dollars and 25 cents, together with interest thereon at eight dollars per cent. from the 29th Nov. 1886 until payment. One of the items of the claim is "No. 50, demurrage for the steamship Saghalien from the 29th November 1886 to the 25th January 1887, being 56 days, 5352*l.* 4*s.*" The Saghalien was a vessel of about 3823 tons gross, and M. de Champeaux, the agent of the company at Hong Kong, stated that he claimed demurrage at 6*d.* a ton a day on the gross tonnage. The assistant registrar, on the 6th Feb. 1888, after hearing both parties, reported that he allowed the amount, 5352*l.* 4*s.*, claimed for demurrage, and all the other items of the plaintiff's claim with some comparatively slight deductions, which are not material to be considered with reference to the present appeal. The total so allowed being 1491 francs 95 centimes, 5819*l.* 0*s.* 9*d.*, and 66,068 dollars and 79 cents, with interest at 8 per cent. until paid. No objection was made to this report by the plaintiffs, but the defendant appellant on the 21st Feb. 1888 objected to the item allowed for demurrage. The appellant also objected to several other items, the objection to which has since been abandoned, and is therefore not now material. The objections were heard by the learned judge who delivered judgment thereon, and by an order dated the 9th March 1888 referred back the report to the registrar and merchants, with a direction to ascertain the number of days the Saghalien was prevented by the collision from taking up her position on her own day from Marseilles, referring, as will hereafter appear, to the 30th Jan. 1887, a day on which the Saghalien, as one of a line of steamers belonging to the company, was appointed to commence a fresh voyage from Marseilles to Shanghai. The deputy registrar assisted by the same merchants having in pursuance of the last-mentioned order heard both parties, together with fresh evidence, including an affidavit of M. de Champeaux, again reported to the court on the 21st March 1888 that fifty-six days' demurrage be allowed, and also specified his reasons for such report. To that report the defendant on the 24th March 1888 objected, and contended that it should be varied, and that no demurrage ought to be allowed. The learned judge having again heard the case on the 27th March 1888, without assigning any further reasons, pronounced that the sums of francs one thousand four hundred and ninety-one centimes ninety-five (frs. 1491. 95), five thousand eight hundred and nineteen pounds and ninepence (5819*l.* 0*s.* 9*d.*), and dollars sixty-six thousand and sixty-eight and cents seventy-nine ($66,068. 79) to be due to the plaintiffs in respect of their claim, together with interest and costs. And he condemned the defendants and their bail in the said sums, interest, and costs. The sum of 5819*l.* 0*s.* 9*d.* so held to be due to the company includes the sum of 5,352*l.* 4*s.* claimed by them and allowed by the first report for demurrage.

From that order or decree the present appeal has been preferred by the defendant upon the ground that no demurrage ought to have been allowed, or in the alternative that the demurrage allowed was for too many days and at too high a rate, and also upon the ground that the rate of interest allowed was unreasonable. Their Lordships in the course of the argument intimated their opinion that no objection having been made in the Lower Court in respect of the interest allowed the appellant could not now support the appeal against such allowance. The only question now to be decided is whether the defendant ought to be held liable for the 5352*l.* 4*s.* allowed for demurrage, or any part of that amount. It was objected on behalf of the respondents on the argument of the appeal in support of the third reason of their case that the objection to the demurrage taken in the court below was not to the rate or number of days, but that no demurrage at all was due, and that the rate and number of days were not objected to in the court below and were therefore not subject to appeal to Her Majesty in Council; but their Lordships are of opinion that that objection cannot be supported. The objection to the first report was that the report be varied, the following items (of which No 50, "Demurrage for Saghalien, 5352*l.* 4*s.*, was one) being objected to." In the objection to the second report the language was, no doubt, altered, the objection being, "that the report be varied and that no demurrage be allowed." Their Lordships are disposed to think that even if the latter objection stood alone the appellant would have been at liberty to contend that part of the sum allowed for demurrage ought to be disallowed, even though it might fail in showing that no demurrage ought to be allowed; but reading the second objection coupled with the first, they have no doubt that the appellant is at liberty to show that the whole or some part of the item of 5352*l.* 4*s.* ought to be disallowed. In dealing with the case their Lordships consider that the plaintiffs must be held to their claim for demurrage, from the 29th Nov. 1886 to the 25th Jan. 1887, or in other words, during the detention of the Saghalien at Hong Kong, and that they are not at liberty to claim as demurrage any detention of the vessel at Marseilles after her arrival there on the 25th Feb. 1888, the 6*d.* a day claimed and allowed being limited to the period of her detention at Hong Kong, between the dates mentioned in item No. 50 of the claim. There is no doubt as to the rule of law according to which compensation is to be assessed in cases of this nature, where a partial loss is sustained by collision. The rule is restitutio in integrum: (The Black Prince, Lush. Rep. 573.) The party injured is entitled to be put, as far as practicable, in the same condition as if the injury had not been suffered. It does not follow as a matter of necessity that anything is due for detention of a vessel whilst under repair. In order to entitle a party to be indemnified for what is termed in the Admiralty Court a consequential loss resulting from the detention of his vessel, two things are absolutely necessary, actual loss and reasonable proof of the amount: (The Clarence, 3 Wm. Rob. Rep. 283; The Argentine, 61 L. T. Rep. N. S. 706; 14 App. Cas. 519; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 433.)

There is no dispute as to the principal facts as stated by the learned judge: "The Saghalien is one of the steamers of the company which run regularly every fortnight from Marseilles to Shanghai. These steamers are subsidised by the French Government to carry mails from France to China and the ports on that course, and to take return mails to France. The China terminus is Shanghai, and it is from there that they commence their return voyage homewards after staying for a time at Shanghai, something between a fortnight and three weeks, it would seem from the evidence before the registrar. They also stop for a short time apparently at Marseilles after the completion of the round trip and before commencing a fresh voyage to China. On the 29th Nov. 1886 the Saghalien was lying in the harbour of Hong Kong, having arrived from Shanghai two days before. She was homeward bound next day at noon. The City of Peking, arriving with the American mails, in coming up to her anchorage, collided with and damaged the Saghalien so that she could not proceed on her journey to France, but had to be taken into dry dock. On the same day the steamship Melbourne, another of the company's steamers, arrived in Hong Kong from Europe with passengers, mails, and cargo, and in the ordinary course would have proceeded to Shanghai on the following day. The agent of the company, M. de Champeaux, at once decided to send on the Melbourne's cargo, mails, and passengers by outside steamers to Shanghai, and to send the Melbourne back to Europe instead of the Saghalien. This decision was very promptly executed, and the Melbourne, having discharged her northern cargo, had transferred to her the Saghalien's cargo, passengers, &c." The outward voyage of the Saghalien from Marseilles commenced on the 26th Sept. 1886. If the collision had not taken place she ought in ordinary course to have left Hong Kong on her homeward voyage on the 30th Nov, 1886, and to have reached Marseilles about the 3rd Jan. 1887, and according to the arrangements of the company would have remained there unemployed until the 30th Jan. in that year, when she was timed to take her turn and to start upon a fresh outward voyage to Shanghai. In consequence, however, of the collision she was detained at Hong Kong until the 25th Jan. 1887, fifty-six days after the collision. She left on that day, arriving at Marseilles on the 25th Feb. in that year, and remained there unemployed until the 27th March, when she again sailed for Shanghai. The Melbourne left Hong Kong on the 2nd Dec. 1886, two days after the Saghalien ought to have started, she arrived at Marseilles in due course early in Jan. 1887, and remained there unemployed until the 30th of that mouth, on which day she took the turn which, but for the collision, would have been taken by the Saghalien, and sailed on a fresh outward voyage for Shanghai. The Melbourne having been substituted for the Saghalien on the homeward voyage, was necessarily prevented from continuing her outward voyage to Shanghai and back, and other arrangements had to be made for carrying on to that port the mails, passengers, and cargo of the Melbourne, and for her return voyage to Marseilles. These arrangements were attended with very considerable expense, in addition to the loss sustained by the withdrawal of certain passengers and freight, booked by the Melbourne from Hong Kong to Shanghai, but the whole of these expenses and losses were included in the plaintiffs' claim, and have been allowed both by the assistant registrar and by the judge, in addition to the claim of 5352*l.* 4s. for demurrage. As to the homeward voyage from Shanghai, which would have been made by the Melbourne if she had not been substituted, M. de Champeaux, in his affidavit of the 18th March 1838, says: "The company's steamship Amazone, instead of remaining at Shanghai, according to the time tables of the company, until the 6th day of January 1887, was despatched from Shanghai on the 23rd day of December 1886, to supply the place of the steamship Melbourne, and the plaintiff company's steamship Yangtse, instead of remaining in Shanghai until the 20th day of January 1887, was despatched from Shanghai on the 6th day of January 1887, in the place of the said steamship Amazone. The company's steamship Volga was taken off the Hong Kong and Japan line, and was despatched from Shanghai on the 20th day of January 1887, in place of the said steamship Yangtse, and she carried the mails, passengers, and cargo to Hong Kong, where they were transshipped into the said steamship Saghalien, thus enabling that vessel to sail on the 25th January 1887 for Marseilles, otherwise the said steamship Saghalien would have had to proceed to Shanghai for the mails, passengers, and cargo, which would have caused her to leave Marseilles again two weeks later than the 27th day of March 1887, the day she did leave. The company's steamers usually remain at Shanghai for about seventeen to twenty-one days, in order to thoroughly overhaul their engines and machinery, and in consequence of the earlier despatch of the said steamships, Amazone and Yangtse, as aforesaid, they were only at Shanghai about three or four days, and the usual overhaul of the engines and machinery could not be and was not effected. The company's steamers usually remain at Marseilles for about four weeks after their arrival before being again despatched to China." M. de Champeaux, in his affidavit of the 9th Jan. 1888, paragraph 15, also stated that, in consequence of the detention of the steamship Saghalien, she lost her turn in the line of mail steamers, and the company suffered great inconvenience, and incurred heavy loss, both pecuniarily and in reputation; but on cross-examination, at page 15, he says: "I do not know if any loss has actually occurred. Loss might have occurred by the steamers not staying long enough at Shanghai to clean their engines. The service of the steamers was also made irregular. We were exposed to a claim from the French Government. If there had been no collision the Melbourne would have got to Shanghai about 3rd December, and would have stayed about fourteen days there, and ought to have left here, i.e., Hong Kong, on 28th December. The Yangtse probably left on 28th December. The next steamer to the north after the Melbourne was the Yangtse. These steamers were turned round at Shanghai. So far as profits were concerned the compagnie lost nothing. The crew and officers are engaged for the voyage, and some of the crew are discharged at Marseilles. Taking the Volga off did not interfere with the service from Yokohama to Hong Kong. I cannot say what extra expense was caused by taking the Volga off her proper voyage. I do not know if any actual gains were lost to the company by the change of steamers, nor can I say what actual expenses were incurred." There appears to be a slight mistake in the statement that the Yangtse was the next steamer north after the Melbourne, for it appears from a later affidavit, as already stated, that the Amazone was the next, and the Yangtse the next after the Amazone, and that the Amazone was the steamer which supplied the place of the Melbourne on the 23rd Dec., but the mistake does not in the least degree alter the case. M. de Champeaux again, at page 16, says: "The Saghalien is three times as large as the Volga. If I had sent the Saghalien up to Shanghai instead of using the Volga the expense would have been more, as a fortnight would have been lost. If I had sent the Saghalien the Volga would not have come down to Hong Kong. Whilst in dock other steamers were earning the profits of the Saghalien. I did not hear of any cargo being shut out at Shanghai." It seems clear that no damage was sustained by the company in consequence of the Melbourne's not having completed her outward voyage, and been at Shanghai for her return voyage. The profits of her homeward voyage, though earned by other steamers, were earned by other steamers of the company and for the company. As to the sending of the Volga to Shanghai to carry the mails, passengers, and cargo from thence to Hong Kong to be reshipped on board the Saghalien, and carried by her to Marseilles on her voyage which commenced on the 25th Jan., it seems clear that no damage has been sustained by the company, as all the expenses of the Volga were claimed by the company and have been allowed by the judge, the sums allowed being 433*l*. 4*s*. 4*d*. and 624 dollars and 77 cents. The learned judge, on allowing these amounts, remarked: "The allowance for the Volga in connecting the Shanghai end of the line with Hong Kong is most moderate, and seems to me to have been the cheapest service that could have been rendered for the City of Peking."

The learned judge was mistaken in treating the case of the Black Prince as analogous to the present. The two cases are very different. In the Black Prince the vessels belonged to different sets of owners, so that the profits earned by one ship belonged to one set of owners, and the profits earned by a different ship to another set of owners, whereas in the present case the profits earned, whether by one ship or another, all belonged to the company. Again, in the case of the Black Prince, the arrangement as to the turns fixed for the voyages to be made by several ships was made by the several owners, each set of owners having a distinct interest in having the arrangement adhered to, so that their ship might be employed in its proper turn; no set of owners had the power to alter the turns allotted without the consent of all the others. In the present case the order in which the ships were appointed to leave Marseilles, was one made for the company's own convenience and to preserve regularity in the departure of their own vessels. It could be changed or varied at any moment at the will of the company in the case of emergency, or if the interests of the company appeared to them to require it, and, in fact, it was very properly changed by M. de Champeaux in consequence of the inability of the Saghalien to proceed on her voyage. It appears to their Lordships that all the damages sustained by the company in consequence of the substitution of the Melbourne were included in the claim brought in before the registrar, allowed by him, and finally sanctioned by the court. The Melbourne and her crew had been substituted for the Saghalien, and her crew on her homeward voyage, at what may now be termed the expense of the defendant, was very properly, and perhaps necessarily, allowed to take the turn of the Saghalien on the next outward voyage from Marseilles on the 30th Jan. 1887. The company lost nothing, so far as the use of the ships was concerned, by substituting the Melbourne, for if she had not been engaged on the homeward journey she and her crew would have been occupied during the whole time in completing the voyage on which she was engaged at the time of the substitution. It would be very unjust to charge the defendant 95*l*. per day or anything for the loss of the use of the Saghalien during her detention at Hong Kong for the time during which the Melbourne and her crew were doing at the defendant's expense the work which the Saghalien and her crew ought to have done. This includes the period from the 2nd Dec. 1886 to the day in Jan. 1887 on which the Melbourne arrived at Marseilles. No loss was sustained by the company by the detention of the Melbourne from the day of her arrival at Marseilles and the day of her departure therefrom, for it was in consequence of the arrangements of the company that she remained unemployed during that period; so also no loss was sustained by the company in consequence of the Saghalien's not having been in Marseilles from the 3rd to the 30th Jan. 1887, as but for the accident she ought to have been, for if she had been there she would have been lying unemployed and earning nothing in accordance with the company's own arrangements. The learned judge was clearly in error in referring back the report by his first judgment to the registrar and merchants with a direction to ascertain the number of days the Saghalien was prevented by the collision from taking up her position on her own day, and to amend their report on the principles indicated, without directing them to ascertain whether the company sustained any loss in consequence. In giving that direction he was acting entirely upon the case of the Black Prince, without adverting to the difference between that case and the present. He said: "It may turn out that there were fifty-six days' delay, but although the Araxes (referring to the injured ship in the case of the Black Prince) was thirty-eight days in dock she was only allowed twenty-eight days' demurrage, such being the number of days she was prevented from taking her place on the line; in other words, that she was not earning money for her owners." The case went before the deputy-registrar, Mr.

Sangster, a different officer, and the same merchants, who reported that fifty-six days' demurrage be allowed. The report is not very clear; but reading the whole report together it seems to their Lordships that the deputy-registrar attributed the demurrage to the fifty-six days during which the Saghalien was in dock at Hong Kong, and not to any portion of the time during which she was unemployed at Marseilles. Be this as it may, the learned judge, acting upon the report without giving any further reasons than those in his first judgment, and apparently under the erroneous impression that this case was governed by the ruling in the case of the Black Prince, allowed the sum of 5352*l.* 4*s.* claimed for demurrage, being at the rate of 6*d.* per ton upon the gross tonnage of the Saghalien, or about 95*l.* a day for each of the said fifty-six days, and this without proof that any loss had been sustained by the company in consequence of that demurrage. It has been shown that the company has claimed and been allowed all the damages sustained in consequence of the inability of the Saghalien to proceed on her homeward voyage on the 30th Nov. 1886, so far as the loss by the company of the use of the vessel was concerned. Mr. Champeaux very properly, and, as it appears to their Lordships, correctly stated, "that, so far as profits were concerned, the company lost nothing," and also "that whilst in dock the other steamers were earning the profits of the Saghalien." The learned judge, however, remarked that that statement required some explanation, and added, "Should they have nothing for those services? I have stated why I think they ought to have," without adverting to the fact that he was allowing in other items of the claim all the expenses which had been incurred in consequence of the substitution of the Melbourne.

Their Lordships are of opinion that the decree or order appealed against ought to be reversed so far as it allows the sum of 5352*l.* 4*s.* claimed for demurrage, with interest thereon and costs. Mr. Champeaux stated in his affidavit of the 9th Jan. 1888 that the portage bill of the steamship Saghalien, whilst lying at Hong Kong during the time she was being repaired, amounted to from 95*l.* to 100*l.* a day, and that it could not have been reduced. There seems, however, to be some mistake in that statement, unless the portage bill, the items of which are not before their Lordships, included the 53,000 dollars claimed and allowed for the repairs of the vessel. Their Lordships are of opinion that the amount claimed and allowed for demurrage, so far as it includes any damage on account of the loss of the use of the Saghalien, ought to be disallowed. They cannot, however, say that the company may not have incurred some expenses in respect of the Saghalien, such, for instance, as the lodging, maintenance, and wages of the crew, and, it may be, other expenses incurred during the period of her detention which would not have been incurred if she had not been detained. These may have been included in No. 50, the item claimed for demurrage, and, if so, their Lordships think that the plaintiffs are entitled to recover them under that item. (See The Inflexible, Swabey's Admiralty Reports, p. 204.) It would be very inconvenient, and would be attended with considerable expense to the parties to send this case back to the registrar at Hong Kong. The head office of the company is in France, and they will doubtless be able to supply the necessary information and affidavits as to the items of the portage bill, and as to the nature and extent of the necessary and reasonable expenses, if any, incurred at Hong Kong with reference to the Saghalien during her detention there. Their Lordships are not prepared to make any report to Her Majesty before it shall have been ascertained whether any and what expenses of the nature above indicated were incurred by the company. They therefore refer it to the Registrar of Her Majesty in Ecclesiastical and Maritime Appeals, to ascertain and report whether, having regard to the above remarks, any and what expenses were properly incurred by the company with reference to the steamship Saghalien during her detention at Hong Kong between the 29th Nov. 1886 and the 25th Jan. 1887, in addition to the several items included in the claim made by the company at Hong Kong exclusive of that for demurrage in No. 50, and if the registrar find that any such expenses were necessarily and properly incurred, then to report the amount and the several items thereof. All further questions, including the question of costs, are reserved. The plaintiffs must bring in their claims in writing before the Registrar of Her Majesty in Ecclesiastical and Maritime Appeals within the space of one month from the 14th Dec. 1889, or within such further time as the said registrar may allow.

The Registrar of Her Majesty in Ecclesiastical and Maritime Appeals having investigated the plaintiff's claim upon the direction given in the above judgment, found that 2043*l.* 2*s.* 2*d.* was due to the plaintiffs.

July 12.—The defendants moved to disallow the sum of 2043*l.* 2*s.* 2*d.* or any other sum.

Judgment was delivered by Sir BARNES PEACOCK.—Upon the hearing of this appeal their Lordships declared their opinion that the decree or order appealed against ought to be reversed, so far as it allowed the sum of 5352*l.* 4*s.* claimed for demurrage, with interest thereon and costs, but they added that they could not say that the company might not have incurred some expense in respect of the Saghalien, such, for instance, as lodging, maintenance, and wages of the crew, and, it might be, other expenses incurred during the period of her detention, which would not have been incurred if she had not been detained, and their Lordships referred it to the Registrar of Her Majesty in Ecclesiastical and Maritime Appeals to ascertain and report to this board in respect of those matters. Their Lordships having considered the report of the registrar, and the evidence adduced before him, are of opinion that the whole of the sum claimed for demurrage ought to be disallowed, and that the respondents have not shown that they are entitled to any sum in substitution thereof. Under these circumstances their Lordships will humbly advise Her Majesty that the decree or order appealed against ought to be reversed, so far as it allows the sum of 5352*l.* 4*s.*

claimed for demurrage, with interest thereon and costs, and that in other respects it ought to be affirmed. The respondents must pay the costs of this appeal, including the costs of the reference to the registrar, and of the motion to this board consequent upon his report.

COURT OF APPEAL.

Tuesday, July 22, 1890.

(Before Lord ESHER, M.R., LINDLEY and BOWEN, L.JJ.)

THE RUBY. (a)

Collision—Compulsory pilotage—Counter-claim—Costs—6 & 7 Vict. c. lxxxviii., s. 158—21 & 22 Vict. c. lxxii. — Llanelly Harbour and Burry Navigation Bye-laws, arts. 1, 2 — Merchant Shipping Act 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104), s. 353.

Pilotage is compulsory in the harbour of Llanelly by virtue of 6 & 7 Vict. c. lxxxviii. and 21 & 22 Vict. c. lxxii., and the bye-laws made thereunder.

It is competent for a harbour authority, which has power to make bye-laws regulating the navigation of their harbour and to appoint pilots, to make pilotage compulsory by means of such bye-laws, and to impose penalties for disobedience to them.

