CARRIAGE OF GOODS.

1. Bill of lading — Charter-party — Variation—Contract—Exceptions.—The charter-party contains the contract between the owner and the charterer of a ship; and, unless it expressly provides that that contract may be varied by the bill of lading, the shipowner will not be relieved from liability by an exception in the bill of lading which is not in the charter-party. (Ct. of App.) Rodocanachi, Sons, and Co. v. Milburn Brothers .....page 100

2. Bill of lading—Clean margin.—A clean bill of lading is a bill of lading which contains nothing in the margin qualifying the words in the bill of lading itself. (Cave, J.) Restitution Steamship Company v. Sir John Pirie and Co..... 428

3. Bill of lading—Collision—Peril of the sea.—A collision is not necessarily a peril of the sea within the meaning of those words in a bill of lading. (Ct. of App.) The Xantho 8

4. Bill of Lading — Indorsee. — The contract between the indorsee of a bill of lading and the shipowner is contained in the bill of lading. (Ct. of App.) Leduc and Co. v. Ward ..... page 290

5. Bill of lading—Indorsee—Marks on cargo—Estoppel.—Where a memorandum on a bill of lading provides that if quality marks are used (on bales of jute) they are to be of the same size as the leading marks, and contiguous thereto, and if such quality marks are inserted in the shipping notes, and the goods are accepted by the mate, bills of lading in conformity therewith shall be signed by the captain, and "the ship shall be responsible for the correct delivery of the goods," and the mate, by mistake, inserts wrong quality marks in the shipping notes, and the master copies such quality marks into the bill of lading, the shipowner incurs no liability to an indorsee who, without notice of the error, receives the goods actually shipped, because the memorandum does not apply to anything but correct quality marks as existing on the bales themselves, and because the shipowners are not estopped by the representation as to quality in the bill of lading. (Ct. of App.) Cox, Patterson, and Co. v. Bruce and Co. 152

6. Bill of lading—Charter-party—Mate's receipts—Quantity shipped—Estoppel.—Where a charter-party, by which the defendants chartered the plaintiff's ship to carry a cargo of timber from M., provided that the cargo should be brought to and taken from alongside the ship at merchant's risk and expense, and that the bill of lading should be conclusive evidence against the shipowners of the quantity of cargo received as therein stated; and the mate, by orders of the master, who was ignorant of the provisions of the charter-party, gave receipts for a certain quantity of timber at the timber ponds, but some of the timber was lost whilst being rafted down to the ship, and the master, having become aware of the provisions in the charter-party, only consented to sign bills of lading for the quantity mentioned in the mate's receipts on being told by the shippers agents that he was bound to do so, and after he had protested before a public notary in respect of the portion lost, the shipowners were estopped as against the charterers by the bills of lading from denying that the full amount of cargo stated therein had been shipped. (Ct. of App.) Lishman v. Christie and Co. 186

7. Bill of lading—Policy of insurance—Perils of the seas.—The words "perils of the seas" have the same meaning in a policy of insurance and in a bill of lading. (H. of L.) The Xantho 207

8. Carrying capacity—Guarantee—Dead weight—Admissibility of evidence—Practice.—Where a charter-party, which provided that the ship should load a cargo of sleepers and timber, and therewith proceed to Smyrna, contained the words "owners guarantee ship to carry at least about 90,000 cubic feet, or 1500 tons dead weight," but in fact the ship was able to load only 65,000 cubic feet, equal to 1120 tons dead weight of the cargo specified in the charter-party the court held in an action by the charterer against the shipowner that there was no guarantee that the ship would carry the named quantity of the cargo mentioned in the charter-party, i.e., sleepers and timber, and that evidence was admissible to show that she would carry such quantity of dead-weight ordinary cargo. (Q. B. Div.) Carnegie v. Connor and Co. 447

9. Delivery of cargo—Bill of lading—Named consignee—German law.—Where by a bill of lading goods are to be delivered to a named consignee or his assigns, and it is not assigned, the master is not justified either by English or German law in delivering to the consignee without his producing the bill of lading, and if he does so, and the consignee has no right to the possession of the goods, the shipowner is liable to the shipper for damages for wrongful delivery. (Adm. Div.) The Stettin ..... page 395

10. Delivery of cargo—Delay—Non-delivery—Measure of damages—Fall in market-price—Bill of lading.—Where a master signs a bill of lading for goods, the whole of which he is unable to carry, the balance being forwarded by another ship, and the endorsees of the bill of lading take delivery of the part cargo carried by the first vessel upon the representation by the master that the balance will shortly arrive, and before the arrival of the balance the market value falls, the indorsees are entitled to recover against the master as damages for non-delivery of the cargo the loss caused by the fall in the market value, or, more accurately, are entitled to recover the full market value of the part not delivered by the original ship, less its market value when delivered. (Q. B. Div.) Smith, Edwards, and Co. v. Tregarthen 137

11. Delivery of cargo—Non-delivery—Measure of damages—Market value—Freight.—In an action by the charterer against the shipowner for failure to deliver, the measure of damages is the market value of the cargo at the port of destination at the time when the ship would in due course have arrived independently of any circumstances peculiar to the plaintiff, less any freight which has not been prepaid. (Ct. of App.) Rodocanachi, Sons, and Co. v. Milburn Brothers 100

12. Delivery of cargo—Short delivery—Charter-party—Bill of lading—Freight—Excepted perils.—A clause in a charter-party, that the balance of freight is to be paid on the delivery of the cargo agreeably to bills of lading, less cost of cargo delivered short of bill of lading quantity, entitles the charterers where there has been short delivery to set off the cost of such short delivery against the balance of freight, although such short delivery has been occasioned by one of the excepted perils. (Ct. of App.) Sailing Ship Garston Company Limited v. Hickie, Borman, and Co. 71

13. Demurrage—Bill of lading—Charter-party—Consignees—Freight.—Consignees under a bill of lading making the goods deliverable to them "paying freight and all other conditions as per charter-party," are not liable to pay demurrage stipulated for by the charter-party and incurred at the port of loading, though they have taken delivery of the goods, providing they are, and are known to the shipowners to be, acting as agents, and have refused to accept delivery on the terms of the bill of lading, and have repudiated all liability for demurrage before accepting delivery. (Q. B. Div.) Steamship County of Lancaster v. Sharpe and Co. 448

14. Demurrage—Charter-party—Ship to proceed to Odessa, or so near thereto as she might safely get—Commencement of running days.—Where by the terms of a charter-party a ship was to proceed to Odessa, or so near thereto as she might safely get, and deliver her cargo alongside any safe wharf, store, craft, steamer, depôt, ship, or arsenal, as ordered by the receiver, the time for unloading to commence from the time she was ready and intimation thereof has been given in writing, and after her arrival in the harbour, she being ready to discharge was ordered by the receiver to a quay which was the usual place for the discharge of the cargo in question, but she had to wait her turn before she could get alongside the quay to discharge, it was held, that the lay days commenced to run from the time when she was ready to discharge, and that the consignees were liable for the delay during the time she was waiting for her turn. (Adm. Div.) The Carisbrook .....page 507

15. Demurrage—Charter-party—Weather permitting—Loading.—Where by a charter-party shipments are to be made "weather permitting," this means "sea weather" permitting. The weather which interferes to save demurrage in such a case must be weather which if there were cargo ready to load would be an obstacle to the loading of the vessel. Where thunderstorms, rains, and floods caused a delay in bringing the cargo from a distance to the port of loading, this is not such weather as brings the case within the charter-party, so as to save demurrage. (Q. B. Div.) Stephens v. Harris and Co. 192

16. Demurrage — Exception — Strike — Cholera—Cessation of work.—In a charter-party, containing the usual provision for payment of demurrage, with the exception "no demurrage to be paid the vessel in case of any hands 'striking work' which may hinder the loading of vessel," the word "strike" is to be understood in its ordinary meaning, that is, as a strike of workmen against their employers in the ordinary sense of the word. Abandonment of the work by the workmen through fear of cholera, which had broken out in the district, is not a "strike" within the meaning of "hands striking work." (Q. B. Div.) Stephens v. Harris and Co. 192

17. Demurrage—Lay days—Commencement of—Ship to proceed to Odessa or so near thereto as she might safely get.—Where by the terms of a charter-party a ship was to proceed to Odessa or so near thereunto as she might safely get, and there load, and on her arrival in the Odessa outer harbour she could not get alongside a quay loading berth for some days in consequence of the docks being full, and it was only possible to load her alongside a quay berth, it was held that the lay days commenced to run as soon as the ship had arrived in the outer harbour as near as she could safely get to a quay loading berth. (Q. B. Div.) Re an Arbitration between Pyman Brothers and Dreyfus Brothers 444

18. Demurrage—Lay days—Stevedores' strike.—The contract by the freighter to pay demurrage to the shipowner, if the ship is not unloaded at the expiration of a fixed number of lay days, is an absolute one, subject to the shipowner doing nothing to prevent the unloading; and, consequently, where the ship is being unloaded by the joint act of the shipowners and freighters, and under a contract between the shipowners and stevedores the latter employ the necessary dock labourers, and delay in unloading is caused by a strike of the labourers employed on behalf of the shipowners and freighter, the freighter is not relieved from his liability to pay demurrage, as the shipowners have no control over the labourers. (Ct. of App.) Budgett and Co. v. Binnington and Co. 592

19. Excepted perils—Bill of lading—British ship—Lex loci contractus—Law of the flag.—Where goods shipped by a foreigner at a foreign port were to be carried thence to a British port in a British ship, under a bill of lading exempting the shipowner from liability for loss or damage caused by negligent navigation, and according to the lex loci contractus such stipulation was void, the court held that the shipowner was entitled to the benefit of such stipulation, as, from the special provisions of the contract, it appeared that the parties were contracting with a view to the law of England. (Ct. of App.) Re The Missouri Steamship Company Limited; Monroe's claim.....page 423

20. Excepted perils—Bill of lading—Charter-party—All other conditions, &c.—Negligence of master and crew.—The plaintiffs, the indorsees of a bill of lading, sued the defendants for damages for loss of goods shipped on board the defendants' vessel. The goods were shipped by the charterer, and the charter-party contained the following exceptions in print: "The act of God, the Queen's enemies, fire, and all and every other dangers and accidents of the seas, rivers, and navigation, of what nature and kind soever, during the said voyage," and in writing at the end: "Negligence clause as per Baltic Bill of Lading 1885." The clause in the Baltic Bill of Lading 1885 excepted "Strandings, collisions, and all losses, even when occasioned by the negligence, default, or error of judgment of the pilot, master, mariners, or other servants of the shipowner." The bill of lading provided that the goods were to be delivered, "the act of God, &c., excepted, unto order or to assigns, they paying freight for the said coals, and all other conditions as per charter-party with average accustomed." Held, that the reference to the charter-party did not extend the exceptions contained in the bill of lading, and that, as the goods were lost through the negligence of the master of the vessel, the plaintiffs were entitled to judgment. (Huddleston, B.) Serraino and Sons v. Campbell 526

21. Excepted perils—Bill of lading—Charter-party—"All other conditions, &c."—Incorporation.—Where a bill of lading contains certain excepted perils, and after them the words "paying freight for the said coals and all other conditions as per charter-party," the latter words do not incorporate the excepted perils in the charter-party, but they only refer to the conditions in the charter-party ejusdem generis with the payment of freight. (Huddleston, B.; since affirmed on appeal.) Serraino and Sons v. Campbell 526

22. Excepted perils—Bill of lading—Jettisoned deck cargo—Shipowner's risk.—Where cargo is carried on deck at the shipowner's risk in violation of the contract contained in the bills of lading which contain an exception relieving the shipowner from liability for goods jettisoned, the shipowner is liable to the indorsees for the jettison, notwithstanding the fact that it is carried on deck in accordance with the practice of the port of loading and with the knowledge and acquiescence of the shipper. (H. of L.) Royal Exchange Shipping Company v. Dixon 92

23. Excepted perils—Bill of lading—Negligence—Navigation.—The exceptions in a bill of lading of "negligence or default of the pilot, master, mariners, engineers or other persons in the service of the ship, whether in navigating the ship or otherwise," are an absolute exception from liability for damage caused, whether in negligently navigating the ship or in negligently bringing about any other losses from which the shipowner has exempted himself in the bill of lading. (Q. B. Div.) Norman v. Binnington 528

24. Excepted perils—Charter-party — Engineers—Negligence — Navigation. — A provision in a charter-party exempting the owners from liability for loss of or damage to cargo caused by the "act, neglect, or default of the master or crew in the navigation of the said vessel in the ordinary course of the voyage" does not relieve them from liability for damage to cargo caused by the joint negligence of one of their crew and shore engineers employed by them to repair the ship's engines, whereby water gets to the cargo when the ship is moored in dock at her port of destination and after part of her cargo has been discharged. (Ct. of App.) The Accomac... page 579

25. Excepted perils—Charter-party—Neaps, and stoppage of navigation—Delay in loading.—Where it was agreed by charter-party that the charterer should not be liable for delay in loading caused by neaps and stoppage of navigation, and the lay days were exceeded in consequence of the lighters which were bringing the cargo (one of salt) down the rivers Weaver and Mersey to Birkenhead, the place of loading, being delayed by neaps of exceptional lowness at the junction of the Mersey and Weaver, and it was proved that it is the invariable practice for all salt intended for foreign exportation to be brought to Birkenhead from the Weaver by water; that there are no storehouses for salt at Birkenhead; and that it is never kept there to await the arrival of vessels, the charterer was held to be relieved from liability under the above exceptions, upon the ground that they must be taken to apply to bringing the cargo to Birkenhead for loading purposes. (Charles, J.) The Sailing Ship Atherton Company Limited v. Falk..... 287

26. Excepted perils—Charter-party—Negligence—Sea-water—Voyage—Unseaworthiness.—Where by the terms of a charter-party a ship described as being at A. is to proceed to B. and there load a cargo for delivery at C., the shipowner not to be liable (inter alia) for the negligence of the master or crew, or other servants, "during the said voyage," and after part of the cargo has been taken on board at B., and before the ship has started, such cargo is damaged by water which gets into the hold through a valve in the engine-room being left open by the negligence of one of the engineers, such damage is caused by the above excepted peril "during the said voyage," nor is the ship to be deemed to be unseaworthy, and therefore the shipowner is not liable. (Adm. Div.) The Carron Park 543

27. Excepted perils—Negligence of pilots, master, and mariners—Bill of lading—Stowage of goods—Voyage.—The exceptions in a bill of lading of "negligence or default of the pilot, master, mariners, engineers, or other persons in the service of the ship, whether in navigating the ship or otherwise," apply to damage done to goods whilst being stowed and before the voyage has commenced. (Q. B. Div.) Norman v. Binnington and Co. 528

28. Excepted perils—Collisions—Dangers and accidents of the seas—Loss of cargo—Bill of lading—Charter-party.—Where goods carried under a charter-party, providing that the shipowner is not to be liable for "dangers and accidents of the seas, rivers, and navigation," are damaged through collision with another ship, the shipowner is not liable if the collision was due solely to the negligence of the other ship. (Ct. of App.) Sailing Ship Garston Company Limited v. Hickie, Borman, and Co. 71

29. Excepted perils—Collision—Loss of cargo—Bill of lading.—Loss of or damage to cargo by collision happening without any negligence on the part of the carrying ship, is loss or damage by perils of the seas within the meaning of those words in a bill of lading. (H. of L.) The Xantho..... 207

30. Excepted perils—Dangers and accidents of the seas—Charter-party—Bill of lading—Rats.—Damage to cargo caused by sea-water entering through a pipe which has been gnawed through by rats, where there is no negligence on the part of the master and crew is caused by a "danger or accident of the seas" within the meaning of a charter-party and bill of lading. (H. of L. reversing Ct. of App.) Pandorf v. Hamilton, Frazer, and Co. ..... page 212

31. Excepted perils—Loss of cargo—Bill of lading—Collision—Onus of proof—Practice.—Quære, whether, where a shipowner is sued for loss of cargo carried by him under a bill of lading containing the exception perils of the sea, and the plaintiff proves non-delivery and the shipowner loss by collision, the onus of showing negligence is thrown upon the plaintiff, or whether the defendant must show that the collision occurred without any negligence on his part. (H. of L.) The Xantho..... 207

32. Excepted perils—Transshipment—Bills of lading—Loss of cargo.—Where a vessel laden with cargo discontinues her voyage, and the cargo is transshipped by the shipowner into other bottoms for the purpose of earning the freight due under the original contract of carriage—but without the assent of the cargo-owners, although they were within reach of communication—the shipowner cannot, in an action by the cargo-owner for non-delivery, protect himself from liability by exceptions in the bills of lading given by the masters of the ships into which the goods have been transhipped, if such exceptions were not contained in the original charter-party and bill of lading. (Adm.) The Bernina 112

33. Freight—Advance of—Charter-party—Insurance.—Where a cargo is shipped under a charter-party containing the clause "one third freight, if required, to be advanced less three per cent. for interest and insurance, and the vessel is wrecked and the cargo lost, the charterers are liable to pay the advanced freight, although the shipowners do not ask for payment until after the loss. (Charles, J.; since reversed on appeal, see vol. vii.) Smith, Hill, and Co. v. Pyman, Bell, and Co. 565

34. Freight—Advance of—Loss of cargo—Measure of damages—Charter-party.—Where goods bought on terms including cost freight and insurance are shipped by the vendors on the defendant's ship under a charter-party stipulating for the payment of freight in advance, and the goods are lost by the defendant's negligence, the vendees having paid the vendors for the goods a sum which included the advanced freight and having received in exchange the bills of lading and a policy on the advanced freight, are entitled in an action against the shipowners for non-delivery, the damages being considered with reference to the value of the goods at their port of destination, to recover as part of their damages the advanced freight as being part of the price of the goods, and consequently the insurer who has paid to the cargo owner the amount of such advanced freight is entitled to sue for it in the plaintiff's name unless debarred by agreement. (Denman, J.) Dufourcet and Co. v. Bishop and others 109

35. Limitation of liability—Collision—Transshipment—Subsequent loss of cargo.—When, in consequence of a collision, cargo is transshipped and lost by the negligence of the master and crew of the then carrying ship, the decree in a limitation action, limiting the liability of the owner of the original ship in respect of the loss or damage caused by the improper navigation of his ship on the occasion of the collision, does not protect him from liability for the subsequent loss of the cargo, and the cargo-owners, notwithstanding such decree, are entitled to sue him for the loss. (Adm.) The Bernina.....page 112

36. Parties—Right to sue—Loss of cargo—Bill of lading—Indorsee.—Where plaintiffs in an action for loss of cargo by collision prove that the cargo was shipped to their order, and that the bill of lading is indorsed to a bank to secure advances, they retain sufficient interest in the cargo to entitle them to sue. (Priv. Co.) The Glamorganshire..... 344

CHARTER PARTY.

1. Construction—Cancellation clause—Custom of port—Ready to receive cargo.—Where by a charter-party made and signed in London it was provided that the charterers should have the option of cancelling the charter if the ship was not "ready to receive cargo" at a foreign port by a certain date the question whether the ship was ready to receive cargo within the charter-party is not affected by a custom of the port of loading by which vessels are not to be considered ready to receive cargo till moored alongside the quay, but must be determined by the fact whether the ship is or is not in the port in readiness to go to a loading berth before the named date. (Charles, J.) Hick v. Tweedy and Co..... 599

2. Construction—Cesser clause—Colliery guarantee—Demurrage.—It was agreed by charter-party between the plaintiffs, the owners of a steamship, and the defendants, the charterers, that the ship should proceed to C. and there "load in the usual and customary manner a cargo of coals," and proceed to T. "The vessel to be loaded as customary, but subject in all respects to the colliery guarantee, in 108 colliery working hours." The cargo was to be unloaded at a specified rate per day, "or charterers to pay demurrage at the rate of 30s. per hour." The master was to sign "clean bills of lading without alteration as presented by charterers." "The charterers' liability under this charter-party to cease on the cargo being loaded and the advance freight paid, the owners having a lien on the cargo for the balance of the freight and demurrage." By a colliery guarantee, the proprietors of a colliery undertook to load the ship for the defendants in 108 hours. "Demurrage, if any, to be at the rate of 20s. per hour." The vessel was not loaded in 108 colliery working hours. In an action brought by the plaintiffs against the defendants for damages for demurrage, or in the alternative for detaining the vessel an unreasonable time at the port of loading: Held, that the defendants were not liable, as the "cesser clause" in the charter-party covered the claim made by the plaintiffs. (Cave, J.) Restitution Steamship Company v. Sir John Pirie and Co..... 428

3. Construction — Cesser clause — Demurrage.—A "cesser clause" in a charter-party applies not merely to liability for demurrage, but to liability incurred through detention in the nature of demurrage. (Cave, J.) Restitution Steamship Company v. Sir John Pirie and Co..... 428

4. Demurrage — Colliery guarantee — Charterers' liability—Right of action.—Semble, that the owners of a ship have no right of action against the charterers under a colliery guarantee whereby colliery proprietors contract with the charterers to load the ship in a specified time and fail to do so, unless the guarantee is incorporated with the charter-party; but that the right of action under such guarantee, if the shipowners have any such right at all, would be against the colliery proprietors. (Cave, J.) Restitution Steamship Company v. Sir John Pirie and Co. ... page 428

5. Disbursements — Coals — Charterers and shipowners' liability. — By a charter-party between the charterers and the owners of a steamer, it was provided that the owners should maintain her in a thoroughly efficient state; that the charterers should provide and pay for all coals and fuel, port charges, pilotages, agencies, commissions, and all other charges whatsoever not appertaining to the working or efficiency of the steamer; and that if in consequence of the deficiency of men or stores, collision, want of repairs, breakdown, and other causes, she put into any port other than that to which she was bound, the port charges, pilotages, and other expenses at such port should be borne by the owners. The steamer put into a port to which she was not bound, for the alleged purpose of repairing the condenser, which was leaking. In consequence of such deviation the master had to buy extra coals, and now sought to make the shipowners liable for them. Held, that, assuming the deviation was caused by the breakdown of the condenser, the price of the coals was not "port charges, pilotages, and other expenses," and that therefore the shipowners were not liable. (Adm. Div.) The Durham City..... 411

6. Principal and agent—Liability of.—1. A charter-party signed by persons in their own names without qualification renders them personally liable as principals unless there is something in the body of the contract inconsistent with their personal responsibility, and this is so even though they may have in fact signed as agents for other persons. COLLISION.

1. Arbitration—Mutual Collision Club—Estoppel—A. and B. were members of a Smack-owners' Mutual Collision Club. By art. 52 of its articles of association the club was liable only up to 30*l*. By art. 56 it was provided that "in the event of a collision occurring between two vessels insured in this company, or their respective trawling gear, and damages being caused thereby to either or both of the said vessels or their gear, the owners of such vessel shall immediately submit a statement of the whole circumstances of the collision, and the directors, after receiving such statement, shall have power to arbitrate on the matter, and their decision in the matter shall be final and conclusive." A. gave notice to the club that the trawl warp of his fishing smack had been cut by B.'s fishing smack drawing her trawl across A.'s trawl. A.'s master was subsequently taken by A.'s agent to a meeting of the directors, and there examined as to the alleged collision, and his evidence was reduced into writing by the secretary. The secretary then gave notice to B. of A.'s claim, and thereupon B.'s mate attended a meeting of the directors and gave evidence, the effect of which was that the damage had not been done by his ship or trawl gear. His evidence was also reduced into writing. At a subsequent meeting of the directors B.'s master was examined, the written statements of the two other witnesses were then read over, and the directors then passed a resolution that B.'s trawl had not been in collision with A.'s. The plaintiff was not present when either of the defendant's witnesses were examined, nor when his claim was adjudicated upon, and had no notice that the meetings were to take place. A. having sued B. in rem in the County Court, B. alleged that the decision of the directors was final. Held, that the plaintiff had never submitted his claim against B. to the directors; that there had been no proper hearing of the case by the directors, and that the alleged arbitration was no defence to the action. (Adm. Div.) The Warwick .....page 545

2. Barge in dock—No one in charge—Negligence.—Whilst a barge was by night lying astern of a steamship in a dock the latter moved her propeller and cut a hole in the barge. It appeared that there was no one on board the barge at the time of the accident. In a collision action: Held, that, although the steamer was to blame, the barge was also to blame for not having anyone on board of her, as, had there been, the collision might have been avoided, and in any event the barge might have been beached before she sank, and therefore the plaintiffs could only recover half the damages. (Adm. Ct.) The Scotia 541

3. Compulsory pilotage—Danube Navigation Rules—Liability of shipowners.—The provisions of arts. 85, 89, and 92 of the regulations for the navigation of the Lower Danube, making the employment of pilots by steamers compulsory but confining their duties to pointing out the local peculiarities of the river and leaving the responsibility of the navigation with the master, do not relieve shipowners from liability for damage solely caused by the negligent navigation of the pilot. (Adm.) The Agnes Otto 119

4. Compulsory pilotage — Havre — Foreign law.—Although the employment of a pilot by a vessel entering the port of Havre is, by French law, compulsory, such pilot does not as of right, as is the case in England, supersede the master and take charge of the ship, but, according to French decisions, the master remains in charge, the pilot being merely his adviser; hence, though the master may allow such pilot to take charge in fact, the owners are not exempted from liability for damage done to another ship by the negligence of the pilot. (Ct. of App. affirming Adm. Div.) The Augusta 58, 161

5. Compulsory pilotage—Tyne Pilotage Order Confirmation Act, 1865.—The Tyne Pilotage Order Confirmation Act 1865 (28 & 29 Vict. c. 44) was meant to be a complete code for regulating pilotage in the River Tyne, and was intended to supersede the pilotage provisions in the Act 41 Geo. 3, c. lxxxvi., and therefore sect. 16 of the schedule of the Tyne Pilotage Order Confirmation Act 1865 exempts all vessels, whether British or foreign, from compulsory pilotage in the port of Newcastle-upon-Tyne. (Ct. of App. affirming Adm.) The Johann Sverdrup... page 16, 73

6. Compulsory pilotage—Vessel at anchor—Burden of proof.—Where the plaintiffs in a collision action show that their vessel was at anchor exhibiting a proper light, and was struck and damaged by another ship, they make a primâ facie case of negligence against the defendants, the owners of the ship in motion, and the burden of proof upon the defendants, to rebut the presumption of liability, is not discharged by merely proving that their ship was in charge of a pilot by compulsion of law without proving that the cause of the collision was solely the fault of the pilot. (Ct. of App.) The Indus..... 105

7. Costs—Admission of liability—Both ships to blame.—In a collision case where both ships are to blame, the plaintiff is entitled to his costs if in his statement of claim he admits that he is to blame. (Adm. Ct.) The General Gordon 533

8. Costs—Compulsory pilotage—Pleadings.—Where in a collision action the plaintiffs, upon the defendants pleading compulsory pilotage, discontinue the action, they must, in the absence of special circumstances, pay all the costs. (Adm.) The J. H. Henkes..... 121

9. Costs—Counter-claim — Compulsory pilotage.—In a collision action, where the defendants' vessel, although solely to blame on the merits, is relieved from liability on the ground of compulsory pilotage, a counter-claim will be dismissed with costs. (Adm. Div.) The Ruby 577

10. Costs—County Court.—Where successful plaintiffs in a collision action in the High Court recovered less than 300*l.* they were allowed no costs, although they claimed more than the County Court limit. (Adm. Div.) The Herald 542

11. Costs—Inevitable accident.—In cases of collision caused by inevitable accident, costs, as a general rule, will follow the event, notwithstanding the former practice in the Admiralty Court to make no order as to costs in such cases. (Ct. of App.) The Monkseaton 383

12. Costs—Inevitable accident.—As a general rule a defendant relying upon and succeeding upon the defence of inevitable accident in a case of collision is entitled to his costs, but there may be exceptions to this rule as where, in addition to such defence, the defendant alleges facts inconsistent therewith and fails to establish their truth. (Ct. of App.) The Batavier..... 500

13. Costs—Inevitable accident—Pleadings.—Where the plaintiffs in a collision action admit in their reply that the collision was not occasioned by the defendants' negligence, and offer to consent to a decree of inevitable accident, the defendants, in the absence of special circumstances, are entitled to judgment with costs. (Adm.) The Naples ... 30

14. Costs—Joint defendants—Judgment against one.—Where the owners of a barge in tow of a tug having been damaged by collision with a steamship, instituted an action against the owners of both tug and steamer to recover damages, and the steamer, which alleged that the collision was due to the negligence of the tug, was found alone to blame, the Court ordered the owners of the steamer to pay the costs of the plaintiffs and of the successful defendants. (Adm. Div.) The River Lagan .....page 281

15. Costs—Joint defendants—Judgment against one.—Where the owners of a pier, which had been damaged by the steamship V. colliding with it, sued jointly the owners of the V. and the owners of the steamship A. for the damage, alleging that the damage was due to the negligence of the V., or alternatively that the V. was forced to come into contact with the pier by reason of the negligent navigation of the A., and each defendant by his defence alleged that the damage was due to the negligence of the other steamer, the Court having found that the A. was to blame, ordered her owners to pay the costs of the plaintiffs, and of the owners of the V. (Hawkins, J.) Green and Burleigh v. Goodyear and the General Steam Navigation Company... 281 n.

16. Damages — Consequential loss of earnings — Chartered voyage—Demurrage.—Where a ship is damaged by collision while prosecuting a voyage in the course of which she has secured an engagement for a new voyage, and in consequence of such damage is unable to fulfil the engagement, her owners are entitled to recover from the wrongdoer the fair and ordinary earnings which she might have earned on the new voyage, less any earning she in fact made during the whole or any period of the time she would have been engaged in the new voyage if the accident had not happened, the loss of such earnings being the direct and natural consequence of the collision, but they are not entitled in addition thereto to demurrage during the time the ship is under repair. (Ct. of App. and H. of L.) The Argentino... 348, 433

17. Damages—Demurrage—Evidence.—To entitle a shipowner to recover demurrage he must show actual loss resulting from the detention of his ship, and give reasonable proof of its amount. (Priv. Co.) The City of Peking 572

18. Damages—Demurrage—Substitution of another vessel—Wages and maintenance.—Where successful plaintiffs in a collision action claimed demurrage during the time their vessel was under repairs, and it appeared that the plaintiffs substituted another of their ships to do the work of the damaged ship, the expenses and loss incidental to this substitution being allowed against the defendants, and the plaintiffs failed to show that they had sustained any pecuniary loss by the detention of their ship, it was held that they were not entitled to recover demurrage; but that, if they could show an actual out-of-pocket expense usually included in the term demurrage, such as wages and maintenance of crew, they would be entitled to recover such sums. (Priv. Co.) The City of Peking..... 572

19. Damages—Loss subsequent to Collision—Mistake without negligence.—In an action for damages by collision, a claim for consequential loss, caused by a mistake of the master of the injured vessel after the collision, is recoverable from the wrongdoer in the absence of negligence or want of ordinary skill on the part of the master, provided such mistake was one which might reasonably have been made in consequence of the damaged condition of the vessel. (Ct. of App.) The City of Lincoln 475

20. Damages—Loss subsequent to collision—Mistake—Without negligence.—A collision between the Swedish barque A. and the steamship C., about 6 p.m. on the 7th Nov., about twelve miles N. of the Hinder Lightship, was solely caused by the negligent navigation of the steamship. In consequence of the collision the barque's starboard quarter was cut off, and her steering compass, log glass, and gear for rudder and wheel were lost. The steering compass having been replaced by a spare compass and tackles having been rigged on to the rudder, the master of the A., with a view to saving the vessel, sailed up the Thames, but between three and four p.m. next day the A. went ashore in consequence of her master mistaking the Tongue Lightship for the Kentish Knock. The owners of the barque (inter alia) claimed for the loss occasioned by the stranding. Held, that the stranding was due to the master of the barque being deprived by the collision of the ordinary means of navigation, and that in the circumstances the owners of the steamship were liable. (Ct. of App.) The City of Lincoln.....page 475

21. Damages—Measure of—Registrar and merchants—Improper abandonment—Cost of raising.—Where, in a collision action for which the defendants were held to blame, the court found that after the collision the plaintiff's vessel had been improperly abandoned, and it appeared that in consequence thereof she sank and was afterwards raised by the plaintiffs, whereas she might have been beached, the Court directed the registrar in assessing the damages, that, as the only ascertainable extra cost arising from the abandonment was the cost of raising, he was to disallow that amount. (Adm. Div.) The Hansa..... 268

22. Damages—Registrar and merchants—Practice—Evidence.—On a reference in a collision action the registrar and merchants are not bound by uncontradicted evidence as to the amount of damage done, but are entitled to use their own judgment and experience, and find in accordance therewith. (Adm.) The Bernina 65

23. Damages—Registrar and merchants—Practice—Insolvency of claimant—Shipwright.—Where in the registrar's report in a collision action it appears that the claimant claims (inter alia) as part of his damages the cost of repairing his ship, but has not paid the shipwright, and has since the repairs were effected become insolvent, and the registrar allows such item, the court has no power to do anything to ensure the money being paid over by the claimant to the shipwright, and will not retain the money in the registry until the claimant has given satisfactory evidence that he has paid the shipwright. (Adm. Div.). The Endeavour 511

24. Damages—Restitutio in integrum—Classification.—A successful plaintiff in a collision action is entitled to have his ship put into the same condition in which it was previous to the collision at the cost of the wrong-doer, irrespective of the fact that some of the of the repairs necessitated by the collision would shortly have been necessary to enable the ship to pass her classification survey, and in estimating the amount of the wrong-doer's liability no deduction can be made on this account, unless it be shown that any part of the work done was for the classification rather than arising out of the collision. (Adm.) The Bernina 65

25. Fog—Altering helm.—Where those in charge of a steamship in a dense fog heard a steam-whistle about three and a half points on their starboard bow, distant about half a mile, and starboarded, the Court held that in the circumstances it was a proper manœuvre. (Ct. of App. and H. of L.) The Vindomora 438, 569

26. Fog—Altering helm. Although where two vessels are approaching one another in a fog without sufficient indication to justify them in acting with their helm, neither vessel ought to alter her course, yet there is no hard-and-fast rule that a vessel hearing only a single whistle is never justified in manœuvring, and must be held to blame if she does so, but each case must be determined according to its own circumstances. (Ct. of App. and H. of L.) The Vindomara...page 438, 569

27. Fog—Altering helm.—Where those in charge of a steamship in a dense fog hear the whistle of another steamship on either bow, but not so broad that they may reasonably infer that she will clear their vessel, they ought not to manœuvre with the helm before seeing the other vessel. (Adm. Div.) The Resolution..... 363

28. Humber and Ouse navigation—Keel—Dredging up.—A keel with her mast lowered may drive up the river Ouse on a flood tide in any part of a river lashed to another keel, but it is her duty in such circumstances to go up dredging with her anchor down, in order that she may thereby have the means in an emergency of bringing herself up if necessary; and whilst two keels may drive up lashed together, there is no less duty imposed on them to dredge. (Adm.) The Ralph Creyke ... 19

29. Humber and Ouse Navigation—Keel—Dredging-up—Navigable channel.—In the absence of any rule of the road, regulation, or custom, there is no duty on the part of a keel or barge drifting up river to keep out of the deep water navigation and navigate in the shallow water, even though by remaining in the deep water she obstructs the passage of steamships which can only navigate in the deep water. (Adm.) The Ralph Creyke ... 19

30. Humber and Ouse Navigation—Steamer—Smelling the ground—Speed.—Where a steamer is navigating a reach in which there is a risk of her smelling the ground, it is her duty to be under such control by occasionally stopping her engines or otherwise, that she may be able to avoid collision with other craft in case she does smell the ground and fails to answer her helm. (Adm.) The Ralph Creyke 19

31. Humber Navigation—Vessel at anchor—Lights.—Art. 2 of the rules for the navigation of the river Humber requiring that vessels having two or more masts when at anchor shall exhibit two white lights, one near the bow the other near the stern, the latter of which shall be exhibited "at double the height of the bow light" does not require that the stern light shall be precisely double the height of the other; and therefore, where the lights were exhibited ten and twenty-five feet respectively from the deck, it was held that there was no breach of the regulation. (Adm. Ct.) The Magneta 531

32. Liability in rem—Tug towing under charter—Tug owners not personally liable.—A ship is not liable to be proceeded against in rem for damages unless her owners at the time of the accident are personally liable, and could be proceeded against in personam for the damage. Hence, where a tug company contract to tow upon terms exempting them from liability for damage caused be negligence, and they engage by charter a tug belonging to a third person to perform the towage, and the tug is by the charter placed under the charge of a servant of the company by whose negligence damage is done to a tow, the tug company by reason of the contract not being liable, and the owner of the tug not being personally liable, there is no liability in rem on the part of the tug for the damage done. (Adm. Div.) The Tasmania..... 305

33. Look-out—Fishing smack—Number of hands on deck.—It is the duty of a sailing smack during the day to have more than one hand on deck, and where a collision occurs between her and another smack, the primary cause of which is the wrongful manœuvre of the other smack, she will also be held to blame if it appears that had she had two hands on deck they might have taken means to have obviated the other's wrongful manœuvre. (Adm. Ct.) The General Gordon.....page 533

34. Loss of life—Action in personam—Both ships to blame—Contributory negligence—Identification with carrying ship—Lord Campbell's Act.—Where passengers and seamen off duty are killed in a collision between two ships, both of which are to blame, the deceased are not identified with their carrying ship so as to be deemed to be guilty of contributory negligence, and their personal representatives are entitled under Lord Campbell's Act to maintain actions against the owners of the non-carrying ship. (H. of L. affirming Ct. of App.) The Bernina 75, 257

35. Loss of life—Action for—Lord Campbell's Act—Both ships to blame—Measure of damages.—Sect. 25, sub-sect. 9, of the Judicature Act 1873, providing that "in any cause or proceeding for damages arising out of a collision between two ships, if both ships shall be found to have been in fault, the rules hitherto in force in the Court of Admiralty, so far as they have been at variance with the rules in force in the courts of common law shall prevail," has no application to actions under Lord Campbell's Act instituted to recover damages for loss of life occasioned by a collision between two ships for which both are to blame, and hence successful plaintiffs in such cases are entitled to recover full damages, and are not limited by the Admiralty Court rule as to the division of damages to recovering only a moiety. (Ct. of App.) The Bernina 75

36. Loss of life—Lord Campbell's Act—Judgment by default—Writ of inquiry—Practice.—Where, in an action for loss of life by collision under Lord Campbell's Act instituted in the Admiralty Division the defendant makes default in pleading, the plaintiffs are entitled, under Order XXVII., r. 4, to enter interlocutory judgment, and to have the damages assessed and apportioned by a jury, and a writ of inquiry will be issued accordingly. (Adm. Div.) The Orwell 309

37. Mersey Navigation Rules—Breach—Effect of—Lights.—The steamship H. at night ran into the barque E. at anchor in the river Mersey. By Order in Council of the 5th Jan. 1881, made under the powers of the Merchant Shipping Act 1862, every vessel when at anchor in the river Mersey shall carry two white lights, the after light being carried double the height of the foremost light. The E. exhibited two anchor lights, both of which were about twenty feet above the deck. It was admitted by the defendants that they only saw the after light. Held, that the H. was to blame for a bad look-out, and the E. to blame for a breach of the regulation, it not being shown that in the circumstances of the case the breach could not have contributed to the collision. (Adm. Div.) The Hermod 509

38. Mersey Navigation Rules—Stern light.—The proper place to carry the stern light prescribed by art. 5 of the Mersey Rules is from the centre of the taffrail, so that it is a foot or eighteen inches below it. (Adm.) The Fire Queen 146

39. Practice—Both ships to blame—Agreement to discontinue.—The owners of a ship, and the owners of the cargo on board it, respectively instituted actions in rem against another ship for damage by collision. In the ship action the parties signed a consent to "this action being discontinued on the ground of inevitable accident," and the registrar made an order for discontinuance accordingly. In the cargo action both ships were found to be in fault, and the defendants obtained a decree limiting their liability. The plaintiffs in the ship action thereupon obtained an order from the court to rescind the order for discontinuance, and made a claim in the limitation action against the fund in court. Held (affirming the judgment of the court below), that they were entitled to do so, the agreement and consent order amounting only to a discontinuance, and not to a release of all rights. (H. of L.) The Kronprinz; The Ardandhu .....page 124

40. Practice—Double litigation—Lis alibi pendens —English and foreign courts — Bail. — The owners of the British ship R. and the owners of her cargo sued the German steamship R. in the German Consular Court at Constantinople for damages for injury to the cargo caused by collision between the two vessels. An order was made therein for the arrest of the R., or for bail, subject to the plaintiffs giving security for a certain sum. The action was proceeded with, but the plaintiffs never gave the required security, and consequently the R. was never arrested. The R. left Constantinople during the pendency of the action and came to England, where she was arrested in the present action in rem instituted by the owners of cargo in respect of the same cause of action. Previously to the institution of the present action the defendants had given bail in the action at Constantinople, to which port the R. was a constant trader, although the plaintiffs in that action had never given the required security. The limit of the defendants' liability in the German Consular Court was the value of the R., a sum considerably less than the limit of their liability in this country. Upon motion by the defendants to release the R. without giving bail, or to stay the action: Held (affirming Butt, J.), that bail having been given without the plaintiffs having deposited the required security, was given voluntarily and not under compulsion, and that the plaintiffs were not proceeding vexatiously in instituting a second action in this country, and that the ship ought not to be released. (Ct. of App.) The Reinbeck 366

41. Practice—Authority of master—Right to sue—Foreign port—Cargo.—Semble, that the master of a ship carrying cargo, where his ship and cargo have been damaged by collision in or near a foreign port, has authority to institute an action in rem in the foreign port against the offending ship on behalf of both ship and cargo, and the owners of the cargo cannot, so long as that suit is pending in their names, be allowed to deny his authority. (Adm. Div.) The Reinbeck 366

42. Practice—Interrogatories—Preliminary Act—Crew drowned.—In a collision action, where the plaintiffs' vessel was lost with all her crew who could give evidence as to the collision, the Court allowed the plaintiffs, before filing their statement of claim, to administer interrogatories to the defendants as to the circumstances of the collision, including information given in the preliminary act. (Adm. Ct.) The Isle of Cyprus..... 534

43. Practice—Laches—Delay—Trial.—In a collision action in rem the plaintiffs are not limited to any specified time during which they must institute their action, but where there has been a long lapse of time between the collision and the institution of the action, and the defendants seek to have the action dismissed on the ground of laches and delay, the question for the court in each case is whether it is inequitable to allow the action to proceed, and in determining this question the court will consider the opportunities the plaintiffs have had of arresting the defendants' ship, the availability of the defendants' witnesses, and all other circumstances affecting the possibility of securing a fair trial; and should the action be allowed to proceed, every reasonable presumption will be made at the hearing in favour of the defendants. (Adm. Div.) The Kong Magnus...page 583

44. Practice—Laches—Delay—Trial.—A collision having occurred between the British ship M. and the Norwegian steamship K. M. in 1878, the owners of the M. in 1889 instituted the present action in rem. The K. M. was owned by a limited company in which there had been changes of interest since the collision. Between the dates of the collision and action the K. M. had been thirty-five times in English ports, and twelve times in Scotch ports. Some of the crew of the K. M. were not available to give evidence. The defendants asked the court to refuse to entertain the action on the ground of laches and delay in its institution. Held, that, although the plaintiffs had had several opportunities of arresting the K. M., the circumstances were not such as to make it inequitable for the action to proceed, but that in trying the case the court would make every reasonable presumption in favour of the defendants. (Adm. Div.) The Kong Magnus ... 583

45. Practice — Nautical assessors — Evidence of nautical matters—Screw alley.—In Admiralty actions, where the court is assisted by nautical assessors, evidence as to matters of nautical skill and knowledge is not admissible, and hence, where in a damage to cargo action the judge found, on the advice of his assessors, that all screw alleys, however well made, may emit smells which may damage sensitive cargo stowed in the vicinity, the Court of Appeal, being assisted by assessors, refused to allow the appellants, the shipowners, at the hearing of the appeal, to call evidence to show that the particular screw alley did not emit a smell, on the ground that it was a question of nautical skill about which evidence could not be given. (Ct. of App.) The Assyrian 525

46. Practice—Nautical assessors — Reasons — Appeal.—Where in a collision action the nautical assessors sitting in the Admiralty Division reduce their reasons into writing, parties appealing from the decision are not entitled to see these reasons or have copies of them for the purposes of the appeal. (Ct. of App.) The Banshee 130

47. Practice—Preliminary act—R. S. C., Order XIX., r. 28.—The principle of filing a preliminary act, under Order XIX., r. 28, applies to every division of the High Court, and is not confined exclusively to actions in the Admiralty Division. (Q. B. Div.) Secretary of State for India v. Hewitt and Co. Limited 384

48. Practice — Preliminary act — Queen's Bench Division.— Where owners of cargo laden on a barge sued the owners of a vessel in the Queen's Bench Division for damage to the cargo caused by a collision between the barge and defendant's vessel, the court ordered the plaintiff to file a preliminary act. (Q. B. Div.) Secretary of State for India v. Hewitt and Co. Limited 384

49. Practice — Preliminary act — Queen's Bench Division.—Where the owner of a barge sued the owners of a tug in the Queen's Bench Division for damage to the barge and her cargo caused by the tug towing her into collision with another vessel, the Court refused to order the plaintiffs to file a preliminary act. (Q. B. Div.) Armstrong and Co. v. Gaselee and others .....page 353

50. Practice—Sale of ship—Damages.—Where the plaintiffs in a collision action in rem applied to the court to order a sale of their ship so as to bind the defendants on the question of damages hereafter, the Court refused the application. (Adm. Div.) The Wexford 244

51. Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea—Breach.—An infringement of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, which by no possibility could have anything to do with the collision, will not render a ship liable. (Priv. Co.) The Glamorganshire 344

52. Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea—Breach, effect of—Onus of proof.—In a collision action where either party has infringed the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, he is deemed to be in fault unless he can establish that the infringement could not possibly have caused or contributed to the collision; and it is the duty of the judge to determine upon the evidence whether or not the party committing the breach has satisfied the burden of proof that the breach could not possibly have occasioned or contributed to the collision. (Ct. of App.) The Duke of Buccleugh 471

53. Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, art. 3.—Breach—Effect of.—The steamship A. collided with the sailing ship B., striking her on the port bow with her stem. The red light of the sailing ship was obscured by the foresail to a vessel substantially right ahead. The steamship approached the sailing ship on a bearing never less than one point to two and a half points on the port bow, and the red light of the sailing ship was in fact always open to the steamship. Held, that, on the proper construction of sect. 17 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1873, although the sailing ship had infringed the regulations as to lights, the court was bound to consider the evidence as to whether such infringement could in fact have contributed to the collision, and that, as in the circumstances the infringement could not possibly have contributed to the collision, the owners of the sailing ship were not to blame. (Ct. of App.) The Duke of Buccleugh 471

54. Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea—Breach of—Merchant Shipping Act 1873.—Where those in charge of a ship, although exercising reasonable care, do not in fact know, and have not the means of knowing, that they are infringing one of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, the ship will not be held in fault under sect. 17 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1873 (36 & 37 Vict. c. 85. (H. of L.) The Theodore H. Rand 122

55. Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea—Breach—Necessity.—Where one of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea has been infringed by a vessel, the fact that the infringement is comparatively venial, and that the reckless navigation of the other vessel is the principal and primary cause of the collision, does not justify the court in absolving the vessel guilty of infringement from blame unless necessity for such infringement is established. (Priv. Co.) The Aratoon Apcar..... 491

56. Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea—Breach—Practice—Evidence—Onus of proof—In considering whether a breach of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions could possibly have contributed to a collision, the court must take into consideration the whole of the evidence, even where there is a conflict, subject to the qualification that the onus of proof lies on those infringeing the Regulations; and if upon such evidence the court comes to the conclusion that the breach could not possibly have contributed to the collision, the ship committing it is not to be deemed to blame in respect thereof. (Adm. Div.) The Hermod .....page 509

57. Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, art. 16—Crossing ships—Narrow channel—Cardiff drain.—Art. 16 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, directing that if two steamships are crossing so as to involve risk of collision the ship which has the other on her starboard side shall keep out of the way of the other, applies in a narrow channel where it is the duty of steamships to keep to that side of mid-channel which lies on their starboard side; and hence, where a steamship going up Cardiff Drain sees a vessel on her starboard side coming down the channel from the Roath Basin, it is her duty to keep out of the way of the other, and the duty of the latter under art. 22 to keep her course; and if the latter, instead of doing so, ports to get on to the starboard side of the channel, she is to blame for breach of art. 22 of the Regulations. (Ct. of App.) The Leverington 7

58. Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, art. 10—Fishing vessel—Trawl gear fast—Signal—Foghorn.—When a fishing vessel becomes stationary in consequence of her gear getting fast to a rock or other obstruction, it is her duty, under art. 10 (d) of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions, to make the fog signal for a vessel at anchor, even though there be no fog, and if she fails to do so she is guilty of a breach of the Regulions. (Adm. Div.) The Warwick 545

59. Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, art. 10—Fishing vessel—Trawler—Lights—Sailing ship—Duty to keep clear.—Where a steam trawler with her trawl down is going so slowly that there would be difficulty in getting out of the way of other vessels, it is her duty to carry the extraordinary lights prescribed by the schedule, Part I. of the Order in Council, dated the 30th Dec. 1884, and made in pursuance of the Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act 1862, and not the ordinary lights of a steamship under way; and if she is carrying the former lights she is relieved from the duty prescribed by art. 17 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions, of getting out of the way of sailing ships. (Adm. Div.) The Tweedsdale 430

60. Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, art. 18—Duty to stop and reverse—Speed—Onus of proof.—When two steamships are approaching so as to involve risk of collision, and it is the duty of one to keep out of the way, and of the other to keep her course, the latter is bound to comply with art. 18 of the Regulations, as to slackening her speed or stopping and reversing if necessary; and if she does not do so the onus lies upon her to show that to continue her speed was in fact the best and most seamanlike manœuvre under the circumstances. (H. of L.) The Memnon ... 488

61. Regulations for Preventing Collision at Sea, art. 18—Duty to stop and reverse—Risk of collision.—The steamship M. sighted the masthead and green light of the steamship S., distant about three miles, and bearing about two and a half points on the port bow. When the S. got within three ship's lengths of the M., still showing her masthead and green lights at a bearing of four points on the port bow, she suddenly starboarded, and, although the M. immediately stopped her engines, a collision occurred. The Court, having held that the S. was to blame, further found that the respective courses of the vessels were such that had the S. kept her course and not starboarded she would have passed one and a half ship's lengths astern of the M., and that the best and most seamanlike manœuvre for the M. was to continue her speed as she did, but that there was in fact risk of collision before the S starboarded, and that the M. was to blame for breach of art. 18 in not stopping sooner. (Ct. of App.) The Memnon .....page 317

62. Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, art. 18—Duty to stop and reverse—Risk of collision.—Where two steamships are approaching so as to involve risk of collision, and it is the duty of one to keep out of the way and of the other to keep her course, the latter is bound to comply with art. 18 of the Regulations as to slackening her speed or stopping and reversing, notwithstanding the fact that by continuing her speed may be the best and most seamanlike manœuvre for the purpose of avoiding a collision. (Ct. of App.) The Memnon..... 317

63. Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, art. 18—Risk of Collision.—Semble, that if it is shown by a ship not complying with art. 18 of the Regulations that, taking into consideration all the circumstances of the case, compliance with the regulation would have increased the risk, such non-compliance will not cause the ship to be held in fault. (H. of L.) The Memnon... 488

64. Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, art. 18—Fog—Duty to stop and reverse.—If a steamship is approaching another in a dense fog, without the means of ascertaining, except by fog signals, the course which the other is pursuing, unless there are indications to convey to a seaman of reasonable skill that they are in such a position as to pass well clear of each other, it is her duty to stop and reverse, under art. 18 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions, and (in the absence of other circumstances making it dangerous to do so) she will be held to blame if she does not, and a collision takes place. (H. of L.) The Ceto 479

65. Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, art. 12 — Fog — Sailing ship — Tacking — Fog signal.—Where a sailing vessel is tacking in a fog, she is not relieved during the manœuvre from giving the signals prescribed by art. 12 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, and it is her duty until she gets the wind on to the side other than that on which she has had it to treat herself as still on the tack on which she was when she began to go about and to make the prescribed signal, and only to change that signal when she gets the wind on the other side. (Adm. Div.) The Constantia 478

66. Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, Art. 13—Fog—Speed—Stopping.—If a steamer in a fog cannot reduce her speed sufficiently to comply with art. 13 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, without occasionally stopping her engines, it is the duty of those in charge of her so to stop them. (Adm. Div.) The Resolution 363

67. Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, art. 18 — Fog — Speed — Stopping.—Where an officer in charge of a steamship in a dense fog hears a whistle apparently two to three points on the bow, but cannot be sure of the bearing within a point or two, and does not know the heading of the vessel whistling, it is his duty to diminish the speed of his vessel to the utmost to give him time to ascertain the manœuvres of the other vessel, and for that purpose he must either reduce the speed until the engines are only just moving, or he must stop them, but he need not necessarily continue to keep them stopped, but only sufficiently to diminish his way, and when he is beginning to lose steerage way, then and only then, may put them on again, but as slowly as is possible. (Adm. Div.) The Rosetta...page 310

68. Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, art. 12 — Fog — Steam-whistle—Lookout.—The fact of a steam-whistle alleged to have been blown in a fog not being heard by those on an approaching ship is not necessarily proof that there was a bad look-out on the approaching ship, as the direction in which and the distance from which the sound would be heard is uncertain. (Adm. Div.) The Rosetta..... 310

69. Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, art 22—Keeping course—Overtaking vessel.—Semble, that a vessel, which is being overtaken by another, is not to blame within art. 22 of the Regulations if she alters her course at such a distance ahead of the overtaking vessel that the latter can, by the exercise of reasonable care, keep out of the way of the former. (Ct. of App.) The Banshee 221

70. Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, art. 22—Keeping course—Overtaking vessel.—Quære, what is the duty of a vessel which is being overtaken as to keeping her course when it becomes necessary for her to manœuvre for another vessel. (Ct. of App.) The Banshee..... 221

71. Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, arts. 22, 23—Keeping course — Special circumstances.—Where two ships are approaching one another so as to involve risk of collision, and it is the duty of one to keep her course and of the other to keep out of the way, the officer in charge of the former ought, as soon as it is obvious to him that keeping his course will involve immediate danger, to alter it and to exercise his best judgment to avoid danger; but, in considering his conduct, it must be remembered that if it is the gross negligence of the other vessel which places him in difficult position of having to judge whether, and if so, how, he is to alter his course, great allowances must be made for him. (Ct. of App. and H. of L.) The Tasmania ...381, 517

72. Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, arts. 22, 23—Keeping course—Steamer and sailing ship.—The fact that a steamship is neglecting to keep out of the way of a sailing ship does not make it the duty of the sailing ship to take measures to avoid a collision, except possibly in very exceptional circumstances, because it is possible for a steamship to act for a sailing ship up to almost the last moment, and any action on the part of the sailing ship might be liable to increase risk of collision. (Adm. Div.) The Highgate 512

73. Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, art. 23—Keeping course — Departure from—Special circumstances.—The s.s. H. was approaching the sailing ship S. for several minutes, with her masthead and red lights open, on the starboard bow of the S. The S. kept her course till a collision was imminent, and then hard-a-ported, but the H. with her port side struck the stem and port bow of the S. The H. admitted that she was to blame, but contended that the S. was also to blame for breach of art. 23 of the Regulations, in not manœuvring for the H. after she saw the H. persisting in doing nothing to keep out of her way. Held, that the S. was not to blame, as the circumstances were not such as to require the S. to alter her course and manœuvre for the H. (Adm. Div.) The Highgate..... page 512

74. Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, art. 3—Lights—Cathead—Obscuration.—Where in a collision action it is alleged that there has been a breach of the regulations as to lights, the question to be determined is whether there has been a reasonable compliance—a literal compliance is not intended; and hence a vessel whose side lights are obscured by the catheads to the extent of two and a half to three degrees on either bow sufficiently complies with the regulations. (Adm.) The Fire Queen 146

75. Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, art. 3—Lights—Place.—It is not an infringement of art. 3 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at sea, to carry side lights in the rigging. P. C.) The Glamorganshire..... 344

76. Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, art. 5—Lights—Ship not under command.—A ship temporarily aground in a fairway is "not under command" within the meaning of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, and should therefore in such circumstances exhibit the three lights required by the regulations. (Hanseatic Ct. of App.) The John Johnasson... 39 n.

77. Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, art. 11—Lights—Flare-up—Overtaking vessel.—Where the lights of an overtaking vessel are sighted about two miles off, and a flare-up light is exhibited for a short time from the vessel which is being overtaken, and a collision occurs about ten minutes after the extinction of the flare-up, without any further light being exhibited, art. 11 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea is infringed, as it is the duty of a vessel which is being overtaken to exhibit a white or flare-up light at reasonable intervals so long as the other vessel continues to be overtaking. (Adm. Div.) The Essequibo..... 276

78. Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, art. 11—Lights—Fixed stern light—Crowded waters.—In crowded waters, where a vessel is being frequently overtaken by others, she does not contravene the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea by carrying a fixed stern light. (Adm. Ct.) The Stakesby..... 532

79. Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, art. 11—Lights—Fixed stern light.—Semble, a vessel carrying a fixed stern light, the rays of which show within the area of the side-lights, must be held to blame if a collision occurs, unless she can show that the carrying of such a light could not have contributed to the collision. (Adm. Div.) The Imbro 392

80. Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, art. 11—Lights—Fixed stern light.—Semble, it is a breach of the Regulation for Preventing Collisions at Sea to carry any fixed stern light, as the Regulations only contemplate a stern light being shown when there is a vessel overtaking. (Adm. Div.) The Imbro 392

81. Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, art. 11—Light—Stern light.—It is a breach of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea to carry a fixed stern light, the rays of which show within the area of the side lights. (Adm. Div.) The Imbro 392

82. Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, art. 11—Lights—Stern light—Overtaking vessel.—Where one of two ships is abaft the beam of the other in such a position that the hinder ship cannot see the side lights of the leading ship, and the former is going at a greater speed than the latter, and getting nearer to her, the latter is a "ship which is being overtaken by another" within the meaning of art. 11 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, even though the hinder ship broadens on her quarter; and she is in such circumstances bound to show a stern light in sufficient time to enable the other, by the exercise of reasonable precautions, to avoid risk of collision. (Ct. of App.) The Main ..... page 37

83. Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, art. 11—Lights—Stern light—Overtaking vessel.—The range of the stern light prescribed by art. 11 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea ought never to overlap that of the side lights, and if it is carried in any way other than is necessary to warn overtaking vessels, it is an infringement of the regulations. (Adm. Div.) The Palinurus 271

84. Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, art. 11—Lights—Stern light—Binnacle.—Although the exhibition of an ordinary binnacle light may in some circumstances be a compliance with art. 11 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, such a light, owing to its peculiar construction and form, is not calculated to give the warning required by the article, and ought not to be used for the purpose. (Adm. Div.) The Patroclus..... 285

85. Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, art. 14—Sailing ship—Luffing—Trade winds.—The custom of sailors to treat sailing ships when in the trades as close-hauled ships when they are sailing a point or two from being as close-hauled as they can lie, does not affect the legal construction of the regulation, and the court will not exonerate vessels so sailing from duties applicable to sailing ships in other latitudes. (Ct. of App.) The Earl Wemys..... 407

86. Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, art. 14—Sailing ship—Luffing—Trade winds.—The sailing ship E. W. while sailing free in the trades, saw the red light of the sailing vessel A. on her starboard bow. The A. was sailing close-hauled (as it is called in the trades), but was in fact not as close to the wind as she could lie. As the vessels approached the E. W. ported to keep out of the way of the A. At about the same the A. not only luffed up as close as she could to the wind, but also went a little farther under a starboard helm, thus counteracting the porting of the E. W. and a collision occurred. Held, that the A. altered her course in breach of art. 22 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions, and was to blame for the collision. (Ct. of App.) The Earl Wemys..... 407

87. Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, art. 14—Sailing ship—Luffing.—Semble, a sailing ship is close-hauled within the meaning of art. 14 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions if she is sailing half a point free of the nearest she can lie to the wind, but not if she is two points off. (Ct. of App.) The Earl Wemys..... 407

88. Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, art. 14—Sailing ship—Luffing.—The decisions holding that a vessel close-hauled, with her yards braced sharp up, may luff close to the wind does not justify a vessel close-hauled, but rather off the wind, in luffing to the extent of 2½ points when approaching a vessel whose duty it is to get out of her way. (Adm. Div.) The Earl Wemys 364

89. Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, art. 18—Time of application—Risk.—The Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea only apply at a time when two vessels have approached

so near to one another that, if either of them does anything contrary to the regulations, risk of collision will be involved. (Ct. of App.) The Banshee ..... page 221

90. River Navigation—Rounding points—Duty to wait.—Where two steamships going in opposite directions in the Scheldt sight one another, one above a point and the other below it in the river, and if both keep on they will meet at the point, it is the duty of the steamer navigating against the tide to wait until the other steamer has passed clear. (Adm. Div.) The Talabot 602

91. Tees Conservancy rules—Starboard side of river—Port helm.—Arts. 17 and 18 of the River Tees Conservancy Bye-laws, providing that ships shall keep "the starboard side of the river so that the port helm may always be applied," and that a "steamship, when approaching another ship on an opposite course or from an opposite direction, shall before approaching within thirty yards slacken her speed, and keep as near as possible to the starboard side of the river," are to be observed even when vessels are approaching one another so as to show each other their green lights, and nothing will excuse the non-observance of these rules but extreme necessity. (Ct. of App.) The Mary Lohden..... 262

92. Thames Conservancy Rules 1872, art. 19—Anchorage ground—Anchor a-cockbill.—Where a vessel, intending either to moor at one of the buoys or anchor in the anchorage ground in Gravesend Reach, finds all the buoys occupied, and, on passing the last buoy, gets her anchor a-cockbill for the purpose of bringing herself to anchor on finding a suitable place, and, after she has got a short distance above the buoys, a collision occurs and damage is done by the anchor, such anchor is only a-cockbill during such time as is "absolutely necessary" for bringing her to anchor within the meaning of art. 19 of the Rules and Bye-laws for the Navigation of the River Thames 1872. (Adm. Div.) The City of Delhi 269

93. Thames Conservancy Rules 1872, art. 15—Anchorage Ground—Gravesend Reach.—Where a vessel intending either to moor at one of the buoys or anchor in the anchorage ground in Gravesend Reach, moves from buoy to buoy to select one, and, finding them all occupied, anchors a short distance above the last of the buoys, she does not navigate within the anchorage ground in contravention of art. 15 of the Rules and Bye-laws for the Navigation of the River Thames 1872. (Adm. Div.) The City of Delhi 269

94. Thames Conservancy Rules 1880, arts. 6 and 7—Barge dredging with mast down—Vessel under way—Lights.—A sailing barge at night dredging down the Thames stern first on the ebb tide, with her anchor touching the ground, and her mast lowered, is neither a "sailing vessel under way," nor a vessel at anchor within the meaning of arts. 6 and 7 of the Rules and Bye-laws for the Navigation of the River Thames, and is therefore neither bound to carry side lights nor anchor light, and if she shows a white globe light she does all that prudence requires. (Adm. Div.) The Indian Chief 362

95. Thames Conservancy Rules, 1872, art. 20—Dumb barges—Anchor—Fog.—Dumb barges in the Thames do not carry anchors, and have no means of bringing themselves up except by going ashore or fastening on to anything they may come in contact with, and hence a dumb barge starting on her voyage in clear weather and getting into a fog, is not guilty of negligence if she comes into contact with a vessel moored in the river, and if that vessel in breach of the Rules and Bye-laws for the Navigation of the River Thames has her anchor not stock-a-wash, and the barge is thereby injured, the vessel so moored is solely responsible for such damage. (Adm. Div.) The Rose of England ..... page 304

96. Thames Conservancy Rules 1880, art. 24—Crossing ship.—A steamship ceases to be "crossing from one side of the river towards the other side" within the meaning of art. 24 of the Rules and Bye-laws for the Navigation of the River Thames, when her stem has got so far across that it can go no further, although she is still athwart the stream; but where a vessel is swinging for the purpose of turning in the river with her anchor down but not holding, she is not a crossed ship if she is still moving towards the shore, although she may have got more than athwart, and although her stern may be swinging to the tide. (Ct. of App.) The River Derwent 467

97. Thames Conservancy Rules 1830, art. 24—Crossing ship.—The steamship A., having come up the Thames as far as Bugsby's Reach on the flood tide, was about to turn head down, and, having whistled, her helm was ported and anchor let go so that it might dredge, and she began to swing round. Meanwhile the steamship R. D., which had been coming up the river astern of the A., instead of taking any steps to keep out of the way of the A, although she saw that the A. was doing nothing to keep out of her way in obedience to art. 24 of the Thames Rules and Bye-laws, came on and collided with the A. Held, that both vessels were to blame, the A., because being a crossing ship, she neglected to keep out of the way of the R. D., and the R. D. because, after she saw that the A. was neglecting her duty to keep out of the way, she failed to take any steps in sufficient time to avoid the collision. (Ct. of App.) The River Derwent 467

98. Thames Conservancy Rules 1880, arts. 24, 25—Crossing ship—Keeping course.—Where a vessel lying at anchor in the river Thames head to tide gets under way for the purpose of proceeding up or down the river with the tide, and in turning round she has to work across the river, she is a steam-vessel "crossing from one side of the river towards the other side" within the meaning of art. 24 of the Rules and Bye-laws for the Navigation of the River Thames, and it is her duty to keep out of the way of vessels navigating up and down the river, and of the latter to keep their course, under art. 25. (Adm. Div.) The Schwan..... 409

99. Thames Conservancy Rules 1872, arts. 10, 12—Fog—Anchorage ground.—Although a vessel may be justified in anchoring in the fairway of the Thames through being overtaken by a dense fog, such a place is not a proper anchorage ground under arts. 10 and 12 of the Thames Rules and Bye-laws 1872, and the duty lies on those in charge of her to move her as soon as they reasonably can, and if a collision occurs whilst she is so anchored, the question will be, whether between the time of her anchoring and the collision the weather was such that she could reasonably have been removed. (Adm. Div.) The Aguadillana..... 390

100. Thames Conservancy Rules—Fog—Steamship under way—Dredging up.—A steamship bound up the Thames on a flood tide ought not to leave a wharf and get under way in a dense fog, and, semble, if a vessel is overtaken by a dense fog in such circumstances, the proper mode for her to go up is dredging up stern first with her anchor down, so that she can be brought up at any moment. (Adm. Div.) The Aguadillana ... page 390

101. Thames Conservancy Rules 1880, art. 21—Steamer and sailing vessel—Steamer unable to get out of way.—Where a steamship navigating the River Thames is in such a position, through no fault of those in charge of her, that it is unsafe or impracticable for her to keep out of the way of a sailing vessel, it is the duty of the sailing vessel, under art. 21 of the Rules and Bye-laws for the Navigation of the River Thames, on hearing the steamer's whistle sounded as therein provided, to keep out of the way of the steamer. (Adm. Div.) The Longnewton 302

102. Thames Conservancy Rules, 1880, art. 21—Steamer and sailing vessel—Steamer unable to get out of the way.—Quære, Is a sailing vessel, on hearing a steamer whistling, as required by art. 21 of the Thames Bye-laws, bound to keep out of the way of the steamer without knowing that it is in fact unsafe or impracticable for the steamer to keep out of her way? (Adm. Div.) The Longnewton 302

103. Tug and tow—Contract—Liability of tow.—The fact that a tow does not come into contact with, or do damage to, a vessel with which the tug collides will not release the owners of the tow from liability if the damage is occasioned by the negligence of the tow. (Adm. Div.) The Niobe 300

104. Tug and tow—Joint tort feasors—Division of damages.—In a collision action in rem, where a tug and tow are both pronounced to blame for a collision with another vessel, the owner of the latter vessel may enforce the judgment for the whole of his damages against either or both the defendants, and the defendants are not entitled to have the decree so drawn up that half only of the total damages is recoverable from each defendant. (Adm. Div.) The Thomas Joliffe 605

105. Tug and tow—Liability of tow—Hopper barge—Master and servant.—Where a hopper barge in charge of two men which had no motive power but which was provided with a rudder, was, by the negligence of her tug, towed into collision with another vessel, it was held that the owners of the tow were not liable for the negligence of the tug. (Adm. Div.) The Quickstep 603

106. Tug and tow—Liability of tow—Master and servant.—Where a tow is liable for the negligence of the tug which causes a collision is a question of fact in each case, and depends upon whether, in the circumstances, those in charge of the tug were so far under the control of the master of the tow as to be the servants of the owner of the tow. (Adm. Div.) The Quickstep.. 603

107. Tug and tow—Night towage—Responsibility of tow.—It is the duty of those in charge of a tow, which is being towed under an ordinary towage contract by night at sea, to control and superintend the navigation of tug and tow, and her owners are liable for damage occasioned by the negligence of the tug, unless it is the result of a sudden manœuvre which it is impossible for the tow to control. (Adm. Div.) The Niobe 300

108. Tug and tow—Night towage—Responsibility of tow.—Whilst the ship N. was being towed under an ordinary towage contract by night at sea with a long scope of hawser, both she and her tug collided with the sailing ship V. The owners of the tug admitted liability. It was proved that there was a bad look-out on the tow, and that if those on board her had seen the approaching vessel and given the tug orders in due time, the collision might have been avoided. Held, that the tug was under the control of the tow, and that the owners of the tow were liable for the damage. (Adm. Div.) The Niobe ..... page 300

109. Tyne Navigation Rules, art. 22—Vessel crossing river.—The duty imposed by art. 22 of the Rules for the Navigation of the River Tyne upon vessels crossing the river not to cause obstruction, injury, or damage to other vessels, does not require them in any event to get out of the way of vessels going up or down, and they are at liberty when crossing at a proper time and in a proper manner to do so at such times as may be convenient to themselves, and vessels proceeding up and down must take the ordinary precautions to avoid collision with crossing vessels. (Adm. Div.) The Thetford 179

110. The Navigation Rules, art. 20—Vessel entering river—Side of mid-channel.—A vessel entering the Tyne is bound, under bye-law 20 for the Regulation of the River Tyne, directing that vessels shall be brought into port to the north of mid-channel, to get on to a course to enable her to enter on the north side when at some considerable distance outside the pier-heads; and if she crosses from south to north of mid-channel, when close up to the pier heads, she thereby infringes the bye-law. (Ct. of App.) The Harvest 5

111. Vessel at anchor—Ship colliding—Primâ facie evidence of fault.—Where a ship is shown to have been properly at anchor with her anchor light burning, and is struck and damaged by another ship, the fact of the collision is primâ facia evidence of negligence on the part of the ship in motion, and the onus is upon the latter to prove that the collision was not occasioned by her negligence. (Ct. of App.) The Annot Lyle... 50

112. Vessel at Anchor—Steamship—Primâ facie evidence of fault.—The fact of a vessel under steam colliding with a ship at her moorings in daylight is primâ facie evidence of fault; and her owners cannot escape liability except by proving that a competent officer could not have averted the collision by the exercise of ordinary care and skill. (P. C.) The City of Peking..... 396

113. Vessel at anchor — Steamship — Current—Neglect to let go anchor.—Where a steamship under way collided with a vessel at her moorings in daylight in consequence of an exceptional current, known to be a possible though improbable occurrence, and it was proved that there was delay in dropping her anchor, and that the other anchor was not in readiness, she was found to have neglected ordinary precautions, and her owners were held liable. COMPULSORY PILOTAGE.

1. British ship—Place north of Boulogne.—A British ship which is one of a line of vessels making regular voyages from London to Japan and ports in the East, and back to London, and thence to ports in Europe north of Boulogne, and back to London, is a ship trading to a "place in Europe north of Boulogne" within the meaning of sect. 379 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, where she on a return voyage from the East goes to London, discharges her crew and part of her cargo, and then with the remainder of her cargo and a crew of runners, sails for Amsterdam, and she is therefore exempt from compulsory pilotage. (Q.B. Div.) Courtney v. Cole...page 169

2. Collision—Place north of Boulogne—Repairs—Port of London.—A vessel trading from Liverpool to Hamburgh, which, in consequence of a collision, puts into the port of London for repairs, and then proceeds on her voyage, is a ship trading to a "place in Europe north of Boulogne," within the meaning of sect. 379 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, and is therefore exempt from compulsory pilotage in the London district, and cannot thereby escape liability for a collision. (Adm. Div.) The Sutherland 181

3. Compulsion—Harbour authority—Power to make bye-laws and appoint pilots—Penalties.—It is competent for a harbour authority, which has power to make bye-laws regulating the navigation of their harbour and to appoint pilots, to make pilotage compulsory by means of such bye-laws, and to impose penalties for disobedience to them. (Ct. of App.) The Ruby 577

4. Compulsion—Penalty—Public local Act—River Dee.—Where a public local Act, in force before the passing of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 and regulating a port, imposes a penalty on any unlicensed person taking upon himself to conduct or pilot any ship into or out of a port, pilotage is compulsory. Hence pilotage is compulsory for certain vessels navigating the Dee. (Q.B.Div.) Jones and another v. Bennett..... 596

5. Foreign ship—Merchant Shipping Amendment Act 1889.—The Merchant Shipping Amendment Act 1889 (52 & 53 Vict. c. 68) is retrospective, as it declares what the meaning of the principal Act of 1854 always has been, and by it the word "ship" in part V. of the Act of 1854 (relating to pilotage) includes "foreign ship." (Q.B. Div.) Jones and another v. Bennett..... 596

6. Llanelly Harbour—Bye-laws—Pilotage is compulsory in the harbour of Llanelly by virtue of 6 & 7 Vict. c. lxxxviii. and 21 & 22 Vict. c. lxxii., and the bye-laws made thereunder. (Ct. of App.) The Ruby 577

7. Rates—Right to sue for—Action-at-law.—Pilotage rates, fixed by bye-laws made by trustees under a local Act and under the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, and duly sanctioned by Her Majesty in Council, may be sued for by a pilot who has rendered service as such. Trade combination—Restraint of trade—Shipowners.—A combination by shipowners which offers advantageous terms to shippers confining their shipments to the combination's ships, and excludes such shippers from the advantages in the event of their making any shipment by an outside ship, not being a combination formed with the view of ruining the trade of other shipowners or from malice or ill-will towards them, but merely to keep the trade in the combination's hands is not in restraint of trade nor unlawful, and therefore an action will not lie against the combination for alleged wrongful conspiracy to prevent other shipowners from carrying on their trade. COUNTY COURTS ADMIRALTY JURISDICTION.

1. "Agreement relating to hire or use of ship"—Colliery guarantee—Demurrage—Jurisdiction.—A loading agreement between a colliery company and the charterers of a ship, by which the colliery company undertake to load the ship in a certain time, and pay demurrage if that time is exceeded, is not an "agreement made in relation to the use or hire" of a ship within the meaning of sect. 2 of the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Amendment Act 1869, and hence the County Court has no jurisdiction on the Admiralty side to entertain a claim for demurrage against the colliery company. (Adm. Div.) The Zeus 312

2. Collision—Damage—Pile driving machine.—Damage to a pile driving machine used at a wharf on the bank of the River Thames by contact with the sailing gear of a barge sailing in the river is not "damage by collision" within the meaning of sect. 3, sub-sect. 3 of the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868, and a County Court has no Admiralty jurisdiction in respect of such damage. (Q. B. Div.) Robson v. The Owner of the Kate 330

3. Collision—Fishing smacks — Trawl gear.—Semble, a County Court having Admiralty jurisdiction has jurisdiction, under the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868, and the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Amendment Act 1868, to entertain a cause of collision between the trawl gear of two fishing smacks. (Adm. Div.) The Warwick 545

4. Practice—Costs—Witnesses.—A County Court judge cannot lay down a general practice that only the costs of such witnesses who have been called at the trial shall be allowed, and that if it be desired to have witnesses allowed who have not been called application is to be made to him, such practice being contrary to the provisions of Order L., r. 16, of the County Court Rules. (Adm. Div.) The Cashmere... page 515

5. Practice—Interlocutory order—Appeal — Leave.—Under sect. 26 of the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868 leave to appeal from an interlocutory order in County Court actions on the Admiralty side must be obtained from the County Court judge, and this enactment is still applicable to such actions, notwithstanding the general provisions of sect. 120 of the County Courts Act 1838, and hence a party cannot appeal from such orders without leave. (Adm. Div.) The Cashmere..... 515

6. Tug and tow—Damage to tow—Subsequent liability—Recovery over—Claim arising out of agreement in relation to use or hire of any ship.—A tugowner, having been engaged to tow a vessel, contracted with another tugowner to provide a tug, which was guilty of negligence in the course of towage occasioning damage to the tow. The owners of the tow recovered this damage from the tugowner with whom they contracted, and the defendant in that action instituted the present action in rem in the County Court under the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Amendment Act 1869, against the owner of the wrong-doing tug to recover back this amount. Held, on appeal, that sect. 2, sub-sect. 1 of the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Amendment Act 1869, giving County Courts with Admiralty jurisdiction power to try "any claim arising out of any agreement made in relation to the use or hire of any ship," covered the present action. (Adm.) The Isca 63

7. Venue—Charter-party—Action by shipowners.—Shipowners may institute an action in personam against charterers for breach of charter-party, under sect. 2 of the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Amendment Act 1869, in the County Court having Admiralty jurisdiction within the jurisdiction of which their vessel is at the commencement of such proceedings. (Adm. Div.) The County of Durham 606

8. Wages — Mate—Articles — Lien.—The County Court has jurisdiction under sect. 3 of the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868 to entertain an action in rem for wages claimed by a chief mate who, having been paid off on the arrival of the ship in port, remains on board in port to superintend the loading for her outward voyage without signing fresh articles by the direction of the owners. DAMAGE.

1. Docking in dock — Harbour master — Foreman docksman — Authority — Negligence.—The plaintiffs' vessel having fouled her propeller whilst entering the port and harbour of Port Talbot, was, with the permission of the foreman docksman in the absence of the harbour master, placed in the sea lock leading into the dock, for the purpose of being put upon the ground and freeing her propeller. On the water being let out, the vessel took the ground, and sustained damage to her bottom by sitting upon an old sill, which had not been removed when the lock was lengthened. It appeared that the control of the management of the dock was in the hands of the harbour master, who at the time was ill, and that the foreman docksman was acting in his place. It also appeared that the foreman docksman did not know the condition of the bottom of the lock, and had so informed the master of the Apollo. In an action by the shipowners against the dock authority: Held (Lord Esher, M.R. dissentiente), that the use of the lock for the purpose was an extraordinary use; that the master of the Apollo was a bare licensee; and that the foreman docksman had no authority to grant the use of the lock for such purpose so as to render the defendants liable for the damage ensuing. (Ct. of App., affirming Adm. Div.; since reversed by the H. of L.) The Apollo ..... page 356, 402

2. Oyster-beds—Grounding — Removal — Compulsory pilot.—A ship in charge of a compulsory pilot was at high water brought into and anchored by the pilot in a river in which there were oyster-beds, the existence of which was known to the pilot. The place where she was anchored was not the usual and customary place for vessels of her size and draught to anchor in. At low water she grounded, and thereby did damage to an oyster-bed. On notice of the existence of the oyster-bed being given to the master he took all reasonable means to remove his ship as speedily as possible. In an action by the lessee of the oyster-bed against the shipowner and the pilot: Held, that the act of the pilot in anchoring the ship where he did was negligence which made him liable, but that the ship was not liable because on receiving notice of the existence of the oyster-bed, the duty of the master, he having no previous knowledge of the locality, was to take all reasonable measures—not extraordinary measures—to remove his ship, and this he had done. (Adm. Div.) The Octavia Stella..... 182

3. Royal Dockyard—Queen's Harbour Master—Liability—Damage to barge—Respondent superior.—A barge belonging to the plaintiffs was moored in Chatham Dockyard at a berth pointed out by the foreman, and the barge was there damaged. In an action to recover the amount of the damage from the Port Admiral, the Admiral Superintendent, and the Queen's Harbour Master of Chatham Dockyard, being the officials in charge of the dockyard, the jury found that the berth was unsafe, and gave a verdict for the plaintiffs. Held, on further consideration, that, there being no Act of Parliament and no Order in Council rendering the defendants liable, their liability must be decided on common law principles, and that the doctrine of respondeat superior does not apply in such a case, but the doctrine of invitation does apply, and as there was no evidence that the defendants invited the plaintiff to moor the barge where they did, the defendants were not liable, and judgment must be for them. (Ct. of App.) Wright and Son v. Lethbridge and others 558

4. Wharfingers—Ship taking the ground—Bed of river—Extraordinary obstruction—Representation—Warning.—Although it may be the duty of wharfingers in a public river, alongside whose wharf vessels lie to load and discharge, to warn the masters of such vessels of any unusual or extraordinary obstruction likely to injure them when coming alongside or leaving, it is not their duty to give information as to the condition of the ground alongside the wharf which is produced in the ordinary way by the action of the tide and the user of it by vessels taking the ground. (H. of L., reversing C. A., and restoring Adm. Div.) The Calliope .....page 359, 440, 555

5. Wharfingers—Ship taking the ground—Bed of river—Representation.—Where an agreement is entered into between ship-owners and wharfingers that a ship shall proceed to a wharf in the Thames for the purpose of discharging and loading cargo, and it is known to the parties that she must take the ground when the tide ebbs, there is an implied representation by the wharfingers, even though the bed of the river is not under their control, that they have taken reasonable care to ascertain that the bottom of the river at the wharf is in such a condition as not to injure the ship on her taking the ground; and if by reason of the uneven nature of the bed of the river she is injured, the wharfingers are liable. GENERAL AVERAGE.

1. Deck Cargo—Jettison—Custom of Trade—Negligence.—There are two exceptions to the right to claim general average: First, a wrongdoer through whose default the peril has happened which gives rise to the sacrifice cannot claim; secondly, owners of deck cargo are not entitled to general average except where such cargo is carried on deck in accordance with the custom of the trade, or where the other cargo owners have consented to the carriage of the goods on deck. Owners of jettisoned cargo subject to the above exceptions are entitled to recover for general average, even where the peril which necessitated the jettison has been brought about by the negligence of the master. (Priv. Co.) Strang, Steel, and Co. v. Scott and Co. ..... page 419

2. Negligence of crew—Excepted perils—Right to contribution.—hWere general average expenses are incurred by a shipowner in consequence of damage caused to ship and cargo by the negligence of his crew, he is entitled to contribution from the cargo owner, where by the terms of the contract of carriage he is not liable for the negligence of his master and crew. (Adm. Div.) The Carron Park 543

3. Right to—Common danger.—Semble, that the right to general average arises not as a matter of contract but as a positive right in consequence of a common danger requiring that all should contribute to indemnify for the loss of property which has been sacrificed to save the whole adventure, and this right of contribution is similar to the right upon which claims for salvage services are founded. LIMITATION OF LIABILITY.

1. Application of fund—Cargo claimants—Life claimants.—Where in an action for limitation of liability the plaintiffs' liability is fixed at 15*l*.

per ton in respect of life and cargo claims, and the life claims exceed 7*l.* a ton, and the cargo claims 8*l.* a ton, 7*l.* per ton is to be applied exclusively towards the payment of the life claims, and the balance of such claims and the cargo claims are to rank pari passu against the balance of the 15*l.* per ton. (Adm. Div.) The Victoria .....page 335

2. Practice—Collision—Re-opening—Admission of both to blame—Decree of the court.—An action in rem by shipowners, for collision between the ships B. and K. having been settled by a written agreement that both ships were to be deemed to blame, this agreement was filed in the Registry under the provisions of Order LII., r. 23. Other actions having subsequently been instituted by owners of cargo on the B. against the K., the owners of the K. obtained a decree limiting their liability. In the statement of claim in the limitation action, it was alleged that it had been agreed between the parties to the ship action that both ships should be deemed to blame. This allegation was not denied in the respective defences of the owners of the B. and her cargo. At the reference to assess the amount due to the various claimants against the fund paid into court in the limitation action, the owners of cargo on the B. claimed to prove for the whole of their loss. The Registrar allowed them a moiety. On appeal: Held, that the cargo owners were not precluded from proving for their whole loss, subject to proof by them that the K. was alone to blame, but that the owners of the B. were precluded by the agreement, which was equivalent to a decree of the court, from proving for more than a moiety; and further, that the owners of cargo might take an issue to try whether the K. was solely or partly to blame for the collision. (Adm. Div.) The Karo..... 245

3. Practice—Evidence—Tonnage—Ship's register.—In an action for limitation of liability the defendants may, if they have raised the question by their defence, call evidence to show that the ship's tonnage as shown by her register is not correct, and that it has been erroneously computed. 4. Practice—Loss of life—Payment into Court—Assessment of damages—Jury.—In an action for limitation of liability in respect of a collision for which the plaintiffs had admitted liability, and in which loss of life had ensued, the court granted a decree limiting the plaintiff's liability to 15*l.* per ton, upon payment into court of 8*l.* per ton and security being given for the balance, but refused to stay life actions which had been instituted in the Admiralty Division, the plaintiffs in such actions wishing to have their damages assessed by a jury. MARINE INSURANCE.

1. Abandonment—Total loss—Barratry—Salvage—Notice.—A ship and her freight having been insured (inter alia) against barratry of the master, was wrongfully abandoned by him. Salvors took possession of her, and having towed her into port instituted salvage proceedings against her. These proceedings were known to the owners, but they did not appear. The ship and cargo were sold by decree of the Court of Admiralty, and realised less than the salvage award. In an action on the policies: Held, that the assured were entitled to recover, as the sale under the decree of the Admiralty Court constituted an actual total loss, and no notice of abandonment was necessary. (Priv. Co.) Cossman v. West .....page 233

2. Agent—Breach of warranty of authority—Damages—Measure of—Foreign judgment.—The plaintiff, who was the holder of a policy of marine insurance effected with a foreign company, claimed for an alleged loss. The company denied liability. The plaintiff sued them in England and obtained judgment by default, but could not enforce it as the company had no assets in this country. The defendants, the company's agents in England, then represented to the plaintiff that they were authorised to settle the claim for 300*l.* The plaintiff accepted this offer, but it turned out that, although the defendants had acted bonâ fide in the matter, they had been mistaken as to their authority, and were not in fact authorised to make the settlement. In an action to recover damages for breach of warranty of authority: Held, that the plaintiff was entitled to recover the 300*l.* and the expenses incurred by him in negotiating the settlement, the measure of damages being what he had lost by the loss of the contract which the defendants warranted was to be made; and that the fact that he had recovered a default judgment and still had a remedy on the policy was immaterial, as the default judgment was valueless, and the value of his remedy on the policy could not be ascertained. (Affirmed on appeal, Charles, J.) Meek v. Wendt and Co. 331

3. "Cargo"—Interpretation.—The word "cargo" is a word susceptible of different meanings in different contracts, and must be interpreted with reference to the context. (Priv. Co.) Colonial Insurance Company of New Zealand and others v. Adelaide Marine Insurance Company..... 94

4. Concealment — Broker—Reinsurance—Principal and agent.—Where brokers employed to reinsure

a ship received information material to the risk, and without communicating it to the plaintiffs (the original underwriters) telegraphed to their London agents in the plaintiffs' names to effect the insurance, and the London agents through a firm effected a policy of reinsurance, it was held that the policy was effected through the agency of the original brokers and was void on the ground of concealment of material facts, though such facts were not known to the plaintiffs, the London agents, nor the brokers who effected the reinsurance. (Q. B. Div.) Blackburn, Low, and Co. v. Haslam..... page 326

5. Concealment—Material fact—Broker.—A policy of marine insurance is not vitiated by the concealment of a material fact by a broker employed by the assured to effect an assurance on the subject matter, if he be not the broker through whom the assurance is ultimately effected. (H. of L.) Blackburn, Low, and Co. v. Vigors..... 216

6. Damage to cargo—Collision—Consequential loss—Discharge and reshipment—Causa proxima.—Where goods, which are insured against (inter alia) damage consequent on collision, are necessarily discharged in consequence of the ship carrying them colliding with another ship, and thereby requiring temporary repairs, and then reshipped when such repairs are effected, and carried to their destination, the assured are not entitled to recover for damage occasioned to the goods by their discharge and reshipment, on the ground that the collision is not the proximate cause of such damage. (Ct. of App.) Pink v. Fleming 554

7. Damage to deck—Passenger ship — Alteration in construction during repairs—Right of recovery.—Where a ship fitted with a saloon deck for passengers, but solely used for carrying cargo, is insured under a time policy while so used, and the saloon deck is destroyed by a risk covered by the policy, but instead of being reinstated is converted into cargo carrying space, the cost of conversion and not of reinstatement is all that the shipowners can recover under the policy. (Q. B. Div.) Bristol Steam Navigation Company, Limited v. The Indemnity Mutual Marine Insurance Company 173

8. Damage to machinery—Defect—Perils of the seas—Donkey engines.—Damage to a donkey-engine occasioned whilst, in the ordinary course of navigation, it was being employed in pumping water into the boiler, by water being forced into the air-chamber and splitting it open owing to a screw valve which should have been open being accidentally or negligently closed, is not covered by a policy against "perils of the seas . . . . and all other perils, losses, and misfortunes that have or shall come to the hurt, detriment or damage, of the subject matter of insurance." (H. of L.) Thames and Mersey Marine Insurance Company v. Hamilton, Fraser, and Co. 200

9. Insurable interest — Cargo — Payment.—A man may have an insurable interest in goods for which he has neither paid, nor become liable to pay. (P.C.) Colonial Insurance Company of New Zealand and others v. Adelaide Marine Insurance Company 94

10. Insurable interest—Cargo—Purchaser—Right of possession—Charterer.—Where the charterers of a vessel are also the purchasers of a cargo of wheat to be shipped on board, which is to be at the risk of the purchaser as it is put on board, and the master from time to time receives delivery from the vendors, such delivery vests the right of possession and property in the purchaser, and in the event of loss by perils insured against when only a portion of the cargo is on board the purchaser has an insurable interest in such portion, and the underwriters are liable for the loss. (P.C.) Colonial Insurance Company of New Zealand and others v. Adelaide Marine Insurance Company ..... page 94

11. *Interest—Cash advances—*19 Geo. 2, c. 37, s. 1 —"Without further proof of interest than the policy."—A policy of marine insurance which insures cash advances on a ship is an insurance on ship within 19 Geo. 2, c. 37, s. 1; and such a policy containing the terms "full interest admitted" is void under that statute. (Ct. of App.) Berridge v. The Man On Insurance Company ... 104

12. Partial loss — Measure of — Depreciation in value of ship—Cost of repairs.—A partial loss sustained by a shipowner by a disaster insured against is not to be measured by the depreciation in the value of the vessel thereby occasioned; but where there is such a loss, and the ship is repaired by the owner, he is entitled to recover the sum properly expended in executing the necessary repairs, less the usual allowances. (H. of L.) The Marine Insurance Company Limited v. The China Transpacific Steamship Company Limited 68

13. Particular average—Under 3 per cent.—How made up — General average. — A particular average loss under 3 per cent. is not recoverable under a policy of insurance containing the clause, "warranted free from average under 3 per cent., unless general," although there has been at the same time a general average loss which, if added to the particular average loss, would make the loss more than 3 per cent. (Ct. of App.) Price and Co. v. The A 1 Ship's Small Damage Insurance Association 435

14. Practice—Concealment of material facts—Statement of claim—Striking out—R. S. C., Order XIX., r. 27.—Where, in an action to avoid a policy of marine insurance, the plaintiff, the underwriter, after alleging (inter alia) in the statement of claim charges of concealment and non-communication by the defendant of material facts, stated in his reply that he did "not proceed further in this action with the charges in the statement of claim as to concealment and non-communication by the defendant of material facts," the Court held that these charges were scandalous and embarrassing, and ordered them to be struck out under Order XIX., r. 27. (Ch. Div.) Brooking v. Maudslay 13

15. Practice — Court of Equity — Cancellation of policy—Fraud.—A Court of Equity has no jurisdiction to direct delivery up and cancellation of a policy of insurance and to restrain parties thereto suing thereon merely because the other parties have a good legal defence to any claim thereon, although it may do so where the policy is liable to be completely avoided as on the ground of fraud or misrepresentation. (Ch. Div.) Brooking v. Maudslay 296

16. Practice—Suing and labouring clauses—Third parties — Underwriters — R. S. C., Order XVI., r. 48.—In an action for work and labour done and expenses incurred by the plaintiff at the defendant's request in attempting to save a ship belonging to some of the defendants during the continuance of a policy on the ship, which contained the usual suing and labouring clause, the defendants are not entitled to bring in the underwriters as third parties under Order XVI., r. 48. (Q. B. Div.) Johnston and others v. The Salvage Association and McKiver 167

17. Protecting class—Running-down clause—Colli- sion—Both ships to blame—Single liability—Cross liability.—The defendants insured their ship in the "protecting class" of the plaintiff association, a limited mutual marine insurance association, to indemnify them against any loss or damage to any other vessel not covered by the usual Lloyd's policy, with the running-down clause attached. The defendant ship came into collision with another ship, and caused and suffered damage; both ships were to blame. The defendants' ship was fully insured by policies in the usual form of Lloyd's policy with the running-down clause attached. It was admitted that the damage suffered by the defendants' ship exceeded that inflicted by her on the other ship, and that the owners of the other ship had paid the defendants a sum equal to the difference between half of the amount of the damage sustained by their ship and half of the damage sustained by the defendants' ship. The plaintiffs brought their action to recover a sum of money in the hands of the defendants, which sum the defendants claimed to be entitled to retain as an indemity in respect of the proportion of the damage to the colliding ship which had been taken into account in adjusting the amount to be paid by the other ship, and which proportional sum was not covered by the ordinary running-down clause in their policies. Held, that the true principle for adjusting the loss from collision in such a case was that of a single liability and not cross-liabilities, and that, as the defendants had not been called upon to contribute anything in respect of the damage done to the other vessel, they were not entitled to call upon the plaintiffs to indemnify them in respect of a loss or damage which they had not sustained. (Ct. of App.) London Steamship Insurance Association v. Grampian Steamship Company ... page 506

18. Risk — Duration of—Cargo—Transshipment — Lighters.—A policy of marine insurance on goods on a coasting vessel "at and from Hull to London, including all risk of craft until the goods are discharged and safely landed" does not cover the risk to the goods while waiting on lighters at the port of delivery for transshipment into an export vessel. (Ct. of App.) Houlder, Bros., and Co. v. Merchants Marine Insurance Company Limited... 12

19. Total loss—Sale of ship—Salvage.—To constitute a total loss within the meaning of a policy of marine insurance it is not necessary that a ship should be actually annihilated. If it is lost to the owner by an adverse valid and legal transfer of his right of property and possession to a purchaser by a sale under a decree of a court of competent jurisdiction in consequence of a peril insured against, it is as much a total loss as if it had been annihilated. In such a case no distinction can be drawn between a sale upon capture and a sale under the decree of a Court of Admiralty for the expenses of salvage services. (Priv. Co.) Cossmann v. West..... 233

20. Warranty—Description of cargo—Iron and steel blooms—Partial loss.—The following warranty in a policy of marine insurance, "warranted no iron, or ore, or phosphate cargoes exceeding net register tonnage across the Atlantic" includes steel blooms, and hence, where the assured's ship whilst laden with steel blooms exceeding her net registered tonnage suffered a partial loss during a voyage across the Atlantic, the assured was held not to be entitled to recover. (Ct. of App.) Hart v. Standard Marine Insurance Company Limited 368

21. Warranty—Free from average under 3 per cent. —Measure of damages.—A ship insured under a policy containing the warranty "free from average under 3 per cent." went into dock to be cleaned, scraped, and painted; while in dock an injury previously unknown, causing a particular average loss within the policy, was discovered. The cleaning, scraping, and painting went on concurrently with the necessary repairs to the injury, and the ship was in dock eight days, being detained the last five days solely for the purpose of the repairs apart from the cleaning, scraping, and painting. If half the dock dues during the first three days were to be attributed to the repairs, the average loss exceeded 3 per cent. The arbitrator, who stated a special case between the parties, found that, if there was to be an apportionment of these dues, one half should be attributed to the repairs, the other half to the cleaning, scraping, &c. Held, that the measure of the assured's damage was not the depreciation in the value of his ship occasioned by the loss, and therefore was not the actual cost of repairs plus the dock dues for the days beyond what was necessary for cleaning, scraping, &c., but was the sum properly expended in effecting the necessary repairs less the usual allowances, and that such sum was the cost of the repairs plus the whole cost of the dock dues less half the cost of the first three days. (H. of L.) Marine Insurance Company Limited v. China Transpacific Steamship Company Limited ..... page 68

See Carriage of Goods, Nos. 7, 33.

MARINE INSURANCE ASSOCIATION.

1. Calls—Managing owner—Purchaser of shares—Liability.—The purchaser of shares in a ship, which have been insured in mutual insurance clubs by the managing owner with the authority of the vendor, is not liable in the absence of agreement to contribute to the payment of calls in respect of the insurance. (Adm. Div.) The Vindobala 250

2. Calls—Subsistence of policy.—By the rules of a marine insurance association, the members insured each other's ships from noon of Feb. 20 in any year, or from the date of entry of a vessel until noon of Feb. 20 in the succeeding year; and the managers were empowered to levy contributions of one-fourth part of the estimated annual premium quarterly in each year, such premiums of insurance to form a fund for the payment of claims; and if any member should refuse to pay his contributions thereto, his respective ship or ships should cease to be insured, and he should thenceforth forfeit all claims in respect of any loss. On the 5th April 1881 a loss incurred in the year 1880-1 upon a ship belonging to the plaintiff and insured in the association, was fixed by an average adjuster at 180*l.* A call of 41*l.* 10*s.*, made on the plaintiff on the 5th May 1881 for the second quarter of 1881-2, was by mutual consent set off against the loss. On the 13th May 1881 the association paid the plaintiff 100*l.* on further account of the loss. On the 23rd June 1881 a call was made on the plaintiff of 52*l.* 16*s.* 8*d.*, and on the 5th July 1881 another call of 31*l.* 4*s.* The plaintiff having tendered the balance due from him, the association refused to accept it, and during the pendency of an action to recover the full amount of the two calls one of the plaintiff's ships insured in the association was wholly lost. Held, on case stated, that as the calls were in respect of matters relating to the 1880-1 policy, and it was not shown that they were in respect of his ship insured as aforesaid, the plaintiff's ship did not cease to be insured, and that he had not forfeited his claim in respect of the loss. (Q. B. Div.) Williams v. British Marine Mutual Insurance Association Limited .....page 134

3. Contributions — Members — Managing owner— Owner's liability. — The managing and part owner of a steamship became a member of a mutual assurance association and took out a policy in his own name in respect of the ship. By the articles of association funds for the purposes of the association were to be "paid to the association by the members thereof." By the policy it was agreed that the members of the association should be liable for all losses and dangers insured against. Certain contributions having in accordance with the articles of association become payable by the managing owner in respect of the ship, and he being bankrupt, the association sued the defendant, a part owner, to recover the contributions. Held, that by the provisions of the articles of association and the policy members only were liable, and the defendant not being a member was not liable. (Ct. of App.) United Mutual Steamship Assurance Association v. Nevill ..... 226 n.

4. Contributions — Members—Managing owner— Owner's liability.—The managing and part owner of a steamship became a member of a mutual insurance association, and took out a policy on behalf of himself and his co-owners in respect of the ship. By the articles of association every person was deemed to be a member "who in his own name, or in his name as agent, insures any ship in pursuance of the regulations of the company," and they also provided that the funds required for the payment of claims should "be raised by contributions from all the members." By the policy it was agreed between the assured and the company, "that without prejudice to the rights and remedies of the company against the said person or persons effecting this insurance, as a member as members of the company, in respect of this insurance, the assured shall pay to the company, in lieu of premiums, all the sums and contributions which the company are entitled to call upon the said person or persons effecting this insurance, as a member or members of the company, to pay to the company in respect of this insurance according to the articles of association of the company, and that the provisions contained in the said articles of association shall be deemed and considered part of this policy, and shall, so far as regards this insurance, be as binding upon the assured as upon the said person or persons effecting this insurance." Certain contributions having, in accordance with the articles of association, become payable by the managing owner in respect of the ship, and the managing owner being bankrupt, the association sued the other owners to recover the contributions: Held, that under the terms of the policy, they were liable, although the policy was effected by the managing owner alone. (Mathew, J.) Ocean Iron Steamship Insurance Association v. Leslie and others 226

5. Contributions—Members — Managing owner — Owners liability—H. & G., the managing owners of a steamship, insured her in a mutual assurance association in their own names, and the policy was expressed to be "as well in his or their own names as for and in the name or names of all and every other person or persons to whom the same doth, may, or shall appertain, in part or in all, subject to the provisions hereinafter contained." The consideration stated in the policy was "the contributions to be paid from time to time by the assured for losses and averages on other steamships." Such contributions having become payable, the association sued the part owners other than H. and G. to recover the same. Held, that these part owners were liable, because the policy was made on their behalf, and they "were assured" within the meaning of the policy, and were expressly bound by the consideration clause to pay these contributions. Quære, whether they become members of the association. (Ct. of App.) Great Britain 100 A 1 Steamship Insurance Association v. Wyllie .....page 398

6. Double insurance—Mortgage—Estoppel.—By the rules of the defendant Mutual Marine Insurance Society vessels were not to be insured for more than three-quarters of their value; members were forbidden to insure elsewhere any ship or ships insured in the society, under penalty of expulsion and forfeiture of any claim against the society; and in the event of it coming to the knowledge of a member that the ship or shares insured have been mortgaged, he is to give notice thereof to the society, and if he fails to do so he shall forfeit all claim in respect of his insurance during the existence of the mortgage to the extent thereof. P., on behalf of the owner of the ship B., insured her in the defendant society for 600*l.* The B. was at the same time, with the knowledge of the defendant society, insured elsewhere for 300*l.*, and 900*l.* was more than three-quarters, but less than the whole of the value of the B. During the subsistence of the policy P. was aware that the B. was mortgaged, but gave no notice of the mortgage to the society. In an action against the defendant society: Held, that the defendant society, having insured the B. with the knowledge that she was insured elsewhere, were estopped from acting on the rule as to double insurance, but that as P. had not given notice of the mortgage its amount must be deducted from the sum payable under the policy by the defendants. (Q.B. Div.) Jones v. Bangor Mutual Shipping Insurance Society Limited. 450

7. Improper navigation—Damage to cargo—Dirty ceiling and limber boards.—Where by the rules of a Mutual Insurance Association members are protected against damage to goods on board when "caused by improper navigation," damage caused to a wheat cargo through the ceiling and limber boards not having been properly cleaned before the wheat was stowed is not caused by "improper navigation." (Ct. of App.) Canada Shipping Company v. British Shipowners' Mutual Protection Association 422

8. Improper navigation—Loading port—Damage to goods—Sea water.—Damage to goods by sea water which leaks in during the voyage owing to the shipowner having neglected to efficiently close a loading port before the completion of the loading, is damage "caused by improper navigation of the ship" within the meaning of the articles of association of a shipowner's Mutual Indemnity Association, although the leakage does not endanger the ship or impede the navigation. (Ct. of App.) Carmichael and Co. v. The Liverpool Sailing Shipowners' Mutual Indemnity Association 184

MORTGAGOR AND MORTGAGEE.

1. Act of Bankruptcy—Further advances—Past debt.—A mortgagor who conveys all his property with the main object of securing further advances, does not thereby commit an act of bankruptcy, even though the mortgage also secures a past debt due from the mortgagor to the mortgagee. (Adm. Ct.) The Thames 536

2. Contribution from owners—Right to—Compulsion of law—Arrest of ship—Possession.—The arrest of a ship in an action in rem for a claim legally due from the owners of the ship, although there be no maritime lien, is a sufficient compulsion of law to entitle mortgagees of part of the shares in the ship paying off the claim in order to get possession to recover from the owners of the remaining shares the amount so paid. (Ct. of App.) The Orchis 501

3. Contribution from owners—Right to—Arrest of ship—Payment of debt—Dock dues—Wages.—The owner of 44/64th shares in the steamship O. mortgaged them to the plaintiffs. Subsequently the O. was arrested in the Admiralty Court at the suit of her master for disbursements. The mortgagor being insolvent, and the plaintiffs wishing to realise their security, paid the master's claim and the ship was released. The plaintiffs then took possession of the O. on behalf of themselves and the other co-owners, and it was thereupon arranged between the plaintiffs and the co-owners that the O. should be sold on behalf of all parties and this was eventually done. Whilst the plaintiffs had possession of the O. she was lying in Bristol Dock, and they paid the necessary dock dues. In the event of the dock dues not being paid, the O. was liable to seizure and sale by the dock authorities under the Bristol Dock Act 1881, and the Harbours, Docks, and Piers Clauses Act 1847. In an action against the co-owners to recover the payments made by the plaintiffs: Held, that, in the circumstances, there was an implied promise in law by the co-owners to pay back the plaintiffs all the money paid by them to release the ship; and that the defendants were also liable to pay their proportion of the dock dues, the payment thereof by the plaintiffs being necessarily made on behalf of all the owners. (Ct. of App.) The Orchis ...page 501

4. Foreign ship—Appointment of receiver—Freight—Equitable mortgage.—In an action in personam by a plaintiff claiming to be equitable mortgagee of the foreign ship F. and her freight to secure a liability incurred by him in accepting bills of exchange which had been drawn by the managing owner, it appeared that the alleged mortgage was given to the plaintiff by the managing owner; that the plaintiff, when he accepted the bills, thought the managing owner was sole owner, and that it was subsequently sworn on affidavit that the managing owner was only a part owner, but it it did not appear whether the amount of the bills was in fact expended on the purposes of the ship. The F. was in an English port under charter to carry cargo to a foreign port, when, on application by the plaintiff, Butt, J. made an order appointing a receiver and authorising him to proceed with the ship to the foreign port and there receive the ship and all the freight due upon the voyage. The defendants appealed. Held, that, even assuming the managing owner to be only a part owner, yet that, as it did not appear that the amount of the bills was not expended solely for the purposes of the ship, the court had authority to appoint a receiver to receive the whole of the freight, and that, in the circumstances, it was expedient that the order should stand. (Ct. of App.) The Faust 126

5. Further advances—Bankruptcy—Receiving order—Priority.—Where under a mortgage of a ship to secure further advances, an advance is made on the date of a receiving order against the mortgagor, who is subsequently adjudicated bankrupt in respect of acts of bankruptcy committed prior to the execution of the mortgage, the mortgagee is entitled, under sect. 49 of the Bankruptcy Act 1883 as against the trustee in bankruptcy, to recover such advance, where before the date of the receiving order there was an existing contract between mortgagor and mortgagee to make future advances and a positive promise by the mortgagee to make this specific advance. (Adm. Ct.) The Thames 536

6. Possession—Mortgage money not due—Release.—Where the registered mortgagees of a ship instituted an action in rem as mortgagees for possession, and the ship was arrested therein before the mortgage money became due, and without any default on the part of the mortgagor, the Court, being of opinion upon the facts that the ship was not being dealt with so as to impair the mortgagees' security, ordered her release. (Adm. Div.) The Blanche .....page 272

7. Priority—Shipping company—Debenture holders—Freight charged.—The directors of a shipping company passed a resolution authorising its brokers to hypothecate the freight of two ships during their present voyages, to secure a present advance of sums not exceeding 5000*l*. Shortly afterwards the brokers transferred the freight of one of the ships to H. and Co. to secure an advance of 3000*l*. The transfer was signed by the brokers as managers of the company, who also gave an undertaking to collect the freight as agents for H. and Co. An action having been brought by the debenture-holders of the company for the enforcement of their securities, and the company having gone into liquidation, H. and Co. applied for an order that the liquidator of the company should pay to the applicant out of moneys representing the freight of the ship in question the sum of 3000*l*. Held, that the company had power under its articles of association, and the resolutions passed pursuant thereto, notwithstanding the debenture debt, to specifically charge a particular asset for the purpose of carrying on the company's business; and that, therefore, H. and Co's security was prior to that of the debenture-holders. NAVAL DISCIPLINE ACT 1866.

1. Commission — Resignation — Court-martial.—When a commissioned officer accepts an appointment to serve in one of Her Majesty's ships in commission, and enters upon the performance of his duties, he subjects himself to the provisions of the Navy Discipline Act 1866, and cannot at his own will and pleasure resign his appointment, and may be tried by court-martial for any of the offences specified in the Act. (Q. B. Div.) Reg. v. Cuming 189

2. Commission—Resignation—Court-martial.—The Admiralty refused leave to an officer of one of Her Majesty's ships in commission, to retire from the service, and thereupon the officer, having obtained permission to go on shore when the ship was at Simons Bay in South Africa, wrote a letter to his captain, informing him that he retired from the service, in accordance with the conditions laid down in article 160 of the Admiralty Regulations and returned his commission. The officer then returned to England in a mail steamer, and upon his arrival at Plymouth he was arrested and taken on board the flagship to await his trial by court-martial for desertion. Held, that he had no right to resign without leave, and that he was liable to be tried by court-martial under the Naval Discipline Act, 1866. (Q. B. Div.) Reg. v. Cuming 189

3. Commission — Acceptance of — Court-martial.—Quære, whether the mere acceptance of a commission would of itself and under all circumstances suffice to bring an officer within the jurisdiction of a court-martial for refusing to enter upon any particular service. NECESSARIES.

1. Maritime lien—Foreign ship—English port——Action in rem.—The statute 3 & 4 Vict. c. 65, s. 6, does not create a maritime lien in respect of necessaries supplied to a foreign ship in an English port, there having been no maritime lien for necessaries before that Act; and, consequently, material men cannot enforce their claims by proceedings in rem against a ship in the hands of a subsequent purchaser for value. (H. of L.) The Heinrich Bjorn 1

2. Practice—Default action—Pleadings—Particulars of claim.—Where the plaintiff in a default action in rem for necessaries had complied with all the formalities entitling him to judgment save service of a statement of claim, but it appeared that the writ, though not specially indorsed, contained particulars of the claim, the Court gave judgment for the plaintiff. (Adm. Div.) The Hulda 244

3. Priority of lien—Wages—Mortgage.—A claim by the plaintiff in an action for necessaries brought under sect. 4 (or, semble, under sect. 5) of the Admiralty Court Act 1861, even though it includes wages paid to the ship's crew at the request of the owner, is not entitled to precedence of a mortgagee's claim. Semble, precedence might have been gained by obtaining prior permission from the court to make the payment. (Adm. Div.) The Lyons 199

PASSENGER CERTIFICATE.

Passenger steamship—Board of Trade—Pleasure trip.—The respondents were charged that they, being the owners of the British steamship Era, did ply on the river O. with certain passengers on board without having one of the duplicates of a certificate issued by the Board of Trade put up in some conspicuous part of the ship so as to be visible to all persons on board the same. More than twelve persons were taken on board the steamer for an excursion from I. down the river to O. to F. and back. No charge was made by the respondents for the use of the steamer, but a gratuity was given to the master and crew. The justices dismissed the case. Held, that the justices were right, as the steamship was not a passenger steamship within the meaning of sects. 303 and 318 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854. (Q. B. PILOTAGE.

1. Licence to pilot—Harbour board—Liability.—A harbour board was empowered by statute to license pilots for the purpose of acting within their district. Pilotage was not compulsory in the district, and the pilot made his own bargain with the shipowner. The harbour master, who who was also a daily licensed pilot, was acting as pilot to a vessel, engaged by the owners themselves, when she was wholly lost, through his negligence and default. Held, that the harbour board were not responsible, as they were only entitled under the statute by which they were constituted to issue licenses, and were not liable for the negligence of those they licensed. (P.C.) Shaw, Savill, and Albion Company v. Timavu Harbour Board 521

2. Rate—Gravesend Reach to Northfleet—Order in Council.—The amount which a pilot is entitled for taking a ship from Gravesend to the outer entrance of the Tilbury Docks, and thence across the tidal basin to the dock gates, is the rate for pilotage from "Gravesend Reach to Northfleet," fixed by Order in Council, May 17, 1882, and the moving of the ship to the dock gates is not within the meaning of the provision in the Order in Council as to "removing a ship or vessel from moorings into a dry or wet dock," so as to entitle him to charge anything beyond the above pilotage rate. PRACTICE.

1. Action in rem—Lien—Secured creditor—Admiralty Court Act 1861.—The right to sue in rem under the Admiralty Court Act 1861, where there is no maritime lien, gives the plaintiff a charge on the res from the date of the arrest, and from that time he is a secured creditor in respect of his claim. (Ct. of App.) The Cella.....page 293

2. Action in rem—Notice of collision—Dublin Steam Packet Company, 6 & 7 Will 4, c. 100.—The 8th section of 6 & 7 Will. 4 (local and personal), c. 100, which requires notice to be given one calendar month before bringing any "action in any of His Majesty's courts of law" against the city of Dublin Steam Packet Company, does not apply to collision actions in rem against the company's vessels, and in such cases no notice is necessary. (Ct. of App.) The Longford 371

3. Appeal — Action in rem — Bail — Stay of execution.—In an appeal from a decision of the Court of Appeal to the House of Lords in an action in rem, in which bail has been given, the Court of Appeal will not stay execution pending the appeal unless special circumstances are shown by affidavit. (Ct. of App.) The Annot Lyle..... 50

4. Appeal — Fresh evidence — Admiralty County Court.—A judge of the Probate, Divorce, and Admiralty Division sitting alone can entertain an application for leave to adduce fresh evidence at the hearing of an Admiralty County Court appeal. (Adm. Div.) The Eclipse..... 409

5. Appeal—New point—Evidence.—Where a point which has not been taken in the court below is put forward by an appellant for the first time in a Court of Appeal, that court ought not to decide in his favour on such point unless it is satisfied beyond doubt, (1) that it has before it all the facts bearing upon the new contention as completely as if it had been raised in the court of first instance; (2) that no satisfactory explanation could have been given if it had been so raised. (H. of L.) The Tasmania..... 517

6. Arbitrator—Nomination of arbitrator—Power of Court.—In the case of an agreement to refer disputes to three arbitrators, one to be nominated by each party, and the third by the two so appointed, the court has no power to make an order calling upon one of the parties, who has been served with notice to appoint and neglects to do so, to appoint an arbitrator within seven days. (Ct. of App.) Re Smith and Service and Nelson and Sons 555

7. Arbitration—Submission—Rule of Court.—Sect. 1 of the Arbitration Act 1889 is only intended to give to all submissions to arbitration the same effect as, prior to the Act, those submissions had which were made rules of court. (Ct. of App.) Re Smith and Service and Nelson and Sons 555

8. Damages — Interest — Admiralty division.—Where an action was brought in the Admiralty Division to recover unliquidated damages, which, prior to the Judicature Act could not have been brought in the Admiralty Court, and the defendant made no attempt to have it transferred, the plaintiffs were held to be entitled, in accordance with the practice of the Admiralty Division, to interest on the amount recovered from the date of the loss. (Ct. of App.) The Gertrude v. The Baron Aberdare 315

9. Damages—Interest—Admiralty division—Transfer of action.—Where an action is transferred to the Admiralty Division by consent of the parties for the assessment of damages, the registrar and merchants are entitled, in accordance with the practice of the Admiralty Division, to give interest in addition to the actual damages, even where such interest would not be given in the division from whence the action is transferred. (Ct. of App.) The Gertrude v. The Baron Aberdare ..... page 315

10. Jurisdiction—Injunction—Delivery of goods—Lord Cairns' Act.—In a claim for delivery of goods asking for damages and an injunction the court has no jurisdiction under Lord Cairn's Act to award damages where no wrongful act has been actually committed by the person against whom the injunction is claimed. (Ct. of App.) Dreyfus and Co. v. Peruvian Guano Company ... 492

11. Registrar and merchants—Affidavit — Cross-examination. — At a reference in an Admiralty action, where the plaintiff being resident abroad makes an affidavit in support of his claim, and refuses to attend for cross-examination, it is in the discretion of the registrar to refuse to accept the affidavit until the plaintiff has been cross-examined, and it is further within his discretion to say whether the circumstances are such that the witness should attend in this country for cross-examination, or should be cross-examined abroad on commission. (Adm. Div.) The Parisian ... 249

12. Registrar and merchants — Privy Council—Appeal.—Where, upon the hearing of an appeal to the Privy Council from a judgment upon the report of the registrar of a Vice-Admiralty Court, the Privy Council is of opinion that the report must be referred back for the finding of other facts and figures, such reference will be to the Registrar of Her Majesty in Ecclesiastical and Maritime Appeals, if convenient and less expensive than a reference back to the Vice-Admiralty Court. (Priv. Co.) The City of Peking 572

13. Registrar and merchants—Report—Objection.—Semble, where an objection to a registrar's report is taken in general terms, as to the whole of an item allowed, it is open to the party objecting so seek to have part of the item disallowed. (Priv. Co.) The City of Peking 572

14. Trial at bar—Crown—Servants of—Attorney-General—Change of venue.—The Crown is entitled as of right to a trial at bar, in any cause in which it is interested, whether as a party or on behalf of any of its servants, or by reason of its interests being affected, and the Attorney-General, on behalf of the Crown, may obtain such trial at bar upon an ex parte application made by him to the court, he stating that the Crown is interested; and, in like manner, he is entitled to an order for a change of venue in any such case on a similar application; and in either case it is open to the other party to apply to set aside the order upon the ground that the Crown is not, in fact, interested, and that the court has been therein misinformed. (Ct. of App.) Dixon v. Farrer, Secretary to the Board of Trade..... 52

15. Trial at bar—Detention of ship—Venue—Merchant Shipping Act 1876—Crown Suits Act 1865.—In an action under the 10th section of the Merchant Shipping Act 1876 (39 & 40 Vict. c. 80), s. 10, against the Secretary of the Board of Trade, to recover costs and compensation for the detention of a ship without reasonable and probable cause, the Attorney-General is entitled, on behalf of the Crown, to demand as of right a trial at bar; and he is therefore also entitled under the Crown Suits Act 1865, on stating to the court that he waives his right to a trial at bar, to change the venue to any county in which he elects to have the cause tried. (Ct. of App.) Dixon v. Farrer, Secretary to the Board of Trade ..... page 52

16. Trial at bar—Judicature Act.—The Judicature Acts and rules of the Supreme Court have not the effect of abolishing trials at bar. (Ct. of App.) Dixon v. Farrer, Secretary to the Board of Trade 52

17. Writ—Action in personam—Foreign corporation—Address.—A writ in personam for service within the jurisdiction must contain the address as well as the name of the defendant, and consequently such a writ issued without any address against a foreign corporation having no place of business in this country is irregular and will be set aside. (Adm. Div.) The W. A. Scholten..... 244

18. Writ—Service—Leave of judge—Foreign corporation—Address.—Semble, that a writ for service in this country upon a foreign corporation having no address here, will not be issued without the leave of the judge, even if it contains the name and foreign address of the corporation. RESTRAINT.

1. Managing owner — Agreement – Bail for safe return.—An agreement between the owners of a ship and two persons appointing them ship's husbands and managers, and empowering them to continue to act as such at all times thereafter for the owners, their executors, administrators, and assigns, and giving them the entire management of the vessel does not prevent a dissentient part owner from instituting an action of restraint upon the ground that he is dissatisfied with the management and obtaining bail from his co-owners in the value of his shares. (Adm.) The England ..... page 140

2. Arrest of ship—Duty of managing owner—Costs.—Where part owners wrongfully institute an action of restraint and arrest the ship therein, it is the duty of the managing owner to take all reasonable steps to minimise the losses and expenses consequent on such arrest, and the arresting owners are not liable for such losses and expenses after a reasonable time has elapsed within which such steps could have been taken. (Adm. Div.) The Vindobala 250

3. Bond for safe return—Duration of—Cancellation—Change of owners.—Where a bail bond has been given in an action of restraint holding the sureties liable so long as the ship does not safely return to a port within the jurisdiction from as many voyages as she shall sail upon before notice shall have been given to the defendants by the plaintiffs that they withdraw their claim for security, the court will, upon its being shown that the owners on whose behalf the bond was given have ceased to be owners, cancel the bond and release the sureties from liability thereunder upon the ground that it never was intended that they should remain liable for all time whoever might be the owners. (Adm. Div.) The Vivienne 178

4. Mortgagees—Appearance under protest — Bond for safe return—Cancellation.—Where shipowners, in an action of restraint instituted by mortgagees alleging themselves to be owners, enter an appearance not under protest, and give a bail bond for the safe return of the ship, they are not precluded at the trial from questioning the plaintiffs' title; and if it in fact appear that the plaintiffs are merely mortgagees, the Court will order the bond to be given up and cancelled. (Adm.) The Keroula 23

5. Mortgagees — Possession. — Where persons hold shares in a ship by way of security for a loan under an agreement, by which it is provided (inter alia) that in the event of the owners of the shares failing to meet their acceptances, or to pay interest, the holders of the shares may realise them, calling on the owners of the shares to make good any loss arising therefrom, or paying them any balance left after repaying themselves the loan, they are merely mortgagees of such shares, and do not become owners thereof on the acceptances being dishonoured, and hence they, not having taken possession of the shares, are not entitled to institute an action of restraint against the ship. SALE OF GOODS.

Practice — Chief clerk's certificate — Damages.—In an action by plaintiffs claiming as consignees named in a bill of lading delivery of certain cargoes and damages for their detention, the defendants, who claimed the goods under a contract with the consignor, were allowed to receive the cargoes pending the trial. The Court subsequently held that the plaintiffs were entitled to the cargoes, and directed an inquiry to ascertain what damages the plaintiffs had sustained by the defendants' detention, but refused to allow the defendants to be reimbursed certain expenses incurred by them in respect of the cargoes. On appeal the House of Lords varied this judgment by allowing the defendants these expenses, but as no application was made to vary the inquiry it remained undisturbed. The chief clerk by his certificate awarded the plaintiffs damages on the footing of wrongful detention. The defendants applied to have the certificate varied on the ground that the effect of the decision of the House was that there had been no wrongful detention, and that the plaintiffs were entitled to nominal damages only: Held (Bowen, J., diss.) that the certificate must have effect given to it as it had not been reversed on appeal, and that therefore the plaintiffs were entitled to damages. SALVAGE.

1. Agreement—Amount.—Where the master of the s.s. P. H., which was in a position of serious danger ashore on rocks, entered into a written agreement with the master of the s.s. F., whereby he agreed to pay 200*l.* a day for every day the F. stood by and assisted, by towing, to remove the P. H., and "in the event of the P. H. being got off or coming off the rocks during the continuance of the agreement" to pay 2000*l.* beyond the daily pay of 200*l.*, and the same day the P. H. came off, either owing to the jettison of her cargo or the towing of the F.: the Court held that the service was a valuable one, that the agreement was reasonable, and that the salvors were entitled to recover 2200*l.* from the shipowners. (Adm. Div.) The Prinz Heinrich ... 273

2. Agreement—Amount—Compulsion.—A steamship in the Atlantic fell in with another which had lost her propeller and was leaking. It was agreed in writing between the masters that the owners of the ship in distress should pay the owners of the other 5000*l.* for being towed into Halifax, and if the towage had to be abandoned through stress of weather the salvors were to be paid for service rendered. The master of the vessel in distress had reasonable grounds for believing that, unless he consented to the above terms, the other ship would not assist him. The salvage was successfully accomplished without any special difficulty or danger. The distance towed was about 350 miles. The value of the salved property was about 23,000*l.* In a salvage action to recover the 5000*l.*, or such sum as the court thought just, the Court held that in the circumstances the agreement was signed under compulsion, that 5000*l.* was exorbitant, and awarded 3000*l.* and costs. (Adm. Div.) The Mark Lane .....page 540

3. Agreement—Authority of master.—An agreement made by the master of a vessel in distress to pay salvors a fixed sum is an agreement made on behalf of, and pledging the credit of, the shipowners, so as to make them liable to the salvors for the whole amount so agreed upon, and not merely for such proportion of such amount as the value of the ship and freight bears to the value of the cargo. (Adm. Div.) The Prinz Heinrich ... 273

4. Agreement — Master—Authority — Liability of shipowners and cargo owners.—An agreement made by the master of a vessel in distress to pay salvors a fixed sum is an agreement made on behalf of and pledging the credit of the shipowners so as to make them liable to the salvors for the whole amount so agreed upon, and not merely for such proportion of such amount as the value of the ship and freight bears to the value of the cargo. (Adm.) The Cumbrian ... 151

5. Agreement—Named sum—Supervening circumstances—Towage.—Where the master of a ship has agreed to tow a ship which is in distress to a named port for a fixed sum, such agreement is binding on the parties to it, even though by reason of an increase in the weather the performance of the agreement becomes more onerous than was originally contemplated; but if supervening circumstances are such as to render the performance of the contract nautically impossible, the Court of Admiralty is entitled to treat the agreement as if it had never been made, and, if the vessel is taken to a place of safety, to award to the salvors such salvage as the merits of the case require; and this is so whether the original contract be a towage or salvage agreement. (Ct. of App.) The Westbourne 405

6. Amount—Damage to salvors.—Where three steamships rendered valuable salvage service to a stranded vessel, and one of them sustained very considerable damage in rendering the services, the court on a value of 3750*l.* awarded 2000*l.* (Adm. Div.) The Erato 334

7. Amount—Principles on which the court acts—Risk to salvors—Risk to salved property.—The court, in estimating the value of salvage services, takes into consideration the value of the property saved, the risks to which it has been exposed, the perils from which it has been saved, the possibility of other assistance being obtained, the value of the salving ship, the sacrifices and risks incurred by the salvors, and the length of time to which they are exposed to such risks. (Adm.) The Werra 115

8. Appeal—Amount of award—Misapprehension of evidence.—The barque S of P., having taken up a foul berth in bad weather in the Downs, collided with another barque. The tug C. towed her clear after an hour's towing, during which time her anchor and chain were slipped. After she had been got clear the tug continued to tow ahead until another anchor had been brought off from the shore by other salvors, and she was ultimately saved. Her value and that of her cargo and freight amounted in all to 23,000*l.* Butt, J., in a salvage action against the S. of P. having awarded 150*l.*, the Court of Appeal held that he had misapprehended the evidence as to the danger from which the S. of P. had been saved, and increased the award to 300*l.* (Ct. of App.) The Star of Persia .....page 220

9. Appeal—Misapprehension of Evidence—Variation of award.—The Court of Appeal will, in a salvage action, where it appears that the judge below has misapprehended the evidence, and consequently given a wrong award, increase or diminish the award as the justice of the case may require. (Ct. of App.) The Star of Persia 220

10. Appeal—Privy Council—Alteration of award.—The Judicial Committee is reluctant to review salvage awards which involve the exercise of the discretion of the judge below, and will not do so unless the amount awarded differs to the extent of one-third from that which the Judicial Committee thinks adequate. (P.C.) The Thomas Allen..... 99

11. Appeal—Privy Council—Reduction of award.—The screw steamship T.A., of 1701 tons, laden with a cargo of grain, broke her screw shaft on the 3rd Oct. 1885 when in the Gulf Stream, about three hundred miles from Halifax. On the evening of the same day the steamship A., of about 1600 tons, laden with cargo and bound from Philadelphia to Bordeaux, took the T.A. in tow about 8.30 p.m. and brought her safely into Halifax about 3.30 p.m. on Oct. 5. The weather was fine, and the A. ran no danger in rendering the services. The T. A. was in no immediate danger when picked up. The value of the T. A., her cargo and freight, was 126,775 dollars; the value of the A., her cargo and freight, was 132,500 dollars. The Vice-Admiralty Court of Halifax having awarded 12,000 dollars: Held, on appeal, to be excessive, and reduced to 7500 dollars. (P.C.) The Thomas Allen..... 99

12. Apportionment—Right to share in salvage—Ship's articles—Cattlemen.—Where a salving ship, trading between England and the United States, carried cattlemen, whose duties were to attend to a cargo of live cattle, they being paid a lump sum for the voyage by the owners of the cattle, the fact that they are on the ship's articles at a nominal rating, in order to satisfy the requirements of the American authorities, does not of itself make them part of the crew, so as to entitle them to share with the ship's crew in the award. (Adm. Div.) The Coriolanus 514

13. Government ship—Transport—Right to reward.—The owners, master, and crew of a steamship chartered to Government as a transport under the ordinary form of Government charter incorporating the transport regulations (by which it is provided that "when necessary, steam transports will be required to tow other vessels"), are entitled to recover for salvage services rendered to a ship and her freight, even though the services be rendered with the assistance of a naval officer and naval seamen and the salved vessel be laden (inter alia) with Government stores. (Adm.) The Bertie 26

14. Incomplete services—Ship ultimately saved—Agreement—Right to reward.—In a salvage action the plaintiffs were obliged by stress of weather to leave the defendants' vessel in a worse position than that in which they found her. In the statement of claim it was alleged, and admitted in the defence, that there was an agreement between the masters that the salving ship should attempt to tow the defendants' ship to a port of safety. The defendants' ship was ultimately saved by another vessel. Held, that the plaintiffs were not entitled to salvage in the proper sense of the term, but that, as they had performed the agreement to attempt to save the ship, they were entitled to adequate remuneration for what they had done. (Adm. Div.) The Benlarig .....page 360

15. Liability for salvage—Ownership—Beneficial interest.—The liability for salvage is not confined to those who have the absolute property in the thing saved, but extends to persons having a beneficial interest therein and subject to pecuniary loss if the property were not saved. (Adm. Div.) Five Steel Barges 580

16. Pilotage—Fisherman—Shortness of provisions.—Where a ship, otherwise uninjured, is short of provisions, and some of her crew are disabled by exposure to bad weather, and her master, being anxious to get to the nearest port, engages out of pilotage waters the services of a fisherman to pilot him to the nearest port, the services of the fisherman are to be rewarded as salvage, and not as mere pilotage. (Adm. Div.) The Aglaia 337

17. Pilotage—Nature of services—Conversion to salvage.—The services of a pilot on a salved ship are not changed from those of pilot to salvor where his services consist in trifling assistance by helping at the wheel and windlass. (Adm.) The Monarch 90

18. Practice—Action in personam—Transfer of property.—An action in personam for salvage lies against the owners of salved property, although the salved property has been transferred to others before the institution of the suit. (Adm. Div.) Five Steel Barges 580

19. Practice—Compromise — Mistake of fact.—Where, in a salvage action, the agents of the plaintiffs' solicitor settle the plaintiffs' claim under a mistake of fact, and one of the claimants is present at the compromise, and under a misapprehension of the facts acquiesces therein, such compromise is not binding on him when the true state of affairs is discovered. (Adm.) The Monarch 90

20. Practice—Consolidation—Separate appearances—Tender—Costs.—Where separate salvage actions against the same ship were consolidated, leave being given to the various plaintiffs to appear separately at the hearing as their interests were conflicting, and the defendants with their defence tendered and paid into court a sum of money as being sufficient to satisfy all claims, but did not apportion it to the separate plaintiffs, the Court having upheld the tender ordered all parties to pay their own costs incurred subsequently to the tender, the defendants paying the costs previous to the tender. (Adm. Div.) The Lee 395

21. Practice—Registrar and Merchants—Bill of lading—Excepted perils.—In a salvage action against cargo, where the ship and cargo had been wrecked in the Red Sea, it appeared that the cargo was carried under a bill of lading exempting the shipowner from liability for loss caused by negligence of the master and crew. The shipowners claimed salvage for services to the cargo and brought in a claim for demurrage of certain of their ships which had rendered services. The Court referred these matters to the registrar to report how much was due to the salving of the ship and how much to the cargo. (Adm. Div.) The Cargo ex Ulysses 354

22. Priority of liens—Conservancy authority—Raising wreck—Expenses—Life salvage.—Where a conservancy authority, in pursuance of their powers under an Act of Parliament, raise a sunken ship and sell her to defray the expenses of raising her, their lien upon the ship and its proceeds take priority of any claim to life salvage, and if the proceeds are less than the expenses, there being no property saved against which life salvage can attach, life salvors cannot recover either against the sunken ship or against the owners, notwithstanding the fact that the owners have recovered from the wrongdoers causing the sinking of their ship the amount of the loss that they have sustained. (Adm.) The Annie .....page 117

23. Queen's ship—Duties of—Right to salvage.—Where a British ship is wrecked with cargo in the Red Sea and one of H.M. ships is employed to protect the ship and cargo from plunder by the Arabs, and the commander and crew also assist in saving the cargo by getting it out of the hold and carrying it a considerable distance to lighters, although it may be that the commander and crew are not entitled to salvage in respect of the protection which they give to the ship and cargo by their presence, they are entitled to salvage in respect of anything done outside the ordinary scope of their duties, which would include the placing of sentinels and carrying the cargo. (Adm. Div.) The Cargo ex Ulysses 354

24. Right to retain salved property—Repairs.—Where salvors have brought a damaged vessel into a position of safety they are bound, on demand by the owners, to deliver up possession of the salved property, and have no right to retain it for the alleged purpose of completing the repairs. (Adm. Div.) The Pinnas 313

25. Right to retain salved property—Possession.—Semble, if the owners of a vessel which is being salved demand possession of her when she is in such a critical position that there may be risk of loss or damage to her unless the salvors are allowed to complete their operations, the salvors may be entitled to retain possession pending their performance. (Adm. Div.) The Pinnas... 313

26. Right to salvage—Purchaser of salved property—Mistake of fact.—Where a person renders services in the nature of salvage to a vessel which he at the time bonâ fide believes to be his own by purchase or otherwise, he is not precluded from recovering salvage reward in respect of such services because it turns out in fact that the vessel was not his property. (Adm. Div.) The Liffey 255

27. Tug and tow—Contract—Conversion into salvage—Right to reward.—Where the owners of a tug contracted to tow a number of barges at sea for an agreed sum of money, it being part of the contract that, if the barges or any of them broke adrift during the towage, the tug owners were nevertheless to be entitled to the sum, and in consequence of the severity of the weather the voyage was unduly protracted, the barges broke adrift on several occasions, and were picked up again, and men in charge of the barges were saved from possible loss of life, the court awarded salvage on the ground that the services were beyond what was contemplated by the parties when entering into the towage contract. (Adm. Div.) Five Steel Barges..... 580

28. Warranty—Seaworthiness—Bill of lading—Latent defect.—Although there is an implied warranty in every bill of lading that the carrying ship shall be seaworthy, this warranty may be abrogated or limited by words to that effect; and hence, where a steamship laden with cargo becomes disabled through a latent defect in existence prior to the commencement of the voyage and salvage services are rendered to such steashmip by a vessel belonging to the same owners, the shipowners may recover salvage against the cargo if by the bill of lading the warranty of seaworthiness is abrogated, and the shipowners are not to be liable for latent defects. (Adm. Div.) The Laertes..... page 174

29. Wreck—Stranded vessel—Merchant Shipping Act 1854, s. 450.—The provisions of sect. 450 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 requiring a person who finds or takes possession of a wreck to give notice to the receiver, are not applicable to the case of a person who takes possession of a stranded vessel under the belief that he is the purchaser thereof, and in such a case these provisions do not operate to deprive him of his right to recover salvage. SHIPOWNERS.

1. Cost of working—Dissentient owners—Proportion of expenses.—Where a ship is being worked by part of her owners, the remainder being dissentient, and losses result from her employment, such losses are to be borne, not in the proportion which each share of the working owners bears to the whole sixty-four shares, but in the proportion which each share bears to the number of shares held by the persons working the ship. (Adm. Div.) The Vindobala 250

2. Jurisdiction—Registered co-owners—Admiralty Court Act 1861.—Quære, whether sect. 8 of the Admiralty Court Act 1861, giving the Admiralty Court jurisdiction to decide questions between co-owners is not confined to questions between registered co-owners. (Adm.) The Bonnie Kate 149

3. Managing owner — Authority — Agency. — Per Lord Esher, M.R.: The managing owner of a ship is the agent of each co-owner separately, and each co-owner may retract his authority to the managing owner without consulting the other co-owners. (Ct. of App.) The Vindobala...page 376

4. Managing owner—Defalcations — Contributions to make good.—Where a part owner of a ship pays to the managing owner his contribution due upon the ship's accounts as agreed between the co-owners, the managing owner receives such contribution as agent for all the owners, and in the event of the managing owner misapplying such payment to his own use, and not paying the ship's accounts therewith, the contributing owner is entitled to be credited with the amount so paid, but all the owners, including himself, must make good the defalcations in proportion to their shares. (Adm.) The Ida 21

5. Managing owner—Shipbroker—Remuneration—Commission.—A shipbroker, who is also managing owner of a ship and receiving a fixed sum as remuneration for his services as such, is not entitled to make an extra profit for himself by commission or brokerage for procuring charters and freights, it being one of the duties of a "managing owner" to procure charters and freights. (Ch. Div.) Williamson v. Hind Brothers 559

6. Principal and agent — Managing owner — Authority.—The mere fact of an agent being bound in honour to complete a contract which he is negotiating for his principal, where he, the agent, is under no legal liability if he refuses to complete, does not prevent the principal withdrawing his authority any time before the agreement is completed. (Ct. of App.) The Vindobala 376

7. Principal and agent — Managing owner — Authority — Charter-party.— The managing owner of the ship V., with the authority of his co-owners, entered into negotiations abroad with the view of chartering the ship. These negotiations were carried on by an agent abroad. On the 17th July 1884 a form of charter, signed by the managing owner, was offered to the proposed charterers. They objected to certain provisions in it, to which objections the agent, with the managing owner's authority, assented. On the 19th July the charterers signed the charter, having previously introduced into it certain further alterations which had never been suggested to the managing owner's agent. On the same day certain of the co-owners gave notice to the managing owners that they refused to be bound by any charter. The managing owner, considering himself bound in honour to sign the charter-party, signed it on the 22nd July. The execution of the charter-party was prevented by the arrest of the V. by the dissentient owners, and damages resulted therefrom. Held (reversing the decision of Butt, J.), in a co-ownership action, that there was no binding contract until the managing owner signed the charter on the 22nd July, and that up to the signing of the same any of the owners could revoke the managing owner's authority, and that, as the dissenting owners had revoked their authority on the 19th July, they were not bound by the charter. (Ct. of App.) The Vindobala 250, 376

8. Purchase of shares during voyage—Right to freight—Deduction of expenses.—The purchaser of shares in a ship during the progress of a voyage is only entitled to share in the net freight after all the expenses incidental to earning the freight on the voyage in question have been deducted from the gross freight. (Adm. Div.) The Vindobala 250

9. Sale of shares — Managing owner — Authority — Liability in expenses. — The managing owners of the steamship B. K. in 1882 agreed to sell the defendant V. one sixty-fourth share in the B. K., for which he gave them a bill of exchange for 156*l.*, and received from them a receipt for the same as "being one sixty-fourth share in the s.s. B. K." In 1883 the managing owners sent V. 8*l.* in respect of profits on his share, and subsequently sent him a statement of accounts. No bill of sale of the share was ever executed by the managing owners, and it appeared that their shares in the B. K. were mortgaged at the time of the sale to V., and that subsequently they never were in a position to redeem them. Certain of the owners having paid losses incidental to the working of the ship, now sued V. as a co-owner for his proportion of the losses. Held, that, notwithstanding the receipt by V. of the 8*l.*, he was not, either in law or equity, a co-owner, that the managing owners had no authority to pledge his credit, and that therefore he was not liable. STOPPAGE IN TRANSITU.

1. Bankruptcy—Vendee—Foreign principal—Mate's receipts.—Where a vendor, having sold goods to a vendee whom he knows to be purchasing for a principal abroad, delivers such goods on board a ship, which he knows to belong to such principal, and having taken mate's receipts for such goods, hands them to the vendee, who is described in the bills of lading as shipper, and to whose order the goods are deliverable, the vendor is not entitled to stop the goods in transitu on learning that the vendee has become bankrupt. Cave, J.) Re Bruno, Silva, and Son; ex parte Francis and Co. Limited 138

2. Duration of transit — Carrier—Agency of.—Where goods have not been delivered to the purchaser, or to any agent of his, for him to hold otherwise than as a carrier, but are still in the hands of the carrier as such, and for the purposes of the transit, then, although such carrier is the purchaser's agent to accept delivery so as to pass the property, nevertheless the goods are in transitu, and may be stopped. (P. C.) Lyons v. Hoffnung 551

3. Duration of transit—Constructive delivery—Mate's receipts.—Delivery of goods by a vendor on board a ship named by the purchaser in pursuance of an order to consign them to the ship "to Melbourne loading in the East India Docks," in respect of which goods a receipt given by the mate to the persons delivering the goods is sent to the purchasers, is not constructive delivery to the purchaser, and hence the vendor on hearing of the purchasers insolvency is entitled to exercise the right of stoppage in transitu. 4. Duration of transit—Purchaser's agent—Carrier—Shipowner's receipts.—Where goods have not been delivered to the purchaser or to his agent to hold for him otherwise than as a carrier, the right to stop them in transitu under such circumstances is not affected by the facts (1) that the purchaser has handed to the shipping agents the shipowners' receipts for the goods received by him from the vendor, and has received from them in exchange a bill of lading; (2) that the purchaser is himself a passenger by the vessel on board which the goods are shipped as cargo for conveyance to their ultimate destination. (Before Lords WATSON, BRAMWELL, and FITZGERALD.)

NORTHCOTE v. OWNERS OF THE HENRICH BJORN. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF APPEAL IN ENGLAND.

Ship—Necessaries supplied to foreign ship—Maritime lien—Action in rem—3 & 4 Vict. c. 65, s. 6.

The statute 3 & 4 Vict. c. 65, s. 6, does not create a maritime lien in respect of necessaries supplied to a foreign ship in an English port, there having been no maritime lien for necessaries before that Act; and, consequently, material men cannot enforce their claims by proceedings in rem against a ship in the hands of a subsequent purchaser for value.

Judgment of the Court of Appeal affirmed.

THIS was an appeal from a judgment of the Court of Appeal (Brett, M.R., Bowen and Fry, L.JJ.), reported in 52 L. T. Rep. N. S. 560; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 391; and 10 P. Div. 44, reversing a judgment of Sir James Hannen, reported in 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 145; 49 L. T. Rep. N. S. 405; and 8 P. Div. 151.

The appellants were shipbrokers in Liverpool, and the respondents were the owners of the Norwegian vessel, the Henrich Bjorn. The appellants claimed the sum of 683*l.* 6*s.* 2*d.*, in respect of necessaries supplied by them to the ship, while lying in the port of Liverpool, at the request of the master, and commenced a proceeding in rem against the ship. The defence set up by the respondents was, that since the goods had been supplied the ship had changed owners. The question, therefore, was whether the appellants were entitled to proceed against the ship, or had only a remedy against her former owners. The action was tried before Sir James Hannen, who gave judgment for the appellants for 350*l.*, but his decision was reversed with costs, as above mentioned.

Cohen, Q.C., and Raikes, for the appellants, argued that the effect of the statute 3 & 4 Vict. c. 65, s. 6, was to give a maritime lien in respect of necessaries supplied to a foreign ship in an English port. By the civil law there always was a maritime lien for necessaries. The American Courts have also decided in favour of the existence of a maritime lien. For many years past, there has been a uniform practice to that effect: (see The Anna, 34 L. T. Rep. N. S. 895; 1 P. Div. 253.) The existence of a jurisdiction in the Admiralty Court is not conclusive as to a maritime lien, for that court might have jurisdiction without a lien. Up to 1840, the Admiralty Court had jurisdiction in a claim for necessaries supplied on the high seas, and there was a lien, and the statute was intended to extend the jurisdiction to cases occurring within the body of a county. If no maritime lien exists in the case of "necessaries," then it must follow that damage and salvage within the body of a county confer no maritime lien, but there is a lien in cases of damage or salvage within the body of a county, and therefore it follows that there must be a lien in a case of necessaries. The civil law gave a maritime lien in certain cases, and the Admiralty Court allowed it as far back as the time of Edward III.; (see Abbott on Shipping, 22th edit., pp. 99, 100.) Then came the statutes 13 Rich. 2, c. 5, and 15 Rich. 2, c. 3, which were passed to restrain the jurisdiction of the Admiralty in the bodies of counties: (see The Public Opinion, 2 Hagg. Ad. 398.) The Admiralty Court similarly lost jurisdiction over masters' wages, except on the high seas, while retaining it over seamen's wages, unless earned under a special contract: (see 24 Vict. c. 10, s. 10.) Towage in the body of a county stands on the same footing as salvage: (Abbott, 12th edit., p. 489.) Necessaries supplied in a port were contracted for on land, so the Admiralty Court was deprived of its jurisdiction by the statute of Richard 2, but it retained it jurisdiction as to necessaries supplied on the high seas down to 1840:

Before the Admiralty Court Act of 1861 (24 Vict. c. 10) proceedings in personam were never taken in the Admiralty Court for wages, salvage, or necessaries: (see The Flecha, 1 Spinks Ecc. & Ad. 438.) The Waiaga (Swa. 165) assumes the very point for which we are contending (see also Re Rio Grande do Sul S.S. Co. (36 L. T. Rep. N. S. 603; 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 424; 5 Ch. Div. 282), citing The Feronia (17 L. T. Rep. N. S. 619; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 54; L. Rep. 2 A. & E. 65), bears out the practice of the Admiralty Court in the case of a lien for disbursements. There was prior to the Admiralty Court Act 1861 no proceeding in rem in the Admiralty Court unless there was a maritime lien; and in this case of the supply of necessaries to a foreign ship in an English port the decisions have been uniform for twenty-five years, though there are dicta to the contrary.

Sir R. Webster, Q.C. and Pyke for the respondents were requested to confine their arguments to the points: (1) Whether the Admiralty Court recognised a maritime lien for necessaries before the Act of 1840? (2) Whether the authorities, or the course of mercantile practice, were such as to preclude the House from putting its own construction on the Act? There has not been a uniform course of practice or decision since 1861, as alleged on the other side. Many of the cases cited were only questions of priorities among various claimants. The civil law did not confer a maritime lien for necessaries before the Act of 1840: (see Emerigon, Contrats à la Grosse, c. 12, s. 1, and Voet.) If there were a lien for necessaries supplied on the high seas there would be no need for bottomry: (see Hussey v. Christie, 9 East, 426.) There is no case of a maritime lien for necessaries before 1840, and the argument of the appellants is based on a misunderstanding of the proceedings in rem. The difference between proceedings in rem and in personam is only in the service of the writ to compel the owner to come into court. The dictum in The Bold Buccleugh (ubi sup.) cannot be supported. See

The Neptune (ubi sup);
The Zodiac, 1 Hagg. Ad. 320;
The Vrow Mina, 1 Dod. 234.

These cases show that there is no maritime lien for necessaries except in cases of bottomry:

The Vibilia, 1 Wm. Rob. 1;
The Parlement Belge, 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 234; 42 L. T. Rep. N. S. 273; 5 P. Div. 197.

The authorities show that there was no such lien as is claimed before 1840, and the Act of that year did not create it. Prior to that Act some proceedings in rem were independent of maritime liens, viz., actions of possession and restraint.

Raikes was heard in reply.

At the conclusion of the arguments their Lordships took time to consider their judgments.

April 5.—Their Lordships gave judgment as follows:

Lord WATSON.—My Lords: This appeal is taken in an Admiralty suit, at the instance of the appellants, for recovery of moneys said to have been advanced by them in March 1882, for equipping and supplying with necessary stores the Norwegian ship Henrich Bjorn which was then lying in the port of Liverpool. The action is in rem, that being, as I understand the term, a proceeding directed against a ship or other chattel, in which the plaintiff seeks either to have the res adjudged to him in property or possession, or to have it sold under the authority of the court, and the proceeds, or part thereof, adjudged to him in satisfaction of his pecuniary claims. The remedy is obviously an appropriate one in the case of a plaintiff who has a right of property or other real interest in the ship, or a claim of debt secured by a lien which the law recognises. We have been informed that under the recent practice of the Admiralty Court the remedy is also given to creditors of the shipowner for maritime debts which are not secured by lien; and in that case the attachment of the ship by process of the court, has the effect of giving the creditor a legal nexus over the proprietary interest of his debtor as from the date of the attachment. The position of a creditor who has a proper maritime lien differs from that of a creditor in an unsecured claim in this respect—that the former, unless he has forfeited the right by his own laches, can proceed against the ship notwithstanding any change in her ownership, whereas the latter cannot have an action in rem unless at the time of its institution the res is the property of his debtor. In the present case there was a change in the ownership of the Henrich Bjorn between March 1882 and the time when this suit was instituted. Accordingly it is not matter of dispute that the action must be dismissed, if the appellants have not a maritime lien for the amount of their advances, which attached to and followed the ship, from and after the time when these advances were made.

Before the year 1840 the Court of Admiralty never possessed, although it did occasionally, when not prohibited, exercise jurisdiction in the case of maritime claims arising within the body of a county. In that year an Act was passed (3 & 4 Vict. c. 65) for the purpose, as expressed in the title and preamble, of improving the practice and extending the jurisdiction of the High Court of Admiralty. Sect. 6 enacts that in future that court shall "have jurisdiction to decide all claims and demands whatsoever in the nature of salvage for services rendered to or damage received by any ship or sea-going vessel, or in the nature of towage, or for necessaries supplied to any foreign ship or sea-going vessel, and to enforce payment thereof, whether such ship or vessel may have been within the body of a county or upon the high seas at the time the services were rendered or damage received or necessaries furnished in respect of which such claim is made." By sect. 23 it is provided that nothing contained in the Act shall be deemed to preclude Her Majesty's Courts of Law and Equity from continuing to exercise the jurisdiction which they previously had over the several matters and causes of action therein mentioned. I do not think it necessary to refer to authorities for the purpose of establishing that by the law of England persons who equip or provide necessaries to a ship in an English port have no preference over other creditors, and have no lien upon the ship itself for recovery of their demands. The law upon that point is clear. But the appellants rely upon the provisions of sect. 6 of the Act of 1840 as evidencing the intention of the Legislature not merely to give the Court of Admiralty jurisdiction to entertain claims for necessaries supplied to a foreign ship within the body of a county, but also to create a new incident of the claimant's right when he elects to sue in that court. It seems to be the necessary result of the appellants' contention that the claimant, who is an unsecured creditor, without any preference, when he seeks to enforce his claim elsewhere, becomes by virtue of the Act a creditor preferably secured when he brings an action in the Court of Admiralty. The whole provisions of 3 & 4 Vict. c. 65, appear to me to relate to the remedies and not to the rights of suitors. Sect. 6 merely confers "jurisdiction" to decide certain claims which the Court of Admiralty had previously no power to entertain. That enactment enables every person having a claim of the nature of one or other of those specified in sect. 6 to bring an action for its recovery in the Admiralty Court, but it cannot, in my opinion, have the effect of altering the nature and legal incidents of the claim. It may be that, at the time when the Act of 1840 was passed, it was not the practice of the Admiralty Court to sustain an action in rem, except at the instance of a plaintiff who had either a real right in, or a proper lien over, the vessel against which it was directed. The authorities cited at the bar appeared to me to bear out that proposition; but assuming it to be well founded, I do not see how it can affect the present question, because it is admitted that the court entertained actions in personam as well as in rem, and could, therefore, give an appropriate remedy in the case of a personal claim to which no maritime lien was attached. It was argued for the appellants that inasmuch as, in sect. 6, claims for necessaries supplied are enumerated in connection with claims for salvage, and for damages arising from collision (which have been held to involve a maritime lien), it must be inferred that the Legislature meant that a right of lien should be also recognised in the case of a claim for necessaries. In my opinion, it is impossible to derive that inference from the terms of the clause except by assuming, as Dr. Lushington seems to have done, in the case of The Flecha (1 Spinks, Eccl. & Ad. 438), that the main object of the Act was to assimilate the law of England to "the general law of the maritime States of Europe." As I have already indicated, that appears to me to be an assumption inconsistent alike with the title and preamble of the Act and with the character of its provisions. Many foreign States, whose systems of jurisprudence are based on the civil law, admit a maritime lien for necessaries, but the ground upon which the courts of England have declined to recognise such a lien is not, in my opinion, that it is opposed to some rule or principle peculiar to English law, but that it is contrary to the general principles of the law merchant. The law of Scotland is to a great extent founded upon the civil law, yet in the case of Wood v. Hamilton (3 Paton, Sc. App. Ca. 148), the Court of Session held that no hypothec existed for repairs or furnishings in a home port, being of opinion that the question ought to be determined, not according to the civil law, but, as in England, upon general principles of commercial law, and the judgment was, on appeal, affirmed by this House. To my mind it is scarcely conceivable that the Legislature, if it had been their intention to assimilate our commercial law to that of the foreign States referred to by Dr. Lushington in the case of The Flecha, should have endeavoured to effect that object by confining the assimilation to suits instituted in the English Court of Admiralty.

It was further argued that your Lordships are precluded from deciding that sect. 6 does not create any maritime lien in the case of claims for necessaries, by an authoritative course of decisions and practice to the contrary in the courts below. I do not think it necessary to refer in detail to the authorities bearing upon this point, which were carefully reviewed by Fry, L.J. in delivering the judgment of the Court of Appeal. The case of The Flecha, which was decided by Dr. Lushington in 1854, does not seem to me to be a direct authority in support of the appellants' argument. It was, no doubt, an action in rem for necessaries; but the owner, on whose credit the furnishings were made, appeared and put in bail, and the report of the case does not indicate that any question was raised in regard to lien. In the case of The West Friesland in 1859 (Swa. 454), and of The Ella A. Clark, in 1863 (Br. & L. 82), the same learned judge did decide in terms that, in virtue of sect. 6 of the Act of 1840, the plaintiffs, who sued in respect of necessaries supplied to a foreign ship in a home port, had a maritime lien, and were consequently entitled to proceed in rem, although the ship had been transferred in bonâ fide to a new owner. His judgment in The West Friesland was recalled, on appeal, by the Privy Council, who disposed of the case on other grounds, and carefully avoided any expression of opinion upon the law which had been laid down in the court below. So far, therefore, as regards judicial decision the argument of the appellants appears to me to rest upon the judgment of Dr. Lushington in the case of The Ella A. Clark. No one has done more to impair the authority of his decisions in The West Friesland and The Ella A. Clark than Dr. Lushington himself by his clear statement of the law in other cases. The principle of these decisions has never been confirmed or approved by any Court of Appeal. They were referred to by the Privy Council in The Two Ellens (26 L. T. Rep. N. S. 1; 1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 208; L. Rep. 4 P. C. 161), and The Rio Tinto (50 L. T. Rep. N. S. 461; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 224; 9 App. Ca. 356); but the language used in the former of these cases by Mellish, L.J., and in the latter by Sir James Hannen, appears to me to be as much calculated to suggest doubt as to imply approval. In these circumstances I have come to the same conclusion as the Court of Appeal. I do not think that there is any decision of such authority, or that any such case of communis error has been made out, as would justify your Lordships in refusing to give effect to the provisions of sect. 6 of the Act of 1840, according to their just construction. I am, therefore, of opinion that the order of the Court of Appeal must be affirmed, and I move accordingly, and that the respondents do have the costs of this appeal.

Lord BRAMWELL.—My Lords: The question is whether the appellants have a maritime lien on the Henrich Bjorn—that is, a right to have satisfaction from the ship of a claim arising when the ownership of the vessel was as to five-sixths different from what it was when the suit now before us was instituted. The claim is for necessaries or money advanced to purchase necessaries for the outfit of the ship, a foreign ship lying at Liverpool. I will assume there was such supply or loans. Now, it is admitted on all sides and is certain that no such lien existed before 3 & 4 Vict. c. 65, s. 6, and also certain that if it now exists, it was given by that statute. But it is also certain that it is not thereby expressly given. For the words of the section are, "the High Court of Admiralty shall have jurisdiction to decide all claims and demands for" certain specified matters, including "necessaries supplied to any foreign ship, and to enforce payment thereof, whether it may have been within the body of a county or upon the high seas when the necessaries were supplied." Not a word about a lien; jurisdiction alone is given. So that if a lien is given, it is by implication only. Now, I think that where the Legislature in its laws, or parties in their agreements, might expressly state a particular intention and have not, that intention ought not to be implied, and the law or agreement dealt with as if the intention were expressed, without the most cogent considerations, amounting almost to a necessity. I am of opinion that they do not exist as to this statute. Let us examine the grounds on which it is contended they do. In the first place it is said that the object of the Legislature was to assimilate the law of England to the law of other European countries, that other European countries gave such a lien, and that, therefore it ought to be implied that this statute gives it. But we shall see presently that this assimilation would make the law of Engiand different to those of Scotland and Ireland, and, as my noble and learned friend who has just addressed your Lordships has said, it would make the rights different as administered in a court of common law from what they are in the Admiralty Court. Then it is said that our law gave such a lien where the supply was at sea, and that it follows that when the statute gives jurisdiction for necessaries supplied within the body of a county, the lien is given. As to this, there is a failure to show that our law did give such a lien for necessaries supplied on the high seas. Lord Tenterden's opinion is to the contrary, so is The Neptune, reported in 3 Knapp, 94. Further, 3 & 4 Vict. c. 65, is a law relating to the English Court of Admiralty only. It does not affect Ireland or Scotland. And if construing it as the appellants require would make our law in England like that of foreign nations, it would make it unlike that of Ireland, and as I am informed by Lord Watson, unlike that of Scotland. The truth is that the Legislature, or draftsman of the Act, was not thinking of a maritime lien, and if it has been given it has been so unintentionally. But then it was said that jurisdiction is given in cases of salvage and collision, and that as to them a maritime lien existed when the salvage or collision arose on the high seas, and that it could not be intended that there should not be a similar law if they arose within the body of a county, that, therefore, the words of the statute by implication gave such lien in those cases, and are therefore sufficient to give it in the case of necessaries. Now it may be admitted that it would be strange that if a collision occurred a little below the Nore, there should be a maritime lien, while if it were just above there should not be. How that may be I do not say; but, assuming there would be a maritime lien in case of a collision within a county, and that it might be in a sense said to be given by the statute, it by no means follows that one is given in the cases of towage or necessaries. It may well be that salvage and collision within counties are put on the same plight and condition as on the high seas, without the consequence as to necessaries contended for. Jurisdiction is by the section given in cases of towage, and it cannot be pretended that there was any maritime lien as to that when it occurs on the high seas. It was, indeed, said it was a sort of salvage, but it certainly is not. And the Admiralty, I take it, would have, under the statute, jurisdiction in a case of towage where the ship had been let and the owner was not liable. I do not see, therefore, any reason for implying that which, if intended, might have been expressly stated. But there are many reasons to the contrary besides the general one against needless implication. The law would, as I have said, be made different to the law of Ireland and Scotland.

Further, when the Legislature meant to give a lien, it knew how to do so, and did it in express terms, as in the case of master's wages, 7 & 8 Vict. c. 112, the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, sect. 191. Then it is not given, as it might have been, for necessaries supplied in cases where jurisdiction is given by 24 Vict. c. 10, s. 5. Further, if giving the Admiralty jurisdiction would give a maritime lien, the effect of 24 Vict. c. 10, would be to give a maritime lien for the rent of a house. The statute gave, as it says, jurisdiction, and jurisdiction only; a jurisdiction over matters arising within the body of a county as to which there was jurisdiction before if they arose on the high seas; a jurisdiction to decide all such claims and demands, and enforce payment thereof. Jurisdiction as to towage was not created by the statute. It existed before with no maritime lien (Williams and Bruce, 152.) But the decisions must be examined. I cannot help thinking that the confusion which exists in them is attributable to a notion that Admiralty jurisdiction only existed where there was a maritime lien, so that to give jurisdiction was to give a lien. That the law was so was stoutly contended before us; but ultimately and most properly that was given up on the strength of authorities showing beyond doubt that Admiralty jurisdiction exists and always existed where there was no such lien. Proceedings might be in personam without the res being affected. And when they were in rem, though a security might be obtained for the payment of what was recovered, it might well be that there was no lien. With respect to the decisions of Dr. Lushington, I shall content myself with saying, with a most affectionate respect for his memory, that they neutralise each other—that, if anything, they are more against than in favour of the lien claimed, especially his decision and reasons for it in The Alexander (1 W. Rob. 288, 346). And here I may observe that I agree in the remarks of Fry, L.J., that the jurisdiction given was not "an old one revived," for it was prohibited because it did not exist rightfully. In The Bold Buccleugh (7 Moo. P. C. 267), it was assumed that a maritime lien existed in cases of collision within the body of a county, which could only be because it was given by 3 & 4 Vict. c. 65. But two remarks are to be made on that case—one, that it was assumed without discussion; the other, that even if it was given it was in cases of collision. As I have said, it does not follow that it was so in case of necessaries. But then there is the opinion of Mellish, L.J., in the Two Ellens (ubi sup.), in which he says, "Their Lordships are of opinion that the case of necessaries may be supported on the ground that, though the words are hardly sufficient to create a maritime lien, yet it appears designed to enlarge the jurisdiction the Admiralty already had in matters forming the subject of a maritime lien." The following remarks arise on this. It is obiter; that does not show a remark is valueless, but it certainly shows it is not so valuable as a specific decision on a question directly raised. If the question had been raised there, I do not think Mellish, L.J. would have said, as he did, "that it was a matter forming the subject of a maritime lien." Further, the expression is, "their Lordships are of opinion that the decision may be supported." I am not sure that means more than "possibly may be." The case of The Rio Tinto (ubi sup.), is in point, and the reasoning there may be entirely adopted. It convincingly decides that there is no maritime lien for necessaries as in the present case is contended for. I have reason for saying that this opinion I am now expressing is not opposed to that of the President of the Probate and Admiralty Division. On these grounds and authorities, I am of opinion no maritime lien existed in this case, and that the judgment should be affirmed.

Lord FITZGERALD.—My Lords: I had the honour of being one of the tribunal which decided the appeal in the case of The Rio Tinto (50 L. T. Rep. N. S. 461; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 224; 9 App. Cas. 356), and I then formed an opinion on the question whether sect. 6 of the 3 & 4 Vict. c. 69, created a maritime lien for "necessaries supplied to a foreign ship," which I have not had since any reason to change. The Judicial Committee had, in that case, to consider this very question. This decision was unanimous, and the reasons for it, as delivered by Sir James Hannen met with the entire approval of the Lords present. It is a case in point, though it does not decide the very same question as that now before us, but I agree with Lord Bramwell that the reasoning there used may be entirely adopted. The conclusion which I had reached in the case of The Rio Tinto is in precise accordance with the decision which has just been announced, and with the clear and exhaustive judgment of the Court of Appeal as delivered by Fry, L.J. The course of this cause has been very singular. The plaintiffs, in their statement of claim, do not allege or set up any maritime lien, and the defence was substantially a denial that, save as to a small sum paid into court, any necessaries had been supplied by the plaintiffs. It came before Sir James Hannen for trial, but the allegation of a maritime lien does not appear to have been raised, nor was his attention at all directed to it. The parties then went before the Court of Appeal, and it was in the argument there that maritime lien was for the first time suggested. I entirely concur with my noble and learned friends, and have nothing to add to their reasons. I desire to point out that the two main propositions on which Mr. Cohen rested the appellant's case—viz., (1) that at the time when The Bold Buccleugh (7 Moo. P. C. 267) was decided there was no proceeding in rem in the Admiralty Court save where there was a maritime lien; and (2) that there was no procedure in that court to found jurisdiction except where there was a maritime lien—were not shown to be well founded. It must now be taken as established that prior to 1840 the Court of Admiralty did exercise a jurisdiction in rem for the purpose of enforcing a claim against the owner, though there was no maritime lien, and also in personam in proper cases.

Order appealed from affirmed; and appeal dismissed with costs.

Supreme Court of Judicature

COURT OF APPEAL.

Thursday, June 3, 1886.

(Before the LORD CHANCELLOR (Herschell), Lord ESHER, M.R., and FRY, L.J.)

THE HARVEST. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM BUTT, J.

Collision—Bye-laws for the Regulation of the River Tyne 1884, art. 30.

A vessel entering the Tyne is bound, under bye-law 20 for the Regulation of the River Tyne, directing that vessels shall be brought into port to the north of mid-channel, to get on to a course to enable her to enter on the north side when at some considerable distance outside the pier-heads; and if she crosses from south to north of mid-channel, when close up to the pier-heads, she thereby infringes the bye-law.

(a) Reported by J. P. ASPINALL and BUTLER ASPINALL, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

This was an appeal by the defendants in a collision action from a decision of Butt, J., finding the defendants' steamship Harvest solely to blame for a collision with the plaintiffs' steamship Stainsacre.

The collision occurred on the 30th Nov. 1885, and, according to the finding of the court below, some two or two and a half cables' lengths outside the pier-heads of the river Tyne, and to the south of mid-channel.

The Stainsacre was bound from the Howdon Dock in the Tyne to Copenhagen. The Harvest was bound from Terneuzen to the Tyne.

The plaintiffs charged the defendants inter alia with improperly approaching the entrance of the river in such a direction that the Harvest was being brought into the port to the south of mid-channel, in contravention of bye-law 20 for the Regulation of the Port of Newcastle-upon-Tyne, which is as follows:

> Every steam or other vessel (whether towing any other vessel or not, or being towed) shall, unless prevented by stress of weather, be brought into port to the north of mid-channel, and be taken out of the port to the south of mid-channel.

The further facts of the case fully appear in the report of the trial below: (11 P. Div. 14; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 546; 54 L. T. Rep. N. S. 274.)

The Lord Chancellor (Herschell).—This is an appeal from the judgment of Butt, J., in which he found the Harvest alone to blame for a collision which took place between the steamships Harvest and Stainsacre, near the mouth of the river Tyne. I think that the case really depends on the view to be taken of the facts, although some argument has been addressed to us on the construction of bye-laws which have been made by the Tyne Commissioners for the navigation of the river. The 20th of these bye-laws is the bye-law which regulates the course the Harvest was bound to take in entering the Tyne. It provides that "Every steam or other vessel (whether towing any other vessel or not, or being towed) shall, unless prevented by stress of weather, be brought into the port to the north of mid-channel, and be taken out of the port to the south of mid-channel." I understood it to be suggested that that bye-law only applied when a vessel was entering or being taken out of the port across an imaginary line drawn between the two pier-heads. But it is quite manifest that, when read in connection with the 19th rule, that that cannot be the meaning, because the 19th rule regulates the navigation up to this imaginary line, and therefore it is obvious rule 20 applies to something outside this line. I think rule 20 is to regulate the mode in which vessels are to be brought to or taken from the place where rule 19 ceases to operate. I therefore think that the true construction of the rule is that put upon it by Butt, J., that in bringing your ship into the river you shall not begin to make the river too near, but you shall keep sufficiently far out before you cross, so as to leave sufficient fairway for vessels that are coming out. That appears to me to be the common sense of the rule, and therefore a vessel is not "brought into the port to the north of mid-channel" if she begins to shape her course and make for the river too near to the pier, by shaving it too fine to leave sufficient room for a vessel coming out on the north side of the channel.

Now, the question arises, did the Harvest so navigate as to violate or comply with this rule? The learned judge below came to the conclusion that she was being navigated in violation of the rule. We see no reason to differ from the conclusion at which he arrived. We think that she came too near to the pier-head, and cut it too fine. That is shown by the position of the wreck, and by other facts, which we think are the correct facts in the case. Therefore we think the Harvest was wrong in violating the rule. [His Lordship then, on the facts, found the Harvest further to blame for not exhibiting a masthead light, and exonerated the Stainsacre for starboarding shortly before the collision.] I therefore think the starboarding of the Stainsacre is to be excused, and that the Harvest is to blame for two acts of negligence, both of which contributed to the collision. I am therefore of opinion that the judgment of the court below must be affirmed.

Lord Esher, M.R.—There is a question in this case as to the construction of the rule relating to vessels going in and out of this port. By the very wording of the rule it is meant to apply to something outside what is called the port. It seems to me, having regard to its nautical language, that it is not applicable to anything which is to be done inside the port, but to something which is to be done when you are navigating a ship into or out of the port. That intention is clear when you contrast it with rule 19. Taking it to apply to the outside of the port, how does it act practically? Why, in this way, that a ship coming in from the south must not make for the point where she is to bring the two leading lights in line too close to the pier-heads so as not to leave room for ships coming out. She must keep a reasonable distance outside before she turns to go up the river, so as to leave a fair course for outcoming ships. That being the construction of the rule, the question is, whether, upon the evidence in this case, the Harvest did not go unreasonably close to the south pier-head so as not to leave enough room for outcoming vessels. Considering the place where the wreck was, and knowing the circumstances of the case, the learned judge below believed the evidence of the captain of the Stainsacre. It seems to me that the Harvest did come in too close to the south pier-head. Our assessors have no doubt from the position of the wreck, and from the evidence that the Harvest came in, not as her captain stated and falsely stated, a mile from the pier-head when she struck the line of lights, but that she came in much closer and struck the line of lights at about a quarter of a mile off. The learned judge thought so, so did the Trinity Masters, and so do our assessors. Therefore, it is obvious that she broke the rule. And what else did she do that was negligence? [His Lordship then dealt with the facts, and found the Harvest further to blame for not exhibiting a proper masthead light, and excused the Stainsacre from starboarding.]

The Leverington. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM THE PROBATE, DIVORCE, AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION (ADMIRALTY).

Collision — Narrow channel — Cardiff Drain— Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, arts. 16, 21, 22.

Art. 16 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, directing that if two steamships are crossing so as to involve risk of collision the ship which has the other on her starboard side shall keep out of the way of the other, applies in a narrow channel where it is the duty of steamships to keep to that side of mid-channel which lies on their starboard side, and hence, where a steamship going up Cardiff Drain sees a vessel on her starboard side coming down the channel from the Roath Basin, it is her duty to keep out of the way of the other, and the duty of the latter under art. 22, to keep her course, and if the latter, instead of doing so, ports to get on to the starboard side of the channel, she is to blame for breach of art. 22 of the Regulations.

This was an appeal by the plaintiffs in a collision action in rem from a decision of Butt, J. finding their steamship the Rapid solely to blame for a collision with the defendants' steamship the Leverington.

The collision occurred about 12.30 p.m. on the 3rd Sept. 1885 in Cardiff Drain.

The facts alleged on behalf of the plaintiffs were as follows:— Shortly after noon on the 3rd Sept. the Rapid, a steamship of 581 tons gross, laden with a cargo of coals from Cardiff Dock to St. Nazaire, was in the Roath outer lock, having just hauled out of the East Bute Dock. As she was leaving the lock with her engines going easy ahead, a steamship, which proved to be the Leverington, was seen coming up the drain at the distance of about 500 yards from her, and bearing about three points on her port bow. The whistle of the Rapid was sounded one blast, and her helm was ported in order to proceed down the starboard side of the drain. The Leverington approached and altered her course as if under a starboard helm, and caused danger of collision. The whistle of the Rapid was blown one blast, and her engines were stopped and then reversed full speed astern, and her helm was put to starboard to cant her head to starboard under sternway; but the Leverington came on with increased speed, and with her stem struck the port side of the Rapid, doing her considerable damage. The plaintiffs (inter alia) charged the defendants with breach of articles 16 and 21 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea.

The facts alleged by the defendants were as follows:—Shortly before 12.30 p.m. on the 3rd Sept. the Leverington, a steamship of 679 tons register, laden with a cargo of iron ore on a voyage from Porman to Cardiff, was proceeding on a proper course slowly up the Cardiff Drain for the East Bute Docks. When the Leverington had nearly reached a point where the channel to Roath Basin diverges, and while she was proceeding with her engines stopped at a speed of about a knot an hour, the Rapid was seen in the entrance to Roath Basin, about 300 yards distant, and bearing about three or four points on the starboard bow of the Leverington. As soon as the Rapid was seen the engines of the Leverington were set on slowly ahead, and the Rapid was waved to go astern of the Leverington. At this time the Rapid was in a position, if she had kept on her course, to have passed all clear under the stern of the Leverington. But almost immediately after the engines of the Leverington had moved ahead, the Rapid was seen to alter her course as if under a port helm, and to be attempting to cross the bows of the Leverington. The engines of the Leverington were at once reversed full speed astern, but the Rapid came on and with her port bow struck the stem of the Leverington. The defendants (inter alia) charged the Rapid with neglecting to keep her course and pass under the stern of the Leverington, and also with improperly leaving the entrance of the Roath Basin without waiting for the Leverington to pass clear.

Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea:

Art. 16. If two ships under steam are crossing, so as to involve risk of collision, the ship which has the other on her own starboard side shall keep out of the way of the other.

Art. 21. In narrow channels every steamship shall, when it is safe and practicable, keep to that side of the fairway or mid-channel which lies on the starboard side of such ship.

Art. 22. Where by the above rules one of two ships is to keep out of the way, the other shall keep her course.

Sir Walter Phillimore (with him Baden-Powell) for the appellants, the owners of the Rapid.—The decision of Butt, J. is wrong. The Leverington is solely to blame for the collision. It was the duty of the Rapid, under art. 21 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, to keep to that side of the channel which lay on her starboard side. In order to do so it was necessary to port her helm and cross the bows of the Leverington. Not only did the Leverington know that it was the Rapid's duty to get on to the starboard side of the channel, but it must also have been evident from her manœuvres that she was in fact about to get to the proper side of the channel. The Leverington, however, held on, and took no steps whatever to keep clear of the Rapid, although under art. 16 of the Regulations it was her duty to do so. The duty cast upon the Leverington by art. 22 to keep her course was, under the peculiar circumstances of the case, complied with.

Kennedy, Q.C. and Barnes for the owners of the Leverington.—Butt, J. was right in finding the Rapid solely to blame. Assuming this place to be a narrow channel, nevertheless art. 16 of the Regulations was applicable. The Leverington had the Rapid on her starboard side. It was therefore her duty to keep out of the way of the Rapid. By continuing her course at the speed she was going she would have passed clear of the Rapid, had the Rapid continued her course as she was bound under art. 22 to do. The Rapid, instead of keeping her course, actually ported her helm, and threw herself across the bows of the Leverington. If it was her duty to go down on that side of the channel which lay on her starboard side, she should before doing so have waited till the Leverington had passed clear. The Leverington is therefore to blame for breach of art. 22.

The Lord Chancellor (Herschell).—This is an appeal from a judgment of Butt, J., in which he decided that the steamship Rapid was solely to blame for a collision between her and the steamship Leverington. At the time of the collision the Rapid was coming out of the Roath Basin at Cardiff, bound to sea, and the Leverington was on way to the East Bute Dock. There is a channel about 150 yards wide, which is the common entrance to the Roath Basin and to the East Bute Dock. Then there is a bifurcation, dividing the channel into two parts, one leading to the Roath Basin, the other to the East Bute Dock. The collision occurred at or about this bifurcation, where the two channels join. It is said, on behalf of the Rapid, that she was coming into a narrow channel, and that therefore it was her duty, under art. 21 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, to get on to her starboard side of the channel. No doubt this was a "narrow channel" within the meaning of the rule. It is not suggested that the Leverington was not on her proper side of the channel. Now, in these circumstances, the Rapid undoubtedly ported immediately before the collision, and we are told by our nautical assessors that, but for that porting, the Leverington might have continued her course with safety, and no collision would have occurred. In other words, if the Rapid had kept her course, and had not ported, the Leverington, by continuing her course, would have passed clear of the Rapid. Now, it appears to all of us that, under the circumstances I have described, art. 16 of the Regulations was applicable to this case. Although this is a narrow channel, yet, in the absence of special rules, the crossing rule must apply. Of course, there may be rivers where there are special rules, and there those rules must be obeyed. But where no special rules are in operation, then we can see no reason why the crossing rule should not apply, even though the channel be a narrow one. If so, and these two ships being in fact crossing ships, it was the duty of the Leverington, which had the Rapid on her starboard side, to keep out of the way of the Rapid. The manœuvre she executed of keeping her course and going on full speed would have complied with art. 16, but for the fact that the Rapid disobeyed art. 22, which provides that, where one ship is to keep out of the way, the other shall keep her course. The Rapid did not keep her course, and we are advised that if she had the collision would not have occurred. The result follows, that the Rapid is to blame; that the Leverington is not to blame; and that the learned judge was right in his decision. This appeal must be dismissed with costs.

Lord Esher, M.R.—These two ships were in a narrow channel, so that under fitting and proper circumstances the narrow channel rule would apply. The question is whether, under the circumstances, the crossing rule did not apply. Now, it cannot be said that the crossing rule does not apply to a narrow channel. If one ship is going across a river which is a narrow channel and another is going up or down, the crossing rule would apply. Where a narrow channel is joined by another narrow channel, there comes a point where it will be most likely that the crossing rule will apply, even though each vessel is going a determined course. Take, for instance, the junction of the Thames and the Medway. If one vessel is coming down the Thames, and another out of the Medway, they must be crossing ships, and there is no reason why the crossing rule should not apply. When two ships come to this corner at Cardiff, the place is determined at which they must be crossing ships if one is going up one channel and the other down the other channel. They then must be crossing ships, and there the crossing rule applies. This decision is important and useful, because, in cases of ships meeting in future at this point, it determines which of them is to wait and which is to go on. By the crossing rule the Leverington was bound to keep out of the way of the Rapid, and therefore, if the Rapid had kept her course, and there had been a collision, the Leverington would have been in the wrong. If she could not have crossed the Rapid's course in time, she was bound to stop. But then the Rapid was bound to keep her course, and had no right either to port or starboard. She, in fact, ported, and therefore broke art. 22. She must, therefore, be held to blame, for her porting certainly contributed to the collision. If, without her porting, there would equally have been a collision, I should have thought the Leverington was also in fault. But we are advised that, if the Rapid had not ported, there would have been no collision. Therefore the Leverington was justified in going on, because, by so doing, she would have kept out of the way of the Rapid if the Rapid had obeyed the rule and kept her course. The collision, therefore, was solely due to the wrongful porting of the Rapid.

Fry, L.J.—I am of the same opinion, and can see no reason why the crossing rule should not apply in a narrow channel. It seems to me that we should be unwise to give a narrow construction to this crossing rule, and that it is desirable to give it a wide and general application. I therefore can see no reason for differing from the learned judge who tried the case.

The Xantho. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM THE CHANCERY DIVISION.

Carriage of goods—Bill of lading—Perils of the sea—Collision—Negligence—Onus of proof.

A collision is not necessarily a peril of the sea within the meaning of those words in a bill of lading.

In an action against a shipowner for loss of goods

carried under a bill of lading containing the exception "dangers and accidents of the seas," the defendants do not, by merely proving that the loss has been occasioned by a collision, show a peril of the sea so as to shift the onus on to the plaintiffs of proving that the collision was occasioned by the defendants' negligence, the onus being upon them to bring themselves within the excepted perils; and, if they fail to do so, the plaintiffs are entitled to judgment.

The judgment in Woodley v. Michell (5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 71; 43 L. T. Rep. N. S. 599; 11 Q. B. Div. 47) discussed.

This was an action by owners of cargo for breach of contract of carriage against the owners of the carrying ship.

The plaintiffs claimed damages for loss of cargo shipped on board the defendants' steamship Xantho under a bill of lading containing the following excepted perils: "The act of God, the Queen's enemies, fire, machinery, boilers, steam, and all and every other dangers and accidents of the seas, rivers, and steam navigation of whatever nature and kind soever." They also alleged that the loss of the goods was occasioned by the collision between the Xantho and another steamship, the Voluta, and that such collision was brought about by the defendants' negligent navigation of the Xantho.

The defendants, by their defence, alleged that the loss was occasioned by the excepted perils, and further stated that the non-delivery was due to a collision between the Xantho and the Voluta, which was solely occasioned by the negligence of the Voluta.

Feb. 25.—The case came on for trial before the President, assisted by Trinity Masters.

The plaintiffs put in the bill of lading, and proved that the property had passed to them, and that the defendants had failed to deliver. The defendants called no evidence. It was admitted by the plaintiffs that the loss of the goods was occasioned by a collision. In these circumstances, the President gave judgment for the plaintiffs.

June 7.—From that decision the defendants now appealed.

Sir Walter Phillimore, Q.C. and J. P. Aspinall for the defendants.—A collision is a peril of the sea, and as it is admitted that the loss of the goods was occasioned by a collision, the defendants are protected by the exceptions in the bill of lading. It is further contended that, even if all collisions are not necessarily perils of the sea, all collisions are, primâ facie, perils of the sea, and, as soon as the defendant proves a collision, he is entitled to succeed, unless the plaintiff proves that the collision was due to causes which, on the existing authorities, prevent the defendant from taking advantage of it as a peril of the sea:

Lloyd v. The General Iron Screw Colliery Company, 33 L. J. 269, Ex.; 10 L. T. Rep. N. S. 586; 2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 32;

Grill v. The General Iron Screw Colliery Company, L. Rep. 3 C. P. 476; 2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 362; 18 L. T. Rep. N. S. 362;

Woodley v. Michell, 11 Q. B. Div. 47; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 71; 48 L. T. Rep. N. S. 599.

[Bowen, L.J. referred to Taylor v. Liverpool and Great Western Steam Company, L. Rep. 9 Q. B. 546; 30 L. T. Rep. N. S. 714; 2 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 275.] In that case the excepted peril "theft" was held to apply to thieves external to the ship, and therefore it was for the defendants to bring their case within "theft," as so limited in meaning. In the present case, the plaintiffs' position is that anything external to the ship happening on the high seas is a peril of the sea, and that in that sense a collision is a peril of the sea:

Pickering v. Barclay, Style, 132; 2 Roll. Ab. pl. 11, 248.

Where a ship strikes on a rock, an iceberg, or a floating log, she encounters a peril of the sea. If, therefore, she strikes a congeries of floating logs, which constitute a ship, that is equally a peril of the sea. In the cases of The Norway (Br. & L. 404) and The Helene (Br. & L. 429) it was held, under very similar circumstances, that the onus of proof was upon the plaintiff to show that the loss was caused by negligence.

Myburgh, Q.C. and Hollams (with them Sir C. Russell, A.-G.) for the respondents.—A collision is not necessarily a peril of the sea. The case of Woodley v. Michell (ubi sup.), and many earlier authorities, show that there are many classes of collisions which are not perils of the seas. It is further contended that the onus is upon the defendants to prove that the collision was so occasioned as to be a peril of the sea. In this case they have given no evidence as to the circumstances of the collision, and, the natural and reasonable inference being that it was occasioned by negligence, the defendants cannot protect themselves under any of the excepted perils. In the case of The Helene (ubi sup.) the perils relied upon by the defendants were expressly named in the bill of lading, and, on it being proved that the damage was caused thereby, the defendants made out a primâ facie case. Here, however, the word collision does not occur in the bill of lading, and it is only upon the supposition that a collision is a peril of the sea that the defendants can rely upon the above decisions.

Sir Walter Phillimore, in reply, cited Hayn v. Culliford (4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 128; 4 C. P. Div. 182; 40 L. T. Rep. N. S. 536), and referred to the old form of pleadings prior to the Judicature Act.

Lord Esher, M.R.—In this case the plaintiffs are shippers of goods, and they have brought an action upon a bill of lading against the owners of the ship carrying the goods for non-delivery of the goods. At the trial the bill of lading was put in, and in it we find certain excepted perils. The case was run extremely fine by both sides, for all that appeared in evidence was an admission—it does not appear by which side—that there had been a collision between the defendants' ship and another vessel. The question is, whether upon this evidence the finding of the learned judge without a jury is correct, by which he held that the plaintiffs were entitled to recover. From that judgment the defendants now appeal, and they say that they ought to succeed because the plaintiffs did not show that this was a collision which was caused by the negligence of the defendants. Now, let us see how the matter stands. The contract, no doubt, is that the shipowner binds himself absolutely to deliver the goods in the same condition in which they were receive unless he is prevented by one of the excepted perils. The plaintiff, in suing upon such a contract, is obliged to say that that was the contract, and in pleading he does aver, and must aver, that the loss was not occasioned by any perils of the seas. I think that, in pleading, the plaintiff always avers that to put himself within the terms of the contract. But it is immediately apparent that the plaintiffs' allegation is a negative allegation. It is a negation of circumstances as to something which has happened on board the ship, and as to circumstances which are solely within the knowledge of the defendants. In my opinion, it has long been the usual and proper course for the plaintiff simply to put in the bill of lading and to prove that the ship has arrived, but that his goods have not been delivered. If the ship has arrived and his goods have not been delivered, it seems to me that, by putting in the bill of lading, he has shown a state of circumstances which the shipowner is called upon to answer. Primâ facie, the non-delivery of the goods is negligence on the part of the shipowner, and, unless there were special circumstances to prevent him delivering, there must be negligence on his part. Therefore I say that the burden of proof which the plaintiff has taken upon himself in the pleadings is satisfied by showing that the ship has arrived, and that the goods have not been delivered. In these circumstances, it devolves upon the shipowner to show the reason why he has not delivered the goods, and, if he can, to show that the non-delivery was caused by one of the perils excepted in the bill of lading. If he shows that the goods were lost or injured by one of the perils which are specifically mentioned in the bill of lading, he has primâ facie brought his case within the exceptions.