Per Butt, J.: In a collision action, where the defendants' vessel, although solely to blame on the merits, is relieved from liability on the ground of compulsory pilotage, a counter-claim will be dismissed with costs.

THIS was a collision action in rem by the owners of the steamship Cambrian against the owners of the steamship Ruby. The defendants counter-claimed.

The collision occurred on the 16th Feb. 1890 in the Burry river, in the harbour of Llanelly.

Both ships were British steamships bound to Llanelly laden with cargo. The Cambrian had come from Barrow and the Ruby from Ardrossan.

The defendants (inter alia) pleaded the defence of compulsory pilotage. The court found that the Ruby was at the time in charge of a duly licensed pilot for the harbour of Llanelly, and that the collision was solely occasioned by his default. The argument as to whether pilotage was compulsory was adjourned till

June 10.—The following Acts of Parliament are material to the decision:

The Merchant Shipping Act 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104):

Sect. 353. Subject to any alteration to be made by any pilotage authority in pursuance of the power hereinbefore in that behalf given, the employment of pilots shall continue to be compulsory in all districts in which the same was by law compulsory immediately before the time when this Act comes into operation; and all exemptions from compulsory pilotage then existing within such districts shall also continue in force.

(a) Reported by J. P. ASPINALL and BUTLER ASPINALL, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

6 Geo. 4, c. 125:

Sect. 59. Provided always, and be it enacted, that for and notwithstanding anything in this Act contained the master of any . . . ship or vessel employed in the regular coasting trade of the kingdom . . . shall and may lawfully, and without being subject to any of the penalties by this Act imposed, conduct or pilot his own ship or vessel when and so long as he shall conduct or pilot the same without the aid or assistance of any unlicensed pilot or other persons or person than the ordinary crew of the ship or vessel.

Sect. 89. And be it further enacted, that nothing in this Act contained shall extend or be construed to extend to . . . alter or repeal any provisions contained in any Act of Acts of Parliament relating to the pilots of any ports or districts in relation to which particular provision shall have been made in any Act or Acts of Parliament as to the pilots or pilotage, or to the pilotage within the limits prescribed by any Act or Acts of Parliament relating so pilotage for such ports, or to the burthen of vessels navigating to or from such ports.

6 & 7 Vict. c. lxxxviii. Preamble:

Whereas by an Act of Parliament passed in the fifty-third year of the reign of his late Majesty King George the Third, intituled an Act for the improvement of the navigation of the rivers Burry, Longhor, and Lliedi, in the counties of Carmarthen and Glamorgan, powers were given to the commissioners thereby appointed, and their successors, to improve, deepen, widen, and maintain the navigation of the said rivers Burry, Longhor, and Lliedi, and of each and every of the said rivers within certain limits prescribed in the said Act, and whereas it is expedient to alter and amend the said Act in several respects, and to extend and enlarge the powers thereby vested in the said commissioners . . .

Sect. 158. And be it enacted that it shall be lawful for the commissioners from time to time to make such bye-laws as they shall think fit for all or any of the following purposes (that is to say); for regulating the entrance and departure of vessels resorting to the said harbour (Llanelli), and rivers, and the pilotage, good behaviour, and conduct of seamen, pilots, hobblers, watermen, and others, and the payment and reward to be made or given to them, and the mooring time and accommodation of such vessels.

Burry Navigation and Llanelly Harbour Act 1858 (21 & 22 Vict. c. lxxii.):

Sect. 3. The said Acts passed (the one in the fifty-third year of the reign of his late Majesty King George the Third, chapter one hundred and eighty-three, and the other in the session holden in the sixth and seventh years of the reign of Her present Majesty, chapter eighty-eight), shall, with the exception of the sections of the said Acts which are contained in the schedule hereto, be repealed, and the sections so remaining unrepealed shall be deemed to be part of this Act, and shall have the same operation and effect as they would have had in case this Act had not been passed.

Sect. 12. Notwithstanding such repeal all bye-laws, rules, and regulations made under the recited Acts, or any of them, and in force at the time of the passing of this Act, shall remain in force during the period six of calendar months next after the passing of this Act unless the same shall previously be altered by the commissioners; and all offenders against those bye-laws during the period aforesaid shall be liable to the like pains and penalties as if this Act had not been passed.

Sect. 158 of 6 & 7 Vict. c. lxxxviii. is contained in the schedule to the above Act, and is unrepealed by virtue of sect. 3.

Llanelly Harbour and Burry Navigation Bye-laws 1844:

Art. 1. All vessels registering 30 tons and upwards passing over the bar of Burry either inwards or outwards, and all vessels with cargoes though under that tonnage inwards, shall heave to and receive on board the first licensed pilot who shall offer, and the master of any vessel refusing or neglecting to do so shall pay the pilotage as though such pilot had been taken on board, and be subject to a penalty not exceeding 5*l.*

Art. 2. Masters of vessels shall employ a licensed pilot, if one shall offer, in transporting their ships within the port, for which they shall pay according to the rates hereinafter specified.

Bye-laws were made in 1814, under the powers of 53 Geo. 3, c. lxxxiii., and continued to be made from time to time under the subsequent Acts of Parliament. At the time of the collision in question there were bye-laws in force to the like effect as those set out hereinbefore.

Sir Walter Phillimore (with him J. P. Aspinall) for the defendants.—Pilotage is compulsory in Llanelly Harbour. Power was given to the commissioners by sect. 158 of 6 & 7 Vict. c. lxxxviii. to make bye-laws, and the language of that section is sufficiently wide to justify them in imposing compulsory pilotage on vessels using their port. Similar bye-laws have been in force since 1814, and until the present time no one has ever questioned the right of the commissioners to enact that pilotage shall be compulsory. [He was stopped by the Court.]

Barnes, Q.C. (with him Raikes), for the plaintiffs, contrà.—Pilotage is not compulsory. If the bye-laws purport to make pilotage compulsory, they are ultra vires. The Legislature never intended to give the commissioners such wide powers as to allow them to say whether pilotage should be compulsory or not. Had it so intended, it would have done so in express terms. It is also submitted that the language of the bye-laws does not make pilotage compulsory. It is also submitted that this vessel was "employed in the regular coasting trade of the kingdom" within the meaning of 6 Geo. 4, c. 125, s. 59, and if so is exempt from compulsory pilotage, by virtue of sect. 353 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854.

Sir Walter Phillimore in reply.—The exemptions in 6 Geo. 4, c. 125, s. 59, have no application to this case. That Act is limited in its application to the places therein named. [Butt, J.—I need not trouble you further on that point.]

Butt, J.—I have no doubt in my own mind that pilotage was compulsory on vessels trading to the port of Llanelly in the year 1854, and if so, by the terms of sect. 353 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, pilotage continued to be compulsory. It appears that the harbour authorities have from time to time made bye-laws which, if they have any operation at all, make pilotage compulsory. I can see no ground upon which it can be said that this vessel was not obliged to take a pilot. It is not necessary for me to go through the lengthy preamble and sections of 6 & 7 Vict. c. lxxxviii. and the bye-laws which have been brought before my notice. The Merchant Shipping Act was passed at a time when, as a matter of fact—although as a matter of law the plaintiffs in this case are now questioning it—pilotage was compulsory. What I mean is, that vessels were in fact taking pilots as if they were compelled to do so. I am of opinion that pilotage was compulsory on the Ruby. I accordingly dismiss the suit without costs.

A question then arose as to how the costs of the counter-claim were to be treated. The learned judge stated that before deciding the point he proposed to inquire of the registrar if there were any precedents on the point.

June 11.—Butt, J.—As regards the costs of the counter-claim, the registrar has supplied me with two precedents, viz. The Cambria (1887, Fo. 76) and The Capella (1887, Fo. 369), in which, under similar circumstances, the counter-claim was dismissed with costs. I therefore order the defendants to pay the costs incidental to the counter-claim.

From this decision the plaintiffs appealed.

July 22.—Barnes, Q.C. and F. W. Raikes, for the appellants, argued as in the court below, and also contended that by the terms of the bye-law the master was only bound to receive the pilot on board and avail himself of his advice, but was not bound to give charge of the ship to him:

The Guy Mannering, 46 L. T. Rep. N. S. 905; 7 P. Div. 132; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 553.

Sir Walter Phillimore and J. P. Aspinall, for the respondents, were not called upon.

Lord Esher, M.R.—In this case the question is, whether a ship on entering this harbour is bound to take a pilot on board, and whether, having done so, her master is bound to give up to him the navigation of the ship. In other words, the question is, whether pilotage is compulsory. Why is such an obligation put upon shipowners? It is for the safety of navigation. It is not for the benefit of particular shipowners, but it is for the protection of the general body of shipowners, and for the protection of navigation for commercial purposes. The entrances to this kingdom are often by narrow channels in which are shoals and rocks. Moreover, the very channel itself is sometimes shifting. If, therefore, a vessel is sunk, it is an impediment to the navigation of ships to which this country owes a large part of its commercial prosperity. If channels are blocked by wrecks they are useless, and it is to prevent such consequences that compulsory pilotage is enacted. The framers of this law were not concerned with collisions between ships. The consequences of this law as to the liability of owners arises under a wholly distinct head of law. The non-liability of owners is a legal consequence of compulsory pilotage, but is not part of the legislation prescribing compulsory pilotage.

We have to decide in this case whether the pilots taking ships in and out of the port of Llanelly are compulsory pilots. It is a small port, and not so well known to the Legislature as others. The method of legislation adopted by the Legislature with regard to small ports, is to give power to the local authorities to do that which in the great ports of the kingdom is done by the Legislature itself. It is to give power to the local commissioners to make bye-laws which would have the same effect as direct legislation has in the case of larger ports. What was the purpose of the legislation? You can gather it from the preamble of the local Act of 1813; it was that pilotage should be regulated and the entry to the port made safe. Whatever bye-laws the Legislature empowers the commissioners to make, the moment they are made they have the force of an Act of Parliament. Now, by sect. 158 of the Act of 1843, which continues the former Act, the commissioners are empowered to make bye-laws for governing and regulating the navigation of the river Burry and two others. They are to establish pilotage. That is one of the purposes for which the first Act according to its preamble was passed. When you are authorised to make bye-laws to govern navigation, it seems to me that it means that you are to control and direct the navigation, and say how the river is to be navigated. How are rivers navigated? They are navigated by ships and vessels; therefore, you have got to regulate the navigation of ships and vessels. What would at once suggest itself to one? Here is a river in which it is for the advantage of everyone that the navigation of it by ships and vessels should be made safe. It is requisite that ships should be steered safely in and out of the harbour. What is the best way of effecting that object? This is a comparatively small and unknown port. Who would navigate a ship there most safely? Why a pilot who is there every day. Therefore, the most natural way of rendering the navigation of the river safe is to require ships to be piloted by pilots who know all the local peculiarities of the river and harbour. How can you enforce that? By a bye-law; and you have power to enforce it by imposing a penalty for disobedience to the bye-law. That is within the Act of Parliament. I have no doubt that that power is given by the words of sect. 158. I understand that the commissioners have made such a bye-law since 1814, and have gone on doing so ever since, which is a strong argument to show what is the opinion of everyone connected with this place as to the power given. Further, the fact of the making of these bye-laws seems to have been recognised by Act of Parliament, and acquiesced in by everyone for seventy years. If a pilot must be taken on board, it follows that he is to have charge of the ship. For these reasons I therefore think that the appeal ought to be dismissed with costs.

Lindley, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The question really turns, when it is understood, upon the true construction of sect. 158 of the Act of 1843, which is kept alive by the Act of 1858. In order to understand sect. 158 of the Act of 1843, you must look a little further into the matter. The key to the question appears to me to be found in the preamble and sect. 17 of the Act of 1813. In addition to sect. 158 of the Act of 1843, there are a series of bye-laws which have been in force ever since 1814, and those which were in force in 1844 were recognised by the Legislature in the Act of 1858. When one bears all this in mind it appears to me to be impossible to say that the particular bye-law which governs this case is ultra vires, illegal, or unreasonable. That brings us to the construction of the bye-law itself. As to that, I have not the least doubt that the construction put upon it by the Master of the Rolls is the only rational one. I am of opinion that pilotage is compulsory, and that this appeal should be dismissed with costs.

Bowen, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. We are asked to say that a bye-law which directs the employment of a pilot in the river Burry is ultra vires and not within the Act which directs that bye-laws may be made for governing the navigation of the river. It is clearly not ultra vires if it is made for the navigation of the river. How can we assume that the navigation of this river does not require the commissioners so to protect it? On the contrary, from the preamble of the first Act, from the language of the second Act, and from the existence of bye-laws to that effect for over seventy years which have been submitted to apparently without demur, it seems to me that the strong probability is that the navigation of this river requires to be protected in this way.

The Accomac. (a)

Carriage of goods—Charter-party—Excepted perils—Negligence.

A provision in a charter-party exempting the owners from liability for loss of or damage to cargo caused by the "act, neglect, or default of the master or crew in the navigation of the said vessel in the ordinary course of the voyage" does not relieve them from liability for damage to cargo caused by the joint negligence of one of their crew and shore engineers employed by them to repair the ship's engines, whereby water gets to the cargo when the ship is moored in dock at her port of destination and after part of her cargo has been discharged.

This was an appeal by the defendants in an action in personam for damage to cargo.

The plaintiffs were the owners of a cargo of rice shipped under charter at Rangoon on board the defendants' vessel the Accomac. On the vessel's arrival in London 3316 bags of the rice were delivered to the plaintiffs in a damaged condition.

By the terms of the charter-party it was provided (inter alia) that the shipowners should not be liable for any "act, neglect, or default whatsoever of pilots, master, or crew in the navigation of the ship in the ordinary course of the voyage."

After the Accomac had discharged part of her cargo in the Victoria Docks certain parts of the main engine and donkey pumps were taken ashore for repairs. To disconnect these parts it was necessary to take off a cock which closed one of the pipes. This pipe was connected with the ballast tanks. The cock was removed by the shore engineers employed to do the repairs, and on its removal the ship's engineer had given them orders to plug the pipe. This they never did, and the ship's engineer, thinking it had been done, opened the sea-valve for the purpose of running up the ballast tanks to keep the ship steady, and left it open during the night. After the tanks were filled the water found its way into the disconnected pipe, thence into the engine room, thence through the sluice valves into the hold, and so caused the damage complained of.

The further facts of the case appear in the report below (63 L. T. Rep. N. S. 118; 15 P. Div. 208; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 535).

Barnes, Q.C. and Joseph Walton, for the defendants, in support of the appeal.—The defendants are not liable. The negligence was in the navigation of the vessel in the ordinary course of the voyage. The ship's engineer in opening the sea-valve was doing an act connected with the management of the ship before the voyage was at an Hollams (with him Finlay, Q.C.), for the plaintiffs, contra.—The defendants are not entitled to the protection of the excepted peril. The negligence was not in the navigation of the ship in the ordinary course of the voyage. It was not an act in the navigation of the ship or in the ordinary course of the voyage. Moreover, it has been found as a fact that the damage was occasioned by the joint negligence of the ship's engineer and the shore engineer. The defendants have only contracted themselves out of liability for the negligence of their ship's engineer, not of their shore engineer. [He was stopped.]

Joseph Walton in reply.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—I have no doubt that in this case the voyage, i.e., the charter-party voyage, was not over, and that the ship might still be subject to many liabilities occurring during the charter-party voyage. But the question here is, what is the meaning of the exception within which the shipowner desires to bring what has happened. Assume that the charter-party voyage was not ended, nevertheless has he brought the case within the exception relied on? The exception is not any act, neglect, or default of the pilots, master, or crew during the voyage. That is not it. Supposing the act, neglect, or default to be during the voyage, that is not enough. They must be connected with a particular matter. What is that? It is the navigation of the ship. Now we must construe this document according to the meaning of ordinary sea language. Was the negligence in this case in the navigation of the ship? That there was negligence of a member of the crew which was partly the cause of the accident I do not doubt. I think the ship's engineer was negligent, as Butt, J. has found. I am equally certain that the shore engineers were also negligent. They were both negligent. Nevertheless, even assuming there to be only negligence on the part of the ship's engineer, I ask myself, was it negligence in the navigation of the ship? How can it be negligence in the navigation of the ship if it is not negligence in navigating the ship? Was the ship being navigated? Had she come to the end of her voyage, or rather of voyaging? The answer is, that she was no longer voyaging, sailing, or moving. She was finally moored to the quay. She was no longer intended to sail. If she had broken loose it may be that she would want navigating again; but as a matter of fact she was hard and fast to the quay, intentionally to so remain there until the cargo was out of her, and until her owners chose to move her again. Nothing happened to call for more navigation. In my opinion Lawrie v. Douglas (ubi sup.) does not touch the point raised in this case. I could decide this case upon the ground I have already stated, but I must say that the test suggested by Butt, J. is absolutely conclusive. What happened here was the result of two negligences, and it could not have happened unless both negligences had happened. In other words, there are two combining negligences which produce the mischief, viz., the negligence of a member of the crew, and the negligence of the servants of an independent tradesman who were repairing the engines. I cannot bring my mind to conceive that anybody would say that the servants of independent contractors were assisting in navigating the ship. That is conclusive to show that the cause of the accident was something which did not happen in the navigation of the ship. For these reasons I am of opinion that this case is not within the terms of the exception, and therefore I think that the appeal must be dismissed.

LINDLEY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. I do not think that anyone accustomed to the ordinary use of language can, without unduly straining it, hold that this damage to cargo occurred "in the navigation of the ship in the ordinary course of the voyage." If I understand the facts in Lawrie v. Douglas (ubi sup.), the ship broke away and was, in fact, never properly moored. That seems to me to be the explanation of that case. I think the appeal must be dismissed.

BOWEN, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. I will assume in favour of the shipowner that the mischief was caused by the negligence of the ship's engineer, and that it did not arise from joint acts of negligence. But giving him the benefit of that view, one question is, was the act which caused the mischief done during the charter-party voyage? Yes, perhaps. But that does not decide the matter. There is the further question, was it done in navigating the ship? Answer, no. The navigation of the ship was at an end. It seems to me that on this ground the appeal fails.

Appeal dismissed.

FIVE STEEL BARGES. (a)

Salvage— Towage — Supervening circumstances— Action in rem—Action in personam.

Where the owners of a tug contracted to tow a number of barges at sea for an agreed sum of money, it being part of the contract that, if the barges or any of them broke adrift during the towage, the tug-owners were nevertheless to be entitled to the sum, and in consequence of the severity of the weather the voyage was unduly protracted, the barges broke adrift on several occasions, and were picked up again, and men in charge of the barges were saved from possible loss of life, the Court awarded salvage on the ground that the services were beyond what was contemplated by the parties when entering into the towage contract.

An action in personam for salvage lies against the owners of salved property, although the salved property has been transferred to others before the institution of the suit.

The liability for salvage is not confined to those who have the absolute property in the thing saved, but extends to persons having a beneficial interest therein and subject to pecuniary loss if the property were not saved.

THIS was a salvage action by the owners of a steam-tug called the White Rose, against Messrs. Finch and Co., for alleged salvage services to five steel barges numbered 68, 69, 70, 71, and 72 respectively.

The action was in rem against Nos. 70, 71, and 72, and in personam against the defendants in respect of Nos. 68 and 69.

The facts alleged by the plaintiffs were as follows: On the 13th Jan. 1890 the plaintiffs contracted with the defendants' agent to tow the said barges from Chepstow to Portland for 85*l.*, it being a term of the contract that, if any of the said barges broke adrift and were lost, the plaintiffs were nevertheless to have the 85*l.* Accordingly on the 16th Jan. the White Rose took the said barges in tow, and left Chepstow, each barge being in charge of two men. Next day, in consequence of the weather, the tug and barges had to anchor under the shelter of Lundy Island. For this purpose the barges were cast off, and barge No. 68 was anchored, the others being attached to her. The tug and barges were then storm-stayed till the 27th, when those in charge of the White Rose thinking the weather had moderated sufficiently to proceed left Lundy with the barges for Portland. At a short distance from Lundy the heavy sea caused barge No. 72 to break adrift, and shortly afterwards Nos. 69, 70, and 71 also broke adrift. The White Rose then towed No. 68 back to Lundy, and having anchored her in safety returned for the other four, which with difficulty and danger she eventually secured and then brought them back to Lundy. That night the wind increased to such an extent that the men on the barges were taken off to the tug, In doing so the tug collided with the barges and sustained damage. Next morning, the wind having moderated, the men returned to the barges, and during the operation of getting hold of the barges the tug's boat capsized and three of the barges' men were drowned, and the remainder saved by the plaintiffs. Towing was then recommenced, but shortly afterwards barges Nos. 70, 71, and 72 again broke adrift in consequence of the severity of the weather; and the tug at considerable risk took the two men off barge No. 70, which was drifting rapidly away. The steam-tug Dunrobin, which was in the vicinity, then took hold of barges Nos. 70, 71, and 72, and towed them to Cardiff, and the White Rose towed barges Nos. 68 and 69 to Portland, where they arrived on the 30th Jan.

The defendants by their defence, after alleging that the weather and danger were greatly exaggerated, and that if any danger existed it was solely occasioned by the negligence of the plaintiffs, also pleaded that the services were within the scope of the towage contract, and were not salvage, and that, assuming the plaintiffs were entitled to salvage, they had lost it as against barges 68 and 69 by giving up possession of them without preserving their lien or obtaining bail.

It appeared that the defendants were sending the said barges to Portland to deliver the same to the Government in pursuance of a contract they had with the Government to build and deliver five barges. After the barges had been brought into port, and before the institution of the suit, the plaintiffs allowed the Government to take possession of barges No. 68 and 69, at Portland.

Barnes, Q.C. and Pyke for the plaintiffs.—The plaintiffs are entitled to salvage. The circumstances of the salvage were outside the towage contract, and were different from those contemplated by the parties:

The Annapolis, Lush. 355;
The Westbourne, 61 L. T. Rep. N. S. 156; 14 P. Div. 132; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 405;
The Minnehaha, 4 L. T. Rep. N. S. 811; Lush. 335.

The plaintiffs have a right in personam against the defendants in respect of the barges delivered to the Government. The defendants had an interest in those barges, and were benefited by the plaintiffs' services.

Bucknill, Q.C. and Raikes for the defendants.—The services were not outside the towage contract, and therefore the plaintiffs are not entitled to recover salvage. The circumstances of the towage as originally contemplated were of an unusual character, and no such facts have been proved as to justify the court in saying that more than towage services have been rendered:

The Neptune, 1 Wm. Rob. 297;
The Kingalock, 1 Spinks, 263;
The Robert Dixon, 42 L. T. Rep. N. N. S. 344; 5 P. Div. 54; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 246.

Technically the plaintiffs have no right to sue in rem and in personam in the same action as they are doing here. The defendants had no property or interest in the barges delivered to the Government, and therefore the plaintiffs conferred no benefit on the defendants by their alleged services:

Ex parte Lambton, 32 L. T. Rep. N. S. 380; L. Rep. 10 Ch. App. 405; Woods v. Russell, 5 B. & A. 942.

Moreover, even if the property was in the defendants at the time of the services, no action in personam lies against them for salvage after the salved property has been transferred to others.

Barnes, Q.C. in reply.

Sir JAMES HANNEN.—The first question in this case is, whether or not as a matter of fact the services which were rendered by the tug were of such a character and were rendered under such circumstances as to take them out of the towage contract. From the examination I have given to the decisions in point, it appears to me that it is not necessary, in order to become entitled to salvage, that the supervening dangers should be of such a character as to actually put an end to the towage contract. It is sufficient if the services rendered are beyond what can be reasonably supposed to have been contemplated by the parties entering into such a contract. It depends on the circumstances of each case whether or not the services are advanced in this way to a higher degree so as to establish a right to salvage. I have very carefully considered this matter with the Trinity Brethren, and we have come to the conclusion that in some particulars salvage services have been rendered. The character of the contract is of course to be looked at, and the circumstances to which it related, before we arrive at the point from which we have to start in estimating the value of the higher class of services. This was a towage of a very peculiar character, which those who undertook it must have known would be a difficult operation at that time of the year, towing as they would through a very exposed and dangerous tract of the sea. They must be assumed to have taken all that into their consideration when they made the bargain to do this peculiar work for 85*l*. They must also have taken into consideration that they were liable to delays, although they could not have contemplated so long a delay as was necessarily incurred in consequence of the extreme violence of the weather. But undoubtedly there did supervene some additional operations which had to be performed which I think cannot be considered as within the towage contract. I have dealt with the delay. No doubt it was somewhat longer than could be expected, but I do not attach great importance to the delay.

Then arises the question whether the tug was justified in going to Lundy. It has been said that that was wrong. I am advised that it was not an improper thing to do. There may possibly be a difference of opinion as to whether it would have been better to go to some other place; but at the utmost that can only be put as an error of judgment, if indeed it was that. I am, however, very strongly advised that it was highly injudicious to put to sea from the shelter of Lundy when they did. After the stormy weather which had prevailed for so long a time any nautical man ought to have known that in such circumstances to tow a string of barges was to expose them to serious danger, as the result proved, for they began to break adrift as soon as they got outside the shelter of Lundy. Therefore, in estimating the value of the plaintiffs' service I do not take into account the return to Lundy. But one of the barges—No. 71—was found by a steamer, which rendered it necessary that the tug should go to its assistance, and extricate it from the position of danger it was in; and at the same time, barge No. 72 was taken to a position of greater safety. That I am of opinion was a salvage service, arising as it did from necessity outside the contract. We are also of opinion that there was life salvage, in taking the men out of the sea after the boat had been upset by the tightening of the hawser. It seems to me to be perfectly clear that that was an accident for which no blame is imputable to the tug. The rising and falling of the sea would naturally cause a loosening and tautening of the rope; and unfortunately the boat got across the rope at a time when it was slack. The tug saved the lives of two men, and for that I think there should be an award, if there is property saved to which life salvage can attach. Then certain men were taken off one of the barges which went adrift. I think there can be no doubt that at the time those men were taken off everyone believed they were in danger; and though it was possible, and afterwards was the fact, that these men would have been saved by the barge being picked up by the steamer, yet I think there was some salvage service rendered to those men. Having regard to the circumstances which existed at the time, it was not certain that the barge would be picked up, and therefore I think there was life salvage in that respect. I therefore come to the conclusion that a sum is to be awarded as salvage for the extraordinary exertions which became necessary over and above those which were reasonably contemplated as within the towage contract.

But then it is argued that the plaintiffs are not entitled to recover, because, as against Nos. 68 and 69, they are not asserting their right as having a maritime lien, but have instituted their action in personam. The reason for doing this is because these barges are now in the possession of the Government, for whom they were made by the defendants. Those remarks do not apply to the other three barges, as to which a lien was asserted before they were given up to the Government. As to the two which have been given up to the Government, I think it is perfectly clear on the authorities that an action in personam lies against the owners of a vessel which has been saved, even though the property has been transferred to others and the lien lost. In this case, however, the property does not appear to have been in the defendants, because it would, I think, under the contract to which reference has been made, be in the Government. But on this point I am of opinion that the right to sue in personam is not confined to the case of the defendant being the actual legal owner of the property saved. I think it exists in cases where the defendant has an interest in the property saved, which interest has been saved by the fact that the property is brought into a position of security. The jurisdiction which the court exercises in salvage cases is of a peculiarly equitable character. The right to salvage may arise out of an actual contract, but it does not necessarily do so. It is a presumption of law arising out of the fact that property has been saved, that the owner of the property, who has had the benefit of it, should make remuneration to those who have conferred the benefit upon him, notwithstanding that he has entered into no contract on the subject. I think that proposition equally applies to the man who has had a benefit arising out of the saving of the property. In this case the defendants were under contract with the Government to supply them with barges at a certain price. Payment was to be made by certain instalments, of which only one remained unpaid at the time of these services. I think, if Mr. Barnes' argument is well founded, viz., that these instalments were all paid on condition that the barges should be delivered within twelve months of the date of the contract, it would follow that, if the defendants had not been in a position to deliver the barges within the twelve months, then either they would have been liable in damages for not performing the contract, or liable to make restitution of the instalments which had been paid them on conditions not fulfilled by them. It appears to me, therefore, that they substantially had an interest to the full amount of the barges at the time of the services, and that the same moral obligation to which the law has given force in the case of an owner applies to those who have an interest in the property. That is certainly the business-like view of the matter; and I do not forget that the defendants insured themselves to the full value of these barges and described themselves as being the owners. In conclusion I award 200*l.* as salvage independently of the towage contract.

THE KONG MAGNUS. (a)

Collision—Institution of action—Delay—Maritime lien—Laches—Change of interest—Statute of Limitations.

In a collision action in rem the plaintiffs are not limited to any specified time during which they must institute their action, but where there has been a long lapse of time between the collision and the institution of the action, and the defendants seek to have the action dismissed on the ground of laches and delay, the question for the court in each case is whether it is inequitable to allow the action to proceed, and in determining this question the court will consider the opportunities the plaintiffs have had of arresting the defendants' ship, the availability of the defendants' witnesses, and all other circumstances affecting the possibility of securing a fair trial, and should the action be allowed to proceed every reasonable presumption will be made at the hearing in favour of the defendants.

A collision having occurred between the British ship M. and the Norwegian steamship K. M. in 1878, the owners of the M. in 1889 instituted the present action in rem. The K. M. was owned by a limited company in which there had been changes of interest since the collision. Between the dates of the collision and action the K. M. had been thirty-five times in English ports, and twelve times in Scotch ports. Some of the crew of the K. M. were not available to give evidence. The defendants asked the court to refuse to entertain the action on the ground of laches and delay in its institution.

Held, that, although the plaintiffs had had several opportunities of arresting the K. M., the circumstances were not such as to make it inequitable for the action to proceed, but that in trying the case the court would make every reasonable presumption in favour of the defendants.

THIS was a collision action in rem instituted by the owners of the British brigantine Mizpah against the owners of the Norwegian steamship Kong Magnus.

The collision occurred on the 19th April 1878, in the North Sea during a fog,

The action was commenced on the 8th Jan. 1889.

The defendants in their defence, after denying the acts of negligence alleged in the statement of claim against the Kong Magnus, said as follows:—

3. The Kong Magnus is a steamship of 418 tons, belonging to the port of Christiania, and at the time of the collision in question the said steamship was and still is owned by the Det Sondenfjelds-Norske Dampskibsselshab, which is a company incorporated under the Norwegian law, carrying on business at Christiania, in the kingdom of Norway. The Mizpah was a British ship, and the plaintiffs, the owners of the Mizpah, carry on business at Portmadoc in the county of Carnarvon.

4. The collision in respect of which this action is brought took place on the 19th April 1878, whilst the Kong Magnus was bound on a voyage from Christiania to Havre with a general cargo. The master and crew of the Mizpah were taken on board the Kong Magnus after the collision, and were landed from the said ship at Havre on the 21st April 1878.

5. The Kong Magnus discharged her cargo at Havre, and from the said month of April 1878 up to the date of the issue of the writ in this action the said ship has been running on short voyages, and during the last nine years she has repeatedly loaded and discharged cargoes at various ports in the United Kingdom within the jurisdiction of this honourable court.

6. The plaintiffs have always known the name and place of business of the owners of the Kong Magnus, and have always had knowledge and notice of the movements and voyages of the said ship, and since the said 21st April 1878 the plaintiffs have been in a position to prosecute their rights (if any) against the defendants in respect of the said collision, and to pursue their remedy in respect of the same either against the owners of the Kong Magnus or against the ship in rem by process of this honourable court, or of other courts of competent jurisdiction. Yet the plaintiffs until the institution of this action have neglected to do so, and have wilfully stood by and made no claim, and given no notice to the defendants of their intention to make any claim against the said ship in respect thereof or at all.

7. By reason of the laches and neglect and delay of the plaintiffs as aforesaid, the defendants have been induced to believe that no claim would be made against them by the plaintiffs for the said collision, and in consequence thereof the defendants are not now in the position to obtain and produce proper and sufficient evidence to establish their defence to this action which, but for such laches, delay, and neglect as aforesaid, they would have been in a position to obtain and produce and to have established, and witnesses who would have been and were available for the Kong Magnus are dispersed, and have been lost sight of by the defendants and are possibly dead, and the defendants cannot get their evidence, and are further and otherwise hampered and prejudiced in their defence.

8. Since the date of the said collision important changes of interest in the ownership of the Kong Magnus have taken place, and the rights of third parties have intervened.

9. By reason of the premises it is unjust and inequitable that the plaintiffs should be allowed to continue this action, and that the defendants should be put to trial upon the facts, and the defendants submit that the plaintiffs' claim is barred, and that their rights (if any) against the defendants are forfeited.

By order of the court the issue of whether the plaintiffs were in the circumstances entitled to prosecute their action was ordered to be tried before the merits of the collision were investigated.

At the trial of this issue it appeared that in 1881 there had been a new issue of shares in the company owning the Kong Magnus, and that the shares in the company were constantly changing. At the time of the collision the Kong Magnus was running regular voyages between Christiania and Havre, which voyages were duly advertised in the newspapers. She continued to be so employed (except during the winter months) till 1880, when she made one voyage from Christiania to Newcastle and back. She then returned to her old line till 1882, when her place was taken by a new steamer, and she was employed as an ordinary cargo ship. From that time till the institution of this action she had been thirty-five times in English ports, and twelve times in Scotch ports. Evidence was given to show that her sailings were advertised in the Shipping Gazette, and that information as to her whereabouts could be obtained at Lloyd's.

The plaintiffs had instructed their solicitors in 1878, immediately after the collision, but according to their evidence, although they had made all reasonable inquiry, they never had an opportunity of arresting the Kong Magnus.

Three seamen, part of the crew of the Kong Magnus, who were on her at the time of the collision, were still in the employ of the defendants. The master was in business at Christiania, and the defendants had a statement from the engineer. Immediately after the collision a protest was noted by the defendants at Havre, and subsequently extended.

Cohen, Q.C. and F. Laing for the defendants.—The maritime lien has been destroyed by lapse of time. The rights of third parties have intervened, and will be prejudiced if this action is allowed to go on. There has been since the collision a new issue of capital, and a change of ownership in the shares:

The Bold Buccleugh, 3 W. Rob. 229; 7 Moo. P. C. C. 267;
The Charles Amelia, L. Rep. 2 Ad. & Ec. 330; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 203;
The Europe, Br. & L. 89;
The Juliana, Swab. 20;
The Mellona, 3 W. Rob. 10;
Abbot on Shipping, 12th edit. 601;
Parsons Law of Shipping, vol. 2, p. 361.

The plaintiffs have been guilty of laches, forfeiting their lien in delaying the action for so long. It would be inequitable that the defendants should be now called upon to meet a claim twelve years old. Their evidence is lost, and they are not now in a position to do justice to their case. Therefore, either by analogy to the Statute of Limitations, or by laches under the rule adopted by the courts of equity, the plaintiffs' claim is barred. Equity does not entertain stale claims, and sets its face against laches:

Greenfell v. Girdlestone, 2 Yo. & Coll. Ex. 679;
Pearson v. Belchier, 4 Vesey, 627;
Spackman v. Evans, L. Rep. 3 E. & I. App. 171;
Story's Equity Jurisprudence, ss. 64a, 529;
Lewin on Trusts, 7th edit., 742.

The court ought by analogy to apply the Statute of Limitations. The principle is as much applicable to an action in rem as in personam:

The Rebecca, 5 Ch. Rob. 102;
Gregory v. Hurrill, 5 B. & C. 341;
21 Jac. 1, c. 16, s. 3;
4 & 5 Anne, c. 16, s. 9;
19 & 20 Vict. c. 97, s. 12.

Sir Walter Phillimore, and Dr. Raikes, for the plaintiffs, contrà.—The plaintiffs have been guilty of no laches. They used all reasonable diligence. Pure delay only avails where it prejudices a fair trial, which is not the case here:

Thomson v. Eastwood, 2 App. Cas. 214.

There has been no change of ownership, and the rights of third parties are not affected:

The Bold Buccleugh (ubi sup.);
The Europa (ubi sup.);
The Sarah Ann, 2 Sumner, 206, 212;
Willard v. Dorr, 3 Mason, 91, 161.

The court will not stop the prosecution of a claim except under very exceptional circumstances. There is nothing in the present case which makes it inequitable that the action should proceed. The plaintiffs would be quite willing that the defendants' documents made at the time, or shortly after the collision, should be used as evidence for the defendants.

Sir JAMES HANNEN.—I have had an opportunity during the adjournment of this case of considering the authorities which have been referred to, and if I thought it necessary to go in detail through all those authorities I should not give my judgment now. But, having considered the cases referred to, and coming to the conclusion that there are certain guiding principles by which I ought to be governed, I propose to state shortly the conclusion I have arrived at. In the first place, it is admitted that there is no Statute of Limitations applicable to a case of this kind. But it is argued that I should adopt the analogy of the Statute of Limitations, and further, even if I do not adopt the fixed periods mentioned in the Statute of Limitations, that I should refuse to entertain this suit on the ground of laches on the part of those prosecuting it. Now I do not find in any of the authorities referred to that any court has ever fixed upon any period limited by the Statute of Limitations as applicable to suits of this kind. There are phrases about it which have been used by particular judges, but there is no case in which any particular period of time has ever been fixed upon. It is said that reference has been made by learned judges to laches which in some circumstances would be a bar to the claim; but there are no decisions which enable me to fix upon any particular period of time. I come to the conclusion that the principle which should guide my decision is this: that in each case it is necessary to look to the particular circumstances of the case to see whether or not it would be inequitable after a period of time—which of course has to be taken into account—and the various circumstances which may have occurred, for example, amongst others loss of time, loss of evidence, and change of property, whether it would be inequitable in the circumstances to entertain the suit. If the vessel had never been in this country or in the United Kingdom, it has not been contended that there would have been any necessity to come to this court, and I am of opinion that it cannot be asserted that there was any duty to go to Norway and prosecute the claim. It has been said that, though no claim was made abroad, it might have been advanced; but I think there was no obligation to do so, because it might have the effect of preventing the vessel being sent to this country. No doubt it was thought and expected that the vessel would come within the jurisdiction. The opportunity was waited for to enforce the lien if she should come. If she had never come here, there would therefore have been no ground for contending that there had been any laches. She did, however, come to this country on several occasions. I do not think it necessary to consider whether or not her coming into a Scotch port ought to be taken into account, because I think it is clear that there were several opportunities of having her arrested in English ports. Evidence has been given of a very great number of occasions on which she came into English ports. On very many of those occasions it would not have been possible to arrest her, because she had come and gone before the information could come to the knowledge of Messrs. Pritchard and Co., who were acting for the plaintiffs in this matter. But, as I have said, there were several opportunities which I think, had other steps been taken, they might have made use of to arrest her. I do not say that I think something more might not have been done. I think some one might have been employed to look through the list of arrivals and departures of vessels which Lloyd's list gives, and I should think that would have been done for a very small remuneration. There must be many clerks engaged in the offices of the Shipping Gazette, who must have the names of the various vessels coming and going under their eyes. Very little extra trouble and remuneration would have ensured, I should have imagined, more specific knowledge of this vessel than seems to have reached Messrs. Pritchard. But I think the observation which has been made in some of the cases is applicable here, viz., that there are very few cases in which after the event it is seen that something more might have been done than was done. It is quite certain, and I am satisfied of it, that there may have been a falling off in the exertions which were made to trace this vessel; that, in the first instance, there was considerable activity on the part of Messrs. Pritchard in their endeavours to find this vessel; but I suppose, as in the ordinary course of things where there has been a failure to find a vessel during several years, the means taken were not so active as they had been. But certainly I do not see that there is anything to show that there was any acquiescence in the immunity of the Kong Magnus, or any idea of abandoning the claim.

The result therefore of my judgment is this, that there are circumstances which would make it the duty of the court to consider whether or not it has become impossible to do justice in the case by reason of the delay which has occurred. As I have said, if the vessel had never been here no such question need have arisen at all. The vessel having come here, the question which arises for my consideration is whether I consider that it would be inequitable in the existing circumstances that the plaintiffs should be allowed to enforce their claim against this vessel. I come to the conclusion that there are no such circumstances. It has not been shown that the merits of the case cannot be gone into. Several of the crew are living, and may be forthcoming. It is to be remembered that the defendants would certainly have the benefit of every presumption which can fairly be made in their favour by reason of the absence of witnesses. Certainly, if the case is tried before me, I should approach it greatly influenced by the fact—if fact it should turn out to be—that there are witnesses who cannot now be found upon whose evidence it would appear probable that the case would materially turn. I do not doubt that that would be equally the case should the action be tried by my colleague. There is one other point before I deal with the suggestions which have been made as to the mode of trial, and that is as to the change of ownership. I am clearly of opinion that this is not a change of ownership, and if I were to endeavour to act upon the suggestion of Mr. Cohen, I should not know by what principle my decision should be guided. He has given some instances which he thinks show the injustice which would arise from not allowing changes in the ownership of shares to be taken into account. But the first share sold after a collision which gives rise to a claim must have a different value. It would be impossible to define any time at which it can be said that the change of ownership of shares is to be a bar to the right of the injured person to pursue his remedy. I do not think that Mr. Cohen has argued that the question of interest is inconsistent with Sir Walter Phillimore's argument. I will not stop to consider that now, but I think it right to say that I do not consider my decision now in any way whatever prejudices the argument which I presume will be addressed to the court which is to determine it that the interest should not be forthcoming during the period. I have only further to allude to the proposals which were made by Sir Walter Phillimore. I do not consider that I have any right to impose those conditions. Taking the view that the plaintiffs are not debarred by the existing circumstances from pursuing their remedy, I have no right to say that they shall submit to some variation of the law of evidence. But, as I have said, every reasonable presumption in favour of the defendants ought to be, and if the case is tried before me will be, made, and it will be expedient on the part of the plaintiffs to make such concessions as have been indicated by Sir Walter Phillimore, in order that the plaintiffs may by those means meet any prejudices which the court might entertain were such facilities withheld. I do not impose that as a condition. I have no right to impose the condition that something which would not in ordinary circumstances be admissible in evidence should be admitted. But I do not in the least discourage any arrangement of that kind in order to guard against prejudice. I therefore think that the case must be allowed to proceed, and I reserve the question of costs.

TREDEGAR IRON COMPANY v. OWNERS OF THE CALLIOPE.

THE CALLIOPE. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF APPEAL IN ENGLAND.

Damage — Wharf—Obstruction in bed of river—Negligence.

Although it may be the duty of wharfingers in a public river, alongside whose wharf vessels lie to load and discharge, to warn the masters of such vessels of any unusual or extraordinary obstruction likely to injure them when coming alongside or leaving, it is not their duty to give information as to the condition of the ground alongside the wharf which is produced in the ordinary way by the action of the tide and the user of it by vessels taking the ground.