Now, in construing a policy of insurance, it is the causa proxima of the loss which is looked at; but in the case of a bill of lading that is not so, for there you look to what is the real moving cause of the loss. Therefore, though the shipowner may have brought himself within the terms of one of the exceptions, if the plaintiff can show that that which is stated to be the cause of the loss was not the real moving cause, but that something else which is not excepted was the real cause of the loss, then there is no defence; and therefore it has been held that if the real moving cause is the defendant's negligence, the loss is not caused by any of the excepted perils, because the negligence of the defendant is not one of the excepted perils. It is on that ground that the defendant fails, and not on any supposed reason that he cannot take advantage of his own negligence. The moment it is shown that the real moving cause of the loss was the shipowner's negligence, then that is a loss by a cause which is not within the excepted perils. Now, suppose that the real moving cause of the loss is not one of the excepted perils, but is the result of the negligence of someone other than the defendant, does the same reasoning apply? You are to take the real moving cause of the loss. If you are to accept the reasoning in the first case, you must accept it in this also. There is no exception in the bill of lading of a loss caused by the negligence of anyone other than the defendant. For that reason we held in the case of Woodley v. Michell (ubi sup.) that if the cause of the loss was the negligence of either of two colliding vessels without the winds or the waves, or any extraordinary difficulty of navigation contributing to the collision, such a loss, the cause of which is negligence, is not a loss occasioned by any of the excepted perils. We held, therefore, that a loss the immediate cause of which is a collision, but the real cause of which is the negligence, of either ship, is not a loss caused by any of the excepted perils. It is caused by negligence, and that is not an excepted peril. It is not necessary to say whether any collision caused in any other way is within the excepted perils or not. If a collision was causen without any negligence on either ship, merely by the action of a storm or violent sea, or an unknown current—if the collision is the result of that which everybody would take to be a peril of the sea, why, then, the mere fact of the collision intervening would not alter the case, and the loss would be by a peril of the sea. There are also collisions occasioned by negligence and the action of the sea, about which I decline to have anything to say. I therefore hold that there are three classes of collisions in which the loss cannot be said to be the result of an excepted peril, viz., where there has been negligence on the part of the carrying ship; where the collision has solely been the result of negligence of another vessel; and where the collision has been the result of the joint negligence of both vessels.

That being so, what follows? Why, that collision is not one of the perils excepted in terms. The only way in which you can get the loss by collision covered by the perils is to show that a peril excepted and not the collision was the real cause of the loss. Now, in this case, the plaintiff shows that his goods were shipped under a bill of lading. It is shown that the vessel carrying the goods sank. But you have something more than the mere non-arrival of the ship, which is evidence that she has foundered at sea; for you have it that there was a collision which was the immediate cause of the loss. Now, it is consistent that a collision is not one of the perils excepted. But is a collision even primâ facie a peril of the sea? Is it more usual for a collision to be caused by the action of the wind and seas in an abnormal state than by the negligence of man? Certainly not. No one can doubt that the very great majority of collisions are occasioned by negligence. Now, we are asked to say that the mere fact of proving a collision is primâ facie bringing the defendant within the perils of the seas. But, in my view, that is not enough. Therefore it seems to me that here the plaintiff made a primâ facie case, and that the defendants gave no answer at all which could absolve them from their liability under the bill of lading. The appellants have cited several cases in support of their contention. But in all those cases it will be found that there was evidence that the loss was occasioned by one of the perils expressly excepted. Of course, if the shipowner can show that the immediate cause of the loss was one of the excepted perils, that is a primâ facie case on the part of the shipowner, and throws on the plaintiff the burden of proof that the real cause of the loss was the negligence of someone, and not the peril which it is said was the cause. That was the case in The Helene (ubi sup.). It was proved there that the immediate cause of the loss was leakage, and by the bill of lading the shipowner was liable for loss caused by leakage. There the shipowner was primâ facie brought within the exception, and the court held that the burden of proof was on the plaintiff to show that the leakage was caused by negligence. In The Norway (Br. & L. 404) the loss was caused by the master jettisoning the cargo. The Privy Council were of opinion that the burden was upon the goods owner to prove that the stranding which necessitated the jettison was occasioned by the shipowner's negligence. The case of Taylor v. The Liverpool and Great Western Steam Company (ubi sup.) seems to be an authority in support of my proposition. Lush, L.J. there seems to put the very point with which we are now dealing. He says: "The remaining question is, Is it for the defendants or the plaintiffs to show that the loss is within one of the exceptions of the bill of lading—on whom does the onus lie? I think it is for the defendants to bring the case within the exception." I think, therefore, that in this instance the defendants have run their case too fine in merely showing that there had been a collision which is not an excepted peril, and which is as likely to have been occasioned by negligence as by the action of the wind or waves. I think that, whether the decision in Woodley v. Michell (ubi sup.) be good law or not, and even if the House of Lords differ from it, the defendants will be unable to succeed. For these reasons, I think this appeal must be dismissed with costs.

Bowen, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. This is an action by a cargo owner against a shipowner. The shipowner having promised to deliver the goods excuses himself by saying that the non-delivery was occasioned by an excepted peril. The bill of lading excuses the shipowner in the case of acts of God, the Queen's enemies, and all and every other accident of the sea, rivers, and navigation whatsoever. In the case of Taylor v. Liverpool and Great Western Steam Company (ubi sup.) it was decided that it lay on the shipowner to bring the loss within one of the exceptions, and, though under the old forms of pleading prior to the Judicature Act it was proper for the plaintiffs to set out the bill of lading, and to negative that the loss or damage was occasioned by this, that, or the other peril, yet that does not affect the law as to burden of proof. Sir Walter Phillimore, on behalf of the shipowner, says that the plaintiff has at the trial, through the mouth of his counsel, admitted enough to shift the onus of proof. He says he has admitted that the loss was occasioned by a collision, and upon that he puts his argument in two ways: First of all, he says that the plaintiff, in admitting a collision, admits a peril of the sea, because all collisions are perils of the seas. In the second place, he says that, even if collision does not necessarily amount to a peril of the sea, yet, when unexplained, it is primâ facie a peril of the sea, and therefore throws the onus on the plaintiff of showing that in the particular instance the collision was not a peril of the sea—an onus which he says the plaintiff has in the present instance failed to discharge. In the first place, he is right in saying that a collision is necessarily a peril of the sea? We must be careful to distinguish the meaning to be attached to words like "perils of the sea" when we are dealing with contracts of carriage between shipowners and shippers, and when we are dealing with policies of insurance between underwriters and shipowners. Confining ourselves for a moment to the case of contracts of carriage between shipowners and cargo owners, can it be said that a collision is a peril of the sea within the meaning of a bill of lading? Now, a collision may be caused in different ways. There may be a collision caused by negligence on either ship, or by joint negligence, and the sea may have no part to play in the misfortune, and the action of the wind and waves may not be the cause of the loss. We have already precluded ourselves from saying that a collision caused by negligence is a peril of the sea, because in the case of Woodley v. Michell (ubi sup.) this court held that, where there is no possibility of the accident having arisen from the action of the wind or waves, and where the cause of the collision is negligence, that is not a peril of the sea. That was one instance in which a collision was not a peril of the sea. After that case it is impossible for us to accept Sir Walter Phillimore's contention that a collision is necessarily a peril of the sea.

His second contention is, that a collision until explained implies a peril of the sea. But does that in itself throw the onus of proof on the plaintiff of showing that the collision is not a peril of the sea? It is perfectly well known in the conduct of cases at Nisi Prius what is meant by shifting the onus of proof. From time to time the onus of proof shifts according to the evidence given, and when you ask yourself upon whom the onus of proof rests, you, in other words, ask yourself who will lose the case, according to law, if no more evidence is given. Sir Walter Phillimore asks us to hold that, as soon as the Attorney-General admitted that this loss was caused by collision, he had admitted enough to shift the burden of proof on to his own shoulders from the shoulders of the shipowner, where it previously rested. Now, in my view, in order to bring the case within the exceptions, the burden of proof, in the first instance, rests upon the shipowner; and how has that burden been shifted? Now, collision is a general term, and we are asked, without being allowed to look into the particular circumstances of this particular collision, to infer that it is more probable than not that it has incurred in such a way as will make it a peril of the sea. But there may be many cases where the collision has been occasioned by joint negligence, or by the negligence of either ship; and the decision in Woodley v. Michell tells us that that is not a peril of the sea. Then there may be cases of collision in which there is negligence on the part of either or both ships, and a contribution to the misfortune by the action of the wind and waves. That class of case I now decline to discuss. The authorities have not finally exhausted the inquiry whether such a collision would be a peril of the sea. Lastly, there may be a collision which is solely caused by the action of the wind and waves. It may be a rare case, but it is a conceivable case. In all probability, though I am deciding nothing more than is required for this case, it would in most cases be a loss caused by a peril of the sea. What are we to say when we are simply told that a collision has occurred?

Why are we to infer that it is a peril of the sea, and that it was occasioned by the action of the wind and waves in such a manner as to bring it within the exception clause? It seems to me that neither as a matter of law or of common sense ought we to draw that inference. The answer of all common-sense people would be, "Tell me more of the circumstances." With regard to what has been said about the cases of The Helene (ubi sup.) and The Norway (ubi sup.) I have nothing to add. I think the case of Woodley v. Michell (ubi sup.) was rightly decided. It seems to me to decide nothing more than what it is said to decide in the head-note, and does not go to the length which Sir Walter Phillimore sought to carry it. For these reasons I think the appeal must fail.

Fry, L.J. concurred.

On the application of the appellants' counsel, who stated that his clients intended going to the House of Lords, execution as to damages was stayed upon bail being renewed; but the costs were directed to be taxed and paid, upon the plaintiffs' solicitors giving an undertaking to pay them back on the decision being reversed.

Houlder Brothers and Co. v. The Merchants Marine Insurance Company Limited. (a)

Marine insurance—Risk of craft till goods landed —Transhipment.

By a policy of marine insurance goods were insured on board a coasting vessel "at and from Hull to London, including all risk of craft, until the goods are discharged and safely landed."

Held, that this policy did not cover the risk to the goods while waiting on lighters at the port of delivery for transhipment into an export vessel.

Judgment of Field, J. affirmed.

The action was brought, upon a policy of marine insurance underwritten by the defendants, by the plaintiffs, who were the shippers of a cargo of iron rails from Hull to London.

The goods were shipped at Hull on board the steamer Kirkstall, and, by the terms of the policy, were insured "at and from Hull to London, including all risk of craft, until the goods are discharged and safely landed."

When the Kirkstall arrived in London the goods were discharged into lighters with the intention, not of landing them, but of loading them into another vessel for exportation to Sydney. Before they were so loaded, and while they were in the lighters, some of the lighters were sunk by a gale, and some of the goods were lost.

The action, which was for salvage and average expenses, was tried before Field, J. without a jury. At the trial the plaintiffs proved that rails which are consigned by coasting vessels to London are most commonly transhipped into export vessels at London without being landed.

Field, J. gave judgment in favour of the defendants.

The plaintiffs appealed.

R. T. Reid, Q.C. and Hollams for the plaintiffs.—It was shown at the trial that practically all rails sent coastwise to London were for export, and were reshipped at London without being landed. The export ship was therefore the destination of the goods in the contemplation of both parties to the policy of insurance. If that was so, then there has in this case been no deviation, because there was no unreasonable delay, and no time was lost in bringing the voyage to an end.

Cohen, Q.C. and Barnes for the defendants.—The word "landed" must be construed in its ordinary meaning, unless some custom of the port of delivery requiring another meaning to be put upon it is proved. The plaintiffs certainly did show that most rails sent coastwise to London were for export, and were at London transhipped without being landed; but that is far from showing a custom of the port of London, which requires the plain word "landed" in the policy to be enlarged beyond its natural meaning. It is easy to suggest many instances in which the risk of transhipment would be greater than the risk of landing, and nothing has been shown in this case which compels the underwriters to take the larger risk.

R. T. Reid, Q.C. in reply.

Cur. adv. vult.

June 11.—The judgment of the court was read by

Bowen, L.J.—This is an action by the shipper of a cargo of iron rails against the underwriters of a policy on the goods from Hull to London, including all risk of craft. The ship arrived safely in the port of London, but the rails, instead of being landed, were placed in lighters for transhipment in dock to an export vessel, and during the process of transhipment in dock, which process was lengthened by reason of the export ship not being ready to receive the rails, a portion was lost by the swamping of the lighters. Field, J. held that the underwriters were discharged, because the accident happened after the expiration of a reasonable and ordinary period from the time at which the goods had been placed on the lighters for transhipment. Against this judgment the plaintiffs have appealed. The question whether a reasonable time had elapsed after the discharge into lighters for transhipment does not arise in its simple sense if the risks covered by the policy did not include the risk of waiting in lighters for transhipment into an export vessel; and our opinion is, that such was in fact the case, and that these goods, though lost upon the lighters, were not lost by any of the perils during the continuance of any of the risks covered by the policy. The policy in question includes all risk of craft until the said goods or merchandise be discharged and "safely landed." The risk insured against is the risk of the transit upon the lighters, which have, in the ordinary course of business, to convey the goods to the shore. The nature of this risk can be perfectly appreciated and estimated by the parties to the contract. Landing goods means putting them upon the land, or upon that which by custom of the port is its equivalent. In the present case, instead of placing the goods upon lighters to carry them to the shore, the goods were placed upon lighters which were to take them to an export vessel, and there to load them as soon as she was ready to receive them. Such transhipment, however usual in the trade, is not the same thing as landing the goods directly and immediately upon the quay. A lighter which has to land its cargo has only to make for the quay, and to wait its turn in accordance with the usages of the port. A lighter which is intended to tranship the goods to another ship may have to wait for its arrival and till it is ready to take the cargo, and may thus be subject to additional risks of exposure to the weather, and of collision with other vessels or barges in the dock. In the smaller London docks lighters may be comparatively safe, but in the larger docks they are often swamped by the wind and by the waters, and yet might be obliged to wait days or possibly weeks for the arrival of the export vessel to which the goods were consigned. Cargo discharged upon lighters for transhipment to an export vessel is accordingly exposed to a peril which is not the same as that which it encounters if discharged upon lighters to take it to the shore at once. It is perfectly true that, by taking delivery short of the shore, the consignee determines the risk insured. But this is not because in such a case the risk is terminated by an actual landing, but because the consignee waives the landing and himself terminates the risk instead by taking delivery short of the land. Nobody, in commercial or business language, can say that goods are landed which are transhipped without landing, or that goods which are placed in lighters for transhipment are placed in lighters to be landed.

It was no doubt proved conclusively at the trial that steel rails which are consigned by coasting vessels to London are most commonly transhipped into export vessels at London without being landed; and underwriters must no doubt be taken to be familiar with the ordinary incidents of the trade and of the transit of the goods insured. But this falls short of proving that by any custom transhipment is equivalent to landing. We were told that it is unusual in such cases to make the policy in any other form than that in which it was made. If this be true, it only follows that it is usual in these cases not to insure the risk which has really to be run. Policies which provide for transhipment are perfectly familiar to all commercial lawyers, and if those who consign steel rails to London are in the habit of transacting their business by means of policies which do not contain the appropriate and proper clause, the shippers, if a loss happens outside the risk against which they are insured, must take the consequences of not having protected themselves by the proper contract of insurance. The goods here have been lost, but by an accident not covered by the policy; and on this ground we can only come to the conclusion that the plaintiffs' appeal fails, and that the action must be dismissed, with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

HIGH COURT OF JUSTICE.

CHANCERY DIVISION.

Thursday, July 15, 1886.

(Before Kay, J.)

Brooking v. Maudslay. (a)

Practice — Marine insurance — Pleading — Embarrassing and scandalous matter—Striking out —Rules of Court 1883—Order XIX., r. 27.

In an action respecting a policy of marine insurance, the plaintiff, the underwriter, by his statement of claim alleged that the risk was of a special and dangerous character, as the defendants well knew; that they failed to communicate such fact to the plaintiff; that the ship was unseaworthy when she commenced her voyage; and that the defendants knew of, but concealed, the fact of her being unseaworthy.

The defendants admitted that the ship was unseaworthy, but stated that the unseaworthiness was solely owing to her being overladen, and was not known to them. They wholly denied the allegations of concealment and non-communication of facts.

The plaintiff in his reply joined issue generally, but stated that he did "not proceed further in this action with the charges in the statement of claim as to concealment and non-communication by the defendants of material facts."

Held, that Order XIX., r. 27, applied; that the allegations in the statement of claim were clearly unnecessary, because the plaintiff subsequently stated that he did not intend to ask any relief grounded on concealment or non-communication; and that they were consequently scandalous and embarrassing, and must be struck out.

This action was brought by an underwriter, suing on behalf of himself and other underwriters, in respect of a certain policy of marine insurance for 40,000*l.* effected by the defendants, a firm of engineers, upon certain machinery and goods which were shipped by them on board the steamship Elephant for conveyance from London to Portsmouth.

The plaintiff, by his statement of claim, alleged that the risk was of a special and dangerous character, as the defendants well knew; that they failed to communicate such fact to the plaintiff that the ship was unseaworthy when she commenced her voyage; and that the defendants knew of, but concealed, the fact of her being unseaworthy.

The plaintiff claimed a declaration that the policy was not binding on him and the other underwriters, and that they were discharged from liability thereunder. He also claimed an injunction to restrain proceedings by the defendants on the policy.

The defendants, by their statement of defence, admitted that the ship was unseaworthy, but stated that the unseaworthiness was solely owing to her being overladen, and was not known to them. They wholly denied the allegations of concealment and non-communication of facts. They further alleged that the overloading did not in fact take place until after the slip for the policy of insurance was initialed, so that the question of overloading did not arise until after the contract was entered into, and concealment was out of the question, inasmuch as the unseaworthiness did not exist at the time when the slip was initialed.

The plaintiff delivered a reply, in which he joined issue generally, but stated that he did "not proceed further in this action with the charges in the statement of claim as to concealment and non-communication by the defendants of material facts."

The defendants objected to this pleading, and moved the court that this part of the reply should be struck out on the ground that it was embarrassing; or, in the alternative, that the allegations in the statement of claim imputing to the defendants concealment and non-communication of material facts should be struck out as being unnecessary and therefore scandalous.

The motion now came on for hearing.

Sir Richard E. Webster, Q.C., E. Widdrington Byrne, and R. M. Bray, for the defendants, in support of the motion, referred to Rules of Court 1883, Order XIX., r. 27.

Graham Hastings, Q.C. and J. Gorell Barnes, for the plaintiff, contrà.

KAY, J., after stating the pleadings as above set forth, continued as follows:—What does that mean? "I abandon all my claims to relief on the ground of concealment or non-communication of material facts." Then comes this notice of motion naturally enough, on the ground that either this statement in the reply is embarrassing or the statement of claim ought to have these allegations struck out, because they now are not necessary to any relief which the plaintiff is entitled to, and if not necessary are scandalous statements which affect the honour and character of the defendants or may do so, and that the plaintiff has no right to say, "I will keep these charges in my statement of claim, though I ask no relief in respect of them." I asked during the argument, by way of illustration, in a very short form, this question, May a man in his pleading say "the defendant has acted like a rogue, but I ask no relief on that ground?" That would be an unnecessary statement and scandalous, of course, because it would affect the character of the defendant. It seems to me in this case it is absolutely necessary that the court should say that Order XIX., r. 27, of the Rules of Court applies. That rule provides that: "The court or a judge may at any stage of the proceedings order to be struck out or amended any matter in any indorsement or pleading which may be unnecessary or scandalous, or which may tend to prejudice, embarrass, or delay the fair trial of the action; and may in any such case, if they or he shall think fit, order the costs of the application to be paid as between solicitor and client." These charges are clearly unnecessary now, because the plaintiff says he is not going to ask any relief grounded on concealment or non-communication. They are scandalous because they are such as any mercantile man would conceive affected his honour and character. I cannot help seeing that these charges, being now unnecessary, are scandalous, and moreover I think they tend to embarrass the fair trial of the action, because if they stand the defendants will be bonnd to bring evidence to support their contradiction of the charges. Therefore I order that the statement of claim be amended by striking out all allegations of concealment or non-communication of material facts by the defendants, and I order that the plaintiff do pay the costs of this application. Both parties will have liberty to make all other necessary amendments, and they may take a week for that purpose.

QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION.

(Before GROVE and GRANTHAM, JJ.)

Reg. on the prosecution of Turner v. JOHNSTON. (a)

Merchant Shipping Act 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104), s. 147—The Summary Jurisdiction Act 1879 (42 & 43 Vict. c. 49), s. 39—Supplying seamen to ships without licence—Evidence—Onus of proof of licence on defendant.

A defendant having been charged, under the 147*th section of the Merchant Shipping Act* 1854, with supplying a seaman to a merchant ship in the United Kingdom, he not being a person holding a licence from the Board of Trade for that purpose:

Held, on a case stated, that proof having been given of the supply of the seaman by the defendant, the onus of proving that he held a licence from the Board of Trade rested with him.

THIS was a case stated by Robert Arthur Valpy Esq., the deputy stipendiary magistrate for the borough of Cardiff, under the statute 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43, for the purpose of obtaining the opinion of the court on questions which arose before him as hereinafter stated.

At a petty sessions holden at the Town Hall, in the borough of Cardiff, on the 2nd March 1881, an information preferred by William Turner, hereinafter called the appellant, against Gustave Johnston, thereinafter called the respondent, under sect. 147, sub-sect. 1 of the Merchant Shipping Act (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104), charging for that he the said Gustave Johnston, not being a person holding a licence from the Board of Trade to engage or supply seamen or apprentices for merchant ships in the United Kingdom, and not being an owner or master or mate of the ship or vessel Astracana hereinafter mentioned, or the bonâ fide servant in the constant employ of the owner, or a shipping master duly appointed pursuant to the said Act, 17 & 18 Vict. c. 104, did on or about the 27th Feb. then last past engage or supply one John Johnson, a seaman, to be entered on board the British ship or vessel Astracana, then being the port of Cardiff, in the county of Glamorgan was heard and determined by the deputy stipendiary magistrate, the said parties respectively being then present, and upon such hearing he dismissed the information.

The appellants being dissatisfied with his determination, as being erroneous in point of law, duly applied for a case setting forth the facts and the grounds of his determination, whereupon he, in compliance with the application, stated the following case:

(a) Reported by JOSEPH SMITH, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Upon the hearing of the information, it was proved on the part of the appellant, and found as a fact, that the respondent had, on or about the 26th Feb. then last past, engaged or supplied the said John Johnson, a seaman, to be entered on board the British ship or vessel Astracana, then being in the port of Cardiff, in the county of Glamorgan, that the respondent was not the owner or master or a mate of the said ship, or a bonâ fide servant in the constant employ of the said owner; but I held that it was not proved that the respondent did not, at the time of the commission of the said alleged offence, hold a licence from the Board of Trade to engage or supply seamen or apprentices for merchant ships in the United Kingdom and I therefore dismissed the information.

The only evidence in support of the allegation of the appellant, that the respondent did not hold the licence from the Board of Trade hereinbefore mentioned, was the evidence of the appellant, who is the chief superintendent of the Mercantile Marine Office of the Board of Trade for the Newport, Cardiff, and Penarth district, who produced a written document signed by one of the assistant secretaries to the Board of Trade and bearing the seal of the said board, and who stated that, as far as he personally knew, the respondent had no licence, though he would not state positively the respondent had no licence; and that the said document referred to the respondent.

The following is a copy of such document:

This is to certify that Gustave Johnston, of 216, Bute-road, Cardiff, boarding-house keeper, does not hold, and has not held during the past six months, a licence from the Board of Trade to engage or supply seamen or apprentices for merchant ships in the United Kingdom, under sect. 146 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854.

It was contended, on the part of the appellant, that the document was made evidence of the fact stated therein under sect. 7 of the statute 17 & 18 Vict. c. 104, and should be received by me as evidence of such fact.

I, however, being of opinion that there was no evidence before me that the respondent was not a licensed person as aforesaid, and that the said document was not legally evidence of such fact, either under sect. 7 of the said statute or otherwise, and that such certificate could not be evidence of any such fact, unless it was expressly made so by the statute itself, gave my determination against the appellant in the manner before stated.

The questions of law arising for the opinion of the court, therefore, are: (1) Whether the document hereinbefore referred to was legal evidence that the respondent did not, at the time of the commission of the said alleged offence, hold a licence from the Board of Trade to engage or supply seamen or apprentices, pursuant to sect. 146 of the statute 17 & 18 Vict. c. 104. (2) Whether the onus of proof that the respondent did not hold such licence was on the appellant.

If the court should be of opinion that my decision was wrong in point of law, then the case is to be remitted to me, the said deputy stipendiary magistrate, with the opinion of the court thereon and with such order as to the court may seem fit.

The 7th section of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104) provides:

All documents whatever, purporting to be issued or written by or under the direction of the Board of Trade and purporting either to be sealed with the seal of such board, or to be signed by one of the secretaries or assistant secretaries to such board, shall be received in evidence, and shall be deemed to be issued or written by or under the direction of the said board, without further proof, unless the contrary be shown; and all documents purporting to be certificates issued by the Board of Trade in pursuance of this Act, and to be sealed with the seal of such board, or to be signed by one of the officers of the marine department of such board, shall be received in evidence, and shall be deemed to be such certificates without further proof, unless the contrary be shown.

And the 146th and 147th sections provide:

146. The Board of Trade may grant to such persons as it thinks fit licences to engage or supply seamen or apprentices for merchant ships in the United Kingdom to continue for such periods, to be upon such terms, and to be revocable upon such conditions, as such board thinks proper.

147. The following offences shall be punishable as hereinafter mentioned; (that is to say)

(1) If any person not licensed as aforesaid, other than the owner or master or a mate of the ship, or some person who is bonâ fide the servant and in the constant employ of the owner, or a shipping master duly appointed as aforesaid, engages or supplies any seaman or apprentice to be entered on board any ship in the United Kingdom, he shall for each seaman or apprentice so engaged or supplied incur a penalty not exceeding twenty pounds.

Danckwerts for the appellant. — After consideration, the appellant does not rely upon the first question raised, and does not now contend that the document proposed to be offered in evidence is a document or certificate issued by the Board of Trade, in pursuance of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, within the meaning of the 7th section of that Act. It is, however, submitted that, on the authorities, and on the true construction of the Summary Jurisdiction Acts, the onus was on the defendant, in this case, to prove that he held a licence from the Board of Trade under the 146th section. In Rex v. Turner (5 M. & S. 206) it was held that, upon a conviction under 5 Anne, c. 14, s. 2, against a carrier for having game in his possession, it is sufficient if in the information and adjudication the qualifications mentioned in 22 & 23 Car 2, c. 25, s. 3 (a), be negatived without negativing them in evidence. Lord Ellenborough there said: "The question is upon whom the onus probandi lies; whether it lies upon the person who affirms a qualification, to prove the affirmative, or upon the informer, who denies any qualification to prove the negative. There are, I think, about ten different heads of qualification enumerated in the statute to which the proof may be applied: and, according to the argument of to-day, every person who lays an information of this sort is bound to give satisfactory evidence before the magistrates to negative the defendant's qualification upon each of those several heads. The argument really comes to this, that there would be a moral impossibility of ever convicting upon such an information. If the informer should establish the negative of any part of these different qualifications, that would be insufficient, because it would be said, non liquet, but that the defendant may be qualified under the other. And does not, then, common sense show that the burden of proof ought to be cast on the person who, by establishing any one of the qualifications, will be well defended? Is not the statute of Anne in effect a prohibition on every person to kill game, unless he brings himself within some one of the qualifications allowed by law; the proof of which is easy on the one side, but almost impossible on the other? I remember the decision of Rex v. Stone (1 East, 639), and the arguments of the learned judges, who held the necessity of giving negative proof, were undoubtedly urged with great force; but I felt at the time that, if they were right, it would in most cases be impossible to convict at all." [GRANTHAM, J.—Then suppose an information is laid against me for shooting without a licence, I should be convicted if I failed to produce my licence.] That follows directly from the judgment of Lord Ellenborough in Rex v. Turner, Again, in The Apothecaries Company v. Bentley (R. & M. 159), there was an averment in a declaration on the 55 Geo. 4, c. 194, that the defendant practised as an apothecary without having obtained such certificate as by the said Act is required, and it was held that the onus probandi that the defendant had obtained his certificate lay with him and not with the plaintiffs. Then in Huggins v. Ward (29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 33; L. Rep. 8 Q. B. 52) it was proved on an information alleging that the defendant had five sheep affected with a contagious disease, and did not give notice to a constable that the appellant had five sheep so affected, and it was held that there was primâ facie evidence on which the appellant might be convicted of the offence charged, and it lay on him to show, if he could, that he had given notice to a police constable. Then by 11 & 12 Vict. c. 43, s. 14, it provided that, if the information or complaint in any such case shall negative any exemption, exception, or proviso, or condition in the statute on which the same shall be framed, it shall not be necessary for the prosecutor or complainant in that behalf to prove such negative, but the defendant may prove the affirmative thereof in his defence, if he would have advantage of the same; and the 39th section of the Summary Jurisdiction Act 1879 (42 & 43 Vict. c. 49) has now enacted that in proceedings before courts of summary jurisdiction any exception, exemption, proviso, excuse, or qualification, whether it does or does not accompany in the same section the description of the offence in the Act, order, bye-law, regulation, or other document creating the offence, may be proved by the defendant, but need not be specified or negatived in the information or complaint, and, if so specified or negatived, no proof in relation to the matter so specified, or negatived shall be required on the part of the informant or complainant. A similar provision was contained in the Licensing Act 1872 with respect to offences under that Act; and in the case of Roberts v. Humphreys (29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 387; L. Rep. 8 Q. B. 483), a keeper of licensed premises having been charged with opening his premises for the sale of intoxicating liquors during prohibited hours, and persons having been shown to have been supplied with liquor on his premises during such hours, it was held that the onus showing that the persons came within the exception lay with the defendant. It is submitted that in this case the possession of a Board of Trade licence is an exception, exemption, proviso, excuse, or qualification which need not be negatived by the informant, the onus of showing that he possesses it resting with the defendant, and that the defendant ought therefore to have been convicted.

(a) This section provided that all and every person or persons not having lands and tenements or some other estate of inheritance in his own or his wife's right of the clear yearly value of one hundred pounds per annum, or for term of life, or having lease or leases of ninety-nine years, or for any longer term, of the clear yearly value of one hundred and fifty pounds, other than the son and heir of an esquire or other person of higher degree, &c., &c., were prohibited from keeping or using guns, bows, dogs, &c.

The respondent did not appear.

GROVE, J.—I was at first somewhat startled by the proposition advanced by Mr. Danckwerts that it was necessary for the defendant to negative an allegation advanced on behalf of the prosecution, and that, if he failed to do so, he was liable to be convicted; but, upon consideration, I do not think that this case goes to that length. The respondent is charged for that he not being a person holding a licence from the Board of Trade to engage or supply seamen or apprentices for merchant ships in the United Kingdom, and not being an owner or master or mate of the ship or vessel Astracana, or the bonâ fide servant in the constant employ of the owner or a shipping master duly appointed pursuant to the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, did engage or supply a seaman to be entered on board that ship in the United Kingdom. Then it was proved that he did engage or supply a seaman to be entered on board the ship in the United Kingdom. I think that when this was proved, he was then brought within the purview comprehended by the 39th section of the Summary Jurisdiction Act 1879 (42 & 43 Vict. c. 49), and he could then defend himself by proving any one or other of the exceptions which the section mentions, and I do not think that the appellant was called upon to negative by evidence each one of those exceptions. I am of opinion therefore that the appellant is entitled to succeed, and that the case must be remitted to the stipendiary magistrate with an intimation that the onus of proving that he has a proper licence from the Board of Trade rests with the respondent. We shall not make any order as to costs.

Collision—Compulsory pilotage — River Tyne — Foreign ship—41 Geo. 3, c. lxxxvi.—Merchant Shipping Act 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 63), s. 39—Tyne Pilotage Order Confirmation Act 1865 (28 Vict. c. 44.)

The Tyne Pilotage Order Confirmation Act 1865 (28 Vict. c. 44) was meant to be a complete code for regulating pilotage in the River Tyne, and was intended to supersede the pilotage provisions in the Act 41 Geo. 3, c. lxxxvi., and therefore sect. 16 of the schedule of the Tyne Pilotage Order Confirmation Act 1865 exempts all vessels whether British or foreign from compulsory pilotage in the port of Newcastle-upon-Tyne.

THIS was an appeal by the plaintiffs to the Divisional Court against a decision of the judge of the County Court of Northumberland in a collision action in rem.

The collision occurred in the river Tyne on the 12th Oct 1884 between the British Steamship Rose and the Norwegian steamship Johann Sverdrup.

The action was instituted by the owners of the Rose against the owners of the Johann Sverdrup and came on for trial at Newcastle on the 23rd Oct. 1885, when the judge found that the collision was caused by the negligence of the Johann Sverdrup, but gave judgment for her owners on the ground that at the time of the collision she was in charge of a duly licensed pilot by compulsion of law, and that it was his negligence which solely caused the collision.

The Acts of Parliament which were cited, and are material to the decision, are set out in the judgment with the exception of the following:

Schedule, s. 10 of the Tyne Pilotage Confirmation Act 1865:

The Pilotage district of the Tyne shall, for the purposes of this order, be deemed to include the whole of the river Tyne, and to extend seaward over a radius of seven miles.

Sect. 11. The jurisdiction in pilotage matters within the district aforesaid, now vested in the Trinity House of Newcastle-upon-Tyne, shall be and is hereby transferred to and vested in the hands of the commissioners incorporated by this order.

Sect. 12. All pilots licensed for the Tyne or its entrance by the Trinity House of Newcastle-upon-Tyne at the commencement of this order, shall be entitled to continue to act as such pilots under the commissioners incorporated by this order for one year after the commencement of this order, without further licence or payment in respect of that year, but in all other respects shall become and be subject to the authority of the commissioners and the provisions of this order as if they had been severally licensed under this order.

Sect. 22. Nothing in this order shall exempt the commissioners of the pilotage district aforesaid from the provisions of any general Act of Parliament now in force or hereafter to be passed relating to pilotage, or pilotage dues . . . . or from any future revision and alteration under the authority of Parliament of the pilotage dues authorised by this order, or of the limits of the district defined by this order.

Gorell Barnes, for the plaintiffs, in support of the appeal.—The effect of the Tyne Pilotage Order Confirmation Act 1865 was to supersede all previous statutory provisions relating to pilotage, and therefore to impliedly repeal them. The effect of that Act was to transfer the old jurisdiction of the Trinity House of Newcastle-upon-Tyne to the Pilotage Commissioners, and to lay down a complete code relating to pilotage in the Tyne. The pilot in the present case was acting in obedience to and in compliance with the provisions of that code, and if so was not a compulsory pilot, as sect. 16 is a direct enactment against compulsory pilotage in the port of Newcastle. The abolition of differential dues by sect. 10 of the Harbour and Passing Tolls Act 1861 (24 & 25 Vict. c. 47) was to put foreign ships in the same position as British ships, and as British ships were not subject to compulsory pilotage, the effect was to exempt foreign ships from compulsion. The provisions of the Merchant Shipping Act 1862, s. 39, allowing a pilotage authority by provisional order to exempt vessels from compulsory pilotage, evidently contemplated such an enactment as is contained in sect. 16 of the schedule to the Tyne Pilotage Order Confirmation Act 1865.

Sir Walter Phillimore and H. Boyd for the respondents.—The effect of the Tyne Pilotage Order Confirmation Act 1865 was to constitute a new pilotage authority, and to make certain new pilotage regulations, but not, in the absence of express words, to repeal the provisions of 41 Geo. 3, c. lxxxvi. If so, pilotage is still compulsory on a foreign ship. Had it been intended to have exercised the power given by sect. 39 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1862, apt and unambiguous words would have been used to have repealed the specific provision contained in sect. 6 of the 41 Geo. 3, c. lxxxvi. In the somewhat analogous case of The Vesta (46 L. T. Rep. N. S. 492; 7 P. Div. 240; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 515) it was held that the operation of sects. 353 and 376 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 was not affected by Order in Council of the 8th Feb. 1854, or by the provisions of the Harbours and Passing Tolls Act 1861. The provisions contained in sect. 22 of the schedule to the Tyne Pilotage Order Confirmation Act 1865, and in sect. 353 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, point to a retention of the compulsory employment of pilots. The abolition of differential dues is immaterial because in The Hanna (15 L. T. Rep. N. S. 334; L. Rep. 1 A. & Ec. 283; 2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 434) it was held that, although a pilotage due may be imposed on a foreign ship and not on a British ship, it is nevertheless not a differential due.

G. Barnes in reply.

Cur. adv. vult.

March 23.—BUTT, J. now delivered the judgment of the court.—This is an appeal from a judgment of the County Court judge at Newcastle. The action was brought by the owners of the steamship Rose against the foreign steamship Johann Sverdrup to recover damages occasioned by a collision between these vessels. The collision occurred in the river Tyne. The learned judge has found that the damage was occasioned by the negligent navigation of the Johann Sverdrup; but that the fault was solely attributable to the pilot in charge, and that the employment of such pilot was by law compulsory on her owners, whom he therefore exonerated from liability. Against this decision the plaintiffs have appealed, and the only question with which we have at present to deal is, whether pilotage was compulsory. The Johann Sverdrup is a Norwegian vessel. By an act passed in 1801, entitled "An Act for extending and enlarging the powers and increasing the rates and duties of the corporation of the Trinity House of Newcastle-upon-Tyne, and for better regulating the port of Newcastle" (41 Geo. 3, c. lxxxvi.), it is provided in sect. 6: "That the owners or masters of any foreign ships or vessels resorting to or coming into or departing from the said port of Newcastle, or any of the creeks, or members belonging thereto, shall, and they are hereby obliged and required respectively to receive, take on board and employ in the piloting, and conducting such their ships or vessels, such pilots to be licensed as aforesaid; and in case of their neglect or refusal to receive and employ such pilots as aforesaid, they shall severally nevertheless answer and pay to the said master, pilots, and seamen, the aforesaid pilotage duties, and the same shall be recoverable in the same manner as if such pilots had been actually received and employed; provided always that nothing in this Act contained shall extend or be construed to extend, to oblige or compel the owners or masters of any British ships or other vessels to employ or make use of any pilot or pilots in piloting or conducting such ships or vessels if they shall not respectively be aminded or desirous so to do." A number of sections of different Acts of Parliament were referred to at the bar as bearing upon the question under discussion, but it seems to us that, so far as legislation is concerned, the section of the Act set forth above remained in force from the time of its enactment in 1801 until the passing of the Tyne Pilotage Order Confirmation Act 1865 (28 Vict. c. 44.) It was indeed suggested that the right to impose compulsory pilotage on foreign ships had been discontinued by usage; and the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104). s. 332, was referred to; but it does not appear that any such bye-law as that section contemplated was ever made, neither was there evidence of such usage given, although we gather from an observation of the learned judge of the court below that for some time the provisions of sect. 6 of the Act of 1801 had not been enforced.

Sect. 39 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 63) provides as follows: "Whereas it is enacted by the principal Act that every pilotage authority shall have power in manner and subject to the conditions therein mentioned to do the following things—that is to say, to exempt the masters of any ships or of any classes of ships from being compelled to employ qualified pilots; to lower and modify the rates and prices or other remuneration to be demanded and received for the time being by pilots licensed by such authority; to make arrangements with any other pilotage authority for altering the limits of their respective districts, and for extending the powers of such other authority and transferring its own powers to such last-mentioned authority: And whereas it is expedient that increased facilities should be given for effecting the objects contemplated by the said recited enactments, and for further amending the law concerning pilotage, and that in so doing means should be afforded for paying due regard to existing interests and to the circumstances of particular cases: Be it enacted that it shall be lawful for the Board of Trade by provisional order to do the following things, that is to say—(1) . . . to transfer the whole or any part of the jurisdiction of the said pilotage authority to a new body corporate or body of persons to be constituted for the purpose by the provisional order so as to represent the interest of the several ports concerned. . . . (4) To exempt the masters and owners of all ships from being obliged to employ pilots in any pilotage district, or in any part of any pilotage district, or from being obliged to pay for pilots when not employing them in any district, or in any part of any pilotage district, and to annex any terms and conditions to such exemptions." Sub-sect. 6 of sect. 40 provides that no such provisional order shall take effect unless and until the same is confirmed by Parliament. In accordance with these enactments a provisional order relating to the pilotage of the river Tyne was made by the Board of Trade, and, having been amended by Parliament, was confirmed by the Tyne Pilotage Order Confirmation Act 1865. Clause 16 of the provisional order provides as follows: "Nothing in this order shall extend to oblige the owner or master of any vessel to employ or make use of any pilot in piloting or conducting such vessel into or out of the said district, or within any part thereof, if he is not desirous so to do, or to pay any pilotage dues when not employing or making use of a pilot." The learned judge of the County Court has held that inasmuch as the obligation to take a pilot was created by the Act of 1801, and not by the provisional order, clause 16 of that order cannot have the effect of exempting foreign ships from compulsory pilotage. We are unable to agree with this view of the matter. The provisional order transferred the jurisdiction in pilotage matters previously vested in the Trinity House of Newcastle-upon-Tyne to a new body, to be called the Tyne Pilotage Commissioners. It provided for the appointment, election, and incorporation of such commissioners. It defined the pilotage district of the Tyne. It provided for the examination and licensing of pilots, and for the levying of pilotage rates. It was, in our opinion, designed as a complete code for regulating pilotage in the river Tyne, and was intended to supersede, and did, in fact, supersede the pilotage provisions of the Act of 1801. Sect. 6 of that Act imposes on foreign ships the employment of "pilots to be licensed as aforesaid," i.e., to be licensed by the Trinity House of Newcastle-upon-Tyne. The provisional order provides for the licensing of pilots by the Tyne Commissioners. The Act of 1801 authorises the Trinity House of Newcastle-upon-Tyne to levy pilotage dues on foreign greater than those on British ships. The provisional order imposes one scale of charges on all vessels alike. Liability to pay pilotage dues, although no pilot has been employed by the master of a vessel, has always been regarded as one of the chief indications of the employment of a pilot being compulsory. Clause 15 of the provisional order directs that the pilotage dues "shall be paid to the commissioners, or to the pilot performing auch pilotage duty, within five days after the performance thereof;" and the provisional order contains no direction analogous to the following words in sect. 6 of the Act of 1801: "And in case of their neglect or refusal to receive and employ such pilots as aforesaid, they shall severally nevertheless answer and pay to the said master, pilots, and seamen, the aforesaid pilotage duties, and the same shall be recoverable in the same manner as if such pilot had been actually received and employed." In other words, no power is conferred on the present commissioners or the pilots to charge pilotage dues where a pilot has not been employed. Again, the only power given to the present pilotage authority—the Tyne Pilotage Commissioners—or to the pilots licensed by them to charge pilotage dues, even when a pilot is employed, is conferred by the provisional order. No such dues can be charged or enforced, save under that order. When therefore clause 16 says, "Nothing in this order shall extend to oblige the owner or master of any vessel to employ" a pilot, or to pay dues when not employing one, it does exempt all vessels, British and foreign alike, from compulsory pilotage. If it be said that the jurisdiction of the Trinity House of Newcastle-upon-Tyne is now transferred to the Tyne Pilotage Commissioners, and that therefore the power to charge and enforce the pilotage dues mentioned in the Act of 1801 is vested in them, the answer is that such jurisdiction being so transferred to the Tyne Pilotage Commissioners by clause 11 of the provisional order itself, compulsory pilotage is expressly excluded by the words of clause 16. We therefore think the judgment of the County Court judge must be reversed, and judgment entered for the plaintiffs, with costs. Appeal allowed.

THE RALPH CREYKE. (a)

Collision—Steamship and keel—Duty of keel—Keels lashed together.

Where a steamer is navigating a reach in which there is a risk of her smelling the ground, it is her duty to be under such control by occasionally stopping her engines or otherwise, that she may be able to avoid collision with other craft in case she does smell the ground and fails to answer her helm.

In the absence of any rule of the road, regulation, or custom, there is no duty on the part of a keel or barge drifting up river to keep out of the deep water navigation and navigate in the shallow water, even though by remaining in the deep water she obstructs the passage of steamships which can only navigate in deep water.

A keel with her mast lowered may drive up on a flood tide in any part of a river lashed to another keel, but it is her duty in such circumstances to go up dredging with her anchor down, in order that she may thereby have the means in an emergency of bringing herself up if necessary; and whilst two keels may drive up lashed together there is no less duty imposed on them to dredge.

This was a damage action in rem instituted by the owners of the keel Jane, of Hull, against the steamship Ralph Creyke, to recover damages occasioned by a collision between the keel and the steamship, in the river Ouse, on the 13th Jan. 1886.

The facts alleged by the plaintiffs were as follows:—

Shortly before 12.30 p.m. on the 13th Jan. 1886, the keel Jane, of eighty tons burden, laden with a cargo of wheat, was drifting broadside up the river Ouse on the flood tide, on the east side of Goole Reach, lashed alongside another keel, both keels having their masts down. The wind was north, blowing strong, the tide nearly high water, and the weather fine and clear. In these circumstances those on board the said keels observed the Ralph Creyke on their starboard bow, distant about half a mile, and coming down the west side of the river with the aid of a tug. As the Ralph Creyke and her tug approached they crossed towards the east side of the river, and, instead of passing clear of the Jane, the Ralph Creyke with her stem struck the starboard side of the Jane, and sank her

The facts alleged on behalf of the defendants were as follows:—

Shortly after noon on the 13th Jan. 1886, the Ralph Creyke was proceeding at slow speed down the deep-water channel in the river Ouse, laden with a cargo for Antwerp. She had a tug fast ahead to assist in steering her, and there was a man stationed on each side of her to take soundings, as the depths, owing to local circumstances, varied from time to time. In these circumstances, and when the Ralph Creyke was a little below Bennett's Jetty, her helm was starboarded to follow the deep-water channel. About this time the keel Jane, which had been previously seen shortly after the Ralph Creyke left the steamboat dock at Goole, was about half mile distant, lashed to another keel, and was lying athwart the tide. As the vessels approached it was seen that the two keels were drifting up in the deep-water channel, and were likely to come near the course of the Ralph Creyke. Her engines were thereupon stopped, her helm was put hard-a-starboard and the tug towed broad off her port bow. Owing to the Ralph Creyke smelling the ground, she did not answer her helm, and the engines were thereupon set full speed astern, but the Jane, which continued to drift up broadside on, with her starboard side about amidships, came into collision with the stem of the Ralph Creyke.

The defendants made the two following charges against the plaintiffs:

6. The Jane was improperly allowed, having regard to the dangers of navigation, and the special circumstances of the case, to drift broadside on up the deep-water channel of the river lashed to another keel, and not under any control.

7. Those on board the Jane improperly neglected to keep a proper or any look-out, and to take any measures by letting go their anchor or otherwise to avoid the collision.

The further facts are sufficiently stated in the judgment.

The Humber Rules:

Art 1. All vessels, as well sailing vessels as steamers (except dumb craft), while navigating or anchored or moored in the river Humber, or in any part of the river Ouse, at or below Goole, or in any part of the river Trent at or below Gainsborough, shall observe and obey the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea set out in the first schedule annexed to an Order in Council made in pursuance of the Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act 1862, and dated the 14th day of Aug. 1879, and as varied and amended by an Order in Council made as aforesaid, and dated the 26th day of Aug. 1881, with the exceptions and additions made in the following rules.

Art. 5. In interpreting these rules, the term "dumb-craft" shall include canal boats, mud barges, and other barges, lighters, vessels without masts, and vessels without either deck or masts, sloops and keels, with their masts lowered, and rafts.

T. T. Bucknill, Q.C. and J. P. Aspinall for the plaintiffs.—It was the duty of the steamer to have kept out of the way of the keels, and, as she has neglected that duty, she is solely to blame for this collision:

The Owen Wallis, 30 L. T. Rep. N. S. 41; 2 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 207; L. Rep. 4 A. & E. 175.

(a) Reported by J. P. ASPINALL and BUTLER ASPINALL, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

The keel was perfectly justified in going up on the flood tide lashed to another keel. She was also entitled to navigate in any part of the channel that she pleased. Those on board the steamer were acquainted with the local dangers of the reach, and they ought to have anticipated the possibility of their vessel smelling the ground, and waited till the keels had passed. Instead of that they kept on without even reducing their speed. Even assuming the keels to have been guilty of negligent navigation, yet it cannot be regarded as negligence contributing to the collision, and would not have occasioned a collision but for the steamer's fault:

Davies v. Mann, 10 M. & W. 546:
Spaight v. Tedcastle, 44 L. T. Rep. N. S. 589; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 486; L. Rep. 6 H. of L. 217.

Sir Walter Phillimore, Q.C. and H Stokes for the defendants.—The collision was solely caused by the keels floating up on a flood tide without taking any precautions whatsoever. By arts. 23 and 24 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea due regard is to be paid to any special circumstances, and no ship is under any circumstances to neglect proper precautions. Notwithstanding these regulations the keels were allowed to drift broadside on in that part of the channel in which the steamer owing to her draught could alone safely navigate, whereas the keels might have safely drifted up in other parts of the channel. In addition to this the keels neglected to take the ordinary precaution of dredging, and so were without any means either of quickly checking their way or altering their course in case any emergency made it necessary so to manœuvre. The "ordinary practice of seamen" makes it clearly wrong to navigate in this reckless and imprudent way.

J. P. Aspinall in reply.—The Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea are not applicable to a keel with her mast lowered. By art. 1 of the Humber Rules all vessels, except "dumb craft," are "to obey the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea." By art. 5 the term "dumb craft" includes among other things "sloops and keels with their masts lowered." That being so, the keel Jane was not bound by the Regulations, and was entitled to suppose that the steamer would take due measures to keep out of her way. Notwithstanding this, the defendants are in effect asking the court to hold that it was the duty of the keel to get out of the way of the steamer. Had she done so, those in charge of her would have been departing from the ordinary practice of seamen:

The Swallow, 36 L. T. Rep. N. S. 231; 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 371.

Cur. adv. vult.

May 11.—Sir JAMES HANNEN.—My decision in this case has been delayed owing to a difference of opinion between my assessors. The facts of the case are these: The keel Jane was proceeding up the Goole reach of the river Ouse lashed to another keel called the Jessie. They had been dredging up the river with the tide, and as the wind was against them, they had their masts down. When they got into Goole reach, I come to the conclusion that they had not got their anchors down, but were drifting up athwart the river with their sterns slightly angling down the river towards the right bank. Whilst in that position the steamer Ralph Creyke was entering the reach at the upper end, and those on board of her saw the position of the two keels. The steamer proceeded down the reach until within a distance of about 130 yards, when her master inquired of the tug which was assisting him on which side of the keels he proposed to go. The tug master stated that he proposed going astern of the keels, that is nearer to the left bank of the river; and at a distance of about 130 yards the helm of the steamer was starboarded for the purpose of enabling her to follow the tug in the direction indicated. In the course of the manœuvre the tug proceeded to tow broad on the port bow of the steamer; but it is said that the steamer did not answer her helm, and the consequence was that, instead of following her tug, she came into contact with the keel Jane, which shortly afterwards sank. It is said on behalf of the steamer that the reason she did not answer her helm and follow the tug was because she smelt the ground. The evidence is this: It is said that soundings were being taken on the steamer from time to time, and that whereas her draught was 11ft. 7in. astern, and 11ft. 6in. forward, the soundings taken on both sides recorded a depth 11ft. 6in. On the other hand the tug, whose special business it was to be acquainted with the depths along this reach, had taken some soundings as she went up the river; and it is alleged by those on board her that they found soundings as deep as 13ft., and further that, in coming down the river, when towing the steamer, soundings were taken from time to time, and they were 13ft. until the very last sounding, which was taken immediately before the collision, when the tug was broad on the port bow of the steamer, and tending nearer into the shore, and consequently in shallower water, and then the soundings gave 12ft. 6in. Now, if the soundings had not been taken on both sides of the steamer, it might have been that this discrepancy was accounted for by the steamer being nearer the shore; but, as it is alleged that soundings were taken on both sides of the steamer, that explanation is not sufficient, and the result is that there is a remarkable discrepancy between the soundings of the tug and those of the steamer. I myself am satisfied that the soundings of the tug are correct, because the dock-master says that he knows as a fact that the depth of water at the dock gates at that time was 12ft., and that the depth of the river at the point where the collision took place would be 1ft. more, making 13ft., which exactly accords with the soundings on the tug. Further than that there was an independent witness on board the tug, who says there was depth and space enough on the left bank for the steamer to have passed the keels, if it had not been for some cause such as the alleged smelling of the ground. It was suggested in argument that there might have been what for the purposes of convenience I will call an accidental bank, which may have caused the smelling of the ground; but there is no evidence of that, and I cannot see why it should not have been proved had it been the case.

The evidence, therefore, stands thus, that the depth of water near the steamer was 13ft., and that it was 12ft. 6in. when the tug was broad on the steamer's port bow. I have put to the Trinity Brethren the question whether or not with that depth of water the steamer might smell the ground, and so become incapable of answering her helm, and they tell me that with some ships under such circumstances it might be so. Upon a matter of that kind, upon which I am quite incapable of forming an opinion myself, I must accept their opinion, and I am going to consider this case on the assumption that the steamer did smell the ground. One of the Trinity Brethren is of opinion that in these circumstances the steamer is not to blame, while the other Trinity Brother is of opinion that she is to blame. The character of the navigation was known to her, and the risk there was of her smelling the ground, and the latter Trinity Brother is of opinion that the steamer ought, by occasionally stopping her engines, to have diminished her way, and been so well under control, as to have been able in the emergency which happened, to have avoided running into the keels with the force which we know she did, cutting into them some three or four feet. I accept the opinion of this Trinity Brother, and come to the conclusion that the steamer was to blame. There remains the question, whether the keel is also to blame. First it is said that it was negligent for her to be lashed to the other keel. Several witnesses were asked whether it was not unusual, and they gave an opinion that it was. But I am of opinion that there was nothing which could be considered negligent on the part of the keel, in being lashed to another. It was stated that they got up faster by this means; and it is to be observed that, when lashed together, they took up no more space in the river than the steamer, and they had just as much right as the steamer to occupy the space of two keels. Further, it was said, that the keels ought not to have been in the deep channel, but in shallow water, because they did not draw so much water as the steamer. But I must entirely repudiate that view. Barges or keels have just as much right to the natural advantages of a swift stream as a steamer, assuming there is no rule of the road or regulation or custom to the contrary. I see no negligence in their navigating in the deep water, and the steamer, seeing they were in the deep water, ought, if there was not room enough in which to pass —which, however, I am of opinion is not proved —to have waited till the keels which were in possession of the reach had passed. But, while I am of opinion that the keels were entitled to proceed up the reach lashed together, it does not follow, that they are entitled to any indulgence when so lashed, beyond the rights of a keel going up alone. I therefore have asked the Trinity Brethren whether the keels were being navigated in a proper manner, and they are of opinion that they were not. They ought to have been proceeding up the reach in the same way as that in which they had been proceeding up the lower parts of the river, viz., by dredging, the effect of which is, that by keeping the anchor on the ground, they practically steer themselves. Further, when dredging, they, by letting the anchor hold, can sooner bring the keel to a standstill. That is what the keel could have done had she been dredging—it is that which I am of opinion the steamer ought to have done by stopping her engines. For these reasons, I am of opinion that both vessels were to blame.

THE IDA. (a)

Co-ownership action—Managing owner—Principal and agent.

Where a part owner of a ship pays to the managing owner his contribution due upon the ship's accounts as agreed between the co-owner, the managing owner receives such contribution as agent for all the owners, and in the event of the managing owner misapplying such payment to his own use, and not paying the ship's accounts therewith, the contributing owner is entitled to be credited with the amount so paid, but all the owners, including himself, must make good the defalcations in proportion to their shares.

THIS was an objection to a registrar's report, taken on motion to vary the report.

The action was originally brought in the Chancery Division by G. B. Meager, one of the owners of the Ida, against W. E. Jones, Thomas Cory, J. Wilson, and W. Pike, as part owners of the Ida, to have an account taken of the receipts, payments, credit, and liabilities of or for the Ida, from the 25th Jan. 1878 to the 28th Feb. 1880, and of what was due to or from each of the several part owners in respect thereof, and in respect of payments made by any or either of them in discharge of liabilities incurred between the said dates.

After some delay, an order was made, upon the application of the plaintiff, that the action should be transferred to the Admiralty Division, and on the 1st July 1885 the whole matter in dispute was referred to the registrar to report on.

Before the reference was heard the plaintiff filed accounts, showing fully what he alleged were the disbursements and receipts made and received in respect of the ship; the debts owing; distinguishing those incurred before and after the several owners acquired their shares; and the amounts due from and paid by and balance due from each party.

At the reference it appeared that from the time the ship was purchased to March 1879 one John Bowen was the managing owner of the ship, and that in March 1879 Bowen presented a petition in liquidation. The plaintiff Meager thereupon became managing owner, and continued to act in that capacity until the end of 1879. When the plaintiff became managing owner he found that several debts and liabilities incurred in respect of the said ship by Bowen remained unpaid.

Whilst Bowen was still managing owner his accounts to Feb. 1878 had been audited by several of the owners, including the plaintiff and the defendant Jones, and found correct, and showed a balance against the ship of 520*l.* 15*s.* 6*d.*

In consequence of the plaintiff insuring his own share, the owners, other than the plaintiff, had to contribute to a sum of 482*l.* 2*s.* 5*d.*

These accounts showed on the debit side an amount of 171*l.* 17*s.* 5*d.* for repairs done to the ship by the firm of G. B. Meager and Co., of which the plaintiff was a member. This amount was not in fact paid by Bowen to the plaintiff's firm, and still remained owing; and the plaintiff claimed to debit the ship with this amount in the subsequent accounts, and to have a contribution in respect of it from his co-owners.

At the reference it was shown by the defendant Cory that he had paid to Bowen, at the request of the defendant Pike, a sum of 34*l.* 8*s.* 9*d.*, being the proportion of the sum of 520*l.* 15*s.* 6*d.* due from him in respect of his eight sixty-fourth shares of the ship. It was also alleged, on behalf of the defendant Jones, that he had accepted in Bowen's favour and ultimately paid a bill of exchange for 118*l.* 15*s.* 1*d.*, to enable Bowen to pay a further repair account due to G. B. Meager and Co.; and Jones claimed to set this off against the claim made against him. This, however, was not claimed by Jones as a contribution in respect of amounts due for his eight sixty-fourth shares. Neither of these amounts had in fact been paid by Bowen for the ship's debts, but had been appropriated by him to his own use.

G. B. Meager and Co. had drawn upon Bowen for the proportion due to the plaintiff of the 171*l.* 17*s.* 5*d.*, but Bowen had not met the bill.

Among the ship's debts was one of 126*l.* 2*s.* 2*d.*, due to Shepherd, a ship chandler in Swansea, of which 69*l.* 7*s.* 11*d.* had been incurred before, and 56*l.* 14*s.* 3*d.* after the 26th Nov. 1878, when Pike became a part owner. In settlement of this account Shepherd accepted 90*l.*, making an abatement of 36*l.* 2*s.* 2*d.* The whole of this abatement was deducted by the plaintiff in his accounts from that part of Shepherd's bill, amounting to 69*l.* 7*s.* 11*d.*, which had occurred before the 26th Nov. 1878.

It further appeared at the reference that the plaintiff had omitted to give credit for 16*l.* 16*s.* received by him from Bowen's estate.

The shares were held as follows: Meager eight sixty-fourth shares; Jones, eight sixty-fourth shares; Cory, four sixty-fourth shares; Wilson, four sixty-fourth shares from the time of the purchase of the ship, including Bowen's managership; Pike, eight sixty-fourth shares from the 26th Nov. 1878.

The rest of the owners were insolvent, or had disappeared, and the case was dealt with on the basis that the above-named persons only were capable of contributing.

The plaintiff, the defendants Jones, Cory, and Pike appeared at the reference. Wilson did not appear. It was then objected, on behalf of the defendants, that the plaintiff, by signing Bowen's account, must be taken to have admitted that the 171*l.* 17*s.* 5*d.*, had been paid to his firm, and that, even if this were not so, Cory, having paid Bowen 34*l.* 8*s.* 9*d.*, was entitled to have that set off against the amount now claimed against him; and similarly that Jones was entitled to set off the 118*l.* 15*s.* 1*d.* against the claim against him.

The registrar, by his report, refused to entertain the defendants' objections upon the ground that the payment to the managing owner by Cory could not of itself discharge Cory from his liability to Meager and Co., and that there had not been any such delay on their part in enforcing their claim against Bowen as to debar them from recovering the amount from the other owners; and that, further, as against his co-owners, Cory ought, before paying his contribution to the managing owner, to have ascertained, as he might have done, that Messrs. Meager's account had not been paid, and to have taken the precaution of paying it over to them himself, in which case his co-owners would have had no further claim against him; and secondly, upon the ground that the bill, of 118*l.* 15*s.* 1*d.* given by defendant Jones to Bowen was not even, as in Cory's case the payment of a contribution ascertained to be due in respect of his shares, but rather an advance by Jones to Bowen, between whom and Jones there were other business transactions independently of the ship. But the registrar directed, with regard to Shepherd's bill, the deduction should be apportioned between the parts of the account before and after the 26th Nov. 1878, and therefore transferred 16*l.* 4*s.* 9*d.* to the credit of the ship after the defendant Pike became an owner; and found that, as the plaintiff had omitted to credit the dividend of 16*l.* 16*s.*, one-half of that sum should be deducted from the ship's debts incurred before the 26th Nov. 1878, and the other half from the amount of those subsequently incurred. With regard to costs, the registrar reported that "the accounts filed by the plaintiff having been altered only by giving credit for the omitted dividend of 16*l.* 16*s.* from Bowen's estate, and by apportioning the allowance made in Shepherd's account, I am of opinion that the plaintiff is entitled to the costs of the reference."

To this report the defendants gave notice of objection.

The objection was heard on notice of motion; the notice of motion on behalf of the defendants Cory and Pike being, that they would move the court on the facts found in the report to vary the said report, or to refer the same back to the registrar for amendment, upon the ground (1) that the plaintiff, inasmuch as he audited and signed an account with credit items on one side and debit items on the other, was bound by his signature to such audited account to treat every debit in such account (his own 171*l.* 17*s.* 5*d.* included) as having been discharged when he has to deal with a person like the defendant Cory, who has acted on the faith of such account and the plaintiff's signature thereto; (2) that in the alternative, the plaintiff so signing being the cause of the defendant Cory having made a payment of 34*l.* 8*s.* 9*d.*, to Mr. Bowen, the defendant Cory is, as between himself and the plaintiff, entitled to claim to take credit for the payment of the 34*l.* 8*s.* 9*d.*, and that the same should be added to the 98*l.* 15*s.*, for which he is given credit in the schedule to the report; (3) that, after being party to an account sent to the owners, asking for their contribution in cash to the 482*l.* 2*s.* 5*d.*, the plaintiff, as between himself and partners (particularly the defendant Cory, who at once paid his contribution in cash), had no right to accept any mode of payment from the managing owner other than cash, and by taking a bill from Bowen, he thereby relieved the other part owners without regard to the form or wording of the bill; (4) that the plaintiff is bound to pay his proportionate part of the costs of the action and reference.

The notice of motion on behalf of the defendant Jones was similar, under heads (1), (3), and (4), but (2) was that the defendant Jones, having made a payment of 118*l.* 5*s.* 1*d.* to Mr. Bowen, the defendant Jones, as between himself and the plaintiff, was entitled to claim to take credit for his payment of 118*l.* 15*s.* 1*d.*, and that the same should be added to the 120*l.* for which he is given credit in the schedule to the report.

Warr, for the defendants Cory and Pike, in support of their objections. In face of the account signed by him, the plaintiff cannot be heard to say that the 171*l.* 15*s.* 1*d.* was not paid to him. [BUTT, J.—That account is not conclusive to show payment, and, as payment was not in fact made, it is open to the plaintiff to claim it. Is not your real position that the defendant Cory's position was altered by his payment of his contribution to Bowen, who received it as agent for all the owners?] Yes, that is my contention; the defendant Cory cannot be called upon to pay twice, having really paid his proportion of the debts due under this account and to the agent of the owners, of whom the plaintiff was one. The owners must credit Cory with the money paid by him to Bowen.

Ashton Cross for the defendant Jones.—The payment to Bowen was really on account of the ship, and should be credited to Jones.

J. P. Aspinall for the plaintiff.—Bowen was not agent for all the co-owners to receive contributions so as to bind them. A managing owner may be agent to bind them as regards transactions with third parties, but, so far as each owner is concerned, he is agent for each individual to pay and not to receive. If a co-owner pays the managing owner money, the latter is bound as against his co-owners to see that it is properly applied. The plaintiff has a right, as against each individual owner, to recover the whole of the necessaries supplied to the ship, and no one of the defendants can be heard to say that, his agent having misappropriated the money paid on account of the debt, he is not liable over again. [BUTT, J.—You are asking me in a co-ownership action to enforce payment of a debt for necessaries. How can I do that? If the amount had been paid it might have been different.] I submit it is immaterial whether the amount is paid or not; in this action all accounts between the co-owners must be settled, and the amounts of their respective contributions to the amount of the ship's liabilities must be determined. A managing owner is entitled to be put in funds before he pays anything, and the fact of his being a creditor makes no difference. [BUTT, J.—On consideration, I think you are right in that, Mr. Aspinall.] The worst that can happen to the plaintiff is that the defendant Cory should be credited with the amount paid by him, and that such amount, not having been paid by Bowen, should be debited against all the owners, including Cory.

BUTT, J.—In my view of this case the report must be amended in one respect. It seems to me perfectly clear that during Mr. Bowen's management as managing owner he received from Mr. Cory, one of the co-owners, and one of the parties to this suit, the sum of 34*l.* 8*s.* 9*d.*, that sum being the exact amount of Mr. Cory's share of the total debts and liabilities of the ship, as appearing in the account which was then audited and settled. I have no hesitation in saying that Mr. Bowen received that sum as the agent of all the owners of the ship, and, if he has misappropriated it, it is a loss, which must be borne by all the owners. Mr. Cory, being one of the owners, will bear his share of that loss; but the proper way of settling the account, in my view, is to credit Mr. Cory with the amount so paid. If it overpays any amount to which Mr. Cory appears to be liable on the final settlement of the accounts of the ship, then his co-owners will have to recoup him the amount so overpaid. So much for Mr. Cory's position. Now, with regard to Mr. Jones, I am sorry to say that I am afraid he has put himself in the awkward position of having made an advance to Mr. Bowen, the managing owner. It is very true that the claim may be said, in one sense, to be in connection with this ship, but it is not in payment of the accounts of this ship, and he, therefore, must suffer for Bowen's misfortune, or Bowen's dishonesty—I do not know which is the correct view of the matter. That, as I understand it, disposes of all the objections to this report.

THE KEROULA. (a)

Restraint—Bond for safe return—Arrest of ship—Mortgage—Damages and costs.

Where persons hold shares in a ship by way of security for a loan under an agreement, by which it is provided (inter alia) that in the event of the owners of the shares failing to meet their acceptances, or to pay interest, the holders of the shares may realise them, calling on the owners of the shares to make good any loss arising therefrom, or paying them any balance left after repaying themselves the loan, they are merely mortgagees of such shares, and do not become owners thereof on the acceptances being dishonoured, and hence they, not having taken possession of the shares, are not entitled to institute an action of restraint against the ship.

Where shipowners, in an action of restraint instituted by mortgagees alleging themselves to be owners, enter an appearance not under protest, and give bail for the safe return of the ship, they are not precluded at the trial from questioning the plaintiffs' title, and, if it in fact appear that the plaintiffs are merely mortgagees, the Court will order the bond to be given up and cancelled.

Semble, a mortgagee of shares in a ship, when in possession, may institute an action of restraint.

THIS was an action of restraint, instituted by Messrs. Westcott and Laurance, the alleged owners of eight sixty-fourth shares in the steamship Keroula, in which they claimed that the co-owners should give a bond for the value of the plaintiffs' shares in the steamship, and for her safe return from her intended voyage.

The plaintiffs having threatened to arrest the

(a) Reported by J. P. ASPINALL and BUTLER ASPINALL, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

Keroula, the defendants gave a bail bond in the sum of 1500*l.* for the safe return of the vessel.

The defendants having required the plaintiffs to deliver a statement of claim, the plaintiffs delivered one as follows:—

1. The plaintiffs are the lawful and registered owners of eight sixty-fourth shares in the steamship Keroula.

2. At the time of the institution of this suit, the said steamship was lying in the river Tyne, or in one of the docks adjacent thereto, in the possession of the defendants, who were about to despatch her on a voyage against the will of the plaintiffs, who always disapproved of, and dissented from, and protested against, any such employment of the said ship, and desired that the said ship should not be employed in trading or attempting to trade for the present.

3. After the institution of the suit, the defendants appeared in the action, and gave a bail bond to the plaintiffs for the safe return of the ship to the satisfaction of the plaintiffs, and as claimed by the plaintiffs, and the plaintiffs are satisfied with the said bail bond, but the defendants have required the plaintiffs to deliver a statement of claim, and in accordance with such demand, and in compliance with the Rules and Orders of Court, the present claim is delivered.

4. The plaintiffs claim that the court should pronounce for the liability of the defendants, to answer judgment in the action, and for the validity of the said bail bond, and condemn the defendants in the costs of these proceedings, and for such other and further relief as the nature of the case may require.

The defendants, by their defence, alleged as follows:—

1. The plaintiffs are not the lawful owners of eight sixty-fourth shares of the said steamship. The plaintiffs, although registered as owners of the said shares, hold the same only by way of security for the repayment of a loan from Messrs. Porteous and Senior, who are the owners of the said shares.

2. At the time of the institution of this suit, the Keroula was under charter for a voyage from the Tyne to Savona, and the defendants pointed out to the plaintiffs that they were only mortgagees of the said shares, and not entitled to commence an action of restraint, but the plaintiffs persisted in their claim and the defendants, rather than suffer the arrest of the said ship, which would have caused very serious damages, entered an appearance in the said action, and gave, under protest, a bail bond for the safe return of the said steamship, at the same time stating that they would hold the plaintiffs responsible for all costs and damages occasioned by their proceedings.

3. Save in so far as they are consistent with this defence, the defendants deny the several allegations contained in the statement of claim.

4. The defendants submit to this honourable court that it was gross negligence on the part of the plaintiffs to institute or proceed with the said action after the said notice, and the defendants pray that the said bail bond may be delivered up to them to be cancelled, and that the plaintiffs be condemned in the costs of this suit, and also in all damages and expenses arising out of the said proceedings, and that, if necessary, a reference may be made to the registrar to report the amount of such damages and expenses.

The terms upon which the plaintiffs held the eight sixty-fourth shares were contained in the following letters between themselves and the defendants, Messrs. Porteous and Senior:—

9, Fenchurch-street, 7th Feb. 1886.—Messrs. Porteous and Senior.—Dear Sirs,—Loan. In consideration of your depositing sufficient steamer shares to cover a loan of 3000*l.*, we agree to pay you 1000*l.* to morrow, and a further 1500*l.* by the 15th inst., the shares to be transferred equally to each partner, and our Mr. W. G. Westcott would be prepared to advance a further 500*l.* against further shares in his name; the loan to bear interest at the rate of 8 per cent. per annum, and for not less a period than three months. If agreeable to you, we shall be glad to receive at same time your acceptances for the amount by six drafts of 500*l.* each for twelve months, you being at liberty to withdraw any one of these at any time you please. It is further agreed you give us a letter indemnifying us against any claims or losses that may accrue on these shares whilst we hold them, as we simply hold them as security on the loan. If you let us know this is in order we will at once arrange accordingly.—Yours truly, WESTCOTT AND LAURANCE.

In answer thereto, Messrs. Porteous and Senior wrote the following letter:—

4, Great St. Helens-street, 15th Feb. 1886.—Messrs. Westcott and Laurance.—Dear Sirs,—In accordance with arrangements, we hand you herewith our acceptances for 3000*l.* in six drafts of 500*l.* each, payable in twelve months hence, and also bills of sale for eight shares in s.s. Keroula, and six shares in s.s. Mareca, it being understood that these do not constitute you owners of these shares, but are merely given as collateral security for payment of acceptances and security. You are not to receive any profits on these shares, nor to be liable for any losses, and we hereby agree to indemnify you against any claims that may be made on you in consequence of your being registered owners of such shares. After the expiration of three months, and at any time between that date and the date when acceptances become due, we are to be at liberty to retire any or all the above acceptances, in which case you agree to re-transfer such shares as we may wish, to the extent of the acceptances retired, and in accordance with the values stated in the respective bills of sale. Interest to be paid at expiration of each three months, at the rate of 8 per cent. per annum on amount of acceptances running. Should we fail to meet our acceptances, or to pay interest when due, you will then be at liberty to realise the shares, calling on us to make good any loss arising therefrom, or handing us any difference you may have in hand, after repaying yourselves what we may then owe you,—Yours truly, PORTEOUS AND SENIOR.

In answer, Messrs. Westcott and Laurance wrote as follows:—

15th Feb. 1886.—Dear Sirs,—Loan 3000*l.* Your letter of the 15th inst. is before us, and we agree to the contents contained therein. Please find herewith one further cheque for 1500*l.*, and our Mr. W. G. Westcott's cheque for 500*l.*, receipt of which please acknowledge.—Yours truly, WESTCOTT AND LAURANCE.

It was admitted that the acceptances given by Messrs. Porteous and Senior had been dishonoured. The plaintiffs had never taken possession of the said shares, having never given any notice either to Porteous and Senior or to the managing owner that they had taken possession of the shares, or intended to receive the benefits thereof.

Dr. Raikes for the plaintiffs.—We are satisfied with the bond given by the defendants, and it is now too late for them to question our right to have such a bond. Had they intended to raise the question of our ownership, they should have appeared under protest:

The Vivar, 35 L. T. Rep. N. S. 782; 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 308; 2 P. Div. 29;
The Vera Cruz, 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 270; 51 L. T. Rep. N. S. 104; 9 P. Div. 96.

The defendants having elected to appear absolutely, and having given the bond, cannot now ask to set it aside. In the case of Skeate v. Beale (11 A. & E. 983) it was held that duress of goods was not a ground for avoiding an agreement. In the present case the bond is an agreement, and therefore the seizure of the ship is no ground for the defendants asking for the cancellation of the bond. Apart from that, my clients are substantially the owners of these shares, and therefore, on the authority of The Innisfallen (L. Rep. 1 Ad. & Ec. 72; 16 L. T. Rep. N. S. 71; 2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 470), entitled to a bond as claimed. The plaintiffs are on the register as owners, and by the correspondence relating to the loan, they are to "be at liberty to realise the shares," assuming the defendants fail to meet their acceptances. It is admitted that the acceptances have been dishonoured, and therefore by the agreement we can at once sell; and if so, we are virtually in the position of owners, and not mortgagees. In The Innisfallen (ubi sup.) Dr. Lushington says that, under some circumstances, an agreement similar to the present might put mortgagees into the position of owners. My clients, by this agreement, became invested with all the rights of owners on default being made, and therefore are entitled to institute this action.

H. F. Boyd for the defendants.—On the authority of The Innisfallen (ubi sup.) the court may look behind the register to see what the real nature of this transaction was. By the agreement contained in the letters it is clear that the plaintiffs' position was that of mortgagees, with the usual power of sale. That they never were to become owners is conclusively proved by the term that in the event of sale the plaintiffs were to hand over the balance to the defendants, or to be repaid any loss. That is inconsistent with ownership, and therefore the plaintiffs are merely mortgagees. If so, they are not entitled to institute an action of restraint:

The Highlander, 2 W. Rob. 109;
Collins v. Lamport, 11 L. T. Rep. N. S. 497; 34 L. J. 196, Ch.;
The Innisfallen (ubi sup.).

The giving of the bail bond does not prevent the defendants contesting this action. They were bound by the practice of the court to give bail in the form in which they did. They gave notice to the plaintiffs' solicitors that they protested against the course taken by the plaintiffs. The bail bond does not constitute an agreement, and it was not given under duress of goods, but in compliance with the practice of the court. The court sets aside improper salvage agreements, and by analogy should order this bond to be given up and cancelled. In consequence of the plaintiffs' proceedings, the defendants were put to the expense of paying commission on bail. This is in the nature of damages, and, as it was caused by the gross negligence of the plaintiffs in instituting this action, notwithstanding their knowledge of their true position, the plaintiffs should be ordered to pay it:

The Numida, 10 P. Div. 158; 53 L. T. Rep. N. S. 681; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 483;
The Evangelismos, Swa. 378;
The Cathcart, L. Rep. 1 A. & E. 314; 16 L. T. Rep. N. S. 211;
The Victor, Lush. 72.

Dr. Raikes in reply.—There has been no such gross negligence as to entitle the plaintiffs to damages. By the terms of the agreement, the plaintiffs were entitled to look upon themselves as owners. In the case of salvage agreements, there is duress of the person in the sense that but for the services the salved might lose their lives.

Sir JAMES HANNEN.—I am of opinion that the plaintiffs have failed in this case. The Innisfallen (ubi sup.) decides very clearly that, though a person may appear to be owner on the register, yet that may be investigated. In other words, the court may look behind the register, and it may be ascertained whether or not the apparent owner is really owner or only mortgagee. Having regard to the facts of this case, and to the correspondence between the parties, I am clearly of opinion that the plaintiffs are only mortgagees. It is not necessary to go through the letters at length, because the plaintiffs have admitted that, subject to one particular passage, they were only mortgagees. That passage is in these words: "Should we fail to meet our acceptances, or to pay interest when due, you will then be at liberty to realise the shares, calling on us to make good any loss arising therefrom, or handing us any difference you may have in hand after repaying yourselves what we may then owe you." That in untechnical language, in my opinion, puts the plaintiffs in the position of mortgagees, and nothing else, and therefore, upon nonpayment of the acceptances, the plaintiffs were not to become owners, but to remain what they were before, with the rights and duties of mortgagees. That being so, the case of The Innisfallen (ubi sup.) is an authority for the proposition that the mortgagee of the shares, not being in possession, is not entitled to institute an action of restrainst. I do not think Mr. Boyd was justified in contending that that decision goes the length of deciding that the mortgagee, when in possession, is not entitled to maintain an action of restraint. It appears to me to permeate the whole judgment, that if the mortgagee is in possession he may institute the suit. In this case the mortgagee was not in possession. A mortgagee who assumes the character of owner may be subject to certain liabilities, and therefore the plaintiffs, for their own protection, were content to remain with only the rights of mortgagees. I am clearly of opinion, now that this case has been investigated, that the plaintiffs were not entitled to institute this suit.

Then comes the question whether the defendants, by giving the bond, have precluded themselves from raising this question. It has been argued that duress of goods does not vitiate a contract. This has nothing to do with duress of goods. In the case cited the duress had nothing to do with the proceedings in a law suit. It was a threat to distrain, and was totally different to the proceedings in this case. This is a case in which the plaintiffs asserted their right to seize the vessel, and the defendants, in accordance with the practice of this division, gave bail. They also very clearly and distinctly gave notice that they disputed their liability in the action, and that they intended to take such proceedings as they might be advised, to assert their rights. They gave bail in the usual form in which a bail bond is given in these actions. It was therefore only an ordinary step in Admiralty litigation to prevent possible loss consequent on the arrest of the ship. I am of opinion that the bail bond must be set aside. As to damages, I think that this is not a case in which I ought to award them. It does not appear to me to be a case of gross negligence. With regard to costs, I think that, having regard to the case of The Innisfallen (ubi sup.), I must give costs to the successful party. I therefore order the bond to be given up and cancelled, and dismiss the action with costs.

(Before Sir JAMES HANNEN.)

THE BERTIE.(a)

Salvage — Government transport — Government stores—Regulations for Her Majesty's transport service.

The owners, master, and crew of a steamship chartered to Government as a transport under the ordinary form of Government charter incorporating the transport regulations (by which it is provided that "when necessary, steam transports will be required to tow other vessels"), are entitled to recover for salvage services rendered to a ship and her freight, even though the services be rendered with the assistance of a naval officer and naval seamen and the salved vessel be laden (inter alia) with Government stores.

THIS was an action in rem instituted by the owners, master, and crew of the steamship Dilston Castle to recover salvage remuneration for services rendered to the steamship Bertie and her freight.

The facts alleged by the plaintiffs were as follows:

The Dilston Castle was a screw steamship of 1055 tons register, with engines of 150 horse power, and was of the value of about 18,000*l.*

On the 19th July 1885 the Dilston Castle was under charter by the British Government as a transport, and was in Suakim Harbour laden with a cargo of forage belonging to the Government, when news was received that the steamship Bertie, laden with a general cargo, was on shore about twenty miles to the northward of Suakim. Next morning, an officer and forty-five seamen of the Royal Navy having come on board, the Dilston Castle, with a naval steam launch in tow, went in search of the Bertie, and found her upon the inner edge of a dangerous coral reef, with her bows out of the water. The Dilston Castle having approached close astern of the Bertie, her anchor was let go, and she was swung with her stern towards the stern of the Bertie. The Dilston Castle was then made fast to the Bertie, and, on her anchor being got up, she steamed slowly ahead, but failed to move the Bertie. After several unsuccessful efforts had been made, it was determined to lighten the Bertie forward. The Dilston Castle was accordingly got alongside the Bertie, and part of the Bertie's cargo was discharged by the crews of both vessels and the seamen of the Royal Navy into the Dilston Castle. Another unsuccessful attempt was made to move the Bertie. Next morning, the 20th July, another unsuccessful attempt was made to move the Bertie, during which the Dilston Castle sustained damage. Discharging of the cargo was again continued, and about 5 a.m. on the 21st July the Bertie suddenly slipped off the reef, when both vessels were safely navigated into Suakim Harbour.

The defence was as follows:

1. The defendants admit that salvage services were rendered by the Dilston Castle on the 19th, 20th, and 21st July, but say that the circumstances under which the said services were rendered are greatly exaggerated in the statement of claim, and, further, that the said services were not rendered to the steamship Bertie, or to any freight which was at the risk of the defendants at the time, but that the said services were rendered to certain Government stores then laden on board the Bertie.

2. Except as herein admitted, the defendants deny the various allegations in the statement of claim, and say that the following are the correct circumstances of the said services: The Bertie is a screw steamship of 1109 tons register, propelled by engines of 140 horse power nominal, and, at the time of the circumstances hereinafter mentioned, was under charter for a voyage from England to Jeddah, Suakim, Aden, Bushire, and Bussorah, for a lump sum of 2250*l.*, and, by the terms of the said charter-party, it was further agreed that the sum of 2000*l.*, part of the said chartered freight, should be paid to the defendants in London fourteen days after the ship had sailed from Liverpool in prosecution of the said voyage, and that the payment of the residue, not exceeding 250*l.*, was secured by deposit of the bills of lading for the whole cargo.

3. The Bertie left Liverpool on the 24th June in prosecution of the said voyage, laden with a general cargo, a portion of which, consisting of Government stores, was loaded in the foreholds, and whilst at Port Said and Jeddah she shipped about 170 tons of coal on deck for the English Government, to be carried to Suakim, and, whilst in prosecution of her voyage from Jeddah to Suakim, at about 10.15 a.m. on the 18th July, and more than fourteen days after leaving Liverpool, the Bertie, by reason of dangers and accidents of the seas and navigation, took the ground forward.

4. The place where the Bertie grounded is a coral reef of new growth, and is soft and pulpy, and the Bertie was only on it for about 12 feet from the stem, the rest of her length being water-borne, and the Bertie was in no danger whilst so lying with her bows on the reef, and could, by jettisoning the cargo from the deck and foreholds, have got off without assistance; but having regard to the vicinity of Suakim, which was only about twenty miles off, and the probability that the Government stores were urgently needed, the master of the Bertie despatched his chief officer with a boat's crew to Suakim to communicate the circumstances to the senior naval officer there.

5. By the directions of the senior naval officer, the Dilston Castle, which is a Government transport, and under his orders, was despatched for the purpose of salving the Government stores. She was piloted to the place where the Bertie was aground by the chief officer of the Bertie, and all the subsequent operations were performed under the directions of the naval officers, who, with a party of seamen belonging to the Royal Navy, and some Egyptians, had been sent on board the Dilston Castle for the purpose.

6. The defendants admit that attempts were made to tow the Bertie off as alleged, but say the ropes and chains were carried away by the Dilston Castle jerking at them instead of keeping a steady strain upon them as she should have done. They also admit that a considerable quantity of Government stores, but nothing else, out of the foreholds of the Bertie were transshipped to the Dilston Castle alongside.

7. At about 5 p.m. on the 21st July the Bertie, having been lightened forward by the discharge of the said stores, came off the reef without assistance, the Dilston Castle at the time not having steam up to work her main engines, and not being in a position to render any assistance.

8. The Bertie afterwards, and as soon as the Dilston Castle was ready to get under weigh, proceeded herself under steam to Suakim, where she delivered the Government stores remaining on board.

9. While the said alleged services were being performed the weather was fine, and the sea smooth, and neither vessel was in any danger.

10. The services were such as the Dilston Castle was bound to render as a Government transport, and under the terms of her agreement with the Government, and were not services for which the defendants were liable to pay salvage.

11. If the defendants had jettisoned the Government stores from the foreholds they would have got off the reef much sooner, and before the arrival of the Dilston Castle, and there was, and would have been, more than enough cargo left on board undamaged to secure the payment of the residue of the freight.

12. The Bertie was examined after arriving in Suakim, and was found to have sustained no material damage.

(a) Reported by J. P. ASPINALL and BUTLER ASPINALL, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

13. The defendants further say the value of the Bertie at the time of the said alleged services was 14,000*l.* and no more.

14. The defendants further say that the plaintiffs, the owners of the Dilston Castle, are unable to maintain this action by reason of having no interest at risk in the ship at the time and under the circumstances under which the said services were rendered.

By the terms of the charter-party under which the Dilston Castle was working, it was provided (inter alia) that the master should in all respects comply with the Regulations for Her Majesty's Transport Service. Art. 35 of the Regulations for Her Majesty's Transport Service provides as follows:

A "transport" being a ship wholly engaged by Government either on monthly pay or for the execution of a special service, the rate of hire is to represent merely the charge for her use as a ship complete and ready for sea as defined by art. 36, and manned in accordance with art. 42. The vessel will be employed in the conveyance of troops, horses, or other animals, stores, or as a hospital ship, or in any other way that may be ordered, and the place of fitting will be decided on acceptance. When necessary, steam transports will be required to tow other vessels.

Sir Walter Phillimore and Barnes for the plaintiffs.—The services were meritorious salvage services, and should be amply rewarded. The defendants have failed to establish the defence that the services were rendered to the cargo, and not to the ship. The fact that the Dilston Castle was under charter to the Government, and bound to obey the orders of Government officers, does not preclude the plaintiffs from claiming salvage. In the case of The Nile (33 L. T. Rep. N. S. 66; L. Rep. 4 A. & E. 449; 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 11), salvage was awarded under precisely similar circumstances. The effect of the transport regulations is only to make towage in the ordinary sense of the word obligatory on transports, and it was never contemplated that transports were to be exposed to perils in rendering salvage services which are wholly unconnected with transport duties.

C. Hall, Q.C. and Dr. Raikes for the defendants.—The case of The Nile (ubi sup.) is not in point. The defendants in that case admitted their liability, and the only question before the court was the apportionment of the accepted tender. The services here were not rendered to the ship, but to the cargo, and therefore the shipowners are not liable. The services were performed under the direction of naval officers by naval seamen, and were only beneficial to the Government stores. Neither vessel was exposed to risk, and, moreover, by the transport regulations it is expressly provided that, when necessary, transports will be required to tow other vessels. If so, the Dilston Castle was only doing what she was bound to do under the charter, and is entitled to no salvage.

Barnes in reply.

Sir JAMES HANNEN.—I am of opinion that the plaintiffs are entitled to recover. The case of The Nile (ubi sup.) is a direct authority on the point, and, even if it were not an authority binding on me, I entirely assent to it. It appears to me that the plaintiffs' vessel was hired by the Government for certain purposes, which did not include the rendering of salvage services to other vessels. Mr. Hall's argument mainly rests on the clause in the Regulations for Her Majesty's Transport Service, that, when necessary, the vessel employed is to tow other vessels; but I think it perfectly clear that that only means to tow in the ordinary sense of the word—i.e., to remove a vessel from one place to another. It does not mean that the vessel is to be used for the purpose of towing another vessel out of a place of danger, when by so doing she will be exposing herself to risk. Mr. Hall says that the Government would be justified in ordering a vessel to incur that risk. I, however, think the true view of the matter is correctly expressed by Sir Robert Phillimore in The Nile (ubi sup.), when he says that the vessel employed is so far under the control of the officer in charge that she would not be justified in going off and rendering salvage services without his permission, but that if he permits her to go and render the services, she is entitled to salvage remuneration.

I therefore now come to the consideration of the services which were rendered. First I have to deal with the ship. The cargo must be eliminated altogether, and the question is, what is the value of the ship and the freight which have been salved. The value of the ship is agreed upon at 14,000*l.*, and then comes the question of the freight. If the owners of the ship were already out of pocket by their expenditure, then the enabling them to earn their freight has saved them from that loss, although upon the balance of accounts it may be, as alleged, that there would not be any profit. Therefore the freight must be taken into account. According to the evidence, the services had to be rendered by passing through a difficult and intricate passage, exposing the salving vessel to some risk. Can it be doubted that the Bertie resting upon this coral reef was in a position of considerable danger? That is plain, and I need not enlarge upon it. It is true that there was nothing to show that the weather was bad; but of course there is always risk of the weather changing, and it was of great importance that this vessel should be rescued from the perilous position in which she was as soon as possible. There were several efforts made to get her off, all of which were unsuccessful while the cargo remained on board. It is plain that the cargo was removed at the instance of the captain of the Bertie for the purpose of saving his ship, and not only for saving the cargo. That was effected by lightening her, and transporting the cargo to the Dilston Castle. As has been observed, the bringing of a great number of men to assist in carrying out the transport of the cargo was in itself a meritorious salvage service. In addition to that, I think there was considerable straining to the vessel and her engines. All these are circumstances which are to be taken into account. I come to the conclusion that valuable services were rendered, and, taking into consideration the values in question, I award 560*l.* I should have said that I consider myself limited to the remuneration of the owners, officers, and crew of the vessel, and am not dealing with the services rendered by the men of the Royal Navy.

THE RINGDOVE. (a)

Master's disbursements—Maritime lien—Service of writ—Bill of sale—Admiralty Court Act 1861, s. 10.

The master of a ship has a maritime lien for disbursements made on behalf of the ship, and therefore his claim has priority over that of a bonâ fide purchaser.

THIS was a motion in objection to the registrar's report in an action in rem for master's wages and disbursements against the barque Ringdove.

The writ, by which the plaintiff claimed 550*l.* for wages, disbursements, and damages for wrongful dismissal, was issued on Dec. 17, 1885. The writ and warrant of arrest were both served on Dec. 21, and an appearance was subsequently entered for her owners.

On Dec. 17, the date of the issue of the writ, the ship was transferred by bill of sale from her then owners to the West of England Shipping Company Limited, and the bill of sale was registered on Dec. 22. The validity of this transfer was disputed by the plaintiff. But this contention was waived for the purposes of the present motion.

Before the delivery of a defence the amount of the plaintiff's claim was by order referred to the registrar, and on March 24, 1886, the registrar reported that 410*l.* 0*s.* 7*d.* was due in respect of wages and disbursements.

The plaintiff now moved to vary the report by a direction from the judge that the disbursements should be disallowed on the ground that there was no maritime lien in respect thereof.

The Admiralty Court Act 1861 (24 Vict. c. 10):

Sect. 5. The High Court of Admiralty shall have jurisdiction over any claim for necessaries supplied to any ship elsewhere than in the port to which the ship belongs, unless it is shown to the satisfaction of the court that at the time of the institution of the cause any owner or part owner of the ship is domiciled in England or Wales.

Sect. 10. The High Court of Admiralty shall have jurisdiction over any claim by a seaman of any ship for wages earned by him on board the ship, whether the same be due under a special contract or otherwise, and also over any claim by the master of any ship for wages earned by him on board the ship, and for disbursements made by him on account of the ship.

May 11.—J. P. Aspinall, for the defendants, in support of the motion.—The master of a ship has no maritime lien for disbursements, and if so his claim against the ship only commences from the date of the service of the writ. As that was on the 21st Dec., and the ship had previously been transferred to the present defendants on Dec. 17, his claim in respect of disbursements is postponed to the rights of the defendants. In support of the contention that there is no maritime lien for master's disbursements, reliance is placed upon the recent decision of the Court of Appeal in the case of The Heinrich Bjorn (5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 391; 10 P. Div. 44; 52 L. T. Rep. N. S. 560), that 3 & 4 Vict. c. 65, s. 6, does not create a maritime lien in respect of necessaries supplied to a foreign ship. The ratio decidendi of that case was that the words the "High Court of Admiralty shall have jurisdiction" do not of themselves create a maritime lien. These words merely mean what they say, viz., give jurisdiction, and do nothing more. In the same way it has been decided that sect. 5 of the Admiralty Court Act 1861, giving jurisdiction over claims for necessaries supplied to any ship, does not create a maritime lien. If so, sect. 10, upon which the plaintiff relies, does not create a maritime lien:

The Heinrich Bjorn (ubi sup.);
The Pacific, 10 L. T. Rep. N. S. 541; 2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 21; Br. & Lush. 243;
The Troubadour, 2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 475; 16 L. T. Rep. N. S. 156; L. Rep. 1 A. & E. 302;
The Two Ellens, 26 L. T. Rep. N. S. 1; 1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 208; L. Rep. 4 P. C. 161.

True it is, that there have been decisions of this court holding that a maritime lien does exist in respect of disbursements, but it is contended that the ratio decidendi of those cases is virtually condemned by the recent case of the Court of Appeal in The Heinrich Bjorn (ubi sup.). The fact that wages and disbursements are dealt with in the same section, and that a maritime lien exists in the case of wages, is no argument that the Legislature intended to create a maritime lien in respect of disbursements. In the recent case of The Beeswing (53 L. T. Rep. N. S. 554; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 484) the Master of the Rolls in express terms doubted the existence of a maritime lien in respect of disbursements. It is therefore submitted that, as no maritime lien existed independently of the statute, and that as the statute has not created one, the purchasers of this ship have priority over the master's claim for disbursements. [Sir JAMES HANNEN referred to the cases of The Mary Ann, L. Rep. 1 A. & E. 8; 2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 294; 13 L. T. Rep. N. S. 384; and The Rio Tinto, 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 224; 50 L. T. Rep. N. S. 461; 9 App. Cas. 356.] The Privy Council in The Rio Tinto (ubi sup.) did not assent to the point actually decided in The Mary Ann (ubi sup.), but only expressed approval of certain passages in Dr. Lushington's judgment. As to the decision in The Mary Ann (ubi sup.) it is submitted that it cannot be supported since the case of The Heinrich Bjorn (ubi sup.). It cannot be contended that sect. 191 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 created a maritime lien in respect of disbursements. All that section did was to enable shipowners in an action for master's wages to have all accounts between them and the master settled. It was a section in favour of shipowners, and was never meant to create a maritime lien. Assuming that no maritime lien exists, then the plaintiff's right against the ship only comes into existence on the institution of the action. It is submitted that the institution of the action is the service of the writ, and not the issue of the writ. The right against a ship only commences from the time when her owners can have notice that a right is alleged. The mere issue of a writ gives them no notice of a claim. It is the service of the writ which is the first indication they have of the claim. If the right dates from the issue of the writ, a material man might issue a writ and keep it in his drawer for months without serving it, and thereby prejudice the position of innocent purchasers for value. Prior to the Judicature Act there was no writ, and the institution of the suit was the service of the warrant. Therefore, when the judges in the old cases speak of the institution of the suit, they refer to the service of the warrant:

The Pacific (ubi sup.);
The Troubadour (ubi sup.);
The Two Ellens (ubi sup.).

In support of this contention I rely on the practice with regard to garnishee orders, by which the order must be served before the judgment creditor acquires any right of priority:

Re Stanhope Silkstone Colliery Company, 11 Ch. Div. 160; 40 L. T. Rep. N. S. 204;
Hamer v. Giles, 41 L. T. Rep. N. S. 270; 11 Ch. Div. 942.

If, therefore, the plaintiff acquired no right against the vessel until the service of the writ, which was not till the 21st Dec., then the defendants have a prior right because their right commenced on the day on which the bill of sale was made, viz., the 17th Dec. It is the date of the bill of sale, and not of its registration, which is the commencement of the purchaser's title. The registration is merely required to enable the public to ascertain who are the owners of a ship, before they have any transactions in respect of her. The property in a ship passes by bill of sale, even though it is not registered:

Stapleton v. Haymen, 2 H. & C. 918;
The Two Ellens (ubi sup.)

Sir Walter Phillimore (with him Dr. Raikes), for the plaintiff, contra.—This court and the Court of Appeal have for many years recognised the existence of a maritime lien in respect of a master's disbursements. The decision in The Heinrich Bjorn (ubi sup.) is confined to necessaries, and is therefore no authority on the present point. Moreover, that decision was greatly based upon the fact that the decisions as to a maritime lien in respect of necessaries were not uniform. Whereas, in the case of disbursements, the courts have unanimously for a long series of years decided in favour of a maritime lien:

The Mary Ann, 13 L. T. Rep. N. S. 384; L. Rep. 1 A. & E. 8; 2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 294;
The Feronia, 17 L. T. Rep. N. S. 619; L. Rep. 2 A. & E. 65; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 54;
The Fairport, 8 P. Div. 48; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 62;
The Limerick, 34 L. T. Rep. N. S. 708; 1 P. Div. 411; 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 206;
Re Rio Grande Do Sul Company, 36 L. T. Rep. N. S. 603; 5 Ch. Div. 282; 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 424.

The reasoning of Dr. Lushington in The Mary Ann (ubi sup.) is based upon the existence of a maritime lien, independently of the jurisdiction conferred by the Act of Parliament. If so, The Heinrich Bjorn (ubi sup.) is really an authority in favour of the plaintiff. It is also to be noticed that sect. 10 of the Admiralty Court Act 1861 couples wages and disbursements together, and as there is undoubtedly a maritime lien in respect of wages, there are strong reasons for inferring that the Legislature meant to create a maritime lien in respect of masters' disbursements. The observations of the Master of the Rolls in The Beeswing (ubi sup.) are merely obiter. Even assuming there is no maritime lien, the plaintiff has priority because his right dates from the institution of the action, which was on the 17th Dec., whereas the defendants' right only commences from the 22nd Dec., the day on which the bill of sale was registered. By the rules of the Supreme Court actions are to be commenced by a writ of summons. A subsequent step, after the action has been instituted, is the service of the writ. If so, the plaintiff's right dates from the issuing of the writ, which is prior to the transfer of the ship. By virtue of the Statute of Limitations a right of action is kept alive by the issue of a writ, provided it be issued, but not served, before the times prescribed by the statute have elapsed.

Aspinall in reply.

Cur. adv. vult.

July 13.—Sir JAMES HANNEN.—This is an action in rem by the master of the Ringdove for wages and disbursements. It is alleged that on the day on which this action was commenced a bill of sale was executed by the then owners to a company called the West of England Shipping Company Limited. The bona fides of this transfer is disputed by the plaintiff, and it would be necessary, before judgment could be pronounced for the company, that their claim should be investigated before the registrar, but for the present purpose the validity of the transfer is assumed, and the question now to be determined is, whether the master of a ship has a lien on the vessel for disbursements which is to be preferred to the claim of a purchaser. This point was distinctly raised in the case of The Mary Ann (ubi sup.) in 1865, when Dr. Lushington held that the master's claim for disbursements was to be preferred to that of the mortgagee. This decision, in which the learned judge went very carefully into the history of the law of masters' liens, has been acted on ever since. It was followed by Sir Robert Phillimore in The Feronia (ubi sup.) and in The Fairport (ubi sup.), and the law, as then declared, was recognised by James, L.J. and the present Master of the Rolls in The Rio Grande do Sul Steamship Company Limited (ubi sup.). But it is said that The Mary Ann (ubi sup.) is overruled by The Heinrich Bjorn (ubi sup.). That case, however, related only to necessaries, and decided that the 3 & 4 Vict. c. 65, s. 6, did not confer a maritime lien for necessaries supplied to a foreign ship. The Mary Ann (ubi sup.) related to masters' wages and disbursements which are covered by the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, s. 191, and the Admiralty Court Act 1861, s. 10, Dr. Lushington there clearly laid down the principle which has been confirmed by the Court of Appeal in the Heinrich Bjorn, viz., that a maritime lien springs into existence with the circumstances which give rise to it, as damage, salvage, wages, and that the mere conferring of jurisdiction on the Admiralty Court in a particular manner does not carry with it a maritime lien. But Dr. Lushington came to the conclusion that "a master claiming for disbursements was to be preferred to the mortgagee, because, before the Act of 1861, his claim for disbursements was entitled to a similar preference in the only case where the court could take cognisance, namely, in the case of a set-off." I cannot say that this reasoning is altogether satisfactory to my mind, but finding, as I do, that the case of The Mary Ann has been followed by my learned predecessor, and has been sanctioned by the Court of Appeal, I do not feel at liberty to disregard its authority. It has now been assumed for twenty years that a master has a lien for disbursements. Innumerable accounts have been settled on that footing, and many existing liabilities for disbursements have been incurred by masters on the faith of their having a lien for them. I think that it would be a misfortune if masters were deprived of the security they now possess, and I must decline the responsibility of altering to their detriment the law as it has been so long administered. My judgment will be for the plaintiff, with costs.

THE NAPLES. (a)

Collision—Practice—Costs—Inevitable accident—Admissions in the reply.

Where the plaintiffs in a collision action admit in their reply that the collision was not occasioned by the defendants' negligence, and offer to consent to a decree of inevitable accident, the defendants, in the absence of special circumstances, are entitled to judgment with costs.

THIS was a collision action in rem, instituted by the owners of the steamship Ruperra against the owners of the steamship Naples.

The collision occurred in Aden Harbour on the 3rd July 1885. The Ruperra was at anchor, and the collision was due to the Naples dragging her anchor and drifting into the Ruperra. The defendants in their defence alleged that the cause of the Ruperra dragging her anchor was a hurricane, and that the collision was, so far as they were concerned, an inevitable accident. The plaintiffs by their reply admitted that the collision was caused by an inevitable accident, and consented to a decree that the collision was so caused.

The defendants now moved for judgment upon the admissions in the reply, and for an order that the plaintiffs should pay the costs of the action and of the motion.

J. P. Aspinall, for the defendants, in support of the motion.—The reply is in effect an admission that the action should never have been brought, and if so, it would be unjust to make the defendants pay the costs occasioned by an action which never ought to have been instituted.

Sims Williams, for the plaintiffs, contra.—It is admitted that the defendants are entitled to judgment, but it is contended, on the authority of the Privy Council in The Marpesia (26 L. T. Rep. N. S. 333; L. Rep. 4 P. C. 212; 1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 261), that where a collision is found to be the result of inevitable accident, the court should make no order as to costs. Although the Court of Appeal in The Condor (40 L. T. Rep. N. S. 442; 4 P. Div. 115; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 115) departed from this principle, Sir Robert Phillimore in the subsequent case of The Buckhurst (46 L. T. Rep. N. S. 108; 6 P. Div. 152; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 484) followed the old practice. The plaintiffs were justified in instituting the present action. The fact of one vessel drifting into another at anchor is a strong primâ facie case of negligence.

Aspinall was not called upon to reply.

(a) Reported by J. P. ASPINALL and BUTLER ASPINALL, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

BUTT, J.—I am of opinion that in this case there must be judgment for the defendants with costs. I have been asked by the counsel for the plaintiffs not to give the defendants their costs, and this request has been based on the authorities which have been cited. I do not think they apply to this case, for the rule that each side shall bear their own costs when a collision is the result of inevitable accident has only been applied when there has been a judgment to that effect on a finding of fact. Moreover, in the case of The Condor (ubi sup.), the Court of Appeal decided against there being different practices in different branches of the High Court, and James, L.J. there clearly laid it down that the practice should be the same in all divisions of the High Court. With that opinion I entirely agree. I think it would be altogether wrong that this court should deal with questions of costs differently to other divisions. No doubt, in special circumstances, it might be reasonable to depart from this otherwise general rule. Some of the circumstances of this case have been disclosed, and it appears that there was a hurricane blowing at the time of the collision. I should have thought that that circumstance would of itself be notice to the plaintiffs that the collision was probably not occasioned by the defendants' negligence. The plaintiffs, however, chose to bring this action, but have, on consideration, come to the conclusion that they were mistaken in charging the defendants with negligence. In these circumstances I can see no reason why the plaintiffs should not pay the costs, and in so ordering I think I shall be acting in accordance with the practice laid down by the Court of Appeal.

the said Attorney-General stating to the court that he waives his right to a trial at bar, the venue herein be changed to Middlesex."

The action was brought by the plaintiff, Thomas Dixon, part owner of the steamship Isle of Hastings, on behalf of himself and others the owners of the said steamship, against Thomas Henry Farrer, Knight, Secretary to the Board of Trade, to recover damages for the wrongful detention of the ship by the defendant.

The statement of claim stated that whilst the said ship was in the port of North Shields, laden with a cargo of coals and coke, in all respects seaworthy, and about to proceed to sea on a voyage thence to Alexandria, the defendant, by a person claiming to be duly appointed in that behalf, wrongfully and improperly, and without reasonable and probable cause, detained or caused the detention and survey of the ship on the alleged ground that she was overladen, whereas in fact she was not overladen, but was safely and properly laden, and the defendant wrongfully and improperly required and caused a large quantity of cargo to be discharged out of the ship before releasing her and allowing her to proceed on her voyage; and after the ship had been detained, surveyed, and lightened, the defendant wrongfully and improperly continued to detain the ship until the payment or deposit of a sum of 10*l*., and compelled the plaintiff thereby to pay or deposit that sum alleged to be due in respect of the detention and survey; by reason of which things the plaintiff was deprived of the use of the ship, and sustained loss.

The plaintiff laid the venue at Newcastle-on-Tyne.

The defendant, in his defence, said that he was being sued as Secretary to the Board of Trade, pursuant to the 10th section of the Merchant Shipping Act 1876, and not otherwise; and that on the 27th Feb. 1886 the Isle of Hastings, being a British ship, and in the port of North Shields, was, under the 6th section of the said Act, provisionally detained by the detaining officer appointed under that section, who then had reason to believe, on the complaint of two persons, that she was unsafe within the meaning of the said Act by reason of overloading; that the ship was lightened by the removal of cargo to such an extent that on the 1st March she was no longer unsafe, and was released; and that it had not appeared, and could not be made to appear, that there was not on the 27th Feb. 1886 reasonable and probable cause by reason of the condition of the ship or the act or default of the owner, for the provisional detention of the ship.

Issue having been joined, a master's order, made at the plaintiff's instance, that the action should be tried by a special jury, was on appeal confirmed by Smith, J. on the 1st July, and by a Divisional Court on the 22nd July.

On the 19th July, however, the Attorney-General moved ex parte on behalf of the defendant that the venue should be changed from Newcastle to Middlesex, on the ground that it being a case in which the Crown was interested and was entitled to demand as of right a trial at bar, the Attorney-General had a right, under the 46th section of the Crown Suits Act 1865 (28 & 29 Vict. c. 104), on waiving his right to a trial at bar, to an order for a change of venue. This motion the Court granted, but subsequently stayed the order on the ground that no notice had been given to the plaintiffs, and ordered that notice should be given. Notice of motion in the above-mentioned terms was then given, and this was the motion which now came on for argument.

Sir Walter Phillimore (with him J. P. Aspinall), for the plaintiff, against the motion. — An action brought under the Merchant Shipping Act 1876 to recover damages for the unlawful detention of the plaintiff's ship is not an action in which Her Majesty's Attorney-General on behalf of the Crown is entitled to demand, as of right, a trial at bar, so as to bring it within the operation of the 46th section of the Crown Suits Act 1865 (28 & 29 Vict. c. 104). (a) The Crown has only a right to a trial at bar where it is interested in its own right or in respect of its ancient and hereditary revenues and prerogatives, and not where its interest is merely that of one of the executive departments of the State. The provision on which the action is founded (the Merchant Shipping Act 1876, 39 & 40 Vict. c. 80, s. 10) is simply, "If it appears that there was not reasonable and probable cause by reason of the condition of the ship, or the act or default of the owner, for the provisional detention of the ship, the Board of Trade shall be liable to pay to the owner of the ship his costs of and incidental to the detention and survey of the ship, and also compensation for any loss or damage sustained by him by reason of the detention or survey;" and it is further directed that, "an action for any costs or compensation payable by the Board of Trade under this section may be brought against the secretary thereof by his official title as if he were a corporation sole." It cannot be contended upon the authorities that, under these circumstances, the Crown is entitled as of right to a trial at bar. In Coke's Institutes, part 2, p. 424, it is said, with reference to ch. xxx. of the second Statute of Westminster, appointing justices of assize: "Albeit this Act be general, yet a nisi prius shall not be granted where the king is party, or where the matter toucheth the right of the king, without a special warrant from the king, or the assent of the king's attourney." In such cases, therefore, the King was entitled to a trial at bar, and the words used are applicable only to cases in which the King is personally interested or his property affected. Again, in Rowe v. Brenton (8 B. & C. 737), the Attorney-General appeared and suggested that the Crown was interested in the result of the cause, and demanded a trial at bar as a matter of right, the court not having power to grant a writ of nisi prius where the King is party, or where the matter toucheth the right of the King, and a trial at bar was granted on the authority of 2 Inst. 424, and Fitz. N. B. 241a, tit. "Procedendo;" but there the property which was the subject-matter in the action belonged to the Crown in right of the Duchy of Cornwall, that is, in right of its ancient and hereditary revenues. Then, in Frith v. The Queen (26 L. T. Rep. N. S. 774; L. Rep. 7 Ex. 365), a suppliant by petition of right sought to recover from the Crown a debt alleged to have become due to the person whom he represented, from the sovereign of Oude before that province was annexed in 1856 to the territories of the East India Company, and it was held that, assuming the East India Company became liable to pay the debt by reason of the annexation of the province, the Secretary of State in Council for India, and not the Crown, was, by the provisions of the Act for the better Government of India 1858, the person against whom the suppliant must seek his remedy. That Act provided, in the same terms aa those used in the 10th section of the Merchant Shipping Act 1876, "That the Secretary of State in Council should and might sue and be sued as well in India as in England, by the name of the Secretary of State in Council as a body corporate," and it was decided that there was a distinction between the Crown and the Secretary of State for India, and that the remedy therefore was not by petition of right against the Crown, but by action against the Secretary of State. The proper procedure in cases to which the Crown is a party is now to be found in the Petitions of Right Act 1860 (23 & 24 Vict. c. 34). In Thompson v. Farrer (47 L. T. Rep. N. S. 117; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 562; 9 Q. B. Div. 372), which was a precisely similar action, there was no attempt to set up this claim.

(a) The 46th section of the Crown Suits Act 1865 (28 & 29 Vict. c. 104) provides that: Where a cause in which Her Majesty's Attorney-General on behalf of the Crown is entitled to demand, as of right, a trial at bar is at any time depending in any of Her Majesty's Superior Courts of Law at Westminster, whether instituted before or instituted after the commencement of this Act, and the Attorney-General states to the court that he waives his right to a trial at bar, the following provisions shall have effect: (1.) The court, on the application of the Attorney-General, shall change the venue to any county in which the Attorney-General elects to have the cause tried.

The Attorney-General, Sir Charles Russell, Q.C. (with him R. S. Wright and Danckwerts) for the defendant.—The right to change the venue was probably given because there might be cases such as the present where the action could not properly be tried where the venue was originally laid, and the Act therefore gives the Attorney-General a discretion assuming that he will not exercise it unreasonably. There is no force in the argument that the Crown can only claim a trial at bar where its personal property is affected, because the Crown property has now ceased to exist in its old form, and has been transferred to the Executive, no personal interest in it remaining in the Sovereign. Nevertheless the Crown retains its old right to intervene in actions respecting it. In the Attorney-General and the Humber Conservancy Commissioners v. Constable (4 Ex. Div. 172) it was held that the prerogative of the Crown to intervene in actions affecting the rights or revenue of the Sovereign had not been affected by the Judicature Acts, and the action as it concerned Her Majesty's revenue and privileges was transferred from the Chancery to the Exchequer Division on that ground. Kelly, C.B., in his judgment in that case, says that "it was settled law before the Judicature Acts that it was part of the prerogative of the Crown that the Sovereign was entitled to be an actor in any litigation affecting the rights of the Crown, and to determine in the Court of Exchequer any matter in which the Crown is interested." The relation of the Crown to Crown property is now determined by 1 & 2 Vict. c. 2, but the material point at issue is as to the relation of the Crown to the annual grants of money made by Parliament. This appears clearly in the case of Reg v. The Lords Commissioners of the Treasury. (26 L. T. Rep. N. S. 64; L. Rep. 7 Q. B. 387). In his judgment in that case Cockburn, C.J. says: "Therefore the question comes to be, whether the Lords Commissioners of the Treasury, when this money gets into their hands, are bound to apply it as the servants of the Crown, or as the servants of Parliament who vote the money. Independently of authority I think there is no doubt whatever we must look upon them as servants of the Crown. The money is voted by Parliament as a supply to the Crown; ways and means are found with a view of furnishing the necessary funds for making that supply effectual. It is true that the money is appropriated te a specific purpose, and it is true that the money can only be appropriated to the purpose so specified in the Appropriation Acts. It is also true, as pointed out by Mr. Gorst, that the particular mode of obtaining the money is also prescribed by statute. It is not a supply to be at once handed over to the Crown, but it is a supply to be got at by a certain specified process, and it is true that the Crown must issue warrants or orders under the sign-manual to enable the Lords Commissioners of the Treasury to have this money paid to them. But nevertheless, when the money is paid, I can entertain no doubt that it is paid to the Lords of the Treasury as servants of the Crown." The money out of which compensation would be paid in case the plaintiff recovers in this action is granted in the same way:

> The Merchant Shipping (Expenses) Act 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 55), ss. 3, 5, 10.

The money is granted to the Queen, and the officials who receive it receive it as servants of the Queen and not of Parliament. The Queen therefore is interested as having to pay the money. The contrary contention is untenable, because, if it were correct, the Crown would only be able to demand a trial at bar in cases dealing with the Queen's private savings or the revenues of the Duchy of Lancaster. The right was never so restricted. In Lord Bellamont's case (2 Salk. 625) the Attorney-General moved for a trial at bar in an action against the Governor of New York for matter done by him as governor, and it was granted because the King defended it. Again, in Buron v. Denman (2 Ex. 167) an action was brought against a naval commander, because, when engaged in the suppression of the slave trade, and in the liberation of British subjects detained as slaves, he took military possession of a barracoon belonging to the plaintiff, who was a Spaniard engaged in the slave trade, and fired it and carried away his slaves and liberated them, and here it appears (1 Ex. 769) that a rule was granted for a trial at bar. These cases are exactly analogous to the present. The right is broadly stated in Tidd's Practice, vol. 2, 9th edit., p. 748, without reservation in these terms: "When the Crown is immediately concerned the Attorney-General has a right to demand a trial at bar (1 Str. 52. 644; 2 Str. 816; 1 Barnard K.B. 88, S. C.)." It was allowed in Rowe v. Brenton (8 B. & C. 737; 3 Mann. & R. 133-364; 449-532); and in Paddock v. Forrester (1 M. & G. 583). Tindal, C.J. says shortly: "The Attorney-General has certified that the Crown is interested in the matter in dispute between these parties, and has stated that Her Majesty does not consent that any writ of nisi prius shall issue in this case. We are therefore bound to direct that the cause shall be tried at bar. (a) It is submitted, on these authorities, that the Crown is immediately concerned in the present case, and would have been entitled to demand a trial at bar.

Cur. adv. vult.

Aug. 12.—FIELD, J.—This is an action brought by a shipowner against the department of State called the Board of Trade, to recover compensation for an alleged improper seizure without reasonable and probable cause of his ship, and the shipowner laid the venue at Newcastle, where he resides. The action is brought pursuant to s. 10 of 39 & 40 Vict. c. 80, against the Secretary of the Board of Trade, "by his official title as if he were a corporation sole." Upon that Her Majesty's Attorney-General appeared personally, and came here in accordance with the procedure in these matters, and alleging an interest in the Crown in the suit, prayed that the venue might be charged from Newcastle to Middlesex. We at the moment assented to his prayer, understanding that the plaintiff had had notice of the application. But it appeared doubtful that he had received it in time. At all events he was very desirous of having the question considered, and in consequence of a doubt, or, I will not say a doubt, but in consequence of an expression of reserve used by Lord Bramwell, then speaking as a Lord Justice of Appeal in the Attorney-General v. Crossman (14 L. T. Rep. N. S. 856; 4 H. & C. 568; L. Rep. 1 Ex. 381), my brother and I thought it desirable that the matter should be discussed, particularly also having regard to the various changes in procedure which have taken place during the last few years, in order to see whether or not anything had occurred to deprive the Crown of its originally undoubted right to a trial at bar.

Now the present state of the matter is this: In 1865 an Act of Parliament was passed for the purpose of improving and regulating the procedure in Crown suits, and to deal with various matters on the Exchequer side and causes in the Exchequer, but also in sect. 46 to deal with other matters, of which this is one, and the enactment there is this: Where a cause in which Her Majesty's Attorney-General on behalf of the Crown is entitled to demand as of right a trial at bar is at any time depending in any of the Superior Courts, and the Attorney-General states to the court that he waives his right to a trial at bar, amongst other things the court, on the application of the Attorney-General, shall change the venue to any county in which the Attorney-General elects to have the case tried. The Attorney-General did, in pursuance of this Act, appear, and he asserted that he was entitled on behalf of the Crown to demand as of right a trial at bar upon the ground of the Crown's interest in the litigation, and further, that he waived that right, and then he applied to us to change the venue to the county of Middlesex. Now the language of the Act is very clear and plain. It is, that whenever Her Majesty's Attorney-General is entitled to demand a trial at bar as of right, the consequence follows that he has a right to have, and the courts shall give him, the venue which he elects to have. It is new legislation, although based to some extent on the old prerogative. The question, therefore, is a very plain one here, and a very simple one. It is whether or not this is a cause in which Her Majesty's Attorney-General is entitled to demand a trial at bar as a matter of right. That question has to be decided in the ordinary way, by authority and precedent, and the views which writers of text-books and judges and others have held with regard to the matter. Now originally, every cause, as is well known, was a trial at bar; that is, until the writ of nisi prius was introduced by the Statute of Westminster all cases were tried before the bench at Westminster, and the Statute of Westminster was passed for the purpose of relieving the subject of this. It had been the practice grown up before this statute was passed for the justices in eyre to try any cause that was ready for trial, before the return of the distringas, and it was commonly done except in all important cases. (a) Then the Statute of Westminster the Second (13 Edw. 1, c. 30) gave the subject a writ of nisi prius which enabled him to try a cause if any of Her Majesty's judges should first come into the county where the venue was laid. (b)

(a) In that case, in addition to the cases above cited, reference was made to 1 Ventr. 74; Rex v. Hales, 2 Str. 816; Reg. v. Banks, 2 Salk. 651; 6 Mod. 245; Cowp. 161.

(a) The ancient justices in eyre, justiciarii in itinere, were directed by Magna Charta, c. 12, to be sent into every county once a year, to take or receive the verdict of the jurors or recognitors in certain actions then called recognitions or assizes, the most difficult of which they were directed to adjourn into the Court of Common Pleas, to be there determined: (Steph. Comm. Bk. V. c. V., 8th ed. vol. 3, p. 352.) The jury process of distringas juratores, in the award of which the proviso of nisi prius used to be inserted, was abolished by 15 & 16 Vict. c. 76, s. 104: (Ibid. p. 355.)

(b) On reference to Tidd's Practice, p. 747, we find the following passage:—"Before the Statute Westminster 2 (13 Edw. 1, c. 30) civil causes were tried either at the bar, before all the judges of the court, in term time; or where of no great moment before the justices in eyre; a practice having very early obtained of continuing the cause from term to term, in the court above, provided the justices in eyre did not previously come into the county where the cause of action arose; and if it happened that they arrived there within that interval then the cause was removed from the jurisdiction of the justices at Westminster to that of the justices in eyre." The Statute of Westminster the Second having abolished the justices in eyre, and having substituted justices of assize, gave them jurisdiction in certain specified cases. The statute is in Latin, and it is worthy of notice to point out a seeming error in translation, which appears both in Ruffhead's edition of the Statutes, and also in Coke's Institutes, part 2, p. 421. The statute, after providing for the appointment of justices of assize, proceeds: "Atterminentur inquisitiones capiendæ de transgressionibus placitatis coram justitiariis de utroque banco, nisi ita enormis sit transgressio quod magna indigeat examinatione." According to Ruffhead's Statutes, and in Coke's Institutes, the meaning of this passage is that, "inquisitions of trespass shall be determined before the justices of both benches, except the trespass be so heinous that it shall require great examination." In other words, inquisitions of trespass, which are not so heinous as to require great examination, are to be determined by the justices of either bench, and not as one would have expected by the justices of assize. When it is remembered that the statute is providing what causes shall be tried by the justices of assize, it would seem that the correct translation is, "Inquisitions to be taken of trespasses, pleaded before the justices of either bench, shall be determined by the justices of assize, unless the trespass be so heinous that it requires great examination." This is the translation given in Tidd's

But that statute did not bind the Crown, and the consequence of that was and is, that the Crown retained its prerogative of trying at Westminster. It was not bound by the statute at all, and although the subject had the right the Crown was not bound by it, and this state of things has existed, the Crown retaining its right. The practice has been uniform from that time down to the present for the Crown to be entitled as of right to a trial at bar, and the mode in which that right has been asserted has invariably been that which Her Majesty's Attorney-General on this occasion pursued, namely, by appearing in court and stating that the Crown has an interest in the suit and claiming to have a trial at bar, or, as in this case, waiving the right to his trial at bar, but asking to have the venue changed.

Now the cases are very numerous. The Crown may be interested because it is a party to the suit, or it may be prior in interest; or, though the litigation is between two subjects, still the Crown may be interested, and may therefore claim an interest as though it were actually a party. First of all, there are the cases in which the Crown was a party, and the most important case of that kind was the case of R. v. Hales (2 Str. 816). That was a case in which the Crown was a party because it was an indictment—a Crown case. In that case the prosecutor was a private prosecutor, but the Crown thought right to intervene, and the court allowed the intervention and gave the Crown accordingly a trial at bar. Therefore, although the Crown was nominally a party, and was not the actual person prosecuting, still being a party the court gave the Crown the right on that occasion. Then there is another case in which the Crown was suing in a civil matter. That was a case of R. v. Webb (1 Siderfin, p. 412). In that case the Crown was suing for the embezzlement of stores by a servant, and there it was distinctly laid down, and has been followed ever since, and was afterwards affirmed by the court in the case of the Attorney-General v. Churchill (8 M. & W. 171), that the Crown has the right, as the King's prerogative, to try his personal actions where he pleases. Now, in all these cases the Crown was actually a party to the litigation, either in its capacity of a body corporate suing for money belonging to it, or else acting as the prosecutor. Then, in a case of the Attorney-General v. Barker (26 L. T. Rep. N. S. 34; L. Rep. 7 Ex. 177), the Crown was the lady of the manor, and in that case also the Crown was held entitled and had its trial at the bar. Again, the same thing occurred in the Attorney-General to the Prince of Wales v. Crossman (14 L. T. Rep. N. S. 856; 4 H. & C. 568; L. Rep. 1 Ex. 381) in more modern times. This was the case which induced my brother and myself to consider the matter, because in that case the venue was changed in the mode which the Attorney-General suggested, but the court expressly changed the venue upon the ordinary ground of convenience, and reserved the question whether or not the Crown as of right could change the venue, Lord Bramwell saying that before he held that, he should like to take time for further consideration, and that was the reason why we also took further time to consider. These cases to which I have adverted are all of them cases in which the Crown was a party by right. But the right of the Crown is not limited to cases of this description, because the Crown may by alleging an interest intervene in litigation between subjects. Now, I entertain some little doubt myself whether it is sufficient for the Crown merely to allege an interest. My brother's judgment, which I am going to read immediately, seems to think it is sufficient. I should entertain a good deal of doubt about that, and I asked the Attorney-General the question, and he answered me frankly that he was not prepared to say that the prerogative of the Crown went to that extent, and that the court could not inquire into the question for the purpose of seeing whether or not there was such an interest in the Crown, not for the purpose of going into the proof of it, but as reasonably entitling the Crown to the privilege. Now, the cases in which this has happened are first of all, the well-known case of Rowe v. Brenton (8 B. & C. 737), in which the defendant was a lessee under the Crown as Duke of Cornwall; and another case of Paddock v. Forrester (1 M. & G. 583), in which the defendant justified under a demise by the Crown. In both these cases there was a personal interest in the Crown in the suit. Property of the Crown was sought to be affected by it, and the Attorney-General claimed and exercised, without objection, his right to a trial at bar.

Then comes the question which we have to decide in this case. It was argued on behalf of the plaintiff, that that was the true limit of the Crown's right, and that the Crown had only the right to a trial at bar where its own personal interest was concerned, its property, its personal feelings, or its personal matters connected with its revenue, and that these were the only matters in which the Crown could have this right. But this argument is absolutely inconsistent with Lord Bellamont's case (2 Salk. 625), in which an action being brought against the Governor of New York at that time, the Crown intervened, claiming the right to defend its own servant, and a trial at bar was granted. Again, in a more recent case, of Buron v. Denman, an action was brought against the captain of one of Her Majesty's ships. The Ministers of the Crown adopted and ratified the act of the defendant, and in that case a trial at bar was claimed and had. Therefore, in those cases, the privilege of the Crown seems to have been carried further, and beyond the limit that it was argued on behalf of the plaintiff was the true limit. Since then the Crown Suits Act has been passed. That Act was passed in 1865, and clearly recognises the privilege or prerogative of the Crown. Therefore, whatever might have been the state of things if the matter had, as it were, lapsed, it is perfectly clear that the Legislature has recognised and fortified the privilege of the Crown to a change of venue. It also seems reasonably clear, from the case of Attorney-General and The Humber Conservancy Commis- sioners v. Constable (4 Ex. Div. 172), that the Judicature Act has not interfered with the prerogative of the Crown in this respect. Therefore, the only question now to consider is, whether or not this is an action in which the Crown may as of right claim a trial at bar. It is, in the first place, a personal action, and therefore comes within the case of Reg. v. Webb. It is also an action to which I think the Crown is a direct party, because the Crown is being sued, in truth, by means of its department, that is, the President and Council of the Board of Trade and Foreign Plantations, the President being a Minister of Her Majesty and the other persons acting under him being her servants. Further, it seems to me quite clear the case falls within the principle of Lord Bellamont's case, and that the Crown has a right to intervene to defend the acts of its servants. Independently of that, the Attorney-General put the case upon a third ground, which seems to me to further remove any doubt, and that is, that by sect. 39 of the Merchant Shipping Act, if the plaintiff shall succeed, the compensation which he is to be entitled to is to be provided for out of the moneys annually voted to Her Majesty by Parliament; and then the Attorney-General referred to the case of Reg. v. The Lords Commissioners of the Treasury (26 L. T. Rep. N. S. 64; L. Rep. 7 Q. B. 387) to establish a point which is very clear, namely, that all the moneys which are paid into Her Majesty's Treasury are Her Majesty's moneys, and therefore the Crown has a direct interest in protecting them. That is the view I take of the case, and I therefore think this motion must be granted with costs.

Practice, p. 747, and in support of it is to be noticed the fact that the inquisitions here referred to "are not to be so heinous as to require great examination." The meaning of this qualification would seem to be, that such inquisitions are to be tried by the justices of the bench, whereas the matters which are not of such moment are to be determined before the justices of assize. On reference to the statute it will be found that a distinction is throughout drawn between simple matters and matters of difficulty, the latter being confined to the justices of the bench.—ED.

FIELD, J. then read the written judgment of WILLS, J.—This is an action brought under the provisions of the 39 & 40 Vict. c. 80, s. 10, against the Secretary of the Board of Trade, to recover compensation for the detention alleged to be without reasonable and probable cause of a sea-going vessel, by an officer of the Board of Trade, acting under sect. 6 of the same Act. The Attorney-General, stating that the Crown is interested in the litigation, and that he waives a trial at bar, claims under the provisions of the Crown Suits Act 1865 (28 & 29 Vict. c. 104), s. 46, that the court shall order the venue to be changed from Newcastle to Middlesex, as the county in which he elects to have the cause tried. As by the terms of sect. 46, the Attorney-General is entitled to the order he claims in any cause in which the Crown is entitled to demand as of right a trial at bar, the only matter for inquiry is whether the Crown is so entitled in the present case. In consequence of a doubt expressed by Bramwell, B. in The Attorney-General of the Prince of Wales v. Crossman (4 H. & C. 573; 14 L. T. Rep. N. S. 856; L. Rep. 1 Ex. 381) as to the extent of the rights of the Crown in such a matter, we took time to consider our judgment. The authorities seem to me conclusive both that where the Crown is interested in litigation, whether civil or criminal, the Attorney-General is entitled to demand a trial at bar, and that he is entitled to it on his statement that the Crown is interested, and without more. The right on the part of the Crown to a trial at bar has been treated in argument, as I think erroneously, as a branch of the Royal prerogative, and, as clear notions on any question affecting the peculiar rights of the Crown are of great importance, I will presently state my views of the origin and history of the right; but of its existence I have no doubt. It is said in Chitty's Practice (12th edit. p. 376) to be the right of the Crown in cases in which the Crown is "actually and immediately interested"—adjectives or adverbs are parts of speech which require to be watched, and in my opinion the adverbs here used are misleading. In Rowe v. Brenton (8 B. & C. 737) a trial at bar was granted in a case in which the defendant justified alleged mining trespasses under a grant from the Duchy of Cornwall, there being at that time no Prince of Wales, so that the duchy was in the hands of the Crown. The Crown would not have been bound by the judgment between the parties, and was only interested in the sense in which any subject is interested in a decision of the courts upon points of law or fact which are identical with those which may govern his own rights either with respect to one of the parties to the suit in question or as to strangers. In Brown v. Lord Granville (1 Harr. & Woll. 270) a trial at bar was granted on an allegation by the Attorney-General that the rights of the King in respect of the Duchy of Lancaster would come in question; in Paddock v. Forrester (1 M. &. G. 583), upon a justification by the defendant under grants from the Crown of the right of getting coal. In all these cases, which are not an exhaustive list, but examples of a class of cases in which a trial at bar has been always granted, the interest of the Crown, however substantial, is indirect and not immediate. No private person would be considered "as interested" in the litigation so as to make him either a necessary or even a possible party to the contest. In Lord Bellamont's case (2 Salk. 625) the report is very short; and the roll, if it exist in the Record Office, is very difficult to find, (a) but I think it sufficiently appears from the short report in Salkeld that Lord Bellamont was sued by some one for some act done by him as Governor of New York, and that the Crown undertook his defence upon that ground. In Buron v. Denman (reported on points of law in 2 Ex. 167), the defendant was sued for acts done by him as a naval officer in command of one of Her Majesty's ships, and the Crown took upon itself his defence. A trial at bar was had—I have caused the roll to be inspected to see whether the trial at bar was had on the demand of the Attorney-General, but it is incomplete, and stops at the award of venire. I believe, however, that there is no doubt the trial at bar was had on the demand of the Attorney-General. In Lord Bellamont's case it is so stated in the report. In neither of these cases can the interest of the Crown be termed "actual" or "immediate." In R. v. Hales (2 Str. 816), which was a prosecution for a misdemeanour, a trial at bar was refused to the Attorney-General applying on behalf of a private prosecutor, but granted on his afterwards stating that the Crown had taken up the prosecution. In Reg. v. Castro (30 L. T. Rep. N. S. 320; L. Rep. 9 Q. B. 350) a trial at bar was granted on the demand of the Attorney-General prosecuting on behalf of the Crown.

These cases make it abundantly clear that the right to a trial at bar exists when demanded on behalf of the Crown in cases in which either the private rights of the Sovereign in respect of the estates and property to which, or to the fruits of which, the Sovereign is entitled for the personal use or advantage of the Sovereign are in question, and in cases in which the Sovereign intervenes in a different capacity, as the head of the State, and authorised by the Constitution, through the responsible Ministers of the Crown, to enforce law and good government, and to afford the protection of the State to public officers sued in courts of justice for acts done by them in the discharge of their duties as servants of the Crown. It is clear also that the right applies equally to civil cases and to criminal prosecutions which have been removed by certiorari to the Queen's Bench, and which have so become subject to many of the incidents of civil trials. It would be more accurate to say that the right exists in cases in which the Crown is interested than to confine it to cases in which the interest of the Crown is actual and immediate; probably what the learned writer meant was to exclude cases of ordinary criminal prosecution, in which the Crown is merely the nominal prosecutor, the distinction between which and cases in which the prosecution is really that of the Crown, is illustrated and emphasised by the two branches of the case of R. v. Hales (2 Str. 816), where the trial at bar was refused to the Attorney-General as counsel for a private prosecutor, but awarded on his application on behalf of the Crown. In my opinion it is sufficient for the Attorney-General to allege, or surmise (in the language of the older cases) that the Crown is interested in the litigation. As a matter of propriety or courtesy he may state the ground for the allegation, but I do not think he is bound to do so, or that the court can require it of him. This appears to me to be abundantly clear on the authorities. If, however, it were necessary to consider how the Crown is interested in the present action, I think it clear, as I have pointed out, that the right exists where the interest of the Crown is that of protecting the servants of the great departments of State, or of conducting such litigation as may be necessary for the efficient conduct of the public administration. The case of Reg. v. The Lords Commissioners of the Treasury (26 L. T. Rep. N. S. 64; L. Rep. 7 Q. B. 387) shows that in the most correct legal phraseology the Commissioners of the Treasury, though administering funds whose destination is fixed by Act of Parliament, are servants of the Crown, and not of Parliament, or of the public, nor to be otherwise described than as servants of the Crown. The same proposition must hold of the persons serving in other public departments. I proceed to inquire what is the origin of the right in question, and I think it clear that it is in no accurate sense a branch of the Royal prerogative, but the survival of a very ancient state of things, in which the Crown in respect of litigation stood upon the same footing as the subject, the difference between the position of the Crown and the subject in the present day being due simply to the fact that the Crown not being expressly named or included by necessary implication in the various statutes which have since then modified the rights of the subject, still retains rights which have been taken away from the subject. That this is so as regards the right of the Crown to determine the place of trial of an information filed by the Attorney-General on behalf of the Crown is shown by the learned and interesting judgment of the Court of Exchequer in R. v. Lord Churchill (8 M. & W. 171, 193), where it is laid down that the right to lay the venue where the actor in the litigation chose was once common to Crown and subject; that the right of the subject to keep the venue where it was once laid has been modified by legislation, whereas that of the Crown has not because the statutes in question do not bind the Crown, and where the alleged prerogative right of the Crown to change the venue at its option was denied, and a rule for that purpose which had originally been granted absolute in the first instance on the motion of the Attorney-General was, after full argument and time taken to consider the judgment, discharged. In the same way trials at bar were anciently had in all causes whether at the suit of the Crown or of an individual. But by the second Statute of Westminster, c. 30, a writ of nisi prius was granted, the effect of which was to deprive the subject of the right to a trial at bar. In Bacon's Abr. tit. "Trial" (E) it is said: "By the Statute of Westminster the Second, c. 30, trials at bar which were before had in all causes were confined to such causes as by reason of the greatness or variety of the matters in question require a more solemn examination." Again: "The Attorney-General may pray a trial at bar in any civil cause wherein the King is interested, for, as the Statute of Nisi Prius does not extend to him, the King has a right to try every civil cause in which he is interested at bar." See also Com. Dig. tit. "Trial" (C, a.) In Paddock v. Forrester (1 M. & G. 583) a trial at bar was ordered on the suggestion of the Attorney-General that the Crown was interested in the matter of dispute. The Lord Chief Justice (Tindal, C.J.) said: "The Attorney-General has stated that Her Majesty does not consent that any writ of nisi prius shall issue in this case. We are therefore bound to direct that the cause shall be tried at bar." In a note to that case the learned editor says: "As the King is not named in the second Statute of Westminster, c. 30, which gives the writ of nisi prius, a nisi prius is not grantable where the King is a party or where the matter in question in an action between subjects touches the King's right, without a special warrant from the King or the assent of the Attorney-General" (p. 586, note a). See also Rex v. Jolliffe (4 T. R. 285, 288, and 292).

This view of the origin of the right now unde consideration is of much historical interest. I am, speaking for myself, convinced that in the early periods of our legal history the Sovereign sued exactly as the subject did—by the same writ, per attornatum suum, with the same process and the same incidents in all respects. The right of the Crown to bring an action in the ordinary sense of that word, and as distinguished from an information, was affirmed in Bradlaugh v. Clarke (48 L. T. Rep. N. S. 681; 8 App. Cas. 354), and in the course of that case two precedents of such actions from the Year Books of the reign of Henry IV. were cited: (see p. 375.) It was not called to the notice of their Lordships that the Placita de Quo Warranto are full of such actions; the records there set forth, many of them at full length, date from the 6th Edw. 1 to the 4th of Edw. 3. Some years ago I had occasion to examine them very carefully and exhaustively with reference to this question, and I am able to say that there are very numerous entries——certainly hundreds, if not more—of records of common actions brought by the Sovereign against subjects, wholly undistinguishable in the manner of origination, and in every stage of procedure, and every other incident connected with it from an ordinary action between subject and subject, and I have found none which indicate any difference in the mode of suit or incidents of process or trial between actions by the King and actions by the subject. There are entries of the same character—though, from their abbreviated nature, less conclusive—in the Abbreviatio Placitorum, which carry the evidence back to the reign of Richard I. The right of the Crown, therefore, to a trial at bar is, in my opinion, not a branch of the prerogative, but an interesting and instructive survival in the case of the Crown of a state of things in which, at an early period of our legal history, the rights of the Crown and subject were identical. The mode in which the Crown can claim a trial at bar, on the other hand, affords a genuine instance of prerogative right, for the Crown can here do what no subject ever could do; the Attorney-General can allege on his own authority that the Crown is interested in the subject-matter of the suit, and upon such allegation can intervene, and having done so can claim the ancient right of both Crown and subject, which for many centuries has been taken away from the subject by legislation.

COURT OF APPEAL.

June 1 and 2, 1886.

(Before the Lord Chancellor (Herschell), Lord Esher, M.R., and Fry, L.J., assisted by Nautical Assessors.)

The Main. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM THE ADMIRALTY DIVISION.

Collision—Overtaking and overtaken ships—Flare-up light—Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, arts. 3, 11, 20.

Where one of two ships is abaft the beam of the other in such a position that the hinder ship cannot see the side lights of the leading ship, and the former is going at a greater speed than the latter, and getting nearer to her, the latter is a "ship which is being overtaken by another" within the meaning of art. 11 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, even though the hinder ship broadens on her quarter; and she is in such circumstances bound to show a stern light in sufficient time to enable the other, by the exercise of reasonable precautions, to avoid risk of collision.

The Reiher (45 L. T. Rep. N. S. 767; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 478) overruled.

(a) Reported by J. P. Aspinall and Butler Aspinall, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

This was an appeal by the defendants in an action brought by the owners of cargo on the barque Kalaja against the steamship Main for the loss thereof by collision. Sir James Hannen found the defendants' steamship Main alone to blame for the collision.

The collision occurred in the North Atlantic about 1.30 a.m. on the 14th April 1885, and in consequence thereof the Kalaja and her cargo were totally lost. The owners of the cargo thereupon instituted the present action in rem against the owners of the Main.

The facts alleged on behalf of the plaintiffs were as follows:—At about 1 a.m. on the 14th April 1885, the barque Kalaja, of 666 tons register, laden with the plaintiffs' cargo, was in the Atlantic Ocean, in the course of a voyage from Jamaica to Havre. The wind was a moderate breeze from about W.N.W. to N.W., and the weather was fine and clear, but rather overcast. The Kalaja was making about four to five knots, steering about N.E. by E. ¼ E. true. Her side lights were duly exhibited, and burning brightly, and a good look-out was being kept. In these circumstances those on the Kalaja saw the masthead light of the Main distant about five miles, and bearing about three points on the port quarter. In about a quarter of an hour the Main's green light was also seen on the port quarter, and the Main continued to approach, showing her masthead and green lights; but when she was on the Kalaja's port quarter, distant about two cables, she was seen to be altering her course to starboard, and although the helm of the Kalaja was immediately ported, and the Main loudly hailed, she came on, and with her stem struck the port quarter of the Kalaja, causing the Kalaja to sink in a few minutes.

The facts alleged on behalf of the defendants were as follows:—Shortly before 1.20 a.m. on the 14th April 1885, the steamship Main of 1737 tons nett was in the Atlantic Ocean, on a voyage from New York to Southampton. The weather was dark and cloudy, and the Main was making about thirteen knots, steering E. ¼ N. true. Her regulation lights were duly exhibited, and burning brightly, and a good look-out was being kept. In these circumstances two dim lights, red and white respectively, of a vessel which proved to be the barque Kalaja, were seen bearing from one to two points on the starboard bow, and distant in fact about 500 yards, but apparently further. The helm of the Main was immediately ported, and, the red light of the Kalaja becoming more distinct, the helm was hard-a-ported, and her engines were immediately after stopped and reversed full speed astern, but the two vessels came into collision, the stem of the Main striking the port quarter of the Kalaja.

The defendants (inter alia) charged the defendants with a breach of art 11 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, in failing to exhibit a white flare-up light over the stern.

It was suggested in evidence that the white light seen on the Kalaja was the light of a lantern hung in the galley.

Art. 3 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, provides that the red and green side lights are respectively to show an "uniform and unbroken light over an arc of the horizon of ten points of the compass so fixed as to throw the light from right ahead to two points abaft the beam."

Art. 11. A ship which is being overtaken by another shall show from her stern to such last-mentioned ship a white light or a flare-up light.

Art. 20. Notwithstanding anything contained in any preceding article, every ship, whether a sailing ship or a steamship, overtaking any other, shall keep out of the way of the overtaken ship.

Aug. 7, 1885.—The case came on for trial before Sir James Hannen, assisted by Trinity Masters.

Sir Walter Phillimore and Dr. Raikes for the plaintiffs.

J. P. Aspinall and L. Pyke for the defendants.

Sir James Hannen.—I cannot say that this case is by any means free from difficulty; but, upon a consideration of the whole evidence, we have come to the conclusion that the steamer is alone to blame. The steamer was steering E. ¼ N. true, and the Kalaja was steering E.N.E. ¼ N. Therefore, their courses were slightly converging. The Kalaja first of all saw the white light of the steamer at a distance which is estimated at five miles, and, taking the chief mate's evidence, three points on her port quarter. That continued for about a quarter of an hour. He says he watched it himself, and after a quarter of an hour he saw the green light bearing three and a half points. Then he says he thought there was no risk, and that the Main would pass them by going clear on their port side. Next, he says that he saw the green light twelve or thirteen minutes before there was any alteration, and that the steamer was three and a half points, but that ultimately she got broader, up to six or seven points. His evidence, therefore, is that, seeing the white light and afterwards the green, the two lights continued to broaden on his port quarter. I have gone through the evidence of the other witnesses, and, though they vary slightly about it, there is nothing that is inconsistent with that statement, and we accept, in a general way, the true view of the facts to be that those lights did continue to broaden on the port quarter of the Kalaja. Taking that view of the facts, I am of opinion that the Kalaja was not an overtaken vessel. If it be true, as is contended, that the alleged overtaking vessel is constantly broadening on the quarter of the alleged overtaken vessel, then those terms do not apply; and, that being so, it was not the duty of the Kalaja to show a light at her stern. At the same time, though I have stated this as my view of the facts and the law, shared in so far as the facts are concerned by the Trinity Brethren, I cannot but see that the steamer would have been greatly assisted had there been a light shown at the stern, and it is in the highest degree probable that if a light had been so shown this accident would not have happened.

I now must deal with the steamer. She first sees a white light, or, rather, a white glare or white shine, and then a dim red light is seen. I am advised that the seeing of that white shine or reflection of a white light ought to have indicated to those on board the steamer that they were in close proximity to another vessel. It seems to me to be more than probable that the officer in charge of the Main did, on first seeing this red light, take it to belong to a vessel sailing close-hauled, and it is with reference to that supposition that I say that, had there been a light shown at the stern, he probably would not have fallen into that error; but, having the red light suddenly presented to him, he did not realise that this white shining, reflected light indicated the close proximity of a vessel, which ought at once to have led him to stop and reverse. Instead of doing that, he, giving himself no time to consider what the red light was, ported his helm, and by so doing brought about a collision. Whereas, if he had not been in such a hurry and confusion, and waited only a short time longer, he would have been able to form an opinion upon the facts which he says he observed, namely, that the red light, which at first was feeble and weak, gradually grew stronger and larger, which should have indicated to him that the Main was an overtaking vessel. Unfortunately, as I have said, he rushed too hastily to the conclusion, that it was a vessel crossing close-hauled, and made the manœuvre which led to the collision; and I am myself disposed to think that the confusion which caused him to do it was caused by there not being a good look-out. I think there are several things that indicate it, and, on the whole, I come rather to the conclusion that there was a bad look-out. I therefore come to the conclusion that there was confusion and uncertainty on the steamer, and that, under the influence of that confusion and uncertainty, time was not taken to form a true judgment of the correct inference to be drawn from the fact that there was a vessel quite close, and that her red light was rapidly becoming brighter, which should have told him the true position of the Kalaja,

From this decision the defendants appealed.

June 1.—Sir Richard Webster, Q.C. and J. P. Aspinall (with them Pyke), for the defendants, in support of the appeal.—The learned President was wrong in finding the Main solely to blame, and should have found the Kalaja solely to blame. By art. 11 of the regulations a ship which is being overtaken by another is bound to show a stern light. On the authority of The Franconia (35 L. T. Rep. N. S. 721; 2 P. Div. 8; 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 295) it is submitted that the Kalaja was an overtaken ship within the meaning of this article. Inasmuch as a duty is imposed on the overtaking ship to keep out of the way of the leading ship, it is only reasonable that she should have due warning to enable her to manœuvre so as to pass clear. As the side lights only show two points abaft the beam, the rule must be applicable in all cases where the hinder ship is overhauling the leading ship from such a position that she is more than two points abaft her beam. If a ship has no notice that there is a vessel ahead of her, she may at any moment alter her course, and so bring about risk of collision, although her original course, if continued, would have taken her clear. The words "risk of collision" were therefore designedly omitted from this article, in order that a light might be exhibited in all cases so as to give the hinder ship ample notice how she ought to manœuvre, and to prevent her innocently bringing about a position of risk. In addition to the authority of The Franconia (ubi sup.), the decisions in the following cases all tend to support the appellants' contention:

The City of Brooklyn, 34 L. T. Rep. N. S. 932; 1 P. Div. 276; 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 230;
The Anglo-Indian, 33 L. T. Rep. N. S. 233; 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 1;
The Breadalbane, 46 L. T. Rep. N. S. 204; 7 P. Div. 186; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 505.

The remarks of the judges in The Peckforton Castle (37 L. T. Rep. N. S. 816; 2 P. Div. 222; 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 533) if opposed to The Franconia (ubi sup.), which is denied, are obiter, and should not be followed. In the present case it is submitted that, on the facts, the Main was not broadening on the Kalaja's quarter. And, even if she did broaden, it was so slight a broaden ing as to necessarily indicate that the Main was approaching in such a way as to be entitled to the assistance of a stern light. If the Main was entitled to notice by the exhibition of a stern light, then her porting was not negligent, and the learned President ought not to have found her look-out was bad.

Sir Walter Phillimore and Dr. Raikes, for the plaintiffs, contra. — The Main was solely to blame for this collision. [The Lord CHANCELLOR (Herschell).—You may take it that the Main was in the wrong. On that we are agreed. But we want to hear you as to whether or no the Kalaja has infringed the regulations.] It is submitted that the Main, had she been keeping a good look-out, had ample materials to enable her to see what the Kalaja was doing. The obligation to show a stern light, under the rule, is only incumbent when the hinder ship is on such a course that if it be continued she will run into the leading ship. The leading ship is not bound to act upon the assumption that the hinder ship will be negligent or will capriciously manœuvre in such a way that no reasonable man would anticipate. Had the Main continued her course, she must have gone clear at a considerable distance from the Kalaja. It is submitted that the remarks of the court as to this question in The Franconia (ubi sup.) were practically overruled in The Peckforton Castle (ubi sup.). In The Franconia (ubi sup.) it was the duty of the Franconia, on either art. 14 or art. 17, to have kept out of the way and hence the observations as to the meaning of an overtaking ship were obiter. [Lord ESHER, M.R.—I do not think so. We certainly said that the overtaking rule had been broken.] The only direct authority on the point is the decision of Sir Robert Phillimore in The Reiher (45 L. T. Rep. N. S. 767; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 478), which has been acted upon for many years. That learned judge says the obligation to show a stern light only arises when there is "ground for an apprehension of danger." Were it otherwise, a vessel navigating crowded waters would practically have to carry a permanent stern light, which is directly contrary to the regulations

Sir Richard Webster, Q.C. in reply.

The LORD CHANCELLOR (Herschell).—This is an appeal from a judgment of the Admiralty Division in a suit between the owners of the cargo on the Kalaja and the owners of the steamship Main. The vessels came into collision, and each alleges that the collision arose from the fault, and the exclusive fault, of the other. Sir James Hannen has found the Main alone to blame. The appellants, the owners of the Main, have taken two points: first, that the Main was not to blame; secondly, that if she was to blame, the Kalaja was also to blame. As regards the first point, we think the judgment of the court below was correct. I do not think it is necessary to go into the circumstances which immediately preceded the collision; but I think, for the reasons given by the learned President, that the Main, when she came near the Kalaja, was guilty of negligent navigation, either in porting when she did, or perhaps in not stopping and reversing much sooner than she did. In either case the conclusion of the learned judge is correct, and we think that on that point the appeal is not well founded.

But then comes the more important question whether the learned judge has properly exonerated the Kalaja from all blame. It is contended on behalf of the appellants that she must be deemed to be in fault by reason of her breach of art. 11 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea (a). It has been held in the case

(a) A decision has recently been given by the Hanseatic Court of Appeal (Hamburg) on art. 5 of the Regulations 1880, which is well worthy of attention. The question for decision was, what lights should a vessel exhibit which has taken the ground, and so put herself out of command. The question is a novel one, and as yet has received no judicial answer in England. In the last edition of Maude and Pollock's Merchant Shipping, p. 590, it is stated that "a ship accidentally aground should, it would seem, exhibit these signals," i.e., the three red lights mentioned in art. 5; and in Marsden's Collisions at Sea, p. 329, it is said, referring to the same article, "Perhaps it would apply to a ship ashore in a fairway." Prior to the provisions of art. 5, Sir Robert Phillimore, in the case of The Industrie (1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 17; L. Rep. 3 A. & E. 303), had to decide in 1871 what was the duty of those in charge of a vessel aground in the fairway of a navigable channel, and laid it down that, apart altogether from the regulations, they were "bound by the general maritime law as administered in this court to take proper means to apprise other vessels of her position." In 1880 art. 5 of the Regulations provided that a steamship, "which from any accident is not under command, should exhibit three red lights in globular lanterns." The Regulations of 1884 contain the same provisions so far as is material to the present case, and therefore the decision of the Hanseatic Court, although based upon the Regulations of 1880, is equally applicable to those of 1884. The facts of the case are very shortly as follows: The steamship John Johnasson took the ground forward on the south side of the river Elbe, and her master, instead of exhibiting three red lights, put up a white light. In her vicinity was a vessel at anchor, which exhibited the usual white riding light. The steamship Etna, while proceeding up river, noticed these two white lights, and at first took them to be the lights of a tow. The helm of the Etna was thereupon ported. On getting nearer it was seen that they were on different vessels, and it was then assumed that they were the riding lights of two vessels at anchor in the fairway. The helm of the Etna was again ported, and of The Khedive (43 L. T. Rep. N. S. 610; 5 App. Cas. 876; 4 Asp. Mar. Law. Cas. 360) that the Merchant Shipping Act of 1873, under which these regulations are made, compels the court to come to the conclusion that a vessel which has infringed the regulations shall be deemed to be in fault; that it is not necessary for the court to consider whether the breach of the regulations in fact contributed to the accident; that if two vessels have come into collision, although that collision be the fault of reckless navigation on the part of one, yet if at the trial it appears that the other vessel was guilty of a breach of one of these regulations, then that vessel must be deemed to be in fault. That is the decision in The Khedive (ubi sup.), the supposed ground, as there stated, of the intention of the Legislature being to enforce obedience to these regulations, which were made for the purpose of preserving life and property at sea, which purpose it was thought would better be effected by laying down certain rules and insisting on their performance, than by leaving those navigating a vessel to the exercise of their own judgment at a moment when it was not likely to be exercised in the calmest and best manner. That is the decision of the House of Lords by which we are bound, and the question we now have to determine is, whether there has been a breach by the Kalaja of art. 11 of the regulations. That article provides that a ship which is being overtaken by another ship shall show from her stern a white or flare-up light. That is an article introduced in recent times, and was not one of the regulations which existed prior to 1880. Before that time several cases had arisen in which it had been contended that the failure to exhibit a light to a vessel which was overtaking you was a want of reasonable care and skill. But there was no rule on the subject. It was therefore thought expedient not to leave it to the judgment of an officer navigating a vessel which was being overtaken to determine, as a matter of prudence or precaution, whether a stern light should be exhibited, but to lay down an absolute obligation on the overtaken vessel to discharge a duty towards the vessel which was overtaking her, that other vessel being by art. 20 of the regulations bound to keep out of her way. The question therefore is, what is the meaning, under art. 11, of a "ship which is being overtaken by it was not until she was within three or four lengths of the John Johnasson that it was seen that the John Johnasson was aground. The Etna having concluded that the John Johnasson was a vessel at anchor, had determined to pass inside of her under a port helm, but when it was seen that the John Johnasson was ashore on that side of the river towards which the Etna was making under her port helm, her helm was at once starboarded and her engines put full speed astern, but too late to be of avail, and the vessels came into collision. The owners of the John Johnasson thereupon sued the owners of the Etna in the Court of Justice of Hamburg, and that court, on the 20th May 1886, held the John Johnasson to be free from blame for breach of the regulations. The owners of the Etna thereupon appealed to the Hanseatic Court of Appeal, which decided that art. 5 of the Regulations was applicable to the John Johnasson, and that she was therefore to blame for not exhibiting three red lights. The Court having held the regulations to be applicable to the place of collision proceeded: "The general terms of art. 5 admit of no distinction between vessels which are within or without the fairway marked by buoys. The question is what is, within the meaning of art. 5, a vessel which in consequence of some accident is not under command. The application of the same regulation to vessels not under command and vessels laying, picking up, or searching for cables, must not be allowed to influence our definition of the expression 'not under command.' It would be better to have different regulations for the two cases, as in the English law, which provides that vessels laying, picking up, or searching for cables shall carry two red lights with a white one between them. A vessel 'not under command' is evidently not in so bad a position as one totally incapacitated to act as a vessel, and therefore the expression 'not under command' would not be applicable to sunken vessels. In ordinary language no one would define a sunken vessel as one 'not under command.' On the contrary, a vessel 'not under command' within the meaning of art. 5 is one which cannot comply with the regulations for preventing collisions by being prevented from executing the manœuvres which would be required of her if in a seaworthy condition. . . . This interpretation is supported by the provision in paragraph (c) of art. 5, that vessels not under command whilst not making way shall not carry side lights, whereas when making way they must carry them. This provision shows that art. 5 refers only to vessels which to judge by their outward appearance seem capable of obeying the regulations, and which only on account of 'not being under command' are prevented from so doing. The English regulations explain this still clearer, for at the end of art. 5 a reference is made to art. 27, specifying the signals to be made by ships in distress and requiring assistance. . . . The meaning of art. 5 would certainly be too limited if a vessel were to be regarded as outside it which is prevented from executing manœuvres by having touched the ground. In the Elbe especially there are many instances of vessels slightly touching the ground in the fairway, so that they can only get off on the tide rising. There is no imaginable reason for not considering them as 'not under command' within the meaning of art. 5, and, as already pointed out, this article makes no difference between the fairway and the remaining water, and therefore the article must be applicable to vessels aground outside the fairway. Stranded vessels, however, ought to be placed on a level with sunken ones. It is, however, different with the John Johnasson. Although ashore with her stem, still she lay with the greater part of her length in deep water, and could get afloat with the high tide. Moreover, in order to keep the ship ashore, and to prevent her sliding off, the pilot considered it necessary to order the engines to be worked ahead. . . . The liberty of her movements was consequently only so far impeded by reason of her being ashore with her stem, and purposely kept in that position. In these circumstances she ought to have acted as a vessel 'not under command.' . . . It might be urged as justification for exhibiting the anchor light that art. 8 treats of stationary vessels, and art. 5 of drifting vessels not under command. But this contention, which violates the literal meaning of art. 5, is not sufficient. The passing of a vessel at anchor does not entail any danger. It is only necessary to get out of her way at a suitable distance. But to approach a vessel which is not under command whether it is at the moment stationary, or drifting, or making way, is attended with danger, because the approaching vessel is generally unable to judge in what direction the vessel under command is going to move. Prudence therefore requires the approaching vessel to advance slowly and cautiously. This position and the precautions thereby necessitated are according to art. 5 to be intimated to approaching vessels by the exhibition of three red lights. The English authorities, which up to the present have expressed opinions on art. 5, appear to be inclined to accept the above interpretation. Thus in Maude and Pollock, 4th edit. vol 1, p. 590, in reference to art. 5, 'A ship accidentally aground should, it would seem, exhibit these signals.' Marsden, On Collisions at Sea, 2nd edit. p. 329, expresses himself as to art. 5, 'Perhaps it would apply to a ship ashore in a fairway.'" The Court thereupon came to the conclusion that the John Johnasson was to blame for breach of art. 5 of the Regulations in not exhibiting three red lights.—Ed.

another?" It is contended by Sir Richard Webster on behalf of the appellants, that a ship is being overtaken by another within the meaning of the article, and therefore bound to show a light, when another vessel is approaching her in such a position that the other vessel is unable to see her lights. On the other hand, it is contended by Sir Walter Phillimore that a vessel is only overtaking another, and the other vessel overtaken within the meaning of the article, when the course of the sternmost vessel is such that if it be unchanged a collision must ensue. I think the latter is too narrow a construction of the rule. To say that a vessel is not overtaken by another, and that the other is not an overtaking vessel, unless the courses be such that if there be no alteration a collision will ensue, would be a dangerous construction to put, not only on this article, but also on art. 20. It would be specially dangerous in regard to art. 20, because, were that construction put upon it, a vessel being navigated in a perfectly prudent manner might nevertheless come into collision with a vessel ahead of her, because the obligation to show a light would never arise until they were so near, and the collision so imminent, that it would be impossible to prevent it, even when notice of the position of the vessel being overtaken was distinctly given. What, then, is the true construction to be put upon art. 11? To ascertain that we must look at its purpose and its object. The Legislature having laid down that the overtaking vessel must keep out of the way of the vessel she is overtaking, I think it must be taken to have contemplated that the vessel whose duty it is to keep out of the way could not be in a position to discharge that duty unless she were made acquainted with the position of the vessel she is approaching. Until she sees some light from the other vessel, she is in absolute ignorance that any vessel is there at all, and she is at liberty to navigate the ocean as she pleases, so long as she has no reason to believe that another vessel is near. She may keep on her course, or change her course, or perform any manœuvre she pleases, and, unless she receives an intimation that a vessel is ahead of her, there is nothing to guide her as to those manœuvres. It appears to me that the object of this rule was that, where a vessel sees, or ought to see, that another vessel is approaching her, going faster than herself, coming nearer to her, and being navigated on such a course as may ultimately lead to a position of danger, and approaching in such a way that she cannot see the lights of the vessel ahead of her, then the obligation rests upon the vessel which is being overtaken in that sense to show from her stern a white light or flare-up light. This, of course, determines nothing as to the time when the obligation arises to show the light. The obligation does not arise till the vessel which is being overtaken has had an opportunity of seeing that the vessel which is overtaking her is a vessel coming nearer and nearer to her. Although, in point of fact, the other vessel is approaching, yet, until there has been an opportunity of ascertaining whether she is approaching on such a course that she cannot see the lights of the vessel ahead, the duty does not arise. The duty appears to me to arise when a vessel is seen to be thus approaching in reasonable time to afford her an opportunity to discharge her duty of keeping out of the way. This question would never arise unless the two vessels were coming nearer to each other. Extreme cases have been put forward by Sir Walter Phillimore where it would be absurd to show a light, although the other vessel was coming nearer, and on such a course as to prevent her seeing the lights of the vessel ahead—the time would not have come, might perhaps never have come. The question can never arise except when the vessels are coming nearer to one another, and it must be for the vessel which is being overtaken to judge when she is so nearly approached that the reasonable and proper time has arrived for giving a signal to the other by showing from her stern a white or flare-up light. Taking the view we do of this article, it seems to me that we are not laying down any new principle of interpretation of these regulations, because, to my mind, we are only adopting the view taken by the Court of Appeal in the case of The Franconia (ubi sup.) I think it is worth observing that that view of the Court of Appeal, as to the meaning to be attributed to an overtaking and an overtaken ship in what is now art. 20, was enunciated in 1876. The article under consideration was promulgated in 1880, and was therefore subsequent to the view which the Court of Appeal had expressed as to the meaning of an overtaking and overtaken ship. That had been intended, not as an exhaustive definition, but as a good working definition, which I think it is, of an overtaking and an overtaken ship, viz., that if the ships are in such a position, on such a course and at such a distance, that, if it were night, the hinder ship could not see any portion of the side lights of the forward ship, they cannot be said to be crossing ships, and if the hinder of two such ships is going faster than the other, she is an overtaking ship. Now, I think that rule is obviously applicable to the construction of art. 11, and shows that the duty which art. 11 imposes applies to a vessel which is being overtaken in that sense. I also think it is a reasonable construction, having regard to the purpose and object of art. 11, because when the duty is cast on the overtaking ship to keep out of the way of the overtaken ship, it is only reasonable to expect that the vessel, which is to do nothing but keep her course, should give in reasonable time an intimation to the other of her presence, so that the overtaking vessel may not manœuvre in the dark in ignorance that a vessel is in her immediate neighbourhood. I do not see any better rule that could be laid down as to what is an overtaking and overtaken ship within the meaning of art. 11 than that to which I have adverted. I do not think it will be found in practice to be an inconvenient rule, because it will only apply, as I have pointed out, when a vessel has approached within such a distance of the other as to make it reasonable that the signal should be given.

In the present case, if this is a sound rule, it is obvious that the Kalaja must be deemed to be in fault. If that is the meaning of the article, it is clear that she was an overtaken vessel, and that therefore it became her duty to show a light to intimate her presence to the Main. That duty was undoubtedly neglected because she never showed a light at all. We have not to determine whether she did it too late, because she never did it at all, and gave no intimation of her presence until the vessels were in close proximity. I think the present case shows the expediency of enforcing such a rule, because the learned President himself is of opinion that the steamer would have been greatly assisted had there been a light shown at the stern, and also thinks it to be in the highest degree probable that if there had been such a light this accident would never have happened. I think this shows that the construction we are putting on the article is a construction which is expedient as well as sound, because undoubtedly, if you impose the obligation on the hinder vessel of keeping out of the way, it must inevitably be that accidents of this kind will happen unless some intimation be given to the vessel coming up astern that there is a vessel ahead of her. I think upon these grounds that the judgment of the court below must be varied, and that both vessels must be held to blame.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—The real question in this case is, what is the construction of art. 11, and therefore it is that the case is important beyond the effect of it in the particular instance. These rules are divided into two classes. There are certain rules which are to determine the conduct of two vessels on the assumption that they see each other, and all the rules as to the conduct of vessels in the daytime assume that they see each other. These rules are enacted to prevent hesitation and to prescribe to each vessel what she shall do under certain circumstances when she sees another vessel. But the rules which apply to lights, are rules which are only applicable at night or in the dark, and are enacted for the purpose of enabling vessels, so far as can be, to see each other and to know each other's position just as if it were daylight. Then, where by reason of the lights they know their position, the rules as to navigation apply in the same way as in daytime. Therefore the object of all rules as to lights is to show each vessel where the other is. When the rules, as originally made, came to be put into practice, it was found that there was one position of affairs which the rules did not provide for, and that was the position where one vessel was overtaking another in such a way that she could not see the lights of the vessel in front of her. In these circumstances the overtaking vessel could not know the position of the other, because she had no opportunity of seeing her lights. This was the difficulty which was to be overcome by art. 11. When you see what the difficulty is, and then see the terms of the rule, the two together lead you to the correct construction of the rule. Where the vessel which is coming up behind cannot see the lights of the other, she is the same as if she were on the open sea without anything near her. She has then no duty towards anyone but herself, and her officers have no duty towards anybody but their owners. Therefore it is wrong to follow the argument of Sir Walter Phillimore, and say that a vessel has no right to deviate from her course, or that she is guilty of negligence if she alters her course out of her track. If that lengthens her voyage it may be a neglect of duty which the officers owe to their owners but not to the ship. Therefore, if the hindermost ship is in such a position that she has no means of knowing that there is another ship in front of her, you cannot say that any alteration on her part is negligence towards that ship, because she has a perfect right, if there be no other ship near, to do as she pleases. It has been pointed out in the argument that she may at any moment, for various good reasons, have to alter her course very considerably; but I wish to go this length and say that, even if she altered her course out of mere caprice, she would neglect no duty if she could not know there was any other ship in the neighbourhood. If that is so, what must be the true interpretation of the rule? It would seem that, in order to avoid the difficulty to which I have referred, you must say that where the leading ship has the opportunity of seeing that the other ship is in such a position that she sees, or ought to see, that the other ship is going faster than she is, and coming nearer to her in such a position that the leading ship must know that she cannot see her lights, then she knows that the hinder ship is in the very difficulty which this rule is intended to obviate, and that she herself is in the position under the rule which obliges her to show a light over the stern. If she does not show such a light under those circumstances, she has broken the rule. And if she has not so acted as to give the other ship the notice this rule requires, what is there to prevent the other ship doing precisely what she likes? Now, when is the hinder ship in this position? It would seem that she is in this position so long as she cannot have the opportunity of seeing the side lights of the ship which is before her. But that in itself is not enough; she must be going faster than the other ship, and, by reason of that, getting nearer to her. These three circumstances constitute the position which makes the rule applicable. It is said that, even though these three circumstances exist, nevertheless the rule is not applicable unless the vessel is coming on such a course as will bring her into danger of collision. Therefore it is said that if she is crossing the track of the other ship, and within the area of obscurity as to lights, although crossing is coming nearer, the rule does not apply. But that overlooks the fact that although she is crossing, yet she is in fact coming nearer; she has the right, and may, if she please, alter her course, and so come dangerously near to the vessel in front of her. I think the rule laid down in The Franconia (ubi sup.) is a good working rule by which to determine which of the two ships is the overtaken and which is the overtaking, and I abide by it. I have the satisfaction of stating that I have consulted our nautical assessors, not by way of giving us advice on this point, because that they cannot do, and I have the satisfaction of learning from them that they, as nautical men, think that interpretation of the rule will lead to valuable and reasonable results. Therefore, I take it that that is the definition, although not an exhaustive one, of an overtaken and an overtaking ship. It is not exhaustive, because there may be other conditions which would constitute an overtaken and an overtaking ship, and I do not desire to exclude the possibility of such other conditions arising. In the case in question one is an overtaken ship and the other an overtaking ship. Then the overtaken ship has to show a light. There is nothing in the rule which determines the time at which the light is to be shown. What follows? Why, of course, according to all the ordinary rules of construction, it must be shown within a reasonable time. In a reasonable time with regard to what? What you want to do is to take away from the following ship the liberty of action which she would otherwise have. It seems to me that the light must be shown at a reasonable time before the following vessel is brought into a position of danger, in order that she may know where the leading ship is, and so avoid putting herself into a position where there might be probable danger of collision. Therefore I think the time is a reasonable time before the following vessel will be brought into a position of danger. Whether the light has been shown within a reasonable time or not must be in each particular case a question for the nautical assessors. In this case the question does not arise, because this vessel never showed a light at all.

Therefore, assuming that the learned President is right in his inference of fact, I cannot agree with his decision. His inference of fact is that the lights continued to broaden on the port quarter, and then he lays it down that if the light is constantly broadening on the quarter the rule does not apply. Now, assuming that these lights were broadening, it does not appear to me to be right to say that because they are broadening the rule does not apply. That overlooks the liberty of the overtaking vessel to change her course. I may say that in this case I give my judgment upon the supposition that these lights were broadening. I am told that it is very doubtful whether the learned President has not in fact drawn an erroneous conclusion; but nevertheless our decision is upon the assumption that the learned President is right in saying that the lights were constantly broadening. That does not seem to me to affect the question, and I stand by the rule laid down in The Franconia (ubi sup.). I cannot agree with the contention that that was a mere dictum, because I believe that the principle upon which that case was decided was to say that the vessels were respectively overtaken and overtaking vessels because they were within the terms of the rule. I have failed to understand the hesitation, or doubt, or criticism of the learned judges in the subsequent case of The Peckforton Castle (ubi sup.). I cannot understand what their objection was, and I do not think they have stated it. With regard to the case of The Reiher (ubi sup.), I, of course, after what I have said, cannot agree with the rule of construction there laid down by the learned judge. That rule, as there enunciated, introduces a limitation upon the rule we have laid down, which limitation does not exist in the rule. Whether that case was rightly decided on the facts is immaterial, but with its principle of construction we cannot agree, as it is inconsistent with the judgment we are now giving. I therefore think that the proper judgment is that both these vessels are to blame—the Kalaja for breach of the regulations, and the Main for careless navigation. The consequence is that there can be no costs of this litigation, either in the Admiralty Court or here.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR (Herschell).—I desire to add that I quite agree with what the Master of the Rolls has said about the case of the Reiher (ubi sup.). I think the interpretation there put on the article adds to it words of qualification which are not to be found in the article.

FRY, L.J.—I quite agree. The question we have to determine arises on the construction of art. 11 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea. That article is one which regulates the conduct of a ship at night. The terms of the article have nothing to do with daytime, and the article is part of a series of articles which regulate the lights to be carried by ships. Now, a ship being overtaken by another is bound to show a light. It appears to me that a ship which is being overtaken by another must mean a ship towards which another ship is coming at a greater pace than herself, and going in such a direction as to be approaching her. But that definition is not enough to determine whether she is an overtaken ship or not. We must further inquire what is to be the position of one ship to the other, in order to bring them within the category of overtaking and overtaken ships. It appears to me that the answer to that inquiry is to be found in the regulations themselves. Preceding regulations provide that every sea-going ship shall carry lights which cover twenty points of the horizon. That leaves a region in which the lights exhibited do not operate. Now art. 11 is one which is introducing an additional light, and what is more reasonable than that that light should be introduced for the purpose of giving notice to a vessel within that area which is not covered by the other lights. It is very probable that the new light was intended to apply to that new region not covered by the other lights. Taking that view, it appears to me that one vessel may be said to be overtaking another when she is within the region not covered by the red and green lights, and when she is nearing the other. But I am far from thinking that this case is not determined by authority. The case of The Franconia (ubi sup.) determines what is an overtaking vessel. That decision was based on the 17th article of the regulations then in force. It is said that the definition was obiter, but I think it was part of a chain of reasoning by which the court came to a conclusion in that case. I therefore think, notwithstanding the view expressed by this court in The Peckforton Castle (ubi sup.), that this case is really determined by The Franconia (ubi sup.). That being the view which I take of the article, there is no further question, because there can be no doubt that in the present case the Main was within the area not covered by the red and green lights of the Kalaja. The Main was an approaching ship, and therefore she was an overtaking ship, and the Kalaja was an overtaken ship. The Kalaja, not having shown a white or flare-up light, infringed the regulations, and conduced in all probability to this unfortunate collision. For these reasons I concur with the judgment of the noble Lords.

PANDORF AND CO. v. HAMILTON, FRASER, AND CO. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION.

Charter-party — Bill of lading — Excepted perils — "Dangers and accidents of the seas" — Sea-water let in by rats—Damage to cargo—Liability of shipowner.

Damage to cargo caused by sea-water entering through a pipe which has been gnawed through by rats, where there is no negligence on the part of the master and crew, is not a "danger or accident of the seas" within the meaning of a charter-party and bill of lading.

A cargo of rice shipped under a charter-party and bills of lading excepting "the act of God, and all and every other dangers and accidents of the seas, rivers, and steam navigation, of whatever nature and kind," was damaged by sea-water entering through a pipe which had been gnawed through by rats. All reasonable precautions had been taken by the shipowner to keep down the rats.

Held (reversing the judgment of Lopes, L.J.), that the damage did not come within the words "dangers and accidents of the seas" in the charter-party and bills of lading, and therefore the shipowners were liable to the owners of the cargo.

APPEAL by the plaintiffs from the judgment of Lopes, L.J., on further consideration.

The plaintiffs were the shippers of a cargo of rice, and brought the action against the defendants, the shipowners, to recover 1008*l.* 1*s.* 8*d.* as damages for injury to the rice on a voyage from Akyab to Liverpool.

The excepted perils in the charter-party were "the act of God, and all and every other dangers and accidents of the seas, rivers, and steam navigation, of whatever nature and kind soever, and errors of navigation during the voyage."

The excepted perils in the bills of lading were "all and every dangers and accidents of the seas, rivers, and navigation, of whatever nature and kind soever."

The rice was damaged during the voyage by sea-water passing through a hole in a pipe connected with the bath-room in the vessel, which pipe had been gnawed through by rats.

It was agreed that all reasonable precautions had been taken to keep down the rats on the voyage to Akyab.

The following questions were left to the jury: Were the rats that caused the damage brought on board by the shippers in the course of shipping the rice; and, Did those on board take reasonable precautions to prevent the rats coming on board during the shipping of the cargo?

The jury answered the first question in the negative, and the second in the affirmative.

Lopes, L.J. reserved the case for further consideration, and afterwards gave judgment for the defendants, holding that the damage complained of had occurred by reason of excepted perils; and from this judgment, which is reported 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 568; 54 L. T. Rep. N. S. 536, and 16 Q. B. Div. 629, the plaintiffs now appealed.

Cur. adv. vult.

Aug. 9. — The following judgments were delivered:—

Lord ESHER, M.R.—This is an action brought by the charterers of a ship, who are also the holders of bills of lading, for damage done by sea-water to a cargo of rice. The question was tried before Lopes, L.J., and after certain questions had been left to the jury, and had been answered by them, he gave judgment in favour of the defendants on the ground that the damage done to the rice was the result of causes excepted in the charter-party and the bills of lading. The questions raised, therefore, are, what is the true construction of the charter-party, and the bills of lading, which are in this case identical, and what is the reasonable mode of applying that construction to the facts of this case? The excepted perils are, "The act of God and the Queen's enemies, and all and every other dangers and accidents of the seas, rivers, and steam navigation, of whatsoever nature or kind, and errors of navigation during the voyage." The vessel was chartered by the plaintiffs to proceed to Akyab, and there load a cargo of rice, and the rice was loaded under the charter-party, and bills of lading were given in the same terms as the charter-party. During the voyage home to Liverpool, rats gnawed through a pipe communicating with a cistern in the ship, and thereby let in the sea-water, which damaged the rice. There was a dispute at the trial as to whether the rats had been allowed to come on board by the shippers in the course of shipping the rice at Akyab; this question was left to the jury. Another question was put to the jury: "Did those on board take reasonable precautions to prevent the rats coming on board during the shipping of the cargo?" That also was at Akyab. The jury answered the first question in the negative—that is, that the rats were not brought on board. The second question they answered in the affirmative, namely, that those on board did take reasonable precautions to prevent the rats coming on board during the shipping of the cargo. The learned judge states that at the trial there was no dispute about the cause of the damage to the cargo; it was agreed that the damage was caused during the voyage by sea-water passing through a hole in a pipe connected with a bath-room in the vessel, such pipe being gnawed through by rats. Therefore the cause of the damage to the rice is, that rats gnawed through the pipe, thereby letting the water in.

The question is, whether, on the true construction of the charter-party and the bills of lading, and applying it in the legal way to the facts, the cause of the damage is a peril excepted out of the bills of lading and charter-party. Now, charter-parties, bills of lading, and policies of marine insurance are documents which do not materially differ from an ordinary daily form of each. No doubt as mercantile business has been enlarged they have differed from time to time, but they do not differ from day to day, and in their substantial structure, which is very peculiar, they are much the same as they have been from the beginning. Where documents are in daily use in mercantile affairs, without any substantial difference in form, it is most material that the construction given to them years ago, and which has from that time been accepted in the courts of law, and in the mercantile world, should not be in the least altered, because all subsequent contracts have been made on the faith of the decisions. Therefore, whether we think that we would have come to the same conclusion as the judges did in the beginning is immaterial, for we ought to adhere strictly to the construction which has been put upon such documents. Moreover, if those documents, construed as the judges have construed them for many years, have also for many years been applied in a particular way to facts similar to those which are in question, it is equally material, in my opinion, to adhere to that application, for otherwise mercantile business becomes wholly uncertain. Now, with regard to charter-parties, bills of lading, and policies of marine insurance, there have been certain rules of construction determined upon and accepted, and there has been a distinction as to the mode of construing the first two documents and the third. With regard to policies of marine insurance a very strict rule as to the application of the doctrine of causa proxima has been adopted. It was pointed out long ago that if this doctrine of causa proxima, as against causa remota, is taken in a large sense it is equally applicable to charter-parties, bills of lading, and policies of marine insurance. One would not seek either as to a charter-party or a bill of lading a cause in the one sense remote; but with regard to policies of insurance, the doctrine of causa proxima, or the immediate cause, has been much more strictly applied than in the other two cases, and the difference has been that in a policy of marine insurance one looks strictly only to the causa proxima, or immediate cause; whereas in the other documents, one looks to that which is called in the law books the causa causans, which has been interpreted by judges to mean the real effective cause of the damage. All these documents were constructed originally in a very peculiar elliptical form of mercantile language. The statement that the shipowner will deliver the cargo in the same order as he has received it in, except the act of God and so on, and all and every other dangers or perils of the seas, shows that it is a most extraordinary elliptical form. The exceptions do not describe the damage, although if the document were construed only grammatically they would be rather supposed to describe the damage; they describe the cause of the damage, not the damage itself. It is necessary, therefore, to see whether the cause of the damage is one which is excepted. The first cause which may produce the damage is the act of God, as it was called in the old times. I shall not now enter into a discussion as to what was the exact meaning of the term "the act of God." In the older, simpler days I have never had any doubt but that it did not mean the act of God in the ecclesiastical and biblical sense, according to which almost everything is said to be the act of God, but that in a mercantile sense it meant an extraordinary circumstance which could not be foreseen, and which could not be guarded against. But in this case there cannot possibly be any foundation for any such suggestion as that this gnawing of a pipe by rats and letting in sea-water is, within the terms of the bills of lading and charter-party, the act of God. The real question is whether the cause could be said to be a cause brought about by dangers and accidents of the seas. It obviously was not a danger or accident of steam navigation, nor is it an error of navigation. Therefore the only term in the bills of lading and charter-party under which the cause could be brought, if it is a cause, is dangers or accidents of the seas. Now, it has been long ago held, that these words "dangers of the seas" are really the same as perils of the seas, for perils and dangers in the English language are synonymous words.

Therefore the question is, whether this is a peril of the sea. That depends on the meaning of the term "perils of the seas" in charter-parties, bills of lading, and policies of marine insurance. They really are the perils to which people who carry on their business on that dangerous element, the sea, are liable, because they carry on their business on the sea. They are the perils of the sea, not the perils of journeying. In Arnould on Marine Insurance, book 2, chap. 2, vol. 2, p. 741, 5th edit., it is stated that, "the words 'perils of the sea' only extend to cover losses really caused by sea damage, or the violence of the elements ex marinæ tempestatis discrimine. They do not embrace all losses happening upon the seas." There may be many dangers which come under other words, but which do not come under the words "perils of the seas." If perils of the seas really included all losses happening on the sea, it is obvious that none of the subsequent words which have been added to charter-parties, bills of lading, and policies of insurance, would have been wanted, or would have been included in them. Therefore perils of the seas are those perils which are peculiar to carrying on business on the sea. They obviously, therefore, include the violence of the sea itself. They include the danger which is caused by being on the sea by reason of the action of other elements acting upon the sea. But rats do not come from the sea, and are not generated by the sea. They are no more a difficulty on board ship than they are in a warehouse or in a mill. Therefore à priori one would have said that damage done to the ship or cargo by rats could not be a peril of the seas, as construed from the beginning. The first time a similar question was raised, in Rohl v. Parr (1 Esp. 445), that was done which in the old days the great judges were in the habit of doing much more than judges have been in the habit of doing in later times. It was at a time before the distinction was so strictly drawn between the construction of a mercantile document being for the court and not for the jury, and the question being partly for the court and partly for the jury. Lord Kenyon asked a mercantile jury at Guildhall whether, in the mercantile world, damage to the ship's bottom by worms was treated as a peril of the sea. The jury answered that it was not. Thereupon Lord Kenyon having asked for that opinion of the jury, not as decisive, but in order to instruct him, held that, upon the true construction of the policy, damage done to the ship by worms did not come within the term "perils of the sea," and that decision, which he, having had himself instructed by the jury, held as a matter of law, has been adopted ever since. My brother Lopes, in his judgment in the present case, which is most elaborate and careful, has not controverted that view, but has adopted the view that damage to the ship or cargo by rats of itself is not a damage caused by a peril or danger of the seas. It is hardly necessary to go through all the cases, but I think it is better to refer to some of them to show how clear this has been. The case of Rohl v. Parr (1 Esp. 445), which was on a policy of insurance on the ship, shows it very strongly. The ship sailed from St. Bartholomew, and arrived safely at the coast of Africa, and began to trade. Afterwards, being about to return, it was found that the worms had eaten her bottom, and had destroyed it so effectually that the ship could barely get to Cape Coast, where she was condemned as irreparable. This case seems to me very strong. The worms had eaten the bottom of the ship—it must have been a wooden ship in those days—so as to render her unfit to be on the seas, so that it was wrong to continue the voyage, and so that it was right and proper to take her into a port of distress, where, if what had happened was caused by the perils of the sea, she was from the other circumstances a constructive total loss; yet it was held that this eating by the worms was not, even in a policy of insurance, a damage caused by a peril of the sea. The damage in that case was done by worms, but the result would have been exactly the same if it had been done by rats. If rats were to gnaw a wooden ship from the inside nearly through to the outside of her planks, so that she became wholly unfit and unsafe to keep the seas, and she were carried into a port, where her condition was such that she could not be repaired so as to be a sea-going ship, in the ordinary business sense of being capable of repair, that would not be a loss caused by a peril of the sea.