The appellants were proprietors of a wharf on the river at N. There were two berths for vessels at the wharf, one alongside the wharf, and the other outside the first berth, near to mid-stream. When vessels were lying in these berths the action of the stream or tide caused a ridge of mud to accumulate between the two berths. There was evidence that the appellants were in the habit of scraping down at intervals the ridge so formed. By charter-party and bill of lading the respondents' ship was to deliver her cargo as directed by the consignees. The cargo was consigned to the appellants, and the ship was ordered by them to proceed to their wharf to discharge. In approaching the wharf she grounded on the ridge of mud above mentioned and sustained damage.

Held (reversing the judgment of the court below), that there was no breach of duty on the part of the appellants which could render them liable for the damage so caused.

The Moorcock (60 L. T. Rep. N. S. 654; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 373; 14 P. Div. 64) distinguished.

THIS was an appeal from a judgment of the Court of Appeal (Lord Esher, M.R., Cotton and Lindley, L.JJ.), reported in 61 L. T. Rep. N. S. 656; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 440; 14 P. Div. 138, who had reversed a judgment of Butt, J., reported in 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 359; 59 L. T. Rep. N. S. 901, in favour of the defendants, the present appellants.

The action was brought by the respondents, the owners of the steamship Calliope, in respect of damages sustained by the ship while attempting to come up to a berth at a wharf of the defendants, under circumstances which are fully set out in the judgments of their Lordships and in the reports of the case in the court below.

Finlay, Q.C., J. Walton, and A. Adams appeared for the appellants.

Barnes, Q.C., Robson, and Holman for the respondents.

At the conclusion of the arguments their Lordships gave judgment as follows:—

The LORD CHANCELLOR (Halsbury).—My Lords: I cannot help thinking that this case affords a somewhat important illustration of the necessity of calling upon litigants to place in some written form of pleading the precise cause of action upon which they rely, for I think that the time during which your Lordships have been occupied and the time which has been occupied in the courts below has to a considerable extent been the result of an oscillation in the minds of the advisers of the plaintiffs as to what was their cause of action. I cannot entertain a doubt, when I look at the form of the statement of claim as it originally stood, that the cause of action was originally founded upon the notion that this vessel was invited to a berth, in the strict and proper sense of that word, at which it was unfit for a vessel under any circumstances to lie, and that by reason of the inequality and unfitness of the berth the vessel being brought there was strained and injured. If that had been the complexion of the case, I certainly entertain no doubt that the law as laid down in the earlier cases and in the later case of The Moorcock (60 L. T. Rep. N. S. 654; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 373; 14 P. Div. 64) would have been applicable to that state of things. In this case the wharfinger, who happens to be the consignee, invites the vessel to a particular place to unload. If, as it is said, to his knowledge the place for unloading was improper and likely to injure the vessel, he certainly ought to have adopted one of these alternatives: either he ought not to have invited the vessel; or he ought to have informed the vessel what the condition of things was when she was invited, so that the injury might have been avoided. But, gradually as the case proceeded, it apparently occurred to the parties that this ground could not be maintained, and that the vessel if it had got there would have been perfectly well able to lie there in a fit and proper place for unloading, and no injury would have resulted; and then came an application to amend, to which the learned judge acceded. The amendment is of this character, that the persons who were in charge of the operation of bringing the vessel to the berth were guilty of negligence. Who those persons were I will say in a moment. The nature of the negligence alleged is this, that in the ordinary condition of things a vessel of that draught could not properly get to that berth at the particular time of the tide, and a Mr. Griffiths is alleged to have misled the pilot and the captain as to the safety with which that vessel might get there to lie there. Now, let us see what the meaning of this contention is, and upon what ground it is suggested that the wharfinger and consignee was guilty of the negligence imputed to him. He in the first instance, as he had a right to do, gave a direction that the vessel should come and unload at that wharf. If, under no circumstances and at no time, the vessel could have gone to that wharf—though in that case, as I think, a serious question would arise as to whether it is not for the captain or the pilot, as representing the shipowners, to make up his mind whether he can safely get to that place or not, and to make his election whether he will or will not attempt to do so with a view to safety—still, if under no circumstances the vessel could with safety have gone there, and if he had relied on that statement for the purpose of getting there, a different question would have arisen. But the facts do not raise that case, because, as I understand the facts relied upon, there is given in the letter the draught of water which under ordinary circumstances may be expected at the particular time, and at the same time as that direction is given the writer says, "But your pilot will tell you what to do." What is the meaning of such a phrase as that? What is the suggestion when the person to whom the direction is given is told to rely upon the pilot? What does a pilot do? What is a pilot's duty? It is impossible to doubt that, under ordinary circumstances, that would mean this: This is information which I give you for the purpose of forming your own judgment whether you can come there or not; that is to say, this is the height of water which may be expected at such and such a time, but you, the person in charge of the navigation of the vessel, the captain, or the pilot, must form your own judgment upon the matter, and you must not expect me to give you a warranty that that height of water will exist, but you, the captain or the pilot, must form your own judgment upon it and must act accordingly. Under the particular circumstances of this case it appears that the utmost amount of water which could possibly be expected at the top of the tide was 18ft. 9in., and that depended upon a comparison between the Bathurst Basin at Bristol and this Tredegar Wharf, between which there was said to be, under the ordinary condition of things, a difference of two feet in favour of the Tredegar Wharf. The vessel in question was drawing aft 18ft. 3in. and at the top of the tide; therefore, assuming everything to be normal in the condition of things with which the parties were dealing, there would be six inches to spare, and that was all. The facts appear to be that about a hour and a half before the top of the tide the vessel attempted to get in. I think it is idle to say that she was there for the purpose of attempting to get in at the top of the tide. It is manifest to me from the evidence that she attempted to get in long before the state of the tide would have justified her doing so, and it was as absolutely certain as any calculation could make it not only that she was likely to ground, but that she must ground if she attempted it. Then it is said that Mr. Griffiths encouraged the pilot and the captain to come in, and in fact the phrase is used that he "gave orders." I think in the course of the argument it has been sufficiently pointed out that the use of those words is inaccurate if understood in the sense that Mr. Barnes has relied on. That a foreman who is concerned with the regulation and management of the wharf, in a certain sense "gives orders" is true enough. He has a right to assume that the captain and the pilot who are navigating the vessel alongside the wharf will navigate her safely; but when it comes to a question of what particular position alongside the wharf or what berth the vessel is to occupy with reference to the loading and unloading of the goods the person on the wharf is the person to give directions at what particular part of the wharf, and how the vessel shall be moored; because with reference to the cranes and other machinery at the wharf for loading and unloading the vessel it may be important that the person in charge of the wharf should give such directions, and accordingly Mr. Griffiths appears to have given such directions. But is it contended for a moment that either the captain or the pilot would understand that Mr. Griffiths' position there was such that he was in a position to give orders to the captain or the pilot with reference to the approach of the vessel, or information as to the water she would draw? The absurdity of such a proposition is at once apparent when it is remembered that this question not only depends upon the absolute depth of the water either at the top of the tide or an hour and a half before it, but also has relation to the draught of the vessel, with which the captain and the pilot may be supposed to be perfectly familiar, but which would be totally unknown to Mr. Griffiths on the wharf. That words which appeared to resemble orders may have been used by Mr. Griffiths when once the difficulty had arisen and it was found that the vessel was incapable of reaching the wharf, is exceedingly likely. I should concur with Butt, J. in the opinion that, while each side perhaps has given a colour to the particular language used, it is extremely likely that Mr. Griffiths used words which, understood literally and without reference to the relations existing between Mr. Griffiths and the captain or the pilot, might in one sense be described as orders; but that he gave orders in the sense of a command in relation to the approach of the vessel to the side of the wharf, or that they so understood it or placed any reliance upon his words as being orders, I certainly do not believe. But we are not left without guidance upon the subject, because the captain and the pilot themselves give, to my mind, an absolutely overwhelming proof that they knew perfectly well that what they were doing was an operation attended with risk, for the pilot himself said that he would not undertake the risk because he knew that he might lose his certificate, and that if it was done it must be done upon the responsibility of the captain. Now, what does that disclose? In the first place, it discloses an absolute intention not to rely upon any "orders" supposed to have been given to them; and in the second place, it also shows that they knew that the operation was one which was attended with danger. That brings me to the next point, what was the danger? The danger was a danger which has in fact been recognised by the pilot in the very first part of his evidence. He knew there were these inequalities in the bed of the river, inequalities owing to the nature of the river, to the nature of the soil of the bed of the river, and incident to the ordinary user of the bed of the river. Under those circumstances it is suggested that there was some duty, before any vessel came in, that this particular berth should be scraped even, so that the vessel should lie on an even keel the moment that she got up to within—I do not know that I am able to give verbal expression exactly to what is suggested—but to within some reasonable distance of the wharf, within what I think Mr. Robson called "the sphere of the operations." I am not quite certain that was not a phrase which was very adroitly used, because it would comprehend something that was so vague that one cannot quite grasp it. The berth itself is admitted now to have been perfectly proper to be in, and how far this alleged responsibility for the approach to the berth extends I really do not know. I suppose, to put it most in favour of the respondents, it would be suggested that it extends as far as vessels coming in and lying at this wharf by lying at that wharf raised the ridge upon which so much has been said. Now, upon that subject, whenever the question does arise, I hope I shall keep my mind perfectly free to have it discussed; but it is absolutely new to me to find that there is by law a responsibility or an obligation upon everybody using the river in a natural and normal way and by lying on mud flats raising by the operation described some of these inequalities, so that another vessel coming in and lying there transversely might suffer injury. It certainly is a new proposition for which I should like some authority before affirming that such an obligation exists by law. I can only say, from one's knowledge of that part of the world, that it would be an obligation which would raise a very serious question indeed, because in particular states of the wind many hundreds of vessels may be seen lying on Cardiff flats, and lying side by side; and the character of the mud there is very much the same as that of the mud in the Usk; and if upon those vessels or their owners there is cast an obligation when they sail away after the tide has come in, having left this impression, to remove those ridges and flatten them again, or if they neglect to do so to be subject to an action by the owner of some other vessel that comes in afterwards and lies across the ridges, it throws an obligation on the shipowners which, I think, they will do well to consider. It certainly is a very serious and important proposition to lay down, and one for which I certainly should require some authority. Then, the accident having happened in this way, the contention is, that this obligation exists, and that, to put it plainly, there was a hard substance left in front of this berth which ought to have been cleared away, and that by reason of its not having been cleared away this accident happened. With regard to that, which is in plain terms the contention which has been made, all I shall say upon that part of the case is, that I do not know whether that is so or not; but one difficulty is, that there is no evidence. That this vessel was injured by lying in the place where she did lie is certain, but neither shipowner nor wharfinger ever intended that she should lie there. The mode in which she got stuck originally I have already referred to; but if it is said that that was not the normal condition of the bank in that place, all I can say is I have no evidence that that was so. There is the theoretic evidence (I admit) that whenever two vessels lie there they raise this ridge; but I do not know when two vessels did lie there; certainly there is no evidence of that sort before us. If two vessels did lie there, I do not know that the ridge that was raised by their lying there has not been scraped away. Then it is said, "Well, but that lies within the knowledge of the defendants." In one sense that is quite true. There is no pretence of it on the other side; and it is part of the case for the plaintiffs that that amount of negligence is in the management of the wharf. That is part of the evidence which the plaintiffs ought to give, and the plaintiffs have given no such evidence. I do not know when they last scraped the place, and I do not know that two vessels ever did lie there before this vessel, after the last scraping. In the result it appears to me that, putting it upon the grounds upon which this case was originally put, there is a complete answer to it; and putting it upon the grounds which have been gradually brought forward in lieu of those originally insisted upon, the whole case is left absolutely without evidence. The only explanation that I can give of that is, that the particular cause of action had not occurred originally to the advisers of the plaintiffs. Much as I respect any judgment of the Court of Appeal (particularly on such a case as this), when presided over by the Master of the Rolls, when I look to see the grounds upon which the judgment of the Court of Appeal proceeded in this case, it appears to me that they have assumed a state of facts without evidence to support it, and one which for my own part I am unable to affirm. I therefore move your Lordships that this appeal be allowed, and that the respondents pay to the appellants their costs, both here and below, and that there be a return of the 1000*l.* paid as a condition of this appeal.

Lord WATSON.—My Lords: Upon the facts proved this appears to me to be a very plain case. The cargo of the Calliope, consisting of iron ore, was deliverable at Newport to the appellant company, who were indorsees of the bill of lading. They were also in the occupation of a tidal wharf within the limits of the port of delivery known as the Tredegar Wharf. On the arrival of the Calliope atNewport, about 2.30 p.m. on Saturday, the 29th Jan. 1886, the captain received instructions from the appellants to bring her alongside the Tredegar Wharf for discharge. The vessel, which drew 18ft. 3in. aft, and 14ft. 7in. forward, did not then proceed to the wharf because the pilot advised that the depth of water at the next tide would be insufficient. On the afternoon of the same day the captain received a note from Griffiths, traffic foreman to the company, in these terms: "You can bring your steamer s.s. Calliope to the Tredegar Wharf Monday morning's tide, as we have two feet more water than at Bathurst Basin. Pilot will tell you what to do." The spring tides were just beginning, and it was, in my opinion, a matter left entirely to the pilot, who knew the draught and trim of the vessel, to judge whether she could be safely berthed on the Monday morning, or must wait for the tide of Monday afternoon or Tuesday morning. The captain, who was naturally anxious to avoid delay, read Griffiths' communication to the pilot. He admits that the pilot at once said that he did not think there would be water enough on Monday morning. The pilot says that he not only expressed that opinion, but distinctly told the captain that, inasmuch as he would incur the risk of losing his certificate, he would not take the vessel to Tredegar Wharf on Monday morning upon his own account, although he was willing to make the attempt if the captain would undertake responsibility for the consequences. The captain denies that such a statement was made to him, but the pilot's evidence is corroborated by two witnesses who were present on the occasion. There are two berths at the Tredegar Wharf, one alongside the quay and another just outside it, in which vessels lie when stranded by the receding tide. The Calliope was destined to the inner berth; and it is not now disputed that if she had got there she would have lain in perfect safety. At that part of the river Usk the foreshore is chiefly composed of mud, varying in consistency, becoming harder and harder as it approaches the underlying rock. A loaded vessel when stranded presses upward the mud on either side of it, and when two vessels are lying side by side that pressure tends to form a ridge of mud between them, which remains after they leave. From the action of the river a deposit of muddy silt rapidly accumulates upon the foreshore. The appellant company are neither owners nor lessees of the foreshore upon which their wharf abuts; they have no right except as members of the public, although their position as occupiers of riparian land gives them a use of the river and its adjacent solum for the purpose of loading and unloading craft which the members of the public cannot enjoy without their permission. They cannot interfere with the natural condition of the foreshore in any way which could possibly affect the flow of the river or its navigation; and such innocent operations as they may venture upon are only protected by the tacit consent of the owners of the solum. It appears that the appellant company and other wharfingers upon the Usk are in the habit at intervals of ten days or a fortnight of removing from their berths the mud deposit, because it impedes the floating of vessels with the rise of the tide, and also of scraping down the ridge or mud bank between the berths.

On the Monday morning the Calliope was taken up the river under steam until she passed the Tredegar Wharf. She was then turned round to port, and her course directed straight to the wharf. When her stem had got within a few feet of the lower end of the quay her stern took the mud, and attempts made to berth her, by warping her stern towards the upper end of the quay, proved unsuccessful. The time at which she attempted to reach the berth was shortly after 4 a.m., more than an hour before full flood. She did not float at the top of the tide, and, at low water, her stem and stern were fast in mud, whilst amidships she rested upon, and was partly sunk into the ridge already described, which had been scraped down, as usual, about a fortnight previously. In that position her hull suffered damage, for which her owners are now seeking to make the appellants responsible. The sole cause of the action disclosed in the respondents' statement of claim was, that the berth which the appellants directed the Calliope to occupy was unfit for that purpose, being "in an uneven, dangerous, and defective condition." Had it been shown that such was the fact, and that the injuries sustained by the Calliope were due to that cause, the present case would have been within the principle followed both by the Admiralty judge and the Court of Appeal in The Moorcock (60 L. T. Rep. N. S. 654; 14 P. Div. 64). In the course of the trial before Butt, J., the respondents put forward two new grounds of action, and asked leave to amend their pleadings in order to introduce them. One amendment was allowed by the learned judge, "in order to raise the question of negligence on the part of Griffiths, upon the assumption that he was intrusted with the authority to bring this ship in, and that his acts were the acts of the defendants." The second amendment proposed, to the effect that the statement in Griffiths' note as to the excess of water at the wharf beyond its depth at Bathurst Basin was a material misrepresentation, by which the captain and pilot were misled, was reserved for consideration after the evidence was completed. So far as concerns the amendment allowed, it is obvious that Butt, J. did not attach implicit credence to the account of Griffiths' actings given by the Calliope witnesses, which was contradicted by Griffiths himself and other witnesses for the appellants. But, assuming that account to be true, it falls far short of showing that Griffiths was either intrusted with or exercised authority in bringing the vessel to the wharf. The fair inference to be derived from it is, in my opinion, that the whole charge of navigating the vessel, and of bringing her alongside the quay, was from first to last in the hands of her officers and pilot, and that Griffiths did and said no more than might naturally have been expected of a wharfinger's servant who was assisting to warp and moor her. The other amendment, which was not expressly allowed, but was dealt with by Butt, J. in the course of his judgment, is equally without foundation in fact. I think with Butt, J., that the representation made by Griffiths was substantially true. According to the register kept from actual observation at Bathurst Basin the extreme depth of water there on the morning in question was 16ft.; adding 2ft., that would only give 18ft. at Tredegar Wharf, whereas the after part of the Calliope was drawing 18ft. 3in. For these reasons Butt, J. dismissed the suit. On appeal his judgment was reversed by Lord Esher, M.R. with Cotton and Lindley, L.JJ., who condemned the present appellants in costs and damages. Their Lordships did not deal with any of the questions raised in the court below, but rested their decision on the ground, that the appellants were lessees of a portion of the river bed ex adverso of their wharf, including the space between the berths, and that they had failed in their duty to those in charge of the Calliope by neglecting either to remove the ridge or to warn the Calliope of its existence. In their argument at your Lordships' bar the respondents mainly relied upon the cause of action which has been affirmed by the Court of Appeal. I hesitate to affirm the principle that a court of review ought to entertain a new ground of action, of which the defendant had no previous notice, based upon inferences of fact derived from evidence directed to other points, inferences which the defendant might possibly have been able to explain away or contradict if he had been required to lead proof with reference to them. But in the present case I am satisfied that the inferences which the Court of Appeal has drawn are not warranted by the evidence. The assumption that the appellants were lessees of the river bed is expressly negatived by the only passage in the depositions to which the respondents were able to refer. Yet it seems to have been regarded as an important factor in the case, and Lindley, L.J. says that "the learned judge in the court below failed to attribute sufficient weight to the fact that the ship was injured by grounding on the ground of the defendants." I do not doubt that there is a duty incumbent upon wharfingers in the position of the appellants towards vessels which they invite to use their berthage for the purpose of loading from or unloading upon their wharf; they are in a position to see, and are in my opinion bound to see, whether the berths themselves and the approaches to them are in an ordinary and reasonable condition of safety for vessels coming to and lying at the wharf. If the approach to the berth is impeded by an unusual obstruction, they must either remove it, or, if that cannot be done, they must give due notice of it to ships coming there to use their quay. I think it would be altogether unreasonable to hold that the river-bed in front of the Tredegar Wharf was not in an ordinary condition of safety unless it was kept as level as a billiard-table; the evidence shows that in the river Usk the stranding of a vessel necessarily occasions a certain rise of the mud above the adjacent level; that the creation of such a ridge as that between the appellants' berths is incidental to all the wharves on the river as well as theirs; and also that the scraping down of such ridges at intervals of time is the usual and only method which has been followed at all these places for enabling vessels to enter the inner berth in safety. It is proved that the appellants had not neglected to take the usual precautions for reducing the ridge; and it is not even suggested in the evidence that, on the occasion when the Calliope stranded upon it, the ridge had attained greater dimensions or height than it usually did before the process of scraping came to be repeated in course. In these circumstances I find it impossible to impute negligence to the appellants. I do not think that a seaman of ordinary skill would have experienced difficulty in ascertaining when the tide would be of sufficient depth to carry the Calliope safely into the inner berth; and I can hardly conceive conduct more reckless than that of the persons intrusted with the duty of taking her there. They knew that safe access was a mere question of time, and that by waiting for high water on the Monday afternoon, or Tuesday morning at furthest, it could be secured. The pilot did not think that there would be enough water; he knew that the attempt to take her in would put him in peril of losing his certificate; and the captain, who seems to have had no personal knowledge of the locality, was aware of the pilot's opinion. Both were in fault, and it is unnecessary to consider the proportion of blame attaching to either, because the present case is between ship and wharf, and the ship must be answerable for what they did either singly or jointly.

One other observation occurs to me upon the facts of this case. I think it is clearly proved that the existence of the ridge was not the cause which prevented the vessel from getting into berth. It has never been suggested that the muddy solum upon which her sternmost part rested was in an abnormal or unsafe condition, either as regards level or otherwise. According to the captain, whose evidence on the point is uncontradicted, her stern only was aground until after the tide began to ebb, when for the first time she grounded amidships: so that until she grounded on the ebb her midships must have been afloat above the ridge for the period of an hour at least. During that period efforts were made to warp her into the berth; and it is plain that these were defeated, not by the ridge, but by the fact that her stern was too fast in the mud. If the grounding of her stern was due to the negligence of those in charge of the Calliope, I cannot understand upon what principle the appellants could be made responsible for her being held fast by the stern in such a position that she stranded upon and was injured by the ridge when the tide ebbed. I therefore concur in the judgment proposed by the Lord Chancellor.

Lord HERSCHELL.—My Lords: I am of the same opinion. I think, as my noble and learned friend has pointed out, that there was some misapprehension on the part of the learned judges in the court below which influenced their decision and led, to some extent at all events, to their differing from the learned judge whose judgment they were reviewing. What I conceive to have been the misapprehension is put most pointedly in the judgment of Lindley, L.J., who says that he thinks "sufficient weight was not given by the learned judge in the court below to the fact that this ship was injured by grounding on the land of the defendants;" and later on he speaks of them "as occupiers of the place and having control of the bed of the river," and says that this "was not sufficiently attended to by the learned judge in the court below." Both the Master of the Rolls and Cotton, L.J., speak of the defendants having been lessees of the particular part of the bed of the river where the accident occurred. Now, the learned counsel for the respondents being pressed upon this point have entirely failed to show the slightest foundation for any such allegation. I do not understand that the appellants had in any way whatsoever a control of this part of the river; nor do I think it is accurate to say, as was said by Cotton, L.J., that the unevenness of the bed of the river was caused by the appellants mooring for their own purposes vessels opposite their wharf. The real position of things I take to be this: Persons navigating the river with vessels have a right to discharge those vessels at any convenient and suitable wharf along its course, and when a vessel grounds and lies near a wharf for the purpose of discharging, that is as much a natural use by the vessel of the river as is her use in being water-borne to the place where she is to discharge, and when she is in that position for the purpose of discharging, her situation there and the discharge are as much a matter of her concern as they are of the wharfinger's, and are as essentially a part of the mode of using the river for the purposes of navigation as any other. Therefore I approach the case from an entirely different standpoint, with all respect to the learned judges in the court below. It appears to me that these ridges or elevations in the bed of the river were caused by the use of the river by vessels navigating it in one of the ordinary modes in which a river is used; and to attribute them to the wharfinger, to speak of them as if they were his work and the result of acts done by him, is, in my judgment, with all respect, to misapprehend the real state of things and the relations of the parties. No doubt it is to his advantage that ships should discharge at his wharf. On the other hand, it is an advantage to the ships that they should go to the place of discharge where commercially the products which they carry are required. Therefore, I am by no means prepared to say that there was any legal obligation on the part of the appellants, when vessels had been lying at their wharf, to remove all unevenness from the bed of the river in order that it might become a perfectly level surface again, any more than there was an obligation on the ships which had caused the elevation to remove that elevation themselves. I will deal in a moment with duties which might, under certain circumstances, conceivably arise which might cast an obligation upon the wharfinger, but I am only saying that the mere fact that vessels so lie and cause a difference of elevation in different parts of the river does not in itself appear to me to involve necessarily any such obligation as is suggested.

Now, I do not for a moment deny that there is a duty on the part of the owner of the wharf to those whom he invites to come alongside that wharf, and a duty in which the condition of the bed of the river adjoining that wharf may be involved. But in the present case we are not dealing, as were the learned judges in the cases which have been cited to us, with a condition of the bed of the river in itself dangerous, that is to say, which is such as necessarily to involve danger to a vessel coming to use the wharf in the ordinary way; and we are not dealing with a case of what I may call an abnormal obstruction in the river—some foreign substance or some condition not arising from the ordinary course of navigation. If the mischief had arisen from the bed of the river adjoining the wharf being in such a condition that a vessel invited there could not, even if she had come in at the most fitting and proper time of tides, have lain there in safety, it may well be that there would have been a cause of action. But the peculiarity of the present case is, that it was all a matter of time and degree; whether it was safe to come or not depended upon a variety of elements. There was no necessarily inherent danger in the condition of the bed of the river. If this vessel had been of a somewhat lighter draught she might have come safely to this wharf when she did, and, having got safely in, have remained uninjured. If, on the other hand, being of the draught that she was, she had waited for a later time of tide, she might equally have come in safely, and have discharged her cargo absolutely uninjured. But the mischief arose from the fact that, being of the draught she was, she came at the time she did, and attempted then to do that which she might safely have done later, or that which a vessel of a lighter draught or a more even keel might have done at that time. Now, under those circumstances, apart from the question of representation, with which I shall deal in a moment, can it be said that there was a breach of duty on the part of the appellants? What was their duty? Was it to keep the bed of the river adjoining their wharf in such a condition as that at all times any ship, however heavy her draught, might come in? Such a proposition surely can hardly be contended for. Then why was there an obligation in respect of this ship at that particular time, or at any particular time indeed that could be named? (I mean, of course, apart from the alleged representation.) That I am wholly unable to see. Therefore, that proves that this case differs altogether from any of those which have been cited, because here the accident, such as it was, arose entirely from the circumstance of a vessel with this draught coming in on this particular tide. I have said that, if the obstruction which created the difficulty in the approach of this vessel to the wharf at this particular tide had been one caused by some unusual and extraordinary circumstance, which those navigating the river would have no right to anticipate, but known to the wharfinger, then I quite agree that some duty on his part would arise towards them, and in the absence of warning it may be that he would be under some responsibility. But the truth is, that the pilot knew perfectly well that these inequalities did arise at all the berths in the river from time to time, owing to vessels lying there. No doubt from time to time at different places some scraping took place for the purpose of lowering the level of these elevations. I have already expressed my doubt whether, although that work was undertaken by the wharfingers, it was in pursuance of any duty incumbent upon them. It was perfectly natural, of course, that they should undertake it in their own interest, because of course, if these elevations were allowed to increase, it would render access to their wharves more difficult. The witness called for the defendants on this part of the case explained that it was for this reason that they did scrape from time to time in order that the access to their wharf might not be interrupted to the extent that it otherwise would be; but it may be doubted whether it was not in their interest rather than in the discharge of an obligation that they from time to time scraped these elevations. I would say this, that it was not by reason of their having any control over this part of the river in any peculiar sense, or having any superior right to that of any other member of the public, that they undertook this work, or would be able or entitled to undertake it; I mean any other member of the public who was, as they were, a riparian proprietor. I apprehend that, being riparian proprietors, they would have a right to execute such work in the neighbourhood for the purpose of improving the access to their wharves as they might be advised to execute, provided that in so doing they did not prejudicially affect or interfere with the rights of any third persons or the rights of the public. Subject to the rights of the public and subject to the rights of any third persons not being interfered with, I do not suppose that they could be in any way rendered liable for thus dealing with the bed of the river in the neighbourhood of their wharf. Now, as I have said, this is not a case of anything foreign or strange in the condition of the bed of the river. It is one of the results of the normal use of the river; and all that can be said is that the wharfingers may not on this occasion have done as much as they had previously done to remove the elevations caused by that use of the river; but certainly it is to my mind impossible to say that, even if they did to some extent omit to do what they had done on previous occasions (and all the evidence as to that is of the vaguest description), they failed in their duty towards those who were about to approach their wharf. That, to my mind, apart from the question of the letter and the representation which came in the letter, is sufficient to dispose of the case.

One observation I may make, although it is to some extent connected with the representation which the appellants made, it is this: that if on the one hand the condition of the bed of the river may be said to have been a matter peculiarly within the knowledge of the appellants, on the other hand the draught of the vessel, which was of at least as great importance in determining whether the vessel could have approached the wharf or not, was peculiarly within the knowledge of the respondents; and to say that the respondents who had this knowledge, which they would know would not in the ordinary course be in the possession of the appellants, were entitled to rely upon a statement made to them by the appellants as to their being able to get safely to the wharf at a particular time, appears to me a somewhat startling proposition. No doubt the letter of Griffiths does represent that in his opinion (and there is no reason to doubt that it was honestly his opinion) the captain could bring the steamer to Tredegar Wharf on Monday morning's tide. But surely that could not absolve the shipowners, or those who were in charge of the ship, from the responsibility of considering for themselves whether it was possible. As I say, presumably the man who gave that information would not know, as they would, the draught of the ship and her trim, because, if this ship had been of the same draught but that draught had been on a different trim, it would very likely have been the case that the vessel would have made her way in with safety. Therefore, I do not think that this letter can be taken as an invitation to come in under all circumstances, or an assertion that they can come in under all circumstances; but it must be taken merely as a general statement of what the condition of the water at the wharf was in comparison with the berth at Bathurst Basin, and what therefore they would have a reasonable right to expect under ordinary circumstances, of course assuming that those who were navigating the ship would know that they must make sufficient allowance because the bed of the river in the neighbourhood of the wharf might not be in a perfectly even condition. It seems to me to be out of the question to suppose that it is a right and proper thing to run the matter so fine that, if you have six inches of elevation at any particular point near the wharf above the surface of the bottom of the berth itself, you will have too little water. I cannot think that it was really a prudent thing to run it so fine as that, and I think that a greater margin ought to have been left in order to ensure reasonable safety. With regard to the representation, it is alleged as a deceit—it cannot be put as a warranty. The utmost the plaintiffs can allege appears to be a representation by the foreman in charge of the wharf of his belief, he being ignorant of that which those on board knew, namely the draught of water of a vessel, on which depended the possibility or not of getting this ship on to the berth. Under these circumstances I am unable to see any breach of duty on the part of the appellants rendering them liable to this action, and I concur with the motion which has been made.

BUDGETT AND CO. v. BINNINGTON AND CO. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION.

Charter-party—Demurrage — Dock strike—Delay in unloading without fault on part of shipowner or freighter—Liability of freighter.

The contract by the freighter to pay demurrage to the shipowner, if the ship is not unloaded at the expiration of a fixed number of lay days, is an absolute one, subject to the shipowner doing nothing to prevent the unloading; and, consequently, where the ship is being unloaded by the joint act of the shipowners and freighters, and under a contract between the shipowners and stevedores the latter employ the necessary dock labourers, and delay in unloading is caused by a strike of the labourers employed on behalf of the shipowners and freighter, the freighter is not relieved from his liability to pay demurrage, as the shipowners have no control over the labourers.

THIS was an appeal from the judgment of the Queen's Bench Division upon a motion for judgment.

The action was tried before Cave, J. and a jury, at the assizes held at Bristol.

The plaintiffs were the indorsees of a bill of lading of a cargo of barley, shipped on board a steamship named the Fairfield, belonging to the defendants.

The plaintiffs sought to recover the sum of 147*l.* 15*s.* 11*d.*, which was paid by them to the defendants, under protest, in respect of a claim by the defendants for keeping the vessel on demurrage at the port of Bristol.

In the bill of lading it was stated that the cargo was shipped at Feisk, for delivery at a port as ordered to the shippers, or to their assigns, "they paying freight and demurrage, if any . . . all conditions as charter-party."

The charter-party stated that the cargo was "to be brought and taken from alongside the steamer at freighters' expense and risk;" the crew, however, were "to render all customary assistance in hauling lighters alongside," and that "thirteen running days, Sundays excepted," were "to be allowed the freighters (if the steamer be not sooner despatched) for sending the cargo alongside and unloading; but in no case should more than seven running days, Sundays excepted, be allowed for unloading, and ten days on demurrage over and above the said lay days, at 4*d.* per ton on the steamer's gross register tonnage per running day," and that "the freighters' liability" was "to cease when the cargo was shipped, the owner or his agent having an absolute lien on the cargo for freight, dead freight, demurrage, lighterage at port of discharge, and average." At the port where the ship was loaded the lay days had been exhausted, so the defendants and the shippers agreed by letter to allow six additional running days, Sundays being excepted, for discharging the cargo.

The bill of lading was in the usual form, and contained the usual exceptions, but said nothing about strikes. Neither did the charter-party say anything about strikes.

After arriving at the Portishead Dock, at Bristol, the Fairfield began to unload her cargo. The lay days commenced on Monday, the 25th, and ended on Saturday, the 30th Nov. 1889.

The custom of the port of Bristol is for grain cargoes in bulk from the Black Sea ports to be discharged by the joint efforts of shipowners and consignees.

During the present unloading the following was the system adopted: The plaintiffs' part of the discharge was performed by the Bristol Docks Committee, who employed a firm of master stevedores; the defendants' part was performed by another firm of master stevedores, but besides these there was a large number of dock labourers, on the part of both, but the number employed by the consignees was much larger than the number employed by the shipowners. First of all, "bushellers" employed by the consignees go into the holds of the vessel and put the grain into sacks; the sacks are attached to a running noose, and then hoisted by "winchmen," these "winchmen" being employed by the shipowners. When the sacks are hoisted out of the hold on to the deck, they are put into scales by men who are called "bearers in." These are employed by the shipowners. Then they are weighed by "weighers," who are employed by the consignees, and are then carried into trucks or into lighters, or into a warehouse as required. This is done by men called "landers," and these are employed by the consignees. "Talleymen" are employed both by shipowners and consignees, but the "foreman" is employed by the shipowners.

On Monday, the 25th, Tuesday, the 26th, and Wednesday, the 27th Nov., being the first three lay days, more than half the cargo was discharged. On Thursday, the 28th Nov., the dock labourers employed by both firms of stevedores struck, and on that day and on Friday, the 29th Nov., Saturday, the 30th Nov., Monday, the 2nd Dec., and Tuesday, the 3rd Dec., no cargo was discharged. On Wednesday, the 4th Dec. the strike ended, and the discharge commenced again, and, owing to the gangs working night and day, it was completed on Thursday, the 5th Dec. Under these circumstances demurrage for the days occupied in unloading after the 30th Nov. was claimed by the defendants, and they exercised their lien upon the cargo for the sum claimed in the action, which was paid under protest, and was now sought to be recovered back.

For them it was contended that the plaintiffs were, under the contract, bound to pay demurrage; that the officers and men had remained on board after the steamer had arrived in the dock; and that the master stevedores employed by the defendants were quite ready to do their part of the discharge, but owing to the strike they were unable to find dock labourers ready to work.

The following question was by the consent of the parties left by the judge to the jury:

"Were the shipowners ready and willing to do their part of that which it was customary for them to do?"

In answer to a question by one of the jurymen, the learned judge (Cave, J.) said that, if the shipowners were not able to do their part, they could not be said to be ready and willing to do it, and upon this the jury found the defendants were not ready and willing to perform their part of the discharge.

The learned judge left either party to move for judgment.

The Queen's Bench Division (Denman, Charles, and Williams, JJ.) entered judgment for the defendants: (63 L. T. Rep. N. S. 493; 25 Q. B. Div. 320; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 549.)

The plaintiffs appealed.

Cohen, Q.C. and Pyke (E. U. Bullen with them) for the plaintiffs.—The detention of the ship was due in part to the default of the shipowners; they cannot, therefore, recover demurrage in respect of such detention. It is an implied term of the contract on the part of the consignees to unload within the specified time that the shipowners will do all that is necessary to enable the consignees to perform their contract. Default was made by the shipowners in this case in doing their part of the work under the contract. The plaintiffs cannot be liable for a delay caused by the dock labourers employed by the defendants refusing to do their duty. It makes no difference that the plaintiffs were also in default. Nor is it material that the labourers were engaged by the stevedores, and so were not directly in the defendants' employment. A man cannot free himself from a liability he has undertaken by employing a sub-contractor. The case of Thiis v. Byers (34 L. T. Rep. N. S. 526; 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 147; 1 Q. B. Div. 244) is distinguishable. There the delay arose from bad weather, and there was no default on the part of the shipowners, or on the part of any persons for whom they were responsible. Bucknill, Q.C. and J. V. Austin for the defendants.—In Thiis v. Byers (ubi sup.) it was held that, where the number of lay days are fixed, there is an absolute contract to unload within the prescribed time, and that the shipowner was entitled to demurrage, although the charterer had been prevented during a part of the time from unloading by bad weather. In the present case the delay was caused by a strike over which the shipowners had no control, and they are, therefore, entitled to demurrage under the contract. That some of the men who struck were employed by stevedores who were employed by the defendants does not make the defendants responsible for the strike, any more than the fact that some of the men who struck were employed by stevedores who were employed by the plaintiffs makes the plaintiffs responsible for it. Neither party was responsible for the strike, and it is, therefore, equivalent to the bad weather in Thiis v. Byers. They cited

Cohen, Q.C., in reply.

Lord Esher, M.R.—In this case the defendants, who are shipowners, have defended an action brought against them by the merchant freighters of the ship to recover back a sum of money paid by the freighters under protest for demurrage; and the defendants rely on a stipulation in the bill of lading, which stipulation is a contract in writing by the merchants. The bill of lading contains many distinct and independent contracts, some of them independent contracts by the shipowners, others independent contracts by the freighters. The stipulation in question is an independent contract by the freighters to pay demurrage. The bill of lading is in the ordinary form. This contract, therefore, is contained in a document which is in ordinary mercantile use, and which has been construed over and over again, consequently the construction of such a contract is well known. In the present case, inasmuch as the lay days are mentioned in number, it is a contract by the freighters that, if the ship is detained beyond those days, they will pay demurrage for every day during which the ship is so detained. If she is detained means if she is in such a condition that she cannot be handed over to the shipowner. It has been held that that is an absolute and independent contract. Mr. Cohen says that he does not know what an absolute contract means. This contract has, however. been so called by many learned judges. An absolute contract means one that is unconditional. The only condition here is, that the running days should have commenced and should have run out. That condition being fulfilled, the freighters are bound to pay, and there is no other condition. That is the contract. The judges, who have from time to time had to construe the stipulation in question, have looked at the words used, and have drawn the irresistible inference from them that that is the meaning of the contract. The rule of construction which they have applied is applicable to all contracts. If a man undertakes to do a certain thing within a specified time or to pay a sum of money when the specified time arrives, if he has not done the thing, his undertaking to pay is an absolute one. When the shipowners in this case had proved that the lay days began to run, that they had run out, and that the ship was not clear of cargo, they had proved their case. If there was any ground upon which, notwithstanding their breach of contract, the freighters would be excused, it rested on them to prove it. That is to say, in such a case, where the freighters have matter of excuse, they may confess and avoid their breach of contract. What is the excuse which, under any contract, whether maritime or not, will relieve a man from paying the money he has agreed to pay on the breach of the specified condition? It is where the other contracting party has so acted as to render it impossible for him to fulfil the condition. He is then excused, although he has broken his contract. If the shipowner has by any act of his prevented the cargo from being taken out of the ship within the running days, the freighter is excused from paying demurrage. It is no part of the contract that excuses him. It is an equity, which is also a rule of common law, founded on natural justice. It has been argued that that equity arises in the present instance, because it is said the delivery of the cargo is a joint act of the shipowner and the merchant freighter, and, if it is a joint act and the shipowner has not performed his part, he has prevented the cargo from being out of the ship within the specified days. It is true to say that the delivery of the cargo is a joint act of the shipowner and the freighter ; and it has been determined what, if nothing is said about it in the contract, are the particular parts of the joint act which are to be performed by each of them. If it is a simple contract for the delivery of cargo, the duty of the shipowner is to hand the cargo over the rail of the ship, and the duty of the freighter is to receive and carry it from the rail of the ship. But that is only in cases where there is nothing in the contract to the contrary. In the present case there is something to the contrary introduced into the contract by a custom which was proved. It is a custom in the case of grain cargoes, such as barley, which this was, for the freighters to do something before the delivery of the cargo over the side by the shipowners. It being the best thing for the freighter, in the case of grain cargoes, that the grain should be put into sacks before delivery over the side, the custom is for sacks to be supplied by the freighter, and the grain to be put into sacks by him while it is still in the hold of the ship. Then the shipowner has to hoist the sacks that have been filled by the freighter over the side of the ship, where they are received by the freighter. It is said that the shipowner has not performed his part of this joint act, and has thus prevented the freighter from discharging the cargo within the specified time. But for whose acts is the shipowner responsible? He is responsible for anyone who is there to represent him. Who are such persons? If the master does a wrongful act, the shipowner is responsible. I am not prepared to say that, if the crew refused to work, the shipowner would not be responsible. It is not necessary now to decide that question, and I do not express any opinion upon it. But I am clear as to this: that if the non-delivery of the cargo is caused by the wrongful act of persons not in the shipowner's employ, and over whose actions, therefore, he has no control, that is the same thing as if the non-delivery was caused by some physical misfortune over which he had no control, which it has been decided does not relieve the freighter from the liability to pay demurrage. For instance, non-delivery of the cargo owing to bad weather does not so relieve him. If the default of the shipowner arises from causes beyond his control, the freighter cannot excuse himself from paying demurrage on the ground that the shipowner has not done his part towards the delivery of the cargo. If the non-delivery of the cargo is caused by the default of persons over whose actions the shipowner had no control, the shipowner is not in default, and he not being in default the freighter has not made out the excuse that the shipowner has by his acts prevented the cargo from being taken out of the ship within the running days.