The next proposition which I shall lay down is, that in business, if it is attempted to distinguish with extreme fineness either as to construction or as to application of facts, the possibility of real business is destroyed, and it seems to me impossible to hold that if rats gnaw within the eighth of an inch of the outside of the planks of a ship and so make the ship unfit to keep on the seas and render her irreparable, that constructive total loss is not a loss caused by perils of the sea, yet if the rats gnaw the eighth of an inch further it would be a loss by perils of the sea. That is far too fine for me, and I think far too fine for business. If that case, therefore, is carried to its full length, the damage caused by the gnawing by rats is not, even in a policy of insurance, a peril of the seas, and much more, as I shall presently show, is this in the case of a charter-party or a bill of lading. There is a case with regards to rats—Hunter v. Potts (4 Camp. 203)—which was again on a policy of insurance. The ship having touched at Antigua was detained there a considerable time by the sickness of the crew, and while she lay at that island the rats ate holes in her transums and other parts of her bottom. In consequence a survey was called, and the ship was found to be unfit to proceed to Honduras, and she was therefore condemned and the cargo sold. Here was a ship reduced to extremities, unfit to keep the sea and properly sold, but the loss having been charged as caused by a peril of the sea, Lord Ellenborough was clearly of opinion that it was not a loss within any of the perils insured against. One would expect to find in America the same law as in England, because the American people of business have adopted the same forms of bills of lading and of policies and of charter-parties that we have ourselves. In the case of Hazard's Administrator v. New England Marine Insurance Company (8 Peters, 557) the damage was caused by worms. The judge directed the jury (or, as it is called in America, charged the jury) that, "if they should find that in the Pacific Ocean worms ordinarily assail and enter the bottoms of vessels, then the loss of a vessel destroyed by worms would not be a loss within the policy." I quote this case because the Court there adopt the English decision to which I have already referred. They say: "In 1796 the case of Rohl v. Parr (1 Esp. 445) was tried, which involved this question, before Lord Kenyon and a special jury. His Lordship said, that 'it appeared to him a question of fact rather than of law, such as the jury were competent to decide on from the opinion on the subject adopted by the underwriters and merchants.' And, 'the jury found it was not a loss within the term 'perils of the sea' in policies of insurance, and, of course, that the plaintiff could not recover for a total loss.' There seems to have been a general acquiescence in this decision in England, as it has never been overruled:" (8 Peters, at pp. 583, 584.) Then some other cases are cited, and it is said that in America the Courts have adopted that finding of the English jury, and acted upon it. In this American case the question left to the jury was whether in the Pacific Ocean worms ordinarily assail the bottoms of vessels. It seems to me that there must be a distinction between rats and some worms which attacked ships in the old days at sea. If by worms are meant worms which ate through the ship from the outside, those are worms which are generated by the sea and which attack from the outside, and this would immediately, I think, raise the question which was left to the jury in that case. Therefore the real ground why the loss was not held to come within the term "perils of the sea" was this, that if the circumstances were the ordinary circumstances of the voyage insured then the loss would not come within the terms of the policy, for it would come within the ordinary circumstances, not the extraordinary circumstances, of the voyage. Therefore to my mind it is different in a case of worms which are peculiar to the sea, attacking the ship from the sea, which I think would be a peril of the sea, unless it were that it is an ordinary circumstance of the voyage, which either the underwriter, or the shipowner, or the owner of the cargo, ought to anticipate as an ordinary circumstance of the voyage. That question with regard to the attack of worms or barnacles can hardly arise in later days, because it was a danger to wooden ships which were not metalled. The metalling of ships was invented and applied chiefly in order to guard against that very danger, and now if a ship were sent into seas frequented by such worms without being metalled it would be a very strong circumstance upon which a jury would be asked to find that the ship was not seaworthy for that voyage even when she started, it being known at the time that in the ordinary course of the voyage such a danger must be anticipated. But with regard to rats, it stood from the beginning, as I say, subject to the other view that a danger to the ship or cargo by rats was not caused by an excepted peril in the bill of lading or by a sea peril as insured against in the policy.

Coming to later times, there is the case of Laveroni v. Drury (8 Ex. 166; 22 L. J. 2, Ex.), which, to a certain extent, is decisive in my opinion. There the question arose upon bills of lading. The cargo, which was cheese, a thing most liable to the attacks of rats, was damaged by rats. It is true that the sea-water did not come in. The only damage was the damage by the rats themselves. Pollock, C.B. said: "We agree with the learned judge that the true question is whether damage by rats falls within the exception, and we are clearly of opinion that it does not. The only part of the exception under which it possibly could be contended to fall is as a danger or accident of the sea and navigation, but this we think includes only a danger of the sea or navigation properly so-called, namely, one caused by the violence of the winds and waves (a vis major) acting upon a seaworthy and substantial ship, and does not cover damage by rats, which is a kind of destruction not peculiar to the sea, or navigation, or arising directly from it, but one to which such a commodity as cheese"—(this is also true as to rice)—"is equally liable in a warehouse on land as in a ship at sea." With regard to the observations which were made in the old days about a cat being on board, it was characteristic of the refined minds of those times to deal with such a matter. Pollock, C.B., who was a very practical judge, said he did not think much of the case of cats, because from the way in which cargoes are now stowed it would be very difficult for a cat to make its way in amongst the cargo; and so it would. However, that question of the cats was dropped long ago, as is well known. That case is a distinct decision that damage done to a cargo by rats, where it does not let in sea-water, is not damage caused by perils of the sea. I have dealt with the cases as to damage to the ship by rats or worms under a policy of insurance. Now I come to the case of damage to a ship or a cargo where the question arises under the exception in a bill of lading, or a charter-party. In the case of a bill of lading or charter-party, not the last immediate cause, but the real effective cause, is to be looked to, so that it must come to this, if the rats, as I said before, gnaw within the eighth of an inch of the outside of the planks of the ship and so damage the ship, or if rats eat the cargo, or otherwise damage the cargo, this is not a cause of damage which is excepted, yet if the rats go a little further so as to let the sea-water in, then the damage to the cargo is to be excepted. It cannot be that there are such distinctions. Therefore I take the case of Laveroni v. Drury (8 Ex. 166; 22 L. J. 2, Ex.) to be decisive, not only of what had then to be decided, namely, that damage caused by rats is not damage caused by a peril of the sea, but also, as a necessary consequence, to prove this, that if rats gnaw through a pipe and let the water in, nevertheless, as the rats are the cause, and the sea is not, and the letting in of the sea-water is only an effect of the cause, the real effective cause being the rats, what the rats do is not damage caused by perils of the sea. I think myself the cases would make it doubtful, even in a policy of insurance, whether where rats gnaw through the planks of the ship, the act is not so closely immediate that the coming in of the sea-water should be treated, not as a cause at all, but as an effect, so that even in that case there would be causa proxima as well as causa causans; but this is a matter which we need not determine on the present occasion, and which must remain open until the point is raised. Taking the distinction of construction which has always been applied as between charter-parties, bills of lading, and policies of insurance, I feel in my own mind perfectly clear that where the effective cause is the conduct of rats, as the learned judge has found here in terms, and properly found, it cannot be held that the coming in of the sea-water is the cause. Therefore, with the greatest deference I cannot agree with the judgment of Lopes, L.J. I think he has in reality, although he did not mean to do it, acted upon this: "The immediate cause of damage in this case," he says, "was the incursion of salt water through the hole in the pipe eaten through by the rats; the effective cause of damage was the rat or rats." It seems to me that he has inadvertently applied to this case the strictest rule of the causa proxima, which is only applicable to policies of insurance, and not to bills of lading or charter-parties. In my opinion, it has been held from the beginning that in a bill of lading or in a charter-party the effective cause is to be looked to, and not the immediate cause, in the sense of its being the causa proxima, as in the case of a policy of insurance. That is the defect in his careful and elaborate judgment. For the purpose of regularity in business, and in order that people may know what their liabilities are, and what they are undertaking, it seems to me that we must revert to the old rule, and say that where the effective cause of a loss under a charter-party or a bill of lading is damage to the cargo by rats that is not a peril excepted, and where the rats, by being the effective cause, let in the sea this letting in of the sea is not a cause at all. It is the effect of what was done by the rats, and the rats were the effective cause. For these reasons I cannot agree with the judgment, and am of opinion that the plaintiffs are entitled to judgment, and this appeal ought to be allowed.

Bowen, L.J.—The judgment I am about to read is the judgment of my brother Fry and myself. This was an action brought against the owners of a ship to recover damages for sea injury to the cargo caused by a leakage of which rats were the authors. The defendants' ship had been chartered by the plaintiffs to proceed to Akyab and there load a cargo of rice for Liverpool. The excepted perils in the charter-party were the act of God, and all and every other dangers and accidents of the seas, rivers, and steam navigation, of whatsoever nature and kind, and errors of navigation during the voyage, and the tenor of the bills of lading was the same. It appeared that the damage was caused during the voyage to Liverpool, after the ship had left Akyab, by sea-water passing through a hole in a metal pipe connected with a bath-room in the vessel, this pipe having been gnawed through by rats. It was not disputed at the trial that all reasonable precautions had been taken by the captain and his crew to keep down the rats on the voyage from Liverpool to Akyab. The jury found further that the rats which caused the damage were not brought on board by the shippers in the course of shipping the rice at Akyab, and that those on board had taken reasonable precautions to prevent the rats coming on board at Akyab during the shipping of the cargo. There was, on the other hand, no finding of the jury, and no admission by the parties, as to the condition of the vessel in respect of rats when she left Liverpool for Akyab, or as to the original cause of the presence of rats on board the ship. The case was dealt with by Lopes, L.J. on further consideration, and he directed a verdict for the defendants, on the ground that the case was one of danger or accident of the seas within the exception in the shipping documents, and that the shipowners were thereby exonerated. From this judgment the plaintiffs now appeal. That damage done to cargo by the direct action of rats, which devour it on the voyage, is not due to a peril of the sea, was decided in Kay v. Wheeler (16 L. T. Rep. N. S. 66; 2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 466; L. Rep. 2 C. P. 302) by the Exchequer Chamber; see Laveroni v. Drury (8 Ex. 166; 22 L. J. 2, Ex.); and Aymar v. Astor (6 Cowen's Reports, Supreme Court of New York, p. 266). It was contended, however, in the present case, on behalf of the shipowners, that the question is a different one where cargo is directly damaged by sea-water entering a ship through leaks which rats have caused, and that although the shipowner is not excused when the rats eat a cargo of rice directly, if a rat eats through a pipe which lets the sea-water in upon the rice, the accident is one for which the shipowner will not be responsible — a distinction which, if it exists, must be admitted to savour of subtlety. By the common law of this country, which in this respect is stricter than either the civil law or the law of many continental nations, a carrier by sea was liable for loss or damage to goods, except only in the event of accidents caused by the act of God or of the king's enemies. In Dale v. Hall (1 Wils. 281), the loss was occasioned by a leakage caused by rats gnawing a hole in the bottom of the vessel. The goods were not carried under any bill of lading, and it was held that by the common law the hoyman was not excused on the ground of any act of God. The larger exception to the carrier's liability contained in the exception of perils of the seas or accidents and dangers of the seas has sprung up gradually since the reign of Queen Elizabeth, no such provision being found in the forms of charter-parties or of bills of lading given in West's Symboleographie, but being known apparently in the reign of Charles I.: (see Pickering v. Barkley, Style, 132; Mors v. Slew, 3 Keb. p. 73; and Barton v. Wolliford, Comb. 56.)

The cargo in the present case was carried under a bill of lading containing the now familiar exception, and we have to consider accordingly whether a carrier who would not be excused by the common law for loss due to leakage caused by rats, can find protection under the express term "accident or danger of the sea." The exact definition of the term "dangers or accidents of the sea," or of the cognate expression "perils" of the sea, which latter name is only the Latinised equivalent for "dangers," has been the subject of perpetual discussion both in England and America. On the one side it has been sought to confine it to calamities which occur only through the violence of the elements (ex marinæ tempestatis discrimine), or (to use the language of Marshall, vol, 2, p. 487, part 1, c. 12, s. 1), "such as arise from stress of weather, winds and waves, from lightning and tempests, rocks and sands," &c. By others it has been sought to extend it so as to include all inevitable accidents which occur upon the seas, or at all events all such as occur by the action of sea-water in the course of navigation, for which human negligence, or for which at all events the carrier's negligence, is not responsible. The term "peril of the sea" is one which has long been employed in policies of insurance as well as in contracts of carriage, though losses which fall within the meaning of the policy (owing to the different nature of the contract) are not always losses which would fall within the bill of lading exception. But it may be at least considered probable (subject always to any question of usage or construction) that if a loss is not due to a peril of the sea within the meaning of a policy of insurance, neither will it be due to a peril of the sea within the meaning of the ordinary bill of lading. According to Lord Tenterden the decision of the judge upon what is a peril of the sea may be guided by usage and the course of practice among merchants, and it is observable that the case in which pirates were first held to be a peril of the sea was decided upon a certificate of merchants, read in court, that they were so esteemed: (Style, 132). It is not necessary in the present instance, and not being necessary it would be undesirable, to lay down an exhaustive definition as to the meaning of the term "perils of the sea," either in contracts of carriage or in policies of insurance. We desire to leave ourselves entirely free to consider (whenever the necessary occasion arises) whether the term "perils of the sea" may not embrace other dangers beyond those which are due directly to the violent action of the elements. Unless there be some exception to such a definition it is difficult to account for the fact that pirates by mercantile custom are a peril of the sea, or that shipwreck upon a hidden boulder, when not due to the negligence of the master, would be due to the same excepted cause. It is sufficient to affirm broadly that within the meaning of an ordinary charter-party or bill of lading a loss cannot be due to the perils of the sea which the exercise of reasonable skill and diligence on the part of the shipowner might have averted. In the case of the schooner Reeside (A.D. 1837, 2 Sumner, at p. 571) Story, J. thus expresses himself: "The phrase 'danger of the seas,' whether understood in its most limited sense, as importing only a loss by the natural accidents peculiar to that element, or whether understood in its more extended sense, as including inevitable accidents upon that element, must still, in either case, be clearly understood to include only such losses as are of an extraordinary nature, or arise from irresistible force, or some overwhelming power, which cannot be guarded against by the ordinary exertions of human skill and prudence." So again in Marshall on Insurance, vol. 1, p. 234, part 1, c. 7, s. 4: "If any loss or damage happen to the goods, from any fault or defect of the ship (not arising from sea damage, or from any accident or misfortune in the voyage, but from some latent defect before she sailed), the owner of the goods has his remedy against the owners of the ship for such loss or damage."

The judgment of Lopes, L.J. in the court below accepts this principle, but proceeds upon the basis that the action of the rats in gnawing through the pipe and letting in the sea-water upon the cargo was a matter beyond all human control—that it was, to adopt his own words, a case "of sea damage at sea and nobody's fault." The burden of proof of this rested upon the shipowner, but the admission made during the trial of the case and the finding of the jury seem to us to fall far short of establishing the inference drawn by Lopes, L.J. It is consistent with both the verdict and the findings that the presence of rats may have constituted an original vice in the ship when she sailed to take in cargo, which continued down to and at the time when she in fact took it in. Their presence at such a time—so far as their presence constituted any element of danger to the cargo—was to that extent a defect in the ship. Even if it were shown to be impossible to have excluded the rats which caused the mischief to the pipe—a topic which it may be said we have not the materials before us for discussing exhaustively—it would still we think be doubtful whether a ship with rats on board her that receives goods into her hold ought not to bear the responsibility for all damage done to the goods by the rats. The burden, as we have said, rests upon the shipowner. An owner of cargo has no means of knowing what has been done by the ship in respect of rats or what is the condition of the vessel. He has a right to assume that the ship is reasonably fit for the carriage of his goods. The broad inference of fact which most persons would accordingly be inclined to draw is that rats capable of doing substantial mischief to a ship or cargo, and which do not come on board with the cargo itself, are not the kind of inevitable misfortune which happens to ships fit to carry cargo—that a rat, and all the direct or indirect mischief a rat does, is, in other words, a peril of the ship and not a peril of the sea. Sir William Jones (Essay on the Law of Bailments, p. 105), commenting upon the case of Dale v. Hall (1 Wils. 281), in which the rats had gnawed out the oakum and made a small hole through which the water gushed, says that it must have been at least ordinary negligence to let a rat do such mischief in a vessel, and quotes the Digest (19, 2, 13, 6): "Si fullo vestimenta polienda acceperit, eaque mures roserint, ex locato tenetur, quia debuit ab hac re cavere." The Court of Exchequer in Laveroni v. Drury (8 Ex. 166; 22 L. J. 2, Ex.) seem to have been of the same opinion. Speaking of a passage from Roccus, which states that keeping cats on board excused the shipowner from damage by rats, Pollock, C.B., says: "Whatever might have been the case when Roccus wrote, we cannot but think that rats might be now banished from a ship by no very extraordinary degree of diligence on the part of the master:" (8 Ex. at p. 172). It is not impossible that it was on some such broad common-sense view of the case that Lord Ellenborough proceeded when in Hunter v. Potts (4 Camp. 203) he held that a loss arising from rats eating holes in the ship's bottom is not within the perils insured against by the common form of a policy of insurance. As a rule, rats can be kept out of ships which are fit to carry cargo, and, speaking broadly, a loss which is due to leakage caused by rats will probably be found to be due, not to the perils of the sea, but to the defects of the ship or the want of precautions of the shipowner. In his chapter dealing with policies of insurance, the learned author of Kent's Commentaries says: "It has even been a vexed question whether the damage done to a ship by rats was among the casualties comprehended under perils of the sea, and the authorities are much divided on the question. The better opinion would, however, seem to be that the insurer is not liable for this sort of damage, because it arises from the negligence of the common carrier, and it may be prevented by due care, and is within the control of human prudence and sagacity:" (vol. 3, pp. 300, 301.) He adds in a note some references to a number of foreign juridical writers, who have all maintained the principle that the owner, and not the insurer, is liable for any injury by rats, and states that the only case which he has met with directly to the contrary is that of Garrigues v. Coxe (1 Bin. 592). Story on Bailments, sect. 513, adds, that "it seems that a loss occasioned by a leakage which is caused by rats gnawing a hole in the bottom of the vessel is not in the English law deemed a loss by a peril of the sea." Lord Tenterden in his work on Shipping, part 4, c. 5, s. 4, adopts language to the same effect: "Where rats," he says, "occasioned a leak in the vessel, whereby the goods were spoiled, the master was held responsible for the damage notwithstanding the crew afterwards, by pumping, &c., did all they could to preserve the cargo from injury. And this determination agrees with the rule laid down by Roccus, who says: 'If mice eat the cargo and thereby occasion no small injury to the merchant, the master must make good the loss, because he is guilty of a fault. Yet if he had cats on board his ship he shall be excused.' This rule and the exception to it, although bearing somewhat of a ludicrous air, furnish a good illustration of the general principle, by which the master and owners are held responsible for every injury that might have been prevented by human foresight or care. In conformity to which principle, they are responsible for goods stolen or embezzled on board the ship by the crew or other persons, or lost or injured in consequence of the ship sailing in fair weather against a rock or shallow known to expert mariners."

It is not strictly necessary to decide what would be the result in the somewhat improbable case of a shipowner who succeeded in proving that the presence of rats that have caused mischief by leakage to the cargo, was neither due to any defect in the reasonable condition of his ship nor a matter which by reasonable precautions could have been prevented. This hypothetical case of a possible exception to what we may call the broad and natural inference of fact is reserved by Marshall (vol. 1. p. 235, part 1, c. 7, s. 4), where he says that the owners are liable for damage done by rats, unless it appear that all necessary precautions were used to prevent it. The academical question which Marshall and other writers have left open it is not necessary in the present case to close, so far as relates to leakage caused by rats as distinguished from damage done by them to the cargo directly. It is, however, obvious that the continental writers to whom Story refers as entertaining a view that in such a case the owner would be protected, wrote at a time when ships were very different from the carrying ships of the present day, nor indeed were their views followed by the Court of Exchequer in Laveroni v. Drury (8 Ex. 166; 22 L. J. 2, Ex.), or by the Exchequer Chamber in Kay v. Wheeler (16 L. T. Rep. N. S. 66; 2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 466; L. Rep. 2 C. P. 302). It never must be forgotten that the English law is less indulgent to the carrier than either the Roman law or the law of many continental nations. In the present instance—the burden of proof resting with the shipowner—no facts have been established which raise this speculative point. It was consistent with all the findings that the mischief done to the pipe, and the incursion of sea-water which followed, would never have happened but for either a defect in the condition of the ship or some want of providence in the shipowner or his servants. The question therefore does not arise whether there may not be a conceivable case of leakage caused by rats which would not fall within the broad and everyday rule. For these reasons we are of opinion that the judgment of the court below must be reversed, and the appeal allowed, with costs.

The Annot Lyle. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM THE PROBATE, DIVORCE, AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION (ADMIRALTY).

Collision—Ship at anchor—Negligence—Onus of proof—Appeal to the House of Lords—Bail—Stay of execution—R. S. C., Order LVIII., r. 16.

Where a ship is shown to have been properly at anchor with her anchor light burning, and is struck and damaged by another ship, the fact of the collision is primâ facie evidence of negligence on the part of the ship in motion, and the onus is upon the latter to prove that the collision was not occasioned by her negligence.

In an appeal from a decision of the Court of Appeal to the House of Lords in an action in rem, in which bail has been given, the Court of Appeal will not stay execution pending the appeal unless special circumstances are shown by affidavit.

This was an appeal by the plaintiffs in a collision action in rem from a decision of Butt, J. dismissing an action brought by them against the owners of the vessel Annot Lyle, to recover damages occasioned by a collision between the Annot Lyle and their barque the Nenuphar.

The collision occurred in the Downs on the night of the 10th Dec. 1884. The Nenuphar was properly at anchor, with her anchor light burning, in the Downs, heading between S.W. and W.S.W., when the barque Annot Lyle was seen to cross her bows. The Annot Lyle was exhibiting a green light and was about a cable's length off, and when about ahead of the Nenuphar it was seen that she was drifting towards the Nenuphar. Those on board the Annot Lyle hailed the Nenuphar to pay out chain, but a collision occurred, whereby the Nenuphar was damaged. The plaintiffs (inter alia) charged the defendants with taking up a foul berth, with neglecting to take proper measures to keep clear of the Nenuphar, and with negligence in coming to an anchor at all.

At the trial before Butt, J., the learned judge having found that the Annot Lyle had not taken up a foul berth, and had done all she could to avoid the collision, proceeded as follows: "The remaining question is whether, having regard to the state of the weather and to the fact that she had only one anchor available for letting go at the time, it was negligence on the part of those in charge of the Annot Lyle to go to anchor amongst the shipping in the Downs? Finding that there was a difference of opinion between the Elder Brethren on that point, and as the word 'negligence' is not always clearly understood, I thought it well to put what is practically the same question in a different form, and I asked them 'Would an officer in the exercise of ordinary care and skill, under the circumstances, have brought his vessel to anchor in the Downs and amongst the shipping?' That altered form of question did not advance the matter much, because one of the Elder Brethren answered it in the affirmative and the other in the negative, and I have to decide; and I shall say that I am not satisfied that it was negligence so to act, that the allegation of negligence is not proved by the plaintiffs, and that therefore I must dismiss the suit. I do not wish it to be understood that I exercise no judgment of my own in this matter; I exercise the best judgment I can in the difference of opinion which prevails between my assessors."

June 3.—Bucknill, Q.C. and Hannen for the appellants, the plaintiffs.—On the evidence the Annot Lyle was guilty of negligence. Moreover, as the Nenuphar was at anchor, the onus was upon the Annot Lyle to prove absence of negligence on their part. This has not been done.

Sir Walter Phillimore and Kennedy, Q.C. for the defendants.—There was no evidence of negligence against the Annot Lyle. The learned judge was right in dismissing the action.

(a) Reported by J. P. Aspinall and Butler Aspinall, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

The Lord Chancellor (Herschell).—In this case the Nenuphar was properly anchored in the Downs when the collision, the subject of this action, occurred; no blame can therefore be attributed to her. Under these circumstances, the burden is on the defendants to discharge themselves primâ facie from the liability which arises from the fact that the Annot Lyle came into collision with and damaged a ship at anchor. The cause of the collision in such a case may be an inevitable accident not arising from negligent navigation, but unless the defendants can prove this the law is clear, and they are liable for the damage caused by their ship. I advert to this point because, though the arguments addressed to the court to-day were in regard to the conduct of the Annot Lyle, there are expressions in the judgment of the learned judge which seem to indicate that the plaintiffs must prove that those on board the Annot Lyle were negligent, and that unless they do so the defendants are entitled to judgment. I do not think that this can have been the intention of the learned judge; but the expressions are somewhat unguarded in their from, and therefore it is desirable that the court should not allow any misapprehension to exist with regard to this point. The Annot Lyle, in order to discharge herself from liability, says that the collision occurred owing to her anchor dragging when she was endeavouring to come to anchor in the Downs. In the court below the learned judge put to the Trinity Masters this question, "Would an officer in the exercise of ordinary care and skill, under the circumstances, have brought his vessel to an anchor in the Downs?" Upon an answer to that question the Trinity Masters were not agreed, and the learned judge thereupon saying it was a matter upon which he did not feel competent to decide, expressed the opinion that he was not satisfied that it was negligent so to act, and that therefore he must dismiss the suit.

Now the facts were these. The Annot Lyle had endeavoured to come to an anchor under the lee at Dungeness some hours earlier in the afternoon. She there had to slip her anchor to avoid collision, because her anchor would not hold. She then made sail to the Downs with only one anchor available, because there had not been time between her leaving Dungeness and arriving at the Downs to prepare her other spare anchor for use. She had therefore dragged one anchor in the gale at Dungeness and lost it. The question is whether, under these circumstances, she was justified in anchoring in the Downs. It seems to me perfectly clear that a vessel about to come to anchor is entitled to consider her own safety, but she is not entitled to consider herself alone. She is bound to have regard to the safety of other vessels which are navigating or at anchor in her vicinity, and hence those on board her must act as reasonable men, as men of prudence and skill would act with due regard not only to the safety of their own vessel, but also to the safety of other vessels. There may no doubt be circumstances in which danger to the vessel would be so imminent and so great that she may be justified, for the purpose of saving herself from that danger, in so acting as to cause some risk—it may be a small risk, but still a risk—to another vessel. All that is a matter of degree. On the other hand, there are cases in which the other course is open to her, viz., to go where she will cause no danger to others, and be freed from danger herself. She is not justified, in order to do that which is more convenient to herself, to expose other vessels to serious risk. That I apprehend to be clear as regards the law. I will now deal with the facts. It is certain that the fact of the Annot Lyle anchoring with only one anchor, and ahead of another vessel, with a gale blowing, caused peril to the other vessel. The question is whether the circumstances were such as to justify her in so doing, and that depends very much upon the alternatives open to her. In view of these circumstances we have put this question to the nautical gentlemen who assist us: "Would an officer of ordinary care and skill, with due regard to the safety of his own ship and the safety of other ships anchored in the Downs, considering the fact that the anchor had been slipped at Dungeness, endeavour to anchor in the Downs?" Our assessors have answered that question in the negative. I entertain no sort of doubt that that is a correct and proper answer, looking at all the circumstances of the case. This vessel had other courses open to her, either of employing a tug, or going into the North Sea, or better still, into Margate Roads, which she might have done with safety to herself. Why was that course not taken? Not because it was thought safer to come to anchor in the Downs; not because it was thought that going to Margate Roads would have caused danger to the vessel. The master of the Annot Lyle, when asked, "Could you not have reached Margate Roads in safety?" answered "No, because I wanted to run into the Downs for the purpose of getting an anchor and chain." It had nothing to do with the safety of the ship, but he thought he would run the risk, inasmuch as it was more convenient that the Annot Lyle should there and then go on to the Margate Roads. If there had been no other vessel there he might have been justified in taking that course. But when there was the fact that there was another vessel in the vicinity, and he knew that if his anchor did not hold it would be disastrous to that other vessel, he was not justified in going there. If there is another course open to him he must take that course which the safety of other vessels demands rather than that course which is the more convenient to himself. Under these circumstances I think the judgment of the court below cannot stand, that it should be reversed, and that judgment should be given for the owners of the Nenuphar, the Annot Lyle being held alone to blame.

Appeal allowed.

Wednesday, June 9.

The defendants applied for a stay of execution pending an appeal by them to the House of Lords. No affidavits had been filed in support of the application. It appeared that the defendants had given bail to answer damages and interest.

Sir Walter Phillimore, for the defendants, in support of the application.—No injustice can be done to the plaintiffs by this application being granted. Sufficient bail has been given to answer damages and interest, and hence if this appeal is unsuccessful the fruits of the litigation are secured to the plaintiffs. When the Privy Council was the appellate court from the Admiralty Court, execution was stayed as a matter of course pending an appeal. A similar application was granted by this very court in the case of The Khedive (41 L. T. Rep. N. S. 392; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 182; 5 P. Div. 1), and my clients are willing that the same terms should be imposed upon them as were imposed in that case.

Bucknill, Q.C., for the plaintiffs, referred to Barker v. Lavery, 14 Q. B. Div. 769.

Lord Esher, M.R.—In this case we are invited to lay down a general rule as to staying execution upon appeals in Admiralty cases from this court differing from that which is in force in regard to other cases. It was argued that we ought to do so because bail has been given by the defendants, and interest is payable on the amount of the damages. Although this may be so, yet the respondents would not receive either the principal or the interest until the appeal was heard and decided. I can see no sufficient reason why the successful party should be so kept out of his money. Sir Walter Phillimore argued that it was the practice of the Privy Council to stay execution in similar cases, and that we were only asked to do that which, under the old practice, was always done. We must, however, assume that that practice was known to the Legislature when they transferred Admiralty appeals to this court, and that they intended such appeals to be subject to the same rules of practice as exist in other cases in the High Court. There is an express rule (Order LVIII., rule 16), that an appeal shall not operate as a stay of execution unless the court appealed from shall otherwise order. This present application therefore in effect asks us to break that rule, although it is admitted that there are no special reasons for our so doing. If in any particular case there is danger of successful appellants not being repaid, that must be shown by affidavit, and may induce us to order a stay. But we should be departing from the Act of Parliament and acting directly contrary to the rule if we made a general practice of staying execution in Admiralty cases pending an appeal to the House of Lords.

Bowen, L.J.—I agree. The unsuccessful litigant is asking us to deprive the successful litigant of the fruits of his judgment pending the determination of a further appeal. There is no affidavit, and therefore no reason is alleged why, if the money is paid over, but the appeal be successful, the appellants will not get their money back. I can see no reason why in Admiralty cases we should make a practice of keeping a successful litigant out of his money and locking up funds because they are secured by a bail bond. We are asked to assume that it is a matter of small importance to a successful litigant to go without his money pending an appeal to the House of Lords. I do not assent to that suggestion. The rule laid down by this court in Barker v. Lavery (ubi sup.) applies to Admiralty cases as much as to any others, and I therefore think that this application must be dismissed.

Fry, L.J.—I also think that this application in the absence of special circumstances must be refused. The case of The Khedive (ubi sup.) has been pressed upon us, but that case is really not in point. The only question there was, whether the court had jurisdiction. The successful party did not oppose the application, so that really the order was made by consent.

Dixon v. Farrer, Secretary of Board of Trade. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION.

Practice—Change of venue—Trial at bar—Action against officer of State—Interest of Crown—Rule absolute on statement of Attorney-General—Unreasonable detention of ship by Secretary of Board of Trade—Merchant Shipping Act 1876, s. 10—Crown Suits Act 1865, s. 46—R. S. C. 1883, Order XXXVI., r. 9.

By the Crown Suits Act 1865, s. 46, where, in any cause in which the Attorney-General is entitled, on behalf of the Crown, to demand as of right a trial at bar, he states to the court that he waives that right, "the court on the application of the Attorney-General shall change the venue to any county he may select." The Crown is entitled as of right to a trial at bar, in any cause in which it is interested, whether as a party or on behalf of any of its servants, or by reason of its interests being affected, and the Attorney-General, on behalf of the Crown, may obtain such trial at bar upon an ex parte application made by him to the court, he stating that the Crown is interested; and, in like manner, he is entitled to an order for a change of venue in any such case on a similar application; and in either case it is open to the other party to apply to set aside the order upon the ground that the Crown is not, in fact, interested, and that the court has been therein misinformed.

In order that the Crown should be interested in the action, it is not necessary that such action should affect either the personal property of the Sovereign or the property of the Crown in its capacity of head of the State. When an action is brought against an official of one of the departments of State, in respect of damage occasioned to a private person by the unreasonable exercise of his power as such official, and the Crown undertakes the defence of such action, the interest of the Crown in such action is sufficient to entitle the Attorney-General to a trial at bar or a change of venue.

In an action under sect. 10 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1876, against the Secretary of the Board of Trade, to recover damages for the detention of a ship without reasonable and probable cause, the Attorney-General is entitled, on behalf of the Crown, to demand as of right a trial at bar, and he is therefore also entitled, under the Crown Suits Act 1865, on stating to the court that he waives his right to a trial at bar, to change the venue to any county in which he elects to have the cause tried.

The Judicature Acts and Rules of Court have not the effect of abolishing trials at bar.

Judgment of Field and Wills, JJ. (reported ante, p. 30; 55 L. T. Rep. N. S. 438) affirmed.

This was an appeal from an order of a divisional court changing the venue in the action from Newcastle to London.

The action was brought by a shipowner against the Secretary of the Board of Trade, under 39 & 40 Vict. c. 80, s. 10, to recover damages for wrongfully, improperly, and without reasonable and probable cause detaining his ship for survey, while in harbour at North Shields. The plaintiff having laid the venue at Newcastle, the Attorney-General applied to the court to change the venue to London, under 28 & 29 Vict. c. 104, s. 46, subsect. 1, alleging that the Crown was interested in the action, and that he was therefore entitled as of right to a trial at bar, and that he waived that right. The Court made the order, and the plaintiff now appealed.

Sir W. Phillimore and J. Aspinall for the appellants.—It is conceded that, if this is an action in which the Attorney-General could of right demand a trial at bar, the order for a change of venue was rightly made. But the right of the Crown to a trial at bar is confined to cases where the King is a party, or the matter touches the right of the King: (see the authorities cited in Chitty's Archbold, 14th edit., p. 586.) Rowe v. Brenton (8 B. & C. 737; 3 Mann. & Ry. 133, 449) decided that a trial at bar might be granted in cases where the Crown was not actually a party to the suit, if the revenues of the Crown were affected. Paddock v. Forrester (1 M. & Gr. 583; 8 Dowl. Pr. Rep. 834) was very like the case of Rowe v. Brenton. It appeared on the record in that case that the property of the Crown was in question. [Lord Esher, M.R.—The present case is more like Buron v. Denman, 2 Ex. 167.] The Crown is not in any sense interested in this action. The Crown chooses to take up the defence of an action against one of its servants; that does not give the Crown an interest in the action. No case can be found in which the Attorney-General has intervened where the Crown was not a party, or the property of the Crown was not in question. Trials at bar were constantly granted at the instance of private persons, and the Attorney-General would sometimes be retained to make the application on behalf of such persons. In Buron v. Denman, for instance, the trial at bar may have been granted because it was an important case without any question as to the Crown's being interested. It appears from the Times report of that case that, at the close of it, the Attorney-General claimed the right of reply; the Court, however, doubted, and the Attorney-General withdrew his claim. By stat. Westm. 2, trials are to be at Nisi Prius, except in important cases. That statute did not bind the Crown, and therefore, where the Crown is a party, there is no right on the other side to a trial at Nisi Prius. There is also a further principle established by the cases, that where the Crown is interested, although not a party, there is no right to a trial at Nisi Prius. But it is submitted that the interest must be a property interest. Then it is further submitted that trials at bar are abolished by the Judicature Acts and Rules. By the Statute Law Revision and Civil Procedure Act 1881 (44 & 45 Vict. c. 59), s. 6, "The enactments relating to the making of rules of court, contained in the Supreme Court of Judicature Act 1875, and the Acts amending it, shall extend and apply to . . . all proceedings by or against the Crown." Order LXVIII. provides that nothing in the rules shall affect the procedure or practice in any of certain specified matters. Trials at bar are not within that order, and therefore the ordinary rules will apply to them. Then rule 9 of Order XXXVI. provides that "Every trial of any question or issue of fact with a jury shall be by a single judge, unless such trial be specially ordered to be by two or more judges." Under that rule there could be a trial before two judges at Newcastle, if so ordered. A trial before two judges, under that rule, is now substituted for a trial at bar. In Langworthy v. Langworthy (11 P. Div. 88) Cotton, L.J. says: "It would be a singular state of things if where an order from a judge is necessary he is to be held to have no discretion as to making it." The words "special order" import that it is an order to be made by the court after the consideration of the facts. [Lopes, L.J.—Rule 9 has no application whatever to trials at bar. There is no provision in the rules as to trials at bar.] Order XXXVI. was intended to comprehend all matters not excepted by Order LXVIII

Sir Charles Russell, Q.C. (Sir Richard Webster, A.-G., R. S. Wright, and Danckwerts with him) for the Crown. — There is nothing in the Rules of the Supreme Court which binds the Crown so as to take away the right to a trial at bar. Order LXXII., r. 2, preserves the right. The Attorney-General only asks that the court should accept his statement in the absence of any ground for not accepting it. It is primâ facie correct, and need not be supported by evidence; but it is not conclusive. There is a note by the reporter in 12 Jurist, p. 82, as to the case of Buron v. Denman: "I find on inquiry that the rule in Buron v. Denman was drawn up absolute in the first instance." That shows, therefore, that in Buron v. Denman the application for a trial at bar was made by the Attorney-General on behalf of the Crown. That case shows that there is a sufficient interest in the Crown, when an act has been done by a servant of the Crown, which the Crown chooses to adopt and justify. That is the case here. It is quite clear that, if damages are recovered in this action, a fi. fa. could not go against the private goods of the official of the Board of Trade, nor against the office furniture. The money would have to be voted by Parliament, and raised by taxation; but as, according to constitutional law, the Queen is the head of the Executive, and hers is the hand that receives the taxes, the damages will be paid by the Crown.

Sir Walter Phillimore in reply.

The following cases were referred to during the argument, in addition to those mentioned:

2 Inst. 424;
Brown v. Lord Granville, 1 Harr. & Woll. 270
Attorney-General v. Constable, 4 Ex. Div. 172
Lord Bellamont's case, 2 Salk. 625

Bradlaugh v. Clarke, 8 App. Cas. 354;
Rex v. Hales, 2 Stra. 816;
Rex v. Jolliffe, 4 T. Rep. 285.

Lord Esher, M.R.—In this case an action was brought against the Secretary of the Board of Trade under a statute which gives an action to a shipowner if his ship is detained unreasonably. The statute gives the Board of Trade the right to detain a ship for the purpose of ascertaining whether it is fit to go to sea, and, if it is found not to be fit, to forbid its going to sea until it has been made fit; but the statute, in order to protect the shipowner as far as was possible, gave him an action against the Secretary to the Board of Trade in his official capacity if he could show that in what they had done they had acted unreasonably. The plaintiff in this case has brought such an action, and laid the venue at Newcastle, as he had a perfect right to do. The Attorney-General, however, applied to the Divisional Court to change the venue, stating that the Crown was interested in the matter and that he appeared, instructed by the Crown, to defend the action. Upon that statement alone, an order was made to change the venue. It is urged that the Divisional Court was wrong to make the order upon those materials. On the other hand, it is urged by the Attorney-General that wherever an action is brought on the civil side of the court to which the Crown is a party, or in which the Crown is interested, the Attorney-General can come before the court and claim a change of venue, he having the right in such a case to claim a trial at bar. It is admitted on behalf of the plaintiff that, if the Attorney-General could have claimed a trial at bar in the present case, he is entitled to claim a change of venue. The question, therefore, comes to be, could the Attorney-General in the present case have claimed a trial at bar? It was at first asserted that, if the Attorney-General stated that the Crown was interested, the court was bound to make a rule for a trial at bar absolute in the first instance, and that that could not afterwards be in any way questioned. But it was afterwards suggested that, when the Attorney-General came forward, the court accepted his statement and made the rule absolute in the first instance, but that the other side might afterwards come before the court on this sole ground, namely, to show that the Attorney-General had been misinformed, and having been misinformed had misinformed the court, upon the question whether the Crown was interested, and, if they established that, then the court would set aside the rule. I think that this latter contention is right. Looking at the reports of the case of Rowe v. Brenton (8 B. & C. 737; 3 Mann. & R. 133, 449), I think that there was a discussion in that case as to whether the Attorney-General could obtain a rule absolute in the first instance for a trial at bar; and it was held that the court gave absolute credence to the Attorney-General and would make the rule absolute in the first instance, so recognising his right to have the order on his mere statement. Then Mr. Brougham endeavoured to set aside that rule; and he was certainly heard upon the question whether the Crown was interested. It turned out that upon his own affidavits the Crown was sufficiently interested; and, Mr. Brougham having failed to show that the Attorney-General was misinformed, the rule was maintained. That case is not strong to show that the court can set aside a rule absolute in the first instance obtained by the Attorney-General, because, as the affidavits showed that there was an interest in the Crown, it was not necessary to determine the point. But, in the case of Paddock v. Forrester (ubi sup.), we have the high authority of Tindal, C.J. as to what the law was on this point. In that case the Attorney-General prayed that a trial at bar might be had, and said that the rule was demanded as of right, and was not nisi in the first instance. Tindal, C.J. says: "No doubt you have a right to demand it on the part of the Crown, and it is for the plaintiff to show the court that it is misinformed upon the case, if that is the fact." And he then gives judgment as follows: "The Attorney-General has certified that the Crown is interested in the matter in dispute between these parties, and has stated that Her Majesty does not consent that any writ of nisi prius shall issue in this case. We are therefore bound to direct that the cause shall be tried at bar." And the rule was made absolute in the first instance. I think that that shows that where the Attorney-General comes into court and says the Crown is interested, he is entitled to a rule absolute in the first instance; but that the other side may afterwards appear to show that in fact the court was misinformed, and that the Crown is not interested. Unless they can show that, they fail; no further question can come before the court.

Then, what is an interest of the Crown? When is the Crown interested? It is obvious that the Crown is interested when its property is directly touched. But can the Crown be said to be interested, although neither the personal property of the Sovereign, nor the property of the Crown in its capacity as head of the State, is affected? On one side it is said that the Crown is not interested, except in one of those two cases; while on the other side it is said that the Crown is also interested in cases like the present, where one of its servants, an executive officer, is charged with maladministration, and that the Crown must be interested in the conduct of its servants? Is that interest within the rule or not? We have Lord Bellamont's case (ubi sup.) upon that point, which seems to make it clear that it is. The report of the case is short, and Sir Walter Phillimore was therefore enabled to make some fanciful suggestions with regard to it. Lord Bellamont was Governor of New York, and the act in respect of which he was sued must have been done by him in execution of his office. If that action had been successful he must have been liable to pay damages out of his own property. The Crown could not have any liability in respect of his acts. Therefore, in that case, neither the private property of the Sovereign, nor the property of the Crown in its capacity of head of the State, were affected. Nevertheless the claim of the Attorney-General, who was instructed by the Crown, to a trial at bar was allowed. That must have been because the Crown was interested in seeing whether its servants acted rightly or wrongly. That case is an authority, therefore, for the proposition that the Crown has a sufficient interest to enable the Attorney-General to come in and claim a trial at bar where the action is brought against one of its officers in respect of an official act. Then you have the case of Buron v.

Denman (ubi sup.). The passage which was read from the Times' report of that case shows that a rule absolute had been obtained by the Attorney-General for a trial at bar. That must have been on the ground that the Crown was interested. Probably the reason why no report is to be found of the application is, because, after the case of Lord Bellamont, it was obvious that there was a sufficient interest in the Crown. It is clear to my mind that in that case, as in Lord Bellamont's, neither the private property of the Sovereign nor the public funds were affected, and that the defendant alone was liable to pay damages; but Captain Denman, being an officer of the navy, had assumed to act for the Crown as its servant. On that ground, the Crown could ratify his act, and was interested in defending the action. It would be impossible for us, without departing from the practice of this court, to overrule those cases decided so long ago. They establish that, apart from the interest which arises where the Crown's right to property is in question, whenever an act is done by an officer of the Crown, on behalf of the Crown, the Crown has a sufficient interest to make the rule under consideration applicable. This action is against the defendant, as representing one of the great departments of the State, and is therefore within the rule. In those cases the trial would have been at Nisi Prius but for the right of the Crown to demand a trial at bar. It was a special order, therefore, that was made. So here a special order that the trial shall take place in London has been made. If the same interest of the Crown exists in this case as in those, unless the right of the Crown has been taken away by the Judicature Acts, that order must be affirmed. It seems to me that there can be no doubt in the present case but that the act in respect of which the defendant is sued was done by him as a servant of the Crown. He is a servant of one of the departments of State, he has done the act in question in his official capacity, and this case is therefore within the rule.

Then as to the point that the Judicature Acts have taken away the right to a trial at bar, those Acts have done away with the distinction that formerly existed between the three courts of common law, and have constituted one high court, and into that court have introduced divisional courts. Whatever was done by each of the three courts in banco is now done by divisional courts. That which was called a trial at bar was a trial before the court in banco. If divisional courts are substituted for courts in banco, it follows that a trial at bar is a trial before a divisional court here. It is to be tried according to the rules of court so far as they are applicable to a trial at bar. By Order XXXVI., r. 9, every trial of any question or issue of fact with a jury shall be by a single judge, unless such trial be specially ordered to be by two or more judges. By the combined effect of that rule and of sect. 26 of the Judicature Act 1873, a trial by jury before more than one judge can now be had in the country. A trial at bar is to be conducted in the way laid down in the rules as to other trials; but, by reason of its being a trial at bar, it must be tried before two judges sitting here. What is there in the Judicature Acts or the rules of court to take away the right to a trial at bar? There is nothing touching it. Then, if trials at bar are still in existence, and I can see nothing to take them away, where are they to be held? A trial "at bar" is in terms a trial here. A trial at Newcastle before two judges would not be a trial at bar. I am of opinion that this case is one in which the Atttorney-General has a right to a trial at bar. If so, he has a right to have the venue changed from Newcastle to London. The Divisional Court made an order to change the venue upon the statement of the Attorney General that the Crown was interested. If it could be shown that the Attorney-General was mistaken when he made that statement, the order would be set aside; but, in my opinion, the plaintiff in this case has failed to show it.

Lindley, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. This is an action brought by the owner of a ship for damage sustained by him by reason of its unreasonable detention by the Board of Trade, under one of the clauses of the Merchant Shipping Act 1876. The right of the Attorney-General to change the venue in the action rests upon sect. 46 of 28 & 29 Vict. c. 104, which is as follows: "Where a cause in which Her Majesty's Attorney-General, on behalf of the Crown, is entitled to demand as of right a trial at bar is at any time depending in any of Her Majesty's Superior Courts of law at Westminster, whether instituted before or instituted after the commencement of this Act, and the Attorney-General states to the court that he waives his right to a trial at bar, the following provision shall have effect: The court, on the application of the Attorney-General, shall change the venue to any county in which the Attorney-General elects to have the cause tried." Under that section the Attorney-General went before the Divisional Court and asked that the venue in this action should be changed from Newcastle to London. Whether he is entitled to this change of venue depends upon whether this is "a cause in which Her Majesty's Attorney.General, on behalf of the Crown, is entitled to demand as of right a trial at bar." It has been suggested by Sir Walter Phillimore that such an action as this, not being possible till 1876, it could not be within the words I have quoted from the Act of 1865. But I should construe those words as meaning causes in which the Attorney-General is entitled at the time of his application to demand a trial at bar; not causes in which he is entitled at the time of the passing of this Act to demand a trial at bar. I think, therefore, that the Attorney-General was right in saying that, if he was entitled to a trial at bar, he was entitled to a change of venue.

Then there was a point taken by Mr. Aspinall, that the right to a trial at bar was taken away by the Judicature Acts. There is nothing in the Judicature Acts or Rules of Court about trials at bar, or of depriving the Crown of the right thereto. The Rules of Court merely deal with procedure. It would be a very strong thing to say that, by reason of those rules, the right to a trial at bar had disappeared without having been mentioned. There is nothing in the rules to prevent the court making an order for a trial at bar, when asked to do so. On the contrary, there is something that warrants it. I refer to Order LXXII., r. 2, which preserves the old practice where no other provision is made by the Acts or rules. It is said that Order XXXVI., r. 9, has introduced a different practice. But that only says, "Every trial of any question or issue of fact with a jury shall be by a single judge, unless such trial be specially ordered to be by two or more judges." Although under that rule a trial before two judges may be ordered either in the country or here, a trial at bar, which can only take place here, may also be claimed in cases in which it could have been before that rule, and I do not see any difficulty in holding that trials at bar are not abolished. Trials at bar, therefore, are not abolished by the Judicature Acts or rules. So far the case is clear.

Then the next question, and the substantial question, is, Is this a case in which the Attorney-General is entitled to a trial at bar? That depends upon whether the Crown is interested in the action. That inquiry naturally resolves itself into two branches—the first being whether it is sufficient for the Attorney-General to state that the Crown is interested; the second being what is an interest of the Crown within the meaning of the rule. The cases of Rowe v. Brenton (ubi sup.) and Paddock v. Forrester (ubi sup.) show that the court does give credence to the mere statement of the Attorney-General, and acts upon that statement alone, though it is still open to the other side to show the court that he is misinformed and that the Crown is not interested. In the present case the plaintiff does not rely upon any affidavit with regard to this point, but contends that the nature of the action shows that the Crown has no sufficient interest. The material fact of the case as to this point is, that a nominal defendant is being sued, as representing one of the departments of State, and it is agreed on all hands that, if a verdict goes against him, the money to satisfy the verdict must be got from Parliament, and that that money must be granted to the Crown. That seems to me to be a much simpler case than either that of Lord Bellamont or of Captain Denman. Upon the statement of that fact, it seems to me plain that the Crown has an interest in the action. The Crown is interested to this extent, at all events, that it is entitled to defend the action, and to claim a trial at bar or a change of venue.

Lopes, L.J.—In this case the Attorney-General claims to have the venue changed from Newcastle to London, under sect. 46 of the Crown Suits Act 1865. Now, if this is a case in which the Attorney-General would be entitled to claim a trial at bar, it is perfectly clear that, under that section, he is entitled to have the venue changed. That raises two questions, both important. First, is this a case in which the Attorney-General is entitled to demand a trial at bar? Secondly, is he so entitled on his mere statement without going into evidence? The first question depends upon whether the Crown is interested in the action. As to that it is only necessary to refer to two facts in the case. First, that, in doing the acts in respect of which he is sued, the defendant was acting as an officer of the Crown. Secondly, that any damages that are awarded to the plaintiff in respect of those acts must come, not out of the defendant's pocket, but out of the public purse. It was contended by Sir Walter Phillimore that the Attorney-General could only intervene in this manner when the property of the Crown was touched. Two cases answer that contention, viz., Lord Bellamont's case (ubi sup.) and Buron v. Denman (ubi sup.). Sir Walter Phillimore suggested that the trials at bar in those cases took place, on account of their general importance, without reference to any interest of the Crown. But it seems to be beyond doubt that in both cases the rule was made absolute in the first instance. It is therefore clear that it was obtained by the Attorney-General on behalf of the Crown because the Crown was interested. The procedure would not have been such as it was unless that had been the case. The defendant in this case is a responsible officer in a department of Government; and, on grounds of convenience, apart from the question of prerogative, I should myself think it much better that the trial of this action should be moved to London.

As to the other question, whether the Attorney-General is entitled to the order on his mere statement, there was at first some doubt as to the practice, but it seems now to be clear. It appears that the Attorney-General is entitled on his mere statement to have the rule made absolute in the first instance; but that the other party to the action can get the rule set aside by showing that the interest of the Crown is insufficient, or that the statement of the Attorney-General was incorrect. That that is the practice is established by the two cases of Rowe v. Brenton (ubi sup.) and Paddock v. Forrester (ubi sup.). Then there is one other point that has been raised, which is, that the Judicature Acts and Rules of Court have abolished trials at bar. By Order XXXVI., r. 9, "Every trial of any question or issue of fact with a jury shall be by a single judge, unless such trial be specially ordered to be by two or more judges." I quite agree with everything that has been said by the Master of the Rolls as to that rule. I think that it had no reference to trials at bar; that they remain exactly where they were before the rule was passed. I think that it gives power to order a trial by jury before more than one judge in the country. But, although a trial at bar is a trial by jury before more than one judge, it is a special description of such trial, and is necessarily always to be at London.

THE IDA. (a)

Shipping casualty—Rehearing and appeal—Board of Trade—Shipping Casualties Investigations Act (42 & 43 Vict. c. 72) 1879.

By the provisions of the Shipping Casualties Investigations Act 1879 no right of appeal is given from the refusal of the Board of Trade to order a rehearing of an investigation into the conduct of a certificated officer.

THIS was an appeal from the refusal of the Board of Trade to order a rehearing of an investigation into the stranding of the Steamship Ida, on the 15th Sept. 1885.

The investigation was held at North Shields, the 21st and 23rd Nov. 1885, before two justices, assisted by nautical assessors, and a decision was given therein, holding John Steel, the master of the Ida, in default, and suspending his certificate for six months.

The master having subsequently discovered what he alleged was new and important evidence which could not be produced at the investigation, laid the same before the Board of Trade on the 24th Dec. 1885, and applied for a rehearing of the case under sect. 2, sub-sect. 1, of the Shipping Casualties Investigation Act 1879.

On the 11th Jan. 1886 the Board of Trade wrote to the master's solicitors refusing to grant a rehearing.

From this refusal the master now appealed.

The material provisions of the Shipping Casualties Investigations Act (42 & 43 Vict. c. 72) 1879 are as follows:

Sect. 2, sub-sect. 1. Where an investigation into the conduct of a master, mate, or engineer, or into a shipping casualty, has been held under the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, or any Act amending the same, or under any provision for holding such investigations in a British possession, the Board of Trade may, in any case, and shall, if new and important evidence, which could not be produced at the investigation has been discovered, or if for any other reason there has, in their opinion, been ground for suspecting a miscarriage of justice, order that the case be reheard, either generally or as to any part thereof, and either by the court or authority by whom it was heard in the first instance, or by the Wreck Commissioner, or in England or Ireland by a judge of Her Majesty's High Court of Justice exercising jurisdiction in Admiralty cases, or in Scotland by the Senior Lord Ordinary, or any other judge in the Court of Session whom the Lord President of that court may appoint for the purpose, and the case shall be so reheard accordingly.

Sub-sect. 2. Where, in any such investigation, a decision has been given with respect to the cancelling or suspension of the certificate of a master, mate, or engineer, and an application for a rehearing under this section has not been made or has been refused, an appeal shall lie from the decision to the following courts; namely,

(a) If the decision is given in England or by a naval court, the Probate, Divorce, and Admiralty Division of Her Majesty's High Court of Justice.

(b) If the decision is given in Scotland, either division of the Court of Session.

(c) If the decision is given in Ireland, the High Court of Admiralty, or the judge or division of Her Majesty's High Court of Justice exercising jurisdiction in Admiralty cases.

Sub-sect. 3. Any rehearing or appeal under this section shall be subject to and conducted in accordance with such conditions and regulations as may from time to time be prescribad by general rules made under sect. 30 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1876.

The Shipping Casualties (Appeal and Rehearing) Rules 1880:

Rule vi. Every appeal under sect. 2 of the Shipping Casualties Investigations Act 1879 shall be subject to the conditions and regulations following, namely:

(a) The appellant shall, within seven days after the day on which the decision appealed against is pronounced, serve on such of the other parties to the proceedings as he may consider to be directly affected by the appeal, notice of his intention to appeal, and shall also, within two days after the appeal is set down, serve on the said parties notice of the general grounds of the appeal.

Myburgh, Q.C. for the master.—It is submitted that the word "decision" covers not only the decision of the tribunal holding the inquiry, but also the determination of the Board of Trade to grant or refuse a rehearing. If an appeal is given from the decision of the court, a fortiori is it given from the Board of Trade. Unless this is so, the sole judge of what is "new and important evidence" is the Board of Trade, who have the conduct of the inquiry and are therefore somewhat in the position of prosecutors. Should the Board of Trade official whose business it is to determine what is "new and important evidence," come to a wrong conclusion, in the absence of an appeal great injustice may be done and the party aggrieved will have no redress. There is also this difficulty, that, should the decision of the Board of Trade be not given until seven days after the inquiry, the appellant is out of time for appealing. [BUTT, J.—I think the language of sub-sect. 2 avoids that difficulty. I should say that the time for appealing runs from the refusal of the Board of Trade to order a rehearing.] The words of rule vi of the Shipping Casualties (Appeal and Rehearing) Rules 1880 are precise, and say that notice of appeal shall be given "within seven days after the day on which the decision appealed against is pro- nounced."

Danckwertz, for the Board of Trade, contra.—This case is governed by the previous decision of this court in The Golden Sea (5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 23; 7 P. Div. 194; 47 L. T. Rep. N. S. 579), where it was said that "the decision from which an appeal is allowed is a decision with respect to the cancelling or suspension of the certificate and not any other decision." [Sir JAMES HANNEN.—That was in giving judgment on quite a different point from the present. The only question there was whether an owner had a right of appeal.] From the very language of sub-sect. 2, it is obvious that a marked distinction is drawn between a decision with respect to the cancelling of the certificate of a master, mate, or engineer, and a decision on an application for a rehearing. [He was stopped by the Court.]

Sir JAMES HANNEN.—I think this is a clear case. I abstain from saying unfortunately, because that would imply that I had formed an opinion on the ground of the Board of Trade's refusal; I have no right to do that, for I do not know what their grounds are. By the 2nd section of the Act, provided for the rehearing of these investigations, "the Board of Trade may, in any case"—that is plainly discretionary—"and shall"—that is obligatory—"if new and important evidence which could not be procured at the investigation has been discovered, or if for any other reason there has, in their opinion, been ground for suspecting a miscarriage of justice, order that the case be reheard." I am of opinion that that imposes a duty on the Board of Trade, if new and important evidence has been discovered, to grant a rehearing; and if the facts be such as the tribunal that has cognisance of such matters should consider establish a case for further investigation, on the ground that new and important evidence has been discovered, the Board of Trade may be compelled by mandamus to grant a rehearing. However, we have simply to deal with the provisions of the Act as to a rehearing. What the Board of Trade has power to do is to order that the case be reheard, which has previously been described as an "investigation into the conduct of a master, mate, or engineer." Then the 2nd sub-section says, "Where, in any such investigation"—that means such an investigation as has been before referred to as dealing with the cancellation of certificate—"a decision has been given . . . . an appeal shall lie from the decision." The word "decision," there must of necessity mean a decision in the investigation, and cannot be interpreted to mean the decision of the Board of Trade not to grant a rehearing. The concluding words of the sub-section make this clearer, if, indeed, it can be made clearer. I allude to the condition which is imposed on the appeal. It is in these words: If "an application for a rehearing under this section has not been made or has been refused, an appeal shall lie from the decision." So that a careful distinction is made between the decision in the investigation and the decision of the Board of Trade to grant or refuse a rehearing. It appears that there have been some rules made which require that the appellant shall, within seven days after the decision appealed against, serve notice on the parties concerned. On that a difficulty has been suggested as to the interpretation of the section. That question, however, is not now before us and I do not wish to prejudge it. It certainly does seem a hardship that, assuming new and important evidence has been discovered, the person aggrieved should be precluded from appealing by reason of the refusal of the Board of Trade to order a rehearing being given after the seven days have elapsed. Of course that is only an argument ad convenientem, and it ought perhaps not to prevail. I do not now express or intimate any sort of opinion on that question. It is sufficient to say that the present application must fail and is therefore dismissed with costs.

BUTT, J.—I am entirely of the same opinion. It seems to be quite clear that, on considering this section, there is no appeal given to this division against the refusal of the Board of Trade to grant a rehearing. What the effect of the words giving an appeal from the decision may be, it is unnecessary to inquire into, but it certainly is a decision other than the refusal of the Board of Trade.

THE AUGUSTA. (a)

Collision—Compulsory pilotage—Duties of pilot—Pilotage regulations for the river Seine—Port of Havre.

Although the employment of a pilot by a vessel entering the port of Havre is by French law compulsory, such pilot does not as of right as is the case in England supersede the master and take charge of the ship, but according to French decisions the master remains in charge, the pilot being merely his adviser. Hence, though the master may allow such pilot to take charge in fact, the owners are not exempted from liability for damage done to another ship by the negligence of the pilot.

THIS was a collision action in rem instituted by the owners of the British steamship Chilian and her cargo, against the owners of the steamship Augusta, to recover compensation for damages occasioned by a collision between the two vessels.

The collision occurred about 1.10 p.m. on Jan. 12, 1886, in the Bassin de l'Eure, at Havre.

The facts alleged on behalf of the plaintiffs were as follows: On Jan. 12, 1886, the Chilian, a steamship of 1415 tons net, was lying properly moored to the quay in the Bassin de l'Eure, at Havre. About 1.5 p.m. the British steamship Augusta was observed about one hundred yards distant, and bearing about two points on the starboard quarter. She was approaching in such a manner as to render a collision imminent and with her anchor in a dangerous position, and although those on board the Chilian did everything in their power to save the blow by placing fenders between the two ships, the Augusta coming on struck the Chilian on the starboard quarter abaft the mizzen rigging, with the bluff of her port bow and anchor, thereby doing her great damage.

The defendants alleged that on Aug. 12, 1886, the Augusta was entering the Bassin de l'Eure in charge of a duly qualified pilot for that place, and was under his orders and control going to make fast alongside the Chilian, when she came into collision with the Chilian. The defendants denied that the collision was caused by their negligence, and alleged that by the laws of France in force at the time and place of the said collision, the Augusta was by compulsion thereof in charge of a duly qualified pilot, and that such pilot was not their servant, and that the collision was solely caused by his negligence, and not in any way caused or contributed to by the master or crew of the Augusta. The defendants at the trial alleged that when the Chilian was first seen they were proceeding to a berth in the dock going about two knots an hour; that at this time the Chilian was about 250 yards distant on their port bow, and that their engines were at once stopped and reversed full speed. The pilot alleged that the cause of the collision was the failure of the Augusta to answer her port helm. He also alleged that all his orders were obeyed with the exception of the order to let go the anchor. He further stated that the anchor was in an improper place, and that it could not be moved because there was something wrong with the stopper. This was denied by the defendants, who asserted that it could have been placed anywhere the pilot wished if he had given an order to have its position altered, which he did not do. It appeared that the pilot and master were on the bridge of the Augusta together, and that the master transmitted the orders of the pilot to the crew.

Evidence was given by one French advocate on each side as to the French law of compulsory pilotage, and it was agreed that judgment should be given on the facts first, and that the argument as to the effect of the French law should be reserved for a future date. The evidence of the French advocates will be found set out below.

Bucknill, Q.C., Raikes, and Beard for the plaintiffs.

Sir Walter Phillimore and J. P. Aspinall for the defendants.

Sir JAMES HANNEN (the President).—For the purposes of to-day I shall confine myself to the facts, and deal with the case as if this collision had taken place in an English port where the taking of a pilot was necessary, and I shall reserve the question of French law for argument. In dealing with the question of fact, it appears to me that it must be taken as a starting point that the pilot admits that all his orders were obeyed, with the exception of the order to let go the anchor. From the damage done it is obvious that these vessels came together in a manner which was not intended, and which was improper. How did that arise? The pilot says it arises from the circumstance that whereas his orders were all obeyed, yet to his surprise the vessel did not answer her helm, and so when he gave the order to port for the purpose of bringing the Augusta up in a line with the Chilian, she did not go off to starboard as he expected, and so the collision was occasioned. On this point I have consulted the Trinity Masters, and they and I concur in thinking that the cause of the collision was that she was coming at such a speed as made it necessary for the vessel's helm to have been put to port earlier than it was, and also that her engines ought to have been stopped and reversed earlier than they were. I must say that I and the Trinity Masters agree in thinking that there was very great exaggeration in the evidence as to the speed of this vessel. I think it pretty clear that the captain at the time considered that his vessel was coming in at too great a rate of speed, because the pilot admits that an observation to that effect was made by the captain to him, but he says that at the moment he had already lessened the speed of the vessel, and that he thought he had done it sufficiently soon, in which, however, he turned out to be mistaken. The view therefore which is taken by the Trinity Brethren of the cause of the accident, and in which I entirely concur, is that the vessel was being navigated by the pilot in such a way that the steps which he took to prevent a collision were taken too late to prevent a collision.

There then remains the question as to the anchor. The collision, which arose from the mistaken navigation of the pilot, would not have caused the mischief which happened if the anchor had not been in the position in which it was. The question therefore arises whether it was in such an improper place that it must have been manifest to the captain so as to make it his duty not to proceed into the port with the anchor in that position. With regard to its position, I am advised that in ordinary circumstances there is nothing improper in that position, but whether it would be right to go into dock with the anchor in that position is another question. But it appears to me to be plain that the pilot was perfectly aware of where this anchor was. There is absolutely no evidence that there was anything to have prevented the anchor being in some other place if the pilot had insisted upon it. His statement as to there being something wrong with the stopper is unintelligible to us. The case amounts to this, that the anchor being in that position, and it being brought to the notice of the pilot that it was so, he did not object to it. If it really was in such a position as to make it unsafe for him to proceed, or if it had been contrary to the regulations of the port that it should have been so placed, of course his duty was to say, "I cannot take this vessel in with the anchor in this position." But it being known to him in what position it was, and he electing to go on in that position, he takes upon himself the responsibility, and it is not negligence on the part of the captain to say that that which satisfied the pilot in that respect was plainly wrong, and that he would not go into the port with the anchor so placed. The truth of the matter is, that nobody contemplated, and under ordinary circumstances no injury could have arisen from the anchor being where it was. It was only in consequence of the pilot's wrongful navigation that it became of importance to consider the position of the anchor. That leaves the remaining question of whether or not the pilot gave the order to let go the anchor, and whether it was obeyed. It is a question of fact, but it is one which I have not decided without first asking the Trinity Brethren what their view of the probabilities of the case is, and the result is that we all agree that the order to let go the anchor was not given by the pilot. No reason can be suggested why if the order had been given it should not have been obeyed. I therefore come to the conclusion that the injury which was caused arose from the negligence of the pilot, and that no case has been made against the master and crew of the Augusta.

June 4.—The case now came on for argument as to the effect of the French law. The evidence of the French advocates before referred to was in substance as follows:

Charles Lecouflet, a French advocate, practising at Havre, gave the following evidence on behalf of the defendants:

The pilotage regulations material to the present case are contained in articles 34 and 35 of the Decree of 1806, and in article 216 of the Decree of 1854. Articles 34 and 35 make it obligatory upon vessels entering the port of Havre to take a pilot. Under the provisions of article 34 the master is bound to pay for a pilot even if he refuses to take one, and in that case he, the master, is responsible for any accident that may happen. The Regulations of 1854 modify those of 1806. Article 216 of the Regulations of 1854 makes it obligatory upon the master to take the first pilot that presents himself. In these circumstances the French tribunals have held pilotage to be compulsory. In France the pilot takes command of the navigation of the ship and gives orders, and is not merely the adviser of the captain. A pilot at Havre taking charge of a ship outside the harbour is bound to take her in and moor her at the quay in the dock; his duty does not end until then: (art. 244 of 1854.)

In cross-examination he admitted that, while the French law as contained in the codes or statutes contained no express provision as to the liability of the captain when a pilot is compulsorily on board, yet, according to the modern French decisions, the master in his representative capacity, i.e., as the agent of the owners, is liable for damage occasioned by the negligent navigation of the ship, even though such negligence is that of the pilot alone; but he pointed out that the present decisions on this subject were in conflict with the earlier decisions of the French tribunals, which had held that the pilot being in charge compulsorily the owners were not responsible for his negligence.

Edouard Clunet, a French advocate practising in Paris, gave the following evidence on behalf of the plaintiffs:

There is no express statutory provision defining the responsibilities of the owners and master when a pilot is compulsorily on board. According to the existing French decisions the presence of a compulsory pilot does not free the owner from liability for damage occasioned by the negligence of the pilot. The pilot is merely the adviser of the captain, and does not superintend the navigation of the ship. If a pilot is compulsorily on board, and damage is done by his negligence, the captain is liable in his representative capacity, but not in his personal capacity. A captain would be liable personally for any damage done by his ship through the negligence of himself or his crew if he had the choosing of them, but would not be personally liable for damage brought about by following the wrong orders or advice of a pilot.

In support of their evidence the advocates referred to the following French treatises and decisions therein contained:

Traité de Droit Commercial Maritime, par M. Desjadins, 1886, art. 1113;
Cours de Droit Maritime, par M. Cresp, 1876, p. 588;
Recueil de Jurisprudence Commercial, par M. Gueraud, pp. 288, 289;
Précis de Droit Commercial, par M. Caen et M. Renault, art. 1823; Dictionnaire Universal Maritime, par M. A. Caumont.

The following decrees of the French Government containing pilotage regulations were referred to, and are material to the decision:

Art. 34. Tout bâtiment entrant ou sortant d'un port, devant avoir un pilote, si un capitaine refusait d'en prendre un, il serait tenu de le payer comme s'il s'en etait servi. Dans ce cas, il demeurera responsable des événements; et s'il perd le bâtiment, sera jugé suivant l'article 31 du présent réglement. Sont exceptés de l'obligation de prendre un pilote: les maîtres au grand et petit cabotage, commandant des bâtiments français au-dessous de quarte-vingts toneaux, lorsqu'il font habituellement la navigation de port en port et qu'ils pratiquent l'embouchure des rivières. Mais les propriétaires des navires chargeurs ou tous autres intéressés, pouvront contrainde les capitaines, maîtres, ou patrons à prendre des pilotes, et ils auront la faculté de les poursuivre devant les tribunaux, en cas d'avaries, échouements, et naufrages occasionnés par le refus de prendre un pilote.

Art. 216. Tout autre bâtiment destiné pour le Havre ou Honfleur, ou qui étant destiné pour la Seine, doit relâcher dans l'un de ces deux ports, est tenu de recevoir le pilote do l'exterieur qui se presente le premier, sans pouvoir le refuser sous prétexte d'un trop grand éloignement; toutefois, les pilotes du Havre ne peuvent monter les navires destinés pour Honfleur, et reciproquement, ceux de ce dernier port ne peuvent être reçus à bord des navires destinés pour le Havre que dans le cas où il n'y aurait pas en vue un pilote du lieu de destination se dirigeant sur le bâtiment.

Art. 244. Les pilotes ne peuvent exiger aucun salaire pour le passage du port dans l'un des bassins, ou de l'un des bassins dans le port, à la meme marée d'entrée ou de sortie. Tout pilote requis pour passer un navire d'un bassin dans un autre reçoit 3 francs.

Sir Walter Phillimore and J. P. Aspinall for the defendants.—The responsibility of the defendants must depend either upon the liability of the res for damage done by the res, or upon the agency of the persons whose negligence causes the damage. It is submitted that in law the defendants are liable upon neither of these grounds. According to The Halley (18 L. T. Rep. N. S. 879; L. Rep. 2 P. C. 193; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 131), a shipowner is not responsible for a person not his servant notwithstanding foreign law if that law forces such person as servant upon him. Having to pay pilotage is by English law a test of compulsion, and therefore in the present case the pilot was compulsorily on board:

The Maria, 1 W. Rob. 95;
The City of Cambridge, 30 L. T. Rep. N. S. 439; L. Rep. 5 P. C. 451; 2 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 239.

The defendants had no opportunity given of selecting any particular pilot. According to art. 216 of the Regulations of 1854 the master was bound to take the first pilot that presented himself. The restricted power of selecting out of a particular class does not make the pilotage less compulsory:

The Batavier, 2 W. Rob. 407;
The Hibernian, 27 L. T. Rep. N. S. 725; L. Rep. 4 P. C. 511; 1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 491.

The pilot in giving evidence spoke of giving orders, and of his orders being obeyed. M. Lecouflet also alleged that the pilot gives the orders as to the navigation of the ship. If so, it would seem that the pilot does in fact supersede the authority of the master, and superintends the navigation of the ship. According to French law, if a pilot is on board the master is not personally responsible for damage occasioned by the negligence of the pilot. Therefore the pilot is not the servant of the master, and is therefore on board and in charge in an independent capacity. For the plaintiffs to succeed they must make out that there was negligence on the part of the defendants' servants. But there was no negligence in letting the pilot take charge, and also no negligence in obeying his orders. Even assuming the pilot to have been only an adviser, the master was entitled to look upon him as a competent adviser, and therefore there was no negligence in the master in allowing his vessel to be navigated under his advice. In other words, the pilot was to be looked upon as a living chart. If a master is led into an error which occasions damage owing to a mistake in his chart, he is not responsible for the fault in the chart, and there-ore his owners are not liable for the damage. As the owners are liable only through the act of an agent, and the master is not liable if a pilot is on board, it must necessarily follow that the defendants cannot be liable for the present damage, because the master who was transmitting the orders of the pilot to the crew is relieved of liability, and consequently there is no one through whom the defendants can be made liable.

Bucknill, Q.C., F. W. Raikes, and Lewis Beard for the plaintiffs.—Even assuming the pilotage to have been compulsory in the English sense, the master ought to have interfered, and not allowed the pilot to navigate the ship as he did. It is, however, submitted that the master was in fact solely responsible for the navigation of the ship. The pilotage no doubt was compulsory in the sense that the master was compelled to take a pilot on board, but the pilot was only to act as his adviser, and not to supersede his authority. The evidence of the French advocates is, that the pilot is only an aid, and nothing more. This question must be decided according to the French decisions, and according to those decisions the presence of a pilot, although compulsorily on board does not free the shipowner from responsibility for damage occasioned by the negligent navigation of his ship, and therefore, on the authority of The Guy Mannering (4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 553; 7 P. Div. 132), the defence of compulsory pilotage is bad. If this be so, the captain was wrong in giving up the charge of the ship to the pilot, and therefore the owners are liable for his negligence. It is also to be noticed that art. 216 places no limit as to the place where a pilot is to be taken, and therefore, if the defendants' contention is right, the moment a pilot is on board, even if it be many miles from the port, the owners are relieved from liability.

Aspinall in reply.—No Legislature can make enactments applicable to places outside its territorial jurisdiction, i.e., three miles, and therefore the extent of the pilotage district is necessarily restricted. Moreover the decrees themselves specify the limits of the various pilotage stations.

Cur. adv. vult.

July 26.—Sir JAMES HANNEN.—This was an action by the owners of the steamship Chilian and her cargo against the steamship Augusta, for damage sustained by a collision between the two vessels in the Bassin de l'Eure, at Havre, on the 12th Jan. 1886. The Chilian was lying moored to the quay at the time of the collision, and the Augusta entered the basin and was proceeding to make fast to the Chilian, and in so doing caused the injuries complained of. I came to the conclusion that the Chilian was in no way to blame, and that the collision arose entirely from negligence on the part of those navigating the Augusta. The defendants, however, pleaded that, by the laws of France in force at the time of the collision the Augusta was by compulsion thereof in charge of a duly qualified pilot, and that such pilot was not the servant of the defendants, and that the collision was solely caused by the negligence of the said pilot, and was not in any way caused or contributed to by the master or crew of the Augusta. I was of opinion upon the facts that, if the collision had occurred in English waters where pilotage was compulsory, the Augusta would not be responsible, inasmuch as the collision arose solely from following the directions of the pilot, and without contributory negligence on the part of her master and crew.

The leading authority on this subject is that of The Halley (ubi sup.). In that case the collision was between a Norwegian barque and a British steamer in Belgian waters, and it was pleaded that the vessel was in charge of a pilot whom the master was compelled by the Belgian law to employ. The Privy Council, overruling the decision of Sir Robert Phillimore, held that this plea disclosed no defence. The principle upon which the decision of the Privy Council was based will appear from the following passages in the judgment: "Their Lordships agree with the learned judge in his statement of the common law of England with respect to the liability of the owner of a vessel for injuries occasioned by the unskilful navigation of his vessel while under the control of a pilot whom the owner was compelled to take on board, and in whose selection he had no voice; and that this law holds that the responsibility of the owner for the acts of his servant is founded upon the presumption that the owner chooses his servant and gives him orders which he is bound to obey, and that the acts of the servant, so far as the interests of third persons are concerned, must always be considered as the acts of the owner. Assuming, as for the purposes of this appeal their Lordships are bound to assume, the truth of the facts stated on the pleadings, and applying the principles of the common law and the statute law of England to those facts, it appears that the tort for which damages are sought to be recovered in this cause was a tort occasioned solely by the negligence or unskilfulness of a person who was in no sense the servant of the appellants, a person whom they were compelled to receive on board their ship, in whose selection they had no voice, whom they had no power to remove or displace, and who so far from being bound to receive or obey their orders was entitled to supersede, and had in fact at the time of the collision superseded, the authority of the master appointed by them; and their Lordships think that the maxim, Qui facit per alium facit per se, cannot by the law of England be applied as against the appellants to an injury occasioned under such circumstances; and that the tort upon which this cause is founded is one which would not be recognised by the law of England as creating any liability in or cause of action against the appellants. It follows therefore that the liability of the appellants and the right of the respondents to recover damages from them as the owners of the Halley, if such liability or right exists in the present case, must be the creature of the Belgian law; and the question is whether an English court of justice is bound to apply and enforce that law in a case when, according to its own principles, no wrong has been committed by the defendants and no right of action against them exists." And their Lordships arrived at the conclusion that "it is alike contrary to principle and to authority to hold that an English court of justice will enforce a foreign municipal law, and will give a remedy in the shape of damages in respect of an act which according to its own principles imposes no liability on the person from whom the damages are claimed." This case is a binding authority upon me unless it can be shown that the facts of the present case are essentially different. The plaintiffs seek to show that they are different in this respect, that it was in that case assumed that the pilot was in charge of the vessel in fault, whereas they claim to have proved by their evidence in this case that the pilot was not by the law of France in charge of the vessel, but was solely the adviser of the captain, and assuming this to be proved, the case of The Guy Mannering (ubi sup.), in the Court of Appeal, is an authority that the owner is not exempt from liability for damage arising from the negligence of a pilot though compulsorily taken on board. It is with great diffidence that I venture to express an opinion upon a question upon which French jurists do not appear to be altogether agreed; but it is my duty to form the best judgment I can with the assistance of the learned advocates who have given evidence before me. It appears to me that M. Clunet's evidence states the law in the most coherent manner, and is best supported by the authorities which have been referred to. His evidence amounts to this, that the French law has no express provision on the subject of the liability of the captain when a pilot is on board, but that the recognised principle is, that the captain is liable in his representative capacity (that is, as representing the ship and owners), notwithstanding the compulsory presence of a pilot, and that the master is not personally liable if he has taken a pilot, because in that case he has done his duty by taking his adviser, but that the pilot is only the adviser, the captain remaining free to obey him or not. The witness stated that in 1827 the Tribunal of Marseilles decided that a pilot's presence freed the ship, but that in 1829 the opposite was held, and that the latter has been acted upon from that time. He also referred to the most recent treatise on this subject as confirming his view. In the Traité de Droit Commercial Maritime of M. Desjardins, 1886, article 1113, it is said: "Lorsque le capitaine s'est soumis à l'obligation de prendre un pilote pour obéir au décret du 12 Dec. 1806 (art. 34), ce dernier, s'il commet une faute et que l'abordage s'ensuivre, est evidemment responsable soit envers le navire soit même directement envers les tiers. Mais cette responsabilité doit elle exclure la responsabilité du capitaine et du navire? Oui en droit anglais, non en droit français." Here the difference between the English and French law is distinctly stated. And after referring to the English law the author proceeds: "Il n'en est pas ainsi en droit français par cela même que le capitaine reste libre non seulement de préférer son avis a celui du pilote, mais encore de ne pas se conformer à la rigueur aux intentions du legislateur en refusant d'embarquer le pilote. La Cour de Rennes a jugé formallement le 3 Août 1832, que l'armateur du navire abordant actioné en responsabilité ne pouvait pas pour faire écarté la demande par une fin de non recevoir alléguer la présence à bord du pilote lameneur que ce pilote etait comme le capitaine son préposé, que la mesure de precaution prise dans l'intérêt bien entendu de l'armateur pouvait pas se retourner contre les tiers le lésés par le fait du navire. Cette jurisprudence a prévali et devait prévaloir." And M. Cresp, in his "Cours de Droit Maritime," 1876, p. 588, says: "Dans le systeme de sa loi le pilote est en effet un aide et non un remplacant, il en resulte que sa presence à bord ne saurait en cas d'accident dégager la responsabilité du capitaine vis-à-vis des tiers, le capitaine reste encore le maître et le directeur supreme du navire, que le pilote n'est que son préposé, son aide dans l'accomplissement de la tâche qui lui est dévolue et qu'il doit dèslors répondre des fautes de celui-ci commises; tout commettant répond des fautes de son préposé." The advocate called to support the defendants' contention admitted that in actual jurisprudence, by which I take him to mean according to the law of France as at present interpreted by its courts, the pilot is only an aid. It follows from this definition of the functions of a pilot that he was not in this case when on board in performance of his duty in charge of the vessel in the sense in which it was assumed that he was in the case of The Halley (ubi sup.), for he was not entitled to supersede, and did not in fact supersede, the authority of the captain. I think that the question may be thus summarised, that, while by the French law there is no express provision defining the responsibilities of captain and owners when a compulsory pilot is on board, the regulations for the navigation of the Suez Canal on this head substantially represent the actual jurisprudence of France on the subject, and that therefore this case falls directly within the authority of the decision of the Court of Appeal in The Guy Mannering (ubi sup.). Judgment will therefore be for the plaintiffs with costs.

THE ANDALINA. (a)

Seamen's wages—Maritime lien—Freight—Sub-charter—Arrest of cargo—Light and dock dues—Towage—Priority of claims—Merchant Shipping Act 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104), s. 401.

Where a ship is chartered for a round voyage out and home, and sub-chartered for the homeward voyage, and earns freight under the sub-charter-party, the freight due to the original charterers under the sub-charter-party is liable to pay seamen's wages earned upon the round voyage, even though only a part of such freight is due to the shipowners under the original charter.

A seaman's claim for wages has priority over a claim for payments made for light dues, and for the towage of a sailing vessel from sea to an inland port.

THIS was a motion by the mate and certain seamen of the foreign brig Andalina for payment out of court of wages in respect of which they had recovered judgment in the County Court of Hull.

The voyage on which the mate and seamen had earned their wages was a round voyage from Hull to Demerara and back. On the 5th June 1886 the ship had been chartered to Crauford and Rowatt for this voyage. On the 22nd July Crauford and Rowatt had sub-chartered the

(a) Reported by J. P. ASPINALL and BUTLER ASPINALL, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

Andalina to A. Bergmann in respect of the homeward voyage.

The ship proceeded to Demerara with a cargo, discharged it, and then under the sub-charter loaded a homeward cargo for Hull, where she duly arrived with her homeward cargo. Upon an investigation of accounts it appeared that there was due to the charterers under the sub-charter-party the sum of 159*l.* 7*s.* 9*d.* in respect of the homeward voyage, and that of this the charterers owed the shipowners 34*l.* 19*s.* 3*d.* as freight due under the original charter for the round voyage.

A necessaries action had also been instituted against the same ship in the County Court of Hull by one Meek, claiming for sums paid for light dues at Hull, and also for the towage of the Andalina inwards to Hull, and from Hull to Goole. Meek had obtained judgment for his claim.

A further action had been instituted in the Admiralty Division of the High Court by Messrs. Burney and Dalzell for necessaries. In this action the ship had been sold, and had realised after payment of the costs of sale the sum of 110*l.* 2*s.* 9*d.* In consequence of the ship having been so sold in the High Court, the wages action and Meek's action were transferred to the High Court to enable the plaintiffs to enforce their judgment.

The freight, amounting to 159*l.* 7*s.* 9*d.* in respect of the homeward voyage from Demerara to Hull, had been paid into court.

J. P. Aspinall, for the mate and seamen, in support of the motion.—My clients are entitled to priority over the other claimants, and therefore their claim should be satisfied in full out of the money in court. The fact that the freight in court was due on the sub-charter does not make it the less available to satisfy the seamen. It was freight earned by the ship on the voyage during which they were navigating the ship. They have a right to arrest the cargo to enforce their claim against the freight, and it is immaterial under what charter or by whom the freight is paid.

E. S. Roscoe for Meek.—Mr. Meek's claim is, under the circumstances, entitled to precedence over all others. One item in his claim is money paid for towing the Andalina from sea to Hull. This was in the nature of salvage, and as but for that towage the ship might not have been available for any of these claims, this item should have priority even over the seamen's claims:

The Gustaf, Lush. 506.

Meek having paid light dues at the master's request, therefore his claim in respect of such payment is in the nature of a claim for light dues. As to the light dues, he is entitled to priority under the provisions of sect. 401 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854. By that section the collector of light dues, in the event of their nonpayment, is entitled to distrain on and sell the vessel to satisfy the claim. Meek having paid the light dues is entitled to the same remedies, and therefore has priority in respect of such payment:

The William F. Safford, Lush. 69.

Witt for Messrs. Crauford and Rowatt.—The seamen can have no right against the freight due under the sub-charter, except against such part as the shipowners are entitled to. That arises under a contract between the charterers and other persons, and is payable to the charterers. The seamen's only remedy as against freight is in respect of the freight due under the charter-party, which the shipowners, the seamen's employers, made. If it were otherwise, the seamen would have a right against two freights.

J. Gorell Barnes, for Messrs. Burney and Dalzell, asked for costs.

BUTT, J.—The order I shall make is, that the amount of the judgment in the sailors' suit is to be paid out of the freight payable by the sub-charterers so far as the freight will suffice to pay it, and out of the balance from the sale of the ship if the freight does not suffice. With regard to the necessaries claim, I am clearly of opinion that no part of that claim can take rank before the seamen's lien for wages. Mr. Roscoe appears to rest the first part of his claim upon an assertion or an assumption that towage and salvage are for this purpose on precisely the same footing. I do not agree with that at all and I cannot accede to that proposition with regard to the payment of the light and dock dues. I think that, if Meek has any lien at all for what he has paid, it is one that takes rank after the sailors'. With regard to Mr. Witt's client my opinion is that the sailors have a lien on the freight earned on the voyage, and that they have therefore a right of arresting the cargo when it arrives at its port of destination in order to enforce that lien. That they have a lien is unquestionable, and their rights are not and cannot be interfered with by any contracts between the sub-charterer and the charterer on the one hand, and the charterer and shipowner on the other. Therefore I decide that they must have their wages out of the fund in court in the way I have indicated. That saves the right of Mr. Barnes' clients, if that sum is sufficient. As to priorities between the other claimants I say nothing. It is sufficient for to-day to decide the question raised by the present motion on behalf of the mate and seamen.

THE ISCA. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM THE COUNTY COURT OF MONMOUTHSHIRE HOLDEN AT NEWPORT.

Tug and tow—Towage contract—Breach—Negligence of tug—County Court—Jurisdiction—County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Amendment Act 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 51), s. 2.

A tugowner, having been engaged to tow a vessel, contracted with another tugowner to provide a tug, which was guilty of negligence in the course of towage occasioning damage to the tow. The owners of the tow recovered this damage from the tugowner with whom they contracted, and the defendant in that action instituted the present action in rem in the County Court under the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Amendment Act 1869, against the owner of the wrong doing tug to recover back this amount.

Held, on appeal, that sect. 2, sub-sect. 1 of the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Amendment Act 1869, giving County Courts with Admiralty jurisdiction power to try "any claim arising out of any agreement made in relation to the use or hire of any ship," covered the present action.

As a general rule it is the duty of a tow to give orders to the tug, and if a specific order is given by the tow to the tug, the responsibility for that order will rest with the tow; but there is no obligation on the tow to be constantly giving directions to the tug as to matters which are specially the duty of the tug, and if the latter by reason of local circumstances or knowledge has the means of forming a judgment as to what is to be done, it is her duty to do it without waiting for orders from the tow.

THIS was an appeal from the County Court of Monmouthshire, holden at Newport, by the defendants in an action in rem instituted under the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Amendment Act 1869.

On March 19, 1886, Messrs. Williams and Sons, tug proprietors, towed with their steam-tug Alexandra the brigantine Mary, of 196 tons, from sea to the Bangor Wharf, in the river Usk, at Newport.

On March 22nd the brigantine required shifting about one and a half miles down the river, and her captain thereupon went to Messrs. Williams and Sons and agreed with them that they should provide a tug to shift his vessel. Messrs. Williams not having a tug of their own available, went to Thomas Cox, the owner of the tug Isca, and hired the Isca for the purpose of towing the brigantine down the river.

The brigantine was lying on the west side of the river, heading up river, and the Isca made fast to her about 7.30 p.m., the tide being about three hours flood. A tow line was passed from the brigantine's starboard bow, and a bridle was put on it from her starboard quarter, and the tug then commenced towing the brigantine stern foremost close into the bank to avoid the flood tide. When opposite the Corporation Pill (which is an estuary of a small stream running into the Usk) the bridle was let go, and the brigantine's stern swung into the Pill. In consequence of this there was danger of the brigantine's stern hitting against the north wall of the Pill, and her master thereupon ordered the tug to keep the brigantine's head out of the Pill. The tug thereupon began to lay across the river, and so exposed the brigantine to the force of the tide. The tug was in these circumstances unable to hold the brigantine, which drove up the river and came into contact with the Newport Stone Bridge, sustaining damage to the amount of 160*l*. The owners of the brigantine thereupon instituted an action against Williams and Son to recover the damage sustained by them, and were successful in their action. Messrs. Williams and Son instituted the present action in rem in the County Court at Newport, against the owner of the Isca, to recover 160*l*., the damages sustained by them arising out of the hire of the tug Isca.

The action came on for trial at Newport, on June 18, 1886, when judgment was given for the plaintiffs.

The plaintiffs' witnesses alleged that the tug-master ordered the bridle to be slipped; that it was not prudent to slip the bridle at the time when it was slipped; that the only order given by the master of the brigantine was to keep the brigantine's head out of the Pill, and that the tug thereupon went across the stream, and so caused the accident.

The defendants' witnesses alleged that all the orders were given by those on board the brigantine; that the order to slip the bridle came from the brigantine; that when there was danger of the brigantine's stern hitting the north wall in the Pill, the order was not to get her head out of the Pill but to lay off, and that they considered this order a very dangerous one.

The County Court judge found that the master of the tug took upon himself the whole management of the towage; that he ordered the bridle to be slipped; that the master of the brigantine ordered the tug to keep the brigantine's head out of the Pill, that this order was not properly obeyed, and that the accident was thereby occasioned. He also stated that he believed the plaintiffs' witnesses, and disbelieved the defendants' witnesses.

The appeal was heard upon the judge's notes.

Abel Thomas, for the defendants, in support of the appeal.—The County Court had no jurisdiction to try this case. The action was instituted under sect. 2, sub-sect. 1, of the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Amendment Act 1869, which gives County Courts with Admiralty jurisdiction power to try "any claim arising out of any agreement made in relation to the use or hire of any ship." Those words relate to the hiring of ships by charter-party and the like, and are not applicable to a claim arising out of negligent towage. [BUTT, J.—Surely this case falls within the very words. Is not this an action for breach of contract for the hire of a ship?] It is submitted not. It is, however, contended that on the merits the tow was solely to blame, or if not solely to blame, was guilty of contributory negligence. It is the duty of the tug only to provide the motive power, and the duty of the tow to superintend the navigation. In the present case those on the tow failed to give proper orders, and this was the cause of the accident. A tug which executes any manœuvres in the absence of orders from the tow does so on her own responsibility, and she has a right to expect that the tow will give all the orders necessary to the performance of the towage:

The Duke of Manchester, 2 W. Rob. 470;
The Christina, 3 W. Rob. 27.

In the present case the disaster was solely due to the order of the brigantine to lay off when her stern was in the Pill. In order to do this the tug was obliged to starboard, and go across the stream. Although the tug-master thought the order a dangerous one, yet he was bound to obey it, and the only way to obey it was the manœuvre he executed. [BUTT, J.—I doubt whether it is the duty of the tow to give all the orders where a tug is employed merely to shift a vessel in a river.] The courts have always thought so, and as is pointed out in The Energy (23 L. T. Rep. N. S. 601; L. Rep. 3 A. & E. 48; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 503), were it left to the tug to execute some manœuvres without orders the result would be a divided command, which would be most prejudicial to safe towage. It therefore can make no difference in principle where and under what circumstances the towage is going on.

G. Barnes, for the plaintiffs, was not called upon.

Sir JAMES HANNEN.—On the point of jurisdiction of the County Court, the question is whether the present claim is a "claim arising out of any agreement made in relation to the use or hire of any ship." I cannot conceive more general words than these, and I think they plainly embrace the present case. As to the law, it has been contended that it is the duty of the tow to give directions to the tug, and undoubtedly that is true in a general sense. If a specific order is given by the tow to the tug, the responsibility for that order will rest with the tow. But it does not follow that the tow is to be constantly interfering with that which is especially the duty of the tug. That must depend upon a variety of considerations. Where there are a number of other vessels and small boats in the vicinity, of whose manœuvres the tug is in a position to judge, she is bound to exercise her judgment as to them, and not to be always waiting for orders from the tow, which may be a long way behind. In this particular case the tow was up a river in which it appears to be difficult to get down to a place where she could be conveniently turned. That is obviously a matter which the tug-master would be more likely to know about than the master of a vessel which comes only occasionally to the port.

It is a question of fact whether or not the tug-master had taken upon himself this particular duty of turning the tow round. That is a question of fact which the learned judge has had under consideration, and he has found that the tug-master did take upon himself the duty of turning this vessel. I see nothing to justify us in calling in question that finding. If the tug-master took upon himself the duty of turning the tow, did the master of the tow improperly interfere in that matter? That depends upon what was done in the Pill. Now, the general result of the evidence is that the judge did not think the defendants' evidence trustworthy. The master of the tow says he gave no orders whatever, but left it entirely to the tug until he was in the Pill, when he told the tug to keep his head out of the Pill, and that is consistent with the view the judge has taken. By that order the master of the tow meant that his vessel was not to be allowed to go further into the Pill, where there was danger of the stern getting against the wall. The master of the tow says that was the only order he gave, and he never said, "Take her head out into the river." On the other hand, the tug-master says he considered it an order to lay out into the river, and although he knew it to be dangerous he did it. I agree with the learned judge, that if the master of the tow sees danger, and says, "Keep me out of the Pill," the tug-master has no right to construe that into an order to go right across the river. I see no reason to think that the learned judge has not arrived at a correct conclusion, and I think this appeal must be dismissed with costs.

BUTT, J.—I am of the same opinion for the same reasons.

THE BERNINA. (a)

Collision—Cost of repairs—Restitutio in integrum—Lloyd's survey—Damage to cargo—Evidence—Registrar and merchants.

A successful plaintiff in a collision action is entitled to have his ship put into the same condition in which it was previous to the collision at the cost of the wrong-doer, irrespective of the fact that some of the repairs necessitated by the collision would shortly have been necessary to enable the ship to pass her classification survey, and in estimating the amount of the wrong-doer's liability no deduction can be made on this account.

On a reference in a collision action the registrar and merchants are not bound by uncontradicted evidence as to the amount of damage done, but are entitled to use their own judgment and experience, and find in accordance therewith.

THIS was an objection by the plaintiffs in a collision action to the registrar's report therein.

The action was instituted by the owners, master, and crew of the steamship Ann Webster and her cargo, against the owners of the steamship Bernina, to recover damages in respect of a collision between the Ann Webster and the Bernina. The hearing took place on the 20th and 22nd March 1886, when the Court found the Bernina solely to blame for the collision, and referred the amount of the damages to the registrar and merchants.

The collision took place on Dec. 29, 1885, in the Thames. The Ann Webster was laden with a cargo of coals. In consequence of the collision the Ann Webster grounded on the south shore in such a position that at high water the water was over her deck. Part of the cargo having been discharged the Ann Webster floated, and was taken to Beckton Jetty, where the rest of the cargo was unloaded.

The reference took place on June 18 and 19. Amongst other repairs effected to the Ann Webster, she was painted inside. The plaintiffs' witnesses alleged that, owing to the amount of mud which got into her when ashore, painting was necessary. The defendants' witnesses alleged that scraping would have been sufficient. It also appeared that, even if there had been no collision, the vessel would have had to undergo certain repairs, and among others painting within a twelvemonth, to pass her No. 2 survey for classification at Lloyd's.

It also appeared that about Dec. 1886 the Ann Webster would have had to pass her No. 2 survey for the purpose of classification at Lloyd's, and that some of the work which was actually done after the collision would, if no collision had occurred, have been required to be done for the purpose of enabling her to pass such survey; for instance, the painting of the holds inside.

After the repairs so done, the Ann Webster in fact passed the No. 2 survey without any further work.

It was contended before the registrar that the painting of the holds and other work required for the No. 2 survey was not necessitated by the collision at all, and that the plaintiffs could not recover in respect of it; or, if any portion of it was occasioned by the collision, the plaintiffs could not recover the whole, but only a proportion, as they got the advantage of work which enabled them to pass the No. 2 survey without further expense.

As to the damage to cargo the following affidavit was filed by the plaintiffs:

1. The Harton Coal Company of Newcastle-on-Tyne were the shippers of a cargo of coal which was being carried on board the steamship Ann Webster, on the 29th Dec. 1885, on which day the said steamship was, as I am informed and believe, run into and sunk by the steamship Bernina, off Tripcock Point, in the river Thames. In consequence of the said collision, the Ann Webster was entirely submerged, but was subsequently raised, and her cargo was discharged.

2. The said cargo consisted of 995 tons or thereabout of Bolton gas coal for delivery, under contract at Beckton, to the Gas Light and Coke Company.

3. A portion of the said cargo was necessarily discharged into lighters with the utmost possible despatch in order to float the Ann Webster, and in consequence of the circumstances attending the discharge the actual out-turn of the said cargo was 961 tons 14 cwt., being a deficiency of 33 tons 6 cwt. on the cargo shipped, which was solely lost by reason of the said collision. The value of the said 33 6-20th tons of coals so lost was the sum of 11*l.* 13*s.* 1*d.*, being at the rate of 7*s.* a ton, which was the shipping value of the said coals.

4. In consequence of the said collision and the subsequent submersion of the said coals they were greatly deteriorated, and were below contract quality, and the said Harton Coal Company, in order to prevent a refusal by the Gas Light and Coke Company to accept the said coal under their contract, came to an arrangement with the Gas Light and Coke Company by which they allowed the said company 2*s.* per ton on the weight delivered as aforesaid, and the said Harton Coal Company have thereby lost the sum of 96*l.* 3*s.* 5*d.* through depreciation in the value of the said coal at the rate aforesaid.

The defendants gave no evidence to contradict the above affidavit.

The Registrar (inter alia) disallowed two items of 80*l.* and 10*l.* in respect of repairs, and reduced the amount claimed for damage to cargo, viz., 107*l.* 16*s.* 6*d.*, to 52*l.* 10*s.*

The plaintiffs objected to the report for the following reasons:

(1) Because the sum of 80*l.* or thereabout was erroneously disallowed on the ground that the owners of the Ann Webster, by reason of the repairs of the damage done, were saved an equivalent expenditure on the vessel at the No. 2 survey, which would have been due some months afterwards.

(2) Because 10*l.* was deducted from the sum charged and actually paid for plates and angles, and there was no evidence that such sum was unreasonable or unusual.

(3) Because the assistant registrar erroneously reduced the plaintiffs' claim for damages to the cargo through the said collision from 107*l.* 16*s.* 6*d.* to 52*l.* 10*s.*

(4) Because the plaintiffs sufficiently proved damage to the cargo to the extent of 107*l.* 16*s.* 6*d.*

(5) Because there was no evidence whatever by the defendants in contradiction of the plaintiffs' proof of such damage.

(6) Because such last-mentioned reduction was entirely arbitrary and unsupported, and was not justified by the evidence.

The Registrar's reasons for his report were as follows:

The items objected to, originally more numerous, have now been reduced to three.

(1) The disallowance of about 80*l.* for expenses of No. 2 survey, saved by the repairs done after the collision.

(2) The disallowance of 10*l.* of the charge for plates and angle iron.

(3) The disallowance of 55*l.* 6*s.* 6*d.* of the claim for damage to the cargo.

(1) As to the first item it was distinctly stated by the plaintiffs' witness, Mr. Honor, the shipbuilder, who repaired the Ann Webster, that the repairs done after the collision "really saved them going through a second survey," which would have been done about the end of this year 1886. I am advised that the cost of the second survey for a vessel of the Ann Webster's tonnage, 77 tons gross, would probably have exceeded 130*l.* in addition to the loss from detention say for seven days, which at 6*l.* per day, the rate allowed by us for demurrage, would amount to 42*l.*, making altogether more than 170*l.* To allow 82*l.* of this, as actually saved by the repairs done after the collision in Jan. and Feb. 1886, i.e., less than twelve months before the second survey would have been due but for these repairs, seems to be a moderate estimate.

J. G. Barnes for the plaintiffs.—The 80*l.* has been erroneously disallowed on the ground that the plaintiffs might have been obliged to subsequently expend the same sum, even if there had been no collision, to enable the ship to pass her survey. Shipowners are entitled to a restitutio in integrum, and they are therefore entitled to have their ship put into the same condition as she was in before the collision. True it is that, while an assured recovers his loss less one-third for new materials, it is to be observed that he recovers on a contract, an implied condition of which is that this reduction shall be made. In the present case the liability of the defendants arises from a tort, and the measure of indemnification in such cases is co-extensive with the amount of damage done:

The Gazelle, 2 W. Rob. 279;
The Inflexible, Swa. 200.

Although it was highly probable that repairs would have had to be done to the vessel to enable her to pass her survey, yet her owners might for various reasons have seen fit not to keep up her classification, or the vessel might have been lost before the repairs would have been effected. It is also submitted that the registrar was wrong in disallowing 10*l.* for plates. The registrar had no right to reduce the plaintiffs' claim for damage to cargo. He was bound by the uncontradicted evidence of the plaintiffs, and yet he has in fact utterly disregarded it.

J. P. Aspinall, for the defendants, contra.—The case of The Inflexible (ubi sup.) is not in point. In consequence of these repairs the plaintiffs have been saved expenditure in respect of repairs which would have been subsequently necessary. In the case of The Marine Insurance Company v. The China Transpacific Steamship Company (55 L. T. Rep. N. S. 491; 11 App. Cas. 573), the House of Lords held that, where a ship underwent repairs in a dock some of which were covered by a policy of marine insurance and others not, both going on at the same time, the dock charges are to be apportioned between the assured and the underwriters. So here, if any portion of the repairs claimed is incidental both to repairing damage done by the collision and putting the ship in a state to enable her to pass her survey, it is only reasonable that the plaintiffs should bear some share of those expenses. As to the reduction for the damage to cargo, the registrar was entitled to attach such weight to the plaintiffs' evidence as he might think fit. The registrar and merchants were in the position of a jury, and were justified in bringing their own experience to bear upon the matter. Moreover the plaintiffs' affidavit does not state the extent of the real reduction in the value of the coal; all it does is to allege that the plaintiffs, in order to secure the coals being taken by a certain company, thought fit to make an allowance of 2*s.* per ton.

Barnes in reply.

Sir JAMES HANNEN.—I think the principle upon which the cost of repairs ought to be estimated is exceedingly simple. It is clear that a person who has had an injury done to his property is entitled to have it restored to him so that it may be used by him as effectually as it would have been if it had not had damage done to it. I entirely assent to the proposition that Mr. Barnes has urged, that because the doing of repairs which have been rendered necessary by the collision procures an advantage to the owner of the damaged property, it is not to be taken into account by way of diminishing the amount which the wrong-doer has to pay in respect of that which is necessary to put the damaged property in the condition it was in before. If a distinction can be drawn between amounts which the registrar has allowed in respect of such repairs as were necessary to make the vessel seaworthy again, and amounts which he has disallowed because they would have to be done some time afterwards in order that the vessel might pass her survey, the distinction must be drawn. For that purpose I think it will be necessary that the case should go back to the registrar in order that this item may be considered on the principle that I have indicated, that is, to find what repairs would be necessary to restore the vessel to the condition in which she was before the collision. Take an illustration: if this vessel was soiled with mud inside so that it would be necessary to make her fit to receive cargo, that the mud should be removed and she thoroughly washed out, then all her owner would be entitled to would be the cost of the washing and cleansing. But if, knowing that he would have to do the painting some time hence, and if he did it now it would save him subsequent trouble and expense, he would not be entitled to be paid for it, because the necessity had not arisen in consequence of the collision. If, on the other hand, in order that the vessel might be used again in the ordinary course of business, painting was necessary, then the fact that it enabled the vessel to pass her survey is not to be taken into account by way of diminution. As to the other two items, I do not think it necessary to refer them back. On questions of value the registrar and merchants are entitled to use their own knowledge and experience, and they are not bound hard and fast by the evidence, whether verbal or on affidavit, of any particular witness. Having heard the evidence they came to the conclusion that the charge for plates was too high, and they have taken off a certain amount. As to the damage to the cargo, while the affidavit puts the damage at a very high figure, the registrar and merchants, using their own experience, have reduced the amount by 15 per cent. They have treated the coal as deteriorated, but have not accepted the estimate of deterioration put on it by a particular witness. On these points I shall not interfere with their discretion, but must send the report back on the first point, and I shall reserve the question of costs pending the registrar's finding. If it should be that the registrar has acted upon principles which I think are right, then the defendants will succeed altogether.

Dec. 20.—On the matter coming before the registrar the plaintiffs proffered the evidence of the surveyor to Lloyd's Registry, on whose recommendation the damages had been repaired. This evidence was objected to by the defendants, but was admitted by the registrar.

The registrar subsequently made a supplementary report, which was so far as is material as follows:

> Having on the 20th ult. heard the evidence of the surveyor to Lloyd's Registry, on whose recommendation the damages were repaired, and the Ann Webster passed the No. 2 survey (but who had not been produced at the previous inquiry), we have come to the conclusion that the special works required by the rule were not in this case insisted upon, the surveyor having in the exercise of his discretion satisfied himself as to the fitness of the vessel for the class from the investigation which the damage repairs afforded him. To that extent therefore the reason for the deduction in question has been removed, and we are of opinion that the disallowance should be reduced to 35*l.*, which I am advised fairly represents the proportion disallowed for other repairs not properly attributable to the collision.

Jan. 26, 1887.—Barnes, for the plaintiffs, moved to vary the report in accordance with the registrar's finding, and for an order condemning the defendants in the costs.

J. P. Aspinall for the defendants.—The second reference was solely necessitated by the plaintiffs' failure to call Lloyd's surveyor at the first inquiry. Had this witness been called, none of these subsequent proceedings would have been required. The defendants have succeeded on two of the items in dispute, and have now practically succeeded on the third. The plaintiffs should therefore be condemned in the costs of all the proceedings subsequent to the first reference. The Court said that if the registrar had acted upon principles which it thought right, then the defendants should succeed altogether. The registrar has done so, and therefore the defendants are entitled to the costs.

Barnes in reply.—The plaintiffs have in principle succeeded in getting a larger allowance, and therefore are entitled to costs.

Sir JAMES HANNEN.—The way I propose to deal with this matter is this: The plaintiffs are to have the costs of the reference and objections generally; but the defendants are to have such costs of objection as the plaintiffs failed on, so far as they can be separated. Each party is to pay the costs of the second reference.

The Marine Insurance Company Limited v. The China Transpacific Steamship Company Limited. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF APPEAL IN ENGLAND.

Marine insurance — Particular average loss — Measure of loss—Apportionment of dock dues.

A partial loss sustained by a shipowner by a disaster insured against is not to be measured by the depreciation in the value of the vessel thereby occasioned; but where there is such a loss, and the ship is repaired by the owner, he is entitled so recover the sum properly expended in executing the necessary repairs, less the usual allowances.

Pitman v. Universal Marine Insurance Company (4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 544; 46 L. T. Rep. N. S. 863; 9 Q. B. Div. 192) approved.

A ship insured under a policy containing the warranty "free from average under 3 per cent." went into dock to be cleaned, scraped, and painted; while in dock an injury previously unknown, causing a particular average loss within the policy, was discovered. The cleaning, scraping, and painting went on concurrently with the necessary repairs to the injury, and the ship was in dock eight days, being detained the last five days solely for the purpose of the repairs apart from the cleaning, scraping, and painting. If half the dock dues during the first three days were to be attributed to the repairs, the average loss exceeded 3 per cent. The arbitrator, who stated a special case between the parties, found that, if there was to be an apportionment of these dues, one half should be attributed to the repairs, the other half to the cleaning, scraping, &c.

Held, that the measure of the assured's damage was not the depreciation in the value of his ship occasioned by the loss, and therefore was not the actual cost of repairs plus the dock dues for the days necessary for cleaning, scraping, &c., but was the sum properly expended in effecting the necessary repairs less the usual allowances, and that such sum was the cost of the repairs plus the whole cost of the dock dues less half the cost of the first three days.

This was an appeal from a judgment of the Court of Appeal (Lord Esher, M.R. and Fry, L.J., Baggallay, L.J. dissenting) which had reversed a judgment of the Queen's Bench Division (Pollock, B. and Manisty, J.) upon a special case stated by an arbitrator.

The respondents were owners of the steamship Vancouver, and the appellants were an insurance company carrying on business in London and elsewhere. In April 1874 the respondents effected an insurance on their ship with the appellants, the policy containing a clause that in case of an average loss, if the loss were under 3 per cent., the underwriters were not to be liable. In the course of her voyage from Hong Kong to San Francisco the vessel encountered very heavy weather and her sternpost was then broken by the sea. The damage, however, was not known or suspected at the time it occurred.

(a) Reported by C. E. Malden, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The Vancouver lay in San Francisco Bay without employment until Jan. 1876, when her bottom became so excessively foul that no prudent owner would have sent her to sea again without having her first scraped and cleaned, and she was therefore on the 4th Jan. put into dry dock to be cleaned, scraped, and painted. While those operations were going on the injury to her sternpost was discovered and the damage was made good with all possible speed, and she was discharged out of dock on the 11th Jan.

Had the vessel required nothing but cleaning, scraping, and painting she might have been finished and discharged out of dock by the evening of the 6th Jan., and the dock bill would then have amounted to $3292; on the other hand, if she had not required cleaning, scraping, and painting, but had gone into dock solely for the purpose of surveying and repairing the fracture of the sternpost, she would have required to be in dock the whole time from the 4th to the 11th Jan. The total dock bill was $9869, and the question arose how much of that sum ought to be charged against the appellants. On behalf of the appellants it was contended that no part of the dock charges incurred during the time the vessel was being cleaned, scraped, and painted ought to be included in the amount charged against the appellants, notwithstanding the fact that the repairs to the sternpost were being carried on at the same time. The Queen's Bench Division (Pollock, B. and Manisty, J.) decided the point in favour of the underwriters, but the Court of Appeal (Lord Esher, M.R., Baggally and Fry, L.JJ.) reversed their decision and held that the underwriters were liable for half the docking charges while the vessel was in dock for the common purpose of being cleaned, scraped, and painted and repaired. By the decision of the Queen's Bench Division the average loss was brought within the 3 per cent. clause under which the underwriters were not liable, and by that of the Court of Appeal it was made to exceed that percentage, and therefore the appellants were held liable to pay the whole cost of the repairs and a proportion of the dock charges.

The Attorney-General (Sir C. Russell, Q.C.) and Barnes appeared for the appellants; Cohen, Q.C. and Shiress Will, Q.C. for the respondents. The following authorities were cited:

At the conclusion of the arguments, their Lordships took time to consider their judgment.

July 30.—Their Lordships gave judgment as follows:—

The Lord Chancellor (Herschell).—My Lords: The sole question arising for decision in this case is whether a particular average loss sustained by the respondents exceeded 3 per cent. within the meaning of the warranty contained in a policy of insurance underwritten by the appellants. The Vancouver, the vessel insured, while on a journey from Hong Kong to San Francisco, encountered very heavy weather, which resulted in a fracture of her sternpost. At the time when the damage was incurred the vessel had a very foul bottom, which so much affected her speed that no prudent owner would have sent her to sea again without having her first scraped and cleaned. She lay for some time in San Francisco Bay, and was on the 4th Jan. 1876 put into the graving dock for the purpose of being cleaned, scraped, and painted. She was put into dock for this purpose only, the injury to the sternpost being then unknown, and only discovered by a survey made in the dry dock. The vessel lay in dock until the 11th Jan., the work necessary for repairing the sternpost occupying all that time. The cleaning, scraping, and painting proceeded concurrently with the necessary repairs to the sternpost. If the former alone had been requisite the vessel might have left the dock on the evening of the 6th Jan. The cost of repairing the sternpost, irrespective of dock dues, was less than 3 per cent. under the policy. The question then arose, what portion of the dock dues ought to be added for the purpose of ascertaining the average loss? The appellants contended that only the dues for the days subsequent to the 6th Jan. ought to be so added, and this would still leave the loss under 3 per cent. The respondents contended that either the whole or a portion of the dues for the earlier days must be taken into account as part of the average loss. If half of these dues are to be attributed to the repair of the sternpost, then the average loss exceeded 3 per cent. It was found by the arbitrator, who stated a special case between the parties, that if there was to be an apportionment of the dues, then, so far as the apportionment was a question of fact, it was to be taken that one-half the sum should be attributed to the repairs and one-half to the cleaning and scraping.

The Court of Appeal, reversing the judgment of a divisional court, held that one-half of the dues incurred while both operations were being carried on ought to be attributed to each of them, and that the average loss, therefore, exceeded 3 per cent. From this judgment the present appeal is brought. I have entertained considerable doubt whether the appellants' contention ought not to prevail, but I have after consideration come to the conclusion, which, I believe, is shared by your Lordships, that the judgment of the court below must be affirmed. It is truly said for the appellants that a contract of insurance is a contract of indemnity only, and they urge that if the judgment stands the respondents will obtain something more than an indemnity for the injury to the sternpost—that they will obtain an actual advantage from its having been fractured. If, they say, no such disaster had occurred, the shipowners must, before using the vessel again, have had her cleaned and scraped, and for this purpose have paid for three days' docking. As it is, besides getting the sternpost repaired without cost to themselves, they are relieved of one-half of the dock dues that they must otherwise necessarily have paid for the purpose of getting their vessel cleaned and scraped. I think it cannot be denied that they do obtain this advantage, but I do not think this conclusively establishes that the court below have proceeded on an erroneous principle. It may, as it seems to me, sometimes unavoidably happen that the assured gain an incidental advantage from the fact that a damage arising from a risk within the policy has necessitated repairs at the expense of the underwriter. For instance, a vessel requires scraping and painting at certain intervals, say of five years. Suppose that a year before the time has arrived for this being done in ordinary course the vessel meets with a disaster for which the underwriters are responsible, and is docked for repairs. The shipowner takes advantage of the opportunity to scrape and paint his ship, in no way delaying the work of repair. It could not be contended that the entire dock dues for the time occupied in scraping and painting were to be borne by the shipowner, if they were to be borne by him at all; and yet, even if they were apportioned, the shipowner would obtain some advantage. Again, suppose that a vessel needs repairs on account of two different injuries, for only one of which the underwriter is liable, but certain materials required for repairing both injuries were obtained more cheaply than they would have been if purchased in the quantities required for one alone. It could surely never be contended that the underwriter was to pay less than the cost of repairing the sea damage for which he was liable, diminished as that cost would be by the cheaper acquisition of the material, and that part of the cost of it was to be thrown on the shipowner, and yet, if not, the shipowner would obtain some advantage by the circumstance that his vessel had sustained a disaster covered by a policy of insurance, and that the repairs thereby rendered necessary, and other repairs which the shipowner had to undertake, were executed together. It was contended by the Attorney-General and Mr. Barnes, for the appellants, that the loss sustained by the shipowner by the disaster insured against was to be measured by the depreciation of the value of his vessel thereby occasioned. And they ingeniously argued that in the present case, inasmuch as the vessel whose sternpost was injured had already so foul a bottom as to necessitate docking before another voyage was prosecuted, she was only depreciated to an extent that would be covered by the cost of the necessary repairs plus the cost of the extra docking for that purpose beyond what was requisite for cleaning her. It is on this point that I have entertained doubts whether the view presented on behalf of the appellants was not the sound one. But I have come to the conclusion that a particular average loss is not, as an ordinary rule, to be measured in the manner contended for. Although there was considerable difference of opinion expressed by the judges in the Court of Appeal in the case of Pitman v. The Universal Marine Insurance Company (46 L. T. Rep. N. S. 863; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 544; 9 Q. B. Div. 192) as to the mode in which the amount of the particular average loss in that case was to be arrived at, all the judges were, I think, agreed that where there is a partial loss in consequence of injury to a vessel by perils insured against, and the ship is actually repaired by the shipowner, he is entitled, as a general rule, to recover the sum properly expended in executing the necessary repairs less the usual allowances. This is, I think, the correct view. It has not been usual in cases of partial loss to apply the test suggested by the appellants, and it would often launch the parties upon an inquiry embarrassing and difficult of determination. I have not lost sight of the fact that the vessel was put into dock only for the purpose of being scraped and painted. But I cannot think that this is material. The injury to the sternpost was immediately discovered, and she remained and was kept there, and the dock was employed for both purposes. Once this conclusion is arrived at, and also that the cost of repairing the damage caused by the perils insured against is the true test, all the rest, I think, follows. And I concur in and have nothing to add to the reasoning by which the Master of the Rolls reached the conclusion that one-half of the dock dues for the first three days should be considered part of the cost of the repairs for which the appellants were responsible. I therefore move your Lordships that the judgment appealed from be affirmed, and the appeal dismissed with costs.

Lord BLACKBURN.—My Lords: This is an appeal against an order of the Court of Appeal of the 8th July 1885, on appeal from an order made by the Queen's Bench Division by which it was ordered that judgment on the special case herein be entered for the defendants. The order appealed against then proceeds: "This court doth declare in respect of paragraph 10 of the special case stated herein that the warranty contained in the said policy has been satisfied by reason of there having been a particular average loss of 3 per cent." I think that the only question before this House is whether on the statements in the special case this declaration is right. I have come to the conclusion that it is right. But before stating my reasons for so thinking I wish to say a word as to an argument urged by the Attorney-General which I think does not apply to this case. The Vancouver steamship was at the time when the stern-post was broken on a voyage to San Francisco with cargo. I agree with the Attorney-General that the primary duty of the shipowners was, if practicable, to carry that cargo to San Francisco and there deliver it. And though I think it not necessary to decide it, I am not prepared to say that, if in order to fulfil that primary duty it had been necessary to bring the ship into dock and pay dock and harbour dues, there would have been ground for charging any portion of those to underwriters on the ship, even though in consequence she was brought into a place where the repairs for which they were liable would be more cheaply and conveniently done than if the vessel had not been brought in. But that primary duty was in this case completely fulfilled on Feb. 18, 1875. And then the owners were under no obligation to anyone to proceed at once to put the ship in order for a fresh voyage, or to go into dock till it suited them. It suited their convenience to allow her to lie in the Bay of San Francisco till Jan. 1876, a space of nearly eleven months, during which the policy for twelve months from the 1st March 1874 ran out by efflux of time. Then they proceeded to put the ship in order. I agree with the Master of the Rolls that the first question is, what would be the measure of the average on the hull which the underwriters would have had to pay if there had been no warranty free of average on the policy, and that we are then to see whether that amounts to 3 per cent. Some cases were referred to by Mr. Barnes on the argument which show that there sometimes is difficulty as to what averages could be joined to make up 3 per cent., but no such question is raised on the statements in the special case, and I think it unnecessary to pursue this subject.

Now I think that, if by delaying as they did for nearly a year the owners had increased the cost of the repairs, it would be unfair to charge more against the underwriters on that account; but except in that respect I agree with the Master of the Rolls that the shipowners might take their own time, and then when they do the whole repairs as well those which they have to bear themselves as those which concern underwriters or others, that, if fairly and reasonably done, fixes the amount, and it is a question how much of that expense is to be attributed to the repairs, the cost of which the owners themselves had to bear, and how much to the repairs of that damage for which they had to be indemnified by the underwriters. All depends on the statements in the special case. The first paragraph of the special case sufficiently states the effect of the policy. I think it indisputable that the fracture of the stern-post described in the second paragraph of the special case was a damage to the hull of the Vancouver during the time she was covered by the policy. It was occasioned by one of the perils against which the appellants were to indemnify the respondents. And I think it also indisputable that the foulness of the bottom of the ship was a damage to the hull of the vessel occasioned by wear and tear against which the underwriters were not bound to indemnify the respondents. It is said in the third paragraph that "at the time when the damage" occasioned by the underwriters' peril was incurred, the bottom of the vessel was already very foul, and that "it may be taken as a fact in the case that she would not have put to sea again after the 18th Feb. without being first put into dry dock for the purpose of having her scraped and cleaned." I do not think it important when the foulness which rendered it reasonable and proper for the owners for their own sakes to have the vessel put into the dry dock arose. The foulness would, I presume, go on increasing from day to day till the day when the Vancouver was put into the dry dock, and indeed that may be inferred from the statement in the fourth paragraph, but no part of it was chargeable to the underwriters, whether it was incurred earlier or later. And the shipowners, acting as reasonable men, would have sooner or later to put her in the dry dock in order to scrape, clean, and paint her. They were under no obligation to anyone to have her put in a state for proceeding to sea till it suited them to do so. That was not till January, about eleven months, during which time the appellants' policy expired by efflux of time. But the appellants were liable to indemnify against the expense of the repairs due to the underwriters' perils accruing whilst the policy was unexpired, unless the warranty is satisfied. That expense was not in any way increased by this delay. The owners, acting with a view to their own benefit, caused the Vancouver to be placed in the dry dock. It is said in paragraph 4 of the special case that the owners "determined to put her in dry dock for the purpose of having her cleaned, scraped, and painted, and for that purpose only." I do not understand this as meaning more than that they determined to do this on that account. whether there were other reasons for putting and keeping her in the dry dock or not. The first step which was taken as soon as the ship was dry was, what I think is usual and was evidently reasonable, to hold a survey, and then the surveyor discovered that the stern-post was broken about thirty inches above the keel, and recommended its repair. This was proper advice, whether the cause of that breakage was one for which the owners were entitled to come upon underwriters, or one on which they stood their own insurers. The case then proceeds, "It was accordingly repaired in dry dock with all reasonable speed and economy, and the vessel was discharged from dry dock on the 11th Jan. repaired, cleaned, scraped, and painted." Then follow the 6th and 7th paragraphs which I need not read, and which I cannot abridge. The 8th and 9th paragraphs only state the contentions of the parties. The Court of Appeal all agreed that the $3292.37 should be attributed partly to repairs, and partly to cleaning, scraping, and painting. I do not think it can properly be said to be a question of pure fact, or a question of pure law, in what proportions the sum should be divided. I think, when it is established that part of the expense is to be attributed to one cause and part to another, it is a mixed question of law and fact under the circumstances how much to each. And I agree with the majority that in this case it ought to be in equal proportions.

I have now to dispose of one further argument made at the bar, which seems to have been what mainly influenced Manisty, J. There is no doubt that a contract of insurance is a contract of indemnity. And it was argued that, if the owners who, had there been no damage to the stern-post, would in order to clean and scrape the ship have had to pay the whole $3292.37 of dock dues, now get that done for one-half of the sum, the other half being paid by the underwriters, they got more than an indemnity. They make, it is said, a profit. I think this is a fallacy—ingenious, but not sound. The whole, both what concerns the shipowners and what concerns the underwriters, has to be repaired. It is best and most cheaply done by doing them both together, for whom it may concern, in the dry dock at the same time; and that being so, each of the parties concerned gets his work done more cheaply because it is done wholesale. Neither is entitled to take the whole benefit of the reduction of cost and apply it to his own work exclusively. The facts in the case of Kemp v. Halliday (6 B. & S. 723) were very complicated; but I think it will be found on examination that the judgment of the Exchequer Chamber, reported in 6 Best and Smith, recognises the principle that in calculating whether the repairs necessary to save the insured subject bore such a relation to its value when saved as to justify the assured in refusing to do them, the fact, if it be one, that the best way of doing them was in such a manner as to benefit others, who would then have to pay part of the joint expenses, is not to be ignored. I think that the appeal should be dismissed with costs, and I agree in the judgment proposed by the Lord Chancellor.

Lord FITZGERALD.—My Lords: I entirely concur in the judgments which have been delivered, and I can with advantage add nothing. From an early stage in the argument I thought that the reasoning of the Master of the Rolls in the Court of Appeal ought to be adopted together with his very simple and sensible mode of adjusting the expenses which have been incurred in San Francisco in the joint operation of cleaning and repairing the vessel and repairing her stern-post.

Lord ASHBOURNE.—My Lords: I also think that the judgment appealed from ought to be affirmed. In my opinion the judgment of the Master of the Rolls in the Court of Appeal proceeds on entirely sound grounds, and I think that the decision which he pronounced quite met all the justice of the case.

Judgment appealed from affirmed, and appeal dismissed with costs.

COURT OF APPEAL.

Thursday, Oct. 28, 1886.

(Before Lord ESHER, M.R., LINDLEY and LOPES, L.JJ.)

THE SAILING SHIP GARSTON COMPANY LIMITED v. HICKIE, BORMAN, AND CO. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION.

Charter-party, excepted perils in — "Dangers and accidents of navigation" — Freight — Short delivery—Collision through negligence of another ship—Liability of shipowner.

A clause in a charter-party, that the balance of freight is to be paid on the delivery of the cargo agreeably to bills of lading, less cost of cargo delivered short of bill of lading quantity, entitles the charterers where there has been short delivery to set off the cost of such short delivery against the balance of freight, although such short delivery has been occasioned by one of the excepted perils.

A shipowner is not liable to the shipper for damage done to the cargo through collision with another ship, if such collision was due solely to the negligence of the other ship and the shipowner is by the charter-party not to be liable for "dangers and accidents of the seas, rivers, and navigation."

Judgment of Grantham, J., affirmed.

THIS was an action by shipowners against the defendants as charterers and cargo owners to recover a general average contribution and a balance due in respect of freight under the charter-party. The defendants counter-claimed in respect of damage done to cargo and short delivery of cargo. By the charter-party it was agreed that the plaintiffs' ship should proceed to Cardiff, and there load a cargo of coal from the defendants' factors, and should forthwith proceed to Bombay and deliver the same there, "the freight to be paid on unloading and right delivery of the cargo at and after the rate of 18*s.* 6*d.* per ton on the quantity delivered (the act of God, the Queen's enemies, restraint of princes and rulers, fire, and all and every other dangers and accidents of the seas, rivers, and navigation always mutually excepted)," part of the freight to be paid in advance and the balance "on the right and true delivery of the cargo agreeably to bills of lading, less cost of coals and coke delivered short of bill of lading quantity." The plaintiffs' ship accordingly loaded a cargo of coal at Cardiff and proceeded on her voyage; but, in consequence of a collision with another ship (caused solely by the negligence of those in charge of such other ship), she had to put back and unload for repairs. Owing to this unloading and reshipment, upon the cargo being delivered to the defendants at Bombay, it was short of the quantity mentioned in the bills of lading by 134 tons.

The defendants claimed under the provisions of the charter to set off against the balance of freight due from them to the plaintiffs the cost of the coals so short delivered.

At the trial, before Grantham, J., without a jury, at Liverpool, the learned judge gave judgment for the plaintiffs on the claim for a general average contribution, and for the defendants on the claim for freight, and for the plaintiffs on the counter-claim. The defendants appealed against this judgment, and there was a cross-appeal by the plaintiffs.

Carver for the defendants.—The defendants are entitled to recover on their counter-claim for short delivery of cargo. The contention of the plaintiffs is that the loss of cargo was due to a danger or accident of navigation, for which, by the charter-party, they are not to be liable. But the loss occurred owing to the negligence of another ship. That is not within the words of the exception. Those words refer to dangers and accidents inseparable from navigation—perils that must arise in the navigation of ships in the ordinary way, that is, with ordinary care. A collision which is caused by the negligence of another ship cannot be caused by a danger or accident of navigation; it is caused by something which has no special connection with navigation, viz., the neglect to take ordinary care. In Woodley v. Michell (48 L. T. Rep. N. S. 599; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 71; 11 Q. B. Div. 47) it was held that a collision caused by the negligent act of one of two ships, without any difficulty of waves or wind contributing to such collision, was not a peril of the sea. So here "dangers and accidents of navigation" denote dangers peculiar to navigation, which do not happen by the intervention of man and are not to be prevented by human prudence. By the very terms of the charter the defendants were entitled to set off against the balance of freight the cost of the coal short delivered, whether the short delivery was caused by an excepted peril or not.

French, Q.C. and Synnott for the plaintiffs.—Collision by the negligence of another ship is a danger or accident of navigation. In Lloyd v. General Iron Screw Collier Company (33 L. J. 269, Ex.; 3 H. & C. 284) Bramwell, B. said: "Suppose a man were to go blindfold along the street, and to run against something, could anyone say he met with an accident? He would do an act that would be very likely to lead to a mischief. It is different with the person who might suffer by such an act; he might fairly say that he met with an accident—a peril—which every man is liable to who goes out in the road and meets with negligent people. But I do not think the fair meaning of the word, or the reason of the thing, extends 'accident' to the case of a mischief accruing to the ship and cargo from the negligence of her own crew." With regard to the case of Woodley v. Michell (ubi sup.), the expression "perils of the sea" in a charter-party have only a limited meaning, and refer to the action of the wind and the waves, apart from human agency. The present case is quite different, because the word "navigation" at once introduces human agency. [Lopes, L.J.—While the sea is not under the control of man, navigation is. Lindley, L.J.—Do you say that a shipowner, under these general words, would be protected against the negligence of his own captain?] It is not necessary to say so in this case. They cited

Hayes v. Kennedy, 41 Penn. State, 378;
Angell on Carriers, 5th edit. p. 153, note (a).

The clause as to deductions from freight of cost of coal not delivered must be read subject to the excepted perils. The consequences of otherwise deciding would be illogical:

Meyer v. Dresser, 33 L. J. 289, C. P.

Carver in reply.

Lord Esher, M.R.—I will deal first with the question whether the defendants were entitled to set off against the balance of freight the cost of the non-delivered cargo. Parties may so contract if they please, and the question is, have they done so here? The rate of freight is stated in the charter-party, after it is the clause containing the excepted perils, and it is said that those perils apply to the freight. But although those excepted perils have come in every charter in the same place, nobody till to-day has suggested that they apply to freight. Part of the freight is to be prepaid, and there can be no deduction for short delivery. The rest is to be paid on "right and true delivery of the cargo agreeably to bills of lading, less the cost of coals or coke delivered short of the bill of lading quantity." That means the balance of freight to be paid is to be at the named rate, less the cost of the coal not delivered. No language could be plainer. It may be that the cargo owner could not recover damages in an action for short delivery, but it is plainly stated that in paying the freight for cargo delivered he may deduct the cost of the coal not delivered. The remaining point is, whether the defendants were entitled to recover on the counter-claim. The facts are, that damage was done to this ship by collision with another ship, which collision was brought about solely through the negligence of the other ship. Owing to this damage, there was a loss of cargo and consequent short delivery. For this the shipowners are primâ facie liable. But they say that they have contracted that they are not to be liable for "dangers and accidents of navigation." The question is, therefore, whether a loss of cargo, caused by a collision through the negligence of another ship, is caused by a danger or accident of navigation. It has been held that such a loss is not a loss by perils of the sea within the meaning of that expression in a charter-party. It is a loss occasioned by the act of man and not by the sea.

But this charter-party contains an exception, not only of dangers and accidents of the sea, but also "of navigation." Perils of navigation must not be construed as if it meant the same as perils of the sea, or else you make the former expression nonsense. Perils of navigation must be held to mean something different to perils of the sea in a charter-party. The question which the court, with the knowledge it has as to what happens at sea, has to determine is, whether a loss which happens by a collision through the negligence of another ship is a loss by a danger or accident of navigation. If the sea drives a spiked instrument into the ship, that is a peril of the sea. It is an act done by the sea. But navigation is done by men. The danger or accident may be caused by the mode in which the ship itself is navigated. I do not say that the expression "dangers and accidents of navigation" could never cover what was done on the ship itself. Something might be done on the ship itself without negligence which would be a peril of navigation. But a collision with another ship is the great peril in the navigation of narrow seas. All the navigation rules about navigation are directed to this. It is undoubtedly a danger caused by bad navigation, and must, therefore, be a danger of navigation. It is a danger to you who are navigating caused by the negligence of others navigating near you. But if the collision is caused by the negligence of those on board the shipowner's own ship, it is not a danger of navigation. It would be a danger of employing inefficient servants. In a case like the present, where the collision has happened solely through the negligence of those on board the other ship, if the shipowner has excepted his liability in the case of dangers of navigation, he is not liable. My brother Grantham was therefore right, and this appeal must be dismissed.

LINDLEY, L.J.—The main question is, whether the collision by which the loss of cargo was caused comes within the perils excepted by the charter-party, which include "dangers and accidents of navigation." To my mind, that is capable of only one answer. The expression "dangers of navigation" is intended to extend and enlarge the expression "perils of the sea." We have to ask ourselves whether such a collision as this was is a danger of navigation. I should have thought that it was a most prominent danger of navigation. We should be narrowing the expression down in an unjust way if we were to confine it to matters arising in the navigation of the ship itself. I think that a shipowner could not cover the negligence of himself or his servants under those words. Our decision in this case is perfectly consistent with the decision in the case of Woodley v. Michell (ubi sup.). The other question is whether the defendants can deduct from the freight the cost of the quantity of coal short delivered. By the very words of the charter the balance of freight is to be paid less the cost of coal short delivered. That is apparently an express bargain that the charterers may make that deduction. But it is said they are not entitled to do so, because the short delivery was caused by the excepted perils. I do not agree with that. It seems to me that the words of the contract are too plain to admit of doubt, and that on this point also the decision of Grantham, J. was right.

LOPES, L.J.—I entirely agree with what has been said by the Master of the Rolls and my brother Lindley, and have very little to say myself. The important question is, what is the effect of the excepted perils clause in this bill of lading? The case of Woodley v. Michell (ubi sup.) has been cited to the court as an authority upon this question. There it was held that a collision caused by negligence was not a peril of the sea. But the words here are different; they are much larger. They are "dangers and accidents of the seas, rivers, and navigation." The question is, are the words "dangers and accidents of navigation" senseless and superfluous, or are they to have some meaning given to them? I am of opinion that they are to have some meaning given to them. It may be said, why should "dangers of navigation" cover a loss occasioned by the negligence of the other ship, when "perils of the sea" do not? The answer is that while the seas are beyond human control, navigation is directly subject to it; and that while negligence cannot be a peril of that which is beyond human control, it may be a peril of anything that is subject to that control.

THE JOHANN SVERDRUP. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM THE PROBATE, DIVORCE, AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION (ADMIRALTY).

*Collision—Compulsory pilotage—River Tyne—Foreign ships—*41 Geo. 3, c. lxxxvi.—Merchant Shipping Act 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 63), s. 39—Tyne Pilotage Order Confirmation Act 1865 (28 & 29 Vict. c. 44).

The Tyne Pilotage Order Confirmation Act 1865 (28 Vict. c. 44) was meant to be a complete code for regulating pilotage in the river Tyne, and was intended to supersede the pilotage provisions in the Act 41 Geo. 3, c. lxxxvi., and therefore sect. 16 of the schedule of the Tyne Pilotage Order Confirmation Act 1865 exempts all vessels, whether British or foreign, from compulsory pilotage in the port of Newcastle-upon-Tyne.

THIS was an appeal by the defendants in a collision action in rem against a decision of the Divisional Court of the Probate, Divorce, and Admiralty Division.

The collision occurred in the river Tyne on the 12th Oct. 1884, between the British steamship Rose and the Norwegian steamship Johann Sverdrup. The action was instituted by the owners of the Rose against the owners of the Johann Sverdrup, and came on for trial at Newcastle on the 23rd Oct. 1885, when the judge found that the collision was caused by the negligence of the Johann Sverdrup, but gave judgment for her owners on the ground that at the time of the collision she was in charge of a duly licensed pilot by compulsion of law, and that it was his negligence which solely caused the collision.

From this decision the plaintiffs appealed to the Divisional Court of the Probate, Divorce, and Admiralty Division. The appeal came on for hearing on the 10th Feb. 1886 before the President and Butt, J., and on the 23rd March the Court gave judgment, allowing the appeal on the ground that the Tyne Pilotage Order Confirmation Act 1865 exempted all ships, British and foreign, from compulsory pilotage in the Tyne.

The case below is reported in 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 16; 54 L. T. Rep. N. S. 800; and 11 P. Div. 49.

H. Boyd, for the appellants, argued as in the court below.

J. Gorell Barnes, for the respondents, was not called upon.

Lord Esher, M.R.—Although this case has been argued with great ability and vigour on behalf of the appellants, I do not think the argument will hold good. The case is a very clear one. It is immaterial what were the rights and powers of pilotage authorities before the Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act 1862, for by sect. 39 of that Act a new power was given by the Board of Trade to deal with almost anything relating to pilotage. They have power, by provisional order under the Act, to do the following, amongst other things: "To transfer the whole or any part of the jurisdiction of the said pilotage authority to a new body corporate or body of persons to be constituted for the purpose by the provisional order." They have power to create the pilotage authority, to determine the limits of the district of the pilotage authority, to sanction a scale of pilotage rates, and by sub-sect. 4 of the same section they have power "to exempt the masters and owners of all ships"—that is, foreign or otherwise—"from being obliged to employ pilots in any pilotage district, or in any part of any pilotage district, or from being obliged to pay for pilots when not employing them . . . . and to annex any terms and conditions to such exemptions." The simple question then, is, Have the Board of Trade made this exemption with regard to Newcastle-upon-Tyne, or any part of that district. To ascertain this we must turn to the Tyne Pilotage Order Confirmation Act 1865. By that Act a new corporate body is constituted as the Tyne Pilotage Commissioners. Does this wholly new body get rid of the old commissioners? It is absurd to suppose that there are two sets of commissioners in the same district. Therefore the creation of the new body got rid of the old. Sect. 10 then provides that "the pilotage district of the Tyne shall for the purposes of this order"—therefore the old district may remain for other purposes—"be deemed to include the whole of the river Tyne, and to extend seaward over a radius of seventy miles;" that is, a part of the old district is made into a new district. To what district do the new powers of the new body apply? Why, to the new district, and that only. So far we have new commissioners and a new district. By sect. 11, "The jurisdiction in pilotage matters within the district aforesaid now vested in the Trinity House of Newcastle-upon-Tyne shall be and is hereby transferred to and vested in the hands of the commissioners incorporated by this order." Therefore the jurisdiction of the old commissioners is transferred to the new. There are no negative words that the jurisdiction of the old commissioners shall cease, because they are not wanted. If you have new commissioners and a new district and say that the jurisdiction which vested in the old commissioners shall vest in the new, you do not want words to get rid of the old commissioners. Then by sect. 12, "All pilots licensed for the Tyne or its entrance by the Trinity House of Newcastle-upon-Tyne at the commencement of this order shall be entitled to continue to act as such pilots under the commissioners incorporated by this order for one year after the commencement of this order without further licence or payment in respect of that year, but in all other respects shall become and be subject to the authority of the commissioners and the provisions of this order as if they had been severally licensed under this order." This section only deals with the pilots' licences. Sect. 39 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1862 also gave power to the Board of Trade to make a table of pilotage rates. How do they carry out that power? Why, they draw up a scale of rates. What is the result of that? Are there to be two scales? If the old scale is different to the new scale, are both scales to be applied? There are no negative words to get rid of the old scale, simply because they are not wanted. If a body has power to make a new scale of rates and makes it, it thereby does away with the old scale. It follows that the only scale of rates which could be collected is this new scale of rates. Clause 15 of the provisional order provides that "the pilotage dues shall be paid to the commissioners or to the pilot performing such pilotage duty within five days after the performance thereof, provided that the commissioners may from time to time increase or diminish the said pilotage dues subject to the approval of the Board of Trade." Therefore the commissioners have power to diminish or increase the scales, subject to the approval of the Board of Trade.

It will be observed that the words used above are that the "pilotage dues shall be paid," and to meet an argument founded on that, it is necessary to refer to the following clause, which is, "Nothing in this order shall extend to oblige the owner or master of any vessel to employ or make use of any pilot in piloting or conducting such vessel into or out of the said district, or within any part thereof, if he is not desirous so to do, or to pay any pilotage dues when not employing or making use of a pilot." Now, the very essence of compulsory pilotage is that the master of a vessel is bound to take a pilot and pay him the rates imposed, and if he refuse to take a pilot, nevertheless to pay the rates. That is the only compulsion you can put on a master, and therefore the Legislature had that present to their minds when this provision was enacted. Can it possibly be said that this provision is not meant to carry out the power given by sect. 39 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1862 to exempt masters and owners from being obliged to employ pilots, and from paying for them when they do not employ them. It can have no power or effect unless it does this, and might be struck out as senseless. The proper meaning of the provision is, that no vessel coming into the Tyne shall be obliged to take a pilot, and that no vessel if it refuses to take a pilot shall be liable to pay the rates. Therefore it does away with compulsory pilotage in the Tyne. But it has been argued that its force is altered by clause 22, which is, "Nothing in this order shall exempt the commissioners of the pilotage district aforesaid from the provisions of any general Act of Parliament now in force or hereafter to be passed relating to pilotage or pilotage dues, or to merchant shipping, or to ports, harbours, or docks, or to dues on shipping or on goods carried therein, or from any future revision or alteration under the authority of Parliament of the pilotage dues authorised by this order, or of the limits of the district defined by this order." But that is merely a general saving clause to meet anything and everything, past, present, and future, which, according to all rules of construction, cannot limit, alter, vary, enlarge, or have any effect on a particular enactment such as that contained in clause 16. I therefore think clause 16 abolishes compulsory pilotage in the Tyne, and that its force is not diminished by any other provision. This appeal must therefore be dismissed with costs.

Lindley, L.J.—I have come to the same conclusion. I am unable to reconcile clause 16 of the Tyne Pilotage Order with sect. 6 of 41 Geo. 3, c. lxxxvi., which was in force up to 1865. Clause 22 does not refer, even by implication, to the special Act of Geo. 3, but to the general Act. So far as one can discover, until this order came into force, compulsory pilotage existed in the Tyne under the Act of Geo. 3. We have to determine whether it still exists. The order of 1865 is equivalent to an Act of Parliament. Mr. Boyd himself admits that which cannot possibly be denied, that the only pilotage rates in force in the Tyne are those mentioned in clause 15 of the order. Those, therefore, and no others, are the rates which are payable, and whenever they are payable they are payable under the order of 1865, and not under any other order or Act of Parliament. Suppose for a moment we adopt Mr. Boyd's argument, and say that as compulsory pilotage was not expressly and in terms abolished, it must therefore be taken to exist. What is the effect of this argument? On that theory there are circumstances which make these rates payable under the order of 1865, but then clause 16 takes away any obligation to pay these rates for pilotage when a pilot is not employed. If compulsory pilotage exists, it is impossible to give any force or meaning to these two sections, because shipowners would, if pilotage were compulsory, be bound to pay rates, whereas by clause 16 they are exempt from so doing. These two Acts are irreconcilable, and on that ground I think it is utterly impossible to attempt to construe them together, and that the old Act is gone. I therefore think it clear that compulsory pilotage was abolished in the Tyne after 1865.

Lopes, L.J.—This case is disposed of by sect. 39 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1862, and clause 16 of the Provisional Order. By sect. 39 of that Act very large powers were given to the Board of Trade, and by sub-sect. 4 power is given to exempt the master and owners of all ships—therefore including foreign ships—from compulsory pilotage. By the Provisional Order that exemption is carried into execution. Notwithstanding, therefore, the able argument of Mr. Boyd, I can feel no doubt that the effect of clause 16 was intended to, and does, abolish compulsory pilotage in the Tyne.

The Bernina. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM BUTT, J.

Collision—Loss of life—Action in personam—Both ships to blame — Contributory negligence — Measure of damages—Lord Campbell's Act 1846 (9 & 10 Vict. c. 93)—Judicature Act 1873 (36 & 37 Vict. c. 66), s. 25, sub-sect. 9.

Where passengers and seamen off duty are killed in a collision between two ships both of which are to blame, the deceased are not identified with their carrying ship so as to be deemed to be guilty of contributory negligence, and hence their personal representatives are entitled under Lord Campbell's Act to sue the owners of the non-carrying ship.

Sect. 25, sub-sect. 9, of the Judicature Act 1873 providing that "in any cause or proceeding for damages arising out of a collision between two ships, if both ships shall be found to have been in fault, the rules hitherto in force in the Court of Admiralty, so far as they have been at variance with the rules in force in the courts of common law shall prevail," has no application to actions under Lord Campbell's Act instituted to recover damages for loss of life occasioned by a collision between two ships for which both are to blame, and hence successful plaintiffs in such cases are entitled to recover full damages, and are not limited by the Admiralty Court rule as to the division of damages to recovering only a moiety.

This was an appeal by the plaintiffs in three actions in personam under Lord Campbell's Act from a decision of Butt, J. giving judgment for the defendants in all three actions.

The actions were instituted by the personal representatives of three deceased persons whose deaths had been occasioned by a collision between the two steamships, the Bernina and the Bushire.

The three deceased persons were respectively the second officer on the Bushire, the first engineer on the Bushire, and a passenger on board the Bushire, and the actions were brought against the owners of the Bernina.

It appeared that the collision was occasioned by the joint negligence of both vessels. At the time of the collision the second officer was in charge of the Bushire, and was directly responsible for the navigation of the Bushire. The engineer and passenger had nothing to do with the collision. (b)

(a) Reported by J. P. Aspinall and Butler Aspinall, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law

(b) It was admitted that the appeal could not be prosecuted on behalf of the representatives of the second officer.—Ed.

It was arranged that in the event of the plaintiffs being successful, there should be a reference to the registrar and merchants to assess the damages in accordance with the judgment of the court.

The facts were set out in a special case which appears in the report below (54 L. T. Rep. N. S. 499; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 577; 11 P. Div. 31).

Nov. 8, 1886.—Bucknill, Q.C. and Nelson for the plaintiffs, in support of the appeal.—Butt, J. declined to give judgment for the plaintiffs, on the ground that he was bound by the decision of Thorogood v. Bryan (8 C. B. 115; 18 L. J. 336, C. P.). This court has power to overrule that decision, and should do so. The decision has from the outset been questioned, and no text-writer has approved of it. Moreover, condemnation has been passed upon it by high judicial authority in this country, in Scotland, and in the United States:

Adams v. The Glasgow and South-Western Railway Company, 3 Scotch Sess. Cas., 4th series, 215;
The Milan, Lush. 388;
Hay v. Le Neve, 2 Shaw Sc. App. 505;
Chapman v. Newhaven Railway Company, 6 Smith's Rep. 341;
Colegrove v. New York and Newhaven Railway Company, 6 Smith's Rep. 492;
Webster v. Hudson River Railroad Company, 38 N. Y. Rep. 260;
Smith's Leading Cases, 4th edit., vol. 1, p. 220, a.

The decision cannot be supported on any sound legal principle. The assumption upon which it is founded, that the plaintiff by selecting his conveyance thereby identifies himself with those who have charge of it so that their negligence is to be considered his, is an erroneous assumption and not warranted by fact or principle. The passenger has, in fact, no control over those who have charge of the conveyance, and they are neither his agents nor his servants. True it is that Lord Bramwell in Armstrong v. The Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Company (33 L. T. Rep. N. S. 228; L. Rep. 10. Ex. 47) assented to the doctrine of Thorogood v. Bryan (ubi sup.), but nowhere else has it been in terms approved of, and many decisions are inconsistent with it:

Quarman v. Burnett, 6 M. & W. 499;
Rigby v. Hewitt, 5 Ex. 240;
Greenland v. Chaplin, 5, Ex. 243;
Reedie v. London and North-Western Railway Company, 4 Ex. 244.

Assuming the plaintiffs are entitled to judgment, they should recover the whole of their damages and not half. The Admiralty Court rule as to the division of damages where both ships are to blame has no application to this case. By sect. 25 of the Judicature Act 1873, that rule is to apply to any cause for damages arising out of a collision between two ships, if it be a rule hitherto "in force in the Court of Admiralty." But no such rule had been in force in the Admiralty Court, because these are actions under Lord Campbell's Act, and none of these actions could be brought in the Admiralty Court before the Judicature Act.

Sir Walter Phillimore and Barnes, for the defendants, contra.—The decision in Thorogood v. Bryan (ubi sup.) has been law for the last thirty-eight years, and, although sometimes adversely criticised, has been followed in numerous cases. Lord Bramwell has in terms approved of it, and many decisions impliedly support the principles upon which it was based:

Armstrong v. Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Company (ubi sup.);
Spaight v. Tedcastle, 44 L. T. Rep. N. S. 589; L. Rep. 6 App. Cas. 217;
Waite v. North-Eastern Railway Company, E. B. & E. 719;
Child v. Hearn, L. Rep. 9, Ex. 176;
Vanderplank v. Miller, M. & M. 169;
Brown v. New York Central Railway Company, 31 Barbour's Rep. 385; Mooney v. Hudson River Railroad Company, 5 Robertson, 549.

Even apart from Thorogood v. Bryan (ubi sup.), Armstrong's personal representatives have no right of action. They could not recover against the owners of the Bushire, because Armstrong's death was caused by the negligence of a fellow-servant. If therefore they have no right against the one wrongdoer, it is manifestly contrary to sound principle that they should have a right against the other. It is also submitted that the provisions of the Judicature Act 1873, s. 25, sub-sect. 9, are applicable to these actions, and therefore the plaintiffs if successful are only entitled to a moiety of their damages. That section deals with "any cause or proceeding for damages arising out of a collision between two ships." These actions are clearly causes or proceedings "for damages arising out of a collision between two ships."

Bucknill, Q.C. in reply.

Cur. adv. vult.

Jan. 24.—Lord Esher, M.R.—This was a special case heard and determined by Butt, J., sitting in the Court of Admiralty. It appears from the case that three actions had been brought and entered in the Admiralty Division, each for damages against the owners of the ship Bernina, the actions being founded on Lord Campbell's Act. In the first, Elizabeth Armstrong sued as administratrix of her husband on behalf of herself and children. In the second, Catharine Owen sued as administratrix of her husband. In the third, Habiba Toeg sued as administratrix of her son. The collision took place between the Bernina and the Bushire, both British ships, and the collision was caused by the fault or default of the master and crew of the Bushire, and by the fault or default of the master and crew of the Bernina. Armstrong was one of the crew of the Bushire, but at the time of collision was off duty, and had nothing to do with the negligence of the Bushire, which partly caused the accident. Owen was second officer of the Bushire, and was at the time of the collision in charge of the Bushire, and was directly responsible for the negligence or carelessness which partly caused the collision. Toeg was a passenger on board the Bushire, and had nothing to do with the negligent or careless navigation which partly caused the collision. Butt, J. gave judgment for the defendants in all three actions, in obedience to, but apparently without himself acquiescing in, the case of Thorogood v. Bryan (ubi sup.). It is evident from this statement that the question raised is, What is the law applicable to a transaction in which a plaintiff has been injured by negligence, and in the course of which transaction there have been negligent acts or omissions by more than one person? Upon many points as to such a transaction the common law is clear. (1.) If no fault can be attributed to the plaintiff, and there is negligence by the defendant and also by another independent person, both negligences partly and directly causing the accident, the plaintiff can maintain an action for all the damages occasioned to him against either the defendant or the other wrongdoer. (2.) If in the same case the negligence is partly that of the defendant personally and partly that of his servants, the plaintiff can maintain an action either against the defendant or his servants. (3.) If in the same case the negligence is that of the defendant's servants, though there be no personal negligence by the defendant, the plaintiff can maintain an action either against the defendant or his servants. (4.) If in the same case the negligence, though not that of the defendant personally or of a servant of the defendant, consists in an act or omission by another done, or omitted to be done, in the way in which it is done, or omitted to be done, by the order or direction, or authority, of the defendant, the plaintiff can maintain an action either against the defendant or the person personally guilty of the negligence. (5.) If, although the plaintiff has himself or by his servants been guilty of negligence, such negligence did not directly partly cause the accident, as if, for example, the plaintiff or his servants having been negligent, the alleged wrongdoers might by reasonable care have avoided the accident, the plaintiff can maintain an action against the defendant. (6.) If the plaintiff has been personally guilty of negligence, which has partly directly caused the accident, he cannot maintain an action against anyone. (7.) If, although the plaintiff has not been personally guilty of negligence, his servants have been guilty of negligence which has partly directly caused the accident, the plaintiff cannot maintain an action against anyone. (8.) If, although the defendant or his servants has or have been guilty of negligence the plaintiff or his servants could by reasonable care have avoided the accident, the plaintiff cannot maintain an action against anyone. In all the propositions thus enunciated the persons named have been confined to the plaintiff, the defendant, and their servants, and in one an agent. It was laid down in Quarman v. Burnett (ubi sup.) in 1840 that a defendant is only liable for the negligence of those who have the relation of servant to him as master, "upon the principle," it was said, "that Qui facit per alium facit per se, the master is responsible for the acts of his servant; and that person is undoubtedly liable who stood in the relation of master to the wrongdoer—he who had selected him as his servant from the knowledge or belief in his skill and care, and who could remove him for misconduct, and whose orders he was bound to receive and obey, &c. But the liability by virtue of the principle of the relation of master and servant must cease where the relation itself ceases to exist; and no other person than the master of such servant can be liable on the simple ground that the servant is the servant of another, and his act the act of another. Consequently, a third person entering into a contract with the master which does not raise the relation of master and servant at all is not thereby rendered liable." And in Reedie v. The London and North-Western Railway Company (ubi sup.), in 1849, "The liability of anyone other than the party actually guilty of any wrongful act proceeds on the maxim Qui facit per alium facit per se . . . But neither the principle of the rule nor the rule itself can apply to a case where the party sought to be charged does not stand in the character of employer to the party by whose negligent act the injury has been occasioned." So stands the common law as to the rights and liabilities of a plaintiff in such actions, unless the case of Thorogood v. Bryan (ubi sup.) is to be supported, by which, although the liabilities of such a plaintiff are not said to be increased, it is said that his rights are diminished. Before entering upon the consideration of that and some other cases, it may be well to observe that in cases of negligence the first point usually dealt with is, whether there has been in fact any negligence by the defendant personally; secondly, or by his servants; then, thirdly, whether that negligence, if any, has been wholly or partly a cause of the accident; fourthly, has the plaintiff personally, or by his servants, been guilty in fact of any negligence; fifthly, has such negligence, if any, either wholly or partly directly been a cause of the accident. In many of the cases with which we shall have to deal, it will be necessary to observe which of these points has been in dispute, and, if more than one has been in dispute, to distinguish that to which the judgment has been applied. The main question, however, before us is, whether for any reason we think that the case of Thorogood v. Bryan (ubi sup.) can now be supported in a court of appeal. Thorogood v. Bryan (ubi sup.) and Cattlin v. Hills (8 C. B. 123) were decided in 1849.

The first was an action under Lord Campbell's Act against the owner of an omnibus. The facts were that the deceased got out of the omnibus in which he was a passenger whilst the omnibus was in motion, and without waiting for it to draw up to the kerb; and that the omnibus of the defendant coming up very fast at the moment, the deceased was unable to get out of the way of it, and was run over and killed. In summing up the learned judge, Vaughan Williams, J., told the jury that, "if they were of opinion that want of care on the part of the driver of Barber's omnibus in not drawing up to the kerb to put the deceased down, or any want of care on the part of the deceased himself had been conducive to the injury, in either of those cases, notwithstanding the defendant, by her servant, had been guilty of negligence, their verdict must be for the defendant." The jury gave a verdict for the defendant. A rule nisi having been obtained for a new trial on the ground of misdirection, on cause being shown, Williams, J. said: "The objection to the summing up applies to that part of it which relates to the want of care and caution on the part of the driver of Barber's omnibus. I acted upon the dictum of the Court of Exchequer in Bridge v. The Grand Junction Railway Company (3 M. & W. 244). If that be correct, I was right." During the argument, Cresswell, J. asked, "Must not the negligence which is to exonerate the defendant be the negligence of the plaintiff or his agent? . . . It seems strange to say that A. shall not be responsible for his negligence because B. has been negligent likewise, C. being the party injured." In Cattlin v. Hills (ubi sup.) the plaintiff was a passenger on the steamer the Sons of the Thames. A collision occurred with the Sapphire, belonging to the defendants, which struck the anchor of the Sons of the Thames projecting over the bow and knocked it down on the plaintiff's leg, and crushed it. Cresswell, J. told the jury that the plaintiff was not entitled to recover if they were of opinion that the damage sustained by the plaintiff had been occasioned by negligence on the part of those intrusted with the care and management of the Sons of the Thames. The jury gave a verdict for the plaintiff. A rule nisi was obtained for a new trial for misdirection. The first of these cases was tried after Trinity Sittings 1848; the second after Michaelmas Term 1848. Cause was shown in both cases on the 20th June 1849. During the arguments, the note regarding Bridge v. The Grand Junction Railway, of the then editors of Smith's Leading Cases—Willes and Keating—was read. The judgments were as follows:—Coltman, J.: "In Thorogood v. Bryan the question raised is, whether a passenger in an omnibus is to be considered so far identified with the owner, that negligence on the part of the owner or his servants is to be considered negligence of the passenger himself. The law is that a party who sustains any injury from the careless or negligent driving of another may maintain an action, unless he has himself been guilty of such negligence or want of due care as to have contributed or conduced to the injury. In the present case the negligence that is relied on as an excuse is not the personal negligence of the party injured, but the negligence of the driver of the omnibus in which he was a passenger. But it appears to me that, having trusted the party by selecting the particular conveyance, the plaintiff has so far identified himself with the owner and his servants that if any injury results from their negligence he must be considered a party to it. In other words, the passenger is so far identified with the carriage in which he is travelling that want of care of the driver will be a defence of the owner of the carriage which directly caused the accident." Maule, J. said: "Although I at one time entertained a contrary impression, upon further consideration I incline to think that for this purpose the deceased must be considered as identified with the driver of the omnibus in which he voluntarily became a passenger, and that the negligence of the driver was the negligence of the deceased. . . . On the part of the plaintiff it is suggested that a passenger in a public conveyance has no control over the driver. But I think that cannot with propriety be said. . . . He enters into a contract with the owner, who by his servant, the driver, he employs to drive him. If he is dissatisfied with the mode of conveyance he is not obliged to avail himself of it. . . . But as regards the present plaintiff, he is not altogether without fault. He chose his own conveyance, and must take the consequences of any default of the driver whom he thought fit to trust." Cresswell, J. said: "I must own I should not have been sorry if the point could have been raised on a bill of exceptions. The subject is an important one, and ought to be definitely set at rest. . . . If the driver of the omnibus the deceased was in had by his negligence or want of due care and skill contributed to an injury from a collision, his master clearly could maintain no action. And I must confess that I see no reason why a passenger who employs the driver to convey him stands in any better position." Vaughan Williams, J. said: "I think the passenger must for this purpose be considered as identified with the person having the management of the omnibus he was conveyed by."

The first observation to be made upon this case is that made by Cresswell, J., that, inasmuch as the judgment was given on a motion for a new trial for alleged misdirection, there being no bill of exceptions, it was not possible to carry the judgment to the Exchequer Chamber. Secondly, that, although there was evidence in the case which showed that the defendant's servants had been guilty of negligence partly directly causing the accident, and that the driver of the omnibus in which the plaintiff was a passenger was also guilty of negligence partly directly causing the accident, there was also evidence upon which the jury might well have found, and probably did find, that the plaintiff himself had personally been guilty of negligence directly causing the accident. But objection was, taken to the summing up, and the judgment was given in respect of the summing up, and we must therefore confine our attention to the summing up. Upon that summing up it is possible that the jury found for the defendant, although the plaintiff was, in their opinion, not personally guilty of any negligence. Now, it is plain that the driver of the omnibus in which the plaintiff was a passenger was not the plaintiff's servant. It is plain that the plaintiff had no legal power or authority to direct him how to drive, or when or where to stop. It is plain that the plaintiff did not in fact direct him. According to the judgment, the defendant was excused, although the owner of the omnibus in which the plaintiff was a passenger was only a contractor with the plaintiff to carry him, it being by the contract left to such owner to determine who should be the driver, and the manner of the driving, and although the driver of the omnibus was not the servant of the plaintiff, but was the servant of the owner of the omnibus. In the face of previous authorities, it was not then said, and is not now said, that the plaintiff could in such circumstances be made liable to anyone else in respect of the negligence of the driver. It is not said that the plaintiff could be made liable in any respect to or for the driver; but it is said that the conduct of the driver prevented the plaintiff from recovering, not from that driver's master, but from an independent wrongdoer, who, by his servant's negligence, had injured the plaintiff. Coltman, J. states, as the ground of his judgment, "that the plaintiff, having trusted the party by selecting the particular conveyance, had so far identified himself with the owner and his servants that if any injury results from their negligence he must be considered a party to it." With great deference, this passage is so loosely worded that it would make the plaintiff liable to persons injured by the negligence of the driver, which was not intended by the learned judge. He then goes on to say: "In other words, the passenger is so far identified with the carriage in which he is travelling, that want of care on the part of that driver will be a defence of the driver of the carriage which directly caused the accident." With regard to the phrase used by all the judges, of the plaintiff being identified with other persons, or with a carriage, it can be but a figure of speech. To say in any sense, other than by way of an analogy contained in a figurative expression, that one man is identified with another, still more with a carriage, is absurd. What is obviously meant is, that the passenger is in the result in the same position as if he had been the driver or owner bringing the action. The figure describes the result; but, as is sometimes the case, the figure which describes the result is taken to be the enunciation of the principle which produces the result. The effect is that the reason for the result is made the result. In order, therefore, to be satisfied with the judgments in this case, we must look to the causes which are relied upon in them to produce the result. The sole cause stated by Coltman, J. is the selection by the plaintiff of the conveyance, and his thereby trusting the party, apparently meaning thereby the driver. As to the selection, it can hardly be said to exist in fact. There are not always two omnibuses starting at the same place and time on the same journey. Hardly ever two ships. Never two railway trains. But, if there be a selection, reliance on it seems to be opposed to a part of the judgment as delivered by Parke, B., in Quarman v. Burnett (ubi sup.): "As to the supposed choice of a particular servant, &c., it seems to us that, if the defendants had asked for this particular servant amongst many, and refused to be driven by any other, they would not have been responsible for his acts and neglect. If the driver be the servant of a jobmaster, we do not think he ceases to be so by reason of the owner of the carriage preferring to be driven by that particular servant, where there is a choice amongst more, any more than a hack post-boy ceases to be the servant of an innkeeper where a traveller has a particular preference for one over the rest, on account of his sobriety and carefulness." Referring to Thorogood v. Bryan (ubi sup.), Maule, J. says that "the negligence of the driver was the negligence of the deceased." That as above observed, is inaccurately worded. Then he says: "It is suggested that a passenger in a public conveyance has no control over the driver. But I think that cannot with propriety be said. He enters into a contract with the owner, whom by his servant, the driver, he employs to drive him." The learned judge could not have meant to state anything so preposterous as that the passenger has in fact, or even by agreement, any power or right to control the manner of driving of the driver. It is obvious that he again rests his conclusion upon the alleged selection of the conveyance. Then he further says: "But as regards the present defendant (he means plaintiff), he is not altogether without fault. He chose his own conveyance, and must take the consequences of any default of the driver whom he thought fit to trust." Where is the fault—i.e., want of care—in doing that which every passenger, however careful, who travels by omnibus does and must do? Where is the trust in a man whom you cannot know beforehand; who can be changed at any moment during the journey without your knowledge or consent? And if this be applied as a principle to railways and ships, is not it still more glaringly untrue in fact? And further, suppose it to be admitted that the passenger does select and thereby does trust, and is therefore guilty in that respect of want of ordinary care, how can it be said that any or all of these are in the end partly directly a cause of the accident? Cresswell, J. evidently desired that the question should be further considered. He does, however, speak of the passenger as of one "who employs the driver to convey him." It is not true in fact. Does a passenger by railway select or employ the engine-driver, or a passenger by ship select or employ the officer of the watch? Williams, J. gives similar reasons. In truth, the judgments in Thorogood v. Bryan (ubi sup.) all amount to saying that by what the plaintiff did, he made the driver his agent so as to be liable for his acts. But, if he did, he must in consistency not only be by reason of such liability deprived of his remedy against third persons, but must be affirmatively liable to third persons. In truth, the driver in the case is not the servant or agent of the passenger, and has not even any one of the attributes which are evidence of being like a servant or agent.

Thorogood v. Bryan (ubi sup.) was stated by Vaughan Williams, J. to have been founded on a dictum of Parke, B. in Bridge v. The Grand Junction Railway Company (3 Mee. & W. 244). It is sometimes also said to have followed Butterfield v. Forrester (11 East, 60). But the latter case deals only with the question of the plaintiff himself being the direct cause of his own injury; although there has been a previous negligence by the defendants. Only the plaintiff and defendant were concerned. It is not in point. In Bridge v. The Grand Junction Railway Company (ubi sup.), in 1838, the declaration was for injury by negligence of servants of the defendants in the conduct of a train of the defendants'. The plea was that the train of carriages, in one whereof the plaintiff was a passenger, did not belong to the defendants, nor was the same under the care and management of the defendants or their servants; and that the persons who had the control and management of the train of carriages, in one whereof the plaintiff was then being carried, were guilty of negligence, and that in part by and through the negligence of the last-mentioned persons, as well as in part by and through the negligence on the part of the servants of the defendants, the collision took place. Special demurrer that the plea amounts to not guilty, that it is argumentative, alleges evidence, &c. During the argument Parke, B. said: "The question is whether the plea is not altogether bad in substance. It is consistent with all the facts stated in it that the plaintiff, or those under whose guidance he was, was guilty of negligence and yet that the plaintiff is entitled to recover. Can it be said that, because a carriage is on the wrong side of the road, a party is excused who drives against it? It ought to have been shown that there was negligence in not avoiding the consequences of the defendants' defaults. The principle is very clearly laid down in Butterfield v. Forrester (ubi sup.)." In giving judgment finally, Parke, B. said: "The plea undoubtedly amounts to the general issue. But I think it is also bad in substance on the ground I before stated, that all the facts alleged in it may be true, there may have been negligence in both parties, and yet the plaintiff may be entitled to recover, The rule of law is laid down with perfect correctness in the case of Butterfield v. Forrester (ubi sup.), and the rule is that, although there may have been negligence on the part of the plaintiff, yet, unless he might by the exercise of ordinary care have avoided the consequences of the defendant's negligence, he is entitled to recover; if by ordinary care he might have avoided them, he is the author of his own wrong." It is clear that the case dealt with the proposition laid down in Butterfield v. Forrester (ubi sup.), a proposition wholly distinct from that in question in Thorogood v. Bryan (ubi sup.). The only applicable words are those of Parke, B. used during the argument, and omitted in the final judgment. The suggestion contained in the words was challenged before Thorogood v. Bryan (ubi sup.), and was argued in banco by the editors—Willes and Keating—of Smith's Leading Cases. In the note to Ashby v. White (Smith's L. C. vol. 1, 3rd edit. p. 132, a) they said, speaking of Bridge v. The Grand Junction Railway Company (ubi sup.): "A hasty perusal of the report of that case might lead to the supposition that, according to the opinion of the court, the plea might have been made good in substance, though not in form, by an averment that the plaintiff's driver could by ordinary care have avoided the accident. But that result does not by any means follow from what the learned judges said, much less from what they actually decided. It may perhaps safely be asserted that the plea was at all events bad in substance for not alleging that the passenger who brought the action was guilty of negligence. If two drunken stage coachmen were to drive their respective carriages against each other, and injure the passengers, each would have to pay for his own carriage no doubt; but it is inconceivable that each set of passengers should by a fiction be identified with the coachman who drove them, so as to be restricted for remedy to actions against their own driver or his employer." This note has been adopted by every subsequent editor. I have been allowed to see the volume in which Thorogood v. Bryan (ubi sup.) is reported in Parke, B.'s own library, and I have seen in his own handwriting "Quære" written against the case, and also "See the note in Smith's Leading Cases." The inference seems to be that he, upon whose casual dictum the case of Thorogood v. Bryan (ubi sup.) is assumed to be founded, was not satisfied with the decision. In Rigby v. Hewitt (ubi sup.) and Greenland v. Chaplin (ubi sup.) the point discussed was that raised in Butterfield v. Forrester (ubi sup.). They are not authorities in support of Thorogood v. Bryan (ubi sup.). In Tuff v. Warman (2 C. B. N. S. 740), decided in 1857, the present point was not raised. The case is only useful for the remark of Vaughan Williams, J., when Thorogood v. Bryan (ubi sup.) was cited. "That case," he said, "has been made the subject of some damaging remarks in the last (the fourth) edition of Smith's Leading Cases: (vol. 1, p. 220, a.)" The note there referred to was written after the decision in Thorogood v. Bryan (ubi sup.), and is as follows: "If two drunken coachmen were to drive their respective carriages against each other, and injure the passengers, each would have to bear the injury to his own carriage no doubt; but it seems highly unreasonable that each set of passengers should by a fiction be identified with the coachman who drove them, so as to be restricted for remedy to actions against their own driver or his employer. This, nevertheless, appears to be the result of the decision in Thorogood v. Bryan (ubi sup.); but it may be questioned whether the reasoning of the court in that case is consistent with those of Rigby v. Hewitt (ubi sup.) and Greenland v. Chaplin (ubi sup.), or with the series of decisions from Quarman v. Burnett (ubi sup.) to Reedie v. The London and North-Western Railway Company (ubi sup.). Why, in the particular case, both the wrongdoers should not be considered liable to a person free from all blame, not answerable for the acts of either of them, and whom they have both injured, is a question which seems to deserve more consideration than it received in Thorogood v. Bryan (ubi sup.)."

The case of Waite v. The North-Eastern Railway Company (E. B. & E. 719), decided in 1858, requires to be examined. It was an action on behalf of an infant by his next friend. The plaintiff, an infant of five years, with his grandmother, who took a half ticket for the child and a ticket for herself, were run over by a passing train as they were crossing the railway, the grandmother being killed. The jury, in answer to questions left them by Martin, B., found that the defendants were guilty of negligence, that Mrs. Park, the grandmother, was also guilty of negligence which contributed to the accident. No negligence of course was attributed to the infant plaintiff. A verdict was entered for the plaintiff with leave to move to enter it for the defendants. Lord Campbell said: "We think the rule ought to be made absolute for entering a verdict for the defendants. The jury must be taken to have found that Mrs. Park, the grandmother of the infant plaintiff, in whose care he was when the accident happened, was guilty of negligence without which the accident would not have happened; and that, notwithstanding the negligence of the defendants, if she had acted upon this occasion with ordinary caution and prudence neither she herself nor the infant would have suffered. Under such circumstances, had she survived, she could not have maintained any action against the company; and we think that the infant is so identified with her that the action in his name cannot be maintained. The relation of master and servant certainly did not subsist between the grandchild and the grandmother, and she cannot in any sense be considered his agent; but we think that the defendants in furnishing the ticket to the one and the half ticket for the other, did not incur a greater liability towards the grandchild than towards the grandmother, and that she, the contracting party, must be implied to have promised that ordinary care should be taken of the grandchild. We do not consider it necessary to offer any opinion as to the recent cases in which passengers by coaches or by ships have brought actions for damages suffered from the negligent management of other coaches and ships, there having been negligence in the management of the coaches and ships in which they were travelling, as, at all events, a complete identification seems to us to be constituted between the plaintiff and the party whose negligence contributed to the damage, which is the alleged cause of action, in the same manner as if the plaintiff had been a baby only a few days old to be carried in a nurse's arms." In the Exchequer Chamber Mellish, for the defendants, commenced by saying it was not necessary to determine whether Thorogood v. Bryan (ubi sup.) was or was not correct. Cockburn, C.J. said: "I put the case on this ground, that when a child of such tender and imbecile age is brought to a railway station, or to any conveyance, for the purpose of being conveyed, and is wholly unable to take care of itself, the contract of conveyance is on the implied condition that the child is to be conveyed subject to due and proper care on the part of the person having it in charge. Such care not being used, when the child has no natural capacity to judge of the surrounding circumstances, a child might get into serious danger from a state of things which would produce no disastrous consequences to an adult capable of taking care of himself." Upon this case it must be observed that the action was against the company with whom the contract for conveyance was made. It may be that the reasons given for this decision might also absolve an independent wrongdoer. But it would be strange to say that this case supports Thorogood v. Bryan (ubi sup.) when the judges in one court and the counsel in the other declined to discuss that case. The case of the infant might be decided as it is though Thorogood v. Bryan (ubi sup.) were discarded. In Child v. Hearn (L. Rep. 9 Ex. 176), decided in 1874, the plaintiff, a platelayer in the employment of the Great Eastern Railway Company, was returning from his work upon the line in a trolley, which was upset by the defendant's pigs escaping through the fence between the defendant's field and the railway. The case was heard before Bramwell, Pigott, and Pollock, BB. Bramwell, B. said that it was the duty of the railway company to keep the fence in a reasonably fit condition; that by reason of their default their property—i.e., the railway—was not sufficiently protected; that if the plaintiff who was on their property by their leave was injured by reason of that want of protection he could not maintain an action against the defendants. "Without saying," he said, "anything as to the decision in Thorogood v. Bryan (ubi sup.) it is sufficient to say that the defendant's pigs escaped through the negligence of the plaintiff's employers, and that, having met with the accident through his employers' negligence, the plaintiff cannot maintain an action against the defendant." Pigott, B. said: "The defendant, then, it not being shown that he has been guilty of any negligence, is not responsible to the plaintiff for the accident which has occurred." Pollock, B. said: "If the case were within the passage cited from Shearman & Redfield's Law of Negligence, 2nd edit., p. 58, sect. 46, this might be open to doubt; but that passage has no application to the present case, where the plaintiff met with his injury through being upon the premises originally insufficiently protected by those in whose employment he was." The learned Baron then gave an instance of a rotten carriage, by which he seemed to bring back the case to Thorogood v. Bryan (ubi sup.), and then used the somewhat startling figure: "I think in such a case the person riding in the carriage (i.e., the rotten carriage) would be identified with the carriage (i.e., the rotten carriage) in which he was riding." In what respect, to what purpose, in regard to what liability or disability, is not stated. The learned judge, in giving this analogy, was trying to avoid the difficulty of saying that the supposed plaintiff was identified with the driver or owners of a carriage in which he was a passenger. The carriage mentioned is therefore a carriage not belonging to the plaintiff or under his control. But then the carriage cannot be guilty of any negligence. There is no negligence with which to identify the supposed plaintiff. If the supposed carriage is one belonging to the plaintiff and there is negligence in using it in a rotten state, and such rottenness contributes to the accident, it is not a case in point. The passage from Shearman & Redfield on Negligence is as follows: "When the negligence of any other person is imputed to the plaintiff, it must appear that such person was the plaintiff's agent in the transaction, and either that he was under the plaintiff's control or that he controlled the plaintiff's conduct." Considering the facts of the case, and what was said by Bramwell and Pigott, BB., it cannot be fairly said that this case was decided on the authority of Thorogood v. Bryan (ubi sup.). In Armstrong v. The Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Company (ubi sup.), decided in 1875, the plaintiff, a travelling inspector of the London and North-Western Railway Company, in their train with a pass, was injured by the train in which he was running into waggons of the defendants left standing at a crossway. The jury found joint negligence in the management. A verdict was directed for the defendants, with leave to move. Bramwell, B. gave judgment discharging the rule on the ground that the case could not be distinguished from Thorogood v. Bryan (ubi sup.). He made the important statement that "it must not be supposed that he was at all dissatisfied with Thorogood v. Bryan." He somewhat diminished the importance of his assent—the first expressed by any English judge—by adding that he "also thought that the alleged negligence of the defendants' servants did not conduce to the accident, so that the sole negligence which caused the accident was that of those in charge of the London and North-Western train." If this was so, the doctrine of Thorogood v. Bryan (ubi sup.) was not wanted. Pollock, B. agreed on both points. But, as to the doctrine laid down in Thorogood v. Bryan (ubi sup.), he said: "The identification does not involve any volition on the part of the passenger. It merely means that he has equal rights with the driver." And again, "The only difficulty arises from the use of the word 'identified' in the judgment. If it is to be taken that by the word 'identified' is meant that the plaintiff by some conduct of his own, as by selecting the omnibus in which he was travelling, has acted so as to make the driver his agent, this would sound like a strange proposition which could not entirely be sustained. But what I understand it to mean is that the plaintiff, for the purpose of the action, must be taken to be in the same position as the owner of the omnibus or his driver." This no doubt reiterated the result of the judgment in Thorogood v. Bryan (ubi sup.), but, with deference, does not elucidate the means by which that judgment was arrived at, or explain the difficulties which have puzzled lawyers.

Then comes the case of The Milan (ubi sup.), decided in 1861. The action was brought in the Admiralty by the owner of cargo on board the Lindisfarne against the owners of the Milan for loss of cargo as the result of a collision. Both ships were held to blame. Dr. Lushington, in considering the legal consequences of that finding, said: "The principle, I apprehend, of this rule of common law is, that a party shall not recover where he himself is in any degree to blame for the loss. Now, cases apart, can it be reasonably contended that the owner of a cargo is responsible for the acts of the master and crew of the vessel in which his goods are taken, he himself not being owner or part owner of the ship? The owner of the cargo does not, as it seems to me, commit any negligence contributing to the loss; certainly not by himself personally, certainly not by his agents, for the master and crew are in no respect under his control. It is difficult to conceive how he can be particeps criminis when he is not so either as principal or agent. It is argued that he should be so considered and deprived of his remedy because he himself, or his agent, selected the ship by which his goods were carried. But there is, in my judgment, in the mere selection of the ship for the conveyance of his cargo none of the ingredients which constitute any kind of responsibility for a collision; for I cannot conceive a responsibility for an act done where the individual has not either by himself or his agent any power of interference or control. . . . I decline to be bound by Thorogood v. Bryan (ubi sup.); because it is a single case; because I know upon inquiry that it has been doubted by high authority; because it appears to me to be not reconcilable with other principles laid down at common law; because it is directly against Hay v. Le Neve (2 Shaw's Sc. App. 395) and the ordinary practice of the Admiralty Court." It has been supposed that the ultimate judgment of Dr. Lushington was inconsistent with this stout disagreement; but he decided to give the plaintiff only half his loss upon wholly other grounds, peculiar to the Admiralty, namely, that it had always been the practice there, instead of saying that an innocent plaintiff might recover his whole loss against any one wrongdoer, to say that he must recover part from one and part from the others, and if there are only two half from each. He said in terms that the plaintiff must sue the owners of the ship in which his cargo was for the other half. In Spaight v. Tedcastle (ubi sup.), decided in the House of Lords in 1881, the action was by owners of a ship against the owners of her towing tug. The ship was in charge of a compulsory pilot, who it was alleged had by negligence contributed to the injury. It was decided in an elaborate judgment that there was no evidence of negligence by the pilot which had contributed to the accident. It was therefore not necessary to review the decision in Thorogood v. Bryan (ubi sup.). With regard to it Lord Blackburn said: "The counsel for the appellants did not rest their case on this point of law, and it was not argued at your Lordships' bar. It is one of general importance, and, if it were necessary to decide it either way, I should wish to have a further argument upon the point."

These being the English cases, it was interesting and profitable, as it always is, to consider the American cases. Several were cited to us—some before and some subsequent to Thorogood v. Bryan (ubi sup.). In Smith v. Smith (2 Pickering Rep. 621) decided in 1825 by the Supreme Court of Massachusetts, the action was for injury to the plaintiff's horse by an obstruction in the highway placed by the defendant. It raised the question decided in Butterfield v. Forrester (ubi sup.), not the doctrine of Thorogood v. Bryan (ubi sup.). In Simpson v. Hand (6 Wharton's Rep. 311), decided in 1840 by the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, the action was for injury to Spanish hides of the plaintiff on board the Thorn against the owners of the William Henry. Contributory negligence was alleged, and that the Thorn was alone to blame. Gibson, C.J. said: "It is an undoubted rule that for a loss from mutual negligence neither party can recover in a court of common law . . . Vanderplank v. Miller (ubi sup.)" he says, "is an authority that the owner of goods on board cannot recover." He then says: "There is at least privity of contract between a merchant and his carrier, and the former, when he commits the management and direction of his goods to the latter, giving him, as he does, authority to labour and travail about the transportation of them, necessarily constitutes him to some extent his agent." It does not seem clear that the owner of cargo gives the authority suggested, if by it is meant the authority to an agent by a principal. The owner of cargo contracts with the shipowners that the latter will carry his goods; but the relation is that of co-contractors, not that of principal and agent. The case of Chapman v. The Newhaven Railway Company (5 Smith Rep. 341), decided in June 1859, was before the Court of Appeal in New York on appeal from the Supreme Court of New York. The action was for damages from a collision between a train of the New York and Harlem Railway Company, on which the plaintiff was a passenger, and a freight train of the defendants. The plaintiff had a verdict and judgment at the trial before Duer, J., which were upheld in the Superior Court. In the Court of Appeal therefrom, Johnson, C.J. said: "There was evidence of negligence in the management of each train, and the position on which the defendants rely is that such negligence on the part of the Harlem train as would preclude that company from an action against the defendants will also preclude the plaintiff from sustaining his action. The general rule is, that one who receives an injury from the negligence of another may maintain an action for his damages. Upon this rule a natural and reasonable exception has been engrafted, that if the injured party by his own negligence has contributed to the injury, he cannot maintain an action, unless the negligence of the other party has been so gross in its character as to be equivalent to a wilful injury. I do not think this exception or any reasonable extension of it can be applicable to the plaintiff. He was a passenger on the Harlem cars, conducting himself as he lawfully ought, having no control over the train or its management; on the contrary, bound to submit to the regulations of the company and the directions of their officers. To say that he is chargeable with negligence because they have been guilty, is plainly not founded on any fact of conduct on his part, but is mere fiction." After discussing Thorogood v. Bryan (ubi sup.), the Chief Justice says: "But I do not see the justice of the doctrine in connection with the case before us. It is entirely plain that the plaintiff has no control, no management, even no advisory power over the train on which he was riding. Even as to selection, he had only the choice of going by that railroad or by none. To attribute to him, therefore, the negligence of the agents of the company, and thus bar him of a right of recovery, is not applying any existing exception to the general rule of law, but is forming a new exception which does not in fact rest upon the reason of the original exception, and is based on fiction, and inconsistent with justice." Six judges were parties to this judgment! A more absolute negation of every point seriatim in Thorogood v. Bryan (ubi sup.) cannot be. In Colegrove v. The New York and Newhaven Railway Company (6 Smith's Rep. 492), decided in Dec. 1859, again before the Court of Appeal in New York, the question was, whether the action could be maintained against both railway companies. The verdict and judgment for the plaintiff, a passenger in the New York and Harlem Railway, were maintained and affirmed against the defendants. In Frances Brown v. The New York Central Railway Company (31 Barbour's Rep. 385), decided in June 1860, before the Supreme Court of New York, the plaintiff had employed Thomas, the owner and driver of a stage coach from Albion to Batavia, to carry her to Elba, a place between those villages, and had taken her seat in the stage with other passengers. The route was across the track of the defendants' railroad. The conductor of the railway train was dropping two cars at Albion. He performed the operation near the crossing, the train going fast. The driver of the coach attempted to cross in front of the two detached cars which were in motion, and was caught by them. It was concontended for the plaintiff that, assuming both drivers to have been negligent, as the jury found, so as that the joint negligence produced the accident, the plaintiff was entitled to recover. This the court denied on the authority of Thorogood v. Bryan (ubi sup.). The case was brought by appeal before the Court of Appeals of New York (3 Tiffany's Rep. 597), as Brown v. The New York Central Railroad Company, in June 1865. Davis, J. said: "Since the trial of this action the decisions of this court in Chapman v. The Newhaven Railway Company and Colegrove v. The New York and Newhaven Railway Company have been published. I do not perceive why those cases do not dispose of the question as to the negligence of the driver in this case. The plaintiff was a passenger in a public stage. She had no control of its management or direction, and occupied no relation to the driver different from that which passengers occupy to any public carrier of persons. In principle there is no difference whatever between the relation to the carrier and that of a passenger on a train of railway cars. But a majority of the judges are of opinion that the true rule in a case of this kind was laid down at the circuit." The majority could not have intended to overrule the former cases, and must therefore have seen some distinction which escapes us between this case and them. The same difficulty seems to have been felt in America, for although one cannot on reflection suppose that the judges in the last case intended to impeach the previous recent decisions of their own court, it was thought that they had so intended. In Mooney v. The Hudson River Railroad Company (5 Robertson, 549), decided in May 1868, the action was by the plaintiff against two companies, the defendants and the Tenth Avenue Railway Company, in whose train he was a passenger. The verdict was for the plaintiff. On a motion for a new trial, questioning the judge's charge, in the Superior Court of New York, Robertson, C.J. said: "The court in substance charged the jury that the defendants were jointly responsible if they were both guilty of concurring negligence, and so the jury found. The charge was made pursuant to the decisions of the Court of Appeals in Chapman v. The Newhaven Railway Company and Colegrove v. The New York and Newhaven Companies; but I understand the decision in the subsequent case of Brown v. The New York Central Railway Company to have in a great measure overruled those decisions." A new trial was ordered. The question, however, was again before the Court of Appeals of New York in Webster v. The Hudson River Railroad Company (11 Tiffany, 260), decided in June 1868. The plaintiff was a passenger by the Hudson and Boston Railroad Company. The negligence of the defendants was established and not questioned. The judge refused to charge that if the Hudson and Boston Railroad car, on whose train the plaintiff was a passenger was also guilty of negligence, the plaintiff could not recover against the defendants. This refusal was upheld by the General Term Court and thereupon the appeal. Hunt, C.J., in the Appeal Court, said: "It is not pretended that the plaintiff was guilty of any personal negligence, or that it was within his power by any means, or in any degree, to have prevented the collision by which he was injured. . . . The imputation to the plaintiff of the negligence of another is based upon no sound principle." The judge then declared that Chapman v. The Newhaven Railway Company and Colegrove v. The Harlem Railway Company were in point, and that Brown v. The New York Railway Company was not inconsistent with them. The verdict and judgment were affirmed.

Since the argument before us, we have seen in the American Law Record, April 1886, No. X., the case of Little v. Hackett, in Jan. 1886, before the Supreme Court of the United States in error from the District Court of New Jersey. Field, J. gave the judgment: "The plaintiff below was injured by a collision between a train of the Central Railroad Company of New Jersey and a hack carriage in which the plaintiff was riding. The defendant legally represented the railroad company. The plaintiff had hired the public hackney carriage and had directed it to drive him to a park. The collision occurred whilst the carriage was crossing the railway track. There was evidence that both the driver and the servants of the railway company were guilty of negligence which partly directly caused the accident. The judge charged the jury: 'I charge you that when a person hires a public hack carriage, which at the time is in the care of the driver, for the purpose of contemporary conveyance, and gives directions to the driver as to the place or places to which he desires to be conveyed, but gives no special directions as to his mode or manner of driving, he is not responsible for the acts of negligence of the driver, and if he sustains an injury by means of a collision between his carriage and another, he may recover damages from any party by whose fault or negligence the injury occurred, whether that of the driver of the carriage in which he was driving, or of the driver of the other. He may sue either. The negligence of the driver of the carriage in which he is riding will not prevent him from recovering damages against the other driver if he was negligent at the same time.' The plaintiff recovered judgment, and the instruction was alleged as error for which its reversal is sought." The judgment then discusses all the English cases. With regard to Thorogood v. Bryan (ubi sup.), Field, J. continues: "What is meant by the passenger being 'identified with the carriage,' or 'with the person having its management,' is not very clear. In a recent case Pollock, B. said that he understood it to mean 'that the plaintiff for the purpose of the action must be taken to be in the same position as the owner of the omnibus or his driver. . . . Assuming this to be the correct explanation, it is difficult to see upon what principle the passenger can be considered to be in the same position with reference to the negligent act as the driver who committed it, or 'his master the owner.' Cases cited . . . show that the relation of master and servant does not exist between the passenger and the driver, or between the passenger and the owner. In the absence of this relation, the imputation of their negligence to the passenger where no fault of omission or commission is chargeable to him is against all legal rules. . . . The truth is, the decision in Thorogood v. Bryan rests upon indefensible grounds. The identification of the passenger with the negligent driver or owner without his personal co-operation or management is a gratuitous assumption. There is no such identification." The judge then cited several American cases to the same effect, and upheld the instruction and verdict for the plaintiff.

After having thus laboriously inquired into the matter, and having considered the case of Thorogood v. Bryan (ubi sup.), we cannot see any principle on which it can be supported, and we think that, with the exception of the weighty opinion of Lord Bramwell, though that does not seem to be a final view, the preponderance of judicial and professional opinion in England is against it, and that the weight of judicial opinion in America is against it. We are of opinion that the proposition maintained in it is essentially unjust and inconsistent with other recognised principles of law. As to the propriety of dealing with it at this time in a court of appeal it is a case which, from the time of its publication, has been constantly criticised. No one can have gone into, or have abstained from going into an omnibus, railroad, or ship, on the faith of the decision. We therefore think that, now the question is for the first time before an English Court of Appeal, the case of Thorogood v. Bryan must be overruled. It follows that the propositions stated at the commencement of this judgment contain the law on this matter, perhaps not exhaustively, and that the proposition contained in Thorogood v. Bryan (ubi sup.) is not to be added to them. We have therefore to apply those propositions to the actions mentioned in the special case. But before doing so we must state that, for the reasons given by Butt, J., we are in accord with him in saying that actions brought under Lord Campbell's Act are not Admiralty actions at all; that they are pure common law actions; that they are not touched by the Judicature Act 1873, s. 25, sub-sect. 9; that they are to be ruled in every respect by the common law. We desire to say that we do not express in this judgment any opinion as to whether an action brought at common law, in respect to damage to cargo, will, by virtue of the above section, be governed by the Admiralty practice laid down in the case of The Milan (ubi sup.), or whether the application of the section is to be limited to actions for injury to one of two ships, or to both, by a collision between them. In Armstrong's action a point is suggested that he ought not to recover against the defendants, the owners of the Bernina, because he could not recover against the owners of the Bushire. He would, in an action against the latter, be met by the doctrine of the accident being occasioned by the negligence of a fellow-servant. The suggestion would go far. It would apply where passengers or goods are carried by railway, or in ship, under a notice limiting the liability of the railway company or shipowner. It would work manifest injustice by enabling a person to take advantage of a contract to which he was a stranger, and for the advantage of which he had given no consideration. The rule of law is, that a person injured by more than one wrongdoer may maintain an action for the whole damage done to him against any of them. There is no condition that he might, if he pleased, maintain an action against each of them. There is no disadvantage to the one sued, because there is no contribution between joint wrongdoers. The plaintiff Armstrong is therefore entitled to judgment for the whole of the damages he may be able to prove, according to the rule of damages laid down in Lord Campbell's Act. So in the case of the plaintiff Toeg. In the case of Owen, the deceased was personally negligent, so that his negligence was partly directly a cause of the injury, he could not have recovered, neither can his administratrix. The two cases must, according to the agreement between the parties, be sent to the registrar and merchants. I have been allowed by my brother Lopes to say that this judgment is his as well as mine, though I hope he will add some observations of his own.

Lindley, L.J.—This was a special case, and was in substance as follows: Three actions were brought in the Admiralty Division of the High Court by the respective legal personal representatives of three persons on board the Bushire against the owners of the Bernina. Those persons were killed by a collision between the two vessels, both of which were negligently navigated. One of the three persons, Toeg, was a passenger on the Bushire. One Armstrong was an engineer of the ship, but was not to blame for the collision. The third, Owen, was her second officer, and was in charge of her, and was himself to blame for the collision. All three actions are brought under Lord Campbell's Act (9 & 10 Vict. c. 93). The questions for decision are whether any, and if any which, of these actions can be maintained, and, if any of them can, then whether the damages recoverable are to be measured according to the principles which prevail at common law or according to those which are adopted in the Court of Admiralty in cases of collision. In order to determine these questions it is first necessary to consider the statute on which the questions are founded, for it must not be forgotten that such actions as these could not be brought at common law. Neither could they be maintained in the Court of Admiralty before that court became a branch of the High Court by virtue of the Judicature Acts 1873 and 1875. Lord Campbell's Act (9 & 10 Vict. c. 93) enacts by sect. 1 that, "Whensoever the death of a person shall be caused by wrongful act, neglect, or default, and the act, neglect, or default is such as would, if death had not ensued, have entitled the party injured to maintain an action and recover damages in respect thereof, then and in every such case the person who would have been liable if death had not ensued shall be liable to an action for damages, notwithstanding the death of the person injured." Then by sect. 2 it is enacted that such action shall be for the benefit of the wife, husband, parent, and child of the deceased, and shall be brought in the name of his or her executor or administrator. The 2nd section then goes on as follows: "And in every such action the jury may give such damages as they may think proportioned to the injury resulting from such death to the parties respectively for whom and for whose benefit such action shall be brought, and the amount so recovered (after deducting the costs not recovered from the defendant) shall be divided amongst the before-mentioned parties in such shares as the jury by their verdict shall find and direct." This provision as to damages was wholly inapplicable to the Court of Admiralty when Lord Campbell's Act was passed. At that time no action for damages in the then technical sense of the expression could be brought in the Court of Admiralty. Moreover, that court did not consist of a judge and jury, nor had it any machinery for summoning juries by whom damages could be assessed or by whom damages could be divided amongst the persons beneficially entitled to them by the statute. Although, therefore, actions under Lord Campbell's Act can now be brought in the Admiralty Division of the High Court, it is plain that the damages must be assessed by a jury as directed by the statute, and not by the judge, with or without other assistance, according to the rules which are usually applied in that court in cases of collision. When the Judicature Acts passed, the Court of Admiralty had no rules applicable to actions brought under Lord Campbell's Act, simply because that court had no jurisdiction to try such actions. It follows, as a consequence, that, whether we regard the right to sue or whether we regard the damages to be recovered in actions founded upon Lord Campbell's Act, it is impossible to comply with sub-sect. 9 of sect. 25 of the Judicature Act 1873. It is manifest that this clause in the Judicature Act has no application to such actions, although it does apply to ordinary actions for collision at sea.

Having cleared the ground thus far, it is necessary to return to the statute and see under what circumstances an action upon it can be supported. The first matter to be considered is, whether there has been any such wrongful act, neglect, or default of the defendants as would if death had not ensued have entitled the three deceased persons respectively to have sued the defendants. Now, as regards one of these, viz., Owen, the second officer, who was himself to blame for the collision, it is clear that if death had not ensued he could not have maintained an action against the defendants. There was negligence on his part contributing to the collision, and no evidence to show that, notwithstanding his negligence, the defendants could, by taking reasonable care, have avoided the collision. There was what is called such contributory negligence on his part as to render an action by him unsustainable. It follows, therefore, that his representatives can recover nothing under Lord Campbell's Act for his widow and children, and their action cannot be maintained. The other two actions are not so easily disposed of. They raise two questions, viz. (1) whether the passenger Toeg, if alive, could have successfully sued the defendants, and, if he could, then (2) whether there is any difference between the case of the passenger and that of the engineer Armstrong. The learned judge whose decision is under review, felt himself bound by authority to decide both actions against the plaintiffs. The authorities which the learned judge followed are Thorogood v. Bryan (8 C. B. 115) and Armstrong v. The Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Company (33 L. T. Rep. N. S. 228; L. Rep. 10 Ex. 47), and the real question to be determined is, whether they can be properly overruled or not. Thorogood v. Bryan (ubi sup.) was decided in 1849, and has been generally followed at Nisi Prius ever since when cases like it have arisen. But it is curious to see how reluctant the courts have been to affirm its principle after argument; and how they have avoided doing so and have preferred, when possible, to decide the cases before them on other grounds, see, for example, Rigby v. Hewitt (5 Ex. 240); Greenland v. Chaplin (5 Ex. 243); Waite v. The North-Eastern Railway Company (E. B. & E. 719). I am not aware that the principle on which Thorogood v. Bryan (ubi sup.) was decided has ever been approved by any court which has had to consider it. On the other hand, that case has been criticised and said to be contrary to principle by persons of the highest eminence, not only in this country, but also in Scotland and America, and whilst it is true that Thorogood v Bryan (ubi sup.) has never been overruled, it is also true that it has never been affirmed by any court which could properly overrule it, and it cannot be yet said to have become indisputably settled law. I do not think, therefore, that it is too late for a court of appeal to reconsider it and to overrule it if clearly contrary to well-settled legal principles. Thorogood v. Bryan (ubi sup.) was an action founded on Lord Campbell's Act. The facts were shortly as follows: The deceased was a passenger on the outside of an omnibus, and he had just got off it. He was knocked down and killed by another omnibus belonging to the defendant. There was negligence on the part of the drivers of both omnibuses, and it appears that there was also negligence on the part of the deceased himself. The jury found a verdict for the defendant, and there does not seem to have been any reason why the court should have disturbed the verdict if not driven to do so on technical grounds. In those days, however, a misdirection by the judge to the jury compelled the court to grant a new trial, whether any injustice had been done or not; and accordingly the plaintiff moved for a new trial on the ground of misdirection, and it is with reference to this point that the decision of the court is of importance. The learned judge who tried the case told the jury in effect to find for the defendant, if they thought that the deceased was killed either by reason of his own want of care or by reason of want of care on the part of the driver of the omnibus off which he was getting. This last direction was complained of, but was upheld by the court. Hence the importance of the case. The ratio decidendi was, that if the death of the deceased was not occasioned by his own negligence it was occasioned by the negligence of both drivers, and that, if so, the negligence of the driver of the omnibus off which the deceased was getting was the negligence of the deceased; and the reason for so holding was that the deceased had voluntarily placed himself under the care of that driver. Maule, J. puts it thus, at p. 131: "The deceased must be considered as identified with the driver of the omnibus in which he voluntarily became a passenger, and that the negligence of the driver was the negligence of the deceased." This theory of identification was quite new. No trace of it is to be found in any earlier decision, nor in any legal treatise, English or foreign, so far as I have been able to ascertain. Nor has it ever been satisfactorily explained. It must be assumed, for the purpose of considering the grounds of the decision in question, that the passenger was not himself in fault. Assuming this to be so, then, if both drivers were negligent and both caused the injury to the passenger, it is difficult to understand why both drivers or their masters should not be liable to him. The doctrine of identification laid down in Thorogood v. Bryan is to me quite unintelligible. It is in truth a fictitious extension of the principles of agency; but to say that the driver of a public conveyance is the agent of the passengers is to say that which is not true in fact. Such a doctrine, if made the basis of further reasoning, leads to results which are wholly untenable; e.g., to the result that the passengers would themselves be liable for the negligence of the persons driving them, which is obviously absurd, but which of course the court never meant. All the court meant to say was, that, for purposes of suing for negligence, the passenger was in no better position than the man driving him. But why not? The driver of a public vehicle is not selected by the passenger otherwise than by being hailed by him as one of the public to take him up; and such selection, if selection it can be called, does not create the relation of principal and agent or master and servant between the passenger and the driver. The passenger knows nothing of the driver, and has no control over him; nor is the driver in any proper sense employed by the passenger. The driver, if not his own master, is hired, paid, and employed by the owner of the vehicle he drives, or by some other person who lets the vehicle to him. The orders he obeys are his employer's orders. Those orders, in the case of an omnibus, are to drive from such a place to such a place, and take up and put down passengers; and in the case of a cab, the orders are to drive where the passenger for the time being may desire to go within the limits expressly or impliedly set by the employer. If the passenger actively interferes with the driver by giving him orders as to what he is to do, I can understand the meaning of the expression that the passenger identifies himself with the driver; but no such interference was suggested in Thorogood v. Bryan (ubi sup.).

The principles of the law of negligence, and in particular of what is called contributory negligence, have been discussed on many occasions since that case was decided, and are much better understood now than they were thirty years ago. Tuff v. Warman (ubi sup.), in the Exchequer Chamber, and Radley v. The London and North-Western Railway Company (ubi sup.), in the House of Lords, show the true grounds on which a person, himself guilty of negligence, is enabled to maintain an action against another for injury occasioned by the combined negligence of both. If the proximate cause of the injury is the negligence of the plaintiff as well as that of the defendant, the plaintiff cannot recover anything. The reason for this is not easily discoverable. But I take it to be settled that an action at common law by A. against B. for injury directly caused to A. by the want of care of A. and B. will not lie. As Pollock, C.B. pointed out in Greenland v. Chaplin (5 Ex. 248), the jury cannot take the consequences and divide them in proportion according to the negligence of the one or the other party. But if the plaintiff can show that, although he has been himself negligent, the real and proximate cause of the injury sustained by him was the negligence of the defendant, the plaintiff can maintain an action, as is shown not only by Tuff v. Warman (ubi sup.) and Radley v. The London and North-Western Railway Company (ubi sup.), but also by the well-known case of Davies v. Mann (10 M. & W. 546) and other cases of that class. The cases which give rise to actions for negligence are primarily reducible to three classes, as follows: (1) A., without fault of his own, is injured by the negligence of B.; then B. is liable to A. (2) A., by his own fault, is injured by B., without fault on his part; then B. is not liable to A. (3) A. is injured by B. by the fault more or less of both combined, then the following further distinctions have to be made: (a) If, notwithstanding B.'s negligence, A., with reasonable care, could have avoided the injury, he cannot sue B.: (Butterfield v. Forrester, 11 East, 60; Bridge v. The Grand Junction Railway Company, 3 M. & W. 244; Dowell v. The General Steam Navigation Company, 5 E. & B. 195). (b) If, notwithstanding A.'s negligence, B., with reasonable care, could have avoided injuring A., A. can sue B.: (Tuff v. Warman, 5 C. B. N. S. 573; Radley v. The London and North-Western Railway Company, 35 L. T. Rep. N. S. 637; 1 App. Cas. 754; Davies v. Mann, 10 M. & W. 546). (c) If there has been as much want of reasonable care on A.'s part as on B.'s—or, in other words, if the proximate cause of the injury is the want of reasonable care on both sides—A. cannot sue B. In such a case, A. cannot with truth say that he has been injured by B.'s negligence; he can only with truth say that he has been injured by his own carelessness and B.'s negligence, and the two combined give no cause of action at common law. This follows from the two sets of decisions already referred to. But why in such a case the damages should not be apportioned I do not profess to understand. However, as already stated, the law on this point is settled and not open to judicial discussion. If now another person is introduced, the same principles will be found applicable. Substitute in the foregoing cases B. and C. for B., and unless C. is A.'s agent or servant there will be no difference in the result, except that A. will have two persons instead of one liable to him. A. may sue B. and C. in one action, and recover damages against them both, or he may sue them separately, and recover the whole damage sustained against the one he sues. See Clark v. Chambers (38 L. T.

Rep. N. S. 454; 3 Q. B. Div. 327), where all the previous authorities were carefully examined by the late Lord Chief Justice Cockburn. This is no doubt hard on the defendant, who is alone sued, and this hardship seems to have influenced the court in deciding Thorogood v. Bryan (ubi sup.). In that case the court appears to have thought it hard on the defendant to make him pay all the damages due to the plaintiff, and that it was no hardship to the plaintiff to exonerate the defendant from liability as the plaintiff had a clear remedy against the master of the omnibus in which he was a passenger. But it is difficult to see the justice of exonerating the defendant from all liability in respect of his own wrong, and of throwing the whole liability on someone who was no more to blame than he. The injustice to the defendant which the court sought to avoid is common to all cases in which a wrong is done by two people, and one of them alone is made to pay for it. The rule which does not allow of contribution between wrongdoers is what produces hardship in these cases; but the hardship produced by that rule (if really applicable to such cases as those under discussion) does not justify the court in exonerating one of the wrongdoers from all responsibility for his own misconduct, or for the misconduct of his servants. I can hardly believe that, if the plaintiff in Thorogood v. Bryan (ubi sup.) had sued the proprietors of both omnibuses, it would have been held that he had no right of action against one of them.

Having given my reasons for my inability to concur in the doctrine laid down in Thorogood v. Bryan (ubi sup.), I proceed to consider how far that doctrine is supported by other authorities. The court in deciding Thorogood v. Bryan (ubi sup.) considered that they were following Bridge v. The Grand Junction Railway (3 M. & W. 244). In that case a passenger in one train sued the owners of another train for an injury caused by a collision between the two trains. The defendants pleaded that the collision was caused in part by the negligence of the persons who had the management of the train in which the plaintiff was. The court held the plea bad, both in substance and in form, because the plea did not state that those who had the management of the plaintiff's train could, with ordinary care, have avoided the collision; and that, even assuming the negligence pleaded to be proved, the plea was bad on the authority of Butterfield v. Forrester (11 East, 60), which was, and still is, a perfectly sound decision. When Bridge v. The Grand Junction Railway Company is carefully looked at it will be found to be no authority for the doctrine laid down in Thorogood v. Bryan (ubi sup.). I cannot find in Bridge v. The Grand Junction Railway Company (ubi sup.) any authority for the proposition that the negligence of the driver of an omnibus or railway train is for any purpose to be regarded as the negligence of the passengers in it. Nor is there any case prior to Thorogood v. Bryan (ubi sup.) which warrants any such proposition. Vanderplank v. Miller (Moo. & M. 168), which was relied upon by Mr. Barnes as an earlier authority in point, is very shortly reported. The plaintiff was the owner of goods on board the Louisa, and he sued the owners of another ship which ran into and sank the Louisa, for the loss of the goods. The plaintiff obtained a verdict, but Lord Tenterden told the jury that, if there was fault on both sides, the plaintiff could not recover; to enable him to do so, the action must be attributable entirely to the fault of the crew of the defendants. This direction cannot be properly understood without knowing more of the facts and pleadings in the case. For anything that appears to the contrary, the plaintiff may have been the owner or charterer of the Louisa, and the employer of those on board of her; or the declaration may have been so drawn as to account for the direction that the plaintiff could not succeed unless the accident was attributable entirely to the fault of the crew of the defendants. I cannot regard this case as an earlier illustration of the principle laid down in Thorogood v. Bryan (ubi sup.) Nor is the relation between bailor or bailee an element in the class of cases now under consideration, and to decide this case on principles applicable to bailments of goods would be to proceed on a misleading analogy. Waite v. The North-Eastern Railway Company (E. B. & E. 719) is materially different from Thorogood v. Bryan (ubi sup.), and was decided on a different and perfectly sound principle. The plaintiff was a child in the care of her grandmother, who had taken tickets for herself and the child to go by a train belonging to the defendant company. The plaintiff was injured in consequence of the want of care of her grandmother quite as much as by the negligence of the defendants, and it was very properly held that the defendants were not liable. There was no obligation or duty on the part of the defendants to take more care of the plaintiff than of grown-up persons. The defendants had a right to expect that proper care would be taken of the child, and if such care had been taken there would have been no accident. The plaintiff sued both in contract and in tort, but the same principle applied to both aspects of the case. In Waite's case Bramwell, B. said he thought Thorogood v. Bryan (ubi sup.) rightly decided, but on wrong reasoning; but the importance of the case turns entirely upon the reasoning; and Bramwell, B. himself, when he gave his judgment in Waite's case, preferred to rest his decision, not on Thorogood v. Bryan (ubi sup.), but on the ground on which the court decided it, as already mentioned. Child v. Hearn (ubi sup.) and Armstrong v. The Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Company (33 L. T. Rep. N. S. 228; L. Rep. 10 Ex. 47) are the only other cases which require notice. In Child v. Hearn (ubi sup.) the plaintiff was in the employment of a railway company whose duty it was to fence its line. The defendant was the owner of some pigs which had got through the fence and upset a trolley, whereby the plaintiff was hurt. There was evidence that the defendant knew that his pigs had got through the fence on previous occasions, and his negligence consisted in not preventing them from so doing. The verdict was for the plaintiff, but the court granted a new trial. Pigott, B. clearly was of opinion that the true cause of the injury to the plaintiff was the negligence of the railway company, and not the negligence of the defendant. The other members of the court, Bramwell and Pollock, BB. concurred in this view, but went further, and expressed their opinion to be that, whether the doctrine laid down in Thorogood v. Bryan (ubi sup.) was right or not, yet the plaintiff, being a servant of the railway company which had omitted to keep its fence in proper order, could not be in a better position than the company would have been in if its property had been injured by the defendant's pigs, and if the company had sued him for such injury. This view was again adopted in Armstrong v. The Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Company (ubi sup.). In that case the plaintiff was in the employ of the North-Western Railway Company, and was injured by a collision between a train belonging to that company and a train belonging to the defendant company. The collision was, in the opinion of the jury, caused by the negligence of the servants of both companies, and the judge, at the trial, directed the verdict to be entered for the defendants with leave for the plaintiff to move to enter the verdict for him. The court held that the verdict had been rightly entered for the defendants. The court seems to have thought that the negligence causing the collision was really that of the London and North-Western Railway Company, and not that of the defendant company, but the court did not decide the case on this ground. The court followed Thorogood v. Bryan (ubi sup.), as indeed it could hardly avoid doing. Bramwell, B. thought that the plaintiff could not sue his own employers the London and North-Western Railway Company, and could not consequently sue the defendants, who only contributed to the mischief and were certainly not the proximate cause of it. If the learned baron meant that the negligence of the defendants was not part of the proximate cause of the injury to the plaintiff, it is obvious that they were not liable at all. But if the proximate cause of the injury was the combined negligence of the two companies, I confess my inability to understand upon what principle the plaintiff could be held not entitled to sue either company, or, in other words, to be without remedy. Wrongdoers are liable to be sued severally, and one of them may have a defence and the others have none. I cannot see why a servant should not sue a person who injures him, although his master or a fellow-servant also injures him at the same time, and so that his injury is the result of the conduct of both of the others. Both Child v. Hearn (ubi sup.) and Amstrong v. Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Company (ubi sup.) were rightly decided on the ground that the negligences of the defendants in those actions were not the proximate causes of the injuries sustained by the plaintiffs. But the reasons for which Bramwell, B. considered that the plaintiffs must fail even if Thorogood v. Bryan (ubi sup.) was decided on wrong grounds, are really open to the same objections as the doctrine enunciated in that case. Thorogood v. Bryan (ubi sup.) and Armstrong v. The Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Company affirm that, although if A. is injured by the combined negligence of B. and C., or either of them, he cannot sue C. if either he A. is under the care of B. or is in his employ. From this general doctrine I am compelled most respectfully to dissent. But, of course, if B. is A.'s agent or servant, the doctrine holds good.

In Scotland the decision in Thorogood v. Bryan (ubi sup.) was discussed and held to be unsatisfactory in the case of Hobbs v. The Glasgow and South-Western Railway Company (3 Sc. Sess. Cas. 215). In America the subject was recently examined with great care by the Supreme Court of the United States in Little v. Hackett (14 Amer. Law Record, 577), in which previous English and American cases were reviewed, and the doctrine laid down in Thorogood v. Bryan (ubi sup.) was distinctly repudiated as contrary to sound principles. In Little v. Hackett (ubi sup.) the plaintiff was driving in a hackney carriage and was injured by a collision between it and a railway train on a level crossing. There was negligence both on the part of the driver of the carriage and on the part of the railway company's servants, but it was held that the plaintiff was not preventrd by the negligence of the driver of the carriage in which he was from maintaining an action against the railway company. The previous American authorities will be found referred to in this case. In this country Thorogood v. Bryan (ubi sup.) was distinctly disapproved of by Dr. Lushington in The Milan (ubi sup.), and even Lord Bramwell, who has gone further than any other judge in upholding the decision, has expressly disapproved of the grounds on which it was based. No text-writer has approved it, and in Smith's Leading Cases the comments on it are clearly adverse to it (see vol. 1, p. 266, edit. 6). For the reasons above stated, I am of opinion that the doctrine laid down in Thorogood v. Bryan (ubi sup.) and Armstrong v. The Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Company (ubi sup.) is contrary to sound legal principles, and ought not to be regarded as law. Consequently, I am of opinion that the decision in Toeg's case and in Armstrong's case ought to be reversed.

Lopes, L.J.—Two very important questions are raised by this case. First, does the Admiralty rule as to joint liability for joint negligence apply to a case like this brought under the provisions of Lord Campbell's Act? Secondly, can the plaintiffs, or either of them, recover against the defendants, or, in other words, is the decision in Thorogood v. Bryan (ubi sup.) good law, and ought it to be followed? The facts of the case have been fully and accurately stated. I agree with the facts as stated by the other members of the court. The general law of negligence has been discussed. I agree with the law as laid down and explained. The authorities bearing upon this case have also been cited and commented upon. And if the case was not of such general importance, and if it was not proposed to overrule the law as acted upon for nearly half a century, I should think it superfluous to add my opinion to the opinions already so exhaustively and elaborately expressed. I shall, however, deal with both questions shortly. First, is the Admiralty rule as to joint liability for joint negligence applicable to this case? According to the Admiralty rule, when both vessels are to blame, the owners and cargo owners of each can recover half their loss from the other. This rule before the Judicature Acts clearly did not apply to claims brought by passengers, or by representatives of deceased passengers, under Lord Campbell's Act. Such claims were not brought in the Admiralty Court at all, because there was no question of maritime lien, but were brought in a court of common law, in which the ordinary rule as to contributory negligence was in force. Since the Judicature Acts the Probate, Divorce, and Admiralty Division has jurisdiction concurrent with the other divisions to try claims of this kind. Whether the Admiralty rule as to joint liability for joint negligence applies to this class of cases depends on sect. 25 of the Judicature Act 1873, sub-sect. 9. It is in these words: "In any case or proceeding for damages arising out of a collision between two ships, if both ships shall have been found to have been in fault the rules hitherto in force in the Court of Admiralty, so far as they have been at variance with the rules in force in the courts of common law, shall prevail." The rule in Admiralty was only to prevail so far as it conflicted with the rule of common law. But there never was any conflict between the Admiralty and the common law rule. On the principle Actio personalis moritur cum personâ, none of these actions could be maintained before the passing of Lord Campbell's Act, and could not have been brought in the Admiralty Court before the passing of the Judicature Acts, when the Admiralty Court became a branch of the High Court. It is clear, too, from Lord Campbell's Act that that Act was never intended to apply to a court where there was no machinery for a trial by jury, and where the damages could not be assessed by a jury. I am clear, therefore, that the Admiralty rule as to joint liability for joint negligence does not apply to the present case.

Secondly, can the plaintiffs, or either of them, recover against the defendants? Owen clearly cannot, because he was himself to blame. Can Toeg the passenger and Armstrong the engineer, neither of whom were in any way to blame? If Thorogood v. Bryan (ubi sup.) is to be maintained they cannot, but if it is to be overruled they can. Thorogood v. Bryan (ubi sup.) was an action under Lord Campbell's Act against the owner of an omnibus for a death caused by the negligence of the driver. The defendant's omnibus had knocked down and killed the deceased just as he was leaving the omnibus of another person in which he had been a passenger. The judge told the jury that if, by the exercise of proper care on the part of the omnibus in which the deceased had been, the injury might have been avoided, they should find for the defendant. The court held this was a good direction in law. No weight was attached to the fact that the deceased had ceased to be a passenger in the omnibus which contributed to his death, and it seems to have been assumed that he was still to be considered a passenger. Nor was it suggested that the passenger was himself to blame. No points, however, of this kind arise in the cases now before the court, as Toeg and Armstrong were actually on board one of the guilty ships, and Toeg and Armstrong were in no way in fault. That a plaintiff cannot recover damages for an injury to which he has directly contributed is an established principle of law, and it matters not whether that contribution consists in participation in the direct cause of the injury, or in the omission of duties which, if performed, would have prevented it. If the fault, whether of omission or commission, has materially contributed to the injury, the plaintiff is without remedy against one also in the wrong. So much is undisputed law. The converse of this doctrine ought to follow as a necessary corollary, namely, when one has been injured by the wrongful act of another, to which he has in no way contributed, he should be entitled to compensation from the wrongdoer, unless the negligence of somebody towards whom he stands in the relation of principal or master has materially contributed to the injury, in which case the negligence is imputed to such principal or master, though he in no way personally participated in it, or had knowledge of it. It cannot be contended that the driver of the omnibus in Thorogood v. Bryan (ubi sup.), or those in charge of the ship, here stood in the relation of principal or master to the injured persons. The driver and those in charge of the ship were the servants of their respective employers. They selected and hired them; they controlled them; they paid them; they alone could discharge them. Neither the driver of the omnibus nor those in charge of the ship were bound to obey any order of the injured persons; the injured persons could neither direct nor alter the course or the mode of navigation of the ship, nor the destination nor mode of driving of the omnibus. It is impossible, therefore, to contend that the relationship of master and servant existed, and that the persons injured lost their remedy because of the contributory negligence of somebody under their control. Nor do the court in Thorogood v. Bryan (ubi sup.) rely upon any such relationship between the passenger and the driver. So far as I understand the case, they rest their judgment on the ground that the passenger trusted the driver by selecting the particular conveyance in which he was carried, and therefore so identified himself with the owner and the owner's servants that if injury resulted from their negligence he must be considered a party to it; in other words, to quote the language of Coltman, J., "the passenger is so far identified with the carriage in which he is travelling that want of care on the part of the driver will be a defence of the driver of the carriage which directly caused the injury." Maule, J. said: "The passenger chose his own conveyance, and must take the consequences of any default of the driver he thought fit to trust." Cresswell, J. said: "If the driver of the omnibus the deceased was in had by his negligence or want of due care contributed to any injury from a collision, his master clearly could not maintain an action, and I must confess I see no reason why a passenger who employs the driver to carry him stands in any different position." Williams, J. added, "I think the passenger must for this purpose be considered as identified with the person having the management of the omnibus he was conveyed in." If the driver could be said to be the servant of the passenger, these judgments would be intelligible and according to well-established law. What is meant by the passenger being "identified with the carriage" or "with the person having its management" I am at a loss to understand. In Armstrong v. The Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Company (ubi sup.) Pollock, B. said he understood it to mean "that the plaintiff, for the purposes of the action, must be taken to be in the same position as the owner of the omnibus or his driver." If that is the true explanation, then the passenger, who is blameless, is to be in the same position as the driver who committed a wrongful act, or his master who is responsible for the negligence of his servant. This is in accordance neither with good sense nor justice, and if, again, the passenger is to be considered in the same position as the driver or owner, and their negligence is to be imputed to him, he would be liable to third parties. For instance, in the case of a collision between two omnibuses, where the driver of one was entirely in fault, every passenger in the omnibus free from blame would have an action against every passenger in the other omnibus, because every such passenger would be identified with the driver and is responsible for his negligence. Nor again, in the case just put, could any passenger in the other omnibus bring an action against the owner of the omnibus in which he was carried, because the negligence of the driver is to be imputed to the passenger. If the negligence of the driver is to be attributed to the passenger for one purpose it would be impossible to say he is not to be affected by it for others. Other cases might be put. The more the decision in Thorogood v. Bryan (ubi sup.) is examined, the more anomalous and indefensible that decision appears. The theory of the identification of the passenger with the negligent driver or owner is, in my opinion, a fallacy and a fiction contrary to sound law and opposed to every principle of justice. A passenger in an omnibus whose injury is caused by the joint negligence of that omnibus and another may, in my opinion, maintain an action either against the owners of the omnibus in which he was carried or the other omnibus or both. I am clearly of opinion that Thorogood v. Bryan (ubi sup.) should be overruled. The plaintiffs can therefore, in my opinion, maintain their action, and this appeal must be allowed.

PROBATE, DIVORCE, AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION.

ADMIRALTY BUSINESS.

Oct. 30 and Nov. 1, 1886.

(Before the Right Hon. Sir JAMES HANNEN, assisted by TRINITY MASTERS.)

THE MONARCH. (a)

Salvage — Compromise — Authority of solicitor — Mistake of fact — Right of pilot to salvage.

Where, in a salvage action, the agents of the plaintiffs' solicitor settle the plaintiffs' claim under a mistake of fact, and one of the claimants is present at the compromise, and under a misapprehension of the facts acquiesces therein, such compromise is not binding on him when the true state of affairs is discovered.

The services of a pilot on a salved ship are not changed from those of pilot to salvor where his services consist in trifling assistance by helping at the wheel and windlass.

THIS was a salvage action instituted by the owners, masters, and crews of the steam-tugs Empress of India and Wild Rose, and John Williams, a pilot, against the owners of the ship Monarch, her cargo and freight.

The facts alleged on behalf of the plaintiffs were as follows:—

Shortly after 5 p.m. on the 15th Oct. 1886 the two steam-tugs Empress of India and Wild Rose, of seventeen and eleven tons respectively, were in the Bristol Channel, proceeding down channel to the assistance of vessels which had been reported in distress, when they observed the full-rigged ship Monarch driving up channel stern first towards the Flat Holms Island. The wind at this time was blowing with hurricane force from W.S.W., and a fearful sea was running up channel. Shortly afterwards it was seen that the Monarch had fallen off to southward, and as it was thus evident that her chains had parted, the tugs steamed after her, and overtook her about a mile and a half to the E.N.E. of the Flat Holms. Meanwhile those on board the Monarch had been trying to get her under command by setting sail, but the sails were blown away before they could be set. After great difficulty and danger the Wild Rose was made fast to the Monarch, but whilst the Empress of India was getting fast she unavoidably came into collision with the Wild Rose, and in order to clear the rope of the Wild Rose had to be let go. After some time both tugs succeeded in getting made fast, and at about 6.45 p.m. began to tow the Monarch towards Newport. As the vessels approached the entrance to the river Usk the hawser of the Wild Rose parted, As it was impossible, in the then state of the weather, to replace it, the Empress of India alone continued the towage. Subsequently the Wild Rose managed to get a warping line fast to the Monarch's quarter. After they had made the river the Monarch sheered over towards the eastern bank, causing the Empress of India's rope to part, and the Monarch at about 8.30 p.m. fell broadside on the soft mud, where she was in a position of safety. Next morning she floated and was towed into the Alexandra Dock.

The master of the Monarch was on shore at the time the services were rendered. The plaintiff (John Williams) had been engaged to pilot the vessel to sea, and alleged that, on the anchors dragging, he had given orders to slip the anchors and set sail, and that he had helped at the wheel and windlass, and had by his exertions and advice materially assisted in getting the vessel into a position of safety.

The defendants alleged that on the 15th Oct. 1886 the Monarch, a full-rigged ship of 1187 tons register, was at anchor between Barry Island and Sully Island, being in the course of a voyage from Cardiff to Yokohama. The pilot, John Williams, had been engaged to pilot the ship to sea, and was in the meantime on board for a charge of 10*s.* a day. On the vessel commencing to drag her anchors it was deemed prudent to slip her cables and put her under sail. Sail was thereupon set, and the Monarch proceeded on the port tack at a speed of about three knots an hour. When the services of the tugs were accepted the Monarch was perfectly tight, and in no immediate danger. The defendants also denied that there was danger to the tugs in rendering the services.

Paragraph 12 of the defence was as follows:

The plaintiffs, by their agent, the owner of the Empress of India, on the 27th inst., after considerable bargaining, agreed to accept the sum of 350*l.* in settlement of the said services, which sum was thereupon paid by the defendants, and also received in exchange a receipt for the same, to which they crave leave to refer.

The receipt above referred to was as follows:

Received of Messrs. Thomas Cooper and Co. the sum of 350*l.* in full and final discharge of all claims by the owners, masters, and crew of the steam-tugs Empress of India and Wild Rose, and John Williams, of Eleanor-street, Cardiff, and all matters in dispute in this action, with the exception of costs, which are to be taxed in the usual way as between party and party.

This receipt was signed by Messrs. Ingledew, Ince, and Colt. From the evidence on this point it appeared that an offer of 350*l.* had been made, and that Messrs. Ingledew, Ince, and Vachell, the plaintiffs' solicitors at Cardiff, had telegraphed to their London agents, Ingledew, Ince, and Colt, to accept the 350*l.* as if paid into court, meaning thereby that payment of the cheque for 350*l.* should be tantamount to a payment into court, leaving them at liberty to accept or reject it as a tender. The London agents mistook the purport of the telegram, and understood it to mean that they were to accept 350*l.* in full satisfaction of all the plaintiffs' claims. Mr. Strong, the managing owner of the Empress of India, happened to be in London, and on the 27th Oct. was at the office of Messrs. Ingledew, Ince, and Colt. He was then informed of the telegram, and an interview then took place between the defendants' solicitors and the agent of the plaintiffs' solicitors. Mr. Strong, acting under the impression that the parties in Cardiff had seen fit to accept the 350*l.*, reluctantly consented to take such sum, and the above receipt was given. On the mistake being ascertained the acceptance of the 350*l.* was at once repudiated by the plaintiffs.

Finlay, Q.C. and Pyke for the plaintiffs.—This compromise was effected under a mistake of fact, and is therefore not binding. Even a settlement made by counsel in court is not binding if made in ignorance of material facts, though with the client's authority:

Furnival v. Bogle, 4 Russ. 142.

Moreover, an agent is not clothed with authority for all purposes, and even if there were no mistake it would be sufficient to set aside the compromise to show that he had no authority:

Yates v. Freckleton, 2 Doug. 623.

The plaintiffs are therefore entitled to ask the court for an award considerably in excess of the 350*l.* The services were of a very valuable character. The pilot is entitled to salvage reward.

Sir Walter Phillimore and Barnes for the defendants.—It is contended only as against the Empress of India that the compromise is binding. As against the other salvors we do not ask to enforce it. It is immaterial whether the compromise arose through a mistake or not. Mr. Strong admittedly acquiesced in it, and therefore the court should not go behind the compromise:

Griffiths v. Williams, 1 Term. Rep. 710.

The court refuses to inquire into the authority of counsel to compromise, and will hold the compromise binding on the client subject to any remedies the client may have against his solicitor for compromising without authority:

Swinfen v. Swinfen, 25 L. J. 303, C. P.;
Chambers v. Mason, 28 L. J. 10, Ex.;
Thomas v. Harris, 27 L. J. 353, Ex.

It is also submitted that 350*l.* is in fact an adequate reward for the services rendered. As to the claim of the pilot, it is contended that his services were never converted into those of salvage. He was on board for the purpose of piloting the ship, and has been paid in respect of his services.

Finlay, Q.C. in reply.

Sir JAMES HANNEN.—I am glad that I have been relieved from the necessity of giving a decision upon a question which has been raised as to the effect of the alleged settlement with the plaintiffs, who had not assented to the compromise, and I think that the course taken by the defendants in admitting that they do not contend that the compromise is binding against the Wild Rose and the pilot is highly creditable to them. I am still, however, called upon to give a decision as to the effect of the transaction between the defendants' solicitors and the agents of the plaintiffs' solicitors on the claim of the Empress of India. I am of the opinion that the owners of the Empress of India are, in the circumstances, not bound by the agreement, and I so decide, for the following reasons: Mr. Strong was under the impression that his solicitors, who also represented the other claimants, had agreed to take 350*l.* in full discharge of their claim, and he under that mistaken apprehension of the facts did give assent to the whole of the claims being settled on that basis. But, as no arrangement was made as to what apportionment should be made, I do not know how it would be possible for me to apportion it so as to bind Mr. Strong, while the other claimants are to be released from the settlement. The ground, therefore, upon which my judgment rests is, that there was a misapprehension of fact on Mr. Strong's part as to the compromise by the other claimants, and a compromise made under a mistake by one creditor as to something done by others does not bind him. I also think it clear that Mr. Strong, though he acquiesced reluctantly in taking 350*l.*, evidently considered 400*l.* as not unreasonable. He bargained for 400*l.*, and when the other side would not give it him he consented to take 350*l.* His conduct, therefore, has a bearing on the question of how much should be paid for the services. I however consider the settlement not to be binding, and must therefore proceed to consider the respective claims.

The occurrences prior to the Monarch clearing the Flat Holms are of little importance, because when the tugs arrived she had by her own manœuvres avoided that difficulty, and had proceeded some considerable way towards the river Usk. The pilot said that if the sails had held he would have tried to put her on the mud to the west of the Usk, but that if they had not held, which is alleged to have been the danger from which the tugs saved the vessel, she would have driven ashore on the coast where it is hard sand, and must have become a total wreck. Now it appears from the chart, and from the experience of one of the Elder Brethren, that that representation is not correct, and that there is a mud soil on the east as well as on the west of the river Usk. Even, therefore, if her sails had not held I am advised that there was no extreme danger, and that, as she was then protected by Lavernock Point, the danger arising from the weather was greatly diminished, and that there was no reason to fear the extreme results which the pilot has pictured to us. Of course nobody would choose in such weather to go ashore, even on soft mud, and from that danger the plaintiffs saved the vessel, for which they are entitled to liberal compensation. The question is whether 350*l.* is sufficient. We have carefully considered the matter, and we are of opinion that this sum is not sufficient. There being a slight difference in the value of the tugs, and in the admitted services of each, we award 235*l.* to the Empress of India, and 215*l.* to the Wild Rose, making 100*l.* more than the amount tendered. With regard to the pilot's claim, the question is whether his services were changed by reason of the peril in which the ship was. That seems to be a question peculiarly for the Trinity Brethren, and I have adopted their opinion that this claimant's services were not changed from those of a pilot to those of a salvor. What was in fact the nature of his so-called salvage services? He took a turn at the wheel and helped at the windlass, things which it was only natural and proper he should do. But such trifling services can give him no claim to salvage.

ROYAL EXCHANGE SHIPPING COMPANY v. DIXON. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF APPEAL IN ENGLAND.

Carriage of goods—Bill of lading—Exception of jettison—Goods carried on deck at shipowners' risk.

Cargo carried on deck at the shipowners' risk, in violation of the contract contained in the bills of lading, but with the knowledge and acquiescence of the shipper, was properly jettisoned in the course of the voyage.

Held (affirming the judgment of the court below), that the case did not come within an exception in the bills of lading relieving the shipowner from liability in respect of goods jettisoned, and that the indorsees of the bills of lading could recover the value, and that the cause of damage was not too remote.

THIS was an appeal from a judgment of the Court of Appeal (Brett, M.R., Baggallay, and Bowen, L.JJ.), who had reversed a decision of Cave, J. in an action tried before him at Liverpool, without a jury, at the Summer Assizes 1884.

The question raised was, whether the respondents were entitled to recover from the appellants the sum of 1487*l.*, in respect of the short delivery to the respondents of cotton shipped on board the appellants' vessel, the Egyptian Monarch, at New Orleans for Liverpool.

The appellants were shipowners, and the respondents were cotton merchants at Liverpool.

The action was brought against the shipowners in respect of cotton carried on deck and properly jettisoned during the voyage.

By the bills of lading it was provided that the shipowner should not be liable in respect of goods jettisoned, or for the "negligence or default of master or other persons in the service of the ship, whether in navigating the ship or otherwise, and all and every the dangers and accidents of the sea and of navigation of whatever nature or kind." The respondents asserted that the cotton had been improperly stowed by being carried upon instead of under the deck. The cargo was shipped under four bills of lading, three of which contained the words "under deck."

In reply to the charge of improperly stowing the goods, the appellants endeavoured to set up a practice in regard to shipments of cotton from New Orleans to Liverpool, under which cotton was carried on deck at the shipowner's risk, with the acquiescence of the shippers.

Cave, J. held that under the custom the appellants were not liable for the loss of the cotton, but his decision was reversed by the Court of Appeal, as above mentioned.

The shipowners appealed.

Sir H. Davey, Q.C. and Haldane, for the appellants, contended that the respondents were bound by the terms of the bill of lading, under which the shipowners were not liable for goods jettisoned. The shippers must be taken to have known of, and to have assented to, the practice of carrying cargo on deck at the shipowner's risk, which included damage by sea water, &c., which would be the direct consequence of deck stowage. But the breach of contract in carrying on deck was not the proximate cause of the jettison, which is admitted to have been proper under the circumstances. They cited

Miller v. Tetherington, 6 H. & N. 278; 7 H. & N. 954;

Steel v. State Line Steamship Company, 37 L. T. Rep. N. S. 333; 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 516; 3 App. Cas. 72.

Sir C. Russell, Q.C., Cohen, Q.C., French, Q.C., and Barnes, for the respondents, maintained that there was no consent to the goods being carried on deck, and the shipowner was liable, and was not protected by the clause in the bill of lading. The damage was not too remote. They cited Gould v. Oliver, 2 M. & G. 208.

Haldane was heard in reply.

At the conclusion of the arguments, their Lordships took time to consider their judgment.

Dec. 7.—Their Lordships gave judgment as follows:—

The LORD CHANCELLOR (Halsbury).—My Lords: In this case the respondents, indorsees of four bills of lading of certain cotton shipped on board the appellants' screw steamer Egyptian Monarch, sue the appellants, the owners of the steamer in question, for the non-delivery to them in Liverpool of certain portions of the cotton, which were jettisoned during the voyage by reason of the Egyptian Monarch having taken the ground. The cotton in question was stowed on deck, and, with respect to three of the bills of lading, it will not be denied that the bills of lading themselves expressly stipulated that the cotton should be stowed under deck. With respect, however, to the fourth bill of lading, the words "under deck" are not to be found in it. It appears to me that there is no real difference between the bills of lading. Expressio eorum quæ tacite insunt nihil operatur, and I think it is clear, therefore, that this cotton was carried under a contract that it should be stowed under deck. The exception in the bills of lading of "jettison" cannot avail the shipowners, who broke their contract in stowing the cotton upon deck, and thereby directly caused the loss to the merchants. That this would be the general law was not, indeed, disputed; but it was said that a practice prevailed at Liverpool, so extensively practised that it must have been known to the plaintiffs, of loading cotton upon deck. But the very same evidence which established the practice, established also that the shipowners paid for any damage resulting from the practice. Now, as they could only be called upon to pay as for a breach of their contract, it follows that the supposed practice established no more than this, that a great many people in Liverpool were in the habit of acting in breach of the contract into which they had entered, and were in the habit of paying damages when injury resulted from such breach. How such a practice can be supposed to affect the contractual relations of merchant and shipowner, I am wholly at a loss to understand; or how the generality of such a practice could alter the legal rights of the parties more than a single example, it is equally difficult to discover. Every carrier by land as by water, when he breaks his contract, and causes damage thereby, is liable to be called upon to make good the damage; but how such a liability, and constant submission to damages for such liability, can license the supposed breach, is a problem that has never been solved. I have had some difficulty in understanding the suggestion that the cause of damage was too remote to give rise to the claim now made. I could imagine a state of facts in which, though I should not agree with it, the argument would be intelligible. In this case it is hardly susceptible of plausible statement. The jettison of this cargo was the direct result of its being stowed upon deck. I am therefore of opinion that the judgment of the Court of Appeal should be affirmed, and the appeal dismissed with costs, and I move your Lordships accordingly.

Lord BLACKBURN.—My Lords: In this case I have had considerable difficulty in understanding what the ground was upon which Cave, J. decided below; but, upon the best consideration which I can give to it, I think that there has been a misapprehension upon his part, and that really the point which in his imagination had arisen did not arise. Upon the facts it appears, as the Lord Chancellor has just stated, that the case really comes to this: the goods were shipped on board, and probably with the knowledge, or at least without any objection on the part of the shippers, were put on the deck, on which they ought not to have been put. That being so, I quite agree that the judgment of the Court of Appeal is right.

Lord WATSON.—My Lords: Notwithstanding the able argument addressed to us on behalf of the appellants, I have come without difficulty to the conclusion that the judgment of the Court of Appeal is right. The appellants did not maintain that they have established a proper mercantile custom, which, if not excluded by the terms of the bills of lading, would become an implied term of the contracts thereby constituted. But it was said that a practice had been admitted by the respondents, which was described as "a practice to carry goods on deck from New Orleans to Liverpool at the risk of the shipowner." From an examination of the statements and concessions mutually made in the course of the trial before Cave, J., I am satisfied that the only practice ultimately alleged by the appellants, and admitted by the respondents, was in substance this: that owners of vessels trading between New Orleans and Liverpool were in the habit of stowing goods on deck in violation of their contract with the shipper, they accepting full responsibility for the consequences. Such being the state of the facts, it appears to me to be absolutely immaterial, so far as concerns the liability of the shipowner, whether the shipper knew or was justifiably ignorant of the practice. Shippers who are aware of the existence of such a practice, and do not object to it, cannot be said to have consented to a modification of the contract embodied in their bills of lading. Their non-interference merely implies that they do not think it necessary to prevent a deviation from the contract, because they are satisfied of the shipowner's ability to make good all loss arising from his having broken it. In short, the liability of the shipowner upon each occasion of deck stowage under the admitted practice is precisely the same with the liability which he would incur, in the absence of any such practice, by stowing goods on deck, on one occasion, in violation of his contract to carry, and without the knowledge of the shipper.

An interesting argument was addressed to your Lordships by the appellants' counsel as to the extent to which the law of England admits claims for contribution in respect of deck cargo properly jettisoned; and all the authorities, from Milward v. Hibbert (3 Q. B. 120) to Burton v. English (49 L. T. Rep. N. S. 768; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 187; 12 Q. B. Div. 218), were referred to and criticised. In the view which I take of the real character of the practice upon which the appellants rely, neither that argument nor the authorities cited in the course of it have any bearing upon this case. It was admitted that the general rule of law excludes such claim of contribution; and it was not seriously disputed that the decisions which establish certain exceptions from that rule either affirm or assume that the jettison of goods placed on the deck of a seagoing vessel, not under contract with the shipper, but by the act of the shipowner, and at his risk, cannot give rise to any claim of average, whether general or particular. To admit an exception in these circumstances would be tantamount to an abolition of the general rule. Of the 120 bales of the respondents' cotton which were stowed on the deck of the Egyptian Monarch by the appellants, 95 bales were carried under bills of lading which bore that the cotton was "under deck," and 25 bales under a bill of lading in which the same condition of stowage was implied. Accordingly, at the time when jettison was made of those 120 bales, they were being carried in breach of the contract, and were not within the exceptions specified in the bills of lading, which have exclusive reference to goods safely stowed under hatches. In these circumstances I cannot doubt that the appellants are liable to pay to the respondents the value of the 120 bales, seeing that they cannot make delivery in terms of their contract and have no legal excuse for their failure to deliver. It was argued that the actual cause of damage was too remote to found any claim against the appellants; but that argument appears to me to be at variance with the principle laid down by Tindal, C.J. in Davis v. Garrett (6 Bing. 716), which has been recognised and acted upon in subsequent decisions. It was also argued that the respondents were not entited to recover the full value of the cotton, because it was said that if all the cargo had been below deck it would have been necessary to jettison part of it, and, consequently, that these 120 bales would have been liable in a sum, by way of general average contribution, which ought to be deducted in calculating damages for the purposes of this suit. Whether the appellants could have made out such a defence, it is in my opinion unnecessary to consider. It is not even indicated in the pleadings, and the evidence before us affords no materials for raising or disposing of any such question.

Order appealed from affirmed, and appeal dismissed with costs.

COLONIAL INSURANCE COMPANY OF NEW ZEALAND AND OTHERS v. ADELAIDE MARINE INSURANCE COMPANY. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM THE SUPREME COURT OF SOUTH AUSTRALIA.

Marine insurance—Insurance "at and from"—Meaning of word "cargo"—Insurable interest—Loss before loading completed.

The word "cargo" is a word susceptible of different meanings in different contracts, and must be interpreted with reference to the context.

The respondents, who had agreed with M., the charterer of a ship, to insure a cargo of wheat, applied to the appellants to hold them covered for a portion of the risk "at and from T. to the United Kingdom." The appellants replied, "In accordance with your written request . . . you are hereby held provisionally insured . . . on wheat cargo . . . from T. to the United Kingdom." M. had purchased the cargo from third parties upon the terms that the goods should be at the risk of M., as they were put on board the ship. The ship and cargo were lost by perils insured against at T., when a portion only of the cargo was on board.

Held (affirming the judgment of the court below), (1) That, on the true construction of the appellants' letter, the contract was to insure "at and from" T.; (2) That the risk commenced as soon as any portion of the wheat was on board; (3) That M., the purchaser, who was himself the charterer of the ship, had an insurable interest in the wheat which had been shipped, the right of possession and the right of property being vested in him.

Anderson v. Morice (35 L. T. Rep. N. S. 566; 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 290; 1 App. Cas. 713) distinguished.

A man may have an insurable interest in goods for which he has neither paid, nor become liable to pay.

THIS was an appeal by the Colonial Insurance Company of New Zealand, defendants, in an action brought against them and Walter Reynell and Charles August Reinecke by the respondents in the Supreme Court of South Australia, from a judgment of the full court dated the 27th Nov. 1884, whereby the court ordered an appeal from the judgment, dated 19th Sept. 1884, of Way, C. J., in favour of the respondents, to be dismissed with costs.

The action was brought in the year 1883 by the respondents against both the appellants to enforce against the first appellants a contract of reinsurance, and to recover from them a certain sum payable thereunder, with damages, and in the alternative against the second appellants, damages for breach of warranty of their authority to enter into the said contract on behalf of the first appellants.

The first-named appellants in their defence traversed most of the allegations in the claim, and the other appellants in their defence did the same, but pleaded that they had authority from the first appellants to enter into the contract in question, and that it was ratified by the first appellants.

The action came on for trial on the 27th May 1884, before Way, C.J.

The circumstances which gave rise to the action were as follows:—The respondents were a company duly incorporated by an Act of Parliament of South Australia, and carrying on business of marine and fire insurance in Adelaide and elsewhere. The appellants, the Colonial Insurance Company of New Zealand, were a company duly incorporated under and according to the law of New Zealand, and carrying on business (inter alia) of marine insurance in New Zealand, and also at Adelaide and elsewhere, and at the time of the matters in question the appellants Reynell and Reinecke were the local agents and managers at Adelaide of the appellants, the Colonial Insurance Company of New Zealand, and duly authorised and empowered by that company to transact and manage the marine insurance business of that company at Adelaide.

On the 29th Sept. 1881 a firm of Messrs. Morgan, Connor, and Glyde, of Adelaide, chartered from her owners a vessel called the Duke of

(a) Reported by C. E. MALDEN, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Sutherland to proceed to certain named ports, with an option to the charterers of loading her in New Zealand, to load from the charterers a cargo of wheat and (or) flour in bags, the latter not exceeding one-fourth, and being so loaded to proceed to a port of call for orders for the United Kingdom or Continent, as in the charter-party mentioned.

On or about the 10th March 1882 Messrs. Morgan, Connor, and Glyde entered into a contract with the New Zealand Grain Agency and Mercantile Company Limited for the supply of a cargo of wheat for the said vessel at 4*s.* 7*d.* per bushel, f.o.b. Timaru, and upon the terms that the goods should be at the risk of Messrs. Morgan, Connor, and Glyde as they were put on board.

Messrs. Morgan, Connor, and Glyde ordered the vessel to Timaru, in New Zealand, to load the goods, and she accordingly proceeded there and began to load her cargo, and at the time of her loss hereafter mentioned had taken on board about 10,571 bags of wheat of the value of 11,500*l.* 19*s.* 5*d.*, but at the time of her loss there still remained about 2500 bags to be shipped by her.

On the 30th March 1882, before the vessel had commenced her loading ,Messrs. Morgan, Connor, and Glyde effected an insurance for not exceeding 14,000*l.* on the wheat, valued at invoice cost and 10 per cent., per the Duke of Sutherland, at and from Timaru, New Zealand, to the United Kingdom or Continent, with the respondents.

On the 30th March 1882 the respondents reinsured the whole of their risk by the said vessel, except 1000*l*, with other companies, including the appellants, the Colonial Insurance Company of New Zealand. The amount re-insured with the said appellants was 2000*l.* or one-seventh interest, and in order to effect the insurance with the appellants, after arranging the matter verbally, the respondents sent to the appellants the following request for cover:

Memorandum.—To the Colonial Insurance Company of New Zealand.—The Adelaide Marine and Fire Insurance Company, Adelaide, 30th March 1882.—Please hold us covered for not exceeding 2000*l.*, being 2-14ths interest in cargo of wheat per Duke of Sutherland, at and from Timaru, New Zealand, to United Kingdom or continent, F. P. A. rate charged to be that ruling in New Zealand for similar risks.—(Signed) E. M. ASHWIN, Secretary.

To that request the Colonial Insurance Company of New Zealand, through the appellants Reynell and Reinecke, their local managers, sent the following accepting the cover:

Marine Department, The Colonial Insurance Company of New Zealand, Fire and Marine.—To Secretary of Adelaide Marine, &c., Assurance Company, Adelaide Branch, 30th March 1882.—Dear Sir, In accordance with your written request of even date, you are hereby held provisionally insured in the sum of (not exceeding) 2000*l.* (being 2-14ths interest) on wheat cargo now on board or to be shipped in the Duke of Sutherland tons, from Timaru, New Zealand, to United Kingdom or Continent. Warranted F. P. A. Declaration to be made upon completion of shipment, and rate to be charged in New Zealand for similar risks.—We are, dear Sirs, yours faithfully, J. EDWIN THOMAS, for Local Managers.

It was proved by the evidence of a number of witnesses called on behalf of the respondents, that in insurance business, it was the universal custom that in covering a cargo there was no difference between "from" and "at and from" a port, and that a cover note, with the words "from" a port, included the loading risk the same as "at and from," and that the policy issued in pursuance of the cover was always issued "at and from." And it also was proved that the appellant company on a cover note "from" always issued their policies "at and from." The usual form of policy which would have been issued by the appellants the Colonial Insurance Company of New Zealand in accordance with the said cover note would have been "at and from Timaru to the United Kingdom or Continent." Such form would have been in the usual printed form supplied by the appellant company to their agents, and in it the words "at and from" were printed.

On the 3rd May the vessel was lost by perils insured against at Timaru, with the cargo of 10,571 sacks of wheat on board, but before the loading was completed, and the loss was duly declared by Morgan, Connor, and Glyde at 11,500*l.* 19*s.* 5*d.*, and the respondents paid their liability to Messrs. Morgan, Connor, and Glyde, and in turn settled with all the other re-insuring companies, except the appellants the Colonial Insurance Company of New Zealand, who refused to issue any policy to the respondents in accordance with their contract to do so, or to pay their proportion of the loss falling upon them under their contract of re-insurance which amounted to the sum of 1708*l.* 14*s.* 2*d.*

The appellants the Colonial Insurance Company of New Zealand disputed their liability on the following grounds:—(1) That the appellants Reynell and Reinecke had no authority to bind them by the cover note above set out. (2) That there was no contract to insure, as the parties were never ad idem. (3) That the adventure insured against had not begun. (4) That the plaintiffs had no insurable interest. But the court held that the evidence and documents clearly proved that the appellants Reynell and Reinecke had full authority from the appellant company to bind them by the said cover note, and that the appellant company ratified the contract, that the contract was entered into and was binding, and both in its terms and by the usage aforesaid and the dealings between the parties covered the goods at and from Timaru, and that the goods were lost at Timaru while at the risk of the respondents assured and while covered by the respondents to their assured and by the appellant company to the respondents, and that the respondents were liable to their assured and were entitled to recover from the appellant company.

The appellants Reynell and Reinecke were joined as defendants after the original defence was filed, in order to make them directly liable to the respondents in the event of it being held that they acted beyond their powers in giving the cover note to the respondents.

On the 19th Sept. 1884 the learned Chief Justice delivered judgment, and directed that judgment be entered for the respondents against the appellants the Colonial Insurance Company of New Zealand for 1708*l.* 14*s.* 2*d.* and interest thereon; that the respondents should have their costs from the appellant company; that the appellants Reynell and Reinecke should have their costs from the appellant company, failing them from the respondents, who were to be at liberty to claim over against the appellant company.

From this judgment the appellant company appealed to the full court, and the appeal came on on the 27th Nov. 1884, and was heard before the full court, and the Court ordered that the appeal be dismissed with costs.

On or about the 1st Dec. 1884 the appellants the Colonial Insurance Company of New Zealand obtained leave to appeal to Her Majesty in Council against the judgment of the Supreme Court dismissing the appeal, and the appellants Messrs. Reynell and Reinecke were joined as appellants for conformity, but they were nominal appellants only, and did not allege that they felt themselves aggrieved by the judgment, or the dismissal of the appeal.

Graham, Q.C. and Torr appeared for the appellants; the arguments appear sufficiently from the judgment of their Lordships.

Cohen, Q.C. and Barnes appeared for the respondents.

The following cases were cited in the course of the arguments:

Borrowman v. Drayton, 35 L. T. Rep N. S. 727; 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 303; 2 Ex. Div. 15;
Kreuger v. Blanck, 23 L. T. Rep. N. S. 128; 3 Mar. Law Cas. 470; L. Rep. 5. Ex. 179;
Anderson v. Morice, 35 L. T. Rep. N. S. 566; 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 290; 1 App. Cas. 713; Gabarron v. Kreeft, 33 L. T. Rep. N. S. 365; 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 36; L. Rep. 10 Ex. 274.

At the conclusion of the arguments their Lordships took time to consider their judgment.

Dec. 18.—Their Lordships' judgment was delivered by Sir B. PEACOCK:—This is an appeal from a judgment of the Supreme Court of South Australia in a suit in which the Adelaide Marine and Fire Assurance Company, now the respondents, were plaintiffs, and the Colonial Insurance Company of New Zealand, and certain other persons to whom it is not now necessary to refer, were defendants. In stating their reasons for the recommendation which their Lordships are about to make to Her Majesty in Council, they will, for the sake of clearness, speak of the parties to this appeal respectively as the plaintiffs and the defendants. [The judgment here set out the facts.] The present appeal is from the judgment of the full court. The reasons of the Chief Justice are fully set out, but no reasons for the judgment of the full court, which is the one from which this appeal has been preferred, have been communicated pursuant to the rule of the Judicial Committee of the 10th Feb. 1845. Their Lordships think it right to remark upon the absence of such reasons, as it is most desirable that the judges in the colonies should always comply with the rule. Upon the argument before their Lordships, the learned counsel for the defendants contended, first, that there was no contract of insurance; secondly, that at the time of the loss the risk had not commenced; thirdly, that the plaintiffs had no insurable interest. As to the first point, they contended that the proposal by the plaintiffs and the acceptance by the defendants were not ad idem, the proposal being "at and from" and the acceptance only "from" Timaru; and also that the acceptance contained the words, "declarations to be made on completion of the shipment," which were not in the proposal. The second point of contention was that, if there was a contract on the part of the defendants, it was merely to insure a wheat cargo from Timaru, whereas the vessel was lost before the cargo was complete and before the commencement of her voyage from Timaru. Parol evidence was admitted by the Chief Justice to prove that the defendants intended by the word "from" in their letter of the 30th March to insure at and from Timaru. One of the plaintiffs' prayers in the suit was that the policy should, if necessary, be amended. The defendants contended that the evidence was inadmissible. It is unnecessary to determine whether it was admissible or not, for their Lordships are of opinion that, upon the true construction of the defendants' letter, independently of any parol evidence, the contract was to insure at and from Timaru, and consequently that the first contention fails. The proposal to the defendants was to hold the plaintiffs covered "at and from" Timaru; the defendants' letter commenced, "In accordance with your written request of even date, you are hereby held provisionally insured 'from' Timaru to United Kingdom," &c. There could be no doubt entertained by the defendants as to the meaning of the words "at and from" contained in the proposal, and their Lordships are of opinion that the answer showed that their acceptance was intended to be in all respects in accordance and in conformity with the proposal, and that, notwithstanding they used only the word "from," they intended to accept the proposal at and from, and consequently that there was a binding contract to that effect.

As to the contention that the loss happened before the cargo was complete, the answer is, that the word "cargo" is a word susceptible of different meanings and must be interpreted with reference to the context. The sellers were to supply a cargo of wheat free on board the Duke of Sutherland at Timaru, and the defendants agreed, as a cover to the plaintiffs, to insure, at and from Timaru, a wheat cargo then on board, or to be shipped in the Duke of Sutherland. Their Lordships interpret the meaning of the words "wheat cargo" or "cargo of wheat to be shipped on board" to be such a quantity of wheat to be shipped at Timaru as the ship could properly carry, and as the defendants' contract was to insure a wheat cargo then "on board or to be shipped in the Duke of Sutherland," &c., the insurance must be construed in the same manner as if it had been on 13,000 bags of wheat to be shipped, &c., at and from Timaru. The risk, therefore, in their Lordships' opinion, commenced as soon as any portion of the wheat was on board. If the sellers had neglected to supply the full quantity of 13,000 bags, and the vessel had been obliged to sail with only 10,500 bags, it could not possibly have been contended that, if the ship had been lost on the voyage, the risk had not commenced because only a part of the cargo had been put on board. Their Lordships hold that the risk had commenced before the loss was incurred.

The last objection, viz., that the plaintiffs had not an insurable interest, was the most important one. It depends upon the question whether Messrs. Morgan, Connor, and Glyde had an insurable interest, for if they had not an insurable interest the plaintiffs had not an insurable interest, and the payment by the plaintiffs to them under their policy was a mere voluntary payment. The appellants laid great stress upon Anderson v. Morice (35 L. T. Rep. N. S. 566; 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 290; 1 App. Cas. 713). The Chief Justice considered that there was a striking resemblance between the facts of that case and those of the present. He proceeded, however, to consider three points which in his opinion constituted a difference between the two cases. Having discussed those points in an elaborate judgment, he arrived at the conclusion that they did not constitute any substantial difference in favour of the plaintiffs, and therefore, but for certain parol evidence which he had admitted on the trial, he would have held that neither Messrs. Morgan, Connor, and Glyde nor the plaintiffs had an insurable interest. Acting, however, upon what he considered to be an admission made by Mr. Glyde during the loading, to the effect that he understood that the wheat which had been shipped prior to the loss was at the buyers' risk as it was put on board, the Chief Justice found as a fact that the letters "f.o.b." in the particular contract were used with the meaning that the bags were to be at the buyers' risk immediately that they were put on board, and consequently that the buyers had an insurable interest. Their Lordships are of opinion that Mr. Glyde's statement as to what he understood was not admissible. He did not prove any additional facts, but merely expressed his opinion, and that at most merely by inference, as to the effect of the contract with the sellers. He merely denied that the wheat was at the risk of the shippers before it was on board. Their Lordships must therefore determine whether or not, independently of what Mr. Glyde was proved to have said, the buyers had an insurable interest. Their Lordships differ from the Chief Justice in this respect, and are of opinion that they had an insurable interest. In Anderson v. Morice it was held by the Exchequer Chamber, reversing a unanimous judgment of the Court of Common Pleas, that the property in the rice which was put on board the seller's vessel in the course of completing the cargo, and was lost by perils of the sea before the cargo was complete, did not vest in Anderson under his agreement for purchase; that there was nothing to show that it was to be at his risk, and consequently that he had no insurable interest. The decision of the Exchequer Chamber, from which one of the judges (Quain, J.) dissented, was appealed from to the House of Lords, and affirmed, the noble Lords who heard the appeal being equally divided in opinion. Their Lordships, notwithstanding the great diversity of opinions expressed in that case, are not prepared to throw any doubt on the correctness of the decision. But admitting it as an authority to the fullest extent, they consider that it is not applicable to the circumstances of the present case.

In each of the cases the insurance was on a "cargo," a word which, as already pointed out, is susceptible of different meanings in different contracts, and must be interpreted with reference to the context. In Anderson v. Morice Anderson agreed with Messrs. Borradaile, Schiller, and Co. to purchase the cargo of new crop Rangoon rice per Sunbeam at 9*s.* 1½*d.* per cwt. cost and freight, expected to be March shipment. Payment by seller's draft on purchaser at six months' sight with documents attached. The cargo to be purchased in that case was an entire thing, and was not in existence at the time when the contract was entered into, and would not be in existence until the whole cargo should be put on board. In the present case the vendors did not sell a particular cargo on board a ship chartered by them, but merely offered to supply a cargo of wheat for the Duke of Sutherland at 4*s.* 7*d.*, free on board at Timaru. No time or mode was fixed for payment, and nothing was said as to the place to which the cargo, when supplied and put on board, was to be carried, or to the effect that the sellers were to have anything to do with bills of lading or other shipping documents. The purchasers accepted the offer, they themselves being the charterers of the Duke of Sutherland, whereas, in Anderson v Morice, the firm who agreed to sell the cargo of rice by the Sunbeam were themselves the charterers of that vessel, and were to receive freight for the carriage of the rice, such freight being included in the purchase money. In putting the rice on board the Sunbeam the sellers were not delivering it to Anderson, but were putting it on board a vessel, of which they were the charterers, for the purpose of completing the cargo which they had agreed to sell. The master of the Sunbeam received it on their account, and not on account of the purchasers. The purchasers' right was to depend on the shipping documents, which were to be under the direction of the sellers. In the present case, in putting the wheat on board the Duke of Sutherland, the contractors were delivering it to the purchasers in pursuance of their contract to put it free on board, the master of the vessel which had been chartered by them being their agent to receive it on their account. The shipowners received it under the charter-party, by which they bound themselves to load from the charterers a full and complete cargo, and to proceed with it, &c., as ordered by the charterers or their agents. The sellers had nothing to do with the wheat or the destination thereof after it was on board, and by putting it on board they did not render themselves liable to the owners of the ship for freight, demurrage, commission, or any other charges provided for by the charter-party. The master would not have been justified in returning to the sellers any portion of the wheat without the authority of the purchasers, who were entitled under the charter-party to have bills of lading signed for it as directed by them according to the terms stipulated by the charter-party. From the very nature of the contract to supply a cargo of wheat for a ship of 1047 tons register, which it is admitted would consist of 13,000 bags of wheat, it could not have been intended that the whole supply should be completed at the same moment, or even in a single day. By the charter thirty days were to be allowed for the loading, and upon a proper construction of the contract of sale, in which nothing was stipulated as to the time of delivery or payment, the sellers would have a reasonable time to deliver it on board. By the charter-party the cargo was to be brought to and taken from alongside at merchant's risk and expense. By the vendors' contract they were to put it free on board for the charterer, and when put on board the master would receive it for the purchasers and hold it for them. In many cases of contract to supply a quantity of goods to be delivered within a fixed period, the whole quantity cannot, from the very nature of the case, be delivered at one time, and it must frequently happen, as in contracts for supplies of provision for the army or navy, or any large establishments, that the quantities first delivered are appropriated and actually consumed by the persons to whom they are delivered before the expiration of the period within which the whole contract is to be performed. As no time was fixed by the contract for the payment of the purchase money the purchasers might not have been bound, if no loss had occurred, to pay for the wheat put on board from time to time until the whole cargo had been supplied; but it does not follow that they had not an insurable interest before the price was paid or payable. It appears from what follows that a man may have an insurable interest in goods for which he has neither paid nor become liable to pay. In the present case, if no loss had happened, and the sellers, without lawful excuse, had neglected to supply a complete cargo, the purchasers must have paid for the wheat which had been put on board, unless they returned it. If the sellers had completed the cargo the purchasers must have paid for the whole. In either case they had, at the time of the loss, an interest in the part which had been put on board. In the one case, that they might be able to return it to excuse them from payment for it in the event of their electing to put an end to the contract in case of the non-completion of the supply; in the other, that they might have the goods for which they would be obliged to pay. In Oxendale v. Wetherell (9 B. & Cr. 386) it was correctly stated by Parke, J., that, "Where there is an entire contract to deliver a large quantity of goods, consisting of distinct parcels, within a specified time, and the seller delivers part, he cannot before the expiration of the time bring an action to recover the price of the part delivered, because the purchaser may, if the vendor fail to complete his contract, return the part delivered. But if he retain the part delivered after the seller has failed to perform his contract, the latter may recover the value of the goods which he has so delivered." In the case cited it was decided accordingly. Applying the law as laid down in that case to the present, the purchasers, if no loss had occurred, might, subject to the rights of the shipowners to their lien for freight under the charter-party, have returned the wheat which had been put on board if the contractors had, without any lawful excuse, refused to supply a full cargo within a reasonable time, but they would not have been obliged to do so; they might have retained and paid for the part delivered, and sued the contractors for damages for not completing their contract; on the other hand, it is clear that the sellers could not without the consent of the purchasers in the case supposed have taken out of the ship the whole of the wheat which they had put on board, and have compelled the ship to go empty away, because they themselves had failed to complete their contract.

In Van Casteel v. Booker (2 Ex. 691) it is correctly stated by Parke, B., that "a delivery on board a purchaser's ship is a delivery to him, but that where goods are shipped under a bill of lading making them deliverable to the shipper's own order, the property does not vest in the consignee until the bill of lading has been delivered to and accepted by him." In their Lordships' opinion the rule applies to a delivery of goods in part performance of a contract as well as to a delivery of the whole quantity contracted for. In the present case the sellers had no right to give any directions as to the persons to whom bills of lading should be made out, nor as to the place to which the wheat should be carried. So far as the goods delivered were concerned, the sellers' obligation as to those goods ceased directly they were put on board. The purchasers might have sold them in New Zealand, and were not obliged, except as between them and the shipowners as regards the freight contracted for by the charter-party, to have had the wheat conveyed to the United Kingdom or the Continent. They had the same right to deal with the wheat which was put on board as they would have had to deal with the whole cargo if it had been completed. In Dunlop v. Lambert (6 Cl. & F. 600) Lord Cottenham, L.C. said: "It is, no doubt, true, as a general rule, that a delivery by a consignor to a carrier is a delivery to the consignee. This is so if, without designating the particular carrier, the consignee directs that the goods shall be sent by the ordinary conveyance, and it is still more strongly so if the goods are sent by a carrier specially pointed out by the consignee, for such carrier then becomes the special agent." In the present case there was a sale, a delivery, and a receipt by the purchasers of the wheat which was put on board. The charterers, and not the contractors, would have been liable to the shipowners for the freight if the wheat had been carried to its destination. Their Lordships are of opinion that the delivery of the wheat from time to time was a delivery to the purchasers, that it vested in them the right of possession as well as the right of property, and that at the time of the loss it was at their risk. The right which they had to return the wheat which had been delivered, in the event of the sellers neglecting, without lawful excuse, to complete the supply, did not prevent them from having an insurable interest. The interest in this case was defeasible, not by the vendors, but at the option of the vendees in the event of the vendors not completing the contract. For the above reasons their Lordships are of opinion that, without taking into consideration the statement made by Mr. Glyde, or the other parol evidence of the intention of the parties upon which the Chief Justice relied, Messrs. Morgan, Connor, and Glyde, and consequently the plaintiffs, had an insurable interest. They will therefore humbly recommend Her Majesty to affirm the judgment of the full bench, and to dismiss the appeal. The appellants must pay the costs of the appeal.

THE THOMAS ALLEN. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM THE VICE-ADMIRALTY COURT OF HALIFAX.

Salvage — Amount of award — Appeal — Award reduced.

The Judicial Committee is reluctant to review salvage awards which involve the exercise of the discretion of the judge below, and will not do so unless the amount awarded differs to the extent of one-third from that which the Judicial Committee thinks adequate.

The screw steamship T. A., of 1701 tons, laden with a cargo of grain, broke her screw shaft on the 3rd Oct. 1885 when in the Gulf Stream, about three hundred miles from Halifax. On the evening of the same day the steamship A., of about 1600 tons, laden with cargo and bound from Philadelphia to Bordeaux, took the T. A. in tow about 8.30 p.m. and brought her safely into Halifax about 3.30 p.m. on Oct. 5. The weather was fine, and the A. ran no danger in rendering the services. The T. A. was in no immediate danger when picked up. The value of the T. A., her cargo and freight, was 126,775 dollars; the value of the A., her cargo and freight, was 132,500 dollars. The Vice-Admiralty Court of Halifax having awarded 12,000 dollars: Held, on appeal, to be excessive, and reduced to 7500 dollars.

THIS was an appeal by the defendants from the decree of the Vice-Admiralty Court of Halifax, Nova Scotia, in a cause of salvage instituted by the owners, master, and crew of the steamship Austerlitz, against the steamship Thomas Allen, her cargo and freight.

The services consisted in towing the Thomas Allen, which had broken her screw shaft about three hundred miles from Halifax, into Halifax under the circumstances set out in their Lordships' judgment. The towage extended over three hundred and twelve miles, and lasted for about forty-three hours.

The Austerlitz was a steamship of 1653 tons gross register, and at the time of the services was on a voyage from Philadelphia to Bordeaux laden with a cargo of syrup and molasses. The value of ship, cargo, and freight was 132,500 dollars.

The Thomas Allen was a steamship of 1701 tons register, and at the time of the services was on a voyage from New York to Bordeaux laden with a cargo of grain. The value of the Thomas Allen, her cargo and freight, was 126,775 dollars.

On the 10th Oct. 1885 the judge of the Vice-Admiralty Court awarded the plaintiffs the sum of 12,000 dollars and costs.

From this decision the defendants now appealed, and submitted that it should be reversed or varied for the following reasons:

1. Because the amount awarded was excessive, and under the circumstances out of all proportion to the services rendered.
2. Because the finding of the court below was not warranted by the evidence.

In the case on behalf of the respondents it was submitted that the judgment below should be affirmed for the following among other reasons:

1. Because the respondents by their services rescued the Thomas Allen, her cargo and freight, from total loss, and saved the lives of those on board.
2. Because the services of the Austerlitz were well and efficiently performed, and were attended by much labour and fatigue to her master and crew.
3. Because the sum awarded was arrived at by the court below after careful consideration of the evidence given before him.
4. Because the award is neither exorbitant nor excessive.
5. Because the said award is in accordance with the law and practice of the Court of Admiralty and Vice-Admiralty Courts in salvage actions.

Dec. 11, 1886.—Judgment was delivered by

Sir JAMES HANNEN.—This is an appeal from a decision of the judge of the Vice-Admiralty Court, at Halifax, Nova Scotia, in an action for salvage, on the ground that the sum awarded by the learned judge is excessive. The material facts are as follows: On Saturday, the 3rd Oct. 1885, the screw steamship Thomas Allen, on a voyage from New York, when about three hundred miles from Halifax, broke her shaft. She was then in the Gulf Stream, with a north-easterly current of one and a half to two miles, the wind being south-east. At 6 p.m. she was seen by the Austerlitz, a steamer of 1600 tons, on a voyage from Philadelphia to Bordeaux, and at 6.30 the Austerlitz reached her, when an agreement was come to that the Austerlitz should tow the Thomas Allen to Halifax. At about 8.30 the operation of making fast was completed, and the two vessels proceeded on their course. The place where the Thomas Allen was picked up was 40° N. and 66° W., at a distance of over one hundred miles in a south-easterly direction from George's Shoal, and within the current of the Gulf Stream setting her north-east. The boat work required in connecting the two vessels was performed by the Thomas Allen, and the operation of making fast was accomplished without difficulty or danger. The two vessels anchored in Halifax harbour at 3.30 p.m. on Monday the 5th Oct. Thus the actual towing occupied forty-three hours, and the whole time that the Austerlitz was engaged in assisting the Thomas Allen was forty-five hours, to which must be added the time required to regain the position she had lost while giving this assistance. The wind was favourable for a portion of the time, and both vessels were able to carry sail. The towing was performed without any stoppage at an average rate of seven miles an hour, and without any unusual consumption of coal. No accident of any kind happened beyond the loss of a running line, and chafing on the poop deck of the Austerlitz, which would cost two or three dollars to repair.

It was argued for the Austerlitz that it was to be assumed that she had not, by her charter, liberty to tow. But in the absence of any evidence on the point no such assumption can be made. The agreed values were, of the Austerlitz, her cargo and freight, 132,500 dollars; and of the Thomas Allen, with her cargo and freight, 126,775 dollars. The learned judge awarded 12,000 dollars for the salvage service rendered. Their Lordships are of opinion that this amount is larger than the circumstances of the case justify. The services, though valuable to the Thomas Allen, were of a very simple character, unaccompanied by any danger to the Austerlitz beyond the ordinary risks of towage, and the fact that the towage was performed at a high rate of speed, and without interruption by breaking of the tow ropes or otherwise, and without damage, except of the most trifling kind, to the Austerlitz, shows that it was without difficulty. The danger from which the Thomas Allen was rescued was simply that of any steamship which had lost her propelling power. Their Lordships are advised by their nautical assessors that there was no risk of her drifting on to George's Shoal, and she was in the track of steamers, so that there is no reason to suppose that she would not have obtained the assistance of some other vessel if the Austerlitz had not fallen in with her. In these circumstances the award of 12,000 dollars is certainly at a higher rate than that which has been adopted by courts of Admiralty in similar circumstances. Their Lordships have felt the hesitation which has so often been expressed at this board in interfering with the judicial discretion upon a mere question of amount, but their Lordships are of opinion that in this case the difference between the sum which they think would be a liberal remuneration for the services rendered and that which has been awarded is so large as to require correction. This subject has been very fully considered by this tribunal on several occasions, and the principle on which the Committee proceeds in these cases is very clearly stated in the judgment delivered by James, L.J. in the Glenduror (1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 31; 24 L. T. Rep. N. S. 499; 3 P. C. 589). He there says: "In some of these cases which have been referred to in argument, the difficulty has been stated in very strong language, namely, that this Committee would not enter into the question of quantum when there has been nothing to shock the conscience, nothing gross or extravagant:" (The Carrier Dove, 2 Moo. P. C. 254, N. S.) In the case of The Clarisse (Swabey 134) there follows a more accurate expression of the rule according to their Lordships' view. Their Lordships there say: "It is, however, a settled rule, and one of great utility, particularly with reference to cases of this description, that the difference ought to be considerable to induce a court of appeal to interfere upon a question of mere discretion;" and at the conclusion of the judgment is this passage: "With respect to the amount of difference of estimate which would justify their Lordships to review the decisions of the learned judge, they were referred to the case of The Scindia, in which this court differed to the extent of one-third. Unless the difference amounted at least to that, they would not have interfered." Acting on the principle thus laid down, and being of opinion that 7500 dollars will be a liberal reward for the services rendered by the Austerlitz, their Lordships will humbly recommend to Her Majesty that the sum awarded be reduced to that amount, of which the master and crew will receive 1880 dollars, and that each party bear his own costs of this appeal.

COURT OF APPEAL.

Nov. 24 and 25, 1886.

(Before Lord ESHER, M.R., LINDLEY and LOPES, L.JJ.)

RODOCANACHI, SONS, AND CO. v. MILBURN BROTHERS. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION.

Charter-party and bill of lading, discrepancy between—Contract between charterer and owner of ship—Cargo lost by negligence of master—Exception in bill of lading—Construction of charter-party—Measure of damages—Sale of cargo "to arrive"—Advanced freight.

The charter-party contains the contract between the owner and the charterer of a ship; and, unless it expressly provides that that contract may be varied by the bill of lading, the shipowner will not be relieved from liability by an exception in the bill of lading which is not in the charter-party.

In an action by the charterer against the shipowner for failure to deliver, the measure of damages is the market value of the cargo at the port of destination at the time when the ship would in due course have arrived independently of any circumstances peculiar to the plaintiff, less any freight which has not been prepaid.

A charter-party contained the following clause: "The master to sign bill of lading at any rate of freight, and as customary at port of loading, without prejudice to the stipulations of this charter-party, receiving the difference, if less than the rates specified therein, at port of loading against his receipt for the same." The cargo having been shipped, a bill of lading was signed by the master, acknowledging that the cargo was shipped in good condition, and was to be delivered in a like condition at the port of destination, but excepting the shipowner from all liability in consequence of "any act, neglect, or default whatsoever of the pilot, master, or mariners." This exception was not in the charter-party. The cargo was lost during the voyage by the negligence of the master. In an action by the charterers against the owners of the ship for damages for the loss of the cargo, the jury found that it was usual to sign bills of lading with a similar exception, but that there was no special custom in that respect at the port of loading.

(a) Reported by A. H. BITTLESTON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Held (affirming the judgment of Manisty, J.), first, that the clause in the charter-party did not mean that the master was to sign a bill of lading containing the provisions that were customary at the port of loading, but that he was to sign in the manner customary at the port of loading; secondly, that, if the clause in the charter-party meant that the master was to sign a bill of lading in the form customary at the port of loading, the jury had found that there was no customary form at the port of loading, and that finding was in accordance with the evidence; thirdly, that, supposing the bill of lading that was signed to be in a form customary at the port of loading, and the clause in the charter-party to give authority to the master to sign a bill of lading in such a form, there were no express words in the charter-party incorporating the provisions of the bill of lading with those of the charter-party; that, in the absence of such words, the charter-party was the contract between the owner and the charterer of the ship; and that, consequently, the shipowner was not relieved from liability by the exception in the bill of lading.

After the charter-party had been entered into, but before bills of lading had been signed, the charterers had contracted to sell the cargo on its arrival at the port of destination at 7l. 2s. 6d. per ton.

Held (reversing the judgment of Manisty, J.), that the measure of damages was not the amount at which the cargo had been sold, less freight, but the market value of the cargo at the port of destination at the time when the ship would in due course have arrived (which was 7l. 7s. 6d. per ton), less unpaid freight.

The charter-party contained a clause providing that "sufficient cash for ship's disbursements to be advanced if required to the captain by charterers on account of freight at current exchange subject to insurance only." Under this clause the charterers advanced 160l. (less premiums for insurance thereon) to the captain at the port of loading, the whole freight being 735l. The charterers did not insure the 160l.

Held (reversing the judgment of Manisty, J.), that, in estimating the damages, the amount to be deducted from the value of the cargo was unpaid freight and not advanced freight as well.

This was an action by the charterers of the Redesdale against her owners for damages for the loss of a cargo of seed.

By the charter-party the ship was to proceed to Alexandria, and there load a cargo to be delivered at a port in the United Kingdom.

The 10th clause of the charter-party was as follows:

> The master to sign bill of lading at any rate of freight, and as customary at port of loading, without prejudice to the stipulation of this charter-party, receiving the difference, if less than the rates specified therein, at port of loading, against his receipt for the same.

The 13th clause was:

> Sufficient cash for ship's disbursements to be advanced, if required, to the captain by charterers on account of freight at current exchange subject to insurance only.

The cargo having been shipped, a bill of lading was signed by the master acknowledging that the cargo was shipped in good order and condition, and was to be delivered in a like condition at the port of destination; and containing a number of exceptions which do not appear in the charter-party, the one material in the present case being an exception of the owners' liability for any consequences of "any act, neglect, or default whatsoever of the pilot, master, or mariners." The cargo shipped was lost by the negligence of the master of the Redesdale.

Evidence was given at the trial with regard to the form of bill of lading in use at Alexandria. There was also evidence given on behalf of the plaintiffs to the effect that on the signing of the bill of lading a discussion had taken place as to its divergence from the terms of the charter-party, and that the captain and ship's agents had said that the bills of lading were only receipts for the cargo taken on board, and did not in any way affect the clauses of the charter-party.

The learned judge (Manisty, J.) asked the jury the following questions:

1. Was it the custom at Alexandria to insert in all bills of lading a clause exempting the ship from liability for loss occasioned by the negligence of the master and crew?

2. Was the bill of lading in this case signed in the form in which it is upon the understanding that it was to be treated only as a receipt for the cargo, and in no way to affect the clauses in the charter-party?

The jury answered as follows: It appears to have been usual to sign bills of lading with a clause which exempted the owners in a greater or less degree, but there was no special custom in Alexandria; and they answered the second question in the affirmative.

After the execution of the charter-party, and before the shipment of the cargo, the plaintiffs had sold the cargo "to arrive" at 7l. 2s. 6d. per ton, a price less than the market price at the port of discharge at the time when the ship in the ordinary course should have arrived there, which would have been 7l. 7s. 6d. per ton. The plaintiffs had made advances to the amount of 160l. under the charter-party on account of freight for ship's disbursements at the port of loading, retaining, however, out of such advances the amount necessary for premiums of insurance thereon. The whole amount of the freight was 735l.

The learned judge entered judgment for the plaintiffs for the price at which they had sold the cargo, less the total amount of the freight.

From this judgment the defendants appealed, and the plaintiffs gave notice of a cross-appeal as to damages.

Bigham, Q.C. and Manisty for the defendants.—Assuming the findings of the jury to be right, the judgment was wrongly entered for the plaintiffs. The contract contained in the charter-party imports the term that the goods are to be carried under a bill of lading in the customary form. The parties contemplated a document coming into existence which was to define the terms upon which these goods should be carried, and that that document should be in the form customary at the port of Alexandria. The words "without prejudice to the stipulation of this charter-party" do not qualify the words "the master to sign bill of lading as customary at port of lading." They only refer to the stipulation in the charter-party as to freight. If the jury have found that there was no customary form of bill of lading at Alexandria, their finding is against the weight of the evidence. But, if the substance of their finding is looked to, it supports the contention that it is usual or customary for bills of lading there to contain the clause in question. Although the bills of lading that were produced at the trial differed in some respects, they all of them contained a stipulation which would relieve the defendants in the present case. There was therefore, a customary form of bill of lading at Alexandria in this sense, that it was customary to have an exception protecting the shipowner from liability for the default of the master and mariners. [Lord Esher, M.R.—Supposing that this clause is customary at Alexandria, and that the master was therefore right in signing bills of lading containing it, is it not the case that, as between the charterer and the shipowner, wherever there is a charter-party and a bill of lading, the charter-party is the contract, and the bill of lading a mere receipt for the goods?] It is submitted not. Lord Bramwell, in Sewell v. Burdick (52 L. T. Rep. N. S. 445; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 386; 10 App. Cas. 74, 105), is only referring to the case of a charter-party that is silent as to the provisions of the bill of lading. In such a case the charter-party is, no doubt, the contract. But here, by the terms of the charter-party, this customary form of bill of lading is incorporated in it. As to the cross-appeal on the question of damages, the learned judge has given the plaintiffs their actual loss, having regard to the contract they had made, not the speculative loss dependent upon the market price. [Lord Esher, M.R.—It makes no difference that they have sold the goods; that is a mere accident.] It is submitted that they cannot recover more than they have actually lost by the breach of the charter-party. As to the second point of the cross-appeal, that the advanced freight having been already paid, should not be deducted in estimating the damages it is submitted that it was rightly deducted. The advanced freight was to be insured at the defendants' expense, and the premium for insurance was deducted from the payment. It must be taken, therefore, that it was insured; and, if it is not to be deducted from the damages, the plaintiffs would in effect get it twice over. They cited

Finlay, Q.C. and Gorell Barnes for the plaintiffs.—It was at the option of the charterers whether there should be a bill of lading or not. The jury have found that they took the bill of lading only on the understanding that it was not to affect the charter-party. The case is, therefore, on the same footing as if there was no bill of lading. Secondly, the master had no authority to sign a bill of lading containing this exception. The evidence failed to show any custom or any general usage as to the form of bills of lading at Alexandria, and the jury have found that there was no special custom there. Thirdly, if the words "without prejudice to the stipulation of this charter-party" refer only to the rate of freight, then the words "as customary at port of lading" also refer only to the freight. As to the damages, the plaintiffs are entitled to the market value, deducting only the unpaid freight. The rule which has always been laid down as the rule by which damages are to be assessed is to take the market value of the goods at the time and place at which they ought to have been delivered, independently of any circumstances peculiar to the plaintiff:

This is a contract for the delivery of goods; and it is not disputed that upon a sale of goods, which is also a contract for the delivery of goods, the purchaser is entitled to recover the market price, although he may have resold at a less value. As to the question whether the advanced freight should be deducted, the effect of deducting it is, that the plaintiffs pay that part of the freight twice over. In order to get the goods they would have had to pay only such portion of the freight as was still unpaid.

Lord Esher, M.R.—In this case the plaintiffs entered into a charter-party with the defendants, who are shipowners, for the carriage of goods by the defendants' ship. By one of the terms of the charter-party the captain was to sign bills of lading. Bills of lading were presented to him to sign, and he did sign them. In the course of the voyage the ship and cargo were lost by the negligence of the captain. Then the charterer sues the shipowner for damages for non-delivery of the goods. The charterer had, after the charter-party but before bills of lading were signed, sold the goods to someone else. The charter-party and the bill of lading are not identical. In the charter-party, among the exceptions of liability, there is not an exception for loss occasioned by the negligence of the shipowner's servants; in the bill of lading there is such an exception. The plaintiffs therefore say, "Although there is that exception in the bill of lading, we are suing you as charterers. We are entitled to rely on the contract contained in the charter-party. You cannot rely upon the bill of lading. There is no such exception in the contract between you and us." On the other hand the defendants say, "It is true there is no such exception in the charter-party. But you stipulated with us that the captain was to sign a bill of lading, as customary at port of loading, and by which the liability of the charterers was to cease when the goods were shipped. Taking those two clauses together, we say that the proper conclusion is, that the liability which existed between you and us when the charter-party was signed is at an end, and the liability which now exists is regulated by the bill of lading." The judge asked the jury, "Was it the custom at Alexandria to insert in all bills of lading a clause exempting the ship from liability for loss occasioned by the negligence of the master and crew?" When the jury asked him what a custom was, he said that it must be so nearly universal that any exception to it would be very rare and special. He asked then whether it was the custom to insert the clause "in all bills of lading." Their answer is, "It appears to have been usual to sign bills of lading with a clause which exempted the owners in a greater or less degree, but there was no special custom in Alexandria." I should have thought that that finding negatived the existence of any custom as to any form of bill of lading at Alexandria. It certainly negatives the existence of any such custom at Alexandria in cases where there is a charter-party. It is said that the finding of the jury means that there is a usual, but not a universal form. I think that the jury meant to say, and were justified in saying, that there was neither a universal nor even a usual form. Of the bills of lading produced at the trial as examples, hardly any two were alike. They have all of them something that in substance would relieve the shipowner from liability for the negligence of his servants. But the stipulation that the captain was to sign a bill of lading as customary at port of loading could not mean that if, at the port of loading, the bills of lading had every clause different, except this one in dispute, he was to sign a bill of lading containing such a clause.

What then is the meaning of the words "as customary at port of loading?" When you have it that there is no customary or usual form of bill of lading at Alexandria, they cannot mean in the customary form there. Those words seem to me to refer, not to the form of the bill of lading but, to the manner of signing it. There are many practices with regard to the signing of bills of lading, so that the words would be satisfied if that meaning is given to them. For instance, there may be a custom that the captain or the ship's agent signs the bill of lading. Again, there may be a custom to sign bills of lading before the goods are on board the ship. My view is, that those words apply only to the signing. But suppose that they mean more than that, and apply to the form of bill of lading. What are the words of the clause in the charter-party? "The master to sign bill of lading at any rate of freight, and as customary at port of loading, without prejudice to the stipulation of this charter-party, receiving the difference, if less than the rates specified therein at port of loading against his receipt for the same." That is all one clause. It is to be "without prejudice to the stipulation of this charter-party." Construing those words in a business manner, I have no doubt that they mean without prejudice to this charter-party. If so, there are authorities which exactly cover this question. Suppose that I am wrong in that also, and that those words refer only to the rate of freight. Suppose that the provision is that the master is to sign a bill of lading in the customary form, that this bill of lading was in the customary form, and that the words without prejudice to the charter-party do not apply to that provision. Then you have a bill of lading to be signed under the charter-party, the stipulations of which would not be the same as those of the charter-party. What in that case is the rule as to the construction of the two documents? In my opinion, unless there is something expressly to the contrary written in them, the proper construction of the two together is that, as between shipowner and charterers, the bill of lading is to be taken only as a receipt for the goods shipped; and I adopt fully what has been twice said by Lord Bramwell upon that point. Full effect can be given to both instruments under that doctrine, because the bill of lading is an instrument upon which any person to whom it is indorsed, without notice of its differing from the charter-party, has a right to rely. If that construction is correct, cadit quæstio; the shipowner in this case is certainly liable to the charterer, if the charter-party between them alone is looked at. To sum up what I have said: Supposing that the words "as customary at port of loading" refer to the manner of signing, there is nothing to take away from the defendants their liability. But supposing that those words mean that the master is to sign a bill of lading in the customary form, then the words "without prejudice to the stipulation of this charter-party" prevent it having any effect at variance with the effect of the charter-party. Lastly, supposing that those words apply only to the rate of freight, and that the only bill of lading that could be presented to the master to sign was the one he did sign, then still, there being nothing expressly stated in the charter-party to show that, upon the signing of the bill of lading, the charter-party is to cease to be the contract between the parties, the bill of lading is to be treated only as a receipt for the goods. If necessary, you have the finding of the jury, upon the peculiar facts of this case, that there was an understanding to that effect; but I do not think that that finding is required. Under the circumstances, therefore, the shipowners are liable to the plaintiffs.

Then comes the question as to damages. Where, under a charter-party, there is a failure to deliver, the measure of damages must be the difference between the position of the plaintiff if the goods had been delivered, and his position if the goods are lost. What is the difference? If the goods had arrived, he would have them upon payment of the freight, which he necessarily has to pay in order to get possession of them. He would have had the value of the goods at the place of arrival, less the amount of the freight. How is that value calculated if there is no market for the goods there? It is calculated by taking the price that he paid for the goods, plus the profit which he would have made upon them at the port of delivery. Where there is a market, it is always to be the market price. It is not, then, necessary to add the cost price to the probable profit, because the market price does that for you. The value of the goods at the port of destination is the market price, if there is a market; if there is no market, a less accurate and more circuitous rule has to be adopted by adding the supposed profit to the original cost. The general rule is now that any intermediate sale or purchase of the goods is not to be taken into account, but is to be regarded as an accidental circumstance not affecting the original contract. Mr. Bigham's contention is, that the market price is to be taken if the plaintiff has sold the goods at a higher price than that; but that, if he has sold the goods at a price below the market price, then he cannot recover more than the contract price. That would be a very unequal rule. The mode of estimating the value of the goods is to take the market price, independently of any circumstances peculiar to the plaintiff. That gives the value of the goods; not the damages. Then the damages have to be estimated. The plaintiff would get the goods of a certain value, but, in order to get them, he would have to pay the accruing freight, for which there is a lien upon the goods. The damages, therefore, would be, not the price at which he had contracted to sell the goods, less the accruing freight, but the market price, less the accruing freight. Upon that point, therefore, the cross-appeal succeeds. As to the other point raised by the cross-appeal with regard to the advanced freight, the plaintiffs would not have had to pay that freight in order to get the goods, as they would have paid it already. Upon that point also, therefore, the cross-appeal must succeed. The defendants' appeal, on the question of liability, fails; but the cross-appeal by the plaintiffs, as to damages, is successful.

Lindley, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. We have to say what is the effect of these two pieces of paper, one of them called a charter-party, and the other a bill of lading. Now, I am not at all sure what the words "as customary at port of loading" do mean; but I am sure that they do not mean that the master may sign a bill of lading at variance with the charter-party. All difficulty seems to be removed from the case by the finding of the jury that there was no custom at Alexandria as to the form of bill of lading. It was argued that the intention was that the bill of lading should supersede the charter-party as the contract between the parties. I do not think that that was in the least contemplated. That there was the slightest contemplation of any new contract between the charterer and the shipowner, I do not believe. That the charter-party is the contract between the parties in the absence of anything showing a contrary intention, is settled by authority. Unless there is some express provision to the contrary to be found in the charter-party, the bill of lading as between the charterers and the shipowners is to be looked upon as a mere receipt for the goods. Then, looking at this particular case, I can see nothing to show that it was the intention of the parties that the bill of lading was to be the contract between them. I have no hesitation in coming to the conclusion that there was only one contract, and that that is contained in the charter-party.

Then there is the question as to damages. That question is necessarily dependent upon rules that can only be approximately just, and that are to be applied not by mathematicians but by juries. Any special contract which the charterer has made is not to be taken into account in estimating the damages, whether he has agreed to sell for more or less than the market price. The damages are to be the market price at the port of discharge, less the accruing freight. As to the advanced freight, the defendants would of course have had no lien upon the plaintiff's goods in respect of that. It is not, therefore, part of the sum which the plaintiffs would have had to pay in order to get their goods, and ought not to be taken into account in estimating the damages.

Lopes, L.J.—In this case, a cargo was admittedly lost by the negligence of the master of the ship, and an important question arises whether the charter-party or the bill of lading is to govern the claim of the charterers against the shipowners. There is an exception in the bill of lading, which does not occur in the charter-party, protecting the shipowners from liability for any damage arising from any act, neglect, or default of the pilot, master, or mariners. The defendants relied on an alleged custom at Alexandria to introduce such an exception into all bills of lading. In my view, the question does not arise at all in this case upon the true construction of the 10th clause of the charter-party. "As customary," in my opinion, only means "as usual," and all that those words refer to seems to me to be the mode of signing bills of lading. But I will assume that they mean more, and refer to the form of bill of lading. I do not attach importance to the words, "without prejudice to the stipulation of this charter-party," because I think that they mean the stipulation as to rate of freight. But unless it is clearly expressed in the charter-party that there is a different intention, it is to be taken that that is the contract between the parties. I believe the law to be this, that where there is a charter-party, the bill of lading operates as a receipt for the goods, and as a document of title passing the property in the goods, but not as a contract between the charterer and the shipowner.

Then as to the question of damages. This is a case where the goods have been lost, not one where delivery has been delayed. I think the true rule is, that the measure of damages in such a case must be the market value of the goods at the place where, and the time at which they ought to have been delivered, independently of any circumstances peculiar to the plaintiff, and less what plaintiff would have had to pay in order to get them. Applying that rule to the present case, I think that the contract by the plaintiffs for the sale of the goods is a matter peculiar to them, between them and third parties, with which the defendants have nothing to do. It is admitted that this would have been the case if the contract had been for a sale of the goods at a higher price than the market value. I think that it makes no difference that the contract was for a sale at a lower price. The only other matter is as to the advanced freight. It seems to me enough to say that, if this were to be deducted from the damages, it would have been paid twice over. The cross-appeal will therefore be allowed, and the defendants' appeal disallowed.

Appeal dismissed; cross-appeal allowed.

Berridge v. The Man On Insurance Company Limited. (a)

*Marine insurance—Cash advances—"Full interest admitted"—*19 Geo. 2, c. 37, s. 1.

A policy of marine insurance which insures cash advances on a ship is within 19 Geo. 2, c. 37, s. 1; and such a policy containing the terms "full interest admitted" is void under that statute.

Smith v. Reynolds (1 H. & N. 221) and De Mattos v. North (18 L. T. Rep. N. S. 797; L. Rep. 3 Ex. 185) followed.

This was an appeal from a judgment of Pollock, B. The plaintiff brought the action upon a policy of marine insurance made with the defendants, who were a joint-stock company registered in

(a) Reported by A. A. Hopkins, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

England. The defendants pleaded that the policy was void under 19 Geo. 2, c. 37

By 19 Geo. 2, c. 37, s. 1 :

No assurance shall be made by any person or persons, bodies corporate or politic, on any ship or ships belonging to His Majesty, or any of his subjects, or on any goods, merchandises, or effects, laden or to be laden on board of any such ship or ships, interest or no interest, or without further proof of interest than the policy, or by way of gaming or wagering, or without benefit of salvage to the assurer, and every such insurance shall be null and void to all intents and purposes.

The plaintiff had advanced money on the security of a ship named the Gainsford, and entered into the policy in question with the defendants in order to insure such advances. The policy stated that the insurance was upon goods and merchandise upon the ship Gainsford for a certain specified voyage, and that "the said goods and merchandise for so much as concerns the assured are and shall be 1250*l.* on cash advances." In the margin of the policy were the words "full interest admitted." It was not disputed at the trial, or at any time, that the plaintiff had made the advances, and was to that extent interested in the ship.

Pollock, B. gave judgment for the defendants upon the ground that the policy was void as being a policy forbidden by the above-mentioned statute.

The plaintiff appealed.

Finlay, Q.C. and Hollams for the plaintiff.—The words in the margin of the policy, full interest admitted," do not fairly bear the construction which the learned judge put upon them at the trial. The fair and reasonable construction of those words is, that the full amount of the interest is admitted, and that the quantum of interest need not therefore be proved. The effect, then, of those words would be to make it a valued policy subject to the proof of some interest. [Lord Esher, M.R.—What would there be left for the plaintiff to prove?] That he had advanced money upon the ship. It is not pretended that this is, as a fact, a wagering policy, and it is not disputed that the plaintiff is interested to the full extent. The statute does not apply at all in such a case as this, because this is not a policy of insurance upon a ship or goods, but upon advances. [Lord Esher, M.R. referred to De Mattos v. North, 18 L. T. Rep. N. S. 797 · L. Rep. 3 Ex. 185; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O.S. 141.] In that case the insurance was upon the profits of goods, and that was taken as part of their value. Smith v. Reynolds (1 H. & N. 221; 25 L. J. 337, Ex.) and Allkins v. Jupe (36 L. T. Rep. N. S. 851; 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 449; 2 C. P. Div. 375) were also cited.

Myburgh, Q.C. and English Harrison, for the defendants, were not called on.

Lord Esher, M.R.—The first question is, whether this policy is within the statute. Now the cases of Smith v. Reynolds (ubi sup.), De Mattos v. North (ubi sup.), and Allkins v. Jupe (ubi sup.) all seem to show that for this purpose the thing on which the insurance is made is the thing which is physically at risk from the perils insured against, so that the loss of that thing involves the loss of the subject-matter of the insurance. In this case the plaintiff was interested in the ship to the extent of his advances; if the ship was lost his advances were lost also, and he therefore effected an insurance on the ship. I think that, in doing so, he was in respect of his advances effecting an insurance upon the ship within the meaning of the statute. Now, it was suggested on the part of the plaintiff that this court could overrule the decisions to which I have referred; but I do not think that we could overrule them now, even if we did not agree with the reasoning upon which they were based, but I think that the decisions were right. Then the only remaining question is, whether this policy does that which the statute forbids by reason of its being a policy which is to have effect "without further proof of interest than the policy." Now, the words are "full interest admitted." Those words do not seem to me to amount merely to a statement that the value of the interest is admitted to be a certain sum, but I think they imply that no proof of interest is required, the whole being admitted. I cannot imagine words which, being different from the words of the statute, more exactly represent its meaning. This policy is not void as a gaming and wagering policy, but nevertheless I think it is void as a forbidden policy by reason of the words which forbid insurances "without further proof of interest than the policy." I therefore think that this appeal must be dismissed.

Bowen and Fry, L.JJ. concurred.

Appeal dismissed.

The Indus. (a)

Collision—Steamship and lightship—Compulsory pilotage—Inevitable accident—Negligence—Onus of proof.

Where the plaintiffs in a collision action show that their vessel was at anchor exhibiting a proper light, and was struck and damaged by another ship, they make a primâ facie case of negligence against the defendants, the owners of the ship in motion, and the burden of proof upon the defendants, to rebut the presumption of liability, is not discharged by merely proving that their ship was in charge of a pilot by compulsion of law without proving that the cause of the collision was solely the fault of the pilot.

The steamship I. having come into collision with a lightship, the owners of the lightship sued the owners of the I., and proved that the lightship was at the time of the collision at anchor, and exhibiting a proper light. The defendants gave evidence that the I. was in charge of a compulsory pilot, and that all his orders were obeyed; that the I. was steered by steam-steering gear; that the helm was starboarded in obedience to the pilot's orders, but that the I. failed to answer her helm, and struck the lightship. The President did not find what was the cause of the collision, but dismissed the action on the ground that the plaintiffs had made no case against the defendants.

Held, on appeal, that the plaintiffs had made out a primâ facie case of negligence against the defendants; that the defendants had neither established that the collision was due to inevitable accident, or the fault of the pilot, and that therefore the plaintiffs were entitled to judgment.

This was an action in personam by the corporation of Trinity House, as owners of the Girdler lightship, against the owners of the screw steamship Indus, to recover damages occasioned by a collision between the Indus and the lightship on the 20th June 1884.

The plaintiffs proved that, at about 11.45 p.m. on June 20, 1884, the Girdler lightship was lying in her usual position in the Thames, and showing her bright revolving light; that the weather was fine and clear; that the Indus was seen bearing north, and half a mile distant, heading for the lightship; that she came on without any alteration, and with her stem struck the starboard side of the lightship and sank her.

The evidence on behalf of the defendants was as follows: Shortly before 11.45 p.m. on the 20th June 1884, the Indus, a steamship of 1615 tons net register, was in the entrance to the river Thames in the course of a voyage from London to Queensland, laden with a general cargo, and carrying about 400 passengers. The weather was fine and clear. The Indus was in charge of a pilot by compulsion of law. Shortly after the Indus had passed the Shivering Sand, her course was by the pilot's orders altered, so that the Girdler lightship was brought to bear right ahead. When the lightship was half a mile distant, and still right ahead, the pilot ordered the helm to be put to starboard, and then put hard-a-starboard. Both these orders were obeyed, but the head of the Indus did not pay off, and when the lightship was about 300 yards distant, and still bearing right ahead, the pilot ordered the helm to be put hard-aport, and her engines to be stopped and reversed full speed astern. But before these orders had any effect, the Indus with her stem struck the lightship amidships. The Indus was being steered by steam-steering gear, and this was her first voyage. She had been built at Dundee, and brought round from there to London. The steering gear had acted properly from Dundee to London, on the voyage down the river till the collision happened, and subsequently on the voyage to Queensland. The helmsman was not called.

Sir Richard Webster, Q.C. (A.-G.), and Bucknill, Q.C. for the plaintiffs.

Finlay, Q.C. and Kennedy, Q.C. for the defendants.

The President.—The question in this case is whether or not the master or crew of the Indus caused wholly or partly by contributory negligence this catastrophe. I have not before me as an issue in the case whether or not the pilot caused the collision. That is only indirectly in question. It was at first suggested by the pleadings, that the owners of the Indus caused the collision, or had contributed to it by not providing the Indus with proper steering gear; but that charge has been abandoned by the Attorney-General. The next thing is, that it is clear that this vessel was under the charge of the pilot, and I have absolutely no evidence that his orders were not obeyed. On the other hand, I have evidence of the clearest kind by the master and the second officer of the Indus that the pilot's orders were obeyed; and the pilot, who has been called, and who of course must know that his skill is being questioned, has not asserted that his orders were not obeyed. Further than that in the evidence which he last gave—he was discreetly left unquestioned upon the subject by the Attorney-General—in answer to questions by Mr. Finlay, he by implication admitted that his orders had been obeyed. It is suggested that, from the previous history of this short voyage, I am to infer that it was by reason of some default on the part of the steersman that the vessel did not answer her helm immediately before the collision. That is based upon the fact which is admitted, that on one occasion a man, who had been at the helm coming down the river, had been removed, because as a matter of fact, whatever the cause, an order having been given by the pilot the manœuvre ordered by him had not been effected, and it appears to have been assumed that that was because the man at the helm had not known how to discharge his duties, and had not in fact discharged his duties of obeying the order of the pilot. First of all, I will assume that it was because the man did not know how to discharge the duties of a steersman. If it was so either once or twice, it is plain that the man had been replaced by somebody else, and that somebody else is not shown by any evidence not to have known how to steer. There is positive evidence that the orders which were given by the pilot were obeyed by the man at the wheel. There is, however, this further observation to be made. It has been elicited by the Attorney-General for some purpose which I do not understand that one or another of the men who were removed from the wheel said when removed, "I know how to steer as well as you do." From which it was suggested that the man was by implication saying it was no fault of his, but was the fault of the steering gear. It appears then that, there being proper steering gear supplied, as is now admitted, the pilot's orders were obeyed. Then there is the fact that the vessel did not answer her helm.

This subject has been considered quite recently in the case of The European (5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 417; 52 L. T. Rep. N. S. 868; 10 P. Div. 99) by my brother Butt. In that case the facts were very similar with this difference, that there the apparatus had been found defective on the previous voyage, and on that ground my brother Butt, while he held that the owners would not have been liable if the failure of the steering gear had occurred for the first time, yet he held they were liable because they had had a warning that this vice was in the steering gear, and that therefore they ought to have taken steps to repair it. There is a complete absence of any such evidence in this case. It has been proved, and it has not been sought to impeach the evidence, that this steering gear had served perfectly well in bringing the ship up from Dundee, and that it had answered perfectly well on the trial trip.. There only remains what happened when the Indus was approaching the lightship, and it seems to me to be clear that there was nothing which occurred then which rendered it the duty of those navigating to stop, because I have no doubt that they did really and truly believe that it was because the man or men had not steered properly that the vessel did not answer her helm. It is quite possible, from the man's remonstrance about knowing how to steer as well as anybody else, that there might have been a defect in the steering gear, but as that had not been brought to the notice of anybody up to that time—I am only putting this forward as a conjecture—I cannot hold that there was any negligence on the part of those in charge of the vessel in continuing the voyage until this happened. I have already pointed out that it is not necessary for me to say whether or not the pilot was to blame. It is possible that the cause of the catastrophe may have been something not accounted for, and it would appear from this case of The European (ubi sup.) that these accidents do happen with the best esteemed machinery. It is possible that something or other did happen to the steering gear which caused her not to answer. I repeat this is quite outside what I have to determine, and I must add that, though the question is not whether or not the pilot was to blame, the assessors, whose valuable assistance I have, incline to the opinion that the collision did arise from the default of the pilot; but I repeat, I do not give my decision on that point, because it is not the question before me. A good deal has been said about the helmsman not being called. Undoubtedly, if I had thought that the evidence given left the matter in dubio, I should have been influenced by the fact that he had not been called; but when I have the clear and distinct evidence of the master and second mate that the orders of the pilot were in fact obeyed, I come to the conclusion upon the whole that the case has not been established against the defendants.

Bucknill, for the plaintiffs, referred to the case of The Buckhurst (46 L. T. Rep. N. S. 108; 6 P. Div. 152; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 484), and asked that the plaintiffs should not be condemned in costs.

Finlay, Q.C., for the defendants, contra.

The President.—I am not much impressed by Mr. Bucknill's contention, that this case is analogous to a case of inevitable accident. It appears to me that, on the first view of this collision, it would be the pilot who was in charge who occasioned it; but I suppose that, because pilots are not able to pay the damages, it was sought to make the owners of the vessel pay, and that attempt has been unsuccessful. The plaintiffs have failed to establish that there was any blame on the part of the defendants, and they must take the ordinary consequences which attach to litigants who fail to establish their case.

From this decision the plaintiffs appealed.

Sir Richard Webster, Q.C. (A.-G.) and Bucknill Q.C. in support of the appeal.—The learned President was wrong in finding that the plaintiffs had not established a case against the defendants. On showing that their vessel was at anchor and exhibiting a proper light they made out a primâ facie case of negligence against the defendants. They have not disproved that primâ facie case, and therefore the plaintiffs are entitled to judgment:

The Batavier, 2 W. Rob. 407;
Bill v. Smith, 39 Connecticut Rep. 206.

All the defendants have proved is that their ship was compulsorily in charge of a pilot, but the President has expressly refrained from finding that it was solely his fault which caused the collision. He has assumed it was upon the plaintiffs to prove the cause of the collision, and has left that cause in dubio. It is submitted that the suggestion of inevitable accident, founded upon the assumpton that the steering gear failed to act on this particular occasion, is inconsistent with the facts. The steering gear previously and subsequently acted properly. The true inference to draw is, that the pilot's orders were never obeyed at all. It is, however, sufficient to say that the defendants have not discharged the burden of proof which lay upon them, and therefore the plaintiffs are entitled to judgment:

The Lochlibo, 3 Wm. Rob. 310;
The Clyde Navigation Company v. Barclay, 36 L. T. Rep. N. S. 379; 1 App. Cas. 790; 3 Asp. Mar. Law. Cas. 390.

Sir Walter Phillimore and Kennedy, Q.C. for the respondents, contra.—Though the onus lay upon the defendants to prove either that the collision was due to the fault of the pilot or an inevitable accident, yet, inasmuch as their evidence had put the matter in dubio, they were entitled to judgment:

The Boliva, 3 Notes of Cas. 208;
The George, 4 Notes of Cas. 161.

The President has found that the collision was due to either of these two causes, for neither of which the defendants would be liable. The defendants have, therefore, discharged the onus which was upon them, and the onus of proving negligence on the part of their servants causing or contributing to the collision lay upon the plaintiffs:

The Daioz, 37 L. T. Rep. N. S. 137; 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 477.

Bucknill, Q.C. in reply.

Lord Esher, M.R.—I am of opinion that in this case the defendants have not discharged to our satisfaction the burden of proof which was upon them. This is an action for collision, and the action is brought against the owners of a steamer which at night time ran into a vessel at anchor. It was incumbent upon the plaintiffs to make out a primâ facie case, one which if unanswered would entitle them to judgment. They, in order to satisfy the burden of proof which was upon them, gave evidence that their vessel was at anchor and was showing a proper light. Under these circumstances, the defendants' vessel being in motion, in my opinion, and as it has been frequently held, the plaintiffs had established a primâ facie case of negligence against the defendants' vessel. It is the duty of a vessel in motion to keep clear of one at anchor, if the latter can be seen, and if she does not keep clear of her then she must show good cause for not doing so. In this case the ship at anchor having shown a proper and sufficient light, the circumstances are just the same as if the collision had happened in midday, and can any man, not as a matter of law, but of common sense, suppose that is not a primâ facie case of negligence? Therefore here the plaintiffs have proved a primâ facie case of negligence, and if it was not answered by countervailing evidence they are entitled to judgment. In what way could the plaintiffs' case be answered? The defendants could say they did everything that could be done by careful seamen, but that some overwhelming storm occurred which prevented the ship from being navigated as she ought to have been. They could say that an entirely unforeseen accident, which could not have been prevented by proper management, occurred to the machinery with the same result. There are many other things which might be classed under the head of law known as inevitable accident, which is a well-known expression, and though it may not be philosophically correct answers its purpose. If the ship which is primâ facie in the wrong sets up the defence of inevitable accident she must prove it, and the burden of proof rests upon her to show that the collision was the result of an inevitable accident. In the present case the learned President seems to have left it an open question, an alternative, whether or not this collision was caused by an inevitable accident. The inevitable accident suggested is, that the machinery was out of order; that is to say, that though it had previously been working perfectly well, something occurred at the particular moment of the collision which prevented it from doing that which everyone might reasonably expect it would do. He has left that open as an alternative, but, in my opinion, there was no evidence to support such a suggestion. It is said that the machinery acted well from Dundee to London, down the Thames, till the accident happened, and afterwards on the voyage to Australia. It is therefore necessary to presume that an inevitable accident happened once, and once only, and that at the most critical moment. In my humble opinion there is no evidence to support such a presumption. Therefore this alternative did not exist, and the defendants never proved the defence of inevitable accident.

In what other way, then, could the defendants discharge their burden? They could show that they had a licensed pilot on board, that he was there by compulsion of law, and that the accident occurred solely through his negligence. They must give evidence which if unanswered would prove that proposition. In my opinion they must show that the fault was one in regard to the navigation of the ship as to the steering, because that is the principal matter over which the pilot has a control, that the collision was due to his fault alone, and that he at the time was in charge of the navigation. If they prove that the pilot gave orders, and that his orders were obeyed, they make out a primâ facie case of negligence on his part. But if they only prove that the pilot gave orders without also proving that they were obeyed, they do not even make out a primâ facie case that the collision was solely the fault of the pilot. By such evidence they perhaps may show that the pilot was in fault, but they do not show that the pilot was solely in fault. In the present case they gave evidence that the pilot gave the orders as to the steering of the vessel, and that they were immediately obeyed. But the question is whether they gave such evidence as the court can accept. The evidence is that the machinery acted well before and after the collision. According to the evidence the pilot was steering so as to bring the lightship right ahead, about two miles off. He continued that course until within half a mile, or somewhat less, and at this time we on the evidence have come to the conclusion that he ordered the helm to be put hard-a-starboard. I cannot doubt myself that if that order was given half a mile off, and it was obeyed at once, and nothing was done to counteract it, the steamer would have gone clear of the lightship. Now comes the question, was that order obeyed? It is for the defendants, on whom the burden of proof lies, to show that it was obeyed. Have they satisfied that burden? The captain and mate said it was obeyed. The mate said, "I looked and saw the man put the helm over hard-a-starboard," but he added "the ship did not alter her course." His evidence means that the ship did not alter her course until the moment she struck the lightship. On this we have put this question to our assessors, "Assuming that the helm was hard-a-starboarded at a distance of half a mile, is it possible that the ship could not have answered her helm so that the officer must have seen it?" They answer No. Therefore the weak point in the evidence of the second mate is this: He says, "I know the helm was put hard-a-starboard," but immediately adds something which seems to suggest that it was not put hard-a-starboard. It is impossible to account for the ship not altering, except on one of two suppositions, either that the machinery had no effect upon the ship, or that the helm was not in fact put hard-a-starboard. It is important to notice that the helmsman, who could have said whether he put the helm hard-a-starboard or not, was not called. I do not say he was not called through any fault of the defendants; but, however it is, their case is open to this criticism, that their evidence that the helm was hard-a-starboarded is supplemented by the evidence that the order was not effective. To my mind, the inference is, that the order was not obeyed, unless there is something else to show that, even if it was obeyed, it was counteracted. But the evidence is that, even at the moment of the collision, the helm had not been got over to hard-a-port, though the pilot had so ordered when he saw the likelihood of a collision arising. We come to the conclusion that nothing was done which would counteract the effect of the hard-a-starboard order if it had been obeyed; and that the order to hard-a-port was given at a time when it had no effect.

So far from agreeing with the learned President that there was a double alternative, it seems to me that the evidence, when carefully considered, proves with a reasonable certainty, sufficient for the court to act on, that the order to put the helm hard-a-starboard was given nearly half a mile from the lightship, and that it was not in fact obeyed. I myself think it would have been better if the pilot had given the order more than half a mile off; but, if the disobedience to the order contributed, as I think it did, to the collision, it cannot be said that it was caused solely by the default of the pilot, and therefore the defendants fail, because they have not satisfied the burden of proof which lay upon them. With the greatest deference to the learned President, I cannot understand that part of his judgment where he says that judgment ought to be given against the plaintiffs, because they did not make out their case. I think they did make out a primâ facie case, and the only thing that remained to be tried was whether it was rebutted by the defendants. I do not think they have rebutted it. With regard to the cases which have been cited at the bar, none of them seem to be contrary to the proposition I have laid down—that where a primâ facie case of this sort is made out by the plaintiffs, and the defendants rely on compulsory pilotage, they must prove two things at least: that the default was in the steering, and that the orders as to that were given by the pilot, and were obeyed. The case in the House of Lords of The Clyde Navigation Company v. Barclay (ubi sup.) amounts, in my opinion, to this, that where the plaintiffs make out a primâ facie case, and the answer is, that the defendants are exempt from liability on the ground of compulsory pilotage, and they give evidence which primâ facie proves that the accident was solely the fault of the pilot who was in charge of the ship by compulsion of law, the burden of proof is then shifted back on to the plaintiffs if they allege that the defendants were guilty of some other act of negligence. That is all the House of Lords there decided; it does not alter the general and long accepted rules as to the burden of proof which I have already stated. For these reasons, I think that this appeal should be allowed.

LINDLEY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The difficulty in this case is to find out what was the cause of the collision. Here is a lightship at anchor, exhibiting proper lights, and she is run into by a steamer in fine and clear weather. The primâ facie case is that the collision was due to the negligence of some one on board the steamer. Now the evidence satisfies me that the steamer was not navigated according to the pilot's orders. A theory of inevitable accident was suggested, in support of which I can see no evidence at all. So far as we can ascertain, the steering apparatus had previously and subsequently acted properly, but it is suggested that it may not have acted properly on this occasion. That is a mere suggestion. The evidence is that the pilot gave the orders starboard and hard-a-starboard, and yet nobody observed the ship alter. If that is so it is inconceivable that the pilot's orders can have been complied with. I am quite aware that the captain and mate say that they were, but it is proved to demonstration that that cannot be, and I decline to accept their evidence on that point. If so the allegation that the steamer's crew were to blame is made out. But the evidence does not stop there. It may be that the pilot was to blame. If the course of the steamer was not changed, I cannot see why he did not stop the engines sooner, but that does not exonerate the defendants, for the reasons I have given. I come to the conclusion therefore that whatever may have been the fault of the pilot, the defendants were guilty of negligence, and that this appeal must be allowed.

LOPES, L.J.—In order to make out that this collision was solely the pilot's fault the defendants must show that his orders were executed by the crew, and, unless they established that, they do not, in my opinion, make out that which they are called upon to prove. There is a good deal of evidence that the pilot's orders to the helm were obeyed, but there is also the fact that though these orders were given nearly half a mile off the ship did not in any way alter her course. How can that be accounted for? Either there must have been something wrong with the steering gear or those orders could not have been obeyed. The evidence is that before and after the collision the steering gear acted perfectly. It is impossible therefore, to my mind, to say that the steering gear had anything to do with this collision, but it seems to me an irresistible inference that it was caused by the pilot's orders not being obeyed. There is a great deal of evidence that they were, but I unhesitatingly say I do not believe that evidence. The defendants have not satisfied the burden of proof which rested upon them to establish a defence to the primâ facie case that was made out against them, and I therefore think that the appeal should be allowed.

Carriage of goods — Charter-party — Advanced freight—Right of cargo owner to recover—Right of insurer to sue in cargo owner's name.

The plaintiffs bought goods on terms including cost, freight, and insurance. The vendors shipped the goods on the defendants' ship under a charter-party, stipulating for the payment of freight in advance. Freight was paid in advance and insured. The goods were lost by the defendants' negligence. The plaintiffs paid the vendors for the goods a sum which included the advanced freight, receiving in exchange the bills of lading and the policy on the advanced freight.

Held, in an action for damages for non-delivery of the goods, that, as the damages were to be considered with reference to the value of the goods at the port of arrival, the plaintiffs were entitled to recover as part of their damages the advanced freight paid by them as part of the price of the goods, and that the insurer of the advanced freight was entitled to sue for it in the plaintiffs' name as part of the damages which the plaintiffs, but for the insurance, would have sustained by the defendants' negligence.

THIS was an action brought by the plaintiffs, Dufourcet and Co., the owners of a cargo of 1500 tons of superphosphate, shipped on board the steamship Aurora, against the defendants, the owners of that steamship, to recover damages for the non-delivery of the cargo which was lost, as was admitted, by the negligence of the defendants.

Cur. adv. vult.

Dec. 21.—DENMAN, J.—The question in this case, which was tried before me without a jury, arose upon the following state of facts: In Oct. 1885 the plaintiffs, Dufourcet and Co., were under contract to sell to certain merchants in America named Malcolmson, 1500 tons of superphosphate. In order to enable them to perform this contract they, on the 23rd Oct. 1885 and other days, entered into three contracts with Gibbs and Co., merchants in London, each contract being for 500 tons of superphosphate at so much per ton, to be shipped in fine, dry, merchantable condition, cost, freight, and insurance by steamer to Savannah. Payment three-fourths cash in London against documents, and balance in ten days from shipment. Buyers to have option of insuring in America, seller allowing current rate of premium ruling here. Discount and commission 3½ per cent.

As explained by Lord Blackburn, in the well-known case of Ireland v. Livingstone (15 L. T. Rep. N. S. 206; L. Rep. 5 H. L. 395, at p. 406) the contract price under these contracts was one for the whole of the valuable things to be done or given by the consignor to the consignee, viz., the actual cost of the goods with the premium of insurance and the freight. On the 5th Nov. Gibbs and Co. entered into a charter-party with the defendants for the steamer Aurora. It was admitted that the plaintiffs did elect to insure in America. If they had not done so Gibbs and Co would have insured as part of their duty under the contract, and have handed over the policy to the plaintiffs. The charter-party provided, that if "required by the captain the whole freight to be advanced on signing bills of lading, subject to a deduction of 3½ per cent. for interest and insurance," and that the ship was to "have an absolute lien upon the cargo for all freight, dead freight, and demurrage, charterer's responsibility ceasing on shipment of cargo." Gibbs and Co. paid the master 600*l.* on account of the freight on signing bills of lading as required by the master, and they effected, on the 24th Nov., an insurance for 600*l.* on the freight so advanced in the name of their own brokers, Brown and Co., on behalf of the plaintiffs, with the City of London Insurance Company, and handed that policy over to the plaintiffs. The 1500 tons were shipped in London, and the ship went to Hartlepool in accordance with the charter-party and bills of lading. She left Hartlepool on her voyage to Savannah on the 25th Nov. at 5 p.m. and was lost on the same evening within three hours by, as was admitted, the negligence of the defendants' servants. On the 1st Dec. the plaintiffs paid Gibbs and Co. for the 1500 tons, including the 600*l.* paid for advanced freight, and the amount due in respect of the policy (for which they had become liable at the current rate of premium according to the contract), the sum of 3672*l.* 15*s.* 6*d.*; received in exchange for the policy for 600*l.*, and three bills of lading each for 500 tons of superphosphate. Upon the loss of the vessel being known the plaintiffs claimed from the defendants the above sum of 3672*l.* 15*s.* 6*d.*, and brought this action on the 12th Dec. 1885. In the statement of claim, as originally delivered on the 7th Jan., the plaintiffs sued upon the bills of lading, alleging default in the delivery of the goods and negligence, which occasioned the loss of the ship and the goods on board, subsequently the statement of claim was amended by adding a statement that prior to the shipment Gibbs and Co., from whom the plaintiff had purchased the goods for 3672*l.* 15*s.* 6*d.*, to cover cost, freight, and insurance, and who had been paid that amount by the plaintiffs, had paid to the master 600*l.* as an advance of freight. To this part of the statement of claim (as amended) the defendants pleaded in the 7th and 8th paragraphs of their amended defence, first, that Gibbs and Co. and the plaintiffs, by the charter-party and the bills of lading, undertook to insure the advanced freight, and to look to the underwriters thereon for any loss of the same capable of being covered by an ordinary marine policy, and not to the defendants; and, secondly, that if the defendants were liable to be sued by the plaintiffs, the plaintiffs ought not further to maintain the action, i.e. in respect of the 600*l.*, for that on the 18th March 1886, the defendants satisfied and discharged all claims of the plaintiffs against the defendants, and all damages and costs in respect thereof by payment of 2700*l.*, which was accepted and received by the plaintiffs in satisfaction and discharge of the said claim, damages, and costs.

The only question raised before me was whether the plaintiffs could maintain this action for the benefit of the underwriters of the policy for 600*l.* advanced freight. The facts relating to this part of the case were as follows: After the present action was brought it was found that the defendants were insured in two mutual insurance companies which had insured them, not only for the loss of the ship, but against such liabilities as they might incur by the loss of the ship. Negotiations were entered into between one Wetherby on behalf of the plaintiff, and Riley, acting for the mutual companies and for the defendants, with the object of enabling the plaintiffs to obtain compensation from those companies instead of looking to the defendants for compensation. Ultimately, a compromise was arrived at, and the plaintiffs received 2700*l.*, which the defendants, in their 8th paragraph of the defence, set up as a settlement of the plaintiffs whole claim, including the 600*l.* which was part of the 3672*l.* 15*s.* 6*d.* paid by them to Gibbs, but which the plaintiffs alleged was expressly excluded from the settlement. The letter, which the defendant contended had the effect of a settlement of the whole of their claim of 3672*l.* 15*s.* 6*d.*, was dated the 17th March 1886, addressed to the owners of the ship, signed by Dufourcet and Co., and was as follows: "Dufourcet and Co. v. Bishop and others; Re Aurora s.s. In consideration of your paying us the sum of 2700*l.* in full settlement of our claim for the loss of the cargo of the superphosphate in the above action, we hereby agree to abandon that part of the said action which relates to the cargo, and to pay all our own costs therein, to discharge all our witnesses, and not to render any assistance to the company in which the advance freight of 600*l.* is insured unless compelled to do so. We also agree to hand you the original invoices and bills of lading duly indorsed for the whole of the said cargo, the invoices of costs thereof, and the charter-party, &c., also to assign to you, at your expense, all our rights to the recovery of the loss of the said cargo against the American underwriters on the same, and to hand you all requisite documents we may have in our possession and control in support of the claim against the said underwriters, and to render you every assistance in our power at your expense, with a view to a recovery of the same, which, when recovered, shall be entirely for your benefit, you holding us harmless and indemnified against any claim that may be made on us by the said underwriters consequent upon any proceedings by you against them. We further agree not to apply to the said underwriters for the return of the premium of insurance on the said cargo within six months from this date, unless in the meantime you inform us that you will not proceed against the said underwriters for the loss of the cargo." This letter is somewhat ambiguous in its terms, but I can only understand it as abandoning that part of the plaintiffs' claim which consists of the claim in respect of the cargo as distinct from, and exclusive of the amount of, the advanced freight of 600*l.* which is specifically mentioned in the letter. The whole action, and not part only at that time (the 17th March) related to the cargo, so that the provision to abandon that part would be senseless unless something was meant to be excluded, and there is nothing else which can be suggested except the advanced freight in respect of which the plaintiff could have recovered anything by reason of the loss of the cargo. I think, therefore, that the agreement of the 17th March does not prove the 8th paragraph of the defence, setting up the payment of 2700*l.* as a settlement of all claims of the plaintiffs against the defendants, and all damages in respect thereof.

The defendants, the shipowners, further contended that no action would lie against them at the suit of the plaintiffs in respect of the 600*l.* advanced freight, because, by the charter-party and bill of lading, the plaintiffs and Gibbs and Co. were bound by the stipulation as to advanced freight, and the freight of 600*l.* had been advanced accordingly, and the plaintiffs and Gibbs and Co. undertook to insure and look to the underwriters for any loss which could be covered by insurance, and that, inasmuch as the plaintiff could not recover back the 600*l.* from the defendants on their own account (according to De Silvale v. Kendall, 4 M. & S. 37, and other cases), neither could they sue for the benefit of the insurers in order to indemnify them against a risk for which they were liable under the policy, but for which the defendants, the shipowners, were not liable at all. I am of opinion that this defence merely amounts to an ingenious attempt to defeat the City of London Insurance Company of its right to be subrogated to the rights of the plaintiffs as against the defendants in respect of so much of the damages recoverable by the plaintiffs as they had covered by the policy of 600*l.*, on which the company had been compelled to pay the plaintiffs that amount. I think it clear from the decision of the Court of Appeal in the very recent case of Rodoconachi v. Milburn (56 L. T. Rep. N. S. 594; ante, p. 100; 18 Q. B. Div. 67) that, upon the loss of the vessel by the negligence of the defendants, the plaintiffs were entitled to damages, including the 600*l.* for which they were liable to Gibbs and Co., as part of the value of the cargo at the end of the voyage. I think it equally clear that they had no right, as against the insurers of that advance freight, to barter away their right to recover it as part of the damage sustained by them by the loss of the cargo; and I also think that they have not even purported to do this by the compromise of the 17th March, which does not use language which need necessarily so be constructed, inasmuch as they only profess to abandon a portion of their action, and the document in which they do so draws a distinction between that part which relates to the cargo and the 600*l.* in question, and contemplates the possibility of their being called upon to do the very thing they are now doing, viz., to be plaintiffs for the benefit of the insurance company, as insurers of the 600*l.* advance freight. All they stipulate to do in that respect is not to render any assistance to the company in which the advanced freight is insured unless compelled to do so; but if the insurance company has a right to be subrogated to their rights as against the defendants, so far as the loss of this 600*l.* is concerned, they are compelled to give all the assistance which is required, viz., not to object to the use of their name to enable the insurance company, who have fully indemnified them for this part of their damage, to recover it from the defendants as part of the damage caused by the negligent loss of the cargo. It was admitted on the hearing that the insurance company had insisted on the action being continued for their benefit in respect of the 600*l.* in question. I do not think that the cases cited by Mr. Barnes are at all inconsistent with this view. Though they establish, as a general rule, that money paid by way of advanced freight cannot be recovered back on the failure of the voyage, they by no means establish that where the cargo owner has, as part of the price of the goods, paid, or become liable to pay a sum, for freight in advance, and the goods are lost by negligence of the shipowner, he may not, as part of his damages (which are to be considered with reference to the value of the goods at the port of arrival), be allowed as against the shipowner an amount equal to the freight so advanced; and if he happens to be partially indemnified against that loss by an insurance of that very amount of advanced freight, I can see no reason why the insurer of that amount should not be entitled to sue in his name for it as part of the damage which the cargo owner but for the insurance would have sustained by the defendants' negligence. I think, for the above reasons, that the plaintiffs are entitled to judgment for 600*l.*, and I give judgment accordingly for that amount with costs. Judgment for plaintiffs.

THE BERNINA. (a)

Carriage of goods—Charter-party and bill of lading—Collision—Transhipment of cargo—Excepted perils—Limitation of liability—Merchant Shipping Act 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104), s. 506—Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 63), s. 54.

Where a vessel laden with cargo discontinues her voyage, and the cargo is transhipped by the shipowner into other bottoms for the purpose of earning the freight due under the original contract of carriage—but without the assent of the cargo-owners, although they were within reach of communication—the shipowner cannot, in an action by the cargo-owner for non-delivery, protect himself from liability by exceptions in the bills of lading given by the masters of the ships into which the goods have been transhipped, if such exceptions were not contained in the original charter-party and bill of lading.

When, in consequence of a collision, cargo is transhipped and lost by the negligence of the master and crew of the then carrying ship, the decree in a limitation action limiting the liability of the owner of the original ship in respect of the loss or damage caused by the improper navigation of his ship on the occasion of the collision, does not protect him from liability for the subsequent loss of the cargo, and the cargo-owners, notwithstanding such decree, are entitled to sue him for the loss.

The defendants' vessel while carrying cargo of the plaintiff's under a charter-party and bill of lading, not excepting the negligence of her master and crew, came into collision with another ship through the joint negligence of both. She was, in consequence, obliged to put into a port of refuge and there discharge her cargo for repairs. The master, without the assent of the cargo-owners, justifiably transhipped the cargo into three other ships under bills of lading excepting the negligence of the master and crew, and by which the master was represented as shipper, and the cargo made deliverable to the order of his owners. Two of the ships into which the cargo had been transhipped were lost by the negligence of their respective masters and crews. The defendants limited their liability in respect of the loss or damage caused by the improper navigation of their ship on the occasion of the collision. The cargo-owners having sued the shipowners for the loss of their cargo:

Held, that the transhipment was for the purpose of enabling the defendants to earn the freight; that they could not protect themselves from liability by exceptions in the subsequent bill of lading which were not contained in the original contract of carriage between themselves and the plaintiffs; and that the decree in the limitation action did not prevent the plaintiffs suing them for the loss of the cargo.

THIS was an action in personam by Edward John Howard, against James Mills and others, the owners of the steamship Bernina, to recover damages for non-delivery of his cargo laden on board the Bernina in breach of a charter-party, dated the 18th Aug. 1884.

The cargo, consisting of 1700 tons of ore, was shipped at Porman for carriage to Cardiff, East Bute Dock, but 1147 tons were not delivered to the plaintiff, although such non-delivery was, according to the plaintiff, not caused by any of the excepted perils in the charter-party or bill of lading given in receipt for the cargo at Porman.

The defendants by their defence, after denying that the plaintiffs had suffered damage or that there had been any breach of the charter-party, alleged as follows:

2. The plaintiff is a merchant, carrying on business at Cardiff. The defendants are shipowners, and owners of the steamship Bernina, which was, at the times hereinafter mentioned, and is a duly registered British ship.

3. By a charter-party, dated Aug. 18, 1884, being the charter-party in the statement of claim mentioned, the plaintiff chartered the defendant's steamship Bernina to proceed to Porman, and there load a cargo of ore for delivery at Cardiff or Newport, as ordered, certain perils excepted.

4. The said steamship proceeded to Porman, and there loaded a cargo of about 1700 tons of ore in accordance with the said charter-party. Such cargo was shipped and owned by the plaintiff, and the master duly signed and delivered to the plaintiff a bill of lading for the same, being the bill of lading referred to in the statement of claim, by which the said cargo was to be carried to Cardiff and there delivered (certain perils excepted) for freight and other conditions as per the said charter-party.

5. The Bernina duly proceeded on her voyage towards Cardiff from Porman with the said cargo and about 250 tons of Esparto grass belonging to other persons on board, and while prosecuting her said voyage, namely, on the 28th Sept. 1884, the Bernina came into collision with the steamship Bushire, in consequence of which the said steamship Bushire sank with her cargo, and fifteen persons on board her were drowned, and the Bernina sustained such damage that she was compelled to put into Lisbon and discharge her cargo.

6. The said collision was occasioned by the fault or default of the master and crew of the Bernina, and the fault or default of the master and crew of the Bushire.

7. The Bernina could not be repaired at Lisbon so as to carry on the said cargo, and she was obliged to proceed after temporary repairs in ballast to be repaired in England, and her repairs would have taken so long before she could have returned to Lisbon that it would have been unreasonable, and cost more than the cargo was worth to keep it for her, and the proper thing to be done with the cargo of ore was to forward it to its destination by other vessels.

8. Accordingly the said cargo of ore was shipped under bills of lading hereinafter mentioned from Lisbon for Cardiff, its destination by Messrs. Pinto Basto and Co. (in whose custody it was at Lisbon, and to whom it had been delivered, and who had received it as agents for and on behalf of the plaintiff) by and with the consent and authority of the plaintiff and on his behalf in three other steamships bound for Cardiff, namely, the Avebury, the Curlew, and the Brixham, all of which were proper and efficient for the purpose. The Esparto grass was also shipped in a similar manner by the said firm with the authority and consent and on behalf of its owners by the Avebury.

9. Only one of the said three steamships, the Curlew, arrived safely at Cardiff with her cargo. The other two, the Brixham and the Avebury, were totally lost on their voyage, with such portions of the said cargo as they were respectively carrying. The portions shipped and lost as aforesaid in the Brixham and Avebury make up and are the 1147 tons of the said cargo referred to in the said statement of claim. Bills of lading for the said portions of cargo put on board the Brixham and Avebury respectively were signed by their respective masters or agents, and were in the customary form in use at Lisbon, and the defendants crave leave to refer thereto.

(a) Reported by J. P. ASPINALL and BUTLER ASPINALL, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

10. The loss of the Brixham and Avebury and their cargoes was occasioned by perils excepted both in the said charter-party and bill of lading of the Bernina, and in the said bills of lading of the Brixham and Avebury.

11. On the 30th Sept. 1884, an action was commenced, in the Admiralty Division of the said court, by the defendants as owners of the steamship Bernina, against the owners of the Bushire for the damages they had sustained by the said collision, and on the 10th Oct. 1884 an action was commenced in the said division of this court by the owners of the Bushire against the owners of the Bernina and her freight to recover damages for the said collision, and these two actions were afterwards consolidated.

12. At the hearing of the consolidated actions on the 20th Nov. 1884, the court found both vessels to blame, and decreed accordingly.

13. On the 11th Dec. 1884, the defendants commenced an action in the Admiralty Division of this court against the Persian Gulf Steamship Company, the owners of the steamship Bushire, and others, to limit their liability to 8*l*. per ton in respect of the said collision.

14. On the 17th March 1885 a decree in the said limitation suit was made, limiting the liability of the present defendants (the plaintiffs in that suit) according to the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 and the Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act 1862, and decreeing that in respect of loss or damage to ships, boats, goods, merchandise, or other things caused by reason of the improper navigation of the said steamship Bernina on the occasion of the said collision, the present defendants, the owners of the Bernina, were answerable in damages to an amount not exceeding 11,437*l*. 15*s*. 2*d*., such sum being at the rate of 8*l*. for each ton of the registered tonnage of the said steamship Bernina without deduction on account of engine room, and that, the said sum having been paid into court, together with the sum of 170*l* 9*s*. 5*d*. for interest thereon, at the rate of 4 per cent. per annum, from the date of the said collision until such payment into court, the judge ordered that all proceedings in the consolidated actions be stayed, that advertisements as in the said decree mentioned should be inserted in the papers therein mentioned, intimating to all persons having any claim in respect of loss or damage to ships, goods, merchandise, or other things caused as aforesaid, that if they did not come in and enter their claim on or before the 17th June then next, they should be excluded from sharing in the aforesaid amount, and he referred all claims brought in, or thereinafter to be brought in, in the said limitation action to the registrar assisted by merchants to assess the amount thereof.

15. The said sum of 11,437*l*. 15*s*. 2*d*., which was at the rate of 8*l*. per ton of the registered tonnage of the Bernina, without deduction on account of engine room, together with interest as aforesaid, had been paid into court in the said limitation action prior to the said decree, namely, on or about the 17th Feb. 1885. Advertisements in accordance with the said decree were duly issued as directed by it. On the 12th June 1885, the plaintiff in the present action came in and appeared in the said limitation action. On the 24th June 1885 the present plaintiff gave notice in the said limitation action that he withdrew his said appearance therein. On the 17th July 1885 the writ in this action was issued by the plaintiff against the defendants. The amount brought into court in the said limitation action as aforesaid was duly distributed on or before the 16th Feb. 1886, rateably amongst the several claimants entering and preferring their claims in the said limitation action.

16. The said collision and the losses by the two steamships aforesaid, the Brixham and the Avebury, occurred without the actual fault or privity of the defendants or any of them.

17. The defendants say that, under the circumstances aforesaid, they were and are not liable to the plaintiff in respect of the said losses or either of them, and that if any liability attached to them in respect of the said losses, such liability is limited as in the said decree mentioned, and the plaintiff is precluded from maintaining this action and prosecuting his claim therein by reason of the proceedings in the limitation suit as aforesaid.

The plaintiffs by their reply joined issue, and alleged that, even if the facts stated in paragraphs 2 to 17 of the defence were true, they formed no answer to the plaintiff's claim.

The allegations in the defence were correct, subject to the following facts:

The charter-party and bill of lading relating to the carriage of the goods in the Bernina contained the following excepted perils, "the act of God, the Queen's enemies, fire, and all and every other dangers and accidents of the seas, rivers, and navigation."

The bills of lading relating to the carriage of the goods in the Avebury, Curlew, and Brixham contained, in addition to the above excepted perils, "neglect or default by the master or mariners in the navigation of the ship." By these bills of lading the master of the Bernina was represented as the shipper, and the agents of the owners of the Bernina were represented as the consignees.

The plaintiff was not informed by the defendants of the additional excepted perils contained in these latter bills of lading, and no evidence was given to show that they were in the customary form in use at Lisbon. The plaintiff knew of the transhipment, but neither assented to or dissented from it. The Avebury and the Brixham and their cargoes were lost, owing to the negligence of their masters and crews, and it was in respect of such loss of cargo that this action was brought.

The above facts were contained in written admissions made by the plaintiff and correspondence.

Nov. 11. — Sir Walter Phillimore and J. P. Aspinall for the plaintiffs.—As the loss of the cargo was due to the negligence of the defendant's agents, and was not caused by any of the excepted perils contained in the charter-party and bill of lading relating to the Bernina, the defendants are liable. The rights of the plaintiffs are solely governed by that charter-party and bill of lading, and the subsequent contract of carriage made between the defendants and the owners of the Avebury and Brixham does not affect the plaintiffs. The cargo was landed at Lisbon for the purpose of repairing the Bernina, and was therefore in safety. Hence there was no necessity constituting the master of the Bernina the agent of the plaintiffs. The master was at liberty to procure another ship to complete the voyage, but only for the purpose of earning the freight, and only as agent for his owners:

Matthews v. Gibbs, 30 L. J. 55, Q. B.;
Notara v. Henderson, 26 L. T. Rep. N. S. 442; L. Rep. 7 Q. B. 225; 1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 278.

Where a ship, injured by perils of the sea, lands cargo and abandons the voyage, it may be that the master, ex necessitate, becomes the agent of the cargo-owners, with power to contract and bind them, but not so where the discontinuance of the voyage is due to a breach of contract or a tort, for, if so, the shipowner would be taking advantage of his own wrong to escape liability to an innocent plaintiff:

De Cuadra v. Swan, 16 C. B. N. S. 772;
Shipton v. Thornton, 9 A. & E. 314;
Abbott's Merchant Shipping, 12th edit. p. 314.

In this case it cannot be said that the master contracted on behalf of the cargo-owners. He never consulted them. There was no necessity to constitute such an agency. By the bills of lading relied upon by the defendants the goods were consigned to the shipowners, and not to the plaintiffs. The defendants are therefore liable, unless protected by the proceedings in the limitation suit. Those proceedings, however, dealt solely with the collision between the Bushire and the Bernina, and had no reference either directly or indirectly to the subsequent loss of the cargo. Sect. 54 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1862, by virtue of which the defendants were allowed to limit their liability, speaks of loss of goods "on board any such ship." That is the Bernina and not the Avebury and the Brixham. Moreover, the very terms of the decree itself limit the damage to damage "caused by reason of the improper navigation of the Bernina in the said collision," and cannot be extended to cover loss caused by reason of the improper navigation of the Avebury and Brixham. It is also to be noticed that sect. 506 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 speaks of the loss or damage "arising on distinct occasions." Here the loss of the plaintiff's cargo arose on distinct occasions from the occasion of the collision. Had the cargo never been transhipped and carried on in the Bernina, and lost or damaged whilst being carried on, how could the defendants have contended that the loss or damage did not arise on a distinct occasion from the occasion of the collision. It is therefore clear that the limitation decree can have no application to the present claim.

Cohen, Q.C. and Gorell Barnes for the defendants.—The state of the Bernina on reaching Lisbon was such that it was the duty of the master, for the benefit of all concerned, to tranship the cargo. The circumstances were such that, in effecting the latter contracts of carriage, the master was acting both on behalf of his owners and also on behalf of the cargo-owners:

Notara v. Henderson (ubi sup.);
De Cuadra v. Swann (ubi sup.);
Shipton v. Thornton (ubi sup.);
Tronson v. Dent, 8 Moo. P. C. C. 419.

If so, the plaintiffs are bound by such contracts, to the making of which they never objected, and they therefore have no right of action against the defendants. It is also submitted that the defendants are protected by the decree in the limitation suit. The words of sect. 54 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1862 are very wide, and should receive a comprehensive construction. The limitation of liability granted the defendants was in respect of all loss or damage consequent on the improper navigation of the Bernina. The present loss of cargo was clearly a consequence of that improper navigation. Had the cargo been directly lost at the time by that improper navigation, the defendants would have been protected, and why should they not have the same protection because subsequently a loss occurs which, but for that improper navigation of the Bernina, never would have occurred.

Sir Walter Phillimore in reply.

Cur. adv. vult.

Dec. 7.—Sir JAMES HANNEN.—This is an action by charterers against shipowners for non-delivery of cargo, though not prevented by any peril excepted by the charter-party. The defendants, in addition to denying their liability in respect of their non-delivery complained of, allege that if any liability attach to them, such liability has been limited to 8*l.* per ton by a decree in a limitation suit of which the plaintiff might have had the benefit, and that therefore the plaintiff is precluded from maintaining this action. The material facts are as follows: The plaintiff chartered the defendant's ship Bernina to proceed to Porman and there load a cargo of iron ore for delivery at Cardiff or Newport as ordered, certain perils excepted, which did not include loss from fault or default of the master and crew of the Bernina. Under this charter the Bernina was loaded with 1700 tons of ore, and proceeded on her voyage to Cardiff. On the 28th Sept. 1884 she came into collision with the Bushire; the result of this collision was that the Bushire with her cargo sank, and fifteen persons on board of her were drowned, and the Bernina was so much damaged that she was compelled to put into Lisbon and discharge her cargo. This collision was occasioned by the fault or default of the master and crew of the Bernina, and the fault or default of the Bushire. The Bernina could not have been repaired at Lisbon so as to carry on the said cargo without so large an expenditure of money as to render it impracticable that such a course should be pursued. In these circumstances the owners of the Bernina determined to tranship the cargo into other bottoms and to bring it to England, and to have only such temporary repairs done to the Bernina in Lisbon as would enable her to come to England in ballast. The plaintiff's cargo was accordingly transhipped into three other steamers bound for Cardiff, viz., the Avebury, the Brixham, and the Curlew. The plaintiff was informed of this transhipment, as to which he expressed neither assent or dissent. The cargo thus transhipped to the three steamers was shipped under bills of lading, which represented the captain of the Bernina as the shipper, and the agents of the owners of the Bernina as consignees, and contained a clause exempting the owners from liability for fault or default of master and crew. The plaintiff was not informed of this exemption. No evidence was offered that these bills of lading were in the customary form in use at Lisbon. Of these three steamers, two, namely, the Avebury and the Brixham, were lost by the fault or default of the master and crew. On the 11th Dec. 1884 the defendants commenced an action in the Admiralty Division against the owners of the Bushire to limit their liability to 8*l.* per ton in respect of the collision between the Bernina and the Bushire. On the 17th March 1885 a decree in the limitation suit was made that "in respect of loss or damage to ship, boats, goods, merchandise, or other things caused by reason of the improper navigation of the said steamship Bernina on the occasion of the said collision," the defendants were answerable in damages to an amount not exceeding 1,437*l.* 15*s.* 2*d.*, such sum being at the rate of 8*l.* per ton. On the 12th June 1885 the plaintiff in the present action came in and appeared in the limitation action. On the 24th June 1885 the present plaintiff gave notice in the limitation action that he withdrew his appearance therein, and on the 17th July he issued his writ in the present action.

I find that the transhipment of the cargo from the Bernina to the three other steamers was justifiable and prudent, and that the cargo was shipped in the three steamers on account of the defendants, and to enable them to earn their freight, and that it was not so shipped on account of the plaintiff. The plaintiff is entitled to recover damages for breach of the contract entered into by the defendants to carry the plaintiff's cargo to its destination, unless the defendants can show that they have been prevented from doing so by any of the excepted perils; and, secondly, unless the proceedings in the limitation suit have deprived the plaintiff of the right to recover for such damage. The collision between the Bernina and the Bushire did not prevent the defendants from performing their contract. The defendants were entitled to tranship the cargo into other vessels as they, in fact, did for the purpose of earning their freight. But if the collision had prevented the defendants from performing their contract, it would not have excused them, as it did not arise from one of the excepted perils, and it was from the default of their servants that the defendants were obliged in their own interest to endeavour to complete the carriage of the cargo in vessels other than the Bernina. In selecting these vessels the defendants exercised their own judgment, and made the masters and crews of the substituted steamers their agents for the purpose of completing their contract with the plaintiff. The defendants were not entitled, as between themselves and the plaintiff, to substitute any other conditions upon which the cargo was to be carried than those which had been agreed upon in the original charter-party and bills of lading of the Bernina, and thus the defendants could not free themselves from their liability under their original contract without showing that the non-delivery of the cargo arose from perils excepted in that contract. It is not necessary to consider what would have been the position of the parties if the Avebury and the Brixham had been lost by perils of the seas, because that is not the existing state of facts. The vessels with the plaintiff's cargo were lost through the fault or default of the defendant's agents, and, therefore, not by one of the perils for which the defendants had agreed that they should not be liable.

This appears to me to reduce the question in the case to the effect of the limitation action. The material provisions in the Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act 1862 are as follows: Sect. 54. "The owners of any ship . . . . shall not, where all or any of the following events occur, without their actual fault or privity, that is to say . . . . (2) where any damage or loss is caused to any goods, merchandise, or other things . . . . on board any such ship . . . . be answerable in respect of . . . . loss or damage to ship, goods, merchandise, or other things, whether there be in addition loss of life or personal injury or not to an aggregate amount exceeding 8*l.* for each ton of the ship's tonnage." And by the principal Act (1854) it is enacted (sect. 506) that the "owner of every seagoing ship . . . . shall be liable in respect of every such . . . . loss of or damage to goods as aforesaid arising on distinct occasions to the same extent as if no other loss, injury, or damage had arisen." By the decree in the limitation suit the judge pronounced that "the owners of the Bernina were entitled to limited liability according to the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Acts 1854 and 1862, and that in respect of loss or damage to ship, boats, goods, merchandise, or other things caused by reason of the improper navigation of the said steamship on the occasion of the collision between that vessel and the steamship Bushire on the 28th Sept. 1884, the owners of the said steamship Bernina are answerable in damages to an amount not exceeding 11,437*l.* 15*s.* 2*d.*, being at the rate of 8*l.* per ton," and the judge further ordered that advertisements should be published, intimating to all persons having any claim in respect of loss or damage to ship, goods, merchandise, or other things, caused as aforesaid, that if they did not come in before the 17th June they should be excluded from sharing in the aforesaid amount. It appears to me that this decree does not apply to the loss in respect of which the present plaintiff claims. His goods were not lost by reason of the improper navigation of the Bernina on the occasion of the collision. The goods were saved from the effects of that collision, and were lost by reason of the improper navigation of the substituted ships, the masters and crews of which were the agents of the defendants. The defendants are not entitled to be put in a better position than if the Bernina had been repaired at Lisbon, and after reshipping the cargo had been lost by subsequent improper navigation. Nor does the case come within the terms of the Act. The damage or loss to this cargo was not caused on board the Bernina in respect of which the liability of the owners was sought to be and was limited, but on board other ships to which the cargo was safely removed from the Bernina. There will be judgment for the plaintiff with costs.

THE WERRA. (a)

Salvage—Amount of award—Ingredients of a salvage service.

The court, in estimating the value of salvage services, takes into consideration the value of the property saved, the risks to which it has been exposed, the perils from which it has been saved, the possibility of other assistance being obtained, the value of the salving ship, the sacrifices and risks incurred by the salvors, and the length of time to which they are exposed to such risks.

In a salvage action the plaintiffs' ship, cargo, and freight being worth 90,000*l.*, and the value of the defendants' ship, cargo, and freight 240,000*l.*, the Court awarded 7000*l.*

THIS was a salvage action, instituted by the owners, master, and crew of the steamship Venetian against the owners of the steamship Werra, her cargo and freight, to recover salvage for services rendered in the Atlantic Ocean from the 31st July, to 7th Aug. 1886.

(a) Reported by J. P. ASPINALL and BUTLER ASPINALL, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

The Venetian was a steamship of 2733 tons net, and at the time of services was in the Atlantic Ocean, lat. 44° N. and long. 47° 57′ W. on a voyage from Liverpool to Boston. She had a general cargo on board, sixteen cattlemen and seven stowaways, and was manned by a crew of fifty-five hands all told. At about 4.30 p.m. on the 31st July 1886, those on board the Venetian observed a four-masted steamship (which proved to be the Werra) seven or eight miles off on the port bow and under all plain sail. The Venetian bore down upon the Werra, and when within three or four miles of her it was seen by her signals that she had broken her shaft and was in want of assistance.

She also had three black balls hoisted on her forestay, meaning that she was unmanageable.

On the Venetian approaching the Werra a boat came off from the Werra asking to be towed to New York. The master of the Venetian having agreed to tow her to Boston the Venetian was manœuvred close to the Werra, and after some difficulty the Venetian made fast ahead. At about 7 p.m. towing commenced on a W.-½-S. course. At about 10 p.m. a fog set in, causing danger to both vessels. At about 4 a.m. on the 1st Aug. the course was changed to N.W. by W.-½-W., and towing was continued through passing banks of mist and fog till about 11.15 a.m. on the 3rd Aug., when the starboard wire hawser parted, and as there was a heavy sea running, there was great danger and difficulty in getting another hawser made fast. At 12.30 p.m. towing was recommenced. Very heavy weather was experienced during the 3rd and 4th Aug., and on the morning of the 6th a dense fog came on. At about 8 p.m. on the 6th Cape Cod bore S. by W.-½-W. distant about twenty miles, and preparations were made to cross the bar on the morning tide. Owing, however, to a fog, it was found impossible to do so till the afternoon, and at about 9 p.m. the Werra was anchored in safety in the port of Boston.

The Werra was a four-masted steamer of 2856 tons net, belonging to the North German Lloyd Steamship Company, and was at the time of the services on a voyage from Bremen to New York.

She was manned by a crew of 175 hands all told, and she carried 544 passengers and English and German mails. She had broken down on the 30th July, and when picked up was in the track of ice. The distance towed was about 1000 miles.

The value of the Venetian was 70,000*l.*; of her cargo 20,166*l.*; and of her freight 1103*l.*

There was a dispute as to the value of the Werra. Upon the defendants' affidavits of values their agent in England swore that she had been valued for the purposes of general average in New York at 104,000*l.*; and he was of opinion that was her true value. The plaintiffs refused to accept this valuation and got an order for appraisement, but it was ultimately arranged that the question of value should be settled by the judge at the hearing, it having been sworn in another affidavit by the defendants' agent that she had been valued in the company's books at the beginning of the year at 140,000*l.*

Her value was in fact settled by the judge at 125,000*l.* The value of her cargo was 114,145*l.* 17*s.* 6*d.*; and of her freight 1364*l.* 18*s.* 7*d.*

Myburgh, Q.C. and Dr. Raikes for the defendants.

Sir JAMES HANNEN.—The magnitude of the values at stake, and the fact that an important foreign company is interested in the matter, make it desirable that I should state at somewhat greater length than I usually think it necessary to do the principles on which the court acts in awarding salvage remuneration. The first thing to be considered is the value of the property saved. By that I do not mean that it is to be taken as absolutely the most important element but that it is the subject-matter in respect o which the action arises. It is the fund which has to be dealt with and divided between its owners and the salvors who have acquired a claim upon it. In the present case I have somewhat to conjecture the value of the Werra. She has been valued in the United States at 104,000*l.*, but I think that that estimate is too low. On the other hand, her value has been estimated by her owners at the beginning of this year at 140,000*l.*, but I think that is too high an estimate. The tendency would be to put the company's property upon their books at the highest figure; but it is a matter of common knowledge that there has recently been a great depreciation in the value of shipping. I think I am making a very liberal allowance by way of discount from the value in the company's book by taking her price for this purpose at 125,000*l.* There is no dispute about the cargo or freight, and the passengers' fares were prepaid and not at risk. Therefore the total value of the property saved is about 240,500*l.* The next question is as to the actual perils from which the Werra has been saved. It appears to me and my assessors that she was not saved from actual imminent risk. She had lost her propelling power, which I have often had occasion to say reduces a steamship to such a condition of impotence that to rescue her from that situation is in itself a service that is the subject of salvage award. The Werra had some sailing powers, but I am advised that she could not have reached her destination by that means alone. On the other hand, it is possible, nay probable, that she might have been able to reach the coast of Europe if her master had determined to abandon the voyage on which the ship had started. But having regard to the fact that the Werra had between 400 or 500 passengers on board, the captain only did his duty towards his owners in determining to prosecute the voyage by any means he could get, and he in fact exercised a very wise discretion in accepting the assistance which offered. I think it is shown that there was no risk of starvation or even of hardships to the passengers and crew, because it is shown that there were forty days provisions on board, as well as a cargo which would have yielded food for a very long time. She was therefore not saved from imminent danger. But she was exposed to two kinds of risk until she fell in with the Venetian, risks arising from fog and ice. She no doubt ran a risk of coming in contact with other vessels during the fog and also with icebergs. I am advised that at that season of the year, although icebergs are occasionally met with, yet it would be rather the exception than the rule to fall in with them. Still it was a danger which cannot be disregarded. She therefore was saved from the costly and disadvantageous course of retracing her way to Europe, and from risks of fog and icebergs. It does not appear that she saw any other vessel till some time after the Venetian fell in with her. That might of course be the consequence of the fog. It is alleged on the one hand that the Werra could easily have been picked up, and on the other, that she would have had to pay salvage services to another vessel. The latter observation is true, but the probability of another vessel being obtained tends to depreciate the salvage remuneration. If two masters were bargaining as to payment for salvage services and one were to say, "You are in a dangerous position and not likely to be picked up," the other might well answer, "Not at all, I am in the track of vessels, and if you refuse to assist me for a moderate price, I shall soon fall in with somebody else who will." That would have the effect of inducing reasonable terms, and it is a circumstance which the court must take into consideration.

Having dealt with the risks to the Werra, I now turn to the sacrifices and risks the Venetian incurred in rendering these services. Her value is to be taken into consideration, though it does not largely increase the amount of the reward, and that only in so far as it exposes the owner of the salving ship to risk of greater loss. It is also said that the Venetian was detained three days on her voyage, and that this detention should be paid for by way of demurrage. She was, however, able to reach Boston in time to fulfil her contracts, and to sail on the regular day; so that in this case I see little ground for taking detention into consideration. It is further said that some part of the life of her machinery was, so to say, sacrificed, but it is a small matter scarcely worth dwelling on. However, the Venetian was exposed to risks of navigation from fogs and icebergs for a longer time in consequence of these services, and under circumstances of great difficulty which would make it more likely for her to incur disaster. Then she towed the Werra for the very long distance of 1000 miles, and during the towage there was some heavy weather, amounting on one occasion to a moderate gale, but for the most part there were no exceptionally dangerous circumstances. Her rate of speed during the services goes far to show that she was able to maintain an average speed throughout, which her captain says he kept up because of the pressing necessity of getting the Werra into a place of safety; and undoubtedly, having regard to the fact that there were a large number of passengers on board the Werra, it was the duty of the master, and also in the interest of the owners, that these passengers should arrive at their destination as soon as possible. This is certainly a case in which the remuneration should be of a liberal kind, and I have not forgotten how desirable it is that shipowners should encourage their captains to render services to vessels in distress. I have very fully taken into consideration the circumstances of this case, and I shall award 7000*l.* I apportion 5250*l.* to the owners; 583*l.* to the master, and 1167*l.* to the crew.

THE ANNIE. (a)

Life salvage—Vessel sunk in collision—Raising of wreck—Expenses of raising—Merchant Shipping Act 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104), s. 459—Thames Conservancy Act 1857 (20 & 21 Vict. c. cxlvii.), s. 86.

Where a conservancy authority, in pursuance of their powers under an Act of Parliament, raise a sunken ship and sell her to defray the expenses of raising her, their lien upon the ship and its proceeds takes priority of any claim to life salvage, and if the proceeds are less than the expenses, there being no property saved against which life salvage can attach, life salvors cannot recover either against the sunken ship or against the owners, notwithstanding the fact that the owners have recovered from the wrongdoers causing the sinking of their ship the amount of the loss that they have sustained.

The A. was sunk in a collision in the Thames solely through the negligence of the R. Some of her crew were saved by the S. The A. was subsequently raised by the Thames Conservancy, and sold by them to defray the expenses. The proceeds being insufficient, the deficiency was recovered from the owners of the A., who in their turn recovered it, and the value of the A., from the owners of the R. The S. now claimed life salvage against the owners of the A., but did not arrest the A. or demand bail.

Held, that the A. had not been saved, and that there was no property to which the claim for life salvage could attach, notwithstanding the fact that the defendants had recovered the value of their vessel.

THIS was a salvage action, instituted in the City of London Court by the owners, master, and crew of the steam-tug Stormcock, against the owners of the schooner Annie. The plaintiffs claimed life salvage for saving the lives of the pilot and one of the crew of the Annie, and of a Custom House officer on board the Annie at the time the services were rendered.

At the hearing before the City of London Court the following facts were proved:—At about 10 p.m. on Jan. 16, 1886, the Stormcock, a screw-tug of 60-horse power, was proceeding down the river Thames when those on board of her observed a collision between the steamship Recepta and the schooner Annie off the entrance to the Victoria Docks. The plaintiffs, fearing that the Annie was in danger of sinking, at once stopped their engines and launched their lifeboat.

On coming up to the Annie it was found that she was rapidly sinking. Cries for help were heard, and ultimately the pilot of the Annie was picked up out of the water, and one of the crew and a Custom House officer were taken off the rigging. The men were then taken on board the Stormcock, and were landed next morning at Gravesend.

The services were rendered in fine weather.

In consequence of the collision the Annie sank, and in an action by her owners against the owners of the Recepta the Recepta was found solely to blame, and the owners of the Annie recovered the damages sustained by them by reason of the collision. The Annie was subsequently raised by the Thames Conservators. The expense of raising the vessel amounted to 149*l*. She was then sold by the Conservators under the provisions of the Act 20 & 21 Vict. c. cxlvii., to defray the expenses of the raising, and realised 92*l*. The Conservators recovered the balance from the owners of the Annie. At the reference in the collision action against the Recepta the owners of the Annie recovered not only the value of their ship, but also the money paid by them to the Thames Conservators for raising the ship. The present action was entitled as an action in rem, but as a matter of fact the writ had never been served on the wreck, nor had she been arrested. It also appeared that no bail had been given, and that no money had been paid into court in lieu of bail.

In these circumstances, the learned judge of the City of London Court valued the plaintiffs' services at 30*l*., but refused to give judgment, and ordered the action to be transferred to the High Court.

The action was thereupon transferred to the High Court, and the plaintiffs now moved for judgment.

For the purposes of the motion, the following agreed statement of facts was used:

1. The Annie was run into and sunk by the steamship Recepta in about midstream of Bugsby's Reach of the river Thames.

2. The steam-tug Stormcock, and her master and crew, rescued some of the crew of the Annie, viz. the pilot, one A. B., and a Custom House officer.

3. The owners of the Annie commenced an action against the Recepta for the damages they incurred in consequence of the sinking of their vessel. The Recepta was held solely to blame for the collision, and the plaintiffs recovered the full value of their ship and cargo.

4. The Annie and her cargo of stone were abandoned and treated as a total loss by the owners thereof.

5. The wreck was subsequently, without communication with or with the consent of the owners of the Annie, raised by the Thames Conservancy at an expense of 149*l*. 4*s*. 9*d*.; and was sold by them for the sum of 92*l*. 5*s*. 2*d*, the balance being paid by the owners of the Annie at the request of the Thames Conservancy, and subsequently recovered by the said owners from the owners of the Recepta in the aforesaid action. The Thames Conservancy, in acting as herein stated, acted in pursuance of their statutory powers.

6. The owners, master, and crew of the Stormcock brought an action against the Annie to recover salvage remuneration in respect of the services they had rendered as aforesaid.

7. The said action for life salvage came on for hearing before the judge of the City of London Court (Admiralty jurisdiction) on the 11th Nov. 1886, and having, with a view of saving expense to the parties, taken evidence as to the nature of the said services, he referred the action to the High Court with a statement that in his opinion, if the plaintiffs were entitled to recover at all, the amount of salvage remuneration should be 30*l*.

Dr. Raikes for the plaintiffs.—The defendants are liable to pay salvage. The fact that the ship has not been arrested is immaterial. The Annie, or her equivalent, has been saved, and therefore the plaintiffs are entitled to be paid salvage:

The Hope, 3 C. Rob. 215;
The Trelawney, 3 C. Rob. 216, n.;

It cannot be said that the Annie has been "destroyed" within the meaning of sect. 459 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854. Moreover the defendants are in the same position as if the Annie had never been sunk. They have recovered her value from the owners of the Recepta, and hold such sum of money subject to the plaintiffs' claim for life salvage. It was never intended that sect. 459 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 should bar such a claim as this. The mere loss of the res, provided it is replaced by an equivalent compensation for its loss, cannot take away the right to life salvage. The amount recovered by the defendants from the Recepta is held by them subject to the present claim:

The Empusa, 41 L. T. Rep. N. S. 383; 5 P. Div. 6; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 185.

Pyke, for the defendants, after citing The Cargo ex Schiller (36 L. T. Rep. N. S. 714; 2 P. Div. 145; 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 439), was stopped by the Court.

Sir JAMES HANNEN.—I have no doubt in deciding this case against the plaintiffs. In my opinion, to found a claim for life salvage there must be something saved to which the claim can attach. In the present case the Annie was not saved, and yet a claim is made against her owners for life salvage. It is true that the present defendants did recover damages from the Recepta in respect of the total loss of their vessel, but to that sum of money a claim for life salvage cannot attach. Now sect 459 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 provides as follows: "Salvage in respect of the preservation of the life or lives of any person or persons belonging to any such ship as aforesaid, shall be payable by the owners of the ship or boat in priority to all other claims for salvage; and in cases where such ship or boat is destroyed, or where the value thereof is insufficient, after payment of the actual expenses incurred, to pay the amount of the salvage due in respect of any life or lives, the Board of Trade may in its discretion award to the salvors of such life or lives out of the Mercantile Marine Fund such sum or sums as it deems fit in whole or in part satisfaction of any amount of salvage so left unpaid in respect of such life or lives." In this case, the Annie being at the bottom of the river, the Thames Conservancy, in fulfilment of a public duty, raised her as being an obstruction to the navigation of the river. They were also entitled under their Act to sell the raised property and to recover any expenses they had incurred over and above the proceeds of the sale of the wreck from her owners. The owners of the Annie had to pay a balance to the Thames Conservancy, and this they recovered from the owners of the Recepta as part of their damages occasioned by the collision. But that is a totally different transaction from the saving of property by salvors. I am clearly of opinion that the present plaintiffs have no rights as against the Thames Conservators, and I think that the rights of the Conservators have priority over the rights of all other persons. The section I have read refers only to salvage claims, and does not entitle life salvors to any priority over the charge created in favour of the Conservancy. I therefore think the plaintiffs' claim entirely fails, and it must be dismissed with costs.

THE AGNES OTTO. (a)

Collision—Compulsory pilotage—Regulations for the navigation of the Lower Danube, arts 85, 89, and 92.

The provisions of arts. 85, 89, and 92 of the regulations for the navigation of the Lower Danube, making the employment of pilots by steamers compulsory but confining their duties to pointing out the local peculiarities of the river and leaving the responsibility of the navigation with the master, do not relieve shipowners from liability for damage solely caused by the negligent navigation of the pilot.

THIS was a collision action, instituted by the owners of the steamship Fitzjames against the owners of the steamship Agnes Otto, to recover damages occasioned by a collision between the two vessels in the Danube, below Galatz, on May 12, 1886. The defendants counter-claimed.

The Fitzjames was proceeding up the river, and was approaching the 86th mile post, where there is a very sharp bend in the river, near which the collision occurred.

The Agnes Otto was coming down the river and was above the bend when those on board of her sighted the Fitzjames below the point.

The evidence showed that it was the practice for vessels coming down the river to slacken speed as they approached the point, but, as they got to the point, to put their engines full speed ahead to give them sufficient way to answer their helms in rounding the point.

The facts alleged on behalf of the plaintiffs were as follows:—Shortly before 9.15 p.m. on May 12, 1886, the steamship Fitzjames, of 865 tons net, in charge of a duly licensed pilot, was proceeding up the Danube between Reani and Galatz in ballast on a voyage from Constantinople to Galatz. The Fitzjames was well over to the bank of the river on her starboard side, and was making about five or six knots an hour over the ground. In these circumstances those on board of her observed over the land at a distance of about two miles the red and masthead lights of the Agnes Otto bearing about four or five points on the starboard bow of the Fitzjames. The engines of the Fitzjames were immediately eased to half speed and shortly afterwards to slow, and her whistle was duly sounded and she was kept well over to the bank of the river on her starboard side under a steady a-port helm stemming the current and waiting for the Agnes Otto to round the bend in the river before passing her. The Agnes Otto came on at great speed with her red light open rounding the bend of the river under a starboard helm, and after opening her green light and showing all three lights for a very short time on the port bow of the Fitzjames, she again shut in her green light and approached with her red and masthead lights only visible to those on board the Fitzjames, but suddenly she opened her green light and shut in her red, as if under a starboard helm, coming across towards that bank of the river which lay on the Fitzjames starboard side, and attempting to cross the bows of the Fitzjames so as to cause danger of collision. The whistle of the Fitzjames was repeatedly blown, and when the green and masthead lights of the Agnes Otto had got a little on the starboard bow as the only means of avoiding a collision, the helm of the Fitzjames was put hard-a-starboard and her engines full speed ahead, but the Agnes Otto again opened her red light, and coming on with her stem and starboard bow struck the Fitzjames on the starboard side, thereby doing her great damage.

The facts alleged on behalf of the defendants were as follows:—Shortly before 9.30 p.m. on May 12, 1886, the Agnes Otto, a steamship of 1319 tons gross, whilst on a voyage from Ibrail to Cork laden with grain, was proceeding down the Danube in charge of a duly licensed pilot, keeping that side of the channel which was on her own starboard hand. In these circumstances the masthead light of the Fitzjames was seen across the land distant between one and two miles, and bearing about four to five points on the port bow of the Agnes Otto. When the Agnes Otto had cleared the point the red light of the Fitzjames came into view, and the whistle of the Agnes Otto was blown, and her engines were eased down to easy ahead, and her helm was ported so as to pass the Fitzjames well clear port side to port side, but the Fitzjames, when at a short distance, suddenly opened her green light, causing danger of collision, and although the engines of the Agnes Otto were reversed full speed astern and her helm put hard-a-port, the Fitzjames came on and with her starboard side struck the stem of the Agnes Otto.

Both vessels pleaded (inter alia) compulsory pilotage.

The following regulations for the navigation of the Lower Danube were cited and are material to the decision:

Art. 85. In the case of steamers, pilotage is compulsory both in ascending and descending the river.

Art. 89. The captain who has taken a licensed river pilot on board is none the less responsible for the observance of the regulations of navigation and police in force upon the Lower Danube, and especially arts. 30 and 44 of the present regulations, and this even where pilotage is compulsory.

Art. 92. The responsibility of the pilot is confined to pointing out the navigable channels and the peculiarities of the navigation of the river; a captain, therefore, who abandons the direction of his vessel to his pilot does so on his own responsibility.

Sir Walter Phillimore (with him Barnes), for the plaintiffs, argued that on the merits the Agnes Otto was solely to blame, and that if the navigation of the Fitzjames was negligent, the negligence was solely that of the pilot, who was in charge by compulsion of law. He referred to

The Guy Mannering, 46 L. T. Rep. N.S. 905; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 553; 7 P. Div. 132;
The Augusta, 56 L. T. Rep. N. S. 58; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 58.

Hall Q.C. (with him J. P. Aspinall), for the defendants, contra.

BUTT, J.—In this case I have come to the conclusion that the green light of the Agnes Otto was not only open to those on board the Fitzjames, but was kept open until it got on the starboard bow of the Fitzjames so as to justify her in starboarding. This state of things ought never to have occurred had the Agnes Otto been carefully and properly navigated. I also accept the plaintiffs' evidence to the effect that, after the vessels had been brought starboard to starboard as I have mentioned, the Agnes Otto counteracted the effect of this manœuvre by porting, and so the collision was brought about. I have now to consider the question whether the Fitzjames was not also to blame for not stopping her engines when the green light of the Agnes Otto was first opened on the second occasion she got on her port bow. It is very true that in these local regulations there is none corresponding to that in the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, which provides for slackening of speed when vessels are approaching so as to involve risk of collision; and even if there were any such rule the penalty imposed by sect. 17 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1873 would not apply to it. But the Elder Brethren advise me that they think ordinary prudence should in the circumstances have dictated the stopping of the engines, and that those in charge of the Fitzjames were to blame for not doing so. The result is, though I regret it, because I think the other ship was the main offender, that I must hold the navigation of the Fitzjames to have been negligent.

Then comes the question of pilotage. The owners of both vessels have claimed exemption from liability on the ground that they were in charge of pilots by compulsion of law. In one sense pilotage is no doubt compulsory in the Danube; but the question is, whether it is compulsory on the master to give up the charge of his ship to the pilot. Rule 85 says that "in the case of steamers pilotage is compulsory both in ascending and descending the river." If there had been no other rule I should have interpreted it as meaning that the pilotage was compulsory as we understand it in England, viz., that it was compulsory to give up the charge of the vessel to the pilot. But I find by rule 89 that a captain who has taken a pilot on board is none the less responsible for the observance of the regulations for the navigation of the Danube; and by rule 92 the responsibility of the pilot is confined to pointing out the navigable channels and the peculiarities of the navigation of the river, and the captain who abandons the direction of the vessel to the pilot does so on his own responsibility. Apart, therefore, from any decisions of the courts on cases analogous to this, I should have thought that the true construction of these rules was, that the master of a vessel navigating the Danube is compelled to take a pilot on his vessel, but is not compelled to give up the navigation of the ship to him. The pilot is on board to point out the peculiarities of the navigation, but the responsibility rests with the captain. If so, it cannot be said that the law forces on masters in the Danube the employment of pilots to navigate their vessels for them. That is the view I take apart from authority, and the decisions in The Guy Mannering (ubi sup.) and The Augusta (ubi sup.) confirm me in that view. I must therefore hold that neither of these vessels was in charge of a pilot by compulsion of law, and the result is, that I pronounce both of them to blame.

THE VICTORIA. (a)

Damage to cargo—Collision—"Damage done by any ship"—Action in rem—The Admiralty Court Act 1861 (24 Vict. c. 10), ss, 6, 7.

The jurisdiction conferred by sect. 7 of the Admiralty Court Act 1861 "over any claim for damage done by any ship" does not cover a claim by a cargo-owner against the ship carrying the cargo for damage received by the cargo in a collision.

THIS was a motion by the defendants in a damage action in rem against the steamship Victoria to "set aside the writ of summons and warrant of arrest, and to dismiss the action with costs."

The facts upon which the defendants moved the court were contained in the following affidavit, which was filed on behalf of the defendants.