In cases similar to this there may some day be a nice question as to whether the lay days have begun to run. But that is wholly apart from the question which we have to consider. There is no question in this case that the lay days had begun to run. I think that the effect of what I have said in this case has been expressed in every judgment on the question of the demurrage contract. In those cases in which no limit of time for unloading is fixed, a further question may arise as to whether the ship was free of cargo within a reasonable time. The question in those cases depends upon the circumstances of each particular case. But in some of those cases in which the limit of time for unloading was not fixed, the principle is laid down which applies to cases where the limit is fixed. That principle has been laid down by Lord Ellenborough, Baron Martin, and many other judges down to the present time. Whatever may be a good definition of the circumstances under which the freighter is excused from paying demurrage, this is clear: that he is not excused where the non-delivery is caused by some physical occurrence over which the shipowner has no control, or by something done by people over whose acts he has no control. Here Binnington and Co. employed a master stevedore, and the master stevedore entered into a contract with workmen. The stevedore carries out his contract in the way that he thinks right. He is not the shipowners' servant, and they cannot interfere in the carrying out of the contract. The shipowners do not select the workmen; they cannot give them orders; they cannot control their acts. It was the acts of the workmen, their breach of contract with the stevedore, that caused this ship not to be unloaded within the specified time. For their acts the shipowners were not responsible to anyone, as they had no control over them. As I have already pointed out, it is clear in this case that there was a breach by the freighters of their contract to pay demurrage, the only condition having been fulfilled by the lay days having run out, and the ship not being free from cargo at the end of the time. The only real question here was, whether the facts of this case could bring it within the principle of those cases where the shipowner's default has excused the freighter's breach of contract. I am of opinion that the facts do not bring this case within that principle; and that, the specified condition having been fulfilled, there was an independent and absolute contract by the freighters to pay demurrage. This appeal must, therefore, be dismissed.

Lindley, L.J.—I am of the same opinion, and have very little to add. The question in the case is an important one, because the answer to it will decide upon which of the two contracting parties the risk of strikes is to fall in contracts such as this. Nothing is said in the contract with reference to strikes. We must therefore determine the case on general principles. By the contract thirteen running days, Sundays excepted, were to be allowed the freighters for sending the cargo alongside and unloading; but in no case were more than seven running days, Sundays excepted, to be allowed for unloading, and ten days on demurrage over and above the said lay days, at 4*d.* per ton on the steamer's gross registered tonnage per running day. The stipulation as to unloading within the time is in terms unconditional. The learned judges in the court below have called it an absolute contract, which I understand to be the same thing as an unconditional contract. It is argued by Mr. Cohen that this is not an unconditional contract, because there is an implied condition that the shipowner must do his part in the unloading. But is that so? It appears to me that the cases of Thiis v. Byers (ubi sup.), Porteus v. Watney (ubi sup.), and Straker v. Kidd (ubi sup.) show that there is no such implied condition. It has been suggested that those cases were wrongly decided. I think that they were quite right. But, although there is no such implied condition in the contract, there is a condition of general application, the breach of which by one party exonerates the other contracting party from liability on his contract, that condition being that the shipowner shall not prevent the freighter from performing his part of the contract. In order to bring this case within that principle the appellants are compelled to argue that the shipowner is responsible for the dock labourers. That is entirely unwarrantable. He does not hire them; he cannot discharge them; and in no sense are they his servants. The shipowner has not, therefore, in this case, prevented the freighter from performing his part of the contract, so as to bring the case within the general principle that I have referred to. That general principle is applicable to all contracts, and will be found to be investigated and very well explained in the work by Sir Frederick Pollock, which was referred to in the course of the argument. The appeal must be dismissed.

Lopes, L.J.—This is an action by merchants against shipowners to recover back demurrage paid by the plaintiffs under protest. Three questions arise: First, what is the contract? Secondly, has there been a breach of it? And, thirdly, is that breach excused? The contract is an absolute and not a conditional one. It is a contract by the merchant to get the ship unloaded within a time fixed, unless there is default on the part of the shipowner. There is a broad distinction between cases where the lay days are fixed in number and cases where they are not so fixed. In the former cases after-circumstances are immaterial and must not be regarded; in the latter, the question whether the merchant has been duly diligent must be determined by reference to those circumstances. The contract where, as in the present case, the lay days are fixed is, to use the words of the Master of the Rolls in Porteus v. Watney (ubi sup.), "that if the ship is not able to discharge the whole of her cargo within the given number of days after she is at the usual place of discharge, the holder of that bill of lading will pay a certain sum for each day beyond those days, however the delay may be caused, unless it is by default of the shipowner." If that is the contract, it is clear that the plaintiffs have broken it. But it is said that the breach is excused, because it was occasioned by the default of the defendants. The facts are that the master of the ship selected a stevedore, and the stevedore selected dock labourers. Before the discharge of the cargo was completed the dock labourers struck. It is said that the shipowners are responsible for the conduct of those dock labourers, but I cannot agree to that. The strike was an unforeseen occurrence over which the shipowners had no control. It was an event which no reasonable care on the part of the master of the ship could have prevented. It was an unforeseen occurrence and nobody's fault, and, therefore, one of the risks which the merchant had contracted to bear, just as much as the crowded state of the port of discharge, in Randall v. Lynch (ubi sup.); or frost, in Barrett v. Dutton (ubi sup.); or bad weather, in Thiss v. Byers (ubi sup.); or acts of the Government, in Barker v. Hodgson (3 M. & S. 267), were held to be such risks. I can, therefore, find no fault in the shipowners which can excuse the breach of contract by the plaintiffs, and their appeal fails.

Appeal dismissed.

JONES AND ANOTHER (apps.) v. BENNETT (resp.). (a)

Pilotage dues—Port of Chester Act (16 Geo. 3, c. lxi.)—Bye-laws—Merchant Shipping Act 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104) — Merchant Shipping (Pilotage) Act (52 & 53 Vict. c. 68).

Where a public local Act, in force before the passing of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 and regulating a port, imposes a penalty on any unlicensed person taking upon himself to conduct or pilot any ship into or out of a port, pilotage is compulsory.

Pilotage rates, fixed by bye-laws made by trustees under a local Act and under the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, and duly sanctioned by Her Majesty in Council, may be sued for by a pilot who has rendered service as such.

The Merchant Shipping Amendment Act 1889 (52 & 53 Vict. c. 68) is retrospective, as it declares what the meaning of the principal Act of 1854 always has been, and by it the word "ship" in the Act of 1854 includes "foreign ship."

THIS was a case stated under 42 & 43 Vict. c. 49, s. 33, by justices for the county of Flint, of which the material parts are as follows:—

The appellants are timber merchants trading at Rhyl; the respondent is a licensed pilot for the Chester pilotage district, which includes the port of Chester.

1. Upon the hearing of a complaint preferred by the respondent against the appellants under sect. 363 of 17 & 18 Vict. c. 104, in which it was alleged that the respondent was a duly licensed pilot for the Chester pilotage district, and that as such duly licensed pilot he on the 23rd April 1889 piloted a vessel called the Orion, bound from Norway to Rhyl, in the county of Flint, from outside the North-West Patch Buoy to the Wild Roads, and on the 28th April 1889 he piloted the same vessel from the Wild Roads to the sea. That under and by virtue of the bye laws for the regulation of pilots in the Chester pilotage district, duly made by the pilotage trustees and confirmed by order of Her Majesty in Council, the rate of pilotage for piloting the said vessel from outside the North-West Patch Buoy to the Wild Roads was 6*s.* per foot, amounting to 3*l.* 12*s.*, and the rate of piloting the said vessel from the Wild Roads to the sea was 4*s.* 6*d.* per foot, amounting to 2*l.* 14*s.* That the appellants were consignees or agents for the said vessel, and as such were liable to pay to the respondent the said sums of 3*l.* 12*s.* and 2*l.* 14*s.*, amounting together to 6*l.* 6*s.* for pilotage dues. And that on the 3rd Oct. 1889 a written demand of payment of the said pilotage dues amounting to the sum of 6*l.* 6*s.* was served on the appellants, and the said dues so demanded remained unpaid for seven days after the time of such demand being made, and still remained due contrary to the form of the statute in such case made and provided. We adjudged the appellants to pay the respondent the said sum of 6*l.* 6*s.* for debt, and the sum of 4*l.* 12*s.* for costs forthwith and in default of payment it was ordered that the sum due thereunder should be levied by distress and sale of the appellants goods.

2. The following facts were either proved to our satisfaction or admitted by both parties. The respondent was a licensed and qualified pilot for the port of Chester. On the 23rd April 1889 between 5 and 6 a.m., he sighted the Norwegian foreign sailing ship Orion, which had a cargo of timber, and which was out at sea three or four miles from the coast and outside the North-West Patch Buoy. The ship Orion when first sighted by the respondent was between the Great Orme's Head and the city of Chester and outside the port of Chester.

3. The ship was bound from Norway to the river Voryd (which lies between the Great Orme's Head and the city of Chester), but unable to get into Voryd in consequence of the neap tide, extensive sands, and shallow sea. The captain, who could speak English, told the respondent he wanted to go to the Wild Roads, which are within the port of Chester, to wait for sufficient water for the Voryd. There was no duly qualified or licensed pilot on board, nor any signal for a pilot given, but the respondent, in exercise of what he believed to be his right as pilot in the case of compulsory pilotage, took charge of the vessel and piloted her to the Wild Roads, where she came to an anchor, and where he left her. Five days afterwards, namely, on the 28th April 1889, the respondent, without any request on the part of the captain and against his wish, again went on board the Orion, which was still at anchor in the same place as he left her, there being then sufficient water for her to proceed to Rhyl. The captain told the respondent that he did not want his (the respondent's) assistance, but would pilot his own ship. The respondent replied he was there, and claimed the right to pilot her out, and would stay there until the ship went out of port. The ship was then towed out by the steamer Albert, on behalf of the appellants, and the respondent, unasked and of his own accord, gave orders to heave the chain short, and to be ready to start for the Voryd, and when the Orion started in tow of the steamer Albert, the respondent took the usual position of pilot on board in the bows, and without the captain's consent directed the course of the steamer Albert by signalling with his hands, and the steamer obeyed his signals. The respondent also directed the helm of the Orion by signalling in the same way to the man at the wheel on board the Orion, who also obeyed his signals. In this way they came from the Wild Roads to the sea outside the port of Chester. The respondent then gave up charge of the ship, which proceeded on her way to Voryd. The respondent admitted that owners of ships bound to Voryd objected to compulsory pilotage as well outwards as inwards from the Wild Roads; and that the captain objected to the respondent's right to board the Orion on the 28th April; also that the Orion gave no signal before the respondent boarded her. Dalpool, or Dawlpool, and Pargate, are on the N.E. or Chester side of the estuary of the Dee. The Wild Roads are on the S.W. or Flintshire side. The navigable channel now lies on the S.W. side. There is no channel to Pargate.

4. It was also proved to our satisfaction that the appellants were consignees or agents of the said ship Orion, and as such had made themselves liable to pay charges on account of such ship in the port of her arrival and discharge, and in the port from which she cleared out, and that demand in writing had been made by the respondent for payment of the said pilotage dues previous to such complaint being made, and that such dues so demanded had remained unpaid for seven days after the time of such demand.

5. According to No. 33 of the bye laws for the regulation of ports (made by the trustees acting in pursuance of 16 Geo. 3, c. lxi., and a copy of which bye laws accompanies, and forms part of, this case), "Every licensed pilot employed in piloting vessels within the district shall be paid the pilotage rates and remuneration stated in the table" therein referred to. The sum of 6*l.* 6*s.* so claimed and adjudged as aforesaid is made up of the two sums of 3*l.* 12*s.* and 2*l.* 14*s.*, being the respective amounts payable according to the said table for piloting the Orion from outside the North-West Patch Buoy to the Wild Roads, and from the Wild Roads to the sea. Such bye law purports to have been made in pursuance of 16 Geo. 3, c. lxi. and 17 & 18 Vict. c. 104.

6. On the part of the appellants it was contended—(a) That there is nothing in the Act 16 Geo. 3, c. lxi. making pilotage compulsory within the Chester pilotage district except in the case of a ship inward bound to the port of Chester, or within the port to, or to a place beyond Dalpool or Pargate aforesaid. (b) That as there is nothing in the said Act (except as aforesaid) to make pilotage compulsory, the trustees acting under that Act had no power to make bye laws imposing dues for pilotage within the Chester pilotage district. (c) That the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, sect. 333, does not make the employment of a pilot compulsory in any district in which there was no compulsory pilotage prior to the passing of that Act, and that Part V. of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, does not apply to foreign ships. (d) That the trustees acting in pursuance of 16 Geo. 3, c. lxi. and not the respondent (as pilot) are the proper persons to take proceedings.

7. We were of opinion that, as 16 Geo. 3, c. lxi. provides for compulsory pilotage into and out of the port of Chester, and as the respondent piloted the said ship Orion from outside the North-West Patch Buoy to the Wild Roads (within the port of Chester), and from the said Wild Roads to the sea, the appellants, as such consignees or agents as aforesaid, became liable to the payment to the respondent of the said dues, and that as the pilotage was compulsory before the passing of the said Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, the said trustees, by virtue of sect. 333, sub-sect. 5, of that Act and with the consent therein mentioned, and by virtue of the provisions of the Act 16 Geo. 3, c. lxi., had power to make the said bye laws, and to fix the rates to be demanded and received by pilots licensed by them; and that for the personal services rendered to the ship Orion by the respondent as pilot, he (and not the said trustees) was the proper person to make the complaint against, and to recover the dues therefor from, the appellants. We are also of opinion that, whatever doubt might formerly have existed as to the application of certain provisions of Part V. of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 to foreign ships, such doubt has now been removed by 52 & 53 Vict. c. 68, s. 1, which enacts that, in the construction of such Part V., the expression "ship" shall include a foreign ship. We were also of opinion that the said ship Orion was not merely passing through the Chester pilotage district (of which the respondent was a pilot) on a voyage between two places situate out of such district, but that she entered such district for safety, and lay at anchor for several days therein. The questions for the opinion of the court are: 1. Whether the trustees, acting in pursuance of 16 Geo. 3, c. lxi., or the respondent (the pilot) are the proper persons to recover the aforesaid pilotage dues. 2. Whether under the circumstances the appellants are liable to pay the respondent for the aforesaid pilotage from outside the North-West Patch Buoy to the Wild Roads. 3. Whether under the circumstances the appellants are liable to pay the respondents for the aforesaid pilotage from the Wild Roads to the sea.

8. If the court should answer the first question in favour of the respondent, and the second and third questions in the affirmative, then the said order is to stand. If the court should answer the first question in favour of the respondent, the second in the affirmative, but the third in the negative, then the said order is to stand for 3*l.* 12*s.* and 4*l.* 12*s.* for costs. If the court should answer the first question in favour of the respondent, the second question in the negative, but the third in the affirmative, then the said order is to stand for 2*l.* 14*s.*, and 4*l.* 12*s.* for costs. If the court should find in answer to the first question that the said trustees, and not the respondent, are the proper persons to recover the aforesaid pilotage dues, or if the court should find that the said respondent is the proper person to recover the aforesaid pilotage dues, but should answer the second and third questions in the negative, then the said complaint is to be dismissed.

Hamilton opened the case, and stated the facts, and contended (1) that the Act gives the trustees no power to make pilotage compulsory, at any rate on a ship in such a case as this; (2) that the only mode of recovering these dues is that prescribed by the local Act of Geo. 3—i.e., by distress—and that the Merchant Shipping Act of 1854 does not enable them to be recovered summarily; and (3) that, even if there is such a summary procedure before justices, it is the trustees that must proceed, and not the individual pilot who has done the service; further (4), that the Merchant Shipping Acts Amendment Act 1889 (52 & 53 Vict. c. 68) is not retrospective, and that therefore the term "ship" in the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 does not include a foreign ship, such as is the case here. By bye-law 33, made by the trustees of the Chester pilotage district, acting in pursuance of 16 Geo. 3, c. lxi., and confirmed by the Privy Council: "Every licensed pilot employed in piloting vessels within the district, shall be paid the pilotage rates and remuneration stated in the following table: . . . Any vessel from a foreign port putting into the Wild Roads for shelter, or any other purpose, is bound to take a Chester pilot, and liable to both inward and outward pilotage." No section in the local Act expressly gives the trustees power to make such a bye-law. The power to make bye-laws is given by sect. 56 of the Act, which is as follows: . . . "It shall and may be lawful to and for the trustees appointed by this Act, or any nine or more of them, at any of their general quarterly meetings, to be held in pursuance of this Act, to make, ordain, and establish such rules, orders, bye-laws, and regulations for the better regulating and managing the said lighthouse, or lighthouses, lights, landmarks, buoys, and all other the works, matters, and things hereinbefore mentioned relating thereto, as to them shall seem proper and expedient, and also to make, ordain, and establish separate rules, orders, bye-laws, and regulations for the better governing and regulating of all such pilots so to be appointed and licensed as aforesaid . . ." This section is merely disciplinary, and was probably enacted in order to prevent interference with the trained and authorised body of pilots. The Act is primâ facie not directed against such an extreme case as this, where a vessel crosses the line of the port for any purpose. Sect. 34 enacts that: "If any person or persons not being licensed as aforesaid, shall, from and after the time that the said trustees shall have fixed a proper number of pilots, take upon him or themselves to conduct or pilot any ship or vessel into or out of the said port of Chester, or if any pilot so licensed as aforesaid shall, after the expiration of such his licence, continue to act as a pilot without the renewal of the same, every such person or persons shall, for every such offence, forfeit and pay the sum of 10*l*." And sect. 35: "That in case any pilot who shall receive such licence as aforesaid shall refuse or neglect to take the charge or conduct of any ship or vessel outward bound, upon proper notice being first given to such pilot, or if any such pilot shall be plying betwixt Dalpoole, in the county of Chester aforesaid, and westward of Chester Bar, and upon a gun being fired, or an ensign being hoisted in a raft or other usual signal given from any ship or vessel, shall refuse or neglect forthwith to board and take under his charge or care such ship or vessel, or if any such ship or vessel cannot be boarded without imminent danger, such pilot shall refuse or neglect to lead the way with his boat, every such pilot shall, for every such offence, forfeit and pay the sum of 10*l*." The former section does not apply to a captain or master of a ship who pilots his own ship. [GRANTHAM, J.—That seems contrary to the principle of the Merchant Shipping Act, from the language of which it is clear that a captain or master piloting his own ship infringes the rule that you must under certain circumstances take a pilot. This has been distinctly held, and surely a similar interpretation must be put on the local Act. Beard, for the respondent, drew the attention of the court to Kimber v. Blanchard (5 Burrows, 2602), and approved of in Beilby v. Shepherd (3 Exch. 40; 18 L. J. 73, Ex.), where a similar section was interpreted by Lord Mansfield against the contention of the appellants. GRANTHAM, J.—Surely we must be bound by that authority, and, if so, sect. 34 of the local Act is compulsory.] Those cases do not apply; they were decided on the construction of certain sections. I rely on the construction to be put upon the entire Act. [Lord COLERIDGE, C.J.—The Acts are not made solely for the benefit of pilots; they are made for the benefit of human life.] These are penal sections, and perhaps the proper remedy is to proceed against the master for the penalty. The other sections of the Act negative any inference as to compulsory pilotage. By sect. 37 a pilot, previous to taking charge of a ship outward bound, may demand a sufficient security from the master, commander, owner, or agent for payment of such pilotage, and in case of refusal to pay or give security the pilot may refuse to conduct or pilot such ship without being subject to any penalty. This points to an option to take a pilot at any rate outwards. [GRANTHAM, J.—Sect. 44 is against you, for it exempts the master of a coasting vessel; this is unnecessary if your contention is correct. The local Act, too, was passed in 1775, six years after the decision in Kimber v. Blanchard, and it is therefore scarcely likely that the Legislature were not aware of that case.] The other sections point to optional pilotage. [Lord COLERIDGE, C.J.—You cannot read these bye-laws without seeing that the intention of the Merchant Shipping Act and all similar ones is, with certain exceptions, that pilotage is to be compulsory; if otherwise, what would be the good of them?] The trustees have certainly acted on that assumption, but this case is implied by an exemption. [Lord COLERIDGE, C.J.—By sect. 332 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 pilotage authorities may make and extend exemptions from compulsory pilotage; it follows from that that persons not exempted are liable.] That is qualified by sect. 353. By sect. 48 of the local Act in certain cases ships at sea may take a Liverpool pilot up to Dalpoole. If the captain finds no Chester pilot there, what is he to do? [GRANTHAM, J.—It all comes back to sect. 34, which is against you.] Part V. of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 does not apply, and consequently there is no procedure by summary remedy. [Counsel also referred to sect. 363 of that Act.] The term "any ship" does not include a foreign ship. [Lord COLERIDGE, C.J. — The Amendment Act has cleared that up by declaring the law to have always been to the contrary]. A pilot cannot sue under the local Act.

Beard, for the respondent, was not called on.

Lord COLERIDGE, C.J.—It seems to me that the magistrates were perfectly right in this case. The Act of Geo. 3, c. 61, is a public Act passed in a certain sense to affect only a certain portion of the kingdom, and amongst other parts of the kingdom which it affects is the port of Chester. The port of Chester, as is very common in this country, is very much larger than the mere harbour of Chester, if there be a harbour, which I really do not know, and it is much more than the portion of the Dee upon which Chester is built, and up to the bridge of which vessels can come, and within the port the Act enacts "that if any person who is not licensed as aforesaid shall from and after the time that the said trustees shall have fixed a proper number of pilots, take upon him or themselves to conduct or pilot any ship or vessel into or out of the said port of Chester, or if a pilot so licensed as aforesaid shall after the expiration of such his licence continue to act as a pilot without the renewal of the same, every such person or persons shall be subject to a penalty." The question is, does that make pilotage compulsory within the port of Chester. I should have thought that it would be difficult to frame words admitting of less dispute. The penalty is inflicted on anybody—even on a licensed pilot if his licence has run out — who without a licence navigates a ship into the port of Chester. This person did navigate the ship, and he attempts to say that that Act does not compel him to take a pilot on board. I am clearly of opinion that it does. Then the Merchant Shipping Acts deal with the question of compulsory pilotage, and everybody knows that compulsory pilotage differs in its particular obligation according as it comes under one or more of the quasi-local Acts of Parliament, that is to say, general Acts of Parliament, but restricted and varying in their enactments as to particular portions of the coast. The Act of 1854 says, "That wherever pilotage has been compulsory before the Act, pilotage shall remain compulsory after the Act." Well, I have shown—at least, I have expressed my clear opinion—that by the 34th section of the Act of the 16 Geo. 3, c. 61, pilotage was compulsory in the port of Chester. It, therefore, remains compulsory after the Act of 1854, because it was so before. Then, if I am right about that, the first point is made out, that this is compulsory pilotage.