I, William Arnold, of Nos. 4 and 6, Throgmorton-avenue, in the City of London, a member of the firm of Wendt and Co. of the same place, underwriters' representative, makes oath and say as follows:

1. My said firm are the representatives in England of the owners of the steamship Victoria for the purposes of this action.

2. This action is brought in the names of "owners of cargo lately laden on board the steamship Victoria" to recover 6500*l.* for damages done to the said cargo by a collision between the steamship Cerwin and the steamship Victoria in the Mediterranean, on the 4th Nov. 1885.

3. The Victoria is a Swedish steamship of 1045 tons register, and is now at Newport, Monmouthshire. The plaintiffs have arrested her, and she still remains under arrest, and my said firm has received telegraphic instructions to obtain her immediate release.

4. At the time of the collision between the Cerwin and the Victoria the Victoria, laden with a cargo of sugar, was on a voyage under charter-party, by which she was bound from Sourabaya to Malta for orders. The collision between the above vessels occurred in the Mediterranean Sea on the 4th Nov. 1885, and I am informed and believe that the Victoria received damage thereby.

5. The Victoria proceeded to Malta, and there received orders from the charterers to proceed to Havre and there deliver her cargo. The Victoria having undergone necessary repairs, proceeded, as I am informed and verily believe, to the port of Havre, where she discharged her cargo, and delivered it to the owners of the bills of lading.

6. The general average statement relating to the damages, consequent upon the collision as between the owners of the Victoria and her cargo was, as I am informed and believe, made up at Havre and accepted by the owners of the cargo.

7. I am informed, and believe that no part of the cargo of the Victoria laden on board her at the time of the collision was brought into any port in England or Wales by the Victoria, but that such cargo was delivered at the port of Havre aforesaid.

The following sections of the Admiralty Court Act 1861 were referred to, and are material to the decision:

Sect. 6. The High Court of Admiralty shall have jurisdiction over any claim by the owner or consignee or assignee of any bill of lading of any goods carried into any port in England or Wales in any ship, for damage done to the goods or any part thereof, by the negligence or misconduct of or for any breach of duty or breach of contract on the part of the owner, master, or crew of the ship, unless it is shown to the satisfaction of the court that at the time of the institution of the cause any owner or part owner of the ship is domiciled in England or Wales.

Sect. 7. The High Court of Admiralty shall have jurisdiction over any claim for damage done by any ship.

Finlay, Q.C. (with him Dr. Stubbs), for the defendants, in support of the motion.—The court has no jurisdiction in rem in the present case. [He was stopped by the Court.]

Barnes, for the plaintiff, contra.—The plaintiffs have not instituted their action under sect. 6 of the Admiralty Court Act 1861, but are suing in tort under sect. 7. By the terms of that section the court has "jurisdiction over any claim for damage done by any ship." The word "damage" has a technical meaning, and covers the damage done to the plaintiff's cargo in the present case. In the case of The Malvina (Br. & L. 57), it was laid down that the widest construction is to be put upon this section. [BUTT, J.—It is not your carrying ship which does the damage. It is the other ship. Your ship suffers damage.] It was owing to the negligent navigation of the carrying ship that the damage was done to the cargo. Just as she damaged the other ship's cargo, so she damaged her own cargo. It would be illogical to say that, under this section, the owners of cargo on the other ship have a right against the Victoria, and the owners of her cargo have not. It was the same negligence which did damage to both cargoes. To found a right of action under this section, it is not necessary that the vessel sued should have been in contact with the other ship:

The Energy, L. Rep. 3 A. & E. 48; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 503; 23 L. T. Rep. N. S. 601;
The Sisters, 1 P. Div. 117; 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 122; 34 L. T. Rep. N. S. 338.

[BUTT, J.—If your argument is right, sect. 6 is practically useless, because a goods owner might always sue in tort, whether the goods were carried into an English port in the ship or not.] That section deals with contract, whereas sect. 7 deals with tort. [BUTT, J. referred to The Dantzig, 1 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 392; 9 L. T. Rep. N. S. 236.]

BUTT, J.—I am of opinion that this is an attempt to extend the jurisdiction in rem of this court to an extent not warranted by the words or the intention of the Act of Parliament. It appears clear to me that the damage alleged to have been done to this cargo was not damage done by a ship within the meaning of the Act. I shall therefore make an order in the terms of the motion.

Barnes applied that the order might be stayed till the day following, to enable his clients to determine whether they would take the question to the Court of Appeal.

BUTT, J.—As I have no doubt at all about the matter, I cannot accede to your application.

THE J. H. HENKES. (a)

Collision—Practice—Plea of compulsory pilotage—Discontinuance of action—Costs.

Where in a collision action the plaintiffs, upon the defendants pleading compulsory pilotage, discontinue the action, they must in the absence of special circumstances pay all the costs.

THIS was a summons before the judge by way of appeal, by the plaintiffs in a collision action in rem, from an order of the registrar condemning them in the costs of the action.

The collision occurred on the 4th Dec. 1886 in the English Channel, between the schooner Mary Capper and the defendants' steamship the J. H. Henkes.

After the statement of claim had been delivered, the defendants delivered a defence, in which it was admitted that there was no negligence on the part of the plaintiffs' vessel, but it was alleged that the J. H. Henkes was at the time of the collision in charge of a pilot by compulsion of law, and that it was his default which solely occasioned the collision.

The plaintiffs thereupon at once took out a summons asking that the action might be discontinued on the terms of each party paying their own costs. The registrar made an order discontinuing the action but condemned the plaintiffs in all the costs of the action. From this order the plaintiffs now appealed.

The summons was heard in chambers before Butt, J.

J. P. Aspinall, for the plaintiffs, contended that, in the circumstances, the plaintiffs were justified in instituting the action, and that, had the plaintiffs prosecuted the action and the defendants succeeded on the plea of compulsory pilotage, it was the practice of the court to make each party pay their own costs.

J. G. Barnes, for the defendants, contended that the ordinary practice of the other divisions should be followed, and that the practice of the Admiralty Court in cases of compulsory pilotage could not be followed, because the action having been discontinued there were no materials to guide the judge's discretion.

Cur. adv. vult.

Feb. 8.—BUTT, J. gave the following judgment in court:—This was an action of damage, and on the defendants pleading (1) no negligence of the owner, master, or crew; (2) compulsory pilotage and the fault of the pilot alone, the plaintiffs applied in the registry to discontinue their action. But the registrar would only allow them to do so on their paying all the costs of the action. I have now to decide the question raised by the summons on behalf of the plaintiffs to review the registrar's decision as to costs. The Admiralty Court is now merged in a division of the High Court, and it is therefore desirable, so far as is possible, that the practice in this division should be the same as in the other divisions. Although there is no doubt that damage was done to the plaintiffs' ship, though it may have been reasonable to bring the action, and although the defence of compulsory pilotage may have taken the plaintiffs by surprise, yet the ordinary rule is that, when a party loses, he must pay the costs. No doubt, when the defendants after an action has been tried have succeeded on the ground of compulsory pilotage, the court in the exercise of its discretion has been in the habit of making each side pay their own costs. But this judicial discretion can only be properly exercised after the facts of the case have been ascertained at the trial of the action. If, however, a plaintiff elects to discontinue his action before trial, there are no materials by which the judge's discretion can be guided. Therefore, as the plaintiffs have brought an action and have failed to carry it to a hearing, the ordinary rule must be applied, and they must pay the defendants' costs.

BAKER v. OWNERS OF THE THEODORE H. RAND. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF APPEAL IN ENGLAND.

Collision—Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, arts. 14 and 22—Merchant Shipping Act 1873 (36 & 37 Vict. c. 85), s. 17.

Where those in charge of a ship, although exercising reasonable care, do not in fact know, and have not the means of knowing, that they are infringing one of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, the ship will not be held in fault under sect. 17 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1873 (36 & 37 Vict. c. 85).

The T., a sailing ship, close-hauled on the port tack, in dark and hazy weather, saw the red light of the S., another sailing ship, on the starboard bow. The S. was in fact running free, but those navigating the T. believed her to be close-hauled on the starboard tack, and ported their helm. A collision took place, and the S. was lost.

Held (affirming the judgment of the court below), that, in the absence of sufficient evidence to show that by the exercise of any reasonable care and diligence on the part of the T. it could have been ascertained that the S. was running free and was not close-hauled, the T. was not to be deemed in fault, though she had in fact infringed art. 22 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea by not keeping her course.

Observations of Brett, M.R. in The Beryl (51 L. T. Rep. N. S. 554; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 321; 9 P. Div. 137) approved.

THIS was an appeal from a judgment of the Court of Appeal (Baggallay, L.J., Sir J. Hannen, and Lindley, L.J.), who had reversed a judgment of Butt, J. in an action in rem brought by the appellants, the owners of the brigantine Statesman, against the respondents, the owners of the ship Theodore H. Rand, for damages arising out of a collision by which the Statesman was lost. There was a counter-claim by the owners of the Theodore H. Rand for damages. The facts are set out fully in the judgment of Lord Herschell.

Sir R. Webster, Q.C., C. Hall, Q.C., and Stubbs appeared for the appellant, the plaintiff.

Finlay, Q.C. and Baden Powell (Sir W. Phillimore with them) for the respondents.

At the conclusion of the arguments their Lordships took time to consider their judgment.

Feb. 14.—Their Lordships gave judgment as follows:—

Lord HERSCHELL. (a)—My Lords: The appellants in this case, who are the plaintiffs in the action, were the owners of the Statesman, a brigantine of 150 tons register, which was sunk whilst on a voyage from South Shields to the Isle of Wight, owing to a collision with the respondents' vessel, a full-rigged ship of 1198 tons register, called the Theodore H. Rand. The collision took place between 4 and 5 a.m. on the morning of the 3rd Feb. 1884, about five miles to the S.W. by S. of Beachy Head. All the crew of the Statesman, except one man, who was below at the time of the collision, were drowned. It was therefore impossible to call any witness from that vessel to speak to her manœuvres prior to the disaster. The master, mate, and several of the crew of the Theodore H. Rand were called as witnesses. Their story was as follows: That the Theodore H. Rand was close-hauled on the port tack heading E., the wind being light from the N.N.E. That the weather was dark and hazy. That the red light of the Statesman was seen about half a point or a point on the starboard bow of the Theodore H. Rand, about half to three-quarters of a mile distant. That the red light was watched, and as it kept open the helm of the Theodore H. Rand was for a short time put hard-aport. That this brought the Statesman's red light about two points on the port bow of the other vessel. That the green light of the Statesman was then seen, and almost immediately afterwards the collision occurred, the stern of the Statesman coming into contact with the port bow of the Theodore H. Rand. Upon the trial before Butt, J. he pronounced the Theodore H. Rand alone to blame. This judgment was reversed by the Court of Appeal, who were of opinion that there was no sufficient evidence to establish blame on the part of either vessel. The most important question argued before your Lordships was, whether those navigating the Theodore H. Rand had infringed any of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, and must therefore be held to blame. It was contended that they had infringed articles 14 and 22. (b) The Statesman, it was said, was running free whilst the Theodore H. Rand was close-hauled; it was therefore the duty of the Statesman to keep out of the way of the Theodore H. Rand, and the duty of the latter vessel to keep her course, and as she admittedly had not done so, but ported, she must be held to be in fault. There was no question that the Theodore H. Rand was close-hauled, but there was some controversy at the bar on the part of the respondents whether the Statesman was running free. The Court of Admiralty and the Court of Appeal both came to the conclusion that she was running free, and I see no reason to think that their conclusion was incorrect. This being so, there can be no doubt that the Theodore H. Rand did, in point of fact, fail to obey the rule. The appellants contend that this is enough to establish her liability, and that it matters not whether those who were navigating her knew or had the means of knowing that they were infringing the rule. I am of opinion that this view cannot be supported. In the case of The Beryl (51 L. T. Rep. N. S. 554; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 321; 9 P. Div. 137) Brett, M.R. uses the following language in relation to the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea: "When you speak of rules which are to regulate the conduct of people, those rules can only apply to circumstances which must or ought to be known to the parties at the time; you cannot regulate the conduct of people as to unknown circumstances. When you instruct people, you instruct them as to what they ought to do under circumstances which are or ought to be before them. When you say that a man must stop and reverse, or, I will say, slacken his speed in order to prevent risk of collision, it would be absurd to suppose that it would depend upon the mere fact that there was risk of collision if the circumstances were such that he could not know there was risk of collision. I put some instances during the argument to show that that was so. . . . How can you regulate their conduct if neither can see the other until they are close together? It is absurd to suppose that you could regulate their conduct not with regard to what they can see, but to what they cannot see. Therefore the consideration must always be, in these cases, not whether the rule was in fact applicable, but were the circumstances such that it ought to have been present to the minds of the person in charge that it was applicable." I entirely concur in the view thus expressed, and adopt the language of the learned judge.

The next question that arises is whether those in charge of the Theodore H. Rand ought to have known that the Statesman was running free, or, in other words, whether they could, with ordinary skill and by the exercise of reasonable care, have ascertained what the fact was. Upon this, the courts below have differed in their conclusions. The question is, of course, most material, for the allegation on the part of those navigating the Theodore H. Rand is, that they believed the other vessel to be close-hauled, and therefore ported, whereas, if she was not only in fact running free, but could have been ascertained by them to be so, there can be no doubt as to their default. Butt, J. (and I gather that the Trinity Masters agreed with him) was of opinion that the officers of the Theodore H. Rand might and ought to have seen that the Statesman was not close-hauled. The Court of Appeal took a different view, and were advised by the nautical gentlemen who assisted them that there was not sufficient evidence to show that, by the exercise of any reasonable care and diligence on the part of the Theodore H. Rand, it could have been ascertained that the Statesman was running free, and was not close-hauled. We are invited to adopt the view taken by the learned judge and his assessors in the Admiralty Court, and reject that taken by the Court of Appeal It is, of course, not sufficient for the appellants to establish, even if they could do so, that it might have been discovered by extraordinary care or skill that the Statesman was not close-hauled; it is incumbent upon them to prove that a competent seaman exercising reasonable care would have discovered it. Now, upon a review of the facts deposed to in evidence, the skilled nautical assessors who assisted the Court of Appeal have come to a conclusion on this point adverse to the appellants. I think it would be a strong measure in the face of this opinion for your Lordships to hold that those in charge of the Theodore H. Rand exhibited in this respect a want of reasonable care or skill. And I am not satisfied that they did so. [His Lordship then discussed the question of whether there was evidence that the Theodore H. Rand had been negligently navigated in other respects, and concluded as follows:] Under these circumstances I am not prepared to advise your Lordships to reverse the judgment of the Court of Appeal, and pronounce the respondents to blame on the ground that the chief officer of their vessel was guilty of the negligence imputed to him. Although I feel the weight of the appellants' argument, I do not think the facts upon which it must rest have been so clearly established that it would be safe to found a judgment against the respondents on the case now set up. Upon the whole, therefore, I move that the judgment appealed from be affirmed, and the appealed dismissed with costs.

Lord BRAMWELL.—My Lords: I have been favoured with a copy of the opinion of my noble and learned friend who has just addressed your Lordships, and I entirely agree in his reasoning and in his conclusion.

Lord FITZGERALD, after stating the facts, proceeded as follows:—My Lords: Has it been established on the part of the Theodore H. Rand, that it was impossible for the officer of that ship, under the circumstances in which he was placed, and by any amount of care and diligence, to ascertain the true position of the Statesman, and that she was not close-hauled, and was running free? This was the question which was so very much pressed on us on behalf of the Statesman, and it depends on the proper inference to be drawn from the evidence of KNOWLTON, the chief officer of the Theodore H. Rand. On the most careful examination of his statements, I have not been able to see that he is not entitled to credit, and I have come to the conclusion, though with considerable hesitation, that it was not practicable for him to have ascertained the position of the Statesman. He judged erroneously that she was close-hauled, but the question is, are the owners of the Theodore H. Rand responsible for this error? Upon this point of the case, it seems to me to be desirable that your Lordships' reasons should be so expressed as to leave no opening for the supposition that the ship may not be liable for an error in judgment of the officer in charge, even where that officer acted bonâ fide according to the best of his judgment, and under circumstances of difficulty. The Statesman not being to blame, the onus was then cast on the owners of the Theodore H. Rand to show that she was not to blame. Baggallay, L.J. rather reverses the position when he says, "I have come to the conclusion that there is not sufficient evidence in this case to show that, by the exercise of any reasonable care or diligence on the part of those on board the Theodore H. Rand, the actual course which the Statesman was pursuing could have been ascertained." The learned Lord Justice places the onus of proof on the Statesman, and in using the flexible term "reasonable," leaves an opening for misconception. Lindley, L.J. deals with this part of the case somewhat more fully, and is reported to have said: "The conclusion was wrong, and therefore what the Theodore H. Rand did was wrong, and that raises the real difficulty, or, what I have felt all throughout to be the real difficulty, in the case. But the exigency of the statute is very strict, and we must have regard to the statutory enactment, which is the 17th section of the 36 & 37 Vict. c. 85, and, although the language of it is very wide, I cannot construe that section as applying to a case where a man acts perfectly bonâ fide, and makes a mistake for which he is not in any way morally to blame. The position of affairs was this: I am stating the conclusion at which I have arrived from the evidence—that the persons on board the Theodore H. Rand could not by any amount of reasonable diligence have ascertained what the course of the other ship was, whether she was free, or whether she was, as they suppose, closed hauled on the starboard tack. It seems plain, when one comes to investigate these rules, that such a state of things might arise. Then if a man is not in a position to find out what the other ship is doing, if he cannot with reasonable diligence find it out, and happens to make a mistake, is he to be made liable under the terms of the 17th section? I think so to construe the 17th section would be erroneous." The language imputed to the Lord Justice is too wide, and seems to be capable of misinterpretation, especially in the passage where he says that the statute does not apply, "where a man acts perfectly bonâ fide, and makes a mistake for which he is not morally to blame." If the application of the statute was to be excluded in such a case, its wholesome operation and effect would be seriously limited. I can well conceive many instances in which the master of the ship, acting bonâ fide and according to the best of his skill and judgment, commits an error for which he may not be morally responsible, and yet the owners of his ship would be answerable for the consequences. It seems to me that the statute intended to exclude considerations of mere mistake, error of judgment, and the like, and to lay down a very rigid, though not inflexible, rule. The language of the 17th section of the statute is, "If, in any case of collision, it is proved to the court before which the case is tried that any of the regulations for preventing collision contained in or made under the Merchant Shipping Acts 1854 to 1873, has been infringed, the ship by which such regulation has been infringed shall be deemed to be in fault, unless it is shown to the satisfaction of the court that the circumstances of the case made departure from the regulation necessary." There were no circumstances shown to make a departure from the regulation necessary. The Statesman obeyed rule 14 by taking the proper manœuvre to keep out of the way of the close hauled ship (the Theodore H. Rand), and the question seems rather to be on the construction of article 22 whether the Theodore H. Rand violated or broke that rule. The 22nd article is, "Where by the above rules one of two ships is to keep out of the way, the other shall keep her course." The Theodore H. Rand did not keep her course. It seems, however, hard and unreasonable to affirm that the 22nd article was violated by the master of the Theodore H. Rand, if it was impossible for him to ascertain that the 14th article was applicable, and if in the critical emergency which was thus forced on him he took the step which the crisis seemed, in his judgment, imperatively to demand. Butt, J. puts the matter thus, and I think with accuracy: "The mistake on the part of the port-tacked ship brought about the collision because the other was acting rightly." "I have to apply this statutory rule. I would not apply it against a port-tacked ship if I thought it were impossible." (your Lordships will observe that he uses the word impossible) "for her officers to tell what they had to deal with." The Statesman was not to blame. The Theodore H. Rand caused the calamity. It lay on her owners to establish that she was not to blame by clear and satisfactory proof that it was impracticable for the officer in charge, using his utmost care and diligence, to make out the situation he had to deal with in relation to the Statesman, and that, being placed in circumstances of great difficulty, he had acted to the best of his skill and judgment. After much hesitation, I have come to the conclusion that the owners of the Theodore H. Rand have established that position in evidence, and that their ship consequently was not to blame.

Lord HERSCHELL.—My Lords: Lord Ashbourne, who took part in the hearing of this appeal and is unable to be present to-day, has asked me to state that he has perused in print the opinion that I have delivered this morning, and that he entirely concurs in it.

THE KRONPRINZ. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF APPEAL IN ENGLAND.

Practice — Collision — Actions by shipowner and cargo owner—Agreement to discontinue—Action for limitation of liability—Claims.

The owners of a ship, and the owners of the cargo on board it, respectively instituted actions in rem against another ship for damage by collision. In the ship action the parties signed a consent to "this action being discontinued on the ground of inevitable accident," and the registrar made an order for discontinuance accordingly. In the cargo action both ships were found to be in fault, and the defendants obtained a decree limiting their liability. The plaintiffs in the ship action thereupon obtained an order from the court to rescind the order for discontinuance, and made a claim in the limitation action against the fund in court.

Held (affirming the judgment of the court below), that they were entitled to do so, the agreement and consent order amounting only to a discontinuance, and not to a release of all rights.

The Bellcairn (53 L. T. Rep. N. S. 686; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 503; 10 P. Div. 161) distinguished.

THIS was an appeal from a judgment of the Court of Appeal (Lindley and Lopes, L.JJ., Lord Coleridge, C.J. dubitante), which had affirmed a judgment of the President of the Admiralty Division Sir J. Hannen).

The action arose out of a collision between the steamships Kronprinz and Ardandhu, whereby the former and the cargo on board were totally lost.

The case is reported below under the name of The Ardandhu, in 54 L. T. Rep. N. S. 468 and 819; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 573 and 594; and 11 P. Div. 40.

The facts appear sufficiently from the headnote above, and from the reports in the court below.

Sir W. Phillimore and Stubbs, for the appellants, the owners of the cargo on board the Kronprinz, contended that the agreement and order operated as a release of all claims in the first action, and not merely as a discontinuance. If the latter had been intended a notice under Order XXVI., r. 1, would have been sufficient, there would have been no necessity for an order, nor for the insertion of the words "on the ground of inevitable accident," which support our contention. The Bellcairn (53 L. T. Rep. N. S. 686; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 503; 10 P. Div. 161) was a very similar case, though it may perhaps be distinguished on the ground that in that case there was a judgment by consent dismissing the action, not only an order.

C. Hall, Q.C. and Barnes, who appeared for the respondents, the owners of the Kronprinz, were not called upon to address the House.

At the conclusion of the arguments for the appellants their Lordships gave judgment as follows:—

The LORD CHANCELLOR (Halsbury).—My Lords: This appeal turns upon a somewhat narrow question, namely, what is the meaning of the agreement between the parties, and what is the effect of the order which purported to carry it out. Those are the only materials from which to ascertain what the agreement between the parties was, I can find no clue to what the object of the parties was, except in those two documents. But it is important to observe that the formal parties entering into the arrangement were the two solicitors, who must be taken to be familiar with the effect and meaning of the forms which they were using. It being conceded that, as matter of law, the form which they adopted was one which allowed all matters to be open, and did not conclude the rights of the parties, the question of the form which they used becomes very material in construing their meaning. It would have been easy to have said that "this action shall be dismissed;" and if they had said that, it is admitted that, as between these two parties, a bar would have been created which would have prevented any further proceeding. But they deliberately (for people must be supposed to intend the reasonable consequences of their acts) adopted language which can only be used if it is the intention of the parties to leave themselves at large so as to reassert their rights if they please. Sir Walter Phillimore has not contested that that must be the ordinary and natural meaning of the words; but he relies upon the language which is added to the order, but which, properly speaking, forms no part of an order to discontinue, namely, the reasons which the parties gave for consenting to that course, that is to say, that it was on the ground of inevitable accident. I am not able to conjecture, with any reasonable degree of certainty, for what purpose those words were used. Various reasons have been suggested, and I think others might occur to one; but the question for your Lordships is whether, when the bargain between the parties and the form which they adopted, lead to the inference that, so far as the instrument itself is concerned, it was intended to leave the parties free to bring a fresh action or to do that which is equivalent to bringing a fresh action, namely, to make this claim, your Lordships are to assume that they intended that that should not be done. I am unable to come to any such conclusion. It seems to me that the plain and obvious inference which is to be drawn from this instrument is, that the parties intended that which is the plain construction of the language which they have used, and, as there is nothing to cut down that construction, I assume that that is what they have meant; and, inasmuch as it is not denied that that is the real meaning of the bargain between the parties, it appears to me that it is competent for the owners of the Kronprinz to make this claim. For these reasons, the matter being an extremely simple and short one, I move your Lordships that this appeal be dismissed and the order of the Court of Appeal affirmed, with costs.

Lord BRAMWELL.—My Lords: I am of the same opinion. If the claim of the Kronprinz against the Ardandhu is in existence, the owners of the Kronprinz have a right, as it seems to me, to share in the fund which has been brought into court. If it is not in existence of course they have no right to do so. That reduces the question to this, Is the claim in existence? It is said that it is not; partly, as I understand, by the effect of the order of discontinuance. I can see nothing in the order of discontinuance which, by what you may call its intrinsic effect, would bar a claim of the owners of the Kronprinz. But then it is said that there was a bargain between the parties which is embodied in that order, and that the bargain is operative to prevent the owners of the Kronprinz claiming against this fund. As I have said, that can only be because that bargain has extinguished the right. But has it? We have not the slightest evidence that there was any agreement between the parties that the claims on the one side should be given up in consideration of the claims on the other being given up. One might make a guess that it was in the contemplation of the parties, but I am by no means sure that it was. I am, on the other hand, by no means sure that they may not have thought it just as well for them to keep silent and not to go on litigating a matter which might have disastrous results to both of them. But supposing that there was such a bargain, that bargain has been rescinded by them, as it was open to them to do. If it had been a bargain the effect of which was to extinguish a debt at the time, I do not say that they could have rescinded it; but if it was not such a bargain as that, but an executory one only, then of course they could rescind it. What I mean is, that if all that was done was that if an action was brought there was to be an application to an equitable jurisdiction to stay the action, I should have doubted very much whether that would extinguish a debt. But be that as it may, in the first place I do not find that there was any such bargain; and in the next place, I do not find, or rather I do not see (for there is no doubt about it), than any such bargain, if ever entered into, was rescinded by parties competent to rescind it. I cannot see therefore any evidence to show, or any ground for saying, that either the claim of the Kronprinz on the Ardandhu or of the Ardandhu on the Kronprinz was extinguished. If so, it seems to me that the respondents had a right to make that claim against this fund. In The Bellcairn (53 L. T. Rep. N. S. 686; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 503; 10 P. Div. 161) what was really decided was, that the judgment was a bar to any further claim being made, or to the same claim being made over again; that the judgment having been pronounced by the court it was res judicata, and that the claim was gone. Of course, therefore, it could not be set up against the fund. That was the distinction between that case and this; there the claim had ceased to exist, here it has not.

Lord HERSCHELL.—My Lords: I am entirely of the same opinion. Sir Walter Phillimore was driven to admit that he could not establish his case unless he could show that the respondents had in fact released all their claims against the Ardandhu, because he was compelled to admit that an order for discontinuance does not of itself operate as a release or an extinguishment of the claims, or in any other way bar further proceedings. But he contended that, from the document signed by the solicitors, and from the order, we were to infer an agreement between the parties that there should be a mutual release of the claims of the one against the other. What evidence have we of any such agreement? Sir Walter Phillimore relied on the use of the words "on the ground of inevitable accident." I will concede, for the purpose of the argument, that those words do point in the direction of such an agreement; but then it is impossible to shut one's eyes to the fact that the rest of the language used and the form which the transaction takes point as strongly, and as it seems to me much more strongly, in the other direction, namely, that the parties have adopted a means of carrying out the object which they had in view, which primâ facie imports, whether you look at the terms of the agreement or at the order itself, that there shall not be a bar; because not merely does the fact of the plaintiff discontinuing not operate in any way as a bar, but the judge's order to discontinue—unless it were made a condition of the discontinuance that no other action should be brought—would not operate as a bar. Under these circumstances, and looking at the two documents as a whole, whatever speculation one may enter into as to what the parties had in view, it seems to me that it would be utterly impossible for us out of those documents to spell an agreement such as alone would establish the case of the appellants before your Lordships' House. I therefore entirely concur in the judgment which has been proposed.

Lord MACNAGHTEN.—My Lords: I also entirely agree. It appears to me that on the face of the documents there is nothing equivalent to a release, and, from the materials before your Lordships' House, I am unable to infer anything of the kind.

COURT OF APPEAL.

Wednesday, Feb. 16, 1887.

(Before Lord ESHER, M.R., BOWEN and FRY, L.JJ.)

BURN v. HERLOFSON AND SIEMENSEN; THE FAUST. (a)

Mortgage action — Shipowners — Charge by managing owner — Bills of exchange—Appointment of receiver—Rights of co-owners.

In an action in personam by a plaintiff claiming to be equitable mortgagee of the foreign ship F. and her freight to secure a liability incurred by him in accepting bills of exchange which had been drawn by the managing owner, it appeared that the alleged mortgage was given to the plaintiff by the managing owner; that the plaintiff, when he accepted the bills, thought the managing owner was sole owner, and that it was subsequently sworn on affidavit that the managing owner was only a part owner, but it did not appear whether the amount of the bills was in fact expended on the purposes of the ship.

The F. was in an English port under charter to carry cargo to a foreign port, when, on application by the plaintiff, Butt, J. made an order appointing a receiver and authorising him to proceed with the ship to the foreign port and there receive the ship and all the freight due upon the voyage. The defendants appealed.

Held, that, even assuming the managing owner to be only a part owner, yet that, as it did not appear that the amount of the bills was not expended solely for the purposes of the ship, the court had authority to appoint a receiver to receive the whole of the freight, and that, in the circumstances, it was expedient that the order should stand.

THIS was an appeal by the defendants in a mortgage action in personam from an order made by Butt, J. in chambers.

The plaintiff, Richard Burn, was a shipbroker, carrying on business in Liverpool, and claimed to be equitable mortgagee or assignee of the Norwegian barque Faust and her freight, and to be entitled to payment of 2000*l.*, together with interest and expenses, out of the proceeds of the ship and freight.

On the 15th July 1886, in accordance with the course of business carried on between the plaintiff and the defendant Axel Herlofson, whom the plaintiff believed to be the sole owner of the Faust, Herlofson drew upon the plaintiff two bills of exchange for the sum of 1000*l.* each.

These bills were accepted by the plaintiff, the defendant undertaking to place the plaintiff in funds to meet the bills.

A letter from Herlofson, containing the bills of exchange for the plaintiff's acceptance, was in the words following:

Arendal, in Norway, 22nd Jan. 1886.—To Captain M. Siemensen.—Dear Sir,—Messrs. Richard Burn and Co., 14, Batavia-buildings, Liverpool, have advanced me on earned freight per your ship the Faust 2000*l.*, two thousand pounds Br. st. in their six months' acceptances from this day. This bill is due on the 22/25 July 1886. Please pay this amount to the above-mentioned firm at maturity as soon after as possible, as I have bound and do hereby bind the ship and her freight or freights liable for the same.—Believe me, dear Sir, yours truly, A. Herlofson, owner of the Faust.

Upon this letter, and upon the course of business in similar transactions between the parties for some time past, the plaintiff claimed to be entitled to an equitable mortgage upon the said ship to cover both the amount of the said bills and his general account.

These bills were indorsed to certain holders, who were now suing the plaintiff upon them. The defendant Herlofson had never put the plaintiff in funds to meet the bills; and Herlofson was now a bankrupt.

On the 5th Jan. 1887 the Faust, laden with cargo, arrived at Falmouth for orders.

This action was instituted in personam against Herlofson and Siemensen, the master of the Faust, on the 7th Jan. 1887, and on the same day an injunction was granted till the 11th restraining the defendants from removing the Faust from out of the jurisdiction, and from receiving her freight. On the 11th Jan. Butt, J. made an order continuing the injunction, and appointing a receiver to take possession of the ship and receive the freight. On the 18th Jan. the defendant Siemensen, by special leave, applied to Butt, J. in chambers to vary the above order, and filed an affidavit alleging that Axel Herlofson owned three-eighths of the Faust, that Oscar Herlofson owned three-eighths, and that he himself owned two-eighths; that he had no knowledge of the letter of the 22nd Jan., or of the bills of exchange; that he had never given any authority to Axel Herlofson to mortgage or charge his shares; and that the Faust was then at Falmouth laden with a cargo of sugar waiting for orders to proceed to a foreign port. The judge thereupon dissolved the injunction, but continued the order appointing the receiver and authorising him to proceed with the Faust to her port of destination, and there receive the ship and the whole of the freight due, and after paying the crew's wages and all proper disbursements to pay the balance into court.

The Faust subsequently sailed to Nantes with the receiver on board, where on her arrival proceedings were instituted by the plaintiff's representatives to give effect to the above order.

The defendants now appealed to set aside or vary the order of the 18th Jan.

Pyke, for the defendants, in support of the appeal.—According to the facts on oath Herlofson was not the sole owner of the ship or freight. He therefore had no authority to pledge the whole of the ship and her freight. [Lord Esher, M.R.—He may, as managing owner, have raised the money solely for the purposes of the ship.] It is not stated upon the affidavits that the money was borrowed for, or expended upon, the ship. [Lord Esher, M.R.—Neither have your clients stated that the money was not borrowed for the purposes of the ship, and only for the private purposes of Herlofson.] If, in fact, Herlofson was only a part owner the court has no jurisdiction to appoint a receiver to take possession of the ship and receive all the freight. [Lord Esher, M.R.—The court has only put the receiver into the position of the managing owner. He would be entitled to receive the freight, and therefore the receiver must have the same right.] It is the master, not the managing owner, who has the right to receive the freight at a foreign port:

Guion v. Trask, 29 L. J. 337, Eq.

This is an oppressive order, and also without precedent. It directs the receiver to go to Nantes with the ship, and practically amounts to the arrest of the ship, which the court has no power to do. A test of the validity of the order is the fact that, now the ship is out of the jurisdiction, were the defendants to disobey it, the court would have no means of enforcing it. It could only do so by attachment or sequestration, neither of which could be effected in the present case. Moreover, the court has no jurisdiction, because the rights of the parties are governed by the law of the flag. [Fry, L.J. referred to Hart v. Herwig, 29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 47; L. Rep. 8 Ch. App. 860; 1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 572.] The court will not interfere between foreign co-owners, and here the plaintiff's alleged rights are derived from a foreign owner:

The Graff Arthur Bernstorff, 2 Spinks, 30.

J. P. Aspinall (with him Sir Henry James, Q.C.).—The order of Butt, J. should stand. [Lord Esher, M.R.—How do you meet the contention that Herlofson had no right to mortgage more than his own share, and if so, how can the receiver take possession of the whole ship and all the freight?] The purposes for which the money was raised are in issue, and will not be determined till the trial. It may turn out that in fact the money was borrowed for the necessary purposes of the ship. If so, to allow this appeal would defeat the just rights of the plaintiff. If it prove that the money was borrowed for the private purposes of the managing owner, no injustice will be done to the other owners, because security has been given to answer any just claim they might have in consequence of this order. The mortgage on which the plaintiff sues is an English contract, and the court undoubtedly has authority to appoint a receiver to collect the freight and take it out of the hands of the master:

The Edmond, Lush. 57.

Moreover, this order has by now been partly worked out. If this court uphold the order, the receiver will be able to invoke the assistance of the court abroad to carry it out, and to obtain an order certifying that he is the proper person to receive the freight. By these means the consignees would be protected from any liability for paying freight to him. It is submitted, both as a matter of legal right and as a matter of convenience, the plaintiff is entitled to hold the order.

Pyke in reply.

Lord Esher, M.R.—In this case the ship is a foreign ship and her owners are foreign owners. One of them, who was in fact the managing owner, borrowed money in England by a contract which he made in England, and by way of security mortgaged, or assumed to mortgage, the ship and her freight. In truth he was not the sole owner, but was only one of three owners. Now, the mortgagee, an Englishman, under these circumstances, applies, I will not say to the Court of Admiralty, but to the court over which Butt, J. was presiding, to enforce the mortgage, which was given to him by an English contract. If neither the ship nor any of the parties had been in England or had been within the jurisdiction of the court, it seems to me that Butt, J. could not have acted as against these foreigners. The ship came within the jurisdiction of the court, but she was not seized into the Admiralty. She could not be seized under any process but an Admiralty process, and she was not in fact seized. But one of the part owners, the captain, or the captain representing the owners, was within the jurisdiction, i.e., within the three miles limit, and I take it that he was served. Whether any order was made as to the service on the captain being a service on the other owners I know not. Herlofson was the person who borrowed the money, and he was the managing owner. He would have no right as managing owner to mortgage the ship for a private debt of his own, although he might mortgage his own shares in the ship for that purpose. In the same way he would have no right as managing owner to mortgage the whole of the freight for his own private wants, although he might mortgage his own share in it. As managing owner he would, as between himself and the lender, have a right to borrow money if it was borrowed for the necessary purposes of the ship. Now he did borrow money, but he did not state that it was for the purposes or necessities of the ship. It was not necessary, so far as the lender is concerned, that he should have stated, if it was in truth the fact. It is suggested that we know that the money was borrowed not for the purposes of the ship, but for the private wants of the managing owner. But that is not clear, and although it may be found to be so when this case comes to trial, at present it is in doubt. It is said that it is impossible, having regard to the amount, that the loan could have been on account of the ship. But is that so? The ship was a new ship. She was about to start from Norway on an extremely long voyage to Australia, and then she was to go seeking for a cargo to take back to Norway. It might very well be that she would not find that cargo at once. I cannot find from the fact that the loan amounted to 2000*l.* that that is conclusive to show that it was not borrowed for the purpose of repairing or fitting the ship out. Therefore it may be that the money was properly borrowed by him as managing owner. If it was properly borrowed by him as managing owner it was borrowed on behalf of all the owners.

The ship having come to Falmouth, the learned judge had, I think, authority to deal with the contract, and with the alleged right of the plaintiff, both with regard to the ship and the freight. He had authority and jurisdiction to do so by the service on the defendant. He had jurisdiction because the contract which he was asked to enforce was an English contract, and the persons against whom it was to be enforced, although foreigners, were within the jurisdiction, or, if all of them were not, one of them certainly was. The injunction seems to me to be practically an interim injunction. It will last until the hearing of the action which is brought on behalf of the plaintiff. It at all events is in the nature of an interim injunction, and is, I think, subject to the rules applicable to such an injunction. It is an appointment of a receiver till the hearing, and is subject to the rules which are applicable to an action in the court till the hearing. Now what are those rules? We are asked to set aside what has been done, and we are to consider whether it is more convenient that what has been done should remain, or that it should be set aside. Now let us test it in this way. Supposing the receiver was removed, what would happen? The ship would go abroad, the defendant would go abroad; the freight would be received by the captain, one of the defendants; he would not return to England, he would take the ship to Norway; the freight would be, according to his duty, then handed over to this very defendant, who has borrowed the money as managing owner, or to the trustees of his estate in Norway, if there are such people in Norway. Under these circumstances the English mortgagee would be absolutely without remedy, he would have lost all. If the order for the receiver stands, he will receive the freight. Whether he will receive it from the consignees, or whether the captain having received the freight from the consignees will pay it to him, is not material. He probably has received it by this time. What inconvenience or injustice will that do to anybody? It is obvious that, if it turns out that the defendant who gave the charge was not entitled to mortgage the whole freight, he was at least entitled to mortgage his own share. In that case the court would direct the receiver—after having paid the proper disbursements or allowed them to be paid—to keep the share of this defendant, which would be the righteous and proper thing to do, and to pay over their respective shares to the other owners. To my mind they would not be entitled to have their shares of the profits of the voyage handed to them until the account, as between the ship's husband and the co-owners, is made out. That must be the law in Norway as it is here. Therefore, it seems to me that their rights are in no jeopardy if this order stands, and so far as I can see their rights will probably not be detained by an hour. The balance of convenience therefore seems to me to be—and more particularly considering the length of time which has elapsed, and how much of this order must have been already carried out—greatly in favour of maintaining this order for the receiver on these grounds: that no injustice will be done if it is maintained; that injustice will inevitably follow if it is set aside; and that it has been so far carried out that it is almost futile to interfere at this moment. All these three grounds are grounds for maintaining the order.

But then it is said that the court has done that which it has no jurisdiction to do. It has been said that the receiver has been put into possession of the ship or part of it. I think the terms of the order may be read so as to lead me to suppose that the receiver has been put into possession of every part of the ship, and it may be very arguable whether a part owner himself—after having agreed that Herlofson should be the managing owner, and after having agreed that the ship should commence to gain freight, and perhaps after a charter-party has been entered into—could go on board and remain on board. But to my mind this order does not really give possession of the ship or any part of it to the receiver. The probable working of it would be, that it would enable the receiver, if the captain abroad attempted to sell the whole ship, including the mortgagee's interest, to represent to the foreign court that that was unjust and unfair, and say it could not be done, and the foreign court would not then give the captain possession of the ship. With regard to the freight, the presence of the receiver on board is immaterial. The freight is not due until the ship arrives at Nantes, and the receiver might just as well have used any other means of getting there. It is not suggested but that the English court would have a right to appoint a receiver to act abroad. The objection urged is, that the English court has sent a receiver on board the ship. If there was anything wrong in that the court could have said, "Very well, I will not send him in the ship, but I shall make an order detaining the ship here unless you give an undertaking to let him go on board the ship at Nantes." It seems to me that the sending him on board the ship does not affect the right or propriety of the court to send him to receive the freight. Another point has been taken, that the court is sending an English receiver to receive the freight abroad. It did at first suggest itself to my mind, that that might put the consignees of cargo into a difficult position. They, in ordinary course, would be entitled to their cargo on offering to pay the freight to the captain, and they might object to paying the freight to an English receiver of whom they knew nothing; or the captain might refuse to deliver the cargo to the consignees unless they paid the freight to him. But the difficulty was met by Mr. Aspinall showing that, if the receiver were objected to, he might in the ordinary course of justice obtain an order from the court at Nantes that he was the proper person to receive the freight. The court at Nantes would, by the comity of nations, give the receiver authority to receive the freight. Therefore the consignees would be protected. On the whole I do not take this to be an order to take possession of any part of the ship, but merely that the receiver shall go on board and receive the freight as any receiver would be entitled to do. Therefore the balance of convenience is all one way, and the court had jurisdiction and authority to make the order, although it may not be strictly in the form in which (after all that has been said to us, and which perhaps may not have been said to Butt, J.) we might draw it. I therefore think that the order as made must stand, and that this appeal must be dismissed.

Bowen, L.J.—I am of the same opinion with regard to the form of the order. I take this judgment as not to be considered as approving or settling any such form of order. I think it is a very exceptional form, and is one which would be found to be an inaccurate and objectionable form if it were used as a precedent. There are two things to consider here: First, had the court jurisdiction to make the order it made; second, if it had, it now being suggested that we should interfere with the particular form of the order, whether we should do more harm by altering the form of the order than by leaving it to stand as it is. With regard to the question of whether the court had jurisdiction to make the order let us consider how matters stood when these bills were drawn. The bills were drawn by a Norwegian on a Liverpool house, and in the letter the drawer sent to the Liverpool house he purported to create, and did create, so far as I know, a charge on the ship and freight for the security of the Liverpool house, and that letter contained a representation to the Liverpool house to the effect that he was the owner of the ship. Supposing that nothing further happened, can it be suggested that that did not form a contract which an English court would not have a right to enforce? Now what is the difficulty which is raised in the way of the English court? It is said that as soon as she comes within the jurisdiction of the English court it transpires that she is not the property of the so-called assuming owner, Mr. Herlofson, who had represented himself as such, and got the loan on that representation, but it is alleged that he was the managing owner only and was himself the owner of only three-eighths, and that the rest of the ship was owned by her captain and another person. If that be so, the managing owner would have no right to pledge more than his own interest in the ship for his own debt. It is also left in dubio for what purposes he borrowed the money or any part of it. On the ship arriving at Falmouth to receive orders she was arrested, and an injunction was issued to prevent the captain removing her. That injunction went upon the urgent ground that she might at any moment be removed out of the jurisdiction. How far can we be sure as to the rights of the parties? It seems to me that at present we cannot be sure at all, because, having regard to what we as yet know, it is left more or less in doubt whether the managing owner had the power or not to pledge what he did pledge. That can only be decided at the hearing. It was impossible, unless the ship was to be kept for an abnormal time, to get further information as to the right of these parties. It was in the interest of all that, rather than the ship should be detained, she should be allowed to prosecute her voyage to Nantes. I cannot say that I think Butt, J. was wrong in assuming that for the purpose of protecting the plaintiffs' alleged rights there was jurisdiction to make the order he did; and if there was jurisdiction it comes to the single question of what was the best thing to do under the circumstances, the object being to preserve the rights of the parties in statu quo, in case anything was done to defeat the claim that was pending. The order has been half worked out. No injustice, as has been pointed out by the Master of the Rolls, can be done if we let the order stand. Considerable injustice might be done if we took the opposite course. With regard to the question of the form of the order, I entirely agree with what has been said by the Master of the Rolls, that the receiver should not be put into possession of the whole ship, but only of Herlofson's shares. I think the true answer to the objection of informality is, that this informality should have been cured at the time the order was made. It is too late now. If it had been put before the court below in the way it has been put now, I think the same end would have been attained by taking an undertaking from the captain to allow the receiver to come on board at Nantes, by which undertaking the owners would have been bound.

Collision—Reasons of nautical assessors—Appeal.

Where in a collision action the nautical assessors sitting in the Admiralty Division reduce their reasons into writing, parties appealing from the decision are not entitled to see these reasons or have copies of them for the purposes of the appeal. (b)

This was an application to the Court of Appeal by the plaintiffs in a collision action in rem for an order that the Registrar of the Admiralty Division should deliver up to them the written reasons of the assessors in the court below, and for leave to print such reasons in the record for the purposes of the appeal.

The action was instituted by the owners of the steamer Kildare against the owners of the steamer Banshee to recover damages in respect of a collision between the two steamers on the 27th Jan. 1887.

At the hearing before Butt, J. he found the Kildare solely to blame, but stated that in the opinion of his nautical assessors the Banshee was solely to blame, adding, "I do not know whether this case will travel any further or not, but the Elder Brethren have been good enough to write out for me not only their views, but their reasons; and I have asked them to preserve them should any court to which this case may travel think fit to call for them."

It appeared that the plaintiffs had applied to the registrar for a copy of these reasons, and that he had refused to let them have them, stating that the judge had told him that the plaintiffs were not entitled to them.

The plaintiffs had filed notice of appeal from the decision finding the Kildare to blame.

Carson, for the plaintiffs, in support of the application.—The plaintiffs are entitled to these reasons. [Lord Esher, M.R.—What power has this court to order the Registrar of the Admiralty Court to give up these reasons? He is not our officer.] As the appeal is pending before this court, it would have jurisdiction to make the order. [Bowen, L.J.—At the hearing of Admiralty appeals we often put written questions to our assessors. How could parties appealing from our decision have any right to those questions and answers?] They form part of the judgment. [Lord Esher, M.R.—They do not form part of the judgment. My experience is, that the judge of the Admiralty Court used to retire with the Trinity Brethren before giving his decision, and no one ever knew what advice he got.] I ask the court to make the order as a matter of discretion.

J. P. Aspinall, for the defendants, was not called on.

Lord Esher, M.R.—It would be a very wrong discretion to make this order. Such a thing has never been done. The application must be dismissed with costs.

HIGH COURT OF JUSTICE.

QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION.

Monday, Dec. 13, 1886.

(Before Smith and Wills, JJ.)

Carmichael and Co. v. The Liverpool Sailing Shipowners' Mutual Indemnity Association. (a)

Marine insurance—Mutual indemnity association—Damage to cargo by improper navigation—Loading port inefficiently closed.

A shipowner neglected to efficiently close a loading port in the side of his ship. The act of negligence occurred before the completion of the loading. Goods were damaged by sea-water which leaked in during the voyage, but the leak did not endanger or impede the navigation of the ship.

Held, that the damage was "caused by improper navigation of the ship" within the meaning of the articles of association of a shipowners' mutual indemnity association.

This was a special case stated by order for the opinion of the court.

The case was, so far as material, as follows:—

Special case.

1. The plaintiffs are the owners of an iron sailing ship called the Argo, which was at the times hereinafter mentioned duly entered on the books of the defendant association.

2. The defendants are an association of sailing ship owners who have agreed to indemnify each other, as appears in their articles and rules, against losses, damages, and expenses for which any of them may be liable in respect of any ship duly entered on the books of the association arising from or occasioned by (amongst other matters) any loss or damage of or to any goods or merchandise "caused by improper navigation of the ship carrying the goods or merchandise or of any other ship (but not from damage caused by bad stowage)." A copy of the articles and rules of the association in force at the times hereinafter mentioned forms part of this case.

3. In Oct. 1882 a cargo of wheat in bags was shipped in the Argo at San Francisco in good order and condition, to be carried to Queenstown or Falmouth for orders to discharge at a safe port in the United Kingdom, or on the Continent between Havre and Hamburg, both ports included. She sailed with the cargo, and called at Queenstown. There she received orders to discharge at Liverpool, and she accordingly proceeded to Liverpool, and discharged the wheat there. The voyage was performed in the ordinary manner, and in safety in all respects save as hereinafter appears.

4. The wheat on being discharged at Liverpool was found to be damaged by salt water, and it is admitted by the parties hereto for the purposes of this case, that the water got into the ship and consequently into the cargo in the manner hereinafter described.

5. The cargo was in part taken on board through a certain opening or port made for this purpose in the side of the ship above the 'tween decks. When part of the wheat was on board, and before the loading was completed, this opening was closed in the ordinary way by means of an iron door or shutter. The door by which this opening is closed is fitted for the purpose on the outside of the ship on hinges. When shut it is made fast by bolts passing through iron bars on the inside of the ship, and screwed up by nuts on the inside. The joint between the ship's side and the over-lapping flange of the door is made tight by smearing the flange with a mixture of white or red lead and oil before the door is shut.

6. The port through which cargo was taken as aforesaid on the voyage in question was not, however, closed efficiently. The joint between the flange of the door and the ship's side was not perfectly tight, and as the port was below the water-line some water leaked in. It is admitted for the purposes of this case, that the defect in the joint was due to negligence on the part of persons employed by the plaintiffs.

7. The water which thus leaked in damaged part of the cargo in the lower hold, and the plaintiffs in consequence became liable to pay and paid 450*l.* compensation to the owners in respect of the damage. They also justifiably incurred expenses amounting to 75*l.* 5*s.* 2*d.* in connection with the claims of the cargo owner. It is agreed that if the defendants are liable to indemnify the plaintiffs in respect of the said compensation, they shall also pay to the plaintiffs the amount of the said expenses.

8. The leak did not endanger the ship nor did it hinder or impede the navigation of her on the course of her voyage.

9. The question for the opinion of the court is, whether the plaintiffs are under the said articles and rules entitled to be indemnified by the defendants in respect of the compensation which the plaintiffs became liable to pay as aforesaid. If the plaintiffs are so entitled, judgment is to be entered for them for 525*l.* 5*s.* 2*d.*; if they are not, judgment is to be entered for the defendants.

Kennedy, Q.C. (with him Squarey) for the plaintiffs. — The damage was caused by improper navigation of the ship within the meaning of the articles of association. (a) In Good v. The London Steamship Owners' Mutual Protecting Association (L. Rep. 6 C. P. 563) the plaintiff was a member of a similar association, and his ship having encountered heavy weather put back to coal and trim her cargo. Going into harbour she took the ground, but was got off. The pumps were put on to try whether she had made any water, and for this purpose the bilgecock was opened, and, through the negligence of the crew, was not closed when the pumping ceased. Shortly afterwards the seacock was also opened to fill the boilers, and through like negligence left open, and the water consequently entered and damaged the cargo. On these facts it was held that the damage arose from "improper navigation." [SMITH, J.—Was not the damage in that case caused during the voyage?] The ship was at the time moored alongside the quay. It is contended that there is no difference between opening the ports improperly during the transit of the ship, and leaving them slightly open as was done in this case from the commencement of the voyage. Both cases amount to improper management of the ship upon the high seas, or, in other words, improper navigation. The word "navigation" is not confined to the actual period of transit of the ship. In Lawrie v. Douglas (16 M. & W. 746) a vessel laden with goods arrived in the port of London, and was taken into the Commercial Dock to discharge her cargo. For this purpose she was fastened by tackle on the one side to a loaded lighter lying outside her, and on the other to a barge lying between her and the wharf. The crew were discharged except the mate, and lumpers were being employed unloading her, when the tackle broke whereby she was fastened to the lighter, and in consequence she canted over, water got in through her ports, and the goods still on board were damaged, and it was held that this was a loss within the meaning of the words "all and every the damages and accidents of the seas and navigation." In Steel v. The State Line Steamship Company (37 L. T. Rep. N. S. 333; 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 516; 3 App. Cas. 72) the damage was caused by water which obtained access to the cargo in consequence of one of the

(a) The articles of association were, so far as material, as follows: "We, the undersigned persons, firms, and companies hereby agree to become members of the 'Liverpool Sailing Ship Owners' Mutual Indemnity Association,' for the purpose of indemnifying each other as hereinafter appearing against losses, damages, and expenses arising from or occasioned by all or any of the following matters or things, for which any of us may be liable in respect of any ship which may be duly entered on the books of this association. 1. From loss of life or personal injury howsoever and to whomsoever the same may be caused. 2. From loss or damage of or to any other ship or boat, or of or to any goods, merchandise, or other things whatsoever on board such other ship or boat, howsoever such loss or damage may be caused, so far as the same shall not be covered by the usual form of Lloyd's policy with running down clause attached. 3. From loss or damage of or to any goods or merchandise other than as aforesaid, whether on board any ship so entered as aforesaid or not, caused by improper navigation of the ship carrying the goods or merchandise or of any other ship (but not from damage caused by bad stowage), or of or to any piers or jetties, or other fixed or movable things whatsoever, whether on board such ship or not, howsoever such damage may be caused."

ports being insufficiently fastened, and it was there held that, in order to bring the loss within the exception of the charter-party, "peril of the sea however caused," it must be found that the ship sailed with the port in a seaworthy state. That case, however, does not affect the point, because there there was an antecedent warranty of seaworthiness, whereas here the sole question is whether the damage was caused by improper navigation. In The Warkworth (49 L. T. Rep. N. S. 715; 51 L. T. Rep. N. S. 558; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 194, 326; 9 P. Div. 20, 145) it was held that the words "improper navigation" in 25 & 26 Vict. c. 63, s. 54, sub-sect. 4, are not to be restricted to the negligent navigation of a vessel by her master and crew, for the statute includes all damage wrongfully done by a ship to another whilst it is being navigated, where the wrongful action is due to the negligence of a person for whom the owner is responsible, as, for instance, to the negligence of a person on shore in overlooking the machinery, and thereby causing the vessel to steer badly. In that case the damage resulted from a collision which was the result of a pin of the steam steering gear not being in its place. The case shows that the negligence need not necessarily take place during the voyage, but may be antecedent.

Carver for the defendant association.—The word "navigation" must be read in its ordinary sense, and cannot be extended to a time when the ship is being used merely as a warehouse for the cargo. The primary object of the association, as appears from the risks against which the members are indemnified, is to protect the members against collision risks, and therefore the word "navigation" must be taken in its ordinary colloquial sense. [SMITH, J.—Why, then, is damage caused by bad stowage excepted?] Those words are inserted because of the expression of opinion of Wills, J. in Good v. The London Steamship Owners' Association (ubi sup.), that damage arising from bad stowage would come under the head of "improper navigation." [SMITH, J.—If the ship started with the hatchways off, would that be "improper navigation?"] In that case there would be a continuing act of neglect. [SMITH, J.—Does not Brett, M.R. meet that objection in The Warkworth (51 L. T. Rep. N. S. 559; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 194, 326; 9 P. Div. 147)? He there says: "Although the negligence occurred before the vessel started, its effect was continuous, and operated while the ship was on her voyage."] In that case there was clearly improper navigation, inasmuch as the vessel ran into another vessel which was at anchor; but Fry, L.J. in the same case takes "navigation" as meaning "the science or art of conducting a ship from place to place through the water." Here there was no improper navigation in that sense. The association does not undertake to indemnify the shipowner if he fails to provide a ship which is reasonably fit to carry the cargo. In Tattersall v. The National Steamship Company Limited (50 L. T. Rep. N. S. 299; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 206; 12 Q. B. Div. 297) the cargo owner was damnified in consequence of the shipowner's negligence in failing to disinfect his ship after carrying a previous cargo of cattle suffering from foot-and-mouth disease, and it was held that an exception in the bill of lading providing that under no circumstances should the shipowner be responsible for more than 5*l.* for each of the animals, did not protect him. [WILLS, J.—Is not that an entirely different class of contract?] In Hayn, Roman, and Co. v. Culliford and Clark (39 L. T. Rep. N. S. 288; 40 L. T. Rep. N. S. 536; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 128; 3 C. P. Div. 410; 4 C. P. Div. 182) the bill of lading contained a clause that the shipowners should not be liable for the default of the pilot, master, or mariners in navigating the ship, and, sugar having been damaged by bad stowage, it was held that the expression "default in navigating the ship" did not cover negligent stowage. [WILLS, J.—At what moment do you say navigation commences?] As soon as the crew begin to move the fastenings of the ship for the purpose of setting out on the voyage.

Kennedy, Q.C. in reply.—There is a difference between the construction of the expression "navigation," as is the case with many other expressions and phrases also, in charter parties and bills of lading on the one hand, and policies of insurance on the other.

SMITH, J.—This is an action brought by the plaintiffs against the Liverpool Sailing Ship Owners' Mutual Indemnity Association to recover the loss sustained by them in respect of a cargo of wheat shipped in a vessel of which they are owners, and which is duly entered on the books of the defendant association at San Francisco, and damaged by sea water in the course of the voyage across the Atlantic. The question we have to decide is as to the true meaning of the article of association enumerating the risks against which the members of the association are indemnified. As far as I can judge, no case has been cited to us throwing any light upon the meaning of the third paragraph, except the case of Good v. The London Steamship Owners' Mutual Protecting Association (L. Rep. 6 C. P. 563) since, in my opinion, the cases cited as to the meaning of the word "navigation" in bills of lading are of no authority, and do not assist us at all in determining in what way we ought to construe the word "navigation" in this case. This is a matter in which the plaintiffs, although they are really shipowners, stand in the place of owners of cargo. They are engaged in carrying goods in their ship, and they therefore contract with the defendant association to make good damage occurring to the goods under certain circumstances. Under the circumstances stated in the case, damage has occurred to goods shipped on board one of the plaintiffs' ships entered in the association, and the question is, whether the plaintiffs can make out that the loss sustained by them comes within any of the clauses of the article of association enumerating the risks. If they can bring it within one of those clauses, they are entitled to succeed; if not, they must fail. The purpose of the association is to indemnify its members against losses, damages, and expenses for which they may be liable in respect of any ship duly entered on the books of the association arising from: First, loss of life or personal injury howsoever or to whomsoever the same may be caused; secondly, from loss or damage of or to any other ship or boat, or of or to any goods, merchandise, or other things whatsoever on board such other ship or boat, howsoever such loss or damage may be caused, so far as the same shall not be covered by the usual form of Lloyd's policy with running down clause attached. Clearly neither of these clauses affect the case. Then comes the third clause, which is: "From loss or damage of or to any goods or merchandise other than as aforesaid, whether on board any ship so entered as aforesaid or not, caused by improper navigation of the ship carrying the goods or merchandise, or of any other ship (but not from damage by bad stowage), or of or to any piers or jetties, or other fixed or movable things whatsoever, whether on board such ship or not, howsoever such damage may be caused." As to the first words of the clause, I agree with Mr. Kennedy that the meaning is that if the goods are damaged while being carried on board a lighter or on the quays, the member is to be indemnified against such damage. Then come the words "caused by the improper navigation of the ship carrying the goods or merchandise or of any other ship (but not from damage caused by bad stowage)."

What is the meaning of the words "damage to goods caused by the improper navigation of the carrying ship"? It has been argued on behalf of the defendant association that they are not liable for the damage, unless the plaintiffs are able to make out that their ship was endangered; but the plaintiffs are not seeking an indemnity in the character of shipowners, but as the owners of goods, and, in my judgment, if the goods were damaged by the improper navigation of the carrying ship, the plaintiffs are entitled to an indemnity. Let us assume for a moment that goods were carried with the hatches off from port to port, and that the ship was not at all damaged or endangered thereby, but nevertheless water got into the hold and damaged the cargo, could it be said in that case that the navigation was not improper, because the safety of the ship was never imperilled? It seems to me that this was not the meaning of the parties when they entered into this agreement. In my judgment, that would be improper navigation by the ship with respect to the goods. But the damage was not caused on this occasion in that way, but by the negligence of persons employed by the plaintiffs to put the cargo on board. It seems that this cargo was in part taken on board through an opening made for the purpose in the side of the ship, and when part of the wheat was on board, and before the loading was completed, this opening was closed in the ordinary way by means of an iron door, fitted for the purpose on the outside of the ship on hinges, which, when shut, was made fast by bolts passing through iron bars on the inside of the ship and screwed up by nuts on the inside, the joint between the ship's side and the overlapping flange of the door being made tight by smearing the flange with a mixture of white or red lead and oil before shutting the door. On the voyage in question, this port was not closed efficiently, inasmuch as the joint between the flange of the door and the ship's side was not perfectly tight, and, as the port was below the water-line, some water leaked in, and it is admitted that the defect in the joint was due to negligence on the part of persons employed by the plaintiffs. Can it, under these circumstances, be said that the ship was properly navigated with respect to the cargo carried from the commencement to the end of the voyage? The port was unclosed at the commencement of the voyage, and continued unclosed during the whole of the voyage; and I think that that amounted to improper navigation of the ship with respect to the cargo carried. As to the authorities, I only desire to add that I do not deal at all with the cases in which similar words in bills of lading have been discussed and construed, because I do not think that those cases are in point. I will refer to two cases only. In Good v. The London Steamship Owners' Association (ubi sup.) Willes, J. said that "improper navigation, within the meaning of this deed, is something improperly done with the ship or part of the ship in the course of the voyage;" but I do not think that the learned judge intended by those words to confine the meaning of the term to things actually done by some hand during the actual voyage, and I think that it applies equally to a thing done before the voyage, and continued through it. In the case of The Warkworth (49 L. T. Rep. N. S. 715; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 194, 326; 51 L. T. Rep. N. S. 558; 9 P. Div. 20, 145) the default occurred before the commencement of the voyage, and the Master of the Rolls there says (51 L. T. Rep. N. S. 559; 9 P. Div. 147): "Although the negligence occurred before the vessel started, its effect was continuous, and operated while the ship was on her voyage." It is quite true that, in that case, the act of negligence operated with respect to the ship, whereas in the present case it operated with respect to the goods; but I do not think that that constitutes a fatal distinction, and I therefore think that the plaintiffs are entitled to judgment.

WILLS, J.—I am of the same opinion. The case is not free from difficulty, and the course which the argument took is an illustration of the danger of trying to arrive at the meaning of a term in a particular contract by the aid of the construction placed upon the same term in a contract of a totally different nature. In this case there is, I think, singularly little to be gathered by way of illustration from the cases. With regard to cases dealing with bills of lading the words which we have to construe are, in the generality of cases, found in connection with a number of other words which have such a large effect in limiting or extending their meaning that we can gather but little from them as to the construction of the words when standing, as they do here, by themselves. In the same way with reference to the case of The Warkworth (ubi sup.), the section of the Merchant Shipping Act there construed deals with a state of things so different from this contract of insurance, that we are in danger of being misled, rather than guided, by the construction of the word in such widely different circumstances. Looking, then, at the contract itself, the covenant which we have to construe was clearly intended to indemnify the owner of any ship entered on the books of the association from any losses he might sustain by reason of the goods he may be carrying in the ship being damaged. The circumstances under which he is to be indemnified are not confined to cases in which there is no negligence on his part, because the majority of the cases to which the articles of association apply are cases in which the shipowner or his servants are guilty of negligence, so that there is no force in the argument that he ought not to be protected from the consequences of his own negligence in sending the ship to sea in an unfit state. The question we have to decide is as to what was in contemplation of the parties to this contract at the time they entered into the agreement. The only case which is sufficiently germane to the present to throw light upon it is that of Good v. The London Steamship Owners' Mutual Protecting Association (ubi sup.). In that case a literal interpretation was placed upon the words "improper navigation" occurring in a contract of indemnity. Damage was done to goods which were being carried in the ship, and it was held that these words covered a state of things which did not endanger or even delay her. The only difference between that case and the present is that there the improper act was done, and the improper condition of the ship with respect to the cargo supervened while the ship was on the voyage. Here these things occurred before the ship set sail. Is that a valid distinction? I do not think that this distinction was present to the minds of those who prepared this contract. If those who framed it had intended to draw this fine distinction between an improper condition of the ship with respect to the cargo before she set sail and after she set sail, they would have introduced words to indicate the distinction. The case of a ship sent to sea with the hatches open has been discussed, and it is not denied that, if that were done, and the hatches were left open, the weather being such that the act would not impede or endanger the ship, but would damage the cargo, there would be improper navigation of the ship with respect to the cargo. What is the difference between failing to remedy that defect, and failing to stop up the hole which was in this case left open in the ship's side? The only difference I am able to see is, that in the one case the cause of the mischief would be apparent, and in the other it would not be so, which is equivalent to saying that in the one case there would be a negligent act, and in the other there would not; and therefore to draw this distinction would be to construe the term "improper navigation" as implying and depending upon negligence. I agree, therefore, with my brother in thinking that the sending of this ship to sea with a hole in her side was improper navigation of the ship with respect to the goods, and that there must be judgment for the plaintiffs, with costs.

WILLIAMS v. THE BRITISH MARINE MUTUAL INSURANCE ASSOCIATION LIMITED. (a)

Marine insurance—Mutual association—Annual policies—Forfeiture for nonpayment of contribution—Set-off of contribution against loss.

By the rules of a marine insurance association, the members insured each other's ships from noon of Feb. 20 in any year, or from the date of entry of a vessel, until noon of Feb. 20 in the succeeding year; and the managers were empowered to levy contributions of one-fourth part of the estimated annual premium quarterly in each year, such premiums of insurance to form a fund for the payment of claims; and if any member should refuse to pay his contributions thereto, his respective ship or ships should cease to be insured, and he should thenceforth forfeit all claims in respect of any loss.

On the 5th April 1881 a loss incurred in the year 1880-1 upon a ship belonging to the plaintiff, and insured in the association, was fixed by an average adjuster at 180*l. A call of* 41*l.* 10*s., made on the plaintiff on the 5th May* 1881 for the second quarter of 1881-2, was by mutual consent set off against the loss. On the 13th May 1881 the association paid the plaintiff 100*l. on further account of the loss. On the 23rd June* 1881 a call was made on the plaintiff of 52*l.* 16*s.* 8*d., and on the 5th July* 1881 another call of 31*l.* 4*s. The plaintiff having tendered the balance due from him, the association refused to accept it, and during the pendency of an action to recover the full amount of the two calls one of the plaintiff's ship insured in the association was wholly lost.*

Held, on case stated, that as the calls were in respect of matters relating to the 1880-1 policy, and it was not shown that they were in respect of his ship insured as aforesaid, the plaintiff's ship did not cease to be insured, and that he had not forfeited his claim in respect of the loss.

THIS was a case stated for the opinion of the court by an arbitrator, pursuant to a submission entered into by the parties to the action.

The case was, so far as material, as follows:—

CASE.

1. The question in this case is whether Mr. William Humphrey Williams is entitled to recover against the British Marine Mutual Insurance Association under two polices of insurance granted to him by the association on the hull and freight of the ship Mathilde.

2. The association is a company limited by guarantee and registered under the Companies Act 1862. It has no capital divided into shares.

3. Mr. Williams was, in 1880, a member of the association, and he had insured therein for twelve months the hull and freight of two ships called the Mathilde and the Oasis. A loss amounting to 19*l.* 10*s.* was incurred in respect of the Oasis, and a loss, the amount of which was disputed, was also incurred in respect of the Mathilde.

4. By a submission, dated the 8th Dec. 1880, it was agreed to refer the question of the amount of the loss on the Mathilde to Mr. Richards, the average adjuster, and on the 5th April 1881 Mr.

(a) Reported by JOSEPH SMITH, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

5. In the meantime, viz., on the 20th Feb. 1881, the policies on the Mathilde expired, and thereupon Mr. Williams insured the vessel afresh in the association for a further period of twelve months, the hull for 600*l.* and the freight for 300*l.*, the premiums amounting to 72*l.* and 30*l.* respectfully. It is in respect of these insurances that the present dispute has arisen.

6. By the rules of the association these premiums became payable in four instalments of 25*l.* 10*s.* each on the 4th May 1881, 4th Aug. 1881, 4th Nov. 1881, and 4th Feb. 1882. By its rules the association was entitled to draw bills for these instalments in advance, but it appeared that in practice the acceptance of such drafts was not insisted upon, and the members were allowed to pay in cash if they preferred to do so.

7. On the 5th May 1881 the association sent to Mr. Williams a draft for 41*l.* 10*s.*, which was intended to represent the second quarter's premium on the Mathilde (25*l.* 10*s.*) and the second quarter's premium (16*l.*) on a fresh insurance of the Oasis. Mr. Williams did not accept this draft, and asked that the amount might be set off against the 180*l.* 8*s.* 6*d.* due to him under Mr. Richards' award. No objection was, in the first instance, taken by the association to this course, and, indeed, it appeared that when drawing for the first quarter's premiums on the 1st March 1881 a similar set-off in respect of a small claim then due under the previous policy on the Oasis had been allowed by the association.

8. On the 13th May 1881 the association paid to Mr. Williams 100*l.* on account of the sum found due to him by Mr. Richards' award.

9. On or about the 23rd June 1881 a call was made on the members of the association, and a draft for 52*l.* 16*s.* 8*d.*, Mr. Williams' contribution in respect thereof, was on that day sent to him for acceptance according to the provisions of rule 4 indorsed on the policies. And subsequently, viz., on or about the 5th July 1881, there became due from Mr. Williams to the association a sum of 31*l.* 4*s.* in respect of a "protection claim" on both ships.

10. These two last-mentioned sums Mr. Williams also asked to have placed against the balance still due to him under the award, and as they exceeded such balance by a few pounds he expressed his readiness and willingness, and he was ready and willing to pay the difference. The association, however, refused to assent to this course, insisting that both amounts, 52*l.* 16*s.* 8*d.* and 31*l.* 4*s.*, should be paid forthwith without deduction, and on the 11th July 1881, a writ was issued to recover the same. In the action so commenced the association also sought to recover the full amount of the draft for 41*l.* 10*s.* mentioned in paragraph 7 hereof, as also 12*l.* 17*s.* 2*d.* the amount of certain "policy charges" which the association had previously represented to Mr. Williams as being due not to it but to a Mr. Evans, who acted as its agent.

11. While the above-mentioned action was pending, viz., on the 3rd Oct. 1881, the Mathilde was totally lost. The association refused to meet any claim in respect of the said loss, either for hull or freight, alleging that Mr. Williams' omission to pay the amounts claimed of him as aforesaid exempted the association from liability by virtue of the provisions of the 5th rule indorsed on the policies.

12. The question for the opinion of the court was whether, under the circumstances aforesaid, the 5th rule applies so as to exempt the association.

The following rules of the association became material in the course of the argument:

2. That the members of this class shall severally and respectively, not jointly or in partnership, nor the one for the other of them, but each only in his own name, insure each other's ships, or shares of ships, from noon of the 20th day of Feb. 1881, or from the date of entry of each vessel respectively, until noon of the 20th day of Feb. then next, and from that time until noon of the 20th day of Feb. in the next succeeding year, and so on from year to year, unless notice to the contrary be given as hereinafter mentioned, against all losses, perils, and damages of what nature or kind soever, which may be sustained or received by their respective ships, or caused or done by them to any other ship or craft, except for personal injury, loss of life, or when on the voyages, in the trades, or under the circumstances hereinafter particularly excepted.

4. The managers are hereby empowered to levy contributions of one-fourth part of the estimated annual premium, which shall be drawn for at two months' date from 1st March, June, September, and December, in each year, such premiums of insurance to form a fund for the payment of claims. Provided always, that if the losses and expenses exceed the amount of premiums so realised, the deficiency shall be made good by an additional percentage on the premiums, to be drawn for as the committee may determine. But should the premiums so realised exceed the losses and expenses incurred, then the surplus to be proportionately returned.

5. That the managers' drafts on any member of this class for his proportion of the annual estimated premium, and for any additional percentage thereon, shall be duly accepted and punctually paid when due; and if any member shall neglect, omit, or refuse to accept any such drafts, or to pay his contributions thereto, his respective ship or ships shall cease to be insured in or by this class, and he shall thenceforth forfeit all claims for or in respect of any loss or average under his policy or policies effected therein, and the managers are hereby authorised and empowered to sue for the amount due from any defaulting member, and if not recovered the loss shall be borne proportionately by all the members.

19. That in case of loss, the owner shall be liable for the amount of estimated annual premium, also additional per centages (if any) from date of entry to date of loss, but if the loss occurs before the 20th August, or within six months of the date of entry, he shall be liable for the annual premium only; in case of sale, the policy may be transferred with the consent of the managers, or the owner released from further liability by an equitable arrangement. In the settlement of claims the managers may retain a sum equal to a year's estimated call, to meet any further demands.

French, Q.C. for the plaintiff.

Barnes for the defendant company.

WILLS, J.—The action in which this special case is stated is brought by Mr. William Humphrey Williams against the British Marine Mutual Assurance Association, of which he was a member, and in which his vessel Mathilde was insured, to recover in respect of the total loss of that vessel which occurred on the 3rd Oct. 1881. This question must clearly depend upon the contract between the parties, and to ascertain what that was one must look at the policy, and at the policy alone. That document says that the plaintiff is insured on the Mathilde in accordance with the rules, conditions, and regulations annexed thereto, which by mutual agreement are to form part of and be of the same force and effect as if inserted in the body of the document. The first question raised is upon the second of these rules, and is whether the transactions of insurance of each separate year are to be treated with or without reference to the transactions of any other year. The 2nd rule says that "the members of the club shall severally and respectively, not jointly or in partnership, nor the one for the other of them, but each only in his own name, insure each other's ships, or shares of ships, from noon of the 20th Feb. 1881, or from the date of entry of each vessel respectively, until noon of the 20th Feb. then next, and from that time until noon of the 20th Feb. in the next succeeding year, and so on from year to year unless notice to the contrary be given." I do not see that there is any room for substantial doubt as to the construction of this rule. The cardinal thing to be observed is that the insurance is intended to be a mutual insurance, and I cannot think that it would be mutual unless each year is dealt with separately and by itself. As all the policies come to an end on the 20th Feb. in each year, the persons entering for the succeeding year may be an entirely different set of persons. They are of course in all probability nearly the same, but still it is possible that there might be a very great change, and the insurance would consequently cease to be mutual unless the transactions of each year were separate, giving rise to a separate set of accounts, to be dealt with apart from the accounts of other years. Many passages in the rules show that this was the intention of the parties. The 2nd clause shows that the policies are to come to an end every 20th Feb., and then the 4th clause provides that "the managers are hereby empowered to levy contributions of one-fourth part of the estimated annual premium, which shall be drawn for at two months date from the 1st March, June, September, and December, in each year, such premiums of insurance to form a fund for the payment of claims, provided always that if the losses and expenses exceed the amount of premiums so realised the deficiency shall be made good by an additional percentage on the premiums, to be drawn for as the committee may determine, but should the premiums so realised exceed the losses and expenses incurred then the surplus to be proportionately returned." It is clear that the "premiums" mentioned in that clause are not premiums in the ordinary sense of the word, and that the foundation of the contract is not the payment of a premium, but an agreement that each member should bear his aliquot share of the losses of the year covered by the policy. The provisions of this 4th clause indeed, are, in my judgment, carefully framed so as to apply to each year by itself, and make its transactions separate. It provides that, if the losses and expenses exceed the amount of premiums so realised—that is, the amount of the original estimate of the losses and expenses, for the phrases "estimated losses" and "estimated premium" are synonymous—then the deficiency is to be made good by an additional percentage on the premiums, and if the estimated premium exceeds the losses, then the surplus is to be returned. Taking all these clauses together, it is to my mind clear that the parties meant that the transactions of each year should stand on their own footing, and that the accounts should be adjusted on that basis. The 19th clause also is important, and points in the same direction. It provides that in case of loss, the owner shall be liable for the amount of estimated annual premium, also additional percentage (if any) from date of entry to date of loss, but if the loss occurs before the 20th Aug., or within six months of the date of entry, he shall be liable for the annual premium only, and in the settlement of claims the manager may retain a sum equal to a year's estimated call to meet any further demands.

Now, although this is a limited liability company, and therefore there is a right of action between the company and each insurer, I cannot see any difficulty in adjusting their rights under this contract. Applying the 19th rule to the present case, is there any defence to the action? In the course of the year, extending from the 20th Feb. 1880 to the 20th Feb. 1881, in which year Mr. Williams was a member of the defendant association, and had insured therein his vessel Mathilde, a loss was incurred upon that ship, the amount of which was disputed, and it was thereupon referred to an average adjuster, who, on the 5th April 1881, fixed it at 180*l.* 8*s.* 6*d.* This amount was due in respect of the year 1880-1, and was to be satisfied out of the contributions of members for that year, and from no other source. The adjustment, however, was not made until the 5th April 1881, and on the 5th May 1881 a call of 41*l.* 10*s.* was made by the association on Mr. Williams, which, it is said, was intended to represent the second quarter's premium for 1881-2 on the Mathilde, and on another ship belonging to Mr. Williams, also insured in the association, and it would seem that the company allowed Mr. Williams to treat that as a set-off against the sum due from the company to him—a very harmless course, because otherwise Mr. Williams would only have had to pay the amount into the coffers of the company with one hand and to receive it back with the other. That call then was settled. On the 13th May 1881 the association paid Mr. Williams 100*l.* on account of the sum due to him. Then on the 23rd June 1881 another call was made upon him by the association for 52*l.* 16*s.* 8*d.* It is not stated in the case in respect of what this call was made, but it is now stated by counsel that it was in respect of losses for the year 1880-1. A contribution therefore is asked of him in respect of the losses of that year, and he desires to set off a loss of the same year. As far as I can see he is perfectly at liberty to do so, and I cannot conceive on what ground it can be contended that he is not. On the 5th July 1881 another call was made on the plaintiff for 31*l.* 4*s.*, and both these last claims he asked to have placed against the balance still due to him under the award, and as they exceeded such balance by a few pounds he expressed his readiness and willingness, and was ready and willing to pay the difference. The association, however, refused to assent to this, and on the 11th July issued a writ to recover both the 52*l.* 16*s.* 8*d.* and the 31*l.* 4*s.*, and also the amount of 41*l.* 10*s.* called on the 5th May, and the Mathilde having been totally lost on the 3rd Oct. 1881, during the pendency of the action, they now refuse to meet any claim in respect of that loss on the ground that the plaintiff having refused to pay his contributions, the Mathilde has, by the operation of the 5th rule, ceased to be insured, and the plaintiff has forfeited all claim in respect of her loss. Now the 5th rule provides that the managers' drafts, or any member's for his proportion of the annual estimated premium, and for any additional percentage thereon, shall be duly accepted and punctually paid when due, and if any member shall neglect, omit, or refuse to accept any such drafts, or to pay his contributions thereto, his respective ship or ships shall cease to be insured, and he shall thenceforth forfeit all claims for or in respect of any loss or average under his policy. But the calls mentioned were not necessarily in respect of the Mathilde, and I see nothing in the case to show that they were so; but, in order to bring the plaintiff and his vessel within the operation of the 5th rule, it must be shown that there was a default in respect of that ship, and its right and liabilities must not be mixed up with that of any other ship. By the rule a forfeiture is only to take place as to a particular ship where there is a default in payment with respect to that particular ship, otherwise there would be no meaning given to the word "respective." There is nothing here to show that the small amount which was left due by the plaintiff on the 5th July was not in respect of some other ship, and the person relying upon the fact that it was not so must establish it. In my opinion it is not shown that the plaintiff was in default in his contributions with respect to that ship. If I am wrong in saying that the forfeiture applies to a particular ship only, and if, according to the true construction of the 5th rule, there is a forfeiture in respect of a ship in case a member is in default in respect of other ships, I think that the proper inference of fact to be drawn from the facts as stated is that the plaintiff was willing to pay the amount which was due on the balance of the account, and would have paid it, but that the defendant company agreed to waive the formality of a tender and to treat what took place as a tender, taking their stand upon their right to make the plaintiff pay the whole of the contributions levied. I am of opinion that the Mathilde did not cease to be insured, and that there was no forfeiture. The plaintiff is therefore entitled to judgment.

GRANTHAM, J.—I am of the same opinion, and I have no doubt that the plaintiff is entitled to recover in respect of this loss. The argument relied upon by Mr. Barnes, that each year's accounts must be considered separately, has considerable weight, but I rely upon the fact that nothing was left undone by the plaintiff which entitles the defendants to say that a forfeiture has been incurred by him. In the case the calls upon the plaintiff's two ships are mixed up, but, as far as the Mathilde is concerned, if we take the calls upon that vessel only, the association actually had money in hand, and it is very startling if, under these circumstances, he is to be told that no set-off can be allowed. I think that the plaintiff is entitled to say that he has paid or tendered all his contributions, and that no forfeiture has been shown.

Bill of lading—Non-delivery of cargo—Damages—Bill of Lading Act 1855—18 & 19 Vict. c. 111, s. 3.

The defendant, the master of a vessel in the cotton trade, signed a bill of lading for 400 bales of cotton said to be shipped on board that vessel, then lying in a port of the United States and bound for Liverpool. The bill of lading was indorsed over to the plaintiffs, who carried on their business in Liverpool. When the vessel arrived at Liverpool, on the 26*th Oct.* 1885, she was found to have on board only 165 bales of cotton; and the defendant informed the plaintiffs that another ship would arrive in a few days with the remainder of the bales. The second ship with 235 bales arrived on the 29*th Oct. The plaintiffs accepted the bales of cotton on board both ships. The price of cotton fell between* 26*th and* 29*th Oct.* 1885. The plaintiffs afterwards brought an action in the County Court at Liverpool against the master of the vessel to recover, on the ground of non-delivery of the 400 bales of cotton, the fall in the market price between the 26*th and the* 29*th Oct.* 1885. The County Court Judge gave judgment for the plaintiffs for the amount claimed. The defendant appealed.

Held, that the County Court judge was right, and the plaintiffs were entitled to recover the loss caused by the fall in the value of the cargo as damages for non-delivery.

THIS was an appeal, by way of motion for a new trial, from the judgment of the County Court of Liverpool in favour of the plaintiffs, who were indorsees of a bill of lading for 400 bales of cotton signed by the defendant, the master of the vessel on board which the bill of lading said they were shipped.

The defendant was master of the steamship the Carbis Bay, which, in September 1885, was lying in the port of Wilmington in the United States.

On the 25th Sept. 1885, the defendant signed the following bill of lading:

Shipped in good order and condition on board the British steam vessel the Carbis Bay, whereof J. D. Tregarthen is master, now lying at the port of Wilmington, North Carolina, and bound for Liverpool, four hundred bales of cotton, being marked and numbered as in margin, and are to be delivered in like order and condition at the port of Liverpool.

This bill of lading was indorsed over to the plaintiffs.

When the bales came to be put on board, the defendant, as master, said that 235 of the bales could go by another vessel, named the Wylo. They were shipped on board, and for these 235 bales another bill of lading was signed by the captain of that vessel, which was afterwards also indorsed over to the plaintiffs.

The Carbis Bay arrived in Liverpool on the 26th Oct. 1885, and the defendant informed the plaintiffs that the Wylo would arrive in a few days.

The Wylo arrived on the 29th Oct. The plaintiffs accepted the 235 bales and the 165 bales in respect of the 400 bales mentioned in the bill of lading. There was a fall in the price of cotton between the 26th and 29th Oct. 1885.

Some time afterwards the plaintiff brought an action in the County Court of Liverpool to recover the fall in the market price of cotton between the 26th and 29th Oct., on the ground that there had been a failure to deliver the cargo in accordance with the terms of the bill of lading.

The County Court judge gave judgment for the plaintiff; the defendant appealed.

By 18 & 19 Vict. c. 111, s. 3:

Every bill of lading in the hands of a consignee or indorsee for valuable consideration representing goods to have been shipped on board a vessel, shall be conclusive evidence of such shipment as against the master or other person signing the same, notwithstanding that such goods or some part thereof may not have been so shipped, unless such holder of the bill of lading shall have had actual notice at the time of receiving the same, that the goods had not been in fact taken on board. Provided that the master or other person so signing may exonerate himself in respect of such misrepresentation by showing that it was caused without any default on his part, and wholly by the fraud of the shipper, or of the holder, or some person under whom the holder claims.

Cohen, Q.C. (Shand with him) for the defendant.—The County Court judge was wrong in holding that there was non-delivery in point of law by the defendant; and that the plaintiffs were entitled to recover as damages the fall of the price of cotton between the 26th and 29th Oct. 1885. This is a mere case of delay in delivering the cargo; and it has been settled that the loss of market resulting therefrom is too remote a consequence to be considered as an element of damage:

The Parana, 36 L. T. Rep. N. S. 388; 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 220, 399; 2 P. Div. 118;
The Notting Hill, 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 241; 51 L. T. Rep. N. S. 66; 9 P. Div. 105.

The plaintiffs accepted these goods, and so are not entitled to damages on such a basis. [Day, J.—There was a clear right of action on the 26th Oct. for non-delivery, which is not lost by subsequent acceptance. The damages would be the value of the goods in the market.] The plaintiffs waived that by accepting the goods.

Pickford, for the plaintiffs, was not called upon.

Day, J.—I am of opinion that the County Court judge was right. The goods in this case were said to be shipped on board the Carbis Bay; but on her arrival at the port of destination they were found not to be on board. The defendant, the captain of that vessel, is estopped from denying that they were on board by his having signed bills of lading to the effect that they were on board. It was known what the market value of the goods at the date of the arrival of the Carbis Bay, and that was the measure of damages. No doubt afterwards the remainder of the goods was brought by another ship, the Wylo, and tendered to the plaintiffs, the indorses of the bills of lading, for what they were worth. The plaintiffs accepted them, and to that extent the claim for damages may be reduced, but the original right to maintain the action remains in full force.

Wills, J.—I am of the same opinion. Under the Act of Parliament, we are bound to assume a state of things which did not exist; we are bound to treat the matter as though the goods were all shipped on board the Carbis Bay. But on the arrival of that ship, she is found not to have the goods on board, and at that moment a right of action for non-delivery of the goods enures to the holders of the bills of lading. What takes place afterwards between the plaintiffs and defendant might have taken place in accord and satisfaction of the original cause of action, but there must have been an agreement to that effect. The delivery ex the Wylo is not delivery ex the Carbis Bay; and the only result of the subsequent transactions between the parties is the reduction of damages. The cases in which the goods had been actually shipped on board, but were a long time on the voyage are different, because there was never a right of action for non-delivery, but only for delay. Motion dismissed.

Stoppage in transitu—End of transit—Purchase by agent in England for foreign principal—Delivery on principal's vessel—Mate's receipts—Bankruptcy.

B. and S., acting as agents in England for a foreign principal, purchased from F. and Co., in England, cement for the New York market; the cement was ordered to be sent alongside a vessel which B. and S. had purchased for their principal, and was shipped on board that vessel; mate's receipts for the cement were taken by F. and Co. and handed on to B. and S., who exchanged them for bills of lading in which B. and S. were stated to be the shippers, and which made the goods deliverable to the order of B. and S. B. and S. gave all necessary directions as to the destination of the goods and the sailing of the vessel. While the vessel was on its way to New York, B. and S. became bankrupt, and F. and Co. claimed as unpaid vendors to stop the cement in transitu. F. and Co. knew not only that the vessel belonged to B. and S.'s principal, but also that the cement was bought by B. and S. for that principal.

Held, that F. and Co. were not entitled to stop the cement in transitu.

This was a motion on behalf of Messrs. Francis and Co. for a declaration that they were on the 2nd March 1885 entitled to stop in transitu 2225 barrels of Portland cement.

Messrs. Francis and Co. were cement manufacturers carrying on business at Vauxhall.

In the latter part of the year 1884 Messrs. Bruno, Silva, and Son, who were merchants carrying on business in the city of London, and acting as agents for a Mr. Burmester, a merchant at Oporto, bought of Francis and Co. the cement in question.

The cement was stated to be required for the New York market.

On the 1st Dec. Bruno, Silva, and Son and (a) Reported by J. E. Vincent, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Francis and Co. met and agreed upon the terms of the purchase, and Bruno, Silva, and Son then informed Francis and Co. that the cement was to be shipped in a vessel that Bruno, Silva, and Son were then purchasing on behalf of their principal abroad, and which was then lying in the West India Docks.

Early in Jan. 1885 the vessel was so purchased by Bruno, Silva, and Son for Mr. Burmester, their principal abroad.

Bruno, Silva, and Son thereupon instructed Francis and Co. to send the cement alongside the vessel. The cement was sent by Francis and Co. alongside the vessel then loading in the West India Docks, and was duly shipped on board.

Francis and Co. knew not only that the vessel belonged to Burmester, but also that the cement was bought by Bruno, Silva, and Son for him. Mate's receipts for the goods as shipped were in due course given by the mate to Francis and Co.'s lightermen, and subsequently handed by Francis and Co. to Bruno, Silva, and Son.

Bruno, Silva, and Son gave all necessary directions to the master of the ship as to the receipt of the goods, the sailing of the vessel, and her destination.

Bills of lading making the cement deliverable at New York to their order, and in which they were described as shippers, were taken by Bruno, Silva, and Son, and dated 12th Jan. 1885.

The vessel sailed in due course to New York with the cement on board.

On the 14th Feb., while the vessel was on her voyage, and while Francis and Co. were still unpaid, Bruno, Silva, and Son became bankrupt.

Francis and Co. thereupon claimed as unpaid vendors to exercise their right to stop the cement in transitu.

On the 2nd March 1885 it was arranged, with the sanction of the official receiver, that instead of stopping the delivery of the cement at New York, Francis and Co. should be considered as having exercised any right of stoppage in transitu to which they were then entitled.

And this was a motion by Francis and Co. to declare that they were so entitled to exercise their right of stoppage in transitu on the 2nd March 1885.

Myburgh, Q.C. and Nicoll for the applicants.—The question is, was there an actual delivery to Bruno, Silva, and Son, or a constructive delivery only? Was the destination New York or London? The destination is the place where the goods are to be sent to by the vendor, and here it was fixed by Burmester as New York. We are to ship the goods. The real question is, are the goods delivered to a person to pass them on? as, if so, the transitus is not at an end. Our directions were that the goods were to be sent on board for shipment and not to be kept there. In Benjamin on Sale, 3rd edit., p. 832, it is stated, "that the question and the sole question for determining whether the transitus is ended is, in what capacity the goods are held by him who has the custody? Is he the buyer's agent to keep the goods? or the buyer's agent to forward them to the destination intended at the time the goods were put in transit?" This is not a case of a delivery of goods to a purchaser's own ship.

[CAVE, J.—Could you have compelled the master to hand you bills of lading?] Yes. They cited

Bowen Rowlands, Q.C. and Linklater for the trustee.—It is clear that here there was an actual delivery by Francis and Co. Their intention was to part with the goods. The transit was over before March. The second destination means that you must give not only the name of the place to which, but also the name of the person to whom goods are to be sent; and Ex parte Miles; Re Isaacs (15 Q. B. Div. 39) shows that the mere fact that the seller knows to what place the goods are going does not make that place the place of destination. Everything shows that the vessel was the place of destination. While the goods were with the lighterman no doubt they could have been stopped.

Myburgh, Q.C. in reply.—We were bound to deliver the goods into the vessel to be carried on, and they accepted them to be shipped to New York.

Cur. adv. vult.

April 6.—CAVE, J.—In this case a motion was made on behalf of Francis and Co. Limited for a declaration that they were, on the 2nd March 1885, entitled to stop in transitu 2225 barrels of cement, under the following circumstances: In 1884 Bruno, Silva, and Son, merchants in London, acting as agents of Mr. Burmester, a merchant of Oporto, bought of Francis and Co., cement manufacturers at Vauxhall, the cement in question, which was stated to be wanted for the New York market, and when the terms of purchase were agreed upon Bruno, Silva, and Son informed Francis and Co. that the cement was to be shipped in a vessel then lying in the West India Docks, and which they were then purchasing on behalf of their principal abroad. In Jan. 1885, when the purchase of the vessel had been completed, Bruno, Silva, and Son instructed Francis and Co. to send the cement alongside the vessel; this was done, and the cement was duly shipped on board. Mate's receipts for the cement were given to Francis and Co.'s lightermen, and handed by Francis and Co. to Bruno, Silva, and Son. Bruno, Silva, and Son gave all necessary directions to the master of the ship as to the receipt of the cement, the sailing of the vessel, and her destination, and took bills of lading making the cement deliverable at New York to their order. On the 14th Feb. 1885 Bruno, Silva, and Son became bankrupt, and thereupon Francis and Co. claimed to exercise the right of stoppage in transitu over the cement, which had not then arrived at New York. It must, I think, be taken that Francis and Co. knew not only that the vessel belonged to Burmester, but also that the cement was bought by Bruno, Silva, and Son for him. I offered, if any doubt existed on the subject, to take measures to have the truth as to the matter cleared up, but Mr. Myburgh declined my offer.

Now upon these facts there can be no doubt that, as between Bruno, Silva, and Son and Burmester, the cement was in transitu on the 14th Feb., and although the cement was put on board Burmester's own vessel, yet Bruno, Silva, and Son, having taken bills of lading, had as against Burmester the right of stoppage in transitu: (Feise v. Wray, 3 East, 93, combined with Turner v. Liverpool Docks Trustees, ubi sup. But the question I have to decide is not what were the rights of Bruno, Silva, and Son against Burmester, who has not become insolvent, but what were the rights of Francis and Co. as vendors to Bruno, Silva, and Son; what as between them was the transitus? The object of the voyage to New York was to effect delivery to Burmester or his agents. It was not contemplated that Bruno, Silva, and Son should have possession at all, except in so far as they got possession by the delivery on board the vessel. As between themselves and Burmester, Bruno, Silva, and Son were to ship the cement on board, and they did so, and are described in the bills of lading as the shippers. As between themselves and Francis and Co., Bruno, Silva, and Son were to receive the cement on board the vessel. The only possession they required was so much as enabled them to fulfil Burmester's instruction by shipping the cement on his vessel. In the course of the argument I asked Mr. Myburgh what the effect would have been if Bruno, Silva, and Son had sent a clerk to the vessel to count the barrels of cement as they were put on board; and he did not seem to find the question easy to answer. It may be that, if Francis and Co. had taken bills of lading making the cement deliverable to their order at New York, the transitus would not have ended, as between Francis and Co. and Bruno, Silva, and Son, until the cement had arrived at New York, and Burmester, or his agent at New York, might, as between Francis and Co. and Bruno, Silva, and Son, have been treated as the agents of the latter to receive possession at New York, and the master of the ship solely as an agent for carriage. This, however, was not done. On the contrary, Francis and Co., knowing that Bruno, Silva, and Son were buying, not for themselves but for Burmester, or at all events for a principal abroad, and that the cement was to be shipped on board that principal's ship, handed the mate's receipts to Bruno, Silva, and Son, who took bills of lading in which they, and not Francis and Co., were described as the shippers. Under these circumstances was there an actual delivery to Bruno, Silva, and Son, or a constructive delivery only? I think there was an actual delivery on the ground that, although they knew that the cement had been bought by Bruno, Silva, and Son for their principal abroad, and that it was loaded on that principal's ship, Francis and Co. did not take bills of lading from the master, but took the mate's receipts to Bruno, Silva, and Son, who themselves handed those receipts to the captain, and obtained from him bills of lading in which they are described as the shippers. When Bruno, Silva, and Son were in possession of the mate's receipts, I see nothing as between themselves and Francis and Co. but their duty to Burmester, which could have prevented their taking bills of lading from the master for any other port, and thus impressing a fresh destination on the cement. They were, I think, when they got the mate's receipts, in actual possession of the goods, and might, so far as Francis and Co. were concerned have impressed a different destination upon them had they thought fit to do so. Suppose, while they had the mate's receipts and before exchanging them for the bills of lading, they had got a telegram from Burmester directing them to send the vessel with the cement to some other port, or to send the cement elsewhere by some other ship, why could they not have done so? If they could have done so, the cement had got into the possession of the vendees in such a way that they could have altered its destination, and if so the transitus was at an end. For these reasons, I am of opinion that, under the circumstances of this case, Francis and Co. had no right to stop the cement, and the motion must be refused with costs.

ADMIRALTY BUSINESS.

Saturday, Dec. 4, 1886.

(Before the Right Hon. Sir James Hannen.)

The England.(a)

Action of restraint—Rights of part owners.

An agreement between the owners of a ship and two persons appointing them ship's husbands and managers, and empowering them to continue to act as such at all times thereafter for the owners, their executors, administrators, and assigns, and giving them the entire management of the vessel does not prevent a dissentient part owner from instituting an action of restraint, and obtaining bail from his co-owners in the value of his shares.

This was a motion by the defendants in an action of restraint, asking to be discharged from their undertaking to put in bail.

The action was instituted by the owner of two sixty-fourth shares in the steamship England, to obtain bail in the value of his shares. The remaining co-owners had entered an appearance, and had given an undertaking to put in bail.

By an agreement, made prior to the vessel being built, between the plaintiff and the defendants and Messrs. Short and Dunn, ship agents, of Cardiff, it was provided as follows: that the owners of the England, their executors, administrators, and assigns, agreed that Messrs. Short and Dunn should act as ship's husbands and managers of the England; that Messrs. Short and Dunn should be and act at all times thereafter, and discharge the duties of ship's husbands and managers for the said steamer; and that Messrs. Short and Dunn should remunerate and appoint the master and crew, and should in all respects have the entire management of the vessel.

The plaintiff was now dissatisfied with the management of Messrs. Short and Dunn, and thereupon instituted the present action.

(a) Reported by J. P. Aspinall and Butler Aspinall, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

Sir Walter Phillimore (with him Dove), for the defendants, in support of the motion.—It is submitted that in the circumstances of this case the plaintiff is estopped from objecting to the present management of this vessel. He has by this agreement bound himself at all times to leave the management of the ship in the hands of Messrs. Short and Dunn, and therefore deprived himself of the ordinary rights of a dissentient part owner:

The Innisfallen, 16 L. T. Rep. N. S. 71; 2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 470; L. Rep. 1 A. & E. 72;
The Talca, 42 L. T. Rep. N. S. 61; 5 P. Div. 169; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 226.

J. G. Baines, for the plaintiff, was not called on.

Sir JAMES HANNEN.—The general principle as to the rights of a part owner who dissents from the employment of a ship is clear, and is that he is entitled to prevent his share of the property being put in jeopardy in a manner which he thinks inadvisable, and is therefore justified in calling on the other owners to give security. He is entitled to bail in the value of his shares, and he then incurs no liabilities, and incurs no profits. But undoubtedly it is possible for a part owner to bind himself not to exercise those legal rights, and the question is whether in this case he has done so. Sir Walter Phillimore has argued that he has so bound himself, but I can find nothing in the facts to support that contention. The agreement among the part owners appointing Messrs. Short and Dunn ship's husbands does not preclude the idea that one or more of them may dissent from the proposed employment of the vessel, and does not prevent any dissentient part owner from exercising his legal rights. The facts would have to be very clear to induce me to say that Messrs. Short and Dunn were by reason of this agreement to have an arbitrary and exclusive management of this vessel so long as she is in existence. If Sir Walter Phillimore's contention were good, all the owners might disagree with the proposed employment of the vessel, and yet be powerless to alter it. I therefore think this motion must be dismissed with costs.

The Princess Helena (Lush. 190) overruled.

(a) Reported by J. P. ASPINALL and BUTLER ASPINALL, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

THESE were two motions in objection to the registrar's report in an action for master's wages and disbursements.

The plaintiff was the late master of the barque Arina, and sued in rem for the recovery of his wages and disbursements.

The action was defended by the mortgagee in possession.

In 1886, while the Arina was at Newfoundland the mortgagee wrote to the plaintiff, telling him he was about to take possession of the ship, and giving him certain orders as to the management of the ship. The master wrote back refusing to take orders from anyone but the owner. On the ship arriving at Swansea, the plaintiff found that the owner had absconded, and thereupon telegraphed to the mortgagee that the Arina had arrived. Thereupon the mortgagee promised that the wages of the crew and master "were all right with him." The master, however, instituted the present action, and arrested the Arina. On the same day the master was discharged, the mortgagee promising to pay him his wages and disbursements, if his accounts were at once sent in.

The action was referred to the Registrar and Merchants, and the plaintiff was ordered to file his accounts, and he did so, claiming his wages to the date of his discharge, ten days double pay and wages to the date of final settlement. Prior to the hearing of the reference, the defendant paid into court the plaintiff's claim, less ten days double pay, wages until the time of final settlement, and costs. The assistant registrar, before whom the reference was heard, allowed the ten days double pay, disallowed the wages to the date of final settlement, and recommended that the plaintiff was entitled to the costs of reference, but not to the costs of the action.

Both parties now moved to vary the registrar's report, the plaintiff claiming to be entitled to wages to the date of final settlement, and the defendant objecting to the allowance of ten days double pay.

The motions were heard before Sir James Hannen, on 14th Dec. 1886, and were ordered to be re-argued on the 7th Feb. 1887, before a Divisional Court, composed of Sir James Hannen, and Butt, J.

L. E. Pyke for the plaintiff.—The registrar was wrong in disallowing wages until the time of final settlement. Upon the authority of The Princess Helena (Lush. 190) he was entitled to ten days double pay, and, if so, it is illogical to say he is not entitled to wages to the date of final settlement. The reasons which make a master entitled to ten days double pay, equally entitle him to wages to time of final settlement. [Sir JAMES HANNEN.—It may be that we, sitting as a Divisional Court, may question the accuracy of Dr. Lushington's decision.] By sect. 1 of the Merchant Seamen Act 1880, that Act is to be construed as one with the Merchant Shipping Acts 1854 to 1876, and as sect. 187 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, has been held to be applicable to masters, the analogous provisions of sect. 4 of the Merchant Seamen Act 1880 should be equally applicable. Even assuming the court were inclined to criticise the decision in The Princess Helena the court would not after this long lapse of years refuse to follow it. Even admitting the ten days double pay not to form part of the master's wages, he can recover it as a "remedy" for the enforcement of due payment of his wages. Assuming the plaintiff's contention to be correct in principle, he is on the facts entitled to ten days double pay, and to wages till the time of final settlement.

Bucknill, Q.C. for the defendant.—The plaintiff is neither entitled to ten days double pay nor to wages till the time of final settlement. Even if The Princess Helena (ubi sup.) is rightly decided, it does not necessarily follow that the Merchant Seamen Act 1880 is applicable to masters. But it is submitted that the decision in The Princess Helena should be overruled. The reasons which induced the Legislature to inflict a penalty on shipowners for withholding payment of seamen's wages have no application to the case of masters. The relation of the master to his owners is such that the master is not in want of that protection which it is necessary the seamen should have. But, apart from outside considerations, the very language of the Legislature is against the plaintiff's contention; sect. 191 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 applies only to the recovery of the master's wages and confines itself to giving him the rights, liens, and remedies possessed by seamen for the recovery of their wages. It does not give him the right to extra payment, which is given to seamen by sect. 187, and as there are no express words so providing, and as this extra payment is a penalty inflicted on shipowners, the language of the section should not be strained to bear a meaning which it is not clear it possesses. The same remarks apply to the plaintiff's contention that he can recover the extra payment as a "remedy" for the enforcement of the payment of his wages.

Pyke in reply.

March 28.—The judgment of the Court was delivered by BUTT, J.—This is an action in rem. The plaintiff, a master mariner, claims 219*l.* 0*s.* 2*d.* as the balance of wages and disbursements due to him, and also ten days double pay, and also wages up to the date of final settlement. Mr. George Chas. Stewart, the mortgagee in possession of the vessel intervened, and it is between him and the plaintiff that the questions now under consideration have arisen. The amounts were in the ordinary course referred to the registrar assisted by merchants. Before the reference came on for hearing, the defendant had tendered and paid into court sums sufficient to satisfy the plaintiff's claim, except the sum of 8*l.* 13*s.* 4*d.* which the plaintiff sought to recover as ten days double pay, alleged to be due to him under the provisions of ss. 187 & 191 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104), and, except an amount alleged to be due to him under sect. 4 of the Merchant Seamen (Payment of Wages and Rating) Act 1880, for wages up to "the time of final settlement." The registrar allowed the ten days double pay, but disallowed the claim for wages up to final settlement. Against this decision each party has appealed. There is also a question raised as to costs.

Sect. 4 of the Merchant Seamen (Payment of Wages and Rating) Act 1880 (43 & 44 Vict. c. 16), provides as follows: "In the case of foreign-going ships—(1) The owner or master of the ship shall pay to each seamen on account, at the time when he lawfully leaves the ship at the end of his engagement, 2*l.* or one-fourth of the balance due to him, whichever is least; and shall pay him the remainder of his wages within two clear days (exclusive of any Sunday, fast day, in Scotland, or Bank Holiday) after he so leaves the ship. (4) In the event of the seamen's wages, or any part therof, not being paid or settled, as in the section mentioned, then, unless the delay is due to the act or default of the seaman, or to any reasonable dispute as to liability, or to any other cause not being the act or default of the owner or master, the seaman's wages shall continue to run, and be payable until the time of the final settlement thereof." But for a case decided by Dr. Lushington in the year 1861, it would have seemed to us clear that the enactment set out above had no reference to master's wages. Sect. 1 provides "that this Act shall be construed as one with the Merchant Shipping Acts 1854 to 1876, and those Acts and this may be cited collectively as the Merchant Shipping Acts 1854 to 1880." By the interpretation clause of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 (sect. 2), the term "seamen" is defined as follows: "Seamen shall include every person (except masters, pilots, and apprentices duly indentured and registered) employed or engaged in any capacity on board any ship." If the matter rested there, the right of the master to wages up to final settlement would seem to be excluded by the very words of the section under which he claims them, no less than by the general scope and tenor of the Merchant Seamen Act 1880. Acting in conformity with this view of the matter the registrar has been in the habit of disallowing claims of masters of wages up to final settlement. But ss. 187 and 191 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, provide as follows: "Sect. 187.—The master or owner of every ship shall pay to every seaman his wages within the respective periods following (that is to say) in the case of a home-trade ship, within two days after the termination of the agreement, or at the time when such seaman is discharged, whichever first happens; and in case of all other ships (except ships employed in the southern whale fishery, or on other voyages for which seamen, by the terms of their agreement, are wholly compensated by shares in the profits of the adventure) within three days after the cargo has been delivered, or within five days after the seamen's discharge, whichever first happens; and in all cases the seaman shall, at the time of his discharge, be entitled to be paid on account a sum equal to one-fourth part of the balance due to him; and every master or owner who neglects or refuses to make payment in manner aforesaid, without sufficient cause, shall pay to the seaman a sum not exceeding the amount of two days pay for each of the days, not exceeding ten ten days, during which payment is delayed beyond the respective periods aforesaid, and such sum shall be recoverable as wages. Sect. 191: "Every master of a ship shall, so far as the case permits, have the same rights, liens, and remedies for the recovery of his wages, which by this Act or by any law or custom, any seaman not being a master has for the recovery of his wages; and if any proceeding in any Court of Admiralty or Vice-Admiralty touching the claim of a master to wages, any right of set-off or counter-claim is set up, it shall be lawful for such court to enter into and adjudicate upon all questions, and to settle all accounts arising or outstanding, and unsettled between the parties to the proceeding, and to direct payment of any balance which is found to be due."

In the case of The Princess Helena, Dr. Lushington held that by virtue of these sections a master has the same right to extra payment as the seaman has, where his wages have not been paid at the proper time. The plaintiff contends that, inasmuch as the Merchant Seamen Act 1880 is to be construed as one with the Merchant Shipping Act 1854; and inasmuch as sect. 191 has been held to give masters of ships the same right to recover extra payment as seamen have; it follows that masters are, equally with seamen, entitled to recover wages to final settlement. Assuming the case of The Princess Helena to have been rightly decided, this is a contention not easy to answer. If that case is accepted as an accurate exposition of the law on the subject, it would seem to force us into giving an effect to sect. 4 of the Act of 1880, which we think was not and could not have been intended by the Legislature. It is worthy of remark in this connection that sect. 4 is by express words limited in its operation to the case of foreign-going ships. In other words, to cases in which there are almost invariably accounts to be settled between masters and owners—cases in which, as applicable to masters, sub-sect. 4 could seldom have any effect. Although the decision in the case of The Princess Helena has been questioned in the profession, and somewhat reluctantly followed in the registry, it has never been discussed in a Court of Appeal. Under these circumstances, notwithstanding the great weight of any judgment of Dr. Lushington, and notwithstanding the length of time during which his decision in the case of The Princess Helena has been followed, it is necessary to consider the accuracy of the law there stated. Some of the reasons for a construction of sect. 191, different from that put upon it by Dr. Lushington, are forcibly stated by that learned judge in the case referred to. He says: "Against the right to extra pay, it may be truly said, that in many respects masters stand in a different position from seamen — they are not inopes consilii like the bulk of common seamen. Also, until the passing of the recent statutes they had in no case a lien for wages on ship; and Lord Tenterden says: 'The master can only sue the owner personally in a court of common law; but as he generally receives the freight and earnings of the ship, and may pay himself out of the money in his hands, he has not often had occasion for the aid of a court of justice to obtain his right.' The master, too, has generally a contract with his owners, which may be deemed a special contract. Moreover, he is almost always an accountant to his owners, and it cannot be expected that they should pay him his wages till his receipts and disbursements be accounted for, and the so doing must take time. Then he may delay his accounts, and it is not just that the owner should be mulcted for his neglect. There is still another reason. If the court should hold that the extra pay may be due, but the right modified or taken away by circumstances, the consequences must be that a door is opened for litigation, a consequence I greatly fear." Coming to the words of the sections of the Act of 1854 (and for the moment we are dealing with the sections of that Act alone), they appear to us to tell in the same direction. The master is, so far as the case permits, to have the same rights, liens, and remedies for the recovery of his wages which any seaman, not being a master, has for the recovery of his wages. What is the extra payment in the case of a seaman? Not wages stipulated for in the contract of hiring, for it forms no part of that contract; but something over and above the wages contracted for, which under sect. 187, "shall be recoverable as wages." If the amount were by the enactment in question made part of the seaman's wages, it would seem unnecessary to say that it should be "recoverable as wages." In point of fact, it is a penalty or forfeiture imposed on the owner for making default in payment of wages; a penalty, moreover, the amount of which is not fixed by the statute, but which is left to be determined by the court, the words of the section being: "Shall pay to the seamen a sum not exceeding two days pay for each of the days not exceeding ten days, during which payment is delayed."

It is not unworthy of remark that in sect. 11 of 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 19, a similar payment is expressly called a forfeiture, that section providing as follows: "And in case any master or owner shall neglect or refuse to make payment in manner aforesaid, he shall, for every such neglect or refusal, forfeit and pay to the seamen the amount of two days pay for each day not exceeding ten days, during which payment shall, without sufficient cause, be delayed beyond the period at which such wages or part wages are hereby required to be paid as aforesaid; for the recovery of which forfeiture the seaman shall have the same remedies as he is by law entitled to for the recovery of his wages." We think, therefore, that the extra payment is not made part of the seaman's wages by sect. 187. Even were it otherwise —were the extra payment made part of the seamen's wages, it would by no means follow that sect. 191 makes a similar extra payment part of a master's wages. By the words of sect. 191, a master is to have, not the same right to wages as the seaman, but only the same rights, liens, and remedies for the recovery of his wages. It does not purport to give the master any additional wages, but only the same rights, liens, and remedies for the recovery of his wages as the seaman has for the recovery of his. This distinction is emphasised by the fact that sect. 187 is one of the sections printed under the heading "Legal Rights to Wages," whereas sect. 191 comes under a different heading, viz., "Modes of Recovering Wages." One of the reasons to which Dr. Lushington says, in the case of The Princess Helena, that he attributed weight, was that the master is not by express terms excluded from the claim to extra payment. With deference we should have thought the more correct view would be that, inasmuch as the extra payment is a penalty, or, at least, something in the nature of a penalty, imposed on the shipowner in the case of his default in due payment of the seaman's wages, it could only be imposed in the case of the master (who, ex hypothesi, is not a seaman) by express words. The extra payment not being by the Act made part of the master's wages, he can nevertheless recover it as a "remedy" for the enforcement of due payment of his wages.

The plaintiff contends that, even if the extra payment be regarded as a penalty, it is one of the means of enforcing due payment of wages given to the seamen, and is, in fact, a "remedy" for the recovery of his wages, and therefore enforceable by the master under sect. 191. We do not think this argument maintainable. Before the enactment in question, the master had no lien on the ship for the enforcement of his claim to wages, except under 7 & 8 Vict. c. 112, s. 16, in case of the bankruptcy or insolvency of the owner. We think full and ample effect may be given to sect. 191 of the Act of 1854, by construing it as giving to masters in all cases a lien, and the consequent remedy in rem, without holding that it also confers upon him the right of recovering a penalty for the nonpayment of his wages in due time. For these reasons we have come to the conclusion that neither under the 191st section of the Act of 1854, nor under the 4th section of the Act of 1880, is the plaintiff entitled to the extra payment he seeks to recover in this suit. The result is that the report of the registrar must be varied by striking out the 8*l.* 13*s.* 4*d.* allowed as ten days double pay. With reference to the costs, we think each party should bear his own costs of the action and of the reference, but that the defendant, having substantially succeeded on the appeal, is entitled to the costs of the appeal.

THE CLAN GRANT. (a)

Pilotage—Gravesend to Northfleet—Tilbury Docks—Rates—Order in Council, May 17, 1882.

The amount to which a pilot is entitled for taking a ship from Gravesend to the outer entrance of the Tilbury Docks, and thence across the tidal basin to the dock gates, is the rate for pilotage from "Gravesend Reach to Northfleet," fixed by Order in Council, May 17, 1882, and the moving of the ship to the dock gates is not within the meaning of the provision in the Order in Council as to "removing a ship or vessel from moorings into a dry or wet dock," so as to entitle him to charge anything beyond the above pilotage rate.

THIS was an action by a duly licensed Trinity House pilot to recover moneys claimed by him in respect of the pilotage of the Clan line of steamships.

The statement of claim was as follows:

The plaintiff is a pilot duly licensed by the Corporation of Deptford-Strond, under the authority of the Acts of Parliament Geo. 4, c. 125, 16 & 17 Vict. c. 129, and 17 & 18 Vict. c. 104, to navigate, conduct, take charge of, and pilot vessels on the river Thames, and into and out of the several docks communicating with the same above Gravesend, at certain specified and legally authorised rates, and as such pilot was employed by the defendants at the said rates as pilot on board the said ships to perform certain services in and about piloting the said ships from Gravesend to the Tilbury Docks, and into the said docks, and in and about mooring the said vessels, and in and about unmooring the said vessels, and in and about piloting the said vessels out of the said docks, and from the said docks to Gravesend, and the plaintiff duly performed the said services and thereby is entitled to demand payment from the defendants at the said rates, but the said defendants have declined and refused to pay the plaintiff, and the plaintiff needs the assistance of this honourable court to enable him to obtain payment of the same.

2. The amount due and owing to the plaintiff in respect of the said services is 30*l.* 18*s.* 9*d.*, particulars of which, exceeding three folios, have been delivered to the defendants.

3. In the alternative the plaintiff claims payment of the said sum for services rendered to the defendants at their request in and about the navigating, conducting, taking charge of, piloting, docking, and undocking the said ships.

The defence, after admitting that the defendants had employed the plaintiff, and that he had piloted their vessels, proceeded as follows:

1. Save as aforesaid the defendants deny the several allegations in the statement of claim.

2. Pursuant to the provisions of 17 & 18 Vict. c. 114, s. 333, sub-sect. 5, and s. 380, and under the authority therein contained, the rates of pilotage to be demanded and received by pilots licensed by the Corporation of Trinity House for piloting ships and vessels within the limits above referred to were fixed by the Trinity House, and were duly approved by Her Majesty in Council on the 17th May 1882.

3. The defendants have always been ready and willing to pay to the plaintiff, and before action offered to pay to the plaintiff, in respect of his said services, all sums due and owing to him according to the rates of pilotage so fixed and approved as above mentioned, but the plaintiff refused to accept the same. The defendants are willing that 12*l.* 18*s.* out of the sum of 30*l.* 18*s.* 9*d.* which has been paid into court by the defendants in lieu of bail in this action shall be paid out to the plaintiff, and they say that the said sum of 12*l.* 18*s.* is sufficient to satisfy the plaintiff's claim.

The Merchant Shipping Act 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104):

Sect. 333, sub-sect. 5. Subject to the provisions contained in the fifth part of this Act it shall be lawful for every pilotage authority, by bye-law made with the consent of Her Majesty in Council, from time to time to do all or any of the following things within its districts; (that is to say,) to fix the rates and prices, or other remuneration, to be demanded and received for the time being by pilots licensed by such authority, or to alter the mode of remunerating such pilots in such manner as such authority may, with such consent as aforesaid, think fit, so that no higher rates or prices be demanded or received from the masters or owners of ships in the case of the Trinity House than the rates and prices specified in the table marked U. in the schedule hereto.

Sect. 358. Any qualified pilot demanding or receiving, and also any master offering or paying to any pilot, any other rate in respect of pilotage services, whether greater or less, than the rate for the time being demandable by law, shall for each offence incur a penalty not exceeding ten pounds.

The schedule referred to in sub-sect. 5, sect. 333, was amended by the following Table of Rates approved by Her Majesty in Council on May 12, 1882:

Table of the rates of pilotage to be demanded and received by pilots licensed by the Corporation of Trinity House of Deptford-Strond, or acting as such under the authority of the Acts of Parliament 6 Geo. 4, c. 125, 16 & 17 Vict. c. 129, and 17 & 18 Vict. c. 104, for piloting ships and vessels within the limits in the said table mentioned:

	To	22 feet.
From Gravesend Reach and vice versâ.	Northfleet	£1 18 0
	Moorings, London Docks, City Canal, or St. Katharine's Docks...	8 8 0

The several rates and prices specified above are subject to a reduction of one-fourth part in respect of vessels propelled by steam.

For removing a ship or vessel from moorings into a dry or wet dock, or from one part of the river situated above Greenwich to another part of the river so situated; or for mooring or unmooring a vessel with two anchors; or for putting a vessel alongside a pier or wharf, and remaining while cattle or merchandise are being discharged or taken on board; or for mooring vessels laden with petroleum in accordance with the harbour regulations; or for attendance while adjusting compasses, the following charge may be made in addition to the pilotage, viz.:—For a ship above 1000 tons 1*l.* 10*s.*

The following facts were proved at the trial:

Prior to the opening of the Tilbury Dock, the Clan steamships were taken by the plaintiff to the Royal Albert Dock. His services then used to cease at the outer pierhead, and the dock master then took charge of the vessel. The Tilbury Dock is approached from the river by a tidal basin. There are pierheads at the entrance to this basin without any gates, so that steamers going into the dock from the river, pass through the pierheads and cross the tidal basin to the dock gates. On the Tilbury Dock being opened the defendants' steamships were taken there, and the plaintiff navigated them across the basin up to the dock gates. The steamers in question were all over 1000 tons.

The plaintiff's claim was based upon the alleged right to charge per vessel 1*l.* 18*s.*, less one-fourth for steam power, plus 1*l.* 10*s.*

Cohen, Q.C., with him F. W. Hollams (for the defendants), at the end of the plaintiff's case, submitted no case had been made out. The plaintiff is entitled to charge 1*l.* 18*s.*, and no more, and his services come under the head of pilotage from Gravesend to Northfleet. By sect. 333, sub-sect. 5, of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, the rates are prescribed, and no other rate can be charged. [BUTT, J.—My doubt is, whether the rate of 1*l.* 18*s.* covers all the work done by the plaintiff. You see, not only did he pilot the ship up the river, but also took her across the tidal basin.] That cannot be so, because by sect. 358 of the same Act, any qualified pilot who receives or demands any other than the prescribed rate is liable to a penalty. [BUTT, J.—But if he does something outside the services mentioned in the section, is he to get nothing for it?] If, in fact, any hardship is done to the pilots by the existing state of things, the only remedy is a new Order in Council to make fresh rates. [BUTT, J.—I am told by the Trinity Masters that it has been the practice to pay the 30*s.* claimed under the proviso as to "removing a ship or vessel from moorings into a dry or wet dock."] But, in fact, the plaintiff did not remove the ship from moorings into a dry or wet dock, and therefore there is no legal liability on the defendants to pay the charge.

Bucknill, Q.C. (with him Dr. Raikes) for the plaintiff, contra.—The plaintiff is entitled to something more than the mere pilotage rate of 1*l.* 18*s.* According to the prescribed rates, the plaintiff is entitled to charge 8*l.* 8*s.* for removing the ship from "Gravesend to moorings." The word "moorings" is not confined to mooring to buoys, and includes taking a vessel to her berth in dock:

The Adah, 2 Hagg. 326.

The plaintiff, however, has not sought to charge the 8*l.* 8*s.* referred to, and only claims an extra 30*s.* under the proviso as to removing ships from moorings into dry or wet docks. If the plaintiff's services do not come within the schedule, it is submitted that he is entitled to a quantum meruit in respect of his services in taking the ship through the tidal basin.

BUTT, J.—This is a case in which I do not mean to express any opinion on the question which has been raised by Mr. Bucknill as to whether the rate of remuneration charged by the pilot under the tariff—apart from the extra charge of 30*s.*—is sufficient or not. I do not know whether it is adequate or inadequate. If it is an inadequate one, I am sorry I cannot, in my view of the case, give my decision in favour of the plaintiff. But I am very clear that, even if I had the means of deciding what would be a quantum meruit for the whole service, I should not be at liberty to make any award in favour of the plaintiff on that footing. In my view, I am limited to making an order in his favour for such rates, and such rates only, as the terms of the pilotage rate authorise him to charge for the services. The actual services rendered do not seem to me to be expressly provided for in the table, because when the table was made these docks at Tilbury were not in existence. It was not in contemplation that there would be any addition to the duties of pilots such as that of taking a vessel across this tidal basin. That being so, the plaintiff in his claim has resorted to a part of the table under which he is certainly entitled to claim something, but whether it covers his whole claim is another question. According to that part of the table he is entitled, in the case of the Clan Grant, to the sum of 1*l.* 18*s.*, less a fourth on account of her having steam-power, but in my opinion he is entitled to no more. It has been said that he is entitled to charge an additional sum of 1*l.* 10*s.* Let us consider how that additional sum is claimed. It is said he is entitled to it because he has piloted the ship to the lock on the inner side of the tidal basin. The words in the table are "For removing a ship or vessel from moorings into a dry or wet dock." That he has not done, because he did not take her from her moorings. "Or from one part of the river situated above Greenwich to another part of the river so situated." That he has not done. "Or for mooring or unmooring a vessel with two anchors." That was not done. "Or for putting a vessel alongside a pier or wharf, and remaining while cattle or merchandise are being discharged or taken on board." That he has not done. "Or for mooring vessels laden with petroleum in accordance with the harbour regulations." That he has not done. "Or for attendance while adjusting compasses." That he has not done. Therefore he has not done anyone of the several things which by this provision entitle him to the extra charge of 30*s.* That is to my mind too clear to admit of argument. But it is said that he is entitled to charge that because he was entitled to charge a great deal more than he has sought to recover under another part of this table of rates. It is said that he has taken this vessel from Gravesend Reach to "moorings," and "moorings" within the meaning of the table. Were that so he would be entitled to charge not 1*l.* 18*s.*, less a fourth, but 8*l.* 8*s.* less a fourth. That is the contention. To my mind an absolutely conclusive and sufficient answer to that is that "moorings," as used in the table are totally different and distinct things from a berth in the dock. I therefore feel myself forced to the conclusion that this claim is not made out, except as to the rate sought to be recovered under that part of the tariff which provides for dues to be paid for pilotage from Gravesend Reach. That claim was admitted and the money practically brought into court. There must therefore be judgment for the defendants with costs.

THE FIRE QUEEN. (a)

Collision—Lights—Mersey Regulations—Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, arts. 3, 6, 11.

Where in a collision action it is alleged that there has been a breach of the regulations as to lights the question to be determined is whether there has been a reasonable compliance—a literal compliance is not intended; and hence a vessel whose side lights are obscured by the catheads to the extent of two and a half to three degrees on either bow sufficiently complies with the regulations.

The proper place to carry the stern light prescribed by art. 5 of the Mersey Rules is from the centre of the taffrail, so that it is a foot or eighteen inches below it.

THIS was an action in rem instituted by the owners of the Norwegian barque Nordens Dronning against the owners of the steamship Fire Queen, to recover damages occasioned by a collision between these two vessels. The defendants counter-claimed.

The collision occurred about 1 a.m. on Jan. 13, in the river Mersey, about abreast of the Canada Dock.

The facts alleged by the plaintiffs were as follows:—

Shortly after 1 a.m. on Jan. 13 the barque Nordens Dronning, in charge of a pilot and in tow of the tug Great Western, had arrived in the Mersey, a little above the New Brighton Ferry Stage. The Nordens Dronning was of 1087 tons register, and was on a voyage from Pensacola to Liverpool, laden with a cargo of timber. The weather was clear with a slight haze, and the tide was the last of the flood. The Great Western, with her engines going slow, was towing the Nordens Dronning up the river well over to the west side.

The Nordens Dronning had her regulation side lights up and a bright globe light on deck aft, and the Great Western exhibited the proper lights for a tug towing in the Mersey. In these circumstances the pilot, intending to bring the Nordens Dronning to an anchor, ordered the Great Western to slew her round and bring her head to tide. As the Nordens Dronning began to swing, and her head had come round to about S.E., the masthead and red light of the Fire Queen, which had been seen just before from the tug, were observed by those on board the Nordens Dronning about a mile off, and about two points on the starboard bow of the Nordens Dronning. The Fire Queen was proceeding down and well on the east side of the river. When the head of the Nordens Dronning had been swung round to nearly N.E., and she was slowly drifting up in about mid-river, the Fire Queen, which was then about on the starboard beam of the Nordens Dronning, suddenly came round under a starboard helm, and, opening her green light, caused imminent danger of collision. The Fire Queen was at once loudly hailed to put her helm hard-a-port and go astern, but she came on and with her stem struck the starboard side of the Nordens Dronning between the fore and main rigging.

The facts alleged by the defendants were as follows:—Shortly before 1.10 a.m. on Jan. 13 the Fire Queen, of 307 tons register, while on a voyage from Liverpool to Glasgow with a general cargo, was on the east side of the river Mersey, about off the Canada Dock. The weather was hazy, with a slight fog. In these circumstances those on board the Fire Queen saw about 400 or 500 yards off, and about a point on their port bow, one bright light, and immediately after the green light of a steamer, which proved to be the Great Western crossing the river to the eastward, and crossing the course of the Fire Queen, and the helm of the Fire Queen was put hard-a-starboard to go under her stern. The Great Western was carrying only one bright light, or was carrying a second so dim as not to be visible to those on board the Fire Queen. The Fire Queen's head went off under her starboard helm, and just after those on board of her saw the masts of a vessel, which proved to be the Nordens Dronning, in tow of the Great Western, looming through the haze, but her lights were obscured from the Fire Queen, and could not be seen by those on board of her, and she showed no stern light. The engines of the Fire Queen were immediately stopped and reversed full speed, but the two vessels came into collision, the stem of the Fire Queen striking the starboard side of the Nordens Dronning.

The defendants further alleged that the Nordens Dronning did not carry proper or properly placed side lights, but carried lights of such a nature and so placed as to be obscured from the Fire Queen; that she carried no stern light; and that the Great Western was not carrying two bright white masthead lights, as required by the rules concerning the lights to be carried by steamers towing in the Mersey, or was carrying a second masthead light so dim as not to be visible a sufficient distance.

At the trial evidence was given to the effect that the catheads of the barque obscured her side lights to the extent of two and a half to three degrees on either bow, but that otherwise her side lights showed an unbroken light over ten points of the horizon. A Board of Trade surveyor who was called by the defendants stated that had the catheads been removed he would have passed the barque as having complied with the regulation as to side lights, but admitted that had the catheads been removed the side lights would intersect at some point ahead of the ship, and each would be seen across the bows of the vessel. It also appeared that the barque's stern light was placed on the after part of the deck abaft a deckhouse.

By art. 1 of the Mersey Rules, "every vesse exceeding ten tons measurement" shall "observe and obey the New Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea."

The following regulations are material to the decision:—

Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea:—

Art. 6. A sailing ship under way or being towed shall carry the same lights as are provided by art. 3 for a steamship under way, with the exception of the white light, which she shall never carry.

Art. 3 (b) A seagoing steamship when under way shall carry on the starboard side a green light so constructed as to show an uniform and unbroken light over an arc of the horizon of ten points of the compass; so fixed as to throw the light from right ahead to two points abaft the beam on the starboard side; and of such a character as to be visible on a dark night with a clear atmosphere at a distance of at least two miles.

(c) On the port side a red light so constructed as to show an uniform and unbroken light over an arc of the horizon of ten points of the compass; so fixed as to throw the light from right ahead to two points abaft the beam on the port side; and of such a character as to be visible on a dark night with a clear atmosphere at a distance of at least two miles.

Art. 11. A ship which is being overtaken by another shall show from her stern to such last-mentioned ship a white light or a flare-up light.

Mersey Rules, Jan. 5, 1881.

Art. 5. Instead of the light prescribed by art. 11 of the said regulations, a bright white light, similar to the lights mentioned in rule 4, shall be shown continuously from the stern rail of every vessel while under way and in motion, in all weathers between sunset and sunrise.

Sir Walter Phillimore (with him Stubbs) for the plaintiffs.—This collision was solely caused by the negligent navigation of the Fire Queen. Even assuming the barque's side lights to have been slightly obscured by the catheads, the obscuration was so slight that the court ought not to hold the plaintiffs liable for a breach of the rules. As to the stern light, if the court should be of opinion that it was not in its proper place, then it is submitted that in the circumstances the breach of the article could not by any possibility have contributed to the collision:

The Duke of Sutherland, 32 L. T. Rep. N. S. 129; L. Rep. 4 A. & E. 419; 2 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 478.

Kennedy, Q.C. (with him Pickford) for the defendants.—On the evidence it is submitted that the tug was not carrying two bright lights. It is also submitted that the barque was not carrying a stern light in the position required by art. 5 of the Mersey Rules. It was merely placed on the deck aft. [BUTT, J.—I think the proper place for it is to hang it from the centre of the taffrail.] Therefore the rule has been broken, and therefore the plaintiffs are to blame. [BUTT, J.—If the proper thing is to hang it from the centre of the taffrail, then, having regard to the way in which these vessels approached one another, the infringement of the rule could not by any possibility have contributed to the collision.] It is contended that it is not a compliance with the rule to hang it over the stern. The light is to take the place of the light prescribed by art. 11 of the regulations, and, according to the decision in The Main (55 L. T. Rep. N. S. 15; 11 P. Div. 132; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 37), that light should be exhibited to an overtaking vessel which is more than two points abaft the beam. Were it hung over the stern it would not fulfil these requirements. The effect would be to make it less effective than the light prescribed by art. 11, whereas it was intended, in a crowded thoroughfare like the Mersey, to be a greater protection, and hence the provision that it should be shown continuously. The obscuration of the side lights is a breach of the regulations. The courts have always held parties very closely to the rules. If the court should sanction this infringement of the rules, the effect will be to say that vessels may carry their lights so as to leave a certain area right ahead in which an approaching vessel will see no light at all.

Sir Walter Phillimore in reply.

BUTT, J.—In this case the plaintiffs' vessel, the barque Nordens Dronning, was in tow of a steam tug called the Great Western, and she had come into the river Mersey, and was about to be rounded to by the tug to bring her head upon the tide. The tug and the Nordens Dronning came up on the western, or Cheshire side, of the river, and when it became necessary to turn the Nordens Dronning round, proper measures were taken for that purpose. At the same time the steamer Fire Queen was coming down somewhere about half-way between mid-river and the eastern shore, and navigating in her own water. In these circumstances I see no reason to suppose that the tug and her tow were not quite justified in putting their helms a-starboard, and going round when and where they did. The case set up by the defendants is this: They say that as they came down the eastern side of the river they for the first time became aware of the existence of a vessel ahead, or nearly ahead, of them by seeing what afterwards proved to be the white light at the masthead of the steam-tug at not more than 400 or 500 yards distant. I presume it is pretended that they could not see this light—which they admit was a good one—at a greater distance on account of the thickness of the weather. The master of the Fire Queen says, "I thought it was the light of a vessel at anchor. It was slightly on my port bow, and I intended to go down inside of it, leaving it on my port hand, when suddenly a green light, apparently on the same ship, came into view, whereupon I assumed the lights to belong to a steamer standing in across my vessel towards the eastern shore. I at once gave the order to starboard the helm. My vessel cleared the lights, and, had there been nothing else, there would have been no danger; but it turned out—and that was a matter I could not have foreseen—that the vessel showing the lights had a barque in tow, with which I at once collided. I should not have done so had any of the proper indications been given to me of there being a vessel in tow." What indications had the officer in charge of the Fire Queen a right to have? He had a right to have a warning that there was a vessel in tow by the tug exhibiting two lights at the masthead. He had a right to have a green light exhibited by the vessel in tow. Possibly he had a right to have a white stern light shown him. Now, he says he had none of these warnings, and therefore had a right, seeing the lights he did, to act as he did.

First of all, therefore, I have to determine the important question of fact whether the tug had one or two good lights at her masthead. Now, there is a very strong body of evidence to the effect that the tug had up to the time of the collision, and at and after the time of the collision, two perfectly good lights at her masthead. There is, however, a strong body of evidence on the other side to the contrary, and I shall have to determine the matter. But, before dealing with that, I propose to consider whether the barque carried a good green light, and on that I have no hesitation in finding at once that she did. I am speaking now of the exhibition of the light, and not of its position. On the question of its position, I have to determine whether it was properly fixed; that is, was its position a compliance with, or a departure from, the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, or the analogous regulations applicable to the Mersey. Now the Nordens Dronning, like most other vessels, has a cathead, and there is no doubt that it was in the way of the light. Of course, there was the same amount of obscuration on the other side, but it is not necessary to consider that. I think the result of the evidence comes to this: that the cathead obscured the side light for some two and a half or possibly three degrees —that is, considerably less than a third of a point —on the vessel's bow; and therefore, save for that third of a point, this vessel's side lights showed an unbroken light over ten points of the horizon. Now, is it a breach of the regulations for a vessel to have her lights obscured to the extent I have described. It is perfectly certain that a literal compliance with these regulations is not intended. A literal compliance with these regulations as to lights is an impossibility. I will take an instance. A vessel at anchor is required to carry at not more than twenty feet above the water or the deck (I forget which) a light which shall show an unbroken light all round the horizon. If a vessel has any mast or rope which runs to a greater height than the prescribed twenty feet, it is utterly impossible that any lantern could show an unbroken light all round the horizon. A number of other similar instances might be given. I am now only pointing out that the letter of the regulations cannot be complied with. What we must look to is, whether there is a reasonable compliance with the regulations. Now, on the question of lights, we have had several surveyors called, and amongst others a gentleman whose evidence is to be treated with every respect, the Board of Trade surveyor. Now, what he says is this: "I have got the regulations, and I have got my instructions from the Board of Trade, and they would prevent me passing these lights in the position in which they were placed with regard to the catheads." I put some questions to him on the Board of Trade instructions, and the result of following those instructions is, while it frees him from one difficulty it places him in another. The Board of Trade is careful not to have any obscuration of the lights on either bow; but, in ensuring that desideratum, they make a departure from the letter of the rule which, to my mind, is a far more serious matter than the question in this case. It turns out that the Board of Trade surveyor would have passed this vessel if her catheads had been removed, and there had been no obstruction of the lights, although there would have been a greater degree of error by the side sights converging in front of the stem of the ship in the sense that the side lights might have been seen across the bows. I myself do not see how these regulations are in practice to be worked out. There cannot be a strict compliance with the letter of the rules. I am strongly inclined to suspect that the right thing to aim at would be to adhere to the prescribed arc of ten points, starting from two points abaft the beam, and carrying the light so as to allow it to be seen no further forward than an arc of ten points. If that were carried out, there would be a breadth of darkness equivalent to the beam of the ship right ahead. Of course, it is obviously impossible to carry out these requirements to a nicety. You must go as near as you can. My impression is that my proposal is the state of things to be aimed at, because the objection to it would be so very small. But, as it is impossible to comply with these rules literally, one must do the next best thing one can. The question is, whether in this case the departure from the strict requirements of the regulations is a departure which under the circumstances is unreasonable. The question is, whether because this cathead obscured the light to the extent of two and a half or three degrees on the bow, it is a breach of the regulations which is to entail the very severe penalty prescribed by the 17th section of the Merchant Shipping Act 1873. I am not inclined to think it is. I have asked the Elder Brethren a question on this, and they agree with me in thinking that there was a reasonable compliance with the rules regarding lights. I therefore hold that the Nordens Dronning is not to blame for having the green light obscured as it was by the cathead. I asked the Board of Trade surveyor the question where he would fix the lights. He said he would carry them further forward, and would place them some three feet higher. He thought that would be a way of obviating the difficulty, but with that suggestion the Elder Brethren do not agree. I have so far been dealing with this matter as a question under the statute.

When I come to the merits of the case, I have not the slightest doubt in coming to the conclusion, as a matter of fact, that the obscuration of the green light had nothing to do with the collision. I say that because I have no doubt that the Fire Queen and the Nordens Dronning were in such positions that that cathead could not have obscured the light of the barque to those on board the steamer. I now come to the question of the stern light. I have already intimated in the course of the case, after consulting with the Elder Brethren, that this stern light was improperly placed, and was a breach of these regulations, which I understand to have the same statutory effect as the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, and the breach of which therefore entails the statutory penalty prescribed by sect. 17 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1873. Now, had the defective position of that stern light any effect on the collision? I must consider that question. It appears to me it would be a compliance with art. 5 of the Mersey Regulations to hang a white globe lantern from the centre of the taffrail, so that it would hang a foot or eighteen inches below the taffrail. In this the Elder Brethren agree with me. I think the real intention of this rule is to have the stern light so placed that it shall not be seen in front of the stern. If that be the compliance with the rule, what follows? Why, that, had it been there, by no possibility, in my view of the case, could those on board the Fire Queen have seen it before the collision. I know that one or two of the plaintiffs' witnesses, when placing the models, put them in a position in which the stern light, carried as I have suggested it should be, would have been seen by those on board the Fire Queen. But I do not accept those positions as correct. These vessels never were in those positions, and never could have been. But taking it that the collision between the Fire Queen and the Nordens Dronning was either a right-angled blow delivered by the stem of the Fire Queen, or a blow leading aft, it follows to my mind, having regard to the fact that both vessels were under a starboard helm at and before the collision, the Fire Queen never could have been in a position to have seen a light hung over the Nordens Dronning's stern. Therefore, although I find that there was an infringement of this regulation, it was an infringement which could have had no effect upon the collision. Therefore with regard to the green and the stern lights I cannot find the Nordens Dronning to blame. Now let me consider the other matters. I am asked to believe that the tug had only one masthead light, or rather one good masthead light. Undoubtedly, if there was an absence of one of those two lights, the Fire Queen was misled. Two lights would have indicated that the tug had a vessel in tow, and would have put those in charge of the Fire Queen on the alert. Were these two lights burning? That is a question on which there is a conflict of evidence. In dealing with this question I do not forget that the defendants have attacked both the side lights and the stern light, and now are attacking one of the masthead lights. But I have found that they did not see the green light, and may it not be that they did not see this white masthead light? The fact is, I am asked to believe too much in this case. I am asked to believe that too many lights were bad. On the whole I and the Elder Brethren think the tug carried two sufficient masthead lights, and that they ought to have been seen by those on the Fire Queen. As to the weather, it is said the night was hazy. Had it not been so those on the Fire Queen certainly ought to have seen the one masthead light which she admits to have been on the tug at a greater distance than 400 or 500 yards. She is going seven knots an hour; her captain sees a light, one point on his port bow, and 400 or 500 yards off. He could not tell for a minute what that light was. He concludes it is a vessel at anchor, and acts accordingly. It turns out to be a vessel under way. I cannot help saying that, having regard to the state of the weather, the pace at which he was going, and the uncertainty there was with regard to the light, common prudence should at once have dictated his easing his engines. He did not stop at all, but kept on until he got other indications, and so brought about the difficulty with which we have to deal. On the whole I find the Fire Queen alone to blame.

THE BONNIE KATE. (a)

Co-ownership action—Transfer of shares—Bill of sale—Admiralty Court Act 1861 (24 Vict. c. 10), s. 8.

The managing owners of the steamship B. K. in 1882 agreed to sell the defendant V. one sixty-fourth share in the B. K., for which he gave them a bill of exchange for 156*l.*, and received from them a receipt for the same as "being one sixty-fourth share in the s.s. B. K." In 1883 the managing owners sent V. 8*l. in respect of profits on his share, and subsequently sent him a statement of accounts. No bill of sale of the share was ever executed by the managing owners, and it appeared that their shares in the B. K. were mortgaged at the time of the sale to V., and that subsequently they never were in a position to redeem them. Certain of the owners having paid losses incidental to the working of the ship, now sued V. as a co-owner for his proportion of the losses.*

Held, that, notwithstanding the receipt by V. of the 8*l., he was not, either in law or equity, a co-owner, that the managing owners had no authority to pledge his credit, and that therefore he was not liable.*

Quære, whether sect. 8 of the Admiralty Court Act 1861, giving the Admiralty Court jurisdiction to decide questions between co-owners, is not confined to questions between registered co-owners.

THIS was a co-ownership action in personam, in which the plaintiffs, the owners of sixteen sixty-fourth shares in the steamship Bonnie Kate, sought to recover contributions from the owners of the remaining forty-eight sixty-fourth shares.

The defendants, with the exception of a Mr. and Mrs. Vasey, subsequently to the institution of the suit paid their proportions of the ship's liabilities, or became insolvent.

By the defence of Mr. Vasey, it was alleged as follows: That he never was the owner of any share or shares in the Bonnie Kate, and that, if any liabilities had been incurred, they had not been incurred on his behalf, nor with his authority.

Par. 3. On or before the 13th Nov. 1882 the said defendant, at the request and on behalf of his wife Louisa Monkhouse Vasey, contracted with R. H. McBryde and Co., who were the then managing owners of the said vessel, for the purchase of one sixty-fourth share in her for his said wife, and gave the said R. H. McBryde and Co. his acceptance for 156*l.* 5*s.* for the same, and from time to time payments were made on account of the said purchase money, and the bill renewed for the balance until the 15th Sept. 1885, when the balance then due, videlicet 101*l.* 5*s.*, was met by payment by the said defendant on behalf of his said wife to W. F. Orwin, the defendant, who had become managing owner in place of the said R. H. McBryde and Co.

4. The said managing owners had always refused to give to the said L. M. Vasey, or to the said H. J. Vasey on her behalf, a bill of sale of the said share, until the said acceptance was met, but when the same was met by such payment as aforesaid the said W. F. Orwin refused to execute a bill of sale of the said share on the ground (as the fact was) that the said share had been mortgaged, and the said W. F. Orwin had become bankrupt.

Mrs. Vasey, by her defence, after making similar allegations to those contained in Mr. Vasey's defence, proceeded as follows:

(a) Reported by J. P. ASPINALL and BUTLER ASPINALL, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

5. The said contract of purchase was never carried out, and the essential terms thereof have not been performed. Amongst the essential terms of such contract which have not been performed, and of which the performance was never dispensed with by the said Louisa Vasey or any person authorised by her, were the following: that the one sixty-fourth share in the said vessel contracted to be purchased for the said Louisa Vasey as aforesaid, was unincumbered, and would be transferred free from incumbrances to the said Louisa Vasey, and that no interest in the said share should vest in or be assigned or transferred to the said Louisa Vasey until the whole purchase money for the said share had been paid, and the person or persons from whom the said H. J. Vasey had on her behalf contracted to purchase the said share had by bill of sale transferred the legal title to the said share free from incumbrances to the said Louisa Vasey, or as legal owners or owner of the said unincumbered share had lawfully made a valid equitable assignment of the said share free from incumbrances to the said Louisa Vasey.

6. No share or other interest in the said vessel was ever specifically appropriated to the said Louisa Vasey, or to any person acting at her request on her behalf. If any share or interest in the said vessel was ever specifically appropriated to the said Louisa Vasey or to any person acting at her request on her behalf, the share or interest in the said vessel so specifically appropriated to the said Louisa Vasey or any person so acting at her request on her behalf, was not such a share or such an interest in the said vessel as she or the said H. J. Vasey contracted to purchase or consented to own.

7. No bill of sale, or other instrument assigning or transferring or purporting to assign or transfer any share or other interest in the said vessel to the said Louisa Vasey, or to any person acting at her request on her behalf, was ever executed, and no equitable assignment of any share or interest in the said vessel was ever made to her, or to any such person acting at her request on her behalf.

At the hearing, the plaintiffs called Mr. Orwin, one of the defendants, and a late member of the firm of McBryde and Co., and also put in certain documentary evidence.

The effect of the evidence was as follows:—On Nov. 13, 1882, Mr. Vasey agreed to purchase one sixty-fourth share in the Bonnie Kate from McBryde and Co., who were the managing owners of the vessel. In payment he gave a bill for 156*l.* 5*s.* and received the following receipt:

Nov. 14, 1882.—Received from H. J. Vasey, Esq., acceptance at four months, due March 4, 1883, for one hundred and fifty-six pounds five shillings, being 1-64th share in the s.s. Bonnie Kate.—McBRYDE and Co.

In Feb. 1883 McBryde and Co. sent Mrs. Vasey a cheque for 8*l.* inclosed in the following letter:

Newcastle-on-Tyne, Feb. 19, 1883.—Mrs. L. M. Vasey.—Madam, We beg to hand you cheque 8*l.* on account of profits on your share in Bonnie Kate s.s. A statement of account will be sent you at the end of the month. Please return the enclosed receipt and oblige yours, etc., McBRYDE and Co.

A statement of accounts was subsequently sent to Mrs. Vasey.

In cross-examination Mr. Orwin admitted that no bill of sale of the said share had ever been executed, that at the time his firm sold the share to Mr. Vasey all the shares held by his firm were mortgaged and had never been redeemed, and that during the negotiations between his firm and Mr. Vasey his firm had been in pecuniary difficulties, and never were in a position to pay off the mortgage.

The defendants called no witnesses.

J. P. Aspinall for the plaintiffs.—On the facts of this case it is clear that Mr. Vasey, and not Mrs. Vasey, was the owner of the share, and therefore he is liable in this action. [BUTT, J.—Whether Mr. or Mrs. Vasey is liable, is a minor consideration. My difficulty is to see how either of them is liable.] The fact that no bill of sale was ever executed does not relieve them of liability. In equity they were the owners of this share. They took the profits, and therefore they are liable for the losses. The defendant Vasey had a contract enforceable in equity for the execution of a bill of sale of a share in the ship, and he is therefore an owner:

Hughes v. Sutherland, 45 L. T. Rep. N. S. 287; 7 Q. B. Div. 160; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 459; Batthyany v. Bouch, 41 L. T. Rep. N. S. 177; 50 L. J. 421, Q. B.; 4 Asp. Mar. Law. Cas. 380.

Although the defendants never received a legal transfer of the share, they took profits on the ground of their ownership, and they allowed McBryde and Co. to treat them throughout as the owners of the share. Moreover they ought to have seen that McBryde and Co. expended the purchase money in releasing the share. Can it be doubted that, had the ship proved a paying concern, the defendants would not have claimed to share in the profits? The position of McBryde and Co. to the defendants was that of agents to receive profits, and incur liabilities on their behalf. [BUTT, J.—On the question of my jurisdiction in this case, I have some doubt whether it comes within sect. 8 of the Admiralty Court Act 1861. I rather think that the "co-owners" there mentioned must be registered co-owners, and if so, this case is not within the section.] No such construction has ever been put upon the section before, the effect of which would be to narrow its application and so diminish its utility. The word "registered" applies to ships and not to owners.

J. Gorell Barnes for the defendants.—The defendants never became the owners of a share either in law or equity. Their contract with McBryde and Co. was to purchase an unincumbered share. That contract never was carried out, because McBryde and Co. never were in a position to transfer an unincumbered share. The receipt of the profits is not enough to constitute them owners. Had they been receiving profits over a lengthened period of time and acquiescing in McBryde and Co.'s conduct, they might perhaps have been liable. But in fact they receive only one profit, and they receive that upon the assumption that McBryde and Co. will shortly be in a position to execute a bill of sale of the share.

BUTT, J.—In the view I take of this case, it is immaterial to consider or determine whether Mr. Vasey or Mrs. Vasey was the person to whom the share in this vessel was to be assigned. I will therefore treat the matter as though Mr. Vasey had been negotiating this matter on his own behalf. This was the state of affairs. He went to McBryde and Orwin to negotiate with them for the purchase of one sixty-fourth share, for which he gave a bill of exchange for 156*l.* 5*s.* The sale of that share and the taking of the bill were really a fraud on Vasey. Those who sold the share knew perfectly well that they had not got the share to sell, and that it was mortgaged together with their other shares. They therefore ought never to have taken the bill of exchange from Mr. Vasey. Owing to their failure, Mr. Vasey never got his share. He has parted with 156*l.*, all he has received is 8*l.*, and he is now called upon to pay something more out of pocket in respect of a share which he has never got. I believe the real facts were these. There was an agreement by McBryde and Co. to sell one sixty-fourth share to Mr. Vasey. They were not in a position to transfer and they knew it. They did not tell Mr. Vasey so, but they took his money, or rather his bill, which was a fraud, and it was in continuation of that fraud that they paid him the 8*l.* as if he had really got the share in the ship. Is he to be affected by taking this 8*l.* so as to be taken to have given McBryde and Co. authority to pledge his credit, although he had never got a transfer of the share? The 8*l.* was taken in the belief that he would immediately have the share transferred to him. The real question, as I have said before, is, whether McBryde and Co. had authority to pledge Vasey's credit, for if they had, of course Vasey would be liable. I hold that, on the facts of this case, he gave no such authority. Had he been asked if he would allow his credit to be pledged in respect of this share, who can doubt what his answer would have been? I think the plaintiffs' case entirely fails, and I therefore dismiss Mr. and Mrs. Vasey from the suit, and order the plaintiffs to pay their costs.

THE CUMBRIAN. (a)

Salvage—Ship and cargo—Primary liability of shipowner—Verbal agreement for fixed sum.

An agreement made by the master of a vessel in distress to pay salvors a fixed sum is an agreement made on behalf of and pledging the credit of the shipowners so as to make them liable to the salvors for the whole amount so agreed upon, and not merely for such proportion of such amount as the value of the ship and freight bears to the value of the cargo.

The Raisby (53 L. T. Rep. N. S. 56; 5 Asp. Mar. Law. Cas. 473; 10 P. Div. 114) distinguished.

THIS was a salvage action in rem instituted by the owner, master, and crew of the smack John Wintringham, against the owners of the steamship Cumbrian, her cargo and freight.

The facts alleged by the plaintiffs were as follows: The smack John Wintringham, of seventy-seven tons register, was at about 4 p.m. on Sept. 9, 1886, in the North Sea, about forty miles east by north of Fraserburg, returning to Grimsby from a fishing voyage, laden with a cargo of fish. In these circumstances, the steamship Cumbrian was sighted in tow of another steamship, the Arthur, and about a quarter of an hour afterwards the tow rope was seen to part. The smack approached, but, owing to the wind and sea, no communication could be made, and she therefore lay by the Cumbrian throughout the night. On the morning of the 10th the Arthur had disappeared, and the wind having moderated and changed, the master of the smack offered the Cumbrian his assistance, but was told that with the wind as it was he could do no good, and was asked to lay by the Cumbrian till the wind came from a favourable quarter. The smack laid by until the morning of the 14th, when between 8 and 9 a.m. the master of the smack was directed to make fast the tow rope and tow the Cumbrian into the track of steamships. The smack accordingly took the Cumbrian's tow rope, and began to tow about 9 a.m., and continued towing until about 2.30 p.m., when the steamship Swan came up, and was engaged by the Cumbrian to tow her to an east coast port, and the Cumbrian was ultimately saved.

The defendants denied that they had ever asked the plaintiffs to stand by till the 14th, and alleged that they had constantly told them to go. They also alleged that, before the tow rope was made fast, it was verbally arranged between the two masters that the smack should tow the Cumbrian till she got a steamer to tow her for the sum of 70*l.*

The Cumbrian was a steamship of 781 tons net, and was at the time of the services mentioned on a voyage from Whitehaven to Riga. On the 4th Sept. her machinery became disabled owing to the high-pressure cylinder covering breaking, and after being under sail for three days, she on the 7th fell in with the steamship Arthur, and took her assistance. At the time when the action was instituted the cargo on board the Cumbrian had been discharged and delivered to the consignees, and hence it had never been arrested, nor had bail been given for it. The only defendants who appeared were the owners of the ship and freight, and in their defence they alleged (inter alia) as follows:

The said defendants pay into court 51*l.* 13*s.* 7*d.*, such sum being the proportion of the said 70*l.* which, having regard to the values of the Cumbrian, her freight and cargo, the said defendants as owners of the said ship and freight should bear, and they say that sum is sufficient to satisfy the plaintiffs' claim against the said defendants.

Bucknill, Q.C. (with him J. P. Aspinall) for the plaintiffs.— On the evidence it is contended that there was an agreement for the smack to lay by from the 10th till the 14th, and in respect of that the plaintiffs are entitled to remuneration. It is also submitted that it has been proved that there was no agreement to tow for 70*l.* as the plaintiffs allege, and that in respect of the towage, the plaintiffs are entitled to substantial reward.

Sir Walter Phillimore (with him Pyke), for the defendants, was told by the court to confine his argument to the question whether the shipowners were liable for the 70*l.* under the agreement, or only for the 51*l.* 13*s.* 7*d.* paid into court. The decision in The Raisby (53 L. T. Rep. N. S. 56; 5 Asp. Mar. Law. Cas. 473; 10 P. Div. 114) decides the point in the shipowners' favour.

(a) Reported by J. P. ASPINALL and BUTLER ASPINALL, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

[BUTT, J.—This is a very different case. In The Raisby no specific sum is mentioned, whereas here there is a fixed amount.] Dr. Lushington has decided that shipowners are not liable for salvage to cargo, and therefore the defendants are only liable for a portion of the 70*l.*:

The Mary Pleasants, Swa. 224;
The Pyrenee, Br. & L. 189.

Bucknill, Q.C. in reply.—In The Raisby (ubi sup.) no specific sum was mentioned, and the matter of compensation was left to arbitration. In the present case, the shipowners' servant binds his owners to pay a fixed sum, and therefore makes them primarily liable for it:

Anderson, Tritton, and Co. v. The Ocean Steamship Company, 52 L. T. Rep. N. S. 441; 5 Asp. Mar. Law. Cas. 401; 10 App. Cas. 107.

BUTT, J.— I am of opinion, in this case, that there was no employment of the smack to stand by during the four days, or any portion of them. It is clear to my mind that the master of the smack was anxious to get a job, and chose to take his chance of waiting for employment. When an altered state of circumstances arose, and the wind blew from such a quarter that the smack could be of use to the steamer, he was allowed to take her in tow, and towed her some few miles in a westerly direction. The main question is, what were the terms under which he took the rope of that vessel. It is denied by the captain of the smack that there was any specific agreement. He admits that 70*l.* was offered, but says he declined it. He says the rope was given him by the steamer in these circumstances: 70*l.* having been offered and declined, the master of the steamer said, "Well, if you tow me into the track of steamers, it will be to your advantage." The evidence on the other side is very strong to the effect that the 70*l.* offered was accepted, and that the rope was only given on those terms. I have come to the conclusion that there was an agreement for 70*l.* I do not, however, think it matters very much, because, having come to the conclusion that the smack was not engaged to stand by, I think 70*l.* is adequate remuneration for the services rendered. The only remaining question is, whether the plaintiffs are entitled to get the 70*l.* from the defendants. They have paid into court the sum of 51*l.* 13*s.* 7*d.*, which they say is the ship's share, and they seek to avoid responsibility for the balance on the ground that it is payable by the cargo. That is not my opinion. I think as a matter of fact and of law, that when that agreement was come to, it was intended that the shipowners' liability and credit should be pledged. I think that is so in all cases of this sort, and I do not think that proposition is really affected by the case of The Raisby (ubi sup.). There the agreement was substantially this, "Tow me to port, and the amount of remuneration shall be settled by arbitration on shore." That is, all the parties interested were to go before the arbitrator. I do not think it has any bearing on the present case. I hold that the shipowners are personally liable, and that it was intended at the time the agreement was made that they should be personally liable for the 70*l.* I must therefore overrule the tender, and increase it by the difference between 51*l.* 13*s.* 7*d.* and 70*l.*, and I allow the plaintiffs' costs on the County Court scale.

COURT OF APPEAL.

Monday, Dec. 6, 1886.

(Before Lord ESHER, M.R., LINDLEY and LOPES, L.JJ.)

COX, PATTERSON, AND CO. v. BRUCE AND CO. (a)

Bill of lading — Holder for value — Authority of master — Quality marks — Shipping notes— Error of master—Liability of owner.

Where a memorandum on a bill of lading provides that if quality marks are used (on bales of jute) they are to be of the same size as the leading marks, and contiguous thereto, and if such quality marks are inserted in the shipping notes, and the goods are accepted by the mate, bills of lading in conformity therewith shall be signed by the captain, and "the ship shall be responsible for the correct delivery of the goods," and the mate, by mistake, inserts wrong quality marks in the shipping notes, and the master copies such quality marks into the bill of lading, the shipowner incurs no liability to an indorsee without notice of the error who receives the goods actually shipped, because the memorandum does not apply to anything but correct quality marks as existing on the bales themselves, and because the shipowners are not estopped by the representation as to quality in the bill of lading.

SPECIAL CASE.

THIS was an action commenced in the Mayor's Court of the City of London and was transferred by an order dated the 17th March 1886 to this honourable court. The plaintiff's claim against the defendants was for 10*l.* for damages for breach of contract by a bill of lading and the parties concurred in stating the following case for the opinion of the court.

The plaintiffs carry on business as jute brokers in the city of London and the defendants are shipbrokers in London and Dundee, and managing owners of the sailing vessel Panmure.

In the month of Sept. 1883 Messrs. R. Steel and Co., who are merchants at Calcutta, shipped on board the Panmure at Calcutta 500 bales of jute, each 400lb. net. Of such bales 26 were marked ◇R C 1◇; 192 were marked ◇R C 2◇; 282 were marked ◇R C 3◇.

A bill of lading for the same, dated the 28th Sept. 1883, was signed by the master of the said vessel and delivered to the said shippers, the said bill of lading being as follows:

Shipped in good order and condition by R. Steel and Co., on board the ship Panmure, whereof is master for this present voyage Downie, lying in the port of Calcutta and bound for London. Five hundred bales jute being marked and numbered as per margin, and to be delivered in the like good order and condition at the aforesaid port of London (the act of God, the Queen's enemies, loss or damage from fire on board in hulk or craft, or on shore, any act, neglect, or default whatsoever of pilots, master, or crew, in the navigation of the ship in the ordinary course of the voyage, and all and every the dangers and accidents of the seas and rivers and of navigation of whatever nature or kind excepted), unto order or to his or their assigns. Freight to be paid for the said goods at the rate of 2*l.* (two pounds) sterling per ton of five bales, without discount, but otherwise subject to the customary mode of payment average, as accustomed. In the event of claim for short delivery, price to be the market price of the day at port of discharge on the day of the ship's reporting at the Custom House, less charges and brokerage.

Weight, contents, and value unknown.

In witness whereof the master or agent of the said ship has signed three bills of lading exclusive of the master's copy all of this tenour, one of which being accomplished, the others to stand over.

Dated at Calcutta the 28th Sept. 1883,

JAMES DOWNIE.

(In the margin.)

If quality marks are used they are to be of the same size as the leading marks and contiguous thereto, and if such quality marks are inserted in the shipping notes and the goods are accepted by the mate, bills of lading in conformity therewith shall be signed by the captain and ship shall be responsible for the correct delivery of the goods.

2 = 251 B/s.
3 = 223 B/s.

The said bill of lading was afterwards indorsed by the said shippers for valuable consideration to the plaintiffs to whom the property in the goods thereby passed who took and had the said bill of lading without any notice of incorrectness in the description of the goods in the said bill of lading.

The said bill of lading is in the customary form of bills of lading in the jute trade for sailing vessels between Calcutta and the United Kingdom. That form and no other has been in use since April 1881 in the said trade of which the defendants were always since that date, and at the time of the shipment in question, aware, and they have, since April 1881, always used the same form for their vessels engaged in the said trade.

Jute is shipped of various qualities, which are indicated on the bales when packed by letters of the alphabet, or by the numbers 1, 2, and 3, No. 1 indicating first quality, No. 2 second quality, and No. 3 third quality. These letters and numbers respectively are termed quality marks.

In the said bill of lading the mark R C is the leading mark borne by each of the 500 bales, and the numbers 1, 2, and 3 are respectively the quality marks, and the numbers 26, 251, and 223 are respectively intended to indicate the number of bales of each quality.

It is admitted that quality marks were used on the goods that were shipped as aforementioned, and that such quality marks were of the same size as the leading marks and contiguous thereto. It is also admitted that the same quality marks and the same number of bales of each of such quality marks as appear in the said bill of lading were inserted in the shipping notes, and that the goods actually shipped were accepted by the mate of the said vessel, and that the said bill of lading was signed by the master of the said vessel in conformity with the said shipping notes.

On the arrival of the Panmure in London, and the discharge of the cargo, the defendants delivered to the plaintiffs the 500 bales of jute mentioned in the 2nd paragraph hereof, and being of the quality and bearing the quality marks therein described, and not of the quality and bearing the quality marks stated in the said bill of lading. There were thus delivered to the plaintiffs fifty-nine bales less of the No. 2 quality, and fifty-nine more of the No. 3 quality than appear from the said bill of lading.

It is admitted, however, that the defendants delivered to the plaintiffs the same 500 bales which they received from the shippers.

The difference in value to the plaintiffs between the bales which were delivered to them and those described in the said bill of lading is to be taken at 10*l.*

A statement containing particulars of the voyages made and the cargoes carried by the Panmure from 1875, the date of her being built, and until Sept. 1883 (when she loaded the goods in question), was put in and formed part of the case.

The question for the opinion of the Court was, whether the defendants were liable to the plaintiffs for the non-delivery of goods of the quality and bearing the quality marks stated in the said bill of lading.

If the Court is of the opinion in the affirmative, then judgment in the action shall be entered for the plaintiffs for 10*l.* and costs, including the costs of this case.

If the Court is of the opinion in the negative, then judgment in the action shall be entered for the defendants with costs, including the costs of this case.

Barnes for the plaintiffs.—The question here is, whether a bill of lading which is in customary form, and contains an entry of quality marks describing the goods shipped, is binding on the shipowner when, on arrival of the goods at port of destination, the marks on them do not correspond to those in the bill of lading, but show that goods of an inferior quality have been shipped. The plaintiffs contend that it is binding. The case turns on the construction which amounts to a stipulation that, if quality marks on the cargo are used, the ship shall be responsible for the correct delivery of the cargo. This clause is well recognised in the jute trade. The goods here were clearly misdescribed; and this action is not an attempt to make the shipowner liable for goods not shipped, but to obtain a decision to enable parties to rely on this clause in the margin which was inserted with the consent of the jute trade. It is admitted law that the captain cannot sign for goods not received; but these bales were received, but misdescribed in the shipping notes and bill of lading, and the clause was introduced to meet this very point:

Howard v. Tucker, 1 B. & Ad. 712.

Bills of lading were made out for these goods, and were indorsed over to the plaintiffs.

Reid, Q.C. (Hollams with him) for the defendants.—The ship is not liable except for goods actually put on board. The defendants rely on 18 & 19 Vict. c. 111, s. 1. The indorsee is asking for larger rights than the consignee of the goods would get. It is perfectly clear that, but for this marginal clause in the charter-party, the shippers would not be liable. It is contended that the parties had not as their intention in inserting it to make the shippers liable for misdescription. It is a merchants' clause, and consists of the parts (1), if quality marks are used they are to be of the same size as and contiguous to the leading marks—this is to facilitate the delivery of identical goods; (2) if such quality marks are inserted in the shipping notes, the ship shall be responsible for the correct delivery of the goods so marked. The second contingency is that, if these marks are inserted in the shipping notes, and the goods are accepted, bills of lading in conformity shall be signed, and the ship shall become responsible for the correct delivery of the goods.

Mathew, J.—I confess that my mind has fluctuated in the course of the argument, but in the end I have come to the conclusion that the shipowner is not responsible in respect of this condition, and the ground for my opinion is that the condition upon which the shipowner undertook to be responsible has not been complied with. The shipowner as a general rule, and apart from the special contract, would have nothing to do with the contents of these bales; he has nothing to do then with the quality of the contents of the bales, and protects himself with the clause "weight, contents, and value unknown" (which is found in this bill of lading) against any loss. It becomes of very great importance to the shippers that they should be able to obtain bills of lading which they can negotiate upon the footing that there is on board the ship goods of a certain quality. Here it seems that there are three qualities of jute which are the subject of commercial transactions. The shipper and the shipowner having come to terms with reference to the requirements of the shipper, the special contract is the result of the arrangement between the two; and I think that we must construe this condition according to the ordinary sense of the language used. There is of course a great deal in the argument of Mr. Barnes, who tells us what the meaning and intention of all parties was, but we are not entitled to look beyond the language that is used in dealing with the terms of the clause in question. This is the bargain between the shipper and the shipowner: "If quality marks are used they are to be of the same size as the leading marks and contiguous thereto, and if such quality marks are inserted in the shipping notes and the goods are accepted by the mate"—what is to follow? that the shipper shall be entitled to bills of lading in conformity therewith—"the ship shall be responsible for the correct delivery of the goods." Now what happened in this particular case was that the quality marks were of the same size of the leading marks which were upon the bales, but those quality marks were not inserted in the shipping notes, but different marks, and somehow or other these goods were passed by the mate. Having been passed by the mate, the shipping notes were returned in the ordinary way to the shipowner's office, and the captain signed the bills of lading corresponding with the shipping notes. The result was that the bills of lading having been signed and having been parted with for value to the indorsee a demand was made on the shipowner here to deliver the goods in accordance with the terms of the bill of lading, that is bearing the quality marks therein referred to. The shipowner was prepared to deliver the very bales that had been received, but it was said "under the terms and conditions you are responsible for delivering all goods as described in the bill of lading." The answer of the shipowner is "No; because the conditions upon which the ship was to be liable for the correct delivery of the goods have not been complied with." Now, if both those conditions were omitted, the shipowner was not to be liable. Why is he to be liable if one and a most material condition has been omitted—a condition which imposes upon the shipper the obligation to see that the correct quality marks were inserted in the shipping notes, those being the documents upon which the captain proceeds when he signs the bill of lading. Any other construction of this contract appears to me to expose the shipowner to the negligence or fraud of the shipper, and I cannot suppose it was intended that any such responsibility should be thrown upon the shipowner. I have very little doubt that Mr. Barnes was right in saying that the great object was to make these bills current, and to give the holder of the bill of lading some security against the ship, but I am not satisfied that it was ever meant that a shipowner in a case like this (if the case had been put to me) should be made responsible for the negligence of the mate of the ship, or the negligence that would have been nothing if it had not been for the preceding negligence of the shipper of the goods. Therefore, not being clear that the language that has been used in this case does impose this liability on the defendants, I give judgment in their favour.

Smith, J.—I am of the same opinion. I am bound to say, that I have had considerable difficulty on account of the argument which has been pressed upon us by Mr. Barnes, who says that, unless we put his construction upon this marginal note in the bill of lading, we do not give any intelligible construction to it at all. I am not so sure about that, the salient point here is, that it is said that under this bill of lading the goods owner can come down upon the shipowner for goods which were never put on board at all. Well, that is a very startling proposition. But, it is said that this contract is such that, although the shipowner can prove conclusively that he has delivered to the goods owner at the port of destination every bale of goods, which the shipowner's agent or the consignor put on board, yet, he is bound to make good to the goods-owner goods which were never put on board. To my mind, it requires a very conclusive contract to make me believe that was ever the intention of the parties. What is done here is patent upon the figures. There were fifty-nine bales too little of No. 2, and fifty-nine too many of No. 3 in the note. The mate passes it. They get the whole 500 bales right on board, but on the shipping note there were fifty-nine too many of No. 2, and fifty-nine too few of No. 3. He gets the whole 500 on board, and when he comes here the shipowner says, "There are your 500 bales which you put on board." "Yes," says the goods-owner, "It is admitted those are the 500 put on board, but the quality marks are wrong, you must make good the deficiency between fifty-nine of No. 2, and fifty-nine of No. 3." I agree with what my brother Mathew says as to the way we should read this marginal note in the bill of lading. Mr. Barnes asks us to read it, that this is a contract by the shipowner to make good any goods that are not put on board. Well now, upon what condition can he say we are to do that? It says, "if quality marks are used," you must read in these "on the bales"—that is quite manifest. Well, if such quality marks are used on the bales then they must be of sufficient size; that is, of the same size as the others. "And if such quality marks," what is the meaning of that? Does it mean quality marks that are not on the bales, because that is Mr. Barnes's contention? He reads it, "If such quality marks," that is marks that are not on the bales, "are inserted in the shipping notes, and the goods are accepted by the mate, then the ship shall be responsible, and the goods-owner may sue him." What are we to do with the word "such." It seems to me impossible to read the word "such" as meaning quality marks different from those on the bales. It means, "If such quality marks on the bales are inserted in the shipping notes which you bring to the mate, and the mate then accepts the goods, then if the goods are marked as agreed, and the shipping notes have the same quality marks upon them, the ship shall be responsible for the correct delivery of the goods. It has been pointed out by my brother Mathew, that if there was not some such clause as that, the shipowner need not trouble himself about quality at all, as long as he delivered the marks apart from quality marks, that is, the leading marks. It seems to me, that the shippers wanted the bill of lading over here to negotiate, and to show persons what it was they had got on board. Well, they wanted to show the qualities of jute on board, whether Nos. 1, 2, or 3 jute, and the bill of lading would be negotiated on those terms, But, that does not prove that the shipowner under this contract has agreed that if the shipping notes are brought with wrong marks upon them, he will make good any loss to the shipper. It seems to me that it means nothing of the sort, and I cannot help coming to the conclusion that this marginal note is certainly not strong enough in its phraseology to bring about what Mr. Barnes wants, namely, that the shipowner willl make good the goods of the goods-owner, although the goods-owner never put the goods on board the ship at all.

Judgment for the defendants with costs.

From this judgment the plaintiffs appealed.

Dec. 6, 1886.—Bigham, Q.C. and Barnes for the plaintiffs.

Reid, Q.C. and Hollams, for the defendants, were not called upon.

Lord Esher, M.R.—The first point is whether, upon the true construction of the bill of lading, there is a breach of contract by the shipowners in respect of which the plaintiffs, as indorsees of the bill of lading for value, can maintain their action. What is the meaning of this bill of lading? Now, in the first place, whatever meaning it would have as between the shippers and the shipowners, it must also have as between the indorsees and the shipowners. Before the Bills of Lading Act the action would have been brought in the name of the shipper. The only effect of that Act is to enable the indorsee of a bill of lading to sue in his own name. He has precisely the same rights as the shipper. The question, therefore, comes to be whether the shippers could have sued in this case. The memorandum in the margin of the bill of lading is, "If quality marks are used, they are to be of the same size as the leading marks and contiguous thereto, and, if such quality marks are inserted in the shipping notes, and the goods are accepted by the mate, bills of lading in conformity therewith shall be signed by the captain, and the ship shall be responsible for the correct delivery of the goods." It seems to me obvious that the words "such quality marks" refer to the marks actually upon the bales of goods. The mate might reject any of the goods on the ground that the marks on the bales were incorrect; but if he accepts the goods and inserts the marks that are upon them in the shipping notes, then they are to appear in the bills of lading, and they will bind the ship. In the present case, the marks on the bales were not correctly inserted in the shipping notes. The memorandum, therefore, does not apply. It is said that if the memorandum is so constructed it has no meaning. Even if that is so we cannot help it. It is said that we must construe the words so as to give them some effect; but, if the words which the parties have used have no effect, we cannot give effect to some supposed intention by altering those words. It is immaterial whether the construction we place on the words results in their having any effect or not. I do not say that that construction makes them of no effect. All I say is that it is immaterial.

Then it is said that the plaintiffs, being indorsees of the bill of lading for value without notice, are entitled to rely on the marks in the bill of lading. All the goods that were put on board have been delivered; and it was decided in terms, in Grant v. Norway (10 C. B. 665), that a bill of lading, which is signed by the master in respect of goods not on board, does not bind the shipowner. That case was decided, not merely on the ground that the captain has no authority to sign a bill of lading in respect of goods not on board, but on the ground that the authority of the captain is limited to doing what it is usual for captains to do, and is known to be so limited by persons in business. It is said that the captain has authority to deal with the weight of the goods put on board, so as to bind his owners; and, no doubt, that is true. But it is impossible to contend that he has authority to estimate, determine, and state on the bill of lading so as to bind the owners the particular mercantile quality of the goods. How could a shipowner with any safety give his captain authority to determine questions as to quality, which require special skill and knowledge? But it is said that the captain was bound to see that the marks on the bales were correctly inserted in the shipping notes. There is nothing in the case to show that, irrespective of the particular contract, the quality marks had by the custom of the trade become a recognised part of the marks which it was his duty to insert. I also doubt whether the indorsee being placed by the Bills of Lading Act in the same position as if the contract between the shippers and shipowners had been made with him, can stand for this purpose in any different position from that of the shipper. The decision of the court below was, therefore, right.

Lindley, L.J.—This was an action brought by the indorsee of a bill of lading against the shipowner, and upon the argument before us two points have been raised; First, as to what liability the shipowners have incurred by the terms of the bill of lading; secondly, as to the effect of representations of quality in the bill of lading. It is said that the memorandum in the margin of the bill of lading should be construed so as to make the shipowner liable for the correctness of certain distinguishing marks, known as quality marks, inserted in the shipping notes; but that would be to reject the word "such," which there is no reason for doing. If the quality marks that are upon the bales are inserted in the shipping notes, then the shipowner is to be responsible for the correct delivery of the goods. In such a case it becomes the captain's duty to see that the bills of lading are made out in conformity with the marks in the shipping notes. It is said that to construe the words is to give no effect to the provision; but the provision makes it obligatory upon the captain to insert the quality marks in the bill of lading if they are in the shipping notes. It may be that he would not be bound to do that without such a provision. In this case the quality marks are not correctly inserted in the shipping notes, and consequently the memorandum does not apply, and there is no breach of contract. But then it is said that the quality marks incorrectly entered in the bill of lading are a representation binding the shipowners as against bond fide holders of it for value. But the shipowners can only be liable for a representation by the captain if it is within the scope of his authority. The captain has no authority whatever to enter the quality marks in the bill of lading unless this memorandum gives it to him. The limits of the captain's authority to enter quality marks in the bill of lading appear upon the face of that document. He has only authority to enter quality marks in the bill of lading, when the marks used on the bales are correctly inserted in the shipping notes. It appears to me, therefore, that this case is governed by the decision in Grant v. Norway.

Lopes, L.J.—The first question is whether what is written in the margin of this bill of lading applies to the circumstances of this contract. I think that it clearly does not. In this case it is perfectly clear that the actual marks on the bales never were inserted in the shipping notes. It is said that if that is necessary to make the memorandum applicable, its provisions are useless. I am not of that opinion. It appears to me that it imposes upon the captain the duty of inserting the quality marks in the bills of lading, when these are correctly inserted in the shipping notes. But even if our construction would make the memorandum useless, we could not alter the words in order to give them some effect. There has been, therefore, no breach of the contract of carriage. But it is said that though the shippers would have no remedy against the shipowners, yet the indorsees of the bill of lading have one, because of the negligence of the master in signing a bill of lading which incorrectly represented the quality marks of the bales shipped. But the master had no authority to insert the quality marks at all, except such as was expressly given to him; and, therefore, there was no authority in him to bind the owners by any representation as to quality, except in accordance with the terms of the memorandum. I think that this case comes well within the principle laid down in Grant v. Norway. "If, then, from the usage of trade, and the general practice of ship masters, it is generally known that the master derives no such authority from his position as master, the case may be considered as if the party taking the bill of lading had notice of an express limitation of the authority; and, in that case, undoubtedly he could not claim to bind the owner by a bill of lading signed, when the goods therein mentioned were never shipped." I think that that is an authority for the decision in this case, and that this appeal must be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

Henderson Brothers v. The Mersey Docks and Harbour Board. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION.

Liverpool Dock rates—Mersey Dock Acts Consolidation Act 1858 (21 & 22 Vict. c. xcii.), s. 230.

A vessel sailing from Glasgow with part of its cargo, entering the docks at Liverpool and taking on board more cargo, but not discharging any, and proceeding thence to a foreign port, there discharging and loading a cargo, sailing to Liverpool, entering the docks there, discharging cargo, and then returning with the remainder of her cargo or in ballast to Glasgow, is only liable to pay to the Mersey Docks and Harbour Board such dock rates as are payable by vessels trading inwards to Liverpool from Glasgow, and by vessels trading inwards to Liverpool from the foreign port (Lord Esher, M.R. dissentiente).

Per Lord Esher, M.R.: Such a vessel is liable to pay such dock rates as are payable by a vessel trading outwards from Liverpool to such foreign port.

This was an action tried before Mathew, J., in London, in which the plaintiffs, as owners of vessels trading between Liverpool and Glasgow and foreign ports, alleged that the defendants, as the harbour authority for the port of Liverpool, had charged rates for the use of the docks there which were excessive and illegal.

The practice with regard to the voyages of the plaintiffs' ships was that they took in a portion of their cargo at Glasgow; proceeded thence to Liverpool, where they entered the docks and completed their loading, but discharged no cargo; and thence proceeded to some foreign port, generally in India, where they discharged. They then loaded a full cargo in the foreign port for the United Kingdom; and sometimes came back to Liverpool, and having discharged cargo in the docks there, proceeded with the rest of their cargo or in ballast to Glasgow, or sometimes came back to Glasgow direct.

(a) Reported by A. H. Bittleston, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

By the Mersey Dock Acts Consolidation Act 1858 (21 & 22 Vict. c. xcii.), s. 230, it is provided that,

All vessels entering into or leaving the docks shall be liable, according to the tonnage burden thereof, to pay to the board the rates hereinafter called Dock Tonnage Rates, mentioned in the schedule B to this Act annexed, according to the several and respective classes of voyages described in such schedule, that is to say, to or from the port of Liverpool from or to any parts or places in such schedule mentioned, and such rates shall be paid to the board by the masters or owners of such vessels, and shall be charged as follows:

Vessels trading inwards shall be liable to the rates payable in respect of the most distant of all the ports from which such vessel shall have traded to Liverpool.

Vessels arriving in ballast, but trading outwards, and also vessels built within the port of Liverpool or trading outwards, shall be liable to the rates payable in respect of the most distant of all the ports to which they shall trade outwards, and vessels built within the said port on first trading outwards, shall be liable to one moiety only of such rates, but shall thereafter pay full rates.

Vessels arriving in ballast at and departing in ballast from the said port shall be liable to one moiety only of the rates payable to the most distant of all the ports for which such vessels shall clear out or depart.

One arrival with one departure of a vessel shall be considered as one voyage, whether such vessel shall have traded both inwards and outwards, or arrived or departed in ballast, and without regard to any intermediate ports between which she may have traded while absent from Liverpool, but such vessel shall be liable to the rates payable in respect of the most distant of all the ports to which such vessel shall have traded; vessels arriving in ballast and trading outwards, and vessels built in the port of Liverpool and trading outwards, and having paid the rates payable on such trading outwards, shall afterwards, on trading inwards, be liable to the rates payable on vessels trading inwards.

By schedule B. the rates payable by vessels entering the docks from or leaving the docks for other ports in England or foreign countries were set out, the rates varying according to the distance of the country specified from the docks, the rate being 4½*d.* a ton for vessels trading from or to Scotland, 1*s.* 5*d.* per ton from or to India. The defendants had charged the dock tonnage rates as on vessels trading outwards to the foreign port in respect of the use of the docks on the vessel's way to the foreign port; and had charged rates as on vessels trading inwards from the foreign port in respect of the use of the docks on the vessel's return to Liverpool.

Mathew, J. held, that the defendants were entitled to charge the dock rates in respect of the plaintiffs' vessels as for vessels trading inwards from Scotland, and that they were entitled to charge the dock rates as for vessels trading outwards to India, but that this voyage and the return voyage from India to Liverpool made one arrival and one departure to be considered as one voyage within the meaning of the statute, and that they were therefore not entitled to charge in respect of such return voyage as for a vessel trading inwards from India.

Against this decision both the defendants and the plaintiffs appealed.

Finlay, Q.C., French, Q.C., and T. F. Squarey, for the defendants.

The Attorney-General, Cohen, Q.C., and Joseph Walton, for the plaintiffs.

The arguments sufficiently appear from the judgment of the court.

Cur. adv. vult.