Then Mr. Hamilton says, that may be, but there is nothing to show that the pilot can recover these fees, which are fixed by the bye-laws. All, he says, that the Act of Parliament shows is, that if a man navigates (as this person navigated here), he is subject to a penalty. Well, that may be in a sense if it was not for the bye-laws. I am not sure it would be so, but it might be contended that, as to any individual pilot, there being no fixed rate given to him for which he could sue or endeavour to recover, the only mode would be to get hold of the master or owner and sue him for a penalty. Then the Act of Parliament—the Merchant Shipping Act—authorises local authorities in different parts of the country to pass bye-laws fixing the rates and stating the sums which are to be recovered for pilotage within the district in which they have authority. Those bye-laws, before they can come into operation, are by the Act of Parliament to be sanctioned by the Queen in Council, acting, as we know, upon advice as in all matters within our constitution Her Majesty does act. These bye-laws have been so sanctioned, and these bye-laws have fixed these rates. The bye-laws being properly passed, and being passed under the authority of the Act of Parliament, and with the power which the Act of Parliament confers upon that authority, are in fact, although in a somewhat circuitous form, parliamentary enactments, because they are enacted by the Act of Parliament which has given authority to enact them. Therefore it seems established, first, that this district is a district within which there is compulsory pilotage; secondly, that these dues are rightly and properly fixed by authority, and may be recovered by persons suing for them. Then it is said, "Oh, but this is a foreign ship, and the Act only says 'any ship' coming within the authority of this Act. This was a foreign ship, and 'ship' does not necessarily mean 'foreign ship.'" The answer to that Mr. Hamilton has very fairly supplied, because he cited to us an Act of Parliament of last year, as I understood, or quite recently, in which it has been not merely negatived, for there might be something to be said on that, although I do not think very much, but something might be said in favour of the retrospective effect of an Act of Parliament expressed in that way, but this is an Act of Parliament which declares and enacts, and every lawyer is familiar with the distinction. A declaratory Act means to declare the law, or to declare that which has always been the law, and there having been doubts which have arisen Parliament declares what the law is, and enacts that it shall continue what it then is. The thing is very familiar. In this very matter most of the Profession, I daresay, are aware that a great conflict of opinion existed as to the distance to which the territory of the Queen extended beyond low-water mark. I was one of those who thought that it extended a marine league out to sea; the majority—but a majority of one—were of a different opinion. But when Parliament came to declare, when it came to enact upon the matter, it declared and enacted—and declared adversely to the opinion of the majority, that that has always been the law of the country, that the marine league was the limit. Many Acts of late years have been passed which, because the words are not "from and after the passing of the Act be it enacted that" so and so, have sometimes inconveniently been held to be retrospective. There is nothing to show that this Act was not intended to be retrospective, but on the contrary, as I have shown, there is very good reason to say that it is retrospective. Therefore, all the matters fail, except the matter of procedure. It is quite clear that that stands or falls with the rest of the judgment. The statute of Geo. 3 is compulsory, and is still in force in the port of Chester, and gives the pilot a right to sue for the fees which are due to him. For all these reasons I think the judgment of the magistrates is correct, and must be upheld.

GRANTHAM, J.—I am of the same opinion.

HICK v. TWEEDY AND CO. (a)

Charter-party — Persons signing agreement — Liability as principals—"Ready to receive cargo" —Meaning of—Claim for loss of freight and for demurrage.

In an action for damages for loss of freight and for demurrage, it was proved that the defendants, who carried on business at O., made a contract with the agent of the plaintiff in L., in the form of a letter signed by the defendants and containing these clauses: "Steamer to load end of November or early December. Charterers having the option of cancelling if she is not ready to receive cargo by the 12th Dec. next. Steamer to be loaded on usual berth terms, 2 per cent. commission to us." The defendants had made contracts with merchants at O. for loading the vessel, the merchants having the power of cancelling if the vessel was not ready to load on the 12th Dec., and the vessel was not to be considered ready to load until moored alongside the quay. The plaintiff had no notice of these contracts. The vessel arrived at O. on the 10th Dec., and her stern having been fastened to the breakwater, the captain gave the defendants notice that he was ready to receive cargo, but the merchants refused to take the notice that the vessel was "ready to receive cargo," until she was moored alongside the quay, which could not be done before the 18th Dec. Meantime the merchants cancelled their contracts with the defendants, and the vessel was loaded at a lower rate of freight than that specified in the contract.

Held, (1) that the defendants were liable as principals, as they had contracted in their own names without any qualification, and (2), that the plaintiff was entitled to recover damages for the loss of freight, as the vessel was "ready to receive cargo" within the meaning of the contract, although not moored alongside the quay, and that the matter was not affected by an alleged custom at the port of O., that a vessel was not to be considered "ready to receive cargo" until moored alongside the quay; but (3), that the plaintiff was not entitled to damages for demurrage or detention of the vessel after the 12th Dec., as the contract came to an end on that date.

Cur. adv. vult.

Dec. 9.—CHARLES, J.—In this case the plaintiff claimed damages from the defendants for breach of an agreement dated the 2nd Nov. 1888. The breach alleged was a refusal by the defendants to load a steamer, called the Thorntondale, at the port of Odessa. Damages were sought under two heads: first, the plaintiff sought to recover the loss of freight which he had sustained in consequence of the defendants' breach of contract; and, secondly, he claimed damages in the nature of demurrage, or damages for the detention of his ship for eight days at sixpence per gross register ton per day. With regard to the last clause I find that, if the plaintiff was entitled to recover at all, the evidence undoubtedly was that sixpence per ton is a reasonable sum.

The defence was two-fold. First, the defendants alleged that they were not contracting parties as principals, but that they were agents in the matter only; and, secondly, that if they were responsible as principals, they were entitled to cancel the contract if the vessel was not ready to receive cargo on the 12th Dec. 1888, and that she was not ready on that date to receive cargo. The plaintiff, Mr. Pentland Hick, was the owner of the Thorntondale. He carried on business at Scarborough, and Thomas Hick was his agent in London. The defendants carried on business at Odessa, and also had an agent in London, and the contract relied upon was made between the agents in London of the two parties respectively. It is in these terms, and is in the form of a letter addressed by Messrs. Tweedy and Co., the defendants, to Thomas Hick, Esq., and signed by Tweedy and Co., the defendants: "Dear Sir,—We confirm having this day fixed the s.s. Thorntondale (15,000 qrs. maxm. of 480 lbs.) for a full cargo of grain $\frac{\text{and}}{\text{or}}$ seed from Odessa to London, Hull, Rotterdam, or Bristol Channel, at 29 shillings, with the option of loading as much cargo at Nicolaieff as she can cross the bar with without lightening at 30 shillings and three pence. Steamer to load end of November or early December. Charterers having the option of cancelling if she is not ready to receive cargo by 12th December next. Steamer to be loaded on usual berth terms, 2 per cent. commission to us. We shall be glad if you will send us as soon as possible her dead weight and cubical capacity; also state present position. Steamer to be loaded at Odessa (full cargo) if Nicolaieff not open. Captain is to telegraph from his last port of outward discharge to Tweedy, Odessa, naming his probable date of readiness to receive cargo." Contemporaneously with this contract or before it, Messrs. Tweedy, in Odessa, had made various contracts with merchants for loading the Thorntondale, and had agreed with the merchants that they should have the power of cancelling their contracts if the vessel was not ready to load on the 12th Dec. Further, they had agreed with the merchants that the vessel is not to be considered ready to load or ready to receive cargo until or before she is found moored alongside the quay. The words were, "le vapeur n'est pas consideré pret a charger avant qu'il ne se trouve 'alongside' le quai." Of the terms of these contracts the plaintiff had no notice. The Thorntondale arrived at Odessa from Ancona on the 10th Dec., in ballast, and anchored at seven in the morning. Some three hours later the captain attended at the defendants' office, and was told to bring in the ship and make her stern fast to the outer breakwater. He did so, and gave the defendants notice that the ship was ready to receive cargo. On the 11th Dec. the defendants write to him this: "The merchants will not take your notice until the steamer is in berth alongside." It was impossible, owing to the crowded state of the port, for a loading berth to be secured before the 18th. In the meantime the merchants cancelled their contracts with the defendants, and the ship was eventually loaded at a much lower rate of freight than was specified in the contract of the 2nd Nov. The action was brought to recover the freight lost, and also demurrage or damages for eight days at Odessa, the rate of sixpence per ton per day.

Two defences, as I have said, were raised to the whole claim. First, the defendants alleged that they were not liable as principals, but that they had simply acted as the plaintiff's agents. Secondly, that the ship was not ready to receive cargo on the cancelling date, the 12th Dec. It was also contended that in any event damages for detention could not be claimed, With regard to the first point, it must be remarked that the signature to the contract of the 2nd Nov. is absolutely unqualified, "George Tweedy and Co.," and certainly would render the defendants personally responsible unless there is something in the body of the contract itself inconsistent with the existence of personal responsibility. The defendants may be agents in fact, and so primâ facie not contracting parties; but they have contracted in their own names without qualification, and I see nothing in the language of the letter itself necessarily inconsistent with primary liability. It is true that there are indications of agency in the letter; the defendants speak of having "fixed" the vessel; of "charterers" having the option of cancelling, and they are to receive 2 per cent. commission. The last circumstance, however, is quite consistent with their having bound themselves personally to perform the contract, and the two phrases relied on are, in my opinion, by no means sufficient to exclude a personal liability. They fall far short of the unequivocal language necessary to negative the inference which is otherwise to be drawn from an unqualified signature. It is true that the correspondence shows that the plaintiff's agent at one time considered that the defendants were agents only, but that impression was not shared by the plaintiff himself. Their true position was that of agents for freighters as well as agents for the plaintiff; but, in my opinion, they have by their signature to the letter of the 2nd Nov. incurred a personal and primary liability. With regard to the second point, it was contended that by the custom or usage of the port of Odessa the words, "ready to receive cargo" have a particular signification, and are not satisfied by a ship being in the port ready, so far as her equipment and condition are concerned, to receive cargo, but only by a ship ready in herself and also alongside a loading berth. Much evidence was given, chiefly taken on commission, on this head. The captain, who was orally examined, denied any knowledge of the custom, and stated that he heard of it for the first time when the defendants in December showed him their engagement notes, and told him that fresh rules had been made in Odessa, to the effect that a ship was not considered ready to load until in a quay berth. It was proved that such rules had been drawn up by a body of merchants called the Odessa Exchange Committee, but it was not argued that these rules would simply as rules bind shipowners who had not assented to them, and it was insisted that the rules did no more than declare the custom of the port. In the engagement notes the words "pret à charger" are so defined. The engagement note in its original shape contained a clause giving a power of cancellation if the vessel had not arrived in ballast on a particular day. In the notes signed by the defendants this clause is altered, and the cancelling date was fixed with reference to "readiness to load." The cancelling date was, of course, admitted to be in each case a matter of special agreement; but it was contended that, if the parties choose to make "readiness to receive cargo" the governing consideration in fixing the cancelling date, those words must receive the interpretation conferred on them by the usage of the port. Now, I think, the alleged usage is proved to this extent, that for the purpose of calculating loading days, in other words, for the purposes of demurrage and damages for detention, a ship is not considered ready to receive cargo or ready to load until she is in berth alongside the quay. There is some variation in the mode in which the custom is stated, but not enough to make it bad for uncertainty. The substance of it is this, that the ship must be in a quay berth, whether whole length on or not does not seem to me to be material, so long as she can take in cargo from the quay direct.

I may here refer briefly to the evidence on this point. It draws the distinction between chartered steamers and steamers not chartered, and confines the alleged custom to the latter class, that is to say, to general ships. [His Lordship then referred to the evidence]. But I now arrive, having referred to the evidence taken upon commission, at the real difficulty in the case. Do these words "ready to receive cargo" mean, in the letter of the 2nd Nov., what by usage they mean in Odessa? I have indicated the extent to which I think the usage proved. Can I apply the same meaning to the words when used in a contract made in London to fix a cancelling date as they bear in a foreign port to fix the date of the commencement of the lay days? I do not feel it possible to do so, having regard to the language of the contract itself. The words "readiness to receive cargo" occur in the last clause, and there can be no doubt at all about their meaning in that clause. The captain is to telegraph his probable date of readiness to receive cargo from his last port of outward discharge. These words can only refer to the date of his probable arrival at Odessa and the readiness of the ship in herself. They cannot refer to a probable date of his getting alongside the quay, a matter as to which he could form no opinion whatever. I see no reason why I should construe the words in the earlier part of the section differently. It is suggested that the words "steamer to be loaded on usual berth terms, 2 per cent. commission to us" favour the defendants' contention. But in my opinion these words clearly point only to the usual berth terms for loading; that is, rather to the amount to be loaded on each day and to the amount of commission payable to the defendants, or merely to the 2 per cent. commission. I prefer myself the latter construction. But whichever be adopted they do not seem to me to alter the meaning which the previous words "ready to receive cargo" naturally bear. It will be seen, therefore, that, in my judgment both defences fail. The question of damages remains to be considered. Two separate sums were claimed: first, the freight lost; and secondly, damages for the detention of the ship. To the first head the plaintiff is clearly entitled. To the second, in my opinion, he is not. Even supposing the contract had continued to exist, I do not think the defendants would have been responsible. They were under no obligation to load in any definite number of days; all they would have been bound to do would have been to load with despatch, having regard to the existing condition of the port. This appears to me to be the effect of the decisions in Rodgers v. Forresters (2 Camp. 483); Strahan v. Gabriel (cited in Maude & Pollock on Shipping, 4th edit. p. 407 in the note); and Postlethwaite v. Freeland (42 L. T. Rep. N. S. 845; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 302; 5 App. Cas. 599). It was indeed pointed out that, inasmuch as "usual berth terms" obliged the merchant to load at least 2000 chetwerts per day, the number of loading days really was fixed, and therefore the charterer must be held responsible for delay in securing a berth: (see Davies v. McVeagh, 41 L. T. Rep. N. S. 308; 4 Asp. Mar Law Cas. 149; 4 Ex. Div. 265.) The answer to this argument is that in my view the berth term as to loading at a particular rate is not incorporated in the letter of the 2nd Nov. In the present case, however, the contract really comes to an end on the 12th Dec., and it seems to me, therefore, on that ground impossible for the plaintiff to claim damages for the detention of his ship until the 18th, as money due to him in the nature of demurrage. The damages under this head were also put as expenses necessarily incurred in minimising the defendants' loss, and I think this is the only way in which they can be properly put. But regarding them in this light I do not feel able to award them. The correspondence shows that what was done after the merchants had refused to hold to their engagement notes was done by arrangement between the captain and the defendants, and under circumstances which do not warrant me in holding the defendants liable in damages for the delay which took place before a loading berth was secured. In the result my judgment will accordingly be for the plaintiff, with costs, for 1154*l.* 6*s.* 7*d*, being the difference between the freight under the contract and the freight earned, deducting balance of commission due to the defendants on the gross freight earned.

THE TALABOT. (a)

Collision—River Scheldt—Rounding point.

Where two steamships going in opposite directions in the Scheldt sight one another, one above a point and the other below it in the river, and if both keep on they will meet at the point, it is the duty of the steamer navigating against the tide to wait until the other steamer has passed clear.

THIS was a collision action instituted by the owners of the steamship Trevethick against the owners of the Norwegian steamship Talabot.

The collision occurred on the 22nd Jan. 1890, at about 6.30 p.m., off a point in the river Scheldt.

The facts alleged by the plaintiffs were as follows:—Shortly before 6.30 p.m. on the 22nd Jan. the Trevethick, a steamship of 488 tons register, was whilst proceeding up the river Scheldt on a voyage to Antwerp, laden with coal, in the reach between Lillo and Fort de la Croix. The tide was first quarter ebb of little force, and there was a freshet running down the river at about the rate of two knots. The Trevethick was in the reach between Lillo and Fort de la Croix. She was to the southward of mid-channel, and was making about seven and a-half knots through the water. As she neared a point in the river on the south side those on board of her saw the red and masthead lights of a steamship which proved to be the Talabot, about four points on the starboard bow, and distant from one and a-half to two miles. The engines of the Trevethick were slowed for another steamer, and as the Trevethick approached the point her helm was ported. The Talabot approached, drawing from the Trevethick's starboard bow to ahead, still showing her red and masthead lights. When ahead she sounded one short blast on her whistle. The Trevethick sounded one short blast in reply, and her helm was hard-a-ported, and her engines were put full speed ahead to help her round the point. Shortly afterwards two short blasts were heard from the Talabot. The Trevethick replied with one blast, put her engines full speed astern, and kept her helm hard-a-port, but the Talbot approached, having shut in her red light and opened her green light, and with her port bow struck the port bow of the Trevethick.

The facts alleged by the defendants were as follows:—On the 22nd Jan. the Talabot, a Norwegian steamship of 1047 tons register was in ballast, proceeding down the river Scheldt in charge of a pilot on a voyage from Antwerp to Blyth. She was in mid-channel making about five or six knots. In these circumstances those on board of her saw the masthead light of a steamship which proved to be the Trevethick, distant two to three miles, and bearing about three points on the port bow. Shortly afterwards the green light came into view, when the Talabot's engines were put to slow, her helm was ported, and she was brought as close as possible to the north bank of the river, and proceeded down along that bank. As the vessels approached, the whistle of the Talabot was blown a single blast, to which the Trevethick replied, but her green light still remaining open on the Talabot's port bow, the Talabot's engines were stopped and then immediately after reversed, but the Trevethick came on, and with her stem struck the port bow of the Talabot.

It appeared that it was the practice in the Scheldt for steam-vessels navigating against the tide, before rounding the point in question, to wait till a steamer meeting them had passed clear.

The defendants (inter alia) charged the plaintiffs with improperly attempting to pass the Talabot at the point, and with improperly neglecting to wait below the point till the Talabot had passed clear.

Rules and Bye-laws for the Navigation of the River Thames:

Art. 23. Steam-vessels navigating against the tide shall, before rounding the following points, viz., Coalhouse Point . . . and Blackwall Point, ease their engines, and wait until any other vessels rounding the point with the tide have passed clear.

Sir Walter Phillimore and J. P. Aspinall for the defendants.

BUTT, J.—The collision in this case occurred at night in the river Scheldt, a little below Antwerp. The Trevethick was bound up, and the Talabot down the river. There was a tide or current, described as a freshet, running down at the rate of about two knots. The Trevethick therefore had the tide against her, and the Talabot had the tide with her. The place of collision is near a buoy on the river, a little above the Kriusschans Lighthouse, to which reference has been made in the course of the case. The Lighthouse and buoy in question are at a strong bend of the river, the two reaches being at right angles the one to the other. In the river Thames there is a well-recognised rule, viz., art. 23 of the Thames Conservancy Rules, providing that in the event of vessels approaching one another at points, it is the duty of the one having the tide against her to ease her engines and wait until the other vessel has passed. There is, so far as appears from the present case, no such positive rule printed and circulated with regard to the navigation of the Scheldt; but the pilots agree that the practice of navigation is really the same as that prescribed by the Thames Rules. The vessel having the tide against her is to wait until the vessel coming in the opposite direction has cleared her at the bend. It is quite certain that the Trevethick disregarded that practice, and I have no hesitation in saying that she was to blame for so doing. Nay, more, if there had been no such practice on the river Scheldt, both I and the Trinity Brethren are of opinion that it was bad navigation for the vessel with the tide against her to proceed as she did under the circumstances. It certainly does not weaken these observations to know that the man in charge of her was reprimanded by the local authorities for not having obeyed the recognised practice.

In the river Scheldt, as in other narrow channels, there is a further rule that vessels approaching in opposite directions shall pass one another port side to port side, and that, in order to do this, each shall keep to that side of mid-channel which is on her starboard hand; in other words, each has about half the channel devoted to her as her own water. There is no doubt that one or other of the steamers in the present case had got across into the water of the other. Which it was is in dispute. We are of opinion that the Trevethick got from her own water, on the south side, into the water which belonged to the Talabot. There are many considerations leading to that conclusion; the chief being, that almost immediately after the collision the Talabot went aground on that side. But, in navigating a narrow channel such as this at night, a pilot might without negligence or default get his vessel out of her own water. I should not necessarily impute blame to him for that. It is not, however, necessary from my point of view to decide that question, the chief and all-important point being, that at such a marked bend in the river it was the imperative duty of the Trevethick to ease and to wait for the Talabot to round the point. As to speed, we think that both vessels acted properly in going slowly, and in stopping and reversing when the collision became imminent. I, therefore, hold the Trevethick alone to blame on the ground I have stated.

THE QUICKSTEP. (a)

Collision — Tug and tow—Master and servant—Costs.

Whether a tow is liable for the negligence of the tug which causes a collision is a question of fact in each case, and depends upon whether, in the circumstances, those in charge of the tug were so far under the control of the master of the tow as to be the servants of the owners of the tow.

Where a hopper barge in charge of two men which had no motive power but which was provided with a rudder, was, by the negligence of her tug, towed into collision with another vessel, it was held that the owners of the tow were not liable for the negligence of the tug.

THIS was an appeal in a collision action in rem from a decision of the judge of the County Court of Durham.

The collision occurred on the 4th Jan. 1889 about 7.20 a.m. in the river Tees between the steamship Charles Dickens and a hopper barge, which at the time was in tow of the steam-tug Quickstep.

The action was in the first instance instituted by the owners of the Charles Dickens against the owners of the hopper barge, and subsequently the owners of the Quickstep were added as defendants.

At the time of the collision the Quickstep was only carrying one masthead light instead of two, as she ought to have done. It was admitted that the two men on the hopper barge in no way interfered with the navigation. She had a rudder but had no motive power.

The County Court judge found that the collision was solely caused by the negligent navigation of the Quickstep, but gave judgment against both defendants on the ground that in law the owners of the tow were liable for the negligence of the tug.

Both defendants appealed, and on the merits the court held that the collision was caused by the joint negligence of the Charles Dickens and Quickstep, and found that there was no negligence on the part of the hopper barge, and adjourned the question as to whether, in the circumstances, the owners of the barge were liable for the negligence of the tug.

April 29.—F. W. Raikes and Lennard for the owners of the tow.—In the circumstances of this case the tow was not responsible for the negligence of the tug. The relationship of master and servant did not exist. It may be that, in many cases, the control of the navigation is in the tow, but in all cases it is a question of fact whether it is or not. In the present case, the tow was a hopper barge without any motive power, and in charge of two men, who never control or interfere with the navigation of the tug. If in all cases the tow is responsible, it follows that, where a tug is towing several barges owned by different owners, each barge owner is responsible for the negligence of the tug, and it also follows that the control is in each tow. In the present case the barge is analogous to cargo, but instead of being on the ship towing it is put astern of her:

Bucknill, Q.C. and L. E. Pyke, for the plaintiff, contrâ.—In the Admiralty Court tug and tow have always been looked upon as one for many years past, and the court ought not after so long a lapse of time to overrule the decisions supporting that principle. Even assuming it to be a question of fact in each case as to who has the control of the navigation, the presumption is strongly in favour of the control being in the tow. Hence, in the present case, the owners of the tow are responsible:

In the present case the owners of the tow are also liable for neglecting to employ a tug properly equipped for the undertaking. She had only one masthead light instead of two.

Raikes in reply. — The tug was properly equipped. She had two lights, and it was only in consequence of the negligence of her master that they were not both exhibited.

Cur. adv. vult.

Aug. 5.—Judgment of the court was delivered by

BUTT, J.—This action was brought in the County Court of Durham by the Tees Conservancy Commissioners, the owners of the steam-tug Charles Dickens, against Cochrane and Co., the owners of a hopper barge which, at the time of the collision, was in tow of the steam-tug Quickstep in the River Tees. Subsequently, Wm. Duncan and Charles Chrystal Duncan, the owners of the Quickstep, were added as defendants. At the trial the learned judge found that the collision was caused by the negligence of those on board the Quickstep, and that there was no negligence on the part of those in charge of the Charles Dickens or of the barge; but he held the owners of the barge, as well as the owners of the Quickstep, liable, on the ground that those on board the Quickstep were the servants of the owners of the barge which had employed the tug. On a former day, after hearing counsel on the facts, we decided that the Charles Dickens and the Quickstep were both in fault, but we agreed with the learned judge in absolving the barge from blame. The question as to the liability of the owners of the barge for the negligence of the crew of the Quickstep was subsequently argued before us, and it is that question which we now have to decide. It is clear that, although there were men on board the barge, the navigation was in the hands of the master of the tug, and the bargemen could do nothing to avoid the collision. No doubt, in many cases of towage, the negligence relied on as making the owners of the vessel in tow liable for a collision has been the negligence of those on board the tug; and where, as in most of such cases, the navigation was under the direction of those on board the vessel being towed, such negligence has been rightly held to be in law the negligence of her owners. In one or two cases in the Court of Admiralty, Dr. Lushington seems to have intimated that the inexpediency of having a divided command and direction of the vessels would in itself be a sufficient reason for attaching liability to the vessel in tow. In all such cases, however, the real question is whether or not the relation of master and servant exists between the defendants, the owners of the vessel towed and the persons in charge of the navigation of the steam-tug. Unless that relation exists, considerations of expediency cannot avail to impose liability on the owners of the vessel in tow. It is the practice on the Tees, as in many of our rivers, for steam-tugs to tow several barges at the same time. The barges frequently belong to different owners. In such cases whose servants are the crew of the tug? Supposing barges A, B, and C, each belonging to a different owner, to be in tow of one steam-tug and damage to be caused to another vessel by the negligence of the master of the tug, is each of the owners of the barges to be held liable for the damage done on the ground that the crew of the steam-tug are his servants? If so, it would follow that if, by the negligence of those on board the tug, barge A is brought into collision with another vessel, the owners of barges B and C would each be liable for the damage so caused—a conclusion which would not seem consistent with reason or with good sense. The truth is, no general rule can be laid down. The question whether the crew of the tug are to be regarded as the servants of the owner of the vessel in tow must depend upon the circumstances of each case. There would seem to be no better reason for holding the master of the tug in the present case to be the servant of the owners of the barge, than there is in saying that the master of a ship engaged in carrying cargo is the servant of the charterer, and so may render the latter responsible for a collision caused by the negligence of the master of the vessel.

It would be a hopeless task to attempt to reconcile the numerous decisions bearing on the subject in our English courts. Nor are the American cases more uniform in their result. We think that the right view of the law is that stated by Lord Tenterden and Littledale, J. in the case of Laugher v. Pointer (5 B. & C. 547), adopted and approved by the Court of Exchequer in Quarman v. Burnett (6 M. & W. 499). Both those cases were actions for negligence in driving a carriage. In the earlier case Lord Tenterden said: "If the temporary use and benefit of the horses will make the driver answerable, and there be no reasonable distinction between driving them with or without a carriage, must not the person who hires a hackney coach to take him for a mile or other greater or less distance, or for an hour or longer time, be answerable for the conduct of the coachman? Must not the person who hires a wherry on the Thames be answerable for the conduct of the waterman? I believe the common sense of all men would be shocked if anyone should affirm the driver to be answerable in either of these cases. If the case of a wherry on the Thames does not furnish an analogy to this subject, let me put the case of a ship hired and chartered for a voyage on the ocean to carry such goods as the charterer may think fit to load and such only. Many accidents have occurred from the negligent management of such vessels, and many actions have been brought against their owners; but I am not aware that any has ever been brought against the charterer, though he is to some purposes the dominus pro tempore, and the voyage is made not less under his employment and for his benefit, whether he be on board or not, than the journey is made under the employment and for the benefit of the hirer of the horses. Why, then, has the charterer of the ship or the hirer of the wherry or the hackney coach never been thought answerable? I answer, because the shipmaster, the wherryman, and the hackney coachman have never been deemed the servants of the hirer, although the hirer does contract with the wherryman and the coachman and is bound to pay them, and the pay is not for the use of the boat or hores or carriage only, but also for the personal service of the man." In conformity with this Mr. Justice Clifford, in delivering the judgment of the Supreme Court of the United States of America in the case of Sturgis v. Bowyer (24 Howard's Reps. 110), says: "But whenever the tug, under the charge of her own master and crew, and in the usual and ordinary course of such employment, undertakes to transport another vessel which for the time being has neither her master or crew on board from one point to another over waters where such accessory motive power is necessary or usually employed, she must be held responsible for the proper navigation of both vessels. . . . Assuming that the tug is a suitable vessel properly manned and equipped for the undertaking, so that no degree of negligence can attach to the owners of the tow on the ground that the motive power employed by them was in an unseaworthy condition, the tow under the circumstances is no more responsible for the consequence of a collision than so much freight; and it is not perceived that it can make any difference in that behalf that a part or even the whole of the officers and crew of the tow are on board, provided it clearly appears that the tug was a seaworthy vessel, properly manned and equipped for the enterprise, and from the nature of the undertaking and the usual course of conducting it, the master and men of the tow were not expected to participate in the navigation of the vessel." In a note on p. 536 of his work on shipping, Mr. Parsons, after reviewing the cases decided in the United States, says: "It seems to be well settled law that canal boats and barges in tow are considered as being under the control of the tug, and the latter therefore is liable." We think that both reason and authority are in favour of holding the owners of the barge exempt from liability for the negligence of the crew of the Quickstep. The result is, that we pronounce the Charles Dickens and the Quickstep both to blame, and dismiss the claim against the owners of the tow with costs here and in the court below, to be paid by the plaintiffs.

Hurst, on behalf of the owners of the Quickstep, asked for the costs of the appeal.

L. E. Pyke, for the plaintiffs, contrâ, cited the Hector (48 L. T. Rep. N. S. 890; 8 P. Div. 218; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 101).

The PRESIDENT.—As our decision is that both the Quickstep and the Charles Dickens are to blame, the rule laid down in The Hector (ubi sup.) will be followed. There will be no costs here or below as between the owners of those two vessels. The costs of the owners of the hopper barge we have already dealt with.

THE THOMAS JOLIFFE. (a)

Collision—Damages—Tug and tow—Joint tort feasors—Contribution.

In a collision action in rem, where a tug and tow are both pronounced to blame for a collision with another vessel, the owner of the latter vessel may enforce the judgment for the whole of his damages against either or both the defendants, and the defendants are not entitled to have the decree so drawn up that half only of the total damages is recoverable from each defendant.

THIS was a motion by defendants in a collision action in rem, asking the court to order the registrar to amend the decree entered therein.

The action was instituted by the owners of the steamship Alaska against the owners of the steam-tug Thomas Joliffe, and against the owners of the sailing ship Avon. The collision occurred on the 25th Dec. 1889, at the entrance to the Penarth Dock, Cardiff. The Avon was at the time in tow of the Thomas Joliffe, both of which vessels collided with the Alaska, and did the damage complained of.

At the trial the learned judge (Butt, J.) found the Thomas Joliffe and the Avon both to blame, and concluded his judgment with these words: "The whole accident was brought about by the improper attempt of the tug and the Avon to go in without a tug behind. I must therefore pronounce them both to blame."

In these circumstances the following decree was drawn up by the registrar:

The judge, being assisted by Captain E. P. Nisbet and Captain A. E. Barlow, two of the Elder Brethren of the Trinity Corporation, and having heard counsel on all sides, pronounced the collision in question in this action to have been occasioned by the fault or default of the master and crew of the ship Avon, and by the fault or default of the master and crew of the steam-tug Thomas Joliffe, and for plaintiffs' claim for damages in consequence thereof, and he condemned the owners of the ship Avon and their bail, and also the owners of the steam-tug Thomas Joliffe, in the said damages and in costs, and referred the said damages to the registrar assisted by merchants to assess the amount thereof.

The plaintiffs having sought payment of the damages from the owners of the Thomas Joliffe, they, the owners of the Thomas Joliffe, now moved as follows:

To amend the form of the decree dated the 6th Nov. 1889, entered in this case, by providing by the said decree that the owners of the ship Avon and the owners of the steam-tug Thomas Joliffe and their respective bail be condemned severally, each for one half of the entire damages, and that any balance of such half which the plaintiffs shall not be able to enforce against either vessel shall be paid by the other vessel or her bail, or that such other amendment be made as in the circumstances is just.

Kennedy, Q.C. and Pyke in support of the motion.—The decree should be amended as asked. In America the decree goes against each defendant for half the damages:

The City of Hartford and The Unit, 7 Otto, 323;
Marsden's Law of Collisions, 2nd edit. 198.

In The Milan (5 L. T. Rep. N. S. 590; Lush. 388; 1 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 185) the loss was divided between both wrongdoers. Lord Esher, M.R. has indicated that the decree should be for half the damage against each wrongdoer:

Black Book of the Admiralty, p. 109.

Bucknill, Q.C. and John Mansfield, for the tug; and Raikes, for the plaintiffs, were not called on.

BUTT, J.—This decree has to my mind been drawn up in the proper form. It may be that the law as administered in the United States directing the recovery of damages in the way pointed out by Mr. Kennedy is calculated to work out in the end more equal justice than results from the application of the law of England as it exists; but I have no power to deal with the matter in the way suggested by the American authorities if in so doing I contravene the law of this country. I am very clearly of opinion that I should be contravening the law of England were I to direct this decree to be amended in the way suggested. Every one who has sustained damage by the joint act of two individuals, and who recovers judgment against them in tort, has the right to enforce that judgment by execution against one or the other or both of those defendants. That I conceive to be the right of a plaintiff in ordinary cases, and I do not know why it should be different in an Admiralty case. I do not agree at all that we have anything to do in this case with what is known as the Admiralty rule as to division or apportionment of damages where both ships are to blame. There seems to me to be no authority whatever for limiting the right of the plaintiffs in this suit in the manner suggested by Mr. Kennedy. I must therefore refuse this application.

THE COUNTY OF DURHAM. (a)

Charter-party — County Court — Venue — County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 71), ss. 3 and 21—County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Amendment Act 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 51), ss. 1 and 2.

Shipowners may institute an action in personam against charterers for breach of charter-party, under sect. 2 of the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Amendment Act 1869, in the County Court having Admiralty jurisdiction within the jurisdiction of which their vessel is at the commencement of such proceedings.

THIS was an appeal by the defendants in an action for breach of charter-party from the decision of the judge of the Newcastle County Court.

The action was instituted in personam on the Admiralty side of the Newcastle County Court, by the owners of the steamship County of Durham against her charterers to recover compensation for damage sustained by the County of Durham taking the ground at the defendants' wharf at Poole.

The plaintiffs, who were the assignees of the charter-party in question, resided in the district of the Newcastle County Court. The defendants resided at Poole.

At the time of the commencement of the action, the County of Durham was within the jurisdiction of the Newcastle County Court.

The defendants moved the County Court judge to dismiss the action for want of jurisdiction. The learned judge refused to do so, and his judgment, so far as it is material, is as follows:—

"So far as the plea of want of jurisdiction may be said to depend upon the general Admiralty Jurisdiction of County Courts over a charter-party of this description, no difficulty exists. The difference which prevailed a few years ago between the High Court of Admiralty and the Courts of Common Pleas and Exchequer on the one hand, and the judges of the Privy Council on the other, as to whether County Courts in Admiralty have not, under recent legislation, a more extensive jurisdiction in certain matters than the High Court has been finally set at rest by the decision of the Court of Appeal in the case of The Alina (42 L. T. Rep. N. S. 517; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 257; 5 Ex. Div. 227). This case, and that of The Cargo ex Argos (28 L. T. Rep. N. S. 745; L. Rep. 5 P. C. 134; 2 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 6) are direct authorities for the proposition that an action on a charter-party, by the owner or charterer of a ship, is an action on an agreement, made in relation to the use or hire of a ship within sect. 2 of the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Amendment Act 1869, and that that Act has given a jurisdiction to the County Courts which the High Court of Admiralty did not possess. The omission of any form applicable to the present case from the 'statutory forms' given under the Act of 1868 may be explained, therefore, by assuming that the latter were no doubt compiled from those in use in the High Court, which had jurisdiction in the cases mentioned in that Act; but, not having jurisdiction in cases like the present, necessarily supplied no forms applicable to the case before me. The only ground, therefore, upon which a plea in denial of the jurisdiction of the court can prevail, is that to which the defendants have mainly limited their contention, viz., that the present action has been entered in the wrong district. In the Act of 1869 there is no express clause defining or limiting the district in which proceedings are to be commenced; but by sect. 1 of the Act of 1869 the two Acts of 1868 and 1869 are to be read and interpreted as one Act. Turning, then, to the Act of 1868, sect. 21, it is provided that, 'Proceedings in an Admiralty cause shall be commenced: (1.) In the County Court having Admiralty jurisdiction within the district of which the vessel or property to which the cause relates is at the commencement of the proceedings; and (2.) if the foregoing rule be not applicable, then in the County Court having Admiralty jurisdiction in the district of which the owners of the vessel or property to which the cause relates or his agent in England resides . . .' It has been strongly contended and urged with much ability and great reliance upon the forms and procedure in Admiralty, that the words 'vessel to which the cause relates' can only mean the ship or vessel of the defendant. It is clear that, until the passing of the Act of 1869, the jurisdiction of the County Court over claims for salvage, towage, necessaries, or wages, or for damage to cargo or damage by collision, were all in their nature proceedings for services rendered to or injury done by the ship or vessel of the defendant, and in any proceeding in rem the only ship in the contemplation of the parties would naturally and logically be the ship of the defendant; but now, by sect. 2, sub-sect. 1, of the Act of 1869, a County Court with Admiralty jurisdiction can try any claim arising out of any agreement made in relation to the use or hire of any ship, and the present action is a proceeding in personam under a charter-party for the use or hire of the plaintiffs' ship and complaining of damage resulting from breach of that agreement. It has been argued that the present is not properly a cause relating to a ship; but I do not agree with that view. The expression cause relating to a ship only differs from cause relating to the use or hire of a ship as the greater differs from the less. If an action on a charter-party which, ex concessis, is an action upon an agreement relating to the use of a ship, is not an action relating to a ship, it seems difficult to admit that an action for towage or wages is an action relating to a ship. To what ship then does the present cause relate? The proceeding, itself, is not in rem, but in personam, and the only ship indicated is the ship which is the subject of the agreement of hire for breach of which this action is brought. There is nothing in the words themselves, 'vessel or property to which the cause relates,' which involves any violence of construction in holding them to be applicable to the ship either of plaintiff or defendant as the case may be. I hold, therefore, that the present cause does relate to the plaintiffs' vessel; and, as that vessel was within my jurisdiction at the time the cause was entered, I decide against the application, and I hold that I have jurisdiction to try this action. I may add that sect. 4 of the Act of 1869, which extends the jurisdiction of County Courts in Admiralty to all claims for damage to ships, whether by collision or otherwise, when the amount claimed does not exceed 300*l.*, is plainly intended to cover cases in which damage may be occasioned in many other ways besides collision, and in which the only vessel to which the cause could be said to relate would be the damaged vessel for which the plaintiff brought his action. Whether, upon the hearing of this cause, it may appear to me more convenient and proper that it should be tried within the jurisdiction of the County Court at Poole, is a matter which I may have to consider hereafter; but for the present I dismiss the defendants' application with costs."

From this decision the defendants now appealed.

The following Acts of Parliament are material to the decision:—

County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 71):

Sect. 3. Any court having Admiralty jurisdiction shall have jurisdiction and all powers and authorities relating thereto to try and determine, subject and according to the provisions of this Act, the following causes (in this Act referred to as Admiralty causes): (1.) As to any claim for salvage, any cause in which the value of the property saved does not exceed one thousand pounds, or in which the amount claimed does not exceed three hundred pounds; (2.) As to any claim for towage, necessaries, or wages, any cause in which the amount claimed does not exceed one hundred and fifty pounds; (3.) As to any claim for damage to cargo or damage by collision, any cause in which the amount claimed does not exceed three hundred pounds.

Sect. 21. Proceedings in an Admiralty cause shall be commenced: (1.) In the County Court having Admiralty jurisdiction within the district of which the vessel or property to which the cause relates is at the commencement of the proceedings; (2.) If the foregoing rule be not applicable, then in the County Court having Admiralty jurisdiction in the district of which the owner of the vessel or property to which the cause relates, or his agent in England, resides, or if such owner or agent does not reside within any such district, then in the County Court having Admiralty jurisdiction the district whereof is nearest to the place where such owner or agent resides; (3.) If for any reason the last foregoing rule is not applicable or cannot be acted on, then in such County Court having Admiralty jurisdiction as general orders direct.

County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Amendment Act 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 51):

Sect. 1. This Act may be cited as the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Amendment Act 1869, and shall be read and interpreted as one with the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868.

Sect. 2. Any County Court appointed or to be appointed to have Admiralty jurisdiction shall have jurisdiction and all powers and authorities relating thereto to try and determine the following causes: (1.) As to any claim arising out of any agreement made in relation to the use or hire of any ship or in relation to the carriage of goods carried in any ship, provided the amount claimed does not exceed three hundred pounds.

J. P. Aspinall, for the defendants, in support of the appeal.—The Newcastle County Court judge has no jurisdiction to entertain this cause. Sect. 21 of the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868 has no application to this case. The causes of action, to which that section is applicable, are contained in the preceding sect. 3, and are all cases in which the shipowner is defendant. That provision is somewhat analogous to the usual County Court rule that the residence or place of business of the defendant fixes the district. The County Court Admiralty Jurisdiction Amendment Act 1869, under which the present action is instituted, contains no provisions as to where such an action is to be commenced. It is necessarily an action in personam, and presumably ought to be commenced where the defendant resides or carries on business. Whilst it is true that both Acts are to be read together, only such provisions of the Act of 1868 are to be read into the Act of 1869 as are consistent therewith. The vessel spoken of in the Act of 1868 is the vessel of the defendant. In the present case it is the vessel of the plaintiff. Therefore the provisions as to district in the Act of 1868 have no application to the present case. No general orders have been made, and the present is, probably, a casus omissus, and therefore the plaintiff should follow the general rule of seeking the defendant's forum.

Boyd for the plaintiffs.—The two Acts are to be read as one, and therefore the provisions of the Act of 1868 are applicable to the causes of action enumerated in the Act of 1869. [He was stopped by the Court.]

Sir JAMES HANNEN.—I have nothing to add to the judgment of the County Court judge. It all turns upon the provisions of sect. 1 of the Act of 1869 that the two Acts are to be read as one. If the language of the earlier Act does not apply, the effect of the later Act is to extend the meaning of that language, and so give the jurisdiction.

BUTT, J.—I agree, though, if it had not been that the Acts are to be read as one, I should have had some doubt whether there was jurisdiction.