May 21. — The following judgments were delivered:—

Lord Esher, M.R.—The Liverpool Dock Acts are a long series of statutes dealing with a complicated and technical business, a business which has been developing enormously from period to period. The statutes are therefore necessarily complicated, probably wanting in consistency, and therefore obscure, certainly full of terms and phrases usual in the business, unusual in ordinary colloquial language. The great canon of construction of such documents is to learn the business, and the language of the business with regard to which they are written, and then to construe the documents by applying them to that business and to that language. The business in the present case is that of a great seaport and harbour with docks, the whole adapted, constructed, and managed, for the importation and exportation of goods by sea. In order to carry on such a business, the principal elements are deep channels, beacons, buoys, lights, quays, dock entrances, docks, and warehouses. The staff of persons employed must be various, including pilots, harbour-masters, dock-masters, labourers, police, clerks, &c. The income necessary to maintain so vast a business must be collected from those who use the harbour and docks. They are used by ships, which come to and use them for the purpose of carrying goods. In such a seaport both ships and goods must be subject to the customs. The terms and phrases used in statutes and documents applied to such a business will therefore be those commonly used by merchants and shipowners in regard to ships and to the import and export of goods, and by revenue officers with regard to the business of the customs relating to ships and goods. The income in such cases is collected by a system of rates, and the chief rates are almost necessarily, from the nature of things, harbour rates, light dues, pilotage dues, dock rates, crane and quay rates. The "harbour rates," and "light and pilotage dues," are applicable to ships coming into and going out of the port or harbour; they are payments for facilities given to the ships, which facilities are equally necessary for the ships, whether they are loaded or unloaded, whether they do or do not enter the docks. The "dock rates" are the payments for the use of the docks, as distinguished from the rest of the port or harbour. The docks give facilities to trading ships with regard to their trade, which is the trade of carrying imported and exported goods, and to the goods with regard to the trade of importing and exporting them as articles of commerce. This case deals more with the docks and the dock rates than with the harbour and the harbour rates. It is right therefore to consider with the greater attention the course of business as to the docks. There is considerable skill and labour in moving a ship in a dock to or from the dock gates; but no one who has not seen it can realise the skill and labour exercised by the servants of the dock board in the conduct and superintendence of the entry or exit of a large ship through the gates of a Liverpool dock from or into the fierce tideway of the Mersey. So far as the ship is concerned, the chief anxiety and labour with regard to the use by her of the docks is the anxiety and labour of her entry and exit. The use of the docks for the goods imported and exported is a use of warehouses, quays, cranes, and the labour of putting the goods into, or taking them out of, the ship. There is, of course, a payment, as of rent, for the time during which ship and goods are in the dock. And there is an immense expense incurred in providing for the safety of ships and goods whilst in the docks. It is obvious that the mode of imposing payment for the various services and facilities thus described required ingenuity. And it was certain to be, and it is the case, that, in order to understand correctly the scheme or schemes of those who have imposed the different rates, one must understand the business with which they were dealing. The light and pilotage dues, and other harbour dues, payable for ships, are easily understood. They are payable in respect of the use of the entrances to the Mersey and of the use of the Mersey. They are therefore obviously payable equally by ships which do, and ships which do not, enter the docks. The dock rates are necessarily extra to these, and are, moreover, the higher rates. It is clear therefore that no ship will enter a dock unless for repairs, or for carrying on its trade, namely, the trade of carrying goods to or from the port of Liverpool. The scheme of payment for the use of the docks by the ship and by the goods, a scheme of payment according to the distance of a port to or from which a ship trades to Liverpool, is based, no doubt, upon good business principles; but it is not easy, and it is unnecessary, to explain the grounds of it. Inasmuch as the dock is, as matter of fact, used only by a ship carrying on its trades (except in the case of repairs), the payment for the ship would be sure to be confined to a trading ship. The trading of a ship consists in her business of carrying goods. The goods which she is thus carrying, as part of her trade, are at Liverpool—goods which she carries to or from Liverpool as a terminus of carriage. The business phrases for the business of the ship in carrying goods to or from such an import or export port as Liverpool, are, in customs phraseology, "vessels clearing inwards or outwards;" in mercantile or business phraseology, "vessels trading inwards or outwards." They are corresponding phrases used to describe the same transaction. Ships which do not carry goods into Liverpool to be there delivered are not by the customs "cleared inwards" to Liverpool, or in business said to be ships "trading inwards" to Liverpool. No business men would, in my opinion, think of saying that a ship which came into Liverpool with a declared intention of not delivering any goods there, and which delivered no goods there, was a ship "trading inwards." They are in customs and business phraseology said to be ships "entering into Liverpool." Ships which do not carry goods by taking them in at Liverpool to be carried elsewhere are not by the customs "cleared outwards" from Liverpool or in business said to be ships "trading outwards" from Liverpool. They are in customs and business phraseology said to be "ships sailing" or "outward bound." The "clearing inwards" is the authority from the customs to "trade inwards;" the "clearance outwards" is the authority of the customs to "trade outwards." So far as the use of the Liverpool Docks is concerned, the trading of the ships means taking goods on board in a dock to be carried elsewhere, or bringing goods into a dock to be delivered to the consignees from that dock. Either of these transactions may happen under different circumstances: First, a ship may come into the dock empty in order to take goods on board and leave the dock loaded; or, secondly, she may come into the dock loaded in order to discharge her goods there, and to leave the dock empty; or, thirdly, she may come into the dock loaded in order to discharge her goods there, and then to load another cargo and leave the dock loaded. There was, I will venture to say, no other state of circumstances (unless she was to come or stay in for repairs) in which, as matter of business and fact, it was, when the original Liverpool Dock Acts were passed, contemplated that a ship would be in a Liverpool dock. The exceptional mode of dealing adopted by the plaintiffs must have arisen at a later period.

The statutes should be first construed according to the usual business which existed when they were enacted. Then it will be necessary to determine how they apply to the exceptional and more novel case. The main point is to see whether the statutes have adopted, as to old existing business, the business phraseology. If they have, we must apply that phraseology to the case under discussion. Having read all the statutes brought before us, it appears that all of them deal with the different rates in, as nearly as possible, the same terms. Attention and examination may therefore be confined to the statute 21 & 22 Vict. c. xcii., passed in 1858. The title divides the subject as I have stated that business must divide it, namely, into a dealing with the docks and a dealing with the port and harbour. The rates are, in the first part of the Act, described to be dock rates, tonnage rates, graving dock rates, harbour rates, wharf rates, warehouse rents, town dues, anchorage dues. The fourth part deals with the management of the docks and quays, and with the absolute control given to the harbour masters and dock masters over the entry and exit of ships into and from the docks. The fifth part deals with the management of the port and harbour; the sixth part deals with the pilotage. The pilotage rates are dealt with in sect. 133, and are imposed in respect of piloting "a vessel" "to the port" or "out of the port"—no limitation of the vessel being a "trading ship;" no mention of going into "dock." They are payable by every vessel "coming to" or "going out of" the port. The seventh part deals with transit sheds, warehouses, and goods. The eleventh part deals with rates and duties. This part divides "the tonnage rates," which is a general nomenclature, into "dock tonnage rates" and "harbour rates," following the business division. By sect. 238, "all" vessels "coming into" or "going out" of "the port" of Liverpool, and not entering the docks, shall be l able, &c., to the tonnage rates, hereinafter called "harbour rates," &c. It must be observed that these are to be paid by all vessels, and they are said to be vessels "coming into" and "going out of;" not trading into or trading out of the port. By sect. 239, "The objects for which such 'harbour rates' shall be levied, &c., are: The maintenance of the lighthouses, light ships, buoys, beacons, sea marks, land marks, telegraphs, lifeboats, &c., and the improvement of the port and harbour in any other respect than in the construction and maintenance of the docks, &c." The division, the natural division, as matter of business, is exactly followed in the statute, and the statute imposes the incidence of payment exactly as business would. Bearing this in mind, we must endeavour to construe sect. 230. In it vessels are described as first, vessels "trading inwards;" secondly, vessels arriving in ballast but "trading outwards;" thirdly, the statement is "vessels built within the port of Liverpool or trading outwards." These, it is said, shall be liable to the rates payable in respect of the most distant of all the ports to which "they shall trade outwards." The section continues: "One arrival with one departure of a vessel shall be considered as one voyage, whether such vessel shall have traded both inwards and outwards, or arrived or departed in ballast, &c.; but such vessel shall be liable to the rates payable in respect of the most distant of all ports to which such vessel shall have traded." The first of these divisions corresponds with the second of the business divisions above set forth; the second of these corresponds with the ordinary mode of conducting the first business division; the third division in the statute certainly corresponds with the third business division. The question is, whether the third division in the statute does not also describe that which I have called the exceptional mode of conducting the first business division. It is urged that it does not, because it is said that, in order to make a grammatical conclusion to the phrase, "and also vessels built within the port of Liverpool," you must read "and" instead of "or" as the following word, and that then the exceptional mode is not described. But let us dissect the sentence, and it may be read thus: Vessels arriving in ballast, but trading outwards, shall be liable to the rates payable in respect of the most distant of all the ports to which they shall trade outwards: vessels built within the port of Liverpool shall be liable to the rates payable in respect of the most distant of all the ports to which they shall trade outwards; vessels trading outwards shall be liable to the rates payable in respect of the most distant of all the ports to which they shall trade outwards. If the section be so read, it covers all modes of trading outwards. If it is true to say that, in order to make good grammar, "or" must be read "and," it follows that the circumstances of the trade described as exceptional are not covered by the statute at all. In such a case the ship most clearly, in my opinion, does not "trade" inwards; she "enters into" the dock, but does not "trade inwards." If she is not within the description of a vessel "trading outwards," although in fact she does trade outwards, and uses the dock solely for the purpose of trading outwards, she will pay nothing in Liverpool at the time for the use of the docks. If she should not return to Liverpool, she would have used the Liverpool docks, and would never pay anything for the use of the docks. I cannot think that it is a real business view, and therefore I think it is not the legal interpretation to say, that for the sake of grammar the word "or" should be changed into "and," so as thereby to produce so unbusinesslike a result. The court cannot properly read one word for another used in a statute, unless it is clear beyond doubt that there is a pure error in the record of the word. If there is any reasonable doubt, the word actually used must remain. It seems to me that a ship which goes into a Liverpool dock solely for the purpose of taking goods on board to carry them away from Liverpool is a vessel "trading outwards" within the words of the statute, and must, under and by virtue of the statute, pay the rates as on a vessel "trading outwards," and is not a vessel "trading inwards."

Another part of the contention between the parties raised the question of the construction of the latter part of sect. 230 as to one arrival and one departure to be considered as one voyage. Here, again, let us examine the business in order to see whether it will not teach us the true construction of the statute. If a ship goes into a dock to unload, does unload, and then loads a new cargo before she goes out, she is moved through the dock twice, comes into the gates once and goes out once. If a ship comes into the dock, and unloads, and goes out empty, and afterwards comes in empty, and loads, and goes out, she is moved through the dock four times, comes into the gates twice and goes out twice. One would expect that the payment in the first case would be less than in the second, considering the difference, before explained, of the skill, labour, and anxiety necessarily bestowed on the two operations. To which of these two cases does the enactment in the statute apply? As matter of business to the first, stipulating for one payment for the performance of one operation. It would seem to be bad business to stipulate for the same payment for the performance of the operations as is charged if one only of the two operations is performed. The words of the section are rather more adapted to the first view than to the second. The words are "one arrival with one departure;" they are not "one arrival and one departure;" not "one departure and one arrival." If the words are ambiguous, the business view should prevail. It was suggested in answer to this meaning and this view, that ships enter a dock and discharge in it, and are then moved round to another dock, and then load. If that is so, which is not proved, the removal is made by order of the dock board for its convenience, the removal giving no advantage to the ship, and the board has in the later Acts taken that burden without additional payment rather than alter the incidents of rating, which had been preserved intact through all the Acts. When the mode of rating was first established, there were not many docks in Liverpool, and this suggested removal from one dock to another in all probability did not take place. I am of opinion that the statute deals with the first case in the limitation it confers, and not with the second. In applying these views to the present case, we must notice the contentions raised between the parties. The contention on behalf of the plaintiffs, raised in the correspondence, was that their ships traded inwards into Liverpool from India, and afterwards traded outwards from Liverpool to India, and that these two voyages made one arrival and one departure, to be considered as one voyage. It must be observed that, in order to make this point, the Glasgow ship was represented as commencing her carrying business in India to Glasgow, instead of as commencing in Glasgow to carry to India. The reason is obvious; without so doing the Indian trade would not commence by an arrival at Liverpool, but by a departure from Liverpool. And, in this contention, the voyage from Glasgow to Liverpool and from Liverpool to Glasgow were dropped out. The view of the learned judge, as I understand it, is that the entry into the docks from Glasgow is a trading coastwise by the ship, and she must pay the rates accordingly; but the ship then trades outwards to India and afterwards trades inwards from India, these two making one arrival and one departure to be considered as one voyage; and that the voyage to Glasgow is also a part of the voyage from India. As to these views, I cannot agree that, as matter of fact, the ship trades inwards from Glasgow, or that she is to be considered as doing so within the meaning of the statute. Neither for the reasons I have given can I agree that the two Indian voyages are one arrival and one departure, to be considered as one voyage within the meaning of the statute. I do agree that the voyage from Liverpool to Glasgow, whether carrying cargo or not, is to be considered as one voyage with the voyage from India. I have now all the ships' papers, furnished to us at our request. The ships are not "cleared out" from Glasgow to Liverpool, but from "Glasgow to India viâ Liverpool." The ships, on arrival at Liverpool from Glasgow, are not "cleared inwards." They are not treated as trading coastwise under a "transire" or under a "special coasting order." The captain's report shows that the Glasgow goods are exported to India and are not to be landed at Liverpool. The ships are at Liverpool "cleared outwards" for India. On their return they are "cleared inwards" from India. All this mode of dealing with the ships by the customs seems to me to lead to the same conclusion. I am of opinion that the ship on arrival from Glasgow does not "trade inwards" to Liverpool. She cannot, therefore, in respect of the entry, when she goes into a dock, be liable to "dock dues." By her entry into the Mersey, she has "entered into the port of Liverpool" and is liable to "harbour dues." When the ship enters into the docks and loads therein for India, she is "trading outwards to India" and must pay the dock dues on such a trading outwards. When she returns to Liverpool and enters the docks to discharge, she is "trading inwards to Liverpool from India" and must pay for dock dues accordingly. This voyage cannot, within the statute, be considered as one with the voyage out to India. The voyage to Glasgow is to be considered as one with the voyage from India. I am, therefore, of opinion that the charges imposed by the defendants were correct, and that the judgment should be entered for them. The appeal, in my opinion, should be allowed.

Fry, L.J. delivered the judgment of himself and Bowen, L.J.—The question in the present case turns entirely on the true construction of the 230th section of the Liverpool Dock Acts Consolidation Act 1858, which imposes dock tonnage rates in the port of Liverpool. These rates, it may be at once observed, apply to all vessels entering into or leaving the dock, whilst the harbour rates apply to all vessels coming into or going out of the port, and not entering into the docks. The plaintiffs are the owners of a line of steamers, and the course of business is that each of these vessels starts from Glasgow with a part of her cargo, then goes to Liverpool, enters the docks, unloads no part of her cargo, takes in more cargo, sails for India and thence returns sometimes to Liverpool, and thence to Glasgow, and sometimes to Glasgow direct. When one of these steamers reaches Liverpool from Glasgow, and enters the docks, is she trading inwards within the meaning of that expression, as used in the section in question? No evidence was adduced as to the meaning of the phrase, if it be a technical one which admits of such evidence. The course of business pursued by the plaintiffs' steamers was at the passing of the Act less common than it is now, but it is not shown to us either by evidence or admission, whether such a course of business was existing or non-existing at that time. We are therefore constrained to ascertain the meaning of the words in question from our knowledge of the English language, aided by the light which the section of the statute throws on them; and by the course of business which we know to be pursued in ports and docks. The words "Trading inwards" would, we think, most naturally and therefore primarily apply to the case of a vessel entering the docks for the purpose of discharging her cargo; but we think that the words may without violence describe also any vessel laden with goods in the course of trade entering the docks for the purposes of her trade, whether loading or unloading, and this includes one of the plaintiffs' vessels arriving from Glasgow; for she is a vessel on a trading voyage; she is a trader; and she enters inwards. Are the words used in the statute in the first of these significations only or in both? The section is far from clear; but a study of it convinces us that the following propositions may be evolved from it. (1) That all vessels entering into the docks as well as all vessels leaving the docks are made liable; (2) that vessels entering the docks are subdivided into two classes, and two classes only, namely, those described as trading inwards, and those described as arriving in ballast; (3) that vessels leaving the docks are capable of subdivision into six classes: first, those trading inwards and trading outwards; secondly, those trading inwards and leaving in ballast; thirdly, those arriving in ballast and trading outwards; fourthly, those arriving in ballast and leaving in ballast; fifthly, those built within the port and trading outwards; and sixthly, those built within the port and going out in ballast; and that all these classes, except the last, are referred to in the section, and are the subject of express charges; (4) that no vessel is to pay both inward and outward rates; (5) that inward rates are to be paid preferentially, as is shown amongst other things by the provision that one arrival followed by one departure is treated as one voyage, and not one departure followed by one arrival; and further, by the enactment of sect. 247, that the rates in question shall be paid on the arrival of the vessel. We have thus stated the conclusions at which we have arrived from a study of the section in question. It is not easy to explain every word in it in accordance with any one of the interpretations suggested to us; nor should we usefully occupy time in a minute criticism of every expression of a somewhat clumsily drawn clause. It may, however, be well to observe that a strong argument was raised on the word "or," in the expression "vessels built within the port of Liverpool or trading outwards," in the third paragraph of the section in question. But, in our opinion, the word "or" must be read "and;" for the general drift of the clause requires this, and in the description of what must be the same class of vessels at the end of the clause, and is therefore strictly speaking a parallel passage, we find the word "and" substituted for "or" and the class of vessels described as "vessels built in the port of Liverpool and trading outwards." If the view of the section above stated be correct, the plaintiffs' steamer when she enters the dock must be either (1) a vessel in ballast; or (2) a vessel trading inwards; or (3) her case is omitted. But she is plainly not a vessel in ballast for her contents are goods — not ballast; no casus omissus can be admitted where the section declares that all vessels entering the port are charged; therefore she is a vessel trading inwards. This conclusion, to which we are driven by the section itself, appears to us for reasons already given to do no violence to the words "trading inwards," and to be in accordance with the general scheme of the enactment which prefers in every case an entering to a leaving charge. It was contended that the dock company are at liberty to charge the plaintiffs' vessels as if the course began in India, and as if one departure with one subsequent arrival constituted one voyage. In our opinion this contention cannot prevail; for in fact each of the vessels has first arrived from Glasgow and not from India, and she is required to pay on that arrival; and secondly the statute declares one arrival with (i.e., followed by) one departure to be one voyage, but contains no declaration in favour of one departure with or followed by one arrival. In our opinion the declaration of the learned judge should be varied, by declaring that the defendants are entitled to charge in respect of every ship of the plaintiffs arriving from Glasgow and sailing for India, as mentioned in paragraph 2 of the statement of claim the dock tonnage rates, as on a ship trading inwards from Glasgow, and in respect of every ship of the plaintiffs arriving from India and sailing for Glasgow, as also mentioned in the said paragraph of the statement of claim, the dock tonnage rate as on a ship trading inwards from India. In our opinion this variation in the judgment ought not to affect the costs of this appeal, which should be borne by the appellants.

THE AUGUSTA. (a)

Collision—Port of Havre—French law—Compulsory pilotage—Duties of pilot.

Although the employment of a pilot by a vessel entering the port of Havre is, by French law, compulsory, such pilot does not as of right, as is the case in England, supersede the master and take charge of the ship, but, according to French decisions, the master remains in charge, the pilot being merely his adviser; hence, though the master may allow such pilot to take charge in fact, the owners are not exempted from liability for damage done to another ship by the negligence of the pilot.

THIS was an appeal by the defendants in a collision action from a decision of Sir James Hannen finding their steamship the Augusta solely to blame for a collision with the plaintiffs' steamship the Chilian.

The collision occurred at about 1 p.m. on the 12th Jan. 1886 in the Bassin le l'Eure at Havre.

The plaintiffs' steamship the Chilian was lying moored to the quay in the Bassin de l'Eure when she was run into by the Augusta.

The defendants denied that the collision was caused by the negligence of themselves or their servants, and alleged that it was solely caused by the negligence of the pilot who was in charge by compulsion of law.

Sir James Hannen found that the collision was occasioned by the negligence of the defendants' pilot, but gave judgment for the plaintiffs on the ground that, according to the French law, the pilot was not compulsorily in charge, and did not supersede the authority of the master.

On the question of compulsory pilotage the plaintiffs and defendants respectively called a French advocate to give evidence as to the law connected therewith. On behalf of the plaintiffs it was alleged that the functions of the pilot were confined to assisting the master in the navigation of the ship by pointing out the local dangers, and the like. On behalf of the defendants it was alleged that the pilot superseded the authority of the master, and that the master was bound to give up the navigation of the ship to the pilot.

As a matter of fact, the orders as to the navigation were given by the pilot and transmitted by the master to the crew. The further facts are fully stated in the report of the case below (6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 58; 56 L. T. Rep. N. S. 58).

The following decrees of the French Government, containing pilotage regulations, were referred to, and are material to the decision:

Art. 34. Tout bâtiment entrant ou sortant d'un port, devant avoir un pilote, si un capitaine refusait d'en prendre un, il serait tenu de le payer comme s'il s'en etait servi. Dans ce cas, il demeurera responsable des événements; et, s'il perd le bâtiment, sera jugé suivant l'article 31 du présent réglement. Sont exceptés de l'obligation de prendre un pilote: les maîtres au grand et petit cabotage, commandant des bâtiments français au-dessous de quatre-vingts toneaux, lorsq'uils font habituellement la navigation de port en port et qu'ils pratiquent l'embouchure des rivières. Mais les propriétaires des navires chargeurs ou tous autres intéressés pouvront contraindre les captaines, maîtres, ou patrons à prendre des pilotes, et ils auront la faculté de les poursuivre devant les tribunaux, en cas d'avaries, échouements, et naufrages occasionnés par le refus de prendre un pilote.

Art. 35. Il est expressément défendu aux pilotes de quitter les navires qu'ils conduiront, avant qu'ils soient ancrés dans les rades ou amarrés dans les ports, ainsi que d'abandonner ceux qu'ils sortiront avant qu'ils soient en pleine mer, au-delà des dangers, à peine de la perte de leurs salaries, de trentre francs d'amende, d'interdiction pendant quinze jours et de plus fortes punitions s'il y a lieu. Il est defendu aux capitaines de retenir les pilotes au-delà du passage des dangers, et aux pilotes de monter à bord contre le gré des capitaines.

Décret du 29 Août 1854.—Pilotage de la Seine.

Art. 216. Tout autre bâtiment destiné pour le Havre ou Honfleur, ou qui étant destiné pour la Seine, doit relâcher dans l'un de ces deux ports, est tenu de recevoir le pilcte de l'exterieur qui se presente le premier, sans pouvoir le refuser sous prétexte d'un trop grand éloignement; toutefois, les pilotes du Havre ne peuvent monter les navires destinées pour Honfleur, et reciproquement, ceux de ce dernier port ne peuvent être reçus à bord des navires destinés pour le Havre que dans le cas où il n'y aurait pas en vue un pilot du lieu de destination se dirigeant sur le bâtiment.

Art. 244. Les pilotes ne peuvent oxiger aucun salaire pour le passage du port dans l'un des bassins, ou de l'un des bassins dans le port, à la meme marée d'entrée ou de sortie. Tout pilote requis pour passer un navire d'un bassin dans un autre reçoit trois francs.

Sir Walter Phillimore and J. P. Aspinall, for the defendants, in support of the appeal.—The defendants are entitled to judgment upon the plea of compulsory pilotage. According to the true constructions of the French decrees on this subject, the pilot does in effect supersede the authority of the master. The case of The Guy Mannering (4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 553; 7 P. Div. 132; 46 L. T. Rep. N. S. 905), upon which the learned President based his decision, is not in point. The Suez Canal Regulations which were under consideration in that case are very different from the French decrees applicable to the pilotage in this case. Should the court accept the evidence of the advocate called on behalf of the plaintiffs, then it is submitted that the reasoning of the French decisions upon which that evidence is based is incorrect and contrary to the principles of English law. This pilot was, in fact, forced upon the defendants, and their vessel was necessarily intrusted to his sole charge, and hence, on the authority of The Halley (18 L. T. Rep. N. S. 879; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 131; L. Rep. 2 P. C. 193), the defendants are relieved from responsibility for his negligence. To found any liability against the defendants, the plaintiffs must establish negligence. If, then, the pilot is only to be looked upon as an adviser, he is equivalent to a living chart, and, as he was a duly qualified pilot, the master was justified in regarding him as a competent adviser, and in following his advice as to the navigation of the vessel. The defendants can only be made liable through their servant or agent, and, as according to French law the master is not personally responsible if a pilot is on board, there is no one through whom the defendants can be made liable.

Bucknill, Q.C., Raikes, and Beard, for the respondents, were not called upon.

Lord Esher, M.R.—This is a perfectly plain case according to the authorities. I will not go further than the authorities in this case. In the case of The Halley (ubi sup.) the duties of the pilot in his relation to the master and as to the power of the master with regard to him, were stated in a statement of defence. There was a replication, and the learned judge in the Admiralty Court held that the replication might, or would, be an answer if it was proved. The Privy Council overruled this. The articles of replication in that case admitted what was said in the articles of defence; it admitted that the articles of defence stated correctly what were the powers of the pilot, and the powers of the captain with regard to the pilot. They were stated as a matter of fact, and that could not be controverted, because it was admitted on demurrer; and when the case came to the Privy Council the judgment was given by Selwyn, L.J. The grounds upon which it was held that in that case the owners were not liable was, that what happened "was a tort occasioned solely by the negligence or unskilfulness of a person who was in no sense the servant of the appellants, a person whom they were compelled to receive on board their ship, in whose selection they had no voice, whom they had no power to remove or displace." If that had been enough, in a considered judgment of the Privy Council, then it would have stopped there; but he goes on, "and who, so far from being bound to receive or obey their orders, was entitled to supersede, and had in fact at the time of the collision superseded, the authority of the master appointed by them." That is the ground of the decision. If the law of France is correctly laid down by M. Clunet in the answer which I have read more than once, that "the pilot is only an adviser, and the captain remains free to obey, or not to obey, the indications given by the pilot," this case does not satisfy that part of the judgment which says: "And who, so far from being bound to receive or obey their orders, was entitled to supersede, and had in fact at the time of the collision superseded, the authority of the master appointed by them." According to M. Clunet, if that was a true description of the relations between the pilot and the captain, the pilot is not entitled to supersede the captain, and the captain is not bound to obey what the pilot says. Therefore this case is not within the authority of the case of The Halley (ubi sup.).

Now we come to the case of The Guy Mannering (ubi sup.). In the case of The Guy Mannering the pilotage was compulsory. There was a collision in the Suez Canal, and what happened was solely the fault of the pilot. Therefore you have to pass from this argument that the mere fact of the pilot being compulsory makes him not the servant of the owners, and therefore the owners are not liable for what was solely his fault. If that is the true doctrine to be laid down, TheGuy Mannering ought to have said so, and ought to have said that the owner was not liable. It is obvious that, in the case of The Guy Mannering, part of what was stated in The Halley did not exist: "And who, so far from being bound to receive or obey their orders, was entitled to supersede, and had in fact at the time of the collision superseded, the authority of the master." In The Guy Mannering he could not supersede the captain, and the captain was not bound to obey him. Was the point taken there? I say that there he was a compulsory pilot and that the pilot was solely to blame, and the point was evidently taken: "It is said that the pilotage is compulsory, and that a shipowner is not liable for the acts of the pilot whom he is compelled to employ." It is obvious that this argument must have been taken and followed pretty well the same lines as the argument taken by Sir W. Phillimore in this case. What did the court decide? It decided that, although it was compulsory, yet, inasmuch as he did not supersede the authority of the captain, it did not come within the English law. By the English law you are not only obliged to take the pilot on board, but he takes command of the ship out of the captain's hands, unless something extraordinary happens. That is the ground upon which the English law always existed. The Guy Mannering states that, and M. Clunet states that the general law of France, as the President points out, is practically to the same effect as the Suez Canal laws which were dealt with in the case of The Guy Mannering. If that is so, this case is entirely on the same footing as The Guy Mannering, which did not intend to overrule The Halley. It is said that the pilot came on board here to take charge of the ship, in a manner which accords with the decision in The Halley. The question is, whether we consider the President was right in adopting the French law as enunciated by M. Clunet. Sir Walter Phillimore objected to the doctrine he enunciated. If the President saw the learned gentleman who gave this evidence, and the manner in which he gave this evidence, I do not see what we can do. We have read the evidence of the two advocates. I do not say anything derogatory to either of them; all I can say is that, having read the evidence of M. Clunet, supported as it is by all the decisions in France, I accept it, and it looks to me as if it were right. If we are going wrong on the law of France, we cannot help it. The evidence of M. Clunet was given before the learned President, and he accepted it. Then it is said that by the law of France the master is not liable. That is going away from the point, and endeavouring to learn what the views of the captain and of the pilot were whilst they were on board the ship, and by that means to come to a conclusion as to what their liabilities were as against the captain, or against the pilot, or against anybody else. With the law of France we are not concerned. We are concerned with the law of England, and in an English action we are bound by the law of France, because the law of France establishes what are the circumstances of the appointment and employment of the pilot. When you find that the pilotage is such that it comes under one head of the English law rather than another, you adopt the terms of the employment according to the English law. I cannot have a doubt myself that the learned President was perfectly right in this case, and that this case comes within the case of The Guy Mannering (ubi sup.). Therefore the judgment of the court below must be affirmed.

Fry, L.J.—My brother Bowen has asked me to precede him in making a few observations on this case. I have very little to add. The case arose in this way: The shipowners were liable primâ facie for the default of the master as their agent. Upon that is engrafted the case of compulsory pilotage, where the pilot, compulsorily taken on board, is, in the language used correctly by Mr. Aspinall, in charge of the ship. He is in charge of the ship, and is entitled to supersede, and does supersede, the authority of the master. It appears to me the pilot is not in charge when he does not so supersede the master, and where the pilot is only the adviser, and where the captain remains free to obey the pilot or not. That is the effect of the decision in The Guy Mannering. Now the question here is really one of fact. The learned President of the Probate, Divorce, and Admiralty Division has found, as a matter of fact, that the French law is, that the pilot is only the adviser, and that the captain remains free to obey him or not. The only question we have to inquire into is, whether the learned judge was justified in the finding. It appears to me that the finding is not only justified, but one at which I should have arrived merely on reading the evidence of the two advocates. In the first place, the evidence of M. Clunet is, to my mind, much more satisfactory than that of M. Lecouflet, who was called for the defendants. In the next place, it appears to me far more to agree with the authorities which have been cited, especially the text writers, whose authority is not entirely denied by the advocate for the defendants. But, in the last place, it appears to me that in the re-examination of M. Lecouflet, he did admit that, according to the law as administered in France, in that system of law the pilot was in effect only the assistant, the aid, and did not supersede the captain. I think, therefore, that the learned judge was justified, and was perfectly right, in the conclusion of fact at which he arrived with regard to the law, and that the pilot coming on board was not entitled to supersede, and did not in fact supersede, the authority of the master.

The Sara. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM BUTT, J.

Master's disbursements — Maritime lien — Bills of exchange—Liability of master—Admiralty Court Act 1861 (24 Vict. c. 10), s. 10.

The master of a ship has a maritime lien for disbursements made on behalf of the ship.

Where a master has incurred liability by drawing bills of exchange for necessary disbursements in respect of the ship, he has a maritime lien on the ship to the extent of that liability, although he has made no payment in respect of that liability.

This was an action in rem for master's disbursements.

By the statement of claim it was alleged that, whilst the plaintiff was serving as master of the vessel Sara, he made necessary disbursements for the ship; that he drew a bill of exchange on the owners for such disbursements; that the bill of exchange had been dishonoured by the owners; and that the holders of the bill were claiming against him. The plaintiff claimed judgment for the amount of the said bill, viz., 182*l.* 19*s.* 4*d.*; for notarial charges; and for interest.

The mortgagees intervened and delivered a defence, which, after denying generally that any money was due to the plaintiff in respect of disbursements, proceeded as follows:

8. The plaintiff has brought this action as agent for, and on behalf of, the holders of the bill of exchange, and the holders of the bill of exchange are suing in the name of the plaintiff. The said holders have no right to have their claim satisfied out of the said ship, and the said defendants submit that the alleged claim of the plaintiff, being made on behalf of the holders of the bill of exchange, ought not to be satisfied out of the said ship to the prejudice of the said defendants.

9. Even if all the averments in the statement of claim are true, which as aforesaid the defendants deny, the said defendants submit that the plaintiff has no right to have his alleged claim satisfied out of the ship to the prejudice of the said defendants.

At the trial it was proved that, on the mortgagees taking possession, they paid the captain his wages, but would not indemnify him against liability on the bill; that, on the bill being dishonoured by the shipowners, a claim was made upon the plaintiff; that the holders of the bill were providing the money to prosecute the action; that, in the event of the action being successful, the money recovered was to go into the pockets of the bill-holders; and that the bill-holders had not released the plaintiff from liability on the bill.

Feb. 14.—Sir Walter Phillimore (with him J. G. Barnes) for the plaintiff.

Finlay, Q.C. (with him Nelson) for the defendants.

Butt, J.—This is an action by a master mariner for disbursements, and the claim resolves itself in effect into one for the amount of a bill of exchange which he drew on the owners of the ship for the sum of 182*l.* 19*s.* 4*d.*, he being then at St. Vincent with the ship. The owners either were then, or since that time have become, insolvent, and the bill has been dishonoured. Notice of dishonour was given to the plaintiff by the holders of the bill, and there is no doubt that, unless they have done something to release him from his liabilities as drawer of this bill, he remains at this moment liable for the amount. Now the defence to the action, a defence put forward by the mortgagees of the ship who have intervened, is this: They say, in the first place, this is not the plaintiffs' action at all; it is the action of the payees and holders of the bills of exchange, and the master is suing as trustee for them and in that capacity alone; and inasmuch as if they had appeared as the plaintiffs they would have no claim against the ship which would not be postponed to the claim of the mortgagees, the master suing for them cannot stand in a different position, and therefore he cannot bring his claim for these disbursements into competition with the claim of the mortgagees. That would be a perfectly sound and good argument if the facts were such as the defendants assert them to be; but, having heard the evidence, I have come to a very clear conclusion that the facts do not warrant the assumption that the master is suing merely as trustee for the payees of the bill. He is undoubtedly liable for the amount of the bill. It is true that the payees have asked him either to sue or to lend them his name to sue in this action, and it is true that if the plaintiff succeeds in recovering in this action the money will go in payment of this bill and go into the pockets of Messrs. Miller and Co., the payees of the bill. But it is equally true that, the moment that money finds its way into the pockets of Messrs. Miller and Co., the master will ipso facto be relieved from his liability to pay the 182*l.*, and therefore I altogether dissent from the notion and from the assertion that the master is suing here merely as a trustee for the payees of the bill, Messrs. Miller and Co. Therefore, the first contention of the defendants fails.

I now come to the second defence, and it is this: The mortgagees say, assuming this action is, as I have held it to be, brought by the master in his own right, still it is a claim for disbursements, and the master has no maritime lien for disbursements. Having no maritime lien he cannot enforce it against the ship, and at all events he cannot enforce his claim against the ship in priority to the claim of the mortgagees. This is a matter which was considered in the court a long time ago, and there are several authorities on the point, the last of which, apart from a recent case to which I will refer by-and-by, was the case of The Mary Ann (L. Rep. 1 A. & E. 8; 13 L. T. Rep. N. S. 384; 2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 294). I confess, had this question come before me in the absence of any such decision as that given in The Mary Ann (ubi sup.) and in the cases which preceded it, I should have had very considerable hesitation in holding that there was any maritime lien for master's disbursements. But there is the case of The Mary Ann (ubi sup.) and the cases which preceded it. Then the defendants say, "True that is so, but the authority of that case is seriously impaired by the decision of The Heinrich Bjorn (55 L. T. Rep. N. S. 66; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 1; 11 App. Cas. 270) in the House of Lords and in the Court of Appeal." I must say, having regard to the language of the section of the Act of Parliament under the consideration of the Court of Appeal and the House of Lords in the case of The Heinrich Bjorn, viz., the 6th section of 3 & 4 Vict. c. 65, it seems to me impossible to say that the case of The Heinrich Bjorn (ubi sup.) has not thrown considerable doubt upon the authority of The Mary Ann (ubi sup.). Had the matter rested there I should have had to consider very carefully what the effect of The Heinrich Bjorn (ubi sup.) really was upon the case of The Mary Ann (ubi sup.) and the cases that preceded it. But there is the case of The Ringdove (55 L. T. Rep. N. S. 552; 11 P. Div. 120; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 28), decided by the President of this division only last year. While I entirely agree with what he says as to the reasoning in the case of The Mary Ann (ubi sup.) not being satisfactory, I still do not think I am authorised in going contrary to his decision in The Ringdove (ubi sup.). I think it is a case decided by a court of co-ordinate jurisdiction, and it is therefore one from which I am not at liberty to depart, and I decline to exercise any independent judgment on the matter. I hold that that case is conclusive upon me, and that if it is to be reconsidered and altered that reconsideration and alteration must be in the Court of Appeal. Therefore I must hold that in this case there is a maritime lien for disbursements, and decide in favour of the plaintiff.

From this decision the defendants now appealed.

Finlay, Q.C. and Nelson, for the defendants, in support of the appeal.—The master of a ship has no maritime lien for disbursements, and therefore the mortgagees are entitled to judgment in this action. The decision in the case of The Heinrich Bjorn (55 L. T. Rep. N. S. 66; 11 App. Cas. 270; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 391; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 1) is an authority in favour of that proposition. The ratio decidendi of that case, both in the House of Lords and Court of Appeal is that the words "the High Court of Admiralty shall have jurisdiction" do not of themselves create a maritime lien. If that be true of sect. 6 of 3 & 4 Vict. c. 65, it is equally true of sect. 10 of the Admiralty Court Act 1861, in which precisely similar words are used. The decisions upon which the plaintiff relies as to the existence of a maritime lien for disbursements are inconsistent with the case of The Heinrich Bjorn (ubi sup.), and have virtually been overruled by it:

The Mary Ann, 13 L. T. Rep. N. S. 384; 2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 294; L. Rep. 1 A. & E. 8;
The Glentanner, Swa. 415;
The Fairport, 48 L. T. Rep. N. S. 536; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 62; 8 P. Div. 48;
The Ringdove, 55 L. T. Rep. N. S. 552; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 28; 11 P. Div. 120;
The Feronia, 17 L. T. Rep. N. S. 619; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 54; L. Rep. 2 A. & E. 65;
Re Rio Grande do Sul Company, 36 L. T. Rep. N. S. 603; 3 Asp. Mar. Law. Cas. 424; 5 Ch. Div. 282.

The court should not be influenced by the fact that the courts have for many years past upheld the existence of a maritime lien for disbursements if in fact there be no lien. In The Heinrich Bjorn (ubi sup.) the court did not hesitate to overrule the then existing law, notwithstanding the many years during which it had been unquestioned. Reliance is also placed upon The Beeswing (53 L. T. Rep. N. S. 554; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 484), where the Master of the Rolls in express terms doubted the existence of a maritime lien in respect of disbursements. It is also contended that disbursements do not include liabilities, and if so the master's liability on this bill does not come within sect. 10 of the Admiralty Court Act 1861:

The Feronia (ubi sup.);
The Fairport (ubi sup.);
The Chieftain, Br. & Lush. 105;
The Edwin, Br. & Lush. 281.

It is, however, submitted that the real plaintiffs in this case are the holders of the bill and not the master. If the action is successful, the money recovered is to go into the pockets of the bill-holders, and the master will not get a penny of it. The master is really only suing as trustee for the bill-holders, and if so they are not entitled to take advantage of a maritime lien which they do not possess.

Sir Walter Phillimore and Dr. Raikes for the plaintiff.—The courts have for a long period of years recognised the existence of a maritime lien in respect of a master's disbursements:

The Mary Ann (ubi sup.);
The Fairport (ubi sup.);
The Glentanner, Swa. 415;
The Feronia (ubi sup.);
The Limerick, 34 L. T. Rep. N. S. 708: 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 206; 1 P. Div. 411; Re Rio Grande do Sul Company (ubi sup.).

It is to be noticed that the decision in The Heinrich Bjorn (ubi sup.) was greatly based upon the fact that the decisions on the point under consideration had conflicted one with another, whereas the decisions on the present point have been uniform from first to last. Moreover, the decision in The Heinrich Bjorn (ubi sup.) is not in point. It was a decision on an Act of Parliament and a subject-matter both different from those under consideration in this case. Another point of difference between this case and The Heinrich Bjorn (ubi sup.) is, that whereas in The Heinrich Bjorn (ubi sup.) the existence of a maritime lien depended entirely upon an Act of Parliament, in the present case it is contended, upon the authority of The Mary Ann (ubi sup.), that a maritime lien exists independently of the provisions of the Admiralty Court Act 1861. If a master has a maritime lien for his disbursements, then the fact that the money recovered by the plaintiff in this case is to go into the pockets of the bill-holders does not take away the maritime lien. He is under a liability in respect of his disbursements, and unless the court upholds his maritime lien he will have to pay the amount due on the bill out of his own pocket.

Nelson in reply.

Lord Esher, M.R.—In this case the master of a ship brings an action against the owners of the ship for alleged disbursements made by him. His liability in respect of these disbursements arose in this way: He had obtained necessaries for the ship, and in respect of them he had drawn a bill of exchange upon his owners, who accepted the bill, but afterwards dishonoured it. It is true that he has not paid his liability on the bill; but it is clear that he is liable to the person in whose favour it is drawn. He is liable as drawer of the dishonoured bill without any possible defence that anyone can see. He thereupon institutes this action, and the mortgagees of the ship intervene to show that, whatever right he had against the shipowners, he has no right against them, and that the ship ought not to be dealt with to their injury. This raises the question whether their claim is to be postponed to the master's claim, or, in other words, whether the master has a lien upon the ship by reason of his disbursements. Now, the only lien he can have is a maritime lien, because he has not possession of the ship, and therefore it must be a maritime lien in the sense in which it has been explained—viz., the right on his part to recover as against the ship in an action in rem in respect of his disbursements. The first point taken against the master's claim is this, that he has not made any disbursements, because he has not paid his liability upon the bill of exchange. If that be a true proposition that, in order to have a right of action for disbursements, a master must have actually paid the money, then, even if judgment had been obtained against him on this bill of exchange, it must follow that he could not claim in respect of that disbursement until he had paid the amount of the judgment, because a judgment against you is not satisfied one whit more than a liability on a bill of exchange until it is paid. Now, when we consider the practice of the Admiralty Court, it seems to me that this would be properly treated as a disbursement, even though the money has not actually been paid. Therefore, with regard to the first point, I confess I have no doubt whatever that this liability was properly treated by Butt, J. as a disbursement.

I now come to the question whether by virtue of sect. 10 of the Admiralty Court Act 1861 the master had a maritime lien upon the ship. That depends upon what is the construction of the section, which includes many subject-matters. It commences with the words: "The High Court of Admiralty shall have jurisdiction over" all these different matters: "over any claim by a seaman of any ship for wages earned by him on board the ship, whether the same be due under a special contract or otherwise, and also over any claim by the master of any ship for wages earned by him on board the ship, and for disbursements made by him on account of the ship." It is obvious that that section in terms gives the Admiralty Court jurisdiction over disbursements; but the question is whether, as applied to the particular case of disbursements, it also gives the master a lien on the ship which is to be realised by an action in rem. The words introducing the section existed in a previous Act of Parliament, and have been dealt with by the Court of Admiralty. There were certain matters over which the Court of Admiralty had jurisdiction in the sense that there was a maritime lien which the court could carry into effect by an action in rem. There were certain other matters over which it had not jurisdiction until it was given by Act of Parliament; for instance, with regard to necessaries supplied to a ship, the court had no jurisdiction until it was given it by the Legislature. On the other hand, the Admiralty Court always had jurisdiction in respect of a collision at sea, whether the vessels were British or foreign. But if a collision occurred within the body of a county the court had no jurisdiction. So with regard to seamen's wages, the court had a jurisdiction by which it could enforce a lien against the ship for the wages of a seaman employed upon the ordinary maritime contract arising from the signing of the articles. But, if there was a special contract, the Admiralty Court had no jurisdiction in regard to it. The first statute, viz., the 3 & 4 Vict. c. 65, s. 6, which begins with the words, "The Court of Admiralty shall have jurisdiction," came before Dr. Lushington in the case of The Mary Ann (ubi sup.), and he came to the conclusion that, though the words gave the Admiralty Court jurisdiction, they did not of themselves give the court a right to enforce a maritime lien. But that learned judge said also that, if these words occurred as the introductory part of a section dealing with a matter in respect of which under certain circumstances the Court of Admiralty would have been able to enforce a maritime lien, and they gave the Admiralty Court jurisdiction to deal with that very same subject-matter under circumstances in which it could not have dealt with it before, then they were to be regarded as taking away the exception, and as placing the matter under the jurisdiction of the Admiralty Court, so that it could enforce a maritime lien without any exception at all. Then the maritime lien would apply to cases which were formerly excepted, just as it did to cases which were not excepted. The case of The Mary Ann (ubi sup.) decided that disbursements were brought within this principle; and why? Because, as Dr. Lushington said, the Court of Admiralty in some circumstances had jurisdiction to deal with disbursements as carrying a maritime lien. He said that power was given to the Admiralty Court with regard to disbursements not by reason of its ancient jurisdiction, but by sect. 191 of the Merchant Shipping Act; and in the case of The Glentanner (Swa. 415) he held that the 191st section gave to the Admiralty Court, under certain circumstances, the power of enforcing the master's claim for disbursements against the ship. That decision is now challenged. The question is no doubt a difficult one, but I do not find that any court has ever expressed disapproval of the construction put by Dr. Lushington on that section. Dr. Lushington used that construction for his decision in The Mary Ann (ubi sup.). I am of opinion that we cannot question the decision in The Glentanner (ubi sup.), for I think it is right. If so, is the reasoning in The Mary Ann (ubi sup.) right? I think it is. I cannot conceive—I am now referring to sect. 6 of the Act of 1840—that in the case of collisions happening in counties there was only to be a right of action against the owners. What use would the statute be if it gave a shipowner the right to go into the Court of Admiralty, and then only gave him a judgment similar to a judgment of a court of common law? What use, again, was it in the case of a seaman with a special contract to give the Admiralty Court power to construe it and nothing more, when it might just as well have been construed by the common law courts? It seems to me to be obvious that in these cases it was intended not only to give jurisdiction, but also to give a maritime lien. It appears to me to follow that, if The Glentanner (ubi sup.) was right, The Mary Ann (ubi sup.) is within the same reasoning, and is also right. Now, has that view been disputed by any court? Many cases have been cited to us. There is the case of The Two Ellens (ubi sup.), in the Privy Council, which, so far from throwing any doubt on the judgment of Dr. Lushington, really approves of it. It is said that that was a mere dictum. I cannot take that view, but the judgment of the Privy Council is not the judgment of a judge, but of all the members of the Privy Council. The Heinrich Bjorn (ubi sup.), and especially the judgment of Lord Bramwell, is supposed to throw doubt on The Mary Ann (ubi sup.). But I cannot see it. Lord Bramwell does not say that the distinction drawn by Dr. Lushington is an unsound one. On the contrary, he seems to countenance it. In dealing with cases of salvage and collision, he with his usual quickness sees the absurdity of holding that in all these case no maritime lien is given. He takes the case of collisions, and says it is not easy to conceive that the Act meant that, if a collision took place 200 yards beyond the Nore Light, there should be a maritime lien, and that if it took place 200 yards within the light, there was to be no maritime lien, but only a personal judgment against the owners of the wrong-doing ship. Lord Bramwell says that would be a strange thing to him, and therefore he seems to me, so far from objecting to the existence of a maritime lien, to be hesitating from saying that there would be no maritime lien in that case. He held, with regard to necessaries, that the words "the Admiralty Court shall have jurisdiction" do not give a maritime lien, but he did so because, as applied to that subject-matter, they cannot be said to take away the exception. I cannot see that he overrules The Mary Ann (ubi sup.), or objects to the reasoning on which it is founded.

But there is this also to be remembered, that the decision in The Mary Ann (ubi sup.) was given in 1865, and from that time till now it has been followed over and over again. It was approved and acted upon, if I am right, in The Edwin (ubi sup.), The Feronia (ubi sup.), The Marco Polo (ubi sup.), The Fairport (ubi sup.), The Limerick (ubi sup.), and by the Court of Appeal in the case of Re Rio Grande do Sul Company (ubi sup.). Sir James Hannen has also acted upon it in the recent case of The Ringdove (ubi sup.). This series of precedents is of importance. It is not the case of an interpretation of an Act of Parliament which only arises on rare occasions, and on the faith of which men have seldom to act. It is not again like the case of The Bernina (36 L. T. Rep. N. S. 258; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 75; 12 P. Div. 58), in which we reversed the old decision of Thorogood v. Ryan (8 C. B. 115; 18 L. J. 336, C. P.), on the faith of which no man ever got into or stayed out of an omnibus. But The Mary Ann (ubi sup.) is a case upon which mercantile man are constantly acting, and, even though we differed from that decision, one must not forget the very good rule of the courts that they will not overrule decisions on the faith of which mercantile business has so long been carried on. Captains are called upon, voyage after voyage, to make disbursements, and on the faith of that decision they have assumed that they are safe in incurring these liabilities, and that they will not be at the mercy of insolvent owners, who perhaps may have mortgaged their ship to third parties. To reverse that decision would go far to justify captains in refusing to order necessaries, and would put an obstacle to this most valuable and useful power of captains. Therefore, even if I differed from the judgment in The Mary Ann (ubi sup.), which I do not, I should hesitate long before overruling such a decision. I desire to state that its reasoning commends itself to my understanding, and I therefore am of opinion that the judgment of Butt, J. must be upheld, and this appeal dismissed with costs.

LINDLEY, L.J.—The main question in this case is, whether the captain has a maritime lien on the ship in respect of disbursements. That depends on the construction of sect. 10 of the Admiralty Court Act 1861. A construction was put upon that section in 1865 in the case of The Mary Ann (ubi sup.) which has been followed ever since. It has been referred to as law in the text-books, and has become incorporated as part of English law. There is no authority against it, but we are asked to overrule it because the reasoning upon which it is based is said to be at variance with the reasoning of this court and the House of Lords in The Heinrich Bjorn (ubi sup.). In my opinion that is not so, and Dr. Lushington himself points out that he bases his judgment on other reasons. I therefore think that this appeal must be dismissed.

LOPES, L.J.—The cases of The Glentanner (ubi sup.) and The Mary Ann (ubi sup.) have been cited, and unless this court is prepared to overrule them, they are conclusive as to the matter now before us. I myself have carefully considered those cases, and heard them commented upon, and, in my opinion, they are correct. I therefore think the appeal should be dismissed.

JOHNSTON AND OTHERS v. THE SALVAGE ASSOCIATION AND MCKIVER. (a)

Practice — Third-party notice — Contracts of indemnity—Marine insurance—Suing and labouring clause—Order XVI., r. 48.

The defendant McKiver insured his ship by a policy containing the usual suing and labouring clause. The plaintiffs sued him for work and labour done and expenses incurred by them, at his request, in attempting to save the ship during the continuance of the policy.

Held (affirming the decision of the Queen's Bench Division), that the defendant McKiver was not entitled to bring in the underwriters as third parties under Order XVI., r. 48, because they had not, by the suing and labouring clause, contracted to indemnify him against the demand of the plaintiff.

APPEAL from the Queen's Bench Division (Lord Coleridge, L.C.J., and A. L. Smith, J.)

This was an action against the Salvage Association and against McKiver for work done, services rendered, and expenses incurred by the plaintiffs for the defendants, at their request, in attempting to save the ship Maggie Robertson and her cargo, which was wrecked on the coast of Brazil, and also for damages against the defendants, or one of them, for misrepresentation or breach of warranty of authority to employ the plaintiffs to act on behalf of the underwriters of the ship and cargo. The defendant McKiver, who was the owner of the ship, had chartered her to certain railway companies in Buenos Ayres, to carry coals to South America, and had effected policies of insurance, containing the usual suing and labouring clause, with the Home and Colonial Marine Insurance Company, and other firms of underwriters. The ship became a total loss, and was abandoned, and the underwriters had, long before this action was commenced, paid McKiver as for a total loss. The action had originally been commenced against the Salvage Association only, but McKiver was subsequently joined as a defendant. McKiver then applied at chambers for leave to issue and serve upon the underwriters a third-party notice under Order XVI., r. 48, claiming to be indemnified by them against the claim of the plaintiffs for work and labour done, and expenses incurred, on the ground that the underwriters had by the policies of insurance contracted to indemnify him against such demands.

Manisty, J., in chambers, gave leave to serve a third-party notice, but the Divisional Court rescinded his order.

The defendant McKiver appealed.

Bigham, Q.C. and J. Walton for the appellant.—This is a proper case for a third-party notice under Order XVI., r. 48. The underwriters are bound to pay to McKiver whatever he may have to pay the plaintiffs for services to the ship.

Cohen, Q.C. and Hollams for the respondents.—Order XVI., r. 48, does not apply here, for there is no contract between the underwriters and McKiver that they will indemnify him against any sums he may be bound to pay to the plaintiffs.

(a) Reported by A. H. BITTLESTON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The rule is limited to cases in which the defendant has a direct right to be indemnified by the proposed third party, arising from a contract to indemnify:

Birmingham and District Land Company v. London and North-Western Railway Company, 55 L. T. Rep. N. S. 699; 34 Ch. Div. 261.

The suing and labouring clause in the policies gives no such right. The only right which McKiver has is to sue the underwriters for any money he may have properly expended on their behalf. The issues between the plaintiff and the defendant, and the defendant and the third party, must be the same, but in this case they are not.

Bingham, Q.C. in reply.—The operation of the rule is not limited to cases where there is a contract to indemnify against liability upon the very contract upon which the plaintiff sues. The expressions of Cotton, L.J. in his judgment in Birmingham District Land Company v. London and North-Western Railway Company (ubi sup.) show that he did not intend so to limit the right given by Order XVI., r. 48. He says: "Of course, if A. requests B. to do a thing for him, and B. in consequence of his doing that act, is subject to some liability or loss, then, in consequence of the request to do the act, the law implies a contract by A. to indemnify B. from the consequence of his doing it. In that case there is not an express but an implied contract to indemnify the party for doing what he does at the request of the other." Here, by the effect of the suing and labouring clause, the defendant did incur liability at the request of the underwriters. It is not necessary that the issues should be the same; one issue must always be different, viz., whether the third party did contract to indemnify the defendant. Cur. adv. vult.

July 9.—The following judgments were delivered:—

Lindley, L.J. (after stating the nature of the action).—The claim of the plaintiffs, Johnston and Co., against McKiver is twofold. viz.: (a) for work and labour and expenses done and incurred by the plaintiffs for the defendant at his request; (b) for damages for misrepresentation or breach of warranty by the defendant of his authority to act for other people in employing the plaintiffs to do what they did. The work and labour and expenses sued for were done and incurred by the plaintiffs in saving or attempting to save a ship and cargo. The ship was insured by the defendant with the persons sought to be introduced as third parties. The misrepresentation alleged is as to McKiver's authority to employ the plaintiffs for the underwriters. The ship was totally lost, and was abandoned to the underwriters, and they long since paid McKiver as for a total loss. His claim against them now is based on the suing and labouring clauses in the policies, and is resisted by the underwriters. The nature and effect of the suing and labouring clause are fully explained in Kidston v. Empire Marine Insurance Company (3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 400, 468; 16 L. T. Rep. N. S. 119; L. Rep 1 C. P. 535; 2 C. P. 357), and Lohre v. Aitcheson (4 App. Cas. 755; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 168; 41 L. T. Rep. N. S. 323). It is, in substance, a contract by which the underwriter agrees to pay the assured the expense he may reasonably and properly incur in preventing a loss which, if it occurred, would fall on the underwriters under the other clauses in the policy. Such a contract is not a contract of indemnity in any proper sense; it is a contract to pay the assured expenses which he may incur, but not to indemnify him against any claims made by other people against him. In equity, a contract to indemnify can be specifically enforced before there has been any such breach of the contract as would sustain an action at law. In equity the plaintiff need not pay, and perhaps might ruin himself before seeking relief. He is entitled to be relieved from liability. But in this case McKiver would have no locus standi in equity against the underwriters if he were to seek specific performance of a contract to indemnify him against Johnston and Co.'s demand. Assuming, therefore, that the underwriters are liable to pay McKiver for services and expenses under the suing and labouring clause, and assuming that these services and expenses are included in those in respect of which Johnston is suing McKiver, I am of opinion that this case is not within Order XVI., r. 48, and that the underwriters cannot be brought in as third parties under that rule. The effect of the rule was fully considered by the Court of Appeal in Birmingham and District Land Company v. London and North-Western Railway Company (supra), and the court there laid down that the rule only applies to cases where the third party was under some obligation, by contract or otherwise, to indemnify the defendant against the demand of the plaintiff. This construction is, in my opinion, warranted by the history of the rule, by its language, and by the forms referred to in it. Whatever obligation the underwriters may be under to McKiver, they are under no obligation to indemnify him against the claims of the plaintiffs, or any of them or any part thereof. There is clearly no obligation on the part of the underwriters to indemnify McKiver against the consequences of any representation he may have made as to his authority to employ the plaintiffs on their behalf, or on behalf of any other person. The appeal ought to be dismissed. The Master of the Rolls agrees on the ground that the suing and labouring clause does not apply.

Lopes, L.J.—This case raises the question as to what is the meaning and scope of Order XVI., r. 48. Does it apply to cases other than those where the third party has contracted to indemnify the defendant against a claim made by the plaintiff? Under the old rules before the recent amendment, the defendant had a much larger power than under the present rule to bring in third parties against whom he might claim some relief or remedy over. The present rule was intended to curtail the old rule. Under the present rule the defendant must make out a primâ facie case, showing that he is entitled to contribution or indemnity against the third party. The defendant here is not entitled to contribution; he must therefore make out a primâ facie case that he is entitled to indemnity. I am of opinion that he does not make out such a case. I agree with what was laid down in the case of the Birmingham and District Land Company v. London and North-Western Railway Company (sup.), viz., that to bring a case within the rule there must be a direct right to indemnity as such —a right which can be enforced either at law or in equity. Lindley, L.J., has fully stated the nature of the claim of the plaintiff, against the defendants, and the other facts of the case which are material. It seems to me that, whatever may be the liability of the underwriters to McKiver, the underwriters are in no way bound, either at law or in equity, to indemnify him against the claim of the plaintiffs in this action, or any part of it. There is no contract by them, either express or implied, to undertake such a liability. This case is covered by the case I have cited, and the appeal must be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

(Before Lord COLERIDGE, C.J. and SMITH, J.)

COURTNEY (app.) v. COLE (resp.). (a)

Compulsory pilotage — Exemption from — Ship trading from the East to London, thence to Amsterdam—Whether exempt from compulsory pilotage—Meaning of "ship trading to Boulogne, or to any place in Europe north of Boulogne"—Merchant Shipping Act 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104), s. 353, and s. 379, sub-sect. 3.

The ship C., a British ship, belonging to the port of London, arrived in London, with a cargo from China and Japan; part of such cargo was to be discharged in London, and part to be taken on to Amsterdam and Hamburg. Part was accordingly discharged in London, and the crew were also discharged, and a fresh crew shipped on coasting articles. The ship left London for Amsterdam and Hamburg with the rest of the cargo, but without any fresh cargo from London, and without passengers. Whilst proceeding down the Thames, and off Gravesend, she was boarded by the respondent, a duly licensed pilot, who offered to the master to pilot the ship; the master refused, and continued himself to pilot the ship, without having a pilotage certificate The ship was then in the London pilotage district, and bound for Amsterdam. At Amsterdam she discharged part of her cargo, and then proceeded to Hamburg, where she discharged the rest of her cargo, and then took in a fresh part cargo for the East, with which she returned to London, where she took further cargo, and then she proceeded to the East.. For some years previously she had made similar voyages.

Upon an information being preferred by the pilot against the master for having unlawfully piloted the ship without having a pilotage certificate, contrary to sect. 353 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, the justices convicted the master, and imposed a penalty of double the amount of pilotage demandable.

Held (setting aside the conviction), that the ship was, under the circumstances, exempt from compulsory pilotage, on the ground that, when she started from London for Amsterdam (at the end of the voyage from the East), she was "a ship trading between London and a port in Europe north of Boulogne" within the meaning of sub-sect. 3 of sect. 379 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854.

SPECIAL CASE, stated by justices pursuant to 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43.

1. An information was on the 28th day of May 1886 preferred by Joseph Everden Cole against William Rice Courtney, for that on the 28th day of April 1886 the defendant Courtney on the river Thames, at and in the borough of Gravesend, then and there being the master of the unexempted ship Cardiganshire, then and there navigating within the compulsory pilotage district called the London District, unlawfully, after the informant Cole, a qualified pilot, had to the knowledge of the defendant offered to take charge of such ship, did himself (the defendant) pilot such ship without possessing a pilotage certificate enabling him so to do, contrary to sect. 353 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854.

2. After hearing the parties and the evidence adduced by them the undersigned, being three of Her Majesty's justices of the peace in and for the said borough of Gravesend, thereupon convicted the defendant of the offence charged and adjudged him to pay the penalty of 16*l.* 10*s.*, being double the amount of pilotage demandable for the conduct of such ship.

3. The defendant being dissatisfied with the said determination as being erroneous in point of law, did within three days thereafter apply in writing to us, the said justices, to state and sign a case setting forth the facts and the grounds of such determination for the opinion thereon of the High Court of Justice, and at the same time he entered into the recognisance required by law in that behalf. Wherefore in pursuance of the statute in such case made and provided we hereby state and sign this case.

4. The defendant having appeared upon summons before us, the undersigned, to answer the said information, the following facts were proved or admitted:

5. The ship Cardiganshire, of which the defendant was at all the times herein mentioned the master, arrived in London on the 22nd April 1886 with a cargo from Japan, China, and the Straits Settlements, she having shipped such cargo at such places, or some or one of them, for, and being bound to discharge part of such cargo in London, and to take the rest on to Amsterdam and Hamburg. She accordingly discharged part of her cargo in London, and in order to get at the London cargo, part of the cargo for Amsterdam and Hamburg was also discharged and afterwards reshipped. The crew who had signed articles for a round voyage from London to the East and back to London were discharged, and runners were shipped on coasting articles for the voyage from London to the Continent and back. The Cardiganshire left London on the 28th April for Amsterdam and Hamburg, with the rest of the cargo (including what was reshipped as aforesaid) which she had brought from Japan, China, and the Straits Settlements, but without any fresh cargo from London, and without passengers. Whilst proceeding down the Thames and off Gravesend on such outward passage, she was boarded by the informant, Cole, a pilot, duly licensed for the London Pilotage District below

(a) Reported by HENRY LEIGH, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Gravesend, and he offered to defendant, the master, to take charge of the ship for the purpose of piloting her to the seaward limits of such pilotage district below Gravesend. The defendant refused this offer, and continued himself to pilot the ship throughout such limits without possessing a pilotage certificate enabling him so to do. At this time (being the time of the alleged offence) the ship was in the London pilotage district below Gravesend, and bound for Amsterdam.

6. The ship is a British ship, and belongs to the port of London. Her draft was at the time of the alleged offence 18 feet, upon which the double pilotage, if demandable, is 16*l.* 10*s.*

7. At Amsterdam she discharged the cargo destined for that port, and then proceeded to Hamburg to discharge the cargo for that port, and then took in at Hamburg a fresh part cargo for Japan, China, and the Straits Settlements, with which she returned to London, where such part cargo was taken out and reshipped with further goods to complete her cargo outwards, and she thereupon proceeded to Japan, China, and the Straits Settlements on her next voyage with a full cargo shipped as aforesaid.

8. On her said passage from Japan, China, and the Straits Settlements, on reaching the London pilotage district, off Dungeness, she took a pilot up to Gravesend, but pilots may be taken by both exempted and unexempted ships.

9. For some years before the voyage in question the Cardiganshire had made similar voyages, and she is one of a line of steamers which sail regularly from London to ports in the East and back to London, and thence to ports in Europe north of Boulogne and back to London.

10. Upon these facts it was contended on the part of the defendant, that at the time in question (28th April) the ship was exempted from compulsory pilotage by sect. 379 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, as being (within the commencing words of that section) a ship in the London district not carrying passengers, and within sub-sect. 3) a ship trading to a place in Europe north of Boulogne.

11. But it was contended on the part of the informant that the 379th section was intended to exempt such ships only as were engaged in regular trade between London and Boulogne and ports to the north thereof, and in carrying cargoes between such ports and originally shipped thereat, and that, as the ship took no cargo in at London, but in proceeding thence had only as cargo what she had brought from Japan, China, and the Straits Settlements, she was not trading from London to Amsterdam, but from Japan, China, and the Straits Settlements to Amsterdam, and that her coming up the river to London and there discharging part of her cargo did not make her, on her subsequent passage for Amsterdam and Hamburg, trading from London, nor within the said exemption.

12. It may be remarked that, if the ship had been bound from Japan to Amsterdam, calling in at London without loading or discharging there, she would have been exempt under 25 & 26 Vict. c. 63, s. 41, as a ship passing through a pilotage district, but she lost that exemption by discharging part of her cargo in London.

13. She was claimed to be exempt while between London and Gravesend, as being (in the words of sub-sect. 5 of the said section 379 of the Act of 1854) "a ship navigating within the limits of the port to which she belongs," so that the question in this case is restricted to the ship while below Gravesend.

14. We adjudged and determined that the ship was subject to compulsory pilotage, on the ground that she was not within the exemption given by sub-sect. 3 of the said section 379, inasmuch as she did not confine her trading to the limits stated in that section, namely, between the London district and a place in Europe north of Boulogne, and on the passage in question did not take in any cargo while in the London district except what was landed from her and reshipped as aforesaid.

15. If the court shall be of opinion that, in the London pilotage district below Gravesend, the ship was exempt from compulsory pilotage on her said passage from London for Amsterdam on the 28th April 1886, under the circumstances aforesaid, then the information is to be dismissed. But if the court shall be of a contrary opinion, then the said conviction is to be confirmed.

WM. FLETCHER.
M. GUTTERIDGE.
P. P. WOOD.

Gainsford Bruce, Q.C. (with J. Fox) for the appellant.—The justices were wrong in convicting the appellant, as the ship was exempt from compulsory pilotage. This ship was not less trading between British ports because she went from London to Amsterdam, and thence to the East.

Bucknill, Q.C. (with Aspinall) for the respondent.—The word "trading" in the exemption means constant trading, and the Legislature never intended to exempt foreign-going ships, as this ship was. In the case of The Lloyds or The Sea Queen (9 L. T. Rep. N. S. 236; 1 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 391; Br. & L. 359; 32 L. J. 897, P. M. & A.) it was held by Dr. Lushington that a vessel, ordinarily occupied in the foreign trade, going from Liverpool to London, in order to sail from London under advertisement for foreign parts, not carrying passengers, but having on board a cargo shipped at Liverpool and deliverable at London, is not "a ship employed in the coasting trade of the United Kingdom" within the meaning of the 379th section of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, and is compellable, by the 376th section, to take a pilot in the London district. That case shows that a ship engaged as the Cardiganshire was here is a ship engaged in foreign trading, and so not exempt. The Cardiganshire really traded between Amsterdam, China, and Japan, and she merely passed through the London pilotage district to take up cargo in London, which was merely her "calling port." In the case of The Agricola (2 Wm. Rob. 10; 7 Jur. 157) the ship had sailed from Calcutta to the river Thames, where she discharged her whole cargo, and proceeded to Liverpool in ballast, and Dr. Lushington held that the ship, on entering Liverpool, was not engaged in "a coasting voyage," and so was not exempt from employing a pilot. That is, he held that the ship was a foreign trader, even on her voyage from London to Liverpool, and in his judgment he gave, as the meaning of a "coasting voyage," "a trading from one British port to another." But in the present case the ports of destination of the ship were in the East. The Moselle (32 L. T. Rep. N. S. 570; 2 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 586) is to the same effect. From these cases it is clear that no ships are exempt, except those which are in reality home traders.

G. Bruce, Q.C. replied.

Cur. adv. vult.

May 19.—Lord COLERIDGE, C.J.—This is a question which arises under the 379th section of 17 & 18 Vict. c. 104. The question before the magistrates and before us is, to determine whether a ship, under the circumstances which I shall in a moment detail, was or was not, under the provisions of that Act, exempt from compulsory pilotage. The magistrates held that she was not so exempt. I am of opinion that the magistrates were wrong, and that she is exempt, for the reasons which I will give in a moment. The ship, according to the findings in the case, was one of a line of vessels which had been engaged in making a voyage, which may thus be described. The ship started from Hamburg. She came to London, where she took in some cargo, but chiefly her cargo was taken in at Hamburg or Amsterdam. She then came to London, and proceeded from London to Japan and China, and ports in the East, and from the East she came back to London, with a cargo chiefly for Amsterdam; but she came to the port of London, on her way from the East to Amsterdam. In London, it is true, she discharged her cargo; but part of it was taken on board again and she proceeded therewith from London to Amsterdam, having, as before said, discharged some portion of her cargo in London. Now, under those circumstances, is she, when within the port of London on her return voyage, between London and Amsterdam, subject to compulsory pilotage? The magistrates have held that she is, and there is something to be said, no doubt, for the view that she is. But, upon consideration, I think the best opinion I can form is, that she is exempt under the words of the section. Now her object or trading is described in this way in the 9th paragraph of the case: "For some years before the voyage in question the Cardiganshire had made similar voyages, and she is one of a line of steamers which sail regularly from London to ports in the East, and back to London, and thence to ports in Europe north of Boulogne and back to London." The 17 & 18 Vict. c. 104 has a number of sections, beginning with sect. 376, devoted to the subject of compulsory pilotage, and there are certain rules given and certain enactments prescribed, subject to which all ships coming within those rules are obliged to have pilotage, within the districts to which those rules apply. The 379th section is this: "The following ships, when not carrying passengers (which was the case of the Cardiganshire) shall be exempted from compulsory pilotage in the London District, and in the Trinity House Outport Districts (that is to say), firstly, ships employed in the coasting trade of the United Kingdom. Secondly, ships of not more than 60 tons burden. Thirdly (which is the exemption insisted upon here) "ships trading to Boulogne, or to any place in Europe north of Boulogne." It is now Brest, I believe, by a subsequent order, but that does not alter either the principle, or indeed the detail in this case. I believe it ought to be now read "ships trading to Brest, or to any place north of Brest." (a) Fourthly, "ships from Guernsey, Jersey, Alderney, Sark, or Man which are wholly laden with stone;" that is, stone only. "Only" is not in the Act, but the exemption applies only to these island ships laden with stone, the produce of those islands. Fifthly, "ships navigating within the limits of the port to which they belong." Sixthly, "Ships passing through the limits of any pilotage district on their voyages between two places both situate out of such limits, and not being bound to any place within such limits, nor anchoring therein." Now something was said about the possibility of her being exempt under the sixth exemption, but I am of opinion that the true exemption which covers her is the third exemption: "ships trading to Boulogne, or to any place in Europe north of Boulogne." That is now Brest—"ships trading to Brest, or to any place in Europe north of Brest." (a) In the first place, it is obvious that she is directly within the words of that exemption. She is a ship trading to a place in Europe north of Brest; and if one went simply by the words of the section, she would be clearly within it. But, it is said, you must not go simply by the words of the section, because the reason of all these exemptions is to be found, not in any protection, or assistance, or favour granted to particular trades, but inasmuch as it has been held by great authority that this compulsory pilotage is not an impost upon trade, but an impost imposed for the benefit really of the ships themselves, and for the safety of human life, it is said, you must see whether the principles of these exemptions will cover the expression, a general and possibly a doubtful expression, "a ship trading to Brest, or to any place in Europe north of Brest." Now, I think it is impossible to say, when you come to look at these exemptions, that they can all have been made upon the principle of protection to human life, and that favouring particular trades had nothing to do with the exemptions. I think it is quite impossible to say that, and it is only due to the respect one feels for Dr. Lushington to observe that Dr. Lushington, as far as I am aware, never said that was so with regard to all of them, nor did he apply the principle, which he undoubtedly laid down, to exemptions such as those which I have at present to deal with. He may have been quite right in saying, and probably was quite right in saying, that compulsory pilotage in itself is not intended to be an impost upon trade, but is intended to be a protection to ships, and to the lives of persons carried in ships. He may have been quite right in saying that that was the principle of the imposition of the duty of taking a pilot compulsorily; but nevertheless it is impossible, as I think, to look at these exemptions and not to see that the principle of protecting particular trades—protecting is a word which has an odious meaning; I will say to favour particular trades—was not in the mind of the Legislature when some at least of these exemptions were enacted; for example, the coasting trade of the United Kingdom. It may be said, possibly, that a person who is engaged in the coasting trade of the United Kingdom must know all the shallows and the headlands, and so forth, and can do without a pilot. That may possibly be. At the same time one cannot but see that the coasting trade being a small trade, chiefly carried on by small vessels, it has at all events the effect, whatever may have been intended, of relieving the coasting trade of what otherwise would have been a heavy impost upon ships of not more than 60 tons burden, without reference to the cargo they carry. I think it is impossible to say that exemption is not for the direct purpose of lightening the burden of navigation upon small ships. I pass over the third exemption, which is matter of dispute, for obvious reasons. I will come back to it when I discuss the other matters.

(a) See Order in Council, dated the 21st Dec. 1871; Maude and Pollock's "Merchant Shipping," 4th ed., vol. 2, p. 78.

Now the next exemption is "Ships from Guernsey, Jersey, Alderney, Sark, or Man, which are wholly laden with stone being the produce of those islands." Now, if they come with fruit, it would seem they are not exempt; if they come with stone they are. There is an exemption which is enacted in favour of a stone-carrying ship which is not enacted in favour of a fruit-carrying ship between exactly the same two termini. Can any man devise a reason, other than a desire to favour the stone trade, why that exemption should have been put in? It seems to me wholly impossible to deny that the exemption, at all events, is an exemption to favour, if they can, the stone trade between these smaller islands and this kingdom. The other two exemptions are not important. The exemption of ships navigating within the ports to which they belong is possibly open to the observation that a person who is always navigating about within a port must know the port as well as a pilot. That may be an adequate reason for that exemption. But founding myself upon the first and second and the fourth, it appears to me impossible to say that into those three exemptions there did not enter the notion of giving a favour to particular trades. Now, it is not for me to say whether the Legislature thought that trading from London or from the Trinity House districts to the north of Europe did or did not require favours. Mr. Bruce suggested (and for aught I know he may be perfectly right in point of history; it will not be very material to him whether we agree with his reasons or not if we are deciding in his favour) that that is an exemption preserved from old time, when there was a legislative desire to favour the trade between this country and the north of Europe and to cut out the French, who were at that time interfering seriously with our trade in those regions. He may be perfectly right—I do not say he is not; but it would be too speculative, in my judgment, even if he be right historically, to place the construction of words of this kind upon an historical basis, which may be correct for aught I know, and very likely is correct if he has looked into it, but which may be incorrect, and which, after all, may be insufficient, and would be insufficient if the words did not admit of the interpretation to which we have come. Now I think that this ship, as a matter of fact, when at the end of her voyage, so to say, she came back from the East and came to London, and then went on with a cargo from London to Amsterdam, was a ship trading (about which I will say a word in a moment) between London and Amsterdam. It is not necessary to consider whether it would have done from any other place because it would clearly do from London. She was a ship trading between London and Amsterdam, a port north of Brest, and was doing that habitually. I say doing that habitually—not, as will be seen from my judgment, that I think it absolutely necessary that she should be habitually trading. I do not decide that it is not, but I do not decide that it is. It does not appear to me to be necessary here, because, in point of fact, this ship did habitually trade, and if it be necessary to apply the principle which Dr. Lushington applied to the coasting trade, that is to say, that it must be constantly and steadily employed in the coasting trade, to a ship trading to the north of Europe, then I say that, at all events in this case, we are well within the authority of Dr. Lushington, because this ship was so constantly and habitually trading. The impression in my mind is, that it is not necessary; but I do not decide that, for the obvious reason that it is never wise, I think, to decide what is not necessary, and in this case it is not necessary to decide that question. Here is a ship trading, and if trading means constantly and habitually trading, then she was constantly and habitually trading between London and Amsterdam. She seems to me to come within the exemption of the third sub-section of the 379th section of the 17 & 18 Vict. c. 104, and therefore to be exempt from compulsory pilotage.

SMITH, J.—The question in this case is whether the ship Cardiganshire, when sailing with a cargo on board from London to Amsterdam was exempted from compulsory pilotage by reason of sect. 379 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104). The material facts are as follows, as found in the case: The Cardiganshire had sailed from China, with a cargo on board, for London and Amsterdam. On arrival in London she discharged such of her cargo as was for the port of London, and also her crew. With a crew of runners, shipped on coasting articles, for the voyage from London to Amsterdam and back, and with her cargo for Amsterdam on board, she set sail upon the voyage. Was she then trading to Boulogne, or to any place in Europe north of Boulogne, within the meaning of sect. 379, sub-sect. 3, of the Merchant Shipping Act of 1854? That is the question. It is manifest that, upon applying the above-stated facts to the sub-section, the ship was clearly within the words of the sub-section; but it is argued on the part of the respondent, the pilot, that though this may be so, yet such was not the intention of the Legislature, and this is how they proceeded to argue: they in the first place said that Dr. Lushington had decided, under sub-sect. 1 of the same section, that a ship employed in the coasting trade of the United Kingdom meant a ship constantly employed in that trade, and that a ship ordinarily employed in foreign trade, though de facto engaged in a coasting trade at the time the question arose, was not a vessel employed in the coasting trade of the United Kingdom within the meaning of sub-sect. 1 of sect. 379 of the Act of 1854. The two cases of The Agricola (ubi sup.) and of Lloyds or The Sea Queen (ubi sup.) were cited in that behalf. It is quite true that

Dr. Lushington did so decide, but does that decision necessarily govern the construction of sub-sect. 3? I think not. Dr. Lushington gives his views for holding as he did as follows: "In my opinion the principle upon which vessels engaged in the coasting trade are so exempted is this, that the masters of such vessels, from their occupation and experience, are presumed to be so familiarly acquainted with the English coasts that it would be superfluous and oppressive upon owners to impose upon them the necessity of employing a pilot on board." It seems to me that, although this reason may apply to sub-sect. 1, relating to coasting voyages, it certainly and manifestly cannot apply to one at least of the other sub-sections, viz. sub-sect. 4; for why should a stone-laden ship from Guernsey be within the exemption as to having a pilot, whereas a ship not so laden is not within the exemption? Moreover, how can this reason apply to an exemption which opens the whole of the North Sea and Baltic to navigation without a pilot? It seems to me, if it be necessary to give a reason for the exemptions in sect. 379, that such reason is rather to be found in the endeavour to favour or foster particular trades, and is not to be found in the question whether the exigencies of navigation require or not a pilot to be on board. That being so, in my judgment, the words in sub-sect. 3 are not to be read as meaning constant trading to Boulogne or any place in Europe north thereof, but as meaning what they say, that is to say, when a ship is in fact trading to Boulogne or north thereof—I would add from, and possibly to, the London district and the Trinity House outpost districts—she is exempt. The argument addressed by the pilots, that in sect. 59 of Geo. 4, c. 125, the word "constant" is used, and that by sect. 353 of the Act of 1854 compulsory pilotage was to be enforced as theretofore, in my opinion, avails nothing in face of the fact that the word "constant" is expressly omitted in the latter section, namely, sect. 379. I would add that, should I be wrong in the interpretation I put upon the words of sect. 379, sub-sect. 3, the findings in this case, especially those in paragraphs 5 and 9, show that the Cardiganshire was a constant trader from London to Amsterdam and back; for it seems to me impossible to hold that the words of the sub-section mean only trading to Boulogne and north thereof, which must be the pilot's contention if they are correct upon their interpretation of the sub-section, as applied to the facts of the case. In my judgment, the decision of the justices was erroneous, and must be reversed, with costs.

Appeal allowed, and conviction set aside, with costs.

Aspinall asked for leave to appeal, but the Court held that, on the authority of Mellor v. Denham (42 L. T. Rep. N. S. 473; 5 Q. B. Div. 467; 49 L. J. 89, M.C.), this was a criminal proceeding, and that therefore there was no appeal.

Bristol Steam Navigation Company Limited v. Indemnity Mutual Marine Insurance Company. (a)

Marine insurance—Partial loss—Owner altering an obsolete ship instead of reinstating it—Cost of alterations less than the cost of reinstatement—Measure of liability of underwriters.

A ship, insured on a time policy, had, above her main deck, a saloon deck for passengers. During the time covered by the policy the saloon deck was destroyed by fire. At the time af the fire the ship was engaged in carrying cargo, being obsolete as a passenger ship and useless for passenger traffic. After the expiration of the policy the ship was converted into a cargo-carrying ship, and the saloon deck for passengers was not reinstated. The cost of converting the ship was less than the cost of the reinstatement of the saloon deck would have been. The ship, after the alteration, was as valuable for sale or use as she was before the accident.

In an action by the shipowners against the underwriters, to recover the cost of reinstatement of the saloon deck:

Held, on the authority of Pitman v. Universal Marine Insurance Company (46 L. T. Rep. N. S. 863; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 68; 9 Q. B. Div. 192; 51 L. J. 561, Q. B.), that, as the shipowners were not entitled to recover more than they had lost, they were not entitled to recover the cost of reinstatement, but only the actual cost of converting the ship.

Special case stated by an official referee, under Order XXXVI., r. 52, in pursuance of an order of Master Johnson, as follows:—

This was an action on a time policy of insurance for 21,000*l.* on the iron steamship Clifton valued at that sum, upon which the defendants were the underwriters for the sum of 1700*l.* The Clifton had been built about eighteen years before the accident presently mentioned, as a passenger steamer, with a provision, but a very inconvenient provision, for carrying cargo. Above her main deck a saloon deck was erected, which afforded accommodation for sixty first-class passengers, besides the captain and officers, extending from the engine-room forward nearly up to the bows, and beyond this was the only hatch for loading and unloading cargo, so that the greater portion of the cargo had to be carried for loading and unloading under the saloon deck. She had held a passenger certificate for sixty persons up to the end of May 1882, when it expired, but it had not been renewed, and since its expiration she had been employed in carrying cargo, and having gone to Bombay with a cargo which was there discharged, a charter-party was entered into for the conveyance by her of a cargo of grain to Havre. While this was being loaded, on the 20th April 1883, within the time covered by the policy, a fire broke out in the saloon deck which destroyed the whole of that portion of the vessel, but did only very slight damage to the lower part of the vessel. Some injury was also done to her and to the portion of the cargo which had been put on board by the influx of water to extinguish the fire and prevent its spreading, but as to the injury to the lower part and this latter injury no question arises. Temporary repairs were effected at Bombay. She brought her cargo of grain to Havre, where an adjustment was made of the general average, to which the cargo owners were contributories, and she was brought to England for the purpose of final repairs. After deliberation and obtaining estimates as to the cost of converting her simply into a cargo-carrying vessel, the plaintiffs determined upon that course, and the greater portion of the space formerly occupied by the saloon deck was converted into a receptacle for cargo with two new main hatches through the main decks under it with appliances for loading and unloading cargo, and in the rest of the space they erected accommodation for the captain and officers. The cost of doing all this, I find, was less than the cost which would have been incurred in restoring or reinstating the saloon deck (as to which they also obtained estimates), after making the usual deduction of one-third new for old. I find that the ship was of a type quite obsolete, and unsuited for the passenger traffic, that the saloon deck was at the time of the fire valueless for such traffic, and that no prudent owner, uninsured, would have attempted to restore or reinstate it, and that the course adopted by the plaintiffs in what they did was the best which could be pursued. I find that the vessel, thus altered, was quite as valuable and as useful for sale or use by the plaintiffs as she was before the fire, and that the sum expended in this alteration will afford them a full pecuniary indemnity and compensation for the loss and injury occasioned to them by the fire as far as this portion of their claim is concerned, and that the sum which it would have cost to restore or reinstate the saloon on deck, after deducting one-third as aforesaid, would exceed its value at the time of the fire, which value was certainly not greater at the time of the fire than the said sum so expended in the alteration.

The counsel for the plaintiffs contended before me that they were entitled to recover against the underwriters the full costs of restoring or reinstating this portion of the ship in its original condition less the usual reduction of one-third. The question for the decision of the court is, whether the plaintiffs are entitled to recover against the defendants a proportion, according to their subscription, less one-third new for old, of the entire cost of restoring or reinstating the said saloon deck, or whether the claim of the plaintiffs against the defendants will not be satisfied by awarding against them their proportion according to their subscription of the costs expended in converting this part of the vessel as above mentioned.

Cohen, Q.C., Bucknill, Q.C., and Macrae, for the plaintiffs.—The case of Pitman v. Universal Marine Insurance Company (46 L. T. Rep. N. S. 863; 9 Q. B. Div. 192; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 68; 51 L. J. 561, Q. B.; 30 W. R. 906) is different from the present, as in that case the ship was sold during the continuance of the risk, and Jessel, M.R. expressly confines his judgment to cases where the ship is sold during the risk. Here the repairs were made after the expiration of the risk.

J. G. Barnes and J. Fox for the defendants.—The question is, what did the plaintiffs lose? The principle of restitutio in integrum cannot be applied when it is wholly unreasonable that it should be applied. Pitman v. Universal Marine Insurance Company (ubi sup.) governs this case. Cotton, L.J., at p. 218, 9 Q. B. Div., says that the authorities do not support the contention that the estimated cost of repairs is necessarily the measure of the sum to be recovered by the insured.

Mathew, J.—In this case the plaintiffs cannot recover from the underwriters more than they have lost. It has been said by Mr. Cohen that the cost of repairing is the true measure of damages. If the ship were a new ship, it might be so, but, in dealing with an old ship, it is admitted that it is not so, as there has to be a deduction of one-third new for old. Mr. Cohen has attempted to distinguish the present case from the case of Pitman v. Universal Marine Insurance Company on the ground that what was done here was done after the expiration of the policy. The contract is simply a contract to indemnify. Take the case of a ship with old and obsolete machinery: the cost of repairing the obsolete machinery might be much greater than the cost of supplying new and improved machinery; in such a case the measure of damages would be the costs of the new machinery, and not the cost of replacing the old and obsolete machinery. The present case is similar. The measure of the loss is the same in both cases, and the indemnity ought to be the same also. On the authority of Pitman v. Universal Marine Insurance Company our judgment ought to be for the defendants, and with costs.

Cave, J.—I entirely agree with what my brother Mathew has said, and I have nothing to add.

(Before Butt, J.)

The Laertes. (a)

Salvage—Salving and salved ship owned by same persons — Liability of cargo owners — Latent defect — Warranty of seaworthiness — Bill of lading.

Although there is an implied warranty in every bill of lading that the carrying ship shall be seaworthy, this warranty may be abrogated or limited by words to that effect; and hence, where a steamship laden with cargo becomes disabled through a latent defect in existence prior to the commencement of the voyage and salvage services are rendered to such steamship by a vessel belonging to the same owners, the shipowners may recover salvage against the cargo if by the bill of lading the warranty of seaworthiness is abrogated, and the shipowners are not to be liable for latent defects.

(a) Reported by J. P. Aspinall and Butler Aspinall, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

The steamship L. became disabled through her shaft breaking in consequence of a latent defect in existence prior to the commencement of the voyage. Salvage services were rendered to her by a vessel belonging to the same owners. Her cargo was carried under three bills of lading containing the following provisions: (1.) "Warranted seaworthy only so far as ordinary care can provide." (2.) "The vessels of the Ocean Steamship Company are warranted seaworthy only so far as due care in the appointment or selection of agents, superintendents, pilots, masters, officers, and engineers and crew can ensure it." (3.) "The owners not to be liable for loss, detention, or damage, if arising directly or indirectly from latent defects in boilers, machinery, or any part of the vessel in which steam is used, even existing at time of shipment, provided all reasonable means have been taken to secure efficiency, even when occasioned by the negligence, default, or error in judment of the owners, pilot, master, or crew, or of any other servant in the employ of the owners of the above or substituted steamer or craft on the above or any other vessel." The value of the cargo salved was 116,400*l. The owners, master, and crew of the salving vessel brought a salvage action against the cargo.*

Held, that the above provisions in the said bills of lading qualified the shipowners' warranty of seaworthiness; that in the circumstances the shipowners had complied with these provisions; and that therefore the plaintiffs were entitled to 1200*l. salvage as against the cargo.*

THIS was a salvage action instituted in personam by the owners, master, and crew of the steamship Achilles against the owners of the cargo laden on board the steamship Laertes for salvage services rendered thereto.

The Achilles was an iron screw steamship of 1529 tons net register, and at the time of the salvage services she was on a voyage from Singapore to Cochin laden with a general cargo. The Laertes was a screw steamship of 1391 tons net, and at the time of the salvage services was on a voyage from Shanghai and other ports to Amsterdam laden with a general cargo. Her owners were also the owners of the Achilles.

The facts alleged on behalf of the plaintiffs were as follows: On the 10th of March 1887 the Laertes broke her fly-wheel shaft, and on 12th March 1887, at about 9.15 a.m. she, being then in about lat. 5.51 N. and long. 90.50 E., was observed by those on board the Achilles flying signals of distress. On the Achilles coming up with the Laertes it was arranged to tow the Laertes to Colombo. At about 10.45 a.m. towing was commenced, and was continued until about 7.50 a.m. on March 16, when the vessels arrived off Colombo and the Laertes was shortly afterwards safely moored in the harbour. The towage extended over about 720 miles and lasted about three and a half days.

The defendants, by their defence, alleged as follows:

5. As to the claim of the plaintiffs, the owners of the Achilles, the defendants, say as follows:

6. The said plaintiffs are and were at the times mentioned in the statement of claim also the owners of the Laertes as well as of the Achilles.

7. The cargo laden on board the Laertes at the time mentioned in the statement of claim was so laden by or for the several owners thereof, the defendants, on the terms of certain contracts by bills of lading then entered into between the plaintiffs the owners of the s.s. Achilles and the defendants (or the shippers of the respective goods who endorsed the bills of lading to the defendants, and thereby passed the property in the goods respectively to the defendants), whereby the plaintiffs contracted to carry the said cargo partly to London and partly to various other ports of destination, and there deliver it to the defendants on payment of freight, and the act of the said plaintiffs in towing and assisting the Laertes as alleged was done only in fulfilment of their said contracts as aforesaid to carry her cargo to its destination, or for the purpose of enabling their own vessel to earn the freight on the said cargo for the purpose of avoiding their liability for the non-delivery of the said cargo to the defendants at its destination or for the purpose of bringing their own vessel (which had put to sea in an unseaworthy condition) safe into port, and was in any case an act done for the sole behalf and advantage of the said plaintiffs, and was not, so far as the said plaintiffs are concerned, a salvage service.

8. The cargo of the Laertes was also laden on board her under the said contracts on the terms that the said vessel should be seaworthy for the voyage on which the said cargo was shipped, and reasonably fit to carry the same to its destination at the time when the said vessel sailed on the said voyage, and the defendants say that the said vessel the Laertes was not seaworthy for the said voyage, and was not reasonably fit to carry the said cargo to its destination at the time when she sailed on the said voyage in this that the screw shaft of the said vessel was defective, unsound, and in improper condition, and in consequence thereof and for no other cause, broke down, and the said vessel Laertes became in need of and received the assistance of the Achilles, as in the statement of claim set out, and the said plaintiffs are not entitled to make any claim upon the defendants in respect of the said assistance.

9. Under the circumstances aforesaid the said plaintiffs the owners of the s.s. Achilles are not entitled to any salvage remuneration. The defendants also submit that any remuneration which the master and crew of the Achilles are entitled to against them is of small amount, and that the defendants are entitled to recover the same from the plaintiffs the owners of the Achilles, and some of them by way of counter-claim, as hereinafter stated.

By way of counter-claim against the plaintiffs, the owners of the s.s. Achilles:

10. The defendants have suffered damage by breaches of contract by bills of lading of the said cargo, shipped thereunder on board the Laertes by the defendants, and signed by or for and on behalf of the said plaintiffs or some of them, or alternatively the said goods were shipped under the said bills of lading by various shippers on board the Laertes, and which was signed as aforesaid and endorsed to the defendants, to whom the property in the said goods thereby pass.

11. The plaintiffs (the shipowners) made default in delivery of the said goods respectively, and only delivered the same subject to certain claims which they were bound to pay and discharge, and which they had not and have not paid or discharged, and which they have left the defendants liable to pay.

12. The said vessel Laertes was not seaworthy for the voyage on which the said goods were shipped, and not reasonably fit to carry the said goods to their destination at the time when she sailed on the said voyage in the respects mentioned in the 5th paragraph of the defence, and in consequence thereof the said shafting broke down, and the said vessel became in need of and received the assistance in the statement of claim mentioned.

Particulars of damage: Whatever sum may be awarded to the master and crew of the Achilles for salvage.

The defendants counter-claim: Judgment for whatever sum or sums they are entitled to recover from the plaintiffs the owners of the Achilles, or any of them, and such further or other relief as the case may require.

The plaintiffs by their reply alleged as follows:

1. They join issue with the defence save in so far as it admits the allegations in the statement of claim.

2. The plaintiffs the owners of the Achilles say alternatively that if they contracted as alleged in the 7th paragraph of the defence (which they deny) their act in towing and assisting the Laertes her cargo and freight as alleged was not done in fulfilment of the said contract or for the purpose of enabling the Laertes to earn the said freight, or for the purpose of avoiding their liability for the non-delivery of the said cargo to the defendants at its destination, and was not an act done for the sole benefit and advantage of the said plaintiffs, and was a salvage service by the plaintiffs. The plaintiffs do not admit that the Laertes had put to sea in an unseaworthy condition.

3. The plaintiffs the owners of the Achilles also say alternatively as aforesaid that the Laertes was seaworthy for the said voyage, and reasonably fit to carry the said cargo to its destination as the time when she sailed on the said voyage. They deny that the screw shaft of the said vessel was defective, unserviceable, or in an improper condition or improperly fitted, and they deny that in consequence thereof the Laertes broke down as alleged.

4. In the alternative the plaintiffs the owners of the Achilles say that if they contracted to carry the cargo proceeded against in this action, which they do not admit, they did so on the terms of certain bills of lading which contain certain excepted perils, causes, or matters and exemptions and restrictions hereinafter stated, and the said plaintiffs say that the breaking of the shaft of the Laertes was an excepted peril, cause, or matter, or was within the said exemptions and restrictions for which they are not liable within the meaning of the said bills of lading.

5. The said bills of lading were in three different forms, and the exceptions and exemptions above referred to were respectively as follows:

(1.) In the first form the vessel was warranted seaworthy only so far as ordinary care can provide, and leakage, breakage, rust, decay, loss or damage by machinery, boilers, or steam, however caused, error in judgment, negligence, or default of pilot, master, owners, mariners, engineers, or other persons in the service of the ship, whether in navigating the ship or otherwise, and all and every the dangers and accidents of the seas, land, and rivers, and of navigation of whatever nature or kind were excepted, and the ship was not to be liable for any consequence of causes therein excepted, however originating.

(2.) The second form was the same as the first, except that the warranty as to seaworthiness was as follows: The vessels of the Ocean Steamship Company are warranted seaworthy only so far as due care in the appointment or selection of agents, superintendents, pilots, masters, officers, engineers, and crew can ensure it. The Ocean Steamship Company are the owners of the Laertes and the Achilles.

(3.) In the third form there was a stipulation that the owners were not to be liable for loss, detention, or damage if arising directly or indirectly from latent defects in boilers, machinery, or any part of the vessel in which steam is used, even existing at time of shipment, provided all reasonable means have been taken to secure efficiency, even when occasioned by negligence, default, or error in judgment of the owners, pilot, master, or crew, or of any other servant in the employ of the owners on the said vessel or any other vessel.

(6.) The Laertes, as a fact, broke down during the said voyage, owing to a latent defect in a portion of her fly-wheel against the existence of which it was impossible to provide, and which could not have been discovered by the existence of any ordinary care, skill, prudence, and foresight, and of the existence of which the plaintiffs were ignorant; and the plaintiffs say that the said vessel was seaworthy as far as ordinary care could provide, and further, was seaworthy so far as due care in the appointment or selection of agents, superintendents, pilots, masters, officers, engineers, and crew could ensure; and further, that all reasonable means were taken to ensure efficiency, and the plantiffs the owners of the Achilles were protected from the said breakdown and the consequences thereof by the terms of the said bills of lading respectively.

7. In answer to the counter-claim the plaintiffs the owners of the Achilles say that they deny the alleged contracts and breaches thereof as alleged in paragraphs 10, 11, and 12 of the counter-claim, and each and every of the allegations therein, and alternatively repeat the allegations in the 2nd to the 7th paragraphs above, both inclusive.

The material provisions in the bills of lading were those set out in the reply. The facts of the services were contained in the evidence of the master of the Achilles, which evidence had been taken before an examiner. The plaintiffs also gave evidence as to how often the shaft had been inspected and what means had been taken to guard against accidents, and as to the defect being latent.

Further evidence was given as to the appointment and capabilities of the superintendents and other servants of the plaintiffs the owners of the Achilles.

The defendants called an engineer to prove that, if due vigilance had been exercised, the flaw might have been discovered.

The value of the cargo laden on board the Laertes was 116,400*l*.

Cohen, Q.C., with him J. G. Barnes, for the plaintiffs.—All the plaintiffs in this action are entitled to salvage, and on the facts to a substantial award. According to The Glenfruin (5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 413; 52 L. T. Rep. N. S. 769; 10 P. Div. 103) the warranty of seaworthiness implied in a bill of lading is an absolute warranty, but that decision does not say that the parties to the contract cannot if they please agree to modify that absolute warranty. In the present case they have clearly so contracted. In all three bills of lading are to be found provisions modifying the shipowners' warranty, provided all reasonable care has been taken to see the ship was seaworthy, and to see that the superintendent and other servants were fitted for their duties. On the evidence it is proved that the shipowner has taken all due and reasonable means to see that his ship was seaworthy, and therefore the usual warranty of seaworthiness does not preclude the shipowners here recovering salvage against the cargo. The shipowners' contract with the cargo owners was to carry the cargo to its destination under the terms of the bills of lading. There was no duty upon them to employ another of their ships, her master and crew, to salve that cargo:

> The Chartered Mercantile Bank of India v. Netherlands India Steam Navigation Company, 10 Q. B. Div. 521; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 65; 48 L. T. Rep. N. S. 546.

Myburgh, Q.C. and Dr. Raikes for the defendants.—The owners of the Achilles are not entitled to recover. The provisions in the bills of lading do not affect the implied warranty of seaworthiness. All the provisions in the bills of lading have application only to matters occurring after the voyage has commenced:

> Steel v. The State Line Steamship Company, 37 L. T. Rep. N. S. 333; 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 516; 3 App. Cas. 72; > Tattersall v. National Steamship Company Limited, 5 Asp. Mar. Law, 206; 50 L. T. Rep. N. S. 299; 12 Q. B. Div. 297.

These provisions were inserted for the benefit of the cargo owner. At common law there is no obligation after the voyage has commenced to keep the vessel in a seaworthy condition:

> Worms v. Story, 11 Exch. 430;
> Gibson v. Small, 4 H. of L. Cas. 353.

[BUTT, J.—There may be no warranty to keep her in a seaworthy state, but surely it is the shipowners' duty to use ordinary care in keeping her in such a state that she may be able to carry the cargo to its destination?] These stipulations as to seaworthiness cast upon the shipowner the duty of taking all reasonable care to keep the ship seaworthy during the voyage, an obligation which in the absence of these provisions would not exist. The provision in the third bill of lading as to latent defect does not in any way affect the implied warranty of seaworthiness. The word warranty is not mentioned, and therefore the warranty must exist. All it does is to excuse the shipowner from liability for latent defects, but it does not give him any right to claim compensation for services rendered necessary by a latent defect.

Dr. Raikes followed.—The shipowner was a bailee of the cargo, and his duty is to care for its safety in the same way as he would care for the safety of his own ship. Circumstances placed the ship and cargo in the same danger, and therefore the shipowner was bound to use all his appliances to save both. If so, he is not entitled to salvage for doing that which it was his duty to do.

Cohen, Q.C. replied.

BUTT, J.—This is a case of salvage services rendered by the steamship Achilles, her master and crew, to the Laertes and her cargo. It is the cargo on board of her which is sued. The Laertes had broken down in the course of her voyage from Shanghai to Amsterdam. She was laden with a cargo of tobacco and other goods. The Achilles is owned by the same people as own the Laertes, and that has given rise to the questions raised in this case. The service was rendered in fine weather. There was no danger to the salvors, and very little, if any, to the salving ship. Neither was there any immediate danger to the salved vessel or her cargo. The ship, of course, had broken down; and, had she been left to her own resources, serious danger might have supervened. The value of the salved cargo is 116,000*l*. The cargo alone is sued because the owners of the salving ship being the same as the owners of the salved ship, make no claim in respect of her. But it is said that, inasmuch as some of the plaintiffs the owners of the Achilles are also the owners of the Laertes, they cannot recover salvage against the cargo owners. When worked out, the defence can only resolve itself into this: "You have contracted to convey the cargo which you are now suing to its port of destination. Your vessel broke down, and you therefore failed to fulfil your contract, and you cannot recover for that failure because, having failed to fulfil your contract, if in consequence of that you recover salvage from the cargo owners, they would at once have an action against you for breach of contract. Therefore you are debarred from recovering in this suit." That is the way the defence must work itself out. The whole thing depends on this. Have the plaintiffs the owners of the Achilles and of the Laertes been guilty of a breach of contract for which they would be liable to the owners of cargo on board the Laertes? That depends upon certain considerations of law and of fact. No doubt in ordinary cases at the commencement of every voyage there is an implied warranty that the ship is seaworthy, not merely that the owner is to use his best endeavours to make her seaworthy, but that as a fact she is seaworthy. The Laertes broke down from a latent defect, which I have no hesitation in saying was one which could not have been discovered by the exercise of any reasonable care on the part of the owners. Now the flaw which led to the breakdown of this ship existed when she started, and she was therefore not seaworthy for the voyage. If the implied warranty existed and was not limited by the contracts in the bills of lading, then the owners of the Achilles, who are identical with the owners of the Laertes, could not sue for salvage.

The cargo in question was shipped under three different bills of lading. It is said on behalf of the defendants that the stipulations in these bills of lading had no effect whatever in limiting the warranty of seaworthiness. The first of these bills of lading provides, amongst other things, that the vessel is "warranted seaworthy only so far as ordinary care can provide." Mr. Myburgh has contended that that is not a limitation of the implied warranty of seaworthiness, but is merely a stipulation by which the shipowner undertakes or warrants to keep his vessel seaworthy during the voyage. I cannot accept that, because I think the words do and were intended to apply as a limitation of the original implied warranty. I think the warranty does not exist in this case, and I have no doubt that in effect these words do abrogate the warranty which otherwise would be implied. The material provision in the second bill of lading is this: "The vessels of the Ocean Steamship Company are warranted seaworthy only so far as due care in the appointment or selection of agents, superintendents, pilots, masters, officers, engineers, and crew can ensure it." That, I understand Mr. Myburgh to say, is only a stipulation to the same effect as the other. With that I disagree, and I cannot accept the defendant's view of it. The third bill of lading provides that "the owners are not to be liable for loss, detention, or damage if arising directly or indirectly from latent defects in boilers, machinery, or any part of the vessel in which steam is used, even existing at time of shipment, provided all reasonable means have been taken to secure efficiency, even when occasioned by the negligence, default, or error in judgment of the owners, pilot, master, or crew, or of any other servant in the employ of the owners of the above or substituted steamer or craft, on the above or any other vessel." I confess I quite fail to appreciate Mr. Myburgh's argument on this. I am not quite sure what he exactly meant, but I have no hesitation in saying that, if it does not abrogate, it at all events limits, the warranty which the law would otherwise imply, that the ship was seaworthy at the beginning of the voyage. I am perfectly well aware of the decision of the House of Lords in the case of Steel v. The State Line Steamship Company (ubi sup.). That was a decision that under ordinary circumstances the stipulations in a bill of lading apply after the warranty of seaworthiness has come into effect. In the bills of lading which were before their Lordships in that case there was no such stipulations as in these, and I am in no wise departing from that view of the case in deciding that the words in these bills of lading may very well be a limitation of the implied warranty of seaworthiness. I say "may" because I have not yet found the facts, and I must be careful to see whether the facts, which must be established in order to give effect to these bills of lading, are established. I am of opinion that they are. I find as a fact that the ship was "seaworthy so far as ordinary care could provide." Secondly, I find that the vessel was seaworthy "so far as due care in the appointment and selection of agents, superintendents, pilots, masters, officers, engineers, and crew could ensure it." As to the third bill of lading, I find that the accident occurred from a latent defect in her machinery existing at the time of shipment, though all reasonable means had been taken to secure efficiency. Having held that these clauses limit the warranty of seaworthiness, I must come to the conclusion that there is no reason why the plaintiffs should not recover salvage from the owners of the cargo laden on the Laertes. The only question is what is to be the amount. I always feel reluctant to make a large award in a case of this sort. I have a sort of feeling—I do not know whether it is a rational one—that I would rather not give them any award at all. However, having regard to the circumstances of this case, especially the value of the cargo salved, I shall make an award of 1200*l*., 50*l*. to the master, 250*l*. to the crew, and the rest to the owners.

THE VIVIENNE. (a)

Action of restraint—Bail bond—Cancellation—Sureties.

Where a bail bond has been given in an action of restraint holding the sureties liable so long as the ship does not safely return to a port within the jurisdiction from as many voyages as she shall sail upon before notice shall have been given to the defendants by the plaintiffs that they withdraw their claim for security, the court will, upon its being shown that the owners on whose behalf the bond was given have ceased to be owners, cancel the bond and release the sureties from liability thereunder upon the ground that it never was intended that they should remain liable for all time whoever might be the owners.

THIS was a summons (adjourned into court) by the defendants in an action of restraint calling on the plaintiffs to show cause why the bail bond therein should not be cancelled, and the sureties to such bond released from all liability thereunder.

The action was instituted in Aug. 1885 by the owners of twelve sixty-fourth shares in the steamship Vivienne, and was defended by the owners of thirty-nine sixty-fourth shares.

The ship was arrested, and in order to obtain her release the following bail bond was given in Oct. 1885 on behalf of the defendants:

Whereas an action has been commenced in the High Court of Justice on behalf of William Stuart, Robert Easthorpe, John Cuthbert, Arthur Daniel Jones, and W. Sultan Eccles, against Messrs. Hooper, Campbell, and Co., and the remaining owners of the s.s. Vivienne and freight. Now therefore we, Frederick James Burt, of No. 72, Cornhill, in the city of London, gentleman, and William Newall, of 14, Arlington-street, in the county of Middlesex, gentleman, hereby jointly and severally submit ourselves to the jurisdiction of the said court, and consent that, if the aforesaid steamship Vivienne shall not safely return to a port within the jurisdiction of this honourable court from as many voyages as she shall sail upon before notice shall have been given to the defendants by the plaintiffs that they withdraw their claim for security for the value of their shares in the said steamship, execution may issue forth against us, our heirs, executors, and administrators, good and chattels, for a sum not exceeding three thousand pounds, being the value of the plaintiffs' shares in the said steamship.

The defendants filed the following affidavit in support of the summons:

I, Edward Græme Gibson, of No. 21, Leadenhall-street, in the city of London, one of the firm of Thomas Cooper and Co., of the same place, solicitors for the defendants, the remaining owners of the said steamship Vivienne, make oath and say as follows:

1. This action was commenced on the 14th day of Aug. 1885, at the suit of the above-named plaintiffs, who were at such time collectively owners of twelve sixty-fourth shares in the above-named steamship.

2. The above-named steamship had been up to the 11th day of Aug. managed by the said John Cuthbert (one of the plaintiffs), but on or about that date the management had been transferred by the owners of thirty-nine sixty-fourth shares in the vessel to the defendants Hooper, Campbell, and Co., who were appointed managers in lieu of the said Cuthbert. The said Hooper, Campbell, and Co. were not then, and never had been owners of any shares in the said steamship.

3. In order to obtain the release of the Vivienne, which had been arrested by the plaintiffs, an undertaking to put in bail for the plaintiffs' shares was given by Messrs. Ingledew and Co., of Cardiff, who were instructed by the said Hooper, Campbell, and Co. to act as the plaintiffs' solicitors, but who ceased to act as such solicitors on or about Sept. 18, 1885.

4. On the 27th day of Oct. 1885, to comply with the said undertaking, a bail bond for 3000*l*. was filed and duly executed by Frederick James Burt and William Newall, therein described. The said Frederick James Burt and William Newall became such sureties at the request of Messrs. Vivian Gray and Co., who owned five shares in the said ship, and who represented the owners of the said thirty-nine sixty-fourth shares, who had appointed the said Hooper, Campbell, and Co. to be managers of the said steamship, and the said Frederick James Burt himself owned five shares.

5. As the Vivienne was expected to be employed on short voyages with a view to prevent the necessity of the great expense consequent on repeated arrests of the vessel, the said bail bond was not confined to the safe return of the ship from a single voyage, but it was never intended by the bail that they should remain permanently liable for the value of the shares of the plaintiffs, or that they should remain so liable after Vivian Gray and Co. and their friends had ceased to be interested in the said ship, or the same had ceased to be managed by the said Hooper, Campbell, and Co.

6. I am informed and believe that the said steamship Vivienne arrived in Cardiff on the night of Thursday, July 7th, and is expected to complete her discharge on Saturday, the 9th inst., and to sail again on Monday, 11th inst.

7. I am informed and believe that since the said vessel was last within the jurisdiction of this honourable court at least thirty, if not more, sixty-fourth shares in the vessel out of the thirty-nine sixty-fourth shares represented by the said Vivian Gray, and Co., have been sold and transferred by their owners together with the beneficial interest thereof to other persons, and that the said Vivian Gray and Co. and their friends, have no longer any interest in the said ship, and the management thereof has been lately transferred by the new owners from the said Hooper, Campbell, and Co. to other managers of whose names I am quite ignorant.

8. The said John Cuthbert, who I am informed acquired the shares of some of the above-named plaintiffs, and who acts for them, has been several times informed that the said sureties seek to be relieved from their bail, and has offered to consent thereto on the defendants paying him large sums of money in respect of his management, which they dispute that he is entitled to receive.

(a) Reported by J. P. ASPINALL and BUTLER ASPINALL, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

The following affidavit was filed in opposition by the plaintiffs:

I, John Cuthbert, of Cardiff, in the county of Glamorgan, coal merchant and ship broker, make oath and say:

1. I am one of the above-named plaintiffs, and from the time when the Vivienne was built, viz., in the year 1880, up to the 11th Aug. 1885, I was respectively the owner and the managing owner of the steamship Vivienne.

2. I have read a copy of an affidavit purporting to have been sworn herein on the 8th day of July inst., by Edward Græme Gibson, the solicitor for the defendants, and in reply thereto say that I and my co-plaintiffs always owned not less than seventeen sixty-fourths of the steamship Vivienne.

3. It is not true to state that the said Messrs. Hooper, Campbell, and Co. never were owners of any share in the steamship Vivienne. Mr. Horatio Hooper is the registered managing owner, and is owner of one sixty-fourth of the said Vivienne, and has been so for some considerable time, as appears by the register at the Customs House, Cardiff.

4. It is untrue to state that Messrs. Vivian Gray and Co. represented thirty-three sixty-fourths of the Vivienne. They only represented and acted for twenty-seven sixty-fourths, which included their own shares.

5. Messrs. Hooper, Campbell, and Co. are still the managing owners of the ship Vivienne.

6. It is untrue to state that I have acquired my shares in the ship Vivienne since the date of the writ in this action. Some time previous to the 11th Aug. 1885 I purchased back the shares of Mr. Arthur David Jones, but the transfer was not registered until after the date of the writ in this action. I always acted with my partners, not for them.

J. G. Barnes, for the defendants and sureties, in support of the motion, after stating the facts, was stopped by the Court.

J. P. Aspinall, for the plaintiffs, contra.—The court should dismiss this motion. [BUTT, J.—Why? It never could have been intended that this bond should be in force for all time.] The bond in terms says so. [BUTT, J.—I call it perfectly monstrous to say that these sureties are to remain always liable after the persons for whom they have gone surety have ceased to be owners.] If the court cancels the bond, the plaintiffs will be left without any security, and the ship may be at once sent out of the jurisdiction. The defendants ought to be made to give an undertaking not to send the ship away until the plaintiffs have had an opportunity of arresting her in another action.

BUTT, J.—What I will do is this. I order the bond to be cancelled within three days unless it be made to appear to the registrar that the ship has left Cardiff, and that the plaintiffs have had no opportunity of arresting her. In that event the bond is to remain in force until the vessel returns to the United Kingdom. If the bond is cancelled within the three days the defendants are to pay the costs of this motion. If not, costs are to be reserved, with liberty to apply.

THE THETFORD. (a)

Collision—Vessel crossing river—Tyne Navigation Rules, arts. 19, 20, 22.

The duty imposed by art. 22 of the Rules for the Navigation of the River Tyne upon vessels crossing the river not to cause obstruction, injury, or damage to other vessels, does not require them in any event to get out of the way of vessels going up or down, and they are at liberty when crossing at a proper time and in a proper manner to do so at such times as may be convenient to themselves, and vessels proceeding up and down must take the ordinary precautions to avoid collision with crossing vessels.

THIS was a collision action in rem instituted by the owners of the barque Allonby against the owners of the steamship Thetford to recover damages occasioned by a collision between these two vessels.

The collision occurred about 2.15 p.m. on the 24th Dec. 1886 in the river Tyne.

The facts alleged on behalf of the plaintiffs were as follows:

Between 2 and 2.15 p.m. on the 24th Dec. 1886 the barque Allonby, of 1400 tons register, having loaded a general cargo at Smith's Buoys, on the north side of the river Tyne at North Shields, was proceeding to sea in tow of the steam-tug Selina.

At this time the Allonby, which had shortly before left her moorings on the north side of the river, and had crossed under a starboard helm, in tow of the Selina, in order to proceed down the river on the south side, was straightening down the river, proceeding at the speed of about one knot per hour, at a distance of thirty to fifty yards from the tiers on the south side. In these circumstances a steamship, which proved to be the Thetford, was observed by those on board the Allonby coming down the river at a distance of 500 to 600 yards off, and on the Allonby's starboard beam. Two short blasts were blown on the steam whistle of the Selina to indicate that the Allonby was being rounded under a starboard helm. The Thetford, however, proceeded at the rate of from four to five knots an hour, at first as if to pass between the bows of the Allonby and the south tier, but shortly afterwards she starboarded her helm, apparently to go under the stern of the Allonby, and, although hailed by those on board the Allonby to stop and reverse, the Thetford came on, and with her stem struck the starboard side of the Allonby abreast the main rigging.

The facts alleged on behalf of the defendants were as follows:

At about 2.15 p.m. on the 24th Dec., the Thetford, a steamship of 866 tons register, laden with coals, was proceeding down the south side of the river Tyne, on a voyage from Jarrow to London, and was making about three to four knots through the water. In these circumstances those on board the Thetford observed the barque Allonby about 300 yards distant, and about four points on the port bow, heading across the river to the south shore, and coming away from the tiers on the north side with a tug on her port bow trying to tow her head down river. Very soon afterwards it was seen that the Allonby, instead of going head down, was coming across the river. Thereupon the engines of the Thetford were stopped and reversed full speed astern. The Allonby, however, continued to come across to the south side, and shortly afterwards, with her starboard side, came into collision with the stem of the Thetford.

The defendants also alleged that the Allonby was brought away from the tiers, and got under way, at an improper time, having regard to the traffic in the river; that she crossed the river at an improper time, having regard to the said traffic; and that proper measures were not duly or in due time taken to get the head of the Allonby down river, and that she was improperly allowed to go too far over to the southward.

The following sailing regulations were referred to, and are material to the decision:

The Tyne Improvement Commission Bye-laws.

Art. 19. Every vessel under weigh shall when proceeding seaward be kept to the south of mid-channel, and when proceeding inward from sea or up the river to the north of mid-channel, so that in either case such vessel shall with a port helm always be and be kept clear of any vessel proceeding in the opposite direction.

Art. 20. Every steam or other vessel (whether towing any other vessel or not or being towed) shall, unless prevented by stress of weather, be brought into the port to the north of mid-channel and be taken out of the port to the south of mid-channel.

Art. 22. Every vessel crossing the river and every vessel turning shall be navigated so as not to cause obstruction, injury, or damage to any other vessel.

Art. 28. Every sailing or steam vessel overtaking any other vessel shall be kept out of the way of the overtaken vessel, which shall be kept on her course, and no obstruction shall be wilfully caused by the overtaken vessel to the passage of the overtaking vessel, and any vessel having passed another shall not cross the bows of the passed vessel until at such a distance as will not necessitate the stopping or easing of the passed vessel to avoid a collision.

Bucknill, Q.C. and Joseph Walton for the plaintiffs.—This collision was solely due to the negligent navigation of the Thetford. The Thetford improperly relied upon the Allonby keeping out of her way, and recklessly held on without easing the speed. True it is that art. 22 requires a vessel crossing the river to be navigated so as not to cause obstruction or injury to other vessels, but it does not say that the crossing vessel is to be liable for damage solely caused by the negligence of a vessel going up or down the river.

Sir Walter Phillimore and J. P. Aspinall, for the defendants, contra.—The collision was solely due to the negligence of the Allonby in crossing the river. The Thetford was, in accordance with the rules, being properly navigated on the south side of the river, and she had a right to expect, under art. 22, that the Allonby would not be brought across the river so as to become an obstruction to her. She broke art. 22, and must therefore be responsible for the consequences. For the Thetford to have kept out of the Allonby's way, it would have been necessary for her to have gone to the north of mid-channel, which by the rules she is expressly forbidden to do.

Bucknill, Q.C. in reply.

Sir JAMES HANNEN.—The first question that has to be considered is, whether there was anything in the state of the weather or the tide to make it improper on the part of the Allonby to move out for the purpose of being towed down the river. I am advised that there was nothing resulting from weather or tide to make it imprudent to cross the river. I will next consider the question which has been raised on the Tyne Rules. As to that, I am of opinion that they have not the meaning sought to be attributed to them, viz., that they make the crossing vessel responsible, whatever the circumstances may be, if it comes in contact with another vessel which is on the side of the river prescribed for its navigation. That would be a most unreasonable construction to give to the rule, and it is not a natural one. There is no doubt a very clear direction that those vessels that are going down are to keep on the south side, and that those coming up are to keep on the north side. Then rule 22 provides that every vessel crossing the river is to do so without causing obstruction, injury, or damage to other vessels. That does not mean that if two vessels come into collision, the one that is crossing is to be considered to blame. You still have to look at the circumstances of the case. Now, this vessel was no doubt properly endeavouring to get as soon as practicable to the south side of the river, which is specified as the proper side for its navigation down the river, and if she was doing that properly, even though she came in the way of another vessel coming down, she was not necessarily an obstruction to the other vessel. She was merely making a legitimate use of the river. In this, as in collisions on land, it seems to me that the whole river belongs to everybody, and that nobody has the right to assert that he has the exclusive occupation of the road, whether on sea or land. All depends on the circumstances of each case. What are the circumstances of this case? It is said that the Allonby ought not to have attempted to make her passage across the river at the time and in the way she did. But I am advised that the mode in which this vessel was navigated across the river indicates nothing unskilful in the manner in which it was done. Then it has been contended on these rules that, if any vessel was coming down on its proper side, the Allonby had no right to go across so as to prevent that vessel continuing her course. I am of opinion that that is not a true construction of the rule, and it is equally opposed to the views of those who assist me as to the duties of vessels under such circumstances. There is some discrepancy as to where the Thetford was when the Allonby was first seen; but, wherever she was, there was then a distance of about 600 yards between the vessels, and the Thetford was higher up the river. Were the circumstances such that it was reasonable for a vessel to endeavour to cross? I am advised that it was, and I am also of opinion that it was. Let us judge by the event whether it was or not. Another vessel, the Kingscote, which was ahead of the Thetford, went clear of the Allonby, but she only just did it. She had to starboard her helm to clear her stern of the Allonby even after she had passed her. The Thetford was a considerable distance behind. True, she did at some time stop and reverse, and the result was that the blow was a very slight one; but the question is, whether this manœuvre ought not to have been done sooner. I am clearly of opinion that she ought to have done it sooner. She was able to see that a vessel was being navigated so as to bring herself on the right side of the river, and she had no right to assume that she would not get into a position which would make it necessary for her (the Thetford) to slacken her pace. It is plain what misled her was, first, the careless and obstinate following of the Kingscote; and, secondly, the assumption that, because she was on the south side of the river, she was not bound, even for the temporary purpose of avoiding a vessel in front of her, to go into the north water. That was clearly the opinion of her pilot. No reasonable man, he said, would think of going into his wrong water. That is, under the circumstances, an entirely mistaken view of his duties. There is no imperative rule of the kind. It must depend on the circumstances of each case. It is not denied by the defendants that the north of the river was perfectly clear of craft, and there was no reason, therefore, why, if he was determined to keep on, seeing that the Allonby was coming over to the south shore, he should not have starboarded and gone under her stern. It might have entailed a temporary delay of a very short time, but there must be in navigating a river, just as in walking along the road, a certain amount of give and take. I am of opinion that the Thetford is alone to blame.

THE SUTHERLAND. (a)

Collision — Compulsory pilotage — Exemption — London district—Trinity House outport districts —Merchant Shipping Act 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104), s. 379.

A vessel trading from Liverpool to Hamburg, which, in consequence of a collision, puts into the port of London for repairs, and then proceeds on her voyage, is a ship trading to a "place in Europe north of Boulogne," within the meaning of sect. 379 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, and is therefore exempt from compulsory pilotage in the London district.

THIS was an appeal by the plaintiffs in a collision action from a decision of the judge of the City of London Court, by which he had held the defendants exempt from liability on the ground of compulsory pilotage.

The collision occurred on the 22nd Dec. 1886, in the Thames, between the plaintiffs' brig the Kate and the defendants' steamship the Sutherland.

It appeared that the Sutherland, a steamship belonging to the port of London, and owned by the Liverpool and Hamburg Shipping Company, left Liverpool in cargo on the 19th Dec. 1886, for Hamburg. On the 21st Dec. during a fog she came into collision with a vessel off Dungeness. In consequence of damage sustained in the collision, her captain decided to put into London for repairs. She therefore took a Channel pilot, and made for the Thames, and at Gravesend took a river pilot on board. Whilst under his charge she on her way up the Thames collided with the plaintiffs' brig the Kate. Upon her arrival in London she went into dock for repairs, where her cargo was discharged for the purpose of effecting the repairs. Part of her cargo was carried on to Hamburg in another ship, the remainder being taken on in the Sutherland after she had been repaired.

The owners of the Kate instituted the action in the City of London Court. It was admitted that the collision was solely caused by the fault of the pilot of the Sutherland, and the judge of the City of London Court held that the defendants were not liable on the ground that the pilot was in charge of their vessel by compulsion of law.

By the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104), s. 379:

The following ships when not carrying passengers shall be exempted from compulsory pilotage in the London district, and in the Trinity House outport districts; that is to say, (1) ships employed in the coasting trade of the United Kingdom; (3) ships trading to Boulogne, or to any place in Europe north of Boulogne.

Myburgh, Q.C. and Pyke, for the plaintiffs, in support of the appeal.—The learned judge below was wrong in holding that the Sutherland was in charge of a pilot by compulsion of law at the time of the collision. She was a ship trading to a "place in Europe north of Boulogne," within the meaning of sect. 379 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, and was therefore exempt from compulsory pilotage. When the Sutherland left Liverpool for Hamburg she was then trading to a place in Europe north of Boulogne. Inasmuch as she only put into London for temporary repairs, and ultimately carried on part of her cargo to Hamburg, she never ceased to be a vessel trading to Hamburg, and is therefore within the exemption. [BUTT, J.—May it not be said that, though you are within the words of the section, you are not within the spirit of the enactment?] If that were so it would be immaterial, because this enactment imposes penalties for breach of its provisions, and therefore the court must construe the words strictly. Hamburg was her port of destination, the port to which she was trading at the time of the collision, and to which she ultimately traded after being repaired. London was nothing more than a port of distress. But assume that the voyage was terminated at London, and is to be looked upon as a voyage from Liverpool to London, then the Sutherland comes within another exemption, and was a ship "employed in the coasting trade of the United Kingdom."

Bruce, Q.C. and Dr. Raikes, for the defendants, contra.—To comply with the conditions of the exemption the vessel must be trading from the London district, or a Trinity House outport district to Boulogne, or to a place in Europe north of Boulogne. The analogous provisions in the Act of George 4 (6 Geo. 4, c. 125) clearly confine the exemption to vessels sailing from London. [BUTT, J.—The later Act was meant to carry the exemption further.] By an Order in Council dated the 21st Dec. 1871, and made under the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, the exemption is limited to vessels "trading from any port or place in Great Britain within the London district, or any of the Trinity House outport districts." [Sir JAMES HANNEN—How does this Order in Council affect the interpretation of the Act of Parliament?] It is also contended that she was not within the exemption, because by putting into London she turned away from her voyage to Hamburg, and therefore ceased to be trading to a place north of Boulogne. Her master then did not know what his owners might do with her on her arrival in London. For all he knew the cargo might have been transhipped, and she might never have gone to Hamburg at all.

Myburgh, Q.C. in reply.—There are no words confining the exemption to vessels trading from the London district or the Trinity House outport districts. The words are general, and should be construed strictly.

The PRESIDENT (Sir James Hannen).—If the policy of the Legislature in granting these exemptions were before us there would no doubt be great difficulty in arriving at a conclusion in this case. But all we have to do is to see what intention is expressed by the words which the Legislature has used. The first question we have to determine is, whether the words used in the section apply to any other vessels than those which start from or are proceeding to the London district, or one of the Trinity House outport districts. In considering this question no section of the Merchant Shipping Acts has been referred to which leads to the conclusion that any limit is to be put on the general words of the section; and when the language of the several sub-sections is considered, it is impossible to say that the construction contended for by the respondent is correct. The words of the section are: "The following ships when not carrying passengers shall be exempted from compulsory pilotage in the London district, and in the Trinity House outport districts." The reference to the London district and the Trinity House outport district, is for the purpose of stating what vessels are not to be subject to compulsory pilotage. When we have to determine the class of vessels which is to be exempt from compulsory pilotage we find them thus described, "ships employed in the coasting trade of the United Kingdom." That obviously means ships going on a coasting voyage from any one port of the United Kingdom to another. It cannot be restricted to vessels coming out or going into the London district, or the Trinity House outport district. Then there come the words, "ships trading to Boulogne, or to any place in Europe north of Boulogne." I can see no reason for putting any restricted construction on these general words which we cannot put on the preceding sub-section. It is not necessary to determine whether or not this applies to foreign vessels, for we are now dealing with an English vessel which was proceeding from a port in England to a port in Europe north of Boulogne, and so far this case seems to fall directly within the words of the sub-section. If we are to speculate upon the object of the Legislature in framing this enactment, it would appear that the idea was to give certain privileges to certain trades, as for instance those engaged in the coasting trade. Again, vessels which were in the habit of trading to places in the north of Europe were to be exempt, and vessels engaged in bringing stone the produce of the Channel Islands were exempted by another sub-section. The question then arises, was this vessel trading to a place north of Boulogne? That she was doing so originally is beyond all dispute, and therefore we have to consider if she had ceased to be a vessel so trading. She was originally trading to Hamburg; can it be said that the moment the captain saw some repairs were necessary she ceased to be a vessel trading to Hamburg? It appears to me that no accident can make her lose her particular trading character. That is the only essential character the Legisture requires. I agree that because a vessel is generally engaged in trading to a place north of Boulogne she would not be exempt if she were not at the time on a voyage of this character. But if a vessel is obliged for a temporary purpose to put into a port she does not on that account cease to be so trading, whether the port be large or small, or near or far. Suppose the Sutherland had put into Ramsgate and come out again immediately, could it have been said that she lost her character of a vessel trading to Hamburg? I therefore base my decision upon the generality of the language of the Act, and hold that, as the Sutherland was in my opinion trading to a place north of Boulogne, she was not bound to take a pilot. The decision of the learned judge must therefore be reversed, and this appeal allowed.

BUTT, J.—I am of the same opinion. This is a penal statute under which penalties can be imposed for breach of these pilotage regulations. The master of this ship could have been fined by a magistrate for not taking a pilot if he was bound to take one. It is said that the words of the section do not express entirely all that is meant; but in dealing with a penal enactment the court must construe the words strictly. I therefore have no doubt that this vessel was a ship trading to a "place in Europe north of Boulogne," and that her voyage was only temporarily interrupted by putting into the Thames. I therefore agree that this appeal must be allowed.

THE OCTAVIA STELLA. (a)

Damage to oyster-beds—Navigable river—Place of anchoring—Duty of pilot.

A ship in charge of a compulsory pilot was at high water brought into and anchored by the pilot in a river in which there were oyster-beds, the existence of which was known to the pilot. The place where she was anchored was not the usual and customary place for vessels of her size and draught to anchor in. At low water she grounded, and thereby did damage to an oyster-bed. On notice of the existence of the oyster-bed being given to the master he took all reasonable means to remove his ship as speedily as possible. In an action by the lessee of the oyster-bed against the shipowner and the pilot:

Held, that the act of the pilot in anchoring the ship where he did was negligence which made him liable, but that the ship was not liable because the master's duty on receiving notice of the existence of the oyster-bed was to take all reasonable measures—not extraordinary measures—to remove his ship, and this he had done.

THIS was an action for damage to an oyster-bed by the grounding thereon of the Italian barque Octavia Stella.

The plaintiff was one John Tyacke, the lessee of certain oyster-grounds and the owner of the oysters thereon, in Helford Harbour, in the Duchy of Cornwall. The defendants were the owners of the barque, and a pilot by name William Richards, who had brought the barque into the river.

It appeared that shortly before 6 a.m. on Aug. 12, 1885, the Octavia Stella, a barque of about 500 tons register, laden with cargo, was brought into Helford Harbour, at about high water, in charge of the pilot William Richards. She was then anchored by the directions of the pilot at a place higher up the river than was usual for seagoing vessels of her size to be anchored. The pilot left the vessel after he had given orders as to where the vessel was to be anchored, but before his orders were carried out. After the barque was anchored, notice was given by the plaintiff to her master that the vessel unless removed would ground on the oysters. The barque, however, was not removed until the evening of the 13th, after she had grounded at low water, and done damage to the oysters.

The defendants delivered separate defences by which they denied that the barque was improperly anchored or allowed to ground on the oysters; that she was improperly and negligently allowed to remain anchored and aground from 7 a.m. on Aug. 11 till 7 p.m. on Aug 12; that the oyster-grounds were marked, or that those in charge of the ship had any knowledge or notice thereof.

Both defences also contained the following paragraph:

Alternatively the defendants say that before or at the time of the matters complained of in this action the Octavia Stella was lawfully navigating the river Helford, bound for River Helford, with a cargo of timber to be there discharged; that the said river is and was a public and common navigable river open to the sea, and having a free passage into and from the same for ships and other vessels, and that the said alleged oyster-grounds on which the said ship was anchored and grounded as alleged (which is not admitted) were and still are a part of the said river, and within the flow and ebb of the sea, and that the said river and every part thereof is a public and common navigable river, open to all persons lawfully using the same with their ships and other vessels to navigate, sail, pass and repass in, upon, through, over, and along the same and all parts thereof, at all times and at all states of the tide of the said river, and that the anchoring and grounding of the said barque were acts done in the lawful navigation of the said ship in the said river as aforesaid.

In the defence of the owners of the Octavia Stella it was further alleged:

The said ship, at the time she entered the said river and anchored as aforesaid, was in charge of a duly licensed pilot, to wit, the said defendant William Richards, by compulsion of law, and if any damage was caused as alleged by any person in charge of the said barque, such damage was wholly caused by the negligence of the said pilot, and not by the defendants the owners of the said barque or their servants.

The fact that oyster-beds existed in the Helford river was a matter of common knowledge in the neighbourhood, and was known to the pilot, but there were no buoys or other marks on the beds. The plaintiff claimed 100*l.* damages, or a reference to the registrar and merchants to assess the amount of the damages.

Sir Walter Phillimore (with him L. E. Pyke) for the plaintiff.—The plaintiff is entitled to judgment against all the defendants. The pilot was bound to moor the Octavia Stella so as not to do harm to the plaintiff's property, of the existence of which he was well aware. By the exercise of ordinary care and prudence he might have anchored the barque elsewhere, and yet in such a position as not to inconvenience her in her user of the river:

The Mayor of Colchester v. Brook, 7 Q. B. 339.

The owners of the Octavia Stella are also liable for the negligence of the master in not taking proper steps to remove the vessel after he had notice of the position of the oyster-grounds.

Bucknill, Q.C. (with him J. P. Aspinall) for the owners of the Octavia Stella.—If there was any negligence it was that of the pilot. The master of the Octavia Stella had a legal right to navigate this river, and the responsibility of the proper mooring of the barque was on the pilot. As soon as the master knew of the existence of the oyster-grounds his only duty was to take all reasonable measures, not extraordinary measures, to remove his vessel, and this he did.

Hon. A. Lyttleton for the plaintiff.—The pilot had a primâ facie right to anchor the vessel anywhere in the river. It is a public navigable river, and unless it was brought to his knowledge that in anchoring where he did he was about to do damage he is under no liability. Though he knew generally of the existence of oyster-beds in the river, there were no marks which would indicate to him exactly where they were. The provisions of the Sea Fisheries Act 1868 seem to require the oyster-beds to be marked before a person damaging them can be made liable.

Sir JAMES HANNEN.—I am of opinion that the plaintiff is entitled to recover, but only against the pilot. The evidence satisfies me that Mr. Tyacke was in possession of the fishery over the locus in quo, and I am of opinion that that fact was generally known. It appears from the evidence of the pilot that it was known to him that this was an oyster fishery as distinct from a bank upon which oysters may be found and dredged; and it further appears to me that he being a pilot must be taken to know of its existence, holding himself out as he does to be a person acquainted with the peculiarities of the navigation. In these circumstances he brought the vessel into this estuary where he says he knew there were oysters about. Now he contends that he was entitled to make use of that public way for the purpose of bringing this vessel to its destination; but that contention gives rise to a number of questions. The rights of all vessels are not co-extensive. It may be reasonable and right that a small vessel should go up to the farthest point she can reach in order to give the public the benefit of the public way. But the same right does not exist in the case of a large vessel, and she is not entitled under extraordinary circumstances to try to get to a place where large vessels are not accustomed to go, and where there is no accommodation for loading or unloading them. This vessel was bound by its charter-party to go as near to the place as she could being always afloat, and the pilot has said that that was what he intended to do. His idea was that he was discharging the duty imposed on him in bringing the vessel to a place where she would still be afloat. But, instead of bringing her to a place where she would be afloat, he brought her to a place where she would be aground. Now, if the Octavia Stella had been a suitable vessel for navigating these upper and shallow waters, and in the course of her navigation it had become necessary to take the ground, that would not in itself be negligence which would have made the person allowing the vessel to ground liable. He would be entitled to say, "I was only using this passage in the ordinary way with prudence, and so as not to injure anybody else except in so far as that might be the necessary consequence of my only doing what I had a right to do." But here the whole state of things is different. I am of opinion that the pilot was under no necessity to ground, that it was an act of imprudence and negligence on the pilot's part to ground the vessel where he did, and that in doing so he injured the rights of a private individual which would not have been injured if he had not been guilty of that dereliction of duty. Therefore it appears to me that he is liable for the natural and reasonable consequences of his act, and hence is liable for all the damage the vessel did by grounding until she could by reasonable exertions be got out of the position in which he had put her.

The captain was clearly in no way to blame for the original grounding. He was a foreigner, and was absolutely ignorant about this inlet. He was taken in by the pilot, and his vessel was put into this position by the negligence of the pilot. It was not suggested that he was to blame for the first grounding, but it is said that he was to blame afterwards for not getting the ship off by slipping the anchor, or by allowing her to catch by the heel as she was swinging. If the vessel had taken the ground in the ordinary course of navigation from some accident, it might be that the pilot would not be liable for the consequences of his act, because undoubtedly the river is a high road, a highway, and I assume if in the ordinary course of navigation the vessel could not get up in one tide and anchored and grounded, there would be no negligence. But in this case we must have regard to the fact that the captain, by no negligence of his own, but by the negligence of somebody else for whose acts he was not responsible, was brought into this position, and he therefore had only the duty imposed upon him of getting out of that position by reasonable efforts. His duty was to extricate himself from the position in which he was by the ordinary means of navigation, and he was not bound to take extraordinary measures not in the nature of ordinary navigation, but in the nature of extra exertions, for the purpose of preventing the damage to the oysters. Therefore the question I have put to the Trinity Brethren is, whether they can see in any of the acts mentioned anything which the captain did which it was wrong for him to do in the condition of things in which he was placed by the conduct of the pilot. They tell me that they can see nothing blameworthy on his part, and that the best that could be done was done under the circumstances. With regard to slipping the anchor, I am advised that that would have been a hazardous and improper thing to do, and I think it unreasonable in the circumstances that the captain should have exposed his vessel to any risks by so doing. I think it unreasonable to expect him to incur that risk for the reason that by remaining there he would do damage to the oysters. The same remark applies to the swinging. What he did was in the ordinary course of navigation under the circumstances in which he was placed, and nothing more was to be required of him. I am therefore of opinion that the case is established against the pilot, but not against the captain. There will be judgment against the pilot with costs. I shall not give the shipowners any costs against the plaintiffs, they having raised other defences than that of compulsory pilotage.

COURT OF APPEAL.

Thursday, May 19, 1887.

Marine insurance—Mutual Indemnity Association —Damage to cargo by "improper navigation" —Negligence—Loading port inefficiently closed.

The members of the defendant association agreed to indemnify one another against (inter alia) "loss or damage of or to any goods or merchandise caused by improper navigation of the ship." The plaintiffs, members of the association, neglected to efficiently close a loading port in the side of their vessel, so that the cargo was damaged by sea-water, which leaked in during the voyage, but the leak did not endanger or impede the navigation of the ship.

The act of negligence occurred before the completion of the loading.

Held (affirming the judgment of the Queen's Bench Division), that the damage was "caused by improper navigation of the ship" within the meaning of the articles of association of the defendants.

THIS was an appeal from a judgment of the Queen's Bench Division (Smith and Wills, JJ.), reported in 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 130; 19 Q. B. Div. 242; 56 L. T. Rep. N. S. 863.

A special case had been stated for the opinion of the court, which is fully set out in the report of the case in the court below. The material facts were as follows:—

The plaintiffs were the owners of an iron sailing ship, called the Argo, which was entered on the books of the defendant association, which was an association of sailing ship owners, who agreed to indemnify each other under their rules and articles against losses, damages, and expenses for which any of them might be liable in respect of any ship duly entered on the books of the association, arising from or occasioned by (amongst other matters) any loss or damage of or to any goods or merchandise "caused by improper navigation of the ship carrying the goods or merchandise or of any other ship (but not from damage caused by bad stowage)."

In Oct. 1882 a cargo of wheat in bags was shipped in the Argo at San Francisco, and carried to and discharged at Liverpool. The voyage was performed in the ordinary manner, and in safety in all respects save as hereinafter described. The wheat, on being discharged at Liverpool, was found to be damaged by salt water, and it was admitted, for the purposes of this case, that the water got into the ship and cargo in the manner hereinafter described.

The cargo was in part taken on board through an opening or port made for the purpose in the side of the ship above the 'tween decks. When part of the wheat was on board, and before the loading was completed, this opening was closed in the ordinary way by means of an iron door or shutter fitted for the purpose in the outside of the ship on hinges, and made fast, when shut, by bolts passing through iron bars on the inside of the ship and screwed up by nuts. The joint between the ship's side and the overlapping flange of the door was made tight by smearing the flange with a mixture of white or red lead and oil before the door was shut.

The port through which the cargo was taken on the voyage in question was not efficiently closed, the joint abovementioned not being perfectly tight, and as the port was below the water line some water leaked in. It was admitted, for the purposes of the case, that the defect in the joint was due to negligence on the part of the persons employed by the plaintiffs. The water which thus leaked in damaged part of the cargo in the lower hold, and the plaintiffs in consequence became liable to pay and paid 450*l.* compensation to the owners in respect of the damage, and they also incurred expenses amounting to 75*l.* 5*s.* 2*d.* in connection with the claims of the cargo owners.

The leak did not endanger the ship, nor did it hinder or impede the navigation of her on the course of her voyage.

The question for the opinion of the court was, whether the plaintiffs were under the rules and articles entitled to be indemnified by the defendants in respect of the compensation so paid. If the plaintiffs were so entitled judgment was to be entered for them for 525*l.* 5*s.* 2*d.*; if they were not, judgment was to be entered for the defendants.

The Queen's Bench Division gave judgment in favour of the plaintiffs.

The defendants appealed.

Cohen, Q.C. and McColl, for the defendants, repeated the arguments used in the court below. They cited Bucknill, Q.C. and Aspinall, for the plaintiffs, were not called on to argue.

Lord Esher, M.R.—The question is what is the true meaning of the words "caused by improper navigation?" First of all, it seems to me that those words do not refer merely and simply to improper navigation with reference to the ship herself, but also to improper navigation with reference to the safety of the goods in the ship. In this connection, then, what is the true meaning of improper navigation? I think that those words imply something wrongly done or wrongly omitted to be done by the shipowner or his servants, for whom he is responsible at some time or other. If neither the shipowner nor any servants for whom he is responsible, do anything improperly at any time, then I think, no liability would arise under this clause. They ought not to be negligent, but if they are negligent and consequently do something which they ought not to do or omit something they ought to do, then I think they would have acted improperly, and that negligence must have some effect upon the navigation of the ship while she is being navigated. I do not think that improper navigation can exist except with regard to something happening while the ship is being navigated. But then this question arises, if negligence occurs before the navigation of the ship begins, which has an effect upon her navigation while she is being navigated, is that or not "improper navigation" within the meaning of those words? Now, I think you could hardly find two greater authorities upon mercantile law or upon the construction of mercantile documents than Willes, J. and Montague Smith, J.; and although I do not say that they have laid down any binding ruling, yet I think we may derive great assistance if we look at the principles enunciated by them in the case of Good v. London Steamship Owners' Association (ubi sup.). It is true that in that case the words are confined to bad stowage, but I think that the principle may be easily enunciated with regard to something other than bad stowage. Supposing that counsel in argument had put his question in these terms: "Would negligence arising before the commencement of the voyage be within this deed?" Then I think those learned judges would have answered, "Certainly, if that negligence affected the safe sailing of the ship with regard to the safety of the goods on board during the voyage." I think that would have been a very sound answer to the question. Therefore, it seems to me that, if negligence occurs before the navigation of the ship begins, and that negligence of the shipowner or his servants has the effect of causing the ship during her navigation to be unsafely navigated with regard to the safety of the goods, that makes the navigation improper navigation by the shipowner, or those for whom he is liable, within the meaning of those words. Then the only remaining question is whether this case is within the proposition. Here there was negligence before the navigation—not the voyage, because there might be navigation without any voyage—commenced; but it was negligence of the shipowner and of his servants for whom he was responsible, and it had the effect of rendering it impossible, unless the matter were remedied, to navigate the ship properly, after her navigation began, with regard to the safety of the goods on board her. Under these circumstances, I think that the damage was caused by improper navigation within the meaning of the rule, and that the judgment of the Divisional Court was right.

Fry, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. We have to construe the words "improper navigation of the ship" with reference to the loss or damage of the goods carried by her. The facts shortly are, that a port-hole in this ship, through which a part of the cargo had been brought on board, was closed before the loading was completed by means of an iron door or shutter, but this door was by reason of the negligence of the plaintiffs' servants insufficiently closed, so that in the course of the voyage water came through and injured the cargo. The question is whether that is improper navigation. In my judgment it is. I do not attempt to define all the cases which may come within the words "improper navigation," but I think those words as used in this rule include the case of something being negligently omitted to be done which ought to be done before the departure of the ship in order to enable her to carry her cargo safely from port to port, whereby it happens that the cargo is not safely and properly so carried. Now it has been argued that the words do not include such a case, for two reasons. First, it has been said that the omission to do some act must take place during the voyage, because navigation does not include anything happening outside the voyage. But, in my judgment, it is impossible reasonably to contend that omission to do a proper act before the commencement of a voyage, which results in bad sailing and injury to the ship during the course of the voyage, is not improper navigation. Supposing, for instance, that a ship's captain omitted to take on board a compass, so that as a consequence the ship lost her way upon the ocean and she and her cargo were lost. I think it could hardly be contended that in such a case there was not improper navigation, even though the captain during the course of the voyage may have done everything that a man without a compass could possibly do. Such a case would be an instance of the omission of a proper act before the commencement of the voyage resulting in damage during the voyage. That was the view of the Court of Common Pleas in the case of Good v. London Steamship Owners' Association (ubi sup.). They considered the case of bad stowage before the commencement of the voyage affecting the sailing of the ship during the voyage, and they thought that would be bad navigation. Next it was urged that navigation only refers to the transit of the ship through the water, without regard to the cargo which she carries. It may be that that contention may be true in some cases, but it seems to me that it is impossible to apply it to this case in which we are considering loss and damage to goods caused by improper navigation. It seems to me that navigation in this context relates to the carriage of the goods by a ship through the water from the terminus a quo to the terminus ad quem. And here again this conclusion is confirmed by the case of Good v. London Steamship Owners' Association (ubi sup.), because the negligence there, which was held to be improper navigation, was not closing a cock which let in water to the injury of the cargo, and it was not shown, as far as I can see, that the letting in of that amount of water would have interfered with the transit of the hull. I therefore think that the arguments for the defendants fail. The question may be approached in another way. What is proper navigation? Can it be said that propor navigation does not include making proper preparations for navigation? I should hesitate to lay down any such principle. At any rate, I am clearly of opinion, that in this case, having regard to the words which we have to construe, that negligent omission by the plaintiffs has led to improper navigation.

Lopes, L.J.—It is assumed that in this case there was no negligence after the commencement of the voyage, and the case depends upon what is the true construction and meaning of the words "improper navigation," as used in this rule. In my opinion, improper navigation includes the improper management of a ship in respect of the cargo during the voyage. Then it is said that it does not include any negligence before the commencement of the voyage, but that it must be some act done or omitted during the voyage. I cannot adopt that view. I think that negligence before the commencement of the voyage which results in bad management of the ship with respect to her cargo during the voyage is improper navigation within this rule, although the course of the vessel is in no way affected. It was admitted during the argument that sending a ship to sea without a compass would, although the negligence happened before the commencement of the voyage, come within the terms of this rule and be improper navigation. I can see no distinction in principle between that case and this. I am of opinion that the decision of the court below was right, and that the appeal must be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

Lishman v. Christie and Co. (a)

Charter-party—Bill of lading conclusive evidence of quantity shipped—Estoppel.

A charter-party, by which the defendants chartered the plaintiff's ship to carry a cargo of timber from Memel, provided that the ship should there load from the agents of the affreighters as customary a full cargo of fir sleepers, that the cargo should be brought to and taken from alongside the ship at merchants' risk and expense, and that the bill of lading should be conclusive evidence against the owners of the quantity of cargo received as therein stated.

When the vessel arrived at Memel the captain had not seen a copy of the charter-party. According to a custom of the port, captains take delivery of timber at timber ponds more than a mile up the river, the timber being then rafted down to the vessel, the expense of the rafting being divided between the ship and the shipper, but the timber being at the risk of the shipowner. The captain took delivery of the timber in such usual way, the mate giving receipts for the timber at the timber ponds. The jury found that the custom did not apply to charter-parties in the form used in this case. Some of the timber was lost in the process of rafting.

When the captain became aware of the provisions of the charter-party and of the loss of part of the cargo, he declined to sign bills of lading which stated the quantities of timber shipped to be the same as mentioned in the mate's receipts, saying to the agents of the shippers that a portion had been lost in the rafting and that he had protested before a public notary in respect of such loss, but on being told by such agent and by a clerk of the ship's brokers that he was bound to sign, he finally did so. The bill of lading stated that such quantity was shipped in good order, to be delivered on payment of freight and all other conditions as per charter-party.

Held, in an action for balance of chartered freight in which the defendants counter-claimed for short delivery, that the plaintiff was estopped by the bill of lading from denying that the full amount of cargo stated therein was shipped.

THIS was an appeal from a judgment of Cave, J. The plaintiff was a shipowner, and brought the action against the defendants, the charterers of his vessel, for 44*l.* 18*s.*, balance of freight due under the charter-party. The defendants counter-claimed the same sum as damages for short delivery of cargo.

It appeared that, by a charter-party made between the plaintiff's agents and the defendants, the defendants chartered the plaintiff's vessel to carry a cargo of timber from Memel to Grangemouth. The charter-party provided that the vessel should load from the agents of the said affreighters as customary a full cargo of fir sleepers, that the cargo should be brought to and taken from alongside the ship at merchant's risk and expense, and that the bills of lading should be conclusive evidence against the owners of the quantity of cargo received as stated therein. The vessel was to be addressed to the freighters' agents at the port of loading. Evidence was given of a custom at the port of Memel according to which the captains of vessels took delivery of timber to be shipped at timber ponds more than a mile up the river, the timber being then rafted down to the vessel, the expense of the rafting being divided between the ship and the shipper, but the timber being during the process at the risk of the shipowner. The jury at the trial found that there was such a custom at the port, but that it did not apply to charter-parties in the form adopted in this case. The captain of the plaintiff's vessel had not seen the charter-party when he arrived at Memel, and he was informed by a clerk of the ship's brokers that he must take delivery of his cargo at the ponds. The captain, therefore, sent the mate up to the timber ponds, and the mate, after inspecting the timber, gave receipts there for a certain quantity, and the timber was then rafted down to the vessel.

The captain having afterwards seen a copy of the charter-party, went to the office of Fowler and Co., the defendants' agents at Memel, who were also the agents for the vendors of the cargo, and pointed out to them that by the terms of the charter-party the cargo was to be brought alongside the ship at merchant's risk and expense, but he was there told that he must take delivery according to the custom of the port, and nothing further was then done in the matter.

During the rafting to the vessel a quantity of timber was lost, and upon this coming to the knowledge of the captain he made a protest before a notary public in respect of such loss. Subsequently the captain attended at the office of Messrs. Fowler and Co. in Memel, for the purpose of signing bills of lading, and Messrs. Fowler laid before him bills of lading in which the quantity of timber shipped was stated to be the same as the quantity for which the mate had given receipts at the timber ponds. The captain pointed out that some timber had been lost in the rafting, and declined to sign. Mr. Fowler insisted that he should sign, and the clerk to the ship's brokers also pressed him to sign, stating that he had done all that was necessary by noting his protest of the loss. The captain thereupon signed the bills of lading as presented.

It was proved that all the timber actually shipped had been delivered.

Cave, J. at the trial gave judgment for the defendants on the counter-claim, holding that the bill of lading was by the terms of the charter-party conclusive as to the quantity of timber shipped.

The plaintiff appealed.

Gainsford Bruce, Q.C. and J. L. Walton for the plaintiff.—The defendants rely only upon the clause in the charter-party which provides that the statement of the quantity of timber shipped in the bill of lading shall be conclusive against the shipowner. That provision does not apply to such a case as the present. It is intended to apply to a case where the full cargo is believed by the captain to be on board, and then it is intended to prevent all disputes; but in this case everyone connected with the shipment knew of the real facts; the captain made a public protest and gave positive notice to the agents of the charterers that a quantity of the timber which was to have been shipped had been lost in the process of rafting: the proviso never could have been meant to have any application to such a case as this. There can be no estoppel as regards facts known to both parties, and in this case the defendants are relying upon the estoppel, when it was their agents who pressed the captain, in spite of his protests, to sign the documents upon which the estoppel arises. Further, the bills of lading are to be conclusive that the goods mentioned therein were "received," not "shipped." It may be conclusive that the mate received that amount at the ponds, but not that that amount was shipped.

Pyman v. Burt, 1 Cababé & Ellis, 207.

Under the circumstances of this case, the proviso should be very strictly construed. They also cited

Grant v. Norway, 16 L. T. Rep. O. S. 504; 10 C. B. 665.

Waddy, Q.C. and C. C. Scott, for the defendants, were not called upon to argue.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—This is an action for a balance of freight, and the charterers counter-claim in respect of a short delivery of cargo, and they rest their case upon the charter-party and the bill of lading, which incorporates the charter-party. Inasmuch as a less quantity of timber has been delivered to the charterers than is mentioned in the bill of lading, there has primâ facie been a short delivery of cargo. Now, the shipowner seeks to prove that a smaller quantity than that mentioned in the bill of lading was all that was really shipped, and, if he is entitled to do so, he has no doubt shown as a fact that such was really the case. It was shown that there was a custom at Memel according to which timber to be shipped is taken possession of by the captain at the timber ponds, and the captain is responsible for bringing it down to the ship. Upon this charter-party I think evidence of that custom was inadmissible, as it is inconsistent with the clause which provides that the cargo is to be brought to and taken from alongside the ship at merchants' risk and expense; however, the jury ultimately found that the custom did not apply to charter-parties in this form, and so this case is to be dealt with upon the footing that the custom has no application. That being so, how does the matter stand? The captain signed a bill of lading, which stated that a certain quantity of timber had been shipped, which must mean that it was delivered to the ship and taken on board. In ordinary circumstances that statement would only be primâ facie evidence against the shipowner of the amount actually shipped; it would not be conclusive, and the shipowner might prove that a less quantity was actually shipped as a fact. That is to say, in other words, that the statement in the bill of lading would only be primâ facie evidence, and would not operate as an estoppel. But it is common knowledge among mercantile men engaged in the timber trade, that disputes are constantly arising as to the amount of timber put on board. Sometimes it is floated to the side of the ship, sometimes it is brought in barges. In the one case there is risk of loss from the rafts; in the other case disputes arise about the quantity put on board the barges, and the bill of lading is often signed without any very careful examination of quantities, and the consequence is that afterwards a dispute arises, the consignee complaining of short deliveries, and the shipowner saying he has delivered all that was delivered to him. I think it is just to obviate the inconvenience of these constant disputes, and to make the bill of lading negotiable for the quantities mentioned therein, that such a clause as this charter-party contains is inserted. The proviso is, that a bill of lading shall be conclusive evidence as against the shipowner of the quantity of cargo received as therein stated. The bill of lading states the cargo to have been shipped. Now, what can be the meaning of such a proviso except to get rid of the liberty of the shipowner to show that a less quantity of cargo was actually put on board, and to make the bill of lading operate against him as an estoppel? It is a good business proviso for the purpose of avoiding disputes as to quantity shipped where there is no dishonesty on either side. Of course it would not take effect against fraud, because fraud overrides all such provisoes; but in the absence of fraud it is meant to cover all bonâ fide mistakes. In this case it is not pretended that there was any want of bona fides, but it is urged that there was no mistake, because the captain knew and the shippers' agents knew that the full quantity of timber had not been put on board the ship. There is no ground here for assuming that the charterers knew that the full quantity was not shipped. The facts seem to point to a blunder on the part of the shippers' agents and the ship broker's clerks in thinking that the custom at Memel applied to such a charter-party as this; but a blunder is not a fraud, and there was nothing in the nature of fraud here. As to the case of Pyman v. Burt (ubi sup.), I can only say that I do not agree with it if it is anything to the contrary of what we are now deciding; but I do not know that it is, because the circumstances of that case seem to have been very different from these. I think that the appeal must be dismissed.

LINDLEY, L.J.—The question in this case turns entirely on the true effect of a short clause in the charter-party, by which it is provided that the bill of lading shall be conclusive evidence against the shipowner of the quantity of cargo received as stated therein. The reasons for the insertion of such a clause are tolerably obvious. Now the shipowner wants to do exactly what he has agreed not to do, namely, to show that the ship did not receive all the cargo that she is stated in the bill of lading to have received. I cannot see on what principle he can do so, except upon proof of fraud; but here there is no suggestion of fraud. The shipowner has agreed to be bound by the statement in the bill of lading, and his only answer is that in this case the facts show plainly that a less quantity was put on board. He must stand or fall by the statement in the bill of lading. The whole object of the provision in this charter-party was to prevent such disputes as this. I think the appeal must be dismissed.

LOPES, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. It seems that all the cargo mentioned in the mate's receipts and in the bill of lading was not shipped, some of it having been lost in the transit from the timber ponds. A bill of lading is generally not conclusive evidence of the quantity of cargo shipped as against the shipowner, but it is made so in this case by the clause in the charter-party on which reliance is placed by the defendants. That provision is a solemn agreement between the parties, and is inserted, in my opinion, for the very purpose of preventing the sort of dispute which has arisen here, namely, the setting up of the inaccuracy of the statement in the bill of lading.

Appeal dismissed.

REG. v. CUMING AND OTHERS. (a)

Navy—Naval Discipline Act 1866 (29 & 30 Vict. c. 109)—Desertion—Right of officer to resign commission—Leaving ship without resignation having been accepted—Admiralty Regulations, 160—Arrest of officer without warrant.

When a commissioned officer accepts an appointment to serve in one of Her Majesty's ships in commission, and enters upon the performance of his duties, he subjects himself to the provisions of the Navy Discipline Act 1866, and cannot at his own will and pleasure resign his appointment, and may be tried by court-martial for any of the offences specified in the Act.

Quœre, whether the mere acceptance of a commission would of itself and under all circumstances suffice to bring an officer within the jurisdiction of a court-martial for refusing to enter upon any particular service.

A naval officer "subject to the Navy Discipline Act 1866," within the meaning of sect. 51, may arrest an offender against the Act without a warrant.

The Admiralty refused leave to an officer of one of Her Majesty's ships in commission, to retire from the service, and thereupon the officer, having obtained permission to go on shore when the ship was at Simons Bay in South Africa, wrote a letter to his captain, informing him that he retired from the service, in accordance with the conditions laid down in article 160 of the Admiralty Regulations and returned his commission. The officer then returned to England in a mail steamer, and upon his arrival at Plymouth he was arrested and taken on board the flagship to await his trial by court-martial for desertion.

Held, that he had no right to resign without leave, and that he was liable to be tried by court-martial under the Naval Discipline Act, 1866.

THIS was a rule calling upon William H. Cuming, captain of the flagship Royal Adelaide, and the Master-at-arms, to show cause why a writ of habeas corpus should not issue directed to them to bring up Edward Brace Turville Hall, in order that he might be discharged from their custody. Lieutenant Hall had been arrested on a charge of desertion, and was in custody on board the flagship at Plymouth, awaiting his trial by court-martial under the 19th section of the Naval Discipline Act 1866 (29 & 30 Vict. c. 109). In 1886 Lieutenant Hall had been appointed to Her Majesty's ship Orontes, which was under orders to sail on Oct. 6, 1886, for a cruise in the southern seas, which was expected to terminate on April 27, 1887.

In Sept. 1886, Lieutenant Hall applied for an appointment in the London Salvage Corps, and having ascertained that the appointment would not be made until Oct. 15, which was nine days after the date fixed for the sailing of the Orontes, he wrote to the Secretary of the Admiralty, asking to be placed on the retired list of his rank, or, in the event of that being refused, to be allowed to resign his commission as a lieutenant in the Royal Navy; this letter he left with his agents in England with instructions for them to forward it to the Admiralty in case he should be successful in obtaining the appointment. He was selected by the committee of the London Salvage Corps, and thereupon his agents forwarded the letter to the Admiralty, to which a reply was sent on the 3rd Nov., stating that the request contained in the letter could not be complied with. On the 13th Nov., at Gibraltar, Lieutenant Hall received a letter from the Committee of the London Salvage Corps, informing him of his appointment, and stating that, as they understood the Orontes would return to England in April, they expected him to take up his duties at that time.

On the 17th Nov. information reached the Orontes by telegram that her cruise was to be extended, so that she would not return to England until July 1887, and thereupon Lieutenant Hall forwarded to the Admiralty through his commanding officer a telegram requesting leave to retire, which request was refused.

On the 1st Feb. 1887, when the Orontes was at Simons Bay in South Africa, Lieutenant Hall obtained permission from his captain to go to Cape Town until the following afternoon, and at 4 p.m. the next day he left Table Bay for Plymouth in the mail steamer Grantully Castle, but before leaving he wrote a letter to his captain in the following terms:

> I have the honour to inform you that, in accordance with the conditions laid down in article 160 of the Admiralty Regulations, I retire from the service, and I beg to hand you my commission.

The commission was inclosed in the letter. On the arrival of the Grantully Castle at Plymouth, Lieutenant Hall was arrested by a naval officer, without a warrant. Article 160 of the Admiralty Regulations 1879 is as follows:

> If any officer shall retire from his employment without the sanction of the Admiralty, except on good and sufficient reasons, to be judged of by the Admiralty, or shall refuse or avoid service, if found capable of serving, he shall not be allowed to receive half-pay, and his name shall be removed from the list of officers of the Royal Navy.

By the Naval Discipline Act 1866 (29 & 30 Vict. c. 109) it is provided as follows:

> Sect. 19. Every person subject to this Act who shall absent himself from his ship, or from the place where his duty requires him to be, with an intention of not returning to such ship or place, or who shall at any time and under any circumstances, when absent from his ship or place of duty, do any act which shows that he has an intention of not returning to such ship or place, shall be deemed to have deserted, and shall be punished accordingly, that is to say:
>
> (1.) If he has deserted to the enemy, he shall be punished with death, or such other punishment as is hereinafter mentioned.
>
> (2.) If he has deserted under any other circumstances, he shall be punished with penal servitude, or such other punishment as is hereinafter mentioned; and in every such case he shall forfeit all pay, head money, bounty, salvage, prize money, and allowances that have been earned by him, and all annuities, pensions, gratuities, medals, and decorations that may have been granted to him, and also all clothes and effects which he may have left on board the ship, or at the place from which he has deserted, unless the tribunal by which he is tried or the Admiralty shall otherwise direct.
>
> Sect. 86. In the construction of this Act, unless there be something in the context or subject-matter

(a) Reported by H. D. BONSEY, Esq., Barrister-at Law.

repugnant to or inconsistent with, such construction . . . . . 'Officer' shall mean an officer belonging to one of Her Majesiy's ships, and shall include a subordinate and a warrant officer, but shall not extend to petty and non-commissioned officers.

Sect. 87. Every person in or belonging to Her Majesty's navy, and borne on the books of any one of Her Majesty's ships in commission, shall be subject to this Act, and all persons hereby made liable thereto shall be triable and punishable under the provisions of this Act.

Sect. 50. Every officer in command of a fleet or squadron of Her Majesty's ships, or of one of Her Majesty's ships, or the senior officer present at any port, may, by warrant under his hand, authorise any person to arrest any offender subject to this Act for any offence against this Act mentioned in such warrant; and any such warrant may include the names of more persons than one in respect of several offences of the same nature; and any person named in any such warrant may forthwith, on his apprehension, if the warrant so directs, be taken on board the ship to which he belongs, or some other of Her Majesty's ships, and any person so authorised may use force, if necessary, for the purpose of effecting such apprehension, towards any person subject to this Act.

A. Staveley Hill, Q.C. (Judge-Advocate of the Fleet) and A. T. Lawrence showed cause against the rule.—The sole question is, whether when Lieutenant Hall left he was in the naval service of the Crown, and upon the facts it is quite clear that he was. His name was "borne on the books of one of Her Majesty's ships in commission," and therefore he was subject to the Naval Discipline Act 1866, and he had been guilty of desertion. There could be no doubt that Lieutenant Hall left the Orontes under circumstances that plainly showed he had no intention of returning. It cannot be contended that an officer can at any moment, and however inconvenient or prejudicial to the service, throw up his commission and leave his ship. It was a matter of vital importance to the State, because, if this could be done by one officer, it might be done by any number at the same time, and the State might be left defenceless. No warrant is necessary to enable a superior officer to arrest his inferior officer on a charge of desertion. Lieutenant Hall was arrested by order of the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty.

Sir Henry James, Q.C. (Charles, Q.C. and R. H. Simonds with him) in support of the rule.—The case has been argued over rather narrow grounds. Leave to retire had been refused to Lieutenant Hall, and he would have lost the appointment he had obtained if he had remained on board the Orontes. I believe the question has never arisen before, because leave to resign has never been refused. My first contention is, that under all circumstances an officer in the navy has a right to resign; secondly, if he has not a right under all circumstances, he has under certain circumstances; and thirdly, such circumstances have arisen in this case. The 160th article of the Admiralty Regulations provides that if an officer retires without the sanction of the Admiralty he shall not be allowed to receive half-pay, and that, I submit, contemplates his right to resign without leave if he chooses to forfeit half-pay allowance. If the contention on the part of the Crown is right, an officer may be compelled to remain in the service, or servitude, of the Crown for life; the claim of the Crown is therefore for life service. [SMITH, J.—Only so long as his name remains on the ship's books.] But the Crown can keep his name on the books. I also contend that this arrest was illegal because Lieutenant Hall was arrested without a warrant: (29 & 30 Vict. c. 109, s. 50.)

Cur. adv. vult.

March 30.—The judgment of the Court (Lord Coleridge, C.J., Mathew, Cave, and Smith JJ.) was delivered by

SMITH, J.—His Lordship stated the facts, and continued:—The question raised for our determination is one of great importance, viz. whether a commissioned officer in the Royal Navy, who has accepted an appointment to serve on board one of Her Majesty's ships, is entitled, without permission from the Admiralty, to resign his commission and leave his ship. The Judge-Advocate of the Fleet, who showed cause against the rule, contended that the officer's commission bound him to serve in the navy so long as he remained fit to perform his duty and the State required his services. On the other hand, it was contended for the applicant that the commission might be resigned at any time, like an ordinary mandate to one required to act as an agent, and that the Crown had no right in time of peace to control the liberty of the subject, or insist upon the performance of duties from which the officer desired to escape. We are unable to agree with either contention. The cases of Parker v. Lord Clive (4 Burr. 2419), and Vertue v. Lord Clive (4 Burr. 2472) would seem to contain a complete condemnation of both propositions. Lord Mansfield, in delivering the considered judgment of the Court, said (4 Burr. 2422): "Upon the general abstract question we are all of opinion that a military officer in the service of the East India Company has not a right to resign his commission at all times and under any circumstances whatsoever whenever he pleases;" and à fortiori we would add, an officer holding a commission in Her Majesty's navy. But the learned counsel for Lieutenant Hall presented an alternative view of the matter, and insisted that, even though the commission could not be resigned under all circumstances, and at the pleasure of the officer, still his obligation went no further than to bind him to serve for a reasonable time and upon reasonable terms, and thus that he was free, upon due notice, and for such causes and under such circumstances as existed in this case, to leave his ship and surrender his commission. The cases relied upon in support of this view were Parker v. Lord Clive (4 Burr. 2419), and Vertue v. Lord Clive (4 Burr. 2472), above mentioned. These were actions in which officers of the East India Company sought to recover damages for having been wrongfully arrested and brought to court-martial upon a charge of having thrown up their commissions while on active service in the Company's army. The court was called upon to determine what was the nature of the engagement between the Company and their officers, and would seem to have rightly come to the conclusion that their acceptance of their commissions imposed upon them the obligation to serve as officers in the Indian army in a reasonable manner, so as not to defeat the purpose of their employment, and to submit themselves to the ordinary military tribunal for any alleged breach of discipline. In each case the court-martial had acquitted the officer. In the actions for false imprisonment the question whether the plaintiffs had been guilty of a breach of duty was treated as one for the jury; and, upon a finding against the plaintiffs, the judgment was entered in each case for the defendants. These authorities have no direct bearing upon this application.

It is not necessary to deal with the case of Lieutenant Hall upon any suggestion of an express or implied contract between him and the Crown. His position seems clearly defined by the terms of the Naval Discipline Act 1866 (29 & 30 Vict. c. 109). Sect. 19 provides that "Every person subject to this Act who shall absent himself from his ship or from the place where his duty requires him to be with an intention of not returning to such ship or place, or who shall at any time and under any circumstances, when absent from his ship or place of duty do any act which shows that he has an intention of not returning to such ship or place, shall be deemed to have deserted, and shall be punished accordingly." Sect. 86 defines the word "officer" to mean "an officer belonging to one of Her Majesty's ships;" and sect 87 describes the persons liable to the Act: "Every person in or belonging to Her Majesty's navy, and borne on the books of any one of Her Majesty's ships in commission, shall be subject to this Act." Lieutenant Hall seems to us, at the time when he left the ship, without any intention to return, to come clearly within these sections. He was an officer of the Orontes, whose name was borne on the ship's books while the ship was in commission. But it was said that when he left for England he was not a person in or belonging to Her Majesty's navy within sect. 87, because he had sent his commission to his captain, and it was urged that every section of the Act which in terms applies to "persons subject to the Act," must be read as applying only to those who had not so resigned their commissions. If this were so, every officer of one of the Queen's ships might with impunity abandon the ship whenever he pleased. It is obvious that such a construction would be fatal to the spirit and object of the Act. It was further contended that the persons "liable to the Act" did not include those officers who after reasonable notice and under reasonable circumstances had resigned their commissions, and that the Act, as regards such persons, was imperative. But this mode of interpreting the statute would lead to the consequence that it would be always a matter of doubt whether an officer who had gone through the form of resigning his commission was still in the navy or not. If his reasons were sufficient, and he was entitled to leave the service, he would not be in the navy; if he were not in a position to resign his commission he would still be an officer. His superior officer would have no means of judging as to the sufficiency of the grounds upon which he claimed to resign. If the officer were right, he would be entitled to resist his detention by force, or to bring an action subsequently for false imprisonment. And so, if he were brought to a court-martial and imprisoned, he might in an action against the officers of the court question their jurisdiction, and submit to the jury that when placed under arrest he had ceased to be an officer in the navy. The difficulty and confusion that this mode of interpretation would give rise to may be illustrated by reference to the sections of the Act with respect to neglect of duty, mutiny, and insubordination. An officer on board one of Her Majesty's ships in commission might be guilty of the misconduct at which those sections are aimed, and be free from punishment, if he could afterwards satisfy a jury that at the time when he was alleged to have done wrong he had taken all reasonable steps for resigning his commission. Reference was made to article 160 of the Admiralty Regulations of 1879, under which Lieutenant Hall had acted. The regulation is in the following terms: "If any officer shall retire from his employment without the sanction of the Admiralty, except on good and sufficient reasons, to be judged of by the Admiralty, or shall refuse or avoid service, if found capable of serving, he shall not be allowed to receive half-pay, and his name shall be removed from the list of officers of the Royal Navy." The learned counsel for Lieutenant Hall did not rely upon this regulation as a justification of or authority for the resignation of Lieutenant Hall, but pointed to it in support of his contention as to the meaning of the statute. We are clearly of opinion that the regulation must be construed with the statute, and that it was not intended to control its operation. The regulation points out what may follow upon an officer resigning his commission without such sufficient cause as shall satisfy the Admiralty, or where he refuses employment offered him by the Admiralty, and his doing so is not otherwise punishable. It is not necessary for us to decide the very grave question whether the mere acceptance of a commission would of itself and under all circumstances suffice to bring an officer within the jurisdiction of a court-martial for refusing to enter upon any particular service. Some of us, as at present advised, are of opinion with Yates, J., in the case cited (Vertue v. Lord Clive, 4 Burr. p. 2477), that it would not. We leave the question, however, distinctly open to be argued and decided if in any case hereafter it should be necessary to decide it. But we are clearly of opinion that, when a commissioned officer accepts an appointment to serve in one of Her Majesty's ships in commission, and enters upon the performance of his duties, he subjects himself to the provisions of the Navy Discipline Act, and at his own will and pleasure cannot resign his appointment, and may be tried by court-martial for any of the offences specified in the Act. We were urged to depart from the plain meaning of the statute because of the consequences which it was said would otherwise result. It was argued that, if the Act applied to everyone in the Royal Navy whose name was borne on the books of one of Her Majesty's ships in commission, the result would be that the Lords of the Admiralty might impose upon an officer perpetual servitude, by directing his name for life to remain on the ship's books, But this difficulty seems to us remote and far-fetched. The Legislature cannot have contemplated a proceeding so unreasonable and entirely unlikely to be adopted. We are not disposed, in order to escape from a peril so remote and improbable, to adopt an interpretation which would entail the consequences above pointed out, i.e., of Her Majesty's ships in commission being left unofficered and uncommanded, at the sole will and pleasure of the officers.

A further point was made by Sir Henry James for Lieutenant Hall, that the arrest of Lieutenant Hall on board the Grantully Castle was illegal. According to Lieutenant Hall's affidavit, which is not contradicted, he was arrested by a naval officer, who exhibited no warrant, and who, it must be taken, had none. By sect. 50 of the Naval Discipline Act 1866, "Every officer in command of a fleet or squadron of Her Majesty's ships, or one of Her Majesty's ships, or the senior officer present at a port, may, by warrant under his hand, authorise any person to arrest any offender subject to the Act, for any offence against the Act mentioned in such warrant . . . . and any person named in such warrant may forthwith, on his apprehension, if the warrant so directs, be taken on board the ship to which he belongs, or some other of Her Majesty's ships." The contention on the part of Lieutenant Hall is, that he could only be arrested under such a warrant, and that there was no such warrant in this case. It is to be observed, however, that under such a warrant, not merely a person in Her Majesty's navy, but any person may make the arrest; and further, that, although the section authorises the person named in the warrant to be taken on board one of Her Majesty's ships, it does not authorise his detention on board. Such an authority, if it stood alone, would be a very imperfect instrument for the bringing to punishment of offenders against the Act. There is, however, another section of the Act, the 51st, of a far more effectual character. By that section, every person subject to that Act who shall not use his utmost endeavours to detect, apprehend, and bring to punishment all offenders against that Act, and shall not assist the officers appointed for that purpose, shall suffer imprisonment or such other punishment as is thereinafter mentioned. The words are not "every person to whom a warrant is directed," but "every person subject to the Act," and we think that the necessary inference is, that such a person has power to apprehend and bring to punishment any offender against this Act, for it would be manifestly unjust to punish a man with imprisonment for not doing that which he had no power to do. Moreover, it seems to us, looking at the number and nature of the offences dealt with in the first forty-five sections of the Act, that it would be quite impossible to maintain discipline on board amongst a ship's crew, if no offender could be arrested until a warrant had been obtained from the officer in command of the ship. In this case, the arrest was effected by a naval officer. It is not stated that he was not a person subject to the Naval Discipline Act, and we think we ought not upon the facts stated to us to infer that he was not so subject, and we infer that he was. Even if we considered the arrest to have been irregular, it is by no means clear that it would have been our duty under the circumstances to decree the discharge of the applicant before he had been brought to trial by the proper tribunal, viz., a court-martial: (see Reg. v. Mount, 32 L. T. Rep. N. S. 279; 44 L. J. 58, P. C.; L. Rep. 6 P. C. 283.) In holding, as we do, that Lieutenant Hall is subject to the jurisdiction of a court-martial, we think it right to add that he has acted, as it seems to us, in good faith, and in the honest belief that the terms of the regulation referred to entitled him without permission from the Admiralty to retire from the service. In dealing with this case, should it be brought to trial, we have no doubt that it will be borne in mind that the regulation in question has unfortunately been so framed as to leave considerable doubt as to its meaning. It seems to us that even a lawyer of some learning and experience might be excused if he failed to interpret it correctly; and, this being so, we are of opinion that, though the rule should be discharged, it should be discharged without costs. We accordingly discharge it without costs.

STEPHENS v. HARRIS AND Co. (a)

Charter-party — Exemptions from demurrage — Strikes—Weather permitting—Meaning of.

In a charter-party, containing the usual provision for payment of demurrage, with the exception "no demurrage to be paid the vessel in case of any hands 'striking work' which may hinder the loading of vessel," the word "strike" is to be understood in its ordinary meaning, that is, as a strike of workmen against their employers in the ordinary sense of the word. Abandonment of the work by the workmen through fear of cholera, which had broken out in the district, is not a "strike" within the meaning of "hands striking work."

Where the shipments are to be made "weather permitting," this means "sea weather" permitting. The weather which interferes to save demurrage in such a case must be weather which if there were cargo ready to load would be an obstacle to the loading of the vessel. Where thunderstorms, rains, and floods caused a delay in bringing the cargo from a distance to the port of loading, this is not such weather as brings the case within the charter-party, so as to save demurrage.

MOTION for judgment in an action brought against the defendants, shipowners, by the plaintiff, the charterer under a charter-party, to recover a sum of 75*l.* for demurrage which he had been compelled to pay to the defendants, the defendants having refused to deliver the cargo until the demurrage was paid. The charter was to carry iron ore from Bilbao in Spain to Middlesbrough, and the charter-party contained a mutual exception against "riots, strikes, or stoppages of pitmen or miners of whatever nature or kind soever," and the usual provision for payment of demurrage with the exception, "no demurrage to be paid the vessel in case of any hands striking work which may hinder the loading the vessel."

It also contained the provision that the shipments were to be made "weather permitting."

The mines from which the ore was taken are situated in the mountains at some distance from Bilbao, and the ore is brought down from the mines to a place within five miles of Bilbao, and there deposited in large heaps. Thence it is brought to Bilbao by railway, and the trucks are brought alongside the wharf, and the ships loaded with the ore at this wharf by means of "spouts."

The evidence showed that at the time of loading there was bad weather, thunderstorms, rains, and floods, and that cholera existed in the district of the mines. The rains made it difficult to raise the ore, besides causing irregularity in the railway trains. In consequence of the cholera breaking out many of the miners left the work—in fact, abandoned it, and fled from the district through fear of the cholera. From these causes delay arose in loading the vessel.

The shipowner claimed demurrage in respect of this delay, alleging that the delay had not arisen from "strikes" or "bad weather" within the meaning of the charter-party, and he refused to deliver up the cargo to the plaintiff until the demurrage was paid. The plaintiff, in order to get delivery of the cargo, paid the demurrage, and now sued to recover the same.

The case was tried before Cave, J., and a jury. Amongst other findings not now material, the jury found: (1) That the state of the weather was such as to interfere with the bringing down of ore from the place of deposit, and that the delay in loading the ship was caused by such state of the weather; (2) That the delay in loading the ship was caused by men striking work by reason of the cholera: (3) That the delay was partly caused by irregularity in railway transit, and that such irregularity was caused partially by cholera.

Upon these findings the learned judge gave both parties leave to move for judgment, and both parties now moved accordingly.

Gainsford Bruce, Q.C. (with him Strachan) for the plaintiff.—"Striking work" simply means leaving the work. Here the delay arose from the miners leaving their work in consequence of the cholera, and this would be a "striking work" within the charter-party. Delay also arose in conveying the ore to the ship, in consequence of the rains, floods, and bad weather generally, and this would be sufficient to bring the delay within the exception "weather permitting," so as to save demurrage.

Gully, Q.C. and Robson (Forbes, Q.C. with them) for the defendants.—The meaning of the words "hands striking work" is striking work in the ordinary use of the word "strike"; that is, a strike against employers which would delay the loading of the vessel. There is no evidence here of any such strike. The evidence merely shows that the men left the work through fear of the cholera, which is not a "strike" in the ordinary meaning of the word. Secondly, "weather permitting" means "sea weather" at the port of loading, and not thunderstorms or rains, which, though delaying the transit of ore from the mines to the port, are not such weather as to save demurrage under the charter.

LORD COLERIDGE, C.J.—In this case various questions were argued before us. It is an action brought for breach of a contract contained in a charter-party, but the questions which have been argued before us turned exclusively upon two points. The contract was of the ordinary kind, containing the usual exceptions, and also containing the usual provision as to demurrage, with the following exception: "No demurrage to be paid the vessel in case of any hands striking work." The argument was this—it was founded to some extent upon the admitted and uncontradicted evidence of the case: There were during loading time storms and rains, and there was a good deal of evidence to show that there was bad weather, but nothing to show that there was any bad "sea weather." There was also evidence to show that the summer was hot, and the place unhealthy, and that there was considerable cholera, and a great number of the miners fled from their work—in fact, abandoned it through fear of the cholera. There was nothing in the nature of a strike, as against the masters, in the ordinary acceptation of the term. The ore at Bilbao is collected in the mountains, and brought down to a place within five miles of Bilbao, and there deposited in large heaps. There is a wharf, and ships are loaded at the wharf by "spouts," as at Cardiff. These are all the facts necessary to the case, which was tried before Cave, J. and a jury. The learned judge entered a verdict for the defendants, with leave to both parties to move for judgment. The real question, as it seems to me, was not asked in the case; the question should be, not whether they struck work by reason of the cholera, but whether they "struck." This was a question of fact which ought to have been left to the jury; but this question was not asked the jury. The two true questions which arose in the case, as it seems to me, were, first, "Was there any evidence of a "strike" which would emancipate the charterer?" Secondly, "Was there any evidence of a "strike," so as to disentitle the ship to demurrage?" In my judgment, the word "strike," in the expression "riots, strikes, or stoppages," must be "striking" in the ordinary sense of the word against employers, standing out for more wages on the part of the workmen. Of a strike in that sense of the word there was absolutely no evidence at all, no evidence which was proper to be submitted to a jury. The strike arose from the men flying from the cholera, but this is a totally different idea from a "strike" in the ordinary sense. Then is a different construction to be placed on the clause, "any hands striking work which may hinder loading of vessel?" I think not. If you cannot construe the expression strictly, what are you to fall back upon? "Any hands striking work" must mean any body of hands striking work as against their employers, and of such a strike there was no evidence. It is plain, therefore, that there was no case here of hands "striking work" within the meaning of the charter-party.

The next point is, what is the meaning of the expression "weather permitting?" Now, it has been argued that this includes thunderstorms. That is not the fair construction of those words. The fair construction of those words is "sea weather." The weather which interferes to save demurrage must be weather which if there were cargo ready to load would be an obstacle to the loading of the vessel; of such weather there is absolutely no evidence at all. These two facts being found against the plaintiffs—there being no evidence whatever of a "strike," or "bad weather," within the meaning of the charter-party—it would follow that the defendants would succeed. We think it right to say that we accede fully to the case in the House of Lords (Grant v. Coverdale, 51 L. T. Rep. N. S. 472; 9 App. Cas. 470; 5 Asp. Mar. Law. Cas. 353; 53 L. J. 462, Q. B.) that was pressed upon us in argument, but the present case is different. We come to the conclusion that the loading was not interfered with by "strikes," and that there was no such "weather" as would bring the case within the charter-party, and this being our opinion of the case, judgment must be for the defendants with costs.

Sale of goods — Goods to be shipped on vessel loading for Melbourne—Delivery on board ship —Stoppage in transitu—End of transit—Destination — Constructive delivery to purchaser or agent.

A purchaser directed the vendor, who carried on business at Wolverhampton, to consign certain goods to a vessel then loading in the East India Docks for Melbourne. The vendor accordingly delivered the goods to the London and North-Western Railway Company at Wolverhampton, to be taken to the vessel and shipped, and this was duly done. The mate gave a receipt for the goods to the Railway Company, which they sent to the purchaser, but no bill of lading was applied for. When the goods were on board, but before the vessel left the port, the vendor, hearing that the purchaser was insolvent, gave notice to the master of the ship to stop the goods.

Held, that the master of the vessel having received the goods in the capacity of carrier only, and not to hold for the purchaser, there had been no constructive delivery to the purchaser; the transit, therefore, was not at an end when the notice to stop was given, and the vendor had properly exercised his right of stoppage in transitu.

Special case stated under Order LVII., r. 9.

1. On the 2nd June 1885 Messrs. T. and C. Clark and Co., ironfounders, of Wolverhampton, received from Messrs. W. W. Tickle and Co., of 20, St. Helen's-place, London, an order for ten hogsheads of hollow ware, in the words and figures following:

Order No. .—London, 1st June 1885. From W. W. Tickle and Co., Merchants and Colonial Agents, 20, St. Helen's-place, E.C.—Messrs. T. and C. Clark and Co., Wolverhampton. Pay-day last Saturday each month. Bankers: London and Westminster, Lothbury. Please pack the undermentioned goods for us in the usual way, and mark same as before, following numbers, invoice in duplicate. On receipt of invoice we will forward you shipping documents.—10 hogsheads hollow ware, usual assortment.

2. On the 25th June 1885, in pursuance of the said order, the said Messrs. T. and C. Clark and Co. forwarded to Messrs. W. W. Tickle and Co. an invoice of goods amounting to 99*l.* 6*s.* 8*d.*

(a) Reported by F. A. Crailsheim, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

3. On the 28th June 1885 Messrs. T. and C. Clark and Co. received from Messrs. W. W. Tickle and Co. a consignment note in the following terms:

Please consign the 10hhds. h'ware to the Darling Downs to Melbourne, loading in the East India Docks here. To come up at once.

4. On the 29th June 1885 Messrs. T. and C. Clark and Co. delivered the ten hogsheads of hollow ware to the carriers, Messrs. Pickford and Co., collecting agents for the London and North-Western Railway Company, at Wolverhampton, together with a consignment note, which was as follows:

290.—Shakespeare Foundry, Wolverhampton, June 29th, 1885.—Pickford and Co.—Please deliver the undermentioned packages in the same good condition as received from Thos. Chas. Clark and Co.

5. On the 30th June 1885 the London and North-Western Railway Company sent to Messrs. W. W. Tickle and Co. an advice note, of which the following are the material parts:

The undermentioned goods consigned to you on the conditions shown on the back hereof, having arrived at this station, I will thank you to instruct our agents, Messrs. Pickford and Co. as to their removal hence as soon as possible, as they remain here to your order, and are now held by the company, not as common carriers, but as warehousemen at owners' sole risk, and subject to the usual warehouse or wharfage charges in addition to the charges now advised. The goods advised by this note have been forwarded to our Poplar station for shipment per Darling Downs, East India Docks.

6. On or before the 2nd July 1885 the ten hogsheads arrived at Poplar, and on the 2nd July were put on board the lighter Nile at Poplar, by the London and North-Western Railway Company, to be towed alongside the Darling Downs, by the Thames Steam Tug and Lighterage Company Limited, the agents of the London and North-Western Railway Company. On the morning of the 3rd July the ten hogsheads were towed alongside the Darling Downs, and at noon of that day they were shipped on board the Darling Downs. Thereupon the mate's receipt for the ten hogsheads was given to the London and North-Western Railway Company, who at once forwarded it to Messrs. W. W. Tickle and Co.

7. On the 3rd July 1885 Messrs. T. and C. Clark and Co. received a letter, dated the 2nd July, from Messrs. Gush, Phillips, Walters, and Williams, solicitors for Messrs. W. W. Tickle and Co.'s creditors, announcing the insolvency of Messrs. W. W. Tickle and Co.

8. Upon receipt of the letter mentioned in the last preceding paragraph, at or about 10 a.m. of the 3rd July Messrs. T. and C. Clark and Co. sent by messenger to the agent at Wolverhampton of the London and North-Western Railway Company a letter, of which the following are the material parts:

Dear Sir,—Ten hhds., consigned June 29th, 1885, to the Darling Downs, @ Melbourne, loading in East India Docks, to W. W. Tickle and Co., 20, St. Helen's-place, London, E.C.—Please do your utmost to stop delivery of these hhds. Of great importance that delivery should not be effected. Will you kindly wire at once and let us have a reply, quick, where they are. The consignment to be transferred for our order. We depend upon your special attention.

At the time the above letter was received by the agent at Wolverhampton of the London and North-Western Railway Company, the ten hogsheads were on board the lighter Nile, in charge of the Thames Steam Tug and Lighterage Company Limited, as agents of the railway company.

9. Immediately upon receipt of the letter set out in the last preceding paragraph, the agent at Wolverhampton of the London and North-Western Railway Company sent to the agent of that company at Poplar the following telegram:

Order, W. W. Tickle and Co.—Senders ask us to stop delivery; hold goods. Do not advise consignee. Can I accept indemnity? Wire how matters stand.

Immediately upon receipt of this telegram the agent at Poplar of the London and North-Western Railway Company sent orders to the Thames Steam Tug and Lighterage Company Limited not to ship the ten hogsheads, but that company did not receive these orders in time to prevent the shipment of the goods on board the Darling Downs.

10. At or shortly after the time when the mate's receipt for the ten hogsheads was made out as stated in paragraph 6 of this case, bills of lading in accordance therewith were prepared for the same, and signed ready for delivery, but were not applied for at the time, and have since remained, and now are, in the possession of Messrs. C. Bethell and Co., the owners or the agents of the owners of the Darling Downs, who are also the stakeholders in these proceedings.

11. Shortly after the shipment of the ten hogsheads the Darling Downs sailed from London for Melbourne with the ten hogsheads on board.

12. On the 11th July 1885 Messrs. W. W. Tickle and Co. presented a petition in bankruptcy, and on the same day a receiving order was made in the said bankruptcy proceedings.

13. On the 7th Aug. 1885 a scheme of arrangement of the affairs of Messrs. W. W. Tickle and Co. was presented to creditors of the firm, and the same was on the 26th Aug. 1885 duly confirmed by a resolution passed by a majority of creditors representing three-fourths in value of all the creditors who had theretofore duly proved their debts.

14. On the 8th Aug. Messrs. T. and C. Clark and Co., who had not paid the price of the ten hogsheads, wrote to Messrs. C. Bethell and Co. claiming as their property the ten hogsheads.

15. On the 15th Aug. 1885 Mr. John Young was appointed special manager of the estate and business of Messrs. W. W. Tickle and Co.

16. On the 15th Sept. the scheme of arrangement and the appointment of Mr. John Young as trustee to administer the said debtors' property and manage their business was duly approved by the court.

17. On the 16th Sept. 1885, Messrs. T. and C. Clark and Co., through their solicitors H. and J. E. Underhill and Lawrence, wrote to Messrs. C. Bethell and Co., again claiming the said hogsheads.

18. On the 21st Sept. Messrs. T. and C. Clark and Co. paid to Messrs. C. Bethell and Co. the freight upon the said hogsheads to Melbourne, but the same was received by Messrs. C. Bethell and Co. without prejudice to the question as to who was entitled to the ten hogsheads.

19. On the 15th Oct. 1885 the Darling Downs arrived at Melbourne with the ten hogsheads on board, and at the time of the commencement of these proceedings they were in the custody of Gibbs, Bright, and Co., shipping agents and consignees, at Melbourne, of the Darling Downs.

20. On the 9th Nov. Messrs. C. Bethell and Co. received a letter from Mr. John Young (as such trustee as aforesaid) claiming the bills of lading relating to the said hogsheads.

21. On the 13th Nov. Messrs. C. Bethell and Co. received a letter from Messrs. H. and J. E. Underhill and Lawrence, solicitors for Messrs. T. and C. Clark and Co., giving them notice that, if the ten hogsheads were handed over to Mr. John Young, Messrs. C. Bethell and Co. would be held responsible.

The question submitted for the opinion of the court was, whether, under the circumstances above set forth, Mr. John Young or Messrs. T. and C. Clark and Co. were entitled to the possession of or property in the said ten hogsheads.

Arthur Charles, Q.C. (Lyon with him) for John Young, the trustee of the estate of Messrs. W. W. Tickle and Co. (the vendees).—It is submitted that, under the circumstances of this case, the goods in question had arrived at their destination before the arrival of the notice to stop them, and therefore that there was no stoppage in transitu. As between the original consignor and consignee, the transit was at an end when the goods were on board the Darling Downs:

Ex parte Miles; Re Isaacs, 15 Q. B. Div. 39.

The general principle applicable is, that when goods have arrived at a place indicated by the purchaser to the vendor, and orders are given that they are to remain there in the possession of an agent of the purchaser, the transitus is at an end, although that may not be the ultimate destination of the goods. Therefore the transit in this particular case ended with the shipment. The following cases were also referred to:

Kendall v. Marshall, 48 L. T. Rep. N. S. 951; 11 Q. B. Div. 356;
Ex parte Rosevear China Clay Company; Re Cock, 40 L. T. Rep. N. S. 730; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 144; 11 Ch. Div. 560.

Underhill, Q.C. (Plumptre with him) for T. and C. Clark and Co. (the vendors).—It is submitted that the vendors had a right to stop the goods, as Melbourne was their destination, and that the goods were properly stopped. The owners of the Darling Downs received the goods in the capacity of agents to carry them only, and not in the capacity of agents to hold them for the buyers:

Dixon v. Baldwen, 5 East, 175.

The ultimate destination of the goods, namely, Melbourne, was in the contemplation of the purchasers when they ordered them to be shipped on board the vessel. Here there was no assignment of the bill of lading to a third party for value:

Ex parte Watson; Re Love, 36 L. T. Rep. N. S. 75; 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 396; 5 Ch. Div. 35.

They also cited

Ex parte Golding; Re Knight, 42 L. T. Rep. N. S. 270; 13 Ch. Div. 628;

Charles, Q.C. in reply.—The case of Ex parte Watson; Re Love (36 L. T. Rep. N. S. 75; 5 Ch. Div. 35), is distinguishable, because there part of the original contract was that Love was to ship the goods direct to China, their ultimate destination. The vendee took constructive possession of the goods as soon as they were on board the Darling Downs, and in Kendall v. Marshall

(48 L. T. Rep. N. S. 951; 11 Q. B. Div. 356), Bowen, L.J. says that the transit lasts until the consignee, either himself or by his agent, takes possession of the goods. In Ex parte Miles; Re Isaacs (15 Q. B. Div. p. 46), Brett, M.R. says: "It was suggested that Ex parte Watson is a decision to the contrary. I cannot think it is. It seems to me that that case was decided upon the assumption that the purchaser, having made his arrangements for the transit, directed the vendor to send the goods, according to those arrangements, straight from the place of manufacture to Shanghai. There was nothing more to be done as to the transit after the vendor had directed the goods to be conveyed to Shanghai to the person to whom they were to be delivered there." Therefore that case is clearly distinguishable from the present one. The form of the mate's receipt for the goods shows that the vessel was the destination of the goods, as between the sellers and purchasers, and that the shipowners were the agents of the vendees to receive the goods. In Ex parte Rosevear China Clay Company (40 L. T. Rep. N. S. 730; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 144; 11 Ch. Div. 560) James, L.J. says: "The authorities show that the vendor has a right to stop in transitu until the goods have actually got into the hands of the purchaser, or of someone who receives them in the character of his servant or agent. That is the cardinal principle. In order that the vendor should have lost that right the goods must be in the hands of the purchaser, or of someone who can be treated as his servant or agent, and not in the hands of a mere intermediary." Here the goods got into the hands of the agent of the purchasers when they reached the Darling Downs, and it is submitted that from that moment the transitus was at an end.

Tatlock appeared for C. Bethell and Co., the shipowners.

Cur. adv. vult.

Aug. 10.—Mathew, J.—This is a special case stated to ascertain whether Mr. Young, as trustee of the estate of Messrs. Tickle and Co., or Messrs. Clark and Co., are entitled to the possession of ten hogsheads of hollow ware which had been forwarded on board the Darling Downs from London to Melbourne. On the 1st June 1885 Messrs. Clark and Co. received an order at Wolverhampton from Messrs. Tickle and Co. for the goods in question, and on the 25th June, in pursuance of the order, an invoice for the goods, amounting to 99*l.* 6*s.* 8*d.*, was forwarded by Messrs. Clark and Co. to Messrs. Tickle and Co. In the order nothing was stated as to the destination of the goods; but on the 28th June Messrs. Clark and Co. received from Messrs. Tickle and Co., directions to consign the goods to the Darling Downs, then loading in the East India Docks for Melbourne. On the 29th June the goods were accordingly delivered by Messrs. Clark and Co. to the London and North-Western Railway Company, at Wolverhampton, to be put on board the Darling Downs. On the 30th June the London and North-Western Railway Company notified to Messrs. Tickle and Co. that the goods had been forwarded to Poplar station for shipment, and on the morning of the 3rd July the goods were shipped by lightermen employed by the railway company and put on board the Darling Downs. The mate's receipt was sent to Messrs. Tickle and Co. while the goods were in course of transit to the Darling Downs. Messrs. Clark and Co. were informed that the buyers had stopped payment, and they immediately tried to stop the delivery of the goods, but before the notice to stop was received the goods had been shipped. The vessel shortly after sailed from the docks for Melbourne with the goods on board. No bills of lading were applied for in exchange for the mate's receipt, and it was arranged that the goods should remain in possession of the owners of the ship pending the settlement of the question whether or not the right to stop in transitu was gone.

It was contended for the trustee of the buyers' estate that the rule of law applicable to the case was this: that where goods have arrived at a place indicated by the buyer to the seller, and are to remain there in the hands of an agent of the buyer, there is an end of the transitus, although the place be not that of their ultimate destination. In this particular case it was said that the master or mate of the vessel was the agent of the buyers, who, as between them and the sellers, was to receive the goods for the buyers, and therefore that the transit ended with the shipment. But the principle to be gathered from the many decisions on the subject seems to me to be that, in determining whether there has been a constructive delivery of the goods to an agent of the buyer, it must be ascertained in what capacity the agent has received the goods, whether to carry or to hold for the buyer. In other words, the inquiry must be what is the exact nature of the contract between the buyer and the agent under which the latter has received the goods. In the case of Dixon v. Baldwen (5 East, 175) the evidence was directed to show that Metcalf received the goods as agent for the buyers, in order that he might hold them until he received further orders as to their destination, and that without such orders the goods in his hands would remain stationary. The court held upon this evidence that when the goods reached Metcalf the transit was at an end. In the case of Kendall v. Marshall (48 L. T. Rep. N. S. 951; 11 Q. B. Div. 356) the facts as presented to the Court of Appeal would seem to be different from those dealt with by the court below. At the trial it appeared that Marshall and Co. had entered into a contract with the buyers to forward the goods at a through rate from Bolton to Rouen. It was not suggested that there was any contract between the buyers and Marshall and Co. other than the contract to forward. There was no evidence that the railway company were the agents of the buyers. They were treated as having acted for Marshall and Co. In the Court of Appeal, it would appear from the judgment of all the Lords Justices that it was assumed or admitted that the railway company were the agents of the buyers to carry the goods to Garston, and there deliver them to Marshall and Co., to be held by them for the buyers until further orders were given. With this material alteration of the evidence submitted to the Court of Appeal, the case was readily brought into line with Dixon v. Baldwen (5 East, 175), and it was held that there had been a constructive delivery to the buyers. The judgments delivered in the Court of Appeal in this and the later case of Ex parte Miles; Re Isaacs (15 Q. B. Div. 39), seem to me to involve the application of the principle that in determining whether the goods are still in transitu a sufficient inquiry into the facts must be made to ascertain what has been the contract between the buyer and the agent who has received the goods. The cases referred to are instances of constructive delivery to the buyer, and of consequent termination of the transit. But the numerous cases from Smith v. Goss (1 Camp. 282) to Ex parte Watson; Re Love (36 L. T. Rep. N. S. 75; 5 Ch. Div. 35), in which the receipt of the goods by the agent has been held not to be a constructive delivery to the buyer, indicate, it seems to me, with equal clearness the existence and application of the rule. These authorities show that, although the fact that a person has been named by the buyer to the seller to receive the goods is some evidence, it is by no means conclusive evidence that the receipt by that person is the end of the transit. The case of Ex parte Rosevear China Clay Company (40 L. T. Rep. N. S. 730; 11 Ch. Div. 560) presents a close analogy to this case. The buyer had purchased china clay, which was to be delivered by the seller free on board at a specified port. Afterwards the buyer named the vessel to the vendor, and the clay was shipped. Before the ship sailed the buyers stopped payment, and notice to stop in transitu was given to the master. No bill of lading had been signed. It was decided by the Court of Appeal that the transit was not at an end. Here it seems clear that the London and North-Western Railway Company, the lightermen, and the shipowners were all the agents of the buyers, not to hold, but to forward the goods. The reasons urged by the learned counsel for the trustee in support of the view that the delivery on board the ship to the mate was a constructive delivery to the buyer would apply as forcibly to the delivery to the London and North-Western Railway Company. But if this were a delivery to the buyers, the transit would have ended in law at the point where it commenced in fact. The contract with the shipowner was to forward the goods to Melbourne, and there deliver upon the terms of a bill of lading in the usual form. Until the bill of lading had been transferred to a bonâ fide holder for value, it seems to me that the sellers in this case would retain the right to stop in transitu. It was further urged for the trustee that the transit was over when the goods were shipped, because the goods might, on the demand of the buyers, have been taken out of the possession of the master of the ship; but this possibility—so remote in a business point of view—is no proof that the transit was terminated (see The London and North-Western Railway Company v. Bartlett, 7 H. & N. 400). The further point was made that the notice to stop was insufficient, because it had been served on the owners and not on the master of the ship. But the notice had been given to the owners under such circumstances as enabled them to communicate with the master, and prevent a delivery contrary to the terms of the notice to stop (Whitehead v. Anderson, 9 M. & W. 518). I am of opinion, for these reasons, that the sellers were entitled to stop the goods, and our judgment is for them with costs.

Cave, J.—In all cases of stoppage in transitu it is necessary, first of all, to ascertain what is the transitus or passage of the goods from the possession of the vendor to that of the purchaser. The moment the goods are delivered by the vendor to a carrier to be carried to the purchaser the transitus begins. When the goods have arrived at their destination, and have been delivered to the purchaser or his agent, or when the carrier holds them as warehouseman for the purchaser, and no longer as carrier only, the transitus is at an end. The destination may be fixed by the contract of sale, or by directions given by the purchaser to the vendor. But however fixed, the goods have arrived at their destination, and the transitus is at an end when they have got into the hands of someone who holds them for the purchaser, and for some other purpose than that of merely carrying them to the destination fixed by the contract, or by the directions given by the purchaser to the vendor. The difficulty in each case lies in applying these principles. In the case now before us, the purchasers directed the vendors, who carried on business at Wolverhampton, to send the goods to the Darling Downs, then loading in the East India Docks for Melbourne; and the vendors accordingly delivered the goods to the London and North-Western Railway Company, at Wolverhampton, to be taken to and put on board the Darling Downs. The railway company carried the goods to their Poplar station, and then by means of lightermen put them on board the Darling Downs. The lightermen took from the mate and gave to the railway company receipts for the goods, which the railway company sent to the purchasers. Nothing more was done, and the Darling Downs, having the goods on board, sailed in due course for Melbourne. The vendors, during the voyage, gave the shipowners notice to stop delivery of the goods; and it was arranged that on their arrival at Melbourne they should remain in the custody of the shipowners, pending the decision of the question whether the right to stop in transitu was gone when the goods were put on board the Darling Downs. Now, if the purchasers, on getting the mate's receipts, had sent a clerk with them to the Darling Downs to exchange them for a bill of lading for the goods, I should have been of opinion that the goods had come into the possession of the purchasers, and that the transitus was at an end; because I should, from those facts, have drawn the inference that it was the intention of the vendors and purchasers that, as between them, the Darling Downs, in the East India Docks, should be the destination of the goods. For I think it is quite immaterial whether the purchasers do or do not intend, after the goods have got into their possession, to send them to a further destination, and that it is equally immaterial whether they do or do not communicate such intention to the purchasers. On the other hand, if the London and North-Western Railway Company had exchanged the mate's receipts for a bill of lading, making the goods deliverable to the order of the vendors, and had sent that bill of lading to the vendors, and if the purchasers had acquiesced in that course of conduct, I should have drawn the inference that, as between the vendors and purchasers, Melbourne was the destination of the goods. In this case neither of these courses was exactly followed. The railway company sent the mate's receipts to the purchasers, but they did nothing with them. No bill of lading was obtained by anyone, and the goods went to Melbourne, because the direction of the purchasers to the vendors had put them on board of a vessel bound for that place. Under these circumstances, I am unable to distinguish this case from that of Ex parte Rosevear China Clay Company (40 L. T. Rep. N. S. 730; 11 Ch. Div. 560), which is binding upon me, although I am also unable to reconcile that case with some of the dicta in Ex parte Miles; Re Isaacs (15 Q. B. Div. 39). I agree, therefore, that judgment must be entered for the vendors.

In an action brought by seamen for wages and breach of contract, where the plaintiffs proved breaches of contract by the shipowners, whereby the seamen were supplied with provisions defective in quantity and quality, and were exposed to great dangers and hardships, the Court awarded the wages as claimed, the maximum compensation of 1*s.* 8*d. per day under sect.* 223 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 in respect of the food, and general damages in respect of the hardships suffered by the plaintiffs.

THIS was an action in personam for seamen's wages and damages for breach of contract against Sir William Call and William Phillips, the owners, and Robert Robertson, the master, of the British steamship Justitia.

It appeared that the plaintiffs had been engaged by the master under articles by which they were to sail from London to Antwerp, and thence to Trinidad, where the plaintiffs were to be discharged within one month after the ship's arrival, and a passage was to be found for them to the United Kingdom, and wages were to be paid them till their arrival in the United Kingdom.

The Justitia, with the plaintiffs on board, left London on June 4, 1885, for Antwerp, where arms and ammunition were shipped. She then proceeded to Grenada, and thence to La Boca, where she was transferred by the owners to certain Venezuelan insurgents for the purpose of being used by them as a troopship against the Venezuelan Government. The plaintiffs refused to give their assistance to the insurgents, but were compelled to remain on board until the 26th July, 1885, when the Justitia was seized by the Dominican Government in San Domingo, and the plaintiffs were then sent home by the British Consul.

(a) Reported by J. P. ASPINALL and BUTLER ASPINALL, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

During the time the Justitia was in the hands of the Venezuelan revolutionists she was on several occasions engaged in conflict with the Venezuelan Government and the plaintiffs were exposed to great dangers and hardships, and were not provided with proper food and provisions.

The plaintiffs alleged that by reason of the defendant's breach of their agreement they suffered damage by not being discharged, by not having their passage home provided, by being detained on board the Justitia, and by being exposed to the dangers incident to the service in which the ship was used.

The plaintiffs had been paid one month's pay, and now claimed wages till date of final settlement, compensation under sects. 187 and 223 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, and general damages for the defendants' breach of the said agreement.

The following sections of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104) were referred to, and are material to the decision:

Sect. 187. The master or owner of every ship shall pay to every seaman his wages within the respective periods following (that is to say): in the case of a home trade ship within two days after the termination of the agreement, or at the time when such seaman is discharged, whichever first happens; and in the case of all other ships (except ships employed in the Southern whale fishery or on other voyages for which seamen by the terms of their agreement are wholly compensated by shares in the profits of the adventure) within three days after the cargo has been delivered, or within five days after the seaman's discharge, whichever first happens; and in all cases the seaman shall, at the time of his discharge, be entitled to be paid on account a sum equal to one-fourth part of the balance due to him; and every master or owner who neglects or refuses to make payment in manner aforesaid, without sufficient cause, shall pay to the seaman a sum not exceeding the amount of two days' pay for each of the days, not exceeding ten days, during which such payment is delayed beyond the respective periods aforesaid, and such sum shall be recoverable as wages.

Sect. 223. In the following cases (that is to say):

(1.) If during a voyage the allowance of any of the provisions which any seaman has by his agreement stipulated for is reduced (except in accordance with any regulations for reduction by way of punishment contained in the agreement, and also except for any time during which such seaman wilfully and without sufficient cause refuses or neglects to perform his duty, or is lawfully under confinement for misconduct, either on board or on shore);

(2.) If it is shown that any of such provisions are or have during the voyage been bad in quality and unfit for use;

The seaman shall receive by way of compensation for such reduction or bad quality, according to the time of its continuance, the following sums, to be paid to him in addition to and to be recoverable as wages (that is to say);

(1.) If his allowance is reduced by any quantity not exceeding one-third of the quantity specified in the agreement, a sum not exceeding fourpence a day;

(2.) If his allowance is reduced by more than one-third of such quantity, eightpence a day;

(3.) In respect of such bad quality as aforesaid, a sum not exceeding one shilling a day.

But if it is shown to the satisfaction of the court before which the case is tried that any provisions the allowance of which has been reduced could not be procured, or supplied in proper quantities, and that proper and equivalent substitutes were supplied in lieu thereof, the court shall take such circumstances into consideration and shall modify or refuse compensation as the justice of the case may require.

Sir Walter Phillimore (with him Stokes) for the plaintiffs.—The plaintiffs are entitled to judgment against all three defendants. As to the food, it is submitted that the court should give them the maximum compensation of 1*s.* 8*d.* per day, 8*d.* a day in respect of the reduced quantity, and 1*s.* a day in respect of the bad quality. They are also entitled to general damages for the hardships which they have incurred by the defendants' breach of the agreement:

Wood v. Germain, Marsden's Admiralty Cases, 1648-1840, p. 311;
Drew v. Hardwick, Marsden's Admiralty Cases, 1648-1840, p. 315.

Nelson for the defendants.—The plaintiffs are not entitled on the facts to judgment against these defendants. The plaintiffs by their conduct have deprived themselves of any right of action. As to the food, no inferior quality or reduced quantity has been proved; and in any event the court ought not in this case to give the maximum compensation. As to general damages the plaintiffs have established no case entitling them to such.

Sir JAMES HANNEN.—I think this is an exceedingly clear case. Mr. Nelson has failed to raise any doubt in my mind as to what the nature of this transaction was. I have not the slightest doubt that these three persons, Sir Wm. Call, his valet Wm. Phillips, and Robertson, were in a combination to provide an armed vessel for the use of the insurgents, whom they expected would be in need of their assistance. I am also of opinion that Phillips and Robertson went out, as the agents of Sir Wm. Call, to give assistance to the insurgents, and I entertain no doubt that the plaintiffs knew nothing but what appeared in the articles. Although I have no doubt that it was intended by the defendants to render assistance to the insurgents by means of the men on board, yet I dare say they had not arranged in what way it was to be done. The fact is, that the ship went to the West Indies, and it is clear that the engagement that was entered into with the crew, which is binding upon all three of these defendants, was never carried out. They never were taken to Trinidad; they never were discharged there; and they were not brought home at the expense of the defendants. That being so, it lies upon the defendants to excuse themselves for breach of the contract. Sir Wm. Call has not put forward any defence. The others have, and I see, on looking at it again, that Phillips goes the length of saying that these men wrongfully broke their engagement with him, and remained on board after the change of ownership. Now, the view I take is this: It is plain that these men raised objections to serving on board the vessel with the insurgents. I believe their statement that they were requested to enter into some engagement on shore, but that they refused to do so. With regard to what occurred on board, it is clear from the evidence that the men were not called upon to sign any articles, and it is not pretended that they did sign any articles, but they were no doubt tempted with an offer of money. The question, however, is, whether they entered into any engagement to the effect that they voluntarily gave up their right under the articles under which they started, and whether they elected to throw in their lot with the insurgents. I look upon the offer of money as a bait to tempt them to assist in carrying out this very irregular transaction.

All these plaintiffs have been exposed to hardships, and very likely in many cases to injury to their healths, by the wrongful acts of the defendants in their attempt to carry out their common object, and I therefore hold that the defendants are jointly and severally liable. The question remains, what are the plaintiffs entitled to? They are entitled to their wages till final settlement. With regard to the food, it is left in some doubt, but I think, believing as I do that the plaintiffs were subjected to serious inconvenience from the insufficient quantity and defective quality of the food, that it must be taken strongly against those who have done the wrong; and therefore I shall allow the plaintiffs the maximum amount of 1*s.* 8*d.* a day until a time which I have fixed upon somewhat roughly, but to the best of my ability, upon the facts before me. It is impossible for me to say that I have any confidence that I am correct in fixing upon the number of days I have, but I shall say up to fourteen days after the plaintiffs' arrival in San Domingo. With regard to general damages, I am very glad to find that the authorities are in favour of the jurisdiction of the court to award general damages, and I shall do so. I am the better pleased to be able to do so, as confirming this as a general principle that, if sailors are subjected to wrongs of this kind, they are not without remedies capable of being enforced in this court. But it is obvious that the amount of damages is left in a great degree of obscurity. The amount must vary with the different men. Some of them have been ill, others have not; and hence the amount would depend on a variety of circumstances which I am not able to exactly estimate. I therefore cannot pretend to think that I could arrive at any exact figure which in each case would represent the injury that these men have sustained. I must therefore deal with it in what is undoubtedly an unsatisfactory manner, and I shall award a sum of 10*l.* to each of these men in respect of the general damages which they have sustained. There will be judgment for the plaintiffs with costs.

THE LYONS. (a)

Mortgage action—Priority of liens—Claim for wages—Admiralty Court Act 1861 (24 Vict. c. 10), s. 4.

A claim by the plaintiff in an action for necessaries brought under sect. 4 (or, semble, under sect. 5) of the Admiralty Court Act 1861, even though it includes wages paid to the ship's crew at the request of the owner, is not entitled to precedence of a mortgagee's claim.

Semble, precedence might have been gained by obtaining prior permission from the court to make the payment.

(a) Reported by J. P. ASPINALL and BUTLER ASPINALL, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

THESE were two motions in two mortgage actions instituted against the British steamship Lyons, asking for judgment in both actions and for payment out of the proceeds of the sale of the ship to the plaintiff.

The plaintiff in both actions was the same person, and sued in respect of two mortgages for 1000*l.* and 950*l.* respectively, held by her on the steamship.

The ship was, by order of the court, sold for 800*l.*, and after deducting the marshal's account there remained the sum of 416*l.* 1*s.* 1*d.*

The defendant, by his solicitor, signed consents to judgments for the claims indorsed on the writs in both actions. Subsequently to the institution of these two actions, one Henry Lafone instituted an action in rem, under sect. 4 of the Admiralty Court Act 1861, against the Lyons, to recover sums of money paid by him for alleged equipment and repairs of the vessel, including items paid by him for wages, pilotage, and towage; and filed a caveat against the payment of the proceeds out of court.

In opposition to the two motions the following affidavit was filed by Henry Lafone:

I, Henry Lafone, of Butler's Wharf, Southwark, in the county of Surrey, wharfinger, trading at Butler's Wharf, make oath and say as follows:

1. In April 1885, Mr. G. O. Lever, who was then the nominal owner of the Lyons, entered into negotiations on behalf of the owners with me, with a view to trading that vessel between London and Antwerp from my wharf. He lodged the ship's register with me, and I arranged to undertake the wharf arrangements of the vessel, and engaged a captain and crew, and had the ship brought from Newhaven, where she was lying, to Butler's Wharf. She was then sent to Antwerp on a trial trip, and certain expenses were incurred in introducing her to the trade, on account of which I paid a bill incurred with the London Tavern Company, for refreshments supplied on the trial trip, the sum of 71*l.* 12*s.* 6*d.* After the return of the vessel from Antwerp she was berthed off the wharf, where she remained a considerable time. I paid all the outgoings in connection with the said ship for wages, equipments, repairs, pilotage, and towage, and there is now due to me the sum of 456*l.* 9*s.* 9*d.* on account thereof, as appears by the account marked A. now produced to me. With the exception of the credit appearing in the said account I have received no payment or satisfaction of the amounts expended by me on behalf of the ship as detailed in the said account, nor have I received any security for the same, except the lien I claim on the said ship or the proceeds of the sale thereof.

J. P. Aspinall, for the plaintiff, moved for an order in the terms of the motion.

Stokes, for Henry Lafone, contra.—It is contended that the wages item takes precedence of the mortgagee's claim. It is admitted that the other items are postponed to the mortgagee's claim. My client's action is instituted under sect. 4 of the Admiralty Court Act 1861, which gives the Admiralty Court jurisdiction over claims for building, equipping, and repairing ships, provided at the time of the institution of the suit the ship or its proceeds are under arrest. The wages item is in the nature of a wages claim, and is entitled to the same priority:

The Wm. F. Safford, Lush. 69;
The St. Lawrence, 5 P. Div. 250.

[BUTT, J.—Those were actions for necessaries, for which it was then supposed there was a maritime lien. Here your action is instituted under a section of the Act which gives no maritime lien.] That is immaterial; wages are entitled to a maritime lien, and therefore a person who pays them should possess the same rights as the seamen themselves. [BUTT, J.—What have you to say to the decision of the House of Lords in The Heinrich Bjorn (55 L. T. Rep. N. S. 66; 11 App. Cas. 270; 55 L. J. 81, P. D. & A.; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 1)? Besides, you ought to have obtained permission of the court to make this payment before paying it.] To decide against my claim will be to overrule The Wm. F. Safford (ubi sup.) and St. Lawreuce (ubi sup.).

The Two Ellens, 26 L. T. Rep. N. S. 1; L. Rep. 4 P. C. 161; 1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 208.

BUTT, J.—There must be judgment in the terms of the two motions. It is quite clear, in the first place, that Mr. Stokes' client could have no right of action apart from the section of the Act of Parliament. But the section gives no maritime lien, but only a right to prove in rem for equipments and repairs where the ship is under arrest. His contention that he is entitled to precedence in respect of these wages is a strong proposition which I cannot accept. That being so, it is clear that he has no priority over the mortgagee.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Feb. 15, 17, and July 14, 1887.

(Before the LORD CHANCELLOR (Halsbury), Lords BRAMWELL, HERSCHELL and MACNAGHTEN.)

THAMES AND MERSEY MARINE INSURANCE COMPANY v. HAMILTON, FRASER, AND CO. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF APPEAL IN ENGLAND.

Marine insurance — General words in policy — Perils insured against—Splitting of chamber of donkey-engine.

A steamer was insured by a time policy in the ordinary form on the ship and machinery, including a donkey-engine. In the ordinary course of navigation the donkey-engine was employed in pumping water into the boiler, and in consequence of a screw-valve, which should have been open, being accidentally or negligently left closed, the water was forced into the air-chamber of the donkey-engine and split it open.

Held (reversing the judgment of the court below), that the injury was not a peril insured against under the general words of the policy, not being ejusdem generis with those specially enumerated.

West India Telegraph Company v. Home and Colonial Marine Insurance Company (43 L. T. Rep. N. S. 420; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 341; 6 Q. B. Div. 51) disapproved.

THIS was an appeal from a judgment of the majority of the Court of Appeal (Lindley and Lopes, L.JJ.), Lord Esher, M.R. dissenting, reported in 17 Q. B. Div. 195, who had affirmed a judgment of the Queen's Bench Division (Mathew and Smith, JJ.), in favour of the plaintiffs, upon a special case.

The action was brought by the respondents against the appellants upon a policy of marine insurance.

The plaintiffs were the owners of the Inchmaree, a steam vessel of 1287 tons net and 1975 tons gross register. In Aug. 1883 the plaintiffs effected with the defendants a policy of marine insurance for 2500*l.* on the hull, masts, spars, sails, boats, materials, and all stores, valued at 20,000*l.*, and machinery, shafting, propeller, boilers and connections, including donkey-engine and boilers, pumps and all connections, valued at 11,000*l.*—total, 31,000*l.*—of the vessel for twelve months. The adventures and perils insured against were of the seas, men-of-war, fire, enemies, pirates, rovers, thieves, jettisons, letters of mart, and countermart, surprisals, takings at sea, arrests, restraints and detainments of all kings, princes, and people of what nation, condition, or quality soever, barratry of the master and mariners, and of all other perils, losses, and misfortunes that had or should come to the hurt, detriment, or damage of the aforesaid subject-matter of insurance or any part thereof.

On the 2nd March 1884, and during the continuance of the policy, the Inchmaree was at anchor off Diamond Island awaiting orders, and for the purposes of the voyage it was necessary to pump up the main boilers by means of the donkey-pump and engine in the usual way. At the time of effecting the insurance the donkey-pump and engine, and all pipes, valves, and machinery connected therewith, were efficient and in good condition, and worked satisfactorily up to the time of the occurrence hereinafter mentioned, and the engineers and men working under them were capable and efficient for their duties. A pipe led from the donkey-pump to the boilers, and at its junction with one of the boilers there was a check-valve, capable of being opened or closed by a screw. This valve should have been open and clear when the boilers were being pumped up. This valve was either closed or salted up at the time when the donkey-pump was set to work off Diamond Island, so that the water could not pass into the boiler, and the consequence was that when the donkey-pump was set to work at the time aforesaid the pipes and water-chamber in the donkey-pump and air-chamber therein became overcharged, and the water was forced up into the air-chamber, which, in consequence, split and the pump was thereby damaged. It was admitted that the check-valve was either allowed to remain closed or become and be salted up by the negligence of one of the engineers, or was accidentally salted up without notice. It was also admitted that the closing of the valve and the accident were not due to ordinary wear and tear. The question was, whether the damage was covered by the policy of insurance.

Feb. 15.—The Attorney-General (Sir R. Webster, Q.C.), Sir C. Russell, Q.C., French, Q.C., and Synnott, appeared for the appellants, and argued that the judgment of the Court of Appeal was wrong. The policy does not contain the words "perils of navigation." Policies used at one time to be drawn to include "all risks incident to steam navigation," but of late years these words have been designedly dropped. The courts below relied on West India Telegraph Company v. Home and Colonial Marine Insurance Company (43 L. T. Rep. N. S. 420; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 341; 6 Q. B. Div. 51); but the judgment in that case departed from the recognised principles of insurance law. In every case in which underwriters have been held liable upon general words, it has been because the peril causing the loss was ejusdem generis with the perils specially enumerated:

Phillips v. Barber, 5 B. & Ald. 161;
Cullen v. Butler, 5 M. & S. 461;
Butler v. Wildman, 3 B. & Ald. 398;
Bishop v. Pentland, 7 B. & C. 219;
Devaux v. I'Anson, 5 Bing. N. C. 519;
Davidson v. Burnand, 19 L. T. Rep. N. S. 782; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 207; L. Rep. 4 C. P. 117; Merchants' Trading Company v. Universal Marine Company, 2 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 431, n.; and cited in Dudgeon v. Pembroke, 31 L. T. Rep. N. S. at p. 39; L. Rep. 9 Q. B. at p. 596.

The injury in this case was not a "peril of the sea" in any sense; a similar accident might have happened to an engine on land from the same cause. See also

Taylor v. Liverpool and Great Western Steam Company, 30 L. T. Rep. N. S. 714; 2 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 275; L. Rep. 9 Q. B. 546;

(where damage to cargo by delay was held not to be within the general words of a policy);

Pandorf v. Hamilton, (a) 55 L. T. Rep. N. S. 499; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 44; 17 Q. B. Div. 670; and the cases of Rohl v. Parr, 1 Esp. 445, and Hunter v. Potts, 4 Camp. 203, there cited. See also Sailing Ship Garston Company v. Hickie, 55 L. T. Rep. N. S. 879; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 71; 18 Q. B. Div. 17.

Cohen, Q.C., Myburgh, Q.C., and Barnes, for the respondents, contended that an ordinary policy of insurance covered all dangers of navigation, and if this accident happened from the negligence of the engineer it was "improper navigation." This is the only principle which will reconcile all the cases. It excludes losses caused by the defect of the subject of the insurance, or by the act of the assured, or by wear and tear. The rule as to perils ejusdem generis is not correctly stated in the argument of the appellants. See Fenwick v. Schmalz, 18 L. T. Rep. N. S. 27; L. Rep. 3 C. P. 313.

The authorities as to general words following specific words are collected in Maxwell on Statutes, p. 297. If the ordinary rules of construction are applied, the general words would cover all losses except such as are manifestly beyond the scope of marine insurance. A policy of marine insurance covers all losses, without risk of which navigation cannot take place—that is, all "perils of navigation:"

Woodley v. Michell (b), 48 L. T. Rep. N. S. 599; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 71; 11 Q. B. Div. 47.

If the words "perils of the seas" do not cover all

(a) The decision in this case has since been reversed in the House of Lords (57 L. T. Rep. N. S. 726; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 212; L. Rep. 12 App. Cas. 518).

(b) The decision in this case has since been overruled by the judgment of the House of Lords in Wilson v. Owners of the Cargo of the Xanthe (57 L. T. Rep. N. S. 701; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 207; L. Rep. 12 App. Cas. 503).

losses from the improper management of the ship during the voyage, the general words do so:

Carruthers v. Sydebotham, 4 M. & S. 77.

This was a case of improper navigation. The case of the Merchants' Trading Company v. Universal Marine Company, cited on the other side, does not affect the argument, for in that case the ship was unseaworthy: see the judgment of Brett, J. in Anderson v. Morice, 31 L. T. Rep. N. S. 605; 2 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 424; L. Rep. 10 C. P. 58; see also Paterson v. Harris, 1 B. & S. 336.

Taylor v. Dunbar and Pandorf v. Hamilton, cited on the other side, do not affect the question. The water in the boiler was essential to navigation, and therefore this was a "peril of navigation." In the case of a steamship the policy covers all such things as may happen connected with steam navigation. The case is governed by West India Telegraph Company v. Home and Colonial Insurance Company (43 L. T. Rep. N. S. 420; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 341; 6 Q. B. Div. 51).

The Attorney-General in reply.—The argument of the respondents goes to the length of saying that the underwriters guarantee the negligence of the crew. The direct consequences of a negligent act must be excluded, unless they lead to a sea peril.

At the conclusion of the arguments their Lordships took time to consider their judgment.

July 14.—Their Lordships gave judgment as follows:—

The LORD CHANCELLOR (Halsbury).—My Lords: In this case a policy of marine insurance for twelve months was effected upon, among other things, a pump on board the Inchmaree steamer. The adventures and perils which the capital stock and funds of the defendant company were made liable to by the policy of insurance were of the seas, men-of-war, fire, enemies, pirates, rovers, thieves, jettisons, letters of mart and countermart, surprisals, takings at sea, arrests, restraints and detainments of all kings, princes, and people of what nation, condition, or quality soever, barratry of the master and mariners, and of all other perils, losses, and misfortunes that had or should come to the hurt, detriment, or damage of the aforesaid subject-matter of insurance or any part thereof. It is certain that a loss or misfortune has happened to the pump while the pump was being used for the purpose of filling the boilers of the Inchmaree, and the sole question is, whether the loss or misfortune which did happen was one of the losses or misfortunes against which the insuring company agree to indemnify the owners of the Inchmaree. If understood in their widest sense, the words are wide enough to include it; but two rules of construction now firmly established as part of our law may be considered as limiting those words. One is, that words, however general, may be limited with respect to a subject-matter in relation to which they are used. The other is, that general words may be restricted to the same genus as the specific words that precede them. There is perhaps a third consideration which cannot be overlooked, and that is that where the same words have for many years received a judicial construction, it is not unreasonable to suppose that parties have contracted upon the belief that their words will be understood in what I will call the accepted sense. And it is to be remembered that what courts have to do in construing all written documents is to reach the meaning of the parties through the words they have used.

Now, the facts here are very simple: a part of the pump was burst because a valve which should have let the water into the boiler was stopped up while the pump was being worked by a donkey-engine. On the one side it is said that filling the boiler was necessary to enable the ship to prosecute her voyage; on the other it is said that the accident, peril, or misfortune had nothing to do with the sea, and was in no sense of the like kind with any of the perils or misfortunes specifically enumerated. In the long line of cases quoted at the bar there was only one (with which I will attempt to deal presently) which enunciated any different principles of construction from those I have endeavoured to set forth above, although I think there is some difficulty in reconciling the facts with respect to which some of them are decided with the principle upon which they profess to be decided, conspicuously, I think, De Vaux v. D'Anson (5 Bing. N. C. 519), where Tindal, C.J. rests upon authorities which, as applicable to the particular facts of the cases to which he refers, hardly support the decision then arrived at. The great difficulty I have had in this case is the decision of Lord Selborne, L.C. and Cockburn, C.J. in the case of the West India and Panama Telegraph Company v. Home and Colonial Marine Insurance Company (43 L. T. Rep. N. S. 420; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 341; 6 Q. B. Div. 51). I cannot agree with the Master of the Rolls that that case does not, as matter of reasoning, cover the present case. With the utmost respect, I can draw no real distinction between the explosion of the boiler and the bursting of the air chamber of the pump, nor can any real distinction depend upon whether it was steam generated by fire which caused the explosion or air and water forced into the chamber by ordinary mechanical action. But before your Lordships that case is open to review, and I cannot think that that case is reconcilable with the principles upon which policies of marine insurance have hitherto been construed. It introduces analogy as the guide by which you are to ascertain the genus to which the different species are to be attributed; so that in the future one must introduce as the true exposition of general words not the genus you find as applicable to the species enumerated, but any analogous genus. Sea perils or the like become enlarged into perils whose only connection with the sea is that they arise from machinery which gives motive power to ships. I cannot think that even were the analogy perfect, which I do not think it is, this is a satisfactory mode of ascertaining what the parties meant by the words they have used; and, as I have said, this is the real function of a court in construing an instrument. It might be reasonable for the parties to provide for such a peril, and one knows that "dangers of and incident to steam navigation" are words which have been used to provide for such casualties; but I cannot think that such casualties were in the contemplation of the parties when using the old familiar words of this policy. I think the subject-matter, marine risks, limits the meaning of the general words. I think the genus "perils of the sea" limits the meaning. I think the meaning attributed to these words for more than half a century by decision makes it probable that the parties used them in that accepted sense. I therefore think the judgment of the Court of Appeal wrong, and I move your Lordships that it be reversed.

Lord BRAMWELL.—My Lords: I cannot agree with the judgment in this case. The donkey-engine was insured. The adventures and perils which the defendants were to make good specified a great many perils, and "all other perils, losses, and misfortunes that shall come to the hurt, detriment, or damage of the aforesaid subject matter of insurance or any part thereof." Words could hardly be more extensive, and if the question, I ought to say a question on them, arose for the first time, I might perhaps give them their natural meaning, and say they included this case. But the question does not arise for the first time. It has arisen from time to time for centuries, and a limitation has always been put on the words in question. Definitions are most difficult, but Lord Ellenborough's seems right: "All cases of marine damages of the like kind with those specially enumerated, and occasioned by similar causes." I have had given to me the following definition or description of what would be included in the general words: "Every accidental circumstance not the result of ordinary wear and tear, delay, or of the act of the assured, happening in the course of the navigation of the ship, and incidental to the navigation, and causing loss to the subject-matter of insurance." Probably a severe criticism might detect some faults in this. There are few definitions in which that could not be done. I think the definition of Lopes, L.J. in Pandorf v. Hamilton (54 L. T. Rep. N. S. 536; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 568; 16 Q. B. Div. 629) very good: "In a seaworthy ship damage to goods caused by the action of the sea during transit not attributable to the fault of anybody" is a damage from a peril of the sea. I have thought that the following might suffice: "All perils, losses, and misfortunes of a marine character, or of a character incident to a ship as such." I put it forward with distrust, but it would comprehend all the cases cited where the assured has recovered, save perhaps the West India Telegraph Company v. Home and Colonial Insurance Company. For example, it would include the case of the ship blown over while in dock, of the ship damaged by its moorings giving way, of the ship fired into by another ship. It would not include the cases put by Lord Esher, M.R., nor the case I put of the captain seized with giddiness dropping the chronometer into the hold, nor would it include the present case. The damage to the donkey-engine was not through its being in a ship or at sea. The same thing would have happened had the boilers and engines been on land, if the same mismanagement had taken place. The sea, waves, and winds had nothing to do with it. As a matter of principle and reasoning, I think the decision wrong. I think the judgment in the West India and Panama Telegraph Company v. Home and Colonial Marine Insurance Company (ubi sup.) wrong on the reasoning I have used. With most sincere respect, though it is true that what the winds are to a sailing vessel, steam is to a steamer, that does not decide the question, for it is not every damage to sails that would be covered by the policy. Suppose damage by rats or mildew to spare sails. As to Lord Esher's judgment in that case, I concur in his criticism on it in the present case. And I agree with Lopes, L.J. that the word "fire" in the policy will not sustain that judgment. The Lord Justice puts the case of a spar falling on the deck, while getting under sail, and being broken, and says it would be within the policy. Perhaps; but if it would, it would be because it was a loss in navigation, a loss which could not have happened except on a ship. But suppose the spar was being used to erect an awning on deck to give shelter to dancers or the like, and was broken, the case would not be covered by the policy. It would not be a marine loss, not a loss with which the sea, or navigation, or the ship as a ship had anything to do. I do not like cutting down the natural meaning of words: there is always a great difficulty in saying what should be substituted. But it is admitted that some limit must be put on those in question here. I think a proper limit would exclude this loss; so that the judgment of Lord Esher, M.R., is, I think, right, and that of the other judges wrong, and their decision should be reversed.

Lord HERSCHELL.—My Lords: This action undoubtedly raises an important question. It turns on the construction to be put upon the general words which follow the specific enumeration of the risks against which the insurance is effected in an ordinary marine policy. The policy sued on was a time policy for twelve months, from the 20th Aug. 1883 to the 20th Aug. 1884; and the subject-matter of insurance, "the hull, masts, spars, sails, boats, materials, and all stores, valued at 20,000*l.*; and machinery, shafting, propellers, boilers and connections, including donkey-engines and boilers, pumps and all connections, valued at 11,000*l.*" The risks against which the insurance was effected are thus described: "And touching the adventures and perils which the capital, stock, and funds of the said company are made liable unto by this insurance, they are, of the seas, men-of-war, fire, enemies, pirates, rovers, thieves, jettisons, letters of mart and countermart, surprisals, takings at sea, arrests, restraints and detainments of all kings, princes, and people of what nation, condition, or quality soever, barratry of the masters and mariners, and of all such perils, losses, and misfortunes that have or shall come to the hurt, detriment, or damage of the aforesaid subject-matter of this insurance, or any part thereof." The facts lie in a narrow compass. They are set out in a special case, stated by agreement between the parties. On the 2nd March 1884 the Inchmaree (the vessel insured) was at anchor off Diamond Island, awaiting orders, and for the purposes of the voyage it was necessary to pump up the main boilers, by means of a donkey-pump and engine, in the usual way. A pipe led from the donkey-pump to the boilers, and at its junction with one of the boilers there was a check-valve, capable of being opened or closed by a screw, which ought to have been kept open and clear when the boilers were being pumped up. This valve had either been left closed or had become salted up when the donkey-pump was set to work off Diamond Island, so that the water could not pass into the boiler. The consequence was that, when the donkey-pump was set to work, the pipes and water chamber in the donkey-pump, and the air chamber therein, became overcharged, and the water was forced up into the air chamber, which, in consequence, split, and the pump was thereby damaged. It was admitted for the purposes of the case that the check-valve was either allowed to remain closed or to become salted up by the negligence of one of the engineers, or was accidentally salted up without being noticed, though reasonable care was taken by the engineers. It was also admitted that the closing or salting up and accident were not due to ordinary wear and tear. The cost of replacing the pump was about 72*l.* 10*s.* The ship and freight were warranted free from average under 3 per cent. unless the ship were stranded; but as she did become stranded during the voyage, the loss was not excluded from the warranty. The parties were unable to agree as to whether there was negligence in allowing the check-valve to remain closed or to become salted up; but as the plaintiffs contended that the defendants were liable, whether there was negligence or not, it was agreed to leave that question for trial (if material) after the decision of the case. The questions stated for the opinion of the court were, whether the defendants were liable under the policy in respect of the loss, (1) if it could have been avoided by proper care, and occurred through negligence; (2) if it occurred accidentally without negligence. The Queen's Bench Division gave judgment for the plaintiffs, and this judgment was affirmed by the majority of the Court of Appeal (Lindley and Lopes, L.JJ.), the Master of the Rolls dissenting.

It was not contended at the bar on behalf of the respondents that the loss was within any of the specific risks enumerated. Reliance was placed exclusively upon the general words: "All other perils, losses, and misfortunes that have or shall come to the hurt, detriment, or damage of the aforesaid subject-matter of this insurance or any part thereof." It cannot be denied that, if these words are to be taken without any limitation, a loss or misfortune did come to the damage of a part of the subject-matter of the insurance. But it is contended on behalf of the appellants that these general words, following a specific enumeration, must be limited to perils ejusdem generis with those specified, or, to put it in another way, that they must be construed with reference to the scope and purpose of the instrument in which they occur, viz., a policy of marine insurance. If the matter now presented itself for consideration for the first time, untouched by authority, I should not myself be inclined to construe these general words without some limitation. Indeed, the learned counsel for the defendants themselves did not contend for so wide an interpretation. The view which they put before the House was, that they should be confined to accidents happening to the subject-matter of the insurance in the course of, and incidental to, the navigation. I think it will be found, upon examination of the authorities, that the general words in a marine policy have received from the courts, for a long series of years, a construction to which your Lordships would do well to adhere. The instrument is one in daily use, and if your Lordships were to put a new construction upon it you would be likely to defeat, and not to give effect to, the intention of the parties. Nothing would be more dangerous, in my opinion, than to depart from a construction which the authorities have put upon words in common use in a mercantile instrument, even if the propriety of the decision might originally have been open to question. In a case which came before the Court of King's Bench, as long ago as 1816, Lord Ellenborough, C.J., in delivering the judgment of the court, in clear and unambiguous terms expressed their view as to the meaning of the words in question. I refer to the case of Cullen v. Butler (5 M. & S. 461). It was an action on a policy of insurance where the ship and goods had been sunk at sea by another ship firing upon her in mistake for an enemy. The court inclined to the opinion that the loss was not one by "perils of the sea," but held that it was covered by the general words. Lord Ellenborough said, "The extent and meaning of the general words have not yet been the immediate subject of any judicial construction in our courts of law. As they must, however, be considered as introduced into the policy in furtherance of the objects of marine insurance, and may have the effect of extending a reasonable indemnity to many cases not distinctly covered by the special words, they are entitled to be considered as material and operative words, and to have the due effect assigned to them in the construction of the instrument, and this will be done by allowing them to comprehend and cover other cases of marine damage of the like kind with those which are specially enumerated and occasioned by similar causes." No case was cited at the bar from the date when this opinion was expressed (unless it be the recent case of the West India and Panama Telegraph Company v. The Home and Colonial Marine Insurance Company, 43 L. T. Rep. N. S. 420; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 341; 6 Q. B. Div. 51, to which I will presently advert), which has proceeded upon a construction of the policy different from that enunciated by Lord Ellenborough.

I will briefly review the subsequent authorities. The first is Butler v. Wildman (3 B. & Ald. 398). There the captain of a ship had thrown a large quantity of dollars overboard, to prevent their falling into the hands of an enemy, by whom he was pursued. It was held that, if not a loss by jettison, it was covered by the general words. Abbott, C.J. says, "If not, strictly speaking, jettison, it is ejusdem generis, and therefore falls within the general words." The other judges concurred in this view, Holroyd, J. saying that the general words include "all losses of the same nature with those described in the enumerated risks." Next in order of time comes Phillips v. Barber (5 B. & Ald. 161). A vessel placed in a graving dock for repair was, by the violence of wind and weather, thrown over on her side, whereby she struck the ground with great violence and was bilged. Abbott, C.J. in a judgment holding that the underwriters were liable, after quoting the general words contained in the policy, said, "These general words are, indeed, restrained in construction to perils ejusdem generis with those more particularly enumerated in the policy. In this case, however, the loss was occasioned by the violence of the wind and weather in port, and it seems to me, therefore, to have been produced by a peril ejusdem generis with those specified, and to fall within the general words of the policy." The next case, De Vaux v. I'Anson (5 Bing. N. C. 519), was much relied on by the counsel for the respondents. But, though I feel some difficulty in explaining the grounds of that decision, it certainly purported to be based upon the antecedent authorities, and not upon any different view of the law. The ship had, in that case, been put into a dry dock for repairs. These being completed, preparations were made for getting her afloat; she was for this purpose made fast by four cables, whilst the workmen removed the sand which was under the vessel, and which consolidated the shores upon which the ship was resting. The cables strained the vessel, forcing in the ribs. The stanchions of the kelsons having all fallen from the force of the lower masts upon the keel, the garboard strake gave way, and when at last the ship was no longer upon the shores she sank into a muddy sand. At the time of her sustaining the injury the depth of water in the dock was about four feet. She was abandoned as a constructive total loss, and the question arose whether she was lost by perils insured against. Tindal, C.J., in delivering the judgment of the court, held that she was. He said: "It is to be observed the words in the policy are very large; the policy not only enumerates 'perils of the sea,' but 'all other perils, losses, and misfortunes that had or should come to the hurt, detriment, or damage of the subject-matter of the insurance.' And the cases cited and relied on by the plaintiff—Carruthers v. Sydebotham, Fletcher v. Inglis, and Phillips v. Barber—are sufficient authority to show that a loss occasioned by the endeavour to get the vessel afloat from the dock in which she had just been repaired, was a loss within the policy." It is not easy, I confess, to see how the authorities referred to were sufficient to establish the propositions they are supposed to support. In Carruthers v. Sydebotham (4 M. & S. 77) the pilot navigating a vessel had fastened her to the pier of a dock basin in the Mersey by a rope to the shore. She took the ground, and when the tide left her fell over on her side and bilged, in consequence of which, when the tide rose, she filled with water and her cargo was wetted. It was held that this was a stranding entitling the assured to recover for an average loss upon the goods. After a careful perusal of the judgments in this case, I am unable to see its bearing upon the point which had to be determined in De Vaux v. I Anson. Nor do I see the application of Fletcher v. Inglis (2 B. & Ald. 315). A vessel insured for twelve months was in a harbour with a hard, uneven bottom; the tide having left the vessel, on its return there was a considerable swell in the harbour and the ship struck the ground hard several times and was found to be considerably injured. It was held that this was a loss by peril of the sea. Still less am I able to perceive the applicability of Phillips v. Barber (ubi sup.), to which I have referred above. There was nothing in De Vaux v. I'Anson that I can see corresponding with the wind and weather in port which was held in Phillips v. Barber to be ejusdem generis with a storm at sea. It is unnecessary to inquire whether the decision in De Vaux v. I'Anson was correct. It cannot be regarded as throwing any doubt upon the canon of construction laid down by Lord Ellenborough, and more that once recognised and acted upon by Lord Tenterden. Nor is it possible to evolve any principle from it applicable to other cases. No reasons are given for the judgment, which is based solely on prior authorities, and when these authorities are examined they only determine the one, that a ship damaged by a storm when in dry dock is damaged by causes similar to perils of the seas; the others that vessels injured by ceasing to be waterborne, and being driven against the ground by the action of the tide, are injured by "perils of the sea."

The last case to which I need refer on this point is Davidson v. Burnand (19 L. T. Rep. N. S. 782; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 207; L. Rep. 4 C. P. 117), where Willes, J. expressly recognised the rule of construction laid down in Cullen v. Butler. He said: "The question is not whether the loss here was strictly one occasioned by perils of the sea, but whether it was such other loss within the policy, which of course must be a loss of the same or a similar kind to one happening from the perils of the sea." I think, therefore, that the case now before your Lordships must be determined by a consideration of the question whether the loss falls within the general words as construed by Lord Ellenborough; that is, whether it is a case "of marine damage of the like kind with those which are specially enumerated and occasioned by similar causes." When the facts are borne in mind it seems necessary only to state the question in this way to see that the answer must be in the negative. To which of the specially enumerated perils is it similar? The only one that could be suggested is "perils of the seas." The damage here arose from the air chamber of the donkey-pump giving way under an excessive pressure of water owing to the proper outlet being closed. It is, I think, impossible to say that this is damage occasioned by a cause similar to "perils of the sea" on any interpretation which has ever been applied to that term. It will be observed that Lord Ellenborough limits the operation of the clause to "marine damage." By this I do not understand him to mean only damage which has been caused by the sea, but damage of a character to which a marine adventure is subject. Such an adventure has its own perils, to which either it is exclusively subject or which possess in relation to it a special or peculiar character. To secure an indemnity against these is the purpose and object of a policy of marine insurance. The respondents placed their main reliance upon the case of the West India Telegraph Company v. Home and Colonial Insurance Company (43 L. T. Rep. N. S. 420; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 341; 6 Q. B. Div. 51), and naturally so, because the majority of the Court of Appeal thought the present case undistinguishable from it. Lord Selborne, L.C. and Cockburn, C.J. in that case held that the damage done by the explosion of the boiler of a steamer was covered by the general words of a marine policy. Lord Selborne, after referring to the effect given to these words in De Vaux v. I'Anson said: "I think it is at least as proper to hold that in the case of a steamship they cover damage occasioned by the explosion of the boiler in which the motive power necessary to her navigation is generated. What the winds are to a sailing vessel, steam is to a steamer; and it is as reasonable that marine insurers should bear the risks incident to a navigation by that kind of power, whether from excess of pressure in the boilers, or from defects of safety valves, or from neglect or mismanagement, making that dangerous which otherwise would not be so, as that they should bear losses occasioned by excessive pressure of wind, and defects or mismanagement of a ship's sails or tackle." I have already given my reasons for doubting whether De Vaux v. l'Anson involved any principle which could possibly be extended by analogy to a case not precisely similar in its facts. Moreover, it is to be observed that in De Vaux v. l'Anson the damage done was done to the ship as such. It arose from her being constructed for the purpose of being waterborne, and thus needing some substituted support, if the support of the water was withdrawn; and the damage to the ship was due to her grounding, and the failure to keep her safely supported. It is on this view alone, I think, that the case can be sustained. But the explosion of the boiler on board the Panama had no marine character at all. It might have happened in precisely the same way and done the same kind of damage, if the steam engine had been in use for the purpose of moving manufacturing machinery on shore. The real ground of Lord Selborne's judgment appears to have been the analogy between damage done by the excessive pressure of the winds in the case of a sailing vessel, and the excessive pressure of steam in the boiler when the motive power used to propel the vessel is steam. I am not satisfied that this analogy is a sound one; but, even if it be so, I am unable to see how it can be treated as an authority in the present case, still less as concluding it. The water in the donkey-engine, the over-pressure of which caused the damage, was certainly not to the steamer "what the winds are to a sailing vessel," and the damage was not, as it seems to me, in any way similar to the injury done to a sailing vessel by a storm of wind. The present Master of the Rolls, although he concurred in the judgment of the majority of the court in the West India Telegraph Company v. Home and Colonial Insurance Company, differed in his reasons. He based his judgment solely on the ground that the explosion was ejusdem generis with fire, and therefore the loss was within the general words. In the case now under appeal he intimated that this reasoning was somewhat fanciful, and that he should not be sorry to see it dissented from. I am certainly disposed to prefer the later view of the learned judge; but it is not necessary to discuss the point, as it is obvious that such a ground of decision can have no bearing upon the case we have to deal with. I may add, however, that since the term "fire" has been added to the specially enumerated risks (which has taken place in comparatively recent times), I think the general words may properly be extended to similar risks which would not have been included before. Upon the whole, I have come to the conclusion that the judgment of the Master of the Rolls in the court below was correct. I believe it not only to have been in accordance with the authorities, but in harmony with the common understanding of those who enter into contracts of marine insurance. Several instances were put in the course of the argument of disasters which are of common occurrence, and would seem to be just as much within the general words as that which is now in question, but in respect of which it has never been suggested that the underwriters were liable. I accordingly concur in the judgment which has been moved.

Lord MACNAGHTEN.—My Lords: In March 1884 the Inchmaree was off Diamond Island lying at anchor, and about to prosecute her voyage. It was necessary to fill up her boilers. There was a donkey-engine and a donkey-pump on board, and the donkey-engine was set to pump up water from the sea into the boilers. Those in charge of the operation did not take the precaution of making sure that the valve of the aperture leading into one of the boilers was open. This valve happened to be closed. The result was that the water, being unable to make its way into the boiler, was forced back and split the air chamber and so disabled the pump. That was the beginning and the end of the misfortune. At this time the Inchmaree with her machinery, including the donkey-engine, was insured by a time policy. The question is, was the loss which resulted from this mishap covered by the policy or not? The policy contained the common clause describing the risks which the underwriters were content to bear. The clause begins in the usual way by specifying certain particular cases, perils of the seas and other well-known risks, to which the indemnity was to extend. Then follow general words apparently providing for every conceivable loss or misfortune that could happen to the subject-matter of the insurance. It was not contended that the mishap in question fell within any of the particular cases enumerated. The argument turned on the effect of the general words. According to the ordinary rules of construction these words must be interpreted with reference to the words which immediately precede them. They were no doubt inserted to prevent disputes founded on nice distinctions. Their office is to cover in terms whatever may be within the spirit of the cases previously enumerated, and so they have a greater or less effect as a narrower or broader view is taken of those cases. For example, if the expression "perils of the seas" is given its widest sense, the general words have little or no effect as applied to that case. If, on the other hand, that expression is to receive a limited construction, as apparently it did in Cullen v. Butler (5 M. & S. 461), and loss by perils of the seas is to be confined to loss ex marinæ tempestatis discrimine, the general words become most important. But still, ever since the case of Cullen v. Butler, when they first became the subject of judicial construction, they have always been held or assumed to be restricted to cases "akin to" or "resembling" or "of the same kind" as those specially mentioned. I see no reason for departing from this settled rule. In marine insurance it is above all things necessary to abide by settled rules, and to avoid anything like novel refinements or a new departure.

It was objected by Mr. Cohen that the rule of ejusdem generis does not apply unless you can find a common characteristic running through or underlying the previous words. I do not know that this is so—at any rate, where several cases are enumerated leading to a common result, or intended to be met by a common remedy. A familiar instance occurs in the Companies Act 1862 and the earlier Act of 1848, in the sections which provide for winding-up. There are several sub-sections specifying various cases in which a winding-up order may be made, and then there is a sub-section providing that the court may make an order whenever it thinks it just and equitable. Under both Acts those general words have always been held to be restricted to cases ejusdem generis with those previously mentioned, and not to give the court a general power to make an order whenever it thinks right to do so. Your Lordships were asked to draw the line, and to give an exact and authoritative definition of the meaning of the expression "perils of the seas" explained or enlarged by or in connection with the general words. For my part, I decline to attempt any such task. I do not think it is possible to frame a definition which would include every case proper to be included and no other. I think that each case must be considered with reference to its own circumstances, and that the circumstances of each case must be looked at in a broad, common-sense view, and not by the light of strained analogies and fanciful resemblances. In the present case, although the Court of Appeal has properly treated the general words as restricted to cases ejusdem generis with those specially enumerated, the majority of the court has held the accident within the policy. I am unable to adopt their conclusion. The accident, in my opinion, was not due to the "perils of the seas," using that expression in the widest sense that I can give to it, nor did it result in sea damage of any kind. I am therefore of opinion that the view of the Master of the Rolls is correct, and that the judgment of the Court of Appeal must be reversed.

WILSON AND CO. v. OWNERS OF THE CARGO OF THE XANTHO. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF APPEAL IN ENGLAND.

Bill of lading—Peril of the sea—Collision.

The words "perils of the seas" have the same meaning in a policy of insurance and in a bill of lading.

Loss of or damage to cargo by collision happening without any negligence on the part of the carrying ship is loss or damage by perils of the seas within the meaning of those words in a bill of lading.

Quœre, whether, where a shipowner is sued for loss of cargo carried by him under a bill of lading containing the exception perils of the sea, and the plaintiff proves non-delivery and the shipowner loss by collision, the onus of showing negligence is thrown upon the plaintiff, or whether the defendant must show that the collision occurred without any negligence on his part.

Judgment of the court below reversed.

Woodley v. Michell (48 L. T. Rep. N. S. 599; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 71; 11 Q. B. Div. 47) overruled.

THIS was an appeal from a judgment of the Court of Appeal (Lord Esher, M.R., Bowen and Fry, L.JJ.), reported in 55 L. T. Rep. N. S. 203; 6 Asp. Mar. Law. Cas. 8; and 11 P. Div. 170, affirming a judgment of the President of the Admiralty Division (Sir J. Hannen) in favour of the plaintiffs.

The action was brought by the respondents, the holders of a bill of lading of the cargo shipped on board the steamship Xantho, against the appellants, who were the owners of that vessel, for non-delivery of the cargo in question.

At the trial it was admitted that a collision had occurred between the Xantho and another vessel, by which the former was sunk; that the cargo had been received, and had not been delivered; and that the bill of lading contained the usual clause excepting the shipowner from liability for the loss of cargo caused by perils of the sea. Upon these facts the respondents asked for judgment.

It was argued for the appellants that the burden of proof which was on them to show that the loss was caused by a peril of the sea, within the meaning of that term in the exceptions named in the bill of lading, had been discharged.

The President of the Admiralty Division gave judgment for the plaintiffs, upon the authority of the case of Woodley v. Michell (48 L. T. Rep. N. S. 599; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 71; 11 Q. B. Div. 47), and his judgment was affirmed as above mentioned.

Sir W. Phillimore and Aspinall (the Attorney-General, Sir R. Webster, Q.C., with them) appeared for the appellants, and argued that a collision was primâ facie a peril of the sea, and that it lay on the plaintiffs to show that there had been negligence:

Phillips v. Clark, 2 C. B. N. S. 156;
Czech v. General Steam Navigation Company, 17 L. T. Rep. N. N. 246; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 5; L. Rep. 3 C. P. 14;
Lloyd v. General Iron Screw Collier Company, 10 L. T. Rep. N. S. 526; 2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 32; 3 H. & C. 284;
Grill v. General Iron Screw Collier Company, 18 L T. Rep. N. S. 362; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 77; L. Rep. 3 C. P. 476;
Sailing Ship Garston Company v. Hickie, 55 L. T. Rep. N. S. 879; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 71; 18 Q. B. Div. 17;
Pickering v. Barkley, 2 Roll. Abr. 248, pl. 10.

Dangers met with on the sea are "perils of the sea" as much as dangers caused by the sea:

Smith v. Scott, 4 Taunt. 126;
The Norway, Br. & L. 404; 3 Moo. P. C. N. S. 245;
The Hélène, Bro. & L. 429; L. Rep. 1 P. C. 231;
Chartered Mercantile Bank of India v. Netherlands India Steam Navigation Company, 48 L. T. Rep. N. S. 546; 5 Asp. Mar. Cas. 65; 10 Q. B. Div. 521.

Woodley v. Michell (ubi sup.), from which this is in fact an appeal, was wrongly decided. See also the American case, Hale v. Washington Insurance Company (2 Story, 176).

Hollams (Sir C. Russell, Q.C. with him), for the respondents, contended that it was in fact only a question of form. Even if Woodley v. Michell be bad law, the appellants cannot succeed. They rested their case at the trial on the ground of onus of proof. It was admitted that this was not an inevitable accident; therefore there must have been negligence somewhere, and the court cannot infer that the loss was by one of the excepted perils, as negligence of the carrier would take it out of the exception. There is a distinction between "perils of the sea" as used in a bill of lading and in a policy of insurance: see Pollock, C.B. in

Lloyd v. General Screw Collier Company (ubi sup.);
Taylor v. Liverpool and Great Western Steam Navigation Company, 30 L. T. Rep. N. S. 714; 2 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 275; L. Rep. 9 Q. B. 546.

The exceptions in a bill of lading are for the benefit of the carrier, and should be construed strictly against him, while those in a policy are for the benefit of the assured. In any case, there should be a new trial that the facts may be ascertained. The Norway and The Hélène are distinguishable on the facts. as also is Woodley v. Michell, if it be held to be wrongly decided; but we say it was right on the facts of that case. The Attorney-General in reply.—If the judgment of the Court of Appeal is reversed, judgment should be entered for the defendants, without a new trial.

At the conclusion of the arguments, their Lordships took time to consider their judgment.

July 14.—Their Lordships gave judgment as follows:—

Lord HERSCHELL.—My Lords: In order to render clear the exact point which has to be determined in this case it will be necessary to state with some minuteness the pleadings and the course which the case took at the trial. The owners of cargo by the steamship Xantho, who were the plaintiffs in the action, by their statement of claim alleged that they had suffered damage by breach of the contract contained in the bills of lading of goods shipped at Cronstadt on board the defendants' vessel Xantho for carriage to Hull, that the bills of lading were indorsed to the plaintiffs, to whom the property in the goods passed by such indorsement; and that the goods were not delivered. The statement further alleged alternatively that the plaintiffs had suffered damage from the loss of their goods while on board the defendants' vessel by a collision with the steamship Valuta, caused by the negligent navigation of the defendants' servants. The statement of defence denied the contract and the breach, and also that the bills of lading were indorsed to the plaintiffs, and that the property in the goods thereby passed to them. In answer to the alternative claim, it admitted that the Xantho came into collision with the Valuta, but denied that the collision was caused by the negligent navigation of the Xantho, alleging that it was solely caused by the negligent navigation of the Valuta. The defence further alleged that the loss was occasioned by perils which were excepted by the bill of lading. The action came on for trial before the President of the Probate and Admiralty Division. The learned counsel for the plaintiffs put in as his only evidence the bills of lading and admissions that the property in the goods and the right to sue on the bills of lading had passed to the plaintiffs, and that the goods had not been delivered. The bills of lading, which were in the usual form, contained an exception in these terms:—"The act of God, Queen's enemies, fire, machinery, boilers, steam, and all and every other dangers and accidents of the sea, rivers, and steam navigation of whatever nature and kind soever excepted." In opening his case the plaintiffs' counsel stated that the Xantho was lost by reason of a collision which took place between that vessel and the Valuta in a fog, and submitted that whether the collision arose from the negligence of those navigating the Xantho or of those navigating the Valuta, or from the negligence of both combined, the loss of the goods did not fall within the exception contained in the bill of lading, and that the plaintiffs were in either case entitled to recover. He relied in support of this contention upon the case of Woodley v. Michell (48 L. T. Rep. N. S. 599; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 71; 11 Q. B. Div. 47). The learned counsel for the defendants admitted that if Woodley v. Michell were good law he could not resist this view; that even if he proved that no negligence was to be imputed to the Xantho, and that the disaster was solely due to the negligence of the Valuta, as he could not prove that it arose from an inevitable accident, the result must be a decision for the plaintiffs. He considered, therefore, that the only course open to the defendants was to test the law laid down in Woodley v. Michell by appeal to your Lordships' House. The learned President thereupon gave judgment for the plaintiffs. I think the defendants' counsel was perfectly correct in the course which he took. If he had proved to demonstration that his vessel was free from blame and that the other vessel's negligence alone caused the disaster, he would have established no defence so long as Woodley v. Michell stood. He accordingly wisely abstained from the idle task of attempting to prove facts which the Court of Appeal had held to be wholly immaterial.

It appears to me that the only question which arises for your Lordships' determination in this case is whether the decision in Woodley v. Michell can be sustained. In that case an action was brought on a bill of lading. The goods were lost owing to a collision between the defendants' and another vessel. The jury found that there was no negligence on the part of the master or crew of the carrying vessel. The Court of Appeal held that the defendants were not protected by the exception of "perils of the sea" contained in the bill of lading, and gave judgment for the plaintiffs. Brett, L.J. said: "What I think it necessary in this case to say (and I repeat it without any doubt), is that although a collision when brought about without any negligence of either vessel is or may be a peril of the sea, a collision brought about by the negligence of either of the vessels, so that without negligence it could not have happened, is not a peril of the sea within the terms of that exception in a bill of lading." And Cotton, L.J. thus expresses himself: "There is no decision that is binding upon us that a collision occasioned by the negligence of one of the ships is a peril of the sea. Looking, then, upon it with reference to decided cases, and according to the ordinary interpretation of words, I cannot see how, if there was no peril from sea or wind, and an accident is caused by the negligent act of one of the two ships which comes into collision, that can be said to be a peril of the sea." The question what comes within the term "perils of the sea" (and certainly the words "dangers and accidents of the sea" cannot have a narrower interpretation) has been more frequently the subject of decision in the case of marine policies than bills of lading. I will first notice the decisions pronounced with regard to the former instrument, and then inquire how far a different interpretation is to be applied in the case of the latter. I think it clear that the term "perils of the sea" does not cover every accident or casualty which may happen to the subject-matter of the insurance on the sea. It must be a peril "of" the sea. Again, it is well settled that it is not every loss or damage of which the sea is the immediate cause that is covered by these words. They do not protect, for example, against that natural and inevitable action of the winds and waves which results in what may be described as wear and tear. There must be some casualty, something which could not be foreseen as one of the necessary incidents of the adventure. The purpose of the policy is to secure an indemnity against accidents which may happen, not against events which must happen. It was contended that those losses only were losses by perils of the sea which were occasioned by extraordinary violence of the winds or waves. I think this is too narrow a construction of the words, and it is certainly not supported by the authorities or by common understanding. It is beyond question that if a vessel strikes upon a sunken rock in fair weather and sinks this is a loss by perils of the sea. And a loss by foundering, owing to a vessel coming into collision with another vessel, even when the collision results from the negligence of that other vessel, falls within the same category. Indeed, I am aware of only one case which throws a doubt upon the proposition that every loss by incursion of the sea, due to a vessel coming accidentally (using that word in its popular sense) into contact with a foreign body which penetrates it and causes a leak, is a loss by a peril of the sea. I refer to the case of Cullen v. Butler (5 M. & S. 461), where a ship having been sunk by another ship, firing upon her in mistake for an enemy, the court inclined to the opinion that this was not a loss by perils of the sea. I think, however, this expression of opinion stands alone, and has not been sanctioned by subsequent cases. But it is said that the words "perils of the sea" occurring in a bill of lading or other contract of carriage must receive a different interpretation from that which is given to them in a policy of marine insurance; that in the latter case the causa proxima alone is regarded, while in the former you may go behind the causa proxima and look at what was the real or efficient cause. It is on this view that the Court of Appeal acted in Woodley v. Michell. Now, I quite agree that in the case of a marine policy the causa proxima alone is considered. If that which immediately caused the loss was a peril of the sea, it matters not how it was induced, even if it were by the negligence of those navigating the vessel. It is equally clear that in the case of a bill of lading you may sometimes look behind the immediate cause, and the shipowner is not protected by the exception of perils of the sea in every case in which he would be entitled to recover on his policy, on the ground that there had been a loss by such perils. But I do not think this difference arises from the words "perils of the sea" having a different meaning in the two instruments; but from the context or general scope and purpose of the contract of carriage excluding in certain cases the operation of the exception. It would, in my opinion, be very objectionable, unless well-settled authority compelled it, to give a different meaning to the same words occurring in two maritime instruments. The true view appears to me to be presented by Willes, J. in his judgment in Grill v. The General Iron Screw Collier Company (14 L. T. Rep. N. S. 711; 2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 362; L. Rep. 1 C. P. 600). The question there arose whether, when a vessel was lost by a collision caused by the negligence of those navigating the carrying ship, the case fell within the exception of "perils of the sea." It was held that it did not. Reference having been made to cases on policies of insurance, and the interpretation there put upon these words, Willes, J. said: "I may say that a policy of insurance is an absolute contract to indemnify for loss by perils of the sea, and it is only necessary to see whether the loss comes within the terms of the contract, and is caused by perils of the sea; the fact that the loss is partly caused by things not distinctly perils of the sea does not prevent its coming within the contract. In the case of a bill of lading it is different, because there the contract is to carry with reasonable care, unless prevented by the excepted perils. If the goods are not carried with reasonable care and are consequently lost by perils of the sea, it becomes necessary to reconcile the two parts of the instrument, and this is done by holding that if the loss through perils of the sea is caused by the previous default of the shipowner, he is liable for this breach of his covenant."

So far as I am aware, until the case of Woodley v. Michell was decided, there was no authority for saying that a loss the proximate cause of which was a peril of the sea, and which did not result from the act or default of the carrier, was not within the exception. In the case of the Chartered Mercantile Bank of India v. The Netherlands India Steam Navigation Company (48 L. T. Rep. N. S. 546; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 65; 10 Q. B. Div. 521) the present Master of the Rolls suggested the view that a loss by a collision due to the negligence not of the carrying but of the other vessel, was not a loss by perils of the sea. He said: "If the collision is caused without any fault on the part of the carrying ship, but is caused by reason of the negligence of those who are conducting the other ship, it cannot be called an accident of the sea. An accident is that which happens without the fault of anybody, and consequently a collision which is the fault of somebody is not an accident of the sea." This was a dictum certainly not necessary for the decision of that case. But in Woodley v. Michell it was repeated and adopted as the ground of judgment. With the greatest respect for that learned judge, the weight of whose opinion on any question of maritime law I fully recognise, I am unable to perceive why a loss occasioned by an inroad of the sea owing to a casualty over which the ship-owner and his servants had no control should not be held to be within the exception. If the distinction pointed out by Willes, J. between the rules governing the construction of policies of marine insurance and bills of lading be the true one, it is certainly not applicable to such a case. I am unable to concur in the view that a disaster which happens from the fault of somebody can never be an accident or peril of the sea; and I think it would give rise to distinctions resting on no sound basis if it were to be held that the exception of perils of the seas in a bill of lading were always excluded when the inroad of the sea which occasioned the loss was induced by some intervention of human agency. Take the case which I put in the course of the argument, of a ship which strikes upon a rock and is lost because the light which should have warned the mariner against it has become extinguished owing to the negligence of the person in charge. Why should this not be within the exception, while a similar loss arising from a vessel coming into contact with a rock not marked upon the chart admittedly would be? And what substantial distinction is there between this latter case and that of a vessel foundering through collision with a ship at anchor left at night without lights? For these reasons I have arrived at the conclusion that the case of Woodley v. Michell cannot be supported. It was contended by the learned counsel for the appellants that if your Lordships should take this view, the judgment ought to be entered for them. I cannot concur in this. With the authority of Woodley v. Michell in their favour, when once it was admitted that the accident was not inevitable, it was as fruitless for the respondents to give evidence of the negligence of the appellants as it was for the appellants to seek to cast the blame on the other vessel. Much argument was addressed to your Lordships on the question whether, when the plaintiffs had proved that the goods had not been delivered, thus throwing the onus on the defendants of excusing their non-delivery, proof by them that the vessel had been sunk in a collision would be sufficient to shift the onus, and render it incumbent on the plaintiffs to establish that the collision was due to the defendants' negligence, or whether the defendants, to bring themselves within the exception, must show that the loss was not due to a cause induced by their own negligence. I do not think this point is now before your Lordships for decision. Arguments of weight have been adduced in support of either view. I certainly must not be understood as deciding that the mere proof of loss by collision under circumstances as consistent with its resulting from the negligence of the carrying ship as from any other cause would exonerate the defendants. I move your Lordships that the judgment appealed from be reversed, and that there be a new trial of the action. I think the respondents must pay the costs in the Court of Appeal and in this House, and that the costs of the two trials already had should abide the event. And I move your Lordships accordingly.

Lord BRAMWELL.—My Lords: My noble and learned friend has been kind enough to read his opinion first, in consequence of its containing a fuller statement of the facts than what I am about to read to your Lordships. The plaintiffs' statement of claim is for the non-delivery of goods according to a bill of lading, with an alternative claim for loss of the goods therein mentioned, owing to the negligence of the defendants. It was admitted at the trial by the defendants that the goods had not been delivered according to the bill of lading. It was admitted by the plaintiffs that the vessel sank owing to damage received in a collision. It was admitted by the defendants that that collision was not the result of inevitable accident—i.e., of winds, waves, or other natural causes. The plaintiffs contended, on the authority of Woodley v. Michell, that that being so they were entitled to judgment, whether the collision was attributable to the negligence of the defendants, with or without negligence on the other ship, or wholly to the negligence of that other. The President so ruled, considering himself bound by Woodley v. Michell. That case decided that a damage, including foundering occasioned by collision, was not a loss by perils of the sea within those words of exception in a bill of lading, unless occasioned by action of sea or wind, or inevitable accident, and therefore that a collision occasioned, whether by the negligence of the one ship or the other, or both, was not a loss by such perils. The now defendants appealed, but the ruling was upheld, the court giving reasons for their opinion, and also relying on the case of Woodley v. Michell. With great respect, I cannot agree. I think that case wrongly decided, and differ from the reasons given in support of the judgment in that and in this case. Was it by a peril of the sea that the defendants' ship foundered? The facts are that the sea-water flowed into her through a hole, and flowed in such quantities that she sank. It seems to me that the bare statement shows she went to the bottom through a peril of the sea. If the hole had been small, there being a piece of bad wood, a plank starting, or a similar cause, it would be called a leak, and no one would doubt that she foundered from a peril of the sea. Does it make any difference that the hole was large, and occasioned by collision? I cannot think it does. It is admitted that if the question had arisen on an insurance against loss by perils of the sea this would have been within the policy a loss by perils of the sea. Are the words to have different meanings in the two instruments? Why should they? Different consequences may follow. The insurer may be unable to defend himself on the ground that the loss was brought about by the negligence of the crew, while the freighter may maintain an action on the ground that it was. But how is the loss a loss by perils of the sea in one case and not in the other? The argument is, that wind and waves did not cause the loss, but negligence in someone. But surely, if that were so, a loss by striking in calm weather on a sunken rock not marked on the chart would not be a loss by perils of the seas within the bill of lading; or striking on a rock from which the light had been removed, or an iceberg, or a vessel without lights. I cannot bring myself to see that such cases are not losses by perils of the sea. Is not the chance of being run against by a clumsy rider one of the perils of hunting? It would be strange if an underwriter on cargo, suing in the name of the cargo owners on the bill of lading, should say, "I have paid for a loss by perils of the sea, and claim on you because the loss was not by perils of the sea."

The Court of Appeal, with great respect, argued as though the collision caused the loss. So it did in a sense. It was a causa sine quâ non, but it was not the causa causans. It was causa remota, but not causa proxima. The causa proxima of the loss was foundering. It would be strange if a plank started, and the vessel went to the bottom in consequence, that it should be held, "Oh, the loss is not by perils of the seas, but by bad carpentering." Let there be no doubt. I do not say that in such case the freighter might not complain that his goods were carried in an unseaworthy ship: all I say is, that the loss would be by perils of the seas. It is only necessary for this House to say that if the foundering was occasioned by a collision, with no blame on the defendants, they ought to have succeeded. For this is what they offered to prove, and were told that it was useless to do so. Mr. Hollams argued that they ought to have insisted on their right to prove their case. I am clearly of a different opinion. I think when the judge says, "I shall decide against you, though you prove what you say," the party must acquiesce for the time, and seek his remedy by appeal. I think that the judge might properly refuse to hear the evidence, for he might truly say that in his opinion this evidence is irrelevant to any issue on the record; no one giving it would be liable to the penalty of perjury. The practice in my experience has always been in conformity with what I am now saying. The judgment, then, must be set aside. The Attorney-General contended that it should be entered for the defendants. That also is impossible. It could not have been done before the Judicature Act, and that Act does not authorise it. It would be most unjust to the plaintiffs. They, relying on the law as it had been laid down, proved what was a sufficient case, and did not give what would have been irrelevant evidence if the law had been rightly laid down. I say nothing about burthen of proof. All I say is, that if the collision was in no way the fault of the defendants' crew, they are entitled to judgment. As to costs, I do not remember whether my noble and learned friend made any mention of costs, but I will merely read what I have written, namely, that as to costs it seems to me that neither party is to blame, and that consequently the costs of the former trial, of the appeal in the court below, and in this House, should be costs in the cause for either party. I do not know whether that will meet your Lordships' view in the matter, but that can be settled afterwards.

Lord MACNAGHTEN.—My Lords: In this case the bill of lading on which the question arises is in common form. In the usual terms it states the engagement on the part of the shipowner to deliver the goods intrusted to his care. At the same time it specifies, by way of exception, certain cases in which failure to deliver those goods may be excused. So much for the express terms of the bill of lading. But the shipowner's obligations are not limited and exhausted by what appears on the face of the instrument underlying the contract, implied and involved in it there is a warranty by the shipowner that his vessel is seaworthy, and there is also an engagement on his part to use due care and skill in navigating the vessel and carrying the goods. Having regard to the duties thus cast upon the shipowner, it seems to follow as a necessary consequence, that, even in cases within the very terms of the exception in the bill of lading, the shipowner is not protected if any default or negligence on his part has caused or contributed to the loss. Turning now to the facts of the case, we find that it was admitted at the trial that the vessel with the goods on board foundered at sea in consequence of a collision. The exception in the bill of lading includes "dangers and accidents of the sea." Is shipwreck by collision a danger or accident of the sea? I should say undoubtedly it is. Then comes the question, how was the collision brought about? Of that we know nothing, except that it was not due to inevitable accident. So much was admitted. It follows from that admission that one or both of the vessels that came into collision must have been to blame. In that state of things, I should have thought that the issue between the parties was reduced to this question, Was the carrying vessel in fault? If it was not, the shipowner is protected. If it was, though the loss occurred through one of the excepted perils, the shipowner cannot rely on the exception. Unfortunately that simple issue was obscured, and the trial of the action was rendered abortive by reason of the decision in Woodley v. Michell. In the face of that decision it would have been idle for the parties to have gone into the facts at the trial. It would have been a work of supererogation on the part of the plaintiffs to have proved that the carrying vessel was in fault. The defendants would have been no nearer winning if they had established by the clearest evidence that up to the moment of collision they had performed every duty cast upon them. Under these circumstances the parties have been compelled to come to your Lordships' House, appealing in form against the judgment of the Court of Appeal in the present case, but in reality against the decision in Woodley v. Michell. Your Lordships are therefore called upon to determine whether the rule laid down in Woodley v. Michell can be supported on principle or authority. Authority in its favour there is none. The industry of counsel could not produce any passage from any recognised treatise or from any reported judgment countenancing the doctrine, except one observation in Chartered Mercantile Bank of India v. Netherlands India Steam Navigation Company (48 L. T. Rep. N. S. 546; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 65; 10 Q. B. Div. 521), which was not necessary for the decision. It seems to me to be equally difficult to support the rule in Woodley v. Michell on principle. If the accident is brought about by the negligence of the owner of the carrying vessel or his servants, it would be contrary to common sense and against all sound principle to allow one who was the author of the mischief to avail himself of his own wrong. But, if the carrying shipowner is free from all blame, why should he suffer for the errors or misconduct of those over whom he has no control? As far as he and his vessel are concerned, what difference can it make in that case whether the collision is caused by a sunken rock, or by an iceberg, or by another vessel, or whether that other vessel is or is not in fault? It seems to me, if I may say so with all deference, that the error of the Court of Appeal in the present case is to be found in this: They start with the assumption that the same words have different meanings when used in policies of assurance, and when used in bills of lading. For that assumption there is not, I venture to think, any foundation. Different considerations, no doubt, apply to the two contracts, a contract of indemnity and a contract of carriage, and the same event may have a different result in the one case from what it would have in the other; but in mercantile contracts so closely connected the same words must have the same meaning. Whatever the expression "perils of the sea" means in a policy of assurance, it means neither more nor less in a bill of lading. The result, in my opinion, is that the appeal must be allowed, and the litigant parties must begin over again.

Orders appealed from reversed; and a new trial ordered; the costs of the trial already had to be costs in the cause; and the costs in the Court of Appeal and in this House to be defendants' costs in the cause.

HAMILTON v. PANDORF. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF APPEAL IN ENGLAND.

Charter-party — Bill of lading — Exceptions — Dangers and accidents of the seas — Damage caused by rats.

A cargo of rice was shipped under a charter-party and bills of lading, which excepted "dangers and accidents of the seas . . . of whatever nature and kind." During the voyage the cargo was damaged by sea-water entering through a pipe which had been gnawed by rats. It was admitted that the ship was seaworthy, and that there was no negligence.

Held (reversing the judgment of the court below), that the damage was within the exception, and that the shipowner was not liable.

THIS was an appeal from a judgment of the Court of Appeal (Lord Esher, M.R., Bowen, and Fry, L.JJ.) reported in 55 L. T. Rep. N. S. 499, 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 44, and 17 Q. B. Div. 670, who had reversed a judgment of Lopes, L.J., upon further consideration of an action tried before him at the Liverpool Summer Assizes 1885.

The appellants were the owners of the steamship Inchrhona, and the respondents were merchants in London and the rice ports. The question for decision was, whether the respondents were entitled to recover from the appellants the sum of 1000*l.* by way of damages for breach of contract contained in certain bills of lading dated the 26th March 1884, on a cargo of rice shipped by the respondents at Akyab, on board the Inchrhona, and delivered in a damaged condition. It appeared that the damage to the rice was occasioned by sea-water which had got into the hold through a hole which had been made in a pipe by rats. The appellants relied on the exceptions in the bills of lading as freeing them from liability for the damage so occasioned. The perils excepted in the bills of lading were "the act of God, the Queen's enemies, fire, and all and every other dangers and accidents of the seas, rivers, and steam navigation of whatever nature and kind soever excepted." There was a dispute at the trial as to whether the rats had been allowed to come on board by the shippers in the course of shipping the rice at Akyab. The jury found as to this, that the rats that caused the damage were not brought on board by the shippers in the course of shipping the rice. A second question was left to the jury—namely, whether those on board the vessel took reasonable precautions to prevent rats coming on board during the shipping of the rice. This question the jury did not answer, as the appellants' counsel at the trial admitted that it became immaterial, having regard to the finding on the first question. There was no dispute at the trial as to the fact of damage or the amount thereof, and it was further agreed that the damage was caused during the voyage home, after the ship had left Akyab, by sea-water passing through a hole made by rats in a leaden discharge pipe connected with a bath-room in the vessel. It was admitted that the effect of the finding of the jury, having regard to the evidence was, that the rats which ate the pipe were in the ship before the cargo was loaded. The appellants did not offer any evidence to show that it was impossible to exclude rats altogether from the ship, or that it was not possible by reasonable care and skill to prevent rats when on board from doing the mischief which caused the damage in this case.

Lopes, L.J. gave judgment for the defendants (the present appellants), but his judgment was reversed, as above mentioned.

Bigham, Q.C. and Barnes appeared for the appellants, and argued that any incursion of sea-water from natural causes which might be guarded against by ordinary care is an "accident of the sea." This loss was within the exception, being sea damage to cargo without negligence; and there is no difference in the construction of the words "dangers or perils of the seas" in policies of insurance, or in charter-parties and bills of lading, except that under the two latter the shipowner is bound to exercise reasonable care. The case is not covered by authority. Damage to a ship's bottom by vermin at sea is not within the exception:

Sir C. Russell, Q.C. and J. Walton, for the respondents, contended that the proposition was laid down too widely on the other side. See

Dudgeon v. Pembroke, 31 L. T. Rep. N. S. 31; 2 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 323; L. Rep. 9 Q. B. 581;

It confuses cause and consequence. There must be a peril of the sea causing an incursion of sea-water. The exception would not apply to barratrous scuttling by one of the crew. See Woodley v. Michell (ubi sup.).

If water was let in by a loose plate which injured a pipe without negligence it would not be a peril of the sea. Hamilton v. Thames and Mersey Marine Insurance Company (17 Q. B. Div. 195) is distinguishable on the special wording of the policy in that case. (a) Damage by a stowaway would not be a sea peril, though it caused an incursion of sea-water. Where a ship was strained by lying on a mud-bank in the ordinary course of navigation, it was held that there was no remedy on a policy, as it was loss by ordinary wear and tear:

Magnus v. Buttemer, 11 C. B. 876. See Arnould, 6th edit. 755.

It is not the mere incursion of sea-water, or the fact of damage to a ship at sea which constitutes the liability. It must be shown that the damage arises from a "peril of the sea," a fortuitous or accidental thing:

Cullen v. Butler, 5 M. & S. 461;
Taylor v. Curtis, 6 Taunt. 608.

This case does not differ from that of a passenger who leaves the cock turned on in the bath-room, and allows the water to overflow. The rats were not a peril of the sea, though they were on the sea. Some bills of lading contain an express exception of damage by rats, and the House is asked to introduce the clause into this bill of lading. [The LORD CHANCELLOR referred to Steel v. State Line Steamship Company, 37 L. T. Rep. N. S. 333; 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 516; 3 App. Cas. 72.] It is not a peril of the sea if the loss arises from the sea in its ordinary state in the ordinary course of navigation, such as a ship foundering in calm weather from a latent defect. A peril is what may, not what must, happen:

Fletcher v. Inglis, 2 B. & Ald. 315;
1 Phillips on Insurance, 6th edit. p. 678, s. 1132.

Bigham, Q.C. in reply.—An accident which cannot be attributed to any act of man, wilful or negligent, is an accident of the sea, as it would not produce damage if the sea was not there. The damage is from the sea-water getting in from nobody's fault: (see Arnould, 748.)

At the conclusion of the arguments their Lordships took time to consider their judgment.

July 14.—Their Lordships gave judgment as follows:—

The LORD CHANCELLOR (Halsbury).—My Lords: In this case the admissions made at the trial reduce the question to this—whether in a seaworthy ship the gnawing by rats of some part of the ship so as to cause sea-water to come in and cause damage is a danger and accident of the sea. That this happened without any negligence of the shipowner is material in determining the rights of the parties in this particular case, but in my judgment has no relevancy to the question whether the facts, as I have stated them, constituted a danger or accident of the seas. With all respect to Bowen and Fry, L.JJ., they have not accepted the hypothesis of fact which the admissions at the trial render essential. It is admitted that the ship was seaworthy, and that there was no negligence, and these admissions are absolutely inconsistent with the reasoning of the Lords Justices, which suggests important difficulties in deciding those questions of fact to which I have referred, but seems beside the question if these facts are proved or admitted, as I think it is clear they were. The other question with which the Master of the Rolls dealt is one which must be determined upon the ordinary rules of construction, whatever the document is the meaning of which is under debate; and it must be admitted that words may receive a limited meaning by reason of the other words with which they are associated, or by reason of the subject-matter with which they deal, or by reason of the mode in which they are commonly used. It is clear that the parties do not mean by such an instrument as we are construing to except all accidents of any kind or description whatsoever which may happen during the particular voyage which both parties are looking forward to. Some effect must be given to the words "perils of the sea." A rat eating a cheese in the hold of a vessel is not a peril of the sea; the sea, or the vessel being on the sea, has nothing to do with the destruction of the cheese. This was the decision of the Court of Exchequer in Laveroni v. Drury (8 Ex. 166; 22 L. J. 2, Ex.). In the Law Journal report of that case Pollock, C.B. and Alderson, B. distinctly point out, after the judgment of the court had been given, that the decision at which the court had arrived did not touch the question of whether the sea being let in by a hole made by a rat was an accident or danger of the sea. One of the dangers which both parties to the contract would have in their mind would, I think, be the possibility of the water getting into the vessel from the sea upon which the vessel was to sail in accomplishing her voyage—it would not necessarily be by a storm; the parties have not so limited the language of their contract—it might be by striking on a rock, or by excessive heat, so as to open some of the upper timbers; these and many more contingencies that might be suggested would let the sea in; but what the parties, I think, contemplated was that if any accident (not wear and tear, or natural decay) should do damage by letting the sea into the vessel, that that should be one of the things contemplated by the contract. A subtle analysis of all the events which lead up to and in that sense cause a thing may doubtless remove the first link in the chain so far that neither the law nor the ordinary business of mankind can permit it to be treated as a cause affecting the legal right of the parties to a suit. In this case the existence of the rats on board, their thirst, the hardness of their teeth, the law of gravitation, which caused the water to descend upon the rice, the ship being afloat, the pipe being lead, and its capacity of being gnawed —each of these may be represented as the cause of the water entering; but I do not assent to the view that this contract can have a different meaning attached to it according as you regard each step in the chain of events as the origin out of which the damage ultimately arises.

(a) The decision has since been reversed by the House of Lords (57 L. T. Rep. N. S. 695; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 200; 12 App. Cas. 484).

In the class of contract where the shipowner's negligence or misconduct prevents perils of the sea being relied upon, it is not that perils of the sea are different, or that the words ought to have a different meaning attached to them, but because in those cases an additional term exists in the contract, which makes the negligence of the shipowner, or of those for whom he is responsible, a material element; but it is also necessary to give effect to the words "dangers and accidents of the seas." Now, cases have been brought to your Lordships' attention in which the decision has turned, not, I think, upon the question of whether it was a sea peril or accident, but whether it was an accident at all. I think the idea of something fortuitous and unexpected is involved in both words, peril or accident; you could not speak of the danger of a ship's decay; you would know that it must decay; and the destruction of the ship's bottom by vermin is assumed to be one of the natural and certain effects of an unprotected wooden vessel sailing through certain seas. One ought, if it is possible, to give effect to all the words that the parties have used to express what this bargain is, and I think in this case it was a danger, accident, or peril, in the contemplation of both parties, that the sea might get in and spoil the rice. I cannot think it was less such a peril or accident because the hole through which the sea came was made by vermin from within the vessel, and not by a sword-fish from without—the sea-water did get in. I am therefore of opinion that the judgment should be reversed, and I move your Lordships accordingly.

Lord WATSON.—My Lords: The respondents sue for damages in respect of injury sustained, during transit, by a cargo of rice, which was carried in the appellants' steamship Inchrhona from Akyab to Bremen. The appellants plead, in defence, that the injury was occasioned by a danger or accident of the sea, within the meaning of the exception in the charter-party and bills of lading, which are in the usual terms. In point of fact, the rice was damaged by sea-water, which found its way into the hold of the Inchrhona through a hole gnawed by a rat in a leaden pipe connected with the bath-room of the vessel. If the respondents were preferring a claim under a contract of marine insurance, expressed in ordinary terms, I should be clearly of opinion that they were entitled to recover, on the ground that their loss was occasioned by a peril of the sea within the meaning of the contract. When a cargo of rice is directly injured by rats or by the crew of the vessel, the sea has no share in producing the damage, which in that case is wholly due to a risk not peculiar to the sea, but incidental to the keeping of that class of goods, whether on shore or on board of a voyaging ship. But in the case where rats make a hole, or where one of the crew leaves a porthole open, through which the sea enters and injures the cargo, the sea is the immediate cause of mischief, and it would afford no answer to the claim of the insured to say that, had ordinary precaution been taken to keep down vermin, or had careful hands been employed, the sea would not have been admitted, and there would have been no consequent damage. Your Lordships have now disapproved of the novel doctrine that, in a contract of sea carriage, a meaning must be attached to the expression "dangers and accidents of the seas," different from that which it bears in a contract insuring cargo against sea risks; (a) that, in the case of a charter-party or bill of lading, the court ought to look to what has been termed the remote, as distinguished from the proximate, cause of damage, whereas, in the case of a policy, the proximate cause can alone be regarded. The expression has precisely the same significance in both cases; but there is this difference between them: that when a shipowner, who is bound, by the implied terms of his contract, to carry with ordinary care, claims the benefit of the exception, the court will, if necessary, go behind the proximate cause of damage, for the purpose of ascertaining whether that cause was brought into operation by the negligent act or default of the shipowner or of those for whom he is responsible. As Lord Blackburn said in Steel v. State Line Steamship Company (37 L. T. Rep. N. S. 333; 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 516; 3 App. Cas. 72): "Although the things perished by a peril of the sea, still, inasmuch as it was the negligence of the shipowner and his servants that led to it, they cannot avail themselves of the exception." I am of opinion that the appellants must prevail, because it has not been shown that the peril which was the immediate and efficient cause of damage owed its existence to their negligence. In the course of the trial before Lopes, L.J. it does appear to have been, at one time, suggested that the appellants' servants failed to exercise due diligence in extirpating the rats, and also that the bath-room pipe ought not to have been of lead, but of some other material which a rat could not or would not gnaw. Neither of these points was submitted to the jury, who negatived the only charge of negligence which was ultimately insisted on by the respondents. I accordingly concur in the judgment which has been moved.

Lord BRAMWELL.—My Lords: I am of opinion that this judgment must be reversed. This is the third case in which this House has had to consider whether a peril of the sea or other peril within the general words was shown. The arguments and discussions in all three have been very useful in helping to a conclusion. As I have said elsewhere, I think the definition of Lopes, L.J. very good—"It is a sea damage occurring at sea, and nobody's fault." What is the "peril?" It is that the ship or goods will be lost or damaged; but it must be "of the sea." "Fire" would not be a peril of the sea; so loss or damage from it would not be insured against by the general words. So of lightning. In the present case the sea has damaged the goods. That it might do so was a peril that the ship encountered. It is true that rats made the hole through which the water got in; and if the question were whether rats making a hole was a peril of the sea, I should say certainly not. If we could suppose that no water got in, but that the assured sued the underwriter for the damage done to the pipe, I should say clearly that he could not recover. But I should equally say that the underwriters on goods would be liable for the damage shown in this case. Then I am of opinion that "perils of the seas" is a phrase having the same meaning in bills of lading and charter-parties as in policies of insurance. I repeat my illustration; if underwriters paid this loss as through a peril of the sea, how would they, in the name of the assured, claim from the shipowner, because it was not a peril of the sea. I do not go through the cases; I say there is none opposed to this opinion. The doubt or hesitation expressed in the case where the ship was sunk by being fired into is certainly a doubt the other way, but only a doubt: (Cullen v. Butler, 5 M. & S. 461.) An attempt was made to show that a peril of the sea meant a peril of what I feel inclined to call the sea's behaviour or ill-condition. But that is met by the argument that if so striking on a sunken rock on a calm day, or against an iceberg, and consequent foundering, is not a peril of the sea or its consequence. No question of negligence exists in this case. The damage was caused by the sea in the course of navigation with no default in anyone. I am therefore of opinion that the damage was caused by peril of the sea within the meaning of the bill of lading, that Lopes, L.J. was right, and that the judgment must be reversed.

Lord FITZGERALD.—My Lords: The damage to a portion of the cargo of rice carried by the defendants' ship was not occasioned either remotely or immediately by any negligence of the defendants, as alleged in the statement of claim, but they may nevertheless be liable, and the real question is, whether the defendants have established that it arose from a peril of the sea coming within the exception contained in the charter-party and in the bill of lading. I agree with Lord Watson that the exception, "peril of the sea," has the same meaning whether it occurs in a marine policy or in a charter-party, or bill of lading, and is to be so interpreted, but that when the action is on the contract of carriage you may look behind the proximate or immediate cause for the purpose of ascertaining whether the remote cause may not have been the negligence of the carrier, and indeed the carrier is usually under the necessity of establishing that no negligence of his had led to the calamity. Thus, for instance, if a ship is cast on the rocks by force of the winds or sea, that is a loss by a peril of the sea within the exception; but in an action against the carrier it would be open to consider whether the ship, being placed in that position, did not originate in negligent navigation. At the close of the argument I was slightly inclined to the opinion that the loss in question might be more accurately described as arising from a peril of the ship than caused by a peril of the sea; but on consideration of the very careful and elaborate judgments in the Court of Appeal, and the authorities referred to, and looking at the reason of the thing, I have come to a conclusion in accord with that announced by my noble and learned friends, adopting the reasons and the decision of Lopes, L.J. The accident was fortuitous, unforeseen, and actually unknown until the ship had reached her destination and commenced unloading. I do not, however, mean to suggest that to constitute a peril of the sea the accident or calamity should have been of an unforeseen character. The remote cause was in a certain sense the action of the rats on the lead pipe, but the immediate cause of the damage was the irruption of sea-water from time to time through the injured pipe, caused by the rolling of the ship as she proceeded on her voyage. There having been no negligence on the part of the defendants, I am of opinion that they have brought the case within the exception, and are protected.

Lord HERSCHELL. — My Lords: I have so recently expressed, in the case of Wilson and Co. v. The Owners of the Cargo of the Xantho, my views upon the interpretation to be put upon the words "dangers and accidents of the seas" occurring in a bill of lading, that I need trouble your Lordships with but few observations in this case. I take the facts to be that the damage occurred by the sea entering through a leak caused by rats, without any neglect or default on the part of the shipowner or those for whom he was responsible, and that this was not an ordinary incident of the voyage which he was bound to anticipate. In saying so, I am differing from the ground upon which two of the learned judges in the Court of Appeal (Bowen and Fry, L.JJ.) based their judgment. But when those learned judges say that "it was consistent with the findings that the mischief done to the pipe and the incursion of sea-water which followed would never have happened but for either a defect in the condition of the ship or some want of prudence in the shipowner," I think they overlook the course which the case took at the trial. It was suggested during the trial, by the learned counsel for the plaintiffs, that due care had not been taken to exclude or exterminate the rats, and that if the pipe had been made of some other material the accident would not have happened. But I think these points were distinctly and unequivocally abandoned by him. If intended to be insisted upon, they raised questions upon which the opinion of the jury ought to have been taken, and, with the assent of the plaintiffs' counsel, the only questions put were upon a totally different point. The Master of the Rolls rested his judgment altogether upon another ground. He considered that the rats were the real cause of the damage, and that it was therefore not due to a danger or accident of the seas. I quite concur with the view expressed in Laveroni v. Drury (8 Ex. 166; 22 L. J. 2 Ex.), that injury done to a vessel or its cargo by rats, is not damage by perils of the sea. But in that very case Pollock, C.B. said: "If indeed the rats had made a hole in the ship through which water came and damaged the cargo, that might very likely be a case of sea damage." The Master of the Rolls says that the distinction is a very fine one between damage done by rats, which, it may be, so eat into the timbers of a ship as to render it unfit to proceed to sea, and the loss of the vessel owing to the incursion of water when its sides have been completely penetrated by the same cause. I own I think the distinction a substantial one, and it seems to me obvious that Pollock, C.B. shared this view. It has been held in the United States in the case of Garrigues v. Coxe (1 Binney Pennsylvania Rep. 592) that a leak occasioned by the eating of rats, without negligence on the part of the shipowner, was a risk covered in a marine policy by the words "perils of the seas." Taking the facts of this case to be as I have stated them, I entertain no doubt that the loss was one which would in this country be recoverable under a marine policy, as due to a peril of the sea. It arose directly from the action of the sea. It was not due to wear and tear, nor to the operation of any cause ordinarily incidental to the voyage, and therefore to be anticipated. And, inasmuch as it was not the result of any act or default on the part of the shipowner or his crew, I think, for the reasons I have given in my opinion in the case already alluded to, that it is within the exception in the bill of lading. I accordingly concur in the motion which has been made.

Lord MACNAGHTEN.—My Lords: I agree. The goods which were carried under the bill of lading were damaged during the voyage by the incursion of sea-water. The water came in through a hole gnawed by rats in a pipe connecting the bath-room with the sea. At the trial various charges and suggestions were made of negligence on the part of the shipowner; but they were all either withdrawn or negatived by the jury. Under these circumstances it seems to me, that the accident which caused the damage was one of the excepted perils or accidents, and there was no reason why the shipowner should not avail himself of the exception. It was an accidental and unforeseen incursion of the sea that could not have been guarded against by the exercise of reasonable care. I agree, therefore, with the judgment of Lopes, L.J. I do not think the case could be summed up better than it was by him in the words which have already been quoted, "Sea damage occurring at sea and nobody's fault." I concur in the motion which has been made.

BLACKBURN, LOW, AND CO. v. VIGORS. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF APPEAL IN ENGLAND.

Marine insurance — Principal and agent — Concealment of material fact by agent.

A policy of marine insurance is not vitiated by the concealment of a material fact by a broker employed by the assured to effect an assurance on the subject-matter, if he be not the broker through whom the assurance is ultimately effected; provided that there is no fraud or concealment on the part of the assured of facts which have come to his knowledge.

Judgment of the court below reversed.

Gladstone v. King (1 M. & S. 35) discussed.

THIS was an appeal from a judgment of the majority of the Court of Appeal (Lindley and Lopes, L.JJ.), Lord Esher, M.R. dissenting), reported in 54 L. T. Rep. N. S. 852; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 597; and 17 Q. B. Div. 553, reversing a judgment of Day, J. in favour of the plaintiffs, the present appellants. It appeared that the appellants carried on business at Glasgow as underwriters and insurance brokers, and that they had insured a steamship called the State of Florida for 1500*l.* from New York to Glasgow. The ship left New York on the 11th April 1884, and was due in ordinary course at Glasgow on or about the 25th April. On the 30th April, the ship being four or five days overdue, the appellants instructed their London brokers, Roxburgh, Currie, and Co., to reinsure the ship to the extent of 1000*l.*, at or not exceeding ten guineas. These brokers answered the same day that the insurance could not be done under twenty guineas, to which the appellants replied, "Not disposed to pay." On the next day the plaintiffs asked Rose, Murison, and Thomson to effect the re-insurance. Before receiving any answer information that the ship was reported to be lost had been brought to Liverpool, and this information reached the ears of Murison, but the fact was never communicated to the plaintiffs, or to Roxburgh, Currie, and Co. The negotiations with Rose, Murison, and Thomson having fallen through, the plaintiffs instructed Roxburgh, Currie, and Co. to insure, and the result was that the policy "lost or not lost," now sued upon, was effected. The question was, whether the appellants were entitled to recover upon the policy after the information as to the loss of their ship had reached their brokers.

The facts are set out in greater detail in the judgments of Lord Esher, M.R. and Lindley, L.J. in the court below.

Sir C. Russell, Q.C. and Hollams appeared for the appellants, and argued that Murison, the person who received the information that the State of Florida was probably lost, was not in fact the agent through whom the insurance was effected. He was neither the habitual agent of the appellants in relation to the subject-matter, nor their agent in this special instance. There is no authority for saying that an innocent non-communication of material facts avoids a policy except in the case of the agent who actually effects the insurance. The authority given to Murison was determined before the policy was effected. They cited

The Attorney-General (Sir R. Webster, Q.C.) and Barnes, for the respondent, contended that the relation of principal and agent existed with reference to the subject-matter, and the agent continued to act after he had received the information, and, as long as he was acting, he was bound to communicate what he knew. The broker had the information before the insurance was effected, and while the relation of principal and agent still existed, and that is not affected by the ultimate result of the negotiations: (see 2 Duer, p. 380.)

Hollams was heard in reply.

At the conclusion of the arguments their Lordships took time to consider their judgment.

Aug. 9.—Their Lordships gave judgment as follows:—

The LORD CHANCELLOR (Halsbury).—My Lords: In this case the plaintiffs sue upon a policy of marine insurance, and the only question arises upon the statement of defence that the defendant was induced to enter into the contract by concealment of material facts by the plaintiffs and their agents. The facts are not in dispute. Neither the plaintiffs nor the agent through whom the policy was effected had any knowledge of the material fact the concealment or non-disclosure of which is relied on as vitiating the policy; but an agent who did not effect the policy at an earlier period received information, admitted to be material while he was acting as agent to effect an insurance for the plaintiffs, which he did not communicate. Day, J., before whom the case was decided without a jury, held that this did not affect the validity of the policy. A majority of the Court of Appeal reversed Day, J.'s judgment, and held that the non-disclosure was fatal to the plaintiffs' claim. So far as I understand the judgment of the Court of Appeal, it is intended to lay down a principle that would not, I think, be contested, but it applies that principle to a state of facts to which I think it is inapplicable. Lindley, L.J. says, I think correctly, "it is a condition of the contract that there is no misrepresentation or concealment either by the assured or by anyone who ought as a matter of business and fair dealing to have stated or disclosed the facts to him, or to the underwriter for him." And Lopes, L.J., after stating the principle upon which the knowledge of the agent is the knowledge of the principal, explains it to mean that the principal is to be as responsible for any knowledge of a material fact acquired by his agent employed to obtain the insurance as if he had acquired it himself. To the propositions thus stated I think no objection could be made; but it is obvious that the words in the one judgment, "agent employed to obtain the insurance," or in the other judgment the words "the underwriter," import that the particular contract obtained was, in the language of the statement of defence, a policy which the defendant was induced to subscribe by the wrongful concealment by the plaintiffs and their agents of certain facts then known to the plaintiffs or their agents, and unknown to the defendant, which were material to the risk. I doubt very much whether the solution of the controversy as to what is the true principle upon which the contract of insurance is avoided by concealment or misrepresentation, whether by considering it fraudulent or as an implied term of the contract, helps one very much in deciding the present case.

If one were to adopt in terms the language of Lord Ellenborough, C.J. in Gladstone v. King (1 M. & S. 35) I do not think it could justify the judgment of the majority of the Court of Appeal. In that case a policy lost or not lost was effected on the 25th Oct. On the previous 25th July the ship had run upon a rock. On the 5th Aug. the captain wrote to his owners, the plaintiffs; they received his letter on the 25th Oct. Whatever may be said of the logic of that case, which acquitted the captain of all ill intention, but decided upon the ground that otherwise owners might direct their captains to remain silent, and which upon a policy lost or not lost assumes any antecedent damage to have been an implied exception out of the policy, it does not proceed upon any such ground as the Court of Appeal appear to rely on here. Lord Ellenborough says: "No mischief will issue" (a somewhat strange mode of enunciating a proposition of law) "from holding in this case that the antecedent damage was an implied exception out of the policy. If the principle be new, it is consistent with justice and convenience." Unfortunately his Lordship does not state what is the principle which he apparently admits to be new. I can quite understand that when a man comes for an insurance upon his ship he may be expected to know both the then condition and the history of the ship he seeks to insure. If he takes means not to know, so as to be able to make contracts of insurance without the responsibility of knowledge, this is fraud. But even without fraud, such as I think this would be, the owner of the ship cannot escape the necessity of being acquainted with the ship and its history because he has committed to others,—his captain, or his general agent for the management of his shipping business—the knowledge which the underwriter has a right to assume the owner possesses when he comes to insure his ship. With respect to agency so limited, I am not disposed to differ with the proposition laid down by Cockburn, C.J. in Proudfoot v. Montefiore (16 L. T. Rep. N. S. 585; 2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 572; L. Rep. 2 Q. B. 511). A part of the proposition is, "that the insurer is entitled to assume as the basis of the contract between him and the assured that the latter will communicate to him every material fact of which the assured has, or in the ordinary course of business ought to have, knowledge." I think the last are the cardinal words, and contemplate such an agency as I have described above. I am unable, however, to see that the present case is governed by any such principle. A broker is employed to effect a particular insurance; while so employed he receives material information; he does not effect the insurance, and he does not communicate the information. How is it possible to suggest that the assured could rely upon the communication to the principal of every piece of information acquired by any agent through whom the assured has unsuccessfully endeavoured to procure an assurance? I am unable to accept the criticism by the Master of the Rolls upon the proposition that the knowledge of the agent is the knowledge of the principal. When a person is the agent to know, his knowledge does bind the principal. But in this case I think the agency of the broker had ceased before the policy sued upon was effected. The principal himself, and the broker through whom the policy sued on was effected, were both admitted to be unacquainted with any material fact which was not disclosed. I cannot but think that the somewhat vague use of the word "agent" leads to confusion. Some agents so far represent the principal that in all respects their acts and intentions and their knowledge may truly be said to be the acts, intentions, and knowledge of the principal. Other agents may have so limited and narrow an authority both in fact and in the common understanding of their form of employment that it would be quite inaccurate to say that such an agent's knowledge or intentions are the knowledge or intentions of his principal; and whether his acts are the acts of his principal depends upon the specific authority he has received. In Fitzherbert v. Mather (1 T. R. 12) the consignor and shipper of the goods insured was the agent whose knowledge was in question; in Gladstone v. King (ubi sup.) the master of the ship was the agent; and in Proudfoot v. Montefiore (ubi sup.) the agent was the accepted representative of the principal, in effect trading and acting for him, in Smyrna, the owner himself carrying on business in Manchester. And though the decision in Ruggles v. The General Insurance Company (4 Mason, 74), before the Supreme Court of the United States, may not be very satisfactory in what they held under the circumstances of that case to be the relation between the captain of the ship and his owners, the principle upon which that case was decided was the supposed termination of the agency between them. Where the employment of the agent is such that in respect of the particular matter in question he really does represent the principal, the formula that the knowledge of the agent is his knowledge is I think correct; but it is obvious that that formula can only be applied when the words "agent" and "principal" are limited in their application. To lay down as an abstract proposition of law that every agent, no matter how limited the scope of his agency, would bind every principal even by his acts, is obviously and upon the face of it absurd; and yet it is by the fallacious use of the word "agent" that plausibility is given to reasoning which requires the assumption of some such proposition. What then is the position of the broker in this case whose knowledge, though not communicated, is held to be that of the principal? He certainly is not employed to acquire such knowledge, nor can any insurer suppose that he has knowledge in the ordinary course of employment like the captain of a ship, or the owner himself, as to the condition or history of the ship. In this particular case the knowledge was acquired, not because he was the agent of the assured, but from the accident that he was general agent for another person. The reason why, if he had effected the insurance, his knowledge, unless he communicated it, would have been fatal to the policy, is because his agency was to effect an insurance, and the authority to make the contract drew with it all the necessary powers and responsibilities which are involved in such an employment; but he had no general agency—he had no other authority than the authority to make the particular contract, and his authority ended before the contract sued on was made. When it was made no relation between him and the shipowner existed which made or continued him an agent for whose knowledge his former principal was responsible. There was no material fact known to any agent which was not disclosed, at the point of time at which the contract was made; there was no one possessed of knowledge whose duty it was to communicate such knowledge. For these reasons I am of opinion that the judgment of the Court of Appeal should be reversed, and the judgment of Day, J. restored; and I move your Lordships accordingly.

Lord WATSON.—My Lords: This is a case of considerable nicety; but I have ultimately come to the conclusion, for the reasons already stated by the Lord Chancellor, that the appeal ought to be allowed. It is, in my opinion, a condition precedent of every contract of marine insurance, that the insured shall make a full disclosure of all facts materially affecting the risk which are within his personal knowledge at the time when the contract is made. Where an insurance is effected through the medium of an agent the ordinary rule of law applies, and non-disclosure of material facts, known to the agent only, will affect his principal, and give the insurer good ground for avoiding the contract. In the case of insurances by a shipowner it has been decided that he is affected by the knowledge of a class of agents other than those whom he employs to insure. In the ordinary course of business, the owner of a trading vessel employs a master, and ship agents, whose special function it is to keep their employer duly informed of all casualties encountered by his ship which would materially influence the judgment of an insurer. On that ground it has been ruled that the insurer must be held to have transacted in reliance upon the well-known usage of the shipping trade, and that he is consequently entitled to assume that every circumstance material to the risk insured has been communicated to him, which ought in due course to have been made known to the shipowner before the insurance was effected. Accordingly, if a master or ship agent, whether wilfully or unintentionally, fail in their duty to their employer, their suppression of a material fact will, notwithstanding his ignorance of the fact, vitiate his contract. I do not think it necessary to notice in detail the authorities which bear upon this point. I desire to say, however, that I have difficulty in comprehending the principle upon which the court in Gladstone v. King (1 M. & S. 35) and Stribley v. The Imperial Marine Insurance Company (34 L. T. Rep. N. S. 281; 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 134; 1 Q. B. Div. 507) held that the innocent non-communication of a material fact, by an agent who was the alter ego of the shipowner, merely created an exception from the policy. In both these cases the court appears to me to have undertaken the somewhat perilous task of settling the terms of the contract, which the insurer would have made for himself if the fact had been communicated to him.

In the present case it is sought to extend the imputed knowledge of the insured to all facts which, during the period of his employment, became known to any agent, other than the agent effecting the policy in question, who was employed at any time, successfully or unsuccessfully, to insure the whole or part of the same risk with that covered by the policy. This is a case of re-insurance; but it is obvious that the principle, if admitted, would be equally applicable to the original contract. I am of opinion, with your Lordships, that the responsibility of an innocent insured, for the non-communication of facts which happen to be within the private knowledge of persons whom he merely employs to obtain an insurance upon a particular risk, ought not to be carried beyond the person who actually makes the contract on his behalf. There is no authority whatever for enlarging his responsibility beyond that limit, unless it is to be found in the decisions which relate to captains and ship agents; and these do not appear to me to have any analogy to the case of agents employed to effect a policy. There is a material difference in the relations of these two classes of agents to their employer. The one class is specially employed for the purpose of communicating to him the very facts which the law requires him to divulge to his insurer; the other is employed, not to procure or give information concerning the ship, but to effect an insurance. There is also, as the Master of the Rolls pointed out, an important difference in the positions of those two classes with respect to the insurer. He is entitled to contract, and does contract, on the basis that all material facts connected with the vessel insured, known to the agent employed for that purpose, have been by him communicated in due course to his principal. So also, when an agent to insure is brought into contact with an insurer, the latter transacts on the footing that the agent has disclosed every material circumstance within his personal knowledge; but it cannot be reasonably suggested that the insurer relies, to any extent, upon the private information possessed by persons of whose existence he presumably knows nothing. In the circumstances of this case I have come to the conclusion that, whilst it might be the moral duty of Mr. Murison to communicate to the appellants the information which he received on the forenoon of the 1st May 1884, he was under no legal obligation to do so. There may be circumstances which impose upon agents in the position of Mr. Murison an express or implied duty to communicate their own information to their principal; but nothing of that sort occurs here. I must, in fairness to Mr. Murison, say that I can find no warrant for the inference of fact drawn by Lindley, L.J., that he purposely omitted to impart his knowledge to the appellants, in order that they might re-insure on more favourable terms. No such imputation was made at the trial; and, if it had been made, it ought to have been submitted to the jury, and their verdict taken upon it. I concur, therefore, in the judgment which has been moved.

Lord FITZGERALD.—My Lords: In this very interesting case I concur in the order which will presently be proposed by the Lord Chancellor. I adopt entirely the reasons which have been given by the Lord Chancellor and by Lord Watson. The judgment delivered by Lord Esher, M.R. was one of more than usual ability; it was a considered judgment, prepared with care and upon a critical examination of the authorities; and I am prepared to adopt that judgment, and substantially the reasons given by the noble and learned Lord for the conclusion at which he arrived, though not every portion of those reasons.

Lord MACNAGHTEN.—My Lords: I agree. It has frequently been said by great judges that the doctrine of constructive notice ought not to be extended. It seems to me that the decision under appeal involves a great and a dangerous extension of that doctrine. There is nothing unreasonable in imputing to a shipowner who effects an insurance on his vessel all the information with regard to his own property which the agent, to whom the management of that property is committed, possessed at the time and might in the ordinary course of things have communicated to his employer. In such a case it may be said without impropriety that the knowledge of the agent is the knowledge of the principal. But the case is different when the agent whose knowledge it is sought to impute to the principal is not the agent to whom the principal looks for information, but an agent employed for the special purpose of effecting the insurance. It is quite true that the insurance would be vitiated by concealment on the part of such an agent just as it would be by concealment on the part of the principal. But that is not because the knowledge of the agent is to be imputed to the principal, but because the agent of the assured is bound as the principal is bound to communicate to the underwriters all material facts within his knowledge. Concealment of those facts is a breach of duty on his part to those with whom his principal has placed him in communication: (Lynch v. Dunsford, 14 East 494.) It was said that in the present case Murison was under a legal obligation to communicate to the appellants the knowledge which he acquired while employed as their agent. But the learned counsel for the respondent produced no authority for that proposition, nor did they, I think, satisfy your Lordships that such a legal obligation flowed from Murison's employment. The majority of the Court of Appeal say that, whether there was a legal obligation on the part of Murison or not, there was a moral obligation on his part to communicate this information to his employers. But I apprehend that it is not the function of a court of justice to enforce or give effect to moral obligations which do not carry with them legal or equitable rights. Whatever may be thought of Murison's conduct from a moral point of view, it would, in my opinion, be a dangerous extension of the doctrine of constructive notice to hold that persons who are themselves absolutely innocent of any concealment or misrepresentation, and who have not wilfully shut their eyes or closed their ears to any means of information, are to be affected with the knowledge of matters which other persons may be morally, though not legally, bound to communicate to them.

COURT OF APPEAL.

Friday, July 1, 1887.

(Before Lord Esher, M.R., Lindley and Lopes, L.JJ., assisted by Nautical Assessors.)

The Star of Persia. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM BUTT, J.

Salvage—Amount—Appeal—Principles on which salvage is awarded.

The Court of Appeal will, in a salvage action, where it appears that the judge below has misapprehended the evidence, and consequently given a wrong award, increase or diminish the award as the justice of the case may require.

The barque S. of P., having taken up a foul berth in bad weather in the Downs, collided with another barque. The tug C. towed her clear after an hour's towing, during which time her anchor and chain were slipped. After she had been got clear the tug continued to tow ahead until another anchor had been brought off from the shore by other salvors, and she was ultimately saved. Her value and that of her cargo and freight amounted in all to 23,000*l.*

Butt, J., in a salvage action against the S. of P. having awarded 150*l., the Court of Appeal held that he had misapprehended the evidence as to the danger from which the S. of P. had been saved, and increased the award to* 300*l.*

This was an appeal by the plaintiffs in a salvage action from an award of Butt, J., given on the 15th Feb. 1887.

The action was instituted by the owners, masters, and crews of the steam-tug Challenge and the luggers Albion and Sappho, against the owners of the barque Star of Persia, her cargo and freight, to recover salvage for services rendered to the Star of Persia in the Straits of Dover on the 22nd and 23rd Dec. 1886.

The facts alleged by the plaintiffs were as follows: About noon, on Dec. 22, those on the Challenge, a tug of 137 tons register, sighted the Star of Persia, near Dungeness, coming up the Channel. The master of the Challenge having previously towed the Star of Persia, and thinking she might again require his services, followed her up the Channel. On coming up with her between 4 and 5 p.m. the master of the barque asked the tug to accompany him in case he should want to be towed to London. Owing, however, to the thickness of the weather the Star of Persia was lost sight of by those on board the tug. At about 7.30 p.m. on the same day, in answer to signals of distress, the lugger Sappho was launched at Deal, and with great risk and difficulty proceeded to the vessel exhibiting the signals, which proved to be the Star of Persia. Some of the crew of the lugger having boarded the Star of Persia, it was found that the Star of Persia was in collision with an Italian barque, the Draguette. The Star of Persia was riding to her port anchor and ninety fathoms of chain. The crew of the Sappho at once gave their assistance, and whilst so engaged the tug Challenge came up and was at once engaged to tow the Star of Persia clear. After an hour's towing, during which the anchor and chain of the Star of Persia were slipped, the Star of Persia was towed clear, and was then towed to a fair berth between Kingsdown and Deal, when her starboard anchor was let go. The tug, however, continued to tow ahead, as the master of the Star of Persia was unwilling to trust to one anchor in the then state of the weather. The Sappho was then sent ashore for a pilot, and on returning was again sent ashore for an anchor and chain, which was brought off by the lugger Albion. The tug continued to lie by the barque till 4 a.m. on the 24th, when the weather having moderated, the tug proceeded to tow the Star of Persia, under an ordinary towage agreement, to London, where they arrived in safety on Dec. 25.

The defendants admitted that the plaintiffs had rendered salvage services, but alleged that the same were exaggerated by the plaintiffs. They also alleged that, when the Challenge and Sappho came up after the collision, the Star of Persia was already clear of the barque and in no danger.

The value of the Star of Persia was 8000*l.*, and of her cargo and freight 15,442*l.*

Jan. 15.—Butt, J., having heard evidence, awarded 150*l.* His judgment, so far as is material, was as follows:—It does not appear with absolute clearness from the evidence whether the Star of Persia was already clear of the barque Draguette when the tug took hold of her. The Elder Brethren are disposed to think she was, but it appears to us evident enough that the Draguette's anchor holding—and there is no evidence whatever that it moved—the cutting of a rope or two and the paying out of cable by the Star of Persia would have taken her clear, as the captain said it did in fact take her clear. Therefore we do not think that there was any injury or any risk of serious injury at the time the tug took hold of her; but still she took her out of an uncomfortable position, and she was in attendance upon her for a considerable time. . . . . It is not asked that I should apportion the amount between these different salvors, and therefore I shall not do so. Having consulted the Elder Brethren I have come to the conclusion that, having regard to all the circumstances of the case, a fair award will be 150*l.*

From this award the plaintiffs now appealed.

July 6.—Sir Walter Phillimore and Nelson for the appellants.

Bucknill, Q.C. and Dr. Raikes for the respondents.

(a) Reported by J. P. Aspinall and Butler Aspinall, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

Lord Esher, M.R.—The rule has been correctly stated by Mr. Bucknill, that if this court cannot say that the learned judge has misapprehended the facts, or cannot say that he has acted contrary to any principle, then, if the amount does not seem to this court to be unreasonable, it cannot interfere. But these are divisible propositions, because, if the court can say, "In our opinion the learned judge has misapprehended the facts, either by considering facts which we think did not exist, or by overlooking facts which we think did exist, either of which is a misapprehension of facts," then the question whether the amount is reasonable or not hardly arises. If the learned judge, by leaving out material facts, comes to a conclusion, it is obvious that he, if he had taken those facts into consideration, would have given more or less. If he assumes or comes to the conclusion, for instance, that there was danger and fixes his award upon that basis, and then this court should be of opinion that he has misapprehended the evidence and that there was in fact no danger, it is obvious that we would give less than he did. Or, if the judge omits to take into consideration the question of danger which we think did exist, then we would give more than he did. How are those principles to be applied to the present case? I think myself that the learned judge here has considerably misapprehended the element of danger, and has underestimated the danger in which the Star of Persia was at the time the services of the tug were accepted. It has been suggested that the services of the tug were imposed and forced upon the defendants. In my opinion they were accepted. The captain of this ship had, when he came into the Downs, taken up an unfortunate position. He had taken up a foul berth with regard to an Italian barque. When the tide swung him the result was, that he came into collision with the barque. Mr. Bucknill has admitted that the defendants did wrong in taking up this berth. There was not only danger to the Star of Persia if she broke loose, but also of breaking the barque loose and thereby making her owners liable for all the damage that might ensue. I cannot think her position was merely uncomfortable, as the learned judge calls it. If she had slipped her anchor and there had been no tug there, what would have been her position? She would have been in the Downs with her anchor slipped and her sails furled, and it would have been difficult to bring her up with any certainty with the other anchor. Unless the other anchor was let go and held immediately, what would happen next? She ran great danger of setting the Italian vessel adrift, and then they both might have collided with other vessels. This I know not unfrequently happens in the Mersey. What was her captain's idea of his position? He burnt blue lights, which means, I want assistance and salvage assistance. He, in the witness-box, recognised the danger of his position, for, having said that he slipped his anchor, he continued, "Not only did I do that, but I did it for my safety, and I engaged the Challenge without agreement, not to tow me to London, but to a clear berth." Looking at the position of these two ships, I cannot help thinking that he came to the conclusion, and the right conclusion, that he required the assistance of the tug to take him into a position of safety. The tug took hold of the Star of Persia and towed her ahead, which was the best means of clearing her.

That the tug is entitled to some salvage is undisputed. The master of the Star of Persia kept the tug's rope on board all night, and it is not until he gets another anchor and chain on board that he throws off the tug's rope. The inference of any reasonable man is, that he did not think himself safe with one anchor, and that was the real reason why he kept the tug's rope on board. I think the learned judge has misapprehended the difficulties and dangers in which the ship and her cargo were, and what might have happened to her but for the arrival of the salvors, viz., the danger of becoming liable for damage to other vessels on the ground that she was the original sinner in taking up a foul berth on a stormy night. Therefore, I think the learned judge did not give full force to the element of danger or to the large value of the property saved, which is an element that must be taken into consideration. On these grounds I am of opinion that the amount of the award is too small, and we think the salvage should be 300*l.* instead of 150*l.*

Lindley, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. It is very difficult to differ from a judge on a mere question of salvage amount, but it appears to me, on consideration of the evidence, that Butt, J. has failed to realise the position in which this ship was. The position was, as a matter of fact, one of extreme difficulty and danger, and I do not think the learned judge has given sufficient attention to that fact. On that ground, and the other grounds to which the Master of the Rolls has alluded, it appears to me that we ought to say that this is a case in which the award is insufficient.

Lopes, L.J. concurred.

The Banshee. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM THE PROBATE, DIVORCE, AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION (ADMIRALTY).

Collision—Duty of overtaken vessel—Course—Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, arts. 22, 23.

The Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea only apply at a time when two vessels have approached so near to one another that, if either of them does anything contrary to the Regulations, risk of collision will be involved.

Semble, that a vessel, which is being overtaken by another, is not to blame within art. 22 of the Regulations if she alters her course at such a distance ahead of the overtaking vessel that the latter can, by the exercise of reasonable care, keep out of the way of the former.

Quære, what is the duty of a vessel which is being overtaken as to keeping her course when it becomes necessary for her to manœuvre for another vessel.

(a) Reported by J. P. Aspinall and Butler Aspinall, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

This was an appeal by the plaintiffs in a collision action from a decision of Butt, J., finding their vessel the Kildare solely to blame for a collision with the defendants' steamship the Banshee.

The collision took place in Dublin Bay, about 8 p.m. on Jan. 27, 1886.

The facts alleged on behalf of the plaintiffs were as follows: Shortly before 8.10 p.m. on Jan. 27, 1886, the Kildare, a paddle-wheel steamship of 842 tons gross, owned by the City of Dublin Steam Packet Company, left the North Wall, in the river Liffey, with a general cargo and sixteen passengers bound for Liverpool. After the Kildare had passed the North Bar Buoy, at which time her course was S.E. by E., ½ E., and her engines were working full speed, those on board her saw on their starboard bow the flare-up light of a pilot cutter, and her engines were thereupon put half speed, and her helm was ported to enable her to pass under the stern of the pilot cutter. At the same time those on board saw the Banshee on their starboard quarter overhauling them rapidly. Subsequently the Banshee was seen to starboard her helm, thereby causing risk of collision, and although the helm of the Kildare was starboarded and her engines stopped, the Banshee, with her port quarter, struck the starboard bow of the Kildare.

The facts alleged on behalf of the defendants were as follows: Shortly before 8.5 p.m. the Banshee, a steamship of 246 tons, owned by the London and North-Western Railway Company, was proceeding down the Liffey on a voyage from Dublin to Holyhead. In these circumstances those on board the Banshee observed the Kildare preceding them down the river. The Banshee was shortly afterwards put on to a S.E. course to pass clear to the south of the Kildare. When the Banshee reached the South Bar Buoy her helm was starboarded half-point to clear a vessel whose light was slightly on the starboard bow. The Banshee continued this course, gradually bringing the Kildare abeam, when the Kildare, instead of keeping her course, came off to starboard and thereby brought about a collision, her stem striking the Banshee on her port side abreast the mainmast.

The defendants (inter alia) charged the plaintiffs with breach of art. 22 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, which is as follows:

> Where, by the above rules, one of two ships is to keep out of the way, the other shall keep her course.

At the trial before Butt, J., the learned judge held the Kildare solely to blame on the ground that she broke art. 22 in porting, and thereby throwing herself across the bows of the Banshee, and that she so ported without looking round to see where the Banshee was. The learned judge also found that at the last moment the Banshee starboarded—a manœuvre which in the circumstances was, in his opinion, imprudent but not negligent.

Sir Walter Phillimore and Bucknill, Q.C. (with them Carson), for the plaintiffs, in support of the appeal.—The Banshee was solely to blame for this collision. The learned judge was wrong in holding the Kildare to blame for porting when she did. Her porting was not a breach of art. 22 of the Regulations. Assuming art. 22 to have been applicable at the time when she ported, yet the circumstances were such that the porting would not be an infringement of the article. Where a vessel, which is being overtaken, has, in order to avoid a vessel in front of her, to manœuvre with her helm, she is nevertheless "keeping her course" within the meaning of the article. She is keeping her course so far as the existing circumstances will admit. In the same way a vessel which is beating up a river does not infringe art. 22 by going about when she gets near the bank:

> The Priscilla, 23 L. T. Rep. N. S. 566; L. Rep. 3 A. & E. 125; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 503.

Reliance is also placed upon art. 23, which provides for a departure from the Regulations where any special circumstances render a departure necessary in order to avoid immediate danger. Here it was absolutely necessary for the Kildare to port to avoid the pilot cutter. If it was a natural and reasonable manœuvre for the Kildare to port for the cutter, those on board the Banshee ought to have expected that manœuvre and acted accordingly. It is also contended that there was no breach of art. 22 because the Kildare's porting took place before the Regulations began to apply. The Regulations do not apply until the vessels are so close that departure from them may involve risk of collision. The starboarding of the Banshee was negligence for which she should be held solely to blame.

Kennedy, Q.C. and J. P. Aspinall, for the respondents, contra.—The decision of Butt, J. was correct. It is admitted that the Kildare was in fact being overtaken by the Banshee, and if so she was wrong in porting. On the evidence it is clear that the vessels were sufficiently near when the Kildare ported to make the Regulations applicable. The Kildare is not entitled to excuse her breach of the Regulations by saying she ported for the pilot cutter. It is not enough to say it was a reasonable manœuvre; the plaintiffs must go further and prove it was a necessary manœuvre before the court will excuse the breach. The Kildare might have stopped, by which manœuvre she would have both obeyed the regulation and avoided the pilot cutter. It is further contended that Butt, J. was right in exonerating the Banshee for starboarding.

Sir Walter Phillimore in reply.

Lord Esher, M.R.—This case arises out of a collision between two ships, the Kildare and the Banshee. The Kildare was the leading ship and the Banshee the overtaking ship, and at one time or another they were within the rules which are applicable to such navigation. Now at what period of time is it that the Regulations begin to apply to two ships? It cannot be said that they are applicable however far off the ships may be. Nobody could seriously contend that, if two ships are six miles apart, the Regulations for Preventing Collisions are applicable to them. They only apply at a time when, if either of them does anything contrary to the Regulations, it will cause danger of collision. None of the Regulations apply unless that period of time has arrived. It follows that anything done before the time arrives at which the Regulations apply is immaterial, because anything done before that time cannot produce risk of collision within the meaning of the Regulations. We therefore have to determine if anything was done by either of these vessels contrary to the Regulations at a time when the Regulations were applicable. After the time when the Regulations become applicable, one of them clearly provides that the leading vessel is to keep her course. Now, a very important question has been raised as to what is the meaning of a vessel keeping her course; but on the present occasion it seems to me to be unnecessary to decide that matter. If what took place with regard to the Kildare's porting before this regulation as to keeping her course applied, the porting is immaterial. After the regulation applied she was bound to keep her course within the meaning of the regulation, and if after that time she never did alter her course, she has not been guilty of a breach of the Regulations. And if she has not been guilty of any breach of the Regulations it is obvious that the Banshee must be solely to blame, because it was her duty, if the Kildare was guilty of no breach of the Regulations, to keep out of her way. Therefore the first question is this: was the first porting of the Kildare at such a distance from the Banshee that it can be said that that porting was not within the Regulations. Now the evidence on the part of the defendants is, that when they starboarded the vessels were from 300 to 400 yards apart. They cannot give evidence as to the distance they were from the Kildare when she first ported. They could not see when she ported, and therefore can give no evidence as to it. Therefore the whole of the case as to what distance these two ships were apart when the Kildare first ported must rest upon the evidence of the Kildare. What is that evidence? It is not the evidence of sight, which would not be very valuable in this case. It is the evidence of time, and the time that is available on the point is the time in the engineer's log of the Kildare. Now, we take it that it was four minutes from the time when he was ordered to go half speed to the time of the collision. We infer from that that there were 800 yards between the two steamers at the time when the Kildare ported as she says she did, and we believe she did, on account of the pilot vessel. Whether, therefore, it was right for her to port and go under the stern of the pilot boat, or whether it would not have been better for her to have gone ahead of it, is wholly immaterial. Whatever she did then was before the Regulations began to apply. If so, it cannot be said that she has infringed the Regulations. If the Regulations had been applicable I should have thought that, when she was aware of a vessel coming up behind her, she had no right to break from her course without looking round to see where the other ship was at that time. I am clear upon this, that after the regulation is applicable she has a right to keep her course, whatever that may mean, without being bound to look round to see what the other vessel is doing. If she keeps her course the whole burden is thrown upon the overtaking ship.

Then comes the question, did the Kildare alter her course when the regulation was applicable? If she did so in the way described by the witnesses from the Banshee she behaved in a gross way. Their evidence is, that after they had come up alongside the Kildare and had taken a course which would have taken them clear of her without difficulty, she ported so as to come into them. All I can say is, I do not believe it. According to their evidence she must, with the other ship alongside of her and within a ship's length of her, have ported four or five points. I do not believe it, and therefore I assume it was not done, and I accept the evidence of those on the Kildare that she did nothing of the kind. If so, she did not alter her course during the time the rule was applicable. Butt, J., differing from his nautical assessors, came to the conclusion that she did port at that time. I think he did so from taking too strict a view of the variance between the statement of the Kildare's captain before the Receiver of Wreck and the evidence he gave in court. It seems to me that the learned judge's mind was unduly influenced with the fact that before the Receiver of Wreck the captain had said nothing about the Banshee starboarding into him. But I really think that, when he said, "she came up alongside me and shot across me," the meaning of that in sailor's language was, that she starboarded, and he did not mean that he ported into her. If my view be true the Kildare never broke the Regulations because she never did anything to take her off her course when the regulation was applicable. In that case the Banshee must be solely to blame. Butt, J. also came to another conclusion which I cannot accept. Even supposing the Kildare was wrong, what was the conduct of the Banshee? She comes up alongside the Kildare, and then, trusting to her superior speed, she starboards her helm for the purpose of going between the Kildare and the pilot boat. The learned judge said he could conceive nothing more rash than the conduct of the Kildare; but, if she did not port as is suggested, and the Banshee starboarded, I can conceive nothing more rash and unseamanlike than the conduct of the Banshee. In my opinion, even assuming the Kildare broke the Regulations, the Banshee did so also in attempting to get across the bows of the Kildare. I further do not believe that the Kildare ported at the last moment. I am therefore of opinion that the Banshee was solely to blame, and that the appeal must be allowed.

Lindley, L.J.—I cannot agree with the decision of Butt, J. finding the Kildare alone to blame. He has exonerated the Banshee from all fault, and has done that on a theory which is not supported by the evidence. It appears to me that the evidence shows that the Banshee was guilty of an amount of negligence which is somewhat startling. The doubt of my mind is in saying whether or not the Kildare is also to blame. I believe the evidence of the witnesses from the Kildare when they say that the Kildare ported in order to avoid a pilot cutter, and went half speed, and that it was four minutes from then to the time of collision, and I do not believe that she afterwards ported into the Banshee. My difficulty in connection with the overtaking rule is this, whether the porting of the Kildare was justifiable, having regard to the fact that the Banshee was behind her and overtaking her. If the Banshee was, when the Kildare ported, so far astern that with reasonable care she could by altering her course have kept out of her way, then the Kildare was not to blame. If, on the other hand, the Banshee was so near that she could not reasonably get out of the way when the Kildare altered her course, then the Kildare was to blame. I am somewhat struck with the fact that the master of the Kildare says he did not bother himself to look round at the Banshee. But from the evidence I gather that at that time the Banshee was about 800 yards astern, and if that was so we are advised that there was ample time for the Banshee to have got out of the way of the Kildare. It therefore appears to me that we are justified upon the evidence in saying that the Kildare did not infringe the Regulations, while the fact that the Banshee was to blame seems to be too obvious to require argument.

LOPES, L.J.—A difficult and important question has been raised in this case as to the meaning of the provision in the Regulations that an overtaken vessel shall keep her course. It is, however, unnecessary in this case to express an opinion on the meaning of those words, because the evidence satisfies me that the Kildare did not alter her course after any of the Regulations became applicable, they only becoming applicable when there is danger of collision. In my opinion she ported before there was any danger, and therefore she is not brought within the Regulations. For these reasons I am satisfied that the Banshee was solely to blame.

HIGH COURT OF JUSTICE.

PROBATE, DIVORCE, AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION.

ADMIRALTY BUSINESS.

July 26 and Aug. 9, 1887.

(Before the Right Hon. Sir JAMES HANNEN.)

STOCKKEBYE AND HVALSOE v. GORDON AND STAMP; THE GERTRUDE. (a)

Carriage of goods—Action for non-delivery—Admiralty Division—Measure of damages—Interest.

In an action brought in the Admiralty Division to recover unliquidated damages, the plaintiffs, if successful, are, in accordance with the practice of the Admiralty Division, entitled to interest on the amount recovered from the date of the loss on which their claim is based, even where the claim is one which, prior to the Judicature Acts, could not have been brought in the Admiralty Court.

THIS was a motion by the defendants in a damage to cargo action, asking the court to vary the registrar's report therein by directing that the plaintiffs were not entitled to recover interest against the defendants on the sum of 9800*l.*, as stated in the report and the schedule thereto.

The action was instituted in personam in the Admiralty Division by the owners of a cargo of corn against Messrs. Gordon and Stamp, the owners of the steamship Gertrude.

In the course of the voyage from New Orleans to Copenhagen the Gertrude and her cargo were lost, and the plaintiffs now claimed damages for the defendants' breach of the contract of carriage.

The defendants delivered a defence, but ultimately admitted liability, the amount of the damages to be assessed by the registrar and merchants.

At the reference the plaintiffs claimed the invoice value of the cargo, merchants' profit, and interest at 4 per cent. per annum from the date on which the bills given by the plaintiffs in payment for the cargo were met; and upon this basis the Registrar allowed 9800*l.* for value of cargo and merchants' profit, with interest, as claimed.

The defendants now moved to vary the report by having the interest disallowed.

J. G. Barnes, for the defendants, in support of the motion.—The plaintiffs are not entitled to interest from the date of the loss. This action is a purely common law action, and could not, before the Judicature Acts, have been brought in this division. It is therefore governed by the practice of the common law courts, and not by the practice of the Admiralty Court. If so, inasmuch as at common law this interest could not have been recovered, the registrar was wrong to allow it. The Judicature Acts were not intended to affect rights, but only procedure, and therefore, because a party has availed himself of the Judicature Act to bring a common law action in this division, the defendant should not be burdened with liabilities other than would attach in the common law courts. It is also contended that the Admiralty Court practice of allowing interest is confined to collision cases. Sect. 29 of 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 42, shows that it requires a specific enactment to give juries power to allow interest in certain cases. This would seem to indicate that in all other cases of claims for unliquidated damages interest is not recoverable.

Sir Walter Phillimore (with him Dr. Stubbs), for the plaintiffs, contra.—The registrar, following the ordinary practice of this court, has rightly allowed interest. True, this is a class of action more commonly instituted in the common law courts, but after it was instituted here the defendants took no steps to remove it, and therefore they are bound by the practice of this division. It would be very undesirable that the registrar should, in each case, have to decide whether the Admiralty Court practice or the common law practice applied. Moreover the rule is a just and equitable one, and only affords the plaintiff a restitutio in integrum, which this court in the exercise of its equitable jurisdiction is always anxious to give:

Cur. adv. vult.

Aug. 9.—Sir JAMES HANNEN.—I was prepared to give judgment this morning on the court sitting in this case, but I deferred doing so until I had heard the arguments in The Baron Aberdare (infra, p. 225). I will first deal with the case of the Gertrude. That was a case not within the ordinary jurisdiction of the Admiralty Division, but it was as a matter of fact brought here, and no attempt was made to remove it, and it proceeded in the ordinary way before the registrar to decide the amount due with interest thereon from the time the claim arose as distinguished from the date of judgment. There is no doubt that it has long been the established practice in the Admiralty

(a) Reported by J. P. ASPINALL and BUTLER ASPINALL, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

Court to allow interest from the time when the claim arises, as distinguished from that which is done in the common law courts. That has been fully gone into by my learned predecessor in the case of The Northumbria (ubi sup.), and it would be useless for me to travel over the same ground. That decision establishes the principle upon which the Admiralty Court proceeds in these cases, viz., that a restitutio in integrum should be made as far as it can be, and that cannot be done unless interest is allowed on the amount that has, ex hypothesi, been retained from the plaintiff. That appears to me to be a sound and equitable rule, and if it is not a rule of the common law courts, it is in my judgment to be regretted. The action having been brought in this division, and having proceeded to reference in the ordinary way, the question is whether the registrar was bound to depart from the practice of the division of which he is an officer and apply this alleged rule of common law. I am of opinion that he was not. Reference has been made to the statute of Will. 4, but it is to be observed that that statute is purely permissive. It simply gives permission to the jury in certain cases to give interest, but it does not touch any cases other than those mentioned. It only applies to cases before a jury, and it leaves me, in my judgment, entirely free to say what rule should be applied in the Admiralty Division. I am of opinion that the registrar was quite right, and I therefore confirm his report.

McCUNN v. THE LONDON AND ST. KATHARINE DOCKS COMPANY; THE BARON ABERDARE. (a)

Damage — Admiralty Division — Measure of damages—Interest.

Where an action is transferred to the Admiralty Division by consent of the parties to assess the amount of damages, the registrar and merchants are entitled, in accordance with the practice of the Admiralty Division, to give interest in addition to the actual damages, even where such interest would not be recoverable in the division from whence the action is transferred.

THIS was a motion by the plaintiffs in the above action to confirm the registrar's report therein.

The report was as follows:

In this case an action was brought in the Queen's Bench Division, on the 17th March 1884, against the London and St. Katharine Docks Company, by the owners of the barque or vessel Baron Aberdare, for damages by reason of the negligence of the defendants in and about the care and custody of the plaintiffs' ship while in the defendants' dock in Dec. 1883. The case was tried before a special jury, and a verdict was given for the plaintiffs on the 19th May 1886. It had been previously agreed that the amount of damages should be referred to an arbitrator. After this verdict and judgment a motion was made to a divisional court to enter judgment for the defendants, or for a new trial, which was rejected with costs. An appeal from this decision of the Divisional Court was then made to the Court of Appeal, which on the 11th May in the present year was likewise dismissed with costs. Immediately afterwards, on the 28th May, the action was transferred to the Admiralty by consent of parties, for the purpose of the assessment of the damages in the usual way. Since that transfer, however, the parties have come to an agreement that 7500*l.* shall be deemed to be the amount of damages the plaintiffs are entitled to recover, without prejudice to the question as to what interest is recoverable in addition; and that point is the only one which I have been called upon to consider. It is admitted that the whole amount of 7500*l.* was paid by the plaintiffs in or previous to the month of June 1884. The interest on that amount since that period necessarily represents a large sum, and if not recoverable from the defendants, also represents a heavy loss which they have had no means of obviating. The ordinary principles therefore of equity and justice would seem to require that compensation for this loss should be made. It is said that some technical rules of common law are against the allowance of interest before judgment, but I am not satisfied that those rules apply to a case of this description, or that, if they do, I am bound to act upon them when called upon as Registrar of the Admiralty Division to assess the amount of the plaintiffs' damages. I should rather assume that I am to apply the principles laid down for my guidance in assessing the damages occasioned by other acts of negligence, such as the negligent navigation of the ship by which another is injured. That the practice of the Admiralty Court is to allow interest on the loss so sustained from the date of such loss cannot be questioned, and I feel bound to follow the same rule in this instance. The judgment in The Northumbria (L. Rep. 3 A. & E. 6; 21 L. T. Rep. N. S. 681; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 314), and followed by a divisional court of the Queen's Bench in the case of Smith v. Kirby (1 Q. B. Div. 131), which was an action by the owners of cargo against the carrying ship, seem to me to justify the allowance of interest. The interest therefore will run from a date or dates in 1884 to be agreed between the parties.

The cause of action in respect of which the defendants were sued was their negligence in mooring the plaintiffs' vessel the Baron Aberdare in their dock, in consequence of which she broke loose from her moorings, and drifted across the dock, coming into collision with other vessels and barges, and thereby doing them and herself damage.

The plaintiffs' claim consisted of payments made in respect of raising the Baron Aberdare, of repairing her, and of settling claims made against them by the owners of the damaged vessels and barges.

F. W. Hollams, for the plaintiffs, in support of the motion, stated the facts.

J. G. Barnes for the defendants.—The registrar was wrong in allowing interest as he has done. This was a common law action tried on the common law side, and in accordance with the common law practice interest is not allowed. At common law interest is never allowed on unliquidated damages, except in certain cases fixed by statute. It actually required a specific enactment, viz., 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 42, s. 29, to enable a jury to give interest in certain cases. This shows that, in cases other than those specified by the Act, interest cannot be recovered:

Calton v. Bragg, 15 East, 223;
Higgins v. Sargent, 2 B. & C. 348;
Straker v. Hartland, 34 L. J. 122, Ch.

The registrar in this case only filled the office of an arbitrator, and if so the defendants should not be burdened with a liability which by the common law practice does not attach to them. The case of Smith v. Kirby (1 Q. B. Div. 131), if looked into, does not show that interest was allowed on the plaintiff's claim. The arbitrator there allowed a lump sum, but how it was made up does not appear. If interest is to be allowed in this case because the registrar of the Admiralty Division has happened to assess the damages, it will have to be allowed in such cases as breach of promise of marriage and the like, should they happen to be instituted in or transferred to this division.

Hollams in reply.—The justice of the case clearly entitles the plaintiffs to interest. For over three years have they, owing to the wrongful act of the defendants, been without this interest. The parties having transferred the action to this division are bound by its practice, and according to that practice the plaintiffs are entitled to interest. This practice has been recognised by the Courts of Chancery before the Judicature Acts and by the common law courts since the Judicature Acts:

The Northumbria, 21 L. T. Rep. N. S. 681; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 314; L. Rep. 3 A. & E. 6; Straker v. Hartland (ubi sup.);
Smith v. Kirby (ubi sup.);
British Columbia Saw Mill Company v. Nettleship, 18 L. T. Rep. N. S. 604; L. Rep. 3 C. P. 499; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 65.

Sir JAMES HANNEN.—Having disposed of the case of The Gertrude (supra, p. 224), I will now deal with the case of The Baron Aberdare, the only distinction in which appears to be that the action was brought in the Queen's Bench Division, and the merits of the case were determined there. The action having gone to the Court of Appeal, the case was then transferred, with the consent of the parties, to the Admiralty Division for the assessment of damages in the usual way. It is said that for that purpose the Registrar of the Admiralty Court was treated as an arbitrator between the parties. I do not find it so stated, but, assuming it to be so, it appears to me to make no difference in the decision to which I ought to come. It must have been transferred to him because it was thought that he was a person who would be more competent to deal with it than an officer of the Queen's Bench Division. I am of opinion that he was quite right in thinking that he was to deal with it in accordance with those principles which have been, as I think, rightly established in this court. It is clear to me that the cases of The Northumbria (ubi sup.) and Smith v. Kirby (ubi sup.) have an important bearing on this case. The case of Smith v. Kirby (ubi sup.) decided, in accordance with the decision in The Northumbria (ubi sup.), that the limitation of liability operated only in respect of what I call the substantive claim of the party injured, but that it did not prevent the granting of interest by way of damages in respect of delay in obtaining the amount. That appears to me to have been a point distinctly brought to the notice of the court, and the court held that the Admiralty Court rule so applied, and interest was granted in addition to the amount of the substantive claim. It appears therefore to me that the registrar's report in this case is right, and I confirm it. As to the dates from whence the interest runs, that must be fixed by the parties.

THE OCEAN IRON STEAMSHIP INSURANCE ASSOCIATION v. LESLIE AND OTHERS. (a)

Mutual marine insurance association—Action for contributions—Managing owner—Principal and agent—Policy of insurance.

The managing and part owner of a steamship became a member of a mutual insurance association, and took out a policy on behalf of himself and his co-owners in respect of the ship. By the articles of association every person was deemed to be a member "who in his own name, or in his name as agent, insures any ship in pursuance of the regulations of the company," and they also provided that the funds required for the payment of claims should "be raised by contributions from all the members." By the policy it was agreed between the assured and the company, "that without prejudice to the rights and remedies of the company against the said person or persons effecting this insurance, as a member or members of the company, in respect of this insurance, the assured shall pay to the company, in lieu of premiums, all the sums and contributions which the company are entitled to call upon the said person or persons effecting this insurance, as a member or members of the company, to pay to the company in respect of this insurance according to the articles of association of the company, and that the provisions contained in the said articles of association shall be deemed and considered part of this policy, and shall, so far as regards this insurance, be as binding upon the assured as upon the said person or persons effecting this insurance." Certain contributions having, in accordance with the articles of association, become payable by the managing owner in respect of the ship, and the managing owner being bankrupt, the association sued the other owners to recover the contributions:

Held, that, under the terms of the policy, they were liable, although the policy was effected by the managing owner alone.

(b) COURT OF APPEAL.

Friday, May 27, 1887.

THE UNITED MUTUAL STEAMSHIP ASSURANCE ASSOCIATION LIMITED v. NEVILL.

THIS was an appeal from the decision of Grove, J., in an action by the United Mutual Steamship Assurance Association, against Nevill, a part owner of the steamship Marquis Scicluna, to recover calls or contributions in respect of the insurance of the steamship.

The plaintiffs were an association limited by guarantee for the purposes of mutual marine insurance.

One Tully was the manager and part owner of the steamship Marquis Scicluna, of which Nevill, the defendant, was also a part owner. Tully became a member of the plaintiff's association, and took out a policy with such association in respect of the Marquis Scicluna. Tully having become bankrupt, and being unable to pay the contributions due to the association in respect of the ship, the present action was instituted.

The plaintiffs sought to make Nevill liable as an

THIS was an action by the Ocean Iron Steamship Insurance Association against Andrew Leslie and others, part owners of the steamship Howick, to recover contributions by way of premiums in respect of the insurance of the steamship.

The plaintiffs also claimed, under the terms of the policies in question, interest at 7½ per cent. per annum on the contributions from the respective dates of the calls becoming due until payment or judgment.

undisclosed principal of Tully in accordance with the rules of the association, and also upon a guarantee alleged to have been given by one Ormond on behalf of Nevill whereby he agreed, in consideration of certain policies of insurance, one of which was a policy upon the said steamer, to pay all calls made by the plaintiffs' association.

The memorandum of association stated that the association was established for the "mutual insurance by the association of the ships of members and of ships which the members may be authorised to insure in their own names and of ships in which they may be otherwise interested, and of the freights of such ships and of the individual members themselves, against any liabilities that may be incurred by them personally as owners or otherwise in respect of such ships and of all other interests or matters usually or properly covered by or included in insurances with respect to shipping, and to interests therein or liabilities in respect thereof."

The 4th article of association provided that, "Every person who on behalf of himself or any other person or persons insures or enters for protection any ship or ships, or share or shares of a ship in the association, shall as from the date of the commencement of such insurance or protection be deemed to have become a member of the association."

The 41st article provided that, "All claims in respect of insurance or protection shall be made and enforced against the association only, and not against any members thereof; but the association shall not be liable to any member or other person for the amount of any loss, claim, or demand, except to the extent of the funds which the association is able to recover from the members or persons liable for the same, and which are applicable to that purpose."

The 44th article provided that, "For the purpose of providing funds for making any payment necessary and proper to be made by or on behalf of the association for expenses connected with the business thereof or otherwise, it shall be lawful for the committee from time to time to direct that there shall be paid to the association by the members thereof rateably for the purpose of providing for or making good any such payments such sums as the committee may from time to time deem necessary."

The 45th and 46th articles provided for "calculating the rate of contribution to be paid by the members for their respective proportion of any loss, claim, or demand, or expenses," that payment might be enforced in the name of the association, and that, "in the event of any sums for the time being payable by any member of the association, or of the classes or clubs not being duly paid," the deficiency should be made good rateably by the other members of the association or classes as the case might be.

The association was divided into three different classes, each of which had its separate code of rules.

The policy made in respect of the steamship Marquis Scicluna, after reciting that Tully had become a member of the association, and had entered the ship in class 1, witnessed that, in consideration of the premises and of the observance by the insured of the rules and regulations, the association agreed that the members of the said association having ships in the said class should, according to the articles of association and the rules of the class indorsed on the policy, be liable to pay all such losses and damages to the steamship as hereinafter expressed; "provided always, that in accordance with the articles of association and the rules of the said class, this policy and the other policies of the association are granted on this condition, and it is hereby especially agreed, that the association under all their policies of insurance of the said class shall be liable in the whole only to the extent of so much of the funds as the said association is able to recover from the members of the said class and their respective heirs, executors, and administrators, liable for the same, and which under and by virtue of the rules of the said class are for the time being applicable for the purpose of paying claims under this and other policies issued in respect of the said class."

The 31st rule indorsed on the policy provided that, "A member shall be uninsured in respect of any ship or his share therein (a) from the date of the legal transfer of such ship; (b) if he do not pay when due and demanded any amount payable by him; (c) if his ship or shares therein be mortgaged or assigned at or after entry, unless before a claim accrues an approved undertaking registered by the managers has been given to pay all contributions due and to become due; (d) if he becomes bankrupt or insolvent, unless before a claim accrues an approved undertaking registered by the managers has been given to pay all contributions due and to become due; (e) if any person giving an undertaking under this rule fail to discharge his liability unless and until a fresh undertaking be tendered and accepted."

At the trial the jury found that Ormond had no authority from the defendant to sign the alleged guarantee, and that the defendant had not ratified it. Grove, J. gave judgment for the defendant on the ground that he was not a member of the association, and that the articles of association and policy imposed liability on members alone.

Cur. adv. vult.

May 27.—Lord ESHER, M.R.—The action is brought against the defendant, the part owner of a ship, as the undisclosed principal of Tully, the ship's manager, who had taken out a policy on the ship in his own name, and had become thereby a member of the plaintiffs' association according to its rules. The question therefore arises whether the plaintiffs can sue the defendant as Tully's principal. There is much complication and difficulty in connection with these mutual insurance associations. In the case of Lion Mutual Insurance Association v. Tucker (49 L. T. Rep. N. S. 764; 12 Q. B. Div. 176) I endeavoured to explain the business relation of the members of such an association to each other. It is necessary to consider the form in which the parties have carried out those business relations in order to ascertain what remedies are available for the purpose of enforcing them. The first question which it may be material to consider is, whether the different members of the association have any remedies or rights of action, and if so, what as between themselves. It is obvious, as explained in the case I have referred to, that members cannot sue other members in respect of payments due from the other members as such to the association. Only the association can sue in respect of such payments. Then can members sue other members in respect of claims arising out of the insurance of ships? In the case of Lion Insurance Association v. Tucker (ubi sup.) I stated that the business relation between the members was that they were in reality both insurers and insured; but that business relation is carried out by means of a policy given under the seal of the association. The members of each class are insurers and insured as between themselves and the other members of the class; they are insured not by the whole association, but by a part only of the association, viz., the members of the same class. A member who has suffered a loss must, however, sue on the policy given by the association. But that policy is made by the association. In order to sue the other members of the class who are really his insurers he would have to say that they were the principals of the association in giving him a policy under the seal of the association. I do not think he could do so. I think that, in the case of such a contract as this under seal, it is not allowable to go behind the instrument to make undisclosed principals responsible, because they are not parties, and have not attached their seals to the contract under seal. Moreover, it is to be observed that in this case the contract is that he is to be paid in respect of the loss he has

The defendants other than William Johnson, the managing owner of the Howick, delivered the following defence:

1. The now pleading defendants do not admit that their respective interests in the s.s. Howick were insured with the plaintiffs during any portion of the periods, and subject to any of the policies in the statement of claim mentioned.

2. If the said insurances or policies were effected in fact, which is not admitted, they were not effected by the said defendants or with their authority, nor were they suffered only the amount which the association can collect from the other members of the class. There would be this difficulty in suing the other members, viz., that they might have satisfied their liability by payment of their contributions to the association; and the member is not to receive the payment direct from them, but is to receive the sum collected by the association. There is no contract, as it seems to me, between the member who has suffered the loss and the other members, but only between him and the association; and such member therefore cannot sue the other members although they are really his insurers. If the member could not sue, a person could not sue as his undisclosed principal. Then as regards any action against the person alleged to be the undisclosed principal of a member by the other members, it would be impossible to allege that a person is an undisclosed principal in respect of the contract, unless the parties who allege that he is a party to the contract as an undisclosed principal could be sued by him as well as he by them. It seems to me clear, therefore, that the members have no right of action as between themselves. Then in respect of what can the association sue or be sued by its members? A member can sue the association for a loss on his ship. That is expressly provided by the policy. In respect of what can a member be sued by the association? He cannot be sued as an insurer, though he is in business reality an insurer, by reason of the form in which the relation between the members is carried out. The association are in form the insurers, and make the policies. They therefore cannot sue him as an insurer. They can only sue the members in respect of what is really the premium. Here no premium properly so called is paid, but each member is liable to a contribution towards losses which may be suffered by the other members on their policies. Therefore the association can only sue the member as an assured for what is equivalent to the premium. It seems to follow that, if they cannot sue him as an insurer, neither can they sue the person alleged to be his undisclosed principal as an insurer. If such person can be sued at all, it must be as an assured for what is equivalent to the premium. But can he be so sued? Such an association as this can only enter into binding policies with members. When the policy is entered into, the person with whom it is so entered into becomes a member. If a person could be an undisclosed principal with regard to such a policy, it would really make him an undisclosed member. If he is not a member, the policy cannot be made with him so as to be binding. I do not think there can be such an undisclosed member or partner so far as the other members are concerned. If it were so, then the making of such a policy as this would make the alleged undisclosed principal of the person effecting it an associate with the members of the association without their knowledge and consent. I do not think this can be so. I do not think that a person actually interested in a ship who has authorised another person to enter into a policy in his own name with the association is a party to the contract as an undisclosed principal, because to make him so, it would be necessary to say that he is a member of the association to which he is wholly undisclosed and unknown. I do not think that he is a party to the contract as an undisclosed principal, although he may be a cestui que trust in respect of the proceeds the member may receive. Not being a party, he cannot sue or be sued on the contract. For these reasons I do not think this action will lie against the defendant as an undisclosed principal.

FRY, L.J.—In this case the plaintiffs are a company limited by guarantee formed for the purposes of mutual assurance. One Charles Tully became a member of this society in respect of a steam-vessel, the Marquis Sciclwna, of which the defendant was a part owner, and Tully also took out a policy on the ship. Tully has become bankrupt, and the association sues the defendant as an undisclosed principal on the contract of assurance; and the question in the case, as it presents itself to my mind, is whether by reason of the nature of the contract in this case the ordinary right of a contracting party to sue the undisclosed principal of the other party has or has not been repelled. Other questions were raised in the course of the discussion. It was argued that Tully was not authorised by the defendant to insure the ship in question in an association like the plaintiffs'; but, looking at the circular on the faith of which the defendant took shares in the ship in question and at the prevalence of insurance in mutual clubs, especially in the northern ports, I am of opinion that the defendant cannot successfully deny the authority of Tully to enter this ship in the plaintiffs' association. Another question was raised as to whether a certain Mr. Ormond signed an undertaking to the plaintiffs with the authority or subsequent ratification of the defendant. But this question was left to the jury, on which they found for the defendant. I see no sufficient reason to disturb their finding. The main question in the cause therefore appears to me to turn on the nature of the contract between Tully and the plaintiffs' association. This contract is to be found in three instruments, namely, the memorandum of association, the articles of association, and the policy of assurance issued by the plaintiffs to Tully in respect of the ship in question. The memorandum and articles of association of course constitute an agreement inter socios, and inter socios only, and they cannot of themselves give rights or create obligations to or in anyone except the members of the association, or those who, like legal personal representatives or trustees in bankruptcy, take their rights and assume their burdens. The memorandum and articles of association when examined appear to me to correspond with what might be expected from their general character and object. The 4th article makes every person who on behalf of himself or any other person insures or enters for protection any ship or share of a ship in the association a member during the period of the insurance. The 44th article defines the manner in which funds are to be raised for making any payment necessary or proper to be made by the association for expenses connected with the business thereof or otherwise (words which I conceive include all claims on policies), and it gives the committee the power to direct that contributions shall be paid to the association by the members thereof rateably. The 45th and 46th articles throughout treat the contributions as payments by members. It is true that in article 41 the expressions "or other person" and "or other persons" follow the words "member or members;" but these words are, I think, used as equivalent to executors, administrators, or assigns. It appears to me clear beyond argument that on the mere memorandum and articles of association the defendant could not be affected with liability. The object of such instruments is to regulate the rights of members, and decisions have long since shown that the fact that a share is held by a member in trust for a third person neither exonerates the member from liability, nor creates any liability in the cestui que trust to the company. The statute which avoids all contracts of assurance not embodied in a policy of insurance made it impossible for the whole of the relations between a member and the association (though those relations were strictly mutual) to be embodied in the memorandum and articles of association, and made it necessary for the association to issue a policy in respect of every ship insured by a member; and this policy of insurance I now proceed to consider. The policy, which is under the common seal of the association, recites that Tully having become a member of the association, and having entered for insurance in class No. 1 the steamship in question had become entitled to the policy. The considerations stated are the premises, i.e., the membership of Tully and the observance by the insured of the rules and regulations of the class. Now what was that consideration? It was that Tully would pay his contributions towards claims against the association under article 44—a consideration which extends to Tully and parties thereto or rendered liable in respect thereof as undisclosed principals or otherwise. The defendants were not members of the plaintiff association.

3. The said defendants do not admit that any portion of the contributions referred to in the particulars in the statement of claim, or of the interest in respect thereof, has in fact become due to the plaintiffs under the said insurances or policies. They deny that by the terms thereof or otherwise the same has become due and payable by them to the plaintiffs, or that they are liable to pay the same in lieu of premiums or otherwise.

The case was tried at the Newcastle Assizes, by Mathew, J., without a jury, when the following facts were proved:—

The plaintiffs were an association for the purposes of mutual marine insurance of iron steamships. One William Johnson was part owner and manager of the steamship Howick. He became a member of the plaintiffs' association in respect of the Howick, of which the defendants were part owners, and took out a his representatives, but does not move from Nevill as an undisclosed principal or as a cestui que trust of Tully. Again, if the defendant is to be liable at all for the default of Tully to pay his contributions as a member of the company, I incline to hold that he must be liable on a guarantee to answer the default of Tully. But there is in the present case no guarantee signed by the defendant which would satisfy the Statute of Frauds. The obligation undertaken by the association with Tully according to the policy is this, that the members of the association having ships entered in the said class shall, according to the provisions of the articles of association and the rules of the said class, and subject to the proviso thereinafter contained, pay and make good the losses insured against. Here again we have the policy referring to the articles of association as the measure of liability, and, so far as mere expression goes, we therefore find a liability recognised as limited to members. The proviso incorporated in the operative part of the policy is in these words: "Provided always, that in accordance with the articles of association of the said association and the rules of the said class, this policy and the other policies of the association and class are granted on this condition, and it is hereby specially agreed, that the association under all their policies of insurance of the said class shall be liable in the whole only to the extent of so much of the funds as the said association is able to recover from the members of the said class, and their respective heirs, executors, and administrators, liable for the same, and which under and by virtue of the articles of association and of the rules of the said class are for the time being applicable for the purpose of paying claims under this and other policies issued in respect of the said class." Now here we have again words of reference to the articles of association as if they were the measure of liability; but furthermore, we have words declaring that the association shall be liable only to the extent of so much of the funds as the association is able to recover from the members of the said class, and their respective heirs, executors, and administrators, liable for the same. It was argued that these words are intended only to preclude liability of members of one class for losses in another, and all liability in respect of sums payable by members, but which the association could not recover by reason of the insolvency of the members or otherwise. But the words taken in their natural signification negative all liability except that stated. So taken the words appear to me to exclude liability for sums payable, but not capable of recovery by anyone except a member, and for sums payable by members of any class except the class insured in. I can see no reason for not giving the words of the proviso their full significance. The rules relative to class 1 are indorsed on the policy, and are by reference incorporated in it. They throughout refer to the liabilities and rights as those of members. But what is perhaps more important is, that the 31st rule provides that a member shall be uninsured in respect of any ship, or his share therein, in various contingencies, amongst others, if his ship or share be mortgaged or assigned at or after entry, or he becomes bankrupt, or unless in each of these cases before a claim accrues an approved undertaking registered by the manager has been given to pay all contributions due or to become due. Now the very object of this rule appears to me to be to enable the managers in the case of an undisclosed principal to drive that person into a direct obligation to the company, an obligation which would be needless if the general rule of law applied to this policy. The conclusion to which this examination of the documents brings me is this: that the primary object of the members of the association was mutual assurance, i.e., an assurance of the property of or represented by the members with the members and with no one else; that the memorandum and articles of association carry this intention into effect; that the policy was needful under the statute to give effect to this mutual assurance, but was not intended to create any liability beyond that of the members; but that on the contrary the tenor of the policy and rules show an intention to confine the liability on the policy to the liability under the articles; and that the proviso in express language excludes any liability of the association for moneys recovered from anyone but members, which would be absurd and insensible if they had the right to sue persons who were not members but undisclosed principals. I therefore conclude that the ordinary principle of law which makes such principals liable was negatived, and that this appeal fails.

LOPES, J.—I have come to the conclusion that the defendant cannot be sued in this action, on short and simple grounds. The plaintiffs sue the defendant for contributions as an undisclosed principal, and also on a guarantee alleged to have been given with the authority or subsequent ratification of the defendant. On the guarantee the jury found against the plaintiffs, and I can see no reason why the verdict should be set aside. The material question is, whether the ordinary rule of law by which an undisclosed principal can be sued by a contracting party applies in the special circumstances of this case. This depends on the construction of the memorandum and articles of association, and the policy issued to Tully. If there is nothing in these documents which contain the contract negativing its application, then the ordinary rule of law attaches, and the plaintiffs can sue the defendant as an undisclosed principal and recover the contributions owing to them. The defendant, in answer to this portion of the plaintiffs' case, says that he was not a member of the association, and not being a member he was not responsible for the contributions sued for, and that by virtue of the rules of the plaintiffs' association and the contract made between Tully and the plaintiffs' association, the plaintiffs can only look to Tully for the contributions now owing. The facts have been stated, and I need not again refer to them. The memorandum and articles of association contemplate and provide for no rights and liabilities outside those of the members, and those upon whom the law in case of death or bankruptcy casts responsibility. Membership and mutuality are the essence and vitality of the concern. The defendant is not a member, and cannot be affected with liability by anything in the memorandum and articles of association which concerns members only. But is there anything in the policy creating a liability in the defendant to be sued as an undisclosed principal? I can find nothing extending the liability beyond the liability of members contemplated by the memorandum and articles of association. The proviso in the policy clearly points to the same liability as that created by the memorandum and articles of association, and the 31st rule would be unnecessary if an undisclosed principal could be sued. I believe the main reason why the 31st rule was incorporated into the policy was because the undisclosed principal could not be sued, and because, except for the rule in the circumstances contemplated by the rule, there would be nobody who would be liable to the company. I am of opinion that the contract contained in the memorandum and articles of association and policy negatives the ordinary rule of law, and that the defendant is not liable.

policy on the ship under the rules of the association. Johnson having become bankrupt, and being unable to pay the contributions due to the company in respect of the Howick, the present action was instituted.

The plaintiffs' memorandum of association stated that the company was established for the "mutual insurance of iron steamships insured with the company by members of the company."

The 2nd article of association provided that,

Every person shall be deemed to have agreed to become and to be a member of the company, who in his own name, or in his name as agent, insures any ship in pursuance of the regulations of the company.

The 36th article provided that,

The funds required for the payment of claims shall be raised by contributions from all the members in the proportions which the sums insured by them respectively bear to the amount of all the sums insured by the company at the respective times of the losses giving rise to the claims, provided that the member who insures a ship which is lost shall contribute not less than 4 per cent. on any one policy on the sum insured by him thereon, exclusive of his contributions in respect of other sums insured by him on other ships.

The 48th article provided that,

If a member shall . . . become bankrupt, file a petition for the liquidation of his affairs, compound with his creditors, or stop payment . . . the insurances effected by him shall expire at noon on the sixth day after the date of any such event as aforesaid, unless the legal representative . . . or other persons to be approved by the directors shall guarantee the payment of all contributions which are or may become due to the company in respect of the insurances, and the directors in their discretion shall accept such guarantee.

The 18th article provided that,

Every contract of insurance shall be by a policy in such form as the directors shall from time to time determine, provided that all policies existing at any one time shall be to the same effect, except that the hull and machinery may be valued in any policy either together or separately as the owner may require.

The policy made in respect of the steamship Howick began with the following words:

Be it known that William Johnson (hereinafter called the said person or persons effecting this insurance) as well in his or their own name or names as for and in the name and names of all and every other person or persons to whom the same doth, may, or shall appertain, in part or in all, subject to the provisions hereinafter contained, doth make assurance, and cause himself, or themselves, and them and every of them, to be insured.

There was also a clause providing as follows:

And it is mutually agreed between the assured and the company that, without prejudice to the rights and remedies of the company against the said person or persons effecting this insurance, as a member or members of the company in respect of this insurance, the assured shall pay to the company in lieu of premiums all the sums and contributions which the company are entitled to call upon the said person or persons effecting this insurance, as a member or members of the company, to pay to the company in respect of this insurance according to the articles of association of the company, and that the provisions contained in the said articles of association shall be deemed and considered part of this policy, and shall, so far as regards this insurance, be as binding upon the assured as upon the said person or persons effecting this insurance.

Cur. adv. vult.

July 22.—MATHEW, J.—This action was brought by the plaintiffs, a mutual insurance association, incorporated under the Joint Stock Companies Act, against the defendants, who are the owners of a ship insured with the association, to recover certain contributions; in other words, to recover the premiums payable by the defendants in respect of the insurance of a ship effected with the plaintiff company. Now, it was quite clear, and indeed was not seriously disputed, that the ship had been insured through a Mr. Johnson, an agent, on behalf of the owners, with the plaintiffs, and insured upon the principle of mutual insurance, whereby those that were insured became liable to contribute to any losses that might be sustained by other members of the association. It was said that the defendants as owners of the ship had had the benefit of the insurance, and had their ship protected. It was assumed for the purposes of this part of the case that they had been paid the amount of the premiums, and it was said that in fairness and in justice they were bound to hand over to the plaintiffs the amount of the contributions that some of them it was admitted were liable to pay. On the other hand, it was said that there was a technical answer to the plaintiffs' claim. It was said that Johnson, the person through whom the insurance had been effected, was the person liable, and that the plaintiffs had contracted themselves out of the right to have recourse to anybody but Johnson, and reliance was placed upon recent decisions, particularly the decision in The United Kingdom Steamship Association v. Neville (19 Q. B. Div. 110).

Now, for the purpose of this insurance, Lloyd's policy in the old form has been made the basis of the contract, and before dealing with that form of contract in connection with this mutual insurance undertaking, it may be desirable to say a word as to the meaning of Lloyd's policy. If attention had been paid to that, I think we should have been spared a considerable amount of discussion with reference to the meaning of this policy—the policy issued by this mutual insurance association. In the ordinary form of Lloyd's policy, the policy is effected through a broker; but the contract is not with that broker, the contract is with the persons interested in the ship. In order that the policy should be effected, and in order that the underwriter should be made liable upon it, the broker must be proved to have been acting for a principal interested in the subject-matter of the insurance, and to have made the contract on his behalf. Without the authority to him to effect the policy on the principal's behalf, the policy is a nullity. It is a wager policy only. The necessary consequence and the essential character of a policy of insurance is that it is a contract of inedmnity, and if an agent, or the nominal person whose name was used for the purpose of the contract with the underwriters, were to insert in a policy that he should be deemed to have an interest, or that the policy should be the proof of interest, it is only necessary to refer to the statutes, which condemn that and make such a course of proceeding impossible. It is absolutely necessary to the contract of insurance in the ordinary form that it should be made with persons interested in the subject-matter of insurance. Now, mutual insurance is the simplest thing in the world if you have not to record it in written documents. It is the most laudable and the most excellent way of effecting insurance, and is a system by which everybody insured is at once underwriter and assured—i.e., entitled to recover for his losses against those associated with him, and they are entitled to contribution from him for any loss sustained by any one of them. This very simple principle was acted on very successfully for many years until technical difficulties began to be interposed. The first technical difficulty was this: all mutual insurance associations were ordered to be incorporated as joint stock companies. That was technicality number one. Technicality number two was that under statutes framed for different purposes which were positive in their terms, every contract of insurance had to be a written document; in other words, there must be a policy of insurance. Those two conditions having to be complied with, the mutual insurance associations set themselves to work, by various rules, to endeavour to reconcile those strict rules of law with the conduct of their business, and different rules have been adopted and have been framed to meet the decisions on the subject. Now, in Neville's case the court had before it a series of rules framed to enable the association conveniently to carry out the purposes for which it was constituted—the purpose of effecting the mutual insurance of the different members. The principle adopted was this: It was arranged that the agent was to be taken to be the person insured for all purposes, and the insurance association were to look to him for contributions, which contributions he of course was to collect from the owners of the ship he represented; but, on the other hand, he was to sue or make a claim on behalf of all the owners for whom he was acting. That was a very simple and a very excellent way of carrying out the purposes of the undertaking until there happened what people do not ordinarily anticipate, viz., the insolvency of somebody connected with the transaction. That happened in Neville's action (ubi sup.), where a person named Tully, the managing owner of the ship there in question, stopped payment. At the time he stopped payment he was largely indebted to the association in respect of the insurance of different ships, and particularly of the ship in question. The amount of the contributions in respect of that ship had never been paid by the owners of the ship. Naturally enough the insurance association, failing to recover the amount of these payments from Tully, through whose hands it was expected the payments would come, sued the principals, the persons who were bound to place Tully in funds to enable the payments to be made, and they were met with the usual technical difficulties. It was said that the scheme of the association and its rules which were incorporated with the policy came to this: that the understanding of everybody was that the association was to look to Tully alone, and not to look to Tully's principals. They were described in the case as undisclosed principals—a description which I should hesitate to adopt as strictly correct, because a man may be a principal and a disclosed principal although his name is not mentioned—but the owners of the ship were sued by the association upon the footing that they were the persons assured in the association, and therefore bound to pay the premiums. The objection was made that if you look at the terms of the policy and of the articles of association, it will appear that the plaintiffs had contracted themselves out of the right to go beyond Tully, and that they had no right to sue the defendants.

Now, I entirely concur in the reasoning of Fry, L.J. in that case, with this observation: it appears to me that the conclusion arrived at did not only depend upon the terms of the contract between the association and Tully, but upon the fact that the assured were parties to that arrangement. The owners of the ship took the benefit of the contract upon the footing that they were not to be looked to, but that their agent was, for the payment of the amount of contributions. That such an arrangement is not unknown to the law of insurance is clear when we refer to what occurs under Lloyd's policies with reference to premiums. Under the ordinary policy the underwriter looks for his premiums to the broker, and not to the assured. That result is brought about in two ways: first, by the insertion in the policy of a receipt for the premiums; and, secondly, by the course of business, which treats the broker as the person liable to the underwriter, and not the principal. If all that arrangement were expanded and set forth in the policy, and if it were part of the contract of insurance in respect of the premiums that the underwriter should look to the broker and not to the principal, it is quite clear that that would be operative. That is practically what was done in Neville's case. The contract there was that the insurance contributions—the premiums—should be paid by Tully, and not be paid by the assured. If I am right in the interpretation which I put on the decision in Neville's case, it is only necessary to contrast this case with that in order to see how completely they differ from each other. I do not go through the different clauses in the articles of association in Neville's case, and merely say that I entirely concur in the view taken by Fry and Lopes, L.JJ., and, as I understand, also taken by the Master of the Rolls, that the result of the stipulations there was that the plaintiffs had contracted themselves out of the right to look to the principal. As if in anticipation of those difficulties, we find a clause in this policy of insurance upon which the plaintiffs rely. That clause is in the following terms: "It is mutually agreed between the assured and the company"—there is no question that "the assured" are the persons interested, the persons for whose benefit the insurance is made, that is the ordinary meaning of the term "assured" in insurance law, and there is no reason for rejecting it, as far as I can see, in interpreting this policy—"it is mutually agreed between the assured and the company that without prejudice to the rights and remedies of the company against the said person or persons effecting this insurance" (that is, against Johnson) "as a member or members of the company in respect of this insurance, the assured" (that is, the party interested) "shall pay to the company in lieu of premiums all the sums and contributions which the company are entitled to call upon the said person or persons effecting this insurance as a member or members of the company to pay to the company in respect of this insurance according to the articles of association of the company, and that the provisions contained in the said articles of association shall be deemed and considered part of this policy, and shall, so far as regards this insurance, be as binding upon the assured as upon the said person or persons effecting this insurance." Mr. Walton and Mr. Boyd did their best to struggle against the plain language of that clause, but it seems to me to be as clear as the light. The company, not content with the liability of the agent, as was the case in Neville's case, stipulate that they shall be entitled to look to the principal; in other words, they emphatically contract that the principal shall be liable to them as well as the agent. It is clear that that contract is binding on the assured, not from their being parties who sign the contract, or put their seal to it, but as being the persons to whom the policy is issued, and who are to have the benefit of it.

The first observation made by the learned counsel about this clause was that it was insensible and absurd, and that it had been inserted by some ignorant person who did not know what he was doing, and that there was a confusion as to the meaning of the words "assured" and "the persons effecting this insurance." I feel quite unable, notwithstanding the ability with which that view was presented, to adopt that conclusion. The clause was framed by a man who knew what he was about, and it appears to me that anyone who reads it will quite readily follow the object the person had in inserting this clause in the policy. The main object is to do that which is perfectly right, perfectly equitable, and perfectly fair, viz., to secure that the persons having the benefit of the contract should meet the liabilities, and that the company should not be compelled to have recourse to an agent, who may stop payment, who may abscond, who may die, or who may not choose to assist them. The next point made was that the clause was ultra vires. On this it appears to me it would be very desirable if counsel would refer to the essential character of the contract of insurance. It was said to be ultra vires because the scheme of this association was that the only persons with whom the association should deal were agents, and not principals. The principals, of course, were named, but when no principal was named, the agent might be either managing owner, with no interest in the ship, or ship's husband. It was said that for all purposes the contract is to be assumed to be a contract between the company and the agent and nobody else. That was insisting on what was impossible according to the rules of commercial and insurance law. The parties to the contract of insurance, whether it be mutual insurance or a contract effected at Lloyd's, are the persons interested on the one hand, and the persons underwriting it on the other. If you assume the object of the association to be to insure ships and to protect their owners, how is it possible to say it is ultra vires to stipulate that the owners shall be liable for the premiums on the ships insured with the association? The argument is an impossible one, and as soon as the true character of the insurance came to be considered, it was clear that it could not be adopted. The contract alone with Johnson, assuming him only to be managing owner, unless he was authorised to represent the owners, would be null and not binding on him. It would be a wagering policy, a policy with no interest, and a policy under which nobody could recover. The object of the insurance is not to protect the agent, or to make contracts with agents who choose to insure particular ships calling themselves agents, but to insure the shipowners. If you once arrive at that as the clear meaning of the parties, what can be more within the powers of the association, more equitable, or more clearly right, than that the association should stipulate that it should have a right to look to the real persons protected by the insurance, and not to an agent in the event of that agent's insolvency? In that view of the matter it appears to me that on that point the construction of the policy must be against the defendants. Sundry subordinate points were then raised.

In the first place, it was suggested that Johnson was only entitled to pledge the credit of each owner for his own share. There was evidence on this point, but the result of it was that Johnson was in the ordinary way acting on behalf of all the owners of the ship, and all the owners were therefore as liable for the premiums of insurance as they would be for necessaries. There was no indication of an intention that each owner in respect of his own share only instructed Johnson to effect the insurance. Then a further point was raised. It was said that there was a clause in the articles of association which affected the extent of the defendant's liability under the circumstances that had occurred, viz., a clause providing for the cesser of the insurance on the bankruptcy of the member, and as Johnson was clearly a member within the meaning of the rule, it was said that his bankruptcy exonerated the other owners in respect of his shares, which I think were twenty-three sixty-fourths. It appeared from Johnson's evidence that he had been a mortgagor of the ship from the very first, and when his mortgage came to be registered—by the time it came to the knowledge of the directors of this company, if they thought proper to exercise the power conferred by the articles against him, they had not done so—he said then there was a hope that everything would come right, and he continued to be insured, and he has been sued for the premiums and judgment recovered against him. I therefore see no ground for suggesting that any benefit could arise to his co-owners because of the existence of that rule in the articles of association. Then Mr. Boyd took this point: He said that, when the account comes to be taken, there may be an equity in favour of some of his clients. It may turn out that some or all of them have accounted to Johnson for the amount of their premiums, and therefore have an equity to decline to pay under the terms of the policy the present plaintiffs. Well, Mr. Gainsford Bruce had sufficient confidence in the position of his clients to agree that, if any such point should arise in taking the account, it should be dealt with hereafter. As at present advised, I think it extremely improbable that any such point will arise, and, if it does, it will be available for the defendants, because the terms of this policy seem to me to be so clear and strong. At the moment, I direct judgment for the plaintiff, with costs, for an amount to be settled by a person to be named by the parties in accordance with the agreement come to, or by me in the event of a difference. The point suggested by Mr. Boyd is reserved, and also the costs, and I give either party liberty to apply generally.

ON APPEAL FROM THE SUPREME COURT OF NOVA SCOTIA.

Marine insurance—Barratry—Total loss—Salvage—Sale under decree of Court of Admiralty.

To constitute a total loss within the meaning of a policy of marine insurance it is not necessary that a ship should be actually annihilated. If it is lost to the owner by an adverse valid and legal transfer of his right of property and possession to a purchaser by a sale under a decree of a court of competent jurisdiction in consequence of a peril insured against, it is as much a total loss as if it had been annihilated. In such a case no distinction can be drawn between a sale upon capture and a sale under the decree of a Court of Admiralty for the expenses of salvage services.

Judgment of the court below reversed.

A ship and her freight having been insured (inter alia) against barratry of the master was wrongfully abandoned by him. Salvors took possession of her, and having towed her into port instituted salvage proceedings against her. These proceedings were known to the owners, but they did not appear. The ship and cargo were sold by decree of the Court of Admiralty, and realised less than the salvage award. In an action on the policies:

Held, that the assured were entitled to recover, as the sale under the decree of the Admiralty Court constituted an actual total loss, and no notice of abandonment was necessary.

THESE were consolidated appeals from two judgments of the Supreme Court of Nova Scotia in actions upon policies of marine insurance, in which the appellant was plaintiff and the respondents were defendants.

The actions were tried before Macdonald, C.J. without a jury, and he gave judgment for the plaintiff in both actions, but his judgments were reversed by a majority of the judges of the full court.

The facts are fully set out in the judgment of their Lordships, in which also the arguments and authorities sufficiently appear.

Nov. 15.—The judgment of their Lordships was delivered by

Sir BARNES PEACOCK.—These are consolidated appeals from two judgments of the Supreme Court of Nova Scotia in actions in which the appellant was the plaintiff. The action against West was upon a time policy of insurance of the Ocean Marine Assurance Association, dated the 28th Nov. 1881, for $4000, upon the barque L. E. Cann, a British ship valued at $10,000, from the 28th of Nov. 1881 to the 28th Nov. 1882. The perils insured against were, amongst others, perils of the seas, barratry of the master (unless in case of loss on goods or specie when the master is the consignee or supercargo thereof), and of mariners, and all other perils, losses, or misfortunes that should come to the hurt, detriment, or damage of the said vessel, or any part thereof, subject to the conditions and provisions contained in or referred to by clauses in the policy, none of which affect the present case. It was stipulated that no particular average or partial loss, unless in case of general average, was to be paid unless the same should amount to 5 per cent., &c. The policy was underwritten for $100 by West, the defendant in the suit, who was a member of the Ocean Marine Assurance Association, and is the respondent in the first appeal. The policy on freight was effected by the plaintiff (appellant) on the 31st Jan. 1882, and was for $3000 on freight at and from Mexico to New York upon all kinds of lawful goods and merchandise laden or to be laden on board the said barque L. E. Cann. The policy contained the following words, "The said goods and merchandise hereby insured are valued at $6000." Their Lordships understand this policy to be a policy on freight of goods laden or to be laden valued at $6000. The perils insured against, so far as this case is concerned, may be treated as substantially the same as those in the other policy. The policy was effected with the British America Assurance Company, the defendants in the second action and the respondents in the second appeal. In the policy on the barque it was provided that all losses and damage which should happen to the vessel should be paid within sixty days after proof made and exhibited of such at the office of the association. In the policy on freight it was stipulated that all losses and damages which should happen should be adjusted in accordance with English practice and usage at Lloyd's, and should be paid within sixty days after proof of loss and adjustment, and proof of interest in the said freight. Each of the policies was effected in the name of the plaintiff, and was stated to be on behalf of whom it may concern; and in the policy on freight it was added, "In case of loss to be paid to him," i.e., to the plaintiff. In neither policy was there any exemption of liability on the part of the insurers on account of charges, if any, which might be incurred for salvage. A charter-party, dated the 6th Jan. 1882, expressed to be made between Brooks, master of the British barque L. E. Cann, then lying in the harbour of Vera Cruz, of the first part, and Mr. Antonio Granes of the second part, was put in evidence in the second action. By that charter-party the said master agreed to the freighting and chartering of the whole of the said vessel, with the exception of the cabin and necessary room for the crew, and storage for provisions, sails, and cables, unto Granes for the voyage from Vera Cruz and Tucolota to New York, and it was agreed that the vessel should load at Vera Cruz one part of the cargo, and after signing bills of lading should proceed to Tucolota for loading the balance of the cargo, and thence to New York. Granes engaged to furnish a cargo of assorted produce, the charterer to have the privilege of loading cargo for other parties, and captain to sign bills of lading for same without prejudice to the charter, and Granes was to pay for the use of the vessel during the voyage the lump sum of $6000 payable at New York in the United States currency or gold, to advance sufficient money to the master at current rate on New York for ship's ordinary disbursements, that amount to be insured by charterer's agents at owner's risk, and to be deducted from the freight with insurance and 5 per cent. commission. The plaintiff claimed for a total loss in each case.

The pleas set up several defences. The most material of them were, that there was not a total loss; that no proof, or no sufficient proof, of the loss was made before action brought; that there was concealment of material facts as to the condition of the vessel; and that the respondent was induced to subscribe the policy by the fraud of the appellant. In the action on the policy there was also a denial of interest as alleged. The following facts appeared in the evidence: In Nov. 1881 the L. E. Cann was at Vera Cruz. Her captain was W. W. Brooks, who had commanded her since 1879 or 1880, and who had acquired a one-sixteenth share in her from the appellant, the bill of sale being made to Ephraim Brooks, an uncle of W. W. Brooks. The interest of W. W. Brooks in the L. E. Cann was always kept insured by him, and in Feb. 1882 he wrote to his agents desiring that his interest in freight should also be insured for $500. This was, however, not done, because the insurance on freight was ordered early in 1882 by the appellant for Brooks' interest as well as his own. At Vera Cruz W. W. Brooks, as he himself gave evidence at the trial, made an arrangement with a Spaniard named Campos, who transacted the business of the vessel, that Campos should ship a bogus or sham cargo, and that Brooks should make away with the vessel. Accordingly a cargo was shipped worth only 40 per cent. of that represented by the bills of lading, and a draft for $1709 40 was given by a man named Villa, with Campos' knowledge, to Edmund Miller, Brooks' father-in-law, for him, the arrangement being that Brooks was to receive $2000 at Vera Cruz on signing bills of lading, $2000 on signing bills of lading at Tucolota in Mexico, and $2000 more when the protest was presented. Granes was a party to these proceedings, and went with the L. E. Cann to Tucolota, which place the L. E. Cann reached from Vera Cruz in January, and at Tucolota gave Brooks a further draft for $2000 in favour of Edmund Miller, and put on board further cargo of much less value than appeared on the bills of lading. On the 30th March 1882 the L. E. Cann left Tucolota, and on the 27th April 1882, in the Gulf Stream, Brooks having previously signalled a passing schooner, the George W. Lockner, went on board of her with all his crew, deserting the L. E. Cann, and proceeded in the George W. Lockner to Philadelphia, where they arrived on the 4th May. The L. E. Cann was, when deserted by her crew, rapidly filling with water. There can be no doubt that this was mainly caused by about fifteen auger holes having been bored in her on both sides, and the ceiling cut away over the auger holes. The L. E. Cann did not, however, sink, and on the 24th May she was found by the Resolute, belonging to the Baker's Salvage Company, and was, with the help of the North America, a vessel belonging to the Insurance Company of North America, towed to Lynnhaven Bay. The Baker Salvage Company afterwards took her to the Port of Norfolk. On examination of the vessel there, the auger holes and the cutting away of the ceiling above mentioned was discovered. In Aug. 1882 the vessel was hauled up on the ways at Grave's ship yard at Norfolk. She was then (subject to the damage she had sustained in several respects from the storms) found to be sound. A suit for salvage was brought by the Baker's Salvage Company in the District Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Virginia (the Insurance Company of North America having waived their claim for salvage), and under orders of the court in July and Aug. 1882 the L. E. Cann and cargo were sold, producing $3183 net, and the said proceeds were paid to the Baker's Salvage Company, it being stated in the later order that it appeared to the court that the actual cost of the salvage service amounted to at least $5000. The vessel was subsequently repaired and put into good condition. The actions were both tried before the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court, who gave a verdict for the plaintiff, without stating any reasons. In Cossman v. West he said: "I think the plaintiff has made out a case entitling him to judgment. I find there is a total loss by the perils insured against under the policy, and assess the damages at $100, with interest $14; total $114, for which judgment will be entered;" and judgment was entered accordingly. In the action on the policy on freight, the Chief Justice said: "The plaintiff has made out a case entitling him to recover for a total loss of freight under the policy declared upon. I find a judgment therefore for the plaintiff, and assess damages at $3000, with interest $295; total $3295, for which judgment will be entered." Judgment was entered accordingly. It should be mentioned that the plaintiff was wholly exonerated from any participation in, or knowledge of the disgraceful fraud on the part of Brooks, the master. Indeed, the Chief Justice stated that the villainous conduct of the master could not affect the owner, who is admittedly innocent of any collusion with his rascality. A motion was made to the full court to set aside the verdicts and judgments. After argument, the learned judges were divided in opinion, the majority holding that, as no notice of abandonment had been given, there was only a partial loss, and in each case the finding and judgment of the Chief Justice was set aside and reversed, and judgment entered for the defendants with costs, including the costs of the trial and the costs of the appeal. The Chief Justice adhered to his original opinion, and held that there was an actual total loss both of the ship and of the freight. The present appeals have been preferred against the decrees founded upon the judgments of the majority of the judges.

The principal questions in each case are whether there was an actual total loss, and whether sufficient preliminary proof of loss was given. There seems to be no doubt that, after the abandonment of the barque by the master and crew, and when the owner first received notice thereof, the vessel was in such a hopeless condition that the risk and expenses of endeavouring to save her were such that no prudent uninsured owner would have incurred them. There was, consequently, a constructive total loss, and the plaintiff might, when he first received notice of the loss, or within a reasonable time afterwards, have given notice of abandonment to the underwriters, in which case he could have recovered for a total loss. It was admitted that no formal notice of abandonment was given, and it is unnecessary, in the view which their Lordships take, to determine whether what took place between the owner and the underwriters substantially amounted to such a notice. Their Lordships are of opinion that after the sale under the decree of the Court of Admiralty there was an actual total loss. By that sale, the property in the vessel and cargo was transferred to the purchaser, and the vessel and cargo ceased to be the property of and were wholly lost to the original owners thereof.

To constitute a total loss within the meaning of a policy of marine insurance, it is not necessary that a ship should be actually annihilated or destroyed; it may, as in the case of capture and sale upon condemnation, remain in its original state and condition; it may be capable of being repaired if damaged; it may be actually repaired by the purchaser, or it may not even require repairs. If it is lost to the owner by an adverse valid and legal transfer of his right of property and possession to a purchaser by a sale under a decree of a court of competent jurisdiction in consequence of a peril insured against, it is as much a total loss as if it had been totally annihilated: (Mullett v. Shedden, 13 East, 304.) In that case saltpetre, which had been insured, was seized in the course of the voyage, and condemned. It was thereupon taken out of the ship and sold under a decree of condemnation for the benefit of the captors. The sentence of condemnation was afterwards reversed on appeal, and the property ordered to be restored, or its value paid, for the use of the owner on payment of the expenses, on behalf of the captor and of His Majesty in the office of Admiralty in both courts. It was held that the assured might recover as for a total loss, without notice of abandonment. In the course of the argument Lord Ellenborough remarked, "The assured stands upon the actual destruction as to him of the thing insured, which precludes the necessity of any notice to abandon it;" and Bayley, J., "No circumstance has happened since the seizure to make the original detention less than a total loss." In delivering judgment Lord Ellenborough, C.J., said: "Then, as to the point of abandonment, if instead of the saltpetre having been taken out of the ship and sold, and the property devested, and the subject-matter lost to the owner, it had remained on board the ship, and been restored at last to the owner, I should have thought that there was much in the argument that in order to make it a total loss there should have been notice of abandonment, and that such notice should have been given sooner; but here the property itself was wholly lost to the owner, and therefore the necessity of any abandonment was altogether done away."

The case of Stringer v. The English and Scottish Marine Insurance Company Limited (L. Rep. 4 Q. B. 676; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 440) was referred to by the learned Chief Justice in the court below. In that case goods were insured on a voyage against, amongst other perils, "takings at sea, arrests, restraints, and detainment of all kings, &c." While on the voyage, the ship and cargo were seized by an American cruiser and taken to New Orleans, where a suit was instituted by the captors against the ship and cargo for the purpose of having them adjudged a lawful prize. The owners at that time elected to treat the seizure as a partial loss. On the 16th June 1864 the prize court gave judgment against the captors, and ordered restitution. On the 1st of July the captors appealed. On the 12th September the owners, who then for the first time knew that an appeal had been preferred, gave notice of abandonment, which the underwriters refused to accept. Subsequently, the owner informed the underwriters that the Prize Commissioner had offered to the court to sell the ship and cargo. The sale of the goods could have been prevented by depositing the full value of the goods, or giving bail for them in the Prize Court, estimated in paper currency; at this time the paper currency was at 150 to 180 per cent. discount, and subject to great and sudden fluctuations. The plaintiffs and defendants declined to take either of these steps, and on the 25th May 1865 the ship and cargo were sold by order of the court. It was held by the Court of Queen's Bench that the prolongation of the litigation by the captors appealing was not more than might have been reasonably anticipated when the ship and cargo were first libelled; that the appeal did not amount to such a change of facts as would justify the assured in changing their election; and that the assured could not, by their notice of abandonment, make the loss by the seizure and detention a total loss. But it was further held that the depositing of the full value of the goods in paper currency or the giving of bail for them were acts which a prudent uninsured owner would not have adopted to prevent a sale and that the sale, therefore, occasioned by the seizure, caused a total loss, for which the plaintiffs were entitled to recover. In delivering the judgment of the court, Blackburn, J. gave a clear and comprehensive view of the law. Speaking of the time when the cargo was detained under the seizure and the suit instituted in the Prize Court to have it condemned, he said, "It is clear that at this time the cargo was, by one of the perils insured against, entirely out of the control of the assured under circumstances which rendered it doubtful whether it would ever be restored, or if restored, at what period. Under such circumstances the assured had a right to elect whether he would retain the property in himself and treat the loss as a partial one or abandon it to the underwriters and claim for a total loss." Having then proceeded to discuss the question whether a notice of abandonment had been given in time, and held that it had not, he went on to say, "But we think the sale by the Prize Court stands on a very different footing. If the Prize Court in America had wrongfully condemned the goods and they had been sold under that sentence, the case would have been identical with that of Mullet v. Shedden, where the very point decided was that by the sale the property was wholly lost to the owner, and therefore that 'the necessity of any abandonment was altogether done away.'" Again he says, "But in the present case the sale was not under a condemnation, but because the assured did not give security to prevent the sale. The defendants (the underwriters) had the fullest notice of what was about to happen, and had ample opportunity to interfere and give security to prevent the sale; still the assured, if he by any means such as he could reasonably be expected to use could have prevented the sale, was bound to use them, and if the sale was directly occasioned by his default, though remotely by the seizure, he cannot recover against the underwriters on account of that sale. But the assured was not bound to use unreasonable exertions in order to preserve the thing insured, and if the giving of bail or deposit would have exposed them to expense, or risk of expense, beyond the value of the object, or, as the same idea is often expressed, if the steps necessary to prevent the sale were such as a prudent uninsured owner would not have adopted, we think they were not in default, and the sale was then a total loss occasioned by the seizure." Having then examined the evidence, his Lordship concluded: "We come, therefore, to the conclusion of fact that the assured could not, by any means which they could reasonably be called on to adopt, have prevented the sale by the American Prize Court, which at once put an end to all possibility of having the goods restored in specie, and consequently entitled the assured to come upon their insurers for a total loss. Even then the assured were not bound to do so. If they had thought it was more for their interest still to claim the proceeds of the sale in the hands of the American court as their money, and come upon the underwriters only for the partial loss, they might do so. It is clear as a matter of fact that they elected to come upon the insurers for an indemnity for a total loss, and that by so doing the insurers, when they have indemnified them, will be entitled to be subrogated for them and to get what they can out of the hands of the Americans for their own benefit." His Lordship then cited authorities in support of that right on the part of the insurers. The case was carried to the Exchequer Chamber by writ of error on a special case, and the judgment was affirmed (22 L. T. Rep. N. S. 802; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 440; L. Rep. 5 Q. B. 599). Kelly, C.B., in delivering his judgment, stated that, in his opinion, the Court of Queen's Bench were not only perfectly justified in coming to the conclusion, but that they could not have come to any other conclusion than that no prudent owner would have given the security necessary to prevent the sale. He then proceeded: "Such being the circumstances of the case, the decree for sale and the sale itself having taken place under circumstances in which there was no default on the part of the owner of the goods, we have to consider whether that sale justified the plaintiffs in treating the case as one of total loss. I am of opinion that the decree for the sale of the goods, and the sale of the goods under that decree, which for ever took out of the possession of the owner the goods themselves, and took away from him the power of ever repossessing himself of the goods in specie, entitled the plaintiff to treat the case as one of total loss. This loss of the goods arises, though not directly, out of the original capture (which was of itself, if so treated, a total loss), through a series of consequences, viz., the institution, the different steps, and the continuance of the suit until the decree was pronounced. The sale was, if I may use the expression, a completion of the total loss." Martin, B. observed: "When the sale took place, the property in the goods was taken out of the owner, so that it became impossible for him to take the goods under his original ownership to the port of discharge, and upon that taking place the goods I will not say were totally lost, because I have complained of that being an ambiguous expression, but were taken entirely out of the owner's dominion and control, and were absolutely taken away from him, and, in my judgment, after that event took place, the word 'abandonment,' in the sense in which I have used the word with regard to what took place anterior to this, does not apply at all. The consequence was that there was, in my judgment, a total deprivation of the ownership of the goods in the assured for the purpose of the adventure, and that he was, therefore, entitled to the whole value of his goods under the valued policy."

In Holdsworth v. Wise (7 B. & C. 794) and Parry v. Aberdein (9 B. & C. 411) there was an abandonment, and it was held that the subsequent recovery of the vessel did not convert that which had become a total loss by reason of a notice of abandonment into a partial loss. In Roux v. Salvador (3 Bing. N. C. 266) it was held by the Court of Exchequer Chamber that, where goods were so injured by the perils of the sea that they would have been destroyed by putrefaction before they could arrive at their destination, and were consequently sold, the assured was at liberty to treat the loss as a total loss, without giving notice of abandonment. In that case, which is a leading one, Lord Abinger, C.B., in a very lucid and learned judgment, pointed out the distinction between a total and a partial loss; gave a clear and exhaustive exposition of the law, and laid down the principles upon which the whole doctrine of abandonment in our law was founded, and the consequences resulting from it. He said: "It is indeed satisfactory to know that however the laws of foreign States may differ from each other, or from our own, they are all directed to the common object of making the contract of insurance a contract of indemnity, and nothing more. Upon that principle is founded the whole doctrine of abandonment. The underwriter engages that the object of the assurance shall arrive in safety at its destined termination. If in the progress of the voyage it becomes totally destroyed or annihilated, or if it be placed by reason of the perils against which he insures in such a position that it is wholly out of the power of the assured or of the underwriter to procure its arrival, he is bound by the letter of his contract to pay the sum insured." His Lordship then went on and pointed out intermediate cases, in which notice of abandonment would be necessary before the assured could treat the loss as a total one. Elsewhere in dealing with the case then before the court, his Lordship said: "In the case before us the jury have found that the hides were so far damaged by perils of the sea that they never could have arrived in the form of hides. By the process of putrefaction and fermentation which had commenced a total destruction of them before their arrival at the port of destination became as inevitable as if they had been consumed by fire. Their destruction not being consummated at the time they were taken out of the vessel, they became in that state a salvage for the benefit of the party who was to sustain the loss, and were accordingly sold; and the facts of the loss and the sale were made known at the same time to the assured. Neither he nor the underwriters could at that time exercise any control over them, or by any interference alter the consequences. It appears to us therefore that this was not the case of what has been called a constructive loss, but of an absolute total loss of the goods. They never could arrive, and at the same moment when the intelligence of the loss arrived all speculation was at an end." Again, on referring to Mellish v. Andrews (15 East, 13), he said: "In the language of Lord Ellenborough, it is an established and familiar rule of insurance that when the thing insured exists in specie and there is a chance of its recovery there must be an abandonment; a party is not in any case obliged to abandon, neither will the want of an abandonment oust him of his claim for that which is, in fact, an average or a total loss, as the case may be." Then, referring to Mullet v. Shedden (13 East, 304), he says: "In that case the sentence under which the sale was made had been reversed, and the proceeds directed to be paid to the owner. So that there was a substitution of money for a portion at least of the matter insured." Again, his Lordship proceeds: "Both these cases are direct authorities that no abandonment is necessary when there is a total loss of the subject-matter insured, to which may be added the cases of Green v. The Royal Exchange Assurance Company (6 Taunt. 68); Idle v. The Royal Exchange Assurance Company (8 Taunt. 755); Robertson v. Clarke (1 Bing. 445); and Cambridge v. Anderton (2 B. & C. 697). This last is on all-fours with the present, and is an express decision that when the subject-matter insured has, by a peril of the sea, lost its form and species, where a ship, for instance, has become a wreck or a mere congeries of planks, and has been bonâ fide sold in that state for a sum of money, the assured may recover for a total loss without any abandonment. In fact, when such a sale takes place, and in the opinion of a jury is justified by necessity and a due regard to the interests of all parties, it is made for the benefit of the party who is to sustain the loss, and if there be an insurance the net amount of the sale, after deducting the charges, becomes money had and received to the use of the underwriter, upon the payment by him of the total loss. It may be proper to remark, however, that the assured may preclude himself from recovering for a total loss if, by any view to his own interest, he voluntarily does or permits to be done any act whereby the interests of the underwriter may be prejudiced in the recovery of that money."

Nothing can be clearer than the doctrine thus enunciated. It has been always acted upon, and was followed in Farnworth v. Hyde (18 C. B. N. S. 835), and in many other cases. The last-mentioned case was overruled in the Exchequer Chamber (15 L. T. Rep. N. S. 395; 2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 429; L. Rep. 2 C. P. 204), but merely upon a question of fact. The principle of law was not impugned. On the question as to the necessity of notice of abandonment, the Court of Exchequer Chamber expressly stated that they left the authority of the decision of the court below untouched, neither confirmed nor weakened. It would be impossible to comment upon all the cases which were referred to in the course of the argument before their Lordships. Many of them were wholly inapplicable to the present case. For instance, Cory v. Burr (49 L. T. Rep. N. S. 78; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 109; 8 App. Cas. 393), in which, in consequence of the barratrous act of the master, the ship was seized, it was held that the seizure and not the act of smuggling was the cause of the damage, and that, as "seizure" was excepted from the perils insured against, the insurer could not recover against the underwriters. In that case the barratrous act of the master in taking the goods on board would not have caused any loss or damage if the vessel had not been seized, but as seizure was excepted from the perils, there was no loss by a peril insured against. If in the present case the policy had excepted all charges, if any, which may be incurred for salvage (an improbable exception, no doubt), the case would have had a bearing upon the present; but there was no such exception, and consequently no similarity between the two cases. The cases above referred to of Roux v. Salvador and Stringer v. The English and Scottish Insurance Company are decisive upon the present case, unless a valid distinction can be drawn between a sale upon capture and the sale under the decree of the Court of Admiralty for the expenses of salvage services.

Two cases were cited to show that there is such a distinction; Thornely v. Hebson (2 B. & Ald. 513) referred to by Thompson, J., in the court below, and De Mattos v. Saunders (27 L. T. Rep. N. S. 120; 1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 379; L. Rep. 7 C. P. 570). In Thornely v. Hebson it was held, under the particular facts of the case, that the sale of a ship under a decree of a foreign Admiralty Court for salvage did not constitute a total loss. In that case, however, it appeared that the value of the vessel, even under a forced sale, exceeded the amount of the claim of the salvors, and that the owners were near enough to have acted in the business, and that it was not proved that they had used all the means in their power to prevent the sale. It is to be inferred from what fell from the learned judges that if they had done so and were not in default in not preventing the sale they might have recovered for a total loss. Abbott, C.J., said, "If, in this case, it had appeared that the owners had used all the means in their power, and were unable to have paid this salvage, it would have been very different; but that is not so." So Bayley, J., "Where a ship is captured she is taken possession of by persons adversely to the owner, and so it is in the case of barratry; but here the ship was taken possession of by persons acting not adversely but for the joint benefit of the owners, and the latter were never dispossessed of the vessel." In that case it appears that the crew of the William were on board the Hyder Ali, from which the volunteer salvors were permitted to go on board the vessel which was saved by their exertions. The vessel, although the crew had left her, could not be treated as a "derelict" and out of the possession and control of the master, so long as he was keeping by her in the Hyder Ali. In another part of his judgment Bayley, J. says, "The sale (that is, the sale under the decree for salvage) in order to constitute a total loss, must have been found to have been necessary and wholly without the fault of the owners. Now, here a ship originally worth 1200*l.* is sold for 315*l.* only. It appears that the owners were near enough to have acted in the business at the time." Holroyd, J. also considered that the taking possession by the salvors was not adverse, but an act done for the benefit of the owners, and therefore did not dispossess them; that the custody of the vessel was in the salvors till the salvage was paid, but that the legal possession was still in the owners. His Lordship added, "I also think that the sale will not amount to a total loss if it was in the power of the owners to prevent it, and it lies upon them to show that they could not do so." In referring to this case in the case of Stringer v. The English and Scottish Marine Insurance Company (ubi sup.), Martin, B. says: "Holroyd, J. pointed out, as indeed did all the judges, that to hold that to be a total loss would be holding that which was really a partial loss to be a total loss, because the assured had not taken a step to prevent the sale which he ought to have taken." The present case differs materially from Thornely v. Hebson, for here the salvage greatly exceeded the value of the property saved, and no prudent uninsured owner would have paid the salvage in order to redeem the ship. Besides, the proceedings in the Admiralty Court were against the ship, which was within its jurisdiction, the plaintiff, the owner, was not, as in Thornely v. Hebson, near enough to have acted. He was in Nova Scotia, and the ship was at Norfolk, and the Admiralty Court in Virginia, and it did not even appear that he had notice of the proceedings in the Admiralty Court. He was not bound to follow his ship, in its then state in the hands of the salvors, wherever they might please to take it. Certainly the owner of the ship was not bound to redeem the cargo, which did not belong to him, in order that he might have a chance, a very remote one, that he might be able to send it to its destination by another vessel. Furthermore, the insurers, by their agents, were present at Norfolk; they had notice of all the proceedings, and the Ocean Assurance Company, the insurers of the ship, had informed the owner in their letter of the 8th June 1882, that they had sent their marine inspector to look into the matter and report, and they did not report before the sale of the ship. They might (as stated by Blackburn, J. in Stringer's case), if they had pleased, have redeemed the ship and cargo. For the reasons above advanced, it appears clear that the owner was not in default in not preventing the sale of the ship and cargo by giving bail, or paying the salvage expenses. In De Mattos v. Saunders (ubi sup.) it was held that a partial loss of cargo caused by perils of the sea was not converted into a total loss by a sale under a decree of a Court of Admiralty, in a suit instituted by salvors against the ship and cargo for the recovery of sums claimed for salvage services. The case was decided upon the ground that the acts and proceedings in the Admiralty Court were not, under the circumstances in that case, the natural consequence of a peril insured against. Willes, J., in delivering the judgment of the court, observed: "The contention that the loss, partial at the time it was incurred, was converted into a total loss by the acts of the salvors, and the seizure and sale under the orders of the Court of Admiralty must fail, because those acts and proceedings were not the natural and necessary consequence of a peril insured against. The assured is entitled to recover from the underwriters for a loss arising from sea damage and its proximate consequences; but it is not a proximate consequence of sea damage in general that there should be proceedings in a Court of Admiralty. A link is wanting. As well might it be said that a proceeding by salvors setting up a false claim would convert a partial into a total loss, which would be absurd. There was no natural connection between the sea damage here and the sale under the decree of the Court of Admiralty. The cases cited of hostile seizure and condemnation by a prize court have no application. In such a case, the original seizure is primâ facie a total loss; all that follows is only the necessary consequence of the seizure. It appears from the case that there was a considerable partial loss of the salt occasioned by perils of the sea. For the purposes of this cause we may call it either a total loss of part or a partial loss of the whole cargo; but whatever it is called it is not a loss within the policy so long as any substantial part of the salt remains, because of the memorandum whereby salt is warranted free from average, unless general, or the ship be stranded." But the present case goes further than a claim for salvage, where a ship has not been abandoned at sea. In this case the vessel had been abandoned by the master and the crew when she was discovered and taken possession of by the salvors.

Their Lordships are of opinion that this case is distinguished from that of De Mattos v. Saunders. The passage above quoted shows that at the time when the salvage service was commenced in that case, there was not any loss for which the insurers were liable under the terms of the policy. In that case also the vessel does not appear to have been abandoned by the master and crew, whereas in this case the vessel was a derelict. There can be no doubt that the barque was at that time, in the eye of the law, a "derelict," a term legally applied to a ship which is abandoned and deserted at sea by the master and crew without any intention on their part of returning to her. It is not like the case of a vessel which is left by her master and crew temporarily with the distinct intention of returning to it. In such a case the ship is not abandoned, and therefore is not derelict, though the master may have given up the entire management to the salvors. In the case of salvors there is a distinction between a derelict and a vessel which, though in great danger, has not been abandoned by the master and crew. In the case of a derelict, the salvors who first take possession have not only a maritime lien on the ship for salvage services, but they have the entire and absolute possession and control of the vessel, and no one can interfere with them except in the case of manifest incompetence; but in an ordinary case of disaster, when the master remains in command he retains the possession of the ship, and it his province to determine the amount of assistance that is necessary, and the first salvors have no right to prevent other persons from rendering assistance if the master wishes such aid. So unless a vessel is derelict the salvors have not the right as against the master to the exclusive possession of it, even though he should have left it temporarily, but they are bound on the master's returning and claiming charge of the vessel to give it up to him. In the present case, the vessel being a derelict, the salvors had the exclusive possession and control of it up to the time of the sale, and were not bound to give it up until they had been remunerated for the salvage services. Assuming that their possession constituted a constructive total loss, but not an absolute total loss, and that there was still a chance that the vessel might be redeemed and restored, the sale under the decree of the court removed, as Lord Abinger remarked in Roux v. Salvador (ubi sup.), all speculation upon that subject, and entitled the plaintiff to treat the case as one of total loss without abandonment. As to the freight, the sale of the cargo clearly constituted a total loss, for after the sale the assured and underwriters in his place lost the right to carry on the cargo. The salvage services, if not a peril insured against, were an immediate and necessary consequence of a peril insured against, whether of barratry or a peril of the sea; the immediate consequence was that the ship was rendered liable for the salvage expenses and the proceedings in the Admiralty Court, the immediate and necessary consequence of the damages remaining unpaid.

It was urged at the bar that there was no valid or legal charter-party or contract for freight in consequence of the fraudulent arrangement made by Brooks, the master of the vessel; but this contention cannot be supported. There were two contracts—one the charter-party of the 6th Jan. 1882, made by the master on the part of the owner of the vessel; the other, the fraudulent agreement on the part of the master on his own account to accept a bogus cargo, and to make away with the vessel. The latter did not vitiate the former, which might have been enforced if the master had refused or neglected to cause the loss of the ship. Their Lordships concur with the Chief Justice that the defendants cannot rely upon want of preliminary proof of loss. It was only the fact of the loss of which preliminary proof had to be given. The production of the master and mate could not be legally insisted upon by the insurers, and, in West's case, they asked for nothing more. In the suit upon the policy on freight there was, in addition to the facts relied upon by the Chief Justice, the declaration of the owner of the 14th Feb. 1883. In the fourth plea, and in the grounds of appeal in the action on the ship policy, the defendants relied upon want of preliminary proof of interest, as well as of loss, but the policy on the ship did not provide for preliminary proof of interest. In the action on the policy on freight, though the policy required preliminary proof of interest, the third plea relied only upon the absence of proof of loss. Their Lordships are of opinion that the absence of preliminary proof of interest cannot avail either of the respondents. The defendants must also fail upon their defence founded upon the alleged fraudulent concealment that at the time of the insurance the ship was worm-eaten, unsound, and unfitted for the voyage. In the respondent's own case it is stated that when the vessel was hauled up at Norfolk she was then, subject to the damage she had in several respects sustained from the storms, found to be sound. The defendants, in their Lordships' opinion, must also fail on the defence that the plaintiff was not interested as alleged.

Upon the whole, their Lordships are of opinion that the judgments and orders of the full bench, dated the 4th Aug. 1885, ought to be reversed, and that the original judgments and decrees of the 6th Dec. 1884 respectively ought to be affirmed, and that the defendants in each of the actions ought to pay the costs incurred in the full bench, and they will humbly advise Her Majesty accordingly. The respondents must respectively pay the costs of the appeals to Her Majesty in Council.

WARD v. THE ROYAL EXCHANGE SHIPPING COMPANY LIMITED; Ex parte HARRISON.(a) Company—Shipping company—Hypothecation of freight—Charge on particular asset—Debenture-holders—Priority.

The directors of a shipping company passed a resolution authorising its brokers to hypothecate the freight of two ships during their present voyages, to secure a present advance of sums not exceeding 5000l. Shortly afterwards the brokers transferred the freight of one of the ships to H. and Co., to secure an advance of 3000l. The transfer was signed by the brokers as managers of the company, who also gave an undertaking to collect the freight as agents to H. and Co. An action having been brought by the debenture-holders of the company for the enforcement of their securities, and the company having gone into liquidation, H. and Co. applied for an order that the liquidator of the company should pay to the applicants out of moneys representing the freight of the ship in question the sum of 3000l.

Held, that the company had power under its articles of association, and the resolutions passed pursuant thereto, notwithstanding the debenture debt, to specifically charge a particular asset for the purpose of carrying on the company's business; and that, therefore, H. and Co.'s security was prior to that of the debenture-holders.

ON the 16th Dec. 1886 a resolution was passed by the directors of the Royal Exchange Shipping Company Limited (the owners of the Monarch line of steamships) authorising its brokers, John Patton, jun., and Co., to hypothecate the freight of the Egyptian Monarch and Assyrian Monarch during their then present voyages, to secure a present advance to the company of sums not exceeding 5000*l.*

By a memorandum, dated the 22nd Dec. 1886, John Patton, jun., and Co. transferred the freight of the Egyptian Monarch to J. and C. Harrison, who had been in the habit of coaling the company's steamers, to secure an advance from J. and C. Harrison of 3000*l.* for the use and necessary disbursements of that steamer.

The memorandum was signed by John Patton, jun., and Co., as the company's managers, who also gave an undertaking to collect the freight as agents for J. and C. Harrison. The memorandum did not bear the seal of the company.

It was a transferance and assignment to J. and C. Harrison, for their own use and benefit, of the freight on account of a particular voyage of the Egyptian Monarch from New York to London, after making provision for the captain's orders for New York disbursements.

Actions were subsequently commenced against the company by David Ward, on behalf of himself and all other the holders of debentures of the company; by William Utley, on behalf of himself and all other the holders of debenture stock of the company; by Hamilton Ramsay Buchanan, on behalf of himself and all other the holders of debentures of the first series issued by the company and by William Webster.

The actions were consolidated, and David Ward obtained the conduct of the consolidated actions. The object of the several actions was the enforcement of the plaintiffs' securities.

Edward Hart was appointed in the consolidated actions receiver and manager of the company.

The company afterwards went into liquidation, and Edward Hart was appointed liquidator of the company.

A motion was then made, on behalf of J. and C. Harrison, that Edward Hart might be ordered to pay to them the sum of 3000*l.*, and their costs of the motion, out of the balance of all moneys received by him as freight on account of the steamer Egyptian Monarch for her last voyage from New York to London, after making provision for captain's orders against such freight for New York disbursements of the vessel; or, in the alternative, that an inquiry might be made whether the applicants had any and what interest in the freight received by Edward Hart, as aforesaid, or in any and what part thereof.

The question was, whether the hypothecation of the freight of the Egyptian Monarch to J. and C. Harrison and whether the general letters on the freights were valid securities, giving priority to J. and C. Harrison's claims against the company.

Various objections were made to J. and C. Harrison's claim, amongst others that the resolutions requisite to the authorisation of the charge had not been passed by the company; that under the company's articles of association its borrowing powers at the date of the charge were actually exhausted; and that the charge was invalid as not made under the company's seal.

Maclean, Q.C. and Levett in support of the motion.—The applicants are entitled to assume as against the company that all acts necessary and proper for the validity of the charge have been performed by the company. The debenture-holders of the company hold a floating security from which the company is entitled to detach any specific asset to secure money advanced in the ordinary routine of business. The charge given to the applicants, although not under seal, is binding on the company, inasmuch as the company was constituted for the purpose of trading, and the charge was made for that purpose. There is nothing in the articles of association and special resolutions of the company with regard to the debenture-holders and the holders of debenture stock which prevented the company from making a specific and perfectly valid charge on a specific portion of the property of the company in order to carry on the business of the company. The claim of the applicants is opposed on the ground that their security is not a good and valid security, since it was not under the seal of the company; and that at the date of the charge the company had already exceeded its borrowing powers, and the directors consequently could not give the charge, neither could the managers. With regard to the first ground of objection, as to the security being bad because it was not under seal, the argument cannot be maintained that the company could not give a perfectly valid security without its being under seal. With regard to the second ground, as to the borrowing powers of the company being exhausted, by a special resolution of the company, dated the 25th July 1879, borrowing was authorised to the extent of 200,000*l.* But, even admitting that the borrowing powers of the company had been exceeded, the applicants were not bound to inquire whether that was the case or not. They were entitled to assume that the directors were exercising a power which they possessed.

Romer, Q.C. and A. R. Kirby for Hart and Ward.—The applicants were not justified in assuming that the directors of the company were entitled to give the charge on the freight. Moreover, there is no document relating to such charge, which on the face of it can be deemed binding upon the company. On the face of it, the charge actually given was not executed by the company at all. That in itself is a complete answer to the present application. The charge was only a memorandum purporting to have been signed by the company's managers. But such an instrument without the seal of the company cannot be treated as binding upon the company. In the absence of special instructions from the directors, the managers had no power to bind the company. The charge could only be binding on the company if the managers had received the necessary authority from the directors to execute it. But the only authority was a resolution of the directors of the 16th Dec. 1886, and a letter sanctioning the managers as brokers to hypothecate freights of two ships against a loan of 5000*l.* There was no authority to give to one creditor a charge securing his own debt, and giving him priority over the other creditors. The resolution of the directors refers to the "present voyages" of the two ships, and it was passed on the 16th Dec. 1886. The Egyptian Monarch, however, left London on the 1st Dec., and did not arrive at New York until the 21st or 22nd, and therefore the vessel was at sea at the time the authority stipulating "present voyage" was given. Upon the appointment of the receiver the debentures became an absolute charge, and immediately he took possession of the vessel on her arrival in London he became entitled to the freight. That possession of the ship made good the debenture-holders' claims.

Cur. adv. vult.

Dec. 19, 1887.—The following written judgment was delivered by CHITTY, J.—The first question is, whether the directors' powers to borrow were exhausted in Dec. 1886, when Messrs. Harrison took their security. The answer to this question depends mainly on the 108th and 55th articles, and the special resolution of the company passed on the 10th and confirmed on the 25th July 1879, pursuant to the 51st section of the Companies Act 1862. By the 108th article the directors had power to borrow at their discretion for the purposes of the company such sums as they might think proper, and to give security for the loans, but subject to a proviso that the aggregate amount borrowed by them should not at any one time, without the assent of an extraordinary meeting of the company, as specified in art. 55, exceed one-half of the amount paid up on the company's charges. By the 55th article an extraordinary meeting of the company had power to authorise the directors to borrow on such security as the meeting might think fit any sum of money beyond the sum mentioned in the 108th article. The directors laid statements before the meetings of the 10th and 25th July 1879, in reference to a proposed new line of steamers between America and Europe; and the special resolution passed and confirmed at those meetings ran thus: "This meeting, having heard the statements of the directors in reference to the acquisition of a controlling interest in three or four large steam vessels to commence a new line between America and Europe, hereby approves the same, and authorises the board to make the needful arrangements for making advantageous contracts for the construction of such vessels, and the raising of the necessary capital from 150,000*l.* to and not exceeding 200,000*l.* on debentures, or otherwise as they may elect on such terms as they may approve, to carry out the same." By virtue of the authority conferred on them by this special resolution, the directors raised 150,000*l.* by the issue of debentures for the purposes of the new line, and duly applied the money thus raised. Subsequently, at meetings held on the 27th March and the 12th April 1882, a statutory special resolution was passed and confirmed authorising the creation of debenture stock, and at an extraordinary general meeting held afterwards on the same 12th April, a resolution was passed authorising the directors at once to seal certificates for 300,000*l.* debenture stock, of which 150,000*l.* was to be issued as an additional loan, and 150,000*l.* was to be applied in the redemption of the outstanding debentures of the like amount; that is, the debentures issued under the authority of the statutory special resolution of 1879. The resolution authorising the directors to issue the 300,000*l.* debenture stock was not a statutory special resolution, but was a single resolution passed at one meeting only. Without going through the figures in detail, it is sufficient to state that in Dec. 1886 there had been raised by borrowing under the statutory special resolutions of 1879 and 1882, and the resolution passed at the extraordinary meeting of the 12th April 1882, sums which were represented in Dec. 1886 by outstanding debentures or debenture stock to an amount largely in excess of one half the amount which had in Dec. 1886 been paid up on the company's shares.

In these circumstances the precise question as to the directors' powers of borrowing in Dec. 1886 is this: Did the statutory special resolution of 1879 confer on the directors a new and independent power to raise money by the means and for the purpose mentioned in that resolution; or did it operate merely in reference to the proviso in the 108th article as an assent of an extraordinary meeting to the directors borrowing in excess of one-half of the paid-up share capital? I think that the special resolution of 1879 created a new independent power for the following reasons: When the company was incorporated it was foreseen that in the transaction of its business and the conduct of its shipping affairs, occasion would arise on which it would be reasonable and convenient to confer on the directors a power to borrow without the trouble and delay of calling an extraordinary meeting, and with this view the 108th article was inserted. It would not be right to hold that this reasonable and convenient power was taken away except upon solid and substantial grounds. Yet if the argument for the respondents is right, the directors lost this power immediately on the passing of the special resolution of 1879, or at all events so soon as it was acted upon. The directors would have had no power to borrow a sixpence for the general purposes of the company without the assent of an extraordinary meeting. Try the case in this way: Suppose the directors had exercised their power under the 108th article of borrowing money within the limit stated in the proviso, and had subsequently sought to exercise the powers conferred by the special resolution of 1879, must the amount borrowed under the 108th article have been brought into account against the sum mentioned in the special resolution? I think not. The exact amount raised by shares when the special resolution was passed is not given in evidence; but it was evidently less than 300,000*l.*, and was stated at the bar to be 200,000*l.* The directors accordingly had at that time power under the 108th article to borrow without the assent of a meeting 100,000*l.*, but not 150,000*l.* It is admitted on both sides that the words in the special resolution "from 150,000*l.* to and not exceeding 200,000*l.*" relate to the amount to be raised under that resolution; that it was not to be less than 150,000*l.* nor more than 200,000*l.* The lower limit then of 150,000*l.* did not correspond with the limit of the directors' power to borrow without further assent. The special resolution does not in terms refer to the 108th article or the proviso contained in it; nor does it in point of form purport to give an assent to the directors borrowing in excess of the half of the paid-up share capital. It does not say that the directors may borrow from 50,000*l.* to 100,000*l.* in excess of their subsisting unconditional power to borrow. Further the special resolution authorised the directors to "raise the necessary capital on debentures or otherwise as they may elect on such terms as they may approve." It was contended by the respondents' counsel that the resolution authorised the raising of capital not merely by borrowing, but by the issue of new shares (see arts. 11 and 12), and this argument was admitted and adopted by the applicants' counsel in reply. Assuming this contention to be correct, and I think it is, the power was clearly a new and independent power to the extent of raising the capital by new shares. Further the necessary capital to be raised under the special resolution was to be raised only for the special purpose of the new line; whereas the power to borrow under the 108th article was for the general purposes of the company. Again the assent required under the 108th article might be well given by the resolution of one of the extraordinary meetings; it was not necessary that two meetings should be held or that a resolution should be passed in accordance with the provisions of the 51st section of the Companies Act 1862. The special resolution of 1879 (which was duly registered) became by virtue of the 50th section of that Act a new regulation of the company. An assent given by the resolution of an extraordinary meeting, under the 108th article, would not have been a new regulation or article—such a resolution would have left the articles unaltered and intact. There being no connection on the face of the special resolution with the 108th article, there is no necessity for reading the special resolution as merely giving an assent under the 108th, and I think it would be erroneous so to read it. The two articles or regulations may well be read as standing side by side, but independently one of another, as follows: The directors may raise capital from 150,000*l.* to 200,000*l.* for the specific purpose of the new line, and they may also borrow for the general purposes of the company within the limit of a half of the paid-up share capital without any further assent on the part of the company. As I am of opinion that the directors' power to borrow under the 108th article was not affected by the special solution of 1879, it is not necessary to express any opinion on the point, whether, having regard to the principle of the decision in the Royal British Bank v. Turquand (6 Ell. & Bl. 327), Messrs. Harrison were not entitled to presume that the assent required by the proviso had been given by a general meeting.

The next question relates to the meaning of the term "their present voyages" in the authority of the 16th Dec. 1886, given by the directors to the company's brokers, Messrs. Patton and Co., under which they gave to Messrs. Harrison the security of the 22nd of the same month on the homeward freight of the Egyptian Monarch. The Egyptian Monarch left London on the 2nd Dec. on her outward passage to New York, and arrived there on the 23rd. For the respondents it was contended that the terms must be confined to the outward passage only, as being the "present voyage" when the authority was given, because the authority was to hypothecate freight, and the freights for the outward passage and the homeward passage were separate and distinct freights. But it is established by the evidence that, in the case of a line of steamers plying regularly between London and New York, the expression "voyage" has a well-known and definite meaning amongst shipowners, brokers, and merchants in the city of London, and that it means the passages from London to New York and back again; and that the ship's accounts are made up on the return of the particular vessel to London when the crew are paid off. Further, it was the regular practice of this company to make out the ship's accounts on the return passage, and the log of the Egyptian Monarch for this particlar voyage treats the outward and homeward passages as one voyage, stating expressly that the voyage ended on the return of the ships to London. In these circumstances I hold that the term "voyage" in the directors' authority includes both passages, that being the meaning in which the directors of this company would naturally employ the term, having regard to their own practice. This conclusion is therefore strengthened by the evidence as to the general sense in which the expression is used in the case of line steamers, and also by a consideration of the circumstances under which the authority was given, such, for instance, as the short time which had to elapse before the Egyptian Monarch would terminate her outward passage, and the small amount of freight payable on the completion of that voyage, as compared with the sum which the directors contemplated might be obtained on the security authorised. It was further argued for the respondents that "present advances" in the authority meant an advance made at the time when the security, was executed, and that any advance made by Messrs. Harrison after the date of the security though made on the faith of it, was not within the authority given to the brokers. I decline to adopt so narrow a construction. I understand that all the advances claimed by Messrs. Harrison were made in Dec. 1886, or, at all events, before the 5th Jan. 1887, the date of the appointment of the first receiver, and consequently before the 12th Jan., the date when the Egyptian Monarch completed her voyage, and I think that all such advances constitute a "present advance" within the meaning of the authority. It is hardly necessary to add that Messrs.

Harrison can stand on the security only for advances and not for pre-existing debts.

Another point argued on behalf of the respondents was that Messrs. Harrison's security is bad because it was not under the company's seal, and it was argued that the directors had no power to give any security under the 108th article, except under the company's seal. This point cannot be maintained. The directors had power under that article to issue the security under the company's seal, but they were not prohibited from giving the security by any other lawful mode; and the contract under which Messrs. Harrison claimed was made in a manner binding on the company under the 37th section of the Companies Act of 1867, and it bound the company, or the directors on its behalf, to execute a further assignment under seal if Messrs. Harrison so required.

The next question is, whether Messrs. Harrison are entitled to priority over the holders of debentures and debenture stock. When Messrs. Harrison took their security and advanced their money the debentures and debenture stock constituted a floating security only. There is a proviso to that effect in the debentures under which, until default, the debentures are to operate as a floating security only, and are not to hinder any dispositions or dealings by the company of or with the ship's undertaking and effects charged; and a similar provision was made in the resolution under which debenture stock was assured. It is clear that there remained in the company power to create a specific charge on a particular asset for the purpose of carrying on the company's business.

A further argument raised by the respondents is, that being as they allege mortgagees of the ship itself, and having taken possession of the ship by their resolution on the completion of her voyage, they are entitled, as such mortgagees of the ship, to the freight which was then accruing due. But this argument assumes that they had a legal mortgage of the ship, whereas they had in fact only an equitable charge. The obtaining the appointment of a receiver and the taking possession by such receiver did not displace the priority which Messrs. Harrison had in equity to the mortgagees of the freight. But it is further contended by the respondents that the holders of debentures and debenture stock obtained priority over Messrs. Harrison by reason of their having given the first notice to the consignees. Now, the plain meaning of the correspondence which passed between the 6th and the 15th Jan. in relation to this subject was that the freight should be placed by the receiver to a separate account, to abide the order of the court as to the rights of the parties as they then stood. The receiver declined to give any personal undertaking, or to do anything which might appear to give up any right of the parties to the suit in which he was appointed by entering into the arrangement that the freight should be carried to a separate account at the bank which he selected. He gave up no right, indeed it was not competent for him to do so; but it was competent for him to enter into a reasonable arrangement which enabled him to collect the freight with greater convenience and dispatch, leaving the consignees unembarrassed by conflicting claims, and leaving the rights of the claimants for adjudication unaffected by the circumstance that he was to get in the freight. The argument for the respondents that the debentures gained an advantage through the arrangements is to my mind contrary to good faith. But assuming that the view I take of the correspondence is too favourable to Messrs. Harrison, there would still remain the question whether the holders of debentures and debenture stock could, as a matter of law, obtain priority over them by giving the first notice to the consignees. It appears to me they could not. The effect of the stipulation already stated, as to the security of the debentures and debenture stock being a floating security only, was to reserve to the extent already stated a power to the company to give a security on a particular asset in priority to the debentures and debenture stock. By virtue of this resolution Messrs. Harrison had priority at the time when they gave notice to the receiver of their security, namely, the 6th of Jan. 1887, which was before the receiver gave notice to the consignees. The result is that Messrs. Harrison had priority by virtue of the contract on the part of the holders of debentures and debenture stock in the company. If at the time when he advanced his money a mortgagee of a chose in action has notice of an existing mortgage, he cannot by giving the first notice to the debtor obtain any priority. If a charge were given on a debt with power for the mortgagor, notwithstanding the charge, to raise certain sums for certain defined purposes on the security of the debt in priority to the charge, and the power were exercised and notice of the subsequent advance were given to the persons entitled to the charge, the person so entitled could not gain priority by giving the first notice to the debtor, and for this simple reason, that he had contracted that the subsequent advance should have priority. That I believe disposes of the numerous questions, and I think there should be an order something to this effect: Declare that Messrs. Harrison are entitled by virtue of the instrument of the 22nd Dec. (in priority to the holders of debentures and debenture stock) to a valid equitable charge on the homeward freight of the Egyptian Monarch for advances made at the time or subsequently on the faith of the security prior to the date of the appointment of a receiver. That is, as I understand, the date of the default by the company. An account must be taken of what is due to Messrs. Harrison under and by virtue of their security. There will be liberty to apply for payment, but of course they will only obtain payment out of the separate fund. Then there had better be an inquiry as to whether there are any and what are the claims on the freight, and what is the amount of the charges. I will reserve the question of costs. Then, as this is only a motion pro interesse suo, the order had better be prefaced by a waiver of all questions of form or procedure. The receiver has no doubt done what is best for the debenture-holders.

THE HULDA. (a)

Practice—Action in rem—Default proceedings—Statement of claim—R. S. C., Order XIII., r. 12.

Where the plaintiff in a default action in rem for necessaries had complied with all the formalities entitling him to judgment save service of a statement of claim, but it appeared that the writ, though not specially indorsed, contained particulars of the claim, the Court gave judgment for the plaintiff.

THIS was an action in rem by one John Stronach, for necessaries supplied to the foreign barque Hulda.

The writ was in the following terms:

The plaintiff's claim is 58*l.* 19*s.* for necessaries supplied to the vessel Hulda, at the port of Queenstown, in Ireland, on the 9th July 1887, and also at the port of Silloth.

Particulars.

July 9, 1887.—To amount of bill of exchange of this date drawn by the master and owner of the barque Hulda on the said John Stronach, and payable on demand to the order of G. M. Harvey and Sons of Queenstown, and stated to be for disbursements for use of the barque Hulda of Gothenburg, and which has been accordingly paid by the said John Stronach	£49	5	0
Cash advanced by the plaintiff at the port of Silloth, for use of the barque Hulda at the request of the master and owner	9	14	0
	£58	19	0

The defendants having made default, the action was set down for trial. It appeared that all the usual formalities had been complied with, save that no statement of claim had been delivered.

Order XIII., r. 12, is as follows:

In all actions not by the rules of this order otherwise specially provided for, in case the party served with the writ, or in Admiralty actions in rem the defendant does not appear within the time limited for appearance, upon the filing by the plaintiff of a proper affidavit of service, and, if the writ is not specially indorsed under Order III., r. 6, of a statement of claim, the action may proceed as if such party had appeared, subject, as to actions where an account is claimed, to the provisions of Order XV.

J. P. Aspinall for the plaintiff.—The plaintiff is entitled to judgment. This is a default action in rem, and therefore within the provisions of Order XIII., r. 12. By that rule a statement of claim is required to be filed, whereas it is to be noticed that that has not been done in the present case. It is, however, submitted that it may under the circumstances be dispensed with. The writ contains particulars of the claim, and is in itself sufficient notice to the parties of the nature of the claim.

BUTT, J.—I think that you have done all that is necessary, and that the plaintiff is therefore entitled to judgment.

THE WEXFORD. (a)

Collision—Practice—Sale of ship.

Where the plaintiffs in a collision action in rem applied to the court to order a sale of their ship so as to bind the defendants on the question of damages hereafter, the Court refused the application.

THIS was a motion by the plaintiffs in a collision action in rem for an order for the sale of their vessel the Mary Evans.

The action was brought by the owners of the Mary Evans to recover damages for a collision which had occurred between the Mary Evans and the defendants' steamship Wexford at Santos, in South America. It was alleged by the plaintiffs that the Mary Evans, which was still abroad, had been so injured by the collision as not to be worth repairing. The writ, which was in rem, had not been served owing to the Wexford not having come within the jurisdiction.

The notice of motion had been served on the owners of the Wexford, and although they had not appeared in the action they were represented at the hearing of the motion.

J. G. Barnes, for the plaintiffs, in support of the motion.—The court ought in the circumstances to make this order. [BUTT, J.—Why? She is your own ship, and you can do what you like with her.] She is practically a total loss, and it is in the interest of all parties that she should be sold abroad. The plaintiffs are anxious to protect themselves from being afterwards charged with not having taken proper measures to secure a good price for the Mary Evans. This will not be open to the defendants if the vessel is sold by order of the court. It is to be noticed that in The Columbus (3 W. Rob. 166) Dr. Lushington was of opinion that this was the right thing to do under very similar circumstances.

J. P. Aspinall, for the defendants, was not called on.

BUTT, J.—I have no hesitation in refusing this motion. The applicants are the owners of a vessel which is not in the hands of the court, and over which they have full authority and control. If they wish to sell her, they can do so. The application is, in my opinion, quite unprecedented, and I dismiss it with costs.

THE W. A. SCHOLTEN. (a)

Practice—Collision—Writ in personam—Foreign corporation—Service outside the jurisdiction—R. S. C., Order II., rr. 3, 4; Order IX., r. 8.

A writ in personam for service within the jurisdiction must contain the address as well as the name of the defendant, and consequently such a writ issued without any address against a foreign corporation having no place of business in this country is irregular and will be set aside.

(a) Reported by J. P. ASPINALL and BUTLER ASPINALL, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

Semble, that a writ for service in this country upon a foreign corporation having no address here, will not be issued without the leave of the judge, even if it contains the name and foreign address of the corporation.

THIS was a motion by the defendants in a collision action in personam to set aside the writ of summons and the service of it.

The collision occurred between the British steamship Rosa Mary and the steamship W. A. Scholten, owned by the Netherlands-American Steam Navigation Company, off Dover and outside the territorial waters of Her Majesty's dominions. The defendants, the Netherlands-American Steam Navigation Company, were a Dutch company resident in Holland and carrying on business at Rotterdam, and had no place of business in this country.

The writ was an ordinary writ in personam in the form set forth in Appendix A, part 1, form 1, to the Rules of Court of 1883, but it did not contain the address of the defendants. The subagent of the company in America and one of the managing directors being in England on the business of the company were served with the above writ.

Finlay, Q.C. (with him H. Stokes) in support of the motion.—The writ ought to be set aside. The defendants are a foreign company, having no place of business in this country, and therefore the writ should be in the form prescribed for service out of the jurisdiction. To issue such a writ leave must first be obtained, but here the writ has been issued without leave, and moreover is in the form prescribed for service within the jurisdiction. The address of the defendants is also omitted:

Sedgwick v. Yedras Mining Company, 35 W. R. 780; W. N. 1887, p. 94.

Sir Walter Phillimore (with him J. G. Barnes), contra.—This writ is not intended for service outside the jurisdiction. It is intended to be served within the jurisdiction, and is therefore perfectly regular in form. The plaintiffs took their chance of serving the defendant company within this country, and the service on the managing director is a good service within Order IX., r. 8. The managing director is a head officer, and it makes no difference that the defendant company is a foreign corporation:

Newby v. Van Oppen, 26 L. T. Rep. N. S. 164; L. Rep. 7 Q. B. 293; 41 L. J. 148, Q. B.;
The Carron Iron Company v. Maclaren, 5 H. of L. Cas. 416.

The absence of address does not invalidate the writ. The address is not an essential part of the writ, but merely identifies the defendant where identification is necessary:

The Helenslea, 47 L. T. Rep. N. S. 546; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 594; 7 P. Div. 57.

Finlay, Q.C. in reply.—The Helenslea (ubi sup.) is not in point. There the defendant was a private individual, here the defendants are a foreign corporation. The latter does not travel about wherever its officials go.

BUTT, J.—The question in this case is, whether the writ ought to be set aside. If the writ is not good, one need say nothing about the service of it. I have caused inquiries to be made at the writ office, and I am told that it is a most clear rule not to issue a writ against an individual or corporation with a foreign address without the leave of the judge. I am further told that the clerk who sealed this writ seeing a long string of names took part of them for an address, and did not notice that in fact there was no address. In fact the writ was sealed per incuriam, and would not have been sealed at all had the clerk noticed there was no address. In the form prescribed by the orders under the Judicature Act, the address as well as the name is part of the necessary form of the writ. I am perfectly aware that this is a writ for service not out of the jurisdiction but within the jurisdiction. Still it is clear that it never would have been sealed if the officer had observed that there was no address, or had there been given the true address, viz., the foreign address of this corporation. It is quite clear that the address was kept out on purpose. That being so, I shall certainly not allow this writ to remain. It is therefore not necessary to discuss the question as to the service. I am clearly of opinion that the party issuing this writ has contravened the express rules of court as to what the writ shall be and shall contain, and I think that the writ is irregular; the writ must therefore be set aside.

THE KARO. (a)

Collision — Limitation of liability — Shipowners and cargo owners — Measure of damages — R. S. C., Order LII., r. 23.

An action in rem by shipowners, for collision between the ships B. and K. having been settled by a written agreement that both ships were to be deemed to blame, this agreement was filed in the Registry under the provisions of Order LII., r. 23. Other actions having subsequently been instituted by owners of cargo on the B. against the K., the owners of the K. obtained a decree limiting their liability. In the statement of claim in the limitation action, it was alleged that it had been agreed between the parties to the ship action that both ships should be deemed to blame. This allegation was not denied in the respective defences of the owners of the B. and her cargo. At the reference to assess the amount due to the various claimants against the fund paid into court in the limitation action, the owners of cargo on the B. claimed to prove for the whole of their loss. The Registrar allowed them a moiety. On appeal:

Held, that the cargo owners were not precluded from proving for their whole loss, subject to proof by them that the K. was alone to blame, but that the owners of the B. were precluded by the agreement which was equivalent to a decree of the court from proving for more than a moiety.

Held, further, that the owners of cargo might take an issue to try whether the K. was solely or partly to blame for the collision.

THIS was a petition in objection to the registrar's report in a limitation of liability action.

The action arose out of a collision between the steamships Balnacraig and Karo, in respect of which it was agreed between the shipowners that both ships should be deemed to be in fault.

The owners of the Karo having subsequently obtained a decree limiting their liability, paid the sum representing that liability into court. The Registrar having investigated the various claims against the fund made the following report:

In this case a point of some peculiarity and difficulty has been raised at the reference, which, I think, it is to be regretted was not raised on the pleadings, or in some more formal way to be disposed of by the court. On the 10th Dec. 1886 a collision took place between the two ships Karo and Balnacraig. The Karo was seriously damaged, whilst the Balnacraig with her cargo sank, and was totally lost. On the 11th and 14th of that month two actions in rem, subsequently consolidated, were brought against the Karo on behalf of the owners, master, and crew of the Balnacraig, and in those consolidated actions the owners of the Karo counter-claimed against the owners of the Balnacraig for the damage done to the Karo. On the eve of the trial in court, viz., on the 12th Jan. 1887, the parties in these actions agreed to a decree that both vessels were to blame for the collision. Subsequently, on the 18th and 21st Jan. respectively, two other actions were brought against the Karo by owners of certain portions of the cargo of the Balnacraig. Thereupon, namely, on the 31st Jan., the owners of the Karo brought this action to limit their liability, and on the 1st March obtained the usual decree limiting their liability to a sum representing 8*l*. per ton of the registered tonnage of their ship. In this last-named action appearances were then duly entered, not only for the owners of the Balnacraig but for the owners of her cargo, some represented by Mr. Greening, others by Mr. Toller, and others owning by far the largest portion of the cargo by Mr. Stokes. The claims of these several parties were duly investigated by me, with the assistance of merchants, on the 25th and 29th days of July. At this reference the owners of the Balnacraig claimed to prove against the fund in court in respect only of a moiety of the damages sustained by the owners of the Karo, and the owners of cargo, other than those represented by Mr. Stokes, also claimed to prove only in respect of a moiety of the loss they sustained; but the owners of cargo, represented by Mr. Stokes, and whose claims are numbered 44 in the schedule hereto, claimed to prove in respect of the whole loss sustained by them, as the Karo was solely to blame. This contention is based on the ground that they were not parties to the action in which the decree was made that both ships were to blame. On referring to the pleadings, it will be seen that the plaintiffs in this action have pleaded and admitted that their ship was only partly to blame for the collision, and, in effect, they plead that they are only liable for a moiety of the damages sustained by the owners of the Balnacraig: see paragraphs 5 and 9 of their statement of claim. The averments are not very distinct, but coupled with paragraph 4 they seem to me sufficient to have rendered it right that the defendants represented by Mr. Stokes, if they intended to raise the point in question, should have done so in their defence, by pleading to those paragraphs, instead of limiting their statement of defence to a non-admission of paragraphs 3, 6, and 8, which do not touch that point. In the absence therefore of any decree or proof on admission that the plaintiffs were solely to blame for the collision in question, I have come to the conclusion that I cannot recognise the right of Mr. Stokes' parties to claim in this action against the fund in court in respect of more than a moiety of their damage, or, in fact, on any different footing from the other defendants.

The agreement referred to by the registrar was as follows:

In the High Court of Justice. Admiralty Division. Folios 335 and 370.—The Karo.—We, the undersigned solicitors for the plaintiffs and defendants herein, hereby consent to this consolidated action being taken out of the paper for trial, and to a decree that both vessels are to blame, and for the usual reference to the registrar and merchants. Dated this 12th day of Jan. 1887.—Robert Greening, solicitor for the plaintiffs; Downing, Holman, and Co., solicitors for the defendants.—To the Registrar.

This agreement was filed in the Admiralty Registry under Order LII., r. 23, which provides:

Any agreement in writing between the solicitors in Admiralty actions, dated and signed by the solicitors of both parties, may, if the Admiralty Registrar think it reasonable and such as the judge would under the circumstances allow, be filed, and shall thereupon become an order of court, and have the same effect as if such order had been made by the judge in person.

The paragraphs in the statement of claim in the limitation action referred to by the registrar, were as follows:

4. On the 11th Dec. 1886 an action—1886 G., No. 2675—was brought in this division of the High Court of Justice on behalf of the Grampian Steamship Company, owners of the steamship Balnacraig, against the plaintiffs, owners of the steamship Karo and her freight, for the recovery of damages occasioned by the said collision, and on the 14th Dec. 1886 an action—1886 R., No. 2849—was also brought in this division on behalf of Jas. Ross and all others the master and crew of the steamship Balnacraig, for damages for the loss of their personal effects against the plaintiffs, owners of the steamship Karo. The said actions were consolidated by an order of court, dated the 18th Dec. 1886, and the owners of the Karo appeared as defendants in the consolidated cause.

5. The 12th Jan. 1887 was appointed for the hearing of the consolidated actions—1886 G., 2675—1886 R., 2849—but on or about the 11th Jan. it was agreed between the several parties to the above-mentioned actions that the said collision should be deemed to have been occasioned by the improper navigation of the Karo and by the improper navigation of the Balnacraig, and the plaintiffs admit that the said collision, and the losses and damages consequent thereon, were in part caused by the improper navigation of the Karo.

9. The plaintiffs apprehend that the said sum is insufficient to answer the moiety of the damages claimed against the plaintiffs in the said actions, and the other claims made or to be made against the Karo or her owners the plaintiffs, in respect of the said collision.

The respective defences merely contained an allegation that paragraphs 3, 6, 8 of the statement of claim were not admitted. These paragraphs stated what the tonnage of the Karo was, what 8*l*. per ton on that tonnage amounted to, and the fact that the collision occurred without the fault or privity of the plaintiffs.

In the petition filed by some of the owners of cargo on board the Balnacraig, it was alleged that the registrar was wrong in refusing to allow them to prove for the whole of their loss on the following grounds:

(a.) Because the petitioners, the plaintiffs in the action (1887 B., No. 285), were not parties to, and are not bound by, the agreement that the Balnacraig should be deemed in fault, and it has not been decreed or proved, and has not been admitted by the petitioners, that the Balnacraig was to blame for the said collision.

(b.) Because the petitioners have been prevented by the decree in the limitation action (1887 K., No. 103) from carrying on their action, and from obtaining a decree that the Karo was solely to blame for the collision, and because the petitioners were, and are therefore, entitled in law to claim against the fund in court as if such a decree had been made.

(c.) Because the registrar's opinion that the petitioners should have made their claim in their pleading in the said limitation action (1887 K., No. 103) was erroneous and ill-founded, since there was nothing alleged in the statement of claim to cause them to do so, and it would have been an improper time to make their claim, and such claim, if so made, would have been struck out as irrelevant or disregarded.

(d.) Because, whether or not the Balnacraig was partly to blame, the petitioners are entitled in law to claim against the fund in court in respect of the whole of the damages they have suffered, and not only in respect of a moiety thereof.

To this petition two answers were filed, one by the owners, master, and crew of the Balnacraig, the other by owners of part of the cargo laden on board the Balnacraig. In the latter there was an averment that if the registrar was wrong all the cargo owners were entitled to be put in the same position as the petitioners and to prove for the whole of their respective damages. In the former it was averred that both ships were in fact to blame.

Nov. 22.—On the petition coming on for hearing it was arranged that it should be adjourned for a week. At the same time leave was given to the owners of cargo other than the petitioners to appear; and, in the event of the appeal being successful, the judge stated that all the cargo owners were entitled to be put in the same position as the petitioners, and to prove for the whole of their respective losses.

Nov. 29.—Sir Walter Phillimore (with him Stubbs) for some of the owners of cargo on the Balnacraig.—The owners of the Balnacraig are by the agreement precluded from claiming for more than a moiety of their loss. This agreement having been filed is, by reason of Order LII., r. 23, equivalent to an order of court, and has the same effect as if it had been made by the judge:

The Bellcairn, 53 L. T. Rep. N. S. 686; 10 P. Div. 161; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 503;
The Ardandhu, 54 L. Rep. N. S. 819; 12 App. Cas. 256; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 594.

The cargo owners are entitled to claim for the whole of their loss. They were not parties to the agreement, and therefore they are not bound by it. The fact that they made no claim in pleading in the limitation action is immaterial. Had they alleged that the Karo was solely to blame, they would have raised an immaterial issue, which would in that action have been no ground for the court refusing to grant the relief claimed. The effect of the decree in that action was to prevent them prosecuting their action, and proving that the Karo was solely to blame. [BUTT, J.—The difficulty arises out of shipowners being able to limit their liability before it is determined what was the cause of the collision. I always had some doubts about the case of The Amalia (Br. & L. 151; 32 L. J. 191, Adm.) I think in this case the court might have hesitated to grant limitation had this question as to which vessel was to blame been raised.] That was a question which was immaterial to the owners of the Karo. The point is also taken that, even if the Balnacraig was partly to blame, the cargo owners are entitled to claim the whole of their losses.

J. P. Aspinall, Pollock, and Mansfield appeared for other claimants.

Finlay, Q.C. (with him Barnes) for the Balnacraig.—The owners of the Karo have refused to consent to this agreement being rescinded. If, however, the court should be of opinion that the cargo owners are entitled to prove for the whole of their loss, the owners of the Balnacraig should be put in the same position. It would be obviously absurd to say that one set of claimants are to prove for half their damage on the basis that both ships are to blame for the collision, and to say that another set are to prove for the whole of their damage on the basis that only one ship is to blame. The cargo owners ought to have taken some steps to establish, in or before the limitation action, what the real facts of this collision were. Had they done so this difficulty would never have arisen:

James v. London and South-Western Railway, 27 L. T. Rep. N. S. 382; L. Rep. 7 Ex. 287; 1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 226;
The Amalia (ubi sup.).

They must now be taken to have admitted that both ships were to blame. In any event the cargo owners ought to show that they are entitled to prove for the whole of their loss before they are allowed to do so.

Sir Walter Phillimore in reply.—If my clients are to be precluded from proving for the whole of their loss because they did not raise this question in the limitation action, for the same reason claimants who have subsequently come in in answer to advertisements ought to be precluded—a result which is obviously unjust, and therefore exposes the fallacy of the contention put forward by the owners of the Balnacraig.

BUTT, J.—The question at present before me is whether the plaintiffs in action No. 285 and other persons who were owners of cargo on board the Balnacraig are entitled to prove against the fund in court for the whole or only half the damage they have sustained. Their goods were on board the Balnacraig, and were sunk with her in consequence of a collision with the steamship Karo. The Karo was in fault for that collision, either wholly or in part. That is an admitted fact. The consequence of that is that, on the collision occurring, ipso facto the plaintiffs in the damage actions became possessed of a maritime lien on the Karo. To enforce this lien the plaintiffs in action 285 brought their action in this court against the Karo. The owners of the Balnacraig also commenced an action in this court against the Karo; but that suit was settled by the solicitors of the plaintiffs and defendants respectively entering into the following agreement: "We, the undersigned solicitors for the plaintiffs and the defendants, herein consent to this consolidated action being taken out of the paper for trial, and to a decree that both vessels are to blame, and for the usual reference to the registrar and merchants." That agreement was filed in the registry, and the effect of that was, in my judgment, to make it equivalent to a decree of the court under Order LII., r. 23. Therefore the matter is to be considered as if there were a judgment of the court pronouncing both of these vessels to blame for the collision. Shortly after that agreement had been filed, the owners of the Karo instituted this action for the limitation of their liability, and they paid 8*l.* per ton into court. The result of that suit was to stay action No. 285. In that state of affairs the only remedy of the plaintiffs in action No. 285 was to claim against the fund in court. Now, what is that fund? Why, it is, in fact, for all purposes of the suit, the res, the ship herself. Unless the plaintiffs in action No. 285 have precluded themselves either by their pleadings or otherwise from making such a claim, it appears to me clear that they have just the same rights against the fund in court as they would have against the res, against the ship herself. That leads to the inquiry whether they have so precluded themselves from making a claim for the full amount of the damage they have sustained, and whether they are only entitled to claim for one-half. It is said that they have precluded themselves from so doing by their pleadings, but I am utterly unable to see they have done anything of the sort. In the first place, there is no distinct allegation in the statement of claim in the limitation suit that both vessels were to blame. It is true that there was an admission that the damages and loss consequent on the collision were in part caused by the improper navigation of the Karo. Then, in another paragraph of the statement of claim, something is said about a moiety of damages. What were the plaintiffs in action No. 285 to do? Had they pleaded that they were entitled to recover the whole and not the moiety, it would have been an immaterial matter in the suit. The real question in the limitation action is whether the plaintiffs are entitled to have their liability limited according to the provisions of the statute. It made no difference, for the purposes of the decree in that suit, whether the plaintiffs in action No. 285 traversed the allegation of the Karo being partly to blame or not. But then it is said they ought somehow to have raised the question in the limitation action, if not by the pleadings, at all events by taking the objection. I ask myself why, and, if so, how? For the purposes of that suit it mattered not to them what was done. The fact of their asserting a claim at the hearing of that suit would not have affected the question of limitation at all. It would not have varied the amount which the owners of the Karo were bound to pay into court. Suppose the question had been raised, the answer would have been, "That has nothing to do with the present proceedings. You may claim that when you get before the registrar." But, further, when it is said that these claimants, who happen to have been parties to the limitation suit, are precluded by their pleading from obtaining full damages, I ask myself, am I to apply a similar rule to the claimants who were not parties to that suit and who have come in afterwards in consequence of the advertisements? It seems preposterous that these latter claimants are to be allowed to prove for their whole loss, while the former are to be allowed to prove for only a moiety. It may be that this difficulty has arisen from the decision in The Amalia (ubi sup.), from which it appears that a limitation suit may be carried to a successful issue by a shipowner without his admitting his liability. It would not be becoming in me to discuss the correctness of the decision in the case of The Amalia (ubi sup.); but I cannot help thinking that that decision has led to a good deal of the difficulty in this case.

Now, what under the circumstances is to be done? I hold that, apart from the question whether these cargo owners have precluded themselves from proving on the fund for the whole amount of their loss, they have a clear right to do so. I hold, also, that they have not so precluded themselves. It by no means follows that they are in fact entitled to the whole amount of the loss which appears in the schedule to the registrar's report. In my judgment they must first establish this, that the facts of the case are such as to entitle them to whole damages and not to half. If the case of The Milan (5 L. T. Rep. N. S. 590; Lush. 388; 1 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 185) is right—and I say nothing to the contrary—then it may well be, on the facts of the case, that they never had a right to more than half of the damages. Under these circumstances some steps must be taken, before they can prove for the whole amount, to ascertain if they are so entitled. The obvious and simple way of enabling them to do it would be to raise the stay put upon their action by the decree in the limitation suit, and that, if necessary, I shall do. But I do not think that is all I ought to do. As has been pointed out, these claimants might proceed against the Karo, but the owners of the Karo have no interest in the matter, because whatever the result they would not be bound to pay a penny more, and therefore possibly would not defend the suit. I think the suit ought to be contested by those who have an interest in contesting it, and I think that the owners of the Balnacraig have that interest. I shall direct an issue between the owners of cargo in No. 285 and any other claimants who like to come in on the one side and the owners of the Balnacraig on the other, to ascertain what the real state of the case is, whether each vessel is partly to blame, or whether the Karo is alone to blame. I am asked, on behalf of the owners of the Balnacraig, to say that they are entitled to rescind what I regard as the order of the court, made in the collision action, and to allow them to claim the whole amount of their damages notwithstanding that order. I am unable to see how that that can be done. I think there is at this moment what is tantamount to a judgment of the court as between the owners of the Karo and the owners of the Balnacraig, that both vessels were to blame. I think that the course taken by the owners of the Balnacraig has precluded them from any such step, and I cannot but remark that in their pleadings in opposition to the objections to this report they allege distinctly, and as a matter of fact, that both vessels were in fact to blame for the collision. It is argued on the part of the owners of cargo that it is immaterial whether both these vessels were to blame, or whether the Karo was alone to blame, because, even if both vessels were to blame, they still, as owners of cargo, would be entitled to claim against the owners of the Karo the full amount of their damage. Apart from authority there would seem to be a good deal to be said in favour of that contention; but it is a matter upon which it is not necessary for me to express any opinion. I hold that I am clearly bound by the authority of The Milan (ubi sup.), which, if I recollect rightly, was approved of by the Court of Appeal, and therefore I can give no effect to that contention. The result will be, that I must hold these owners of cargo are entitled to put forward their respective claims for the whole amount of their damage; that the owners of the Balnacraig are not entitled to prove for more than half the amount of their damage; and that, if it be desired, there is to be an issue between the owners of cargo on the one hand and the owners of the Balnacraig on the other, to determine whether one or both of these vessels are to blame.

THE PARISIAN. (a)

Collision—Reference — Affidavit — Cross-examination of deponent—R. S. C., Order XXXVII., r. 2 ; Order XXXVIII., r. 28.

At a reference in an Admiralty action, where the plaintiff being resident abroad makes an affidavit in support of his claim and refuses to attend for cross-examination, it is in the discretion of the registrar to refuse to accept the affidavit until the plaintiff has been cross-examined, and it is further within his discretion to say whether the circumstances are such that the witness should attend in this country for cross-examination, or should be cross-examined abroad on commission.

THIS was a special case stated by the district registrar at Liverpool for the opinion of the court.

The case was as follows :—

1. This was an action brought to recover damages occasioned by a collision which took place between the La Marie and the s.s. Parisian, on the 30th March 1886, off the banks of Newfoundland.

2. On the 28th Jan. 1887 an order was made by consent that judgment should be entered for the plaintiff for 50 per cent. of the damages found to have been sustained by him, and that the accounts and vouchers relating to the plaintiff's claim should be referred to the district registrar and merchants to assess the amount thereof.

3. On the 11th June 1887 the plaintiffs lodged their claim, a copy of which is hereto annexed, and filed a number of affidavits in support, one of which was made by Prosper Villars, of Granville in France, who was the sole owner of the La Marie.

4. On the 18th Nov. 1887 an order was made appointing the reference to take place on the 2nd inst., and directing the said Prosper Villars to attend to be cross-examined on his affidavit.

5. On the 18th Nov. 1887 the defendants' solicitors also gave notice to the plaintiff's solicitors that they required the said Prosper Villars to be produced for examination at the said reference.

6. After the reference had been opened the plaintiff's solicitor stated that the said Prosper Villars was not in attendance owing to illness, and he contended that if the defendants wished to cross-examine him the proper course to be adopted was to issue a commission to France for the purpose. It was also submitted that, if the defendants wished to check the statements in the affidavits, they could do this by requiring production of the plaintiff's books and documents. The defendants' counsel contended that, if the said Prosper Villars did not attend to be cross-examined, his affidavit ought not to be used at the reference.

7. The merchants and I were strongly of opinion that, considering the nature and extent of the claim, it would be more satisfactory in the interests of justice that the said Prosper Villars should attend to be cross-examined on his affidavit and to produce his vouchers and explain the entries in his books.

(a) Reported by J. P. ASPINALL and BUTLER ASPINALL, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

The questions for the decision of the court are: (1.) Whether the said affidavit of Prosper Villars ought to be used on the reference, the said Prosper Villars having failed to attend for the purpose of cross-examination; (2) whether the proper mode of taking such examination is by issuing a commission to France for the purpose, or by his attending before the registrar and merchants; (3) how the costs of and incident to this special case are to be borne.

The registrar was of opinion that the plaintiff ought to attend for cross-examination, and had adjourned the reference until the court had decided the above questions.

C. Hall, Q.C. (with him Dr. Stubbs) for the plaintiff.—The registrar ought to have read and accepted the plaintiff's affidavit. Express provision is made by Order XXXVII., r. 2, that "in references in Admiralty actions, evidence may be given by affidavit." Order XXXVIII., r. 28, which deals with the cross-examination of deponents, does not apply to references. There is no power to compel a person resident abroad to come over to this country for cross-examination :

Concha v. Concha, 55 L. T. Rep. N. S. 522 ; 11 App. Cas. 541.

If the court should think that the plaintiff ought to be cross-examined, the proper procedure is to issue a commission for that purpose.

Joseph Walton, for the defendants, contra.—The registrar was entitled to say that in the circumstances he would not accept the plaintiff's affidavit. He has a discretion, and in the present case was justified in exercising it as he has done. Order XXXVIII., r. 28, is applicable to the present case. It is to be noticed that in this case the deponent is not a mere witness, but the plaintiff. No sufficient reason has been shown why the plaintiff is unable to attend.

Hall, Q.C. in reply.

BUTT, J.—I think the proper course in this case is for the registrar to receive the affidavit of the plaintiff, but I think he is perfectly within his rights if he refuses to find the facts alleged in that affidavit to be proved by it unless and until there has been a cross-examination in some way or another, either here or abroad, of this deponent. That I understand to be substantially the view that the registrar has taken. It may be doubtful whether the registrar has power to require the cross-examination, either here or in France, of the plaintiff. I am far from saying that it could not be done under the rules, but I do not think it necessary to decide whether it may. I think the practice — which to my mind is entirely conformable to common sense—is, that the registrar has power to say, "I am not satisfied with the evidence as it stands, and before I go any further I require the deponent's cross-examination." That, I think, is a matter within, and strictly within, the discretion of the registrar. If that be so, the next question which arises is, how is that discretion to be exercised? Is it to be exercised by issuing a commission to the place of residence of the plaintiff, which is Granville, in the north of France; or should it be exercised in the way the registrar preferred by requiring the cross-examination here? To my mind, in exercising that discretion there is a material difference when you are dealing with a party to the suit and an ordinary witness in the suit. If the deponent is resident abroad, and is a mere witness for the plaintiff, it may be, and very likely would be, absolutely impossible for the plaintiff to produce him for cross-examination here. And then very great injustice would be done to the plaintiff in ordering him to do something which it would be wholly out of his power to do. The case is different where the plaintiff is the deponent, because he has it in his power, subject to one matter for consideration, to come or stay away.

There is another consideration to be kept in sight in exercising discretion of this sort, and it is convenience and expense. It is one thing to require a man, a party to a suit, to come, for instance, from Brazil, to submit himself for cross-examination; it is another where that man is resident in France, and within a few hours' distance. I think that again is a matter to be taken into consideration by the registrar, and I confess, if the plaintiff is in a position and state of health to allow of his coming, I think the registrar is exercising his discretion in a reasonable manner in saying, "I won't order him to come, but I won't give effect to his affidavit till he does come." The exact state of things with regard to the plaintiff I don't know. It is said he was ill, but I don't think any evidence of that was given, and that being so, I think the registrar was perfectly entitled to take the course which substantially he has taken and say, "I shall hold my hand in this matter until the plaintiff comes here and submits to cross-examination." In that view I concur, and if I made an order in the matter it would be a similar order, but always subject to an application to take the evidence abroad on the ground that the plaintiff is really unable to come, i.e., too ill to come within a reasonable time. That being my view, I don't think there is anything that I have decided which is really in conflict with the decision of the Lords Justices in the case of Concha v. Concha (ubi sup.). Still less do I think so, having regard to the fact that the case has been to the House of Lords, and that they put it merely as a matter of discretion. It seems to me it is less expensive and more convenient, where a man resides in France, for him to come over and be cross-examined on his own affidavit than to issue a commission there. I think, therefore, the discretion is with the registrar, and that it has been properly exercised by his expressing an opinion that the plaintiff ought to come over. But it is entirely within his discretion to accept the affidavit or refuse it, or if the circumstances warrant it to say the cross-examination should take place under a commission in France.

THE VINDOBALA. (a)

Co-ownership action—Freight—Marine insurance—Managing owner—Liability of trading owners.

The purchaser of shares in a ship during the progress of a voyage is only entitled to share in the net freight after all the expenses incidental to earning the freight on the voyage in question have been deducted from the gross freight.

The purchaser of shares in a ship, which have been insured in mutual insurance clubs by the managing owner with the authority of the vendor, is not liable in the absence of agreement to contribute to the payment of calls in respect of the insurance.

Where a ship is being worked by part of her owners, the remainder being dissentient, and losses result from her employment, such losses are to be borne, not in the proportion which each share of the working owners bears to the whole sixty-four shares, but in the proportion which each share bears to the number of shares held by the persons working the ship.

Where a managing owner with the authority of his co-owners entered into negotiations as to chartering their ship, and for that purpose signed and sent to the proposed charterers a form of charter fixing the ship for a certain voyage at a certain rate of freight, and the charter was returned finally signed by the charterers, but altered as to certain minor provisions, the fact that some of the co-owners gave notice in writing to the managing owner after he had signed the charter, but before it had been signed by the charterers, that they refused to be bound by it, did not relieve them from liability in respect of it.

Where part owners wrongfully institute an action of restraint and arrest the ship therein, it is the duty of the managing owner to take all reasonable steps to minimise the losses and expenses consequent on such arrest, and the arresting owners are not liable for such losses and expenses after a reasonable time has elapsed within which such steps could have been taken.

THIS was an action by E. J. and C. H. Walker as executors of Robert Dickinson, deceased, to recover contribution from the defendants as part owners of the s.s. Vindobala, in respect of expenses incurred by Dickinson and the plaintiffs as managing owners in relation to the management and insurance of the vessel.

The facts were presented to the court in the form of a special case, and on the 6th Aug. 1886 the claim was referred to the registrar and merchants to report on the accounts upon the facts stated in the special case.

The reference having been heard, the Registrar made the following report:—

The various questions raised in the action were originally presented to the court in the form of a special case on the 6th Aug. 1886. Butt, J., then, before entering upon a consideration of these questions, made the following order of reference to the registrar and merchants, viz.: To report on the accounts upon the facts stated in such special case, with liberty to the registrar to call for further evidence as he might think necessary.

In pursuance of that order the parties finally arranged to meet on the 10th March in the present year, and it was then found necessary as a preliminary to going into various questions of account that I should consider several of the points of law raised in the special case, on which, if possible, I should have greatly preferred to have been guided by the previous decision of the court. A brief statement of the facts, which are fully set forth in the special case, is desirable, to indicate the nature of the points in dispute.

The plaintiffs are E. J. Walker and C. H. Walker, executors of R. Dickinson, who, to the date of his death, on the 9th Sept. 1884, was managing owner of the ship Vindobala and held twenty shares in her. The defendants are the remaining owners of that ship, some, viz., W. Dickinson and C. Leslie, by recent transfer of shares. The first question is whether a certain charter-party which bears date Amsterdam, the 17th July 1884, and which had been the subject of negotiation for many days previously, was binding on all the then owners of the ship, including the ten defendants, called the Bell defendants, who owned fourteen sixty-fourths of the ship, and who on the 19th July 1884 caused a notice to be given to the managing owner that they declined to continue sailing the vessel in the depressed state of trade, or to be bound in any way by any new charter. I came to the conclusion that such notice was given too late, and consequently that the charter of the 17th July 1884 was binding on all. That charter provided that the ship should proceed to Riga and there load a cargo of timber for Amsterdam, Zaandam, &c. When this charter was negotiated, the ship was on a voyage to Bilbao and thence to Rotterdam with cargo, and it was contemplated by the managing owner that, instead of proceeding to Riga in ballast, she should take out a cargo to the Baltic on owners' account, and leave for that purpose was given by the charter of 17th July. Accordingly on the 28th July the managing owner entered into a charter-party with Messrs. Pyman, Bell, and Co. for carrying a cargo of coals from the Tyne to Swinemunde in the Baltic, whence the ship was to proceed to Riga to load her timber. Viewing this second charter-party which, though of later date, was to be performed, first, as a proper and necessary complement to the charter of 17th July, I have determined that it also is binding on all the owners. On the 3rd Aug. the ship, having delivered the cargo from Bilbao to Rotterdam, arrived in the Tyne and proceeded to load the cargo of coals. On the 5th Aug. when the ship was cleared and about to sail she was arrested in an action of restraint at the suit of the Bell defendants, who had given the notice before mentioned. Many communications then took place between the solicitors for the Bell defendants and the managing owner, but without any agreement being come to for the release of the ship, and in fact she was not released until about the 23rd Dec. 1884 under the circumstances hereinafter stated. In consequence of these proceedings the greater part of the crew were discharged early in September. On the 9th Sept. R. Dickinson, the managing owner, died, and on the 18th Sept. the charter of the 17th July was cancelled by agreement between the charterer and E. J. Walker, one of the said R. Dickinson's executors. As regards the coal charter no arrangement was come to, and the coals remained on board the vessel. On the 16th Oct. Mr. E. J. Walker issued a circular to each of the then owners, giving notice of a meeting to be held on the 21st Oct. to appoint another managing owner in lieu of Mr. R. Dickinson, and to make arrangements for the future management. This meeting was attended by owners or representatives of owners holding fifty-six shares, of whom the holders of thirty shares voted for Mr. E. J. Walker as managing owner, the holder of twenty-one shares, voted against him, and the holders of five shares did not vote at all. No other person was proposed as managing owner. The Bell defendants gave written notice the same day that they did not recognise Mr. E. J. Walker as their agent in any way.

Under the circumstances stated, I am of opinion that Mr. Walker by this vote was entitled to assume the position of managing owner, and to act as such, though bound to recognise the notices received from the owners who dissented from the employment of the ship. A few days later, viz., on the 26th Oct., the cargo of coals on board the ship took fire by spontaneous combustion. The fire was afterwards extinguished, and on the advice of the surveyors the remainder was unloaded and landed at a wharf on the Tyne by direction of E. J. Walker. This misfortune also necessarily led to increased expense and loss. At length on the 2nd Dec. Mr. E. J. Walker instructed his solicitor to enter an appearance in the action commenced on the 5th Aug., and after much difficulty and delay bail for the safe return of the ship was eventually given on the 19th Dec. to the Bell defendants who were plaintiffs in that action, and the ship was released on the 23rd, and sailed under a charter-party entered into on the 10th Dec. by Mr. E. J. Walker as managing owner. The voyage was to Coosaw and back, and is known as voyage 15.

The above is a bare outline of this ship's history from July to Dec. 1884, and on these facts I have come to the following conclusions: As already stated, I have held that the notice given by the Bell defendants came too late to release them from responsibility for the engagements made for the ship by the charters of the 17th and 28th July respectively. It follows, if that conclusion is correct, that they were not justified in interfering with the execution of these contracts by arresting the ship on the 5th Aug., and refusing to release her without security for their interests being given by their co-owners, and consequently they are liable for the losses and expenses which naturally resulted from their action. The next question is, what is the limit of that liability? This would seem to depend upon what new duty was cast upon the managing owner by the arrest. We have considered that his best course would have been to consult the non-arresting owners and with their concurrence, if they would not bail the ship, to adopt with reasonable promptitude some other course that would minimise the loss and expense, such as to negotiate the cancellation of the charters, and failing in that to abandon them, throwing on the arresting owners in either case any loss that might ensue. Such a course, we think, allowing time for negotiations and communications, might have been decided upon by the 3rd Sept., on which day the greater part of the crew were in fact discharged. We hold therefore that the arresting owners are liable for all losses and expenses consequent on the arrest, which would have been incurred if these charters had been abandoned by that date, and that any other losses so resulting and subsequently incurred, other than the costs of the custody of the ship by the marshal during arrest, shall be borne by all the owners. In deciding, however, that the arresting owners are liable for losses as above stated, I am of opinion that such losses should not include damages, or, in other words, demurrage of the ship. Next, as to the losses arising from fire in the cargo of coals, considering the date of Mr. Dickinson's death, the 9th Sept., and the general circumstances of the case, including the fact that no managing owner was appointed in his place until the 21st Oct., a few days only before the fire, we consider that there is no evidence or presumption of such negligence as would render Mr. Dickinson's estate, or Mr. Walker as his successor, liable for those losses, and that they must fall rateably upon the holders of the whole sixty-four shares.

A separate question has arisen as to the defendant J. Bourne, owner of three shares. He was not one of the arresting owners, and security in respect of his shares was not given by the bail bond of the 19th Dec. 884, but, inasmuch as he had caused notice to be given on the 8th Aug. that he would not join in sailing the ship, we think he is to be considered a non-trading owner in respect of voyage 15, although no further notice was given on his behalf until after the voyage commenced. As regards three other defendants, namely, Messrs. John Dickinson, W. Renton, and W. Riley, who were present at the meeting of the 21st Oct., and voted against the appointment of Mr. E. J. Walker, as managing owner, inasmuch as they were not included in the non-trading notice given on behalf of the Bell defendants, or in any similar notice until the close of that year, they must be considered as participators in voyage 15. The trading owners for this voyage therefore held forty-seven shares. After the return of the ship from the fifteenth voyage in March 1885, a second action of restraint was brought on behalf of the Bell defendants in conjunction with Messrs. Bourne, Renton, and Riley before named, the two latter holding four shares, and subsequently bail was given to those plaintiffs for the safe return of the ship from her sixteenth voyage which was from the Tyne to Coosaw and back to Plymouth, which she reached on the 1st May 1885. In June 1885 further bail was given to the same plaintiffs in a further action for the safe return of the ship from her seventeenth voyage, which terminated at Glasgow.

Again, under the circumstances stated in paragraphs 126 to 133 inclusive of the special case, I have concluded that Mr. Leslie, who is now the holder of the twenty shares originally held by R. Dickinson deceased, and afterwards by Messrs. Walker as his executors, is entitled on the one hand to twenty forty-thirds of the freight earned on voyage 18, and on the other hand, he is liable for twenty forty-thirds of the expenses of earning such freight. Another point specially mooted has been in what proportion the profits or losses of the four voyages 15 to 18 inclusive should be credited or debited between the trading owners for each voyage respectively. It has been contended that the trading owners other than the managing owners are only liable in sixty-fourths instead of in forty-sevenths or forty-thirds, as the case may be, on the ground that it is not proved that such owners consented to increase or vary their interest in the working of the ship. The conclusion, however, which we have come to is, that under the circumstances of this case such consent is to be inferred. The grounds for this conclusion are shortly these. On the 16th Aug. 1884, a few days after the arrest of the ship by the Bell defendants, a printed letter was sent by Mr. Dickinson, the then managing owner, to each of the other owners, informing them of the arrest, of the circumstances under which that step was taken and persisted in, and generally of the hostile action of the Bell defendants, and their refusal to join in navigating the ship. This was followed by the circular of the 16th Oct., which notified to each owner that, in consequence of Mr. Dickinson's death, it became necessary to appoint another managing owner, and to make arrangements for the further management of the ship, and invited each owner to attend the meeting of owners for the purpose named. That meeting took place on the 21st Oct., as previously stated, when Mr. E. J. Walker was appointed managing owner, and shortly afterwards, on the 8th Nov., Mr. E. J. Walker sent out a printed circular to the owners, in which he says: "You are aware the steamer has been laid up under arrest at the instigation of certain shareholders. However, I am making such arrangements as I hope will enable me to get the steamer under weigh again, and I trust you will favour me with your support to accomplish this. I have payable business in hand for the vessel." After these various notices, and in the absence of any objection to the course adopted by Mr. Walker, except from that limited number who have been termed non-trading owners, we consider it is right and equitable to assume that Mr. Walker had authority to trade with the ship on behalf of those who are termed trading owners, and that the profits or losses of each voyage must be credited or debited amongst them rateably according to the shares in the ship respectively held by such trading owners. By arrangement between the parties, the accounts have been made out by an accountant, in accordance with the views above stated, and the result, up to the date to which the accounts extend, is set forth in the statement hereto annexed, which shows the amount recoverable by the plaintiffs from each set of defendants in this action.

According to the special case it appeared that the charter-party of the 17th July differed in certain terms from the form of charter originally proposed by the managing owner to the charterer —viz. in this, that, whereas in the original draft the ship was to be cleared free of commission, and the owner and master were to have an absolute right of lien on the cargo for all freight, dead freight, and demurrage, and all other charges whatsoever, these provisions were not in the charter as signed. It also appeared that, whereas the charter was signed by the managing owner on the 17th July, it was not signed by the charterer till the 22nd July.

With regard to the defendant Leslie, it appeared that he had bought his shares during the prosecution of a voyage, but that the registrar had debited him with all the expenses incidental to earning the freight, including expenses incurred prior to his becoming owner of the shares. It also appeared that at the time he bought his shares they had been insured in mutual insurance clubs, and that the plaintiffs sought to make him liable in respect of calls. When he bought the shares nothing was said about the insurance. He after the purchase of these shares became managing owner.

The plaintiffs and defendants objected to the above report, and now applied to the court to vary the same.

The plaintiffs objected to the report for the following reasons: (1.) Because the Bell defendants were not held liable for the whole of the losses and expenses which ensued upon the arrest including the damage to the coals by fire. (2.) Because it was not found by the report whether Leslie should pay certain claims of insurance clubs in which his shares were insured when he bought them, and that it should have been found that he ought to pay them.

The Bell defendants, including Leslie and Bourne, objected to the report for the following reasons: (1.) Because they were not bound by the charters of July 1884, and were not liable to any losses and expenses incidental to the charters. (2.) Because they were entitled under the circumstances to arrest the vessel. (3.) Because, if not so entitled, they were only liable for the expenses of putting in bail. (4.) Because the losses, expenses, and damages should be borne by the estate of Robert Dickinson or by E. J. Walker. (5.) Because Leslie was not liable for any debts or liabilities incurred by the managing owners prior to the date of the purchase of his shares, and was entitled to receive his share of the freight without any deduction for the expenses of earning such freight prior to the purchase of the shares.

The Craven defendants objected to the report for the following reasons: (1.) Because the losses consequent on the arrest subsequently to the 3rd Sept. are debited to all the owners, whereas they should be borne either by the Bell defendants or by Dickinson. (2.) Because as to voyages 15 to 18 inclusive, the trading owners are made liable in forty-sevenths and forty-thirds, and not in sixty-fourths only.

Sir Walter Phillimore and J. G. Barnes for the Bell defendants.—The Bell defendants gave notice to the managing owner that they would not be bound by any new charter before the charter of the 17th July was concluded. True, it was signed by the managing owner before the notice was given, but it was not signed by the charterer till subsequently. Moreover the concluded charter differs in certain material provisions from the form of charter originally sent by the managing owner to the charterer, and therefore it was the duty of the managing owner to break off negotiations when he found that the charterer would not accept his terms. [BUTT, J.—Is there such a difference between the two forms of charter as would entitle a reasonable man without breach of faith to break off negotiations?] Yes; the provision in the first form that the ship was to be cleared free of commission is wanting in the concluded charter, and the very important provision giving the ship a lien on the cargo for freight, dead freight, and demurage is also left out in the concluded charter. It is admitted that, if the Bell defendants are bound by the charter of the 17th July, they are also bound by the charter of the 28th July. But, if they are not bound by the charter of the 17th July, then they are not liable to bear any part of the losses and expenses incidental to the two charters, or in respect of the coals. For the same reason they were entitled to arrest the ship. Even assuming they were not entitled to arrest the ship the managing owner ought to have put in bail within a reasonable time, and had he done so much expense and loss would have been saved. It is also submitted that Leslie is not liable for any debts incurred by the managing owners prior to the date of his purchase of the shares, and that he is entitled to his share of the freight without any deduction for the expenses of earning it before such date. The managing owner was not his agent to incur such debts, and therefore he is not liable to pay them.

J. P. Aspinall for Leslie, one of the Bell defendants.

Carver for the plaintiffs.—The Bell defendants are liable for the expenses incidental to the charters. The charter-party of the 17th July was really in substance concluded before the Bell defendants sent their notice of objection. True, the precise form had not then been agreed upon, but the ship was in fact fixed for a certain voyage at a certain rate. [BUTT, J.—My view is, that if the state of affairs was such that the managing owner could not have withdrawn without breach of good faith, I ought to hold that these co-owners were bound by the charter.] It was only a question of form as to how the parties should carry out a binding engagement already made. The arrest was wrongful, and therefore these defendants are liable for all the consequences, including the loss by fire. But for the arrest those losses would never have occurred. Leslie is only entitled to a share in the net freight. A voyage is a partnership adventure and to arrive at the profits due to the partners it must be taken as a whole. The accounts must be taken, and each partner debited with his share of the expense of earning the freight:

Green v. Briggs, 17 L. J. 323, Eq.; 6 Hare, 395;
Doddington v. Hallett, 1 Ves. sen. 496.

To decide otherwise would be to say that the managing owner has not a first charge upon the freight, which according to all the authorities he has. The vendee buys from the vendor on the assumption that the managing owner will satisfy himself out of the freight before it is divided. Leslie is also liable for the claims of the insurance clubs in respect of his twenty shares. The policies were taken out for the benefit of all the co-owners, and to that benefit he succeeded on becoming a co-owner.

Bruce, Q.C., Joseph Walton, and Simey for the Craven defendants.—The Bell defendants were liable to the losses incidental to the two charters, and also to all the losses consequent on the arrest. Assuming them to be liable only up to the 3rd Sept., then the managing owner is liable for the losses subsequent to that date. It was his duty to take all the necessary steps to procure the release of the ship. Leslie is only entitled to share in the net freight:

Alexander v. Simms, 18 Beav. 80; 23 L. J. 791, Ch.;
Maclachlan's Merchant Shipping, p. 100.

The Craven defendants are not liable in forty-sevenths and forty-thirds, but only in sixty-fourths. The proper way of ascertaining their liabilities is to divide the losses into sixty-fourths. They never consented to work the ship so as to increase their liabilities in the way found by the registrar.

Sir Walter Phillimore and Barnes in reply.—The Bell defendants were in the circumstances entitled to arrest the ship:

The Talca, 42 L. T. Rep. N. S. 61; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 226; 5 P. Div. 169;
The England, 56 L. T. Rep. N. S. 896; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 140; 12 Prob. Div. 32.

Leslie is not liable to pay these expenses, because they were incurred without his authority. The managing owner made these disbursements on the authority of the then co-owners. It is a mistake to say the managing owner has a lien upon the freight. This was expressly pointed out by Wigram, V.C. in Green v. Briggs (ubi sup.). He has a right of set-off, provided that when the account is taken the owners are the same persons who were owners when he made the disbursements. Suppose the freight does not pass through his hands, then clearly his only remedy is to sue those owners on whose behalf the disbursements were made. Leslie is not liable for the insurance calls. He never authorised the insurance, nor did he get any benefit from it.

Carver in reply.—Leslie by buying shares impliedly agreed to indemnify the managing owner in respect of the liabilities attaching to those shares. One of those liabilities was the insurance on the shares which is part of the current expenses of working a ship. The Talca (ubi sup.) was wrongly decided, and is inconsistent with The Maxima (39 L. T. Rep. N. S. 112; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 21). [BUTT, J.—The Talca always was unintelligible to me.] In that case the managing owner had the plaintiffs' authority to charter the ship, and it is difficult to see how that authority could be withdrawn after the ship was chartered.

Cur. adv. vult.

Jan. 17.—BUTT, J.—This is an action between co-owners of the ship Vindobala. A special case was stated for the judgment of the court. It was stated at very considerable length, and the facts were somewhat involved. It therefore appeared to me that at that stage of the case it was impossible to know what the precise questions for the determination of the court were, until the accounts of a number of voyages which the ship had performed had been taken. I therefore made an order referring the matter to the registrar. He has gone into the accounts with the assistance of a professional accountant. While on the one hand it was impossible for me to ascertain what the questions for decision really were until the accounts had been taken, it was equally impossible for the registrar to settle the accounts without determining a number of matters of principle and questions of law which are now dealt with in his report. On that report the case now comes before me. The facts are sufficiently stated in the special case and in the report, and it is therefore unnecessary for me to recapitulate them. I shall therefore proceed to deal with the questions raised before me, assuming that the facts are such as appear in the special case and in the report. The first question for consideration is this: Certain of the defendants, known as the Bell defendants because one of them has the name of Bell, contend that they were not bound by the terms of a certain charter-party dated the 17th July 1884, which had been entered into by the managing owner, Mr. Dickinson, on behalf of all concerned. Their contention was, that before the contract of charter was actually signed, they on the 19th July gave the managing owner notice that they declined to continue sailing the vessel or to be bound by the new charter. On the 17th, and perhaps before that date, the charter had been signed by the managing owner, but it had not been signed by the charterers. The contract of charter had then been concluded subject to certain minor questions, and in my judgment Mr. Dickinson could not have honourably refused to agree to it. In the words of the brokers, "the ship was fixed." I hold that the Bell defendants, having empowered him to contract for them, could not require him to hold his hand and refuse to sign when it was too late for him to do so without a breach of faith on his part. They therefore were, in my judgment, bound by the charter-party which bears date the 17th July 1884. With respect to the next charter-party, dated the 28th July, it is admitted that it being merely supplementary to the earlier one, the Bell defendants would be bound by it if parties to the earlier charter. These defendants being, as I hold, bound by the charter-party, had no right to arrest the ship as they did, and are liable for any damage resulting from their wrongful act. I think the registrar has exercised a reasonable and proper discretion in holding them liable for the loss up to the 3rd Sept., and in refusing to make them pay for the damages resulting from the fire which on the 26th Oct. broke out on board the ship and injured the cargo.

The next question relates to a co-owner called Leslie. He became the purchaser of certain shares which had belonged to Mr. Dickinson, the managing owner, in the first place, and afterwards to his executors. He was not a direct purchaser, but an intervening purchaser, during the prosecution of one of the later voyages. The first question raised in regard to Leslie is this: The voyage was in course of prosecution when he purchased his shares. It is contended, on the one side, that he is not liable to pay a share of the outfit and expenses involved in the preparation for that voyage. On the other hand, it is said that the proper way to ascertain the position of a shareholder purchasing after the commencement of a voyage is to state accounts, and to charge him with the expenditure incurred from the outset, and credit him with his share of the profit. What the registrar has done is this: he has dealt with that voyage by debiting Leslie with his share of the expenditure incurred for the prosecution of the voyage, and by crediting him with his share of the freight. I think that is the proper way of dealing with the matter. It is a question which has previously been discussed, and with reference to which there does not always appear to have been entire unanimity of opinion. In the case of Doddington v. Hallett (1 Ves. sen. 497) Lord Hardwicke had this question under consideration; and, when dealing with the proper mode of stating accounts in such circumstances, he observed that the court would never extend a partnership of this kind to affect purchasers beyond what the course of trade would do, which must govern in mercantile matters. But Lord Tenterden, in Ex parte Harrison (2 Rose, 76) and Ex parte Young (2 Vesey and Beames, 242), commenting on this passage, remarked that he apprehended that this usage of trade would not go so far as to carry back the charges against a purchaser to the expenditure on any antecedent adventure from which he could derive no profit. This seems to me to be an accurate exposition of the law, and I therefore am not inclined to interfere with this part of the registrar's report. It is in reference to Leslie that the question is raised as to his liability to pay certain calls to one or more insurance clubs. I tried to understand, during the argument, on what principle it was said he was to be liable for these calls, and I failed to see any reason for making him liable. At all events, I can find no evidence on which I think such liability arises.

I now come to the question raised with regard to certain other defendants, called the Craven defendants. Certain of the co-owners having declined to join in any further adventure of the ship, she was sent away in the ordinary course of business under charters by the managing owner, and the Craven defendants were not among the dissentient shareholders. The registrar, in dealing with the accounts, instead of following the usual plan in dealing with ships' accounts, and dividing the figures into sixty-fourths, has taken them in forty-thirds and forty-seventhss, this being the number of shares respectively owned at different times by the co-owners who had not dissented from the voyage. The Craven defendants contended that they are only liable for the proportion their shares bear to the whole number of sixty-fourths. But they had notice, and were perfectly well aware that the voyages were commenced, and that certain of the owners had disclaimed any part in the expenditure of those voyages. They allowed the matter to go on, and the managing owner sent the ship away in those circumstances on their behalf. It is perfectly clear to my mind that each and every one of them must be called upon to pay his quota of the total expenses; in other words, that they are liable in forty-thirds and forty-seventhss, as the case may be. It is clear that this question has arisen because there were no profits, and because there has been a loss. I think they intended to share the profits in forty-thirds and forty-seventhss if there had been a profit, and the same principle applies with regard to the expenditure. I therefore come to the conclusion that the view taken by the registrar was right, and I confirm the report. As the registrar has not dealt with the question of interest, the report must be referred back to him for that purpose, and also to enable him to state his recommendations as to costs.

THE LIFFEY. (a)

Salvage—Intention of salvor—Mistake of fact—Right to reward—Merchant Shipping Act 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104), ss. 450, 458.

Where a person renders services in the nature of salvage to a vessel which he at the time bonâ fide believes to be his own by purchase or otherwise, he is not precluded from recovering salvage reward in respect of such services because it turns out in fact that the vessel was not his property.

The provisions of sect. 450 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, requiring a person who finds or takes possession of a wreck to give notice to the receiver, are not applicable to the case of a person who takes possession of a stranded vessel under the belief that he is the purchaser thereof, and in such a case these provisions do not operate to deprive him of his right to recover salvage.

THIS was a mortgage action instituted by the mortgagees of the steamship Liffey, asking for judgment pronouncing for the validity of the mortgage, payment of the amount due under the mortgage, sale of the ship, and payment to the plaintiffs out of the proceeds.

In this action one W. H. Caple intervened and delivered a defence which, after denying that the plaintiffs were mortgagees, or that any money was due to them under the mortgage, alleged as follows:

4. Alternatively, prior to the 15th June 1887, one William McDougall, of Liverpool, was, with the authority, knowledge, and consent of the owners of the said steamship Liffey, and of the plaintiffs, manager and ship's husband of the said steamship, and acting as such.

5. On or about the 26th May last, whilst the said steamship was at anchor loading a cargo of iron she stranded at Marcross, in the Bristol Channel, in a dangerous position, and did herself so much damage that she was likely to become a total loss.

6. The said William McDougall, acting as manager and ship's husband as aforesaid, thereupon took steps to ascertain the position of the said vessel and the cost of attempting to get her off the beach, and of repairing the said steamship, and having discovered, as the fact was, that the said steamship was seriously damaged and in a most critical position, and that the costs of floating her and of repairing her in the event of her being got off would be very great, determined, with the authority of the said owners and with the knowledge and consent of the plaintiffs, to sell the said vessel as a wreck as she then lay for the benefit of all concerned, and the said vessel was thereupon put up to public auction as a wreck, but the bidding being insufficient she was not sold.

7. Subsequently, upon the 15th June 1887, the defendant entered into an agreement with the said William McDougall, acting with the authority, knowledge, and consent of the plaintiffs and the owners of the said ship, to purchase the said ship as she then lay wrecked for the sum of 120*l.*, and the said defendant intervening paid to the said William McDougall the said sum of 120*l.* and received therefor a receipt in the words and figures following:

"Cardiff, June 15, 1887. 120*l.* Received of Mr. William Henry Caple the sum of one hundred and twenty pounds, being the purchase money of the wrecked screw steamer Liffey, of Waterford, as she now lies wrecked on the bed near the Nash Point. For and by the authority of William McDougall, of 2, South Castle-street, Liverpool, SHORT and DUNN as agents."

8. The said defendant intervening thereupon took possession of the said wreck, and expended large sums of money in discharging the cargo and in fixing a false bottom in the ship, and in hiring tugs and men, and the said defendant intervening ultimately succeeded in floating the said ship and in bringing her into safety.

9. The plaintiffs always had full notice and knowledge of the facts stated in the foregoing paragraphs, and the said sale to the defendant was made with the knowledge and consent of the plaintiffs.

10. The said defendant intervening did not know that the plaintiffs had or claimed to have any title to or interest in the said steamship.

11. By reason of the premises, if the plaintiffs are entitled as mortgagees as alleged, which is denied, they have authorised and consented to the said sale to the defendant, and are not entitled to the relief claimed in this action.

12. Alternatively, the plaintiffs having the notice and knowledge aforesaid, and well knowing that the defendant was ignorant of their title, stood wilfully by and allowed the said ship to be sold, and allowed the said defendant intervening to pay the said purchase money, and to expend the moneys aforesaid and to do the work and labour upon the said ship, and the defendant is entitled against the plaintiffs to a confirmation of his title to the said ship, or to a full indemnity for the said sums so expended as aforesaid.

By way of counter-claim against the plaintiffs and the owners of the Liffey:

13. The defendant intervening repeats paragraphs 5 to 12 inclusive of his defence.

14. The defendant intervening has paid money and incurred expenses and done work and labour in and about the saving of the said steamer at the request of the plaintiffs and the defendants, the owners of the Liffey, or one or both of them.

15. Alternatively, the defendant intervening has rendered salvage services to the steamship Liffey, under circumstances set forth, whereby the said vessel was saved from total loss.

The defendant intervening counter-claims:

1. A declaration that the defendant intervening is entitled as purchaser under the agreement of June 15, 1887, to specific performance of the said agreement, and to a conveyance of the said steamship free from any charge or incumbrance in favour of the plaintiffs.

2. Possession of the said ship.

3. In the alternative an indemnity from the plaintiffs for the purchase money paid by the defendant intervening, and for the expenses incurred by floating the vessel and bringing her into safety.

4. In the alternative such an amount of salvage as may be just.

5. In the alternative 750*l.* for money paid by the said defendant intervening, and work and labour done by him at the request of and on behalf of the plaintiffs and the defendants, the owners of the said ship.

The plaintiffs at the trial having called evidence in support of their case, Sir Walter Phillimore, on behalf of Caple, stated that he abandoned the defence, but relied upon Caple's right to claim salvage.

Mr. Caple, whose testimony was confirmed by other witnesses, gave evidence to the effect that he believed a valid transfer of the vessel had been made to him, that he under the belief that he was owner had expended money in rescuing the vessel from her position, and had thereby saved her from total loss.

Sir Walter Phillimore (with him J. P. Aspinall) for Caple.—My client is entitled to salvage. The circumstances of the case bring it directly within sect. 458 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854. The intention of the person saving the property is immaterial. [Sir JAMES HANNEN.—It strikes me thus: Suppose a derelict to be brought into harbour by persons who, in ignorance of the law, think that the vessel being derelict becomes their property. Could it be said that because they saved the ship under the impression that she belonged to them they were to get no reward?] Exactly. If all the ingredients of a salvage service are present, as they are here, salvage reward ought to be given:

The Purissima Concepcion, 3 W. Rob. 181;
The Favourite, 2 W. Rob. 255.

J. G. Barnes, for the mortgagees, contra.—Caple is not entitled to salvage. The services were never meant to be salvage, and cannot now be treated as salvage services. No one authorised Caple to expend this money, and hence he must bear the loss. Caple is also precluded by statute from recovering salvage. Sect. 450 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 provides that all claim to salvage is forfeited if a person who finds or takes possession of the wreck does not give immediate notice thereof to the receiver. (a) Caple has not complied with the requirements of this enactment, and has therefore forfeited all claims to salvage.

Sir Walter Phillimore.— Sect. 450 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 was never meant to apply to such a case as the present:

Sir Henry Constable's case, 2 Inst. 167;
Rex v. Property Derelict, 1 Hagg. 383.

Sir JAMES HANNEN.—I am glad that the view which I take of this case has also been taken by others before me. In this court happily we deal with matters on equitable principles, and we are not tied down to the strict rules of the common law. It appears to me that, on every principle of justice, this man must be entitled to something in the nature of salvage. I believe what he did was salvage, and nothing else. It is perfectly true that what he did was under a complete mistake of fact, but it was an honest mistake of fact which would naturally lead him to think that the property which was put up for sale by the auctioneers was property which they had authority to sell, and he thought he had bought it. Unfortunately for him it turns out that that which he thought had taken place, namely, a transfer of the property to him, did not take place, because neither the owners nor the mortgagees had in fact authorised the sale. What was his position in these circumstances? I shall assume for this purpose that he has done that which was necessary for the purpose of rescuing this vessel from the position in which she was; and I am of opinion, as a matter of fact, that she was in a very dangerous position, and that if she had not been rescued from it she would have been lost to everybody. It is perfectly true that, if McDougall, whose name has been so often mentioned in the matter, had, as it would seem he has not, done his duty, the owners of the ship would have had an opportunity of exercising their judgment; but they had not that opportunity. That was no fault of the salvor, Mr. Caple, and he proceeded to do the best he could. I cannot enter into the question of whether his expenditure was proper or judicious. I shall assume that what he did was judicious. The best proof that it must have been so is, that what he did was done under the impression that he was the owner, and therefore it is inconceivable he would not have tried to save the vessel at the least possible expense. Why is he not entitled to salvage? Mr. Barnes says he is not because what he did was not done with the idea and intention of being a salvor. I am of opinion that that has nothing to do with the matter. It is perfectly plain that salvage does not depend upon any express contract, because the whole thing could be done without the shipowner having any knowledge on the subject; but once being done, then by reason of the facts the shipowner becomes liable to do that which is right and fair, viz., to make a compensation to the man who has restored to him property which but for his exertions would have been lost. In my judgment it makes no difference whatever with what idea the man has rendered the services. He renders them under the mistaken idea that it is for himself. He is entitled when the facts are discovered to say: "I made a mistake; I thought I was doing it for myself. But it is not fair or equitable that you should take possession of this property without making a proper compensation to me for the exertions which I have made on your behalf."

With regard to the Act of Parliament to which my attention has been called, I am of opinion that the facts of this case are not within it. That section was intended to apply to the case of a man finding property and not making it known to the Receiver of Wreck. But the salvor here did not find this property within the meaning of the Act. He thought he was taking possession of his own property. Nor did he in fact find it; it was handed over to him by somebody under the idea that there was a transfer made of the property, and there was no finding in the case. Therefore I am of opinion that Mr. Caple is entitled to salvage, but the exact amount I am not in a position to fix until I know what the value of the vessel is. As it is agreed by all parties I decree a sale of the vessel, and then when the proceeds are paid into court I will give my award. I of course decree the validity of the mortgage, but reserve all questions of priority.

The ship was subsequently sold for 195*l*., from which 48*l*. 16*s*. 5*d*. was deducted for marshal's expenses, and on Nov. 1 Sir James Hannen awarded 73*l*. as salvage.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Dec. 8, 9, 1887, and Feb. 24, 1888.

(Before Lords HERSCHELL, BRAMWELL, WATSON, and MACNAGHTEN.)

MILLS v. ARMSTRONG AND ANOTHER; THE BERNINA. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF APPEAL IN ENGLAND.

Collision — Both ships in fault — Passenger — Loss of life — Liability of owners — Lord Campbell's Act 1846 (9 & 10 Vict. c. 93).

Where passengers and seamen off duty are killed in a collision between two ships, both of which are to blame, the deceased are not identified with their carrying ship so as to be deemed to be guilty of contributory negligence, and their personal representatives are entitled under Lord Campbell's Act to maintain actions against the owners of the non-carrying ship.

Thorogood v. Bryan (8 C. B. 115; 18 L. J. 336, C. P.) overruled.

THIS was an appeal from a judgment of the Court of Appeal (Lord Esher, M.R., Lindley and Lopes, L.JJ.), reported in 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 75; 56 L. T. Rep. N. S. 258; and 12 P. Div. 58), who had reversed a judgment of Butt, J., reported in 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 577; 54 L. T. Rep. N. S. 449; and 11 P. Div. 31, upon a special case.

The action was brought under Lord Campbell's Act (9 & 10 Vict. c. 93) against the owners of the ship Bernina by the personal representatives of two persons who were on board the Bushire, a British ship, and were killed in consequence of a collision with the Bernina, which was also a British ship. The collision was the fault of both ships, but the deceased persons, who were a passenger and engineer off duty, had nothing to do with the negligence which caused the accident.

The facts, which were not disputed, are fully set out in the reports in the courts below.

Butt, J. held that he was bound by the decision in the case of Thorogood v. Bryan (8 C. B. 115; 18 L. J. 336 C. P.), and gave judgment for the defendants, but his decision was reversed, as above mentioned.

The owners of the Bernina appealed to the House of Lords.

Sir W. Phillimore and J. G. Barnes appeared for the appellants.

Bucknill, Q.C. and Nelson for the respondents.

It was admitted that, if the case of Thorogood v. Bryan was good law, the present case fell within it, and the sole question in the argument was, as to whether that decision could be sustained.

In addition to the cases cited in the judgment, the following were also referred to:

Cattlin v. Hills, 8 C. B. 123;
Read v. Great Eastern Railway Company, 18 L. T. Rep. N. S. 82; L. Rep. 3 Q. B. 555;
Rigby v. Hewitt, 5 Ex. 240;
Greenland v. Chaplin, 5 Ex. 243;
Child v. Hearn, L. Rep. 9 Ex. 176;
Dudman v. Dublin Port and Docks Board, 7 Ir. Rep. Com. L. 518;
Lockhart v. Lichtenthaler, 46 Penn. 151;
Wabash, St. Louis, and Pacific Railway Company v. Shacklet, 44 Amer. Rep. 791; Borough of Carlisle v. Brisbane, 57 Amer. Rep. 483, 488.

(a) Reported by C. E. MALDEN, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

At the conclusion of the arguments their Lordships took time to consider their judgment.

Feb. 24.—Their Lordships gave judgment as follows:—

Lord HERSCHELL. — My Lords: This appeal arises upon a special case stated in actions in which the respondents are plaintiffs. They are both actions brought under Lord Campbell's Act to recover damages against the appellants for the loss sustained owing to the deaths of the persons of whom the respondents are the personal representatives; and it is alleged that they lost their lives through the negligence of the appellants. The appellants are the owners of the steamship Bernina, between which vessel and the steamship Bushire a collision took place, which led to the loss of fifteen persons, who were on board the latter vessel. It is admitted that the collision was caused by the fault or default of the master and crew of both vessels. J. H. Armstrong, whose administratrix one of the respondents is, was a member of the crew of the Bushire, but had nothing to do with its careless navigation. M. A. Toeg, of whom the other respondent is administratrix, was a passenger on board the Bushire. The question arises whether under these circumstances the appellants are liable. The appellants having, as they admit, been guilty of negligence from which the respondents have suffered loss, a primâ facie case of liability is made out against them. How do they defend themselves? They do not allege that those whom the respondents represent were personally guilty of negligence which contributed to the accident. Nor, again, do they allege that there was contributory negligence on the part of any third person standing in such a legal relation towards the deceased men as to cause the acts of that third person, on principles well settled in our law, to be regarded as their acts as, e.g., the relation of master and servant or employer and agent acting within the scope of his authority. But they rest their defence solely upon the ground that those who were navigating the vessel in which the deceased men were being carried were guilty of negligence, without which the disaster would not have occurred. In support of the proposition that this establishes a defence, they rely upon the case of Thorogood v. Bryan (8 C. B. 115), which undoubtedly does support their contention. This case was decided as long ago as 1849, and has been followed in some other cases; but, though it was early subjected to adverse criticism, it has never come for revision before a Court of Appeal until the present occasion. That action was one brought under Lord Campbell's Act against the owner of an omnibus by which the deceased man was run over and killed. The omnibus in which he had been carried had set him down in the middle of the road instead of drawing up to the kerb, and before he could get out of the way he was run over by the defendant's omnibus, which was coming along at too rapid a pace to be able to pull up. The learned judge directed the jury that, "if they were of opinion that want of care on the part of Barber's omnibus in not drawing up to the kerb to put the deceased down, or any want of care on the part of the deceased himself, had been conducive to the injury, in either of those cases, notwithstanding the defendant, by her servant, had been guilty of negligence, their verdict must be for the defendant." The jury gave a verdict for the defendant, and the question was then raised on a rule for a new trial on the ground of misdirection, whether the ruling of the learned judge was right. The court held that it was.

It is necessary to examine carefully the reasoning by which this conclusion was arrived at. Coltman, J. said: "It appears to me that, having trusted the party by selecting the particular conveyance, the plaintiff has so far identified himself with the owner and his servants, that if any injury results from their negligence, he must be considered a party to it. In other words, the passenger is so far identified with the carriage in which he is travelling, that want of care of the driver will be a defence of the driver of the carriage which directly caused the accident." Maule and Vaughan Williams, JJ. also dwelt upon this view of the identification of the passenger with the driver of the vehicle in which he is being carried. The former thus expressed himself: "I incline to think that, for this purpose, the deceased must be considered as identified with the driver of the omnibus in which he voluntarily became a passenger, and that the negligence of the driver was the negligence of the deceased." Vaughan Williams, J. said: "I think the passenger must for this purpose be considered as identified with the person having the management of the omnibus he was conveyed by." With the utmost respect for these eminent judges, I must say that I am unable to comprehend this doctrine of identification upon which they lay so much stress. In what sense is the passenger by a public stage coach, because he avails himself of the accommodation afforded by it, identified with the driver? The learned judges manifestly do not mean to suggest (though some of the language used would seem to bear that construction) that the passenger is so far identified with the driver that the negligence of the latter would render the former liable to third persons injured by it. I presume that they did not even mean that the identification is so complete as to prevent the passenger from recovering against the driver's master; though, if "negligence of the owner's servants is to be considered negligence of the passenger," or if he "must be considered a party" to their negligence, it is not easy to see why it should not be a bar to such an action. In short, as far as I can see, the identification appears to be effective only to the extent of enabling another person whose servants have been guilty of negligence to defend himself by the allegation of contributory negligence on the part of the person injured. But the very question that had to be determined was, whether the contributory negligence of the driver of the vehicle was a defence as against the passenger when suing another wrongdoer. To say that it is a defence because the passenger is identified with the driver, appears to me to beg the question, when it is not suggested that this identification results from any recognised principles of law, or has any other effect than to furnish that defence, the validity of which was the very point in issue. Two persons may no doubt be so bound together by the legal relation in which they stand to each other, that the acts of one may be regarded by the law as the acts of the other. But the relation between the passenger in a public vehicle, and the driver of it, certainly is not such as to fall within any of the recognised categories in which the act of one man is treated in law as the act of another.

I pass now to the other reasons given for the judgment in Thorogood v. Bryan. Maule, J. says: "On the part of the plaintiff it is suggested that a passenger in a public conveyance has no control over the driver. But I think that cannot with propriety be said. He enters into a contract with the owner, whom by his servant, the driver, he employs to drive him. If he is dissatisfied with the mode of conveyance he is not obliged to avail himself of it. But, as regards the present plaintiff, he is not altogether without fault; he chose his own conveyance, and must take the consequences of any default on the part of the driver whom he thought fit to trust." I confess I cannot concur in this reasoning. I do not think it well founded either in law or in fact. What kind of control has the passenger over the driver which would make it reasonable to hold the former affected by the negligence of the latter? And is it any more reasonable to hold him so affected because he chose the mode of conveyance, that is to say, drove in an omnibus rather than walked, or took the first omnibus that passed him instead of waiting for another? And when it is attempted to apply this reasoning to passengers travelling in steamships or on railways, the unreasonableness of such a doctrine is even more glaring. The only other reason given is contained in the judgment of Cresswell, J. in these words: "If the driver of the omnibus the deceased was in had by his negligence or want of due care and skill contributed to an injury from a collision his master clearly could maintain no action. And I must confess I see no reason why a passenger who employs the driver to convey him stands in any better position." Surely, with deference, the reason for the difference lies on the very surface. If the master in such a case could maintain no action, it is because there existed between him and the driver the relation of master and servant. It is clear that, if his driver's negligence alone had caused the collision, he would have been liable to an action for the injury resulting from it to third parties. The learned judge would, I imagine, in that case have seen a reason why a passenger in the omnibus stood in a better position than the master of the driver. I have now dealt with all the reasons on which the judgment in Thorogood v. Bryan was founded, and I entirely agree with the learned judges in the court below in thinking them inconclusive and unsatisfactory. I will not detain your Lordships further on this part of the case, beyond saying that I concur with the judgments of the learned judges in the court below, and specially with the very exhaustive judgment of Lord Esher, M.R.

It was suggested in the course of the argument that Thorogood v. Bryan might be supported on the ground that the allegation that the negligence which caused the injury was the defendant's was not proved, inasmuch as it was the defendant's negligence in conjunction with that of the driver of the other omnibus. It may be that, as a pleading point, this would have been good. It is not necessary to express an opinion whether it would or not. I do not think it would have been a defence on the merits if the facts had been properly averred. If, by a collision between two vehicles, a person unconnected with either vehicle were injured, the owner of neither vehicle, when sued, could maintain as a defence, "I am not guilty, because but for the negligence of another person the accident would not have happened." And I do not see how this defence is any more available as against a person being carried in one of the vehicles, unless the reasoning in Thorogood v. Bryan be well founded. I have said that the decision in Thorogood v. Bryan has not been unquestioned. I do not think it necessary to enter upon a minute consideration of the subsequent cases, after the careful and accurate examination to which they have been subjected by the Master of the Rolls. The result may be summarised thus: The learned editors of Smith's Leading Cases, Willes and Keating, JJ., strongly questioned the propriety of the decision in the notes to Ashby v. White (1 Sm. L. C.). Parke, B., whose dictum in Bridge v. The Grand Junction Railway Company (3 M. & W. 244) Williams, J. followed in directing the jury in Thorogood v. Bryan, appears to have doubted the soundness of the judgment in that case. Dr. Lushington, in The Milan (Lush. 388), expressed strong disapproval of it; and though in Armstrong v. The Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Company (33 L. T. Rep. N. S. 228; L. Rep. 10 Ex. 47) it was followed, and Bramwell and Pollock, BB., to say the least, did not indicate dissatisfaction with it, I understand that my noble and learned friend, Lord Bramwell, after hearing this case argued, and maturely considering it, agrees with the judgment of the court below. In Scotland the decision in Thorogood v. Bryan was pronounced unsatisfactory in Adams v. The Glasgow and South-Western Railway Company (3 Ct. Sess. Cas., 4th series, 215). In America it has been followed in the courts of some States, but it has often been departed from, and upon the whole the view taken has been decidedly adverse to it. The latest case that I am aware of in that country is Little v. Hacket (9 Davis Sup. Ct. U.S. 366). That was a decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, whose decisions, on account of its high character for learning and ability, are always to be regarded with respect. Field, J., in delivering judgment, examined all the English and American cases, and the conclusion adopted was the same as that at which your Lordships have arrived. I have only this observation to add. The case of Waite v. The North-Eastern Railway Company (E. B. & E. 719) was much relied on in the argument for the appellants; but the very learned counsel who argued that case for the defendants, and all the judges who took part in the decision, were of opinion that it was clearly distinguishable from Thorogood v. Bryan, and did not involve a review of that case. I think they were right. As regards the other questions argued before your Lordships, I have only to say that I think they were properly dealt with by the court below. I am requested by my noble and learned friend Lord Bramwell, who was unable to remain to read the opinion which he had prepared, to state that he concurs in the motion which I am about to make. (a) I move your Lordships that the judgment of the Court of Appeal be affirmed, and the appeal dismissed, with costs.

Lord WATSON.—My Lords: The appellants

(a) The opinion was as follows:—Lord BRAMWELL.—My Lords: These cases are to me cases of extreme difficulty. They are supposed to involve the same question as, and no other than, that in Thorogood v. Bryan (8 C. B. 115). I do not think so. I am reported, I have no doubt accurately, to have made some observations upon that case; but I can safely say, and it will be seen that I can consider those before us "loyally," to use an expression of Lord Esher, and unbiassed by anything I may have said before. Whether it was that that case could be or might be supported is immaterial. I think it was rightly decided, though not decisive of the cases before us. The plaintiff there was administratrix of a passenger in an omnibus who lost his life, we must take it, through the negligence of the driver of the omnibus in which he was a passenger, and the negligence of the driver of an omnibus belonging to the defendant. The negligence of the two drivers was not a joint act; the negligence of one was not the negligence of the other; each was separately guilty of an act of negligence, and the two acts caused the passenger's death. The plaintiff's case was, as stated in the declaration, that the defendant by her servant so carelessly drove and directed the carriage and horses, that by the negligence and improper conduct of her servants in that behalf they ran against the deceased and knocked him down, &c., and by reason of the premises he died. The plea was "not guilty," i.e., that the deceased was not struck and killed by the negligence of the defendant's driver. That that is the meaning of the plea is shown by what was said in Bridge v. Grand Junction Railway Company (3 M. & W. 244). It was for the plaintiff to prove that the deceased was killed by a negligent act of the defendant's driver: he did not prove it by showing he was killed by such negligent act, and by a separate negligent act in the driver of the omnibus in which the deceased rode. As I have said, he was killed not by a joint act of negligence by two persons, but by two separate acts of negligence of those two. If the owner of the omnibus in which the passenger was had sued the defendant, and had said in his declaration, as he would have done, that by the defendant's negligence his (the plaintiff's) omnibus was damaged, he would have failed to prove it, if there was contributory negligence of his own driver. The plea would have been not guilty; but if not guilty to such a declaration raised the defence of, "You say I did it; I did not, for without your negligence, it would not have happened"—if it raised, I say, the defence in one case, so it would in the other, viz., the case of the passenger. I hope I speak with no undue confidence, but I had many years' practice in special pleading, happily abolished, and have not a doubt that the declaration in Thorogood v. Bryan was not proved. It was not by and through the defendant's negligence the passenger was killed. If there had been nothing but that negligence the man would not have been killed. If he would have been, then the other negligence was not contributory. This is the ground on which I have thought Thorogood v. Bryan (ubi sup.) was rightly decided. It is true it is not so put by the court. The expression they used is, that the passenger was identified with the omnibus that carried him. Whether that is a right expression may be doubtful. I shall have to examine it further on. At present I will only observe that the four judges were great lawyers, and I believe that an experienced lawyer may be instinctively right without at the moment being able to give a good reason for his opinion. I confess that, at the commencement of the argument of the present cases, I thought this consideration decided them, but I am now satisfied that it does not. It is obvious that my opinion that Thorogood v. Bryan was rightly decided turns on a question of pleading, viz., that the plaintiff alleged that the defendant's negligence caused the injury which was not proved. But in the case before us there are no pleadings, and we must see whether the facts show a cause of action against the appellants. Now the facts are different as to the two cases. In one the plaintiff's case is: I was a passenger in the Bushire; that vessel contracted to carry me without negligence, they failed—broke their contract; you were owner of another vessel, it was your duty towards the public to navigate without negligence; by your breach of duty conceded in argument that, unless it can be shown that Thorogood v. Bryan (8 C. B. 115) is a valid precedent, they cannot succeed in this appeal. Although nearly forty years have elapsed since that case was decided, I think the rule which it established must still be dealt with upon and the breach of contract in the Bushire, I was injured, and claim damages of you. The case of the engineer of the Bushire differs from this, for he could not say that the owners contracted to carry him safely, because he undertook the risk of negligence in fellow-servants. But I suppose he might say that there was a duty to him in the other sailors to be careful in the performance of their share of the navigation. I have used the word "negligence;" but suppose there was no negligence nor want of skill, but only an error of judgment. The outside public I suppose might rely on that. But could a fellow-servant? I doubt it extremely. These then are the facts of the cases: Take that of the passenger first. Is it a good cause of action to say, I was a passenger in a ship, the owners of which had agreed with me that she should be navigated with care, skill, and judgment; you were owner of another ship, by your negligence and their negligence or want of skill or error of judgment which contributed to it, and without which it would not have happened, there was a collision, and I was injured; I may maintain an action for the damage against them, but I prefer to sue you. Is this a good statement of claim? Is a good cause of action shown? The language of the judges in Thorogood v. Bryan (ubi sup.) says "No." I have been unable to think of any other possible case in which a man could be successfully sued for an act which would have caused no injury to the plaintiff, except for another act in breach of a contract with the plaintiff by the man guilty of it, and for which the plaintiff could maintain an action against him. It is clear that the passenger could maintain an action against those who failed in their contract to carry him without negligence. Why should he also be able to maintain one against the defendants? Without the negligence of the servant of the man who had contracted to carry him safely there would have been no collision, no damage. The servant of the carrier of the plaintiff contributed to it. He has therefore helped the plaintiff to a cause of action, helped to cause the damage, but the whole damage is to be paid by the defendant. Can that be? Further, if the passenger can maintain an action, why cannot the owner of the carriage for injury to it? I know it was said during the argument that there was no case where an action had been maintained by a man who was responsible for the act of his servant in respect of an injury to the causing of which his servant had contributed. That is true; but why, unless on principles that justify the decision in Thorogood v. Bryan (8 C. B. 115)? The maxim Qui facit per alium facit per se does not apply. That maxim applies where the tortious act has been commanded by the "se." As for instance, where A. tells B. to beat C., or to build a house such that it will obstruct C.'s ancient lights. It does not apply to a case of negligence. The negligence of the servant is not commanded by the master. It is a breach of duty in the servant to the master. How then can he have commanded it? I cannot see why, if a passenger can maintain this action, the owner being a passenger and injured cannot. But I will put another case. Suppose the owner's wife is a passenger and injured, can she maintain such an action? If not, why not? The driver is not her servant, and she is not responsible for his negligence. Take a case a little more remote, a friend of the owner of the carriage. Can he maintain the action? If the driver of the omnibus gives a friend a gratis lift, can he maintain an action against the other omnibus, being injured by the combined effect of acts of negligence in each driver of the omnibuses? Does it not seem absurd that, if a man hires a carriage for a month with horses and driver, he and his family and friends may maintain such action, but not if his own coachman drives? Suppose the horses are jobbed, can the jobmaster maintain such action? If not, again I ask, why not? Further, if the passenger can maintain the action, clearly the owner of goods being carried which are injured by the negligence of the owner and the negligence of a third person conjoined, could maintain an action against the third person, and we should have what seems to me the ludicrous case of a collision between railways A. and B., injury to goods in each, and actions maintainable by owners of goods carried by A. against B., and of goods carried by B against A. when possibly neither had any remedy against his own carrier. It is to be remembered that the negligence of the driving is not a joint act. There are two several acts of negligence. If judgment is recovered against one of two joint wrongdoers, no second action is maintainable against the other. If two men were driving a carriage negligently and damage resulted, if an action was brought and judgment recovered against one, no second action could be maintained against the other. But if a passenger in one omnibus recovered against the owner of another omnibus, it is certain he could maintain an action against the owner of the omnibus in which he had been carried. What damages he would recover, if he had received damages, whether recovered or voluntarily given, I will not stop to consider. I cannot see why he should not recover over again. He might say that his transaction with the other omnibus was res inter alios. But supposing he recovered yet did not get paid, he clearly would be entitled to get his damages from the owner of the omnibus in which he was a passenger. Should it be said, why of him, who also could say, I did not do it, it was the act of another added to mine? the answer would be, "You broke your contract with me to drive me with care, and not negligently." But take the case put in argument of injury not to a passenger but to one of the public by separate acts of negligence in two persons, which acts conjoined caused the injury. This is a case I suggested during the argument in Armstrong v. Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Company (ubi sup.). Such a case it is not easy to imagine, but let us suppose it. I should say an action might be maintained against the two jointly. If their conduct was wilful it clearly might be, and I do not know why its being negligent should make a difference. Let it be remembered that the defence is: I did not do it; my act alone did you no harm; you would not have been damaged but for the default of the man with whom you made a contract which he broke, and the breach of which made my act a danger and hurt to you. Had you yourself been guilty of the default, I should not be liable; why should I, when the default is that of the person you employ while he is acting in that employment? These considerations are applicable to the passenger. But what about the engineer? I suppose, as far as his employer is concerned, he could maintain no claim against him; he would be held to have taken the risk of negligence in his fellow-servants. But he might perhaps have a valid claim against the fellow-servant, and would be met with the same argument as the passenger, viz., "I did not do it, it was the result of two acts, mine and that of the other vessel." It seems impossible to suppose that the engineer, a person employed on the vessel, would have a better or worse case than the passenger. Further, it must be remembered that the cause of the damage may be, not negligence, no breach of duty, but error of judgment in one driver and negligence of the grossest kind in the other. Is the former to be liable for all the damage? These considerations seem to me of great weight, and raise difficulties that will have to be faced, but I will examine those on the other side. A plaintiff in a case like these says: Truly, you, the defendant or your servants, were guilty of a breach of your duty to the public. You drove or navigated negligently on the highway or high seas where I had a right to be. If not precisely the cause or sole cause of the harm that befell me, if not the causâ causans, your tortious act was the cause without which I should not have sustained harm. Why am I to seek further or prove more? Perhaps someone else is liable to me. How does that affect my right to complain of you? You are a wrongdoer. Suppose the other wrongdoer is insolvent or dead. You complain that you will be made liable for damage that you have only in part caused: but if you succeed you will pay no part of that damage. You have no right to be heard to confess that you are a wrongdoer, and yet contend there is no liability. If you had done wilfully what you did; that is, if you had wilfully driven hazardously, hoping the other driver would have avoided its own merits. The decision has not met with general acceptance, and it cannot be represented as an authority upon which a course of practice has followed, or upon which persons guilty, or intending to be guilty, of contributory negligence are entitled to rely. When the combined negligence of two or more individuals, who are not acting in concert, results in personal injury to one of them, he cannot recover compensation from the others, for the obvious reason that, but for his own neglect, he would have sustained no harm. Upon the same principle, individuals who are injured, without being personally negligent, are nevertheless disabled from recovering damages if at the time they stood in such a relation to any one of the actual wrongdoers as to imply their responsibility for his act or default. That constructive fault, which implies the liability of those to whom it is imputable to make reparation to an innocent sufferer, must also have the effect of barring all claims at their instance against others who are in pari delicto, is a proposition at once intelligible and reasonable. If they are within the incidence of the maxim, Qui facit per alium facit per se, there can be no reason why it should apply in questions between them and the outside public, and not in questions between them and their fellow wrongdoers. But the facts which were before the court in Thorogood v. Bryan do not appear to me to bring the case within that principle. My noble and learned friend, Lord Bramwell, who is so conversant with the intricacies of English pleading, suggested in the course of the argument a technical ground upon which the decision in Thorogood v. Bryan might be justified. In that view, the case would not be an authority for the appellants, who accordingly supported the reason assigned for the judgment, which was simply this, that the deceased passenger, by taking his seat on the omnibus, became so far identified with its driver that the negligence of its driver was imputable to him in any question with the driver or owner of the other omnibus which ran over him and was the immediate cause of his death. Coltman and Cresswell, JJ. express themselves in terms which, if literally understood, would lead to the conclusion that he would also have been responsible for damage solely attributable to the fault of the driver. Coltman, J. said: "Having trusted the party, by selecting the particular conveyance, the plaintiff has so far indentified himself with the owner and her servants that, if any injury results from their negligence, he must be considered a party to it." Maule, J. was careful to limit his observations to the case before him. "I incline to think," said the learned judge, "that for this purpose (i.e., recovering damages from the defendant) the deceased must be considered as identified with the owner of the omnibus in which he voluntarily became a passenger, and that the negligence of the driver was the negligence of the deceased." I do not think the very eminent judges who decided Thorogood v. Bryan intended to affirm that the deceased, by taking his seat in the omnibus, incurred the same responsibility for the negligent acts of the driver as if the latter had been his servant. If they did you, there could be no doubt of your liability. But in point of law there is no difference between liability for wilfulness and for negligence or want of skill. Perhaps the suggested hardship of a part causer of the damage being made liable for the whole may be met by holding that he is not, that the right of action against the other lessens the damages against the one. These last arguments have prevailed with me. The defendant is a wrongdoer. Damage has resulted to the plaintiff which would not have resulted but for such wrongdoing. The plaintiff is not concerned with difficulties and hardships beyond his own. I think, therefore, that the judgment must be affirmed; but I cannot say confidently. As to the authorities, Thorogood v. Bryan (ubi sup.) was decided by a very strong court. They decided it on principle, and not on the pleadings. The expression used by them, "identified," is not satisfactory, but it represents and conveys an idea, I believe the same as that which I have elaborated, viz., the defendant's act or default did not cause the damage. It was preceded by Bridge v. Grand Junction Railway Company (ubi sup.), which points in the same direction. So also in Vanderplank v. Miller (Moo. & M. 169), which I think plain enough. There is also the case of Armstrong v. Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Company (ubi sup.), which, as James, L.J. used to say of himself, is an authority though I joined in the decision. There is also the case of Waite v. North-Eastern Railway Company (E. B. & E. 719), where the child could maintain no action, because, as Lord Campbell said, "It was so identified with its grandmother," who was carrying it. It is true he offered no opinion on Thorogood v. Bryan (ubi sup.) and such cases, but I cannot see the difference. As to the judgments in the courts below, they have not, I consider, dealt with the question that I have elaborated, viz., Is the defendant guilty; did he cause the mischief? The Master of the Rolls argues: "If no fault can be attributed to the plaintiff, and there is negligence by the defendant and also by another independent person, both negligences partly directly causing the accident," the person injured can maintain an action for all the damages occasioned to him against either wrongdoer. Can he? If so, there is an end of the matter. Can he when his claim against one is for breach of contract and against the other for a tort? Can he where he is a gratuitous passenger in a carriage of one wrongdoer? Lindley, L.J. says, speaking of Armstrong v. Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Company (ubi sup.): "If the proximate cause of the injury was the combined negligence of the two companies, I confess my inability to understand upon what principle the plaintiff could be held not entitled to sue either company, or, in other words, to be without a remedy." With submission, this is a mistake. If the plaintiff could maintain no action against his own company, it was because he had not bargained for care on their part, and they had done him no wrong. Lopes, J. is very hard on Thorogood v. Bryan, and says, "The theory of identification is a fallacy and a fiction contrary to sound law, and every principle of justice," and that the passenger may maintain an action against either wrongdoer, or "both." With great respect I venture to doubt the last statement. The judges then have dealt with the question I have stated. Whether it did not occur to them, or was not thought worthy of notice, I know not. The same may be said of the American cases. As to what Parke, B. said, I set the greatest value on everything from him, but his respect for Willes, J. would make him query anything that that learned judge queried. I may be permitted to meet this original style of authority by another and of the same kind, and say that he (Lord Wensleydale) once told me of a reported decision that he had written "wrong" against it, which he would done against Thorogood v. Bryan if he had thought it so. I am not much helped by the authorities. I will only say that, if the proposed judgment is right, for the reasons I gave Waite v. Northern Railway Company (ubi sup.) was wrongly decided. The abstract question must be decided on principle. I do not pretend to have a confident opinion on it, but I think the judgment right, and should be affirmed. I think so on the ground that in such cases the defendant is a wrongdoer without whose wrongdoing the plaintiff would not have been damaged; that he cannot be heard to say that there is some other wrongdoer who contributed to the damage; that, as far as the sufferer is concerned, it matters not whether that other wrongdoer was so in a joint or separate act.—ED.

mean to do so their conclusion might be perfectly logical, but their premises would be directly at variance with the principles laid down in Quarman v. Burnett (6 M. & W. 499), which I have always regarded, and still regard, as a sound and authoritative precedent. If they did not, then they have affirmed that a passenger, travelling by a public conveyance, may be so unconnected with the driver as to be exempt from liability for his negligence, and yet be so identified with him as to lose all right of action against wrongdoers whose negligence, in combination with that of the driver, has occasioned personal injury to himself. That is a proposition which it is very difficult to understand. It must be a singular kind of relationship, and created by very exceptional circumstances, which results in the superior being affected by his inferior's negligence, in a question with wrongdoers, and not in a question with persons who are themselves free from blame. It humbly appears to me that the identification upon which the decision in Thorogood v. Bryan is based has no foundation in fact. I am of opinion that there is no relation constituted between the driver of an omnibus and its ordinary passengers which can justify the inference that they are identified to any extent whatever with his negligence. He is the servant of the owner, not their servant; he does not look to them for orders, and they have no right to interfere with his conduct of the vehicle, except, perhaps, the right of remonstrance when he is doing, or threatens to do, something that is wrong and inconsistent with their safety. Practically they have no greater measure of control over his actions than the passenger in a railway train has over the conduct of the engine-driver. I am therefore unable to assent to the principle upon which the case of Thorogood v. Bryan rests. In my opinion, an ordinary passenger by an omnibus, or by a ship, is not affected, either in a question with contributory wrongdoers or with innocent third parties, by the negligence, in the one case, of the driver, and, in the other, of the master and crew by whom the ship is navigated, unless he actually assumes control over their actions, and thereby occasions mischief. In that case he must of course be responsible for the consequences of his interference.

Counsel for the appellants endeavoured to support Thorogood v. Bryan upon a totally different principle from that assigned by the learned judges who decided the case. They argued alternatively that the maxim Respondeat superior does not apply, and that passengers are affected by the wrongful acts of the driver, not because he is in any sense their servant, or subject to their control, but by reason of their being, for the time, under his dominion. Waite v. North-Eastern Railway Company (E. B. & E. 719) was the authority relied on in support of this branch of the argument. But there is no analogy between the position of an infant incapable of taking care of itself and that of a passenger sui juris; and the theory that an adult passenger places himself under the guardianship of the driver, so as to be affected by his negligence, appears to me to be absolutely without foundation, either in fact or law. I therefore concur in the judgment which has been moved.

Lord MACNAGHTEN.—My Lords: I concur in the motion which has been proposed, and in the reasons upon which it has been founded.

COURT OF APPEAL.

Monday, Dec. 12, 1887.

(Before Lord ESHER, M.R., BOWEN and FRY, L.JJ., assisted by NAUTICAL ASSESSORS.)

THE MARY LOHDEN. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM BUTT, J.

Collision — River Tees Conservancy Bye-laws, arts. 17, 18—Breach of.

Arts. 17 and 18 of the River Tees Conservancy Bye-laws, providing that ships shall keep "the starboard side of the river so that the port helm may always be applied," and that a "steamship, when approaching another ship on an opposite course or from an opposite direction, shall before approaching within thirty yards slacken her speed, and keep as near as possible to the starboard side of the river," are to be observed even when vessels are approaching one another so as to show each other their green lights, and nothing will excuse the non-observance of these rules but extreme necessity.

THIS was an appeal by the plaintiffs in a collision action from a decision of Butt, J., finding their vessel the G. M. B. solely to blame.

The collision occurred in the river Tees about 7 a.m. on the 15th Jan. 1887.

The facts alleged on behalf of the plaintiffs were as follows:

Shortly before 7.10 a.m. on the 15th Jan., the G. M. B., a steamer of 382 tons, bound on a voyage from Middlesbrough to Grangemouth, with a cargo of pig iron and soda, was on the south side of the river Tees close to the buoys off the upper part of Eston Jetty. The weather was foggy and calm. The G. M. B. was heading down the river, and was stationary or nearly so, her engines having been previously and still being stopped on account of fog. She was under a slight starboard helm to keep her clear of the buoys off Eston Jetty, and her steam-whistle was being duly sounded. In these circumstances those on board the G. M. B. saw the green and masthead lights of a steamer (which proved to be the defendants' steamship the Mary Lohden) bearing between one and two points on their starboard bow at a distance of about 400 yards and close to the south shore. The Mary Lohden was taken to be a vessel going to Eston Jetty. The whistle of the G. M. B. was then blown two short blasts, but the Mary Lohden continued to come ahead, and when she got within 150 yards of the G. M. B., opened her red light. Thereupon the G. M. B.'s engines were immediately reversed full speed astern, but the Mary Lohden continued to come on at considerable speed, and with her stem and starboard bow struck the G. M. B. on the starboard side in the way of the foreriggging, cutting a large hole in her, and doing her so much damage that it was necessary to beach her. The G. M. B. was accordingly run ashore higher up the river, but the Mary Lohden coming on again struck the G. M. B. on her starboard quarter.

The facts alleged on behalf of the defendants were as follows:

Shortly before 6.40 a.m. on the 15th Jan., the Mary Lohden, a steamship of 875 tons register, whilst on a voyage from Bilbao to Middlesborough laden with a cargo of iron ore, was proceeding up the river Tees a little to the north of Mid-channel, at a speed of between two and three knots an hour. The weather was thick. In the circumstances those on board the Mary Lohden observed the masthead light of the G. M. B. from three to four hundred yards distant and about right ahead, and immediately afterwards the green light of the G. M. B. came into view on about the same bearing. The whistle of the Mary Lohden was blown one short blast, and her helm ported in order to pass the G. M. B. port side to port side, and when the Mary Lohden was close to the north side of the river her helm was steadied, but the G. M. B. was observed to be coming towards the Mary Lohden under a starboard helm, and thereby causing danger of collision. The engines of the Mary Lohden were immediately reversed full speed, her whistle blown three short blasts, and her helm put hard-aport. The G. M. B., however, coming on with her starboard side struck the stem of the Mary Lohden, and did her great damage.

The plaintiffs (inter alia) charged the defendants with negligence in not navigating the Mary Lohden on the north side of the river, and also with improperly attempting to cross the bows of the G. M. B.

The defendants (inter alia) charged the plaintiffs with improperly starboading, and with improperly neglecting to keep the G. M. B. on her starboard side of the river, and to pass the Mary Lohden port side to port side.

By the River Tees Conservancy Bye-laws:

Clause 17. Every ship navigating the river shall keep the starboard side, so that the port helm may always be applied to clear vessels proceeding in the opposite direction.

Clause 18. Every steamship, when approaching another ship on an opposite course or from an opposite direction, shall, before approaching within thirty yards, slacken her speed and keep as near as possible to the starboard side of the river, so as to afford the greatest facility for passing the approaching ship.

The learned judge below found that both vessels were some distance to the north of the line of buoys along the south shore, and that, as they approached one another, the Mary Lohden ported and the G. M. B. starboarded, and for this starboarding, in contravention of the bye-laws, he found the G. M B. solely to blame.

Myburgh, Q.C. (with him Hollams), for the plaintiffs, in support of the appeal.—The Mary Lohden was solely to blame. True, the rules require vessels to pass port side to port side; but here the circumstances were such as to make the rule inapplicable. As a matter of fact, the Mary Lohden was within the line of buoys on the south shore, and therefore broad on the starboard bow of the G. M. B. If so, it was most improper to port out across the bows of the G. M. B. It was never intended that the port helm rule should be applied where vessels are broad on each other's starboard bows. Those on the G. M. B., seeing a green light on their starboard bow, were justified in starboarding, and, but for the wrongful porting of the Mary Lohden, the collision would never have happened.

Hall, Q.C. and J. G. Barnes, for the defendants, were not called upon.

Lord Esher, M.R.—I think Mr. Myburgh has taken the only point which can excuse his clients. He contends that the Mary Lohden was coming up inside these buoys, and that she suddenly ported and came outside. I agree with the learned judge that, if that were so, the Mary Lohden would have acted wrongly. But I also think that even then the G. M. B. was not in the right; but I do not care to inquire into that. Mr. Myburgh puts his case upon this, that the Mary Lohden came out from the inside of these buoys, and he very rightly admits that unless he can make that out he must fail. With that I agree. If these vessels were navigating at all near the centre of the river, whether they were rather to the one side of mid-channel or to the other, or even much to the one side or much to the other, the rule of the river is clear, that the moment they are coming near to each other they shall both port. Now what did happen? Why one of them ported and the other starboarded. Therefore the one that starboarded broke the rule of the river, and the other that ported kept the rule of the river. Now, what shall excuse a ship on the Tees which breaks a rule of the river? I say nothing but extreme necessity. To argue that one was a little on the port bow of the other, or that one showed for a moment a green light or a red light on one bow or the other, is wholly immaterial. It is equally immaterial whether they were going on parallel courses, end on, or nearly end on. The rule of the river is, that unless there is extreme necessity they shall both of them port, so that one can go on one side and the other on the other side of the river. Now, the G. M. B. broke that rule and the other observed it.

Can the G. M. B. be excused on the ground of its being a wholly exceptional case? She cannot unless the Mary Lohden was inside the buoys. Now the learned judge below was advised by his assessors that they did not believe she was inside these buoys. It was not suggested that the Mary Lohden had gone in there purposely, but had done so inadvertently. There was a pilot on the bridge. It is not suggested he was neglecting his duty. He had his glasses in his hand, and the fog was not thick enough to make him blunder. I have asked the gentlemen who assist us, and they say they do not believe the ship was inside these buoys. It might be that we might differ from them. We should be very loth to do so, but as a matter of fact I agree with them. As to whether these two ships were more or less in the centre I have my own views. Probably they were neither of them so near the centre as is suggested. I want to lay down this rule with regard to the navigation of the Tees, that whether the green light was for a moment seen on the starboard side of the G. M. B. or not, unless the Mary Lohden was so close to the shore as to justify the G. M. B. in breaking the rule, the rule is most distinct and clear.

As to the second collision, I am of opinion that the Mary Lohden was following to assist the other vessel, which was a proper and seamanlike thing to do, and would have been to blame if she had not done so. The other vessel stopping suddenly by taking the ground, the Mary Lohden had not a fair opportunity of seeing her before she touched her, and then touched her with extreme lightness. I am therefore of opinion that the judgment of the learned judge was right, and that this appeal must be dismissed.

(Before CHITTY, J.)

Re THE MISSOURI STEAMSHIP COMPANY LIMITED; MONROE'S CLAIM. (a)

Contract of affreightment—Conflict of laws—Law of the flag — "Lex loci contractus"—Charter-party—Bill of lading—Special exemption.

A claim was made by an American citizen in the winding-up of a British steamship company for damages for the loss of his cattle arising through the negligence of the master and crew. The ship in which the cattle were carried was a British ship trading between Boston and Liverpool. The charter-party contained express stipulations exempting the company from liability caused by the negligence of the master and crew. The cattle were shipped at Boston, and bills of lading were given there, in conformity with the contract. The ship stranded on the coast of North Wales owing, as was admitted, to the negligence of the master and crew. According to the law of the State of Massachusetts, as at present ascertained, the stipulations exempting the owners from liability through negligent navigation were void; but according to English law such stipulations were good, and were usually inserted in English bills of lading. The question was whether the law of the flag (that is to say, the personal law of the shipowner) or the lex loci contractus should govern the contract of affreightment.

Held, on the authority of Lloyd v. Guibert (13 L. T. Rep. N. S. 602; 2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 283; L. Rep. 1 Q. B. 115), that the stipulations were valid, first, on the general ground that the contract was governed by the law of the flag; and secondly, on the particular ground that from the special provisions of the contract itself it appeared that the parties were contracting with a view to the law of England.

THE Missouri Steamship Company was a limited company registered in England, and owned the steamship Missouri, which was one of a line of steamers trading between United States ports and Liverpool, known as the "Warren Line."

(a) Reported by A. COYSGARNE SIM, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The managers of the line were George Warren and Co. Their agents in America were Warren and Co., who did the business of the steamers there.

The s.s. Missouri was registered at the Custom-house at Liverpool, and sailed under the British flag.

On the 4th Jan. 1883 a contract was entered into between Albert N. Monroe, of Boston, a citizen of the United States of America, and Warren and Co., on behalf of the company, for the carriage by the s.s. Missouri of 400 sheep from Boston to Liverpool. The contract was signed at Boston, and contained the following clause:

When the animals are shipped bills of lading will be issued for them, and said bills of lading will contain stipulations to the following effect to which the shipper hereby agrees, viz.:

Ship not accountable for the acts of God, the Queen's enemies, pirates, robbers, or thieves, barratry of master, or mariners, restraints of princes, rulers, or people, loss or damage, mortality or injury resulting from any of the following perils, whether arising from the negligence, default, or error in judgment of the master, mariners, engineers, or others of the crew or otherwise howsoever, namely, accidents to fittings, disease, stress of weather, want of space, air, or water, accidents to condensing apparatus, tanks, or machinery, diminishing or injuring the supply of water or air, risk of craft, explosion, or fire, in port or at sea, in craft or on shore, before lading or after unlading, accidents from steam machinery or boilers, or any damage or injury thereto, however caused, nor for collision, stranding, or any other accident or peril of the seas, rivers, and steam navigation, of whatever nature or kind soever, howsoever such collision, stranding, or other accident or peril may be caused. Liberty is reserved to the ship, her agents, officers, and owners, in the event of the said ship's putting back to Boston, or into any port, or otherwise being prevented from any cause from proceeding in the ordinary course of her voyage, to tranship the animals by any other steamer, and liberty is also reserved to sail with or without pilots, to call at any intermediate port or ports, and to tow and assist vessels in all situations.

The contract was a printed one. The form of it was prepared in England, and had been in use by the s.s. Missouri, and other steamships of the Warren line, for a number of years prior to 1883. It was the only form of contract adopted by the Warren line in carrying cattle.

The bills of lading for the 400 sheep shipped by A. N. Monroe on board the s.s. Missouri at Boston to be carried to Liverpool were signed on the 7th March 1883, and contained the clause as to exceptions mentioned in the contract and set out above.

On the 8th March 1883 the s.s. Missouri sailed from Boston, and whilst on her voyage to Liverpool she rendered salvage services to the s.s. City of Chester, which were subsequently the subject of a salvage action in the Admiralty Court in England.

Owing to the deviation and consequent delay caused by the rendering of such salvage services, the sheep were exposed to much additional wear and tear and knocking about upon the voyage, in consequence whereof eleven sheep died and the remainder were seriously damaged and reduced in value.

On the 6th Feb. 1886 a contract was made between J. A. Hathaway, who was an American citizen resident at Boston, and Warren and Co., on behalf of the company, for the carriage by the s.s. Missouri of cattle from Boston to Liverpool. The contract was exactly similar in form to the previous one.

A part of the space taken under such contract was sublet to A. N. Monroe, and an indorsement to that effect was made on the contract.

Under that contract A. N. Monroe, on the 17th Feb. 1886, shipped 264 fat cattle on board the s.s. Missouri at Boston to be carried to Liverpool. The bills of lading for the cattle were signed on the 17th Feb. 1886, and were exactly similar in form to the previous bills of lading.

The s.s. Missouri sailed from Boston on the 18th Feb. 1886, and in course of her voyage ran ashore on the coast of North Wales and became a total wreck. All the cattle went into the sea and were lost in consequence of such stranding. A Board of Trade inquiry was afterwards held at Liverpool to inquire into the cause of the stranding. The court found that it was due to negligent and careless navigation on the part of those on board and in charge of the vessel on behalf of her owners.

The company then went into voluntary liquidation. Frank Shaw, Frederick Massey, and Frederic Warren, jun., members of the firm of George Warren and Co., of Liverpool, were appointed liquidators.

The usual advertisements for claims were issued, and the only one sent in was that of A. N. Monroe, which was as follows:

Take notice, that Albert N. Monroe, of Boston, in the State of Massachusetts, one of the United States of America, claims to be entitled to 6751*l.* 17*s.* 3*d.* from the estate of the Missouri Steamship Company Limited for damages sustained by him owing to the wrongful acts and breaches of contract of the said company, or their servants, or agents, of which the following are the particulars:

(1.) 133*l.* 13*s.* 7*d.* damages for the loss of eleven and deterioration of the remainder of 400 sheep shipped by the said A. N. Monroe at Boston aforesaid for Liverpool on or about March 7, 1883, in the steamship Missouri, belonging to the said company, under a contract made at Boston aforesaid, between the said A. N. Monroe and the agents at that place of the said company on the 4th January 1883. The said loss and deterioration were caused by those in charge of the said steamship on behalf of the said company by wrongfully and in breach of the said contract deviating from and delaying upon the said voyage, and exposing the said sheep to improper hardships and risks.

(2.) 6618*l.* 3*s.* 8*d.* damages for the loss of 264 cattle shipped by the said A. N. Monroe at Boston aforesaid for Liverpool on or about the 17th of February 1886, in the said steamship, under a contract made on the 6th of February 1886, at Boston aforesaid, originally between one J. A. Hathaway, of Boston, and the said agents of the said company, and subsequently transferred by agreement with the said agents to the said A. N. Monroe so far as regarded so much of the said steamship as was afterwards occupied by the said 264 cattle. The said company wholly failed to deliver any of the said cattle to the said A. N. Monroe, or to his consignees. The cattle were destroyed by those in charge of the said steamship on behalf of the said company by wrongfully navigating the said steamship in a negligent and reckless manner.

The said A. N. Monroe holds no security whatever for his said claims, or any part thereof.

In support of A. N. Monroe's claim an affidavit was made by an attorney of Boston stating that, according to the law of the United States, the company was liable to A. N. Monroe for the claim which he had put forward. The reason for his opinion was stated to be that, according to decided cases in American law, a common carrier could not lawfully stipulate by special contract for exemption from responsibility for the negligence of the carriers or his servants.

The liquidators, on the other hand, obtained affidavits from attorneys at New York giving a resumé of the American decisions bearing on the point; also affidavits from several other attorneys in America. The result of them appeared to be that the American law applicable to the circumstances of the present case had never been finally settled; but that the point was being raised in the case of the Montana, which was at present under appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States.

The liquidators' answer to A. N. Monroe's claim was that it should be decided according to English law, and not according to the law of the United States; and that, according to the former law, the claimant would be bound by the terms of the contracts and bills of lading, by which the owners of the s.s. Missouri had liberty to tow vessels and were exempted from the consequences of the negligence of their servants.

The grounds upon which the liquidators contended that English law should govern the contract were:

1. That the s.s. Missouri, being a British owned steamer, and sailing under the British flag, the law of the flag should apply.

2. That the contract should be construed according to the law of the place of performance; and that the contract was one to be wholly, or at all events principally, performed in England, the object of the contract being the carriage of the cattle in an English ship, and delivery of them in an English port, the freight only being payable on the arrival of the steamer, or any of the animals, at the port of destination.

3. That if the contract was void, according to the law of one of the countries of the contracting parties, it should be construed according to the law of the country where it was valid, which in this case was England; and that if the contract contained stipulations which were illegal according to American law, it should be interpreted according to the law of England, as on entering into the contract the parties must be taken to have intended to give effect to the terms to which they mutually agreed, and not to treat them as null and void.

A summons, under sect. 138 of the Companies Act 1862, was taken out, on behalf of the liquidators, asking that it might be determined whether the claim against the company by A. N. Monroe ought, or ought not, to be allowed by the liquidators.

The summons was adjourned into court, and now came on to be heard. It was admitted for the purpose of the present claim that the stranding of the Missouri occurred through the negligence of the master and crew.

Cur. adv. vult.

Feb. 28.—The following written judgment was delivered by CHITTY, J.—This is a claim by Mr. Monroe against the Missouri Steamship Company Limited for damages for loss of his sheep and cattle. Mr. Monroe is a citizen of the United States, domiciled there. The company is an English company, incorporated according to English law, and domiciled in England. The company is in voluntary liquidation. The contracts under which the claim is made were made at Boston, where the company had an agent by whom contracts were entered into on their part. The ship in which the goods were to be carried was a British ship (The Missouri), and one of a line of steamships trading regularly between Boston and Liverpool. The contracts were for the carriage of the sheep and cattle from Boston to Liverpool, and they contained express stipulations exempting the shipowners from liability for loss or damage arising from negligence of the master or crew, and they provided that bills of lading should be given containing stipulations to the same effect. The company's agent had no authority to bind the company by any contract not containing such stipulations as those which were actually inserted. The sheep and cattle were shipped on board at Boston, and bills of lading were given and accepted there in conformity with the contracts. The ship sailed and was stranded on the Welsh coast. It is admitted for the purpose of the present case that the stranding occurred through the negligence of the master and crew.

In these circumstances it is clear and is admitted by the claimant's counsel that he is not entitled to recover if the stipulations exempting the shipowners from liability arising from the negligence of their servants are valid. But it is contended for the claimant that the stipulations are invalid according to the law of the State of Massachusetts, where the contracts were in fact made, and the bills of lading given and accepted. There was no substantial contest before me as to the present state of the law of Massachusetts on the subject. According to that law the stipulations are invalid. The grounds upon which the decisions at present stand are that stipulations by which a common carrier endeavours to exempt himself from the consequences of the negligence of himself or his servants are considered to be extorted by the carrier without any real assent on the part of the person sending the goods, and are void as being contrary to public policy. In The Brantford City (29 Federal Reporter, 373), these principles were held to apply in favour of the shipper at Boston of cattle on board a British vessel for carriage to England, where the facts were substantially the same as those in the present case. The law in the United States on this subject, however, appears not to be finally settled. The question is apparently pending in the Supreme Court in the case of the Montana, on appeal from the circuit court. The Supreme Court has given leave to the appellants to adduce evidence to show what is the English law on the subject. The arguments have been concluded, and the judgment has been reserved. But, as after inquiry I am unable to ascertain that some considerabe time may not elapse before the judgment is given, and as it is not clear that the judgment will determine the point, I have not thought it right to any longer postpone my decision. Should the judgment of the Supreme Court be in favour of the shipowner on the question of the validity of the stipulation, Mr. Monroe's claim before me must fail. I proceed, then, to consider the question on the assumption that, according to the law of Massachusetts, the stipulations are void. The question to be determined is whether the law of England or the law of Massachusetts ought to be applied to the stipulations which purport to exempt the shipowners from liability for negligence. For the claimant it is argued that the question, being a question as to the validity of the terms of the contracts, ought to be determined according to the law of the place where the contracts were made. For the shipowners, on the other hand, it is argued that the question ought to be determined according to the law of the country to which the ship belongs.

As the stipulations in the contracts and the bills of lading are identical there is no occasion to treat these documents separately. Now, the question does not relate to the formal validity of the contracts, and the objection raised by the claimant does not go to the validity in matters of substance of the contract as a whole. So far as relates to all matters of form the contracts are valid according to the law of both countries. So far as relates to all matters of substance the rest of the contracts would, if the stipulations attached had not been inserted, stand valid according to the law of both countries. Further, the stipulations are not impeached on the ground that they are of a criminal or wicked or immoral nature, or such as ought not to be permitted according to the laws of civilised countries. They are impeached solely on the ground that they are void as being disallowed by the law of the place where the contracts were made, which law considers them contrary to its own view of the public policy that ought to prevail within the limits of its own territorial jurisdiction. Although by the law of Massachusetts, in the case of a contract in Massachusetts by a common carrier for the carriage of goods wholly within the territories of the State, such stipulations would be held void, yet I cannot find any sufficient reason for saying that they would also be held to be void in the case of a contract made within the State for the carriage of goods where the performance of the contract was (as in the case before me) to take place mainly outside the State, if it were declared expressly on the face of the contract that for all purposes the contract was to be governed by the law of the country to which the ship belonged, and the law of such country allowed the stipulations to be valid. In other words, I apprehend that the law of Massachusetts would not prohibit the parties to such a contract from contracting expressly with a view to the law of England: (see Lord Mansfield's judgment in Robinson v. Bland, 2 Burr, p. 1077; and Story's Conflict of Laws, 8th edit., sects. 280 and 281.) The contracts before me do not contain any such express declaration. But I have examined and endeavoured to ascertain the precise nature of the objection raised, with this result as it appears to me, that it was within the competence of the parties according to the law of both countries to enter into the contracts.

Two cases of high authority were relied upon by the company's counsel in support of their contention: (Lloyd v. Guibert, 2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 283; 13 L. T. Rep. N. S. 602; L. Rep. 1 Q. B. 115; and The Peninsular and Oriental Steam Navigation Company v. Shand, 3 Moo. P. C. Cas., in the Exchequer Chamber, N. S. 272.) The actual decisions in these cases may not precisely govern the present case, but the question is whether the principle upon which these decisions were based does not apply. It is generally agreed that the law of the place where the contract is made is primâ facie, that which the parties intended or ought to be presumed to have adopted as the footing upon which they dealt, and that such law ought therefore to prevail in the absence of the circumstances indicating a different intention. Numerous instances of the exception are to be found in the books. A different intention—that is, an intention to be bound by some other law than the law of the place where the contract is made—may be inferred from the subject-matter of the contract and from the surrounding circumstances, so far as they are relevant to determine the character of the contract: (see the judgment of Willes, J. in Lloyd v. Guibert (ubi sup.), pp. 122-123.) The terms and stipulations found in the contract itself are matters of importance to be taken into consideration as to the true inference to be drawn. The general principle by which the Court of Exchequer was guided in the solution of the question as to what law ought to prevail was that "the rights of the parties to a contract are to be judged by that law by which they may justly be presumed to have bound themselves" (Lloyd v. Guibert, p. 123), and by the steady application of that principle the court arrived at the conclusion that where the contract of affreightment does not provide otherwise, then as between the parties to such contract, in respect of sea damage and its incidents, the law of the ship should govern. In Lloyd v. Guibert the ship was a French ship, the contract was made at a Danish West India port (St. Thomas), and the goods were shipped at Hayti to be delivered at Havre, London, or Liverpool, at the charterer's option. The court held that the law of France applied whereby the shipowners, on abandonment of the ship and freight, were exempt from any liability to the owner of the cargo, and rejected the law of Denmark and the various other countries put forward on behalf of the owner of the cargo. In the course of the judgment the various places in which the contract was to be performed were pointed out (see p. 122). But in adopting the French law the court relied on the subject-matter of the contract—the employment of a seagoing vessel for a service the greater and more onerous part of which was to be rendered on the high seas, where, for all purposes of jurisdiction criminal and civil, with respect to all persons, things, and transactions on board, she was, as it were, a floating island over which France had as absolute, and for all purposes of peace as exclusive a sovereignty as over her dominions on land, and which, even while in a foreign port, was never completely removed from French jurisdiction (see p. 127). These practical considerations formed the main ground of the judgment. The court declined to enter into any question as to the policy of the French law. I have quoted somewhat extensively from this judgment in order to shew that the principle upon which it proceeds is not confined to the particular facts of that case, but is applicable, and ought to be applied, not merely to questions of construction and the rights incidental to or arising out of the contract of affreightment, but to questions as to the validity of stipulations in the contract itself. Any distinction founded on the difference of these questions would not rest on substantial grounds, and would lead to uncertainty and confusion in mercantile transactions of this character. It is just to presume that in reference to all such questions the parties have submitted themselves to the law of one country only—namely, that of the flag—and so to hold is to adopt a simple, natural, and consistent rule: (see Westlake's Private International Law, 2nd edit., p. 201.) In Lloyd v. Guibert (ubi sup.) there were no express stipulations pointing to the law of one country rather than to the law of some other country. But in the Peninsular and Oriental Company v. Shand (ubi sup.), where also it was held that the contract was governed by the law of the flag, there were such stipulations. Turner, L.J., in delivering the judgment of the Privy Council, inquired into the actual intentions of the contracting parties as disclosed on the face of the contract. In that case the contract was made between British subjects in England substantially for safe carriage from Southampton to Mauritius. The performance was to commence in an English vessel in an English port; to be continued in vessels which for this purpose carried their country with them; to be fully completed in Mauritius; but liable to breach, partial or entire, in several other countries in which the vessel might be in the course of the voyage. Into this contract there was introduced a stipulation professing to limit the liability of the shipowner, which stipulation was valid according to the law of England but invalid according to the law of Mauritius. In discussing the intention of the parties, the Lord Justice asked (in substance) whether it was intended that the stipulation should be construed according to English law (which would give effect to it) or according to French law or some other law (which would give no effect to it). And he held that the actual intention of the parties must be taken clearly to have been to treat the contract as an English contract to be interpreted according to English law, and that as there was no rule of general law or policy setting up a contrary presumption the court below was wrong in not governing itself according to those rules.

Now the difference in fact between that case and the present is that in that case the parties were both British subjects, and the contract was made in England, whereas in the present case one only of the parties is English and the contract was made in Boston. But these differences, though proper to be taken into consideration on the general question, have little or no bearing on the question of the intention of the parties to be inferred from the particular stipulations. "In determining a question between contracting parties" (to quote once more from the judgment in Lloyd v. Guibert, p. 120) "recourse must first be had to the language of the contract itself, and (force, fraud, and mistake apart) the true construction of the language of the contract (lex contractus) is the touchstone of legal right." The circumstance that the stipulations which the claimant asks to have struck out of the contracts are allowed by the law of one country and disallowed by the law of the other country affords a cogent reason for holding that the parties were contracting with reference to the law of the country which allowed, and not to the law of the country which disallowed, the stipulations. It is unreasonable to presume that the parties inserted in the contracts stipulations which they intended should be nugatory and void. But on the facts of this case a more limited proposition may be adopted. The loss accrued through the negligence of the shipowners' servants within the territorial waters, not of Massachusetts, but of Wales—that is, a country where English law prevails. Conceding that it would be possible (without saying that it would be reasonable) to presume that the parties contracted with reference to the law of Massachusetts in respect of any loss by negligence occurring within the territorial waters of that State, it appears to me that it would be unreasonable to presume that they contracted with reference to the law of that State in respect of a loss by negligence occurring outside the limits of the State. I hold that the stipulations are valid—first, on the general ground that the contracts are governed by the law of the flag; and, secondly, on the particular ground that from the special provisions of the contracts themselves it appears that the parties were contracting with a view to the law of England. It is unnecessary to consider any other grounds of defence raised on behalf of the company. I therefore dismiss the claim with costs.

PROBATE, DIVORCE, AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION.

ADMIRALTY BUSINESS.

Monday, Dec. 5, 1887.

(Before BUTT, J., assisted by TRINITY MASTERS.)

THE HANSA. (a)

Collision—Improper abandonment—Consequential damage.

Where in a collision action for which the defendants were held to blame the court found that after the collision the plaintiff's vessel had been improperly abandoned, and it appeared that in consequence thereof she sank and was afterwards raised by the plaintiffs, whereas she might have been beached, the Court directed the registrar in assessing the damages, that, as the only ascertainable extra cost arising from the abandonment was the cost of raising, he was to disallow that amount.

THIS was a collision action in rem by the owners of the steamship Tom John Taylor against the owners of the steamship Hansa.

The collision occurred in the river Elbe, at about 1.30 a.m. on the 18th April 1887.

At the time of the collision the Tom John Taylor was lying at anchor and swinging to the ebb tide. Her anchor light was up, and burning brightly. In these circumstances those on the Hansa, which was coming slowly up the river, did not observe the Tom John Taylor until they were within a ship's length off. It was then seen that the Tom John Taylor was athwart the stream, with her starboard side open to the Hansa, and although the engines of the Hansa were at once reversed full speed and her helm hard-a-ported, she with her stem struck the starboard side amidships of the Tom John Taylor.

The defendants alleged that the Tom John Taylor was not carrying and exhibiting an anchor light in such a position as to be visible to those on board the Hansa. They also alleged that after the collision her crew improperly abandoned her, and that if they had not neglected to take proper measures she might have been brought into a place of safety.

It appeared at the trial that the pumps of the Tom John Taylor had not been used; that she was abandoned within half an hour after the collision; that she had steam up; and that a pilot found her afloat one hour and a half after the collision.

BUTT, J. having found the Hansa to blame, proceeded as follows:—There is another question, and that is whether there should be any direction to the registrar in assessing the damages with reference to what he should or should not find. It is said by the defendants that the plaintiffs' ship was improperly abandoned by her officers and crew. Having regard to the comparatively small injury she had sustained, to the fact that within half an hour after the collision she only made a small quantity of water, and also having regard to the fact that so far as we can judge it was several hours before she sank, we cannot help thinking that it was very unseamanlike and
